"Are Methodists cold?" asks the Chicago Chronicle. Well, if they are not they doubtless will be this winter. Coal prices are the same to them as to other people. —The Kansas City Journal.

Every one who has a garden or farm should write to T. W. Wood & Sons, Richmond, Va., for their Seed Book for 1903. It is beautifully gotten up and well pointed, and is really a complete hand-book of information, both for the garden and farm. It is peculiarly valuable to our Southern growers, as it gives practical information about the seeds best adapted to our own section.

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL

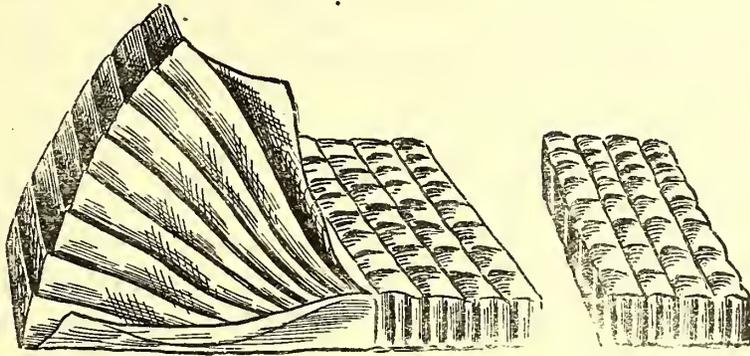

POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

March.

With a loving touch doth the March wind sweep
O'er the garden beds to-day,
And a thousand flowers stir in their sleep,
While they sweetly dream of May.

***

The pansies cunningly lift their heads
And nod as he passes by;
The good news grows, and the gladness spreads
As the sunny moments fly.

***

The hyacinths ring their perfumed bells,
And the tulips, peeping out,
Catch the herald's kiss as he gladly tells
What the stir is all about.

***

"Awake! awake!" he calls as he hies
Over garden, hill and mead,
And even the leafless forest trees
To the stirring words take heed.

***

And O, heart mine, a message, too,
Does he bring for thee to-day;
Awake! awake! and with purpose true
The March wind's call obey.

***

There are seeds of thought that sleep in thee—
God planted them long ago;—
Let them grow and blossom and fragrant be,
And thy love and loyalty show.

Event and Comment.

After all it does not hurt for a judge to have a Calvinistic back-bone.

The Chicago and Northwestern railway has stopped the hauling of freight on its branch lines on Sunday and sixty per cent. of it on the main lines, and thereby gives six thousand employes a day of rest. The corporation is not soulless that remembers that its hands are also souls.

Only eight per cent. of the people of Chicago are enrolled in the Protestant Churches. The Baptist Standard admits that the great middle class of wage earners are practically untouched by the churches. It is the Protestant problem that presses for solution in all the North, how to reach the working-men.

It is said that General Booth, of Salvation Army fame, preached at the United States Senate, the other day, for six minutes, under the invitation to offer prayer. It was the lamented humorist, Thomas B. Reed, who sent word to a House chaplain once, that he was expected to lead in prayer and not to deliver an address on the state of the Union.

Noting the wide-spread movement in favor of genuine and permanent temperance reform, The Congregationalist publishes this comment: "Two steps in temperance activity are imperatively needed: to reform liquor-selling itself, where its discontinuance is as yet impracticable, and to reform many of the reformers into broad-mindedness and charity." Hear! Hear!

If anybody has an idea that the Presbyterians are good quarrellers, he ought to subscribe to the rival Baptist papers in the State of Texas. It is claimed by one faction in both Arkansas and Texas that there is no New Testament ground for missionary organizations. There has already been a secession in Arkansas, a civil suit in Texas, some most uncivil charges of corruption and a general hullabaloo. It is characteristic of people who stand on narrow issues to magnify small questions, and the violence of the contestants increases as the square of the unimportance of the contention.

The Methodist Book Concern has not outlived the memory of the Barbee-Smith-Congressional incident long enough to show mercenary motives so soon. It sent letters to the Methodist signers of the call for the Religious Educational Association, saying: "Our publishing department is committed to the uniform lessons for the Sunday-schools and our Sunday-school periodicals are based thereon. Any disturbance . . . would greatly disarrange our publishing interests and cause an immense loss of money to the church." There is a current impression that Publication Committees were made for the Church and not vice versa.

We shall have to pass on to our Northern exchanges a joke that is too good to keep. The reader may recollect a beautifully written paragraph published on the cover page recently, entitled, Twentieth Century Presbyterianism. A note in the Editor's Chat explained that it was from the much abused "New Creed" of the Northern Church. We have received the information that our own conservative Committee of Publication was so much pleased with it that it has been considering its re-publication from the office in Richmond, giving due credit to the editor of the Presbyterian Standard for composing it. We presume that Dr. Henry Van Dyke is the author of the paragraph, and he will please try to feel complimented by the Committee's mistake.

Correcting a misstatement of a contemporary as to the falling off in church attendance, when the facts show just the contrary, the Interior rebukes the saddened sermonizer by remarking: "Whether the devil be as black as he is painted we do not pretend to say; but we do say that there would be fewer Jeremiahs in the Christian Church if the facts were more carefully sought out and comparisons more judiciously made."

In all the discussion about the genuineness of the miracles of the New Testament, it is just as well to remember that we have only shifted the argument. At first the miracles were used to prove the Christ. Now we say that Christ proves the miracles. It would be a wonder as great as it would be diabolical, that the character of the Miracle-worker could be impeached by calling in question the genuineness of his wonderful works. After all, the difference between faith and infidelity is largely the difference as to what kind of wonders to believe in, and the choice is a test of character.

From the Interior's account given elsewhere there was nothing to be so scared about in the Convention on Religious Education, which recently met in Chicago. We suppose that our esteemed contemporaries who have been on the borders of hysterics would admit that there is more ignorance of the Bible to the square foot among people who are otherwise cultured folks, than there has been since the Dark Ages. Something is wrong with modern methods of instruction in the Bible. And yet when every fact published demands the inauguration of something new, there are left those who will cry with mournful iteration, The old is better.

With President Roosevelt preaching to the American people on the evils of "race-suicide" and the blessing of large families, and Mr. William J. Bryan editorializing Congress on the duty of suppressing gambling contests, the country should be thankful that two of its most conspicuous citizens are interested in its moral welfare.

P. S. President Roosevelt's sermon was not greatly needed in these latitudes. There are 400,000 more people in Massachusetts than in Georgia. There are 200,000 more children of school age in Georgia than in Massachusetts.

We stretch out the hand of fraternal greeting to Colonel Jacob L. Greene, Episcopalian, of Hartford, Connecticut, who made an address before the National Conference of Church clubs, meeting recently in Pittsburg. He said in part:

"I regret to see how we stand aloof from our fellow Christians of other names. We dare not deny their membership in Christ himself; we do deny, some of us in terms and most of us in act, that they are properly members at all of his visible church; not for want of Christian faith or lives of faith, hope and charity, but for their want of a 'valid,' or at least a 'regular,' ministry. Let us ask of our common sense, What is the test of 'validity?' One test is always available,—the test of fruit." Proceeding to recount eloquently the debt of the world to Puritan, Huguenot, and Covenanter, and to men who have inherited their traditions, Colonel Greene went on to say: "If this has been the fruit of 'invalidity,' we may well ask, What is the advantage of 'validity?' God is not bound by precedent nor by lines of our ignorance, arrogance, prejudice or sentiment. He has not lodged the efficacy of his power in any one symbol nor surrendered his free action to the dictation of any one body. He who denies the sufficiency of independence and refuses fellowship with it, takes on himself an overwhelming responsibility."

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

We do not claim that it is the only business of the Church. One very large part of the usefulness of the Church is simply holding up before the world a high standard of righteousness. And it sometimes becomes necessary for the Church, at least in the persons of its members and officials, to take an active part in reform movements, thus supplementing by example what it teaches by precept. And while such a fight is on it is the poorest policy in the world to remind the Church of its main business, as a prominent Baptist minister did the other day, when he made a public reference to "preachers going into politics" with the result that the saloon politicians quoted him with approval on the floor of the Legislature in Raleigh.

Nevertheless, neither standard-raising nor reforming are the Church's main business. "Make disciples" is the Church's great commission. For executing that commission it is reminded of the omnipotent power of the Church's Lord and the inspiring and protecting power of the Church's King. Make disciples. Disciples are the salt that keep the earth from getting rotten. Disciples are the light of the world. Disciples must bear the burden of missionary work at home and abroad. Disciples make the citizenship of the nation that may be relied upon to do the right. The more disciples, the better. When the Church fails in the work of making disciples then every cause of Christian civilization is weakened. So that even from the point of view of the reformer, looking toward the extermination of an evil, the surest work that the Church can do, although it may be slow, is the work of making disciples. The only way to keep results that have been secured, the only way to win new results, is to recruit with more and yet more soldiers the army of the Lord.

We are tempted sometimes to get impatient at the slowness of the process. We are inclined to take things in our hands and accomplish them any way. And then we find too late that we have won a barren victory, because the ranks were too thin to hold what had been gained and the line had to fall back. Let us not be discouraged. The number of the disciples is growing, at home and abroad, growing more rapidly than the population, growing in influence and in means of usefulness more rapidly than in numbers. It is because North Carolina is a Christian state that its people have awakened so nobly to the duty of suppressing the saloon evil. It is because the churches have been making disciples through all these years that such an advance has been made. It is because more are being made every week and every year, that the reforms that have been battled for will be won. There is no discharge in this war. There are evils to contend with that arise or seem to come into our consciousness as the victories are won over the old ones. But the victory is on the side of right, because the Church of Christ stands for the right and it is adding its recruits to every righteous cause every hour.

And let this be the encouragement to the worker in the kingdom of Christ, no matter how obscure may be the place of his working. Things are wonderfully bound together in this world as cause and effect. When our labor is mixed with the work of the Omnipotent Spirit, an element of the infinite is at once introduced that brings to naught all calculations from the appearance merely. There is no more far reaching work that can be done than the conversion of a soul to Christ. It may take more than one generation to show the beginnings of the harvest. But the harvest will not cease while the world remains.

So make disciples. Minister, Sunday-school teacher, man with the money that can be converted into the finer gold of Christian character, saint with your prayers to God, make disciples. No trouble about their fighting the Lord's battles if they are the right kind, although it should never be forgotten that they should be instructed as to what their business as disciples is, whenever an issue is drawn between the interests of the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of Satan. And when disciples are made "of all nations," which is the extent of the Church's commission, then the whole world will be what every model Christian community is in our own land and age, with a people whose God is the Lord.

The Presbyterian Banner notes the fact that the National Central Committee of the Twentieth Century Church Year.

National Gospel Campaign, has sent out an appeal to utilize the Lenten season for religious activity and advance. Says the appeal of the National Central Committee of the Twentieth Century National Gospel Campaign, "The Lenten season has of late years—owing to the special emphasis upon it by some branches of the Church, and the resulting temporary staying of the tide of worldliness and frivolity at that time—proved peculiarly favorable to the promotion of religious interest." And so the National Central Committee, etc. hopes that Ash Wednesday, the first day of Lent, will be observed as a day of prayer and that special services will be held during the Lenten season for revival and ingathering.

We notice in passing the confession, which is at the same time an accusation. The special emphasis upon the Lenten season by some branches of the Church has resulted in "a temporary staying of the tide of worldliness at that time." The Committee aforesaid is at pains to express the exceeding temporariness of that staying of the tide of worldliness. The staying was only "temporary at that time." It would seem to have been therefore of no great permanent or lasting advantage. Moreover a fair inference from the Committee's remarks would be that the churches thus laying special emphasis upon the Lenten season were themselves afflicted with that tide of worldliness and frivolity, as the world itself does not keep Lent and the churches which failed to keep it could hardly use the emphasis of other churches upon it to stay the tide of worldliness in themselves. But if special emphasis of the Lenten season goes along with the tide of worldliness that is only temporarily stayed at that time, the very practical question recurs, What is the good of laying special emphasis upon the Lenten season?

The Presbyterian Banner has this to say of the appeal:

This Appeal emanating from prominent representatives of many Churches is a significant sign. It would not have been possible a generation ago. Protestantism, in breaking away from Roman Catholicism, necessarily swung to the opposite extreme and renounced the Church year in its worship. Wearied with the multiplied commandments and ordinances of men it esteemed every day alike and reduced the calendar of worship to the weekly Sabbath. But a reaction from this extreme has been slowly and surely setting in. The two most conspicuous days in the Church year, Christmas and Easter, have crept back into the Protestant calendar, until now they are almost universally observed in the Protestant churches. In the mean time, Protestant churches have been developing something like a Church year of their own. Special seasons and days have multiplied until they fill a good part of the year. The Week of Prayer takes up a week at the beginning of the year and is followed by a long series of special days. We have a Day of Prayer for Colleges, the Y. M. C. A. Day of Prayer, Endeavor Day, Children's Day, Rally Day, Decision Day, Temperance Day, Thanksgiving Day, and many others. Our Presbyterian Handbook enumerates twenty-two "Special Days for 1903," making a respectable "Church year" in themselves. This thing is growing and threatens to cover practically all the Sabbaths of the year and to become a burden more grievous than the "Church year" our fathers discarded when they threw off the Roman yoke.

The Banner then proceeds to state that even "the Week of Prayer has undoubtedly lost ground with our churches and its observance is receiving less and less attention or is being omitted." And then for a Presbyterian paper it brings certain strange things to our ears:

There are signs that our churches are tiring of this multiplication of miscellaneous special days and are turning towards the original Christian Year. The observance of Christmas and Easter concedes the principle of this year and logically prepares the way for the acceptance of its general calendar. Whatever good reasons there may once have been for rejecting it, these reasons have passed away, and the fear of Popery is no longer before our eyes. The fact that it always has been and now is observed by the greater part of the Christian world is an immense motive in its favor. That so many other Christians accept it is surely no reason why we should reject it; rather this is a reason why we should share in its common blessing. It would be a great step towards Christian unity for all Christians to travel through the Christian Year together. The common Sabbath is a powerful bond of unity and means of action to the Christian world, and a common church calendar would contribute to the same end.

It would seem that the multiplication of "special days" has made the people turn towards the "Original Christian Year," though we suppose the Banner would not claim that it originated with New Testament practice. We call attention also to the argument, "the observance of Christmas and Easter concedes the principle of this year and logically prepares the way for the general acceptance of its general calendar." But the "common blessing" of sharing that Church Year is a rather dubious one, if the appeal of the "Central Committee" is to be trusted. Why should we want a tide of worldliness and frivolity for the sake of "temporarily staying it at that time?"

Would it not be a still easier way to give up the idea of having any special days and just keep Sunday? That unites us to a very large body of Christian people including the New Testament saints. Presbyterians make a very poor out of it as either parrots or apes. Our immemorial contention is that these special days were not commanded in the New Testament and therefore were not intended to be observed. That is simple and intelligible. Paul was thinking of Presbyterians when he spoke of those hard-headed folk who esteemed every day alike. Let us have all charity, of course, for him that esteemeth one day above another. But let us also cling to our own inheritance of simplicity in worship.

The Congregationalist, of Boston, recently published the following paragraph:

Rev. Dr. F. W. Gunsaulus is reported as having resorted to subterfuge to induce his congregation to leave the auditorium in Chicago on a recent Sunday. He suspected that the building was on fire and, wishing to avoid a panic, he is said to have told his hearers that he had suddenly been smitten anew with pain in his leg, and would they please retire without further explanation or formal dismission. This incident of course has furnished a sweet morsel for the casuists. Dr. H. Clay Trumbull probably would say that Dr. Gunsaulus erred grievously; that better that he and all the audience should perish in flame and smoke than that there should be deflection from truth, even a hair's breadth. Of course it should be borne in mind that it is not unlikely that Dr. Gunsaulus did have the pain he described.

Upon which we commented as follows:

Dr. Gunsaulus of Chicago, while preaching in his church the other Sunday suspected that the building was on fire and so told his audience that he had a pain in his leg and asked them to leave quietly. They did and a possible panic was averted. And now they are discussing whether Dr. Gunsaulus had a right to lie under the circumstances.

The Brooklyn Eagle calls this, "A Cruel Calumny" and proceeds to excoriate the calumniators as follows:

There has not been a moment these many sad years. Dr. Gunsaulus has not had a pain in his leg. He is a sufferer by sciatica and locomotor ataxia combined. He has spent months in hospitals for relief. He has obtained relief but he will never attain cure. Any extra strain or sudden shock aggravates his condition of pain.

He preached here twice the Sunday before the time referred to in Chicago. His condition of pain was evident. His endurance of it for the gospel's sake was heroic. The paragraph in the Standard—copied and condensed from others—is a cruel calumny. He has not contradicted it, for those who know him know the facts and those who do not have an account of false witnessing, which it is their duty—not his, as the subject of it—to correct. Besides he is averse to publishing his own physical condition, as any fine sufferer is.

Knowing the facts, however, we have here told them, for the injustice has gone far enough. Those who have unwittingly spread it owe to him and to fair dealing the reparation of the telling of the truth—and more care hereafter to reflect that as character is a constant the idea that a godly man has become a liar is one peremptorily to discredit. All presumption is against it. To adopt it, without inquiry, on print-say or hearsay, is prodigiously wrong.

Dr. Gunsaulus did not say, "I have a pain in my leg." He is a man of culture as well as of piety and propriety. He said, "I feel the return of my old malady." He did. He told the truth. The believed but unfounded impression that the building was on fire and the audience in danger made the pain recur in acute degree. He summarily ended the service, quietly dismissed the congregation and prevented a possible panic — by telling the truth.

We apprehend that the casuistic discussion of him as a liar likewise aggravates his pain. Now that the truth is out, sundry others should be the ones to suffer moral pain equal to his never-intermitted bodily pain.

The reader will observe that the paragraph from which the Standard's little squib was taken was published by a Boston paper, in Boston, where they put pantalets on the piano legs. Of course with this high authority we made the excusable mistake of saying, "pain in his leg," instead of "an indisposition in one of his lower limbs." We make due apologies. And then both the paper and the minister are Congregationalist, we believe, and we supposed that we should have had the facts which we now have from the Eagle, if there had really been the indisposition referred to. Still, we expressed no opinion on the question, but stated the fact that "they," namely the casuists, were "discussing whether Dr. Gunsaulus had the right to lie under the circumstances." The remark has brought out the facts in the case, for which we are all indebted to the Eagle. Of course with the facts as they were, there is no question even for the casuist, and we hereby tender apologies for having helped to spread the suspicion that there may not have been the indisposition.

At the same time, we were pained that some religious papers should have supposed, both that Dr. Gunsaulus said what was not true and that he did right. And the defense of Dr. Gunsaulus in this instance seems to be a good opportunity for pointing out the difference between lying and deception.

The congregation was undoubtedly deceived by Dr. Gunsaulus. They thought that the service was suspended on account of his old malady. He intended to deceive them. But after the deception they could be grateful to him without losing one atom of the respect for him which he deserves and they feel. If there had been no malady, then it would have been better for the panic to have come and for the people to have been trampled to death than for the lie to have been uttered. There is no such fatal wreck as the wreck of our faith in the virtue of truth between man and man. To give up that principle is to adopt Jesuitism, is to believe that evil may be done that good may come, is to accept the theory that the expedient is always right, instead of the simpler phrase that only right is right.

Lying is always wrong. It is wrong to lie even to save life. It is better to die than to lie.

On the other hand deception by silence or act or words, if the words be true, may be right. The wrong in deception comes when the one deceived has the right to know the whole truth. The child has no right to deceive the parent in authority over it and the child is rightly punished for such deception as akin to lying. The witness in the court-room is bound to tell the whole truth and is forbidden any deception. The law has the right to require that of him. It is sometimes said that lying is right in warfare. Deception is, but lying, never. General Lee used to have reports published in the Richmond newspapers, which everybody in Richmond knew to be fake stories. And then a Confederate prisoner would be conveniently captured with the papers on his person and General McClellan would act accordingly and as General Lee had planned. But if Lee and McClellan had met face to face or Lee had written a letter to McClellan, and a falsehood had been told, even for the purpose of saving an army, the world would have lost the ideal of noble manhood which now belongs to it in the character of General Lee. That would have been worse than the loss of an army.

We owe it to all men, to the lowest and most degraded, to our enemies who may be seeking our lives, not to break faith with anybody. As the Eagle is fond of putting it, character is a constant. It would have been a grievous thing for Dr. Gunsaulus' congregation to have felt that he had even for a great end forfeited their confidence in him in the smallest degree. We are unfeignedly glad that he really did have the pain at that moment, (sorry that he has it all the time) and glad also for this opportunity to let the truth about him catch up with the error.

Review of Contemporaries.

Says the New Voice:

The Presbyterian Standard, Charlotte, N. C., January 28, discusses the question of crime which is so rampant both North and South this winter. Seeking the sources of it all, it says:

"But there is one institution which is perhaps the greatest foe to human life for which North and South are equally guilty, and that is the saloon. It will be admitted that drunkenness shortens human life just as inevitably as a bullet through the heart, or work at an unhealthy trade. And it has been proved beyond question that the saloon is the great promoter of drunkenness. The mere sale of liquor is one thing. But the business of the saloon-keeper adds to the number of drunkards that the world would have if there were any substitutes adopted for the saloon. There is no need to make extreme statement here. Drunkenness shortens life. The saloon multiplies drunkards. Therefore the saloon kills men.

It follows that the question of the liquor problem becomes a discussion of the value of human life. It can not be denied that any substitute for the saloon, that has ever been tried, Prohibition, the dispensary, the Gothenburg system, decreases drunkenness and saves life. So the man who, in the face of these facts, advocates the saloon, is an enemy of his own kind. If he does it with his eyes open and for personal or political gain he is a murderer."

And the Voice comments thus:

The editor that within almost a stone's throw of the Tillman-state-saloon octopus will assert that that sort of "regulation" decreases drunkenness and saves life, ought to be examined for moral aphasia. The Gothenburg farce is only less widely known. But what the Standard says in regard to the saloon is incontestable.

Of course The New Voice, published in Chicago, knows a great deal more about the South Carolina Dispensary than anybody living within a stone's throw of it. It is the wilful disregard of the facts that unfortunately characterizes this so-called temperance paper and prevents its allegations from being taken seriously. While admitting that what we say about the saloon is incontestable, that it is the great promoter of drunkenness, it can not admit that any substitute for the saloon is a less promoter of drunkenness.

We really regard The New Voice as a foe to temperance reform. It belongs to the class that confound the prohibition of the sale of liquor with the prohibition of its use under any circumstances. It is incontestable that the Dispensary system in South Carolina and the Gothenburg system in Norway and Sweden have largely diminished drunkenness. But the Voice feeds on impossible theories and has no use for facts. It is the extremist that prevents all reforms.

It seems that we were unable to stir up any comment on the last instance of a woman's speaking in a church in Charlotte. What has become of all the valiant defenders of the faith? Have they accepted the Standard's dictum that as long as a woman does not preach or pray in a mixed assembly she may talk to her heart's content? By way of stirring up any pure minds by way of remembrance we print the last echo of a controversy of a year ago, from an address by Mrs. Taylor, the report of which was sent to us by a missionary in China:

Since we last saw you we have travelled up and down over the States, through about forty out of the forty-five. There are so many places that are open to us, even in Presbyterian Churches in the South where ladies are not supposed to speak. You know what a feeling there is in the South about this. In a very strong church there, the dear minister would have me speak five times, although in that very church, and on that platform only two or three weeks(?) before, ministers had denounced such doings, and had promulgated a mandate that no minister in the church was even to announce from his pulpit a meeting in which a woman was to speak to a mixed assembly. We had that church packed five times. I did not know anything about this, of course, at the time. I did not know that there was such a prejudice, until the minister told me of it at the last meeting. There is a great change coming in the South. The people are waking up to all sorts of things.

The city of McKinney has been chosen as the seat of the University of Texas, and the undertaking starts out under auspicious circumstances. The citizens have raised $80,000 to secure the location, which is three times as much as has ever been given by any city in the Southwest for a like object to any Presbyterian institution. Of this amount, $50,000 are for grounds and buildings, while $30,000 are for scholarships, and will go into the Endowment Fund. The university will be located in the centre of a tract of from 200 to 300 acres of land. According to the plan of the trustees, 100 acres are to be retained for the campus, and the remainder is to be divided into lots and sold for residences. It is expected that $50,000 will be realized in this way for building purposes. The friends of the enterprise are much elated over this happy beginning, and mean to push it on to the greatest possible success. Presbyterians in both the Northern and Southern Church are lending it aid, and expect great things from its establishment to the cause of Presbyterianism in the Southwest.—Philadelphia Presbyterian.

The Presbyterian is mistaken in supposing that any great aid is being rendered this enterprise by Southern Presbyterians. We are of the opinion that they almost unanimously consider it a large-sized humbug, though perhaps sincerely advocated by its chief champion. Nor are there any great expectations as to the results of this "Presbyterian University."

It is idle to talk about such an institution with less than a million dollars in sight, and with the competition of Southern Presbyterian colleges and the State University it can never have any constituency to support it.

The following is the Interior's account, in part, of the Religious Educational Convention in Chicago:

In the audience on this occasion as well as on the days following there were signs of the presence of two parties which could be read in the applause. There was always some applause for the more radical utterances of speakers, but in contrast to that, the greatest and heartiest hand-clapping constantly singled out those expressions which were signally evangelical and conservative. There were several men heard upon the program whose opinions of the Bible diverge from the accepted estimates of the Word. They did not in any instance seek to conceal or equivocate that divergence, but in all cases they did submit explicitly or implicitly the proposition that no differences of biblical interpretation among Christians should interfere with their co-operating together to apply the moral worth of the Bible to the needs of these times and to encourage everywhere the more serious and attentive teaching of the Bible to the young. To this idea more conservative men responded in the same brotherly confidence, and out of that understanding grew the unanimous action with which the convention came to its close.

Inasmuch as the educational idea was the guiding star of all the movement which led up to the call of this meeting, it was not strange that the evangelistic purpose of Sunday-schools and young people's societies should not receive the heaviest emphasis in these discussions. Yet it was significant that the supremacy of this latter purpose was frequently stated with appropriate vigor. As a notable instance Dr. Shailer Mathews in speaking of the Sunday-school curriculum stressed the importance of arranging the course of study to the direct end of bringing the child to the crisis of conversion. There was one Unitarian speaker on the program,—Dr. Horton, president of the Unitarian Sunday-school Association,—but it took the testimony of the printed program itself to prove that he was a Unitarian. His address was a very impressive discussion of the breakdown of public school secularism and an impassioned plea for greater reliance on the Bible as an agency of moral stimulus to society. The convention saw a very significant incident when Professor Pearson, the author of "The Carpenter of Nazareth," volunteered to speak from the floor. Having risen he hesitated, saying, "I suppose I had better not say what was in my mind." But the convention impatiently cried to him to go on and say all that he pleased, and he faltered the opinion that "the church would never accomplish anything as long as it held to an unbelieving creed." But the remark met the most painful silence. Not a murmur indorsed him.

The Convention passed this reassuring resolution:

"The Convention for Religious and Moral Education, meeting in Chicago on February 10, 11 and 12, 1903, hereby expresses the conviction that a forward movement is necessary in religious and moral education. Inasmuch as an important service can be rendered by co-operation of workers for studying problems, for furnishing information, for mutual encouragement, and for the promotion of higher ideals and better methods, a new organization for the United States and Canada seems desirable. The organization should be comprehensive and flexible. This will exclude advocacy of the distinctive views of any denomination or school of opinion; it will forbid the limitation of the work to any single phase of religious and moral education, as, for example, the Sunday-school; it will prevent the control of the organization by any section of the country, by those interested in any single division of the work, or by those representing any one school of thought. It is not the purpose to publish a series of Sunday-school lessons or to compete with existing Sunday-school or other organizations; but rather to advance religious and moral education through such agencies."

Key=Notes.

The key-note determines whether the piece shall be high or low; and largely what shall be its character. And it is sounded at the outset.

Large halls and churches have their key-notes. And tis a familiar experience to notice, when the organ gives forth some particular note, all the windows of the house rattle.

Congregations have their key-notes; and revivalists learn how to pitch their voices, so that, whether they say sense or nonsense, the nervous systems of the congregation seem to be affected and to respond. In a great revival in Ireland, it was said that men and women would seem to be almost crazy with nervous excitement and be almost thrown into fits by the mere voice of the preacher. In ordinary life we know how certain notes of music affect us. We are servile to musical instruments and tones as well as skyey influences.

We know, too, how the air and bearing of certain people move us. The old Duke says: That fellow has such a vinegar aspect that I am heart-burned an hour after I see him. Some people throw us into a good humor, some into a bad one, by a glance of the eye or a slight word or expression. The flavor and tone is good or bad, sweet or sour, musical or unmusical. And it is not pleasant to have our souls and bodies all put out of order, like sweet bells out of tune and harsh.

The moral of these observations is first for our individual selves that we heed the divine order and keep our loins girded and never go untuned; then that we earnestly pray the family prayer of the Prayer Book, to be quiet and peaceable, full of compassion and ready to do good. If we keep in that condition, it will not be easy to make us sound a discordant note. Moreover, we will be not unlike the Aeolian harp, and will give agreeable music for every breath that passes over us, or every blow that strikes us.

Another lesson is that we are all centres of influence; we all give out key-notes; and we may to individuals or crowds give out key-notes lively and bright or sorrowful. We may make whole companies bright or doleful, sad or joyful, by the glance of the eye, the light or sadness of the countenance, the tone of the voice, whether hopeless, or confident and hopeful. And these very key-notes that we give may determine the result of great enterprises, or the happiness or unhappiness of individuals.

Farther still, the very nature, character and influence of the key-note comes from the heart. A selfish and ambitious soul cannot give forth a key-note of self-sacrifice and devout piety. And a soul filled with the love of God, and absolutely devoted to His service, cannot sound a note of worldliness and selfishness.

J. L. W. in Churchman.

Taking Off His Hat to Nature.

Hamilton W. Mabie repeats a story which shows how one man at least was affected by the beautiful in nature. One day in the early spring a Scotchman was walking along the side of a mountain in Skye, when he came to a hut in which lived an old man he had known a great many years. He saw the old man with his head bowed, and his bonnet in his hand. He came up and said to him after a bit: "I did not speak to you, Sandy, because I thought you might be at your prayers."

"Well, not exactly that," said the old man, "but I will tell you what I was doing. Every morning for forty years I have taken off my bonnet here to the beauty of the world."

Beauty wherever it is seen is a reflection of God's face, the shining of heavenly light down upon the earth. Wherever we come upon it, it should touch our hearts with a spirit of reverence. God is near; we are standing in the light of his countenance.

Shall we make a new rule of life from tonight: always try to be a little kinder than is necessary?—J. M. Barrie.

Missionary.

Four Essential Convictions for Successful Evangelization.

By Rev. Ernest G. Wellesley Wesley.

Back of all intense effort there must be intense conviction. The man who does not intensely believe in what he attempts to accomplish, in the methods and plans he intends to use, cannot be as intense in his efforts as he would be if held in the firm grasp of an unwavering, deepening, whole-hearted conviction.

1. Conviction that the world is lost. That this fact, as an all-mastering and overmastering conviction of soul does not exercise the power which it ought to exercise upon our general church membership does not need proof. It may be true that the great effort of missionary enterprise should be "to bring to the world a knowledge of the fullness and completeness of blessing which there is in the world in Christ." It is no less true that the world needs this knowledge because it is a world lost in sin.

Thousands upon thousands of Christians would be much more interested in the rescue of a few imperiled lives from sickness, shipwreck, fire or other danger than they are in the rescue of countless millions from the degradation and death of that condition which is without hope because it is without God.

The cause of the greater interest is clearer realization of the fact of danger, of its imminence. Let Christians realize the lost condition of a Christless world as they realize the peril of lives in danger from earthly calamity, and such conviction would irresistibly impel to immediate, heroic, continued self-sacrifices.

2. Conviction that the world can be saved. When faith looks down upon the millions of the unsaved in heathen lands, upon the hundreds of millions held in bondage of sin, as yet untouched by the weakest influence of the Cross, it is too apt to ask: "Can these dry bones live?" The question is more than inquiry, it frequently amounts to denial, quite generally to doubt as to the possibility.

The Church professes to believe that there are none whom our blessed Lord has not come to save, who cannot be saved if the offer of the Gospel is accepted, but, at the same time, this belief lacks conviction in the hearts and minds of millions.

3. Conviction that Christ alone can save the world. Though we may object to so plain a statement of the case, it is true that thousands of Christian workers have been and still are asking one form or another: "Must not the heathen be educated, civilized, improved, in this way or that before they are in a condition to have the Gospel presented to them?" The question asked does not take exactly this form, but it virtually amounts to this.

It is high time for the whole Church to realize with the most intense conviction that the very first thing to do is to "lift up Christ." Whatever educational, moral, civilizing or uplifting agencies may be put to work, it must be Christ, and Christ crucified, first. Those who attempt to build without Christ as the foundation-stone, build in the air or upon the sand. Until the eternally enduring spikes of faith in Christ Jesus are driven far below the quick sands and mire of all else, the salvation of the world is impossible.

4. Conviction that "I" am to do my part. Personal responsibility must become the conviction of the Church before the will of God can be accomplished. If the whole Christian Church was possessed by this conviction in each of its members, in the majority of its members, there would be no need to urge Christians to go, to give, to help, to pray, to toil.

Personal conviction of a personal responsibility would very soon break down apathy, selfishness, slothfulness, stinginess, faithlessness, coldness, lack of interest as well as all other obstacles in the way of the world's redemption.—Gospel in All Lands.

Men are God's trees and women are God's flowers.—Tennyson.

Paul at Ephesus.

Acts 19, 13-20. March 8, 1903.

Athens was the seat of intellectual culture and moral skepticism, and here Paul established no church. Corinth was an abode of luxury, and sensual indulgence, and yet the Apostle here organized a flourishing church. Ephesus was as the capital of Proconsular Asia, noted for the idolatry of Diana, for her splendid temple and for the practise of magic and the occult arts. Here Paul found disciples, made by Apollos and instructed them more perfectly in the doctrines and duties of Gospel piety. At Ephesus Paul remained for three years, met with opposition, from various sources and yet diffused a knowledge of the Gospel through the whole province. The present lesson mentions the conduct of certain Jewish opponents who attempted to cast out Demons in Jesus' name, and suggests several profitable subjects.

I. Demons are Cast Out in Jesus' Name.—Jesus' name represents His Divine perfections and power. Paul through Christ freed demoniacs from the dominion of demons. He thus encouraged the wandering or "vagabond Jewish exorcists," to attempt to do the same. Only Divine power can cast out Demons, and God alone determines upon what conditions this power will be exercised. He casts out Demons not for His enemies but for Christ's disciples upon the conditions of faith, prayer and obedience. Christ's real followers can conquer Satan, Demons and all the powers of darkness through Jesus Christ. But without Him, they can do nothing. "Christ was manifested to destroy the works of the Devil," and the only hope for even the regenerate man to gain the victory over Satanic wiles and agents is to secure the aid of Omnipotence.

II. Unbelievers can not Conquer Demons.—The vagabond Jews who had no personal faith in Christ but in imitation of Paul endeavored to cast out Demons in Jesus' name, signally failed. So far from driving the evil spirits from their victims, these unbelieving exorcists were disowned by the demons and the demoniac assaulted them so that they fled out of the house naked and wounded. Their utter failure and defeat was known to Jews and Gentiles in Ephesus, men learned that it was vain to call on Christ when no faith was exercised, and "the name of the Lord Jesus was manifested." These faithless exorcists have proved for all time that Jesus will not exercise His Divine power for those who do not trust Him and that unbelievers can not cope with Satan and Demons.

III. True Converts Confess and Forsake Evil Agents and Practices.—Those who had practised magic occult arts and impostures after becoming Christians, confessed their evil deeds. They furthermore brought their books giving instruction in their arts and charms and burned them before all men. They surrendered these books though their estimated value was $25,000 and they parted with all hope of future gain by using them. They destroyed the books as pernicious and did not sell them to be employed for vicious ends by others. The conduct of these Ephesian converts is commendable and worthy of imitation. True believers will confess their past sins. They will abandon employments, agencies and practices that are of manifest evil tendency. They will do this even if it involves large pecuniary sacrifice. The converted gambler will forsake the gaming table. The saloon-keeper will abandon the promiscuous sale of ardent spirits. The Christianized Sabbath-breaker will cease from every occupation which requires the Lord's day to be desecrated. The genuine disciples of Jesus will do this no matter what financial sacrifice may be demanded.

Unless you can muse in a crowd all day
On the absent face that fixed you, . . .
Oh, do not call it loving—

Christ Teaching Trust.

Matt. VI. 19:4. Topic for March 15.

One of the rarest things found among those who profess faith in Christ is trust. There are many to be found who will say that they believe every word in the Bible, but comparatively few who are trusting the Word of God fully. In this day of commercialism men would rather trust to their own prowess than to be dependent upon God. This is not a lack which is exhibited altogether by one locality or by one class of people. It is too prevalent everywhere. And yet Jesus had much to say about this very virtue. He taught it in many forms. At one time He says for us to not be so careful to lay up treasure for ourselves on earth but to lay up treasure in heaven. Moths and rust corrupt the earthly treasure and thieves break through and carry away that which is laid up in earthly treasure-boxes. But we weak mortals in the face of, these words and in spite of experience which confirms their truth, are unwilling to put our trust in them, but keep striving day after day to make that which seems to us to be the only thing necessary for our happiness and as the one thing indispensable for our very existence. If we stopped at this point, far enough remote, it would not be so bad, but after getting enough of this world's wealth to give us a comfortable time, as the world counts comfort, we keep right on hoarding as if we then could take with us what we do not use here. All the way through we are not content to trust our heavenly Father even a little bit when it comes to the things of this present life. Is it not strange that man will trust the Lord to save that priceless jewel of which this body is but the case, and yet will not trust Him to save the case? That is what men are doing; but Christ would teach us differently. He teaches us at the same time, too, something which should make us stop and ponder. "Where your treasure is there will your heart be also," said Jesus. Is it possible for the treasure to be divided? Men sometimes divide their savings between two or more earthly banks so that if one of them fails, that part of the treasure deposited with the others will be safe. It seems that they try this same plan in regard to the things which make for life. They trust God part way, but would rather trust themselves for the rest. But Christ says the treasure cannot be divided. They who profess to have treasure in heaven but who are so mindful for the treasure of earth but deceive themselves. They have no treasure in heaven. Again Christ enforces this lesson in this same sixth chapter of Matthew. "The light of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be single thy whole body shall be full of light. But if thine eye be evil thine whole body shall be full of darkness. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is the darkness." Then again as though He could not emphasize the truth enough He continues: "No man can serve two masters, etc." As He continues He seems to be afraid, humbly speaking, that men will not give the heed to the subject that its importance warrants and then He speaks those matchless words about God's care for the birds of the air and the grass of the fields and the beautiful lilies growing at His feet and concluding with "seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you." How few are exhibiting that trust which the Lord was so anxious to teach.

Wherever people have trusted as Jesus teaches them to trust, they have never been disappointed. Paul trusted in this way through the thirty or thirty-five years of his discipleship and hear him at the last: "I know whom I have believed, (literally, "with whom I have made my deposit") and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day." And from the day when the words of the Sermon on the Mount fell from the lips of Christ to the end of Paul's life, that trust in Him was never misplaced.

Paying the Fare.

When Jonah took it into his foolish head to run away to Tarshish "from the presence of the Lord," he went on board an outwardbound vessel, and "paid the fare thereof." That was an expensive excursion. He lost the approval of his conscience and smile of God. He would have lost his life but for a miraculous rescue, and he returned to Joppa a sadder and wiser man. When any one attempts to run away from God he is sure to be overtaken, and when any one chooses a seductive path of sin, he pays dearly for the folly.

I see it announced in the daily journals that a certain heart-broken young wife has been divorced from a worthless husband for "cruelty and desertion." It was all in vain that her parents besought her not to intrust her heart and her happiness to one who hid a rotten character behind a handsome face and polished manners; she took the reckless risk, and has paid the fare thereof. In all my lifelong observation I have almost never known a marriage contracted in opposition to the wishes of loving parents that has not turned out badly. The wages of filial disobedience are apt to be death to happiness.

Not long ago I met a man whom I had known in his better days; he was reeling along under the escort of a policeman toward the station-house. Poor creature! He was paying the toll on the devil's turnpike. The heartless saloon-keeper who sold him the poison will be required to pay his when he reaches the judgment bar of a righteous God. Let the young understand that every pathway of sensual indulgence—whether it leads to impure books, or to salacious scenes in a theatre, or to any gratification of sensual lusts, will sooner or later encounter a toll-gate of retribution. Can any young man or maiden take hot coals of fire into the bosom and not be scorched?

Roads to gross sins that pollute the body and soul are not the only perilous ones. There is a pathway to political preferment into which bright and ambitious young men are pushing; if in name for the service of the people, yet too often only for party or self-advancement. The "fare" they pay is constant worry, a temptation to trick and intrigue, a readiness to descend in character in order to ascend into high office, and a wretched demoralization of conscience. Civil offices ought to be accepted as an honorable and sacred trust, but unfortunately the atmosphere of "practical politics" in our country is so contaminating that few clean men stay in long without a smirch on their reputations. Whoever chooses that road of ambition, let him count his cost.

Over in yonder city streets to-day are thousands of men mad to get rich. That appetite grows by what it feeds on. "He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver," and they who determine that at all hazards they will win wealth must pay the penalty. Gold is an excellent servant when held in trust for God and good men; it is a cruel monster when it owns its possessor. "How do you feel to-day?" was asked a millionaire who at fourscore was tottering along feebly for an airing. "I feel better," was the pitiful reply; "I feel better to-day; stocks are up!" The poor rich man was almost in sight of eternity; yet he was hugging his money-bags as a drowning man hugs a plank. Whoever travels the thronged road of covetousness must "pay the fare thereof."

I could multiply illustrations; but they would all point to the one great solemn truth that sin is about the costliest thing in God's universe. However smooth its tongue and bewitching its promises, the wages it exacts is death! It always "finds us out" and Christians need to remember this as much as the most worldly-minded slave of mammon or the most impure slave of sensual appetite. It was one of God's prophets who fled from the path of duty into the path of inclination, and paid the "fare thereof." Even some ministers have been overtaken on the road to Tarshish, and have been glad to get back penitently to their right field of labor in Ninevah. The "meek will he guide in his way."

Is not a life of godliness costly, too? Yes, but in quite another way. The straight road toward heaven by the redeeming love of Christ Jesus hath a "fare thereof" also. Repentance and faith are demanded at the entrance gate. "If thou wilt enter life," says Jesus, "keep my commandments. He that would come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." All the richest graces, all the noblest deeds of love for others, all the grandest achievements for the glory of our blessed Master are costly. Crosses are the price of unfading crowns.—Dr. Cuyler.

Young People and Lexington Assembly.

By Thornton Whaling, D. D.

Our young people ought to be taught what the General Assembly is, and trained to pray that it may be guided by God's Spirit in all it does. And the young people, and their teachers, parents, pastors, all, ought most earnestly to plead with God that the Lexington Assembly may be divinely directed in all that it may undertake to do for the young people.

1. Childhood is the battle ground of the Kingdom. The 150,000 youth of the Southern Presbyterian Church are the gold mine of the future. "A child saved is a soul saved plus a life of service gained."

2. The study and interests of the children to-day have the largest and most commanding place in the thoughts of the wisest and most far-seeing men, and if the Assembly be given "wisdom to know what Israel ought to do," it will ally itself with this providential movement, which puts the children first.

3. There is much that the Assembly might do for the wiser instruction and training of the young people of the Church.

(1) If the Church exists for missions, then the Young People's Societies and the Sunday-school ought to exist for missions too. A mission study class, and a missionary library, in addition to systematic training in giving for missions in every Young People's Society—why not? Courses in missions in the Sunday-school—why not?

(2) The Societies and the Sunday-school could well be made more evangelistic, aggressive in enlisting outsiders in their membership, and zealous in bringing all of their members to Christ—why not?

And this is the most hopeful mode of bringing to Christ the unevangelized—that is largely through the Sunday-school.

(3) Through the Home Department and the Cradle Roll, and by aggressiveness in seeking for members, the School ought to outnumber the Church; and the Societies ought to enlist all the boys and girls for training in Christian living and serving. The numbers in each are far smaller than they ought to be.

May I not ask the prayers of the whole Church that the Lexington Assembly as it considers these and such like questions, may be guided by the Spirit of Christ to conclusions which shall be pleasing to the great Head of the Church?

The Voyage.

Into the restless sea of life
I launch my bark,
Forth through the tossing waves to face
The dark.
A hand unseen directs its course
Past every snare,
A whisper stirs my hidden soul
To dare.
With God beside me in the dark
I almost see
And through the deepest waters guide
Will He.
Until at last when life is done
I reach the shore
And light shall break and darkness be No more.

Outline Bible Study.

Rev. R. A. Lapsley, Galatians, Chapter I.

These questions are designed to furnish daily Bible work for two weeks, a little at a time, until the study on the next chapter is published. Study, Bible in hand. The answer to nearly every question is suggested by the Scripture references given.

Answers to these questions sent with return postage to Rev. R. A. Lapsley, R. F. D. No 1. Staunton, Va., will be corrected and returned.

Vers. 1. "An Apostle." Was the number of the apostles strictly limited to twelve? See Rev. 21:14, but compare the next question, also vers. 19 this chapter, and vers. 9, ch. 2. Did Paul then take the place of Judas, and if so, was the transaction in Acts I, divinely authorized? See Acts 1:15-26. What three qualifications for the apostolic office are laid down in the New Testament? 1. See the remainder of this verse and Eph. 4:11, also Heb. 5:4. 2. See Acts 1:22 last clause, 1st. Cor. 15:8, 1st Cor. 9:1. 3. See Acts 8:18. Acts. 19:6. How do these three requisites for the Apostolic office settle the question of the so-called apostolic succession?

"Not of men, neither by man." Part of Paul's purpose in writing this epistle was to show the divine authority by which he held his office—what other verses in this chapter and chapter 2 show this same purpose?

Vers. 2. "Unto the Churches in Galatia." What churches mentioned in the Acts as the scene of Paul's labors are probably included here? See Acts. 14:6. 16:1-2.

Vers. 4. "Who gave himself for our sins." Put with this, ch. 2:20, last clause. Eph. 5:2, 25. In what sense did Christ give himself for our sins? See 1 Tim. 2:6. Heb. 9:26. 1 Jno. 2:2. Compare 1 Jno. 1:7 last clause, with Lev. 17:11.

"That he might deliver us." What did Christ's death accomplish besides our justification? See ch. 2:19. Eph. 5:25-26. 1 Pet. 2:24.

Vers. 6. "I marvel that ye are so soon removed." In this verse we come to one of the main subjects of this epistle. What error had the Galatian Christians fallen into which this epistle is designed to correct? See ch. 2:21. ch. 4:21. ch. 5:2-4. ch. 6:12-13. Compare and note especially Acts 15:1.

"The grace of Christ." This expression is directly contrasted with the following words, "another gospel." ("a different gospel," R. V.) What does the word grace, mean? See Ro. 5:15 compare Eph. 2:8. What is the gospel itself called. Acts 20:24 last clause. If then, salvation by grace is, the distinguishing feature of the gospel of Christ, what marks the erroneous doctrine—the "different gospel" (R. V.) which Paul here condemns? See Ro. 4:4. Ro. 11:6. Compare ch 2:21. ch 5:4.

Vers. 6-9. "Another Gospel." Compare 2 Cor. 11:4. What three expressions used in that passage similar to this?

"Let him be accursed." Is Paul here uncharitable? Compare Ps. 139:21. Are we ever to imitate him in this?

Vers. 10. "Do I seek to please men?" See also 1 Thess. 2:4-6. What reasons are suggested by the two passages for not pleasing men? Is this inconsistent with 1 Cor. 9:19-20? See Ro. 15:2.

Vers. 11-12. "The gospel preached of me is not after man." What claim does Paul here make for his preaching and writing? See 2 Tim. 3:16. Compare 2 Pet. 3:15-16. How does this support the main purposes of this epistle? See questions on vss. 1 and 6.

Vers. 13. "I persecuted the church of God." Study in connection with this 1 Tim. 1:13-15. What four strong epithets there applied by Paul to himself? See also 1 Cor. 15:9. Eph. 3:8. In all likelihood, Paul wrote 1 Cor. before he wrote Ephesians and Ephesians before he wrote 1 Timothy. Studying these references then in the order of time, what do they show you as to Paul's growth in grace?

Vers. 13-16. "Ye have heard." How many times and where is Paul's conversion narrated in the book of Acts? With what other great event in New Testament history may it be compared? See Eph. 1:19-20.

Vers. 15-15. "That I might preach him." What four indispensable qualifications for preaching the Gospel are shown us in these two verses? Study the words: 1. "Separated me," compare Jer. 1:5. 2. "Called me by his grace," compare 2 Cor. 4:13. Jno. 9:25. 3. "Reveal his son in me," compare 1 Jno. 1:1, 3, 1st clause. 4. "I conferred not with flesh and blood," compare 1 Cor. 2:10-13. Jno. 14:26. 16:13. Is. 54:13. How do you reconcile 4 with an educated ministry? See Acts 18:26. Acts 7:22, 1st clause. 1 Tim 4:14 2 Tim. 2:15.

Vers. 16-17. "I conferred not . . . neither went I up." What was Paul's purpose in making these statements? Compare the question on vers. 11, above.

Vers. 18. "After three years." What light is here thrown on Acts 9:23? Compare the similar expressions, "many days . . . three years." 1 Ki. 2:38, 39. "I went up to Jerusalem." How many times did Paul visit Jerusalem after his conversion? Give references in Acts which record these visits. "Fifteen days." Why was his stay in Jerusalem so short? See Acts 9:29, 30.

Vers. 19. "James, the Lord's brother." How many James's figure prominently in New Testament history and which was this? How does your answer to this question affect your answer to the first question on verse one, above?

Vers. 22. "The churches of Judea." Does the statement in this verse include or exclude the church at Jerusalem? See Acts 9:28.

Vers. 24. "They glorified God in me." What divine attributes are gloriously exhibited in the conversion of Saul of Tarsus? 1. See verses 15, first clause. 2. See Eph. 1:19. 3. See 1 Tim. 1:13, 14, 16. What purpose in life is here set before us? See Phil. 1:20. 1 Cor. 6:20.

Looking over the above questions with the references given: what verses indicate Paul's purpose in writing this epistle? What verses throw light on events in his history, such as: 1. his conversion; 2, his stay in Damascus and Arabia; 3, his subsequent visits to Jerusalem; 4, his acquaintance with the other apostles; 5, the sphere of his labors?

In what verses do you find light on the following doctrines: 1. The Apostolic office; 2, the Atonement of Christ; 3, the gospel plan of salvation; 4, the inspiration of the Scriptures; 5, election; 6, regeneration; 7, sanctification; 8, a call to the ministry?

In what verses do you find practical lessons on: 1, abhorrence of error and zeal for the truth; 2, independence of man's judgment; 3, the greatest event in human life; 4, sorrow for past sin; 5, growth in grace; 6, a divine call to a God-given work; 7, the chief end of man?

A Critic's True Inwardness.

A second reading of Dr. Stagg's "Calvin, Twisse and Edwards" confirms me in the opinion that he has presented, from their own writings, incontestable proof that these "maligned theologians" taught the salvation of all infants dying in infancy.

Devoting most of his book to Calvin, he says: "We undertake to show that Calvin states positively that infants are damned, and that he exempts from damnation those dying in infancy." He succeeds in this apparently paradoxical undertaking. First, he quotes Calvin as teaching that God's decree involves infants in Adam's sin and includes them in its penalty. All Christians believe this. They get it from the Bible: "by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned," and "death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression."

If Calvin had stopped here, if he had pursued the subject no further than to say, as he does say: "whether they wish it or dread it, predestination exhibits itself in Adam's posterity. The Scriptures proclaim that all men were, in the person of their father, sentenced to eternal death" . . . there would be ground for the charge that Calvin consigns infants as well adults to hell. But he does not stop here: for, as Dr. Stagg establishes by abundant quotation, he goes on to demonstrate that the same sovereign predestination which included infants in the guilt and doom of Adam's sin, decreed that all those dying in infancy should be among the elect.

By the way, the phrase, "elect infants," taken by itself, implies that there are non-elect infants. Nobody denies this. But the expression in our Confession of Faith, "elect infants, dying in infancy," can be used against Calvinism by those only who are either unable or unwilling to interpret language fairly. That expression occurs in the chapter on Effectual Calling. Bearing this in mind, every honest reader of ordinary capacity will admit that the point of contrast is not between elect infants and non-elect infants, but between elect infants who die in infancy and elect infants who survive that period and attain to years of accountability. The latter are effectually called in the ordinary way, i. e., by God's word and Spirit; the former, "incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the word," "are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who worketh when, and where, and how He pleaseth."

The only adverse criticism of Dr. Stagg's work that has fallen under my eye, was smashed into smithereens by the editor of the Standard. But the author of that criticism has recently revealed the real ground of his dissent. He is almost ecstatic in his praise of a volume of lectures on "The Progress of Dogma," lately delivered in this country by Prof. James Orr, of the United Free Church of Scotland. This gentleman speaks highly of Calvin's life and work, but insists that Calvin's theological system "urgently calls for rectification and supplement." He says: "The defect does not lie simply in the doctrine of predestination, but rather in the idea of God behind that doctrine. Calvin errs in placing his root-idea of God in sovereign will rather than in love. Love is subordinated to sovereignty instead of sovereignty to love." This is plausible but fallacious. Subordination is not predicability of the Divine attributes. Each in absolute perfection, "infinite, eternal and unchangeable," and therefore a constituent of the Divine sovereignty. So that, when God "appointed the elect to glory," and "ordained the rest of mankind to dishonor and wrath for their sin," His love was not subordinated to this exercise of "the unsearchable counsel of His own will," but went hand in hand with it. Nevertheless, our critic is quite enamored with the Professor's plea that Calvinism be "rectified" by subordinating the Divine sovereignty to the Divine love, and exults in "what we may expect from the determined purpose of the enlightened Christian students and scientists of our day to discard and repudiate every dogma set forth in human creeds which is not in accord with the highest view of the attributes of God, and especially of God in his gracious and infinite attribute of love, and his status of Father of all mankind." (Father of all mankind, or of the elect only?) He tells us that the Presbyterian Church of England, twenty years ago, adopted "a reformed creed, discarding unscriptural and dishonoring dogmas;" that "the same enlightened spirit is at work among the more than two millions of Presbyterians in the United States;" and that "the church that falls behind in this great work of reform will not have the light of "the glory of the Lord?"

This revelation of the true ground of our critic's unfavorable notice of Dr. Stagg's book, illustrates the Doctor's keen insight, when he writes, p. 156, that the opposition is not to the statement of the doctrine, but to the doctrine itself, and revision and amendment are clamorously called for, not to amend the statement, but to get rid of the doctrine, in which event "Calvinism will be supplanted by Arminianism."

Dr. Stagg has given us a great book; great, as the fruit of indefatigable research; great, in its impregnable logic; great, as a demonstration that the Calvinism of the standards of the Presbyterian Church of to-day, is the Calvinism not only of the Westminster Assembly, but of John Calvin himself, and that this "Calvinism is the only system of theology that can with logical consistency declare the salvation of all dying in infancy."

Shall There be a Scaling?

All friends who feel a lively interest in the treatment that shall be accorded to the aged and disabled ministers and to the widows and orphans of the deceased ministers of our church, will be glad to learn that encouraging reports come to the Executive Committee in various forms and from divers places. It would afford us pleasure to lay before the readers of this article some of these cheering communications, but just now we are disturbed by the approaching shadow of a most unwelcome question: Shall there be, or shall there not be, a scaling of the small amounts promised toward the support of our veterans and of the widows and orphans of our dead? That is now the question that absorbs our attention.

Shall it be the absorbing questions with the pastors and sessions of delinquent churches until they shall each send a contribution for this sacred cause before the close of this month of March? It should be so because:

1. In the action taken by the three last Assemblies, and so cordially commended by our Synods and Presbyteries, our church has given promise to deal more justly and more kindly with our aged and disabled ministers and with the widows and orphans of our deceased ministers than has been our practice heretofore, and this promise has very naturally and properly increased the number and the expectations of our beneficiaries.

2. The amounts promised these beloved servants of our Lord are already too small for their comfort and for our credit, being only an average of $100 per annum for each family.

3. These amounts, and more also, are due to these brethren by all those considerations that entitle other ministers of the gospel to a reasonable support. Touching this appropriation for disabled ministers, the Methodist Church of Canada says: "It is not a charity. It were a humiliation too great to bear, if, after a lifetime of faithful service, ministers were to be supported in their old age by charity. In multitudes of instances they have put all their private means into their own support and into the work of the church while in active service. Whole fortunes have been expended to supplement the insufficient maintenance which churches in their weakness and poverty have given. The churches owe them a debt they can never repay, and it would be strange if they had not a righteous claim on their superannuation allowance. It is not charity; it is debt owing for work done according to contract."

4. These meagre amounts which we have promised these beloved servants of our Lord are urgently needed by them. One of our most beloved ministers, who for more than a generation was one of our most consecrated, self-sacrificing, and efficient workers, and now by reason of disabilities resulting from his abundant labors, can only serve as "they who only stand and wait," writes like this: "If we can get $200 from the fund we can manage to pull through. But if we do not get this it will be disastrous." The widow of one of our ministers who a few years ago was prominent in our church councils, and honored for his long and useful and fruitful ministry, writes thus of her condition: "My dear husband left me almost nothing except the priceless legacy of his noble and useful life, and if it was not for the assistance I get from the Committee I do not know what would become of me." Another widow, and the mother of a family of small children, and in feeble health, writes: "I haven't a dollar outside of what the church gives, and no relatives or any one on whom I could call."

5. To scale these meagre appropriations and give these needy and most worthy beneficiaries less than the little that has been promised and which they expect to receive from us, would be to entail upon them hardships and embarrassments that can and should be prevented.

6. The good name of our church will suffer if our promises be not kept to these beloved servants of our Lord, and he will surely be displeased with our unjust and ungenerous treatment of them. Is it not written in his book: "Take heed to thyself that thou forsake not the Levite as long as thou livest in the land?" "Even so hath Christ ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel." "But if any provide not for his own, specially for those of his own household, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever."

These and similar considerations give solemn urgency to the question whether the aged and disabled ministers and the widows and orphans of the deceased ministers of our beloved church shall receive what we have promised them and is due them, or whether these small amounts promised shall be scaled, to their serious embarrassment and to our shame.

This shame and embarrassment will be averted, and our beneficiaries paid in full, if every individual and every congregation that has failed to contribute anything since April, 1902, to this sacred and much neglected cause, will send a contribution during this month of March to our treasurer, Mr. S. H. Hawes, Richmond, Va.

We anxiously and prayerfully await your answer to the question, "Shall there be, or shall there not be, a scaling?"

There is urgent need for $4,000. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

By order of the Committee, and in His name,
I. S. McElroy, Secretary.

Elect Infants.

The dissatisfaction in the Southern Presbyterian Church with Section III, Chap. 10, of the Confession of Faith arose, not because it fails to teach that all infants dying in infancy are saved, but because in the opinion of some, it does teach that there are, or at least may be, those who die in infancy and yet are lost.

There can be no question but that the Church has the power (acting in accord with its Constitution) to establish authoritatively the construction to be given the language used in its Confession, and if this is done by the law-making powers in the regular way, then the construction so given becomes a part of the law itself and is equally binding with the remainder thereof. Had the Little Rock Assembly adopted the minority report of the Special Committee on this subject, proposing to send down to the Presbyteries an overture amending the section in question, by adding thereto a declaration that the same was not to be construed as teaching the possibility of an infant dying in infancy being lost, and the same had been adopted by the Presbyteries, this question which now vexes the Church and will continue to vex it until some adequate relief is given, would have been settled. But when the Assembly not only refused to do this, but by adopting the majority report put our Church on record so far as it could, as declaring to the world that we had no Scriptural warrant for asserting that all who die in infancy are embraced with the elective love of our Compassionate Redeemer, the conscience of the Church became aroused; and when in the Assembly at Jackson, Dr. Hemphill, as a compromise measure, offered a substitute for the report of the committee on Bill and Overtures, proposing in substance the same thing, the supporters of the Committee's report would not accept the substitute, declining to agree to anything less than an amendment positively declaring as the belief of the Church that "all infants dying in infancy are included in the election of grace, etc."

The minority report in the Little Rock Assembly, proposing what may be called a negative amendment, was made by only one of a committee of thirteen and was rejected by a vote so overwhelming that no division was called for. In the Jackson Assembly an affirmative amendment was reported by a full committee, with the moderator at the last Assembly as chairman, and was defeated by a vote of only twelve majority. This, it seems to me, shows a very decided growth of the sentiment in favor of amending the section.

And why should it not be amended? Those opposing it, say it is not needed, because the section fairly interpreted does not teach even indirectly that there are or even may be, those dying in infancy who are lost; that the hue and cry against the section was raised by opponents of our Church who sought, by putting a false construction on the section, to injure the Church. If all this be admitted, it would be no sufficient answer to the demand now being made by those within the Church for some kind of an amendment to the section. Undoubtedly the words of the section will admit of the construction our friends declare to be false; and it seems to me that it is the construction which a plain, unlearned man would naturally place upon them, unexplained. I am aware that some of our learned men have a way of explaining the language satisfactory to themselves so as to show that it does not teach the possibility of an infant dying in infancy being lost; but one difficulty is, that this explanation is not always on hand when needed, even if it was satisfactory to all to whom it came. The force of this was felt by the Atlanta Assembly when it ordered the "foot-note" printed in the Confession. Our Saviour gave as a proof of the divinity of His mission on earth that, "The poor have the Gospel preached to them." Can we afford to have in our creed a declaration on a vital doctrine that only the learned can understand?

But are our friends correct in their interpretation of the section? To my mind (and I have had some experience in judicially construing language) whatever may have been the latent intent of the framers of this section, the words they used, in the connection in which they are used, will admit of but one construction: that is, —that there is necessarily involved therein a negative assertion in effect that there are, or at least may be, infants dying in infancy who are not elect and, therefore, not saved.

By all rules of construction, effect must be given to each word used: unless it can be rejected under certain well known rules, which it is unnecessary here to discuss, as all admit that the word "elect" with which the section begins was intentionally and intelligently placed there. Giving effect then to this word "elect," it is as here used a distinguishing adjective which separates infants dying in infancy to which it relates, from other infants dying in infancy to which it does not relate, and therefore of a necessity implies that there are, or at least may be, infants dying in infancy who are not elect, and from whom it was necessary to separate those who are declared saved in the manner indicated.

The Constitution of Texas, as it existed prior to the war, provided that "All free male persons over the age of twenty-one years, etc. . . . shall be deemed qualified electors." Now if this provision of the Constitution was under judicial investigation and the question became pertinent, would any judge hesitate to rule that the language necessarily implied that there were, or at least might be in the State "male persons over twenty-one years of age" who were not free, and to whom because thereof, the elective franchise was not thereby given.

The war came on; the 13th and 14th amendments to the Federal Constitution were adopted, and in the similar provision of the Texas Constitution of 1869 the word "free" is omitted, leaving it to read "every" male person, etc." Why? Because slavery having been abolished and all male persons twenty-one years of age having become free, there remained no necessity for the adjective formerly used to distinguish the free man from the slave. If it be true, (as our Church as a whole doth verily believe is taught by God's Holy Word) that all infants dying in infancy were given by the Father to the son in the Councils of the Deity before the foundation of the world as a part of the reward of his atoning sacrifice. then they are all elect, and the word "elect" as a distinguishing adjective, has no more place in the section under discussion, than has the word "free" in the provision of the present Texas Constitution on the subject of the elective franchise.

But they say our Assembly has defined our position. Why not let the matter rest there? Among several reasons which might be given this seems to me to be conclusive: to make any declaration of the Church on this subject practically effective, it must be made to accompany and be ever present with, the section explained, and this cannot be done constitutionally unless such declaration be submitted to, and approved by, the Presbyteries and thus become an amendment to the section.

In the Jackson Assembly, Dr. Strickler (than whom there is no grander man in our Church) argued that this is too small an evil to authorize the opening of the door of the floods of heresies and other dangers which he predicts would follow the adoption of the proposed amendment to the Confession of Faith. I respectfully disagree with the Doctor as to the floods he apprehends. The Southern Presbyterian Church is Calvinistic to its heart's core. There is no danger of any proposed revision, which calls in question that grand system, reaching with us even to the dignity of an agitation. But is this a small evil? And should we hesitate to correct it, even if the dangers he fears were to be faced therein?

If it be true that God's Word teaches that "all infants dying in infancy are included in the election of grace," is it a small evil that our Confession should teach even indirectly, that this is not, or at least may not be true?

From my youth up I have loved and revered our Confession of Faith as the grandest of all human writings, setting forth as it does the great truths of God's Word with wonderful integrity and clearness, but being human, liability to error exists. And if a harmful error be found therein, it is our duty, "studying the peace and purity of the Church," to remove the same, and that at once. It is for us to do our duty. the consequences are with God. It is His Church. He is able to take care of His own.

"Meditation."

Father, Thou who clothed the lily
In such beauty of its own,
Solomon in all his glory,
Fades before the flow'ry throne.

Thou, blest Father, in thy mercy,
Seest the sparrow's helpless fall,—
While they sow not neither gather,
Yet Thou dost in love feed all.

May we in our hearts remember,
He who cares for bird and flow'r
Ne'er forgets his blood-bought children.
But doth save them by his pow'r.

Cease, O heart, thy anxious pining,
For thy God doth love thee well,—
More than bird or stately lily,
More than tongue or pen can tell.

Teach us, O our Heav'nly Father,
Of thy watch-care from above,
In thy loving-kindness lead us,
Tenderly in paths of love.

The Ad Interim Committee of Home Missions.

The Committee appointed by the Assembly to consider and devise some more efficient method of carrying on the Home Mission work of the Church, met at Nashville, Tenn. Feb. 3, 1903, ten members out of fourteen being present.

The following plan was unanimously adopted, which the Secretary was instructed to publish as soon as possible in the religious papers, in order that the Church may have ample time to consider it before the meeting of the Assembly.

At first glance, it may not seem to differ materially from the present plan, but careful examination will discover three points of difference:

1. The present plan localized the operations of the Church, confining it practically to three Synods. The proposed plan makes the Assembly's work stand for all the destitutions of the Church. Any Presbytery in any Synod unable to compass its work may apply for aid, but the preference is to be given to the unorganized sections of the West.

2. The present plan is operated by a local Committee in Atlanta. The proposed plan constitutes the Committee of one Representative from each Synod together with the Secretary and two business men.

3. The present plan in Church Election lent funds to the Church as debts of honor. The proposed plan throws a few more safe guards around the funds, which are distributed for building new houses of worship.

With these explanations, the Committee submits its work to the Church for its consideration and trusts it will meet with hearty approval.

In response to an overture from the Presbytery of Arkansas, as to the best method of conducting the work of Home Missions, the General Assembly in session at Little Rock, Ark., May 1901, took the following action, namely:

"That the General Assembly appoint an Ad Interim Committee of which the Secretary to be elected shall be Chairman, and which shall be composed of the Chairmen of the Synodical Committees of Home Missions, who shall take into consideration the whole matter of our Home Mission work, in order to devise, if they find it practicable, a more efficient plan of Home Mission work, and report the result to the next Assembly for their action."

In accordance with the above action of the General Assembly, the Ad Interim Committee met in the First Presbyterian Church of Chattanooga, Tenn., February 4, 1902, and submitted a plan for the consideration of the Assembly at Jackson, Miss. After some discussion, it was evident that the Assembly could not be unified along the line of the plan suggested, and it was referred back to the same Committee for further consideration to be reported to the next Assembly.

This Committee met again in Nashville, Tenn., February 3, 1903, the following being present:

Rev. S. L. Morris, D. D., Chairman.
Rev. E. P. Davis, D. D., Synod of Alabama.
Rev. S. G. Miller, D. D., Synod of Arkansas.
Rev. T. H. Rice, D. D., Synod of Georgia.
Rev. W. C. Clark, D. D., Synod of Kentucky.
Rev. W. R. Dobyns, D. D., Synod of Missouri.
Rev. E. E. Gillespie, Synod of North Carolina.
Rev. Alex. Sprunt, D. D., Synod of South Carolina.
Rev. W. M. Anderson, D. D., Synod of Tennessee.
Rev. A. H. P. McCurdy, Synod of Texas.

Each session was opened and closed with prayer; and after a most careful consideration of the whole matter, the following is suggested as a plan of Home Mission operation for the consideration of the Assembly at Lexington, Va.:

I.

1. The Home Missionary work of the Church is a unit, but for its better administration, it is divided into two departments, Local and General.

2. The Assembly urges upon all its Synods and Presbyteries to prosecute the work of Local Home Missions within their own bounds to the extent of their ability, and reserves for the use of these Courts the months of February, June and August for collections to defray the expenses of their Local work.

3. The Assembly's Home Mission work embraces the whole church for the purpose of aiding the weaker Presbyteries and frontier districts, in the various Synods, but more especially in the new territory and unorganized sections of the West.

4. The Executive Committee shall aid, within its ability, the work in any Presbytery, where it is shown to the satisfaction of the Committee that said Presbytery is unable to compass the work; and in all cases, the Presbyteries shall secure offerings for this cause from their churches during the months designated for this purpose.

5. The General Assembly appoints two annual collections for Assembly's Home Missions, including the causes formerly known as Sustentation, Evangelistic and Church Erection; and appoints the months of January and September for the presentation of this work, and urges upon all its Synods and Presbyteries to endeavor to have this department of the work presented to the Churches distinctly upon its own merits, and to secure liberal collections from the Churches in their bounds.

II.

1. The General Assembly's Executive Committee of Home Missions shall be composed of the Assembly's Secretary and one representative from each Synod, ordinarily the Chairman of Synodical Home Missions, together with two business men residents of the city where the Committee has its main office, a majority of the whole Committee constituting a quorum.

2. The Executive Committee shall hold one regular meeting at the office of the Assembly's Secretary on the third Wednesday of February of each year, at which all appropriations for the ordinary Home Missions work of the year beginning April the first next thereafter, shall be made.

3. The Assembly, at the time of the election of said Committee, shall designate seven of the members as a sub-committee, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, who shall meet monthly at the Secretary's office to issue all such business as may be committed to it by the Executive Committee. Said Sub-Committee shall also hold such special meetings as may be called by the Secretary.

III.

1. No appropriation shall be made to aid in repairing or erecting a church edifice except where the Presbyterial Committee of Missions shall certify: 1. That the congregation themselves have not the means to do it. 2. That no application has already been made to the churches which are expected to contribute to the general fund. 3. That the amount appropriated by this Committee will be payable only when the building shall have reached a stage free from debt from which this money will be sufficient to put the house in condition to be used for public worship and leave it free from debt.

2. Ordinarily no grant or loan for church erection shall be made to any congregation, unless such congregation own in fee simple, and free from all encumbrances, the lot on which their house of worship is situated, or on which they propose to build; provided however, that in case a church is building upon leasehold property the Committee, at its discretion in extraordinary cases, may make such grant or loan, taking such precautions by the way of security or otherwise, as will protect the Church therein.

3. The sum granted to any congregation shall never be more than one half of the amount contributed, i. e., one-third of the entire cost.

4. In all ordinary cases, the grant to any church shall not exceed $500; and in making grants the Committee shall give special consideration and preference to the weaker churches and less costly buildings, when other things are equal.

5. The Committee is directed, whenever practicable and in accordance with the best interests of the church aided, to engage with said church that the amount shall be regarded as a loan, without interest, and to be repaid to the Committee in specified annual payments.

6. The appropriation, whether grant or loan, is subject to the following conditions, to wit: That in case the church or congregation shall cease to be connected with the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, or their house of worship be alienated, except for the building or purchase of a better house of worship, they shall refund to the Committee the amount they have so received.

7. When the appropriation is a loan (then unless other satisfactory security be accepted) a mortgage upon the church property, duly executed and acknowledged by the Church, through their legally appointed representatives, and recorded in the county clerk's or recorder's office, shall be returned to the Committee with a certificate, endorsed thereon by an attorney at law, designated by the Presbytery or its Home Mission Committee, to the effect that the church has a valid title to the property, and full power to mortgage the same, and that said mortgage is a first lien upon said property, and has been executed, acknowledged, and recorded according to law. Said mortgage shall be accompanied by a policy of insurance on said property in some reliable Insurance Company, in the sum of at least the amount of said loan, and for the period of said loan (if obtainable), the policy to contain a provision that loss, if any, shall be payable to the Executive Committee of Home Missions, as its interest may appear.

8. When the appropriation is a donation in all ordinary cases, the title of said property shall be vested in the Trustees of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, to be held in trust for the benefit of said congregation.

IV.

We further recommend that the Assembly's Manual be so amended as to make it conform to the plan herein presented; and that this proposed plan shall go into active operation on the first of April 1904; provided however, that the Assembly of 1903 shall, in addition to the Committee appointed under the proposed plan, re-appoint a Committee under the proposed plan which shall conduct the work until April 1904, with the exception that the Committee of the proposed plan shall hold their first meeting in February 1904 and arrange for the work of the ensuing ecclesiastical year, taking full charge April 1st, 1904.

Respectfully Submitted,

S. L. Morris, Chairman.

E. P. Davis, Synod of Alabama.

S. G. Miller, Synod of Arkansas.

T. P. Hay, Synod of Florida.

T. H. Rice, Synod of Georgia.

W. C. Clark, Synod of Kentucky.

W. R. Dobyns, Synod of Missouri.

Three Days in Florida.

As a good many of our readers cannot combine business and pleasure as I did a week ago, and take a jaunt from St. Augustine to Palm Beach, it may be unkind to suggest to them the delight of such an outing.

Though Florida is ten degrees nearer the Equator than Southern Italy the temperature is less warm, and more equable. Why this is, I do not know, since it is now considered out of date to mention the Gulf Stream as a regulator of climate. Anyway, one does not worry over the matter or any other matter in this Lotus land. There are perfect days,—days when it is a positive privilege to breathe the soft fragrant air, to live and move and have one's being—and nights that are serene and comfortable and beautiful. St. Augustine, is as everyone remembers, the oldest city in America, have ing been founded by the Spanish in 1565. They left their quaint old-world imprint there, and there is an intermixture of the picturesque, and magnificently modern, that is the happiest combination in city making, and then where there is rippling water and eternal sunshine, what more could a cold and tired mortal want? The old fort.—San Marco for several hundred years, but Fort Marion now, was fitted up as an arsenal during our unpleasantness with Spain. 'Twas the irony of fate that such should be, but the pliable stone of which it is built would probably not resist the big projectiles of the present. The old fort belongs to the age of feudalism and romance, before chivalry was routed by modern guns.

The stone wall, four or five feet wide—miles of it—built to keep back the sea which kept encroaching on the city's foot-hold, makes a charming promenade, and who comes away without a picture of the old gate? Just beyond it are the golf links, the golf season here being longer than at any of the other resorts. Then when you cross over into New Augustine, it is almost like coming from Spain to New York, and there be some who like Spain better. As Fort Marion is the crown of old St. Augustine, the Ponce de Leon Hotel is the glory of the new. Wise they were to perpetuate the name of the man who first sought out the sunshine land, and then looking on it as it rested in the yellow light of that far-away Easter morning in 1513, called it Florida. It was nothing less than an inspiration. The hotel is famous the world over, for the beauty of its architecture, the elegance of its decorations and furniture, and the comfort it offers its guests. The flowers and shrubs and trees make the grounds pleasantly odorous,—the many tropical plants in bloom, yielding a rich perfume, especially sweet after the sun goes down.

Journeying on down the East Coast railroad, made comfortable by its excellent service, we pass Ormond-on-the-Halifax. Here the drives are made beautiful by tropical verdure. Steam launches run up the picturesque Tomoka river, and there is a twenty-mile stretch of hard beach, the finest speedway for automobiles known. The hotel is elegant, and is only over-shadowed by the beautiful Ponce de Leon, and the Royal Poinciana at Palm Beach, my destination. As the former is the most beautiful hostelry in the world, the latter is the largest. Seventeen hundred can be seated at one time in its immense dining room. There are no horses and carriages there,—they belong back in the work-a-day world; instead, are yachts, launches "rickshaws," bicycle chairs, etc., etc. The gardens surrounding the Royal Poinciana, when seen at night lighted by myriads of vari-colored lights, look like fairyland.

There has never been such a season. All along the line of the Coast, the hotels have been filled with people. This cannot be accounted for by unusual prosperity or an unusually hard winter; more of the people are finding out what a vision lies near them.

Palm Beach is the queen of the East Coast resorts; it is worth a visit, even if one's pocket-book only allows an half-day's stay. It is well to know that somewhere in our own country is a spot where nature and money have joined hands, and the result is—completion.

H. M. McAllister.

One of the editors of Christian Work and The Evangelist, we think we know who, is charitable enough to suppose that John Alexander Dowie "perhaps honestly believes himself to be the second Elijah." That is a pearl cast before a very large sized hog. John Alexander Dowie is a Scotchman, raised on the Shorter Catechism and taught at a Presbyterian Seminary, and he knows there are enough fools in Chicago and New York too to part with their money to him. There are "millions in" the Second Elijah business. We should not be surprised at any time to hear that John Alexander had retired from active business in the hope of cheating the devil as badly as he has the Chicagoans. Meanwhile, if he comes to New York as he threatens, we advise the editors of our esteemed contemporary and all other enquiring friends to insure their eye-teeth.

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

The article by Dr. Cuyler, Paying the Fare, was clipped from the Presbyterian Banner. Dr. Thornton Whaling makes some suggestions as to what the Lexington Assembly should do for the Young People. Our three poems this week, the one on the First Page by O. H., and another on page 10, by Elizabeth M. Dinwiddie, and the other on page 14, by John Roberts, show what our North Carolina bards can do when they try. The first "Outline Study," by Rev. R. A. Lapsley is worthy of careful study by the reader, Bible in hand. Suppose we have a Standard home study class on Sunday afternoons with this Outline for the topic. It will be found most profitable and helpful. We are glad that Dr. Farris agrees with the Standard and other high authority as to the fact that Dr. Stagg's book is a demonstration.

The Standard has had the article by Texas Elder for some time. The note in favor of probable infant damnation in the Southwestern Presbyterian which we published last week was a reply to this article. It was not an answer to it however.

Two important matters pertaining to the welfare and progress of the Southern Church are discussed by Dr. McElroy and the Ad Interim Committee of Home Missions. We may have something to say about both next week. The note by Mr. H. M. McAllister, on his trip to Florida, shows that the Business Manager can also write.

TEMPERANCE.

The Watts Bill with the important amendment allowing the people to vote at any time for prohibition or the dispensary and allowing those advocating either to combine their votes against the saloon, has passed both Senate and House. We regard it as a long step forward and ask our constituents in North Carolina not to be disturbed by adverse criticisms of disappointed extremists. In the mean time both the anti-jug law and a law compelling the saloons everywhere to close at 8 p. m., have been given favorable reports by the House Committee and are now before the House. They ought to pass.

In addition, the Revenue Bill has added a heavy State tax to saloons and distilleries. Let the Legislature hear from you, friends, on the anti-jug and early closing bills.

DALLAS.—Dallas Presbytery is called to meet in Sherman, Texas, March 9th, to change the time of the regular meeting from April 17th to April 10th and to dismiss Rev. Fred A. Sale to the Presbytery of East Texas.

The Rev. J. F. McKenzie of Wortham, Texas, has accepted a call to the El Dorado church in Arkansas.

Rev. F. T. Charlton, Evangelist of Dallas Presbytery has just closed an interesting meeting at Clarendon. This church received twelve members as the result.

Rev. A. M. MacLauchlin, who was ordained by the Dallas Presbytery at its last regular meeting, is preaching at Childress. He is very acceptable as a preacher and is doing well in this western field.

Central Texas Presbytery has dissolved the pastoral relation between Rev. S. A. King, D. D., and the Waco church. Dr. King will henceforth give his entire time to his work in the Austin Theological Seminary.

The Texas Presbyterian University has been located at McKinney, Texas. The city gave $50,000 to the building fund and $30,000 to the endowment fund. Its friends now hope to see the school open in 1904.

ALABAMA.

FLORENCE.—The First Church here has decided to double its gift to Foreign Missions as a result of the visit of the Rev. Lacy Moffett representing the Executive Committee in the Forward Movement. We hope ultimately to have our own missionary. It is hoped that a church will soon be organized at Sheffield, Ala. Forty-two members have been added to the First Church, Florence, since Nov. 1st.

E. D. McDougall.

TUSCALOOSA.—At a called meeting of the Presbytery of Tuscaloosa, held at Selma, Ala., Feb. 17, the pastoral relation of Rev. Francis Tapp with Valley Creek church was dissolved and a letter of dismission granted him to North Alabama Presbytery. He changes his Presbyterial connection, that he may accept the call recently extended him by the church at Huntersville, Ala. He resigned the chairmanship of the Presbyterial committee on Home Missions. Rev. A. A. Little, of Selma, was elected to fill the vacancy.

NORTH CAROLINA

SUGAR CREEK—The Constitutional requirements having been complied with, I hereby call a meeting of Mecklenburg Presbytery to be held in the Second Presbyterian Church of Charlotte, N. C., on March 10th, 1903, at 11:30 a. m., to transact the following business:

1. To dismiss Rev. J. K. Fraser to Charleston Presbytery.
2. To take all necessary action upon the call from Munroe church for pastoral services of Rev. G. H. Atkinson.
3. To authorize and empower James M. Oates, W. H. Belk and J. Lee Choate, Trustees of the Presbytery, to execute a receipt and Refunding Bond unto Joseph Otis Minott, Fred. Shepherd Minott and William Alford Minott, executors of Mary K. Minott, as required by the laws of New Jersey, to receive a legacy of $1,000 to Miss Ufford's School at Albemarle, N. C.

T. J. Allison, Stated Clerk.

ELIZABETH CITY.—The little church in this city, which is called the Cann Memorial, in honor of a noble Christian woman, has been struggling along under difficulties. Since the dismissal of the late Dr. Johnson, the church has lived on supplies, and only at "sundry times" if not in "divers manners" has the word of the Lord been spoken unto them. From one cause and another, the church had only a few sermons during the course of last year. Earnest and faithful Christians did all they could to keep the little band together and to keep alive the Sabbath-school. Prominent among those thus active, might be mentioned Mr. E. F. Lamb, Prof. S. L. Sheep, Mrs. P. W. Melick and Mrs. Dr. Blades.

I came to this field the last of November, and although the church had had no regular preaching for almost a year, and only a few sermons during that time, I was greeted at the first service by a good audience.

On Feb. 15 we held our quarterly communion. Five united with the church; two by certificate and three on profession of faith. For all of which we thank God and take courage.

In the course of 6 or 8 months the town will have another railroad which we hope will bring some Presbyterians to the town.

R. L. Grier.

BLOWING ROCK.—Since Christmas there have been three additions on profession of faith. The Sunday-school is holding its own, which means a good deal for Blowing Rock in the winter.

Through the effort of Rev. M. Savage, an Episcopal minister who is located at this point, a public Reading Room has been opened, in which a union prayer meeting is held every week.

BANNER ELK.—On Feb. 8th there were eight additions, six on profession and two by letter—all students of Lees-McRae Institute. Not only is this institution a feeder for the colleges of our State (three of our students are to-day in as many colleges, not one of whom would probably have been there, if it hadn't been for this institution) but it is also the right arm of our church and evangelistic work in the mountains, to say nothing of the moral influence it is exerting over six counties.

We know whereof we speak when we say that with a comparatively small outlay of expense, the usefulness of this institution can be doubled within twelve month's time.

ORANGE PRESBYTERY.—Orange Presbytery will convene in its 266th sessions in the Presbyterian Church at Mount Airy, N. C., on Tuesday, April 7th, 1903, at 8 o'clock, p. m.

Delegates and visitors may expect the usual reduced rates of travel over the Southern railway.

At a called meeting of Orange Presbytery, held in Greensboro, N. C., Feb. 24, 1903, the Rev. S. M. Rankin was received from the Transylvania Presbytery, and will become pastor of the Alamance and Springwood Churches.

D. I. Craig, Stated Clerk.

DAVIDSON.—Dr. Smith, assisting Rev. D. P. McGeachy, will speak in Morganton, on the coming Sabbath in the interest of the Twentieth Century Fund. Rev. William Black has been holding a meeting with the pastor in Pine Bluff the past week. His coming appointment is at Newbern.

The faculty acting as a committee of judges for the two societies have elected the following representatives from the Junior class to speak at Commencement: From the En. Society, C. A. Cornelson, Orangeburg, S. C.; B. G. Team, Camden, S. C.; L. W. White, Abbeville, S. C. From the Phi. J. W. Currie, Davidson, N. C.; R. D. Dickson, Raeford, N. C.; J. N. McNeill, Vass, N. C.

It is a pleasure to state that President Ira Remsen, of the Johns Hopkins University, has consented to make the annual address before the two literary societies at Commencement. In the absence of Mr. McQueen, H. H. Caldwell has been made editor in chief of the forthcoming volume of "Quips and Cranks," Mr. W. P. Mills succeeding him as editor of the College Magazine. Another copy of the Davidson Bulletin is about ready for the printer and will appear before many days. The mild spring-like weather is causing a good deal of activity in base-ball circles. The practices will be very spirited, and it is likely a strong team will represent Davidson on the inter-collegiate diamond. The work of last year was brilliant, and it is hoped that new material of this season will recompense for any losses that are due to the falling out of older men.

Mr. Fitzgerald, of Greenville, S. C., the photographer has been here several days taking the pictures for the new annual.

The Presbytery of Wilmington meets in Kenansville, N. C., at 4 p. m., April the 8th, 1903

A. M. Fadyen, S. C.

Publication and Colportage.

To the churches of Concord Presbytery:

I wish to call your attention to the March collection for Publication and Colportage. This cause should commend itself to our liberality for the following reasons:

1. The business of the Publication committee is growing under the efficient management of Dr. Phillips. The business of the committee has increased, during the past nine months more than $13,000. This means that its profits are increasing, and that it will have more money to be used in the mission work of the church.

2. The Publication committee has donated to our Presbytery, literature for a number of Sabbath-schools besides contributing Bibles, tracts, and books for distribution among the destitute.

3. It has employed for his whole time Mr. J. E. Robinson, a most efficient worker as Sunday-school colporteur for Mitchell and Yancy counties. Mr. Robinson is doing good work and is building up work that has already been established and laying foundations for new churches.

3. Because every cent contributed to this cause goes direct to the mission field.

Let us show our appreciation of what is being done for us by making a liberal contribution to this cause at this time.

John Wakefield.

Chairman Com. Pub. and Col. Concord Presbytery.

Another Old-fashioned Meeting.

Dear Standard:

At the request of one of your editors I send you an account of a delightful meeting held in our church in January. After three preliminary prayer meetings, we began preaching Sunday night, Jan. 11th and preached every night, except Saturday nights, till Jan. 28th. At every service from first to last there were inquirers seeking the way of life. With these the pastor and elders personally conversed and prayed in the after-meetings. As a precaution against self-deception no opportunity of publicly confessing Christ or committing one's self was given at any time during the meeting, and not till several days after the meeting had closed.

The ladies held two daily afternoon prayer meetings at different points in the congregation, and the men's prayer meeting was held at noon every day in the Directors' Room of the Greensboro National Bank. These prayer meetings were all well attended. The men's prayer meetings, at which I was always present, though never in the capacity of leader, were as delightful and profitable as any meetings of the kind I have ever known.

The effect of the meeting upon the church has been more marked, the Session believes, than any held for many years. Forty new members have been received so far into our church upon examination. Of these fifteen are adults, and eleven heads of families.

Egbert W. Smith.

Greensboro, N. C.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Charleston Presbytery will meet at the Beech Island Church on April 14th, at 7:30 p. m.

Alexander Sprunt, S. C.

Enoree Presbytery meets, for its spring sessions, at Fairview Church, Thursday, April 16th, 5 p. m.

Thos. H. Law, S. C.

Harmony Presbytery will meet in Summerton church, Wednesday before the Second Sabbath of April, 1903, at 11 a. m. All delinquent churches are hereby earnestly requested to pay their Presbyterial Assessments.

W. W. Mills, Stated Clerk.

South Carolina Presbytery will meet at Easley, S. C., April 15, 1903, 8 p. m. Commissioners should inquire of railroad agents in time about reduced rates, and Clerks of Sessions should notify me if blanks do not reach them.

Hugh R. Murchison, S. C.

ANDERSON.—At a recent called-meeting of South Carolina Presbytery Rev. T. P. Burgess resigned his pastorate of Coronola and Ninety-six churches and accepted calls to Edgefield, Trenton and Johnston. The Coronola and Ninety-six congregations spoke in high terms of Brother Burgess and were loath to part with him. He will take charge of his group about the middle of March.

Hugh R. Murchison, S. C.

Funds for the Bible Cause.

As the fiscal year of the American Bible Society closes with March, I beg Treasurers of churches and Presbyteries who have funds in hand for the Bible Cause, please to remit them at once.

Thos. H. Law, Field Agent.

Spartanburg, S. C.

All Well at the Thornwell Orphanage.

I am very grateful for the many expressions of sympathy received during the epidemic of measles in the Thornwell Orphanage. There were some sixty-five or seventy cases, beside two of pneumonia, and a number of grip. But all are now entirely recovered and very hungry. We are also glad to be able to say that the extra expense called for by the sickness has been met by the generous people of God. Presbyterians are noble people. They know both how to love and to give. We have had rich experience of both and give grateful praise to Our Heavenly Father for this loving kindness.

We have gotten safely through the month of February. There is no debt hanging over any department of the work. The store-room is like the widow's cruse, daily full and daily empty. The children are dutiful, studious, happy and industrious. Some few are leaving us, and others coming in, giving anxiety both ways, that the one may do well and the others bring no evil with them.

As to our support, while every day we are anxious that we should be able to meet its burdens and necessities, we are also anxious that some one should put two or three thousand dollars into our hands to build another cottage, that we might receive, be responsible for and provide for twenty-five of the boys, now awaiting admission.

Send all gifts of flour, molasses, etc. to Thornwell Orphanage, Clinton, S. C., and all gifts of money to the undersigned.

Rev. W. P. Jacobs, Clinton, S. C.

TENNESSEE.

NASHVILLE.—WESTMINSTER CHURCH.—This pulpit having recently been vacated by the resignation of Rev. H. F. Williams, who has succeeded the late Dr. D. C. Rankin as editor of the publications of the Mission Board of the Southern Presbyterian Church, located here, pursuant to an adjourned meeting of the congregation held Sunday last, at the 11 o'clock service, over which Dr. Williams presided the official board of the church was authorized by a unanimous vote of the congregation to prosecute a call of Rev. James Lawrence Brownlee, of Covington, Tenn., to the pastorate of this church, if the way be clear.

Mr. Brownlee is a South Carolinian by birth. Secured his M. A. degree at Erskine College, South Carolina. Was ordained by the Presbytery of South Carolina. He has filled important pulpits in South Carolina, Alabama and Mississippi, and has been at Covington, Tenn., some four and a half years. He is regarded as a pulpit orator of more than ordinary ability, forceful and fearless in his preaching, pleasing in his address, cordial and genial in his disposition and will be quite an addition to the clergy of this city of churches and schools.

This church is to be congratulated if the services of Rev. Brownlee can be secured. It is hoped by the community of South Nashville, as well as the general public, and the Presbyterians in particular, that Dr. Brownlee will consider this call favorably and come to Nashville, where he will receive a warm welcome.

PETERSBURG.—The pastor of this church, Rev. J. S. Wood and family have great reason to be grateful to God for the kindness and thoughtfulness of an appreciative people. The ladies of the church with the elders and deacons stormed the manse Monday afternoon, Feb. 23rd and taking possession of every room pelted and pounded them with every variety of missile large and small, hard and soft, until we were quite overcome.

Nevertheless the blows were so soft and so tempered with love that the smitten ones could not resist the temptation to turn the "other side" and say "Do it again." Our hearts were warmed and cheered by the thoughtful kindness of these good people, and we feel encouraged to take up the work with renewed vigor. The occasion was the anniversary of the 29th wedding day, Feb. 22nd. After partaking of light refreshments they adjourned. May the giver of every good and perfect gift bless this people from his bountiful storehouse.

VIRGINIA.

NORFOLK; Second Church.—Seven new deacons have recently been installed in this church—Messrs. F. F. Ferguson, Wm. F. Sprattwood, Joseph H. Burroughs, J. M. Reynolds, J. T. Jacobs, G. Leslie Hall, and Curtis N. Foster. This gives us large board of competent deacons and the temporal affairs of the church are prospering under their care. Mr. A. B. Stephen was also elected a deacon but has not as yet signified his willingness to accept.

A Convention of Practical Men Meets in Winston-Salem, N. C., March 7-10, 1903.

Winston-Salem has captured the next Convention of the Young Men's Christian Association of North Carolina.

All indications point to a record breaking convention. The program is unique in many respects and up to the times. Not many subjects will be discussed, but those that have been selected are of vital interest.

A number of men who are experts in certain lines of definite work among young men and boys have been secured to address the convention. Among the number are:

Cecil L. Gates, Field Secretary of the International Committee; H. O. Williams, Railroad Secretary of the International Committee; L. A. Coulter, State Secretary of Virginia; Lymau L. Pierce, General Secretary of the Washington (D. C.) Association; A. C. Bridgman, General Secretary of the Columbia (S. C.) Association.

The convention will open Saturday evening, March 7th, and close the following Tuesday evening, March 10th.

The program deals with the religious and social conditions of young men in cities, towns, railroad centres, mill districts, schools and colleges.

Sunday will be a notable day—with union mass meetings in the evening, mass meetings for men and boys in the afternoon and other special services.

The State Committee, through the columns of this paper, extend a cordial invitation to all ministers of the Gospel, to Christian business men, to teachers and others interested, to attend. There will be reduced rates on all railroads and delegates will be entertained in the hospitable homes of the citizens of Winston-Salem.

Upon application, credentials will be furnished those who contemplate attending, either as a visitor or delegate. Credentials, programs and other information may be obtained by addressing Mr. A. G. Knebel, State Secretary, Y. M. C. A., Charlotte, N. C. Those who expect to attend should communicate with the State Secretary before March 1st.

The Czar of Russia will be asked to appoint the three judges who will constitute The Hague Tribunal and settle the Venezuelan controversy.

There is a growing belief that before the end of the year Mexico will have adopted a gold basis, with modifications to suit local needs.

A bill has been introduced in Congress to make the salary of the President of these United States $100,000 a year instead of $50,000 as at present.

The Belgian government is pressing a bill which aims at the raising of the standard of public morality, which will deal with street outcries and signs.

Russia's crop of winter cereals is estimated at 904,000,000 bushels of rye and 220,000,000 bushels of wheat—the proportion of rye to wheat being as four to one.

Work began this week on the new Highland Park cotton mill, to be the largest in Charlotte. The plant will cost $600,000 and will employ 800 operatives.

The Audubon societies are now organized in thirty States, and have 60,000 members; within ten years probably every State will protect its non-game birds by law.

Gen. J. B. Gordon, commander-in-chief of the United Confederate Veterans, who has been very sick, is much improved, but will cancel lecturing engagements.

There were no Southern delegates present at President Roosevelt's reception to the Daughters of the American Revolution, in session at Washington last week.

The Ohio and Mississippi rivers have been outside their banks; at Pittsburg the damage from high water has been such as to throw 38,000 people out of employment.

Secretary Reidy has issued a declaration of principles and asks the race at home and abroad to strike a final blow for Irish liberties—to make Ireland a nation among the nations.

It is proposed to cut a railroad tunnel through the mountain known as the Faucille, in the Jura Alps, and so shorten the journey between Paris and Switzerland by two and a half hours.

The Canadian Doukhobors, the Russian sect with whom the authorities had so much trouble at the beginning of the winter, have now apparently settled down to become good citizens.

Emperor William has instructed Minister von Sternburg to inform President Roosevelt that the statue of Frederick the Great will not be sent to the United States until the spring of 1904.

There was a wreck of Southern Railway train, caused by a landslide, near Lenoir City, Tenn., on the 28th ult. Three of the train crew were killed and twenty-five passengers were injured.

London.—The newly appointed Archbishop of Canterbury will soon take up his residence in Lambeth Palace, which for some seven hundred years has been the official residence of the holder of that office.

A London dispatch of Tuesday says that a "colored rain" has been falling in England for the past few days. It left a grayish brown sediment and it is thought that this is caused from volcanic dust floating in the air.

Right worthily the State of Virginia has appropriated a site on Capitol Square, Richmond, near those of Washington, Clay and Jackson, for a monument to Doctor Hunter McGuire. Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war.

The drinking of kerosene is such a growing evil in France that measures are being proposed to combat it. The vice has long prevailed among the Indians of the South Pacific, and to such an extent that the importation of kerosene for drinking is an important trade in Peru and Bolivia.

The London Open air Sanatorium, which was built as the result of King Edward's interest in the subject of curing consumptives, is now under working headway at Workingham. It has been so successful that several other institutions of the kind will be built in different parts of the kingdom.

R. J. Gatling, inventor of the famous Gatling gun, and the recently perfected autograph, and a native of North Carolina, died suddenly Feb. 26, of heart failure and grip, at New York. He was 84 years of age. Dr. Gatling suffered from heart failure for three years. Of late it has been aggravated by an attack of influenza.

At the seventh annual meeting of the Southern Historical Association Feb. 27, the following were chosen officers: President, Gen. M. J. Wright; vice presidents, Gen. M. C. Butler, Col. Geo. A. Porterfield, Thomas Nelson Page, President Woodrow Wilson, Hon. S. Pasco and Thomas H. Clark; secretary and treasurer, Colyer Meriweather.

The National Good Roads Convention in session at Chicago last week unanimously endorsed a proposition pending in Congress to appropriate $20,000,000 to aid in good roads building throughout the country, declaring that present conditions were not only a hindrance to inter-State commerce, but cost the people annually 900 millions of dollars.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court upholding the contention of the government that it is unlawful to send lottery tickets from one state to another by other means than the United States mails, will be followed up by a strict prosecution of all those whom the special agents of the government find are engaged in the lottery and policy business.

The Senate of the United States cannot afford to ignore the charges of polygamy preferred by a Methodist minister in Utah against Senator-elect Reed Smoot. Some Senators, including so influential an one as Mr. Morgan, have said they would not oppose Smoot's admission to the Senate on the ground of his Mormonism, but they must investigate the charge of bigamy against him.

Henry Phipps, the director of the Carnegie Steel Company, who gave Lord Curzon, February 1st, $10,000, to be devoted to some practical object for scientific research, promising to be of enduring benefit to India, and who, February 3, gave Lady Curzon, wife of the viceroy, $10,000 for her Victoria memorial midwifery fund, handed to Lord Curzon to-day a further sum of $50,000 for the promotion of agricultural and scientific education.

Senatorial callers on the President regard an extraordinary session of the Senate as practically inevitable. The determination of the advocates of both the Cuban reciprocity and the Panama Canal treaties to secure their ratification continues firm. If they cannot ratify them before the final adjournment of the Congress, they will do so at the extra session of the Senate. That will be called by the President to meet probably at noon on March 5.

During the past few years there has been such a rapid decline in the water level of Great Salt Lake that the people of Northern Utah, and especially of Salt Lake City, have begun to be afraid lest this remarkable body of water will soon be a thing of the past. The reading of the gage at Garfield Beach on December 1, 1902, was 3 feet 5 inches below the zero of the scale, showing a fall of 11 feet 7 inches since the close of 1886, the year in which the last rise terminated.

Baron Speck Von Sternburg, the German Envoy who will represent his country at Washington during the Venezuelan troubles was born of English mother, had a military education and won honors in the Franco-Prussian war. After leaving the army he pursued political and economic studies, and all his diplomatic experience has been in English-speaking countries. He is regarded as the German diplomat who knows better than any other the temperament of America. His coming at this time is taken as an evidence of good-will to us.

Three of the eight Republicans on the Judiciary committee have voted with the democrats to report favorably to the Senate on the Littlefield anti-Trust bill. As amended, the bill restricts the use of the facilities of inter State commerce by corporations which secure rebates and attempts to establish a monopoly by lowering prices in localities where competition is threatened, and restricts the use of these facilities to prevent competition. Over-capitalized corporations hereafter organized, will be denied the right to engage in inter-State commerce. Pity it is that there will probably be no action on this measure at this session.

The Asyut dam which has just been completed across the Nile at a point 350 miles above the great Aswan dam which was opened by the Duke of Connaught on December 10th, will, it is expected, double the number of crops that can be gathered each year from land now under cultivation. The last dam is over one-half a mile in length, having a foundation of solid masonry ten feet thick and 87 feet wide. On the top is a roadway 14 feet wide which affords communication between the opposite banks. During the summer of 1900, 13,000 men were employed each day. The channel of the river had to be changed to facilitate the work, and a note-worthy feature of the undertaking is that it has been handed over to the Government, in thorough working order, more than twelve months under the contracted time.

The polar-exploration habit is strongly fixed upon Commander Peary. It was understood that his long effort to reach the pole, which ended last spring, was to be his last appearance as an explorer. He had promised his wife not to go again, the papers said. But such meagre tastes of frost as we have had this winter seem to have sapped his resolution, for it is now reported that he is ready to make another farewell tour of the arctic regions, provided that the Peary Arctic Club can raise $150,000 to send him. The verdict of his last trip was that he was an exceedingly well-qualified explorer. Unless he is thought to be past the polar-expedition age, there is probably no American who is so likely as he to conduct a successful expedition.—Exchange.

The chorus of objection which the President's negro policy has raised in the South has seemingly extended to the United States Senate, if the adverse action of the Senate committee on commerce on the Crum appointment is a sufficient indication. Washington correspondents say that it is, and they report that prominent Senators have assured the President that the Senate is loath to thrust negro office-holders upon unwilling Southern communities, and have advised him to withdraw the nomination. The President, however, can not find that there is any other objection to Dr. Crum except his color, and does not think that that would incapacitate him for performing the duties of collector of the port of Charleston; so he has told the senatorial emissaries, according to the Washington correspondents, that he will not withdraw the appointment, and that if the Senate takes no action on it, as is threatened, he will make Crum a recess appointee.—Exchange.

It will be a disgrace to the Fifty-seventh Congress should it adjourn sine die without passing some bill improving the currency of the Philippines, and without amending in one way or another the present Philippine tariff. There is no reason good in equity why the Philippines should not be treated as generously as Hawaii or Porto Rico. There is absolutely free trade between the two last-named islands and the United States, and the result has been in each case an astonishing growth of prosperity. We are practically asking Governor-General Taft and his associates to make bricks without straw when we insist upon subjecting the Filipinos to oppressive tariff restrictions. The Philippine tariff bill as it was passed by the House reduced customs duties on all products of the Philippines to twenty-five per cent. of the Dingley rates. In the Senate Mr. Lodge has proposed to make the tariff on sugar and tobacco half of the Dingley rates, and to admit all other articles duty free. The sole excuse for the amendment is the assumption, founded, no doubt, on inquiry, that the bill cannot pass the Senate in the form which the House gave it. If that be true, the amendment should be adopted, for, even as amended, the bill will present a marked improvement on the existing state of things.—Harper's Weekly.

"No person who has not recently been in the Philippines," says Vice Governor Wright, "can appreciate the condition of poverty and distress that prevails throughout nearly all the islands. Fully 90 per cent. of the caribaoes of the islands have been swept away by rinderpest. That represents a terrible loss, for it affects not only the owners of large plantations, but the individual farmers. Many Filipinos have lost their entire capital and will have to begin at the bottom again. The cultivation of rice is wholly dependent on the caribaoes, which are the draft animals of that country. To add to the difficulties of the situation the rice crop of China last year was poor, so that the price of the product has been almost doubled.

"It seems as though a plague were descending on the islands. Great hordes of locusts have preyed on the crops for the last two years and cholera has carried off fully 100,000 of the inhabitants. Whole villages have been depopulated by the ravages of this disease, so that it is not to be wondered at if the natives are badly discouraged over the prospect for the future. Under these conditions the temptations are great for the warlike and restless elements to take to the hills and live by plunder and thieving. All these troubles have naturally added to the difficulties of the Philippine Commission in establishing civil government and that there has not been a general outbreak among the people is a great tribute to their confidence in the American authorities."—Exchange.

The institution for scientific research founded by Andrew Carnegie in Washington and endowed with $10,000,000 is now organized and at work. According to an official account of its plans, published in Science, the institution does not purpose to undertake to do anything that is being well done by other agencies; to do that which can be better done by other agencies; or to enter the field of existing organizations that are properly equipped.

The executive committee, we are told, purposes, when facilities for research in any direction are not available, to create them, and to this end it advises the purchase of a large tract of ground at Washington, the erection thereon of a central administration building, the establishment of such laboratories as may be found necessary, and the employment of men for such research work as may be undertaken in Washington. Advisory committees of scientific men to aid in organizing and carrying on this work are to be formed in all parts of the country. "Research," in the sense in which it is to be carried and aided by the institution, is defined as follows:

While the income of the institution is large enough to enter upon some large projects and a number of minor ones, it has seemed to the authorities to be wiser, at the beginning, to make a number of small grants and to prepare thoroughly to take up some of the larger projects. With this in view the executive committee has recommended to the trustees that there be placed at its disposal, for the fiscal year 1902-03, $200,000 for aid to special researches in various branches of science, and $40,000 for the publication of the results.

"In the opinion of the committee, the most effective way to discover and develop the exceptional man is to put promising men upon research work under proper guidance and supervision. Those who do not fulfil their promise will soon drop out, and by the survival of the fittest the exceptionally capable man will appear and be given opportunity to accomplish the best that is in him."—Literary Digest.

Deaths.

Somewhere night
Drifts to a morning beautiful with light.
—F. L. Stanton.

M'KINNON.—Miss Mary McKinnon died Aug. 22nd, 1902, in her 54th year. She joined Sharon Presbyterian Church when a girl and continued to grow in grace till her death. For more than four years she was afflicted and unable to walk, but her long affliction revealed the fact that her faith was real—a principle within that brought forth a patience that was rare and beautiful. To her the Bible was God's word, revealing sin and the remedy. She loved her friends. She was devoted to her family. The work of the whole church was dear to her but her own church was her chief delight. A Presbyterian Church at Mt. Gilead was her ardent wish. Religious conversation with her friends and pastor was to her a source of strength and pleasure. She was for many years the President of the Ladies' Missionary Society. Truly a good woman has gone from us.

M'AULEY.—Mr. James A. McAuley, Sr., died Nov. 2nd, 1902. He was for a long term of years a member of the Presbyterian Church, first at Sharon and was later transferred to Wadeville Church.

M'KINNON.—Rory McKinnon was born Dec. 8th, 1823 and died Oct. 31st, 1902. In early youth he joined the Presbyterian Church. Was a deacon more than 20 years in Sharon Church, afterwards elected to the office of Ruling Elder and was transferred to Wadeville Presbyterian Church. He magnified the office of Ruling Elder and died as he had lived, trusting his Redeemer.

And since God has taken him from us we feel our loss and wish to express our sympathy and sorrow.

Therefore it is resolved, 1st, That we bow in submission unto the will of God. The loss is felt by family, church and community.

2nd, We cherish his memory, his noble example and influence, his untiring zeal for his church and loyalty to God.

3rd. We tender our sympathy to his loved ones and trust that they may ever profit by his life and example.

4th, We set apart a page of our minister to his memory and order a copy sent to The Presbyterian Standard for publication.

The Household.

Slavery to Things.

Mrs. Newell Dwight Hillis does not come before the public as a preacher often, but a little ten-line talk of hers before a woman's club on Saturday shows her fitness for occasional incursions of the profession to which her husband belongs. The women were talking about simplicity of living, about the possibility of an escape for the modern woman from the complications of social life, which become so much of a burden, even outside the ranks of that society whose devotees recruit the sanitariums, winter resort hotels, and rest cures. The example of the New England women of an earlier generation, who did their own housework and yet had leisure for reading and for social refinements, was quoted with approval and there was a demand for the organization of anti-extravagant society. Then Mrs. Hillis told the story of a woman who achieved simplicity of living while other women talked about it. According to Mrs. Hillis, this woman reduced her servants from four to one, riddled her house of encumbering trifles, declined to change her furniture with the changes of fashion, and then, in a simple but artistic home, entertained her friends simply, giving them herself instead of the achievements of a chef.

This is a case where example is better than precept. It is a condition and not a theory that confronts the women with education and refinement but who have only a moderate income. In theory none of them approve of the extreme elaboration which entertaining has reached, even among people who make no pretensions in fashion. Where is the woman who will give a real simplicity luncheon, with only three courses, without a single "dolly," laid upon a plate, without one plate on top of another, and who will dare to allow her servant to carry more than two plates from the table at a time, out of mercy to her fellow woman who has the work to do? The New England women before 1850, who did their own work and yet were social leaders, did not hesitate to invite many friends to their table and yet arise to remove plates themselves or have their daughters do it. It was the accepted standard of a whole society, yet any one who imagines that those homes lacked refinement, that the hospitality was not lavish or that the people were not intelligent and the conversation worth hearing, has missed the knowledge of the most interesting social development in America. It was a system worked out in harmony with our political theories and yet it made room for the exaltation of literature and education.

Profusion came in with the rapid increase of wealth after the Civil War. In its later developments it is copied from the great country houses in England. Those houses are widely supposed to show the most charming hospitality in the world, but it is based upon conditions which do not exist here. Two of its foundations are cheap service and a large class who inherit servitude as unquestioningly as their employers inherit wealth and titles. It is "that station in life to which it has pleased God to call me," and the servants follow their catechism by trying to do their duty there. In this country no man believes that he is "called" to anything except the finest position with the biggest salary in sight. Men and women scorn domestic service and the result is a rate of wages which forbids any such retinue of servants as the English have. Even the millionaires who can pay for such a service commonly have to import it, because the breed languishes in this climate. The American woman with one or two servants tries to fill in the duties of those who are missing, herself. The English hostess has a housekeeper and a butler. The American woman, like the miner's widow in "The Spenders," commonly "does her own butting," and then she ridicules the woman who used the phrase as well as did the thing. It is the thing and not the phrase that counts. The folly of trying to maintain a style of living which grew up about the presence of a butler and many maids, by women who have only one or two, is a good deal better subject for satire than is any "nice derangement of epitaphs" ever invented by any Mrs. Malaprop from the West or from a hotel kitchen.

The women who listened to Mrs. Hillis' talk know that quite as well as Mrs. Hillis or any social reformer does. What they lack is the bravery to strike out and do things which may by any possibility imply that they do not know what the etiquette of fashion prescribes, or that they lack the refinement to appreciate all the little niceties of an elegant establishment. Most of them would rather go to a sanitarium than make such a confession as that. In the slavery to things and to customs is a much finer chance for feminine reformers than is to be found in street cleaning, or industrial education, or in most of the pet philanthropies at the hour. That is a reform which would save the women who are really worth saving.—Selected.

The Domestic Value of Newspapers.

Newspapers can be made a wonderful lightener of household work. For instance, two or three thicknesses of newspaper laid upon the nicely scrubbed kitchen table, when preparing a meal, will obviate the necessity of scrubbing it again when the clearing is done. They will catch the drops of milk or grease, the specks that will fall even with the most careful hand. A double thickness spread upon the floor in front of the range when cooking is going on will serve the same purpose. It is so easy to spill a little—indeed, it is so difficult to avoid it—and the frying will "spatter" sometimes in spite of you.

Your dishwashing will be a much more dainty process if, after you have scraped your dishes ready for washing, you first rub them off with crumpled newspaper. There will be almost nothing to come off in the water. Clean as you may scrape them, you cannot pretend to get them, as clean as if they are rubbed off with paper. Rubbing them off in this way removes about three quarters of the terrors of dishwashing.

"Nowadays," said a young housekeeper, recently, "when I peel potatoes that have been boiled in their jackets I drop the skins on a piece of paper instead of into a pan. I found that when they were cold they seemed almost glued to the pan, and were very hard to soak off. Now I don't have any trouble with them. Whenever I can, I make paper take the place of a refuse dish. You would be surprised how I have learned to reduce the number of dishes I have around when I am preparing a meal, and I am just as clean, if not actually cleaner than I was in the beginning. I don't have any mussy pans sitting around now, and what I do use are easily washed for I wipe out the refuse before it has time to dry on. I couldn't keep house without old papers; and then I burn them up under the range, throw out the refuse with the ashes, and I'm "cleaned up" in short order."

So much for newspapers in the kitchen. They are equally useful in their own way in other parts of the house. Windows, if cleaned with crumpled newspapers, wet moderately with coal oil, and then rubbed entirely clear with more crumpled paper, will be brighter and keep clean longer than if cleaned in any other way. The coal oil running on to the paint of the sashes is no detriment in this method of cleaning glass, as the fluid itself is a most effective paint cleaner.—The Witness.

MISS ROSE OWENS,

No. 720 Seventeenth St.,

WASHINGTON, D. C.

"If every suffering woman has the same experience with Wine of Cardui that I had, your medicine will be most popular. About a year ago I began to have a worn out tired feeling with lassitude, pains in the back and head which kept increasing every month. I felt that I needed something, but to get the right medicine was the trouble. I finally decided on your Wine of Cardui and only needed to take three bottles when I was fully recovered."

Miss Rose Owens.

If you are a suffering woman we would say to you that Wine of Cardui seldom fails to completely cure any case of female ills. We say emphatically, it never fails to benefit. Every day hundreds of sufferers are writing to our Ladies' Advisory Department. The letters are opened by persons competent to give advice. Mrs. Jones was cured by following the advice which was freely given her by the Ladies' Advisory Department. Miss Owens was cured without advice by just buying a $1.00 bottle of Wine of Cardui from her druggist and taking this great medicine in the privacy of her home. No doctor's examination, treatment or advice is necessary. You have read what these two cured women have written. Is this not enough to lead you to determine to be rid of suffering?

August 13, 1900, Mrs. W. H. Jones, of Cameron, Mo., writes:

"I suffered terribly at monthly periods for three years. I would sometimes go for seven months with no flow at all. Now I have my health back again and am expecting to be confined in January. I cannot praise your medicine enough."

WHEN Miss Rose Owens, who has a responsible position in the Government service at Washington, D. C., decided to try Wine of Cardui, she made a wise choice. Over a million women have been relieved of female weakness by this same Wine of Cardui. It is not a strong medicine but may be taken every day in the year by any woman with benefit. It does not force results, but corrects derangements of the menstrual organs. It strengthens the nervous system, gives tone to the bodily functions, acts directly on the genital organs, and is the finest tonic for women known to the science of medicine.

The Home Circle.

Mother's Birthday Gift.

"I've never had anything like that in all my life. Whatever is given me is something I can use about the house," said Mrs. Winship, as she hurried to the kitchen where a kettle of vegetables was boiling over. "Sometimes it's a set of knives and forks, then again some table linen. I've had a gasoline stove, a dozen dining-room chairs, some window shades for the parlor, and my last birthday gift was a churn.

"I don't suppose they think," charitably, "that something like what father and the boys gave Millie might please me. Probably they think such things aren't adapted to me!"

She held up her hard, rough hands, and tried to imagine how a fire opal, like the ring Millie had just received as a birthday gift, would look on the work-worn fingers. She changed the position as though for a better light.

"You would look rather out of place, perhaps a little bit ashamed, with a ring on. I reckon you wouldn't know how to act, never having been accustomed to such things; but perhaps you'd get used to it." There was such a trace of wistful longing in her voice that it almost startled hard-working Mrs. Winship herself.

"Isn't it a beauty, mother? Father and the boys are just splendid to give me such a darling little ring; they're so good to me! I wish your birthday came the same time as mine, instead of three weeks later. We could compare our gifts and rejoice together. See how it sparkles!"

Millie, who had just entered the kitchen, held the ring so the sun, shining through the window, scattered little flashes of color about her hand.

"It is a beauty, dear!" There was yet just the faintest trace of longing in the mother's tone.

"What do you suppose they're going to give you? Of course, I'm going to put my money with theirs," and Millie looked up expectantly into Mrs. Winship's face. "Don't know? I knew you couldn't guess; but it's something nice!"

"Father asked me only yesterday what you needed, and I mentioned so many things! There's a new parlor lamp—we can hardly go any longer without one. Then the front stairs' carpet is worn almost threadbare! I also suggested how often you had hinted for a new pump; how the old one is so hard to bring water with. Then, while I was about it, I suggested a clothes-horse. The one we have is such a rickety affair it hardly stood up while I was hanging the last ironing on it. Don't you wish you knew which you'd get?"

"They are all very useful," replied Mrs. Winship. "I don't know as there's any choice."

Millie turned and glanced suspiciously at her mother. The way in which she spoke didn't seem quite natural; or was it because she was tired?

"Mother does have too much to do," thought Millie, as she hurried to show the new gift to Ellen Kimball, who was just going by. "I believe we'd better get the pump, for it would so lighten her work! That's what we'll decide on; father'd as soon get that as one of the others, I am sure!"

Hiram Winship had been an unusually prosperous farmer. His acres had increased as the years came and went until the original farm "was almost squeezed to death situated in the middle of so many additions," as he facetiously expressed it. The small dowry Sarah Hobbart had brought to her husband had gone to stock the place and buy some improved farm machinery.

"I'll get a ring soon's we're on our feet—your engagement ring," Hiram had declared before they were married, but the once slender fingers had grown red and big-jointed, and the ring had not been bought. Hiram had forgotten all about it long ago.

The afternoon following Millie's birthday, she drew the strings of her sun hat about her neck and started for the meadow with a berry basket. She stopped before she reached the gate.

"I mustn't wear you; you might get lost," she said to the handsome birthday ring, and slipping it off, she ran back up the stairs to her room. "I guess you'll be safer there," she said, laying the opal on the velvet pin cushion and hurrying back to her basket.

Some time later, Mrs. Winship stood before the bureau in her daughter's room, holding the ring in her hands. "It's rather too small for me. I imagine it's just about the size I could have worn when I was married."

She didn't hear Millie's step on the stair, nor did she notice her daughter's form in the door.

"Even though I'm growing old, I like pretty things! I haven't had a very large share; perhaps that is why I wish they knew, and would give me just one little thing for my very own. Not something for the house like!"

Millie heard no more. She crept softly away from the open door and down the narrow stairs.

"Pump - clotheshorse! Mother mine, we never thought, else we'd never have been so cruel! We've just given you the things we needed ourselves and called them presents. Mother, why didn't you tell us how selfish we were? You've never even whispered a protest!"

"Have you decided, daughter, which we'd better get—the pump, or one of the other things?" asked Mr. Winship.

It was after the supper dishes had been put away, and Millie had found her father on the cool veranda. She could see her mother in the warm kitchen, sprinkling the clothes for the morrow's ironing.

"Yes, father, the other things," and while she spoke it low, that her mother might not hear, there was an anxious determination in her voice that caused her father to look up with inquisitive surprise.

"Not all—clotheshorse, lamp, and carpet?" he asked, with a smile on his sun-burnt face.

"No, father; let me whisper."

When the dual conference was over, there was a light in Mr. Winship's eyes of regret and resolve.

He sealed the contract with a bargain squeeze of Millie's hand.

"We'll get the rest, too; the pump and 'the other things!' he declared.

"They seem to have a good deal of mystery over getting my birthday present," thought Mrs. Winship a fortnight later. "It may be over the make of the pump or the color of the lampshade. But there, I must be grateful; a spirit like this isn't becoming a woman of my age!"

The Tuesday before her birthday, the hardware man from the village drove into the Winship yard.

"It's a pump!" exclaimed Mrs. Winship, and though she had half expected it, there was a trace of disappointment in her voice.

"Shut your eyes and come with us," and Millie took her mother's hand, after breakfast, the morning of Mrs. Winship's birthday, and they started toward the stairs.

"But the present isn't up there!" remonstrated the little woman positively.

"Who said so?"

"It couldn't be—a pump; besides, I've seen it."

"The pump! Sarah, don't!" and over the face of Hiram Winship passed an expression of pain and shame.

"You'll have to guess again, mother," and Charles and Harold gently lifted Mrs. Winship and carried her to the stairway.

"Hiram! Children!" In those two words was the pent-up gratitude of twenty years.

There on the bed was a beautiful copy in colors of the Sistine Madonna, from Charles; a work-basket lined with silk and fitted with sewing implements of steel and silver, from Millie; a set of novels by her favorite author from Harold; creamy lace and such a beautiful shimmering silk dress pattern from Hiram.

"And here, Sally," said her husband, calling her by an almost forgotten name, "here is your engagement ring," and he lovingly, though a trifle, clumsily, perhaps, forced it over the enlarged finger joints. "It's from us all and is our pledge to remember what we owe the little woman. There, Sally, you know—I can't express it!"—Selected.

Mrs. But.

Friendly Visitor.

Mrs. But is our next-door neighbor. Her real name is "Green;" but John, whenever he sees her marching up the walk, remarks: "My dear, here comes Mrs. But." He is not given to calling people names, he says it merely to put me on my guard, for he knows our neighbor's failing. She is a bright, breezy little woman, and as long as the conversation is confined to the weather and household affairs, I quite enjoy chatting with her; but the moment that a human being, living or dead, chances to be mentioned, I begin to quake.

The first time she called—it was soon after we moved into the neighborhood—it happened to say that Mrs. Goodwin, from the opposite side of the street, had called to see me, and that she impressed me as a very lovely character.

"O, she is, indeed," said Mrs. But, heartily; "she is such a devoted wife and so good to the poor. But," she went on, lowering her voice; "there used to be a good deal of talk about her when she was a girl; and though I don't suppose half the things that were said were true, people don't seem to forget them."

What necessity there was for this drop of poison to be instilled into my mind I could not see. Mrs. Goodwin's youth was in the far past, and in the gossip concerning her in that remote period I had no interest whatever; I was quite willing to take her as she was in her sweet, ripe womanhood.

One day, when Mrs. But dropped in, she found my little friend, Nellie Gray, at the piano. Nellie is a shy, brown-eyed girl of fifteen, gifted with a wonderful ear for melody, and, as the Gray's had no piano, I had offered her mine. "I can't help loving the child, she is such a warm-hearted little creature, and so eager for music," I said, as the door closed behind her.

My visitor gave a scarcely perceptible shrug. "Yes, Nellie seems to be a very nice girl," she admitted, "but I suppose you know she is a poor house waif?"

"No," I said: I knew nothing of the kind. Mrs. Gray had introduced Nellie to me as her eldest daughter, and the information volunteered by Mrs. But was utterly uncalled for.

One evening, on our way home from prayer meeting, John remarked that he always enjoyed listening to young Spaulding, he was so devout and earnest.

"Yes, he is a very interesting speaker," said our neighbor, who had joined us as we came out of the lecture room, "and he seems very sincere, but I can't help feeling a little suspicious; I knew him when he was a boy."

John made haste to change the subject; a word of encouragement would have resulted in our hearing the whole history of the young man's boyhood.

"I've no patience," he exclaimed, the moment we were by ourselves, "with people who are always bringing up the past! Just imagine what heaven would be if the inhabitants were disposed to indulge in that sort of retrospection! The Angel Gabriel himself would hardly be safe from their disparaging 'buts,' and the whitest robe in all the white-robed throng would be in danger of being smutted."

"And yet," I said, "Mrs. But evidently considers herself a Christian."

"O, I don't dispute her title," said John; "but I can't help thinking that she might be able to read it clearer if she would rub up her glasses with I Cor. 13."

Sharing Our Homes.

"A flower upon my threshold laid;
A little kindness wrought unseen;
I know not who love's tribute paid,
I only know that it has made Life's pathway smooth, life's borders green."

"Why, why don't we do something for this army of students, then?" said an energetic young matron, one of a group of ladies, among whom a discussion of the needs of students had arisen. "Let's do something."

"That's what I say," came promptly from another of the group. "I'm tired and sick of hearing that the world in general needs reforming. What I want to find out is how I can put a practical hand to helping the small corner in which I find myself. You know I'm nothing if not practical," with a half apologetic laugh and with an interrogative look.

"But, my dear, are we not doing that in planning and working for home-like college residences?" said an elderly lady.

"Yes, but look at the time and, above all, the money, that it will require. I'm afraid that solution of the question is far in the future yet. Meanwhile numbers of these young people come and go and live, or exist, as best they may or can in boarding houses, with no one specially interested in them, practically without counsel or restraint, and that, too at a most impressionable period of their lives. What a lonely student needs is a touch of real personal interest and a breath of a real home atmosphere occasionally."

"Besides," said another speaker "what is true of the larger cities is true in a measure of the whole country. Almost every town of any importance has its educational centre to attend which young people must leave their homes in the surrounding country for a considerable part of the year."

"I have done a good deal of entertaining of students," said a professor's wife, "but I always felt this difficulty; there were so many of them that it was almost impossible to become well enough acquainted with them individually to give them the benefit of the personal sympathy which they need. If there were only half a dozen or so, one could get to know and take an individual interest in them."

"Why, that suggests a simple solution of the whole matter," broke in the first speaker again. "Suppose each woman interested in students in general takes four or five of them under her special care and makes them feel that her home is open to them at any and all times and that she is always sufficiently interested in them to be interested in what they are doing, or to give freely counsel and help in difficulties or perplexities. Don't you think some absent mother would bless her for it?"

"In short, you mean, give them a corner in your life and home, that they may consider specially their own?" returned the professor's wife.

"Exactly."

"Would it not be a good thing to extend this idea of sharing our home beyond even the student circles? There are a great many people who long for a touch of home life."

"Yes, it would," agreed another speaker, heartily; "you see, it requires no organization, no equipment beyond that of tact and a home and a kind heart back of it all. The idea is capable of endless adaptation to different needs and circumstances."

"Well," said the young matron, with bright emphasis, "I've got a glimpse of something to do and I'm going to do it."

"I was a stranger and ye took me in," quoted the quiet little woman softly.—Selected.

Our Young People.

Where the Roses Led.

By Mabel Nelson Thurston.

From her shop window, Miss Loann Peckham saw the new minister coming up the path, and a curious expression came about her lips. She was a small, sandy woman, with penetrating gray eyes under the dusty lashes, and a manner of business-like brevity. She had the name in the village of being close-fisted, although always scrupulously honest. Everybody trusted Loann Peckham, but nobody ever thought of running in to "visit" with her in the homely neighborhood fashion.

At the minister's knock she slipped through the shop and opened the side door into her little sitting-room. The whole room was full of roses. They all were crowded tightly into "bunches" and jammed into blue and purple vases, yet not even so could they lose entirely their birthright of beauty, and their fragrance wandered freely.

Miss Loann gave the minister the best chair and took her seat stiffly opposite. He talked easily of one thing after another; she answered with brief monosyllables. In the dim room he did not see the red climbing higher and higher in her thin cheeks. So it was a surprise when she suddenly took the conversation.

"You know that sermon that you preached last Sunday, about there being joy for everybody if they'd take it?"

"Yes," replied the minister.

"Well, 'tain't so—that's all. I wanted to tell you so then; I wanted to get right up in meetin' and say it to your face. It's leading folks astray—that's 'tis. I ain't sayin' you meant to. You're young, and it hasn't come to you yet. But I guess I know. It ain't true."

"I think that I don't quite understand," the minister answered quietly.

The woman opposite him drew a hard breath; her words came angrily:

"I dunno whether I can make you understand or not, but I know what I'm talkin' about. You said that everybody could be happy if he would—that it was God's plan. Mebbe 'tis for some people. But there's folks that it seems as if He's taken a grudge against. I s'pose its wicked to say it, but I'm goin' to let it out for once in my life. Do you suppose if I'd had anything to do with it, I'd chosen to live, when it meant livin' the way I've had to—a little homely runt of a thing that everybody laughed at in school, and nobody ever cared for, an' that's had to drudge day in an' day out to get an' keep a place that she could call her own? I s'pose you'd say I ought to be grateful to have enough to eat an' wear, but I ain't. That's nothin' but justice. Folks want more than that—they want somethin' happy to make livin' worth while. I've done just as right as I knew how all my life, an' I'd treat an animal as good as God has treated me.

"And I ain't the only one, either. There's that Hawkins girl—I watched her Sunday while you was preachin'.

She looked as if she'd like to bite some body an' I knew jest how she felt. There she is, both parents dead—not that I should think that counted much for they was a shiftless pair as ever was, but I s'pose t'was somethin' to her—an' she livin' with an uncle that's got a houseful of his own, an' at their beck an' call the whole time. She goes 'round lookin' like a rag bag, an' her face as peaked as if she didn't have more'n a meal a week.

"Then there's Mis' Bailey—her husband an' boys all gone an' jest Harriet left to be a burden an' a care. You know about Harriet, of course—she ain't bright. Mis' Bailey has to watch her every minute for fear she'll get hold of matches. She's a great big girl, but she don't know any more than a four-year-old child. It must be real happy to have a daughter like that!"

"And yet," the minister interrupted, "Mrs. Bailey came and thanked me for that sermon after church, Miss Peckham."

"I guess the Hawkins girl didn't," said Miss Loann, grimly.

"No," he replied, seriously, "the Hawkins girl didn't." He had risen to go, but remained standing a minute. "And yet, do you know," he said, with his warm, winning smile, "I cannot retract my sermon. I believe that God sends happiness to us every day of our lives if we would but see it. I believe that it has been at your door today and will come again tomorrow, and the day after and the day after that. But that is not the last word; if it should be that there are souls to whom God has denied happiness, there is never one upon whom He is not longing to bestow a higher gift, and that is Victory."

He opened the door as he spoke, and the brilliant June beauty flooded the room. "Your roses are so beautiful, Miss Peckham—I don't know any in the village like them. You must enjoy giving your tenth of such exquisite harvests!"

Miss Loann stared at him as if she did not understand.

"My tenth—of roses!"

"Why, yes," he laughed. "You didn't suppose that the command applied only to farmers, did you?"

"But I never have given any," she said, bluntly.

"Then," answered the minister, with a laugh in his eyes, "what a great deal you have to pay up, Miss Peckham!"

Five minutes later the minister was almost out of sight down the green arched street, but Miss Peckham still stood as he had left her among the roses.

They were her roses—the one beautiful thing in her life. Besides, how could she give them? She couldn't go round offering them to people and folks never asked her for any—that is, not often; a sudden memory of the answer she had given Mrs. Babbitt's little girl, when her mother sent her for a few flowers one day when she expected company, rose and condemned her. She had never liked Mrs. Babbitt and she had told the child sharply to tell her mother that when she put flowers in her store she'd have them to sell, and not till then. When she put flowers in her store—well, why

A TRAIN FOR MILLIONAIRES

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

shouldn't she—not to sell, but to give to anyone who cared for them? The more she thought of it, the more the idea seemed to please her.

She brought out her garden scissors and cut a great armful of blossoms. She had no vase that would hold them, so she put them into her largest mixing bowl and set them on her counter.

But when six o'clock came—Miss Loann always closed her shop at six—the perplexity was as large as before. For through the whole long summer afternoon the shop bell had jingled but once, and that was for Teddy Morley, whose mother had sent him for a spool of number sixty black cotton; and though in knowledge of boy nature Miss Loann was still, so to speak, in the primer class, Teddy's anxiety to get the errand done as speedily as possible was so very evident that she did not dare offer roses. She stood looking down at the flowers after she had locked her store door and closed the shutters.

She went back into her sitting-room and locked the door between; but not so could she shut out the disquieting thoughts. All through her solitary supper she was struggling with her problem; finally, when her dishes were washed and put away, she went for her Bible; she was going to study that thing out for herself.

"Fur's I can make out," she said, after an hour's hard searching, "they all had to give somethin', an' I s'pose it's got to be flowers; but sakes alive, I ain't any more idea than a year-old child how I'm goin' to do it. I dunno what I am goin' to do—'less I pull up all those rose bushes!"

She frowned impatiently, but there was honest perplexity in her eyes; and all the night, in the intervals between fitful snatches of sleep, she was going over and over the minister's words. When at half-past six she rose weary and unrefreshed, it was to a spirit of mockery.

"Guess it's likely happiness will be coming along to my door today," she said ironically. "I guess——" She stopped short, staring in amazement. There was someone on her doorstep! No customer, surely; there was not such urgent demand for tape and pins before seven o'clock. The next minute she gave a short laugh.

"If 'taint that Hawkins girl!" she exclaimed. "Well, I guess she's about as far from happiness as you'd be likely to find. Wonder what she's doin' here anyway!"

She opened the door cautiously, and stepped out. The meagre, ragged little figure certainly did not look like one's ideal of joy, but for one revealing second Miss Loann had a glimpse of a face looking over to the roses that she never would have recognized; the next moment the Hawkins girl was staring at her with the familiar frown.

"I wasn't hurting your old flowers" she said, defiantly. "I guess anybody can look at 'em."

Miss Loann spoke hurriedly, before her courage should forsake her: "You can have some if you want. They bloom better if you cut them," she added lamely.

"You mean it honest Injun?" the girl cried, incredulously.

"Yes, I do," Miss Loann returned.

The girl drew a long breath. Then the light died from her face and she shook her head.

"'Twouldn't be any use. I ain't got any place to put 'em. They'd be torn to pieces in five minutes, at—where I live."

Even in the utter bewilderment of the experience, Miss Loann noticed two things, the softening of the hard voice, and the avoidance of the word "home." A strange sympathy swept across her; she knew so well what it meant to be alone and left out. She stepped down and opened the garden gate. "Mebbe you'd like to come in," she said. "You can stay just as long as you want to. It ain't botherin' any."

The girl gave her one swift look then, without a word, she slipped into the beautiful welcoming place. Miss Loann's voice, fraught with anxiety, called across the roses:

"You don't know anybody that would like to have some flowers, do you?"

The girl considered a moment. "There's Mis' Bailey," she said; "she likes 'em awfully, but she can't have a garden because Harriet pulls things up."

"Well, there!" Miss Loann exclaimed, in intense relief; "I dunno why I didn't think of her. Can you take her some when you go back? I'll bring you the scissors to cut them."

"I'd like to," the girl cried, eagerly. "Mis' Bailey's good—she is!"

Miss Loann nodded and hurried into the house. A minute later she appeared at the side door with the scissors.

"How many shall I cut?" the girl inquired.

"Enough to make a good big bunch," Miss Loann responded, promptly.

As Miss Loann stepped about her kitchen getting breakfast she kept glancing out into the garden. The Hawkins girl was tiptoeing about as if she were in a parlor. Once Miss Loann saw her kiss a rose. She cut very slowly and only after long deliberation. Miss Loann had an inspiration.

"Don't you want to fill my vases?" she asked. "I dunno's I'll get time to day."

"I'd just love to," the girl replied.

Miss Loann nodded. "You can come an' get them when you're through there," she said; "then you'll know where to set them. Don't you want to come in to breakfast?"

She stood aghast at herself when the words were out; she hadn't had the least idea that she was going to say them; she wondered in dismay how she could talk to the Hawkins girl at the table. It seemed easy out in the garden, but anywhere else!

But she need not have worried. The Hawkins girl shook her head hastily. "No'm, I couldn't," she said, "I guess I've got to be getting back. But I'd love to fill your vases first."

So while Miss Loann sat eating her breakfast the Hawkins girl filled the vases. When she brought them in, Miss Loann looked at them in amazement.

"Why, you've fixed them all loose!" she exclaimed. "And only one color in each. I never thought about doing them that way."

"Don't you like them?" the girl asked anxiously. "I didn't know how you did it, so I tried to fix them the way they look growing. I thought they'd hate to be crowded all in together; seems's if they must feel about it like people. But I can fix 'em over if you tell me how."

"I don't want them fixed over," Miss Loann returned, promptly. The sentiment was one that appealed to her sympathy.

The Hawkins girl picked up Mrs. Bailey's roses; her old air of indifference had fallen suddenly upon her. "Well, I guess I'll be going," she said. She hesitated a moment, flushing darkly; politeness had so seldom been demanded by the exigencies of her poor little life, that she didn't know how to achieve it.

"I—I'm real obliged to you for letting me come in," she stammered, finally.

Miss Loann was busy over her roses and did not glance up. "Don't you want to come tomorrow?" she asked. "You can just reach over and untatch the gate and come in any time you feel like it."

The Hawkins girl stood and looked at her. "Any time?" she repeated.

"That's what I said," Miss Loann returned, briskly.

"But mebbe—s'posin' 'twas every day?"

"Well?" Miss Loann responded

The Hawkins girl stood as if petrified, the color deepening in her face; suddenly, without a word, the gate had slammed behind her, and she was gone.

The next morning Miss Loann woke early, but she was not thinking about tenths—she was wondering if the Hawkins girl would come again; when seven o'clock struck and she had not appeared, she was curiously disappointed.

"I guess she don't care any great about it or she'd have been here," she said. "Sakes alive, as if it makes any difference to me whether a ragged chip of a girl comes or not!"

But the next morning she did come, and the morning after that; before two weeks had passed, she had become as regular a visitor to the garden as day-break itself. By slow degrees, with many relapses into embarrassing monosyllabic periods, the two began to know each other. Before a month was over the Hawkins girl had divined Miss Loann's intent in regard to her flowers and was carrying them to sick or tired or lonely ones all over the village. Somehow—Miss Loann could not in the least understand how it was—people seemed to have changed; they stopped to chat when they came for needles and ribbons, they even began to drop in to "set a while," and twice within ten days Miss Loann had been invited out to tea.

So the summer grew happier and happier, and Miss Loann for the first time in her life was too busy to notice the passing of the flowers. It was when she found the Hawkins girl standing, a desolate, lonely figure in a frost-blackened garden one morning, that she suddenly realized that the summer had vanished and the summer's guest would follow. A sudden wave of loneliness swept upon her.

The Hawkins girl looked up at her, trying to smile. "I guess there won't be any good of my coming any more," she said.

Then at last Miss Loann knew with a strange, wonderful certainty. She didn't even ask; she said it with triumphant ring in her voice: "No, there aint' any need of comin' any more, because you ain't goin' away. You're going to live with me and go to school and have a good time like other girls. I never had any folks in my life, since I can remember. You're going to stay and be my folks."

The Hawkins girl stood before her, perfectly still. "Miss Loann," she said, slowly, "I'd work my fingers off for you."

Miss Loann laughed. Nobody would have noticed that her hair was sandy and her lashes dust-colored, so transformed was she by the great magician, Joy.

"No, you'll not!" she declared. "I've worked all my life and I couldn't stop if I tried, but it's going to be different with you. You're going to be a girl. You're going to have pretty dresses an' good times an' go about like other girls. I never had any of those things when I was young, but you're goin' to have them for me."

It was an afternoon a few weeks later that the minister called. Miss Loann greeted him brightly. The little sitting-room was flooded with autumn sunshine, and, though the garden was bare, geraniums and begonias made cheer at all the windows. There was the sound of girls' voices up-stairs, and once a peal of merry laughter in half a dozen different keys.

Miss Loann looked at the minister.

"You know that sermon on happiness you preached last summer?"

"Yes?" he said, expectantly.

"I wish you'd preach it over some Sunday," she replied. "I was thinking just the other day I'd like to hear it again."—Forward.

A Curious Tree.

There is a tree in the West Indies that the natives say "grows in dishes!" It looks like an apple tree. They call it the calabash.

It bears very queer leaves and large white blossoms that grow right from the trunk and larger branches. After the flower comes the fruit, just as our apples or peaches do. But this fruit is in the shape of a gourd, only stronger and much larger, some times a foot in diameter.

Now, see what a use the people of that country make of this fruit. The shell is so hard that all sorts of big and little dishes and drinking cups can be carved out of it. Even pots and kettles are made and used over the fire, but of course they cannot last as long as our iron ones. Is not this a serviceable tree? No wonder the natives are proud of it.—Montreal Star.

The Cunning of the Coyote.

One can occasionally trap a big wolf, but of all cute beasts the coyote, or little prairie wolf, is the most cunning. It possesses an appreciation of danger, and a regard for its own safety, that is almost beyond belief, especially in a region where it has been hunted a good deal. It will spring a steel trap, extract the bait and eat it, if it is anything it likes to eat. As for poisoning it, it simply disdains all such attempts for its destruction. This of course is in a region where baits, traps, and all sorts of devices for its destruction have been employed in vain.

You may exercise the most cunning precautions to no purpose. The wolf will sit on a mound watching you, while you with gloved hands fix your bait, and set your trap. Before you are 200 yards away he or she will have approached your trap, sprung it, got out your bait, and eaten it, seeming to grin all the while in your face.

And he possesses an expert knowledge of the range—and the exact range, too—of your rifle, that would put Colonel Gildersleeve to shame. There was never under the sun a beast that can excel it in pure cunning, and if by any lucky chance, you do take one in a trap, be very careful how you fool about it, for it can smash your wrist bone with one snap of its trap-like jaws, and it will do it, too, if you are not wary in taking it out of the trap alive. Once caught, however, it makes no noise, but dies like an Indian captured, in silence, and it takes more killing than any animal under the sun.

Once the writer remembers seeing an illustration of this, that made an indelible impression upon his memory and mind. Three Mexican shepherds and their American pardone or boss, it would be in English, had taken a coyote in a snare trap—a noose-like concern not unlike the rabbit snares every country bred Southern and Western boy is familiar with. After a knock or two on the head with the butt of a loaded whip handle end, the herdmen proceeded to skin the animal. Something relating to their horses distracted their attention for a few moments, when the coyote, half skinned, as it was, staggered to its feet and actually started to make off in a staggering way! The Mexicans, accustomed as they were to the intense vitality of the prairie wolf, declared that they had never seen anything like this, the skin being really half removed before a rifle bullet through its head put an end to what must have been the terrible agony of the beast.—William Hugh Roberts, in Shooting and Fishing.

A Valuable Gift.

Parents, guardians, friends and relatives could not present one with a more valuable gift than a scholarship in one of Draughon's Business Colleges located at Nashville, St. Louis, Atlanta, Montgomery, Shreveport, Galveston, Little Rock and Fort Worth. A gift of this kind is something which one can not steal, fires burn or floods wash away. Such a gift costs but little in comparison with its real value and will be a stepping stone—a firm foundation whereon one may build a successful career. Elsewhere in this issue will be found an advertisement of Prof. Draughon's Colleges. Write for catalogue before entering elsewhere.

Children's Letters.

Mooresville, N. C., Feb. 19, 1902.

Dear Standard:

As I have never written to you before, I thought I would write. I love to read your paper. I have been living at a hotel ever since I was 9 months old. I am reading through the New Testament and have read to I Thessalonians. We take the Southern Presbyterian, Christian Observer, and your paper. I have been going to school 6 years and am still going. I study spelling, arithmetic, geography, grammar and United States History. My teacher's name is Mr. C. T. Carr. I like him very much. I will answer Annie Lee Patterson's question, Coffin is found in Genesis, 50th chapter, 26 verse. I will close as my letter is too long now, by asking a question, Which book of the Bible has not God's name mentioned in it?

Your friend,

Age 12. Mary E. Melchor.

Dixie, N. C., Feb. 19th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I haven't never written to you before I will write a short letter. Papa takes your paper now. I love to read the little folks' letters. I go to school at Dixie. My teacher is Miss Myrtle Wolf. I go to Sunday-school every Sunday. My teacher is Miss Minnie Blair. I will answer Mary A. Ward's question. The Alphabet is found in the Bible, Ezra 7 21: all but one and that is J. I will close by asking where is Eternity mentioned in the Bible.

Your unknown friend,

Age 11. Olive Cathey.

Charlotte, N. C., Feb. 23rd, 1903.

Dear Standard:

We are little twin sisters. We are seven years old. Papa takes your nice paper, and we enjoy reading the little letters so much. We go to school at Mulberry. Mr. Winecoff is our teacher. We also go to church and Sunday-school at Mulberry. Mr. Sample is our pastor and Cousin Essie Todd is our Sunday-school teacher. She has the largest class in Sunday-school—and we think the best teacher. We will answer Frank Spratt's question. Apples of Gold is found in Proverbs, 25:11. We will close,

Your little friends,

Elvira Rhyne,
Annie Rhyne.

Hopewell, N. C., Feb. 21st, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I never see any letters from the little folks of Hopewell, I thought I would write a short letter. Rev. R. D. Stimson, our pastor, has left us and gone to Georgia. I am so sorry he is gone. We are without a pastor now. Mrs. Lizzie Winders is my Sunday-school teacher. She is such a nice lady and so kind to all the class. I have three brothers and one sister. My oldest brother is married. I am eleven years old. I love to help mama to cook and keep house. I will answer Frank Spratt's question. Apples of Gold is found in Proverbs, 25th chapter, and 11th verse. I will ask the little friends a question. Where is the word Girl found in the Bible?

Your little friend,

Amy Tola Fesperman.

Stony Point, N. C.

Dear Standard:

As my Papa takes the Standard I thought I would write you a letter as I have never written to you before. I am a little girl ten years old. I go to school. My teacher's name is Mr. J. W. Sims. I like him very much. I study geography, history, spelling and arithmetic. I have two sisters and one brother. My papa is a merchant and Postmaster. We have a guitar and organ, but I can't play much—hope to learn soon. We go to church at New Salem. Our Pastor is Rev. W. C. Brown: he is a good preacher. I enjoy the boys' and girls' letters best of all. Well I will close. Hoping to see this in your valuable paper.

Your friend,

Pearl Hines.

Sedalia, N. C.

Dear Standard:

I am six years old. I am in the second reader. I am going to school. We are fixing for an entertainment. It is raining. We have three cats; their names are Jim, Muff and Buff. I have a big doll. She is almost as big as me. We are going to have a dolly show. My doll is the bride, her name is Lucy May. I have not been to school but one week: I have a pretty Valentine, I got it on Valentine day.

Your little friend,

Kate McLean.

Bishopville, S. C., Feb. 20, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I love to read the letters in your papers that the little children write. I go to school. My teacher's name is Miss Daisy Pearce. I also go to Sunday-school. My Sunday-school teacher's name is Mrs. Lee Couser. I have four sisters and three brothers; they are all older than me. I'm nine years old.

Your little friend,

"Doug's Little Sister."

By Elizabeth Preston Allan.

We all had the nicest game, one rainy day at Tip-Top last summer, that you ever saw! Have you ever been at Tip-Top? It is a summer place, you know, on top of the Blue Ridge Mountains, where you can stand on a rock called "Catherine's Seat," and look over great big pieces of Virginia on both sides of the mountain.

We children like it best of all the summer places we've tried; the grown ups say there isn't enough to do,—no baths, no ball-room, not even a ten-pin roll. But Jack and Mercer and I don't care for those things: we like the woods and fields and rocks and trees and wild flowers and birds. Jack and Mercer pretend that they like the snakes too, but I don't see how they can.

The first two weeks we played out of doors all day, and only dressed once a day,—before breakfast; at dinner and tea we only had to wash our faces and hands, and slick up our hair. We liked Tip-top for that.

But then came a rainy day, and we didn't like the place so well. There really wasn't any very good getting together place for the thirty-six children, so we had to break up into squads. Mercer and Jack and I were asked into Mrs. McCrum's room to play with her four, and the three Fenwicks were asked too.

"Mama," said Hartly, "I saw Douglas Campbell and his sister in the hall. They look awful lonesome. Can't we ask em in?"

Mrs. McCrum said there wasn't much breathing room, but she couldn't bear to think of those two being lonesome. They had no mother, so Douglas and Elsie came in.

And this was the game that I told you was so nice,—Mrs. McCrum showed us how. Every one chose a character; it might be Queen Elizabeth, or President Roosevelt, or a pet dog, or a parrot, or anything you pleased. Nobody must know but Mrs. McCrum, and when she asked questions, we must try to answer in some way that showed what our character was, and all the others guessed.

For instance, when Mrs. McCrum asked "President Roosevelt" how he liked Tip-Top, he said he liked a white horse better. And when she asked "Jennie Lind" how her health was today, she answered that her throat was too sore to sing!

Of course, Elsie was really too little to play, we just let her pretend. But after Ruth Fenwick had been guessed, and was out of the game, she took Elsie on her lap, and answered for her.

We all noticed that when Mrs. McCrum first asked Elsie what she'd be, and Elsie whispered back, Mrs. McCrum hugged and kissed her, and said, "You darling!" And then, when Ruth asked her what she was, and she whispered back, Ruth kissed her too, and said "How lovely!"

But Elsie was such a little dear, nobody wondered at her being kissed.

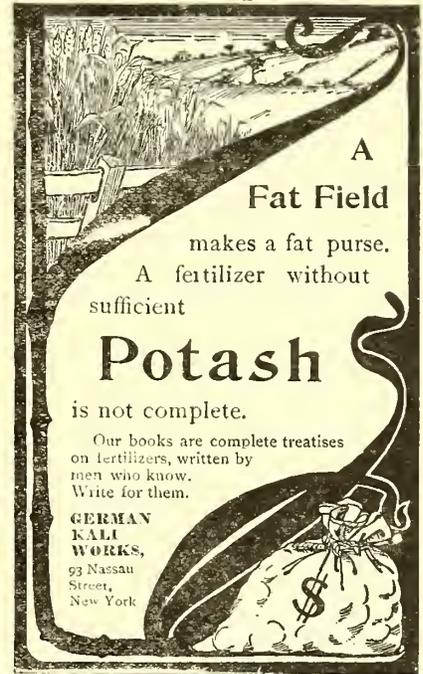

Well, we guessed everybody in the play except Elsie, and we just couldn't guess her, so she got the prize (a little raisin cake,) and then Mrs. McCrum told us that Elsie wouldn't agree to be anybody but "Doug's little sister!"

"She seemed to think," Mrs. McCrum said, "that if she agreed to be Jennie Wren or Cinderella, as I proposed, it might keep her from being Doug's little sure enough sister, and I was afraid it would make her cry, so I let her have her way.

"And if I was Douglas Campbell," Mrs. McCrum went on, "I would rather have it to remember that my precious little sister said that, than get a thousand dollar prize."

"Why would you, Mrs. McCrum?" asked stupid little me; but the next minute I was ashamed of asking such a foolish question.

"Don't you see, Caroline?" she answered, and looked at me in surprise, "it shows that Elsie's brother has been so sweet and good to her that she isn't willing to be anything in the world but 'Doug's little sister'!"—S. S. Times.

The Mocking Bird's Day.

He was always a saucy birdling. This bright breezy morning, as he flew out of the nest, and perched himself on the tallest of the flowering sprays, he broke into a whistle in the most noisy manner.

Said he to his mother, "I think I will go out and try my wings and have some fun today!"

"Beware of the cat then," said his mother, and her voice was not so very cheerful.

But Mimus, with a wild flutter of his unsteady wings, was off. Away he flew, with never a look back at his mother, or at the home-nest in the honeysuckle, or even a nod to the two little sisters cheeping after him.

Mimus thought to himself that he was a very smart bird, and that not another young mocker in all Tennessee could use his wings any better.

He stopped to rest, pretty soon, in the great locust near the Big House.

"Now, just what shall I do to have some fun?" he asked himself.

For some time the little ashen bird poised, restless, on his perch, flirting his black tail and wings, and looking and listening sharply.

Then he laughed. Far below him, a little chicken, astray from its mother, was peeping pitiously.

"Yeep, yeep, yeep, you little fowl," mocked the mocking-bird, looking down at him. "There's your mother, over by the gate!"

"Yeep, yeep, yeep!" Master Mimus said it over, trying the sound, until he repeated it exactly like the chicken.

"Yeep, yeep—there's little Nance running out after the chicken has found its mother, to see what's the matter! She thinks 'm the lost chicken peeping, and she can't find me!" The young mocking-bird chuckled over the joke until he nearly fell off, to see little Nancy running here and running there each time he peeped.

Nancy looked up at last, and spied him. She shook her finger at him and laughed, and ran back into the house.

"That was a good joke on little Nance!" he chuckled again. It was his very first joke, and Mimus enjoyed it mightily. "I'm glad I came out today!" said he.

"Now who can I stir up next!" he asked himself. Then he saw the Colonel's house-cat. She was moving her kittens, carrying them in from a hollow stump and laying them in an old basket under a shed, and he wondered if he couldn't make her think she had left one behind.

"Mew, mew," said a tiny voice from the stump, just as she settled down contentedly.

"Why," said Puss Mother to herself, "I am sure I moved all my babies!" But back she trotted to make double sure. The stump was quite empty, and just above, on the limb of a dead tree, sat the young mocking-bird, twisting and fluffing himself with silent laughter.

Puss glared up at him. "I will get even with you, some day, my smart little bird," said she, climbing after him.

Master Mimus hastily flew back to the locust. "That was a narrow escape," he thought; "but didn't I fool her good!"

Then he looked over at the Big House. On the wide verandah, where the clambering vines shut out the sun, the two dogs, little black Trim and Shepherd Donald, were taking a noonday rest.

Sharp and clear as a trumpet sounded a call they knew full well. Both dogs bounded to their feet. They spoke to each other. "Was that Master?" Again the whistle sounded, and they ran excitedly around the house—but the Master was asleep in the shade. Above them, from a tree, rang out a bird's laugh, and they dropped their heads sheepishly, and went back.

So on. The mocking-bird had "a great time." There was ever some one to mimic and tease and stir up, and set to running to and for. At nightfall he flew back to the nest in the honeysuckle, well pleased with his day.

His mother met him reproachfully. "Naughty, naughty birdling!" said she. "I have kept my eye on you! Was it for this that your wonderful throat was given you? Is it kind to lead chickens and children and cats and dogs into trouble for the sake of amusing yourself? I am ashamed of you! Better have no more voice than a crow than use it as you have to-day! Why didn't you sing? Why didn't you listen to some singer and take a lesson? Of course you can mock! But you don't know yet, after a whole day's freedom, whether you can sing or not!"

And Master Mimus hung his foolish head. The things he had done did not seem quite so funny, after all.—Pearl Howard Campbell, Our Little Folks.

Cancer of the Breast.

The letter of Mrs. Billings should be read by all suffering ones. So many women are dying of this terrible disease. Reader, cut this out and send it to any similarly afflicted. For free book, giving price of the Oil and particulars, address Dr. D. M. Bye Co., Drawer 505, Indianapolis, Ind.

Dr. D. M. Bye Co., Indianapolis, Ind.:

Dear Doctors:—It is with a heart of gratitude to you and to the dear Father above that I have the pleasure of informing you of the entire removal of that cancerous growth which had for six years been praying on my system. When I commenced your treatment on June the 6th, the hard bunch on my left breast could scarcely be covered by a pint bowl; my body was much bloated, and I could only take liquid or the softest of solid food. On December the 6th, the last of the fungus growth came out, my body has resumed its normal condition, and I can eat anything I wish with relish and pleasure. Our physician says, "It is wonderful!" My neighbors say, "It seems a miracle!" Words can not express my gratitude, but I will, whenever and wherever I may, proclaim the good news.

Truly and gratefully yours,
Mrs. Nancy F. Billings.

Another Appreciation of the Aetna.

LUMBERTON, N. C., November 26, 1902.

J. D. BUSHALL, Esq., Manager Aetna Life Insurance Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir:—After a careful comparison of policies submitted to me by the Aetna Life, Bankers' Life of New York, Equitable of New York, Northwestern, New York Life and Prudential, I have accepted $10,000 in the Aetna on the 20-payment life plan, with option of 25-year 3 per cent. Gold Bond Contract.

I have been a policy-holder in the Aetna for nearly eight years, and therefore feel somewhat prepared to judge of its merits from actual results. With all due deference to other companies, it affords me great pleasure to say that in my opinion the Aetna cannot be surpassed for plain and liberal contracts, and for just, conservative and economical management. I now have $12,000 in the Aetna. My partner, Mr. W. W. Carlyle, has $16,000 and one of our clerks, Mr. John T. Biggs, has $2,000, nearly all of which was written and delivered by your special agent, Mr. H. T. Spears.

Wishing you and the grand old Aetna continued success, I am,

Yours very truly,

An old Scottish farmer being elected a member of the local School Board visited the school and tested the intelligence of the class by his questions. His first inquiry was:

"Noo, boys, can ony o' you tell me what naething is?"

After a moments silence a small boy in a back seat arose and replied:

"It's what ye give me t'other day for haudin' yer horse!"

The closing exercises began with the displaying of a portrait of George Washington. "Who is this?" the teacher asked.

The children sat mute and unresponsive, till finally one little fellow piped up.

"I know who it is," he shouted. "We got that picture at home. Mamma told me who it is." He swelled with pride. "It's our father from the country," he said.—Ex.

A friend of the Roosevelt family says that when Theodore, Jr., was but a small chap of seven years he was thrown into a state of great excitement by a proposed trip in the care of his mother. The night before he started his father said, "Ted, you must take good care of your mother while you're away."

That night the child undressed himself without any help from his nurse, and when he knelt at his mother's knee to say his prayers, he prayed, "Please, God, take good care of papa, but I'm going with mamma myself."—Selected.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL

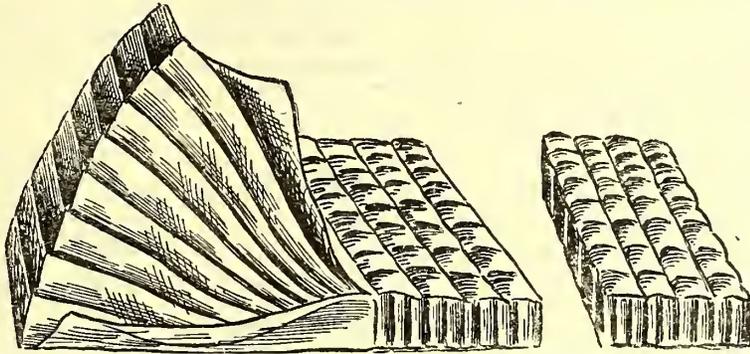

POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

The Reward of Service.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

The sweetest lives are those to duty wed,
Whose deeds both great and small,
Are close-knit strands of an unbroken thread;
Where love ennobles all.
The world may sound no trumpets, ring no bells;
The Book of Life the shining record tells.

***

Thy love shall chant its own beatitudes
After its own life working. A child's kiss
Set on thy singing lips shall make thee glad;
A poor man served by thee shall make thee rich;
A sick man helped by thee shall make thee strong;
Thou shalt be served thyself by every sense
Of service which thou renderest.

Event and Comment.

We take great pleasure in announcing that Rev. George L. Leyburn, D. D., of St. Louis, Missouri, will hereafter represent the Presbyterian Standard as its Western Editor and Manager. Dr. Leyburn brings to this task the best qualifications from both a literary and a business point of view and the Standard congratulates itself on securing his services. Letters addressed to him at 3,511 Bell Avenue, St. Louis, will receive as prompt attention as though sent to the home office in Charlotte and we hope by this means to give more adequate representation to our Western Synods and to make the Standard more than ever indispensable to its Western readers. It is needless to add that Dr. Leyburn's connection with the Standard will by no means interfere with his work as Superintendent of Home Missions for the Synod of Missouri, but on the other hand will be an advantage to him in the prosecution of that work.

Beirut College, Syria, is asking for a half-million dollars for better equipment for its noble work. It is said that most of the physicians in the Egyptian army are graduates of Beirut.

An exchange notes that there were five hundred converts at the Sam Jones meeting in North Wilkesboro, of which ten joined the Methodist Church, four the Baptist and none the Presbyterian. Those who joined the churches at least professed that they were the Lord's converts. The other four hundred and eighty-six were Sam's.

Leaving out the children under twelve years of age, just about one half of the people of America are church members. We suppose the proportion would be even larger in the Southern States. The churches stand for respectability and morality. That is one reason why the politician who likes to be in the majority would better consider what the churches as a whole stand for.

The opening of the new library at Trinity the other day was celebrated by some excellent speeches from Walter H. Page, Judge Armstead Burwell and others. The library is the gift of Mr. Ben. Duke and no expense was spared to make it elegant and complete in every detail. It is by far the finest building of its kind in the State. We congratulate Trinity upon this addition to its equipment.

Even the Interior, which at one time wanted such a thorough-going revision of the Confession, speaks complacently now of "our innocent confessional changes." There must have been some conservative preachers on the Revision Committee, who would have shone resplendent in the world of politics. They were persuaded that the revision fervor was much ado about nothing and they gave the agitators nothing, and it stopped the much ado.

The British Government will never tolerate slavery in South Africa, oh no. One of the telling appeals in the prosecution of the South African War was for the liberation of the blacks from enslavement by the Boers. But now that Mr. Chamberlain has visited South Africa he is advising a system of "forced native labor." That does not mean slavery, not at all. But the reconstruction of South Africa will be modeled after what reconstruction was not in the Southern States.

The Rev. J. Kinsey Smith, of the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church, Louisville, is right much of a man. He preached to his people the other day on the "Upper Side of the Social Problem," and said some things that are needed to be said elsewhere. There is no use disguising the fact that in the new "bon ton" of our Southern cities, which is nevertheless not the best society, there is as much rottenness to the square inch as in the class at the bottom of the social scale. "Vice in velvet" is a phrase that describes the situation adequately. A little more pugnacious piety in some of our pulpits, a little more of fearless denunciation by the prophets of the Lord!

It is sometimes best to do just what a man of Christian zeal and ample means suggests. Mr. Robert Arthington proposed to his missionary society to send an expedition to the Congo to explore the country, in 1877. He paid the expenses of the expedition, amounting to $5,000, and later bought a steamer for the river and furnished the means for running it. He has been interested in that mission ever since, and dying, left in his will some $5,000,000 for the two missionary societies of England, the Baptist and the London.

We do not believe that the Emperor of Germany really knows very much either of theology or archaeology. But he has common sense enough to know that the two sciences occupy different spheres. He intimated very strongly that Professor Delitzsch was out of his sphere in questioning the fact of inspiration on account of some discoveries that the Decalogue was older than Abraham. Science used to be fond of saying that theology had nothing to do with its conclusions. Theology is entitled to the same retort, that the scientists know as little of religion as the theologians do of natural science.

The Christian Observer is, like Jacob of old, "greatly afraid and distressed." The hope was recently expressed at the Religious Education Association, "that the time may come when the child may not know the time when it was not Christian." The Observer thinks that "this sentiment is one that is capable of doing great harm in enfeebling effort for the conversion of children." From that point of view it was a great pity that John the Baptist was full of the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb. Some of the best people in the world to-day never knew when they were not Christians. God would have us treat our children as elect and saved. The ordinance of infant baptism presumes just that. And many a child has been sinned against most cruelly by "efforts for his conversion," when its little heart never knew anything but love for its Lord.

The Observer is also distressed that an exchange should have referred to parts of the Bible as "improperly translated." It holds that "no one is at liberty to discredit our standard translation". We think that any one who loves the truth and wants to know just what the Lord inspired his servants to say, is at liberty to discredit any translation that is untrue to the original. The Westminster Fathers were never guilty of such a Romish attempt to bind the minds and consciences of men as that. There is no "standard translation" of the Bible. The Confession says, "The Old Testament in Hebrew and the New Testament in Greek, being immediately inspired of God, are therefore authentic; so as in all controversies of religion the church is finally to appeal to them." For instance, we think it is an "improper translation" that says Herod intended "after Easter" to bring Peter out to the people. What does the Observer think of that? If it is a proper translation, is there not some scriptural ground for keeping Easter? We confess that we get a little impatient sometimes at the fear of trusting the people with the truth. When did they ever prove unworthy of that trust? When did any prophecy of the Scripture have a private interpretation?

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

Review of the Contest. About six years ago a little company of six men met in a church parlor in Fayetteville, N. C.,—a Baptist minister and his deacon, a Methodist minister and his steward, a Presbyterian minister and his elder. Fayetteville was as completely saloon-ridden as any town ever was. The town charter forbade any but the lowest license tax; the saloons were put wherever the saloon-keepers wanted them, over the protests of property-owners and even closer to church property than the law allowed. But it had been observed that the Legislature then in session was apparently in sympathy with the cause of temperance. The little meeting elected as secretary the Baptist deacon, who was also the editor of a church paper, and resolved to secure a petition from the people of the county asking the Legislature to abolish the saloons and establish a dispensary in their place. The sentiment of the meeting was that anything was better than the saloons. Petitions were secured with a large number of names, large enough to keep the politicians from taking sides, and then four of the members of that meeting went to Raleigh and lobbied the dispensary bill through, one of them violating all the traditions of the Presbyterian ministry in doing so, for which he has never yet had the grace to be ashamed. The saloon-keepers could only find some of their own number to represent them, and they lost. And Fayetteville was rid of the saloons, as we believe forever.

The dispensary did more in the way of diminishing drinking and drunkenness, crime and disorder, than its most ardent advocates had hoped. Incidentally it furnished a large amount of revenue, which was divided equally between the city and the county.

The following Legislature the saloon men and their allies and attorneys made their utmost effort to repeal the dispensary law. They failed. At the same time the people of Charlotte and Mecklenburg drew up a monster petition and sent a delegation of a hundred and twenty men to Raleigh to appeal to the Legislature in person. They were defeated by the Senator from Mecklenburg whose excuse was a pledge given to the saloon-keepers that the saloons should not be disturbed. That defeat was a blessing in disguise. It aroused the whole state as nothing else could have done, to the iniquity of government by the saloon. At the succeeding Legislature, another attempt was made to abolish the Fayetteville dispensary and re-establish the bar-rooms. It failed. Then a prohibition bill was secured by the same malign influences, and the law was accepted by the friends of temperance, was enforced through the clean set of city and county officials that succeeded the saloon-politicians, and was overwhelmingly ratified at the polls, the first chance the people got to express their sentiments as to their choice between prohibition and the saloon. But it should be remembered that the saloon's fangs had been drawn by four years of the dispensary, and the saloon-keepers and their henchmen were scattered, and the people had a chance to vote un-awed by threats and freed from the incubus of negro suffrage, debauched as it always was by the bribery of the saloon.

At the same Legislature a second attempt was made by the freemen of Mecklenburg to secure a chance to vote on the subject of the dispensary, and it soon transpired that, with one exception, the representatives from Mecklenburg were in favor of the continuance of the saloons, and they have never denied the charge that was then publicly and responsibly made.

And now the editor of this paper, begs, for the first time, the privilege of a personal explanation. It was seen that the tyranny of the saloon had been exercised so long that the average office-seeker feared its opposition more than the wrath of the people. It was steadfastly resolved that those who had betrayed the people in order to subserve the interests of the saloon, should be made to feel the wrath of the people, and thus others should be taught to fear that wrath. This was not an agreeable task for anybody, and perhaps not the most proper and suitable task for the editor of a religious paper. But there was no other medium for reaching the people of this community and county with just that message, that the betrayers of the people should be punished. And since the paper had more than local circulation it was purposed also that the news of that punishment and the reason for it should be published abroad, for the strengthening of others to the same resistance and the deterring of others from the same blunder. We are not minded to call the roll of those who have been buried by the ballots of the freemen of this city and county. But that roll includes every man who opposed the cause of temperance here in advocacy of the saloon and then subjected himself to the suffrages of his countrymen. And we think the lesson has been learned and is being learned all over North Carolina to-day, that the man who controls the saloon vote is the man who is controlled by the saloon vote, and is one to be left at home when a man is needed to represent the people and not the saloon. If the punished are satisfied, we are. If they are willing to let by-gones be by-gones and be put upon their good behaviour, henceforth, we are. We have paid the penalty also in suffering as much misrepresentation and abuse as falls to the lot of a man in a good cause. At the same time we are grateful for friends that have been made by the same course that has made enemies of others. And we are able to say with thankfulness and not with boasting that this paper speaks to a constituency to-day, in this city and this county and this State, at least, that love it and trust it, and that may well be reckoned with in the political calculations of the future, where a moral issue is involved.

Then last year we were asked to meet another little company of men who had already been noted for their opposition to the saloon. An organization was effected, called the Anti-Saloon League, and a broad platform was adopted on which might stand all who opposed that devil's solution of the liquor problem called the saloon. The thanks of the temperance people of this state are due to Mr. John Oates, editor of the North Carolina Baptist, of Fayetteville, for the work of organization and agitation, as the secretary of the league, for several months. There was sufficient response to the movement from the first to keep the politicians from committing themselves to the saloon and it happened that a Legislature has just been in session that will be note-worthy for the advance it has made in temperance legislation.

The thanks of the State are also due in large measure to Mr. J. W. Bailey, of the Biblical Recorder. The Executive Committee of the League appointed him manager of the campaign, just before the meeting of the Legislature. He did manage it with marked ability and with a fertility of resource and an untiring energy that deserves highest praise. The result accomplished was a compromise—most legislation is of that nature. But it is far-reaching in its effects.

The Watts Bill closes every saloon and distillery in North Carolina outside of the incorporated towns. It lays severe penalties upon the sale of liquor by drug-stores, except upon the physician's prescription for a bona fide case of sickness. And then it allows at any time except within ninety days of a city, county or general election, upon petition of one-fourth of the voters, an election to be held at which the three questions may be voted upon at the same time, whether intoxicating liquors shall be manufactured in said city or town, whether saloons shall be established, whether dispensaries shall be established.

Now it is an undoubted fact that the anti-saloon people are divided as between prohibition or the dispensary as the best means of controlling the liquor traffic. This section of the bill allows these to combine against the saloon and at the same time to settle whether prohibition or the dispensary is the best solution of the problem for the particular locality voting. If those who vote "Against Saloons" exceed the number of those who vote "For Saloons" then the saloons are voted out. If the number voting "For Dispensaries," exceeds the number voting "Against Dispensaries," than the dispensaries are voted in. If the other way, prohibition prevails. But every man who favors prohibition and every man who favors the dispensary unite in voting out the saloon.

Moreover, the Watts Bill does not interfere with those counties that are already prohibition counties, and they number over half the counties of the state. The bill is a challenge to the moral forces of North Carolina to vote the saloon out if they can, with every advantage given them of combining all the decent folks who are opposed to the saloon.

Besides this, the Legislature granted practically every responsible appeal for local prohibition, for the prohibition of the shipment of liquor into prohibited territory, and for the establishment of dispensaries. The Revenue Bill in addition lays a State tax of two hundred dollars a year with an equal county tax, plus an indefinite city tax, on all saloons. This minimum license tax of some five hundred dollars should operate to close the saloons in many of the smaller towns, we should say would close half of the sixty-five saloons now open in Wilmington. The fewer the saloons, the less the chance for government by the saloon.

The people should remember with gratitude such splendid fighters for the cause as Senators London, Lamb, White, Brown, and others.

The people should remember also such saloon advocates as Representatives Morton and Murphy and Senators Gilliam and Travers, among others. Read the roll-calls on the bills. Representative Watts was indefatigable in passing the bill that bears his name. Dr. H. Q. Alexander, to mention one of the Mecklenburg delegation, is the author of a bill to prevent the shipment of liquor into prohibited territory, and another to have the saloons closed at eight o'clock, following the Charlotte ordinance that has worked so well here. As we write, the fate of these bills is in doubt. But the issue has been raised that will not down until the last vestige of the saloon is swept from the Old North State.

"Tis weary watching wave on wave,
And yet the tide leaves onward;
We build like corals—grave on grave,
But pave a pathway sunward.

We're beaten back in many a fray,
Yet ever strength we borrow;
And where the vanguard rests today,
The rear shall camp tomorrow."

As we have before remarked, The Congregationalist, of Boston, Massachusetts, is by all odds the brightest and at the same time one of the most conservative papers that comes to our table. In the main it is notably fair to the ideals and opinions of the Southern people. It is with some regret, therefore, that we read accusation against us, "not kindly in spirit." Nevertheless we are glad that it has seen fit to give the paragraph circulation among its New England constituency, and we think that it is in the main "accurate in statement."

Says The Congregationalist:

In commenting recently on certain aspects of the Southern educational problem we called attention to the pronounced exclusion of New England men and New England influence from the General Education Board, which is said to be the coming clearing-house for Northern philanthropy in the South. Commenting on this fact, the Presbyterian Standard, of Charlotte, N. C., one of the most progressive of our Southern exchanges, says:

It should be noted also that the board is working for the education of both races and has therefore to deal with the negro problem in the South. The New England record on that question is not one to be proud of. It was the original promoter of the slave trade, voted against Virginia and other Southern States for the perpetuation of slavery at a time when it might have been peaceably abolished, and then sold its slaves to the South after they had proved unprofitable in New England. It then became oppressed with the iniquity of Southern slavery, began the agitation that ended in a fratricidal war, and urged the suffrage policy which Secretary Root has just admitted to be a forty-year failure. Since the foisting of a helpless people upon the whole nation it has been much more liberal with theories than with charities, and has furnished more salaried reformers than dollars for reform. The board needs money now more than anything else and it is probably in view of the paucity of New England funds and the quality of New England advice in such matters in the past, that it has asked that interesting section of our common country to go way back and sit down."

This is frank, if not kindly in spirit or accurate in statement. If Peabody, Slater and Hand among the large givers, and thousands of New Englanders among the small givers, had not poured out their gifts for Southern education during the decades since the Civil War, the illiteracy and provincialism of that section would have been vastly worse than they are now. So closely bound together are the various sections of the country that for prudential reasons, if not for higher motives, New Englanders must continue to spend and be spent for the amelioration of social conditions in the South. Both patriotism and religion demand it.

First, we assure our contemporary that we have no authority to speak for the General Education Board. The Congregationalist discovered a fact about the personnel of the board. The fact may have been accidental. The Congregationalist considered it significant and in that view of the matter, the Standard made its own suggestion as to the probable cause of the apparent slight to New England.

Still, the main question is neither as to the frankness or kindness of the Standard's statement, but as to its accuracy. The Congregationalist questions it in one particular only. That is perhaps not an admission that the rest is true. But the admission would as well be made. It is a matter of historic fact that New England was the original promoter of the slave-trade and it might be added that among American vessels practically all the slave-ships were built and owned by New Englanders. At a time when Charleston and Savannah and Norfolk compared favorably with the other great ports of the country, Southern shipping was free from the reproach of the slave trade.

It is a matter of record that Massachusetts voted against Virginia and other Southern States for the early abolition of slavery. It is a fact that far the largest portion of the New England slaves were sold to the Southern planters, and that an insignificant number were freed. It has been the boast of New England that its agitation of the slavery question brought on the Civil War, and the New England type of mind that finds its chief delight in reforming something at a distance has been the last to admit the "forty-year failure" of the system of unlimited negro suffrage which has been responsible for the evils of reconstruction times and largely for the negro problem in its present phase. We rather suspect that The Congregationalist is ahead of its constituency in its sane view of that problem, and that The Independent, with its reactionary ideas is more in accord with New England sentiment. Yet every passing year proves that under the tutelage of the Southern master the negro reached a higher plane of civilization than the race had ever attained, and also that it would have been better for him if that tutelage had continued at least a generation more.

Remains the statement of The Congregationalist, in apparent contradiction of The Standard's contention, "If Peabody, Slater and Hand among the large givers, and thousands of New Englanders among the small givers, had not poured out their gifts for Southern education during the decades since the Civil War, the illiteracy and provincialism of that section would have been vastly worse than they are now." That is very neatly turned.

Now, we rather meant to affirm than to deny that there were "small givers" in New England. As to George Peabody, one hardly thinks of him as a New Englander. For, as a young man, he went to England on business for the State of Maryland and doubtless became familiar then, as the average New Englander never has been, with Southern conditions. A little later he went to London to live, and there amassed the splendid fortune with which he did so much good. Of this fortune he gave a million and a half dollars to his adopted state of Maryland and left three and a half millions for the cause of education in the South. Undoubtedly it has been a great boon to the South, especially as it was administered so well through the intelligent zeal of the late lamented Dr. J. L. M. Curry.

Nevertheless it is hardly fair to say that the South would be "vastly worse off" except for the interest on three and a half million dollars, when the South is spending thirty-five millions a year on education, mainly raised by public taxation.

With regard to the Slater fund of one million dollars and the Hand fund, (we confess to our ignorance as to the extent of the latter), these have gone entirely to the education of the negroes and there are two things to say about that. The Southern people have spent about $110,000,000 on negro education alone during the last forty years. The North, as a whole, has spent about the same amount. It would be hardly fair, therefore to say that the negroes would be "vastly worse off" except for the Slater and Hand funds. Furthermore, unless there is some exceptional distinction about a negro school in the South, established by Northern philanthropy, like Hampton or Tuskegee, it is a toss-up whether it has done more harm or good. That is another truth, as bitter and perhaps harder to swallow than the failure of negro suffrage. And yet it is truth that will have to be both swallowed and digested before there is any hope of better things. There has been more money wasted in negro education than by all the philanthropists since the world began, and however much or little New England has contributed to the waste, there has generally been a New Englander to show how the waste could best be made. The South has put its money into common schools and State Normal Schools and colleges of Agriculture and Mechanics. Northern philanthropy has taught the negroes to study Latin and Greek and piano-playing and Medicine and Law.

Southern Churches have tried to teach the negro how to live and to preach the gospel of Christ. The New Englander generally made the voting of the Republican ticket the first article of the darkey's religion, and taught him that his redemption was in the line of politics. It is to the everlasting credit of Booker Washington that he first opened the New Englander's eyes to the folly of that course, and yet, we understand the larger part of the expenses of Tuskegee are paid by Northern Presbyterians not many of whom live in New England.

We think our reference to the "paucity of New England funds and the quality of New England ideas on negro education, to have been warranted by the facts.

As to the illiteracy and provincialism of the South, we can pardon our contemporary for such a retort, under severe provocation, and can afford to smile at the accusation.

Provincialism is like heterodoxy, it is ignorance of things we think other people ought to know. The South is quite a large section of the country. It began to be settled before the Mayflower sailed. It is an historic section. So is New England. And yet we suspect that the average school-boy in the South knows as much of New England history, which is of course an important part of American history, as the average college man in New England knows about the South and its history. We venture to say that even the accomplished editor of The Congregationalist knows nothing about the Wilmington resistance to the Stamp Act, or the battle of Moore's Creek. Well, that is what we call, in the South, provincialism. The most provincial American citizen of any note to-day is the distinguished Edward Everett Hale.

Yet, while the accusation of Southern provincialism coming from New England is much like the abuse of the pot by the kettle, there is one generation of Southern folks that will have to plead guilty to the charge of both provincialism and illiteracy, namely, our own. But the cause of both is a poverty that is most honorable and a self-sacrifice for a weaker race that is heroic.

By the census of 1860, the North had a population of 19,000,000 and the South a population of 8,000,000. The North had 205 colleges, the South 262; the North had 1,407 professors, the South had 1,488; the North had 29,044 students in its colleges, the South 27,055. The North expended for colleges, $1,514,688 per annum and the South $1,662,419; the North expended for academies $4,663,749, and the South $4,328,127.

There was no common school system in the South, but the results of its educational system seem to show a greater illiteracy at the North than at the South, according to the population. And then came the war, and the South's educational system shared the fate of its labor system and its transportation system, all utterly destroyed; with the larger part of the breadwinners under the sod. For, you see, esteemed contemporary, there were no German and Irish substitutes to be hired to fight the battles of the South. It would have been an impossibility for three able-bodied men like the Blaine brothers, of Maine, for instance, to have all sent substitutes to the army, and for any one of them to have sought anything but obscurity afterwards in the South.

And so the South had to start anew, with colleges and academies and endowments all gone, to build up a common school system, in her dire poverty. Do you know what that poverty really was, friend? Georgia had $600,000,000 of real and personal property at the beginning of the war, and $121,000,000 at its close. And the only reason this was left was that Sherman's army could not carry the land back North with it, or burn it up or pull it down. The South has just gotten back to its five and a half billions of property that it had before the war, while the North has gone forward since then from six and a half billions to thirty billions, the agricultural South contributing no small part of this in tariff taxes for the benefit of the government and the Northern manufacturers, while the former Confederate States of course have paid their share of the pension fund, to be distributed among the soldiers of the North and West, amounting to an average of fifty millions a year. And, chiefly, it should be remembered that ninety-two per cent. of the $110,000,000 for negro education has come from the pockets of the white people, from whom their slaves were taken without compensation, by the descendants of the New England slave-owner and slave-trader, who had sold them to the South. Well did Dr. Curry, to whom we are indebted for most of these statistics, say that "Nothing in the history of civilization is comparable to this sublime self-denial and this work of enlarged patriotism." There are over a million and a quarter negro children enrolled in the public schools of the South, and they are given the same school term that the white children are given. If the hundred millions spent on them had been spent on the education of the white children there would not be the opportunity for our contemporary to taunt us with the illiteracy of the white people of the South. It may have been all right to bring on the war and free the slaves and vandalize the Southern States. But it is hardly generous to twit us about the resulting poverty of this section or the results of that poverty.

Just give us a little time now and we shall be sending missionaries to benighted New England and its "exiles of Erin."

P. S. The General Education Board is not without New England representation after all. Mr. W. H. Baldwin, who is perhaps the business head of the whole enterprise, says that he is "a New Englander with all the inherited tendencies and sympathies of that people, supplemented by three years of active and intimate relations with the whites of the South." The supplement is the important thing. It almost looks as if Mr. Baldwin had been trying to explain that he was a New Englander without "provincialism."

The declarations at the Twelfth Tuskegee Conference which was recently held, closed with these words: "Prosperity and peace are dependent upon friendly relations between the races, and to this end we urge a spirit of manly forbearance and mutual interest". And friendly relations depend also on the absence of social relations, or any ambition in that direction.

We have received a most interesting pamphlet setting forth the plan of union of all the Presbyterian and Reformed Churches in China and the results of the conference on that subject held in Shanghai. We trust the plan will succeed and see no reason now why it will not. As between two of the churches represented it would be difficult to get the Chinese interested in the Spring Resolutions or even the Herrick Johnson Rider, would it not, beloved?

The Legislature passed the bill incorporating a whiskey-still in Yadkin county, North Carolina. As the brand of liquor distilled there is appropriately named after the devil the new town ought to have been named Hell. We have no doubt that some of it will be raised there. The mayor appointed is the distiller and of course he will lock himself up whenever he detects himself in any unlawful conduct. We call his attention now to a habit of his, that of sending his seductive advertisements to half-grown boys, agreeing to send them liquor in innocent looking packages. The passage of the bill, after all we heard about the vice of the country distillery, was a shameful surrender of principle to personal or partisan ends. The only redeeming thing was the fight that the legislators made against having any roll-call by means of which their names could be known. That looks as if they had the grace to be ashamed of themselves or the wit to be afraid of the people.

Not Ours to See and Know.

By Dr. J. R. Miller.

Away down in the darkness, in the heart of the great steamer, the engineer stands. He never sees how the vessel moves. He does not know where she is going. It is not his duty to know. It is his only answer every signal, to start his engine to quicken or slow its motion, to reverse it, just as he is directed by the one whose part it is to see. He has nothing whatsoever to do with the vessel's course. He sees not an inch of the sea.

It is not our part to guide our life in this world, amid its tangled affairs. It is ours just to do our duty, our Master's bidding. Christ's hand is on the helm. He sees all the future. He pilots us. Let us learn to thank God that we can not know the future, that we need not know it. Christ knows it, and it is better to go in the dark with him, letting him lead, than to go alone in the light and choose our own path.—Ex.

Fear of Failure.

No duty, however hard and perilous, should be feared one half so much as failure in that duty. People sometimes shrink from responsibility, saying they dare not accept it because it is so great. But in shrinking from duty they are really encountering a far more serious condition than that which they evade. It is a great deal easier to do that which God gives us to do, no matter how hard it is, than to face the responsibility of not doing it. We have abundant assurance that we shall receive all the strength we need to perform any duty God allots to us; but if we fall out of the line of obedience, and refuse to do anything which we ought to do, we find ourselves at once out of harmony with God's law and God's providence, and cannot escape the consequences of our failure.—J. R. Miller, D. D.

The time when you are tempted not to pray is most likely the very time when your need of prayer is greatest. If your mind is full of secular cares, and your hands are burdened with many and difficult tasks, you cannot afford to dispense with the benefits which come from frequent communings with God. Under such circumstances, if you are a wise Christian, you will say to yourself: "My danger is much increased. Therefore I will keep close to the only source of my help and strength." As long as the vital bond of your fellowship with the Eternal remains unbroken the world, the flesh and the devil will seek in vain to sway you from your moral steadfastness. It is only when you forget to converse with the Father of your spirit that you run the risk of falling away from the firm standing ground of your integrity. Lay this thought to your heart, and do not fail to act upon it.—Advocate.

I rejoice that He is come, and hath chosen you in the furnace; it was even there where ye and he set tryst. That is an old method of Christ's; he keepeth the good fashion with you, that was in Hosea's days: "Therefore behold, I will bring her into the wilderness, and speak to her heart." There was no talking to her heart while he and she were in the fair city, and at ease; but out in the cold, waste wilderness, he whispered to her, "Thou are mine."—Samuel Rutherford.

You never get to the end of Christ's words. There is something in them always beyond. They pass into proverbs, they pass into laws, they pass into doctrines, they pass into consolations; but they never pass away, and after all the use that is made of them they are still not exhausted.—Dean Stanley.

Missionary.

Missionary Perspective.

By Mr. Robert E. Speer, in Assembly Herald.

It is almost impossible to give the missionary perspective to those who have never been on the mission field, or who are not in constant contact with missionaries. We see what is near, and it appears large, because it is near. And what is far seems small because it is far.

We hear of a mission station in Africa with only one or two missionaries, and assume that it is only a small affair. We forget that one station may be the sole centre of evangelization for two large tribes. This is not an imaginary illustration. Mr. Milligan writes from Liberville:

"Here and there over the field, inquirers have appeared in large numbers, casting away their fetishes and professing faith in Christ. These are but green fruit, which though ever so good, can only be brought to maturity by the sunshine of God's truth. I have appealed in vain for help.

"A few days ago, one of the Congo Bololo missionaries, in passing, visited Baraka. He said that their greatest hindrance was that their stations were very much undermanned. 'Why,' he said, 'we have only six missionaries at a station.' I don't know what he said after that. At present we have on the field eighteen missionaries distributed among six stations,—one might justly say stations, for Baraka is two stations combined in one place; but, as to the work, the two are separate. The French Protestant Society on the Ogowe would consider that our whole number of missionaries could man only two stations, and one of those stations would still be undermanned; for that Society has ten missionaries at each of their two large stations. By the way, I have known for a long time that this French Society has the most successful Mission in West Africa. The results have seemed most incredible since that work was transferred from our Mission to them.

"In late years the Fang of the very far interior had poured down in great numbers, and upon exploring the field I found it the most populous in the whole Mission,—a network of water-ways, extending one hundred and forty miles from the coast, exactly the distance from Batanga to Elat, and much wider than the whole Kamerun field, including Lolodorf. The Gospel had never been preached in it except to the people of the village at Angom."

Or we hear the great need in Arizona, Alaska, and because it is near, we realize its importance in part at least. We find it harder to realize that in one field like that of the Ningpo Station, there is a population ten times and more than the population of either of these territories, or both of them, with only three or four missionaries to make known the Gospel to them.

And the perspective of success is as difficult to get as the perspective of need. We think that a few Christians in China or India or Persia, mean nothing more than a few here. We forget that they are won against almost irresistible opposition and that they come right out of the darkness and the densest godlessness into life. And that when won they are not mere passive Christians, but a living light in a dark place, exerting influence inconceivable to us. Each Christian Church is the talk of villages far and near, and the country side talks of what the new doctrine is, and why its teachers have come, and what the consequences are.

The mission work seems to be doing a humble and insignificant thing, but the thing that it is doing is the revolutionary and infinite service. "How long will it last?" Bishop Foster is said to have asked a temple keeper in India once, after going over the temple and looking at the gods. "Not long," said the man. "Why?" asked Bishop Foster. "Jesus," was the terse reply. The captains and the kings, the troops and armies, guns and machinery and trade fill our vision, and appear to us to be the only mighty forces capable of effecting changes among men; but this, too, is defective perspective, the angle at the eye.

The Riot at Ephesus.

Paul at Ephesus had been opposed by strolling Jewish exorcists. These attempted to discredit Paul's miracles by endeavoring to cast out demons through the use of Jesus' name as a magical term or charm without having any personal faith in Him as the Saviour. But the power of Christ over evil spirits is not exerted in behalf of those who do not trust Him and these pretenders to magical power signally fail and are shamefully overcome by the demoniac. This occurrence confirmed Paul's teachings and magnified the name of the Lord Jesus. But the apostle encountered at Ephesus another form of opposition, connected with mob violence. The present lesson describes a riot in this city as to its origin, phases and results.

I. The Causes of this Riot.—This tumult among the citizens was primarily due to the success of the Gospel. Paul and his co-workers had presented Christ's claims for more than two years, not only in Ephesus but in the whole province of Asia. They had made many converts, and had turned many from idolatry and from patronizing those craftsmen who made images of the temple of Diana. Their teachings had been attested by Divine miracles which opponents could neither deny nor imitate. This signal progress of the Gospel, antagonizing idolatry and its helpers aroused the hostility of Demetrius and his fellow-craftsmen, and of the worshippers of Diana. Regard for a profitable business and greed of gain stirred Demetrius and his associates to active opposition. But zeal for idolatry and partiality for their local Divinity were combined with greed of gain to increase the number of adherents opposing Paul. Love of money, hurtful employments and varied forms of cherished idolatry have often combined to incite men to assault the religion of Christ and its representatives.

II. The Elements and Methods of the Mob.—The parties composing this mob at Ephesus were similar in character to those constituting all unlawful assemblies intending violence. Their leaders were designing men having personal ends and interests to serve. Demetrius and his fellows proposed to use the mob to banish Christian teachers to preserve their business and to increase their gains. They associated with themselves, zealous idolaters, who were proud of Diana and her splendid temple and who were not disposed to tolerate any religious teachings that detracted from her worship. But while these leaders had definite objects in view, the larger part of the confused multitude "know not wherefore they were come together." It is thus with most disorderly crowds. While leaders knew what purposes are to be served, the majority are comparatively ignorant of the matters at issue. To keep the mob together however, and to stimulate their zeal, some popular cry must be adopted. Hence the leaders start and the multitude shout "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." All worshippers of Diana and most patriotic citizens of Ephesus would heartily utter that sentiment. To unite a mob and to intensify their excitement popular slogans are often now employed. By the advice of officials who were his friends, Paul and his co-laborers avoided this riotous assembly and escaped their wrath.

III. The Counsel of the Town Clerk.—This tumult was appeased by the wise words of a single, cool and courageous man. He remonstrates with the people for their needless clamor in affirming so persistently what no one denied. He advises these "to be quiet and to do nothing rashly." He affirms that the men against whom their anger was directed were not criminals, "nor blasphemers of their goddess." He declares that if Demetrius and his fellows had any just cause of grievance against any man the courts and judges were accessible to them.

Christ Forbids Judging Others.

How many people can read these first five verses of this seventh chapter and not feel condemned to be judged by others? It is a lamentable fact, but a fact nevertheless that the number is small. And it is a fact that in this respect the generations of to-day have not made any great degree of progress beyond that which the men of Christ's own time had made. Why is this? We talk about the altruism, or love to the other man, of to-day and it is very likely that the spirit that makes one think of others and do for others is given a greater emphasis now than formerly, but the fact remains that we have not ceased, nor are we making very rapid progress toward that point where we will quit uttering harsh judgment about others. It seems to be one of the basal principles upon which almost every phase of life is built. The merchant tells you in his newspaper advertisements and over his counter that the other man's goods are not of first class quality. The lawyer tells you that his competitor at the bar is not as high principled as he should be; the doctor may not say it on account of professional ethics, but gives you to infer that his fellow practitioner does not treat the others right; and sad to say it but the minister of the Gospel is not as charitable toward his brother preacher as he should be. This is not a pessimistic view of the case. We all know that it is altogether too true. Then when it comes to judging the faults and weaknesses of others it is amazing how much harshness is used. At the same time there is no where a more direct promise given than in reference to this very matter. In Luke's Gospel the two parts of this saying of Christ are not joined by a "that" which might leave a doubt as to the matter of whether we shall be judged ourselves, but it is, "Judge not and ye shall not be judged; condemn not and ye shall not be condemned." The words are plain and the promise is certain. If you would not be judged by others, then do not judge others, and you shall not be judged.

An estimable lady once noticed that in her home, where others besides her own family found a home, there was a great deal of harsh judgment passed on people; that scarcely anyone escaped. She was finally so much grieved at this that she made the rule to allow no one to say anything ill of anybody at her table. It was a revelation to each one of those who made up the household when they tried to refrain from this judgment. How accustomed they had become to this bad habit! If anyone who reads these lines thinks he does not judge others, the way to be sure is to put a guard on his lips and see if he does not have his eyes opened to the sad fact that he has not been free from this evil thing. There are those who have given up or possibly who never had this inclination, but they are in the minority. The writer was once walking down the street with a fellow minister and they passed a third pastor of their own city. The companion of the writer said, "Brother ——— may not be a brainy man and he may not be as successful in the ministry as some others, but I would rather have one trait of his than brains or brilliance. Did you ever hear a harsh judgment from his lips?" And the answer was, "I never did." So rare is this virtue that it is always very noticeable. Let us cultivate it.

Let us again call the attention of pastors and sessions to the matter of the reports on Sabbath-schools and young people's societies. Begin to gather data for them right away. Let not the complaint be heard this year that they are meager and imperfect. If they are put off until the last minute this is sure to be the case. These reports are not "red tape." They are of great importance.

Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus.

To get the correct meaning of any of our Lord's parables, it is essential that we first ascertain what he designed to teach by it, and if we ascertain its true design, we shall have little or no trouble to understand its true meaning, and just what Jesus intended to teach by it. And here I would remark, that when we have ascertained the true design of this parable, its meaning will be as plainly manifest as day light.

We will now turn back to the 13th and 14th verses of this same 16th chapter and read: "No servant can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other, or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. And the Pharisees also, who were covetous, heard all these things, and they derided him. Then Jesus directed his discourse directly to these covetous Pharisees; and this parable is evidently a part of his discourse to them. And we shall see that the design of the parable was to show the absurdity and the futility of two great and fatal errors held by these Pharisees. One of them was, that riches were of great advantage in obtaining an entrance into the kingdom of God. And I am persuaded this belief was at the bottom of their inordinate covetousness. It was certainly a great factor in their religious belief; and therefore, to obtain riches they used all means in their power, both foul and fair. On one occasion Jesus said: "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers: therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation." (Mat. 23:14.) It is evident that the immediate disciples of Christ were deeply tintured with this same error about riches being necessary to gain the kingdom of God and to be saved. On one occasion, Jesus saith unto his disciples: "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God! And the disciples were astonished at his words. But Jesus answereth again, and saith unto them, Children, how hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God! It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. And they were astonished out of measure, saying, among themselves, who then can be saved? (Mark 10:23-26.) This proverbial saying, "easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle," meant that the thing was impossible to be done. Jesus immediately said to them, with men it is impossible, but not with God; for with God all things are possible. The other great error that the Pharisees held to was: that, being the descendants of Abraham assured their salvation.

When John the Baptist saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance: and think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father." (Mat. 3:7-9.)

Benson, in his commentary, says: "It is almost incredible how great the presumption of the Jews was on this their relation to Abraham." "Abraham," says the Talmud, "sits near the gates of hell, and does not permit one wicked Israelite to go down into it." And Justin informs us that the "Jewish rabbies assured them that being Abraham's seed, though they continued in disobedience to God and in infidelity, the Kingdom of Heaven should still be given them."

Now, we will consider the parable, and we shall see how completely it upsets and demolishes both of these errors: "There was a certain rich man, which was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day: and there was a certain beggar named Lazarus, which was laid at his gate, full of sores, and desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table: moreover the dogs came and licked his sores." Here is as complete a contrast drawn between the earthly conditions of these two men as could be, because drawn by infinite wisdom. The rich man was as rich as could be desired. He was arrayed every day in raiment so costly that none but the very rich could afford it. And then he fared sumptuously every day. That is, in a magnificent, costly, princely way. And then we are to presume that he was sound and well, and in the best conditions to enjoy all the advantages, comforts and blessings that could be derived from being rich. He was in want for nothing that money could procure. But the poor beggar laid at his gate, was destitute of all the good things of earth. He was homeless, houseless and moneyless. He was not able to buy one loaf of bread; he was wholly dependent. And the phrase, "Laid at his gate," implies that he was unable to walk, and was helpless, and was full of sores. So he was deprived of all earthly enjoyments. And it seems that the only sympathizing friends he had were the dogs, which came and licked his sores. It is said that nothing is better for a sore, than for a dog to lick it. They lick softly and tenderly and cleanse a sore completely. Instead of being clothed in the cheapest raiment, the inference from the dogs licking Lazarus' sores is that he was not even clothed in rags to cover his sores. The sores must have been naked for the dogs to lick them.

"And it came to pass, that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom." O how exceedingly glorious his transition from earth, and all his sufferings into Abraham's bosom! Heaven sent a convoy of the angels to carry him!

"The rich man also died, and was buried." It is not said that the beggar was buried. His body may have been taken, and with disgust, thrown out into some unfrequented place to be eaten by dogs. But be this as it may, the inner man, the real man, was not affected by any disposition that was made of it. The rich man died, and was buried; no doubt, with great pomp and ceremony. "And in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. And cried and said, Father Abraham." Abraham returned in his answer, a corresponding term, "Son." Now, there cannot be any dispute about this being a real descendant of Abraham: for Abraham acknowledges it, by calling him son. But with all his riches, and being a son of Abraham, where is he? Awful thought! He is in hell, tormented. The condition of the two men is now reversed. The poor beggar is now the rich man, and has the true riches to enjoy for ever; instead of being carried and laid at the rich man's door, he is carried by angels into Abraham's bosom, in heaven, and arrayed in a robe outshining the sun in its glory—happy for ever. He is in want for nothing, he has Heaven's infinite stores to draw from, to supply all he needs, to make him perfectly happy. But the rich man is now the poor beggar; he begs for one drop of water, but begs in vain. He found no Abraham guarding the gates of hell to prevent his going into it. All his dependencies for entering the Kingdom of God, have proved as a baseless vision. Thus we see, that the parable was designed by our Lord to show the absurdity and falsity of the two errors we have been considering. And that the parable does utterly upset and demolish them.

The lesson taught by the parable, was needed also by the disciples of Christ. As Jews, they were, as Paul was, Pharisees. And I would venture the remark that the lesson taught by the parable is needed to be learned, even in this day of light, and knowledge, especially that part relating to succession. Were it possible for us to prove to a demonstration that we are in a straight unbroken line with Christ's Apostles, or with any one of them as Peter, or with John the Baptist what would it avail us before the judgment bar of God? It would avail us no more than the succession with Abraham availed the rich man. Let us take warning from the word of God, and not suffer ourselves to be beguiled into any man-made plan of salvation, no matter how pleasing it may be to the pride of our hearts, but stick to the sure plan that God our Maker has devised.

The Church Fair at Antioch.

And it came to pass in those days that Paul and Barnabas came down into Antioch to minister to the church there.

And there assembled much women of the sterner sort and of men a few.

And they reasoned amongst themselves how their brethren, Paul and Barnabas, should be fed and clothed.

And Paul, being a tent-maker, was willing to prepare for them a great tent in which to hold a bazaar.

But there arose a contention between Paul and the stronger minded of these women who desired to sell their traffic in the temple of the Lord.

And Paul, willing to yield his own conviction, consented to the opening of the doors of the temple, and said, on the Lord's day, unto the church assembled at that place: Women, Sisters, upon a certain set day, there shall be gathered together at this place men, women, and children, Jews and Greeks and Gentiles to witness an athletic contest between some of the chief men of this city and the brethren who accompanied us to this place from Jerusalem.

Brother Barnabas shall be present and will hold a grab-bag and there shall be dropped into this bag, much spoils of the devout men and women of this town, who will charge one drachma each for a grab into this bag.

There shall also be a charge at the door of a small sum.

And when these things shall be ended, there shall be assembled a number of young women, dressed after the manner of the Gentiles, with uncovered heads and unwashed hands, who shall bring in into the people gathered there a feast of the fat things of the land, so that they may all eat and be filled.

For this there will be no charge.

And Paul said furthermore, Men, Brethren, the sons of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and ye men of Antioch and of all nations present, know ye that thus it is appointed in these later times to serve the Lord with your substance, laying by such of you as the Lord hath prospered, to partake of this feast of good things.

And on the appointed day, there assembled a great multitude of people, of men and women and children and of young men and young women, not a few.

And they came together into the temple of the Lord and there were great revelings and feastings and much merriment.

And Paul, consenting unto these things, came also and was present.

And there grew out of this great contentions and backbitings, and there was no small stir in the church at Antioch, so that Paul and Barnabas remained not much longer in that place, but returned unto Jerusalem.

And passing by, one of the captains of the host of the Evil One, when he heard that there had arisen contention and strife, rejoiced greatly and said: Truly we have no need to tempt this people, nor to send our ambassadors amongst them for they have already become like the worshippers of Bacchus and like those that bow down unto idols, and he went his way rejoicing greatly.

And those of the churchmen, women and children, assembled often together to play cards and to drink wine and to dance, one with another, and to make merry and there was much reveling and feasting in those days, but for the space of a whole year there was not many souls added unto that church.

And when the brethren assembled in Jerusalem, they spake often of these things one to another, but they feared the people, lest they should withhold of their substance, and there should be nothing for the poor, nor for the spread of the gospel among the Gentiles, nor for the support of the brethren.

Sitting Over Against the Treasury.

By the Rev. Courtney H. Fenn, in New York Observer.

It was the Saturday before Foreign Mission Sunday in the Westminster Presbyterian Church of Jaconsett. The Church still adhered to the good (?) old custom of taking one collection a year for the cause, and that toward the end of April. It was not a deliberate attempt to keep the Foreign Board on the anxious seat until the end of the fiscal year, but simply a custom of long standing. The church had been greatly prospered, for Jaconsett was a growing city, and its expansion had all been in the direction of Westminster church, which had now enrolled a membership of eight hundred and twenty, the additions for the year having been ninety-five, seventy-six of them by letter from other churches.

It was the fourth year of the pastorate of the Rev. John Santon, D. D., a young man who had manifested an increasing pulpit power, and was much thought of by his people for his social qualities. During his senior year in the seminary course he had been seriously considering the needs of the foreign field, when he was called, quite unexpectedly, to a flourishing church in the manufacturing town of Denton. The call to the foreign work seeming to be a more indefinite one, he had concluded that an equally great opportunity for the use of his talents offered itself in Denton, whence after a few years he was called to Jaconsett. His ministry had not been unfruitful, so far as numbers were concerned; yet he had never felt altogether at ease in his heart as to the decision made on leaving the seminary. He lamented the fact that all his efforts to increase his church's interest in Foreign Missions had resulted in so little; yet he was sometimes more than dimly conscious of the fact that he was embarrassed in his appeals for this cause by the uncomfortable intruding thought:

"Why did you not heed the call yourself? How can you plead with your people for men and money, when you might have been one of the men yourself?" There was not, in the nervelessness of his appeals, that element, not unknown in the home pulpit, of fear lest gifts for the foreign field would rob the home field. No, Dr. Santon knew full well that no church has ever thriven through withholding, and that no pastor ever starved because his people were interested in Foreign Missions. Neither was he afraid of offending his people by his zeal for the foreign work. But the results were small, and year by year he faced the disappointment of failure, rendered the more poignant by his own sense of responsibility. The presence of a furloughed missionary speaker in his mid-week meetings was by no means a rare event, and he had once secured the services of the Rev. Dr. —, one of the secretaries of the Foreign Board, for a Sunday morning address, but the young pastor was always embarrassed by his own weakness in seconding the appeal. And now, as the time for another annual collection came round, he was feeling so distressed over the prospect that it almost made him ill. He determined to devote much time to prayer over his preparation for the service on that day, and after a long hard week of study and meditation, on Saturday evening he shut himself into his study for a last earnest seeking of God's help and blessing. He had been more fatigued than he knew, and, while he prayed, he fell asleep and dreamed.

He was entering the church for the morning service of Foreign Mission Sunday. As he opened the door beside the pulpit, he was conscious of an unusual expression on the faces of the congregation, which, as he had feared, was smaller than usual. The cause was soon apparent. One of the side seats in the pulpit was already occupied, and by a stranger, who rose to meet him as he ascended the steps. Where had he seen that face before? It was one which would be noticeable among ten thousand, not for any striking beauty of feature; but for such a combination of strength and sweetness as is rarely seen in any man, for, with the best of man, it united the best of woman, without even faintly suggesting the effeminate. His manner, modest, unassuming, yet betokened no feeling that he had not a right to be there. He extended his hand, and said in a low voice:

"My brother, I have come at your earnest invitation, as I have done many times before. As your mind, and those of this people, are yet weak to discern spiritual realities, I, your Lord and Master, have come this once in bodily form, that henceforth you may feel more confidently assured of my continual presence in your worship." For a moment, the young minister could not speak, but simply gazed into that matchless face, convinced that there was no mistake, yet with an unspeakable joy and a strong fear struggling for the mastery in his heart. Then, with almost a sigh of relief, he said:

"Lord, it is indeed Thou; and my heart is filled with thanksgiving for this blessed privilege; and now Thou wilt speak to my people to-day, and they will heed the message as they would not mine. The service is Thine, conduct it as Thou wilt."

"I will indeed speak to your people to-day, my brother, but through your lips. Speak you what you believe I would speak; and I will be with your mouth, and teach you what you should say." There was no use in arguing against these quiet, decided, yet sympathetic tones. But how could the young minister ever lead his people in prayer, or attempt to present the cause, while the Lord Himself sat beside him there in the pulpit? It was impossible.

The organ prelude was ended, the first notes of the long metre doxology were struck; mechanically Dr. Santon joined in the strains, stumbled through the invocation, and made such work of the Psalter that his people gazed wonderingly at him. He gave out the hymn, and sat down, his head throbbing as if it would burst. He read the Scripture lesson, without knowing what he read, and said: "Let us pray." All heads were bowed, and the people waited. The minister tried to speak, but words would not come. At last, in anguish of spirit and with tears streaming down his cheeks, he turned about in the pulpit and burst forth:

"Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord. I have been unfaithful to Thee, unfaithful to this people, and I am not worthy to stand up before them to proclaim Thy word. I have told them of the almost countless thousands of Thy sheep who are wandering in the darkness of sin and of ignorance, and have urged them to give up their substance to seek and to save that which is lost; but I have turned my own back on the hand that was outstretched to call me to carry the Gospel to the heathen, when there was nothing in the world to prevent my going, and I have chosen the comparative comfort of a large home pastorate, and the chance to make a reputation. O Lord, forbid that, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a cast-away, unused of Thee because I would not let Thee use me as Thou wouldest! Forgive my sin, make me what Thou wouldest have me be, and send me where Thou wouldest have me go. And O, have mercy upon this people. Let them not suffer for my sin, but give to them a worthier Shepherd, and arouse them to earnest prayer and intelligent effort for the speedy evangelization of this world of Thine. For Thine own Name's sake. Amen."

It was the most remarkable prayer ever offered from that pulpit, the briefest and the most intensely earnest, and there was hardly a dry eye in the house when it was concluded. Dr. Santon's missionary sermon that day was hardly the one which he had so laboriously prepared. His lips had been opened, and in very truth did the Lord teach him what he should speak. He first told his people more fully of the struggle through which he had passed on leaving the seminary, and of his excusing himself from going out as a foreign missionary.

"And now," said he, "I can never rest until I have found out whether I am too old to correct that mistake. If not, you must find another pastor. If I cannot go, I shall stay with you, but I shall not be the man I was before I saw my Lord. My people, I have never been able to set before you your responsibility for the world, as I ought to have done, and I have mourned the fact; but now I can say all that is in my heart; and in the presence of the Christ of Calvary, I plead with you for the souls for whom He died, and for whose salvation He has commissioned every disciple to go, so far as he may be able, unto the uttermost parts of the earth. There are young people in this church whom the love of Christ might well constrain to devote their lives to this service. There are men of means who could well afford the joy of supporting a substitute on the foreign field. And there is not one of us who will not be the better for some sacrifice of our own ease and comfort and luxury that the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ, may shine out into the darkness.

"We have been but playing at this great work, eagerly investing our millions in every form of commercial enterprise for selfish gain, while we have rather grudgingly dropped the pennies and the nickles and a few dollars in the plate to provide for the sending of the Gospel to millions of immortal souls. Our young men have fought and bled for their country; our young women have hesitated at no peril in their devotions as nurses of the sick; and parents have not held back the willing offering. But the recruiting of soldiers of the Cross is a slow and disheartening task. The country has gladly poured out blood and treasures like water to give Cuba's people freedom from temporal oppression, but the Church of a million members has called it 'conscienceless begging' when called upon for a million dollars, and a few hundred young people to save a billion heathen from the crushing slavery of sin.

"O my people, these things ought not so to be. We cannot, we dare not, permit them to continue so to be. We must have a part in the sacrifice of those who have suffered and died in Mission lands, by at least giving until we feel it, and then, like them, giving until we do not feel it. Here in the presence of our Lord, I am more than ever convinced that we, His Church and His ministers, have been grieving Him beyond expression by making a plaything of this greatest business in the world, while we make a business of the things which the Lord intended should be but playthings. Never can we hope for the outpouring of His blessing, until we seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, bringing all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in His house. He looks not at how much we give, but at how much we withhold. Some of us may not have come prepared to respond to this new sense of responsibility which has come to us through the realization of the presence of the Master Himself; but I am sure that He will take our pledges. He is testing our hearts to-day, not our purses. His sacrifice for us was a glad one, though it meant the cross. Let us follow Him in joyful offering."

This is but a brief outline of the sermon, which moved that congregation as it had never been moved before. There followed an indescribable scene. Once more the Lord "sat over against the Treasury, as the people cast in their gifts." The poor widow was there with her two mites, and the Lord, as of old, smiled upon her and blessed her. The man of moderate means was there, and gave till he felt it; and the rich man was there, who had been accustomed to "cast in of his abundance" a dollar bill, and to go home and joke with his friends about how much of his dollar would get to Africa. But it was not a dollar this time. A dollar for missions in the presence of the Lord of life! No; he would be ashamed to give it. He had a ten-dollar bill in his pocket; how would that do? He smoked that much in a couple of weeks. And this was for the salvation of millions for a year. How much did a whole missionary cost, anyway. What would his wife say if they should have one of their own? Afford it? For that matter he would hardly notice it. And there was that strong, sweet face looking into his face, yes, on down into his heart; and with a new joy, which embarrassed him by its strangeness and sweetness, he slipped in a paper pledging himself and wife to the support of a new missionary.

And there sat Elder X—, one of the richest men in the community, regular in attendance at church, a faithful member of the Session, but not a believer in foreign missions. Was there not far more that the church could do at home? was his argument; surely he could not be expected to convert other nations when there was such a need of the Gospel in America! But somehow or other, the suicidal selfishness of such a programme struck him to-day, as it never had done before. What would he, and what would America, be to-day, if that plan had been followed from the time of Christ? Was it simply for America that Christ had died? Were the men who had no interest in foreign missions the most enthusiastic in the home work, and the strongest spiritual powers in the local church? For the first time, he saw the matter as his Lord saw it, when He stopped not short of the uttermost parts of the earth in His great commission to His disciples.

This thought brought others in its train. If this be indeed the Lord's plan for His church, surely the minister was right in saying that he did not intend that the Church should play with this solemn responsibility, putting its millions into commercial enterprise for selfish gain and pleasure, its tens of thousands into the provision of luxurious home churches, where the rich might take comfort during a service and a sermon, soothed by the beautiful architecture of the building, and the music of the trained choir, and congratulate themselves that they were not as other men; and putting only its pennies and dimes and a few dollars into this vast work for the salvation of a world. What a sublime faith it must have taken for the few who had been in earnest about it, to work on, year after year, with the Church's pittance, while her rich men were living for themselves, or at best adding to the magnificent endowments of some of the larger colleges or libraries, or contributing to local philanthropies. Why should not the Lord's work have some of the millions? Did men leave any other work to take care of itself because it was, forsooth, "a work of faith?" It was at best the excuse of an unpardonable selfishness. Overwhelmed with a sense of shame for himself, and for others like him, he rose to his feet, and stammered out:

"Lord, have mercy upon me, a sinner. I have given some portion of my time, my strength, my means, to the work of this church; but I have turned a deaf ear to the call of the need of heathen millions for whom Thou hast died. And the Church which calls itself Thine has been playing at Missions, grudgingly sparing a handful of its young men and women, and permitting them to suffer and toil, with a meagre support while it rests at home and criticizes and orders retrenchment. We have let the sons of the poor go to this field and have counted our own souls too good for this sacrifice. How shall we ever lift up our heads before Thee to claim Thy blessing? We have come short even of the tithe of the income, the minimum requirement under the law; instead of realizing the larger privileges and responsibilities which are ours under the reign of the blessed liberty of love! Henceforth, O Lord, I pledge myself that I will, if my wealth continues with me, at least never give less for Thy work than I spend on myself and my family." And, as to Zaccheus of old, Jesus said to him: "This day will I abide at thy house."

A son of the elder had been sitting in the family pew, amazed beyond measure by all that was going on around him; but with the conviction growing more and more intense that it meant more for himself than he was willing to acknowledge. Then began the struggle of his life. Reared in luxury, of both natural and acquired refinement, in the Senior year of Yale University, possessed of an original mind and quick perceptions, which had made him the prize debater of his class, he had looked forward to the study of the law and a brilliant career at the bar, of which friends, classmates and professors all had assured him. Could it be possible that he was mistaken in this choice of a profession? Was it indeed true, as he had unheedingly heard, that the majority of those who went as missionaries were children of the comparatively poor, while those who had the means to support themselves, without cost to the church, rarely felt themselves called to turn aside from the pursuit of wealth to take up this self-denying work? In vain he tried to think of an excuse for this; not one would satisfy his conscience, in the presence of the Master.

"Why should you not go? Would you regard it as a waste of your time and talents to follow your Master in this work? Who gave you those talents, and to what purpose?" With head bowed low, he fought it out, then faced the Master in the joy of triumph, crying, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do? Whether it be China, or India, or Africa, I will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest; and the money wherewith Thou hast blessed me, but wherewith I was in danger of cursing myself, shall provide for the necessities of my work."

This was an almost heart-breaking announcement to his father and mother; but they dared not, nor would they, oppose any objection to this logical application of the new spirit of the elder himself, who simply sighed an "Amen," as the Lord accepted the volunteer.

There were many others in that congregation who formed a new plan of life that day, but not all. Some, alas, "went away sorrowful, for they had great possessions."

The minister had been sitting on the platform, speechless, overwhelmed by what was going on before him. Startled by a sudden sound, he turned his head, and lo, he was not in the church, but sitting in his study chair. His wife stood in the doorway saying:

"John, it is past midnight; are you not coming to bed?"

It had been only a dream, but that dream was the beginning of a new life for John Santon, and the church at Jaconssett, for many of the things which the pastor had dreamed, became sober realities, through the power of the new sense of the real Presence of the Living Lord.

The New Era in Religious Education.

By George Albert Coe, Professor in Northwestern University.

For some years religious workers have been yearning for the dawn of a new day in the religious nurture of the young. The reasons need need not be described. The decay of catechising, the neglect of parental instruction, the limitations of the Sunday-school, the slipping away of the children of the Church, and the inability of evangelism to bring them back,—these are all recognized and mourned, and a cry has arisen for reform. A like demand was made by Horace Bushnell in his Christian Nurture, published in 1847. Here were formulated, too, some of the basal principles upon which this reform must proceed, whenever it occurs. Why did not the churches follow the leadership of this truly inspired preacher and theologian? Because certain conditions of success were either not ripe or not recognized. Today these conditions are present and recognized as controlling forces in the life of our time. In our day there have met together five great influences which focus light and power upon the problem of religious nurture as never before in the history of the Church. The path, the means, the methods and the motives of a great forward movements are all before us at last.

The first of these influences is what is called "the new education." Within about a century the whole theory and practice of education has been revolutionized. While we cannot say that the end of the movement has yet been reached, nevertheless the school organizers of to-day are building upon real knowledge of the child and of the principles of method. All their knowledge and experience is now available for the use of the Church in its own educational reform. The problem before the Church, too, is largely parallel with that which the schoolmasters have been working at. For Church and schoolmaster deal with the same child, and the child is a single personality, with laws of development that apply to all the faculties alike. The unity of the child makes education a unit; wherefore President Butler objects to the phrase, "religious education," saying that religious training and so-called secular training are merely parts of the unitary whole. Accordingly, all that Rousseau, Pestalozzi, Herbert, Froebel and Horace Mann have contributed to education theory and practice, together with the accumulated experience of the schools, is so much capital now for the first time ready for the use of the Church.

Second, the so-called "new psychology," with its improved methods of research into the mind of man, and with its widened range, which takes in the child as well as the adult, is likewise ready to contribute to the reform of religious education. For the first time in history, knowledge of the processes of the child mind and of the periods of its growth has been rendered definite and systematic. There has dawned upon us the truth that the human being is a developing, not merely an enlarging organism. Much remains to be learned in this field, yet the kindergarten, the child-study movement and the psychology of religion have already yielded enough information about the periods and laws of child growth to enable us to go ahead at once with intelligent reconstruction of religious training.

A third factor is the Sunday school. In this day, when the limitations of the Sunday-school are keenly felt, we shall do well to note what it has accomplished. Its chief service has been that of organization. It has made the Church conscious of her teaching function, it has organized that function, and it has linked a large part of the Protestant world together in a fellowship of Bible study. These are permanent gains. Yet the Sunday-school has wrought only feebly at the basal problems of religious education, the nature of the child, the principles and methods of instruction, the subordinate and the ultimate aims, and even while it has worked at the one task of teaching the Bible, ignorance of the Scriptures has taken on alarming proportions both within and without the Church. It is clear that the Sunday-school movement, in its present form, is not a finality, but rather a prelude to a vast reform. That reform will not supersede the Sunday-school, but will build upon it while transforming it.

A fourth condition of progress is fulfilled in the deepened knowledge of the Bible that has come to our age. Never, since the days of the apostles, has the Bible as a whole and in its minutest parts been as well known and understood as it is to-day. But this knowledge remains chiefly a possession of the expert student. It has not generally penetrated to the people except through distorting and disquieting hearsay. The time has come when the assured results of Bible study must be made available to the people. Children must be taught to think of the sacred writings from the first in a way that will stand the test of their riper years. Now, the new points of view are inherently adapted to the work of popular instruction, for they make the Bible more concrete, more intelligible, something more closely related to us, so that the spiritual truth stand out in a stronger light. The way to restore the treasure of Christendom to its rightful place in the minds and hearts of the people is to teach the whole truth, and to teach it by methods based upon our knowledge of the mind and of the principles of education.

A fifth element in the preparation for a new era is the new appreciation of what is essential in the Christian life. We are learning what Jesus meant when He said that the will to do God's will comes first, and the doctrine second. Denominationalism, from being a doctrinal squabble, has become loving emulation in good works. Putting the emphasis upon the Christly life, we come more directly to the Christ as a concrete reality that touches us here and now. The cry "Back to Christ," in which nearly all Christendom has joined, is bringing Christians together, and is giving them clearer, more heart-searching insight into what it is that the Master demands of us.

Finally, the movement as a whole seems likely to find a voice in the convention which is to be held in February or March for the purpose of forming a national organization for the promotion of religious and moral education. It is not a significant fact that over four hundred persons from various denominations and from various parts of the country, including over three score presidents and deans of colleges and theological seminaries, over five score professors, seven score pastors and three score workers in other fields should unite in the call for such a gathering? What the outcome will be no one can wholly fore see. But, in view of the forces that are focussing upon this reform, and in view of what has actually been done, is it an exaggeration to say that the new era is already upon us?

A Contrast.

To the young men of our churches:

Those in position to know tell us that for every desirable position in the business world there are ten applicants. That is the supply of men willing to do the work is greater than the demand. Precisely the opposite is true in all departments of church work. The demand is greater than the supply. This fact has been very plainly revealed to the writer in his efforts to find men to do mission work in the Synod of Kentucky. A trip was recently made to one of our Theological Schools in search of young men. Nine young men were needed for the one Synod, but there were just nine young men in the senior class and there were three other brethren there on the same mission with myself the same day, and each of them wanted more men than they could find. In addition to this most of these young men had already been approached, either by letter or in person by churches wishing their services. A letter from a professor at another Seminary gave a list of six young men but held out no hope that any one of them could be had. A letter from still another school of Theology stated that the graduating class was small and that the calls for men had come earlier than usual and that they were more numerous and more pressing—that one Synodical representative had been there wanting six men, that another was coming, that some of the best men were wanted as foreign missionaries and that the Presbyteries were claiming their own young men as being badly needed at home. It seems clear that there are not far from ten calls to each young man leaving the Seminary this spring. The demand is far greater than the supply. Should not this fact constitute a strong call to Christian young men to consider whether they cannot better serve God in the gospel of His Son than in other departments of work? If the work is waiting to be done, if the laborers are few and the Lord is saying, "Go work in my vineyard," should you not pause and ask earnestly and prayerfully "Lord what wilt thou have me to do?" Think it over and give God your answer.

Development.

For the Standard.

The pen can be glad
When the heart is sad,
But what does it tell of the "I."

The surface we show,
But the deeps who can know?
Each stroke of the pen is awry.

'Tis best when the life
Is saddened by strife
To appear with a smiling face,
For the world doesn't share
In our troubles—nor care
For aught, but the gladsome grace.

Each heart alone knows
And thus bitterly grows
'Neath the chastening of sorrow and pain,
Then ask "how," not "why,"
Can I best glorify
In loss, and the end will be gain.

The Spiritual Tone of the Chicago Convention.

Chicago, March 4th, 1903.

Dear Dr. McKelway:

I find in your issue of last week an extract from The Outlook, concerning the Convention recently held in this city under the auspices of the Council of Seventy. It is printed without any comment of yours, and without any other account of this meeting, and I fear is liable to carry with it to some readers an impression of endorsement. Your vigorous defence of evangelical truth assures me that you would not knowingly lend yourself or the influence of your paper to this movement, and for this reason I am sending you the following statement, hoping that you may deem it worthy of publication. I am the more free to do this both because I attended the convention and because of the fact that five of the happiest years of my ministry were spent in North Carolina, and I came to know the people and the churches and the ministers throughout the State and believe that in what I say I would be endorsed by the Christian people of North Carolina without, as well as within, the Presbyterian Church.

The point at issue is in the following sentences of your extract:

"The spiritual tone and devotional spirit were as marked in platform utterances as in the earnest prayer and fervent song which opened and closed each session. This religious atmosphere, together with the profoundly serious earnestness and fearlessly free fellowship which pervaded the whole occasion, made it impossible to suspect the presence or possibility of any factional control, ulterior motive, or polemic purpose."

These statements are directly at variance with the judgment of evangelical men of different denominations who attended this Convention, and for the following reasons:

1. Of the numerous papers read, not one had a "devotional" or "spiritual" subject. No room was found for a paper setting forth any of the great truths of Scripture from the substance of teaching in Christian Sabbath-schools, such as God our Father, Christ our Saviour, the Holy Spirit our Teacher, the danger of sin, the way of salvation, etc. Instead, it was announced that the new movement could not be "dogmatic" and that "we cannot afford to exalt any body of truth, whether liberal or conservative, as our lodestar." Notwithstanding this, ample time was given to setting forth the conclusions of radical criticism on the composition of the Bible and the philosophy of the "new" psychology with entire avoidance of all mention of sin and the need of repentance and conversion. Your readers can judge for themselves how "spiritual" and "devotional" such a programme was.

2. Both from the papers which were read and from the addresses which were made, "the spiritual tone and devotional spirit" were conspicuously absent with two exceptions. One of these was when a plea was made for the family altar and the other when a warning was given that without the Holy Spirit the organization would be in vain; but both of these utterances failed to evoke any sign of approval, although doubtless approval was felt by some members of the Convention. Many brilliant things were said, and valuable suggestions on the technique of education were made, but these were neither spiritual nor devotional. On the other hand, every quip and jest at the expense of the Sabbath-school teacher and of our system of religious instruction, every criticism of the Christian ministry every confident assertion of the "new" theology was greeted with hearty applause. The sympathies of the Convention were manifest when one speaker who was dismissed from a Methodist university for his erroneous teaching concerning Christ and the Scriptures, and who is now pastor of a Unitarian Church, intimated that he would withhold a full expression of his views. From all over the house, came cries of "Speak it out!" to which he replied "So far as there is any paralysis in religion to-day, it is due to the uncredited and incredible philosophy on which it is based." The one sign of wholesome restraint was when one speaker with shocking irreverence, said, "This Convention is far more significant than the gathering of the disciples on the Day of Pentecost, and is far more pregnant with meaning." This outburst was received in silence, but if the Convention had been imbued with a "devotional" spirit, it would have rebuked the speaker to his face.

3. The organization effected is on scientific and institutional, not on religious, grounds. No church membership is required, no common religious principle is proposed, no statement of Christian belief is permitted. Unitarians, radical critics and men dismissed from various evangelical churches for false teaching concerning Christian truth are included in this organization, which proposes to become "the central agency" for instructing our young people in the mind and will of God. Dr. Harper of the University of Chicago, has just been elected president of the Council, and his pupil, Dr. Sanders of Yale is president of the Association. According to the public press, Dr. Harper is "the real promoter of this new combined effort," and directed all of the work in organizing the Convention. Dr. Harper is credited with the statement that he had been looking forward to this meeting for twenty years. Evangelical Christians throughout the country will judge for themselves of the "spiritual tone and devotional spirit" which will emanate from Dr. Harper and his university.

Three ministers, pastors respectively of a Baptist, a Methodist and a Presbyterian church, have within the last day or two expressed themselves concerning this Convention. The Baptist had signed the call for the Convention, but said to me "I am done with it. There is nothing in it. It is a cold-blooded, scientific affair." The Methodist protested against instruction "under the inspiration of influences emanating from Dr. Harper, and contaminated with destructive views of the Bible." The Presbyterian said, "I was present at every session, and watched and listened intently. It made my heart sick. Mark my word for it, this Council of the Seventy mean no good to the churches of America, to our Sabbath-schools and our public schools."

The Christian churches of America must meet the issue put before them by this Convention. It involves the foundations of the faith. It permits of no evasion or compromise. It draws the line sharp and rigid. It were better far to leave uncorrected the admitted defects of our method of Sabbath-schools instruction than to introduce into our churches and Sabbath-schools a spirit so alien, so hostile, so radical as that which marked this Convention.

With the earnest hope that God will protect our churches and our Sabbath-schools, and that a great blessing may rest on the Churches and Sabbath-schools of your Synod, I am,

Faithfully yours,

W. S. Plumer Bryan.

Theology for the People.

In a letter to the author, Rev. A. R. Shaw, Portsmouth, Va., Rev. Walter L. Lingle, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Rock Hill, S. C., writes:

"I have examined Theology for the People very thoroughly. I have occasion to use it every week and have found it exceedingly valuable. It is the kind of theology I like. I want mine in popular form; I can use it better that way. I have gotten a great deal of good from the book, and trust it will have a large circulation."

"How much like your father you are, William," said an old man, laying his hand on a young preacher's shoulder, the other day; "and you grow more like him every day."

"Heavenly Father," said the young man as he went about his duties, "help me so to live that men shall find in me a likeness to Thee, even Thee, great Father! And oh, that it may be found of me that I grow more like Thee every day!"

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

We publish this week an interesting communication from our good friend Dr. W. S. Plumer Bryan, on the Chicago Convention. We publish on the other side an article from Professor Coe, of the great Methodist University, in the suburbs of Chicago. It was written before the Convention was held and somewhat in anticipation of it. The Convention itself seems to have made its impressions very largely according to the pre-conceived opinions of those who attended it. We regret that lack of space forbids our review of these two articles this week, but we suggest that the truth lies midway the extremes.

Rev. James L. Reed gives us a sound and scriptural exposition of the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus. And the selected article will be found to be just about the best sermon to pulpit and pew on the greatest of all themes that one may find in the course of much hearing or reading.

The New Plan of Home Mission Work.

Last week we rather promised to say a word with regard to the plan that is to be presented to the next Assembly by the able committee from all the Synods of the Church. Perhaps the most sincere endorsement that we can give is to claim its origination. We hope that the claim will be no obstacle to its being advocated by the other religious papers of our Church and we are glad to give the weight of Dr. Dabney's testimony to the necessity and the feasibility of some such plan. The following was published in the North Carolina Presbyterian of April 14, 1898, while the editor was Superintendent of Home Missions for the North Carolina Synod:

THE UNIFICATION OF OUR HOME MISSION WORK.

"The suggestion is made that the plan of representation adopted in North Carolina be extended to the Assembly, that the Assembly's Home Mission Committee consist of representatives from the Synodical Committees. Thus each Synod would have its part in the management as well as in the support of the Assembly's work.

The Committee could meet once a year, just before the Assembly meets and lay off the plans for the whole year, each Synod engaging to raise its quota of money and the united wisdom of the committee expending the money where the need and promise is greatest. The objection on the score of expense would be more than met by the financial value of a report to the Assembly of the Home Mission Work of the whole Church. That report now covers the work done in three Synods at an expense of $25,000, and the Assembly, as such, knows nothing of the far larger and more successful work involving the outlay of $100,000.

Between the meetings of the Assembly and an Executive Committee from contiguous Synods could manage affairs with small expense.

In suggesting this plan, we have been encouraged by the commendation of brethren whose opinions have been of great weight with us. We spoke of the plan to Dr. Dabney last summer and he gave his unqualified approval of the measure. In a letter to one of our ministers last summer, he says:

"The Synodical commissions for this work are wholly approved. The Presbytery is too small a body. Its efforts should be auxiliary to those of the Synods and Assembly, and not independent. Otherwise, the work will be so chopped up as to reach disintegration.

There is urgent need that the Assembly's Committee and the Synodical Commissions should be brought into a closer, more intelligent and harmonious concert."

TEMPERANCE.

We give elsewhere a review of the contest in this State against the saloon, which has lasted, so far as the work of this writer has concerned, for six years. We confidently expect complete victory over the saloon within the next six years in North Carolina.

The Alexander Bill of which we spoke, compelling the closing of all saloons at eight o'clock, passed the House by large majority for which Dr. H. Q. Alexander of Mecklenburg county deserves the applause of all right thinking people. We are sure that he was supported by Representative Freeman—also of this county. The bill was tabled in the Senate on Saturday. This was really a temperance measure without political consideration of any kind and the friends and the foes of temperance may very well be distinguished by the following roll-call in the Senate. The account is taken from the Charlotte Observer:

The House bill came up to regulate saloons, requiring all to close at 8 o'clock at night. The judiciary committee reported it unfavorably, but London and Pharr made a minority report, recommending its passage. He said the most progressive town in the State, Charlotte, now closed its saloons early. The bill was tabled, ayes 23, noes 15. Those voting to table were: Aarons, Baldwin, Ballenger, Bellamy, Burton, Conley, Crisp, Glenn, Godwin, Hicks, of Granville; Hoey, Hunter, Justice, Norris, Pollock, Reinhardt, Spence, Travis, Vann, Warren, Webb, Wellborn and Woodard. Those voting no, were: Allison, Beasley, Brown, Henderson, Hicks, of Duplin; Lamb, London, Mann, Ingersoll, Milton, Pharr, Thayer, Walker and White.

There is one satisfaction in the defeat of the bill. While we are always in favor of crippling the harmful power of the saloon at every step, yet the closing of the saloons at night cuts off so much of the mischief done that it makes the saloon itself more tolerable to decent people. It may be another case of the devil's over-reaching himself, that this bill failed to pass. But we may be sure that no motives of this kind to make the saloon as intolerable as possible, animated the senators who voted against this bill, moderate and reasonable as it was. Even our esteemed contemporary from which we quote above, whom we hope to have with us some day, if the present rate of progress continues, commended this as a reasonable bill. And the people ought to know who are the friends and the enemies of the saloon. The people must teach the lesson that has been so faithfully taught in Mecklenburg and Cumberland that the man who tampers with the saloon is an enemy of the people and of their best interests. Let us give a thorough course of instruction on this point and the power of the saloon in politics and government will be broken forever.

The History of Mecklenburg County, from 1740 to 1900. By J. B. Alexander, M. D. The Observer Printing Company, Charlotte, N. C.

A county that has given birth to two presidents, that was the cradle of independence in Revolutionary times, that was the scene of most successful armed resistance to the British and Tories, winning the name of Hornets' Nest from the British, deserves the honor of having a history of its own. Dr. J. B. Alexander of Charlotte has recently published a book of general information with his personal reminiscences of men and events which is a very readable one. It lacks somewhat the sequence of a history the author passing over the period between the founding of the county and his own personal recollections in a brief chapter. There is a jump from the treatment of the Declaration of Independence on May 20, 1775 to the War of 1812 and almost no mention of the Revolutionary History of the county, except in the biographies of certain distinguished men. But with this criticism of the method of arrangement the book is a valuable one in the preservation of material that would otherwise have been lost, and the reminiscences of one of the best-known citizens of Charlotte who has watched its growth from the time when it was a village of 1,500 people to the present prosperous period, are alone worth the price of the book. The Appendix is especially valuable for the thorough treatment of the revolutionary heroes, condensed from the narrative of that painstaking historian, Lyman Draper of Wisconsin.

We have read recently a part of the manuscript of another history of Mecklenburg County, now in preparation by D. A. Tompkins, of Charlotte. The two together will give an adequate picture of life in Mecklenburg for 150 years.

Church News.

NORTH CAROLINA.

King's Mountain Presbytery will meet in the Henrietta Church, April 10th at 7:30 p. m. The S. A. L. passenger train going west reaches Ellenboro—where a change is made for Henrietta—at 2:30 p. m. The Southern train reaches Henrietta Station at 9:05 a. m. Reduced rates have been applied for, over both roads. S. L. Cathey, S. C.

CHARLOTTE; Tenth Avenue Presbyterian Church.—The membership of this church increases from week to week. There were ten additions on last Sunday. The prayer-meetings are well attended. The Westminster League is making good progress. And the night school, conducted at the old church, is in a flourishing condition.

KENTUCKY.

Rev. L. O. Spencer the Synodical Evangelist, has just closed an interesting meeting at Bardstown, Ky. There were eighteen additions to the church, God's people were greatly revived and $150 was subscribed for the Evangelistic work.

The Synod's Committee in Kentucky is trying to induce individuals and churches to undertake the support of special home mission fields. The First Church Lexington has agreed to give the amount necessary to make up the salary of the Jackson field, the Versailles Church has pledged the support of the man in charge of the Breathitt group, a lady member of the Shelbyville church gives $300 towards the support of the Perry group, Owensboro undertakes the partial support of the Pike group. The ladies of the First Church, Louisville, the ladies of Highland Church and the Anchorage Sabbath-school support the Letcher group and the effort is being made to get the Sabbath-schools, the ladies' societies and the Christian Endeavor Societies to support three home missionaries. One liberal man has just given $500 to the work and made a liberal pledge for the future and the cause has found a warm place in the hearts of some of our noble women. If all of our churches will give the amounts asked we can supply our vacancies, do some aggressive work, pay our debts and close the year with joy and gladness. C.

TEXAS

Presbytery of Dallas adjourned to meet in the College Park church, Sherman, Tex., April 17th, at 7:30 p. m.

Presbytery is called to meet in the First Church, Sherman, Tex., March 9th, at 3 p. m. to change the time for the regular spring meeting from April 17th to Friday, April 10th, at 7:30 p. m. E. M. Munroe, S. C.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Pee Dee Presbytery will meet in Conway, S. C., on April the 28th, at 8 p. m. A. H. McArn, S. C.

VIRGINIA

STONE'S CHAPEL.—At a meeting of the congregation of this church after services on last Sabbath, the apportionment for the Davis and Elkins College was considered, and in probably less than five minutes from the time the matter was presented the entire amount was raised more. One gratifying feature was that many young men contributed liberally and gladly. It was enough to make any pastor happy to see such generous and ready response to call for such a cause and involving such demands.

MISSOURI

CAROTHERSVILLE.—For a number of years after its organization, ten years ago, this church was without even regular preaching, but they managed to keep alive in the face of many opposing forces. Recently, however, they have taken a new lease of life and energy. About two years ago a very neat, comfortable church was built and paid for, and handsomely furnished by the Ladies' Society. For about a year they had the faithful services of Rev. W. Beale, and were strengthened by substantial additions to the membership. And last fall Rev. A. F. Cunningham, a recent graduate of Louisville Seminary, was secured as Pastor. He began his work Nov. 1st, and in many ways has been much encouraged. He was kindly received by his own people, and by the whole community as well. Congregations have largely increased both morning and evening. The Sabbath-school has doubled in numbers and interest. A handsome manse has been built and occupied. A new bell has been put in the belfry. There have been eight additions, five by letter, and three by profession. These last were especially encouraging, for they came to Christ and into the church as the result of special prayer and effort on the part of the Pastor and a few faithful co-workers.

It is true that "iniquity abounds" and that there are many adversaries," and yet the young Pastor and his people may well "take courage and go forward."

CAPE GIRARDEAU.—Our church at this place, Rev. J. L. Alsworth, pastor, has just completed a handsome new building, which will be at once an ornament to the town and a monument to the zeal, energy, and liberality of the church. "On the first Sabbath and first day of March they expected to occupy it and have the dedication services, Rev. J. Addison Smith, D.D. preaching the sermon. For more than a year they have worshipped on Sabbath in the Court House, and have been greatly handicapped by lack of a church home. But now in their new house, and under the leadership of their energetic pastor and efficient officers, we may safely expect better things of this church and people,—perhaps even "great things done for them" and through them by their Lord and ours.

BRAZIL

Extract from Rev. Alva Hardie's class letter:

SAO JOAO DEL REY, MINAS.—As to my work, the Lord has been with us here in Brazil also, and has given us of his blessings in the way of the salvation of a few souls. During this year I have received into the church twenty four persons, fifteen on profession of their faith in Christ, and nine by letter. Besides that we have organized a church here with a membership of thirty two. We consider this quite a victory for the cause of Christ in this idolatrous city, known far and wide as one of the most idolatrous cities in Brazil. And not only here in the city, but in the neighboring town, the Gospel is taking hold of some of the people. Soon we are to take a trip to visit some of the towns, and we hear that there are several persons ready to accept Christ. In one town the priest came to see us at the hotel to discuss doctrines with us, and when he found he could not conquer us in that way, he told us if we ever came back he would have the people drive us out. But we have no fear of him and are going back some time this month. We find that where there is a little opposition there the Gospel takes hold better, because the people desire to investigate this thing that the priests so bitterly denounce. We want your prayers for this priest-ridden and idolatrous people, and for our church, that the Lord will give us His Spirit.

NORTH CAROLINA

DAVIDSON.—Work on the new dormitory, that had to be suspended during the mid-winter months has been resumed and will be pushed to completion during the spring and early summer as rapidly as possible. If there is no undue delay in securing the necessary lumber, those in charge of the remodelling of the large commencement hall in the main building hope that the changes can be made in time for the closing exercises of the college year, taking place the last of May.

Dr. Martin will represent Davidson on the same date at Union and Jonesville, in South Carolina. Dr. Howerton, of the First Church, Charlotte, was heard with a great deal of pleasure here last Sabbath, both morning and evening. His sermon for the day service on the seal of the Spirit was very fine and striking in every way.

Very general regret in our community has been expressed over Dr. Shearer's serious and continued indisposition, the after-effects it would appear of the grippe and the physical and mental strain incident to the great sorrow that came to him in the loss of his wife, the faithful and constant companion of a half century.

His friends hope that the rest which his physician insists must continue for a while yet, will soon restore him to his usual health and strength. A testimony of no slight kind to the appreciation in which his Bible course is held is the expression of disappointment that one hears from earnest students at losing part of such valuable and interesting instruction.

A large delegation will represent the College Y. M. C. A. at the State convention convening on the 5th inst. at Winston-Salem.

The association here is apparently in a most healthy state and actively busy with the several forms of religious work.

CONCORD.—The Twentieth Century Canvass of Concord First Church is nearly complete. The total sum subscribed is $4,259 which amount will in all probability be increased to $5,000. Of this $2,200 is already paid in. When we take into account all that Concord is doing in the way of Local Home Missions and especially when we remember that these subscriptions are made in the face of the fact that a new house of worship is almost at once to be provided we see that Concord has in no way fallen behind her wonted liberality.

ASHEVILLE.—The Presbytery of Asheville will meet at Bryson City, on April 7, at 8 p. m. Churches will try and have their reports in the hands of the Stated Clerk on or before April the 1st.
E. A. Sample, S. C.

Concord Presbytery will meet in the First Presbyterian Church, Salisbury, N. C., April 9th, 1903, at 8 o'clock, p. m.
W. R. McLelland, S. C.

The Presbytery of Albemarle will meet at Kinston, N. C., April 14, at 8 p. m. Presbyterial assessments are due April 1.
E. D. Brown, S. C. and Treas.

VIRGINIA.

PETERSBURG.—The regular services were held in all our churches Sunday, and the weather being beautiful, good congregations were in attendance.

At Tabb Street Rev. J. S. Foster filled his pulpit morning and night, preaching, as he always does, fine sermons. There seems to be developing in this church a strong missionary spirit, and they are organizing for more perfect work along all lines of missionary work.

At the Second Church Rev. W. McC. White occupied his pulpit at both services, preaching in the morning from Matthew v. 3. his subject being "Humility." At night he preached from Matthew xxvii, "And Jesus stood before the governor." In the afternoon, at 4 o'clock, the annual meeting of the Young Ladies' Missionary Society was held, which was addressed by Rev. Mr. Martin, of the Senior Class of Union Seminary. The fact that Mr. Martin will leave for the African mission as soon as he completes his studies, rendered what he said on this occasion of peculiar interest to our people, and our prayers will follow him to his distant field, that God may give him success in that benighted land. This Society is doing a good work for the Master, among numerous other things having contributed more than $70 for Foreign Missions. It was noticeable that there were present at the missionary meeting no less than four of our ministers.

The Sunday-school was larger last Sunday than the writer ever remembers to have seen it, save once, there being 143 present.

The pulpit of Old Street Church was filled by Mr. Martin in the morning, and by Mr. Sevier at night, Mr. Pratt, the pastor, being absent from the city.

NORFOLK.—The Rev. Dr. Alfred Jones, evangelist of the Synod of Virginia, has worked this winter in Norfolk Presbytery, where there is very extensive mission fields and a number of points of much promise. After two weeks in the Berkley Church with the Rev. Lewis Watson, Dr. Jones had two weeks' work with the Rev. J. B. Waller at Lambert's Point, where there were nine additions to the church. He spent also one week at the Princes Ann Chapel, preaching twice a day, through very unfavorable weather. A Sunday-school was organized, which was to be formally opened on Sunday, March 1st.

Dr. Jones is now at Hampton with the Rev. A. C. Hopkins, Jr., pastor.

Rev. William M. Morrison, who is a son of Mrs. J. Luther Morrison, of Whistle Creek, is expected home late in April from the Congo Free State in Africa, where for more than six years he has been serving as a missionary of the Southern Presbyterian Church.

MISSISSIPPI.

WEST POINT.—On Sunday morning the usual monthly services held in the Presbyterian church were conducted by Prof. D. A. Hill, who selected as his subject, "The Model Church."

M'COMB CITY.—We are requested to announce that the installation of Rev. E. W. Ford as pastor of the church here, which was appointed to take place on the first Sabbath in March, has been postponed until the fifth Sabbath of the same month. It will be an interesting and important occasion in the history of the church, and it is hoped and urged that all connected with it will attend.—Exchange.

M'KINNEY.—There is a time when it seems opportune to write about the progress made in spiritual matters, and I deem it a pleasure and a duty to do so now, briefly. The McKinney church has been greatly strengthened spiritually, and quite a number of our young people have become members under the faithful ministry of our pastor, Rev. S. L. Rieves. He is a preacher of much power and influence in the pulpit and in his pastoral work. Deeply sensible of the great field he has come to occupy under Divine guidance, we hope and trust the cause of Christ will be greatly advanced.

An Elder.

ALABAMA.

The Presbytery of East Alabama will meet at Troy, April 15, 1903, at 7:30 p. m.
E. P. Davis S. C.

GADSDEN.—Rev. G. W. Bull, pastor of West End Presbyterian Church, Atlanta, Ga., assisted Rev. R. B. McAlpine in a ten days' meeting recently. The people of God were much refreshed by the simple, earnest preaching of the gospel. A good impression was made upon all. There were two professions of faith in Christ.

The church is getting ready to build an annex for the primary department of the Sunday-school.

MONTGOMERY.—Rev. Neal L. Anderson, pastor of the Central Presbyterian church in this city, is reported as having returned from a recent trip north. He has signaled his return by a powerful arraignment of the methods resorted to by those who are making desperate efforts to leagize "pool selling" in Alabama. His article appears in the Birmingham News of a recent date. How members of the legislature can resort to such methods passes comprehension. We trust that this exposure will prove effectual in killing the scheme to afford protection to this form of gambling, and that Alabamians will show what they think of such matters and such practices.—Southern Presbyterian.

LOUISIANA.

NEW ORLEANS.—Rev. J. L. Stuart, Jr., expected to spend the first and second Sabbaths in March in this city, presenting the "Forward Mission Movement." He will be with a number of our churches on those two Sabbaths and the intervening week at their respective services.

BATON ROUGE.—Dr. F. H. Billings was ordained and installed ruling elder in the First Church Sunday, February 22nd.

Dr. H. M. Blain, of Virginia, who has lately been appointed assistant Professor in the chair of English in the Louisiana State University, is on the ground now, and, coming, as she does, from such good Presbyterian stock, he is of course a valuable addition to our church. His father is a minister, and his brother is a missionary to China. We wish we had many more like him."—Southwestern Presbyterian.

Rev. Donald McQueen, of Anniston, Ala., has been invited by the faculty of the Louisiana State University to preach the Commencement sermon next June, and he has accepted the invitation.

The National Florence Crittenton Mission, 218 Third Street, N. W.

Washington, D. C., February 18th, 1903.

Dear Friends:

You are cordially invited to be present at a conference on "The Best Methods of Conducting Rescue Work," to be held March 11th to 16th, 1903, at the Mother Mission 21-23 Bleecker Street, New York, by the National Florence Crittenton Mission. A number of persons prominent in philanthropic work will present papers on important phases of this most necessary work. An opportunity will be given for the visitors at the conference to visit the various public institutions in that city and inspect the latest methods used in philanthropy and charity. Tours will be made each night through the lower districts of the city and a glimpse thus given of the needs and possibilities of the all-night missionary.

We expect to be able to secure reduced rates from the railroads. If you will notify us of your intention of attending this conference, we will do what we can to make your visit comfortable and profitable.

Very Truly I. H. N.

Chas N. Crittenton

Sabbath Literature.

The Woman's National Sabbath Alliance has published five new leaflets: "The Child and the Sabbath" by Miss Imbrie. "Ninnie's Sabbath Keeping" a leaflet for children. "The Peanut Lesson" by Rev. Chas T. Young, D. D., and two leaflets called "Starved" and "No Sabbath."

The Alliance is glad to obtain strong and convincing material on every phase of the Sunday Problem.

We will gladly send you a set of the Alliance publications including suggestions for work in your own neighborhood on receipt of ten cents.

To know is to be interested. Apply to Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, Room 709, 156, 5th Ave., New York City.

Foreign Mission Receipts for February.

The receipts for the Foreign Missions treasury for February were $19,372.65, a gain of $7,800.00 over the receipts of last February.

All Presbyterian and church treasurers are earnestly requested to forward sums in their hands so that they will certainly reach the Foreign Mission office before March 31st, as our books necessarily close on that day.

S. H. Chester, Secretary.

From January 2, to February 3, under the direction of the Executive Committee of Foreign Missions, Rev. H. C. DuBose has visited Louisville, Clarksville, Danville and Bristol; the Kentucky Union and Bible School (Christian) at Lexington and the Theological Seminary (Cumberland) at Lebanon, Tenn., the A. and M. at Lexington, Ky., and Starkville, Miss., the University of Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and The Tulane, and lectured on China.

Committee Notes.

The Executive Committee of Foreign Missions met in the Mission Rooms on Tuesday, March 3rd, 1903.

Mr. H. C. Slaymaker of Alexandria, Va., was present by invitation of the Committee for interview regarding his appointment as a missionary to Africa. After the presentation of his testimonials and a most satisfactory interview the appointment was made and Mr. Slaymaker will start for Africa as soon as he can make the necessary business arrangements for leaving home. His special work will be to take charge of the business affairs of the Mission, though he will go as a missionary ready to make the gospel known wherever and whenever he may have opportunity.

A communication from the Southern Brazil Mission in regard to the use to be made of the proceeds of the sale of the Campinas property when it shall have been sold was laid before the Committee and a special committee was appointed to formulate the answer to the same, laying down what will be the Committee's policy in this matter.

The Cuban Mission was authorized to issue a call for a layman to take charge of the school work in that field, on the understanding that whoever might respond to the call would depend upon the income of the school for his support, the Committee assuming no financial obligations in the case. It is believed that ample support will be found for anyone who will undertake this work and it is earnestly hoped that some one of the young men of our Church who has had sufficient experience to be able to manage such work will speedily respond to the call.

Very interesting letters were read from Rev. H. M. Woods, D. D., and Dr. Jas. B. Woods concerning the work at Tsing-Kiang-Pu and Whainfu. Both of these brethren are very much in need of additional funds to complete the buildings necessary to accommodate the work which they are trying to do. Dr. Jas. B. Woods especially needs at once $1,000 to complete a hospital which he has begun to build and which when completed will be of the greatest help to the work in that field, where opposition to the gospel has been stronger perhaps than in any other of our stations in China.

Interesting letters were read from the members of the African Mission giving, as usual, most encouraging accounts of the interesting work in that field.

The Treasurer reported his receipts for Feb. were $19,372.65. About $6,000 of this amount was a legacy. The receipts for last February were $11,807.41 of which $2,000 were legacies. The gain in regular contributions therefore for February was about $4,000. The obligations of the Committee for the month of March are about $23,000. The receipts for March 1902 were about $19,000. We must therefore have an increase of at least $4,000 in the receipts of March to enable us to close the fiscal year without a deficit.

We make an earnest appeal to all friends of the Foreign Mission cause that everyone who can would contribute something towards enabling us to realize this $4,000 of increase. We also earnestly request all Presbyterian and Church Treasurers to promptly forward funds they may have in hand so they may certainly reach us before March 31st.

S. H. Chester, Secretary.

The Navy League of the United States has just been incorporated as a result of the efforts of a few public spirited citizens; its aim is to inform the people by means of lectures, periodicals and literature, with regard to naval affairs.

During last year a law was passed in Iowa permitting the confinement in Asylums of confirmed drunkards; within eight months three hundred patients were under restraint and treatment, which has resulted in the cure of about 75 per cent.

A representative of a wholesale firm in Seoul, Korea, has arrived in this country to contract for idols to be used in heathen temples in Korea and China. For years this trade has been monopolized by England and Germany. "They that make them are like unto them."

The whole mischief has been wrought by the amendment to the treaty as agreed to at Havana. This states that for five years after the ratification of the convention, no rate on sugar and tobacco lower than that fixed by the Dingley tariff act shall be granted to any other nation.

The new Princeton University catalogue shows a total of 1,382 students this year, against 1,354 last year. The number of professors and instructors has increased from 101 to 108. The combined Princeton libraries contain 256,000 volumes, 14,000 having been added during the year.

King Edward has notified the St. Louis Fair authorities that he would exhibit the collection of presents received by Queen Victoria during her Jubilee. This is a most gracious courtesy, prompted by the keen "appreciation of the affection and respect" in which the American people always held his mother.

The imports of books into the United States during 1902 were a little over $1,800,000, while the exports for the same period were $4,564,000. The recent ruling of the Treasury Department has materially advanced the duty on English books. This action has given rise to much protest, and some of the Publication Companies are making a strong plea for the abolition of duty on books.

Panama, March 8.—The election of Congressman took place to-day. The official candidates were elected for the six provinces of the isthmus. Nearly all the Liberals abstained from voting, claiming that government would not respect the vote. Had the Liberals voted they could have won easily in three provinces. The elected Congressmen intend to fight in favor of the Panama Canal treaty.

The Canadian Parliament opens this week. Probably the most important of its deliberations will be the redistribution bill. From this side of the border more interest is centered about legislation with regard to tariff and railroads; it is confidently predicted that if any change is made it will be in the direction of lowering instead of raising the tariff. It is hoped that the Parliament will appoint its representatives on the Alaskan Boundary commission.

In the closing days of the 57th Congress there was a flurry over the attempt of the Republican majority to unseat in the last fortnight of the session, a Democratic member from Missouri, who had a majority of 3,000 votes. There were evidences of corruption. The democrats left the Chamber, to break the quorum. The Republican was seated, owing to a unique method of counting a quorum. The rules were so amended as to enable business to go on.

The decision of the European Powers to accept Turkey's promises of reforms in Macedonia has not been well received in that turbulent province, nor in the neighboring Balkan States, particularly Bulgaria. As everybody knows full well, the trouble in Macedonia is less due to Turkish cruelties than to political agitation for freedom from Turkish rule. As Macedonia can scarcely hope for independent existence under any circumstances, it is clear that Bulgaria and Bulgarian intrigues are at the bottom of all the agitation.—Ex.

Paris doctor named Cizez has published in the Revue des Reves an account of an extraordinary discovery which he attributes to Professor Peter Steins, whoever he may be. According to Dr. Caze, the professor can give sight to all blind people, even to those whose affliction is beyond any of the resources known to modern surgery. It is a pity that the doctor does not publish any details of this remarkable invention beyond stating that it is a contrivance that fastens across the temples and through surfaces peculiarly sensitive to illumination, conveys images to the brain.—Exchange.

The proposal to use the automatic stop as a check upon engineers who play fast and loose with block signals is evidently gaining ground. In a recently report of the Illinois Railroad Commission, there are given some statistics of derailments at interlocking grade crossings of railways in the State of Illinois for the past year, from which it appears that while, out of a total of 197 derailments only 7 were due to defective interlocking functions (including defects caused by snow, ice, etc.), and 27 were due to defective track or rolling stock, no less than 138 derailments were due to trains running against the signals.

The North German Lloyd Company has a device for the immediate discovery of fire in the hold of a steamer. At a convenient position on the ship there is placed an indicator station in which is mounted an electric motor which operates a suction fan. The fan acts upon the upper ends of a number of one-inch pipes, which extend down into the various holds and bunkers of the ship. Each pipe terminates with a flaring opening at the ceiling of its respective compartment; and the system is so arranged that when the fan is running, the smoke of any fire that may occur in a compartment will be drawn up and pass into the indicator station.

Disappointment over the failure of Congress to pass the bill reducing the duty on imports from the Philippine Islands has not yet cleared away at the War Department. The officials there take a gloomy view of the situation and confess that they do not know what may happen in the desolated islands. Out of the wreck of Philippine legislation came the appropriation of $3,000,000, in response to the special appeal of the President. This will be credited to the Philippine Commission and will be expended in building highways, streets and in other improvements that will give employment to the natives

But this is looked upon as only a drop in the bucket, and as wholly inadequate to provide the full measure of relief needed.

The board of naval officers that has been in session at the Washington Navy Yard for the past eight or ten months, making experiments with various kinds of oil as fuel, has ordered a quantity of oil from California. This will be thoroughly tried and the results compared with those of the Texas oils that have formed the chief basis for the experiments up to date. The trials so far made have proved that there is a great deal in the claim that oil can be advantageously used as fuel in small naval vessels, particularly torpedo boats. It has been found an improvement over coal in the matter of smoke and power generated and is also superior in that space and weight can be economized by its use.

Another complication has arisen to further embarrass the Cuban reciprocity treaty. It is claimed at the State Department that if it is ratified in its present shape it will have the effect of abrogating every treaty in which there is the unmodified most favored nation clause with other governments that the United States has. This matter has been under investigation at the State Department for some days past, an examination of the various existing treaties being made to ascertain which of them carried clauses of this kind. A list has been made of treaties containing modified and unmodified favored nation clauses, and it is held that all those of the latter class will be wiped out by the adoption of the Cuban treaty in its present shape.

Curator Wilcomb of the San Francisco Museum has recently received a number of Indian relics from the Moqui reservation, about one hundred specimens in all, many of rare interest. The collection includes an ancient firestick used in aboriginal times for kindling a blaze on a block of wood by rapidly twirling it on its pointed end, old water-bottles of basket-work, ceremonial drums of various designs, sacred paraphernalia rarely parted with, a complete costume of the kind worn by the priests in the famous snake dance, which was witnessed by Prof. Wilcomb; stone household utensils, now disused and hard to find, and many other specimens of great value as showing the habits of living in vogue among these interesting people before they came in touch with civilization. The collection will be unpacked at the earliest opportunity and placed in the ethnological room.

The little country of Holland is struggling with a very large labor problem just at present. Recently the dock laborers and others went on strike, and soon afterward railroad employes declared a sympathetic strike. The government operates the railroads in Holland and therefore had to take a hand in ending this strike. In the endeavor to prevent the recurrence of similar labor troubles, a law has been proposed which makes a strike on the government railroads a crime punishable by imprisonment, and provides for a railroad brigade of troops, whose special duty will be to checkmate the operations of the strikers. The measure is still pending and is the cause of much bitterness. Labor leaders threaten a "universal strike" in case the bill becomes a law. A law forbidding a strike sounds strangely to American ears, and yet it is not to be forgotten that a Federal judge at St. Louis the other day issued an injunction to prevent a strike. If it had not been for this we might say something about the disadvantages of living under a monarchy — Charlotte Observer.

The task that the Cuyard Company, aided by the British government, have set themselves of placing in the Atlantic service two 750-foot, 25-knot ships, is proving itself of formidable proportions at the very outset; for it seems that the announcement that these contracts had been let was premature, and that the builders are hesitating to put their names to a contract carrying such enormous conditions as are imposed in the case of the two vessels. According to the latest reports that have reached this side of the water, the vessels are required to show an average speed of 25 knots over several thousand miles of continuous steaming, the average speed to be maintained irrespective of the conditions of wind and weather. Now, while we believe that such conditions of trial speed as this are the only satisfactory ones, since they are conditions that exist in every-day service, it will be realized at once that they are enormously more burdensome than the requirement that a vessel should show a similar speed over the measured mile.—Exchange.

If one were asked to name the strongest proof of the virility of the American race, he would not be far wrong if he pointed to the fact that we are able to receive and assimilate the enormous immigration which pours like a flood, year by year, upon our shores, without losing our strongly-marked characteristics either in the nation or in the individual. How vast is this immigration is shown by the statistics of the number of cabin and steerage passengers landed at the port of New York during last year, in which all previous records were surpassed. Of cabin passengers there were 139,848, while the enormous total of 574,276 steerage passengers was landed at this port. The previous year the figures were 128,143 cabin and 438,868 steerage passengers; while in 1900, 137,852 cabin and 403,491 steerage passengers were landed in New York City. The explanation of our easy assimilation of these heterogeneous millions is to be found in our magnificent public school system, which is undoubtedly the chief agency in making the immigrants' children who are native by birth, native also in sympathy and training.—Scientific American.

To most of us the Irish Land Question is a hazy one; The Stuarts confiscated nearly all the estates in Ireland for a non-resident nobility, which concocted the worst land-laws in the world. Leases were renewed from year to year so that if a tenant improved his holding the rent was advanced accordingly. Naturally the Irish tenant ceased to improve his land and ended by cultivating but a single crop; out of this started the tide of immigration toward America, twenty-millions of Irish birth or race being now in this country. The Land League agitation under Parnell, which is now bearing fruit. The new Land Purchase bill is framed upon the principle that the landlords shall receive, and the tenants pay considerably less than the market price of landed property, the Imperial Exchequer paying the difference. It is computed that the annual interest on the sum needed for this will not exceed $15,000,000., a part of which will be counter balanced by the savings in the cost of the Irish constabulary, if the country were tranquil, and it will be worth the United Kingdom's while to spend a few million a year to end the Irish discontent.

It is well known that the present anti-Clerical ministry of M. Combes retains power in France only through a temporary combination of the more advanced groups in the chamber of deputies. This combination is now threatened by the inability of the groups to agree regarding the separation of church and state, the question of dogmatic instruction, the regulation by law of the religious orders, and the suppression of the embassy at the Vatican. Debates on these allied topics were proceeding in a way that developed discord, when Premier Combes made a speech that plunged the situation into still greater confusion. The subject of his remarks was the necessity of religious instruction. While announcing himself favorable to the separation of church and state in theory, the Premier said that the immediate institution of such a reform would greatly embarrass the republic, because, in his opinion "religious ideas are still necessary for the masses." He announced that he was a "spiritualized philosopher." The people "can not do without faith. Reason alone cannot guide man through the perplexities of life. We can not and should not disturb the people in those habits of faith implanted in them by fourteen hundred years of Catholic training." These words created confusion among the groups that support the Premier. The radical organs denounced M. Combes, and his anti-Clericalism was gravely questioned. Some days later, accordingly, the Premier returned to the subject. He said he had been misunderstood, that his speech was left incomplete, and that the sense of his utterance had been perverted. He never meant to say that morals, as taught by a laity, should rest upon a foundation of dogma. On the contrary, he eulogized "lay moral teaching," which he said was "based upon eternal ideas of justice and right." It seems generally admitted that the incident might have led to serious consequences for the ministry had not the Socialist leader Jaures come to the support of the Premier.—Digest.

Deaths.

"They never quite leave us, the friends who have passed,
Through the shadows of death to the sunlight above—
A thousand sweet memories are holding them fast,
To the places they blessed with their presence and love."

CORBETT.—At her home, Ivanhoe, N. C., at 3 p. m., Sunday, Feb. 15, Hattie, wife of William M. Corbett, Sr., in her seventieth year. Deceased had long been a consistent and very useful member of Black River Presbyterian Church. The remains were interred on Monday by the pastor.

An Appreciation.

YOUNG.—My acquaintance with Mr. Young began in the early spring of 1893, when I became pastor of our church at Lake City. Our acquaintance ripened into a friendship that grew clearer and stronger as the months passed.

Mr. Young was an elder of our church, a man of mark and of great influence in his own church and throughout the Presbytery. All his work for the church was marked by consummate common sense. In carrying out the plans of the session or Presbytery he gave liberally time and money. One rare gift he possessed in marked degree, the ability to lay aside his own opinions and accept the will of the majority. On all questions that came before the session he had decided opinions, and used his almost paramount influence in carrying his point. But when the decision was against him, he gave himself to the work as generously as if he were carrying out his own plans. There never was a hint of opposition, no half-hearted work, no "damning with faint praise." He believed that the majority had the right to shape the policy and form the plans in our church courts, and his own conduct was consistent with this belief.

Mr. Young's most prominent characteristic was, perhaps, his common sense. His judgment was a safe guide. Every subject that came up for discussion became clear and plain when he had spoken. Few men were as wise in counsel as he, and he was always ready to hear and to help any who came to him. The writer feels himself under life-long obligations for sympathy, counsel, help of every kind.

The strongest test, perhaps, of a man is his attitude toward those who have offended or injured him. In this respect Mr. Young was, in my judgment, an example for all the world. If he remembered injustice, insult, injury, he gave no signs in his outward life that he remembered. I do not believe that he ever remembered aught against any man; I believe that he freely and fully forgave all injustice and injury. There is, certainly, no nobler gift than this. For it has been written of old time, "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors."

Mr. Young was prominently a Calvinist. Nothing ever seemed to excite or move him unduly. No matter what came to him he seemed able to accept it with more than resignation—even with perfect acquiescence. In the midst of perplexity, grief, or trial of any kind, he seemed always calm and serene. And he was an original thinker, as Calvinists are apt to be. Once we were looking over a long stretch of pine land that had been stripped by the wind. The scene was desolate indeed. Far as eye could reach there was only a mass of fallen timber, with here and there a tree still standing. Of the few left standing many were dead, others barely alive, a very few green and flourishing. As we looked, Mr. Young said, "This is the story of human life. Think of the timber decaying on the ground there, then think of the years, the sunshine and rain, the winters and summers that made the life of the trees. The storm came, and left only a few standing, and most of those have since died or are dying from the effects of the storm. This forest is man. The daily providence of God, all parents can give, enter into the child's life and make the man. Then come the storms of life. Most fall at once. Many who are left never recover the first shock; only a few are left to grow on."

This incident—told as nearly as possible in his own words—reveals in a large measure, the man.

But no words of mine can really characterize Mr. Young. In his going away the church at Lake City, the whole Church, the community, sustained a great loss. Lake City would seem a very different place now that Mr. Young is no longer there. He is not going to be forgotten; he was not the sort of man who can be forgotten. The impress of his life is too deep to be soon or easily lost. "These all died in the faith." Shall we who remain, grieve that they have always received the morning star?

"Friends and brothers earlier landing,
Comrades 'round the throne now standing,
We salute you, and we come."

Resolutions adopted by the Ladies' Missionary Society of Lumber Bridge Presbyterian Church, Feb. 18, 1903.
Whereas, God in his all wise Providence has removed from us our loved and faithful member of our society, Mrs. Martha Buie, therefore be it Resolved, First That while we bow humbly to the will of God we recognize that we have sustained a great loss in her death.

Resolved, Second, That we now express our sincere appreciation of her faithful and devoted service as a member of our society.

Resolved, Third, That we commend to all our members her example of devotion to duty, of her promptness and of thorough consecration to the Master's service.

Resolved, Fourth, That we express to her bereaved daughter and kindred our deep sympathy in their great sorrow.

Mrs. M. B. McDonald,
Miss Janie Malloy.

Com.

Whereas, God, in his all-wise and all-powerful Providence, hath seen fit to call to her everlasting home Mrs. W. T. Walker, our beloved companion and fellow-worker; we, the members of the Ladies' Missionary Society of Ashpole church, trusting in the mercy of Him who doeth all things well, do offer the following resolutions as a small yet loving tribute to her memory:

Resolved, First, That in her death our society has lost an earnest and useful member, our church a loyal and consecrated Christian, our community a true and noble woman.

Second, That we extend our deep and heart-felt sympathy to the bereaved family in this dark hour, and pray that the God who so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son will reveal the father's loving hand in this affliction and will comfort the heart of him, our pastor, who so often has brought peace and solace to the breaking hearts of others.

Third, That these resolutions be read before our society and that a page in our minute book be devoted to them.

Fourth, That a copy of them be sent to the bereaved family as a slight yet sincere evidence of our sympathy with them in this our common sorrow, and copies be sent to the "Presbyterian Standard" and "Christian Observer" for publication.

Mrs. Ida McQueen,
Mrs. Alexander Alford,
Mrs. D. Sinclair.

Committee.

We the members of the Woman's Foreign Missionary and Ladies Benevolent Societies of Sugar Creek Church do hereby desire to express and place on record our real and heart-felt sorrow at the loss of our dear and much esteemed friend, Mrs. J. M. Davis.

She was a woman of strong personal attraction, she possessed a diversity of gifts, which made her at home under all circumstances, she was respected and admired by a large circle of friends, and her executive ability made her always an acceptable President of either Society, a position which she filled to her own credit, and God's glory, over and over again.

Snatched, as it were, in the very prime of life, in the midst of her field of labor, sickle in hand, busily binding the sheaves at her side, she was ready when the summons came. We bow in contrite submission to the Master who doeth all things well, we know she has simply been promoted to a higher field, and made perfect in the likeness of Him she served here below, and our grief is not for her, but those of us that are left behind.

Therefore be it resolved, That we will never let her memory die, that we will consecrate ourselves anew this day to the service of our Lord, that we will strive diligently and faithfully, by the cultivation of patience, generosity, and good will to each other to close up shoulder to shoulder and fill the space made vacant by her loss.

That we will study God's word as our Lamp and Guide, that daily we will remember each other at a throne of Grace, and strive to realize in ourselves a combination of the good qualities required of the soldiers of the Cross, so that we too, maybe well prepared to meet our Lord when he comes.

Mrs. R. B. Trotter,
Mrs. Chas. H. Caldwell.

A Woman's Prayer.

Not mine to sing life's greatest songs, but,
Father, may I be
In good attune if thy dear hand should wake by minstrelsy
To little songs of common things, which wise hearts know are best,
To lullabies of babyhood, or love songs of the nest.
Just as a child who knows not how to form her letter yet Looks up from her long striving, perchance with eyes grown wet,
And lets the teacher hold her hand to write where she could not—
So, Father, dear, I look to thee: define and shape my lot.
—Alice Cary, in Good Housekeeping.

In one of his sermons, the Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage gives the following:
"A beautiful German story relates how one day a little girl named Jeanette witnessed a great army review. Thousands upon thousands of spectators crowded round the stand, before which the Emperor was to watch the passing regiments. While Jeanette was seated in the stand, she saw an old feeble woman try very hard to get where she could see. The little German girl said to herself, 'It is not right for me to sit here, when I am strong and well and can stand, while that poor, feeble old woman can see nothing. I ought to honor old age, as I want some one to honor me when I am old.' When she gave up her seat to the old woman, and went and stood in the crowd. But while Jeanette was standing upon her tiptoes, trying in vain to see, a courier of the Emperor, covered with gold lace, elbowed his way to her side, as he said, 'Little girl, her majesty would be pleased to see you in the royal box.' When the abashed child stood before the empress, she graciously said, 'Come here, my daughter, and sit with me. I saw you give up your seat to that old woman, and now you must remain by my side.' So God honors those who honor his servants. God especially honors those who honor the aged and seemingly helpless disciples, whose earthly pilgrimages are nearly ended."—Selected.

"Well," she said, "I knew it was a trifle out of fashion, but I never thought a country cow would notice it."

After the Rain.

We'll sing a song, my darling,
For the sun is shining bright;
And the once sad earth is laughing
In the joy-inspiring light.

The birds will sing the chorons
With many chirps and trills,
'Till, clouds and rains forgotten,
The heart of nature thrills.

The wind will play his bag pipe;
And the leaves upon the ground
Will dance a merry Highland fling.
And turn them 'round and 'round.

The music of our song, Dear,
Will be our laughter gay;
The words our merry hearts, Dear,
Will teach us what to say.

The Story of Savonarola.

By James H. Allen.

Jerome Savonarola, the celebrated preacher and reformer, was born of poor parentage at Ferrara in 1452. At twenty-two years of age he withdrew from secular affairs, and entered the Dominican Order at Bologna. Having completed his studies, he first appeared as a preacher at the age of thirty in the city of Florence. He continued his preaching going from place to place. While in the evangelistic work he wrote very tender letters home to his poor mother. It, no doubt, caused her heart to rejoice to hear from her absent son. The following is a sample of how he wrote: "Do not be troubled about me; I wish I could comfort you more. I have voluntarily given myself to be a slave (servant) for the love of Jesus, who for love to me made Himself man, and became a slave (servant) to set me free. For the love of Him I am labouring in His vineyard in diverse cities: and that not solely for the salvation of my own soul, but for the souls of others. He has given me a talent, and I must use it as best pleases Him." How such letters must have cheered her loving heart; how she must have wept for joy over having a son who was so honouring his Redeemer.

It must be remembered that Savonarola lived in an Age of dense darkness. Heathenism prevailed; the Pope and cardinals being its leaders. A reform in the Church had long been admitted a necessity.

Jerome was invited back to Florence in 1489. His second appearance at Florence was a complete success. He poured forth terrible denunciations upon the clergy concerning their sins and vices, declaring that God would not much longer endure such outrages. His preaching took effect. Men who came to take notes of his sermons for the press dropped their pens and wept. Women went home to dress in more plain attire. Enemies became friends.

A Dominican who wrote concerning his life declared him to be a moral, political and religious reformer, whose love of liberty brought upon him persecutation and the crown of martyrdom. Another Roman priest writes thus: "The development of a drama, the most important, the most touching, the most sorrowful that is to be found in the history of Italy for many centuries." He has been denominated

THE "JUTHER OF ITALY."

Blackburn says: "This man, so honest, independent, pure in life, eloquent in speech, gifted with an insight which led to prophetic utterances. Once written down as a fanatic, is now proved to have been a philosopher."

One of the best deeds for which Savonarola is to be remembered is the special attention he paid to children. As Blackburn says: "We may disapprove the mode, but the fact is an example." He organized the young people into bands and termed them "Children of Jesus Christ." He was successful in bringing out their latent, talent and energy. He had them shun all bad company, vile songsters, wicked books, dances, circuses, etc. They must be punctual in attending religious services. On certain days he would have them march through the streets in perfect order, chanting hymns and litanies.

Through the children and young people he reached the parents. Women came in the procession to the public square and flung their costliest ornaments in a pile as so much discarded worldiness. At another time the lewd monks, the amatory poets, and grave scholars, brought their bad books and licentious poems, along with copies of the viler classics, and made a great bonfire in front of the cathedral. This shows the influence children and young people can have when living for Jesus.

Savonarola sways the multitudes. In terrible power he scathes the clergy, not excepting the Pope, who was none else than the infamous Borgia (Alexander VI.), who, as Blackburn says, "is able in talents, shrewd in policy, and devoid of honesty, shame, truth, honour, faith, morality; for we may as well say that this blackest of Popes is ruled by a courtisan, the mother of his five children, one of whom is Caesar, the cardinal, and another is Lucretia, reputed as the most monstrous of women in crime."

A Dominican monk from Rome came to visit Savonarola. He spent three days in earnest discussion and ends up with, "Come, now, cease from these assaults on the clergy and these predictions of woes; be quiet; and then, I am authorized to say, his holiness will offer you the red hat of a cardinal." Did Savonarola need any time to meditate before replying? No, he immediately replies: "God forbid that I should be unfaithful to

THE EMBASSY OF MY LORD.

But—be at sermon tomorrow and you shall hear." The Pope's agent was there. So was Savonarola. He did not spare the clergy; not even the Pope. Then concerning the bribe offered he wound up with: "Red hat? I wish for no other red hat than that of martyrdom reddened with my own blood."

In 1495 he was cited to Rome to answer to a charge of heresy, and on his failure to appear he was forbidden to preach. Savonarola laughed at this.

Two years later he received sentence of excommunication. This he declared came from the devil and was null.

The next year he was brought to trial for misleading the people by false prophecies. He denied the charge, but like Huss he did not have a fair trial, and was declared guilty.

At the execution, when the bishop was saying, "I separate thee from the Church militant and triumphant," our martyr hero firmly replied, "Militant, but not triumphant; that of yours is not."

On the 23rd May, 1498, this extraordinary man, with his two companions, F. Domenico de Pescia and Silvestro Maruffi, were executed (hanged) and their bodies burned by the executioner. His last words were: "The Lord has suffered as much for me.

His ashes were thrown into the river Arno, but the life he lived and the truths he taught are still extant and "he being dead yet speaketh."—The Witness.

Baby's Mission.

So still in its cot, lies the baby to-day,
Hushed is its voice, and its toys put away;
Its dear little hands on its bosom crossed,
And our hearts are sore for the baby we've lost.

We prayed in our anguish the dear life to spare,
Though our prayer is unanswered, we know that He cares,
And safe in his arms, its mission fulfilled
Our dear one is sleeping, because He has willed.

Ah! little we thought of His kindness and care,
By the pleasures of earth so easily ensnared;
We see it all now in the darkness and gloom,
On our knees, by the cot in the darkened room.

It is thus that He teaches to trust all to Him,
By taking our dear ones, our hearts He would win,
He knows we will follow where baby has led;
To the Saviour, who oft for our love has pled.

Our dear one has lived and died not in vain,
Its work on earth done, what need to remain?
Though short was its life, its mission
how great,
And safe home in Heaven our coming will wait.

Says Ruskin: "What fairy palaces we may build of beautiful thoughts, proof against all adversity, bright fancies, satisfied memories, noble histories, faithful sayings; treasurehouses of precious and restful thoughts, which care cannot disturb nor pain make gloomy, nor poverty take away from us—houses built without hands, for our souls to live in!"

To Make an Aeolian Harp.

This instrument can be made by almost any ingenious boy. It consists of a long, narrow box of very thin wood, about five or six inches deep, with a circle in the middle of the upper side an inch and a half in diameter, in which are to be drilled small holes. In this side seven, ten or more strings, of very fine gut, are stretched over bridges at each end, like the bridges of a fiddle, and screwed up or relaxed with screw pins.

The strings should all be tuned to the same note, and the instrument be placed in some current of air, where the wind can pass over its strings with freedom. A window, the width of which is equal to the length of the harp, with the sash just raised to give the air admission, is a proper situation. When the air blows upon the strings of the harp, with different degrees of force, it will excite different degrees of sound: sometimes the blast brings out all the tones in full concert, and sometimes it sinks to the softest murmurs.

Mother's Hymns.

Hushed are those lips, their earthly song is ended;
The singer sleeps at last;
While I sit gazing at her arm-chair vacant,
And think of days long past.

The room still echoes with the old-time music.
As, singing soft and low
Those grand, sweet hymns, the Christian's consolation,
She rocks her to and fro.

Some that can stir the heart like shouts of triumph
Or loud-toned trumpet's call,
Bidding the people prostrate fall before Him,
"And crown Him—Lord of all."

The tender notes, filled with melodious rapture,
That leaned upon His word,
Rose in those strains of solemn, deep affection,
"I love Thy kingdom, Lord."

Safe hidden in the wondrous "Rock of Ages,"
She bade farewell to fear;
Sure that her Lord would always gently lead her.
She read her title clear.

Joyful she saw "from Greenland's icy mountains"
The Gospel flag unfurled;
And knew by faith "the morning light was breaking"
Over a sinful world.

"There is a fountain," how the tones triumphant
Rose in victorious strains,
Filled with that precious blood for all the ransomed,
"Drawn from Immanuel's veins."

Dear saint, in heavenly mansions long since folded,
Safe in God's fostering love,
She joins with rapture in the blissful chorus
Of those bright choirs above.

There, where no tears are known, no pain nor sorrow,
Safe beyond Jordan's roll,
She lives forever with her blessed Jesus,
The lover of her soul.

The earth is flecked wi' flowers, monytinted, fresh, and gay,

The birdies warble blithely, for my Father made them sae;

But these sights an' these soun's will as naething be to me,

When I hear the angels singing in my

I've his gude word of promise that some

"No man ever lived a right life who had not been chastened by a woman's love, strengthened by her courage, and guided by her discretion."—John Ruskin.

When Spurgeon on one occasion was seriously ill he grew extremely impatient to get back to the pulpit, saying, among other things: "If I ever preach again, I will leave out every bit of flourish and preach nothing but present and pressing truth, hurl it at the people with all my might, live at high pressure, and direct all my energies to the salvation of souls."

BEST EVIDENCE

The best evidence of the acceptability of any brand of an article of common use is the quantity sold. "GOOD LUCK" Baking Powder has, from the start, steadily increased in favor with the House-keepers until it now supplies largely more than half of the entire amount of Baking Powder consumed in the entire South. "GOOD LUCK" is frequently sold in train-load lots, the last of which consisted of One Hundred and Sixty-nine Solid car-loads.

Our Young People.

To James Whitcomb Riley, Gardner.

Yours is a garden of old-fashioned flowers;

Joyous children delight to play there;
Weary men find rest in its bowers,
Watching the lingering light of day there.

Old-time tunes and young love's laughter
Ripple and run among the roses;
Memory's echoes come murmuring after,
Fading the dusk when the long day closes.

Simple songs with a cadence olden—
These you learned in the forest of Arden:

Friendly flowers with hearts all golden—
These you borrowed from Eden's garden.

This the reason why all men love you,
Remember your songs and forget your art:

Other poets may soar above you
You keep close to the human heart.
—By Henry Van Dyke, in the February Scribner's.

Coffee-Pail Ezra.

From Southern Churchman.

"No, I can't go," and Ezra looked reproachfully at a pail of hot coffee which he had set down close by, under the shadow of the big ore bin.

"Oh, bother!" said Jack Evarts, "your uncle doesn't need that stuff. He's well now—been well this two weeks."

"I know, but Grandma Hillis thinks he needs it."

"Well, he doesn't. You know, half time he doesn't touch it."

"And sometimes he scolds you if you get in the road of his pick," put in Herbert James.

"Yes," and Ezra stroked the long ears of Nancy, the burro, meditatively. "But, then, you see, he might want it to-day, and it wouldn't be there. And, besides, grandma depends on me to take it down to him."

Still he looked at the coffee pail with no friendly eye. If he had had a mother, or even a Sabbath-school teacher, he would have learned long before that duty is duty and must be done, however hard it seems, but he had no one except a feeble old grandmother and a big, busy uncle, who worked so down in the mine. At precisely 10 o'clock every day the boy was sent to him with hot coffee, and the task had grown very wearisome to him. At the first, when Uncle Tom was so weak, and the coffee seemed to do him so much good, Ezra was glad to take it. But, for two weeks past, Uncle Tom himself had protested against it, and Ezra felt that he was making a goose of himself in the eyes of everybody, except grandma. She could not be made to see that Tom no longer needed it.

"No, I can't go," said Ezra again, taking up his pail and turning toward the engine house."

"It's all nonsense, I tell you," said Jack; "grandma'll never know if you don't tell her, and your uncle doesn't want it."

"I know," answered Ezra, resolutely,

"but it is my business. Grandma depends on me," and then he began climbing the hill as fast as he could go, which, although he did spill some of the coffee, was the very best thing he could do, for he was the sooner out of temptation. It is no wonder that when Jack and Herbert proposed an expedition out in the sage brush after cotton-tails, Ezra looked at his coffee pail in deep disgust. Every day since Uncle Tom had the fever, grandma had sent the boy with coffee for him.

At the top of the shaft he gave one rueful look at the two boys and the burro out in the shimmering sunny valley, and then climbed into the car, nodded to the engineer, and slid down into the dark, close mine. The engineer knew his errand, but he had to scramble out as fast as he could to let the car go on to the seventh, from which ore was being hoisted. At the fifth level, that day, the air seemed unusually close.

"I s'pose it's because I wanted to go after cotton-tails so much that it seems uncommonly hot and nasty down here to-day," thought Ezra. He lighted his candle and plodded his way along the low-walled drift. He was in the "old works," long ago stopped out, at the far end of which the company had a gang of men making a vertical shaft, or "up-raise," as it is called, to the level above. At irregular intervals, cross cuts came in from the darkness at either side, leading sometimes only a few feet, and sometimes from some distant ore chamber. Ezra was eleven years old, but to pass the black mouth of an unused cross cut was still an ordeal to him. Something about its thick silence and darkness and its unknown depth awed and troubled him. He had walked some little distance, trying to keep up his spirits with whistling, when he suddenly halted. His breath was coming quick and short, and he began to realize that he was breathing smoke. Where did it come from? Lifting his candle, he peered about carefully. He could see no sign of fire, but the drift was gray with smoke—a heavy, curling mass that was coming toward him in sultry silence.

His first thought was to run for the shaft. But no—where were Uncle Tom and the other men. If the fire was in one of the cross cuts, the smoke would seek the open shaft, as it would a chimney, and the men would have no warning until the whole drift was ablaze and it would be too late. He must find where it was, and he must reach them if they did not already know. He hurried on, but his light grew dim in the smoke, and his feet stumbled over the uneven floor. His breath was growing painful, and his eyes smarted unbearably. He remembered instinctively having read somewhere that one must not breathe smoke, and he stopped and looked back toward the shaft. He could see the faint twinkle of the light that hung over the car track, and he held out his hand toward it as toward a friend. But he knew that his way led in the other direction. He must find the men. He stumbled on, groping with his eyes shut, every breath a stab of pain and his mind holding but one thought—to reach the others before

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

it was too late. Once he fell headlong, but it was a fortunate fall, for the lid of his coffee pail flew off, and half the contents were dashed in his face. Quickly righting the pail, he dipped his handkerchief in the remaining coffee—one of the big red cotton handkerchiefs of the mining camps—and tied it over his head and face. He could have cried from the feeling of relief that it gave, and the way grew easier until the heat dried the handkerchief and forced him to take it off. Then he groped and stumbled and fell, and picked himself up, and ran on and fell again, and then on once more. His strength was giving out, and the curling, lead-colored mass wrapped about him closer and thicker. It was the battle of a child against a relentless, unreasoning foe, and it was bravely fought. But he could not fight always. His foot caught beneath a loose board, and he fell at full length. Vaguely he felt that the struggle was over, and he was glad he had done his best. He gave a little gasp—and then sat up and looked around him in surprise. The air was clearer, and he could breathe. There was smoke, certainly, but still he could see and breathe. Where was he? How did it happen? And then he saw what made him more anxious still for the men in the upraise. His fall had carried him just past the mount of a deep cross cut, from which the smoke was pouring in thick, leaden masses toward the shaft. He could hear the dull crackling of the burning timbers, and he knew that the time was short. He stood up and tried to run, but his mind was in a whirl, and his legs tottered beneath him. Still he would not give up. The worst was past, and as his head grew clearer in the better air, his strength began to come back also.

In less than five minutes the men in the upraise were standing about him, and he was telling them as quickly as he could of their danger, and of their one chance of escape.

"We must make a dash for it," said Tom Hillis, who was always the leader. The men nodded, threw down their picks and shovels, and marched grimly out into the drift to meet the foe. How Ezra got through the second time he never knew. He remembered being dragged along by hard, kind hands, and, at the last, being lifted on a pair of strong shoulders and carried "pick-a-back" like a baby, but when he opened his eyes he was in the hoisting room, and the superintendent of the mine was there, too, looking very grave and anxious.

"Will he live?" he was asking of the doctor, who was stirring something in a glass.

"Oh, yes. He'll not die yet. He's a plucky little chap. He will be all right in a little while."

"It is strange how things happen," the superintendent went on. "It is certainly strange. If this boy had not been going about his plain, everyday business this morning, these men would have been smothered, and the whole mine would have been in such a blaze that we couldn't have stopped it."

When Jack and Herbert came home that night with four cotton-tails they were very much surprised to find that

Another Appreciation of the Aetna.

LUMBERTON, N. C., November 26, 1902.

J. D. BUSHALL, ESQ., Manager Aetna Life Insurance Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir:—After a careful comparison of policies submitted to me by the Aetna Life, Bankers' Life of New York, Equitable of New York, Northwestern, New York Life and Prudential, I have accepted $10,000 in the Aetna on the 20-payment life plan, with option of 25 year 3 per cent. Gold Bond Contract.

I have been a policy-holder in the Aetna for nearly eight years, and therefore feel somewhat prepared to judge of its merits from actual results. With all due deference to other companies, it affords me great pleasure to say that in my opinion the Aetna cannot be surpassed for plain and liberal contracts, and for just, conservative and economical management. I now have $12,000 in the Aetna. My partner, Mr. W. W. Carlyle, has $16,000 and one of our clerks, Mr. John T. Biggs, has $2,000, nearly all of which was written and delivered by your special agent, Mr. H. T. Spears.

Wishing you and the grand old Aetna continued success, I am,

Yours very truly,

"Coffee-pail Ezra" had become a hero in the camp, and was to be taken into the superintendent's family to go to school with his own boys.

"It's mighty queer how lucky some folks are," said Jack.

"Tain't so queer," answered Herbert, "when you consider how plucky some folks are."

"Humph I guess anybody would have warned those men!"

"Maybe they would, and then maybe they wouldn't. But what I am thinking is that there isn't more than one boy in the camp that would have been down there with that coffee pail when the other boys were going out hunting. That's where the pluck comes in, I'm thinking."

The Bell.

Hans Christian Andersen.

People said, "The evening bell is sounding, the sun is setting."

A strange and wondrous tone was heard in the narrow streets of a large town. It was like the sound of a church bell, but it was only heard for a moment; the rolling of the carriages and the voices of the multitude made too great a noise.

The people who were walking outside of the town where there were gardens and fields could see the evening sky better, and to them the sound of the bell was more distinct.

As the days went by and at evening the bell might still be heard, people grew eager to find the place where it was hung. The king of the country vowed that he who discovered whence the sounds proceeded should have the title of "Universal Bell-ringer," even if it were not really a bell.

Many persons now went to the wood for the sake of getting the place. The rich people drove out and the poor walked, but either way the road seemed long; and when they came to a clump of willows which grew on the skirts of the forest, they sat down and looked up into the branches and fancied they were now in the depths of the wood. The confectioner of the town came out and set up a booth there, and all the people refreshed themselves with his good things. They said, when they had returned home, that it had been very romantic and not at all like a picnic. One wrote a poem about the bell from the experience. Only a single person returned with any sort of an explanation, however. Not that he had gone further than the others, but he had a theory which sounded so reasonable no one could contradict it.

He said that the sound proceeded from a hollow tree in which an owl roosted. A sort of learned owl, he surmised it to be, that continually knocked its head against the branches. But whether the sound from the owl or the hollow tree he could not say exactly.

Of course he got the place of "Universal Bell-ringer," and every year he wrote a short treatise, "On the Owl," which made people as wise as they were before!

It was the day of confirmation. The clergyman had spoken so touchingly that the children who were confirmed were greatly moved; it was an eventful day for them: from children they became all at once grown-up persons. As they went forth from the service the sound of the deep, sweet bell was borne towards them from the wood with wonderful distinctness. They all felt a wish to go thither; all except three.

One of these three had to go home to try on a ball-dress; the engagement was so very important that if the confirmation service had not been over when it was she would have had to put off being confirmed at all that year. The other was a poor boy who had borrowed his coat and boots from the innkeeper's son and had promised to return them by a certain hour; the third had been forbidden to go to strange places without his parents. He said that he had always been a good boy hitherto, and would still be so now that he was confirmed, and that he ought not to be laughed at for being obedient. The others, however, did make fun of him after all.

There were three, therefore, that did not go; the others hastened on. The sun shone and the birds sang and the children sang, too, and held each other's hands, for as yet they had none of them any high office in the world and they supposed that they were of equal rank in the eye of God.

But two of the youngest grew tired and returned to town. Then two little girls sat down and twined garlands, so they did not go either. When the rest reached the confectioner's under the willow tree, they said: "Now we are there!"

At that moment the bell sounded deep in the wood so clear and solemnly that five or six determined to penetrate further.

The wood was very thick and the foliage and undergrowth were so dense that the way was fatiguing. After much struggling through beautiful hemmed-in places the children came at last to a little house, made of branches and the bark of trees. A large wild apple-tree showered its blossoms down upon the roof and roses bloomed everywhere. The long stems twined round the gable even, upon which there hung a small bell.

Was that the bell which had sounded so deep and sweet? Yes, everybody was unanimous on the subject except one, who said that the bell was too small and tinkling to give forth such deep and moving tones. It was a King's son who spoke, whereon the others said, "Such people always want to be wiser than any one else."

They let him go on alone; and as he went his breast was filled more and more with the forest solitude. A rustling was heard in the bushes and a little boy stood before the King's son. It was the boy who had gone home to return his coat and boots to the innkeeper's son. He was now in wooden shoes and an old jacket much too short in the arms; the two boys knew each other at once.

"Why, now we can go together," said the King's son. But the poor boy in the wooden shoes felt ashamed and pulled at the short sleeves of his jacket. "I am afraid I cannot walk so fast," he answered. Besides, he thought the bell sounded from the right and the King's son felt sure it was on the left; so they parted.

The King's son pursued his way through sunlight and shadow. Most of the time the wood was beautiful and gay with flowers. Sometimes, however, there were difficulties and he got some scratches. Not so many, to be sure, as the poor boy, who had plunged into the thickest and thorniest part of the forest.

At last the sun was setting and it was still in the woods—so very still. The King's son fell upon his knees and said, "I cannot find what I seek; night is coming on, dark night. Yet oh! that I might be able once more to see the sun!"

Then he rose and, seizing hold of some swinging vines, he pulled himself above the low ground where evening had found him and gazed the summit of a hill. How magnificent was the sight! The sea—the great, glorious sea was stretched before him, and yonder, where sky and water met, was the sun—a golden, glowing altar! The great trees around him were like pillars of a mighty roof; the flowers and moss at his feet were the velvet carpeting of the church; heaven itself was the dome. It was a vast sanctuary in which he stood, in which the wind and waves and birds sang the chaut to the Almighty. Then the King's son spread his arms wide and thanked God that he had come to the end of his quest. There by the path to the right was the poor boy in his wooden shoes and jacket! He had followed his own heart while he listened to the bell and it had brought him thither. The two ran together and stood hand in hand in the vast temple. Over them sounded the invisible bell and round them swelled the mighty hallelujah which all nature sings to the Creator, and all was peace.

Now, if you would know the meaning of this story you must seek diligently, but that is not enough; only he who loves the truth may understand. But if you would enter that great temple to which the prince and the poor man's child journeyed long ago, I can only tell you this for your guidance: Though all may hear the melody of the great bell, only those who have pure hearts may stand within the portals of the Secret Place of the Most High.

Can You Tell?

Uncle Harry came into the nursery, where his four nieces and nephews were playing and held up a big, round, rosy, red apple.

"Children he said, 'I am going to give this apple to which ever one of you can answer a question that I shall ask about it. Stand in front of me in a row and listen.'"

So Fred and Josie and Dick and Totty came and stood in a row with their eyes fixed on the beautiful apple.

"What is in this apple?" asked Uncle Harry.

"A core," said Fred, "that's easy."

"Yes, my boy; but what is in the core?"

"Seeds," said Dick.

"Certainly; that's right. But those are, neither one of them, the test question. Here it is: There are several seeds in this apple. Now which way are they pointing, upward or downward, in toward the core or out toward the skin? Who can answer?" The children looked puzzled. They had seen the core of an apple hundreds of times, but they couldn't seem to remember the position of the seeds.

However, as there were four directions to guess, Fred proposed that each guess one and then, as one of them must be right, whoever won the apple was to give a quarter of it to the other three. They agreed to this and Fred guessed that the seeds pointed down. Then Josie guessed that they pointed up. Dick said he guessed that they all pointed inward toward the core; and as there was only one left, of course Totty guessed that they pointed outward.

"You are right," said Uncle Harry, handing the apple to the one who guessed correctly; "and I am glad you are going to share it with the others. But I must say you are a stupid lot of children; for if you had known which way the seeds pointed and had all told me correctly, I would have given you each an apple. As it is, I shall keep the other three myself."—Carolyn Wells.

Answered.

I thought to find some healing clime
For her I loved; she found that shore,
That city, whose inhabitants
Are sick and sorrowful no more.

I asked for human love for her;
The Loving knew how best to still
The infinite yearning of a heart
Which but infinity could fill.

Such sweet communion had been ours,
I prayed that it might never end,
My prayer is more than answered; now
I have an angel for my friend.

I wished for perfect peace to soothe
The troubled anguish of her breast;
And, numbered with the loved and called,
She entered on untroubled rest.

Life was so fair a thing to her,
I wept and pleaded for its stay;
My wish was granted me, for, lo!
She hath eternal life today.

—Phoebe Cary.

Lewis Carroll, the mathematician and author of "Alice in Wonderland," once said: "Once realize what the true object is in life—that it is not pleasure, not knowledge, not even fame itself, that last infirmity of noble minds, but that it is the development of character, the rising to a higher, nobler, purer standard, the building up of the perfect man—and then so long as this is going on and it will, we trust, go on forevermore, death has for us no terror: it is not a shadow, but a light; not an end, but a beginning."

God grant that you may so conquer your temptations by the power of God that they may not leave you as you were, but fill you with the consciousness of yourself and with deep sympathy with your brothers.—Phillips Brooks.

Our Little Folks.

CONDUCTED BY MRS. A. J. MCKELWAY.

Children's Letters.

Buie, N. C., Feb. 26, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I thought I would write to-night. I am going to school. I have a little dog; his name is Zip. I have one brother; his name is Earl. I have 3 cats. I have a goat. My Uncle Hector J. McMillian takes your valuable paper. I like to read the Little Folks' letters very much. I have nothing more to tell. Hoping to see my letter in print.

Brown Brothers.

Hope Mills, N. C., Feb. 17, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl eight years old. I have two brothers. Their names are Henry and David. Henry is 5 years old to-day. He will have his birthday tomorrow, Saturday. I am going to school to Mrs. McDonald. I am sorry to say my school will close this week. We have a nice Sunday-school at our church. Mr. Munroe is our preacher now. I have told you some thing about school but I will tell you more. Every Monday morning I drive four miles. My papa is a depot agent. I don't know what to say so I will close now.

How the Swallow was Caught.

It was a warm evening near the close of summer when papa and Fred went for a stroll in the meadow, to watch Rover, grandpapa's shepherd-dog, drive the cows up the long lane from the pasture to be milked. The weather had been dry and fine for several days, and all the tiny insects that are found in such numbers in the country were flying near the ground, where the air was warmest. The air seemed to be thick with them.

Circling in and out after the flies, bugs, and midges were hundreds of swallows, whose nests were fastened in long rows beneath the eaves of grandpapa's barns. Because the insects were down near the ground the swallows flew there, too; for they were out getting their supper. Each pretty bird had its mouth wide open as it swept swiftly about. Every second or two their bills would close with a snap as they seized and swallowed a mosquito or a little unsuspecting gnat, still keeping on the wing.

Papa and Fred forgot Rover and the cows as they watched them. The swallows flew so close that one's wing brushed Fred's ear and another saved himself from flying squarely into papa's face only by making a quick upward turn.

"Once when I was a little boy and lived here in the country," said papa, "I came out into this same meadow just at sundown, and what do you think? I caught a swallow! How do you suppose I did it?"

"I don't know," said Fred, greatly interested. "How?"

"Well," said papa, "the swallows were flying just as they are now, almost bumping against me. So I took off my hat and waited—like—this—and, when one came near—see!—I made a swoop with my hat—so—and—why!" said papa, much astonished, "I've got one now." His face showed more astonishment than Fred's.

Fred danced about in a circle while papa gently thrust his other hand into the hat and took out the poor, trembling little bird.

"Have you hurt him, papa?" asked Fred, his tender heart stirred to sympathy at the prisoner's fright.

"No," said papa, looking half ashamed, "I don't think so; and really, my boy, 'I didn't mean to catch him I was as surprised as he was, I am sure. It only happened once before in all my life. How strange that this one should fly into my hat as I was telling you about the other! Maybe he's the great great-grandson of the first one I caught.'"

He showed Fred the beautiful purple head and shoulders of the little captive, and each stroked him gently with one finger.

Then papa opened his hand. For a second or two the swallow sat perfectly still on the palm, not knowing he was free. Suddenly he seemed to discover that no one was holding him; and with a twitter he darted away and was lost to sight among his countless companions in the air.—Roe L. Hendrick, in The Youth's Companion.

The Queen Story.

"Oh, Auntie, just one more! Won't you?" Auntie had been telling stories to a trio of little folks till she was tired; but still they wanted more. Whether you are an auntie, or whether you are a child, you know how it is yourself.

"Well," said auntie, with a merry twinkle in her eye, "I'll tell you my queen story."

Then auntie began: "There was once a queen who had three beautiful daughters. I will give you their names and you must remember them to tell me when I ask you. The eldest had lovely silken hair that fell in golden curls below her waist. This little princess was named Gloriana on account of her dazzling hair. The second little princess had the most charming eyes that were ever seen; they were like violets, and her name was Violetta. The youngest, who was really the most beautiful of them all, was a cripple, and had never walked. Her great blue eyes, so bright to look at, were of no use to her, for she was stone blind. And because she was thus shut away from pleasure they named her Shut-up. The queen was going on a journey, and she called the three princesses and asked what they would like to have for presents when she returned. Now, being princesses, they had almost everything they could think of, so it was very hard to name anything they wanted. But finally the eldest little princess—what was her name?"

"Gloriana!" replied the children, all together, after a little thought.

"Right. Gloriana said: 'Please bring me a milk white Arabian pony and a saddle with scarlet silk fringe, also golden stirrups.'

"I will, dear," said the queen, writing it all down on her ivory tablets.
 "Then the second daughter spoke—do you remember what her name was?"
 "Violetta," answered the children.
 "Yes. Violetta said: 'I want a bird of paradise, in a great golden cage, and I want it so very tame that it will eat from my hand.'
 "'You shall have it, my darling,' said the queen. And then drawing her youngest child tenderly to her side—what was her name?"
 "Shnt-up," shonted the children.
 There was a dead silence. The children waited and stared at auntie.
 "Why don't you go on?" they asked.
 "I'm not in the habit of talking to children who tell me to shut up!" said auntie.
 "Oh, we didn't!" they cried; "that was her name! do please go on!"
 "That is all there is to the story," laughed auntie; and the children laughed too.—Mattie M. Baker, in Little Folks.

The Butterfly's Story.

"Once upon a time," began the butterfly, impressively, "I was an egg. My butterfly mother placed about three dozen of us on the under side of a milk-weed leaf. I was at that period of my career a trifle smaller than the head of a pin. A few days later I burst—"
 "Oh, dear!" cried Geraldine, sympathetically.
 "It didn't hurt," said the butterfly; "I was only an egg, remember. And, as I have already observed, I burst my tiny shell and—guess what came out of that shell?"
 "Why, you did," ventured Peter, politely.
 "Yes—I came out, but, bless your hearts, you little indoor children would never have known me. I had no wings. But I had a body, and sixteen legs, and a splendid appetite. I was, in fact, a caterpillar—very small, it is true, but still a caterpillar."
 "You a caterpillar?" exclaimed Geraldine, excitedly.
 "Certainly," replied the butterfly, calmly closing his brilliant wings over his back and indolently uncoiling a long, thin tongue. "All butterflies come from caterpillars; didn't you know it?"
 "No," said Geraldine.
 "Didn't know it?" repeated the butterfly in astonishment; "what do you study in school?"
 "Books," said Geraldine, faintly, "but they're not about you; they're about men."
 "Poor trash! Poor trash!" said the butterfly; "I had six legs; when I was a caterpillar I had sixteen; when I was an egg I had none."
 "Goodness, how I did eat when I first became a caterpillar! I ate and ate until I burst—"
 "Oh, dear!" cried Geraldine, sympathetically.
 "It didn't hurt, child," said the butterfly. "I had eaten too much and my skin became too tight. So I went off by myself and stood on the outside of a leaf for a few hours, and then I quietly burst my old skin and came out in a beautiful brand new skin. I did it four times in three months. My! What a pretty skin I had; green, with yellow and black stripes. And all day long I ate and ate."

 "What?" ventured Peter.
 "Milk-weed, always milk-weed," replied the butterfly. "I had a pair of jaws which worked sideways, like scissors, and I fed on the edge of the leaf, eating it down to the tough old mid-rib."
 Then the process of transformation from caterpillar to chrysalis, while the incipient butterfly is hanging by its two hind-feet to a fence, is described:
 "Yes, I was a trifle dizzy," admitted the butterfly, "but I had no idea of letting go. Beautiful dreams came to me. I dreamed first that I was eating milk-weed; then I dreamed I had wings and was floating far up among the clouds with the birds; and then—and then—"
 "What happened?" exclaimed Peter, much interested.
 "I burst," said the butterfly, calmly.
 "Oh dear! Oh, dear!" cried Geraldine, rocking to and fro.
 "It didn't hurt," said the butterfly; "it never hurt me to burst. So I burst open; and out through the skin of my back came a beautiful jewel, about the size of a sparrow's egg, but a little different in shape, and of an exquisite pale, translucent green color, all spotted with gilt.
 "I was a chrysalis."
 "A chrysalis?" repeated the children; "what is a chrysalis?"
 "Different kinds of butterflies have different chrysalides," said the butterfly; "mine was a smooth, little pear-shaped thing, without eyes or legs or mouth. There I swung from the small spot of silk. I wriggled a little to cast off the thin, dry, transparent skin of the caterpillar which clung to me; but when I was freed from it I remained motionless, like a tiny lacquered mummy inlaid with gold. Good gracious, how beautiful I was!"
 "If you had no mouth how could you breathe?" asked Peter.
 "I breathed through little holes in my sides—holes about as big as the point of a pin. I breathed the same way when I was a caterpillar, and I breathe that way now. It is a very good way to breathe," said the butterfly, impatiently; "do you know a better way?"
 Peter said nothing.
 "I breathe through my nose," ventured Geraldine, timidly; "mother wants me to."
 "I don't object," said the butterfly, "there are hundreds of ways to breathe. I knew a grasshopper who breathed through his hind legs."
 Peter said nothing; Geraldine looked down at her legs thoughtfully; the butterfly resumed his memoirs.—From "Out-doorland."

Missionary Children in Japan.

I mean the children of our own missionaries. We have twenty-seven missionaries in Japan, and I found in their homes just twenty-seven children! And charming children they are—I shall not soon forget them. The first of this merry band of little people that I met were the Fulton boys of Tokyo—Sam, Darby and Kenneth—fine boys, all. I wish you could have heard Darby play the violin!

R. M. COFFEY, C. T. A.,
Charlotte, N. C.

One Sunday night while I was in Tokyo he said he kept from going to sleep in church changing by his zabuton. The zabuton (pronounced zah-boo-tone) is a cushion in the church pews; and Darby's idea was that by changing cushions he could keep awake! These dear boys like fun and all innocent sports, and lead happy lives in the green campus of the Meiji Gakuin in the great city of Tokyo.

The next of these missionary children to meet me was ruddy-faced, stalwart little Wentworth Myers, who in his blue overalls was busy from morning till night around his summer home at Kar-u-i-za-a, far up among the mountains of Japan. Just a short distance away was the greatest volcano in Japan, constantly sending up clouds of smoke, and sometimes showers of ashes and cinders over the houses and yards. But this did not frighten this chubby boy, happy at play. The next to meet me I am very sure I can never forget. Our train had stopped at a railway station near the famous mountain of Japan, Fuji. A dear little girl came on board, with merriest eyes, and golden, curly hair. She was one whose picture you have seen in these pages, little Marjorie McAlpine. Soon this dear little girlie was nestling in my arms, and somehow I cannot help loving just a wee bit more than all other children in the Far East this affectionate, winsome child. And yet, when I met her sunny-haired sister, warm-hearted Jean, I almost wondered which of these dear children I loved most! For Jean is also as loving and winsome as can be.

Next I met Cornelia and Edward Hope, and baby Robbie, at Akoga beach, on the seaside. We had pleasant times watching the great billows roll in, and seeing the fishermen drawing in their nets full of fish. Like Marjorie, Cornelia and Edward have also been in The Children's Missionary. In a former letter I told you of Cornelia's birthday.

The last week in August I met at Arima all the rest of our twenty-seven missionary children. Arima is a lovely place up in the mountains, back of Kobe.

It is a long, straggling village, with but one winding street. Mr. McAlpine, Mr. Price and I had walked all the way up the mountain, and it was quite dark when we reached the outskirts of the village. But we saw a lantern coming towards us, and soon heard merry voices. It was a band of these dear missionary children coming to meet me, and welcome me to Arima. They were Evelyn and Marjorie McAlpine, and Sam and Darby Fulton. Sam seized one of my hands and dear, litiesome Evelyn the other (what a charming, athletic girl she is!), and thus with merry chatter they led me as their guest up the long, winding street. Was it not lovely to be thus escorted into this beautiful mountain town? The next afternoon the children gave me a picnic beyond the Ton-son spring, and what fun they had, especially when Evelyn and Sam played "Fug of War."

But my letter would be too long if I were to tell you of all these dear children—of May and Percival Buchanan; of Dan, Elsie and Stewart Kerr Buchanan; of Anna, Estelle and Grace Mc-

A Perfect Laxative is one which is palatable, pleasant to take and can be relied upon to act gently, but thoroughly; cleansing the entire system of all impurities. Such a remedy is Mozley's Lemon Elixir. It is a pleasant lemon tonic, acceptable to the most delicate stomach, and a thoroughly effective laxative, acting upon the bowels, liver, and kidneys, without the slightest unpleasantness.

MOZLEY'S LEMON HOT DROPS are without an equal for coughs, colds, sore throat and bronchitis.

Sold by all druggists.

Little Allyn Randolph is the beautiful baby boy of Mr. and Mrs. Cumming, and it was my happy privilege to baptize him. The McIlwaine boys won my heart by their drawings. I hope they can study drawing under a good teacher; for some day one of them may be a second Benjamin West.

I came away from Japan, feeling happier and younger for having had the companionship of these dear children. May God long spare them and make them useful men and women.

Lullabies from all Lands.

Danish.

Sleep, sleep, little mouse!
The field your father plows;
Your mother feeds the pigs in the sty,
She'll come and siap you when you cry.

Chinese.

Snail, snail, come out and be fed!
Put out your horns and then your head,
And thy mammy will give thee mutton,
For thou art doubly dear to me.

Spanish.

The moon shines bright,
And the snake darts swift and light;
I see five baby bullocks
And a calf young and white.

Arabic.

Sleep my baby, sleep!
Sleep a slumber hale,
Sweetly rest till morning light,
My farmer boy, so bright.

Zulu.

Hush thee, my baby!
Thy mother's over the mountain gone,
There she will dig the little garden patch,
And water she'll fetch from the river.

Norwegian.

Row, row, to Baltnarock,
How many fish are caught in the net?
One for father, and one for mother
One for sister and one for brother.

Swedish.

Hush, hush, baby mine!
Pussy climbs the big green pine;
Mother turns the millstone,
Father to kill the pigs has gone.

German.

Sleep, baby, sleep!
Thy father guards the sheep
Thy mother shakes the dreamland tree,
And from it falls sweet dreams for thee;
Sleep, baby, sleep!

What My Penny Can Do.

My grandma gave me a penny,
So pretty and bright and new,
And she said, "Go and spend it, darling,
Just as you wish to do."

You know it's so strange about grandmas;
They are always so rich and so kind,
They will give you pennies and pennies,
And never seem to mind.

If you ask your mamma for a penny
She will hold up her hands this way,
And say, "My dear! I'm not made of pennies,
You had one yesterday."

But grandma will give you plenty,
And tell you to spend them, too;
And that is what puzzles me just now,
I don't know what to do.

Of things you can buy for a penny
I do not need any at all;
I have got a new hat for my dolly,
Some jacks, and a bouncing ball.

And I have been thinking and thinking,
Since I went to the Mission Band,
Of the poor little heathen children
In that far-away, darkened land.

They never have beautiful playthings,
And when their hearts are sad,
They do not know of the Saviour,
Whose love could make them glad.

And they tell me that one little penny,
To a missionary given,
Would pay for printing the story
That shows them the way to heaven.

So I'll send you, dear bright treasure,
Through our own little Mission Band,
Far out over the water,
Into the heathen land.

And, perhaps in that bright hereafter,
Some little girl will say,
"I learned of the love of Jesus,
Through the penny you gave that day."
—Gospel in all Lands.

A girl cannot too sedulously guard her mother nor too gently bear with her, if the mother has reached a period where she is more easily wearied than formerly and where little things vex her. To some of us there come days when our hearts are heavy because we were not so sweet and loving as we might have been, and God alone can help us when this realization comes too late.

Great and sacred is obedience. He who is not able, in the highest majesty of manhood, to obey with clear and open brow a law higher than himself is barren of all faith and love, and tightens his chains, moreover, in the struggle to be free.—James Martineau.

A writer in the Brooklyn Eagle saw a woman in a street car open a satchel and take out a purse, close the satchel and open the purse, take out a dime and close the purse, open the satchel and put in the purse, close the satchel and lock both ends. Then she gave the dime to the conductor and took a nickle in exchange. Then she opened the satchel and took out the purse, closed the satchel and opened the purse, put in the nickle and closed the purse, opened the satchel and put in the purse, closed the satchel and locked both ends. Then she felt to see if her back hair was all right, and it was all right, and she was all right, and just as sweet! That was a woman.

"Johnny, get up! Aren't you ashamed to lie abed so long?"

"Yes, mother, I'm ashamed; but I'd rather be ashamed than to get up."

"I think papa is dreadful," sobbed little three-year-old Margie, who had just been chastised by her father. "Was he the only man you could get, mamma?"—Chicago News.

"The fools are not all dead yet," said the angry husband. "I'm glad of it, dear," calmly replied the other half of the combination. "I never did look well in black."—Chicago News.

At one of Bishop Potter's visitations were a number of young deacons, and one rather vacuous personage remarked to the Bishop: "In the Benedicite occurs the verse, 'O all ye priests of the Lord, bless ye the Lord,' but there is no mention of us deacons." "Oh, yes, there is," rejoined the bishop. "Here it is—'O all ye green things upon earth, bless ye the Lord.'"—Congregationalist.

"Boys," said the professor, "when I am endeavoring to explain to you the peculiarities of the monkey I wish you to look straight at me."

An old farmer, dictating his will to a lawyer, said:

"I give and bequeath to my wife the sum of £100 a year. Is that writ doon?"

"Yes," said the lawyer, "but she is not so old but she may marry again. Don't you make any change in that case? Most people do."

"Ah, weel, write again and say: 'If my wif marry again I give and bequeath to her the sum of £200 a year.' That'll dae, eh?"

"Why, that's just double the sum that she would have if she had remained unmarried," said the lawyer. "It is generally the other way."

"Aye," said the farmer, "but him that taks her wull weel deserve it."—Exchange.

Lady—"Oh, how dirty your face is, little boy!"

Boy—"Yes'm; we hain't had no company fer more'n a week."—Judge.

Filipinos must wonder why it was necessary to shoot so many of them before explaining that independence was merely being deferred.—The Detroit News-Tribune.

President Roosevelt could get more people to read his message if he would incorporate in it a column or so about his bear hunt.—The Chicago News.

He had been courting the girl from Philadelphia for ten years. When he proposed she exclaimed: "This is so sudden."—Life.

An Irish farmer went into an iron monger's shop to buy a scythe. After serving him, the shopman asked him if he would buy a bicycle.

"What is that?" queried the Irishman.

"It's a machine to ride about the town on."

"And, sure, what might the price of it be?"

"Fifteen pounds."

"I'd rather see fifteen pounds in a cow."

"But what a fool you would look, riding around the town on the back of a cow!"

"Shure, now," replied the Irishman, "not half such a fool as I'd look trying to milk a bicycle!"—Tit-Bits.

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL

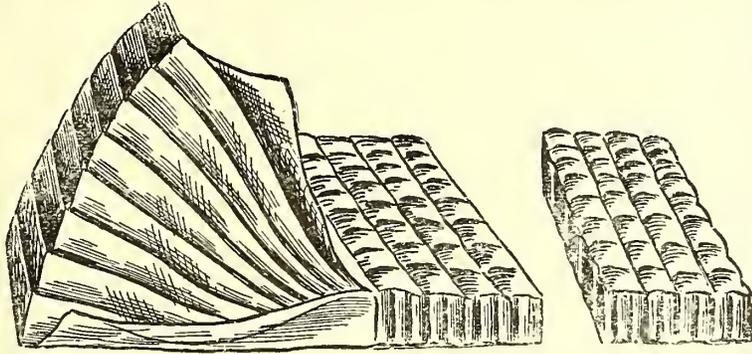

POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

Event and Comment.

Alexander McLaren is taking a three months vacation and it is feared that he will never preach again. He and Parker and Spurgeon were a great trio and there are none of their like left upon earth that people recognize as yet.

Christian Work and the Evangelist sees in the disgust of the churches with the numerous "special days" the sign of a return to the Christian Year, observed by the Episcopal Churches. But there is still another alternative, that one day in every seven should be kept and well kept.

If Attorney Folk of St. Louis does not look out they will make him President yet. He is about to do the same thing to the vicious elements of St. Louis that he has done to the bribed and bribing officials. There was a sheriff who did his duty once in Buffalo—but that is another story.

One of our Baptist exchanges has been discussing Baptistism. We would not try to learn what that is for pay. And other Baptist exchanges are talking about the "invisiblisticists." The best thing for a sect with such a name is to practise invisiblisticism and remain inaudible as well.

They are trying to pass a law in New York reviving the prize-ring contests with all their brutality. We need not become excited about such reversion to savagery. The processes of civilization are slow, but the influences of civilized commonwealths to the south of New York will gradually spread northward.

A New York contemporary says that to suppose the success of negro suffrage would be to suppose "that a young Pi-Ute of seven could be depended upon for a thoughtful and informing paper upon the inspiration of the Scriptures." We have seldom read any better putting of the case by a Northern religious paper.

The Brooklyn Eagle, in commenting upon the life of the late E. P. Clark, of the Evening Post, coined a phrase that should be the ideal for all editors, whether of religious or secular papers, "His profession was the translation of his conscience into comment." Mr. Rollo Ogden, who becomes editor-in-chief of the Post, was formerly a Presbyterian minister.

The Supreme Court has decided that the Federal Government may prohibit the carrying of lottery tickets from state to state under the general powers delegated to the general government. This is a far-reaching decision and may apply to other things than lottery tickets. But we are glad to see this last blow given to the lottery evil.

Dr. E. E. Hale's successor in Boston said the other day: "You have labor trusts and capitalistic trusts and they are having a glorious time fighting each other because they do not know they are inevitable. Finally they will combine, and then the great consuming public will have both to reckon with." But the Standard said that first.

The Philadelphia Journal says: "No church is so misunderstood as ours. To the Cumberland Presbyterian we are represented as fatalists and to the Southern Presbyterian as Arminians." We never heard of but one Southern Presbyterian that represented the Northern Church as Arminian and he is not the Southern Presbyterian par excellence.

The pressure of missionary enterprise upon the churches constantly forces them together. The other day there was a meeting of Presbyterians and Methodists in Toronto to see if some modus vivendi could not be adopted for the prosecution of mission work in the great Northwest field. When Wesleyans and Calvinists can get together on such a proposition the union of kindred churches cannot be far off.

We wonder if the devil does not applaud the sentiment that the preacher should never preach politics, as that phrase is generally meant, namely, that he should never "cry aloud and spare not" such institutions of evil as the saloon and the lottery. It was a saloon politician who advised a Baptist editor the other day that it would be a great deal better for him just to edit his paper, and let "politics" alone.

Bishop Potter declares that a bishop who is cut off from contact with rural life cannot fail to become "that very prejudiced, unsympathetic and opinionated thing, a Cockney Bishop." And the Bishop says that the reference is unmistakeable to the deacons, in "O all ye green things of earth, bless ye the Lord." The good Bishop must be getting a little dyspeptic, as well as unsympathetic, opinionated and prejudiced, after the years of his sojourn in the highly flavored metropolis.

It is just as well to be on our guard against undue boasting about our remarkable advance in the cause of temperance in North Carolina. Tennessee has shut up the saloons in all the communities of that state having less than five thousand inhabitants and the Governor of the Federal District of Mexico has issued an order closing the saloons at nine o'clock. North Carolina will have to move faster still to catch up with the procession.

The New York and New Haven Railroad has issued orders prohibiting the playing of cards on its Sunday trains. Mark Twain once made such a rule a theme for his biting satire. He explained that the rule was made for the benefit of those who were profaning the Sabbath by Sunday travel, but who did not like to see other people profaning it by playing cards. And we think the point was well taken. The Pharisaical keepers of the Sabbath law did not all live in the First Century, in Judea.

A writer from Virginia to the Interior says that the main obstacle to Organic Union between the Northern and Southern Churches is the difference of opinion as to the speaking of women in the churches. But then this Northern correspondent was living in the Synod of Virginia, which once published an appendix to its Minutes on the Woman Question and has to live up to the fact that it has an appendix, like other aristocratic bodies. And besides, even in Richmond, Virginia, the editor of the Central Presbyterian went to hear Mrs. Taylor speak. There is no telling what we may come to.

Who was it that said that North Carolina was not going to raise the Three Hundred Thousand Dollars it pledged to the Twentieth Century Fund? The canvass is being conducted now at both ends of the Synod with much energy. Rev. C. G. Vardell has been very successful in Wilmington and Fayetteville Presbyteries and Rev. D. P. McGeachy has lately undertaken the work in Mecklenburg and Concord, Asheville and King's Mountain Presbyteries. At Concord he and President H. L. Smith made an appeal which resulted in the subscription from that liberal church being raised to some $5,000. Marion and Morganton also contributed several hundred dollars apiece. We again commend the cause to the hearts and consciences of North Carolina Presbyterians.

Beecher and Cleveland.

On Sunday night of last week there was a memorial service held in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, in honor of Henry Ward Beecher. Addresses were made by Newell Dwight Hillis, the present pastor of Plymouth Church, Dr. F. W. Gunsaulus, of Chicago, Justice Brewer of the Supreme Court, and Mayor Seth Low. But the man who was easily the chief figure of the occasion was Grover Cleveland, and the applause that greeted him was a spontaneous tribute to his greatness that was all the more impressive coming as it did from those who may be presumed to be in the main his political opponents. A reference to him by Justice Brewer and a second one by Dr. Gunsaulus were received with the same tribute of applause. Mr. Cleveland was visibly touched by the warmth of his reception and his address revealed a tenderness of feeling that has not usually been attributed to this strong and masterful man, as immovable as granite and seemingly as hard, who was twice the chief magistrate of this Republic.

We have always felt a warm admiration for Mr. Cleveland's civic virtues. We are rather proud of having ridden forty-two miles on horseback to cast a vote for him. While we understand fully the opposition to him both in its strength and its sincerity we have hoped that with the passing of the years and the certainty that he was beyond the reach of any further political activities or ambitions, he would reap this side the grave the reward of honor that history is certain to bestow upon him. However that may be, the testimony which he gave last week, regarding the influence upon his life of one sermon, is well worth repeating and suggests its own lessons of helpfulness and cheer.

Said Mr. Cleveland:

"It is now more than forty-nine years ago that I heard in Plymouth Church a sermon whose impressiveness has remained fresh and bright in my mind during all the time that has since passed. In days of trial and troublous perplexity its remembrance has been an un-failing comfort; and in every time of depression and discouragement the lesson it taught has brought restoration of hope and confidence. I remember as if it were but yesterday the fervid eloquence of the great preacher as he captivated my youthful understanding and pictured to my aroused imagination the entrance of two young men upon the world's jostling activities—one laden like a beast of burden with avaricious plans and sordid expectations, and the other with a light step and cheerful determination, seeking the way of duty and usefulness and striving for the reward promised to those who love and serve God, and labor for humanity. I have never for a moment lost the impression made upon me by the vivid contrast thrillingly painted in words that burned, between the two careers; nor have I ever failed to realize the meaning of the truths taught by the description given of the happy compensations in life and the peace and solace in death of the one, and the racking disappointments in life and the despair in death of the other. What this sermon has been to me in all these years I alone know. I present its recollection today as a personal credential of my own, especially entitling me to representation among those who meet to recall and memorialize the fame and usefulness of Henry Ward Beecher.

It is more than probable that the sermon is one of the forgotten sermons that Beecher preached, that the parable of the two young men that so seized the mind and heart of a simple country boy, the son himself of a Presbyterian preacher, was but the exaltation of the commonplace. But now, fifty years afterwards, this boy has become one of the famous men of America, thrice nominated and twice elected to the Presidency, carrying in all three elections a large majority of the suffrages of his countrymen and leaving for all that came after him traditions of integrity in office and the unswerving purpose to do the right as he saw the right, which is one of the heartening influences in politics and government for this twentieth century. And the man attributes, modestly, his own fixedness of character to the influence of an illustration of a sermon.

What a reward that, for the preacher of the Gospel! Who knows into what fertile soil the seed may fall. Here is the hope of every faithful worker for Christ, that by the blessing of God, in the years to come, the corn of wheat that fell to the ground and died may bring forth fruit an hundred fold.

We think that in thus uncovering his heart-secret and giving his testimony to the influence which brought him "to love and serve God and to labor for humanity," Mr. Cleveland did a public service. There is certainly not a member of the profession to which his father belonged that will not thank him for the message of encouragement that he has sent. It is not given to every man to speak with the eloquence of a Beecher. But the Spirit of God can take a feeble and halting message and send it to the heart even as Beecher's eloquent words reached the heart of the future President. There may be some faithful pastor who reads these lines in whose charge is the boy who in after years shall be a mighty force in the Kingdom of God. They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars.

The Standard is a little late in giving its own opinion of the recent Convention held in Chicago in behalf of moral and religious education, and the Association that was organized as a result of the Convention. Not being able to attend we have been dependent upon the reports of others and these reports have been contradictory to an almost ludicrous degree. Strange to say also, the impressions which even the eyewitnesses gained were exactly in line with the prejudices which they took with them to the Convention and carried home from the Convention. For example Dr. W. S. Plumer Bryan deposes thus: "The sympathies of the convention were manifest when one speaker who was dismissed from a Methodist university for his erroneous teaching concerning Christ and the Scriptures, and who is now pastor of a Unitarian Church, intimated that he would withhold a full expression of his views. From all over the house, came cries of, "Speak it out!" to which he replied, "So far as there is any paralysis in religion to-day, it is due to the uncredited and incredible philosophy on which it is based."

The editor of the Interior describes the same incident thus: "The convention saw a very significant incident when Professor Pearson, the author of "The Carpenter of Nazareth," volunteered to speak from the floor. Having risen he hesitated, saying: "I suppose I had better not say what was in my mind." But the convention impatiently cried to him to go on and say all he pleased, and he faltered the opinion that "the church would never accomplish anything as long as it held to an unbelieved creed." But the remark met the most painful silence. Not a murmur endorsed him."

Again, Dr. Bryan says, "Every quip and jest at the expense of the Sabbath-school teacher and of our system of religious instruction was greeted with a hearty applause." Says Chancellor J. H. Kirkland of Vanderbilt University, "No unkind criticisms were indulged in, either concerning present Sunday-schools, public schools or the home. Full recognition was made of present agencies at work in this field."

When the eye-witnesses differ what can a far-a-way editor do but take to the woods?

We publish elsewhere a column of newspaper opinions on the subject of the convention. The last one from the Congregationalist, closes with this sentence: "It is interesting to note that the opposition to the convention, which was quite formidable before it was held has dwindled to the querulous voices of a few moss-grown religious newspapers, mostly Presbyterian." It is difficult to deny that there is a slight growth of moss on some religious papers—even Presbyterian papers sometimes remind one of the old oaken bucket.

The much discussed convention was called by the Committee of Seventy of the Institute of Sacred Literature, joined by a large number of ministers of all denominations, college presidents, theological professors and other teachers. As The Congregationalist intimates the opposition to the movement was formidable before the convention was held. Unfortunately the impression got abroad that there was a plan on foot to undertake the work of Sunday-school literature. We quoted last week from the disinterested warning of the Methodist Book Concern of Nashville, begging Methodist ministers not to have anything to do with the proposed convention. The Central Presbyterian, whose editor is the present editor of the Sunday-school literature of our church, seems to be still afraid of this, despite the disclaimer of the Association on this very point. Says the dear old Central:

It is evident that Dr. Harper and his Chicago followers in his Sanhedrim have organized a general society for the direction of Sunday-school teaching and the preparation of literature. They would bring us all, with or without our consent, into subjection to their rational rejection of the inspiration of the Word of God. A sequence will be an enormous publishing house, with millions of capital, and the absorption of the publication of all Sunday-school literature.

Now we think that the hue and cry was raised without sufficient cause and that it succeeded in keeping from the convention people who would have added to the evangelical element there. We know a prominent Baptist of this State who would have gone to the convention except for the unpleasant criticisms that he knew would follow. We know a Presbyterian minister of Virginia who would have gladly gone and who would have been profitable to the convention and doubtless profited by it, but was unwilling to jeopardize other interests by his attendance there. Now it seems to us that this was a great pity. Why should not Presbyterians bear their share of a discussion relating to the religious and moral education of the children both in the public schools and in the Sunday-schools? Why should they give up altogether the intellectual primacy that was once theirs so conspicuously, especially on such themes, because, forsooth, in a convention attended by representatives of twenty evangelical denominations, one may not be able to agree with all that is said. We have become so morbidly afraid of endorsing a wrong opinion that we would rather see the opinion triumph, so long as we can wash our hands of responsibility, than enter an arena of discussion which is free for all and there attempt the defense of what we believe.

So if Presbyterians generally were warned away, and we suppose Dr. Bryan would have warned them all away if he could, it seems hardly fair to reproach the convention for the comparatively small representation of Presbyterians.

Moreover the convention was called mainly for the discussion of methods, methods of teaching morality and religion in the public schools, better methods of Sunday-school work. From this point of view it was hardly necessary for papers to have been prepared on the orthodox themes suggested by Dr. Bryan, the danger of sin, the way of salvation, and the like. The convention was not a Sunday-school itself. The philosophy of the "new psychology" on the other hand, was a proper subject for discussion. Undoubtedly there is much truth in the new psychology and the science of psychology is at the very basis of successful teaching. Nor are we aware that any system of psychology whether new or old is recommended in the Scriptures as the orthodox system.

For our own part we believe that there was great need for a convention on this subject and that it was a great pity if the hostility to this one on the grounds we have mentioned shall prevent the full success of the association. Consider the appalling ignorance of the Bible in every class, in every section of the country. Consider the fact that the Sunday-schools have succeeded in lifting from parents the sense of responsibility for the religious instruction of their children, and that the average Sunday-school, as compared with the average secular school, is almost misnamed a school at all. Parents are often rebuked for keeping their children away from Sunday-school when they could give ten times better instruction to their own children than those children would receive at Sunday-school. As for the quips and jests at the expense of the Sunday-school, we wonder if Dr. Bryan ever attended a real live meeting of the North Carolina Sunday-school Convention; he would find there oftentimes a merciless exposure of the inefficiency of the Sunday-school as it is very often conducted. There can be no question, that with all its usefulness, the Sunday-school is an institution that is in need of radical changes in the direction of efficient study and efficient teaching of the Word of God, and the proof is the wide-spread ignorance of the Word that flourishes in this Sunday-school generation. We have no doubt that the failure of the Denver Convention last year to meet the demand for graded lessons gave a great impetus to the present movement. From the standpoint of the teacher, the International System is about as unscientific as could be well arranged.

And then consider the fact that because of the disagreement of denominations and sectarian jealousy the public school children are growing up without any moral or religious instruction whatever. Is there not some need of reform on that line? Why the great Calvinist, Kuyper of Holland, gladly joined hands with the Roman Catholics on the issue of giving religious instruction in the schools.

If the new association can accomplish aught in the way of improving the methods of instruction on religious subjects, whether in the Sunday-schools or the public schools or the State Universities, we bid it God-speed. The character of the instruction, the subject matter of the teaching, will be settled by local forces that no general association can control for either good or evil. And if it is not too late we advise that Presbyterians seek to obtain their fair share of representation in this body and direct the movement all they can. If the movement is to fail it is time that some constructive work was started on similar lines.

The President and the South. We print elsewhere an article by Thomas Nelson Page published in Collier's Weekly. Mr. Page is one of those Southern men who have the ear of the Northern public, and yet he has never written a line that could be called offensive to the land of his birth. It is a suggestive article, "The New Aspect of the Negro Question." Mr. Page closes with a quotation from one of Mr. Roosevelt's works. He affirms that Mr. Roosevelt has not changed as regards this statement, "The whole civilization of the future owes a debt of gratitude to that democratic policy which has kept the temperate zones of the new and the newest worlds a heritage for the white people." Mr. Page affirms that there has been a change of conditions in the South.

It seems to us that he is right. The Southern people will be a long time submitting again to what they bore but a short time ago. Both parties in the South have repudiated the negro. And it has come about that there is now active and resentful protest even against the filling of federal offices with negroes, when that used to be taken as a matter of course, as the mistaken but inevitable policy of the national party to which the negro belonged. What has produced the change is not very far to seek. The negro has proved both unworthy and offensive in office. This is perhaps less true of the Southern negro than it would be of the negro anywhere else, than it is in Hayti and San Domingo to day. But then the Southern white people have found themselves, while they and the rest of the country have been finding out about the negro, in office. They have matched their strength against his weakness even to their own surprise at the degree of both. Yes, conditions have changed.

About the same time that the article of Mr. Page appeared, the President wrote a letter to Clark Howell of the Atlanta Constitution. There is a tone of bitterness in it but also a shade of pathos. The President affirms that he has been guided in his appointments, by consideration for the feelings of the people of each locality, so far as he could do so without sacrificing principle; that he has applied the prime tests of character, fitness and ability, and has frequently gone outside his own party to find these qualifications; that he cannot treat color as a bar to holding office and will not treat it as conferring a right to hold office.

The President then claims that he has appointed about one negro out of a hundred appointees in the South, and is at a loss to understand why the appointment of the negro, Crum, to be Collector of the Port, at Charleston, should have been received with so much more disappointment and anger than the re-appointment of a negro to the same office in Savannah. "To connect either of these appointments or any or all of my appointments, or my actions in upholding the law at Indianola, with such questions as social equality or negro domination is as absurd as to connect them with the nebular hypothesis, or the theory of atoms."

And he concludes, "In view of these facts, I have been surprised and somewhat pained at what seems to me the incomprehensible outcry in the South about my actions. I am concerned at the attitude thus taken by so many of the Southern people; but I am not in the least angry and still less will this attitude have the effect of making me swerve one hair's breadth from one side or the other from the course I have marked out—the course I have consistently followed in the past and shall consistently follow in the future."

In pleading precedents for his appointments and re-appointments, the President has failed to take into account the changed conditions of which Mr. Page speaks. And then there is just a suspicion that the President has not been as consistent as the resolve not to swerve one hair's breadth would indicate. For example, here in North Carolina, the only negro postmaster left, and one who has the endorsement of the best white people in the place and who is much preferred to some white men who have been mentioned for the position, is to be excluded solely on the ground of his color. And it would be difficult to believe that the negro collector in Charleston was not appointed solely on the ground of his color. There has been a regretful suspicion that the President is playing a little too much the game of politics. For the negro is not a political nonentity in the North now as he has become in the South. There has been the feeling that there was a deliberate choice made between stirring up the resentment of the white people in the South and that of the negroes in the North. He may not need their votes to secure the next nomination. But he is going to need them, unless all signs fail, to secure the election for the next term of the Presidency. Moreover, the fact that the nomination of Crum turned upon the proof of his party loyalty, rather lowers the plane of his appointment to one of expediency from that of high principle, after all protestations.

But after all has been said, we think the President is learning. He is a man quick to learn and he is certainly not afflicted with that vice of small minds called consistency. We wish it could be shown to him that the real reason for the feeling in the South against him is the fact of disappointment after highest expectations. The South had begun to love him and he has hurt her feelings. We need not enumerate the facts brought out so clearly by Mr. Page. If the President cannot understand why the South felt a little contemptuous at the appointment of a negro to be Collector of the Port at Charleston, in the face of the protest of the city that opened its gates and its hearts so wide to him a year ago, then it is impossible to explain. One might as well try to argue that a gentleman ought to give his seat to a lady in a street car, or remove his hat when a lady is in the elevator with him. There are certain instincts relating to hospitality and politeness that cannot be acquired. And then if the President does not understand why the people of the South can never be driven to his way of thinking by the closing of a post-office, he has not read aright the story of the War between the States. It was because the South believed that any one with a Southern mother would know better, that the disappointment has been so great.

And then with all the defence of the appointments made, the President has hardly borne out his reputation as a Civil Service Reformer. The South, minus the small politicians, believes in the principles of that reform. Certainly in this State those appointments might have been vastly improved by consulting either the wishes of the communities most interested or really making those tests of fitness, character and ability, of which he speaks.

Nevertheless and notwithstanding, let us give him time to learn more thoroughly what we think he has set out to learn. There are some things that come by experience only. With Congress off his hands he may have a season for strenuous meditation.

The South has made its impression by its "incomprehensible outcry." The unanimity of that outcry is something to be heeded. It may occur to the President that several million people with the problem to face know more about what affects its peaceful solution than one man, even though a President.

And let us try to forget and to make allowances for ignorance and impulsiveness. We may be happy yet.

Dr. Samuel A. King—An Appreciation.

On the 22nd of February Rev. Samuel A. King, D. D., celebrated the fortieth anniversary of the beginning of his pastorate at Waco, Texas, and on the same date his congregation took reluctant action relating to his departure to the new Texas Seminary for the whole of his time.

Samuel A. King was born near Versailles, Kentucky, in 1834, his father being a Presbyterian minister, Rev. William M. King. He was reared in Texas and received the main part of his education, both in the classics and in theology, from his father. He was married in 1860 to Miss Anna King, of Crockett, Texas, and is the father of six children. He was ordained to service as a home missionary, making Milford his headquarters, and in 1863 was called to Waco. There were then but a few Presbyterian families in and near Waco, the Robinsons, McAlls, Abernathys, Bosticks, and others, good North Carolina names, most of them. There were but seven Presbyterians in the whole county when he began his ministry in Waco. During his pastorate more than a thousand souls have been added to the church which he so faithfully served. Volumes might be written that would not contain the significance of that one eloquent fact.

The degree of D. D. was conferred on Dr. King by Baylor University, Texas, and The Southwestern Presbyterian University at Clarksville. He was a delegate to the Pan-Presbyterian Council in 1877 and was made moderator of the General Assembly of 1892. When the funds for the Texas Presbyterian Seminary reached a sum sufficient for the inauguration of that much needed institution, Dr. King was chosen as the first Professor of Systematic Theology, and no wiser choice could have been made—a man who was intimately acquainted with the Texas field and at the same time enjoyed the confidence, so completely, of the whole Southern Church. A great career of usefulness and honor is thus opened up before him for the closing years of his useful and honored life.

He is a man of deep piety, earnest eloquence, sound scholarship, gentle manners, ripe experience, and wields the mighty influence of a godly life.

The outpouring of love and affection from the whole community at Waco on the occasion of his fortieth anniversary, was the best testimony to the place he had made for himself in the life of the city. The following are the resolutions adopted by the congregation.

"Whereas, our pastor, the Rev. Dr. S. A. King, has announced to this church that he has tendered to the Presbytery of Central Texas his resignation of the pastorate of this church, and asked that we unite with him in a request to the Presbytery to dissolve the relation existing between us, that he may accept the chair of systematic theology in the Austin Theological seminary to which the board of directors of that institution have unanimously elected him; and

"Whereas, a committee from that board, composed of the Revs. Drs. W. H. Leavell and T. R. Sampson, has heretofore visited us and urged upon us the great need the Synod of Texas had for the services of Dr. King as a professor in the seminary, and earnestly besought us to relinquish our claims upon him;

Resolved—1. That we unite with Dr. King in his request to Presbytery because he desires it, feeling as he does that it is his duty to accept the call of the Synod, and because we believe that his piety, learning and reputation will be of inestimable value in the position to which he goes, and that the work of the church will thereby be advanced, and the kingdom of our Lord be built up.

Resolved—2. That in parting with Dr. King, we would place upon record our tribute to his faithfulness through the forty years he has served this church. His zeal in the Master's work and his loyalty to his people have rarely been equalled. He came to this church when it was a feeble flock, few in numbers, poor in substance, and through all its vicissitudes his prayers, his preaching, his kind ministrations have been given it with self-sacrificing devotion. Whatever of prosperity we may justly claim, we owe it, under God, to his devotedness and faithfulness. Never complaining or faultfinding from the pulpit, he has ever sought to win us from worldly conformity by pointing us to the pleasantness of wisdom's ways and the peace of her paths.

His going in and out before us has been worthy of all imitation. True to the faith once delivered to the saints, he has ever in his preaching had courage to declare the whole counsel of God. He has been our only pastor, and through all these years we have had in our distresses the sympathy of his great heart and in our joys his kindly participation. The love we bear him and the sorrow that possesses us, at the severance of the sacred tie that has so long bound us to him, words can not express.

He will carry with him our love, and our prayer is that God will bless him in his new labors and finally give him a crown of rejoicing."

Devotional.

Flavor.

The flavor of wild game comes of the food they feed on. The flavor of our conversation, the expressions of our countenances, the grace of our bearing, the tone of our writing and utterances come from the heart. The single eye, that sees clearly, and honorably, and justly, comes from the heart. And the tone, flavor and character of the heart comes of its keeping and nourishment. Solomon advises: Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life. The same spring cannot bring forth sweet waters and bitter.

The heart is kept by the books we read, the company we keep, the exercises we practice and indulge. The order is imperative—keep! The threat is positive. The thoughts shall be revealed! Scalawag cattle graze on the common, and drink ditch water. They run with the crowd, they feed with the crowd; and they are scalawag.

A man of understanding separateth himself, and interminglith with all wisdom.

If we desire that our presence, our conversation, our utterances, shall be agreeable and wholesome, we must discriminate; be true to our standards, our principles, our ideals, our loyalty to the divine manhood of our Lord and Master. All wondered at the gracious words that fell from His lips. He was God tabernacled in the flesh.—Churchman.

Prayer.

“Lord, if there be some weaker one,
Give me strength to help him on.
If a blinder son there be,
Let me guide him nearer thee.
Make my mortal dreams come true
With the work I fain would do.
Clothe with life the weak intent,
Let me be the thing I meant;
Let me find in thy employ
Peace, that dearer is than joy.
Out of self to love be led,
And to heaven acclimated,
Until all things sweet and good Seem my natural habitude.”

“Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted.” Queen Victoria, mourning the death of her grandson, the Duke of Clarence, was comforted by finding on the fly leaf of a little book of devotions she had given the lad, an inscription she had herself placed there,—

“Nothing in my hand I bring, Simply to Thy cross I cling.”

“I could not help feeling” she said, “that he did cling to the cross, and that it had all come true.”—Selected.

Genuine unselfishness is very rare. This fact easily explains the wide-spread indifference to Christian work which honey combs the Church of to-day. The moment the cross begins to be heavy, thousands who have taken the name of Christ decline to continue in His service, who climbed the hill of Golgotha, with bleeding feet and bleeding brow, for their salvation. They propose to accept that salvation, with all its blessings, but not to share the fellowship of His sufferings. Who can doubt that to many such the words of the Master must be spoken, “Depart from me, I never knew you?” The selfish life of the professed Christian is the veriest mockery. The world smiles at empty professions. But wherever men do reveal the Christ-spirit of unselfishness, instantly their worth is recognized and their power felt. God uses them with blessed results.—Selected.

The mark of a saint is not perfection, but consecration. A saint is not a man without faults, but a man who has given himself without reserve to God.—B. F. Westcott.

Missionary.

In His Name.

“One of the noblest illustrations of Christian faith in recent times, was the going out to China during the past summer of a young woman, the sister of Mrs. Courtlandt Van Rennsalaer Hodge, who, with her husband, gave her life at Pao-ting fu. Some people wondered that this young woman would even think of going as a missionary to a country where, only a few months before, her sister had perished as a martyr.

But she wavered not in her consecration, and went as cheerfully and as gladly as if her sister had been there to welcome her to a happy, peaceful home and work.

Her mother, too, although having just given one daughter to martyrdom in China, gladly gave the other to go for Christ to that far-away country. Sometimes we are told that the days of heroism in the cause of Christ are past, that now Christians want only easy service. But such examples as this—and this is only one among many that might be cited—show that the friends of Christ today are just as heroic and as ready to suffer for their Master as were those who lived in the first century.”—Forward.

“Before we lay our gifts on the altar for Christ, we must give ourselves to Christ.”—Forward.

“The Church that is not interested in missions is a dying Church.”—Forward.

“God wants us to give of our money to him. True, it is our hearts and our lives that he wants first. Our gifts are not pleasing to him, if we do not bring ourselves. We cannot buy our way with money to God’s favor. Yet, we must give money too. It is needed for carrying on the work.

In one of the prophetic books, the Lord brings a serious charge against his people. “Ye have robbed me,” he says. When they ask wherein they have robbed him, he answers: “In tithes and offerings.” God wants his portion of our money, and if we fail to give it to him, we are guilty of purloining. We cannot get a blessing from God, unless we give. But money is not all that we should give. We may give love, kindness, comfort, sympathy, cheer. At the Beautiful Gate, Peter told the lame man that he had no silver or gold to give, but he added: “Such as I have, I give thee.”

“A Church visitor went to a poor woman with her monthly allowance. The old woman said: “Thank you for the money; I need it; but thank you more for coming to see me. What I need most is folks.”—Forward.

The great doors of opportunity are open. No, not doors, not measured openings, but the very sides of the world are taken off, so that anybody coming from anywhere can go to the center, and in the uncovered, exposed hundreds of millions are our opportunities. Opportunity is power. What we ought to do we can do. When God opens a door before his people, that is his command to them to enter, and his promise to back them to the extent of his resources. Whenever a people sees God’s beckoning hand, and hears his call, and are obedient to the heavenly vision, then they rise to higher levels, take up heavier burdens, achieve greater results, and reap wider harvests for God. But whenever through fear or selfishness or diversion they hesitate and doubt, then they see some braver people step to the front and take the place they might have had.—Bishop C. H. Fowler.

Down below all of the superstition of China and the idolatry of Confucianism there is a substratum of moral teaching which is a beautiful foundation for Christianity. The noblest form of Christianity is to be wrought from the Chinese. The noblest, mightiest people of the earth are standing there, waiting for you to strike off their manacles with the dynamic force of the gospel and give them the light of Christianity.—Bishop D. H. Moore.

Paul's Message to the Ephesians.

Eph. 2, 1-10. March 22, 1903.

Paul preached the Gospel in Ephesus for more than two years. He encountered much opposition from Jewish exorcists and the patrons of idolatry. The latter, moved by greed of gain and zeal for Diana's worship stimulated the mob to violence. Yet Paul triumphed over all opponents, made many converts and established a vigorous church in this city. After he left Ephesus and on his last journey to Jerusalem he sent for the Ephesian Elders to meet him at Miletus and delivered them a solemn charge. During his imprisonment at Rome he wrote his Epistle to the Ephesian Church. This Epistle contains profound and vital doctrines, multiplied and stirring exhortations, varied and important precepts and several fervent and edifying prayers. The lesson now considered may be presented under three heads.

I. Man's Natural Condition. — The Apostle describes the natural man as "dead in trespasses and sins." He says "You hath He quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins." He also affirms that such a man "walks according to the course of this world," "according to the prince of the power of the air," or Satan, "the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience." He declares that the "conversation," or course of life of men in their natural condition is dominated by "the lusts of the flesh," and that they "fulfill the desires of the flesh and of the mind." He furthermore asserts that natural men are depraved in nature, or that "they are by nature the children of wrath even as others." This scriptural description of man's natural condition, is appalling and would cause us to despair of salvation, were it not for Gospel revelations. A creature dead in sin, dominated by Satan, controlled by carnal lusts and passions, and because of a depraved nature exposed to Divine wrath, has naught to hope from his own unaided efforts.

II. God's Loving Mercy. — Having pointed man to the hopelessness of his lost condition by nature, the apostle proceeds to indicate the source of his rescue. He says, "But God who is rich in mercy for His great love wherewith He loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ: by grace ye are saved." Here we are taught that the source of salvation for fallen, depraved, condemned man is the Divine mercy, prompted by compassionate love. This love, manifested in mercy, causes God to impart spiritual life to those dead in sins and this quickening is given in union with Christ. This Divine mercy is rich or abundant and God's love is great and therefore they secure such great blessings for sinners. This wondrous love not only confers life through Christ upon the dead, but lifts believing sinners to a higher plane of living and to most exalted relations and abodes. Hence the apostle adds, "And hath raised us up together and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." The exaltation of Christ involves the exaltation of His people. If He is in heaven so shall also His people be. If He is glorified, they shall share His glory. If He is the Holy Son of God, His disciples shall also be "the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty." The kindness too that our loving and merciful God will show to redeemed and regenerate sinners in Christ is not confined to the present life or to an assured entrance at the close of earthly life into the heavenly places. It will be manifested through Jesus Christ during the eternal ages to come. Therefore Paul declares, "That in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness towards us through Christ Jesus."

III. Salvation by Grace. — Having pictured man's lost estate and indicated God's loving mercy as the source of His rescue and exaltation, Paul enlarges upon salvation by Divine grace.

A Mission Study of Africa.

Ps. 68:29-31, Isa. 43:3. Topic for March 29.

In our study of missions we come this month to the "Dark Continent." It is so easy to forget about our work and our workers that it was thought advisable to give at this time a brief summary of our work in that great and promising field. The following article is clipped from the pamphlet, "Our Forty Years in the Foreign Field," written two years ago by the late Dr. D. C. Rankin. It brings the history of our African field down to 1901.

"The first Assembly, sitting in Augusta, December, 1861, directed the longing eyes of the Church especially to Africa and South America." The first Assembly after the war, again sitting in Georgia, amid the desolations attending Sherman's march to the sea, solemnly resolved that the Executive Committee direct special attention to Africa, as a field of missionay labor particularly appropriate to this church; and with this view to secure as soon as practicable, missionaries from among the African race on this continent who may bear the Gospel of the grace of God to the homes of their ancestors." It was not, however, until 1889, twenty-four years afterwards, that definite steps were taken toward realizing this purpose. In that year two young men, the one white, the other colored, were appointed to go forth and open a mission in the Congo Free State. The names of these young men have long become household words in our land, the one, the gifted Samuel Lapsley, becoming the Henry Martin of the Southern Presbyterian Church, the other, William Sheppard, by his heroism and humility, justly winning the love and admiration of our whole communion. They sailed from New York February 25, 1890, reached the Congo in May, and on April 18, 1891, founded their first station at Luebo, one thousand miles in the interior, on a southern tributary of the mighty Congo.

"Less than a year later, March 26, 1892, Lapsley died at Underhill, near the coast and is there buried. What at the time seemed an irreparable loss has been used of God to kindle a fresh enthusiasm in missions, especially missions in Africa.

"No mission of the Church has been more signally blessed. Begun at Luebo only ten years ago, among utter heathen, some of them cannibals, this mission now points to more than four hundred communicants in the two churches at Luebo and Ibanj; a successful school, prosperous day school, a printing press which has just begun its work, and a potent influence far and wide among the Bakuba, Baketi, Baluba, Bakalulua and other large tribes. At one time there were three stations in the interior, Luebo, Ibanj, and Dombi. The latter near Wissman Falls on the Kassai, has been discontinued for the present.

"When the news of Lapsley's death reached this country zealous friends proposed to the children of the church the pleasing task of contributing funds with which to build a mission vessel to be used on the Congo and its tributaries, and which should at the same time perpetuate Mr. Lapsley's work and memory. The children have given $15,000 for this purpose. The steamer Samuel N. Lapsley was built at Richmond, Va., in 1899, and rebuilt at Stanley Pool by Mr. Vass during the winter of 1900-1901. She is to make her first trip to Luebo in the early spring.

"There have been twenty laborers in the Congo mission; three of these have died on the field, five have been obliged to return, leaving twelve still in the service. Half of these are white, the other half colored. Thus the earliest wish of the Assembly is being realized, that missionaries from the African race on this continent may bear the Gospel to the homes of their ancestors."

The above was written two years ago. Since that time the work in Africa has continued to bear rich fruit. In the face of these facts can anyone say that missions in Africa do not pay?

Outline Bible Study.—Galatians, Chapter II.

Rev. R. A. Lapsley.

Vers. 1. "Then fourteen years after." Do these fourteen years begin with Paul's conversion, ch. 1:15; or his first visit to Jerusalem, ch. 1:18?

"I went up again to Jerusalem." This must have been either the visit mentioned in Acts 11:30 and Acts 12:25, or that of Acts 15—which was it? Conybeare and Howson give these dates in the life of Paul: his conversion, A. D. 36; the visit to Jerusalem of Acts 11:30, A. D. 44; the council at Jerusalem, Acts 15, A. D. 50. Show how these dates answer both of the above questions.

Vers. 2. "I went up by revelation." Here Paul claims that his visit to Jerusalem was by express divine command; is that inconsistent with Acts 15:2? Compare Acts 22:17-21 with Acts 9:30.

Vers. 2, 6-10. These verses are to be studied side by side with Acts 15:1-29. Here in Galatians we are given inside history, in Acts 15, the public events. How did Paul display "sanctified common-sense" in this important affair? 1. See vers. 2, last clause and verse 6, last clause. 2. See Acts 15:12. Note particularly what kind of argument Paul and Barnabas there make use of.

Vers. 3-5. "Neither Titus . . . was compelled to be circumcised." Who seem to have demanded the circumcision of Titus and on what ground? See vers. 4, first clause, Acts 15:5. How do you explain Paul's conduct in the case of Titus and his directly opposite conduct, Acts 16:3? 1. See what race Timothy was descended from on his mother's side, Acts 16:1. 2. See Paul's reason given here vs. 4-5, for not circumcising Titus. What, then, is true consistency?

Vers. 7. "The gospel of the uncircumcision . . . the gospel of the circumcision." Do these expressions imply different doctrinal teaching on the part of Paul and Peter, or only different fields of labor? How would you show from this passage and Acts 15, that the teaching of the apostles was the same? See vs. 2, 6, 7, 9, Acts 15:22-29. Compare 2 Pet. 3:15.

Vers. 9. "Me and Barnabas." What change do you notice in the order in which the two names are mentioned, Acts 11:30, Acts 12:25, Act 13:7, compared with Acts 13:13, 43, 46, 50, Acts 15:2 and what do you infer from this? Does the use of this expression, "me and Barnabas," throw any light on the second question on vers. 1 above?

"The right hands of fellowship." Was Barnabas then an apostle? Compare Acts 14:14. See also the first question on vers. 1, ch. 1.

Vers. 11-14. "When Peter was come to Antioch." When must this have been? See Acts 15:35. Peter's conduct here is like what previous event in his history? Mat. 26:69-74. And unlike what other events? See Acts ch. 10 and 11. Acts 15:7-11.

"I withstood him to the face." How did Peter receive Paul's reproof? See 2 Pet. 3:15. Compare Mat. 26:75. What lessons here for all Christians? 1. Lesson from Paul, 1 Tim. 5:20, 2 Tim. 4:2, Eph. 4:15, first clause. 2. Lesson from Peter, Prov. 9:8; Ps. 141:5, Mat. 5:5. How does this incident dispose of the Roman Catholic doctrine of the primacy of Peter? "Barnabas also." Must Barnabas have shared the reproof administered to Peter? What may this have prepared the way for? Acts 15:39. What evidence is there that this breach between Paul and Barnabas was afterwards healed? See 1 Cor. 9:6, with the context; see also 2 Tim 4:11, last clause; Col. 4:10, Philemon 24.

Vers. 1-14. Show how each of these three incidents, the council of Jerusalem, Paul's refusal to circumcise Titus, his reproof of Peter, supports the objects he had in writing this Epistle, as seen in your study of chap. 1.

Vers. 15. "Jews by nature." What were the advantages of Jewish ancestry? See Ro. 3:2, Ro. 9:4-5.

What did these advantages fail to do? Ro. 10:1-3. Compare Phil. 3:4-8.

Vers. 16. "A man is not justified by the works of the law." Why is it impossible to be justified by the works of the law? See 1. what the law requires, Deut. 12:32, Jas. 2:10, Mat. 5:48. 2 the universal condition of the race, Ro. 3:23, 9: 10, Is. 64:6, 1 Jno. 1:8; 3 the sentence of the law, Gal. 3:10, last clause. Ro. 1:18, 32, Ro. 6:23 first clause; 4, the inevitable conclusion, Ro. 3:20. Is it possible then for a merely moral man to be saved?

"Justified by the faith of Christ." What part has faith in our justification? See 1, the ground on which we are justified, Eph. 1:6, last clause, Ro. 5:9, first clause, Jno. 15:5 first clause, Eph. 5:30, Ro. 5:18,19; 2, the relation of faith to Christ, Rev. 22:17, last clause, Jno. 1:13, Acts 16:31. 3, the conclusion from 1 and 2, Acts 13:39.

"By the works of the law shall no flesh be justified." How do you reconcile this with Jas. 2:24? Study the whole passage, Jas. 2:17-26, particularly vs. 18 and 22; and compare Gal. 5:6 last clause, Acts 15:9 last clause.

Vers. 17, 18, 21. Can you unravel the apostle's argument in these verses? By combining vs. 17-18 with vs. 21, the argument comes out more plainly. Thus: vs. 21, "I do not frustrate the grace of God, but if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain; (then) vs 17, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners. (then) is Christ the minister of sin; (which) God forbid! vs. 18, For (since Christ cannot be the minister of sin, righteousness cannot come by the law, and so) if I build again the things which I destroyed (by going back to the law for righteousness) I make myself a transgressor."

In verse 17, what false doctrine, for argument's sake, is supposed to be true? In verse 18, on the contrary, what truth is taken for granted?

Vers. 19-20. "Dead . . . nevertheless I live." Here we have the very heart of the Christian life. Dead, 1, to what? vs. 19, first clause; 2, with whom? vs. 20, first clause, Ro. 7:4 first clause. "Nevertheless I live," 1, to whom? vs. 19 last clause; 2, through whose life? vs. 20, third clause; 3, by what principle of action? vs. 20, fifth clause; 4, in what present outward condition? vs. 20, fourth clause.

"Dead to the law." Is a Christian then, under no obligation to obey the law? See Ro. 6: 1-2, 6, 7, 11, 14. 1 Cor. 9:21. Is there, however, a higher motive than duty? vs. 20 last clause, ch. 5:6 last clause. Ro. 13:10. "Who loved me." What is the Bible measure of the love of Christ? 1 Thes. 5:10., first clause, Jno. 13:1, Jno. 15:13, Eph. 3:19. How are we to be like Christ in this respect? Jno. 13:34, 1 Jno. 3:16. Is the "new commandment" higher than "the Golden Rule"? Compare Jno. 13:34, Jno. 15:12, 1 Jno. 2:16, with Mat. 7:12. Lev. 19:18.

Vers. 21. "Then Christ is dead in vain." Greek, "Without a sufficient reason." Ellicott. Could God have saved sinners in any other way than by the death of his Son? See ch. 3:21, last clause, Acts 17:3, first clause, Jno. 3:16, Mat. 21:37.

Looking over the whole chapter; what persons prominent in New Testament history are mentioned here? What important events in Paul's life, either mentioned in the chapter or the references given? Having seen in chapter 1, that Paul's object in this Epistle was 1, to indicate his independent apostolic authority; 2, to correct the work of false teachers, who taught salvation by the works of the law; what verses fall in line with 1? What verses with 2? Any with both 1 and 2?

What important doctrines taught here and in what verses? What practical lessons, and in what verses?

Answers to these questions sent with return postage to Rev. R. A. Lapsley, R. F. D. No. 1, Staunton, Va., will be corrected and returned.

The New Aspect of the Negro Question.

By Thomas Nelson Page.

The negro question has recently and somewhat unexpectedly appeared again at the South. After holding the stage for over thirty years to the complete exclusion of other questions, it has for the last five or six years seemed almost "as good as settled," and the South has congratulated herself that this settlement was for the peace and well-being of all classes of her people.

The colored race, more or less eliminated from politics, under wiser counsel than had formely prevailed, was applying its energies to building itself up industrially. The white race, freed from the incubus that had weighted it down so long, had immediately begun to divide on economic questions. With this appeared to have passed the chief cause of misunderstanding between the two sections of the country—the North and the South. The division was not enough to break the solid South; but it was quite enough to contribute to the election of a Republican President and Vice-President.

To illustrate: Fifteen years ago, the leading social club of Virginia, the Westmorland Club of Richmond, had not Republican in it. Two years ago a majority of the members of that club voted for McKinley and Roosevelt.

When, in the Wilmington riot, Northern men marched shoulder to shoulder with Southern men, and when the Mississippi Constitution passed the Supreme Court of the United States, the South considered that the negro question was at rest, and for the first time since the war felt free to divide on other lines of public policy.

Such was the state of the case when McKinley and Roosevelt were elected. Mr. McKinley, by his extraordinary tact, won the good-will of the Southern people. His successor fell heir to this good-will, in addition to a large amount of popularity quite personal to himself. He was one-half Southern, by blood; his career had been one to appeal peculiarly to the imagination of the South; his character commanded admiration; his brief but honorable military career established him further in her esteem. In his command, for the first time since the war, a Southerner found that to be a Southerner did not operate against the chance for military preferment. It is probable that there was not a more popular man in the South than Mr. Roosevelt when he succeeded to the Presidency. His first Southern appointments were made from Democrats who had supported McKinley, and added to his prestige.

This was but a year and a half ago. Within this brief time conditions appear to have totally changed. The negroes throughout the country are in a state of upheaval. The popularity of the President with the people of the South has suffered a sudden eclipse. The deepest feeling is beginning to be stirred.

It is claimed by some that this change is due to the appointment of negroes to office. But in the judgment of those better informed, this does not account for the present ferment. President McKinley filled over thirty places with negroes, among them such important offices as the collectorship of the ports of Wilmington and Beaufort, North Carolina, and St. Augustine; the collectorship of customs at Savannah, Atlanta, and Georgetown, Georgia; and the postmasterships of Athens and Darien, Georgia; Beaufort and Florence, South Carolina; Pine Bluff, Arkansas, and others—all without causing a fraction of the excitement that has arisen of late, while only four original appointments of negroes to office in the South have been made during the present Administration, and but one of these has met with strenuous opposition. On the other hand, President Roosevelt has, perhaps appointed more men to office from among the conservative whites of the South than all the other Republican Presidents put together.

It is plain, therefore, that the reason for the present ferment must lie deeper than the mere appointment to office of negroes. The true reason is that these appointments have been taken at the South as evidences of an attitude on the part of the President toward the race question which the South reprobates far more than the selection of however many negroes for office.

The first of these causes was undoubtedly what is now known as "the Booker Washington incident."

To make this understood it is necessary to speak plainly. Conditions at the South have changed within ten years. The old relation between the races has changed. Those who have made that relation one of kindness and affection are passing away. The races are wider apart to-day than they have ever been. It is, in the main, only those who knew the old relation that retain the old feeling. The new negro, when he gets an education, becomes the "Afro-American." Every question in which the negro is concerned becomes now a race question. The negroes will not have it otherwise, and the whites must act accordingly. The most passionate aspiration of the new negro is for social equality. This means in plain terms what the South in plain terms intends shall not be. The increased frequency of the crime for which lynching has come to be almost inevitable penalty is a manifestation of this aspiration. The frightful spread of lynching in its most terrible forms as the penalty for this crime is a manifestation of the determination on the part of the Southern whites that this aspiration shall never be realized. This is the reason that an act which to the President and many others who are friendly with the South appeared simple enough aroused so much excitement there. The effect was instantaneous and far-reaching. The negroes showed it. The thrill of it was felt from one end of the South to the other. Even those who were most liberal toward that race, most friendly toward the distinguished educator who had come to be regarded at the South as perhaps the most sensible man of that race, and who held the President in highest esteem, were disappointed that he could have so little understood conditions at the South.

This, however, passed, and might have passed completely, but for another act which appeared to point in the same direction.

For years, throughout the South, there has been the growing hope that the negro might be excluded from politics, and that another party might arise there to which the whites might turn without finding themselves in the association that affiliation with the negro party in the South has for the most part signified. It was generally held that this would mean the removal of the most debasing element of politics; of the chief cause of misunderstanding between the North and the South; and the opportunity for the South, relieved from the thralldom incident to the existence of only one party, to place herself in harmony with the rest of the country. This movement was advancing propitiously when the Administration intervened. One or two men who had made themselves prominent in it were removed from office. It is said that they would have been removed anyhow for violation of the general order prohibiting office holders from too active participation in politics, and that the fact that they were excluding negroes from their conventions had nothing to do with their dismissal. It is possible that they ought to have been removed. At least, however, the circumstances were unfortunate. It looked as if these men were being disciplined for trying to form a party exclusively of whites. The negroes so understood it, and the whites so understood it.

Following close on this came the closing of the Indianola post-office. There were two precedents for such removal; but the uprising of the whites had been inspired by the advances of a negro toward a white woman, and unhappily the action of the Administration had the appearance of retaliation in behalf of the negroes. The President was hailed by them as a "New Joshua." Immediately on the heels of this came the appointment of a negro to the principal government office in perhaps the proudest and most sensitive city in the South—the city that had fired the first gun at Fort Sumter, and the city that, in the whole South, during the reconstruction period, had drunk deepest of the dregs of humiliation. The whole South, already stirred, resented it. It was taken as indicating a policy which conceivably might plunge the South again into horrors which she recalls with loathing. It was taken as indicating a want of appreciation of the grave dangers that underlie her social fabric, and, above all, as showing, on the part of one who was half Southern, a want of understanding of and of sympathy with the South.

These dangers can not be expressed in cold print. But they lie at every man's door, and when they stir they thrill every heart. To one who does not feel them, they can not be explained by reasoning; but they are felt, and they are felt to be more imminent now than for a good while past.

The South does not fear social equality. It knows that it can not be. But it fears the consequences of anything looking like the most remote recognition of it. It feels, as no one else can, the consequences of every agitation of this kind. "Social Equality" and the "Sword and Torch"—terms which none would have ventured to use five years ago—are beginning to be openly advocated by candidates for office at "Afro-American" meetings.

Happily, there is still a conservative element among the negroes at the South—mainly composed of those who knew the old relation between the whites and the blacks—who repudiate such incendiary doctrines. And, happily, there are those among the whites who know the President. These know that however he may have misunderstood conditions there, he has no intention of fastening again on the South negro domination or of fostering social equality in any form. Those who know him best feel that he has simply been misunderstood, and believe that in time the whole South will recognize it. They recall what he said a few years since in the "Sewanee Review," and republished in "American Ideals":

"The whole civilization of the future owes a debt of gratitude, greater than can be expressed in words, to that democratic policy which has kept the temperate zones of the new and the newest worlds a heritage for the white people."

The world has not changed since then, and neither has Theodore Roosevelt.—Collier's Weekly.

Christ the Only Spiritual Light.

Rev. John Van Lear.

John 8: 12.

The language of Christ produced upon the minds of those who heard Him two impressions: one as to its matter and the other as to its manner. Men wonder at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth: men marvelled at the authority with which he spoke, for he spoke not as the Scribes and Pharisees. Jesus Christ never dealt in surmises or speculations and in this He differed from all human sages and the highest culture of the ancient schools. Ancient philosophers speculated upon the existence of a Creator: upon the extent and authority of His moral government; upon the immortality of the soul; upon a future state of rewards and punishments. For all these questions for which the wisdom of this world had never framed an adequate and satisfactory answer, Christ had a definite and positive assertion to make and He made it with an authority that wrought conviction and an assurance that silenced doubt. The verdict of all subsequent ages, His enemies themselves being judges, has coincided with that of His own age, "never spake man like this man;" "Thou knowest all things and shewest the way of God in truth." This certainty with which Christ spake on all matters where the wisest of men had only surmise or speculation to give to the world, is traceable to no other source than the clear knowledge He had of Himself. No other so fully as He conformed to that Delphic Inscription "Know Thyself:" other men did not know whence they were or whither they were going: no human seer had brought into the cradle a knowledge of any previous life and none could look beyond the grave with any hope of continued existence. Christ made the claim that He had come forth from and would return unto the Father. The assertions that Jesus Christ made of Himself have no parallel in any of the claims put forth by Confucius, or Buddha or Mahomet, the founders of other great ethnic religions. None of these ever claimed a Divine pre-existence and equality with God. Christ's claim was this: "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him;" "No man knoweth the Father save the Son and he to whomsoever the Son shall reveal Him;" "I am in the Father and the Father in Me and the works that I do, I do not of myself but the Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works." "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father and how sayest thou then shew us the Father?" Christianity does not deny that there are ethical precepts in other systems of religions that are beneficial and uplifting to men, but it does assert that no one of the founders of these systems claimed that he was the eternal Son of the living God and His co-equal in being, power and glory. The distinct fruitage that grows upon this blessed religion that has come into the world from Judea and Galilee is the Divinity of Christ and the Saviorhood of men from sin in Him and Him alone. "He is the door by whom if any man enters in he shall be saved." He is the "Bread of Life," meeting the hunger of the world; He is the "water of Life," satisfying its thirst. These are His claims. Men may, as men have questioned them, but no parallel can be found to them in the religious literature of the ages. The text presents the most striking and distinct of these claims of Christ: "I am the light of the world; he that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness but shall have the light of life." What the sun in the heavens is to the natural world as the sole source of its light and life, fruitfulness and energy, that Jesus Christ asserts Himself to be to the spiritual world. The sun which is as a bridegroom that goeth forth out of his chamber and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race; whose going forth is from the ends of the heavens and his circuit unto the ends thereof and from whose heat nothing can be hid is the emblem of Christ's blessings and the symbol of His being to the world of men. Light is the most universal and omnipresent force in the universe and because of this Jesus Christ chose it to illustrate His personality and mission. "I am the Light of the world." Let us suppose that Christ had claimed that He was the Son of God and the only Saviour from sin, but that instead of saying that He was the light of the world, had said that He was the light for one hemisphere, or one continent or one race of men. If that had been His assertion then men might have some ground on which to dispute His claim that He was God's Son and could have framed a reasonable objection to His closing the doors of eternal life to all but a mere fraction of the human race. There is entire consistency between His claim of Divinity and the universality of His blessings. He is the Light and the Light of the world. He has joined in a wedlock His Saviorhood and the universality of His Gospel that no man can put asunder. Men are at liberty to reject Christ. He offers the gift of eternal life freely, freely on His part as a gift and freely for man's acceptance; but no man is at liberty to accept Christ and reject any of His claims; no man can believe in Him and mutilate His Gospel: no man can divorce the saying Christ from the missionary Christ. Taking this claim of Christ, "I am the light of the world," let us notice it in the forceful bearing it has upon some objections that are urged against missionary enterprise and activity in the Church.

I. The exclusiveness of this claim, "I am the light," not a light, not one of many lights, not a star or a moon or a satellite, but the sun. Christ does not admit any rival claimant to the belief and affections of men; He closes and fast bars the door against the entrance of any other spiritual teacher than Himself.

1. Men object to this exclusiveness and tell us that there are sublime moral teachings in such heathen philosophers as Plato and Aristotle and that the founders of Confucianism, Buddhism and Mohammedanism taught great truths. It is so but the Gospel of Jesus Christ tells from whence they secured these principles and truths: they did not originate them but they derived them from "that True Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." All the truth that men have ever taught to men in any age of the world has come from Christ. All human wisdom is but the spark from His eternal wisdom.

2. Again men object to this exclusive claim of the Lord Jesus Christ because it makes Christianity intolerant of that which is good in other religions. This is true but the intolerance of Christianity is not that of force or compulsion; it is rather the intolerance of peace and gentleness and forbearance; it is the intolerance that the sun in its meridian brightness has for the candle ray; it does not force out or extinguish the candle, nor forbid it to shine; but by the excess of its brilliance it puts to shame the feebleness of the candle's shining, so that men see it not and if they see it they do so only to mock and deride a candle shining when the King of Day shineth in his strength! That is the attitude of the Gospel to all the good that men assert exists in other systems of religion; it does not quench them but by the supremacy of its own truth it puts to shame the feeble candles men have lighted! Christianity could not be the one true, revealed religion from God and be tolerant of other systems that pretend to such claims; if Christianity were a tolerant faith it would give place to the lords many and gods many that men create for themselves; it would make room for the conceits of human philosophy; it would recognize the claims of Confucius and Buddha, Mohammed and Zoroaster and their followers, as children of the light. Had Christianity been thus tolerant it would have never provoked opposition and hostility; its missionaries would never have been denounced as subversive and revolutionary and branded as "they who turn the world upside down;" it would have escaped all the baptism of blood through which the Church has passed as the vials of human wrath have been poured out against her "when the kings of the earth set themselves and the rulers take counsel against the Lord and against His anointed, saying, let us break their bonds asunder and cast away their cords from us." There was until recent years the death penalty attached to any forswearing of Mohammedanism in order to accept Christianity. Such a law would never have been written had Christianity admitted the claim of Mahomet to be the True Prophet of Allah.

3. Christ's exclusive claim offends the liberal and latitudinarian spirit and tendency of this age. Men tell us that a man has the right to believe as he wishes; to create and shape truth for himself and in what they term their "broad charitableness" they say, "let the heathen nations alone in the religions they have; let Confucianism reign in China; let Buddhism reign in India; let Mohammedanism reign in Syria and let Christianity prevail in Europe and America." This liberalism forgets that the progenitors of the Anglo-Saxon race were found in barbarism and idolatry in the forests of Europe by Christian missionaries and that the advance and enlightenment and civilization of the European and American world is traceable to no other source than the cross of Christ. But this liberalism says, "it is unkind to disturb any people in their ancestral faith; to wean them from their hoary faiths with which they are satisfied and to fasten upon them a foreign religion." But Christianity is not a foreign religion. It did not originate on earth: it was not founded by man; it is no more foreign to the heathen than it is to us: it is foreign to us and the heathen alike in that it is from heaven and not of earth. "God hath made of one blood all nations to dwell upon the face of the earth." He created the heathen as He did us and they have the same rights to the Gospel that we have. The last words that Jesus spoke before He ascended were "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." This liberalism of the age forgets and overlooks another thing and that is, that Christianity is not the only intolerant and exclusive system taught to men the world over. Centuries ago Arabia discovered the use of certain characters named letters and certain figures named numbers. Can you show anywhere a more dogmatic and intolerant system than that wrapped up in the Alphabet? Why does literature in its intolerance say to men, You can not read or write or think but by the use of the letters of the Alphabet? Do you know of a more dogmatic and exclusive system than Mathematics? You can make no calculation without the use of the digits. I say to the liberalist, now be consistent in your argument. If it is unkind to distrust heathen people in their religion and to wrench them away from their ancestral faiths, is it not unkind to fasten the Alphabet and numbers in Mathematics upon them? Why not leave them in their ignorance clinging to their venerable and hoary customs. Would the man who contends for the rights of many religions to exist contend that there should be many languages that could not be translated into each other? Or if one language were found that all nations might use and which it would be best for all to use would he assert that it was unkind to teach such a useful and practical Vollpuk to all nations? Would he contend that every race should have its own system of numbers? Would our government in its expanding trade with the Orient and in the greater trade we hope to have through the opening of the Isthmian Canal consent that China and Japan should throw away the tables of additions and subtraction and multiplication or reckon interest on any other basis than per cent? Is it unkind to have one universal system of mathematical computation? Shall this system discovered by man be taught all nations as the final and absolute truth in mathematics and yet men who admit this be so liberal as to charge the Christian Church with intolerance for teaching all nations that there is but one revealed religion from heaven? Is not modern science too very dogmatic, arbitrary and exclusive in its teaching? Scientists tell us that there is but one interpretation of nature; that all the physical forces and laws of nature operate in the same way throughout her wide domain; gravitation is the same in China as in America: molecular heat and attraction is the same in Africa as in Europe: water rises to its level on the Ganges as on the Thames. Every great discovery of modern science by the western mind is being fastened upon the Oriental mind in the great universities of China and India and Japan, yet who charges science with intolerance or denies to her the right to fasten any final truth that she discovers in nature upon men everywhere? It is not "unkind" in science to draw the heathen mind from hoary and venerable misinterpretations of nature!

Alas, alas, it is only unkind to tell benighted hearts in heathen lands the story of the blood that saves and of the God who made and loves all His creatures and gave His Son for their redemption! Letters, mathematics and science can be exclusive and teach final truth but religion must not! And letters, mathematics and science are all man's wisdom and the preaching of Christ crucified is God's wisdom! We may take the heathen the wisdom of men but we may not take them the wisdom of God!

II. This exclusive claim of Christ is reasonable. When the Lord God drove the guilty parents of our race from Eden He placed at the entrance to the garden the flaming cherubim and the sword revolving every way, and the meaning of this was that man by none of his devices could find his way back to the life of holiness he had forfeited by his sin. If he ever found it it would be by the efforts of another for him and not by his own. Christ has removed the cherubim and sword and is the one way of salvation from sin. That there should be but one Redeemer for men is reasonable and in line and accord with all God's methods of creation and revelation. Singleness marks all of God's methods. There is but one way by which water can be produced and that is by the union of hydrogen and oxygen; that one way shuts off all other ways; there is but one way by which light reaches your eye and sound reaches your ear. The waves method excludes all other possible methods: there is but one method by which plant life can be nourished and soil and sunshine shut out all other ways. There is but one way by which your body can be sustained: food alone can do that and food excludes all other ways. There is but one method by which conscience can be enlightened, the divine word whose entrance giveth light, precludes every other way. This manifested and revealed Christ who offers Himself for sin as the sole propitiation harmonizes the cross with God's hand as we see it every where in having but one method for results. By this single method of salvation God simplifies for men the whole matter. It is easier to believe in and love one Christ than twenty Christs. One Eddystone lighthouse off the coast of Plymouth is all the mariner needs to keep him off the reefs whereas twenty might confuse him. In the great terminal stations of the land you have often been thankful when told that your train was standing upon such a numbered track and that it was placarded so that you could distinguish it. "God is not the author of confusion" and has saved men from confusion as to how to be saved by giving them but one Savior. If you believe that men are saved in any other way than by Christ, you are more "liberal" than God and "kinder" than Infinite Love! Christ looked not on the firmament at night sown thick with stars in its "infinite meadows" but in the open day and beholding the sun in his zenith, one light obscuring all others, said "I am the light of the world and he that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life."

Home Mission Work in the Ozarks.

The Ozarks or the Ozark mountains are not a range of mountains or a series of mountain peaks, as the word seems to indicate, but rather a broad, rough, elevated table-land in the Southern and Southwestern parts of Missouri. The soil except in the valleys is generally thin, often poor, the markets distant; and agriculture does not flourish: there are evidences of mineral deposits in many places, but as yet these are undeveloped; the climate however is well suited for fruit, and thousands of acres have been planted in orchards during the last ten years; and recently several companies have been formed and large areas of land purchased for pasturage and the rearing of sheep and goats. There is probably a future for this country, but it is yet in the future.

The population of this region is sparse, the schools are usually far apart, the terms short and the teachers ill-paid, and there is naturally more of poverty and illiteracy than in more favored parts of the State. And in many places the "moral illiteracy," as it has been aptly termed, is even worse and the ignorance of the Bible and its teachings appalling; perhaps the saddest and most significant fact in this connection is that often the so-called preachers are more strongly and even bitterly opposed than any others to the introduction of a more intelligent and Scriptural form of Christianity.

This is emphatically the missionary territory of the Synod of Missouri, and lies within the bounds of Lafayette and Potosi Presbyteries. During the last ten or twelve years something has been done to overtake the destitutions and supply the needs of this region: seven churches were organized, and five counties were entered and occupied where before no Presbyterian church had ever been known, or perhaps even heard of. These churches however have with few exceptions been generally vacant, and of course have suffered greatly from lack of pastoral oversight and Scriptural instruction. Nearly two years ago an evangelist, Rev. Jas. F. Forsyth was secured for the lower part of the field, and he has done most efficient, faithful and hard work in the face of difficulties and obstacles not a few; and his work has not been without tokens of the divine presence and blessing. Further, as the direct result of these labors plans are now being proposed and matured, which we believe will result in great and lasting good if they can be successfully carried out.

Besides this, an interesting and unique Home Mission work has been done by women during the past year in the upper Ozarks. Mrs. Rinehart, the wife of an elder of the Montrose church, situated in that region, was spending the winter of 1901-2 in St. Louis, where members of her family sought work to help them through the winter, and to provide "seed corn" for the crops of the coming spring after the severe drought of the preceding summer. Very naturally she attended the meetings of the Ladies' Aid Society of Grand Avenue Church, and very naturally, they in turn questioned her about the conditions in the Ozark region, the great needs, the lack of competent workers, etc. And they became so greatly interested in the work and in trying to have the destitution supplied that they proposed to Mrs. Rinehart that she do some Sunday-school Missionary work during the Summer; to this she agreed, and the Society employed her for six months, paying her a very moderate salary. This was done only after consultation with and the hearty approval of their Pastor, Dr. Cannon, of the Home Mission chairman of Lafayette Presbytery, Dr. Gordon, where the work was to be done, of Synod's Superintendent, and of other brethren consulted.

As the direct result of these labors four Sabbath-schools were organized with more than a hundred pupils, three of them where there had never been schools before: literature was furnished them all by our Publication Committee at Richmond, and they were continued during the summer and Fall and well up to Christmas.

Valuable information was also obtained for the Home Mission Committees, several preaching places were suggested, and arrangements were made at two of them for meetings by one of our Ministers, at one of which there were twenty-five professions of faith in Christ and the desire expressed for the organization of a church. And further, the Sabbath-school Committee of Lafayette Presbytery, with the knowledge and approval of the Assembly's Publication Committee, have continued the services of Mrs. Rinehart as an actual, though not technical, "Sunday-school Missionary;" She will now not only look after the schools already organized and seek to start others, but will also do what she can in the way of distributing wholesome literature of a kind suitable to the people among whom she labors. She has also organized a Young People's Society which meets at her house once a week, for singing, prayer, and especially reading for an hour or two, and also for the distribution of library books which she has purchased herself. And already one remarkable instance of reformation on the part of a young man has been accomplished by the reading of one of these books. This is a summary of what has been done since last June.

May this be the beginning of better things and brighter days in that region of the State. G. L. L.

A Flying Visit to Daghesh Forte and His Folks.

I, your correspondent, Mr. Editor, don't often get away from home. I dwell among mine own people. The luxury of a rest, and the extravagance of a trip, I but seldom indulge in. But the few times I do depart from home and this rule, I like to wander among my friends. Some people, when they get away from a place where they have been kindly entertained; and (they do say) some preachers, when they have been promoted from an humble charge where they were well treated; immediately drop all acquaintance and communication, as if they had narrowly escaped being burned. But I never was built that way, Mr. Editor. It has always seemed to me,

"Should old acquaintance be forgot
And never bro't to mind?"

And so these foggy mornings and hub-deep roads, when I tore myself away for an outing, which way should I turn but to the house of my old friend Daghesh Forte?

Now I had rung the old fellow's door bell upon occasion in the days gone by, had met some of his family, and had even taken his daughters out once or twice of an evening. And I doubt not their society had been profitable, for it is Scripture that afflictions are good for the soul. But years ago dust and innocuous desuetude had gathered upon our acquaintance. And now when Mr. Daghesh F. met me at the door, I never was more surprised in my life. The old gentleman must have grown a beard or something, he looked so queer. And when Mrs. Daghesh Lene, came out and their oldest daughter Beth, and Eric and Sadie (they spell their names "Hireq" and "Cadhe" since they have been off to school), and Quibboots (little rascal!) and baby Shewa—you wouldn't have believed your own eyes, they were so changed. Their limbs were all twisted, and their necks craned and their faces wizened, and their eyes squinted, like they'd had rheumatiz and neuralgia and things, bad. And, I don't want to be uncharitable, Mr. Editor, but I just can't get over it, the way they looked at me at first, sort of stony like, as would say: "Dr. Moore we know, and Dr. Lingle we know, and Dr. McKelway is not a stranger, but who are you?" But when at last we did get it right, and remembered, and recognized each other good and mutual, my but! there was some thawing done! It would have done Dr. Moore (as first introduced us) good in his soul to have seen how cordial we were. We just couldn't do anything but beam and smile, and shake one another by the hand, and hug ourselves, for joy of the meeting. And the yarns that we spun, and the stories that we recalled, and the reminiscences that we reminisced, they were a plenty. You'd have thought there weren't any times but the old times, and these hadn't been anybody but just us.

And so it came about that with a merry welcome and much pleasant chat, I spent the night with my old friend Daghesh Forte and his family. I found them sticking just as close to their Bibles as ever. They are a Scriptural set, every one of them. That part of the ancient Scriptures where they are not at home is mighty scarce. And then their talk is really refreshing, it it rests a body. They have such a nigh way of expressing themselves, so natural and child like. "Navy" I think the fine folks call it. Like as they just looked a look straight out of their eyes at things (without any poison of fashion to turn it aside or make colors of it,) and then out with what was before them. It is rousin' and healthy just to be with the Dagheshes. Kind o' brings the blood to the surface just to rub up against them. I don't know how much my pulses might have been quickened, or my constitution strengthened if the state of my affairs had permitted me to tarry longer. But part I must, and part I did, next morning, sorrowing most that I could not more be filled with their company.

Opinions on the Chicago Convention.

This convention represented the Christian scholarship of the United States more adequately than any other meeting ever held. The leaders of thought were there in great numbers. But in the devotional exercises and in the speeches there was no discordant note. The things as to which they agreed were so large and compelling that the smaller things were lost sight of. And though there were no demonstrations of emotion you could not attend the sessions without becoming aware of that restrained intensity of feeling and depth of conviction that awes the human spirit.—The Watchman.

There is absolutely nothing to fear from the association, and everything to hope. Nothing could be of brighter promise for the future of the Church and of the State than that the most distinguished scholars in the country should take time to come together in conference and express themselves as profoundly zealous for the widest and best knowledge of the Bible, and for the furtherance of every agency which proposes the moral elevation of our youth.—The Christian Advocate.

There were no iconoclastic utterances despite the wide-spread expectation of those suspicious of the movement. A sweet, sane, positive, uplifting spirit sounded the trumpet call to attention before the vast audience on Tuesday night, and the same spirit broke free the banner of action in the formation of the Religious Education Association at the crowded session late Thursday afternoon.—The Examiner.

The spiritual tone and devotional spirit were as marked in platform utterance as in the earnest prayer and fervent song which opened and closed each session. This religious atmosphere, together with the profoundly serious earnestness and fearlessly free fellowship which pervaded the whole occasion, made it impossible to suspect the presence or possibility of any factional control, ulterior motive, or polemic purpose.—The Outlook.

The uncompromising position adopted by such men as Dr. Potts of Toronto, Dr. Neely of New York, and Bishop Vincent, was not represented on the platform. This doubtless was due to the failure of leaders of that class to respond to the cordial invitations extended. Their absence is regretted; for, had they listened to the frank, irenic declarations of these who advocate the new movement, the promotion of a complete understanding would have been simpler than it will be through the medium of reports and correspondence.—The Baptist Standard.

It may make a splendid scientific record, but it will prove a dismal religious failure. As its character and aims come to be known, the evangelical denominations will let it s verely alone. The sooner it comes to its demise, the better for evangelicalism.—The Presbyterian.

The Chicago convention on religious education set going a discussion which as yet has only begun. We are by no means as sure as Dr. Berle is, in his article on another page, that its projectors did not have first in mind the spiritual ends of religious education; and this for the reason that the final impression in which Dr. Berle rejoices was largely produced through addresses of men most influential in planning the convention. But we are no less grateful that it placed chief emphasis on the supreme importance of the spiritual life to be created through knowledge of God and of human nature. It is interesting to note that the opposition to the convention, which was quite formidable before it was held, has dwindled to the querulous voices of a few moss-grown religious newspapers, mostly Presbyterian.—The Congregationalist.

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

The Chicago Convention, as the term is now used in the religious world, is the recent religious education meeting there, which seems to have made as many differences of opinion as the Chicago Convention which nominated Mr. Bryan for the Presidency. In publishing the different accounts we omitted those of the Interior and the Herald and Presbyter. The Herald and Presbyter adduced five propositions which it regarded as the results of the meeting; the Interior pronounced them all, specially and inferentially, false. So the esteemed Interior and the esteemed Herald and Presbyter are paired, so to speak. Rev. R. A. Lapsley gives a good, hard lesson to the Standard's Home Class for next Sunday afternoon. It is worth hard study, though.

We clip from Collier's Weekly, which has gotten to be a most excellent publication, with a Southward sympathy, Thomas Nelson Page's article on the Negro Question. It is well worth reading. And the sermon by Rev. John Van Lear is an admirable one. We are glad to learn of the habit some of our vacant churches have of getting one of the elders to read a Standard sermon, when no minister is obtainable. This is a good one to read. Dr. Leyburn sends us his first contribution as editor and our Eastern readers will be glad to learn more of Home Mission Work in the West. Also they are glad to see this week the face of that distinguished Texan, Dr. Samuel A. King. The visit to Doghes Forte should be taken by other Presbyterian ministers occasionally.

PERSONALS.

GEORGIA.

ATLANTA.—In an impassioned speech at the Bijou theatre yesterday, the 1st, to an audience of 2,000 men, among whom were many of the most prominent ministers of Atlanta, Rev. George Campbell Morgan announced that he would not and could not take part in any non-denominational or other religious movement which included among its promoters and laborers men who denied the absolute deity of Christ and salvation through His blood.

"I wish to make a statement here and now," said the distinguished successor of Dwight L. Moody, as he advanced to the center of the stage, straightening himself to his full 6 feet of stature and raising his voice so that it rang as clear as a bell throughout the theatre, "which I think is my due. I was surprised as I came on the train to Atlanta to find in one of your newspapers that I was to be the speaker this afternoon at the launching of an evangelistic movement, which, according to the report, had on its proposed committee men with whom I could not labor because they deny the absolute deity of our Lord and salvation through the blood of Christ.

"I make no war on any man's faith, but I cannot and will not enter into any alliance with men whose creed denies the essential elements of salvation."

At the end of Dr. Morgan's oration the vast audience sat spellbound, not comprehending in the least the meaning of it.

Then all at once it dawned upon them that the speaker had refused most emphatically to participate or assist in the great non-denominational religious revival planned through the united efforts of the ministers of the city, the beginning of which was to be marked by his sermon to men, unless the Unitarians and Universalists were barred.

All the elements of a sensation of the first magnitude were here, and the audience was quick to grasp the fact, it being generally known that both Dr. McGlauffin of the Universalist Church and Dr. Langston of the Unitarian had taken part in the ministers' conference, at which the revival was planned and united effort on the part of the churches decided upon, and that Dr. McGlauffin had gone to the length of bringing here two distinguished Boston clergymen of his denomination to assist in the work.

Preceding Dr. Morgan's statement, ex-Governor W. J. Northen read from the stage the following communication from Dr. W. W. Landrum, chairman of the executive committee of the ministers' conference:

"Concerning this great movement, in which the Christians of Atlanta are invited to co-operate, it should be remembered:

"1. It did not originate in Atlanta, but in New York.

"2. It is distinctly a gospel movement, designed to emphasize the following evangelical doctrines: The inspiration of the Bible as the Word of God, the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, His sacrificial atonement for the sins of the world, regeneration by the Holy Spirit and justification by faith. All these doctrines are specially emphasized in the document sent out from headquarters in New York, and which was read in open meeting by Bishop Nelson when the Atlanta pastors began to organize.

"3. In the plan of work outlined topics and speakers are to be arranged by a committee composed of one Baptist, one Episcopalian, one Methodist, one Presbyterian, one Congregationalist, one Cumberland Presbyterian—six in all, and all evangelical.

"4. The movement is sympathetic to all good work, moral, patriotic and philanthropic, and welcomes the aid of any who can co-operate only on these lines."

While no mention is made in this document, nor in Dr. Morgan's speech, for that matter, of any particular denomination or denominations, all understood that the Unitarians and Universalists were meant.

Dr. Morgan later said that, in view of the committee's statement, he would be glad to aid in the services and to pray God's blessing upon them.

Repentance was the theme, the text being taken from Acts xx. 21: "Testifying both to Jews and Greeks repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ."—Constitution.

MOBILE.—Report for February of Rev. R. A. Mickle, Seamen's Chaplain.—To The American Seamen's Society, 76 Wall St., N. Y.: Number of American ships, etc., in port since last statement, 12; all others, 44; religious services held in chapel, 89; in hospital, 12; average attendance of seamen at religious services, 14; of others, 4; religious visits to hospital, 4; on vessels, 8; in boarding houses, 30.; distributed 12 English Bibles, 2 German, 1 Swedish, 1 French Testament, and many sailors' magazines, leaflets, tracts, magazines and papers.

The short month of February has been a busy and in many respects a fruitful one. The religious services have been well attended by seamen, but the inclement weather tended to diminish somewhat the number of outsiders. Mrs. Trousdale and Mrs. Mangrum, from New Orleans, gave their promised concert with a view to putting in bath and sewerage. As the result, they turned over to us, from first to last, $63.35. Mr. Wm. Butler Duncan of New York, upon the chaplain's application, generously and promptly donated $50 for this much needed improvement of bath and sewerage. A lady contributed anonymously through a deacon of one of the city churches $1. The Southern Coal Company kindly gave some coal, and the ladies of the Bethel Auxiliary paid for the drayage of same. Graham and Delchamps printed gratuitously some circulars for the entertainment; Yeend and Potter gave the chaplain a fine double woolen blanket for the janitor's use; Kloskey, Lauretta, Ziegler and Yuile fed some hungry seamen; Mr. Bromberg gave German papers; a sailor gave some magazines, and the sisters of Mr. R. G. Markham, deceased, gave a quantity of magazines left by their brother. Mr. Bidgood gave a ream of note paper; The Bible Society of Mobile donated 10 Bibles. Notwithstanding the rain and mud, the monthly concert was enjoyed by a large crowd of sailors, and a goodly number of ladies and gentlemen from the city.

R. A. Mickle, Chaplain.

TALLADEGA; Isbell College.—The Rev. F. B. Webb, D. D., wishes it announced that he will withdraw from the management of Isbell College, and will have no further connection with it, after the present scholastic year, but will remain in charge of the First Presbyterian Church of Talladega, Ala.

Rev. W. A. Hall, pastor of Wytheville, Va., Presbyterian Church, being on a visit to his sisters and niece, preached an excellent sermon for Dr. Webb's people on Sunday night, March 1st.—Southwestern.

The Presbytery of Tuscaloosa will meet at Centreville, Ala., Tuesday, April 14, 1903, at 7:30 p. m.

J. G. Praigg, S. C.

KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE, Westminster Church.—On Friday evening, March 13, Dr. C. R. Hemphill will deliver a lecture on "The Apostolic Church." This lecture comes in the series on Epochs in Church History to be given in this church during this year.

CRESCENT HILL.—Last Sunday the communion of the Lord's supper was observed at this church. It was a precious season. Mr. Porter announced four additions since the last communion, two on profession and two by letter.

HIGHLAND CHURCH.—On account of Dr. Hawes' illness, the communion service announced for last Sunday had to be postponed. Mr. Carpenter, the pastor's assistant, preached both morning and night. Twelve persons have recently united with the church on profession, one of the results of the Sunday night evangelistic services which Dr. Hawes has been conducting.—Christian Observer.

TENNESSEE.

CLARKSVILLE.—At the suggestion of the Executive Committee I make a call for a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Southwestern Presbyterian University, to be held on Wednesday, March 25, at 10 a. m., in Clarksville, Tenn. The special object of the call is to elect a chancellor if the way be clear.

G. F. Nicolassen, Vice-Chancellor.

TEXAS.

Presbytery of Dallas will meet in the College Park Church, Sherman, Texas, Friday, April 10th, 1903, at 7:30 p. m. The Sabbath-school convention will meet at the same place, April 9th, at 7:30 p. m. E. M. Munroe, Stated Clerk.

The Presbytery of Western Texas meets at San Marcos, Texas, April 9th, 8 o'clock, p. m.

Stonewall McMurray, Stated Clerk.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

At a recent called meeting of South Carolina Presbytery, Rev. T. P. Burgess resigned his pastorate of the Ninety-Six and Coronaca Churches and accepted calls to Edgefield, Trenton and Johnston. The Ninety-Six and Coronaca congregations spoke in high terms of their pastor, and were loth to part with him. Brother Burgess expects to begin work in his new field about the middle of March.

GREENVILLE.—At the First Church, on Sabbath, March 1st, the sacred desk was occupied by Rev. Waddy H. Hudson, our returned missionary from China, now on a year's vacation in America. Mr. Hudson was in Savannah on the preceding Sabbath, when Dr. Sloane, pastor, announced to his congregation at the First Church that "a child of this church will occupy this pulpit next Sabbath."

UNION.—Rev. R. G. McLees assisted Rev. A. G. Wardlaw in a recent series of special services, and as a result, sixteen persons were added to the church on profession of faith, this making about forty new members received since last May, when Mr. Wardlaw took charge of the church.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Not Delinquent.

Mr. Editor:

Please allow me to say and say quick to the Brethren of Concord Presbytery that the list of churches sent me by our new Secretary as delinquent to Ministerial Relief Fund for a year, beginning April 1st, 1902, is not correct. Many of our most punctual and liberal and all our churches, loyal to the injunctions of Presbytery did not send their contributions direct to Assembly Treasurer, but to our Presbytery Treasurer, and should not have been counted delinquents. Dr. McElroy not being familiar with our method, did not confer with our Treasurer, H. L. Dixon, Hickory, N. C.

C. A. Munroe.

GREENVILLE.—The church at this place has extended a unanimous and most earnest call to Rev. F. G. Hartman, of Greenbrier Presbytery, to become its pastor. Greenville is a prosperous town, with a most promising outlook ahead for usefulness in the wideawake and vigorous Presbyterian church there. It is hoped that Mr. Hartman will accept and enter upon his duties as pastor in the near future.

GREENSBORO.—The Sunday-school of the First Church will take up a special collection on Sunday, March 29th, for "Little Joe's Church" at Barium Springs. Attractive envelopes have been printed for the offering. Who will follow this example?

PEMBROKE.—Arrangements have been made whereby there will be services at this point once a month.

RED SPRINGS.—On Monday night the 9th inst. Dr. H. L. Smith of Davidson College gave one of his wonderful scientific lectures in the Seminary Auditorium, on the Life and Death of Worlds. A large audience was present and many were convinced that Dr. Smith can see further back into the past, deeper into the present and further on into the future than most men.

He is an instructive as well as an attractive speaker. And handled his (to many of us) new subject in a masterful manner, never being once at a loss for the word wanted to express his ideas.

Tuesday morning, at the North Carolina Military Academy, he addressed the student body and others. Prof. McArthur and his helpers are fast pushing this school to the front, and Dr. Smith's address was a step in the right direction to help on the work and to encourage the boys.

J. McL.

At a call meeting of Mecklenburg Presbytery held in Charlotte, N. C., on the 10th inst., Rev. J. K. Fraser was dismissed to Charleston Presbytery.

The call from Monroe Church was accepted by Rev. Geo. H. Atkinson and the following order was made for his installation on April 9th at 8 p. m., viz:

1. Rev. J. R. Howerton, D. D., to preach the sermon.
2. Rev. J. A. Dorritee to propose the constitutional questions.
3. Rev. J. W. Stagg, D. D., to charge the people. Mr. Atkinson was granted the privilege of asking Rev. S. M. Smith, D. D., of Columbia, S. C., his old pastor, to charge the pastor on the above occasion.

The Trustees of Mecklenburg Presbytery were authorized and ordered to execute a receipt and refunding bond to the executors of the last Will and Testament of Mrs. Mary K. Minott, according to the laws of the State of New Jersey that a legacy of $1,000 may be obtained for Miss Ufford's school at Albemarle, N. C. T. J. Allison, Stated Clerk.

SUGAR CREEK.—The constitutional requirement having been complied with, I hereby call a meeting of Mecklenburg Presbytery to be held in the Second Presbyterian Church of Charlotte, N. C., on Tuesday the 24th inst., at 11 a. m. to transact the following business:

1. To act upon the request of Rev. G. T. Thompson for the dissolution of the pastoral relation between himself and Sharon Church.
2. To dismiss him to another Presbytery if the way be clear.

T. J. Allison, Stated Clerk.

Mecklenburg Presbytery will meet in regular stated session in Tenth Avenue Church, Charlotte, N. C., on Tuesday, April 14th, 1903, at 8 p. m. T. J. Allison.

BRUNSWICK COUNTY FIELD.—The Rev. Wm. Black, the Synod's Evangelist began a meeting on February 1st, at one of the mission points in this county near Phoenix. For eight consecutive days he preached the Gospel in the power and demonstration of the Holy Spirit to an appreciative people.

Church members were revived and strengthened in the faith, backsliders reclaimed, and 35 persons professed faith in Christ. Sixteen were added to the Presbyterian Church on profession, giving us a total membership in this community of 24. Sixteen heads of families agreed to hold family prayer for the first time in their lives.

A large number of the professions was composed of old men and women, one old man being in his 78th year.

Brother Black won the affections of the people, and his visit to us will ever be held in grateful memory.

On February 27th a commission of Wilmington Presbytery organized a Presbyterian Church with a membership of twenty-two, the immediate results of Brother Black's meeting.

Mr. A. M. Williams and Dr. T. V. Moore were elected ruling elders, a promising Sabbath-school was organized and steps taken to erect a Presbyterian Church at once.

The name chosen for the new church is Bethbirei, meaning the house of my creation.

To God be all the praise.

FAYETTEVILLE.—The Presbytery of Fayetteville will meet at Sanford, Tuesday at 7:30 p. m. April 14, 1903.

P. R. Law, Stated Clerk.

Needed—A Church.

Dear Standard:

For many years Rev. Mr. McLaurin preached once a month at Plum Tree, a thriving mounta'n village about twenty-two miles south west of Banner Elk and in the bounds of Concord Presbytery. This is a wide-a-wake little place and has several very successful manufacturing interests, such as Mica Mills and factories that work in wood.

There are about two hundred school children in the district. Mr. McLaurin having gone to another field, a church has never been organized, but there are in the village a dozen Presbyterians waiting for Presbytery to see the way clear to organize a church.

In the meantime, these people and others who are not Presbyterians but who would be if there was a church here, have been so much impressed by the work done in other places such as Banner Elk and Spruce Pine, that they resolved to build a church for themselves.

The Presbytery fully approved of this effort and has been ready to help in any way in its power.

It is in regard to this church and its present needs that I wish to write a few words to the readers of the Standard. My home is at Plum Tree, but I am a student at Davidson College preparing for the Presbyterian ministry.

Last year I was a student at the Lees-McRae Institute. While there I was so impressed by the advantages of the religious atmosphere of that noble school, that on returning home I determined to do all I could to help forward the plan to build a church.

I laid the matter before the people of the community and found that they were willing to give liberal support.

As a result of their co-operation we now have a five hundred dollar building about completed. It still needs doors, windows, flues and seats. These will cost about $100. Nearly everything so far has been done by the people of Plum Tree.

Seeing that it is impossible for us to raise the amount necessary to have the house ready for use in early spring, I take it upon myself to appeal to the Christian people of our State for their support.

We have no pastor, though Rev. J. P. Hall of Banner Elk has been coming once a month simply because he recognized the great importance of this field.

This is written after reading a letter from Mr. Hall in which he speaks of the great importance of having the Church finished at once.

If anybody, after reading this feels moved to help us, we sincerely hope that such persons will send their money as soon as possible to Rev. J. P. Hall, Banner Elk, Watauga county, N. C. S. W. Goforth.

FLORIDA.

The Presbytery of St. John's will meet at Clearwater, Fla., April 10, 1903, at 7:30 p. m.

D. L. Lander, Stated Clerk.

LAKE CITY.—The Rev. L. R. Lynn, the beloved pastor of the churches Mikeville and High Springs, preached both morning and evening to large and appreciative congregations in the Presbyterian Church at Lake City, on the 3rd Sunday in February. He also made an address before the Y. M. C. A. in the L. A. College, in the afternoon. Rev. J. S. Crowley, the pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Lake City preached in the Presbyterian Church at High Springs. At the morning service an offering was given for the cause of Home Missions. Mr. Crowley gave a missionary address at the evening service, exhibiting curios from the heart of Africa and also illustrating his lecture with them. The beautiful little church was crowded with people, and about 30 or 40 young men stood on the outside and looked in through the open windows and doors. A good offering was given for the cause of Foreign Missions and Mr. Crowley had a most delightful and pleasant time among the people of High Springs. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon Mr. Crowley visited the A. M. E. Church, where he made an address to the colored people who became very enthusiastic and manifested very much interest, and contributed of their scanty means as best they could to Foreign Missions.

Our church is now undergoing some repairs. It is being painted and a new carpet will be put down. The Ladies' Aid Society is having the repairs and painting done, and the Young Ladies' Aid Society is having a nice stained glass window put in, and the new carpet.

Suwannee Presbytery will meet with us on the 14th of April at 7:30 o'clock p. m., and we would like to have all the ministers and elders who expect to be here, inform the pastor, J. S. Crowley, as early as possible, and by what train and road they will arrive so that they can be promptly met and escorted to the homes assigned to them.

A large attendance is expected and a most cordial and hearty welcome awaits all who will be present.

MARYLAND

STREET.—We are very pleasantly situated. Church and manse buildings are comfortable, handsome and modern and beautifully situated on a hill, which affords a fine view. The church is young and hopeful, and there is a good deal of raw material to work on, besides contiguous home mission territory. So I am encouraged to expect, under God's blessing, future growth. The Catholics are strong and somewhat aggressive, but that is to be expected. You know this is Maryland. These are fine people here and they are very kind to their pastor.

Jonas Barclay.

MISSOURI.

The Presbytery of Missouri meets April 8th, 7:30, p. m., at Keytesville, Mo.

A. A. Wallace, S. C.

CALHOUN.—Rev. W. T. Howison has recently taken charge of the church at this place, and Calhoun, not Fulton, is his present address.

SPRINGFIELD.—Mr. A. Y. Beatie of the senior class in the Kentucky Theological Seminary, Louisville, has agreed to take charge of our church at Springfield, recently left vacant by the removal of Rev. E. F. Abbott to Boonville, Mo. He expects to begin work about June, 1st., and he will be most heartily welcomed by all the church who are doing as best they can without a Pastor, keeping up the Sabbath-school and prayer meeting, and having preaching at least once a Sabbath by temporary supplies.

GEORGIA.

ATLANTA.—The Presbytery of Atlanta will meet (D. V.) with Ebenezer Church at Hogansville, Ga., on April 15th, 1903, at 7:30 p. m. I would urge the ministers coming not to use their "permits," but "buy full fare tickets, getting certificates for reduced rates," so that we may have 50 or more members holding certificates as required.

P. P. Winn, Stated Clerk.

MISSISSIPPI.

Meridian Presbytery will meet Thursday, April 9th, 7:30 p. m., at Newton, Miss.

A. B. Coit, Stated Clerk.

ARKANSAS.

The Presbytery of Arkansas will meet at Conway on Tuesday, April 21, at 7:30 p. m.

J. E. Latham, Stated Clerk.

VIRGINIA.

The Presbytery of Norfolk will meet at the Belle Haven Church, Belle Haven, Va., on Tuesday, April 14th, at 8 p. m.

E. B. McCluer, S. C.

ALABAMA.

North Alabama Presbytery will meet in Birmingham, Ala., Tuesday, April 14, 1903, at 7:30 p. m.

W. I. Sinnott, S. C.

The Children's Mission Schools.

Dear Children and Sabbath-school Workers:

By appointment of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, the children of the Sabbath-schools are given the privilege of carrying on Mission Schools for the poor children of the Indian Territory. It is a blessing to both parties. The children of the Territory are thus being educated for citizenship by the time that great State is admitted into the Union, and are being prepared as well for citizenship in the kingdom of Christ. Our Sabbath-school children in giving to these Mission Schools receive the greater blessing, for "remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.'"

For the amount of money expended, no work in the church is producing more magnificent results. During the present school year we are carrying on eleven schools, employing 23 teachers and educating more than 1,000 pupils. Who can estimate the grand results in the future citizenship of that country growing out of all this wholesome instruction? Who can estimate the results for eternity? Sir Humphrey Davy, being asked which he considered his greatest discovery, answered "Michael Faraday," his protegee. The greatest discovery of the West will not be some new mineral or gold mine, but some great mind, some immortal spirit (trained perhaps in some of these schools), that will bless the church on earth, and that shall shine forever in the galaxy of saints.

The next fifth Sabbath will occur March 29th, when an opportunity will be given of making a contribution to this worthy cause. Will not every Sabbath-school scholar invest something for Christ in this work?

S. L. Morris,

Sec'y Home Missions Pres. Ch. U. S.

Forward offerings promptly to W. A. Powell, Atlanta, Ga.

Foreign Mission Lectures.

Besides several churches in the Trans-Mississippi, Dr. DuBose has recently visited our colleges at Sherman, Brownwood and Batesville; the Theological Seminary at Austin and the Normal College at Huntsville; and the Universities of Texas, Arkansas and Missouri. He had previously visited Fulton.

Notice - Home Missions.

The Books of the Executive Committee's Treasurer of Home Missions will close March 31. It is very important to have all funds in hand by that time, if they are to be included in this year's report to the General Assembly. Will not all pastors and church treasurers see that all funds collected for this work are forwarded immediately to Capt. W. A. Powell, Atlanta, Ga.

S. L. Morris, Sec'y.

The blockade of the ports along the Orinoco river has been raised by the Venezuelan Government.

The lowest death rate in any civilized nation is found in Sweden. For ten years the average has been 16.49 per thousand.

The poets in Germany have formed a trust. They have entered into a compact not to accept less than half a mark (12 cents) a line for their work.

It is rumored that the German Crown Prince and Alexandra, the 20 year-old daughter of the Duke of Cumberland, are betrothed. The Crown Prince is at present in upper Egypt.

King Victor Emmanuel has conferred on Signor Mascagni the title of Chevalier of the Order of Savoy. The conferring of the title is attributed to the King's desire to show sympathy with the composer as a result of his tribulations in the United States.

Last year 31,000,000 gallons of alcohol were used in Germany for technical purposes and for fuel. For motor wagons, light runing machines and small railroads it is said to be cheaper and more practical than coal, and for lighting purposes more economical than petroleum.

In reply to an invitation to send delegates to a convention to consider the race question, to be held in Atlanta—a scheme set on foot in Wisconsin, Governor Aycock wrote:

"We have troubles enough of our own and have always been diligent enough to meet and overcome them."

The rumor is revived that Lord Minto will shortly resign the Lieutenant-Governorship of the Dominion of Canada. He confesses that he has been a social failure at Ottawa through his inability to comprehend the lines of social demarkation that obtain among the elite of Ottawa.

An unusually perceptible earthquake shock was felt at Olympia, Wash., March 13, at 6:25 o'clock p. m. Buildings were shaken so that the occupants ran into the streets in alarm. The principal shock was preceded by a tremor of a few seconds and followed by a slight tremor, the entire disturbance lasting nine seconds.

The project to construct a harbor and dock eastward of the rock of Gibraltar has received an impetus by the report of Admiralty commission, which has reported on the feasibility of the scheme. The approximate cost of the improvement is placed at $32,500,000, and it is estimated that it would take ten years to complete the undertaking.

The Constitution of Tennessee provides that whereas ministers of the Gospel are by their profession dedicated to God and the care of souls, and ought not to be diverted from the great duties of their functions, therefore no minister of the Gospel, or priest of any denomination whatever, shall be eligible to a seat in either House of the Legislature.

Count Zeppelin, according to the Geneva correspondent of The Daily Mail, London, has just completed an automobile-launch "which possesses the peculiarity of having its propellers in the air. According to the inventor, the launch will be of the greatest use in tropical lakes and rivers encumbered with aquatic plants, which, obstructing the screw, render an ordinary steam-launch useless. The launch is extremely light, has a draft of only ten inches, and it skims the water at a rate varying from fourteen to sixteen miles an hour."

While the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Moody, and his party were making a visit on shore at Havana, March 15, a squall of the most violent kind swept over the harbor. It became as dark as night and the wind and the downpour were terrific. Commander Stoney, of the Dolphin, realizing the peril to the small boats in the harbor during such a squall, called for volunteer rescuers. The entire crew of the Dolphin responded. Boats were instantly manned and sent off. The launch returned with four half-drowned Cubans and the captain's boat with others.

The bill to erect in Richmond, Va., a monument to John Brown "for being instrumental in ridding the United States of the curse of human slavery, was killed by the Fifty-seventh Congress. The New York Sun comments as follows:

"John Brown was hanged for rebellion against the State of Virginia. For the government now to erect a statue to him would be to sanction rebellion and repudiate its own constitutional relations to a member of the Union."

Although Congress failed to pass the bill giving preference to G. A. R. veterans in the matter of government employment, and amended the present bill so as to discourage young women from marrying "ex-soldiers for the purpose of receiving the widow's pension after their death," the pensions of those who lost limbs in service were increased, and the pensions of Mexican and Indian war veterans were made $12.00 a month instead of $8.00 as heretofore, which will make the expenditure $750,000 more each year.

Regular daily communication has been established between Guadeloupe and Martinique by a system of wireless telegraphy. The station in Guadeloupe is situated near Gosier lighthouse, and that in Martinique somewhere on the peninsula of La Caravelle on the east side of that island. These stations have been installed by a detachment of army engineers. Thus far only official messages between the governments of the two colonies have been exchanged. The system in use is not that of Marconi, but one devised by the French engineer corps.

Sixty-seven sewers empty into the Hudson between Waterford and Coxsack alone. Yet people put Hudson River ice into their goblets! Put bottles of water on ice and be civilized, and refrain from typhoid fever.—Ex.

The people living on the Northern coast of Norway have for some time suffered severely from the ravages of seals, which destroyed or scattered the fish on which they mainly subsisted. Now it is proposed to send warships to the waters where the seals are most numerous to destroy as many as possible and break up the herds.—Exchange.

The decree of the Czar of Russia proclaiming religious freedom to all who reside in his domains, is a notable event. The intolerance of the Greek Church in the past is well known, and that other religions are now to be allowed alongside of it is a great stride forward. The Associated Press dispatch of yesterday conveying this information says the new decree will apply even to the Jews, and it is to be hoped that this is the case. But it has been recently stated that the Russian Government has refused to allow shares in the Jewish Colonial Bank to be held by Russian Jews. This bank is the financial institution of the Zionist movement, and its foundation principal is to secure the necessary capital to buy the land of Palestine from the Turk, when the auspicious hour shall arrive when the Sultan makes up his mind to dispose of ancient Jewry for needed cash. Half of the 10,000,000 Jews in the world live in Russia, and if this new decree applies to them it will immensely relieve the fierceness of their long persecution there, and will give them a chance to educate and develop, which will mean progress for the Empire as well as for the race itself.—Charlotte Observer.

The world in general, and the great European powers in particular, are to be congratulated on the partial solution of the Macedonian question. The Balkan storm-cloud is perceptibly lightened, and, while there is still considerable menace in the air, it is felt on all sides that, granted the smooth working of certain forces, a permanent peace for the Balkans may be in sight; a new era of well-being for the long-suffering Slavs of the three Macedonian provinces may be at hand. This pacific settlement is chiefly due to the same sentiment in the Russian Czar which inspired the proposal for the Hague court, and the success of Count Lamsdorff in carrying to a certain finality the Czar's policy of humanity and mercy is by far the greatest achievement as yet to the credit of the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs. The main point, diplomatically, was to gain the friendship and sincere cooperation of Austria; and, partly as a result of the ripe experience of Kaiser Franz-Josef and the Slavonic leanings of Count Goluchovski, and in part as a result of the growing insight into Russia's real political motives, this good understanding with Austria has been made possible and actual. It is by far the strongest factor for good in the future of the Balkan problem.—Harper's Weekly.

The Bureau of Chemistry, of the Department of Agriculture, has grown to be one of the most important in the whole service. There are now eight laboratories, each with its distinct and well-defined field of labor. These are foods, sugar, dairy products, fertilizer, soil analysis, road materials, insecticides and agricultural waters and dendrochemical or arboreal studies. Among the most comprehensive studies attempted by the Bureau are the effects of environment on special plant growths, such as sugar beets and wheat, especially valuable in the introduction of foreign types. Quite as valuable is the work to determine the fertilizer requirements of plants and the means of determining these by chemical analysis, a study that obviously could only be carried out under unprejudiced Government control.

A British treaty with Siam is expected to be announced soon. It is said that the future of the Malay states of Kelantan and Tringanu will be settled by the recognition of Siamese supremacy and by the appointment of two British subjects, in each case as resident and assistant resident respectively. The local rajahs pay the salaries and Siam nominates the candidates subject to British approval.

The wealth of the states is immense. Gold is found in abundance. One syndicate is working in Kelantan under a concession of such value that its $5 shares are now quoted at $25.

Siam has also made other minor concessions, and indeed, the general attitude of the government of Bangkok is regarded as conciliatory.

The ratification of the French treaty with Siam will hardly be pressed and negotiations may be instituted with the object of modifying it. Ever since the conclusion of the treaty the Colonial party has denounced the agreement which obliged the French to evacuate Chantaboon, and granted other concessions to Siamese sentiment in exchange for what it claims was only a slight accession of territory. The French governor of Indo-China then came forward with fresh proposals, and finally the Paris press declared that the Siamese envoy resorted to illicit practices to secure his end.

March 3, 1903, will stand as an important date in the industrial history of this country (such is the prevailing view), in case the injunction issued in St. Louis on that day by Judge Elmer B. Adams (of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eighth Circuit in the Eastern District of Missouri) is sustained by the higher courts. "There will be no more railway strikes in this country" if the injunction is so sustained, says the New York Commercial Advertiser; and P. H. Morrissey, grand master of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, agrees that "if Judge Adams's order is written into the laws of our country, organization of labor, which is to-day the hope and protection of those who toil, can no longer contribute its beneficent influences in bettering the condition of the working people." The trainmen and firemen on the Wabash road, it appears, had authorized the officials of their unions to make certain demands of the company, and to order a strike if the demands were refused. No agreement was reached, and the company was notified that if the demands were not granted, a strike would be ordered at 5 p. m. on March 3. The company, however, applied to the United States court for an injunction to restrain the men from striking, and Judge Adams granted it. There was no strike, and it is not thought likely that there will be one until the injunction is dissolved. Proceedings for and against such dissolution are now on.—Literary Digest.

Professor Alfred Russell Wallace, the eminent scientist, has an article in the Fortnightly Review, which persons who accept the theories it expounds will find not a little flattering to human self-conceit. Dr. Wallace reminds us that the early astronomers considered the earth the centre of the universe, but that, gradually, as telescopes improved and astronomical science was perfected, the conviction grew that there were an infinite number of worlds, and that ours was probably one of comparatively small consequence in the multitude. Dr. Wallace thinks that there are not so many worlds (or stars) as has appeared. He finds that the great telescopes which reach the remoter depths of space find the stars much less numerous in those distant regions. From this he argues that the number of the stars is definitely limited. That being so, they have a centre, and he suggests that the cluster of stars to which earth belongs, being near the centre of the plane of the Milky Way, is really at the centre of the universe, as the early astronomers supposed. The probability that earth occupies this remarkable position he finds helpful to the belief that the Creator had extraordinary intentions with regard to it, and planned, in making it the home of man, that on earth the ultimate purpose of creation should be worked out. So Dr. Wallace doubts that any other planets than ours are inhabited, and that anywhere else than near the centre of the universe could an orderly development of living souls have been attained. It is a consoling theory. Only astronomers are qualified to weigh or discuss the assumption on which it is based, but we can all hope that it is true.—Harper's.

The Mississippi flood situation between Carnthersville, Mo., and Baton Rouge, La., is serious. The river is rising rapidly (March 15th,) and it will be a little short of marvelous if the levees hold the great volume of rushing waters. The gauge at Memphis marks 38.5 feet, a rise of one and two-tenths foot since last night. This is the highest water ever recorded here and Local Observer Emery, of the weather bureau, said to-night that 39 1-2 feet would be registered by Tuesday and those interested have been warned to prepare for a stage of 40 feet. The situation in and around Memphis is becoming more serious. Without a single exception the numerous lumber plants in North Memphis have suspended operations, owing to the encroachment of the waters. At Fourth and Market streets, people are moving about in skiffs and the street railway has annulled all schedules in this part of the city. Three of the Illinois Central's tracks are under water north of Auction street, although traffic has not been suspended on them, but if the water continues to rise trouble is expected there. At Easley, 6 miles below Memphis, 500 feet of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley's tracks are inundated, but they were "cribbed" over to-day and trains are running through. The Choctaw Railroad has suspended operations between Hopefield and Wolf river and all trains are being sent over the Memphis bridge. A dangerous place in the levee is reported from Holly Bush, 20 miles north of here. Engineers of the St. Francis levee board, with a steamboat, went to the scene to-day. It was found that the water was running over the levee for a distance of 600 feet. Men and material are being sent there and a strong fight is being made to hold the embankment, but it is believed by many that a break will occur in a day or two.

The Christian Herald (New York), which is receiving and forwarding money to relieve the famine, has investigated the situation in Finland through correspondents there. It summarizes the conditions as follows:

"Last year's crops were a total failure, owing to the unprecedented rains, which rotted the grain in the ground. Besides, the fisheries, which supply the means of existence to a very large proportion of the people, also failed through the same cause. Peas, beans, and potatoes grew sodden and rotted in the soil, like the grain. The hay, too, then went through rot and flood. Spring was late; then came a long succession of chilly rains and early frost, killing off the last hopes of the farmers. In the provinces mentioned, there were not more than half a dozen dry days the whole summer. It was altogether the most utter crop failure in half a century, and has brought the people of one hundred and ninety-four parishes to a condition of destitution.

"Finland's average grain crop is easily $12,000,000 short of the preceding year; and this, together with the loss in sea and lake fishing, means ruin to thousands of industrious peasant families. Hunger, with all its terrors, has invaded the northern provinces, and multitudes are to-day living upon bread made from unripe rye and barley, which even the horses reject. Loaves of barley husks and straw are all that stand between them and starvation, and there are thousands who have not even a morsel of that wretched compost to stay their hunger, and who are compelled to live upon the kindness of their neighbors. In the last great famine of 1867, when the crops failed, 100,000 were said to have died of starvation. This winter the situation is even more serious, and the authorities are alarmed for the fate of the sufferers. Four hundred thousand, or one-sixth of the entire population of the country, are reported as literally on the verge of starvation."

GRAHAM.—Died, near St. Paul's, N. C., Feb. 11, '03, Mrs. Mary Graham—near eighty-five years of age. Her husband, Archibald Graham, had died many years before. Her children, Robert and Maggie, still live—all dearly beloved in the Lord.

SHIELDS.—A tribute to the memory of Mrs. Ann Shields, a mother in Israel, by the Ladies' Missionary Society of the Carthage Presbyterian Church of which she was a member.

It hath seemed best in the all-wise providence of our Heavenly Father to take from us our friend and co-worker, Mrs. Ann Shields. She fell asleep in her sixty-fifth year. Her passing away was calm and sweet. A true woman, a loving and devoted mother, a consecrated and consistent Christian, her life was one of sunshine and helpfulness. She might well be called the mother of her neighborhood, for in sickness or distress she never failed in giving personal help and comfort. One of her most beautiful traits of character was her loyalty and devotion to her church. Through rain and sunshine she was found in her pew at the stated church service.

"We'll miss thy voice, thy touch, and the true helping,

Of thy pure hand,
Till through the storm and tempest safely anchored

Just on the other side,
We shall find thy dear face looking through death's shadows
Not changed, but glorified."

HOVIS.—Died, in Steele Creek, North Carolina, Feb. 27, 1903, Mr. Franklin Hovis in the seventy-sixth year of his age. He was an up right and valuable citizen. For many years he had been a member of the Steele Creek Church, regular in his attendance upon the exercises of the Sunday-school and the preaching of the word. He was buried at Steele Creek, and sleeps in the peace and promise of the Gospel. A widow and four children—all valuable citizens—survive him.

ALEXANDER.—This "elect lady," Mrs. Sarah S. Alexander, of Charlotte, after long and grievous suffering, borne with patient submission to the divine will, entered into rest on the morning of Dec. 8th, 1902. She was born in Clear Creek township on Nov. 17th, 1833. Her life therefore extended over almost three score and ten years. The writer of this tribute has known but few people who have filled this long allotment of life to so good a purpose. She became a Christian early in life and was a steadfast, consistent, and fruitful servant of God till the day of her death.

Shortly before the outbreak of the Civil War she was married to the late Dr. Elias C. Alexander, well known as a practising physician in Monroe and afterwards in Charlotte. For many years, through all the hard conditions brought about by the war, they lived together happily as heirs of the grace of life, ordering their household in the spirit of Christ and training up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. They both lived long enough to enjoy the best reward of faithfulness and love that can be given to Christian parents, viz., the sight of all their children exemplifying the principles of truth which they had taught them and leading upright, active, useful Christian lives.

Moreover it was given to both of them, first to the father and years afterward to the mother, to experience in turn, through a long period of helpness and suffering towards the end, the most loving, tender and devoted care and ministry at the hands of their dear children.

The quiet, gentle, loving spirit which had been the most potent factor in the making of this Christian home and the moulding of these Christian men and women who grew up in it, continued to shine serenely through days of peace and prosperity or days of sore bereavement or days of intense suffering till the very end.

The women who are best worth knowing, whose characters attain to the finest type and whose lives are of most value to the community, are usually not known to the general public. Dr. Samuel Johnson was right when he said that "domestic virtue, as it is exerted without great occasions or conspicuous consequences, in an even tenor," is that which really makes, though not the splendor, the felicity of life. "Of such a character," he adds, "which the dull overlook and the gay despise, it was fit that the value should be made known and the dignity established," and that it should be displayed in such a manner as to attract regard and enforce reverence. He was referring to Pope's famous epitaph on the monument of Mrs. Elizabeth Corbett, who died after an exceedingly painful illness and is buried in St. Margaret's Church, London:

"Here rests a woman good without pretense,
Blest with plain reason, and with sober sense:

No conquest she but o'er herself desired,
No arts essay'd but not to be admired:
Passion and pride were to her soul unknown.

Convinced that virtue only is our own:
So unaffected, so composed a mind,
So firm, yet soft, so strong, yet so refined.
Heaven, as its purest gold, by tortures tried;
The saint sustain'd it, but the woman died."

It is to such genuine, unostentatious, sensible, earnest, Christian women that the world is most indebted. Those who keep the home life pure and sweet and true are the real conservers of our Christian civilization.

The foundation of her sound and wholesome character and her lovely and beneficent life was simple faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. She loved Him. She loved His people. She loved His church. She rejoiced in the service of the sanctuary. Her good works abounded not only in her home, but in the causes of the church. Especially notable her zeal for missions and her liberality to the poor. She had the poor on her great heart continually. Her good works ceased not while she lived, though she was so great a sufferer.

To those who remember her great sufferings and her simple faith and her loving deeds, two passages from the Revolution of John now come like healing balm. One of them is this: "Neither shall there be any more pain." The other declares: "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them." W. W. M.

The Household.

A Happy, Poor Woman.

Of course a poor woman cannot buy many violets in mid-winter, or many posies of any sort; and yet, if she be a worshipper of beauty, she wants her vases filled with vines and blossoms. I manage always to give a bowery look to my wee rooms; a couple of growing ferns helps a lot; there are quantities of the grey-green and red-brown grasses that are so feathery and lovely, and that kindly keep their loveliness until the flowers bloom in the spring; and then the trailing ground-pine and the cedar give greenness and spicy fragrance.

A room, to my mind, is well furnished that has an open fire and a clean hearth; a harmony in the choice and arrangement of the furniture, no matter how inexpensive this maybe; necessary, but not too many, articles about; and some perfume and beauty of plant life. Very little outlay of money can attain this, but considerable love and thought are involved.

To-night I sit before my "sea coal glow" and thank God for health and strength, for the simple beauty about me, the simple living, the simple joys, before me. I think of no hunger unsatisfied, no taste starved. Over there, "my song birds in a row" await the moment my present idle mood shall pass. Near by lives a friend who is due to drop in later in the evening, and together, over the walnuts and the apples, we will talk of many things. We will speak of the day's work; exchange a few secrets, and a few happy hopes.

An open fire of a winter's evening, a friend beside it, a plate of apples at my elbow; what more could a woman ask for?—Katherine Pope, in The Pilgrim for December.

Mistakes Women Make.

One of the mistakes of womankind is in not knowing how to eat. If a man is not to be fed when she is, she thinks a cup of tea or anything handy, good enough. If she needs to save money, she does it at the butcher's cost. If she is busy, she will not waste time in eating. If she is unhappy, she goes without food. A man eats if the broker's man is at the door, if his work drives, if the undertaker interrupts; and he is right.

A woman will choose ice-cream instead of beefsteak, and a man will not. Another of her mistakes is in not knowing how to rest. If she is tired, she may sit down, but she will darn stockings, crochet shawls, embroider doilies. She doesn't know that hard work tires. If she is exhausted, she will write letters, or figure her accounts. She would laugh at you if you hinted that reading or writing could fail to rest her. All over the country women's hospitals flourish because women do not know how to rest. Another mistake on the list is their constant worrying. Worry and hurry are their enemies, and yet they hug them to their bosom.—Exchange.

Care of Sewing Machines.—When a sewing machine is heavy to work take out the cotton and thoroughly oil every part of the machine with paraffin. Work it briskly for a few minutes, that the oil may penetrate thoroughly, and extract all dirt and grit, and then wipe every part of the machine carefully with a soft old duster. When the paraffin has been removed, oil the machine again with the proper lubricating oil. Paraffin should never be allowed to remain on the machine, for it heats the bearings and causes them to wear out.—Exchange.

A hot bath will bring sleep. Suppose a person to be so tired out by overwork of any kind, as to feel nervous, irritable and worn, to be absolutely certain that bed means only tossing for hours in an unhappy wakefulness (we all know this condition of the body and mind), turn on the hot water in the bath room and soak in the hot bath until the drowsy feeling comes, which will be within three minutes; turn on the cold water until it becomes tepid; then rub yourself with a coarse turkish towel until the body is perfectly dry, and then go to bed.

You will sleep the sleep of the just, and rise in the morning wondering how you could have felt so badly the night before. The bath has saved many a one from a sleepless night if not from a severe headache the next day.—Dr. Cyrus Edson.

The Sanctuary.

Dear little arms that 'round me twine,
Dear little heart that leans on mine,
You are so small—the world goes by,
And never sees us, you and I,
Who sit in some sweet, sheltered place,
And whisper in a close embrace.
But oh, if all the trumpet flare
Of all the pageant passing there,
If all the beauty of the earth
All treasures of whatever worth,
The glory of triumphal things,
The gift of fame, the wealth of kings—
If these, and more, were offered me
For you, my child, in barter free,
I'd give my answer in a smile,
And hug you to my soul the while!—

MISS MAY MARKELL,

A Society Belle of London, Canada.

MISS MAY MARKELL of London, Ontario, Canada, is a beautiful girl who knows what suffering is and Wine of Cardui has brought her back to health. She is one of the social favorites of her home and her recovery to health has permitted her to enjoy the company of her many friends instead of lying on a bed of sickness and suffering. For the health she now enjoys she gives credit to Wine of Cardui. She writes:

"I have found Wine of Cardui an excellent remedy for female trouble. I suffered for three years with terrible bearing-down pains at the menstrual period. I could hardly stand on my feet and was never real well. Wine of Cardui was the only medicine that I could depend on to do me any good, as I tried several with no success. Wine of Cardui cured me and I have now enjoyed perfect health for two years, and give you all the credit for I know you deserve it."

For a young girl Wine of Cardui is the best remedy to guide her through womanhood by starting the menstrual flow in a healthy and natural manner. Menstruation started right is very easy to keep regular through the years of mature womanhood. Then the "change of life" need not be feared. Thus Wine of Cardui is woman's best relief from youth to old age. A million women have secured blessed relief from their sufferings by taking this treatment. It relieves menstrual troubles in an incredibly short time. In a simple case of deranged menses Wine of Cardui never fails. To relieve disordered menses is to remove the cause of other female troubles. Any physician will tell you that to remove the cause of a disease renders the cure easy, in fact seldom fails to complete the cure. If you would have the same relief which Miss Markell secured try Wine of Cardui. You can take it without an examination and without any publicity whatever. You can take it in the privacy of your home and secure just as much benefit as if a doctor had prescribed it for you. Thousands of women are feeling the vigor of returning health by taking Wine of Cardui.

Another Appreciation of the Aetna.

LUMBERTON, N. C., November 26, 1902.

J. D. BUSHALL, Esq., Manager Aetna Life Insurance Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir:—After a careful comparison of policies submitted to me by the Aetna Life, Bankers' Life of New York, Equitable of New York, Northwestern, New York Life and Prudential, I have accepted $10,000 in the Aetna on the 20-payment life plan, with option of 25 year 3 per cent. Gold Bond Contract.

I have been a policy-holder in the Aetna for nearly eight years, and therefore feel somewhat prepared to judge of its merits from actual results. With all due deference to other companies, it affords me great pleasure to say that in my opinion the Aetna cannot be surpassed for plain and liberal contracts, and for just, conservative and economical management. I now have $12,000 in the Aetna. My partner, Mr. W. W. Carlyle, has $16,000 and one of our clerks, Mr. John T. Biggs, has $2,000, nearly all of which was written and delivered by your special agent, Mr. H. T. Spears.

Wishing you and the grand old Aetna continued success, I am,

Yours very truly,
ROBERT D. CALDWELL.

The Home Circle.

Babies White and Brown in Siam.

By Mrs. Chalmers Martin.

The French people in their indignation against the United States for what they are pleased to call "the spoliation of the weak by the strong," seem never to have heard that homely adage: "People who live in glass houses should not throw stones," and to have forgotten the high-handed manner with which they wrested from the king of Siam the rich territory that he was not strong enough to defend. The land ceded to France is about four hundred miles northeast of Bangkok, and lies east of the Mekong or Cambodia River. The northern part of the kingdom of Siam is divided into six provinces, tributary to Siam, but which are governed by their own chiefs or princes. These are the Laos provinces, the largest of which is the province of Chenng Mai, or Zimme as the French call it, and as it is set down on some maps. The city of Chenng Mai is the capital and chief town. There has always been a certain indefiniteness in regard to the boundaries and claims of Siam.

In 1884 Prince Bijit, brother of the king of Siam, was sent to Cheung Mai by the king to uphold the rights of Siam to some valuable teak forest lying to the northwest of Ranheng, which were claimed by the chief of Cheung Mai. About the same time Mr. E. B. Gould was appointed British Vice-consul to the Laos States and commissioned to confer with the Prince in regard to the boundaries between Siam and Upper Burmah, then recently acquired by Great Britain. In 1885 Mr. Gould was instructed by his government to make a long tour to the north in order if possible to determine the frontier line of the two countries. So slowly does the world move in that far-off land that the Prince spent more than two years in Cheung Mai adjusting these matters.

Prince Bijit had shared with his brother, the present king, the instructions of an English lady, Mrs. A. H. Leonowens, who was employed by their father, the late king, as governess for his children. The Prince spoke English fluently and correctly, with only a little accent. During his stay in Cheung Mai, he was a good friend to the American missionaries there and a welcome visitor in their families. To our modest household he seemed especially to attach himself, perhaps because my husband was about his own age. Out of respect for our democratic habits, he would often call upon us with but few servants, and a soldier or two.

In Siam no person of rank goes out entirely unattended; in their train would be necessarily a slave carrying an earthen ware water jar with a drinking cup of lacquered bamboo, brass, silver, or gold, according to the wealth of the owner, turned over its top: an attendant with an umbrella of oiled paper to protect his master's august head from sun or rain; another keeping the purse and one carrying a round box which may be of plain or precious material, containing the betel nut, quicklime, tea and tobacco, which rolled in a seri leaf forms the quid of the betel chewer. Happily our Prince had no use for this, as he was not a chewer of betel. The number of followers in a native retinue depends upon the master's position, from two or three, to twelve or fourteen, and in the case of persons of exalted rank, like the prince, of a great company.

One morning I stepped out on the back veranda to order our breakfast served, and found there a swarthy Siamese soldier in brilliant uniform and bare feet, with a gun over his shoulder, pacing solemnly to and fro. From his explanation, which was difficult for me to understand, I gathered that his Highness, Prince Bijit, having invited himself to breakfast with us, had arrived before we were up. With the consideration of a gentleman he would not allow us to be aroused, but awaited on the front veranda the opening of our doors. On this occasion he brought with him his daughter, a young girl ten or twelve years old. One of the servants carried a fine Chinese cloak of black satin lined with white fur, which the Prince begged me to accept. There was no opportunity to add anything but jam and sardines to our simple breakfast fare. I knew that the Prince could eat foreign food, and hoped that his daughter might be able to do so.

But consternation seized me when I realized that the pretty, modest Laos girl who waited upon our table so deftly and quietly, was accustomed to prostrate herself and never to stand upright in the presence of a native prince. Besides she had never before even seen so exalted a personage as His Highness, and I feared she would be paralyzed with terror. The native dining tables are small and low, one sits on the floor before them, and the servants stoop and kneel in serving.

Contrary to our ideas of politeness by which an inferior stands while his superior sits, Siamese etiquette does not permit an inferior to be above a superior. It is also bad manners for one person to reach higher than another person's head for any purpose; in any rank this requires an apology. But it is really impossible for a maid to wait on a civilized table without standing erect, and I explained to the girl that for the time she must regard the Prince and Princess as foreigners, and wait upon them as she was accustomed to wait upon the English consul or the doctor; and although I could see her hand shake with agitation when she offered their Highnesses anything, she performed her part with credit. So our impromptu breakfast party went off successfully. The little princess was a trifle awkward with her knife and fork, and inclined to make her breakfast of jam, but she was quiet and well behaved, and sat patiently listening to conversation of which she could not understand a word.

About the time of the early rains, that is the month of May, 1885, there came to our home a sweet baby girl, and the same month a daughter was born to Prince Bijit. This coincidence delighted him immensely, since the Siamese put great stress upon the bond of union between persons born in the same month or year.

That the babies were both girls did not seem to lessen the joy of their coming. Our baby received the simple Bible name of Ruth. She was an object of most intense interest to the natives, who adore their own children and almost reverence white babies.

"Cum Mogn," said some one to the Laos nurse, who was walking proudly up and down the veranda carrying her little charge, "do you love Ruth the same as you do your little brothers and sisters?"

"No, indeed," was the indignant rejoinder, "they are just common Laos children, but this little lady is a foreign white baby, so I love her far more."

When Ruth was only a few days old, there was heard in the compound a great tramping of feet and prancing of horses: our Prince had come with a large retinue of servants and soldiers, in great pomp and state, to make a visit of ceremony to the new baby. He was much disappointed when told that he could not see her mother and offer his congratulations in person, but the excuse so often made by the native to the white man: "It is not our custom," satisfied him. Baby Ruth was arrayed by proud and loving hands in the full regalia of Imperial Babyhood, the dainty flannels, embroidered petticoats, sheer white muslin frock, white silk socks, and soft white shawl adorned with forget-me-nots. As if to emphasize her Anglo-Saxon origin, Ruth was a very white baby with a purely transparent skin, even at an extremely tender age. To the Prince, who had never before seen a small white child, this vision of infancy was a revelation.

"How beautiful, how white, how soft, how clean," he exclaimed, almost awed by the softness and the whiteness. "How clean," he repeated, touching the pink cheek and lifting reverently a dimpled hand. Then, as if anxious to say the proper thing, he added:

"I think she will be handsome—like her mother." As he was leaving the house, he met the doctor, to whom he imparted his admiration of our small daughter, always reiterating the refrain, "And so clean, so clean."

The next day Ruth's father went with Dr. McG—, a veteran missionary, to pay his respects to the new born princess. She was shown to them with great pride a very tiny morsel of humanity compared with a white baby, in complexion rather fairer than a grown Siamese, and with a round head well covered with thick black hair. Her Highness had no clothes on, but was wrapped in a muslin scarf. All native infants lack that pure freshness as of the early day or the newly opened flower, that impresses one so strongly in a white baby.

Dr. McG— was an intensive baby lover and to his large heart the tiny brown baby was attractive and dear. Tenderly he took it in his arms, and turning to the father, he asked permission to pray for the child. The Prince gladly consented and the venerable "father-teacher" offered a fervent petition for the little one's welfare. Alas, while little Ruth thrived like a flower in spite of the hot and at some seasons unhealthy climate, the little Princess succumbed in infancy to an attack of small pox.

At last, when even Oriental deliberateness could find nothing more to detain the Prince and his suite in Cheung Mai, and the enormously elaborate and expensive preparations for moving a household of several hundred retainers had been made, and the Prince called to take leave of us, his farewell gift was a photograph of himself in full uniform; on the back of it he had written in Siamese: "To my dear friends whom I love—a token of affection at parting." Soon after the Prince's departure we were obliged to leave Siam, so that we never saw him again.—N. Y. Observer.

On Pleasure.

He who cannot find pleasure except in gaiety, nor recreation except in some sort of amusement, is a creature made of coarse and sordid clay. The pursuit of pleasure is quite an occupation with many people, but pleasure is an elusive spirit and is more often captured on a still hunt than by the hot and strenuous chase. There have been men and women who have spent their lives amid the giddy excesses that are supposed to constitute pleasure's peculiar realm who have died confessing that they never knew a day of happiness in all their lives. The world saw the glitter and pomp that surrounded them, but could not know of the heartaches and soul hunger that often lurked behind the smiling faces.

You noisy, restless fellow; pursuing pleasure in gaiety and dissipation, do you know what you are missing? If you would only try, you might get a more serene and lofty pleasure in another way. Last night as you were hurrying to a ball you felt sorry for the lot of the poor young laborer whom you met going home after his day's work. But while you were bowing and smiling and dancing and drinking in the stuffy hall and the glittering saloon, he was sitting by his fireside chatting his wife, frolicing with his babies, smoking his pipe, nor envying you any of your rioting. He felt sorry for you this morning when he met you going home through the early dawn flushed with wine and nervous with excitement.

Oh, reveller, you have been pursuing pleasure, but last night as you hastened along pleasure was pursuing you and you heeded it not. The stars looked down upon you from their far heights, and you could have beheld the splendor of ten thousand worlds had you but lifted your gaze. You could have beheld what moved David to poetry and worship, Job to divine philosophy and Copernicus to discovery and exploration. Orion, the armed warrior, held his lofty station, Arcturus flamed in dazzling brightness, the Pleiades shed on old Earth their "gentle influence," Ursa Major swung half way around his mighty polar circle, while you were listening to tinkling instruments and shuffling feet. You might have seen it all; and have watch the moon rise over the shaggy hill and thus have been "present like an archangel at the creation of light." Today your face would have been less pallid and your hand more steady besides.

Last night instead of going to the dance you might have gone to bed, which would have been so much better. You could have listened to the wind around the gables and under the eaves. You could have let your imagination run riot, and have conjured up many a pleasant fancy. You could have heard the voices of the spirits of the night as they trooped by in the wild gusts. You could have thought of the fox prowling under the winter moon, the rabbit hopping timidly through the brush, the great owl blinking at the stars, the lamb in the fold, and the little child in his cot.

You have longed to see Swiss sunsets and Italian skies; but are you familiar with American sunsets and skies? They are not common-place. Sit in your western window this evening and watch the glorious sun go down, and you will not wonder that simple, untutored peoples have worshipped it as a god. With what resplendent glory does it veil its departure! What cloud-mountains of gold and jasper, what stately palaces lifting their heads to be crowned in living light, what variegated banners athwart the world! Watch the light fade away until the beauty is faintly visible in the distance, like the gates of heaven, far, far away. Then lift your eyes to the pale evening star which, like your soul, lingers in sight of, but all too far from, the courts of glory. And you will wonder if you can ever have an evil thought again, or an unholy ambition—and this will be pleasure such as spirits enjoy about the throne of the Highest.

You would go to Italy to see its beautiful skies? Wait until some mild day next June, and go out into the orchard, and lie down flat on your back in the lush clover, and look up through the branches of the apple tree to where the white clouds are floating in seas of ethery blue. And presently you will begin to wonder that you never knew before that the skies were so blue over your orchard. And as you gaze, solemn and sweet thoughts will come to your soul unbidden. How paltry and mean will all those things appear that vexed and worried you only yesterday. You will look upon the things of earth from the heights of heaven and see them as they are. And your soul will be thrilled with ecstasies of pleasure, and you will be happy with the same kind of happiness that fills the mocking bird's throat with melody and the poet's mouth with song.

These are a few of the pleasures that you might have in place of those giddy rounds of amusement that are eating out your heart and ruining your life. But you say it would take a poet to enjoy all this, to see and hear the glory of earth and sky. Yes, you must be a poet or a child. Many of us who cannot be poets have to content ourselves with the hearts of children.—Rev. Charles L. Greaves, Reidsville, N. C., in Biblical Recorder.

What hast thou done to-day for God?

Answer, O soul of mine!

What thorny pathway hast thou trod,

Trusting in strength divine?

What gift upon the altar laid,

Of all that was most dear?

Or hast thou meagre tribute paid,

With less of love than fear?

The Mysterious Parcel.

For the Standard.

It was early in the afternoon of Christmas Eve, and Miriam could scarcely wait for nightfall and the promised treat. She was not going to a party, nor was she going to give a party; and this year there was not to be a Christmas tree. This was the second year of the war, and even the youngest child in this Southern town knew better than to expect Santa Claus to come prancing through the streets with his old time magnificence. And yet even the youngest child believed, in its heart of hearts, that he would contrive to slip in, somehow. Yes, indeed, never was blockade strong enough or strict enough to shut out the dear old Saint.

Miriam was only seven years old, but she was the eldest of the family, and her mother's companion. In the morning her mother had said: "Now, Miriam, if you are a good girl all day, I shall let you help me fill the stockings to-night after Paul and the baby are asleep."

No wonder she was impatient for the dark to come. If she was a good girl? Wasn't she nearly always a good girl? She hadn't flown into a tantrum for ever so long, she minded her Father and Mother, and she just loved to wait on people. Everybody always said, What a good child Miriam is! Everybody, that is, except her Mother.

Just before tea-time something happened. The door-bell rang, and up walked Miss Sarah, little Paul's Sunday-school teacher. All during her visit Miriam's eyes were glued upon a parcel in Miss Sarah's hand. It was round, and about four inches in diameter. The rim was more than an inch wide. Miriam thought maybe it was for Paul; but when Miss Sarah rose to go, the mysterious parcel was still in her hand.

"Why, what a polite little girl you are!" said the young lady, as Miriam accompanied her downstairs from the sitting room. At the front door the child sidled up to her and asked, in a low, coaxing tone,

"What's in that little bundle, Miss Sarah?"

"Oh, that would be telling," said the visitor, laughing, "Santa Claus expects everybody to keep his secrets."

Miriam glanced up the steps to see if her mother were in hearing. She did not see her, and felt relieved, but not so happy as before.

After the little ones were asleep, her mother called, "Miriam," and she went into the nursery. There was no sign of Christmas gayety lying about the room. Miriam was not surprised, for there had been no Christmas gayety in her Mother's tone.

Miriam did not help her mother fill the Christmas stockings that night. Instead, came a talk that gave her a long, deep look into the heart of things, and, most of all into her own heart. Some quiet tears moistened her pillow before she slept, but "I am glad," she thought, quoting from one of her Sunday books, "that there isn't any thorn in my pillow. I don't mean ever to forget the things Mamma told me tonight."

The pretty tin wheel with the revolving horseman inside that Miss Sarah sent Paul next morning helped her all winter not to forget. But the broken toy was cast aside forty years ago, and Miriam remembered still.

The Forge of Life.

By Mary Morrison.

Here, take it, Lydia, and keep it for me." Lydia Danvers looked up from her study of Longfellow in surprised astonishment, as Carla Earl held out a handful of bills, with a pleading accent in her voice.

"Yes, take it, do, and don't look so dumbfounded, I'm not giving it to you, understand. I'm far and away too stingy to do that; just keep it for me and dole it out in homeopathic doses. I mean it shall last until pay-day if possible, and I know if it stays in my possession, I shall spend the whole lot in ten days at farthest and then be a pauper until papa sends me some more next quarter. I hate paupers!" she exclaimed vehemently.

A dark flash shot from among the tawny lights in Lydia Danvers' eyes.

"Don't look so tragic, my dear. I'm privileged to hate them aint I, as long as I'm the only representative present?"

Lydia laughed mirthlessly; it was the only answer she could make to her roommate's forceful remark. "Hate paupers!" There were others perhaps with a capacity for hatred of which Carla Earl could not conceive.

"You will, won't you?" the girl continued coaxingly. "You are always such a good steady old thing, I shall feel perfectly safe." Carla tucked the money into her hand confidently.

"But your bills, Carla; surely you mean to pay those?"

"Oh, I've paid Miss Prince and the chocolate man and my laundry bill. I suppose there is something against me at Fernwood; I had roses five times and carnations twice last quarter. Well, I'll attend to that later."

Lydia regarded the money in her hand thoughtfully a moment; then she held it out. "I'd rather not, Carla. I—," she stammered reluctantly.

R. M. COFFEY, C. T. A.,
Charlotte, N. C.

"Oh pshaw! It won't be any trouble. All you have to do is to give what I absolutely need and if I come begging for some awful piece of extravagance, like the automobile ride I gave the girls last month, you are to put your foot down gently and say 'No, my dear; my orders are strictly against it.' Don't you see?"

"It's terribly absurd, Carla."

"So is common sense, but it's extremely necessary you know, and as I haven't any I mean to profit by yours 'willy nilly'." Carla smiled up into her companion's face with pleasing candor.

"Well, I'll write a receipt for it then," Lydia declared in desperation as she counted the roll of bills so ruthlessly thrust upon her guardianship.

"No you won't. There's just seventy dollars. I've five for things too foolish to even ask for. I guess there will be enough left to get along decently upon. Now tuck it away somewhere and come and play basket ball," she said, going to the door, but Lydia shook her head.

A sudden desire to be alone for a moment came upon her. She wanted to examine this wealth that had been so unexpectedly consigned to her care. Seventy dollars. She spread it out before her; there were two tens, and ten fives. She picked them up one by one and scrutinized them closely. What great possibilities lay in these bits of crumpled green paper, of advancement, of comfort, of ease, and they were all to go for fripperies; for things if not absolutely injurious, at least unnecessary and superfluous. She had never bought a pound of chocolates in her life. She would scorn even to eat them so long as Lide, dear, gifted Lide waited patiently at home and cooked,—what little she could get, and washed and scrubbed and tended her chickens and waited upon grandma, content to bide her time which could not come until she, Lydia, had had her chance.

That it was due to the mere circumstance of her name, always turned her hot with shame. One of these would bring a little of comfort, of unexpected pleasure into the dull gray of Lide's life. Her heart throbbed with longing which must go unsatisfied. She had better put them away from sight where their mocking possibilities might not taunt her so mercilessly; she who never knew the pleasure of giving; of planning the spending of an extra coin.

"So much for tuition, so much for laundry, so much for paper, postage, etc.," so aunt Lydia's letters always ran. And Carla Earl had said she "hated paupers."

She took a crumpled letter from her pocket; it was worn at the folds and almost illegible from much reading. One sentence she read and reread.

"You spoke of your enjoyment of fruit at meals. Think of grandma, Lydia, when you eat grapes. She has talked of nothing but grapes since they began to ripen. As for me I am hungry for nothing but books; for those I am absolutely starving. Why Lydia, I have not seen a page of anything new except an almanac, and that Mrs. Denkama brought grandma one day last week. It advertises some new remedy which she is going to persuade grandma to try. I devoured it, testimonial and all, but it was scarcely appetizing."

Lydia thought of the rows of volumes on the library shelves which so few among them cared to take down, unless to read up on some required question. She too had felt the same hunger; it was more poignant than food hunger. She looked down upon the bills which still lay upon her lap. What would happen supposing she should send one—only one. It would scarcely be missed. Carla was so careless. She would forget perhaps. It would mean grapes, a book, some much needed article of clothing. One more might make a set of artist's materials possible. Lide had always longed for them. Through their magic inspiration even the pinch of poverty might lose its sting. The longing was growing into mad desire.

She arose suddenly and crumpling them fiercely in her hand, thrust them into a crevice behind the dresser; then she went to the window and threw up the sash, with panting breath. There were tears on her cheeks which the breeze had not dried when she returned again to her neglected theme. The first words that met her eye were like a cool bracing wind; they calmed and strengthened her.

"Thus at the flaming forge of life
Our fortunes must be wrought.
Thus on its sounding anvil shaped
Each burning deed and thought."

She drew a long breath. This one temptation would never have power to move her again.

She finished the preparation of her theme, then she wrote a long letter to Lide and went to post it. When she returned Carla was in the room. She laughed consciously as Lydia came in.

"Where were you? I've waited all of half an hour. Say Lydia I want ten dollars awfully. No don't say anything just yet till I tell you," she interrupted hastily, as Lydia smilingly shook her head. "It isn't candy or boat rides or even flowers; I've had an accident. I threw the ball through the window in Miss Prince's bedroom and broke the dear old thing's plate glass mirror into fragments. It will cost all of fifteen dollars to replace it."

"That was an unlucky toss. You might better have written your theme," she remarked as she slipped her hand behind the dresser. "Why, you've got it Carla," she said reproachfully.

Carla looked at her in surprise. "Why how could I get it when I didn't even know where it was?"

True, that was an unanswerable argument. Lydia pulled the dresser out into the room and searched the surroundings hurriedly, but the little crevice was empty.

"That was a queer place to put money. Are you sure you didn't put it somewhere else?" Carla's tones were suspicious, so Lydia fancied. The tawny lights emitted scintillant sparks,—then remembering, quick tears pnt out their flashing light.

"Yes, I am sure." She strove to calm herself, pride and resentment were not for such as she. Carla came and assisted in the search but it availed nothing.

It was as Carla said, a queer place to put money. Lydia could not explain the sudden impulse that had prompted her to put it out of sight. They stood and looked into each other's faces; there was petulant distrust in one; in the other the shadow of a great regret.

"I have told you the truth, Carla, I put it there—and it is gone; where I do not know. I wrote a letter after you left the room, and went to post it but I locked the door. That is all I can tell you." She turned away and sat down at the table; the trouble in her eyes touched even Carla.

"But what am I to do with only a pitiful five dollars—? I can't go to Miss Prince with that and it is three whole months yet till . . ." she turned and flung herself out of the room.

After she had gone Lydia returned frantically to the search. She moved out every piece of furniture; she tore at the closely tacked carpet; she even took the bed clothing from the bed, piece by piece; there was nothing to be discovered. It was as if the will had become the deed. Her brain felt dull and dazed. Had her hands then unconsciously completed the work her heart had conceived? She had read somewhere of such things.

For a second time she threw up the sash and let the rushing wind beat upon her throbbing temples. And Carla had only an hour ago called her "good" and "steady" and had talked of her common sense.

Her latent fond of this much abused commodity came to her aid presently. It was gone, there was no gainsaying the fact; nor the fact that she must make it good; how or when she could not tell. She shivered as she thought of Lide and realized that this was another burden for her slender shoulders and it was hers to tell her that she, Lydia, had deliberately clasped hands with evil. It had not seemed to matter that she had repented, —in results.

When Carla returned she had grown quiet. She came and stood beside her with folded hands.

"I have searched everywhere for your money, Carla; it is gone, I do not know where. I cannot expect that you will believe me. I cannot blame you for any course you may see fit to take, but I will repay you with the first money I may call my own. You said you hated paupers. I am a pauper." Her tones were solid; she was merely stating facts.

Carla looked at her curiously, then she went away and sat down by herself to think. It was a task not often attempted and she had not even the consoling aid of a chocolate. She picked up a bit of string and chewed it reflectively; she was used to the motion of chewing. The fact that she was to be deprived of the pleasure of spending her money troubled her more than the question of whether it had been lost or stolen. It was gone; that necessitated a course of self-denial which she had no mind to practice. She could not bring herself to accuse her room-mate of theft. It might have been lost; it was easy to lose things she knew by experience. After all it was her own fault. She had no right to impose such a responsibility upon any one and Lydia had protested—had almost refused. "Well the more a body learns the more they find out," she said to herself whimsically.

After supper Alta Barto and Sarah King came for her to go out shopping. They generally wanted her to go at least once a week, usually on Saturday evening. It meant an abundance of sweetmeats for Sunday eating, unless Carla was bankrupt; in that case they consoled themselves with thinking of the near future when she would be "flush." Now they were safe in asking her, on the evening of her "pay-day." But she shook her head.

"No use girls. I'm insolvent already," she said ruefully.

"Why Carla Earl, you awful girl! You don't mean to say you have spent it all," Sarah King's voice expressed surprise and consternation.

"It is gone—to the dogs. If that is the reason you young ladies desire my society, I am glad it has," Carla declared vehemently.

Lydia raised her eyes gratefully from the letter she was writing.

"Why Carla, how can you? Of course it isn't. It is our treat tonight anyhow; you had better come," but she shook her head.

"I must beg to decline your most pressing invitation," she said ceremoniously. After they had gone she came and stood by Lydia. "Who are you writing to?" she asked abruptly.

"My sister Eliza; Lide we call her." "You never told me anything of her before."

"There was nothing to tell, that you would care to hear."

"Is she coming to school?"

"Probably not—now."

"Why not?"

"I am writing to tell her 'why not,'" answered Lydia quietly.

"Oh ps! aw!" Carla turned away impatiently and picked up her Physics. "I might as well study, seeing that I can't do anything else," she said petulantly.

Lydia was still writing when she finished and went to bed. When she awakened from a sound sleep she saw her still at the table but her head rested wearily on her arm. Carla crept silently from the bed and approached her. She was asleep; there were undried tears on her cheek. Carla looked over her shoulder at the closely written pages on the table; one of which she could read. It did not occur to her to respect its contents.

"Oh Lide! you cannot know what a torture it is to stay on here while you are there, chained to the bald, bare rocks of poverty of body and soul. I turn with loathing from the daintiest food, knowing you are eating crusts. I have worked with a feverish impatience, but now, now that this has come upon us,—Lide do you believe it was a judgment because of the dreadful envy and covetousness I let into my heart? If the punishment fell on me alone—but you—." There were several great blots here but nothing more. Beside the sheets lay a letter worn and crumpled which she unfolded. When she had read it she erept humbly back to bed. "Poor Lydia, and poor Lide."

She lay very still for hours after Lydia came to bed, but she did not sleep. Unusual emotions rendered her sleepless; "enlargement of the heart," she told herself whimsically. She had never known what it was before to absolutely long for money, or regret the unworthy use of it. There was so much she might have done if she had only known,—but three months couldn't last forever.

Next day May Wilgamott, next door, came in triumphantly. "I've fixed them now, girls. We shan't lay awake nights any longer listening to rats skurrying up and down the walls. They scare me almost into fits some nights."

"Oh, rats are nothing. I like to have something to lay all mysterious sound to," declared Carla. "If I hear ghostly groans or a funeral rattle, I always say it's nothing but the rats, and turn over and go to sleep. What have you done to them?"

"Just gave them a spread of wafers and 'Rough on Rats': slipped them under the mop boards you know."

"And now we shall be haunted by ghastly smells probably," suggested Carla, which proved only too true. Complaints dire and deep came to Miss Prinee who was compelled at last to investigate.

When the mop boards were taken up several decomposed rodents were promptly removed. There were also several young rodents sleeping profoundly in a nest of crumpled green paper. They did not awaken when Carla pounced eagerly upon it and bore it away to Lydia in triumph.

"Oh Carla! I'm so glad, so glad you know," Lydia exclaimed fervently.

"I knew all the time but I was too mean to say so," confessed Carla contritely. But she did not confide it again to Lydia's keeping and there was a new sparkle in her eye and an earnestness in her manner that Lydia saw with satisfaction.

Carla too had been touched by sparks from the "forge of life."

When Lide wrote again she was bubbling with joyous rapture. "Oh, Lydia, such books and so many of them. What fairy godmother has touched you with her golden wand? And grandma is perfectly happy. She sits here nodding and the sunshine has turned the grapes in her lap to globules of ruby wine." And I am so glad dear Lydia, the money is found; but no one could really think you took it. You are over sensitive, dear. And I—I am superlatively happy. Do not waste another regretful thought on me. We will both work and hope and trust."

Lydia went to Carla with a full heart. "How did you know! who told you?" she asked tearfully.

"Spirits or—rats," declared Carla gayly, but the kiss she left on Lydia's lips was a pardon and a promise.—The Interior.

Children's Letters.

Gastonia, N. C., March 7, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I thought I would write to you as I have never written before. My mama takes your nice paper and I like to read the letters very much.

I have one sister and one brother. I go to school at the graded school and am in the third grade. My teacher is Miss Janie Jackson and I like her very much. I go to Sunday-school every Sunday. My Sunday-school teacher is Mrs. Hunter. Rev. M. McG. Shields is our pastor. I will close hoping that this will not reach the waste-basket.

Your little unknown friend,
Age 8. Susie Rankin.

King's Mountain, March 7th, '03.

Dear Standard:

As I haven't written to you before, I thought I would write a few lines. I go to school every day. My teacher is Cousin Ella Torrence. I like her. We have four teachers. Prof. Warwile is principal. I am in the fourth reader, arithmetic and Webster's spelling book. I go to Sunday-school. Our pastor is Mr. Forbis. He has just come to us from Florida. We like him very much. He will preach at Long Creek Church Sunday. I want to go. My grandmother goes there and I'll see her. She is going on her 90th year; she was to see us not long ago and stayed two weeks. I have two brothers and one sister. My youngest brother has two pets, Kitten and Bantam hen.

Your unknown friend,
Age 8. Bessie Ramseur.

Charlotte, N. C., March 8, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I will write you a short letter, as I have never written before. I am going to school now, it will close the 16th of April. My teacher is Mr. Ernest Orr of Charlotte. I will answer Mary Melchar's question. God is not found in Songs of Solomon. I will ask a question. How many chariots did King Solomon have? Also, How many horsemen did he have? Whose drinking cups were all gold? I will close for fear of the waste basket.

Your unknown friend,
Eugene Alexander.

Charlotte, N. C., Mar. 9th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I have never written to you before, I thought I would write. Papa takes your nice paper and I enjoy reading the Children's Letters and stories very much. I go to school at Pine Grove. Our school closed last Friday. Miss Bessie McCord was our teacher. I liked her very much. I go to church at Williams. Rev. J. J. Harrell is our pastor. I will answer Mary E. Melchor's question: God's name is not mentioned in Esther and also Amy Tola Fesperman's question. The word girl is found in Zechariah, 8:5. I will close by asking a question, Where are the words dishes, spoons and bowls found in the Bible?

Your unknown friend,
Age 11. Myrtle McCord.

Fern, N. C., Mar. 9, '03.

Dear Standard:

I like to read the little letters in your good paper. I go to school. I like to go very much, it will close soon. I will answer Hattie Bell Smith's question, Coffin is found in Genesis 50:26. I will close.

Your little friend,
Paul H. Kime.

Minor, N. C., Dec. 15, 1902.

Dear Mrs. McKelway:

As I have never written to the Standard before, I will try for the first time. We have been taking the Standard for a long time. I certainly love to read the letters from the children. I have five sisters and one brother. My brother has three pets, a sheep a dog and a colt. Our school has started now and Miss Carrie McCoy is our teacher. I like her very much. We go to Poplar Tent to preaching and Mrs. McLain is my Sunday-school teacher. There is four of us to go to school but I didn't go to-day I have such a bad cold. Well I guess I have written all I know.

Your little unknown friend,
Sarah Harry.

Shelby, N. C., Mar. 7, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I have never written to you before, I will write a short letter to you. Grand papa takes your nice paper. We live with grandpapa and I enjoy reading the nice little letters. I am a little girl eight years old. I go to the graded school. I am in the second grade. Miss Davis is my teacher. I go to Sunday-school. Mrs. Maggie Brice is my teacher. Rev. W. R. Minter is our pastor. I have two brothers and two sisters. I will close for fear of the waste basket.

Your little friend,

Dear Standard:

I am going to tell you about the pets that we got this week. They are rabbits, and our Uncle Sim gave them to us. They are white and brown. We have them in a big box in the garden. Their hair is as long as a goat's hair and it is about three inches long. We never saw any like them before. We had North Carolina day yesterday at school and we sang "Carolina" and "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," and "Perri merri dictum

Cotton, N. C., Feb. 27, 1903.

Dear Standard:

Our father read us a story in the Standard about a boy who trained two oxen. That made me think of the ox my brother and I tried to train. We made a cart and hitched him to it. We used a belt for a back-band and a twine string for an under-girth, and an old bridle with bells on. I had hold of the bridle and he wouldn't go, so my brother hit him with a switch. Then he jumped over a bush four feet high and took the cart with him, and the cart never touched the bush. Another time when we had him hitched to the cart, he jumped over the well-sweep hole, 5 feet across and broke the cart all up. His name is Sandy. My brother's name is Kenneth. One day Ken got on Sandy's back and he stood on his hind feet, then on his front feet, and threw Ken over his head, and Ken held on—held to his horns—and lauded on his feet with his back to the ox, nearly sitting on his nose. When he got tired of us playing with him he would lie down all day and make out he was sick. And when Uncle Angus was here he helped us pull him up with a rope. We had to give up training him because he got out in the woods with his mother. Good by.

Graham MacDonald.

T. K. P. China, Nov. 28th, 1902.

Dear Mrs. McKelway:

I have been thinking of writing to you for a long time and tell you how much I like to read the stories you write about Goldie and Brownie and big sister. Perhaps the reason I am so interested in them is because I think I am close kin to one of them. I think my mother is Goldie; she is a missionary away out here in China now, and has three children, I am the oldest and Sophy is my only sister and James my only brother. I don't think we have quite as good a time as Goldie, Brownie, and big sister had, and I heard Goldie say that considering she and Brownie were friends so long she didn't get very many letters from her. Sometimes on some special day we get nine or ten donkeys, one for each child in the station. One day we were through a corn field, my donkey was way ahead of the rest. We were going full speed when my donkey boy cracked his whip and made the donkey jump and I sat on at first but soon fell off. How is Benjamin getting along now?

Dear Standard:

I am a little boy eleven years old. I have to get up early in the morning and milk the cow, for my brother that milked is away at school. I helped to trim the apple trees to-day. Hope we will have plenty of fruit don't you? I go to school every day. I had a fine goat but sold him not long ago. I have a lot of chickens. Best wishes to the Standard.

Dear Mrs. McKelway:

As I see so many other children writing, I thought I would write too. I live in North Carolina. I have one brother and one sister. My sister is younger than I am, and my brother is older than I am. I have took music all this session. Mama says I am doing real well for a girl 8 years old. School is just closed and we are glad for we are fixing to go to our grandmother's in Harnette county to spend our vacation. I will close for fear of making my letter too long.

The Story of Mrs. Apple-Tree.

One morning in spring a little boy and girl ran merrily down the garden walk. The little boy carried a tin shovel and something shut up tightly in his hand. Presently they came to a nice place in the garden, and shoveled the earth away with the shovel until they had a snug little bed; then they put the tiny seed they had carried into the little bed, and covered it with the dark cover. In the little seed, all folded away asleep, was a tiny plant—the little germ of life—which the sunlight and rain and proper soil would waken and start growing.

The big, round sun shone down on the little bed, and after a time the little seed said: "Dear me, how warm I am; I really must throw off my brown jacket."

It tried to do so, but found it very hard, so said it must wait a little longer. Before many days a cloud came sailing along through the sky and said to his children, the raindrops: "There is a little seed down in the earth that needs your help. You've been long enough in cloudland, anyway; it is time you were going back to earth to help the streams and rivers to the ocean; then, of course, you can come back."

So the little raindrop children came pattering merrily down, and trickled all about the waiting seed, and then ran on. Soon the seed began to swell; its jacket became so tight it could hardly breathe. It made another effort to throw it off, and it split right open and came off without a bit of trouble. So the little plant was free; but, O my! it was so dark—so very dark.

"There must be light some place," said the plant, "or I wouldn't want it so badly."

So it sent its little roots down into the earth to get it something to eat to make it strong, and it kept pushing up to find the light. One day it pushed right through the dark ground, and it was so bright it could hardly see for awhile.

Pretty soon the little sunbeam came and said, "Welcome to Earthland, little tree," and the breezes, too, gave it welcome. It grew very fast. One day in spring something came out all over the little twigs, beautiful and green. Yes, they were leaves. Then something white, something with a little pink tinge, came to visit Mrs. Apple-tree. These, you say, were the blossoms, but they were really Mrs. Apple-tree's babies.

After a time, Mrs. Apple-tree said that her children were no longer babies, and ought to put off their baby dresses. She had so many babies to dress, and you know it takes a good while to dress a baby, so Mrs. Apple-tree said she would have to have help. She called on Mr. Wind and his family, the jolly little breeze children, to help her undress the babies, and she had arranged with Madam Spring to have their short dresses all ready.

The Apple-tree children were very tender and must not be left undressed an instant, so Madam Spring did a very strange thing indeed. She put on the short dresses before Mr. Wind had taken off the baby dresses. She never could have done it, of course, only that the Apple-tree children never have sleeves in their dresses, so you see she could just slip them over their feet and tie them up snug round their necks, and just as quick as a wink, Mr. Wind and his children whisked off the white dresses and carried them away.

Old Mother Earth called to Mr. Wind, and asked him what he was going to do with the baby dresses. Mr. Wind hardly knew, because they were not at all soiled.

"Well," said Mother Earth, "we must never waste anything, so if you will just toss those dresses into my lap, we will make them over for the Apple-tree babies next year." Mr. Wind was very glad, and tossed the dresses into Mother Earth's lap for her to make over.

The children's short dresses were—yes, they were all green; and there was something very strange about them too. They were a little like rubber—when the Apple-tree children grew, why their dresses grew, too, so they never had dresses too tight, but just nice and snug.

One day in fall, Mrs. Apple-tree said that her children were grown, and that they ought to have new dresses; but she really could not afford to buy them any new ones, and she just believed she would color them. She was very particular, so she sent to the best coloring shop she knew of. Mr. Sun was the proprietor. He sent down his little sunbeam fairies—Red, Orange, Yellow, Green, Blue, and Violet—in a ray of light to do the work for Mrs. Appletree.

Mrs. Appletree thought the children were old enough to choose the color they wished for their dresses, and they thought that they would all have red ones. And do you know, when they saw how beautiful those little sunbeam fairies were, they did the queerest thing—they went to work and ate them all, except the little red fairy, and she wouldn't be eaten up. Some people would say they absorbed them; but anyway, the little red fairy said if she made their dresses she couldn't be eaten.

Mr. Wind came along one day to see how the children looked in their new dresses, and he was delighted. "Now, Mrs. Apple-tree," he said, "your children are all grown up, and look beautiful in their new dresses; it's time for them to go out into the world and make some one happy."

Mrs. Apple-tree sighed, but she knew that was what God meant, and what she had reared her children for, so she let Mr. Wind take them to make little boys and girls happy.—Olive M. Hoover in St. Louis Christian Advocate.

Choosing Who Should Go.

"Of course I shall be the one. I'm oldest," said Edith.

"No, I shall, because you went away last, and I didn't," said Ruth.

"I need a change for my health," said Anna, with a drawn down mouth that might truly be the sign of pain, but with rosy cheeks which could be the sign only of a very healthy girl.

"Whoever goes," said Mrs. Stone, "will have not only the visit, but the new clothes."

"Then it will have to be me, because I haven't a thing left over from last year, and must have new clothes anyway," said Edith.

"I think I might be the one," said Anna, "for I have a new winter suit already."

"Which fits me as well as you, and could be borrowed," added Ruth.

"Children! children!" cried Mrs. Stone, in despair. "What would Aunt Nell say if she were to hear you quarreling so over her invitation? She writes, 'I love all three of my nieces so much that I don't know which one I want to visit me next, so I will leave it for them to decide. Send along the girl who needs the change, and I promise her as nice a time as I know how to give.'"

"But, instead of filling them with contrition, this reading of the letter made their desire to go all the stronger.

"Think of the sleigh rides behind the grav pair, all nestled down in those soft black furs!" said Anna, with a sigh, drawing the folds of an afghan about her, and half closing her eyes.

"I presume you hear the jingling of the sleigh bells now," said Ruth. "A person with such a vivid imagination as you've got doesn't need to go away to enjoy things."

"Well, mother," said Edith, with a very grown-up air, "I think somebody ought to go who will do credit to the family, and of course I've been out more and know how to act in society better than these children."

"These children!" screamed Ruth and Anna, in a derisive chorus; but Mrs. Stone held up her finger with a warning gesture, and then, to the surprise of all, she buried her face in her hands and sobbed—Yes, mother was crying!

The three girls looked at each other in dismay. "Mother!" cried Edith, gently, "what have we done?"

"I am too tired of it all," burst out the sobbing woman. "It has been so

A TRAIN FOR MILLIONAIRES

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

S. L. DILL, Superintendent

ever since your father died. Things no sooner get to running smoothly than their is a great fuss over who shall have a new dress, or whose boots are the shabbiest, or who shall go on the picnic. When there are three children there ought to be money enough to divide by three, not by one. I can't decide for you any more. You must choose some way yourself."

The slow tears ran down her cheek. Edith noticed how pale and wrinkled it was. There used to be color there when the father was alive. And what a shabby dress! "Mother, I've decided who shall go, and it's not myself. Will you all consent? And, mother dear, will you let me do all the contriving about clothes and packing, so that you needn't have a thing to decide about it till the day comes to go?"

Mrs. Stone wiped away the tears, "I am very much ashamed," she said. "Of course I'll help get any one of you ready. It was the disputing that troubled me."

"Just this once, let me, mother," said Edith. "It will do me good, truly."

So Mrs. Stone consented, and the two young girls were borne away to Edith's room. "Which of us is it?" asked Ruth.

"Neither," said Edith. "Why, Edith Stone," said Anna; "you selfish old thing, to choose yourself."

"I didn't," said Edith. "It's—it's—mother!"

"Mother!" echoed Ruth. "Why, she wasn't even asked," said Anna.

"No, but Aunt Nell would rather have her than all three of us put together, if she had any idea she'd come. "Girls," and Edith's voice trembled, "the money has been divided into three parts when it ought to have been four. Does mother ever have a new dress? Does she ever go to a picnic or trolley riding? Do we choose her to have the extra orange or the Christmas present that's not marked for anybody? No, sir! We're selfish old pigs, that's what we are."

"But will she go?" asked Anna. "She'll have to," said Edith. "Ruth, you run straight down to Marcy's, and say that we've decided to change the blue suit for a black one. Anna hasn't worn it, and there was a lovely plain black for the same price. You don't mind, do you Anna?"

"I'll wear my old one till it falls off," said that young woman, "and imagine it's stylish," with a wink at Ruth. "Her bonnet is all right, and how thankful I am my new silk waist is a plain black one and too large. It will just fit mother."

"And I'll get boots for her instead of skates for me," saith Ruth, "and let her choose any of my stocks she likes, and—and she may take my new belt buckle, if she'll be very careful of it."

A note was dispatched to Aunt Nell, and the loving planning went on, till the day for the visit came, and the mother was still in ignorance. She had thought it wise to let Edith arrange things this time, and had not tried to solve the mystery.

At ten o'clock the three girls stood before her. "In one hour," began Edith,

"the expressman stops at this house for the trunk of the one who is to visit Aunt Nell."

"Which is no evidence, as the same trunk will go, which ever person went," put in Anna.

"That trunk is now packed," said Edith.

"And the contents not to be poked over or criticized by the traveler," said Ruth. "And all lent articles are to be considered the person's own."

"The ticket is bought," said Anna.

"The person's pocket book properly filled, with her name and address within in case of accident," said Ruth.

"And the lucky girl is—?" smiled the mother.

"Mother?" cried three voices in chorus.

And in telling about it all to Aunt Nell, Mrs. Stone said that if those artful daughters of hers had given her longer than one hour to think of it, she would have decided not to come, and that she was glad they hadn't!—The Churchman.

Clippings.

A young lawyer, just starting in his profession, hung out his sign in a Connecticut town where there was only one other lawyer, an aged judge.

A close-fisted old fellow, thinking to get legal advice for nothing, called upon the young man, told him he was very glad he had come into the town, as the old judge was getting superannuated, and then contrived in a sort of neighborly talk to get some legal questions answered. Then thanking the young man, he put on his hat and was about to leave, when the young man asked him if he should charge the advice, for which the fee was five dollars. The old fellow went into a violent passion, and swore he never would pay. The young lawyer told him he would sue him if he didn't.

So the old fellow went down to see the judge, found him hoeing in his garden, and said:

"That young scamp that's just come into town! I dropped in to make a neighborly call on him, and he charges me five dollars for legal advice."

"Served you right," said the judge; "you had no business to have gone to him."

"But have I got to pay it, judge?"

"Of course you have."

"Well, then," said the man, "I suppose I must," and he started off.

"Hold on!" said the judge; "aren't you going to pay me?"

"Pay you? What for?"

"For legal advice."

"What do you charge?"

"Ten dollars."

The result was that the old fellow had to pay five dollars to the young lawyer and ten dollars to the old one.

A lawyer, whose eloquence was of the spread-eagle sort, was addressing the jury at great length, and his legal opponent, growing weary, went outside to rest.

"Mr. B— is making a great speech," said a countryman to the bored counsel.

"O, yes, Mr. B— always makes a great speech. If you or I had occasion to announce that two and two make four, we'd be just fools enough to blurt it out. Not so Mr. B—. He would say:

"If, by that particular arithmetical rule known as addition, we desired to arrive at the sum of two integers added to two integers, we should find—and I assert this boldly, sir, and without fear of successful contradiction—we, I repeat, should find by the particular arithmetical formula before mentioned—and, sir, I hold myself perfectly responsible for the assertion I am about to make—that the sum of the two given integers added to the other two integers would be four!"

A Marysville schoolma'am was teaching her class the mysteries of grammar.

"Now, Johnny," said she, "in what tense do I speak when I say, 'I am beautiful?'"

The little fellow answered, quick as a wink, "The past."—Epworth Herald.

Mr Godfather had brought up his son according to the good old model which teaches that children shall be seen and not heard—say "Yes, sir," and "No, sir," and respect their elders. When Johnnie went to college he arranged with his father that on his arrival there, if he found everything satisfactory, he would telegraph, "Yes." When the telegram arrived, the busy father had forgotten what "Yes" referred to, so he wired back, "Yes, what?" and Johnnie answered, "Yes, sir."—Harper's Bazar.

A Southern judge who had a fine lot of hogs one day met a colored man notorious for stealing and said to him: "Uncle Jack, I'll tell you what I'll do. You pick out two of those hogs you like best, and I'll give them to you, provided you won't steal any of the others."

The negro pondered awhile and finally said: "Jedge, your'e always been a good neighbor, an' I likes yuh, an' I wants to do right by yuh, an' so accepts de offer yuh makes, but I wants you to know dat I'll lose meat by it."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

A small boy, required to write a sentence containing the word "hominy," produced the following: "Hominy marbles have you?"

The late Mackintosh of Mackintosh, chief of a Scotch clan, was once on a visit to London. During his stay he got into a dispute with his cab driver over the fare. "Perhaps you do not know who I am," he said at last, when other argument failed. "I am The Mackintosh."

"I don't care if you're the humbrella, too," returned the unimpressed cabby. "The fare is one and six, and that's what I want."

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

AND a practical theology must be a missionary theology. Here is a practical outworking of Christian experience that theology must express. The present conditions, moreover, are all the time in intolerant contradiction with the Christian assertion of what ought to be, and with Christ's sole purpose in coming to men. Hence the more close theology comes to life, and the more vital it keeps its conceptions and its contact with Christ, the more certainly missionary it will be. That theology will be missionary that has so vital a conception of the relation to God that it sees, on the one hand, the infinite richness of the life of the child of God, and, on the other hand, really enters into God's thought of sin and its loss, and into his love for men; that sees the sin of men in the light of the love and holiness of God as a perpetual pain to God; that enters, therefore, into the double sympathy of Christ with God and with man, bearing in its measure the sin of the world; and that, consequently, must go to men with the same glad tidings and with the same seeking, suffering love with which Christ came.

Event and Comment.

They have an Anti-Profanity League, recently organized in Massachusetts. We had always thought that any Christian Church would be a sort of Anti-Profanity League.

Dr. Hilprecht, to whom the credit of deciphering the inscriptions at Nippur is due, says, after an investigation of fifteen years, that the "Faith of the Israelites could never have had its origin in the Babylonian mountain of the gods, which is full of death and the savor of death."

The Outlook is doing a great service in interpreting the South to its constituency. In the number of March 14, there is an article on the negro question by a Southern Christian woman. It is true, every word of it, and we are so glad that it was published for Northern consumption.

The papers are full of the accounts of the preaching of Rev. Reginald J. Campbell, the young Scotchman that has taken the pulpit of Dr. Parker, even if he has not taken his place. He expects to come to America this spring. Mr. Campbell is the son of a Free Methodist minister and the grandson of a Congregational preacher and of a Presbyterian elder. That is not a bad combination.

It may be just as well to put a pin right here and say that the decline of temperance sentiment in Vermont is due to the decadence of the population of that state through the emigration of the best and the immigration of the worst elements. While the advance of temperance sentiment in the South is due to the fact that a body of Anglo-Saxon freemen have the ballot in their own hands, thank you.

The Northwestern and the New York Christian Advocates are still contending over those million members that were supposed to have been added during the canvass for the twenty million dollars. The New York paper contends that if the Northwestern is right as to the fact of these additions, then there are 748,000 of these members who have disappeared and left no trace at all. Perhaps they fell out of the records automatically when they fell from grace.

We congratulate Statesville upon its handsome majority for prohibition. Statesville is a city of churches and schools and cultivated, Christian homes. But unfortunately it has been known for the last few years for the whiskey that was manufactured there. The good people have evidently gotten a little tired of this, and last week they wiped out the reproach. We extend our sympathies also to both the publishers of the Landmark. It really does not seem to matter much when a paper advocates the continuance of the saloon.

We said once that the question of child-labor in the factories was a Southern question and a legislative question, and that Southern Legislatures would be found able to deal with it. But the quickness of the Northern mind to see a needed reform in the South has in this instance been followed by the revelations of abuses at the North before which the instances of child-slavery in the South are insignificant. A writer in the New York Outlook of March 14 draws a picture of factory life in New York that is darker than anything that could exist in the South. Reforms are like charity, they should begin at home. As the boys used to say in an old-fashioned game at school, "Shimmy on your own side."

The priests of Sicily have sent a petition three times to the Pope asking that they be allowed to marry and as the Pope did not pay any attention to it they have printed the appeal and even given their reasons: that the Lord Jesus Christ gave no precepts as to celibacy and that the celibacy of the priesthood was not required in the early Church. This must be very annoying to His Holiness. We have often wondered how successfully the average Romish priest could prove from the text, "forbidding to marry," that it was a mark of the true rather than of the apostate church to forbid to marry.

A good story comes from Asheville which is also a lesson about showing too much respect of persons. Mr. Rockefeller spent Sunday in Asheville. The Baptists hid themselves out to welcome him, gave special invitations, verbal and written, for him to attend church on Sunday morning and there was a great throng at the Baptist Church to see him. Mr. Rockefeller is a Baptist, but on that particular Sunday he went to the Presbyterian Church, where he was shown a seat just as if he were an ordinary sinner or saint, and nobody stared at him; and it is said that from the good sermon that Dr. Campbell preached one would never have known that there was a rich man in the world. Certainly the church is one place where a rich man should be treated like other folks and the rich man who isn't a fool likes to be treated just that way.

The New York Observer quotes with approval the breeziness of the "Western methods" of the Rev. M. A. Matthews, D. D., of Seattle, Washington, who is addressing his people thus: "Your pastor expects every member of his force to do his duty. There is no time nor place in this force for the grabber, the growler or the grumbler. Each must be up and doing. Let your motto be: I will do more and talk less. All commercial schemes, sales or fairs are things of the past. You must pay all debts; that is a part of your contract. Be consistent in all things." We call the Observer's attention to the fact that the Rev. M. A. Matthews, D. D., is a Southern product, born in Georgia, educated at Gordon University (though nobody knows where that is) and that the Cumberland and Southern Presbyterian Churches together claim the honor of having discovered his histrionic and elocutionary talents. We are just awfully proud of him.

We call special attention to the Open Letter of Rev. S. J. McMurry in reply to a letter of Dr. E. C. Gordon. Mr. McMurry's letter has the advantage of being "open." While a man has a perfect right to suggest a concerted movement by private correspondence, the Southern Church has always been most impatient with just that method and we are surprised that it is Dr. Gordon, rather than some youthful and inexperienced zealot, who has resorted to it. And then if there is one thing that the Southern Church is never going to revise, it is its high standard of holiness, and every effort to change the Catechism, which says "no mere man is in this life able to keep perfectly the commandments of God," squints at a lowering of the perfect standard of holiness. We regret very much that such a movement is contemplated. It will not stand the ghost of a chance before either Presbyteries or Assembly. Incidentally, Mr. McMurry has done a public service in collating the Confessional passages regarding the Holy Spirit. And if any one will read the new chapter on the Holy Spirit now before the Northern Assembly he will find that every statement in it is simply a repetition of the same proposition already laid down in the Westminster Confession.

The Colored Problem in the Presbyterian Church.

There is a large amount of contributed sense and of editorial nonsense in the Presbyterian Banner of March 5. The Rev. C. Humble writes an article on the Colored Problem in the Presbyterian Church and one of the editors writes on the Color Line in the Presbyterian Church. By the Presbyterian Church is meant the largest Presbyterian body in America, though not the only one. It is commonly known as the Northern Presbyterian Church. And the Colored Problem is right inside of it, men and brethren. And there is danger, as the Banner editor thinks, of the color-line being drawn right through it. Just to think!

There have been some mutterings of the coming storm, and the Standard has duly tried to interpret the mutterings to its disinterested but not uninterested constituency. There was formed a white Presbytery in North Carolina, of some most excellent brethren whom we love and honor, and they went across the Great Smoky Mountains into Tennessee to form their Synodical connection with the white Synod of Tennessee instead of staying in North Carolina with the black Synod of Catawba already here—and we wish it understood that from a personal visit we have learned to respect the Synod of Catawba for its orthodoxy, its Presbyterian decency and order and its preservation of all the “traditions of the elders.” And then there was Maryville College, with an endowment that called for a mixed college with white pupils and black, and that kept a few unhappy negro boys there to hold on to the endowment, whose pupils were somehow ashamed to boast of their alma mater or to show a diploma from the institution. And then keen old Dr. Gray of the Interior visited Maryville and told the whole truth about it, and then the Tennessee Legislature providentially passed a bill forbidding such mixed schools, and Maryville has been shedding tears of joy ever since, there being more than a suspicion that it asserted Providence in the outcome.

And all this time they were gerrymandering Synods and Presbyteries as shamelessly as the Democrats did William McKinley's old congressional district in Ohio when they kept him out of Congress and thereby helped to land him in the White House. The problem of drawing a line that should put all the negro churches in one Presbytery and all the white churches in another without any over-lapping was a very difficult problem when one had to keep his face straight at the same time and preserve a proper ecclesiastical dignity. And finally the bold proposition was made to map out two Presbyteries, in the Synod of Tennessee, one white and one black, and covering the same territory. It is this that has brought the issue up squarely before the church. The Interior misses Dr. Gray more than it knows when it insists that this shall not be countenanced by the General Assembly. The Banner shows its need of somebody to wave it with more sense and less hypocrisy when it opposes the proposition made by the Rev. C. Humble. For Mr. Humble has been on the ground for twenty years. If we are not mistaken in our man, he is a Canadian who came South with no particular prejudices against either North or South and with the British open-mindedness toward the inferior races. He has been a Sunday-school missionary of the Northern Church. And Mr. Humble is just telling the straight truth when he says: “The Presbyterian Church is a social organization and flourishes as a fervent social spirit prevails; and because of this we are now in the South facing a condition that unless wisely met will become a conflict.” If the Northern Church does not want the secession of the white churches in the South that it has built up with so much care and at so much expense it had better heed the remarks of the Rev. C. Humble, even if the process is what we in the South call “eating humble pie.”

Mr. Humble argues for the separate colored Presbyteries and Synods, but sees no need for separate General Assemblies. We rather agree with him in this. In fact, until the organization of our Independent Colored Synod, the separate Presbyteries were all that were needed in the Southern Assembly. The Southern position on this point has been much misunderstood. No Southern Church ever objected to negro members, until they formed too large a proportion of the congregation, when it has been our policy to set them off into a church of their own. No Southern Presbytery objected to having colored churches and ministers enrolled with its white churches and ministers. When the churches grew numerous enough they and their ministers were set off into separate Presbyteries. There are still two colored Presbyteries in connection with our Southern Assembly in spite of the organization of the Independent Synod, and they send commissioners to our General Assembly.

But Mr. Humble declares that unless the relief of separate Presbyteries is allowed a “separate Colored General Assembly is imminent” and this because the negroes seem to want it as much as the white people. If the Southern Church should be as zealous in proselyting as we have known churches to be, and the Northern Assembly insists on the principle of a non-separation of the races, it might not have very much trouble hereafter with the drawing of the “Color Line in the Presbyterian Church." There would not be left enough of it in the South for any kind of a line to be drawn through it. There would be organic union between the Southern Church and the Northern churches in Texas and Florida and Kentucky and Maryland, while perhaps there would be secession in the very Capital of these now United States!

And the Rev. C. Humble makes one statement that uncovers the sublime hypocrisy, the more sublime if unconscious, of this talk about the "color line." He says: "As a matter of fact, the color line has for years been drawn in our Presbyterian Churches by the organization of separate colored churches, and in this we all acquiesce."

Yet in the face of that the Banner says: "The root of the proposed separation, however, is the race antipathy that arrays the whites so intolerantly against the blacks and makes the one race determined to keep the other race down. We like it not that it is proposed to give this race antipathy and separation the sanction of the Church and run the color line through the body of Christ. This seems to us to be a very practical denial of that brotherhood which is of the very essence of the gospel. If anywhere in the world men would meet together simply as men, whether rich or poor, white or black, it is in the Church of Christ. If it is ever better on grounds of expediency to separate along these lines, then it must be because of the hardness of our hearts, and not because this is the ideal Christian relation."

Perhaps it is on account of the softness of our heads, O esteemed contemporary, that we have refused to give our sanction to a race antipathy which was ordered of God for race preservation.

The reader will observe that "Church" in the above quotation means "Presbytery." It is the Presbytery and not the local church where men should meet in that "ideal Christian relation." For the Banner goes on to say, "In so far as colored people of their own accord form their own congregations we do not think the principle of brotherhood is violated." Oh! No. As Mr. Humble puts it, "in this we all acquiesce." And if the colored people "of their own accord" do not form their own congregations, but insist on worshipping in the white churches en masse, what then? Why they will have the separate churches formed for them. And if the Banner does not know that to be true even in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, then it is the banner paper for the crassness of its ignorance. The Presbytery of Pittsburg made a negro its moderator not long ago and it was welcome. But what white church in Pittsburg Presbytery is served by a negro? How often do the white and negro pastors exchange pulpits in Pittsburg? How many white churches in Pittsburg have even a fourth of their membership colored? How many churches are half-and-half? One of the Banner editors is the President of Washington College, and a mighty level headed man he is, too busy we sometimes think for much editorial work. How many negro students at Washington College? How many negro professors in the white faculty of Lincoln University, founded for teaching the negroes? Is there no negro alumnus of that institution fit to teach his own race?

The Banner continues: "It is true that the Methodists have separated the colored people and have their colored conferences in the North as well as in the South, covering the same ground as the white conferences. But the Episcopal Churches have not done this, but have kept their people, white and black, together." Well, the Methodists have a few million adherents among the negroes and the Episcopalians hardly enough to make a real colored line. It is very easy, too, with a white Bishop to manage things, to keep out troubles that arise in a representative body like a Presbytery.

No, the business began with fanaticism and it is ending with hypocrisy. While the statistics were not accurately kept of the colored membership of the white churches in the South before the Civil War, we believe, from the best information obtainable that there were about twenty thousand of these members. The Southern Churches were quietly going on with their work among the negroes after the war, when the word came that it was not good for these negroes to belong to the Southern churches. They were therefore set off into separate churches and Presbyteries in connection with the Northern Assembly. And now after forty years of work and no end of money spent there are just twenty-one thousand negro Presbyterians in connection with that Assembly, about the same that there were when the sheep stealing began. These churches bear the reproach among their own people of being "white men's churches," "supported by white men," and so on. And while their influence is good so far as it extends, twenty thousand do not weigh much with eight millions.

And the Southern Church had to start its work anew, with no nucleus to build upon, and between the two, Northern and Southern, and their conflicting theories, with Northern meddling and Southern resentment, negro Presbyterianism is almost nil as compared with the Methodist and Baptist Churches. And still for the sake of a theory that has had such brilliant exploitation, the wish of white and black to be separated in their church courts is to be denied. Well, the longer that theory is held to the more "humble pie" will have to be eaten, finally.

Saint Patrick a Presbyterian. Last week our Irish com-patriots and their kinsmen in Erin celebrated St. Patrick's Day. There have been some Protestant historians that have been too radical in their treatment of St. Patrick's claims. They have used the Higher Criticism to prove that he did not have any historical existence at all. It is true that there is very little that is certainly authentic about Patrick, and of his own writings we have left only his Confessions and a letter of remonstrance to the British chieftain, Coroticus, and these are written in Latin. But the Standard, as a conservative paper, does not side with these extremists who banish Patrick from history altogether. For ourselves, we very much doubt that episode of his driving the snakes out of Ireland. Yet we believe that he really lived in Ireland and deserves to be called the Apostle of Ireland. But neither do we lean to the Roman Catholic extreme claims. The middle ground is that Patrick was a real preacher, but a Presbyterian preacher, and we undertake to prove that he was a long way nearer to being a Presbyterian preacher than he ever was to being a Catholic bishop.

In the first place he was born in the Fifth Century at Kilpatrick, near Glasgow, Scotland.

Everyone will at once recognize the bearing of this fact of his birthplace upon the form of religion that he believed in. A Scotchman who is not a Presbyterian will bear watching. Moreover, it is well known that the early churches of both England and Scotland were independent of Rome, and the Presbyterian character of the early Scottish Christians is proved by the ease with which the later missionaries from Ireland, from the churches founded by St. Patrick, established the Presbyterian forms of government which they had been taught.

Patrick was the son of a deacon and the grandson of a presbyter as he states in his Confessions. That proves that the presbyter was not a Catholic priest, not that priests have not had grandsons, but usually the descendants have been ashamed to acknowledge the relation. When he was about sixteen years old he was seized by pirates and sold into slavery into Ireland. While feeding the sheep the memory of his early instruction in sacred things came back to him and he consecrated himself to the work of converting Ireland. He believed that the call had come from heaven and there is not a syllable that goes to show he received any episcopal ordination or any ecclesiastical authority.

At the first opportunity he began the work of preaching the gospel in Ireland. He founded 365 churches and ordained 365 bishops and 3,000 presbyters.

Now this is a very significant fact. If Patrick had been a Roman Catholic, two or three bishops would have been enough and there would not have been more than enough presbyters or priests for the churches. The bishops were evidently pastors of a single church, one for each, and the presbyters formed the church sessions, as we would say, there being an average of nine presbyters for each church. And if we consider that Patrick himself had evangelistic power, as a missionary in a heathen land, his ordaining these bishops himself was not so far wrong even if we do not suppose that he ordained them as Paul did Timothy, with the laying on of the hands of the Presbytery.

Later these bishops and presbyters were greatly multiplied with the multiplication of the churches, and as late as six hundred years after St. Patrick, every parish church had its bishop, and, as LaFranc writes, "there was not only one bishop in such a little precinct, but more than one, not only in cities, but also in villages."

Furthermore these bishops were elected by the people and everybody knows how far that is from the practice of the Roman Catholic Church. Anselm complains that "bishops were everywhere elected and consecrated without title."

And the Irish bishops also, in orthodox Presbyterian fashion, believed that it was a duty to be the husband of one wife, for which cause they were denounced by Catholic authorities as "an adulterous generation."

Other distinctions might be pointed out that belong to Protestantism rather than to Presbyterianism distinctively. The bishops of St. Patrick did not believe in transubstantiation; they gave both the wine and the bread to the people at the communion, contrary to the Romish custom; they rejected the confessional; they had no liturgy except what each bishop made for his own church. And they were not Associate Reformed Presbyterians, for they used hymns as well as psalms in the worship of God; and they were not Cumberland Presbyterians because even in the press of evangelistic work in the newly civilized country of Ireland, they held firmly to the doctrine of an educated ministry, endowed theological seminaries, and made the abbot, or doctor of divinity, in charge of the seminary, of greater authority than the bishop or presbyter, a tendency noticeable among Southern Presbyterians. And the crowning proof of the Presbyterian character of the church that St. Patrick founded was the fact that it was the great missionary church of its time, sending its missionaries to Scotland, where the Culdee Church and the influence of Iona long resisted the Romish claims; to the Piets in Scotland; to France and Germany and Franconia and Belgium and Bavaria and Friesland. Says Dr. Schaff, "During the sixth and seventh centuries Ireland excelled all other countries in Christian piety and acquired the name of the 'Island of the Saints.'"

We think the point has been proved that St. Patrick was as near to being a Presbyterian preacher as the authentic facts allow us to know what he was, and by the same token, as far from being a Catholic priest or a Catholic bishop. And some time, when Ireland has awakened from the nightmare of superstition and ignorance and degradation that began to afflict her with the beginning of Romish tyranny, in the twelfth century, she may see a new meaning in St. Patrick's Day, and venerate the old saint all the more for not being what the Catholic Church has taught that he was, during all these centuries, without the scintilla of historical proof.

The Czar of Russia is a good example of Plato's wise tyrant. He is using the absolute power that belongs to his throne to bring about by decree those reforms that democracy reaches by a long and wavering process. Not that democracy is not infinitely better than autocracy. But a country generally has as good a government as it deserves. Self-government is the attainment of centuries of toil and moil and blood. Not every people or every race is fit for self-government, until this education process has been tried. The Russian peasant is about as unfit at this present time as the Filipino or the Zulu. And it is a blessed thing that the spiritual and temporal ruler of all the Russias is bent upon the welfare of his people rather than the strengthening of his absolutism. The liberation of the serfs by the imperial ukase was the first great step in giving liberty to the people. But the present Czar, under the influence of his English Protestant Queen, (God bless her!) will be credited in history with three great and permanent reforms. One of them is the establishment of the Hague Tribunal, with its plea for disarmament, which was initiated by Russia. The second was the universal control of the liquor-traffic by the imperial government, with the beneficent restrictions that go with governmental control. The third started the world on Thursday, March 12, being a decree of religious freedom throughout the Russian Empire.

It is said that the methods of carrying out this great reform are not clearly stated, that there are no positive recommendations in the decree. Methods and details can wait. The great principle has been established, that in the Czar's dominions, Catholic and Protestant and Greek and Jew shall have liberty to worship his own God in his own way.

The Greek Church, which is the National Church of Russia is afflicted with a notoriously immoral priesthood, and its religion is even more a religion of forms than is the Roman Catholic. The decree will open Russia, finally if not now, to the Protestant influences which it so much needs. What will be the outcome upon the destinies of Russia the history of Protestantism clearly shows.

Russia is but a young country. It was just 200 years ago that Peter the Great founded his capital at St. Petersburg. That was almost the beginning of Russian national life. And the world moves fast in these days of the rapid circulation of ideas and of energy. Another hundred years may see the triumph of that basic principle of Protestantism, "Call no man master. If any will be great among you let him be your servant." It may well be that the decree of religious liberty will be the dawning of the era of civil and constitutional liberty. A Russian Republic is one of the possibilities of the Twentieth Century. For freedom of speech, and the freedom of the press are closely connected with freedom of worship.

These are marvellous times in which we live, and the point of view from which one may see the relations of events to the Kingdom of Christ is the view-point of most absorbing interest.

Review of Contemporaries.

The Christian Advocate draws the contrast between Paul and one of the Apostle's successors thus:

BISHOP POTTER.

"How can I blame him if now and then he introduces a little variety into his life by getting drunk?"

ST. PAUL.

"Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these: adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, . . . drunkenness . . . neither drunkards shall inherit the Kingdom of God.

A Presbyterian Union.

Union among large denominations must be preceded by union among small denominations, especially among those small bodies that exist in the larger denominational families. There is not much hope or need of immediate union between Presbyterians and Methodists or Baptists, but the union of Presbyterians among themselves may not be so impracticable and remote. The Reformed Presbyterian Church (General Synod) is one of the lesser Presbyterian bodies. It may be small, but it has tenacious and sturdy convictions, with roots running back into Scotland and buried deep in its stormy religious history. It now has about 35 churches, with as many ministers and 5,000 members. Of late years the thought of union with one of the large Presbyterian bodies has been working in its mind. A committee of five members was appointed by the late General Synod to confer with similar committees from churches holding the Presbyterian system, and it is likely that a decision in favor of union with some of these bodies will be reached soon. It is believed that it is disposed to unite with our Church, and the matter will be presented to our coming General Assembly in Los Angeles. There is no question of the orthodoxy of the Reformed Presbyterians, and they would be a welcome addition to our Church. Their pure Presbyterianism, sound faith and indomitable faithfulness, would be a tonic to our body. We trust this movement will result in a happy wedding with our own Church and that the bridal day may be soon.—Presbyterian Banner.

Several weeks ago we printed and made brief comment upon an article from the Presbyterian Banner in which it was said that the Presbyterian Twentieth Century Fund "has been a comparative failure," and giving as a reason "that the movement was an imitation of the Methodist movement; it started too late, and it never took hold of the hearts of the people." Rev. Dr. Wm. H. Roberts, Stated Clerk of the General Assembly, demurs to this and says, in a letter to the Banner—which we haven't seen—that "for the five years preceding 1899 the increase of the total contributions of the Church had not aggregated over $200,000 per annum, and that, allowing such an increase as normal for the three years, 1900 to 1902, the Twentieth Century Fund was entitled to $6,539,717." Dr. Roberts adds: "When my report as treasurer is finally presented to the General Assembly, the Assembly and the Church will understand how much benefit the movement has brought to the Church." We shall be very glad to see the statement, and only wish we had the figures now. Naturally we accept Presbyterian statements made in Presbyterian journals as correct, though none of us is infallible. Of course we are not responsible for the slips of others; and, of course, too, we hold that the Presbyterian Church, and every other Church for that matter, like a woman sitting for her photograph, is entitled to the best possible representation consistent with accuracy. In that event though we should make a little allowance in favor of the woman.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

The Biblical World has been printing in the last few months a series of articles on "The Need of a New Apologetic." Their general trend naturally has been a discussion of the new answers which Christianity must frame to meet new objections of contemporary unbelief. But when one of our Chicago Presbyterian pastors, Rev. W. P. Merrill, contributed a number to the series, he brushed past the supposititious modern man who wants to combat Christianity and went straight after the man who does not care enough about Christianity either to fight it or accept it. Of course, he got out of the field of technical apologetics; the other writers are the scientific apologetics undoubtedly. But he landed precisely where the practical pastor had better spend his apologetic skill. There is seldom wisdom in study and worry devoted to shaping up answers for the cavils of an infidel who is spoiling for an argument; it is preferable to let him spoil. But the conscientious preacher of God must be every day concerned to make out what statement or emphasis or exposition or enforcement of the appeal of Christ will effectually arouse the indifferent and persuade them to take Christ into their lives. It is easier to answer a hundred men than to win one, but the winning of the one is a thousand times better worth thought and planning and anxiety.—Interior.

Book Notices.

"A Tar-Heel Baron," by Mabel Shippe Clarke Pelton. Illustrated. Price $1.50. J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia.

Tender and proud, the Baron is a strange figure in the North Carolina mountain country, but he wins his way as a courteous gentleman usually does. The book is interesting and dramatic, while the drawings by Edward S. Holloway are of actual scenes. To one born and bred in North Carolina it is funny to hear "ah" used for "I" in the native speech, but that is less unnatural than much of Cable's so-called Southern dialect. This can hardly be called a North Carolina story, as the chief characters are foreign, but the back-ground is native and, we think, true to life.

"The Life of Joseph Parker," by William Adamson, D. D. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York. Price $1.75.

Much of the vitality of the religious life of England is outside of the Established Church. There have been teachers and leaders, who casting aside conventionality, have appealed to the people. Following Wesley, these men have championed religious liberty and individual responsibility. The greatest of these leaders in recent times was Dr. Joseph Parker. In accepting a call to Manchester, in 1852, he laid down the rule of his life: "I promise no deference to usages or precedence; what appears to me right, I shall do, and what appears to me wrong and insufficient, I shall unequivocally reject." It is too soon after his passing to finally estimate this great preacher. With the exception of the last two chapters, the book was written before his death. One can but feel that the real life of Dr. Parker is yet to be written, though there is much that is of interest and value in Dr. Adamson's version of it.

Theology That Saves.

Ian Maclaren, in an article entitled "Our Needs and the Answer: Our Christ," tells this tale of the way in which a believing acceptance of the substitutionary death of Christ gives peace to the guilty conscience and rest to the troubled soul:

"Nearly thirty years ago a Highland farmer lay upon the lawn in the manse garden in an agony, not of the body, but of the soul. Originally a dull and careless man, thinking about nothing but plowing and cattle, he had been visited with a profound sense of sin, and moved by a deep anxiety about his soul. He lay at the feet of God, unworthy to be in the divine presence and afraid to take the divine name upon his lips, hating himself and nigh unto despair. A minister of Christ (who has now fallen asleep) stood by him and preached Christ unto him. As he heard one after another of the great invitations of the Lord, and as the person of the Lord himself took shape before his soul, he began to be comforted and dared to hope. At last he rose and stood, and, looking into the west, where the sun was going down gloriously behind the hills, he said aloud, 'Laid down his life a ransom for many,' then, after a pause, he added, 'For me.' When he went out through the manse gate, underneath the gold of the laburnum, his very face showed he was another man; and that was the beginning of a new life, wherein he has gone from strength to strength in knowledge and in grace, in power also and in success; and when last I saw him he spoke to me of Christ as if, like John and Peter, he had met with the Lord and companied with him face to face."—Selected.

How to Live in Peace.

In order to be satisfied even with the best people, we need to be content with little and bear a great deal. Even the most perfect people have many imperfections. We ourselves have as great defects. Our faults combined with theirs make mutual toleration a difficult matter, but we can only fulfill the law of Christ by bearing one another's burdens. Frequent silence, habitual recollection, prayer, self-detachment, giving up all critical tendencies, faithfulness in putting aside all the idle imaginations of a jealous, fastidious self-love—all these will go far to maintain peace and union. How many troubles would be avoided by this simplicity. Happy is he who neither listens to himself nor to the idle talk of others. Be content to lead a simple life where God has placed you. Be obedient, bear your little daily crosses—you need them and God gives them to you only out of pure mercy.—Canadian Churchman.

When ever you attempt a good work you will find other men doing the same kind of work, and probably doing it better. Envy them not. Envy is a feeling of ill will to those who are in the same line as ourselves, a spirit of covetousness and detraction. How little Christian work even is a protection against un-Christian feeling! That most despicable of all the unworthy moods which cloud a Christian's soul assuredly waits for us on the threshold of every work, unless we are fortified with this grace of magnanimity. Only one thing truly need the Christian envy—the large, rich, generous soul which "envieth not."—Henry Drummond.

The other day a young woman whose work is very hard, with long hours and incessant pressure, took a little time from her noon hour to call upon an older friend, saying, "I felt that if I could see you for five minutes to get an encouraging word, I could get through the afternoon better." What is true of a human friend, is true yet more of God. If we can get a little while with Him when we are weary, when our strength is running low, our life will be put in tune so that the music will be sweet again. We cannot afford to live a day without communion with Christ, to get His strength, joy, and peace, into our hearts.

Preparation by the Study Class Leader.

By T. H. P. Sailer, in the Assembly Herald.

In his general reading on a subject, the leader should have three aims in view.

1. A broader grasp of the subject than is afforded by the text-book. Many matters become clear only after having been regarded from several standpoints. Indeed, a thing can hardly be said to be known until it is so regarded. One of the surest means of attracting members to the class sessions is to bring before them something that they could not have gotten by reading the text-book at home. The average leader can not hope to gain any such grasp of the subject as would be demanded in secular education, but he does owe it to the class to put himself in a position to help them at least a little further along. When he obtains on an important topic some fresh light, let him formulate a concise statement for dictation to supplement the matter in the text-book.

2. A collection of references suitable for short papers, to be written by the class. For these clear and compact passages should be assigned, covering usually not more than 25 to 30 consecutive pages. It is too much to expect that the ordinary member will read a whole book in preparation for a paper. Even if willing, most members would be unable to condense so much material satisfactorily. The way to get classes to work is to present them with tasks quite within their ability.

3. The selection of subjects for discussion. No exercise is more stimulating to a class than a well-conducted discussion. Much depends on the topic chosen. It should be one appealing to the general knowledge and common sense of the members, one on which they might be expected, after a little reflection, to form an opinion. Questions involving comparisons, criticisms of courses of action, methods of missionary administration, are all fruitful themes. But the leader must have gained in his reading some grasp that will enable him to steer the discussion, to present objections to too popular a view, and to supplement and qualify the conclusion reached.

As he reads, let the leader make notes with these three aims in view, and arrange them to correspond with the material in the text-book. The amount gathered in connection with some subjects may be such that extra sessions in which to present it may be advisable. In deciding such questions, however, let the leader keep in mind the ability of the class.

Let no one who is unable to carry out these suggestions be discouraged. Very helpful work has been and will be done by simpler methods. But where the leader has the time and ability, it is believed that the preparation indicated will be thoroughly worth while.

"Lord, send whom thou wilt; but in any case permit me to pay my share of the expenses." Surely this should be the soul-attitude of every supplicant for missions. The recognition of the Divine claim over self and possessions must be complete and unreserved. When the Church attains to this, some of the harrassing problems of carrying on missionary work will disappear.—C. M. S. Intelligencer.

The Chinese are a Mongolian race, but as the late war clearly demonstrated, there are distinct classes among them. The Chinese are very different from the Manchus, or ruling class. They differ also from the Western Tartars. There are also descendants from the aboriginal tribes, the real Chinese. Many converts have been made among this last class.

Not until recently have the Japanese bookstores been willing to carry the Bible in stock, for fear of offending their Buddhist patrons. Now, however, Bibles are so eagerly sought that they are kept on sale in all the prominent bookstores in Japan.

Sunday School Lesson.

CONDUCTED BY REV. H. G. HILL, D. D.

Review of Quarter.

Acts 16:22-34, to Eph. 2: 1-10. March 29, 1903.

The principal places mentioned in these lessons are Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth and Ephesus. The prominent persons are, Paul, Silas, Lydia, the Phillipian Jailor, Timothy, Appolos, Priscilla and Aquilla, Crispus, Demetrius, and the town clerk of Ephesus. The time covered by them is from A. D. 51 to A. D. 63.

I. Paul and Silas at Philippi: Acts 16: 22-34. Principal Topics: The Imprisonment of the Evangelists; the Manifestation of Divine Power; the Conversion of the Jailor; Proof of His Conversion.

II. Christian Living. Phil. 4: 1-13. Leading Topics: Duties to be performed; Graces to be developed; Eminent Example to be copied; Christian contentment to be fostered; Christ our strength for Christian living.

III. Paul at Thessalonica and Berea: Acts 17: 1-12. Prominent Subjects: Paul's preaching—matter and manner; The results of preaching at Thessalonica; the nobility of the Bereans; The effects of hearing and searching the Scriptures.

IV. Paul's Counsel to the Thessalonians: 1 Thess. 5: 14-28. Leading Topics: Duties to different classes; Precepts applying to all believers; Sanctification to be sought; Prayer for brethren.

V. Paul at Athens: Acts 17: 22-34. Subjects Presented: Paul revealing Jehovah; Paul dissuading from Idolatry; Paul urging to repentance; The effects of his preaching.

VI. The Church at Corinth Founded: Acts 18: 1-11. Topics Mentioned: Paul's companionship with Aquilla and Priscilla; His preaching in the Synagogue; The opposition encountered; Converts made; His encouragements from the Lord.

VII. Christian Self-Control: 1 Cor. 8: 4-13. Subjects Considered: Knowledge of God destroys Idolatry; Eating meats offered to Idols not essential; By eating such meats may injure our fellows; By so doing we sin against Christ; We should deny ourselves for the good of others.

VIII. Christian Love. 1 Cor. 13. Topics Enforced: The Excellence of Christian Love; More excellent than Tongues, Prophecy, Knowledge or Charity; The Fruits of Christian Love; In heart and conduct; The durability of Christian Love; Outlasting miraculous tongues, prophecies, and earthly knowledge.

IX. Paul and Appolos: Acts 18: 24; 19: 6. Topics Considered: Appolos' Character and Ministry; Instructed by Priscilla and Aquilla; His zeal and efficiency in work; Paul teaching new converts; Causing them to be baptized in Jesus' name; Conferring upon them miraculous influences of Spirit.

X. Paul at Ephesus: Acts 19: 13-20. Subjects Presented: Believers through Christ cast out Demons; Unbelievers overcome by Demons; Manifested Divine Power honors Christ; The believing and penitent reform their lives; By confession forsaking evil pursuits; Sacrificing vicious agencies.

XI. The Riot at Ephesus: Acts 19: 29-40. Topics Mentioned: The elements of the mob; Demetrius: Fellow craftsmen worshippers of Diana; Causes of the riot; Decline of Idolatry; Decline in Image making, caused by preaching the Gospel; Motives employed, appeals to greed of gain, patriotism and religious prejudices; Counsel of the Town Clerk wise, stimulating, effectual; Mob dispersed; Evangelists protected; Gospel triumphant.

XII. Paul's Message to the Ephesians: Eph. 2: 1-10. Subjects Treated: Man's Natural Condition; "Dead in sin" controlled by Satan; God's loving mercy, quickening, exalting; Salvation by grace; Holy Ghost imparting life, working repentance and faith, excluding boasting and by regeneration and sanctification making capable of good works.

The Good Samaritan.

Luke X: 30-37. Topic for April 5.

It is hard for us to understand how very hostile the people of Christ's time were to His teachings. There has been great advancement made during the centuries which have elapsed since His words were first spoken. We live in a time when men talk about breadth of vision and charitable judgment and still we find as we read the words of Jesus that we have by no means reached the times which are abreast of His teachings. His words were so projective that men are only beginning to realize a few of the many high ideals which He set. Men read the Sermon on the Mount and feel that the truths it inculcates are heavenly and that the line of conduct it set before men is right because Jesus taught it, but as to putting His teachings into practice, they hold back and fear that should this be done they would be ruined. These words sound severe and yet they are true as judged by the lives of men.

To regard a larger and ever increasing number of people as neighbors, is one idea which is taking a larger hold of people every day. When Jesus spoke the words of the parable of "The Good Samaritan," the world into which He had come was a very narrow world. For almost every man, there was but two classes. In Palestine the division was into Jews and Gentiles. In Greece they knew only Greeks and Barbarians. In the language of the Roman, the word that meant stranger was the same as the word for enemy. It was among such people that Jesus taught the larger meaning of neighbor. "Who is my neighbor?" said the lawyer. In reply Jesus uttered the parable which we are considering now, concluding by putting the question to the questioner, "Which now of these three think you was neighbor to him that fell among the thieves?" The lawyer himself gave the answer which was accepted by Jesus, "He that showed mercy." "Go," said Jesus, "and do thou likewise."

This then was the larger meaning of the word. Whoever needs our assistance. Not the man or woman, boy or girl, whose home adjoins ours, but that person whoever he may be or wherever he may be who needs our help. It may be our enemy. The man who hates us and who would not do anything for us if we were in need. To this Samaritan the man who fell among thieves was his enemy. "The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans!" In all probability had the conditions been reversed the Jew would not have paid any attention to the suffering and dying Samaritan, but that did not relieve the Samaritan from helping the Jew, nor did it make the Jew any the less the neighbor of the Samaritan. Jesus shows that "neighbor" does not refer to a person in a certain geographical location, nor to a social relationship, but does refer to a condition of heart; the condition of heart which impels and compels one to respond to the cry of distress where ever and whenever uttered. It is the condition of heart which makes one speed to the help of another notwithstanding that one has no claim on him. It was the good neighborliness of Christ which made Him come to the relief of sin-cursed humanity, and His teaching of the meaning of the word finds its fullest illustration in His own life and ministry on earth. He was the perfect neighbor and as we approach to the likeness of Christ, in such measure do we too become neighbors.

Many of us, however, will find our prototype unfortunately, not in the Samaritan but in the priest and the Levite who passed by on the other side. The priest no doubt had pressing business in Jerusalem, which had to do with the "mint, anise and cummin" of the law and had not time for the "justice, mercy and faith" which would have made him stop and help his unfortunate fellow-man. The Levite no doubt thought the locality a dangerous one or feared that he might be charged with the attack on the sufferer.

The Law of Spiritual Growth.

"For unto everyone that hath shall be given."

If we read these words of our Lord, separate from their original connection, they divert the great stream of beneficence flowing through the world into a new channel, and give it a new outlet.

The destitute, helpless and suffering, rather than those already having a competency, are the chief beneficiaries of the gifts, both of the world and the church. So far from this distribution being at variance with the will of the Great Teacher, it has the sanction of both His word and example. Furthermore, it is the very spirit of Christianity that has founded, and is operating the great charitable institutions of modern times, thereby furnishing Asylums, Hospitals, and Homes, for the needy. It is this tender regard for the poor and unfortunate ones of society, that in a great measure differentiates Christian civilization from every other form, whether past or present.

Interpreted by the context of the Parable of the Talents, the meaning of these words is apparent.

They contain the announcement of one of the great principles, according to which Christ administers the kingdom of God, both on earth and in Heaven. The teaching is that the improvement of gifts and opportunities, already possessed, leads to increased blessings and enlarged spheres of usefulness.

Abundant illustration of the great principle that faithful service in a lower sphere, leads to increased opportunities in a higher sphere, is furnished in the varied activities of the world around us; where true men by the leverage of faithfulness, raise themselves from humble beginners to high positions of trust and usefulness. But it is on the higher plain of spiritual life that we find our chief concern in the operation of this great regulative principle.

I. It is according to this principle that the current of Christian experience widens and deepens. In the gracious change, wrought by the Holy Spirit in the soul, at the new birth, new spiritual forces are created, capable of indefinite development and achievement. But it must not be forgotten that the spiritual life, like the natural, has its infancy and weakness; as well as its after-growth and maturity.

The Master himself likened the Kingdom of God, which is within us, to the springing up and growth of seed cast into the earth: "First the blade, then the ear; after that the full corn in the ear." Perfect in kind, in its earlier stages, but imperfect in degree. The question arises, by what kind of culture is this gradual growth and increase obtained?

The Apostle Peter in his second epistle, after addressing Christians, as those who had obtained like precious faith with himself, and had been made partakers of the Divine nature by the power of our God and Saviour, through exceeding great and precious promises, proceeds to tell them what they should do as co-workers with God, in completing their sanctification. He exhorts them, giving all diligence on their part, to "add to your faith, virtue (courage); and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance (self-restraint); and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity (love)."

In the closing chapter of this same epistle, the whole exhortation is condensed in the words, "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

From such instruction we learn that the Christian in the exercise of faith already possessed, and pleading the promises of the gospel, the greatest of which is the promise of the Holy Ghost, is to go in prayer to Christ, in whom all fulness dwells, and obtain first the grace of courage. The effect of this is, faith strengthened by exercise, and his religious experience enriched by the acquisition of courage, for the performance of duty.

In like manner, he goes again to the great source of all blessings and continues to go, and the result is, faith still further strengthened, and religious experience still more enriched by the new endowments of knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness and love. Thus, the Christian grows in grace, and finds in his own experience the confirmation of truth, that to him who improves what he has, more will be given. This growth is not necessarily uniform in different Christians, nor in the same Christian during different periods of equal duration. The reverse of this is oftener true in both cases. Growth in the spiritual world, as in the natural, is greatly effected by surrounding conditions, some reasons being much more favorable than others.

Besides this, each separate stage of growth usually has its marked characteristics.

In the stage of the new convert, zeal, if not always according to knowledge, predominates; in the more advanced stage the work of patience appears; while the ripe fruit of love is found in the more matured saint. But after making all proper allowances for these differences, real growth will usually be indicated by a growing likeness to Christ; by carefulness to maintain good works; by increased spiritual-mindedness; and by an ever deepening humility.

The growing Christian has too intimate an acquaintance with his Saviour, and knows too well what He has done and is doing for him, to be much troubled with doubt about his personal salvation.

This accumulation of the riches of grace is made, says the apostle, by giving all diligence to it. Diligence is required that we may know the promises, which as so many well posted highways, lead up to the rich treasury of blessings in Christ. Search the Scriptures, says Christ, for they testify of me. Earnest, increasing prayer is needed, that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need. The answer of prayer, offered according to God's will, may be delayed and may not come in the way we would have it, but in God's time and way is sure to come.

"Prayer makes the darkened cloud withdraw,
Prayer climbs the ladder Jacob saw;
Gives exercise to faith and love,
Brings every blessing from above."

II. According to this principle, the gradation of service in the Kingdom of Christ is from improved opportunities in a lower sphere, to enlarged opportunities in a higher sphere. Christ taught a new doctrine concerning greatness, and the way of reaching its high places, when He said to His Apostles, "Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant." Thus greatness in His Kingdom consists not in being ministered unto, but in ministering to others; not in being served, but in serving. The nobility in the Kingdom of God consists of those who wear the coronet of usefulness, and have reached the peerage through the lineage of faithful service. In this way the faithful servants of the parable rose from the improvement of the few things of earth to the rulership of the many things of Heaven. And so, the Apostle Peter exhorted his fellow officers in the church, to feed the flock of God and to take the oversight of them from the proper motive and in a true spirit, assuring them that, "when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away."

The Kingdom of God being one, both on earth and in Heaven, just as the advancement from the earthly stage to the Heavenly comes through faithful service; so should the successive advancements of the lower stage be made. Human infirmities, at times, set aside this law of the kingdom and make other alignments, but few are willing to deny its rightful authority. The progress of the church emphasizes and furnishes an almost continued illustration of their truth.

The Mission Sabbath-school, by the blessing of God, grows into a prosperous church, and its founders enter into multiplied opportunities of usefulness. A few faithful Christian men and women, through a period of depression, keep the fires burning on the different altars of their church; God blesses their efforts, a brighter era dawns upon them and they enter into a greatly enlarged field of service. A faithful pastor extends the boundary lines of his charge, and by intensive culture, increases its fruitfulness, then, with the godly lives of his people as his earthly crown, finishes his course among them. Or it may be recommended by his record of faithfulness, he is called to another field of greater possibilities.

The elder who has the reputation of faithful work in his home church is not the one to complain of a lack of proper recognition in the higher courts of the church. And the minister who fills his present sphere with usefulness, to the point of overflowing, will never have reason to complain of a lack of proper appreciation at home or elsewhere.

In the light of this subject we see that true religion is not stationary, but progressive; not leaves, but fruit; not theory, but practice; not a profession, but a life. And further, that Heaven, while a place, is also character, the ground work of which is laid in this life by the improvements of the precious privileges, which God in His great love has given us.

An Open Letter to Rev. E. C. Gordon, D. D.

Rev. E. C. Gordon, D. D.,
Lexington, Mo.

Dear Brother:

If you have a reason to believe that I am favorably disposed to any such overture as the one you send me, you have been very badly informed with reference to me. I have seen, in the last few years, some ill-advised mutterings with reference to revising our Confession on the subject of the Holy Spirit, and also some slight indication on the part of a few brethren to desire to modify the Confession looking toward the vagaries of "the holiness band," but I have never had any aspirations in that direction; that is to say in other words, each time when any of these things have been suggested I have studied my Bible more diligently, lest I should have missed some of the mind of the Spirit expressed therein. I can say most emphatically, that each time I have done this and have looked to see how the fathers understood the mind of the Spirit, I have been more and more convinced that God did indeed guide the minds and pens of those men who in the providence of God were called upon to frame those symbols of Faith. In connection with that statement, I wish to say that I do not believe that the same number of men, nor a smaller, nor a larger number, selected from any one denomination or from several or from all evangelical denominations, could frame Standards that would be worthy to be compared, at any point or on any subject, with the present Standards of the Southern Presbyterian Church. Also I do not believe that if any number, small or large, of our ministers and ruling elders should meet together for the purpose of framing new Standards on precisely the same doctrines,—let me emphasize it,—I do not believe that they could come together with any ground for assurance that God would guide them even to the correct restatement of the same doctrines. Why? For the simple reason that in the providence of God there has not arisen the necessity for any such fooling with the sacred things that God has revealed in His Word. At the time of the Westminster Assembly there was a necessity, and God called his servants together to meet the case, and He guided them to the unequalled success that attended their labors. Since the canon of Holy Scripture was closed, there is no other production among men that is worthy to be compared to the Westminster Standards for Scripturalness, completeness, clearness and logic. While I do not believe that the Westminster divines and laymen were inspired in the same sense as were the writers of the Bible, yet I do believe that they were guided in a special sense by the positive direction of God so that they correctly interpreted the Scriptures in formulating those Standards, and I do not believe that God would guide us now if we should undertake to loosen up the straightforward statements of those Standards.

I cannot agree to even one count in the points set forth in the draft of the overture sent by you. Any of them are wrong; all of them are wrong.

Among the reasons assigned, you wish those who sign the overture to say to the General Assembly:

"1. It is a well known fact that the proof-texts now in use were hastily compiled more than a hundred years ago; that they have not been revised; that many of them are inappropriate; that some do not correspond with the revised text of Holy Scripture, nor with the best results of exegetical study."

a. (To begin at the end) There is a certain class of exegetes that are always bobbing up against the logical, Scriptural statements of the interpretations set forth in the Confession and Catechisms—if you will recall what you have surely read in history, you will remember that some of the same class of exegetes lived in the times when the Standards were being framed; you will remember that they endeavored to have some of their exegesis incorporated in the Standards, but God prevented it. The point of disagreement between us would be, perhaps, concerning the "best results of exegetical study."

b. "That some do not correspond with the revised text of Holy Scripture," is in some cases to the great credit of the version used. The Revised Version has not become a book of general use. When it has become so, then will be time enough to talk of revising the proof-texts of the Standards.

c. "That many of them are inappropriate" will not be agreed to generally; for it is easily apprehended that the inappropriateness may only seem from the "queered exegesis" that we spoke of above.

d. "That they have not been revised" when there was no necessity, should make us careful lest we create the seeming necessity out of "moonshine and thin grey matter."

e. "It is well known that the proof-texts used were hastily compiled more than a hundred years ago," will bear some inspection. The fact that they are a hundred years in use with great satisfaction to men at least as Godly as we are, should make us very careful, lest we have missed the true meaning of the Scriptures used. Then too the version of the Bible from which they are taken, is one hundred and ninety-two years older, so the hundred years use in the Standards will not be noticed. Now as to the proof-texts being hastily compiled, there is room for much doubt. The result of five and a half years of the about twelve hundred sessions, in Bible study and discussion, was summed up in the Westminster Standards. When that Assembly was required by Parliament to prove every statement by Scripture, time was taken to set the word of God to each proposition that was contained in the statement. If, as some understand, only the Shorter Catechism was accompanied by the Scripture proofs, then it is easy to see that no haste was required to follow up the same proof-texts, and find proof-texts for the very few remaining doctrines of the Confession and Larger Catechism that are not found in the Shorter Catechism.

Again you would have us say to the Assembly:

"2. It is well known that our Standards are incomplete in regard to the work of the Holy Spirit, and the important branch of Biblical truth therein involved."

I am somewhat at a loss to reckon what that branch of truth is unless it is what is known as "sinless perfection." If the guess is correct, then I would call it an "important branch of anti-Biblical untruth." And it is well known to any who will take the trouble to look into the matter, that the Confession and the Larger Catechism are both very complete in their fully setting forth the work of the Holy Spirit.

The Confession has 171 paragraphs; 100 of these paragraphs refer to God the Father, 74 refer to Jesus Christ, and 43 refer to the Holy Spirit. In the Larger Catechism there are 31 questions that refer to the Holy Spirit, setting forth His work and all the Scriptural doctrines involved in the nature, relation, and work, of the third Person of the Trinity. And when we look carefully at the Confession, we are impressed with the fulness and completeness of the manner with which it sets forth the Scriptural teaching with reference to the Holy Spirit.

Let us relate in detail these references, using in almost every case the exact words of the Confession, simply transposing some of the words to make the statement, but in no case changing the meaning, when the words are thus separated from their surroundings.

1. Chap. 1. Sec. V. The Holy Spirit alone enables us to be fully persuaded and assured of the infallible truth and Divine authority of the Scriptures.

2. Sec. VI. There are no new revelations even by the Holy Spirit; but the inward illumination of the Spirit is necessary to the saving understanding of the Scriptures.

3. Sec. X. The Supreme Judge of all religious controversies is the Holy Spirit speaking in the Scriptures.

4. Chap. II. The whole chapter is given to the setting forth of the existence, being, nature and attributes and work of the Holy Spirit.

5. Chap. III. Sec. VI. The elect of God are effectually called by the Holy Spirit; and by Him are also justified, adopted, sanctified, and preserved in such state.

6. Chap. IV. It pleased the Holy Spirit to do the work of creation as it was done.

7. Chap. VII. Sec. III. God promised to give His Holy Spirit to all the elect to make them willing and able to believe.

8. Sec. V. The Holy Spirit wrought whatever good there was in all the ceremonial of the Old Testament, by instructing and edifying the elect in faith in the Messiah.

9. Chap. VIII. Sec. II. The Son of God was conceived in the womb of the Virgin Mary by the Holy Spirit.

10. Sec. III. The Lord Jesus was sanctified and anointed by the Holy Spirit.

11. Sec. V. The Lord Jesus offered Himself as a sacrifice through the Holy Spirit.

12. Sec. VIII. By the Holy Spirit Christ effectually persuades to faith and obedience those for whom Christ has purchased redemption.

13. Sec. VIII. And governs their hearts by the word and the Holy Spirit.

14. Chap. X. Sec. I. By the word and the Holy Spirit God calls those whom He has predestined, out of the state of sin and death, to grace and salvation by Jesus Christ. The Holy Spirit does all the work by which these are persuaded, prepared, and enabled to come to Jesus Christ.

15. Sec. II. In effectual calling, man is passive until quickened and renewed by the Holy Spirit.

16. Sec. III. Elect infants, dying in infancy, are regenerated and saved through the Holy Spirit; and all others elected who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the word.

17. Sec. IV. Others may have some of the common operations of the Holy Spirit.

18. Chap. XI. The elect are not justified until the Holy Spirit actually applies Christ unto them.

19. Sec. VI. The justification of believers under the Old Testament was effected in the same way, i. e., by the Holy Spirit.

20. Chap. XII. All those that are justified receive the Holy Spirit of adoption.

21. Chap. XIII. The whole of the chapter on sanctification is given to the setting forth of the work of the Holy Spirit in, with, and for, the elect, after regeneration. (This would seem complete and clear enough to satisfy any one who is free from a mania for revision).

22. Chap. XIV. Sec. I. The grace of faith is the work of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of the elect.

23. Chap. XVI. Sec. III. The ability of men to perform good works is wholly from the Holy Spirit, not only by originating in them the desire and ability for good work, but there is required an actual influence of the Holy Spirit to work in them to will and to do good.

24. Sec. V. We gain no merit before God by the good works we perform, for the reason that they are wrought by the Holy Spirit, and are therefore not to the credit of the human.

25. Chap. XVII. Those whom God has accepted in Jesus Christ can not totally nor finally fall away, because they have been effectually called and sanctified by His Holy Spirit.

26. Sec. II. The perseverance of the saints depends upon the abiding of the Holy Spirit in them.

27. Sec. III. The Holy Spirit is grieved by the sins of God's children.

28. Chap. XVIII. Sec. II. Assurance of grace and salvation is founded on the testimony of the Holy Spirit, which Holy Spirit is the deed to our inheritance in heaven, and by the Holy Spirit we are sealed to the day of complete redemption and our inheritance is sealed to us.

29. Sec. III. The Holy Spirit enables us to so know the things given to us of God, that we may attain unto infallible assurance.

30. Peace and joy in the Holy Spirit enlarges the heart.

31. Sec. IV. The assurance of grace and salvation is shaken and discontinued by grieving the Holy Spirit. This assurance is revived by the operation of the Holy Spirit.

32. Chap. XIX. Sec. VII. The Holy Spirit subdues and enables the will of man to do freely and cheerfully the will of God contained in the law, as well as the will of God contained in the gospel.

33. Chap. XX. Sec. I. Under the New Testament believers enjoy fuller communications of the Holy Spirit, than ordinarily under the Old Testament.

34. Chap. XXI. Sec. II. The Holy Spirit is to be worshipped as God.

35. Sec. III. Prayer, in order to be acceptable, must be made by the help of the Holy Spirit.

36. Chap. XXV. Sec. III. Christ, by the Holy Spirit, makes the ministry, oracles, and ordinances, effectual for the gathering and perfecting of the saints.

37. Chap. XXVI. Sec. I. All saints are united to Christ by the Holy Spirit.

38. Chap. XXVII. Sec. III. The efficacy of the Sacraments depends upon the work of the Holy Spirit.

39. Chap. XXVIII. Sec. II. The Baptismal Formula.

40. Sec. VI. In the right use of the ordinance of baptism the Holy Spirit really exhibits and confers the grace promised, in God's appointed time.

41. Chap. XXXIII. Sec. III. At the resurrection the bodies of the just shall be raised unto honour by the Holy Spirit, and made conformable to the glorified body of Christ.

Now read the chapter on Sanctification, and you will have the statements by our Confession before you.

I challenge any man to show from the Scriptures any one doctrine concerning the Holy Spirit that is not stated here in clear terms.

Let it be known that to the writer hereof the study of the word of God concerning the Holy Spirit has been for about eight years a most delightful, refreshing and purifying study. After studying all the books I could get, at the same time comparing them with the Scriptures, I threw some of these books into the fire, and having put the others on the shelves, I reviewed my Bible, and for about six months preached at the Sabbath morning services on the subject of the Holy Spirit. I believe that the series of sermons was exceedingly profitable to my people. I know those sermons were to the great spiritual profit of their pastor. In the course of those sermons I had occasion to say some things with reference to the trouble that seems to me to be the real cause of this effort to bring about a revision in our Standards. In my further study I have not found any reason to change my mind.

It is strange that slanders should rise against our Standards among our own people.

On the proposed changes in the Larger and Shorter Catechisms I most emphatically disagree with you.

Concerning the proposed change in Q. 149, it is my observation and experience, that every man "doth daily break them (God's Commandments) in thought, word, and deed." The answer as it stands is Scriptural, psychological, ethical, experimental and logical.

Concerning the change proposed in Q. 153, I think one text of the words of our Saviour ought to be enough to satisfy every right-thinking mind that "God requireth of us the diligent use of the outward means whereby Christ communicates to us the benefits of His mediation." I refer to Luke 13: 24, "Strive (Agonize—agonizesthe) to enter in at the strait gate; for many, I say unto you, will seek (expect) to enter in, and shall not be able."

The seeming inharmony between this statement and our historic position on Justification by Faith is entirely, no doubt, in the inability of the human reason to clearly reconcile these two clearly taught Scripture doctrines. If the framers of the Westminster Standards found these two doctrines in the Scriptures, it was perfectly right and proper for them to put these two doctrines in the Standards, and it is perfectly right for us to keep them in the same place. There are many things in the word of God that you and I are under the necessity of believing that we can't wholly understand, though we may see the reasonableness of them; e. g., we are justified by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; but the work of the Holy Spirit is absolutely necessary in every case in order that the justification may be made effective in the heart of the man who believes in Jesus.

Again: "There is now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus"; but the security of the believer depends upon the efficacy of the merit and intercession of Christ; and the abiding of the Holy Spirit within the believer.

There is much more to the point that might be said, but this must suffice at this time on the special points involved.

And now, my dear brother, as I am forbidden to rebuke an elder, and am commanded to "entreat him as a father", let me entreat you to go about this matter in a different way. Why should you, in this half secret way, endeavor to make it appear to the next General Assembly that there is a widespread demand for such revision as you suggest? Why not, in a perfectly open, frank and Christian manner, write what you think on these subjects, and in that open way call the attention of the brethren at large to what you think is needed in our Standards, and ask them to join you in bringing the matter before the next General Assembly?

In this manner the Church would not be distracted by a prolonged discussion through two General Assemblies, and through all the Presbyteries. A question of change is a most distracting question, and takes up so much of the energies of the Church while it is being prolonged. I apprehend that an open call to the brethren would be sufficient in this very important matter to ascertain whether there is any demand for such changes. The question of the Holy Spirit is important enough to bring thousands of the brethren to your company, if so be that you get them to see the necessity on so important a subject. I apprehend, however, that you would have a very few to join you; for there are exceedingly few who would join such overture without first reviewing the teachings of the Confession and Catechisms. I am at a loss to explain how, after a careful examination on these points, any one could persuade himself to think that the Confession and Catechisms are not Scriptural, complete and exceedingly clear on all these points.

As a younger minister than yourself, I entreat you to examine the Scriptures and your own heart again, and see that you have in some way been deceived.

The Lord lead you, and give you all joy and peace in believing in Jesus the loving Saviour.

The Lord bless His work in your hands.

Yours truly and fraternally,

Stonewall J. McMurry,

Pastor First Presbyterian Church.

Laredo, Texas, March 11th, 1903.

[We publish below the new chapter on the Holy Spirit adopted by the Northern Assembly. In the light of Mr. McMurry's collocations from the old Confession, it would seem that there is little new in this chapter.—Ed.]

I. The Holy Spirit, the third person in the Trinity, proceeding from the Father and the Son, of the same substance and equal in power and glory, is, together with the Father and the Son, to be believed in, loved, obeyed and worshipped throughout all ages.

II. He is the Lord and Giver of life, everywhere present in nature, and is the source of all good thoughts, pure desires and holy counsels in men. By Him the prophets were moved to speak the Word of God and all writers of the Holy Scriptures inspired to record infallibly the mind and will of God. The dispensation of the gospel is especially committed to Him. He prepares the way for it, accompanies it with His persuasive power, and urges its message upon the reason and conscience of men, so that they who reject its merciful offer are not only without excuse, but are also guilty of rejecting the Holy Spirit.

III. The Holy Spirit, whom the Father is ever willing to give to all who ask Him, is the only efficient agent in the application of redemption. He convicts men of sin, moves them to repentance, regenerates them by His grace, and persuades and enables them to embrace Jesus Christ by faith. He unites all believers to Christ, dwells in them as their Comforter and Sanctifier, gives to them the Spirit of Adoption and Prayer, performs all those gracious offices by which they are sanctified, and sealed unto the day of redemption.

IV. By the indwelling of the Holy Spirit all believers being vitally united to Christ, who is the Head, are thus united one to another in the Church, which is His body. He calls and appoints ministers for their holy office, qualifies all other officers in the church for their special work, and imparts various gifts and graces to its members. He gives efficacy to the word and to the ordinances of the gospel. By Him the church will be preserved, increased until it shall cover the earth, purified, and at last made perfectly holy in the presence of God.

The Recent Religious Convention.

The recent Religious Educational Convention was held in Chicago, Feb. 10, 11 and 12, 1903. I have seen no detailed account of its proceedings, its membership, its organization, or its final action. All this will doubtless be given to the public in due time, perhaps it has been already done at least in part: and until all this is known no intelligent estimate or just and satisfactory criticism can be made of this Convention and especially of its work, of what was actually done by it. I have, however, read the editorial comments upon the Convention and brief notices and accounts of it in several of our religious journals, the longest and most favorable being that of the Interior, published in the Standard of March 4, with what the Interior calls "this reassuring resolution," passed by the Convention towards its close; and more recently I have carefully read an editorial in The Biblical World for February, giving very fully the inception, the purpose, the personnel, the speakers, the topics for discussion, the proposed organization, and the probable action of the Convention then about to be held; also a calm, dispassionate and able criticism of this whole movement in the March number of the Bible Student by Dr. Wm. M. McPheeters of Columbia Seminary. And with this information before us, I think we are warranted in making the following comments, statements and suggestions.

First, The University of Chicago, of which Dr. Wm. R. Harper is President, and the Biblical World, of which he is editor, are apparently the prime movers in this whole matter. They seem to be not alone the sponsors and promoters, but the chief originators of this movement. "The Council of Seventy" who issued the "Call" for the Convention was composed of those connected with the above mentioned institution and magazine, and of men for the most part like-minded with them in and around Chicago and elsewhere in the East and Middle West. (I have not seen the names, but feel sure this is a correct statement.) This Council of Seventy, or its committees, certainly "ran the Convention." For they issued the Call, sent out the invitations, determined the membership—the number and largely the men—: they made out the program, and selected the speakers both for the "Addresses" and for the "Discussions" thereon, and they so limited the time as practically to leave none for general discussion. And in furnishing members of the committees who really did this work, the "General Committee" and "the eight committees preparing for the Convention," Chicago University easily distanced all competitors, while Union Seminary, New York, was a good "second." Everything was admirably prearranged, and all went through smoothly and beautifully—as political conventions often do when the program of the "bosses" is carried out to the letter. Now a movement begun under such auspices, an organization dominated, as it seems, by such leaders is not to be approved and endorsed, no matter how many, or able, or learned, or pious, or influential its members may be—and its influence and power are not to be underrated,—and no matter either how much of real good it may propose, attempt, or even accomplish; but it should rather be jealously watched, the evil in it pointed out, and the unwary kindly warned of the danger. The least, and the most, we ought to do, should be carefully to "take forth the precious from the vile." "Times, Donors, etc."

In the next place. The purpose of the organization, which was to be, and I believe was, the outcome of this Convention, is stated in these words (quotations from The Biblical World): "The organization . . . should aim to survey the whole field of religious and moral education, to ascertain what is being accomplished in all portions of the field, by all agencies, and to assist all organizations, institutions, and individuals who are now engaged in this great work." This is certainly a worthy aim, as it is unquestionably a "great work:" and if wisely conducted under safe and competent leaders, all true lovers of "religious and moral education" might gladly lend a helping hand and utter a hearty God-speed. But, besides what has just been said, there are several things that should give us pause and prevent our doing either the one or the other. Note the following:

This organization is curiously conglomerate—"many men of many minds,"—and is composed of men virtually self-appointed, and certainly self-appreciative and self-confident. Its purpose, as we have seen, is broad and beneficent, its scope well-nigh all-inclusive, as this extract shows: "The scope of the movement" includes: "1, the Sunday-schools; 2, the Home; 3, the Theological Seminaries and Colleges; 4, the Academies and Private Schools; 5, the Public Schools; 6, Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations; 7, Young Peoples' Societies; 8, Mothers' Clubs; 9, City and Village Libraries; 10, Church and Sunday-school Libraries; 11, the Religious Press, and 12, the Daily Press." But there is not the slightest hesitation about undertaking this vast work, nor the faintest shadow of a doubt of their ability to do it, for: "All the scholarly and progressive workers in the field of religion and morality are uniting to make this new organization an educating, uplifting force in the Twentieth Century:" and: "What is sought is an organization which can accomplish for the single organizations and individuals engaged in this work the same service that in military affairs is rendered by the general staff." And a good deal more of the same kind.

Again and more serious. The "practical" is emphasized and insisted on rather than the doctrinal, as if it mattered little what men "believe concerning God" provided only they always "draw from the Bible the same practical standard of Christian life." Much also is said about "the constructive teaching" and "the historical study" of the Bible; e. g. "The new organization should stand for the historical study of the Bible as a necessary means of understanding the Bible in its relation to practical Christian belief and activity:" and this, "consequently"—i. e., even before Biblical scholars have reached a unanimity of opinion on all historical matters,—"we should be able to unite upon a constructive teaching of the Bible which will leave in solution those historical problems that are now under investigation, while it will put to their legitimate use the vital and clear practical teachings of the Bible in matters of everyday religion and morality." And more like it. All this may not be very plain to ordinary laymen, who like the apostles are but "unlearned and ignorant men," but coming from the source it does we may be quite sure it means something very different from what Presbyterians have heretofore believed the Bible to be and to teach, different too from the way Jesus always spoke of the Scriptures as the Word of God which could not be broken.

Other instances might be cited, but let these suffice. Enough has been presented to show the direction of this movement, the temper and spirit of this organization, and to make us all agree with Dr. McPheeters when he closes his articles with these sad and solemn words: "Without feeling called upon to question any one's motives, or impeach any one's personal Christian standing, we have no hesitation in saying that if—as it seems reasonable to expect will be the case—this organization is to be dominated by the views for which The Biblical World stands, it will perhaps be the gravest menace to the pure, comfortable gospel of Christ that this country has ever seen." #### Medical Science in the Cove.

Some of the Coves are blessed in having a good resident physician. Ian MacLaren in the sketch of Dr. Weelum MacLure has immortalized the Doctor of the Old School. The same type of doctor lives in the mountains of the South. I know one, a Mac too, like that canny Scotchman. He does his best for the need of every man, woman and child in his wild straggling district, year in, year out, in the dark and in the light, without rest and without holiday.

But not every mountain community is so fortunate. There are large sections of country in which hundreds of people live without the care of physicians. Old women administer their herbs and quacks practice their superstitious arts.

Lately I was called upon to visit a man dying of consumption. He desired to be prayed with; not that prayer had occupied an important part in his life but that he feared to go hence unprayed for. He looked upon me as a devout Romanist might have looked upon his priest confessor, as one carrying the keys to the Kingdom.

The Doctor of the Old School had been discharged some months before and a doctor of an older school, a sure enough witch doctor had been called in. We met face to face at the bedside. The patient had abandoned hope of recovery. The duty he sought to impose upon me was intercession for the forgiveness of his sins; the duty he sought to impose upon my companion was the wreaking of vengeance upon the witch who had brought about his mortal sickness.

The sickness was brought about on this wise. The man had unwittingly inhaled smoke from the burning flesh of a bewitched hog. The hog's body was being burned in order to destroy the witch, the man all the while cutting the flames with a table knife. This effort had failed, for the witch, an unsuspected neighbor, had purloined a household utensil from the owner of the dog. The unfortunate man himself was stricken by the witch.

"Sleep did neither night nor day
Hang upon his pent-house lid;
He did live a man forbid;
Weary sev'n nights, nine times nine,
Did he dwindle, peak and pine."

Hence the calling of the witch doctor. This was his method of procedure. He drew a picture of the supposed witch on a sheet of paper. This paper he placed upon a tree as a target. His object was to hit it a centre shot with a silver bullet the end of which had been previously bitten by human teeth. He failed to do this, the witch escaped death; the bewitched man died. He died but not before he had sent his son to kill a rooster that had crowed at an unseemly hour at night. This he did in order to stay death another twenty-four hours.

On my way home I overtook the Doctor of the Old School and told him what my eyes had seen and what my ears had heard.

He sighed and answered: "Superstitions of six centuries ago survive among us Coveites. They survive despite medical science and organic chemistry, despite electrical conductions and inductions. They survive and though dying, they die hard."

Not long thereafter I had another good illustration of the truth of this assertion.

A neighbor youth was badly cut and was bleeding profusely. A toothless old hag sitting in the corner smoking mumbled his name over and over again, each time repeating a formula from the Bible: "When I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live; yea, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live." She professed to be thus able to staunch the flow of blood. What she professed was of small moment; specially since the young man submitted his limb to be pounded and the wound to be sewed up. What she professed was of small moment; what she practiced was more serious.

An eight day old infant was brought to her to be scarified. The theory is that every child must have what the Coveites call the hives, i. e., eruptions like those of measles. These eruptions are induced by cutting the child's flesh with a razor and by causing the child to drink the blood thus drawn. This is the theory; the facts are quite otherwise. The eruptions are caused by the drenching of horrid teas poured down the helpless infant's throat, teas made from bone-set, grounding, penny-royal, snake-root, catnip, alder and four score other "yerbs," a list of which the old woman gave me.

Five years residence in the Cove has convinced me that Herod is not the only one guilty of slaying the innocents. These old women do it; not at one stroke by deputed executioners as the king did; but little by little, by potions and pills. Sallow-faced, tallow-faced, low-headed children—such is the residue that survives infancy and with unsteady hands, lack-lustre eyes reach out towards maturity. They reach it but go through life afflicted with a "stumnick trouble."

One of those thus afflicted had a more acute pain one day than usual. That day he drank six different kinds of teas and ended the course by a gill of bitters mostly mean whiskey. After that he was very voluble. "I am the seventh son of a seventh son," he said, "and I have never seen my father. I can cure the worst case of thrash on record. I can blow my breath into the mouth of any child sick with thrash and thereby cure it."

I was laughed at for not believing him, whereupon he produced his witnesses pretty much after the manner of the patent medicine man. The Coveites know not a word of Latin; yet with them every post hoc is a propter hoc. They sincerely believe that this seventh son of a seventh son had cured their children of thrash by blowing his rum-tainted, tobacco-saturated breath into their little lungs. The children lived through the ordeal. There they were before me to speak for themselves.

Before I escaped from that crowd the seventh son of a seventh son recommended that my wife rub our teething child's gums with the warm brains of a lately killed rabbit. "It will teeth without pain, sir, without pain." He repeated this again and again; and added: "The same result can be secured by rubbing the gums with the comb of a red rooster or by knocking the child's head three times against the door step."

The incredulous reader may smile but if he knows of the pilgrimages to the shrine of Good St. Ann and of the absent treatment of Mrs. Eddy he will not smile too broad a smile.

It is not a laughing matter that the Coveite attempts to cure whooping-cough by thrusting the sick child under a briar both ends of which are rooted. He does this head first and draws the sufferer back by the heels.

To remove cataracts from the eyes he recommends the bathing of the eyes seven successive mornings in spring water running due east. To cure nervous maladies drink three drops of a black cat's blood. To prevent backache, roll over on the ground three times on seeing the first dove in the spring season. To cure asthma bore a hole in a tree at a point the height of the patient's head, put a lock of his hair therein and seal.

To cure cattle of hollow-horn, brand with a pair of pot hooks made after marriage.

All of these prescriptions and more have been recommended to me. I could enumerate ad nauseam; but enough. The problem is how to dislodge superstition, how to displace witch-craft, how to establish right views of physiology and hygiene. A preacher feels so helpless to grapple with that problem. He is only a bachelor of arts and he needs to be a master of science. He knows Augustine and Calvin; but has only heard of Pasteur and Koch. He knows all about the filioque controversy and can enumerate the ecumenical councils in order. He has a diploma from a theological seminary and certificate of graduation in apologetics and hermenentics. Yet he stands helpless in the presence of such ignorance and superstition. If any time he had designs on the D. D. degree he abandons them and applies himself to the study of man. He loses interest in the Egypticity of the Pentateuch and applies himself to the study of the pancreas and the associated organs of digestion.

Revising the Confession.

Permit me to give in brief terms some reasons for revising the Confession of Faith concerning "Elect Infants dying in Infancy."

1. So far as one can judge from the discussions that for some time have been engaging our church courts and occupying the columns of our church papers, there is no one in our communion who believes that any dying infant is damned. The oft-repeated charge that Calvin taught that not all who die in infancy are saved, has been shown by the excellent work of Dr. Stagg to be unfounded. The refutation of the charge has been rejoiced in by Calvinists on all sides. The clearing of him who gives his name to their system of theology, goes far towards relieving the system itself of the suspicion that it teaches such a doctrine even by implication. I think I can safely say that the Presbyterian Church as a unit rejects the doctrine of infant damnation.

2. The only expression in the Confession of Faith upon which the enemies of Calvinism base the charge that infant damnation is taught in our standards, is not so clear as to be unsusceptible of being misunderstood. See the recent letter of Rev. J. S. Shaw to the Christian Observer, in which he contends that the words "elect infants dying in infancy," imply that there are non-elect infants who die in infancy. If the words are equivocal to one who is a student of our standards and prepossessed in their favor, can we expect them to be unequivocal to those who read the Confession only partially and often with a view to finding in it something objectionable?

3. According to the Confession itself, "the whole counsel of God . . . is either expressly set down in Scripture, or by good and necessary consequence may be deduced from Scripture. Can the belief that "all infants dying in infancy are regenerated and saved by Christ through the spirit" be deduced from Scripture by good and necessary consequence?

If not, how dare we preach it? If so, why do we hesitate to express it authoritatively in our standards?

4. Our creeds are the expression, not of what we certainly know, but of what we believe the Scriptures to teach. We do not profess to have a "Thus saith the Lord" for every assertion of the Confession of Faith. To do so, we would have to yield to the Campellite contention, and use only the exact language of Scripture. Many of these credal statements are conclusions which have been reached by a careful comparison of Scripture with Scripture—inferences, in which of necessity man's wisdom bears a main or has prominent part. Shall we say that all those deductions are infallibly correct? In view of our past history such an assertion will hardly be made. Not a score of years have passed since the General Assembly, acting upon the instruction of the Presbyteries, ordered that the clause, "the man may not marry of his wife's kindred nearer in blood than he may of his own, nor the woman of her husband's kindred nearer in blood than of her own," be stricken from the Confession of Faith. This was done on the ground that there was "a settled conviction on the part of almost the whole church that the rule is not supported by any just Scripture authority." There is no just Scripture authority, according to the view of the church at large, for any other belief than that all infants who die in infancy, are "elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father," and, as such, "are regenerated and saved by Christ, through the Spirit, who worketh when and where and how he will." Why, then, hesitate to express this belief in language that cannot be perverted or misunderstood?

The Twentieth Century Church Builders' Fund of the Synod of North Carolina.

The plan is as follows: All who are interested in the upbuilding of the Presbyterian Church are asked to contribute $1.00 each upon every call made by the Chairman of the Fund, provided that not more than five calls are made in one year.

This $1.00 from each person insures the completion of a church or manse free from debt, at some place where one could not have been erected without such aid. There are now about 125 subscribers. What a work might be done in this cause if all of the 35,000 members in our Synod who are able were contributors to this Fund!

Consider: 1. That only $1.00 is asked.

2. That not more than five calls are made within one year.

3. That calls are only made for points unable to build without aid and these calls are made only on the approval of the Chairman of the Presbyterian and Synodical Home Mission Committees.

4. There are many places now waiting for which calls upon this Fund should be made.

5. If 1,000 of our more than 35,000 members would respond all of these places could be supplied with a comfortable church or manse.

In view of these facts, will you not become one of our subscribers to this most easy and effective plan for building Presbyterian churches?

We now appeal to the Session of each Church in the Synod to conscientiously and prayerfully take hold of this matter, and appoint one in each Church to solicit subscribers and collect.

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

We hope the reader will understand the really serious purpose under the bantering tone of "The Colored Problem in the Presbyterian Church." It is best for both churches, Northern and Southern, to know the exact ideas of representative men on the negro problem. But we predict now that the General Assembly, meeting in California with its Chinese Problem and looking across the Pacific to Hawaii and the Philippines with their problems, is not going to reverse the action of the Synod of Tennessee in erecting white and colored Presbyteries in the same territory.

We always feel grateful for such a contribution as The Law of Spiritual Growth, signed by the familiar initials L. McK., which may need translation to newer circles of readers as belonging to the beloved Luther McKinnon, former President of Davidson College.

The Standard is always willing to touch off such a piece of dynamite as Rev. S. J. McMurry lays under the scheme to overture the Assembly for Confessional Revision. The Standard is in favor of Confessional Amendment on the one point argued this week by Dr. Praigg. It is not in favor of Revision. There is a difference, though Dr. Praigg calls it Revising the Confession. Medical Science in the Cove is a sad commentary upon the civilization of some isolated regions in our great Appalachian System, and should bring to mind the truth that the gospel is the great civilizer and educator.

We are glad to publish, also, our Western Editor's view of the Recent Religious Convention, merely qualifying its drift with the remark that the Committee of Seventy were not the only ones that called the Convention; that the Convention organized an independent Association to which are invited members of all religious bodies engaged in the work of moral and spiritual education, and that the Biblical World is not the authoritative exponent of the views of the Association, whatever relation it may bear to the Committee of Seventy.

Church News.

PERSONALS.

Rev. S. C. Byrd of Columbia, S. C., has accepted the call to Winnsboro, S. C.

Rev. A. A. McGeachy and wife, of Fulton, Mo., have been visiting relatives in North Carolina.

Rev. J. H. Thornwell, D. D., preached at Easley, S. C., on the First Sunday in March. Mr. Wade, the pastor, writes that five persons were added to this church last Sunday.

The address of Rev. R. C. Morrison is changed from Brittain, N. C., to Wildemere, his work remaining the same.

Rev. W. C. Lindsay of Biloxi, Miss., has taken charge of the church at Ocala, Fla. Mr. Lindsay had the unique experience of being recalled by the church at Biloxi, after resigning its pastorate.

Rev. Lacy L. Little of the China Mission will come to North Carolina early in the summer, and asks that correspondents write him at Little's Mills, N. C.

MISSOURI

THE OZARK FIELD.—The Home Mission Committee of Lafayette Presbytery has secured the services of Rev. Dr. O. W. Gauss to take charge of the lower Ozark field. He will relieve Rev. J. F. Forsyth, who has labored faithfully there for nearly two years, and who will be given other work in the Presbytery. The field consists of the churches at Sparta and Forsyth in Christian and Taney counties and the region round about. For several years Dr. Gauss has had charge of the very interesting and successful Mission work of the Central Church, Kansas City. And the Committee is to be congratulated upon obtaining a man of his experience and ability for this important work.

ST. LOUIS.—A movement has recently been inaugurated here that promises much good to our cause in this city. It is the formation of a Church Extension Society. The purposes and plans of the Society are sufficiently indicated by the following: "The Society for Church Extension in St. Louis Presbytery U. S. is a corporation under the laws of the State of Missouri, to promote and carry on the work of Christian evangelization by establishing Missions and Sunday-schools in destitute parts of the city: to give pecuniary aid to churches and congregations needing it; to purchase grounds and erect church edifices thereon; to receive and administer such gifts, devises, or legacies given to it; and in general to carry out the work of said missions and church extensions."

Under this plan the Society will have an annual income, without the necessity of annual solicitation, to devote to the work of church extension.

The Board of Trustees consists of fifteen members, the four pastors of our churches in St. Louis and eleven laymen. The subscriptions are not valid until $20,000 is subscribed; not more than ten per cent is to be called for in any one year; after the first year the subscription may be changed or cancelled at the pleasure of the subscriber, after due notice given, and the subscription is void at the death of the subscriber. Most of the $20,000 needed to begin has been already subscribed, and the success of the movement seems assured. And this means new hope and life to some of our enterprises in the city. Perhaps others may be encouraged to go on and do likewise.

VIRGINIA.

Union Seminary Notes.

We take pleasure in announcing the acceptance by Rev. Egbert W. Smith, of Greensboro, of the invitation to make the annual missionary address before the student body on Sunday evening, May 10th. The services will be held in the First Presbyterian Church of Richmond, and a very interesting program is being arranged. This has been a year marked for interest in world-wide missions in the Seminary, and the student body is to be congratulated on securing as its speaker one of the most enthusiastic and most successful missionary pastors in the Church.

Dr. J. R. Howerton, of Charlotte, N. C., has been selected to make the closing address to the Senior class at the graduating exercises Wednesday morning, May 13th.

Mr. Arthur Clark, of Danville, Va., a graduate of Hampden-Sidney, and lately a student at Johns Hopkins University, has entered the Seminary.

The two upper classes have had recently a brief course, under Mr. J. Gray McAllister, in Archaeology. The text book used was "The Monuments and the Old Testament," by Prof. Ira M. Price of the University of Chicago. The aim of the book is to point out all the recent discoveries, along archaeological lines, in Bible lands, and to show clearly their bearing on Israelitish history. The study was found to be both interesting and profitable. The Spence Library is not wanting in several trophies from the East.

The Seminary community receives a valuable addition in a handsome home, now being built by Mr. S. H. Hawes of Richmond, on Chamberlyne Ave. He will bring his family out for the summer months.

The sick list has been rather large recently but we are glad to report everyone out and enjoying the delightful weather.

Miss Effie Strickler has as guests Misses Pogue and Effinger of Lexington, Va., and Miss Robeson, of Red Springs, N. C.

Miss Sue Lightfoot is visiting her aunt, Mrs. J. P. Smith, on Chamberlayne Ave. W. M. W.

Spring Meeting Concord Presbytery.

To the delegates to the spring meeting of Concord Presbytery:

All delegates to the spring meeting of Concord Presbytery to be held at Salisbury, N. C., 9th April, are requested to notify me at once of their intention to be present so that suitable arrangements can be made for their entertainment. Prompt compliance with this request on the part of both ministers and elders is earnestly desired.

W. G. Watson.

Salisbury, N. C. March 21st, 1903.

ROCKY MOUNT.—Rev. John E. Wool, of Oxford, N. C., assisted the pastor of this church for seven or eight days early in March. His sermons were earnest, original and full of gospel truth. The congregations were good, attentive and deeply interested. The pastor is expecting to receive several persons into our communion who were deeply impressed during these services.

Rev. Alex. Phillips, D. D., our general superintendent of Sabbath-schools and acting secretary of Publication, paid our church and Sabbath-school a visit on last Sabbath, March 15. The more we see and hear of Dr. Phillips, the more we are impressed of the wisdom of our Assembly in creating this office and in selecting this officer. Our work under his influence and stimulating force is becoming more thorough and aggressive in all parts of our church.

Dr. Phillips has the gift of attracting and of holding the attention of young people, and they assembled in large numbers to hear him.

Besides two addresses to this class, on the same day he preached two sermons to the congregation, which crowded the house and heard him with deep attention and great profit.

DAVIDSON.—Prof. S. T. Ford, elocutionist and impersonator, is to be here on April the 6th, and Dr. Hawkes, of Baltimore, will give a humorous lecture on the 21st. Senior speaking occurs on April 10th and 11th. The Mandolin and Glee Club will also give a musical entertainment at that time.

Rev. D. P. McGeachy, the newly appointed agent for the Twentieth Century educational fund, is making Davidson his headquarters during his canvass of Concord Presbytery. Our community hopes he may labor in these bounds long enough for Mrs. McGeachy to take up at least a temporary residence in the village. Mr. McGeachy seems to be meeting with a gratifying response to his appeals for the cause. His visit to Taylorsville a few days ago resulted in subscriptions to the amount of $450.00. His next appointment is at Fifth Creek Church.

Dr. Smith spoke at Aiken on the 22nd inst.

It is thought that the work of remodelling the large auditorium in the Chambers Building will begin next week. Mr. Mooney, who is in charge of this work and of the building of the new dormitory, promises the hall for Commencement.

DUPLIN ROAD CHURCH.—On Wednesday night before the first Sabbath in March, 1903, the Rev. J. M. Wells, D. D., Wilmington, N. C. delivered his famous lecture on Wise Reading, which was greatly enjoyed by a well filled house. He remained over and preached for us Thursday and Friday. The meeting was continued over Sunday by our beloved Pastor, Rev. R. Murphy Williams. Our communion service on that day was well attended. As a result of the meeting several new members have been added on examination.

WILMINGTON; St. Andrews.—Fourteen names of new members received since the last Quarterly communion; ten by profession and ten by letter were announced in this church at the communion on March 15.

PHOENIX.—A church was organized near Phoenix, Brunswick county, N. C., Friday night February 27, 1903. There were twenty-two charter members. This is a result of the work of our Synod's committee of Home Missions and followed a successful meeting conducted by Rev. Wm. Black. The Evangelist in the county, Rev. J. C. Storey is doing a fine work. The church chose the name, Bethberie. A Sabbath-school was started there the following Sabbath. Ten years ago an elder in St. Andrew's Church offered to support a young man for the summer to preach in this county where there was then no Presbyterian Church. There are now four.

Collection for Church and Christian Education.

To the Ministers and Churches of the Synod of North Carolina.

Allow me to call attention to Synod's one collection in April to this cause. I can only remind you of the growing importance of this cause as set forth in my last report to Synod which is published in the Appendix of the minutes of Synod. Sickness has prevented me from addressing you through the mails as I have usually done.

J. B. Shearer,
Synod's Agent and Chairman.

TENNESSEE.

SODDY.—The good people of Soddy Church and congregation have received us with much kindness. We are now established in the manse, where we were met on Wednesday night, by many of the dear people, each bringing some substantial token of kindness. May the Lord bless them and make our ministry promotive of their spiritual interests. We also wish gratefully to mention the abounding liberality of our Winston brethren and the tender affection of our dear Danbury people whom we have left. May God grant them a faithful shepherd.

FLORIDA

CLEARWATER.—Rev. C. O. Groves, late of Pisgah, Ky., has received a call to the church at Braidentown, Fla. Mr. Groves has signified his acceptance of the call.

GEORGIA.

VALDOSTA.—A very impressive memorial service of Rev. D. C. Rankin, D. D., whose first pastorate was Valdosta, was held in the Presbyterian Church here Sabbath evening, Feb. 15

A picture of the lamented preacher and editor was exhibited in front of the pulpit.

The appropriate program was executed with sympathetic tenderness. The services opened with prayer by the Pastor, followed by the missionary hymn: "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," and the reading of a Scripture lesson from 1 Cor. 15: 39-58.

Mrs. C. S. Bondurant read with much earnestness and insight the splendid tribute paid the departed by Bishop O. P. Fitzgerald of Nashville, Tenn., who was neighbor to Dr. Rankin. Then came the song, "Only Remembered by What We have Done." Miss Sallie Myddleton, a warm personal friend of Dr. Rankin, read a memorial prepared by herself. This excellent and beautiful tribute was read with evident feeling and singular impressiveness.

Mr. C. C. Varnedore spoke lovingly and eloquently of Dr. Rankin as a pastor.

Major J. O. Varnedore spoke ably and discriminatingly of him as a man and preacher, making some strong and valuable suggestions relative to the minister's mission and opportunity in the pulpit.

Rev. Charles C. Carson spoke of him as an editor and made a fervent appeal to the congregation to cultivate the missionary spirit, which he said was the real secret of Dr. Rankin's useful and inspiring life.

The services concluded with the singing of the old hymn, "Sweet By and By," and the benediction.

In addition to the usual Sabbath evening attendance a number of former friends and admirers of Dr. Rankin were present.

WAYCROSS.—Our church has passed through a refreshing season of grace. Rev. W. S. Lingle of Rock Hill, S. C., preached for the pastor ten days. His sermons were strong and rich with the Word of God and so productive of good that many say they will by the grace of God live a better life and others accepted Christ as their Saviour. There was no special effort made to get people to commit themselves for there have been too many spurious committals in all of our churches. God says in Isaiah 55:11 "So shall . . . accomplish that which I please." We have had the promise verified.

Our city has had all kinds of evangelists with all kinds of methods but it is the general testimony that the quiet meeting held at the Presbyterian Church had put more men to thinking than any we have held in years.

Our community has been built up and blessed by the clear and practical exposition of God's Word. Our prayers and best wishes follow our brother.

MISSISSIPPI

YAZOO CITY.—Rev. Lacey I. Moffett delivered a most interesting and effective lecture on foreign missions in the Presbyterian Church Sunday morning, 11 o'clock, and that night preached an eloquent sermon. As a result of his discourse on missions, contributions to the amount of $450 were received, which will go to the support of a missionary in China. Mr. Moffett will sail some time next year for China, to devote his life to the mission cause.—Herald.

Rev. Dr. G. S. Roudebush of Madison county was the guest of Capt. C. J. DuBuisson Saturday and of Rev. C. E. Cunningham Sunday, preaching at the Presbyterian Church Sunday morning.

Encouraging, But Might be Better.

Through the good hand of our God upon us we bring you glad tidings concerning our candidates for the ministry. The exact number of them for this year will not be known definitely until the next General Assembly shall have completed its minutes. But we now have on our roll 175 beneficiaries, as against 162 last year. This would seem to indicate an encouraging increase in the entire number of candidates. For this we are profoundly thankful. By this we are encouraged to expect a greater increase in the near future. It is certain we should make more ample provision for our beneficiaries. In the hope of doing this we now commend this cause to your generosity for the new year which begins with April. From the April collection we should realize $10,000.

In order to do this, however, larger liberality on the part of our people will be necessary. We are in urgent need of more ministers. Should not love to Christ and compassion upon our perishing fellowmen constrain us to give liberally and gladly of our means to equip and send forth an adequate ministry?

We beg to remind pastors, sessions and treasurers that, according to receipts of March in former years, there are perhaps at present in the treasuries of our churches $2,000 contributed this year for this cause. This should go to the credit of these churches this year. We are anxious it shall do so. We must close our books March 31. Hence all funds already contributed for this year should reach us before that date. We gladly supply without charge, on application, envelopes and leaflets for collections.

Joseph H. Lumpkin, Secretary.

By order of the Executive Committee of Education for the Ministry.

Memphis, Tenn., March 13, 1903.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

News Items from Thornwell Orphanage.

The Thornwell Orphanage is entering upon the spring with good health prevailing throughout, among teachers and pupils, with everybody busy and with a bright outlook for a successful closing in July next, of its 28th school year. There are 22 matrons, teachers and foremen employed and there are 100 pupils now present in the Institution.

These pupils are from every Southern Synod of our Church and from a number of outside states and territories. South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida and Virginia furnish the large majority of pupils.

There are now 50 accepted applicants waiting for the first vacancy, while as many more applications are undergoing examination. These can only be admitted as vacancies occur, as every cottage, (of which there are nine) is full and, indeed, some of them over-crowded. We cannot enlarge without additional cottage room. The Institution is now the largest Presbyterian Orphanage in the United States.

Our teachers are from Virginia, 7; North Carolina, 9; South Carolina, 10; Georgia, 2; Florida, 1, Kentucky, 2, and Missouri, 1.

The children under our care are not given out for adoption or hired out for service. They are received as pupils, given thorough literary education and trained in some trade or manual employment. We have an excellent Technical School provided with several thousand dollars worth of improved machinery in which the boys are fitted to make a living for themselves. We have no trouble in finding situations for either boys or girls who complete our full course and who act creditably while with us.

The support of the Institution is wholly voluntary. No regular church collections are ordered by the Synods. The majority control of the institution is in the hands of the Synods of South Carolina, Georgia and Florida with one representative from each of the other Synods of the Church, the appointment of whom is made by the Board of Trustees. The school is of high grade and pupils graduating from it are entitled to teach under the laws of the State of South Carolina without further examination with a first-class certificate, the Institution having arranged its courses of study according to law.

It is sufficient evidence of the moral training of the Orphanage to be able to say that 20 of our boys are either now in the ministry or are preparing for it. Of our present family 116 are now members of the Presbyterian Church.

It takes about $60 a year for the support of each child, including board, clothing and tuition for the twelve months. The payment of $5 a month constitutes the donor the patron of a child. As expenses are of course heavy for the sustenance of so large a family, gifts of even the smallest sum will be very gratefully acknowledged.

Send all gifts to Rev. Wm. P. Jacobs, Clinton. S. C.

The World.

King Alfonso, of Spain, is suffering from lung trouble.

The bubonic plague at Mazatlan, Mexico, has been checked. No death or new cases were reported.

A life-sized bust of Sidney Lanier was unveiled at Tulane University, New Orleans, a few days ago.

Much excitement has been caused at Pairal, Mexico, by the discovery of a phenomenally rich body of gold ore.

Consul McWade, of Canton, reports that a rebellion has broken out in the Province of Kwan-Tung, China.

Colonial Secretary Joseph Chamberlain received the city of London's congratulations on the success of his mission to South Africa.

The German Reichstag adopted the appropriation of $750,000 to cover the expenses of Germany's participation in the St. Louis Exposition.

The French Government has received a definite offer of $200,000 from Venezuela as a settlement of all claims of France prior to 1892.

The anniversary of the death of Louis Kossuth was marked by the usual student demonstrations and collisions with the police at Budapest, Hungary.

The Czar has ordered the immediate construction of the proposed Idensalmi-Kayana Railroad, which will cost $700,000, so as to give employment to the Finns who are suffering from famine.

One of the last wishes of the late Mr. Rhodes, was the erection of a memorial at Carter's Ridge to Colonel Scott-Turner and others who were killed in the sortie on November 28, 1899, has just been carried out by the De Beers Company.

Mr. Chamberlain has made the statement to the the House of Commons that 100,000 Boers have been repatriated and that the Government is giving the new colonies, under the peace terms, $75,000,000 towards the expenses of the re-settlement.

Senator Morgan's speech on the Panama Canal makes ninety-seven pages of the Congressional Record. It will average 4,000 words to the page and make a total of about 388,000 words, which is equivalent to about three volumes of the ordinary 400 page novel.

Shirley Christy, general manager of the Southwest for an American Life Insurance Company, and Ben Shuster, who has been touring in Mexico in an automobile, have been thrown in jail at Cananea, Sonora, Mexico, because their automobile caused a panic.

King Leopold has postponed his visit to the United States until next year. He has decided not to leave Europe this year on account of the number of important questions now before Parliament, which might necessitate his presence in Brussels at any moment. It is, however, certain that he intends to cross the Atlantic as soon as possible.

The Secretary of the treasury has received a proposal to remove the wreck of the United States battleship Maine. It came from an individual American, whose name the Secretary declines to disclose. The proposition does not call for payment either way. Pending its acceptance it has been decided to include the Maine in the advertisements for bids for the removal of various wrecks.

The Oxford Bible is widely known, but few are aware of the tremendous scale on which it is produced. From The Caxton Magazine, we glean the following data: The Bible publications of the Oxford University Press have been issued for three hundred years and can be published in 150 languages and dialects. Every year fully 600 tons of paper are used for this purpose alone. Orders for 100,000 Bibles are quite common, and the supply of printed sheets is so great that an order for half a million copies can be readily filled. On an average, from 30 to 40 Bibles are furnished every minute, and this number can readily be doubled.

Mr. John Henry Boner, poet, editor, and cyclopedist, died in the city of Washington week before last. His most notable poem was "Poe's Cottage at Fordham." He was at one time on the staff of the "Standard Dictionary," the "Century Dictionary," and the "Library of American Literature," and for several years was on the editorial staff of The Literary Digest, where his work was of uniformly high grade.

Consul Gonalue, at Toronto, reports to the State Department that the New Niagara Falls Power Company proposes to bring electricity to that city by cable over a distance of 90 miles. The company will begin work on its plant as soon as it gets authority from the government to develop power. The power will be used to operate the Toronto Street Railway, and about $5,000,000 will be invested in the plant.

The steamer Mariposa arrived at San Francisco from Tahiti, Mar. 16, bringing additional news of the typhoon and tidal wave at the Paumotu or Pear island group of the Society islands on Jan. 15. The French Government has investigated the disaster and has found that between 500 and 600 islanders perished during the storm. The islands of Hao, Morakau and Hikura are virtually washed away, as they are at present little above the sea level, and are destitute of vegetation.

The British embassy at Washington has been formally advised of the appointment of Lord Chief Justice Alverstone of England and Sir Louis Jette, retired judge of the Supreme Court of Quebec and Sir John Douglas Armour, judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, as members of the Alaskan Boundary Commission, provided for under the Hay-Herbert treaty.

A new floating pontoon dock is being constructed in Great Britain for Durban, South Africa, to replace the one which was recently wrecked on the rocks off the coast of Cape Colony, while en route from England to its destination. This new dock is to be much more powerful than the one which was wrecked, though it will be similar in construction. It will measure 475 feet over all—an increase of 110 feet over the wrecked dock—while its lifting capacity will be 4,000 tons greater—8,500 tons as compared with 4,500 tons.

The British Admiralty has definitely decided to adopt the French gray color as the official war paint for all the vessels in the navy. This decision has been arrived at after prolonged experiments with various tints, but French gray is the color which renders a vessel the least conspicuous and renders it a difficult target to hit. The vessels of the channel squadron are being transformed, and the Mediterranean and other fleets will be similarly treated as soon as possible. The painting of each ship costs $5,000.

The original map made by George Washington in 1775 of the lands on the Great Kanawha River, West Virginia, granted to him by the British government in 1763 for his services in the Braddock expedition, is now in the possession of the Library of Congress, says The National Geographic Magazine. The map is about two by five, and is entirely in the hand writing of Washington. The margin is filled with notes, also in Washington's hand writing, describing the boundary marks set by Washington and different features of the tract.

Silk is known to be the secretion of two glands of the silk-worm alongside of the digestive canal. These glands, which consist of tubes in numerous coils, terminate in the spinning-ward, and open in a common orifice from which the secretion, of the consistency of honey, issues forth promptly hardening into a thread on exposure to the air. Usually the silk is colorless on leaving the body of the silk worm, but sometimes it is straw-yellow or greenish. There has been a dispute of long standing between the savants as regards the origin of this coloration. Some claimed that the larva itself produced the color, others ascribed it to impurities which it acquired upon secretion, and still others were of the opinion that the green color of the leaves of the mulberry tree was the cause of the coloring. The last-named opinion seems to be the correct one. Latterly, Levrat and Conte fed silkworms on mulberry leaves which had been saturated with non-poisonous aniline red and aniline blue. The result was that not only the silkworms turned red or blue, but they also secreted silk of the respective colors. Injections of the above-named dye stuffs into the anal organ of the silkworm produced the same result.—Die Seide. Scientific American.

The troubles in the management of the American National Red Cross Society will culminate soon in the retirement of Clara Barton from active control of that organization. It is said that an agreement has been reached by those most interested in the society by which Miss Barton is to be succeeded by Rear Admiral William K. Van Reypen, retired, former surgeon general of the Navy, and for some years a resident of Brooklyn Heights, where he still owns some property. Miss Barton is to be given the office and position of honorary president for life.

A novel way to get electricity for lighting a railway train is described by Cassier's Magazine. A dynamo is located on the engine, perhaps under the pilot. Power in driving it is derived from a rotary fan or windmill immediately above, under the headlight. As the locomotive travels at the rate of 20, 30, and even 40 miles an hour, a breeze of corresponding velocity is developed. The current is conveyed to small accumulators under each car of the train. It may be assumed that when these are fully charged, the current is automatically cut off. Tests are said to have been made with an outfit of this kind, and the results are said also to have been encouraging, contrary to what one might be led to expect.

The report of the commission appointed by the President last October to investigate the anthracite coal strike, has been made public. The report is dated March 18, and is signed by all the members of the commission. In brief the commission recommends an increase of wages amounting in most instances to 10 per cent.; some decrease of time; the settlement of all disputes by arbitration, fixes a minimum wage and a sliding scale, provides against discrimination of persons by either the mine owners or the miners on account of membership or non-membership in a labor union, and provides that the awards made shall continue in force until 1906. To some extent the matter of recognition or non-recognition of the miner's union is touched on, but the commission declined to make any award on this matter.

Dr. Ludwig Biro, the eminent Hungarian explorer and scientist, has returned to Europe with a large collection of zoological and ethnological specimens gathered in the Malay Peninsula and New Guinea, during a period of six years. So extensive and varied is his collection, that it will require several years to examine, catalogue, and classify them for the Hungarian National Museum, where they are to be exhibited. He has obtained among his zoological specimens a number of species which have been hitherto unknown to science. Dr. Biro was formerly an assistant master in a college in Hungary, but was so imbued with the desire to prosecute his studies abroad, that he sold his remarkably extensive entomological collection, numbering 60,000 specimens, to the Hungarian National Museum, to defray his Malay expenses.—Scientific American.

Little surprise is shown in the press over the failure, by popular vote in New Hampshire, of the woman-suffrage amendment to the state constitution. This amendment, with nine others, was submitted to the voters last week and was lost by a vote of nearly two to one, in spite of a very active campaign carried on by its supporters. The vote is reckoned at about 15,000 in its favor, to about 26,000 against it. "Some prejudices are as rock-rooted as the granite hills," says the Boston Transcript, "and that against admitting our women to their civic rights and responsibilities is apparently one of them." "New Hampshire is certainly a conservative State," remarks the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, "and it is surprising that a vote on woman-suffrage was permitted." The Chicago Post thinks that the New Hampshire women did not want the ballot.

"The northern belt (of forests) is perhaps greater in extent than all the other timber belts and reserves of Canada combined," says a writer in The National Geographic Magazine. "According to the best authority, it extends from the eastern coast of Labrador north of the fiftieth parallel in a north-westerly direction to Alaska, a distance of some 3,000 miles, with an average width of perhaps 500 miles. This vast strip of timber land, if placed upon the territory of the United States, would extend from Maine to California and from the southern shore of Lake Erie to the northern boundary line of Georgia. It is known as the spruce forest of the Dominion, the great bulk of the timber being of that species, black and white, the other important trees being larch and poplar. Although this belt has been but partially explored, it is claimed that many of the trees in the southern portion are of a lumber-producing size, but the greater portion is fit only for pulp. When it is considered that spruce is distributed in vast quantities through all the forests of Canada, and that an almost incalculable amount will be produced in this great northern belt, it is hardly exaggeration to say that the Dominion possesses an inexhaustible supply of pulpwood."

Tidings come of the death of His Imperial Highness Prince Kamatsu, of Japan, on February 18th. He was prominent in the westernization of the Empire, and filled with credit and distinction, important positions in the Empire's military and civil administration. He was commander of the expedition against the Shogunate, which effected the restoration to power of the Mikado, and the unification of the Empire. He participated also in the expedition against the Saigo rebellion in 1877, and also in the Japan China war. But his most important services were as the representative of the Japanese Imperial family at such events as the Jubilee of Queen Victoria in 1897, and the coronation of His Majesty King Edward VII. He was prepared for such service by study and residence in England for two years, 1870-1. He was a broad-minded and progressive statesman, filling every position he occupied with intelligence and tact. He was always ready to assist and patronize worthy causes, and was specially interested in the Red Cross Society of which he was the General Superintendent. He contributed largely to the better international understanding which culminated in the admission of Japan to the comity of nations.—Exchange.

Memphis, March 21.—To-night there are many hopeful features in the flood situation in the immediate territory about the city and the officers of the levee boards and river men are expressing more satisfaction with the conditions now prevailing than has been indulged at any time since the flood first assumed critical proportions. The gauge to-night shows 39.7 feet and falling, which is a decline of .4 since last night at 9 o'clock, when the water became stationary on the gauge. It is now believed that the fall is due to natural conditions, rather than to the drainage of water from the Mississippi by the breaks in the Arkansas levees to the north. Although the fall might have been slower if these crevasses had not occurred, it is currently believed that the fall will continue without check and the crisis is passed. President Killough, of the St. Francis levee board, to-day succeeded in sending a large barge through the crevasse at Trice's Landing, for the rescue of stock and property at Marion, Ark. The steamer Hugo was dispatched to the crevasse later with a commission to enter the flooded territory and render assistance to such as might be in need. Mayor Williams has been notified by the government commissary officers at Jeffersonville, Ind., that 500 tents were to-day shipped to this city for the shelter of the flood refugees.

The great power station which is being erected at Chelsea, London, for the operation of the District Railway system, possesses special interest because of the fact that it will be the first large electrical power station to be operated entirely by steam turbines. The plant will consist of ten turbines, each of 7,500 horse power, with an overload capacity of 50 per cent above the normal rating. The turbines, which are being supplied by the British Westinghouse Company, will be of the Parsons type with Westinghouse modifications. Each turbine will be direct-connected to a three-phase generator of 5,500 kilowatts running at a speed of 1,000 revolutions per minute. There will be only four field-magnet poles, and current will be produced at 11,000 volts potential. The dynamos and the turbines are being built, part of them at the works of the American Westinghouse Company at Pittsburg, and part at the new works of the British company at Manchester. As a result of the high speed of revolution, and the consequent small number of field magnet poles required, the dynamos will be only about 6 feet in diameter; whereas if reciprocating engines of the type used at the Metropolitan Elevated Company's power station in this city were used, running at 75 revolutions per minute, the diameter of the generators would have to be not less than 32 feet.—Exchange.

Marriages.

M'GEE-ROBINSON.—On March 10th, 1903, at the residence of the bride's brother, Mr. J. H. Robinson by the Rev. R. Murphy William, Miss Margaret E. Robinson was happily married to Mr. George McGee of Goldsboro, N. C.

HOWARD-BRAY.—In the Presbyterian manse, Jackson, Mo., March 8, 1903, by Rev. C. W. Lathan, Mr. J. E. Howard of Jackson, Mo., and Miss Josephine Bray of Neely's Landing, Mo.

COLLINS-BRUNSON.—In Wilmington, N. C., at the home of the bride's mother by Rev. A. D. McClure, D. D., Dec. 24, 1902, Mr. John S. Collins and Miss Annie Laura Brunson.

COWLES-NEELY.—At the home of the sister of the bride in Wilmington, N. C., by Rev. A. D. McClure, D. D., Feb. 11, 1903, Mr. Hugh Reynolds Cowles and Miss Eloise Neely, both of Statesville, N. C.

LANIER-SASSER.—At the home of the bride's mother in Wilmington, N. C., Feb. 18, 1903, by Rev. A. D. McClure, D. D., Mr. James T. Lanier and Miss Annie May Sasser.

Deaths.

"Lie down and sleep,
Leave it with God to keep
This sorrow which is part
Now of thy heart."

CALAHAN.—At La Fallett, Tenn., Feb. 13, 1903, Mrs. Emma Du Bose Calahan, a member of the Presbyterian Church of Columbiana, Ala.

M'CALL.—At the meeting of the Ladies' Aid Society of Amity Church on Sunday, March 1st, the members spoke in saddened tones of the death of their youngest member, Mrs. Lula McCall.

Her cheerful presence is missed by our church, of which she was such an earnest worker; her sweet voice will no more be heard in our choir where her place was seldom vacant.

Though we so deeply sympathize with her family and sorely miss her smiling face, our hearts are lightened by the thought that she has seen the King of Kings in all his glory and her voice is that of an angel.

CORBETT.—At his residence, near Ivanhoe, N. C., on Thursday, Dec. 4, 1902, Mr. James L. Corbett in his 86th year.

Deceased was the senior elder of Black River Church, having entered upon the duties of the office in early life. Though of iron constitution his health had been bad for several years. Those who knew him at his best testify to his sincerity, purity of speech, and devotion to duty as a member of the church and of the session. His power was felt in the closet and in his whole life. For 16 years he was the faithful superintendent of the Sabbath-school and for 60 years led the congregation in singing. The spirit of song hushed for several years, burst out on his death bed in an effort to sing, "Jesus, lover of my soul."

His death was without a struggle and a look of deepest peace and satisfaction spread over his face as his soul passed away.

He is survived by his wife, a brother, two sons, four daughters and many other relatives who mourn his loss, while pastor and people ask, "Who will take his place?"

In Memoriam.

In the fellowship of Christian love we offer this token of esteem for our departed friend now "absent with the Lord," Mrs. Cynthia Belk, who has entered into rest since the mid-night watches of February 14th, 1903. In attempting a tribute to her excellent worth, we feel it a sad but gracious privilege.

Born and reared in a home of religious training, amid the comforts of affluence—the refining influence of gentle piety early sown in her receptive heart, eased not to bear fruit abundant, "e'en down to old age." Long years of widowhood she lived among us—unremitting strength she patiently exercised in the loving care of a growing family, committing her all to the "Father of the Fatherless," herself to the "God of the widow."

In the house of her God her feet delighted to dwell—her accustomed place in the sanctuary rarely vacant, and the communion of saints she held as "a feast to her soul."

Sharp and bitter sorrows she bore in meek submission, but confident trust in "Him whom she believed." The evening "when shadows grow long" of her hallowed days, was crowned by effulgent peace; in humble gratitude she rejoiced in the blessing of faithful ministry by loving children, who counted it but an honor to cherish and gladden her life, a just reward for her long-expended motherhood. Children and grand-children may well hold her sainted memory a precious benediction. To them we offer our deepest sympathy, we too have lost a friend and mourn her absence. "One by one we are crossing over." May her consistent life be an incentive to walk worthily, so that when the swift and silent messenger cometh, we too, shall meet her in "the land of light," and mingle again our praises to the Lamb who hath washed and redeemed us from all sin, to "enter the joys of our Lord" forever more.

"At the crystal river's brink,
We shall find each broken link.
Then the star that fading here,
Left our hearts and homes so dear,
We shall behold more bright and clear."

"Sleep on then, beloved, sleep and take thy rest,
We loved thee well, but Jesus loved thee best."

Thou left us not without warning,
In a brighter clime, we'll say not "Good-night, but good morning."

Resolved—a copy in our minutes be dedicated to inscribe her memory—a copy be tendered the family, also duplicates be forwarded to The Fort Mill

Times and The Presbyterian Standard, with request for publication.

In Memoriam.

M'LAURIN.—In Fayetteville, N. C., on April 6th, 1829, the subject of this memorial was born. She entered into rest in Jacksonville, Fla., Feb. 28th, 1903, at the residence of her son, Mr. Joseph H. McLaurin.

Her maiden name was Elizabeth Eccles. Her father, Mr. John D. Eccles, of Fayetteville, N. C. where she spent all of her young life, where she was married in Nov. 1853, to Mr. Duncan McLaurin, with whom she lived in happy, faithful and loving union till his death, which occurred in Jacksonville, Fla., in Nov. 1883. Nine children were born to them, six of whom still survive and were all present at the bedside of the loving and devoted mother when she fell asleep in Jesus.

In 1867 the family moved from North Carolina to Florida, making their home in Lake City, and resided there till 1880, when they came to Jacksonville and have been there ever since.

Early in life Mrs. McLaurin was sav- ingly converted and united with the Pres- byterian Church of Fayetteville, of which her father was an honored and useful Ruling Elder. From the time of her conversion till the day of her death, she lived a consistent, circumspect and godly life, walking in intimate and delightful communion with her God and Saviour, in loving and friendly fellowship with the children of God, and in salutary and exemplary piety before her family, thus fulfilling all her Christian obligations and under all conditions and circum- stances of life faithfully confessing and bearing witness for her Lord and Master, Christ Jesus. To her church she was al- ways truly loyal, and never hesitated to advocate and defend its principles and its causes—never failing to seek its peace or to promote its prosperity. She was indeed a true and ardent Presbyterian, but first of all a loyal and consecrated Christian, who loved the Church of God and his people by whatever name they were called. She exercised the love, that knew no intolerance of others, con- victious, but conceded to all the right to differ.

She was a strong sympathizer with and contributor to the causes of benefi- cence, giving liberally of her time and means to maintain every worthy object. The cause of Foreign Missions was es- pecially dear to her and she was greatly interested in everything that tended to extend the Redeemer's kingdom through- out the world. For several successive years she was the President of the Ladies' Foreign Missionary Society of the New- man Street Presbyterian Church, of which she was a devoted member for twenty years. And among the last acts of her long and useful life in Chris- tian work was one connected with this cause so dear to her heart.

In her domestic relations she was the faithful and devoted wife, the tender and loving mother, the kind and gentle sister, and the fond and affectionate grand-mother. The interests of her husband and her children lay very near her heart and she always strove to be a blessing to them, and of her it could have been said most truthfully.

"The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil. She will do him good, and not evil, all the days of his life. She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness. She looketh well to the ways of her household and eateth not the bread of idleness. Her children arise up, and call her blessed, her husband also, and he praiseth her."

Her friends hold her in loving remembrance, cherishing with devoted affection the memory of delightful commings with her and the recollection of her cordial hospitality and tender acts of considerate attention. Her life was filled with loving ministries and kindly mercies for others' pleasure and comfort. Hers was a cultured, refined and noble nature. She was modest, retiring and gentle in her disposition and demeanor; firm, strong and steadfast in her convictions of right and duty; uncompromising and unyielding where principle was involved.

Her piety was characterized by fervency, sincerity, spirituality and earnestness of purpose, but without ostentation or obsequiousness.

She was 'strong in faith, patient in tribulation, rejoicing in hope, fervent in spirit, diligent in business, serving the Lord.' And of her as of Mary of old, it can be said, "she hath done what she could." Her last illness was borne with fortitude, patience and resignation. And her sanctified spirit released from its tabernacle of clay winged its flight into the light of eternal day to be "forever with the Lord."

We mourn our loss, but with the sweet consolation that it is her everlasting gain, and "she rests from her labors, and her works do follow her."

'Blessed she was: God made her so:
And deeds of week-day holiness
Fell from her noiseless as the snow;
Nor had she ever chance to know
That aught were easier than to bless.'
Her Former Pastor, W. H. Dodge.

The Household.

A hot water bag is not a thing of beauty, even though its utilitarian value be undeniable. Place a cover over it, though, of white flannel, eiderdown or crocheted wool and it at once assumes an ornamental air without in the least detracting from its usefulness.

Pancakes when prepared in the right way are very palatable additions to the daily menu, and the varieties of pancakes are about as numerous as the varieties of fritters. Here are some recipes from an English source, of pancakes of various kinds:

Cream Pancake—Mix the yolks of three well-beaten eggs with half a pint of cream, sweetened with two ounces of sugar, flavor with powdered cinnamon, mace and grated nutmeg, and fry quickly in sweet, heated lard. Drain and dish, screening with granulated sugar, and serve with halved oranges.

Apple pancakes—Pare, core and cut into slices some large, good cooking apples. Make the following batter: Two eggs, as much ground rice and flour mixed as will make a rich, stiff batter; add grated nutmeg and sugar to taste. Stew the apples in a thin syrup. Two pans will be required for this pancake. Pour enough batter into the boiling fat to cover the pan then take the cooked slices of apples and screen the pancake with them, at the same time frying another pancake in the other pan and turn it upon the apples—this will leave the golden sides both outward. Drain and cut each one into four, put upon a dish, screen with sugar and serve with sauce.

Bean pancakes—Make a dish of beans or peas (nicely boiled till tender, with cream), adding minced parsley and a chopped eschalot, and season with pepper and salt. Give it one boil, then make a pancake as before, and fry. When one side is cooked, screen it with the mixture, fry another pancake on one side only, and with it cover the mixture. Take it up and set it in a hot oven for three minutes. Dish and serve with tomato sauce.

Doubtless most of you will remember the distinction drawn by Ruskin between the kinds of work—the work done for the sake of the fee, and the work done for the sake of the work itself. The man or woman in public or private life who works only for the sake of the reward that comes for the work outside of the work itself will in the long do poor work always. I don't care where or what the work is. The man or woman who does work worth doing is the man or woman who lives, breathes, sleeps that work, with whom it is ever present in his or her soul, whose ambition is to do it well, and who feels rewarded in the thought of having done it well. That man, that woman, puts the whole country under an obligation to him or her.—President Roosevelt.

In order to keep things from burning in an agate boiler place copper plating on the bottom next the fire and have this protecting metal extend up on the sides about an inch.

Oblong heating pans of tin or nickel, with small alcohol lamps underneath, are a decided convenience for the household. There is room for a small place inside on which food may be placed to keep warm for folks too late for regular meals.

Cork carpet makes an excellent floor covering for the nursery and is very easy to keep clean.

To preserve the ecru tint of lace in laundrying put it through thin starch colored with tea or coffee or simply rinse in tea or coffee water. For old lace tea gives the best tint.

The Courage of Simplicity.

By Priscilla Leonard.

To have the courage of one's convictions is a rare virtue, except when those convictions happen to coincide with the opinions of the world around us. In that event, a little courage goes a long way, and gains an applause out of all proportion to its true amount. To express that other people feel, but do not quite like to say, or know how to say, is simply to speak for the crowd, after all. The true measure of bravery is to uphold convictions which are thoroughly unpopular, and which conflict with one's daily surroundings and immediate circle of society. In these rushing and crowded days the speaker for the sternous life appears the very apostle of courageous effort to the minds of the striving masses. He expresses what the ambitious American boy, the eager American girl, the man of business, the woman of affairs, thinks about life to-day. The gospel of work, the gospel of progress, the gospel of the extreme of individual effort in every possible direction on every day of every year—surely this sounds like a clarion call to bravery and heroic living. And even the tired hearer, wavering on the edge of nervous prostration, tries to respond, and feels ashamed at the inward shudder as a new wave of work is seen heaping up ahead.

But when the doctrine of the simple life is asserted, that requires true courage in its exponent. Modern living is complex, and grows more so with every difficulty overcome and every dollar earned. Simplicity is thoroughly unpopular. The ideal of making "two blades of wheat grow where one grew before" extends to everything, whether it be a necessity like wheat or a luxury like orchids. The strenuous life fits in perfectly with this complex scheme of things. The harder a man or woman works, the more money he or she or his and hers will possess to spend for unnecessary matters. The strenuous inventor provides new methods of complicating life afresh. Has the sewing machine rendered dress less complicated or more so for women? Look at the fashions of a century ago, and the question answers itself. Our grandmothers had one dress where we have a dozen. But they had repose of manner, and we are in a state of nervous tension instead.

Times have changed, doubtless, and we cannot expect to preserve the simplicity of our grandmothers. But the courage of simplicity is sadly needed among American women. Every detail of household life is becoming more and more complex. Many a husband and father is overworked year after year, till the strenuous life finishes him a decade earlier than necessary, because his household requires too much furniture, too many clothes, too many outings, too many entertainments, too many servants, too much keeping up with the rising standard of luxurious living. It requires a high courage for any woman to set a simple standard, and hold to it; but her family will rise up and call her blessed in the end, of she has the courage of her conviction that simplicity is the keynote of true living.

When we sit down and think about it, how few are the essentials of life, after all. Shelter, warmth, clothing, cleanliness, plain food, education, religion, family ties, friendship,—there is little more to be added to complete the list. They are practically within any one's reach, without exhausting effort. Strenuousness begins when we add brown stone, steam heat, laundries, entrees, university courses, pews in expensive churches, and relatives and friends who spend largely and expect us to do the same. Caught in this luxurious whirl, we lose the realities for the appearances of life. Many a home which might have been happy if it had been contented simple, becomes a mere abode of contention, debt, and pretense, from which all possibility of happiness has faded forever. It requires bravery to wear one dress for three seasons when all one's neighbors have three dresses in one season. It requires a calm courage to do without new curtains and centerpieces when our friends regard them as necessities of existence. It demands firm mental balance to read standard books instead of the last novels, and to let the flood of magazines and newspapers sweep by without wading in neck-deep in company with every one else. The woman who rushes from kitchen to club, from sewing machine to charity meeting, from teas to card-parties, with haste and without rest, is called an "all-round" person in approving tones. "She neglects nothing" is the formula of praise from all her friends who toil after her, inspired by her strenuous example. The woman who simplifies kitchen and sewing, who restricts clubs and charities to the point where she really gains strength and gives strength from and to them, and who aims for true social intercourse and not empty social dissipation, is regarded as "so eccentric" if she is a person of position and means, or "so queer" if she possesses neither. The average woman has not the courage to take this stand. It involves "not being like other people" and we all know the horrors of that phrase to the average mind.

Yet, unless the simple life gains on the strenuous one, what are we coming to? The modern dinner-table, with its flowers, its embroideries and laces, its successive courses, its thousand-and-one luxurious details, its costly service and food, is a fair illustration. It does not nourish; it over-feeds and over-stimulates, as any doctor with practice among well-to-do families knows. In point of fulfilling its legitimate uses, it does not compare with a farmhouse table of the plainest pine, with all the dinner spread on it at once, and small variety at that. The common phrase regarding a well-cooked article of diet "the same your mother used to make" reveals what memories of simple tables cling fondly to many minds. What is gained by the luxury of a modern dinner, except the temptation to over-eat, and the consequent tendency to dyspepsia? Yet to the modern dinner-table many a housewife sacrifices thought and time enough to make life rich in higher directions, and spends money enough to make the difference between a comfortable margin and an anxious edge of domestic expenditure. How refreshing to find a cultivated household, the head of whom is famous in American letters, where, as one acquaintance put it, "you can drop in to lunch whenever you want to, and know that you are not giving one bit of trouble. If cold mutton and baked potatoes are the menu for that day, you get them, and a cordial welcome with them, and such clever talk around the table that you congratulate your lucky stars that you are there." It might, of course, be objected that without the clever talk, the cold mutton and potatoes would not be so acceptable. But the point of the simple life is that by cutting off the non-essential, the essential is rendered more possible; and a host and hostess who are not bending their minds on the expense and quality of their dinner, but on the quality of the conversation that accompanies it, are certainly likely to be pleasant company. The worried hostess, as we all know, is a damper to any feast.

The simple life indeed, is not negation—mere ruthless cutting-off. It is rather the affirmation of the best, and the constant choice of it in preference to side issues. It grows by practice. The more we pursue the essential, the more quickly we recognize the non-essential, and the more easily we can renounce it. Like the Japanese householder with his few pieces of furniture, his single artistic drawing on the wall, his single vase of blossomed boughs on the table, we can smile at the crowded decoration that overflows the house next door. Digging in our gardens, with healthy enjoyment of the exercise, we need not envy the millionaire his imported gardeners and his huge conservatory. Reading a fine book, with thorough delight in it, we feel no disappointment in not being able to subscribe for ten magazines and half-a-dozen newspapers with Sunday supplements. Though poor, we can reach sometimes that highest luxury which the rich no longer possess—leisure. The strenuous life fails in this point—the simple life wins it. In the end the latter is more of a power than the former, for a tremendous energy lavished and scattered cannot accomplish as much as a smaller effort, no ounce of which is wasted. To be simple is to relieve the need for being so strenuous. Are there not tired souls who need this gospel, and who are weary of the complexity that grows more complex every year? Let them take courage—the courage to be simple—and life will straighten out wonderfully, and unnecessary burdens drop from them as they go forward, leaving the superfluities of existence behind and finding the essential things even easier to reach.—The Interior.

"A Denominational Garden."

In the February Century, Lovey Mary, Mrs. Wiggs and all the other delightful folks of the Cabbage Patch go on as unique a picnic as any pleasure seekers ever enjoyed. Before this outing Lovey Mary is sent on a Sunday trip to Miss Viny for some yellow-root, and Miss Viny tells her all about her "denominational garden":

"This here is a denominational garden an' I got every congregation I ever heard of planted in it. I ain't no favorite bed. I keef fer 'em all jes alike. When you come to think of it, the same rule holds good in startin' a garden as does in startin' a church. You first got to stiddy what sort of soil you goin' to work with, then you have to sum up all the things you have to fight ag'inst. Next you choose what flowers are goin' to hold the best places. That's a mighty important question in churches, too, ain't it? Then you go to plantin', the thicker the better, fer in both you got to allow fer a mighty fallin' off. After that you must take good keef of what you got, an' be sure to plan something new each year. Once in a while some of the old growths has to be thinned out, an' the new upstarts an' suckers has to be pulled up. Now, if you'll come out here I'll show you round."

"These here are the Baptists," said Miss Viny, waving her hand toward a bed of heliotrope and flags. "They want lots of water; like to be wet clean through. They sorter set off to they selves an' 'tend to their own business; don't keef much 'bout minglin' with the other flowers."

"These is geraniums, ain't they? One of the girls had one, once, in a flower-pot when she was sick."

"Yes," said Miss Viny; "they're Methodist. They fall from grace an' has to be revived; they like lots of encouragement in the way of sun an' water. These phlox are Methodist, too; no set color, easy to grow, hardy an' vigorous. Pinchin' an' cuttin' back the shoots makes it flower all the better; needs new soil every few years. Now, ain't that Methodist down to the ground?"

"Are there any Presbyterians?" asked Lovey Mary, beginning to grasp Miss Viny's meaning.

"Yes, indeed; they are a good, old, reliable bed. Look at all these roses an' tiger-lilies an' dahlias; they all knew what they was goin' to be afore they started to grow. They was elected to it an' they'll keep on bein' what they started out to be clean to the very end."

Miss Viny crossed the garden, and stopped before a bed of stately lilies and azaleas. "These are 'Piscopals," she explained. "Ain't they tony? Jes look like they thought their bed was the only one in the garden. Somebody said that a lily didn't have no pore kin among the flowers. It ain't no wonder they 'most die of dignity. They're like the 'Piscopals in more ways 'n one; both hates to be disturbed, both likes some shade, an'—confidentially—"both air pretty pernickity. But, to tell you the truth, ain't nothin' kin touch 'em when it comes to beauty. I think all the other beds is proud of 'em, if you'd come to look into it. Why, look at weddin's an' funerals! Don't all the churches call in the 'Piscopals an' the lilies on both them occasions?"

"An' here," continued Miss Viny, "are the Unitarians. You may be 'sprised at me fer havin' 'em in here, 'long with the orthodox chnrches; but if the sun an' the rain don't make no distinction, I don't see what right I got to put 'em on the other side of the fence. These first is sweet-william, as rich in bloom as the Unitarian is in good works, a-sowin' theyselves constant, an' every little plant a-puttin' out a flower.

"Ain't there any Catholics?" asked Lovey Mary.

"Don't you see them hollyhaws an' snowballs an' laylajs? All of them are Catholics, takin' np lots of room an' needin' the prunin-knife pretty often, but bringin' cheer an' brightness to the whole garden when it needs it most. Yes, I guess you'd have trouble thinkin' of any sect I ain't got planted. Them ferns over in the corner is Quakers. I ain't never seen no Quakers, but they tell me that they don't believe in flowerin' out; that they like cooness an' shade an' quiet an' are jes the same the year round. These colea plants are the apes; they are all things to all men, take on any color that's round 'em, kin be the worst kind of Baptists or Presbyterians, but if left to theyselves they run back to good-f-r-nothin's. This here everlastin' is one of these here Christians that's so busy thinkin' 'bout dyin' that he fergits to live."

Miss Viny chuckled as she crumbled the dry flower in her fingers.

"See how different this is," she said, plucking a sprig of lemon-verbena. "This an' the mint an' the sage an' the lavender is all true Christians; jes by bein' touched they give out a influence that makes the whole world a sweeter place to live in. But, after all, they can't all be alike. There's all sorts of Christians; some stands fer sunshine, some fer shade; some fer beauty, some fer use; some up high, some down low. There's jes one thing all the flowers has to unite in fightin' ag'inst—that's the canker-worm. Hate. If it once gets in a plant, no matter how good an' strong that plant may be, it eats right down to its heart."

"How do you get it out, Miss Viny?" asked Lovey Mary, earnestly.

"Prayer an' perseverance. If the Christian 'll do his part, God 'll do his. You see, I'm tryin' to be to these flowers what God is to his churches. The snn, which answers to the Sperrit, has to shine on 'em all, an' the rain, which answers to God's mercy, has to fall on 'em all. I jes watch 'em, an' plan fer em' an' shelter 'em, an' love 'em, an' if they do their part, they're bound to grow."

Our Young People.

Aunt Tabitha's Letter—No. 6.

My dear Girls:

You must not infer that I am an Irish woman because I want to begin my letter with a postscript! The fact is, I have a few more words to say on the subject of my last letter, namely: manner. This time I wish especially to speak of manner in church, for your old aunt has been comparing the manner of two young ladies recently, and for your sake she wants to describe them. Perhaps I should say that they are both members of choirs posted in the rear of the pulpit, a very trying position for one who does not keep in mind that he or she is facing the congregation!

One of these comes into the choir quietly and reverently, before service begins, and without seeming to notice, and especially without recognizing any one in the assemblage before her. When she sings, she does so as her share of the worship of God—reverently, fervently, and to the very best of her ability.

Her dress is always neat and quiet, and does not draw your attention in the middle of the singing to the style of her shirt waist, or the trimming of her hat, and during the prayers her head is bowed reverently, and she seems to remember that this is the house of God, and that she is a worshipper.

The other comes in late, and the fact that she is late seems to amuse her. During the prayers she takes the opportunity to converse with her next neighbor, and during the reading of the Scriptures she recognizes and smiles with several acquaintances in the back part of the church. Her dress would be appropriate at an afternoon reception, or for a formal call, though such dressing on the street would warrant the slang expression: "loud."

Now, dear girls, I mention these things because I really believe that girls err often through sheer thoughtlessness, and that many only need to have their attention called to matter like this; and I also believe that they are not wholly to blame, because they should be trained to recognize that in the eternal fitness of things conspicuous dressing is entirely out of place in church, and especially in a choir which is behind the pulpit.

There are very few girls who are so indifferent to propriety, and to their obligations to help others, as to be willing to distract the attention of devout listeners by their manner,—few that would not regret to know that they had spoiled a good sermon by bad taste in dressing, or by an irreverent manner.

So much for my long postscript which perhaps had better be called an ante-script—but please don't call that last effort—a pun!

I wanted to talk about accomplishments this time. What are considered accomplishments now-a-days? What is the object of acquiring them? Since the word accomplish really means to finish or complete, when we speak of accomplishments we presuppose something to complete, something that we are to ornament, or finish off. Just as we must have the dress made before we put the trimming on. A girl all accomplishments would be as useless, as a dress all trimmings!

I believe that if people thought of these things more, there would not only be a lot of money saved, but girls would have more to show for the money so lavishly expended on them.

If the object of what we call accomplishments, is to make us more attractive, to increase our influence over people, several questions arise: What do we want to be attractive for? What do we want to influence people for? Just to be called attractive? Just to be more attractive and influential than somebody else? Oh, surely there is a better reason. That would be selfishness pure and simple! But if we recognize our gifts both mental and physical as gifts to be used, talents to profit with—then we have a God-given reason to cultivate them, and to acquire whatever can aid us in making the world brighter and better for our presence.

Now let us glance back to the days of our grandmothers and our mothers.

What were regarded as accomplishments then? We hear them tell of music and drawing and painting and needle work, yes, and even of spinning and weaving! Perhaps the study of languages, especially of French, was included, but, as a rule it was a very superficial knowledge of colloquial French, and the reading of a few of the best plays.

Of course there were practical mothers who, under the head of needle work included good, old-fashioned sewing, and I remember hearing my mother tell of a five dollar gold piece earned by making a shirt for her father when she was not twelve years old.

And there have been others who did not consider a girl truly accomplished who could not make bread, or, indeed, cook a whole meal! How many can do these things now even with the modern cooking stove, and the sewing machine, or consider them as accomplishments, if they can do them?

But there are somethings on the list of accomplishments to-day, which we could wish stricken off. There are girls who regard it a greater accomplishment to walk gracefully, to have the right "bend"—I believe that is the word?—than to be able to sing like a Prima donna. Who would rather be regarded as "stylish" than cultivated. Who would rather be able to entertain several men at one time, than to paint a picture.

They really regard these things as accomplishments and the time devoted to the acquirement of them, as time well spent!

Now may I mention a few things that seem to me as the most desirable of all accomplishments,—things that add more to the ornamentation of a young girl than anything I have mentioned.

First of all, I would place saying pleasant things. This is an accomplishment and can be learned. I knew a young woman, who was not pretty, she could not play or sing, or "elocute," or waltz—but when she spoke to you, you found yourself saying and doing pleasant things, and when she left you, there seemed to linger both sunlight and perfume. I believe that she acquired this—or at any rate she improved a gift.

Then there is the accomplishment of cordial greetings—especially to older people. And there is good reading,—I do not mean elocution, with all its stilted gestures, practiced in evening dress before an audience, but reading in a clear pleasant voice with appreciative tones and inflections—the kind of reading one loves to listen to as the family is gathered about a cozy fire-place on a rainy evening. Again, the singing of ballads—the dear old songs, that do not require a course of study in some Conservatory in order to be appreciated.

I would not have you neglect the others if you have the gift to cultivate—but I beg, I beseech you, do not strive after accomplishments just because they are the fashion, or for any selfish, or ambitious ends. God gave us all some talent or talents—and these we are expected to improve—but he gave us, as our work to build-up character to which these are the trimmings, or ornaments. Good-bye!

Yours affectionately,
Aunt Tabitha.

The Stormy Petrel's Warning.

It was a dull, leaden day in summer, and the great Atlantic Ocean was moaning a strange song of sorrow for the dead which it had swallowed up, for it was just after one of the hurricanes which occasionally sweep up the coast and destroy ships by the score. The clouds were dark and heavy overhead; the waves white and fleecy with foam and spray. The shore birds had retreated inland during the storm; but now they were returning to their accustomed haunts along the water's edge, glad that the storm had spent its fury.

But suddenly out of the dull roaring of the sea there came a sound which made the plovers, ducks, snipe, and terns stop their feeding and look up inquiringly. It was the distant cry of a bird borne to their ears far across the tossing waves. At first the birds wondered if one of their number had been washed out to sea and was calling for help; but a few moments later they caught the more distant cry of the same bird, and a small tern, which was soaring high in the air, called down to its mate:

"Its only one of Mother Carey's chickens."

"O, indeed," replied the tern on the sand. "I wonder if it has had a good time in the storm. I can never understand 'why a bird should like to go so far out to sea.'"

"Neither can I," spoke up a grebe; but, then, that isn't strange, for the shore birds around here can't understand why I like to dive so much; but I do, and I suppose it's because I was made to dive.

With that the grebe walked toward the water, swam out where it was deep, and then disappeared deep down in the water. For a long time it did not appear again, but the birds looked out of curiosity to see it come up half a mile away. It suddenly bobbed its head up within a foot of the stormy petrel, or Mother

Carey's chicken, whose voice had so startled the feeding birds on the beach.

"You frightened me!" exclaimed the petrel. "Where did you come from so suddenly?"

"From the bottom of the sea," answered the grebe, with a violent shake of its head and feathers. "But where did you come from?"

"O, I came from the middle of the sea—a thousand miles away."

"I should think you would be tired out, and want to rest on the shore."

"I never get tired," answered the petrel, "or if I do I rest on the waves, or sleep under the stern of a passage ship. I would feel lost on the shore."

The two were now slowly making their way toward the shore birds. The grebe was swimming rapidly, but the little petrel half-flew and half-walked over the surface of the sea, making such speed that the grebe could hardly keep up with it.

"What are the birds doing on the water now?" asked the petrel, surveying the different flocks floating around or skimming far out over the waves on strong wings.

They are eating their dinner and flying around for exercise," answered the grebe. "They are all so glad that the storm is over."

"Over? Do they think this storm is over?" asked the petrel, incredulously. "Why, it has just begun. The worst of it is coming up the coast. It is so violent that I am flying just ahead of it to keep out of its way."

"Are you sure of that?" asked the grebe, doubtfully.

"Did you ever know a petrel to make a mistake? Don't we know every storm that comes up, and when to expect them? If the birds are all as doubting as you I'll go back, and not tell them."

"No, they will believe you," said the grebe. "Go and warn them. They are flying far out to sea, and some of them will get caught."

"O, well, what is it to me? I'm not appointed their guardian. If they must be foolish, don't blame me."

But despite this apparently heartless reply the petrel skimmed over the surface of the sea, and called out in its peculiar way the warning that danger was approaching. Many of the other birds heard it, and prudently stayed in near the shore, but the young and more venturesome ones laughed at the petrel's cry and continued to search for food far out to sea.

Finally the petrel reached the outermost flock of young terns, and warned them, saying in unmistakable words: "A storm is coming. You are too far out, and you'll get caught in it."

"What a foolish petrel that is!" answered one of the terns. "The storm has been here, and is now over."

Still the petrel shrilly uttered its cry of warning, circling around and around the terns, and then finally it added: "The storm is now here, and I must fly away before it. It will be too late for you to escape if you wait much longer."

Again the young terns scoffed at it, and to show their disbelief in such prophecy they flew half a mile further from the shore; but when they turned in their flight they saw the stormy petrel far off in the distance, half flying and half running over the water toward the north. Its cry, borne to them on the salt air, seemed now to say, "Foolish birds! Foolish birds!"

Then it occurred to the young terns that probably they were not as wise as they thought, for they remembered that the stormy petrels had always been sure prophets concerning the weather. Instinctively they turned their heads toward the distant shore, but before they had flown a dozen yards a puff of wind struck them, and then another and another. In vain they tried to fly against the gale, which steadily increased. They could hear the shriek and chatter of the other birds, but they knew that their fate was sealed.

For half an hour they struggled with the wind, and then, unable to stand up against it longer, they fell into the sea, and were washed out into mid-ocean before the fierce hurricane. They were never seen again on the coast, but one day, far out at sea, a Mother Carey chicken happened to see dead bodies floating around, and it was heard to say, "Foolish birds! Foolish birds!"—Geo. E. Walsh, in Christian Advocate.

Origin of Familiar Phrases.

"An Axe to Grind."—In the year 1815 there was published a book entitled, Essays from the Desk of Poor Robert, the Scribe. In this book its author, C. Miner, tells the story of a boy—was it Benjamin Franklin?—who, by the offer of liberal compensation, was induced to turn a grandstone for a man who wished to sharpen his axe. The promised compensation was never paid. And since the publication of this story it has been customary to say of any one who disguises his own selfish aims under an appearance of generosity or disinterestedness, that he "has an axe to grind."

"In Apple Pie Order."—To feel "in apple pie order" is a phrase which dates back to Puritan times. The story of its origin is that a certain Hepzibah Merton, who was noted among the Puritan matrons for her skill and orderliness in housewifery, was accustomed on every "baking day," which was Saturday, to bake two dozen apple pies, which were to last her family through the week. In order that the consumption of apple pie by the Merton household should be uniform on every day of the week, and to prevent any shortage before "baking day" came around again, the two dozen pies were placed on the pantry shelves and carefully labeled for each day on which they were to be eaten. A healthy warning this to the little Merton family pantry pilferers. Aunt Hepzibah's "apple pie order" was known throughout the country side and originated the well-known saying.

"Not Worth a Straw."—In olden times in England it was the custom for people to cover the floors of their houses with rushes. When visitors who were deemed worthy of consideration were expected the rushes were changed, fresh ones being substituted for the old. But if the expected visitors were only ordin-

"A Feather in His Cap."—In the days when the Turks still thought it possible to extend Moslem sway in Europe, conflicts between the Turks and Hungarians upon their separating frontiers were of frequent occurrence, and it was a Hungarian rule and saying that "none shall wear a feather in his cap but he who has killed a Turk," and the number of feathers in his cap indicated how many Turks a Hungarian had killed. And this originated the saying, now common with reference to a feather in one's cap.—Selected.

The Children of the Year.

By Miss Lillian M. Yeudes.

Who are the children of the year? What are their names? I will answer your last question soon. The first answer is The Months. What is a month? It is the twelfth part of a year. Long ago there were but ten months and the first one was March.

The word month comes from a word that means "to measure." It takes the earth three hundred and sixty-five days, or a year, to revolve around the sun. The moon revolves around the earth about twelve times in a year; so the moon is the measurer of the year, and the twelve periods are called months.

From Janus, a Roman god, comes the name of the first month of the year. Janus is represented with two heads. A temple of this divinity was placed at the city gate of Rome. His statue had one face looking toward the city and one beyond the gate. The month of January stands at the gateway of the year, one face looking toward the old year and one toward the new.

Among the Romans the first month was held sacred to Janus, and so it is that it was named January, and has thirty-one days.

"It was in the Eighteenth Century that January was universally adopted by the European nations as the first month of the year, although the Romans considered it as such as far back as 251 B. C. ("Library of Universal Knowledge.")

Even in the worship of other gods, the votary began by offering wine and incense to Janus. New Year's Day is the first day of January, being the first day of the year. The custom of celebrating by some religious observance, appears to have prevailed among most of the ancient nations. The Jews, Egyptians, Chinese, Romans, and the Mohammedans, all regarded it as a day of special interest.

"Janus am I; oldest of potentates! Forward I look and backward, and below I count as god of avenues and gates—The years that through my portals come and go."

(H. W. Longfellow: Janus and January.)

February is the year's next child; it receives its name from a Latin word which means to purify, for in this month the people used to purify their homes and

"For the season of snow is past,
The mild south wind is on high."

John Addington Symonds: In February.

February has usually twenty-eight days, but in a leap year it has twenty-nine days. Among the Romans it originally had twenty-nine days in an ordinary year but when the senate decreed that the eighth month should bear the name of Augustus, a day was taken from February and given to August, which had been only thirty, that it might not be inferior to July.

February 22 is Washington's birthday, and February 12 Lincoln's birthday: you all know about these men.

The fourteenth of February is celebrated as Valentine day. On the eve of St. Valentine a number of young maids and bachelors gather in England, Scotland and France, and inscribe upon little billets the names of the young ladies and put them in a box, then each young man draws a slip and chance directs. A traveler once said that "the man stuck faster to the valentine that had fallen to him, than to her whom he had fallen."

Valentines are now extensively manufactured, the demand being yearly on the increase.

"February makes a bridge, and March breaks it."

Herbert: Jacula Prudentum.

March is the third child.

"Now are the winds about us in their glee,

Tossing the slender tree."

William G. Simms: Song in March.

The name of the famous god of war, Mars, was given to the first month of spring. March is a very appropriate name for this month of storms.

In March the sun turns back in his journey among the stars and begins to come north again. The days grow longer and we know that summer is coming again.

As I said March until 1752 was the first month of the year.

March's motto is "Courage and strength in times of danger." Its tree is the juniper, its stone the bloodstone.

"Ah, March, we know thou art

Kind hearted, spite of ugly looks and threats.

And, out of sight, art nursing April's violets."

Helen Hunt Jackson: March.

Where Flint Comes From.

You never would think it, would you? but I'm told that flint is really nothing more or less than sponge, turned to stone. Once the sponge grew at the bottom of the sea, as other sponges grow now, but that was ages and ages ago; and since then the sponge, turned to flint has lain covered by rocks and earth of many kinds piled thick above it. Seen with a microscope, flint shows the make of sponge in its fibres, and sometimes you can see bedded in it the shells of the tiny creatures on which the sponge had fed. Now and then inside a flint will be found bits of the sponge not yet changed.

The last proof settles it; but I may say it's hard to believe—hard as the flint almost.—St. Nicholas.

Another Appreciation of the Aetna.

LUMBERTON, N. C., November 26, 1902.

J. D. BOUSHALL, Esq., Manager Aetna Life Insurance Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir:—After a careful comparison of policies submitted to me by the Aetna Life, Bankers' Life of New York, Equitable of New York, Northwestern, New York Life and Prudential, I have accepted $10,000 in the Aetna on the 20-payment life plan, with option of 25 year 3 per cent. Gold Bond Contract.

I have been a policy-holder in the Aetna for nearly eight years, and therefore feel somewhat prepared to judge of its merits from actual results. With all due deference to other companies, it affords me great pleasure to say that in my opinion the Aetna cannot be surpassed for plain and liberal contracts, and for just, conservative and economical management. I now have $12,000 in the Aetna. My partner, Mr. W. W. Carlyle, has $16,000 and one of our clerks, Mr. John T. Biggs, has $2,000, nearly all of which was written and delivered by your special agent, Mr. H. T. Spears.

Wishing you and the grand old Aetna continued success, I am,

Yours very truly,

Our Little Folks.

CONDUCTED BY MRS. A. J. MCKELWAY.

Dear Little Folks:

To save space and to save you the trouble of writing, "I will close for fear of the waste basket," we will tell you a secret. Within a year not a single little letter that reached the Standard office has gone to the waste basket. We are too glad to get each one.

It is nice for you to be studying the Bible and we like for you to ask the Bible questions, but after you have done this, tell us of the games you are playing and the trips you take; the pets you have and what they can do—just a letter like you would write Mama if she were over here in Charlotte. Won't you?

Gratefully yours,
Presbyterian Standard.

Children's Letters.

Salisbury, N. C., March 12, 1903.

Dear Standard:

Mama reads your little letters to me every Sunday. Papa takes your good paper. We live in the country, nine miles from Salisbury. We have lots of fruit every year. I gather up apples and peaches for Mama. I can sweep the house and wash dishes. We have a large turkey and sometimes he gets after me, then I have to run to get away from him. I have only one pet, a large yellow cat named Buff. I know a lot of Bible questions, and several pages in my Catechism. I like to go to Sunday-school at Unity Church. We live three miles from our church. Our pastor is Rev. R. S. Arrowood. He is a good preacher. I have two brothers—Marion and Harry. Harry gets into his bureau drawer. He can say some words real plainly. I will close for fear of the waste basket.

Your little friend,
Louise Lyerly.

Age 5.

Salisbury, N. C., March 12, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little boy seven years old. I like to read the little letters so much. I haven't any pets, but a cute little brother, who plays with me. He will be fifteen months old tomorrow. He can ride a stick horse almost as well as I can and calls all his horses Jack. I like to go to Sunday-school. I do not go to school as the school house is too far from here. I say my lesson to Mama nearly every day. I soon will be ready for the Third Reader. I have been telling time by the clock for over a year. When I get a man I want to be a preacher. Mama tells me I must be a very good boy if I intend to preach. I know nearly all of the Child's Catechism. I have one sister and when Mama asks her, "Where do you learn to love and obey God," she says, "In the story of the Bible, because Mama reads to us every Sunday in the 'story of the Bible.'"

Your friend,
Marion G. Lyerly.

Dixie, N. C., March 11, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I will write to you now as I have never written before. I go to church at Steele Creek every Sunday. Rev. P. H. Gwinn is our pastor. We like him very much. We have a band of Earnest Workers in our church, Miss Maggie Whiteside is our leader. We are supporting a boy in China. Our band gives a picnic every summer and we have a nice time. I will answer Olive Cathey's question: Eternity is found in Isaiah 57:15. I will ask a question: Who built a monument in the middle of a river? What river, and why? I will close, hoping to see this in print.

Your friend,

Age 10. Maggie Brown.

Fayetteville, N. C., Mar. 8th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

My father takes your good paper and I enjoy reading the letters. I go to Sunday-school and church every Sunday. Mrs. H. Marsh is my teacher and I like her very much. I study the Shorter Catechism and I am on the fourteenth page. I haven't any pets. I have one brother and one sister. I go to school. My teacher is Miss Maggie Ellison. I will close.

Your friend,

James C. Cooper.

Gladis, N. C., March 18, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I have never written to your paper before, I thought that I would write. I go to church at Robinson church, and our pastor is Rev. J. A. McMurray. He has been gone a month, but is coming home this week.

I am sorry to say that our school is out, it has been out a week. Miss Bird Cross was our teacher. We have a nice new school house. I have four sisters and three brothers. My oldest sister is at the Presbyterian College. I will close my letter by asking a question: Where is God winked found in the Bible? and will also answer Maud Rankin's question, The longest chapter in the Bible is the CXIX Psalm.

Your Friend,

Vanie C. Welch.

Fayetteville, N. C., March 9, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I thought I would write to you, as I have never written before. My papa takes your Standard, and I love to read the children's letters. I have been going to school to Glendale school-house. Our school closed last Friday. Our teacher's name was Mr. Evander Simpson. We all liked him very much. I go to Sunday-school every Sunday. Our Superintendent's name is Mr. D. P. McDonald. I will close, hoping to see my letter in print.

Your unknown friend,

Nettie L. Leslie.

Dear Standard:

I am most too young to write a letter but I want to send one anyway to surprise my auntie and grandma. Mr. Sample is my pastor and he baptized my little twin brothers at Carmel Church last Sunday and Mr. Ross' twins too, and two more little babies besides. My little well brother's name is "Shelton" and my little sick brother's name is "Milton." He was baptized on a pillow for you know that is the way he has to be nursed all the time. Shelton is a good baby and grows fast. They are six months old and the Ross twins are most that old too. And we hope after while we can hear them sing as good as we can hear them cry now.

Your little friend,

Conner Hutchison.

Harts, N. C., March 9, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I haven't written to you, I thought I would write to you. I haven't much to tell. I am a little boy, 9 years old. I go to school every day. My teacher is Miss Connie Edwards. Papa takes your paper. I like to read the children's letters. I will close by asking a question, What king had his life prolonged fifteen years?

Your friend,

Meade Hart.

Townsville, N. C., March 9, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I will write to your paper. This is the first time I have written. I go to school to my Aunt Fannie. I think she is a mighty good teacher. I am in the Fourth Reader, Spelling Book and in Long division in Arithmetic. I go to church at Nutbush. My pastor is Rev. E. P. Bradley. We think he is a mighty good preacher. I am staying up at my Aunt Sallie's while my grand mother is sick.

Your little friend,

Lucy N. Alston.

Townsville, N. C., March 9th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I enjoy reading the letters in your paper. I would like to see one of my letters in print so I will write one. I go to school to my Aunt Fannie in Townsville, she is a splendid teacher. I go to Sunday-school at Nutbush. Our pastor is Rev. E. P. Bradley. We like him very much. My mother has been dead about five years. I have two little sisters. One is name Lucy and the other Henrietta. We live down at our Grandmother's. My sister Lucy and I go to school from our Papa's. For fear of the waste basket I will close.

Your unknown friend.

Age 11. Sue H. Alston.

Dixie, N. C., March, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am eight years old. I have two brothers and three sisters. My oldest sister goes to school at the Presbyterian College. I go to church and Sunday-school at Steele Creek. Mr. Gwinn is our pastor. I will answer Olive Cathey's question. Eternity is found, Isaiah 57:15 I will close by asking which is the shortest and which the longest Psalm?

Your friend,

Ruth Sadler.

Concord, N. C.

Dear Standard:

As my Papa takes your nice paper, I will try to help to fill up the paper. I go to preaching at Poplar Tent Church. My pastor is Rev. McLain; he is a very good preacher. My Sunday-school teacher is Mrs. McLain. Well I must close for fear of the waste basket.

Your little friend,

Age 12. Maggie Andrew.

The Sequel to "Cinderella and the Glass Slipper"

Grace McG. Cooke, in The Delineator. When Cinderella ran from the Prince's hall, you remember, her fine clothing changed to rags as she reached the doorway; and out upon the sidewalk, instead of a golden coach with its sleek gray horse and a fat old coachman, there was only a pumpkin, a couple of mice, an old rat and two lizards.

Cinderella ran home and was none the worse for it. Crouching on the sidewalk was a beggar boy; his name was Alfredo. His back was bent and twisted, but his large eyes were very beautiful, and under the dirt and grime his big, white forehead showed that if he had been the child of well-to-do parents he might have been a brilliant scholar.

Now he crouched there on the pavement, waiting for some of the fine guests to come out and throw him a penny. On his back was a great sack in which he gathered up all sorts of odds and ends that nobody else wanted, and his eyes were fixed on the doorway, as Cinderella came out.

He could scarcely believe those same eyes when he saw all her beautiful shining garments change into rags, as she ran away; he turned and looked where, beside him, had stood the golden coach. No coach was there; only a pumpkin, a great rat, two long-tailed mice and some lizards. These didn't run away at once; they lay as if stunned—for let me tell you being changed from a wee mouse into a carriage horse, from little slipper lizards into great, tall footmen, and from a hulking old rat to a grand coachman is a rather stunning business. If no one had noticed them, they would have been better after a while and crept away; but when Alfredo had popped the big pumpkin into his bag, he thought he would take these rats and mice to feed a dog he knew, so before they were in the least recovered, they were being carried away by the little hunch back beggar-boy to his garret room.

Here Alfredo lived all alone; his father and mother were both dead, and he managed to get what kept body and soul together by begging, and in spite of his deformity and poverty he had a few pleasures. One of these—and the greatest—was to pass the grand house of the goldsmith on the corner. The goldsmith had a daughter, Lisa, a little younger than the boy. She was very gentle and very beautiful; she never looked frowningly upon any one, and upon those who touched her tender heart, as did Alfredo, she always smiled. Lisa had a great white hound with which she played, and it was for this dog that Alfredo intended the mice and rats.

He threw that bag into a corner of his garret room and lay down upon his bed of straw to sleep. When he awoke the next morning, he was parched with fever and racked with pain so that he forgot the sack in the corner. All day he lay, drinking occasional draughts of water from the stone jug which stood beside his bed, and as night came on he fell into an uneasy slumber.

He was awakened by a bright light in the room, and a sound of snapping and crackling. He sat up on his bed of straw fully convinced that at last the terrible thing which he always dreaded had happened—the house was on fire. His little room was up so many flights of stairs, the mounting and descending of stairs was so difficult for him, that he had always dreaded lest he be burned to death in his bed. But no, it was not a fire; he rubbed his eyes and looked again—this was a dream—nothing, certainly, but a dream!

There in the middle of his dingy room stood a great golden, glowing coach! Harnessed to it were two sleek, long-tailed, gray horses, which tossed their heads and champed their golden bits and pawed with their slender forelegs as though they longed to be away. On the box was a gorgeous coachman, who held the prancing team well in hand. On the rumble were two splendid footmen, and as Alfredo looked one of these sprang down, flung open the coach door, and bowed low as though bidding him to enter.

This, then, was part of the dream. He got up, rubbing his eyes and stepped into the coach. The door was slammed, the old coachman gathered up his lines and chirruped to his horses, the wall of the room which was before them melted away like a mist—and out they sped. First they went through the air, settling down to the pavement as softly as a snowflake falls, then on, and on, and on through the streets with a rush and a soft rustle. They sped through wonderful streets and saw wonderful sights, did Alfredo and his golden coach. Whether he had never been in the streets through which they now drove, or whether things look different when one looks out upon them from the window of a golden coach, everything they went by was beautiful—beautiful houses, beautiful grass and trees, beautiful lamps flashing everywhere, a beautiful moon and stars up overhead, and beautiful people beautifully dressed, smiling and talking together.

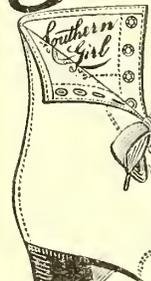

It was all so inspiring to Alfredo, he loved the beautiful things of this world so that he sang as he rode. The songs simply came into his head, and to sing them was a delight. By-and-by they passed the cathedral which Alfredo knew was at the corner near his garret home. The great clock in the tall tower began striking twelve, the gray horses were going like the wind; they went so fast he scarcely heard the strokes of the clock, but the last one must have sounded just as he reached the curb-stone in front of his home, for with a little shock he found himself lying upon the sidewalk, his black bag in his hand, a pumpkin beside him, in front a rat, two mice and a couple of lizards lying as though dead. A little dizzy, for the songs were still ringing in his head, he rose to his feet and put the pumpkin, the rat, the mice and the lizards into his sack and climbed the stairs to his room.

When the lame boy waked in the morning he began to understand what this strange, new thing was which had come into his life. He remembered that he had seen such a coach stand at the curbstone waiting for the beautiful lady. He remembered that he had found there, when the coach disappeared, the pumpkin, the rat, the mice and the lizards. Now these were his, and he doubted not that if he kept them they would change each night into a golden coach. From this time on the beggar boy's days were changed. He walked straighter—for was he not the owner of a golden coach? He washed his face—and people about him began to find that it was a beautiful face. He mended his clothing and, begging from the old woman who kept the stand at the corner a bit of comb, he combed out his tangled yellow curls.

So the years passed till he was grown comely youth. No one ever knew what straightened that bent back, but it was purely pride in his golden coach and delight in the sense to which the coach carried him, that did it. His days were not happy; they were full of hard work and ill usage, but if he were harshly treated or had little to eat during the daytime, he comforted himself with thought of the rides in his golden coach.

His love for Lisa would have made him glad to share his rides with her, but such a coach as he had is one in which each person rides alone—you remember that not even the Prince rode with Cinderella. So he contented himself with telling Lisa about it, and singing to her the beautiful songs which came into his head as he rode in the coach. Gentle Lisa grew to love him more and more. The young people had to be secret about their affection for each other, for Lisa's father, the goldsmith, cared more for money than for anything else, and he would have driven Alfredo from the house, had he suspected that his daughter loved the youth.

On the night of Alfredo's twenty-first birthday, he was awakened as usual by the crackling and the light—he still lived in his garret room. Anyhow, the coach stood there now, and there was some one inside!

The footman flung wide the door. Alfredo, now grown a man, stepped forward and looked in. There sat a little, old woman, her face all puckered into smiles, and a long, slender wand in her little brown hand. "Why don't you get in?" she chuckled. "Isn't this your coach?"

"It is one which has been lent to me for a long time," Alfredo faltered, "But I know that it cannot belong to me. Perhaps, madam, it is yours."

"Get in," said the fairy, "You have ridden in this coach for fifteen years—are you afraid of it all at once?"

Alfredo entered and sat down facing the fairy. The horses sprang away, as usual, and soon they were mounting through the air. "Alfredo," began the fairy, laying her hand upon his knee, after she had shown him all the wonders

A TRAIN FOR MILLIONAIRES

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

of Fairyland, "Alfredo, what do you do when you ride in this coach?"

"I sing songs," Alfredo replied to her. "I cannot ride in the coach without singing." The fairy looked satisfied.

The coach was moving now through the street in which Alfredo lived; it had passed the corner where Lisa, the goldsmith's daughter, was. "Where are we going?" Alfredo asked the fairy.

"We are going to the palace where you first found your golden coach—we are going to the King's palace," said the fairy.

"What should I be doing at the King's palace?" Alfredo asked her in wonder.

"The King and his Queen, Cinderella, have a contest of poets this night. They are choosing a Poet Laureate—and you, my Alfredo, will be the one chosen."

"I?—I—to go to the King's palace in such clothing?"

The fairy laughed, touched the youth with her wand, and straightway he wore a garment of satin laced with gold and sprinkled with jewels.

"Now you will win the prize, Alfredo," she said. "Be not afraid. Sing to them the Song of the Golden Coach, and remember that it is only the pure in heart whom the fairies help."

Alfredo went to the contest at the palace, and you need not be told that he was successful. He married Lisa, the goldsmith's daughter and lived long to sing of the goodness of Queen Cinderella.

The Cat and the Doughnuts.

This is a true story that my grandmother told me about her cat and dog. She used to find the cover of her doughnut jar, and also noticed that her doughnuts disappeared.

One day she heard an noise, and found that her cat was on the shelf where the doughnuts were kept.

Then it put its paw in the jar and drew out a doughnut and pushed it off the shelf; and the dog, who was looking up at the cat, caught the doughnut in his mouth and ate it.

When they found they were caught, they acted very guilty.

Then there was a cat who did not allow any cat or dog in her yard, and had a special dislike to the cat who thought it owned the next yard.

One day the latter cat's mistress went away to have a good time for several weeks, and left her cat with no food, as people too often do.

Then the cat, who before this would not allow any cat in her yard, actually coaxed the abandoned cat into the outer shed where her meals were served, and fed the cat in that way till the people came back. After that it would not allow the cat there any more than before.—Our Four-Footed Friends.

Disappointment, ailment, or even weather depresses us; and our look or tone of depression hinders others from maintaining a cheerful and thankful spirit. We say an unkind thing, and another is hindered in learning the holy lesson of charity that thinketh no evil. We say a provoking thing, and our sister or brother is hindered in that day's effort to be meek. How sadly, too, we may hinder without word or act! For wrong feeling is more infectious than wrong doing; especially the various phases of ill temper—gloominess, touchiness, discontent, irritability—do we not know how catching these are?—Frances Ridley Havergal.

S. L. DILL, Superintendent

Clippings.

"I think," said Mr. Dooley, "I wouldn't like to be an editor, after all. I sometimes wonder why they don't come out with a line printed across the first page: 'We don't know anything about it, and we don't care, and what business it has with you, anyhow?'" "I should think that would kill them," said Mr. Hennessy, sadly. "It does," said Mr. Dooley. "Manny great editors is dead."

An English traveler once met a companion, sitting in a state of the most woe-ful despair, and apparently near the last agonies, by the side of one of the moun-tain lakes of Switzerland. He inquired the cause of his sufferings. "Oh," said the latter, "I was very hot and thirsty and took a large draft of the clear water of the lake, and then sat down on this stone to consult my guidebook. To my astonishment, I found that the water of this lake is very poisonous! Oh, I am a gone man—I feel it running all over me. I have only a few minutes to live! Re-member me to—." "Let me see the guide-book," said his friend. Turn-ing to the passage, he found: "L'eau du lac est bien poissonneux" ("The water of this lake abounds in fish.") "Is that the meaning of it?" "Certainly." The dying man looked up with a radiant countenance. "What would have be-come of you," said his friend, "if I had not met you?" "I should have died of imperfect knowledge of the French lan-guage."

A Fifehire farmer gave his herd lad-die, Jamie (a half-wit), a ticket to admit him to a sacred recital in a neighboring town, to be given by local talent, and told the lad to be sure and enjoy him-self.

The farmer was greatly surprised to find his servant in the kitchen long before the conclusion of the perfor-mance, and upon asking him why he had returned from the recital, Jamie replied:

"Weel, maister, ac man yonder began to sing, 'I'm the King of Glory;' then anither said he 'was the king of Glory' and when I saw three others standin' up an' sayin' they were 'the Kings of Glory,' I kent there was to be a fecht, so I cam awa' an' left them to finish it amon' themselves."—Dunde Advertiser.

An inspector inspecting a Canadian school was much worried by the noise of the scholars in the next room. At last, unable to bear it any longer, he opened the door and burst in upon the class.

Seeing one boy rather taller than the others talking a great deal, he caught him by the collar, carried him to his own room, and banged him into a chair saying:

"Now, sit there and be quiet."

A quarter of an hour later a small head appeared round the door, and a meek little voice said:

"Please, sir, you've got our teacher."

It was his first voyage, and he was leaning over the rail in an attitude of reckless abandonment.

"What are you doing?" some one jeeringly asked him.

"I am rendering to the sea sir, the things that are the sea's sir, he gasped, as soon as he could speak.

"Yow!" howled the baby. "There's a pin sticking in me."

"But," replied the wise nurse, gently, "if I remove the pin your clothes will fall off."

Moral: Don't touch the tariff.

New Sayings of Mrs. Wiggs.

"I've made it a practice to put all my worries down in the bottom of my heart, then set on the lid an' smile."

"You never kin tell which way any pleasure is a' comin'. Who ever would' thought, when we aimed at the cemetery, that we'd land up at a first-class fire?"

"I b'lieve in havin' a good time when you start out to have it. If you git knocked out of one plan, you want to git yerself another right quick, before yer sperrits has a chance to fall."

"The way to git cheerful is to smile when you feel bad, to think about some-body else's headache when yer own is 'most bustin', to keep on believin' the sun is a-shinin' when the clouds is thick enough to cut."

"Don't you go an' git sorry fer yer-self. That's one thing I can't stand in nobody. There's always lots of other folks you kin be sorry fer 'stid of yerself. Ain't you proud you ain't got a hare-lip? Why, that one thought is enough to keep me from ever gittin' sorry for myself." —From "Lovey Mary," by Alice Cald-well Hegan, in the Century Magazine.

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL

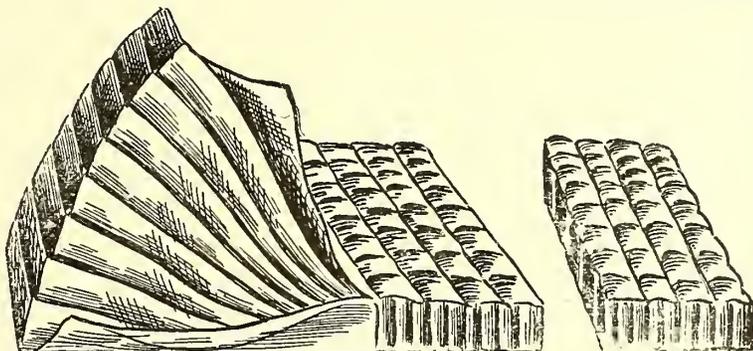

POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

3. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

Event and Comment.

Charleston to St. Louis: Don't treat President Roosevelt with too cordial and lavish a hospitality. He will be sure to send you negro officials and non-resident post-masters in return.

It is all right to stand in the old paths. But the paths ought to lead somewhere, and if standing is all one can do, it is sometimes necessary to make a new path in order to get past a standing obstacle.

Our readers will be especially interested in the picture on the front page on learning that Reginald Campbell's uncle was a South Carolinian and a Confederate soldier. Also a Scotch Presbyterian, as his name, John McAirlie, clearly indicates. Campbell and John Watson are the two great preachers of England.

Delaware is rather a Southern State. But Rhode Island is very much of a Northern State. And from the recent message of Governor Garvin, Rhode Island is about as black as Delaware has been painted, in the matters of bribery by the politicians and the venality of the voters.

The Outlook's recent roast of Roosevelt is remarkable for the rarity of such rebuke from that quarter. But it has proved pretty conclusively that the re-appointment of the man Byrnes after being turned down by the Senate, has opened the "door of hope" to Addicks and his unspeakable gang in Delaware politics, and amounts to the endorsement of wholesale bribery.

The marked decline in drunkenness and in the consumption of liquor in Switzerland and Russia, since these governments took entire control of the liquor business has brought the French house of deputies to recommend that France adopt the same system. The time is coming when the man who putteth a bottle to his neighbor's lips to make him drunken will find not only the Divine curse resting on him, but the additional damnation of being put out of his job all over the world. That may also be his salvation.

The Charlotte Observer's theory that Walter H. Page would never have dined with those negroes at the Unitarian Club except for the corrupting influences of the Southern Education Board is as far-fetched as was Mr. Page's attempt to charge South Carolina aristocracy with the murder of Gonzales by James H. Tillman. One of the wisest of Northern journalists confesses that "Mr. Page holds a brief against the Southern aristocracy." But the dining with negroes at the Unitarian Club is a simultaneous falling from the grace of early Methodism and the teachings of Carolina Democracy.

So the record to date is the closing of a post-office in Mississippi because of local protest against a negro post-mistress; the ousting of an Alabama official because he favored the "lily-white" policy in Alabama; the appointment of a negro collector at Charleston against the protest of the business element that has to deal with him; and the eviction of Vick, supported by the decent element of Wilson, N. C., as a good post-master, but convicted of opposing the "lily-white" policy in North Carolina. In view of the record, the President's resolution not to "swerve one hair's breadth from one side or the other of the course I have consistently followed in the past and shall consistently follow in the future," is just a trifle puzzling.

The late Spanish Bishop of Cebu published a pastoral letter in which he declared that "it is more difficult to meet with a chaste heretic than with a true Catholic who is unchaste." If the Bishop refers to the Philippine friars as true Catholics, that is rather a compliment to Protestantism.

The Church Discipline Bill passed the House of Commons by an overwhelming majority. It deprives the bishop of his veto power in actions brought against the Catholicizing priests and authorizes the civil courts to try these cases and take away their livings from those found guilty. The cause of pure Protestantism is a good one and as long as the Anglican Church is a State Church it should be made to feel the heavy hand of the State. But to Americans this savors of tyranny. After all, the separation of Church and State is best. Disestablishment may come at the behest of the Established Church.

Sam Vick is a good negro. He is a negro, and showed the African facility for doing the incorrect thing at a critical time by his letter to the President in which he referred to the unsuccessful bear-hunt in rather impertinent terms. Nevertheless he is a good negro, and made a good postmaster, and received the endorsement of the best people in Wilson as to his conduct of the office. But Senator Pritchard demanded his head, in pursuance of his "lily-white" programme and the President has finally yielded, the excuse being made public that Vick had been guilty of party perfidy, we presume in opposing Senator Pritchard's "lily-white" policy, which seems to us a mighty small business for a big government to be concerned with.

Seth Low made a ten-strike the other day. A deputation from the New York Liquor Dealers' Association called to see him and he courteously refused to see them until they disproved the current rumor that said the Association had collected a three million dollar corruption fund. Then he wrote a letter declaring that as Mayor of New York he had nothing to do with the State legislation increasing the license taxes, but as plain Seth Low he favored high license against low. If the truth be told he would be against Low in favoring low license. He has proved himself to be a fearless and straightforward official and that is the best kind of politics as well. The day is past when a man had to cater to the saloon vote to be elected. He risks his chance of preferment by tampering with that vote, even in New York City, and certainly in Charlotte.

The Eagle, commenting on the stand which Mayor Low has taken, says:

"Events are under way on all hands, and are converging from all sides, to make the coming municipal campaign a union of ethical power and of business successes that may shatter the calculations and paralyze the energies of those who are confidently relying upon a reactionary rally for rapacity and upon a retrogression toward rottenness. The stand of the Mayor on this excise question has in it exactly that quickening element which appeals to the integrity, the pride and the imagination of upright men. Those who think that the great Democratic Party is only and always will be the Great Whisky Party, or the Great Beer Party, or the Great Rum Party, will leave out of account tens of thousands of Democrats who are for decency, without fanaticism, for order without intolerance, for straight goods without impracticable ideality, and for the manifest preponderance of what is right and feasible over what is lowering, specious, corroding, corrupting and false." Same here.

No Perfectionism for the Southern Church.

We have received for publication and comment the letter of Dr. E. C. Gordon to which the Open Letter of Rev. S. J. McMurry, published last week, was a reply. In justice to all parties we print both the letter and the proposed overture to the Assembly, in full. As the letter proposes "thorough discussion" as well the securing of "an expression of wide-spread interest," Dr. Gordon should be acquitted of any attempt to manufacture sentiment for his overture. It was not the wisest plan, but as we said last week a man has a perfect right to adopt it if he will.

THE LETTER.

Lexington, Mo., March 5, 1903.

My dear brother,

I have reason to believe that you are favorably disposed to some such overture to the General Assembly as that which I enclose. If so, please write to me authorizing me to sign your name to it.

It is understood that your signature commits you, not to all the particulars of the overture, but to the request for the appointment of the ad interim committee, with the instructions as indicated; and also that verbal changes may be made in the language so as to adapt it more perfectly to the object we have in view, but that no substantive changes are to be made.

I shall be obliged to you for any suggestions as to such changes as you may deem advisable to make, and also if you will exert yourself to secure signatures. All signatures should indicate the Presbytery, or in the case of a ruling elder the session, to which the signer belongs.

It may be that you can secure the endorsement of your Presbytery. Do so if practicable. At the same time if we can secure a large number of signatures from various portions of the Church, it will have greater weight than the endorsement of one or two Presbyteries secured by bare majorities.

What we need to secure is first of all an expression of wide spread and intelligent interest, and then thorough discussion of the subjects involved.

With kind regards and earnest prayers that the blessing of God may rest on you and your labors in the Lord, I am

Yours fraternally,
 E. C. Gordon.

THE OVERTURE.

To the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, meeting in Lexington, Virginia, May, 1903.

The undersigned, Presbyters in, and under the jurisdiction of, various courts of the Church represented by you, respectfully request you to appoint a committee ad interim, consisting of one teaching or one ruling elder from each Synod of our Church, to take the following action:

I. To revise the proof-texts now published in the editions of our doctrinal standards published under the authority of the General Assembly, and to report the same to the next General Assembly with a view to their approval and subsequent publication.

II. To prepare and report to the next General Assembly with a view to their submission to the Presbyteries for consideration and adoption the following:

1. One or more paragraphs to be added to the Confession of Faith, and corresponding questions and answers to the Catechism, which shall more explicitly and fully set forth the office and work of the Holy Spirit in the application of Redemption to the elect people of God.

2. A proposal to strike out from the answer to Larger Catechism, Q. 149, the following words: "but doth daily break them in thought, word and deed," and otherwise change the answer so as it shall read to this effect:

"No man is able, of himself, in this life, perfectly to keep the commandments of God, even the least of them."

3. A proposal to change the answer to Shorter Catechism, Q. 82, to correspond with the changes in the Larger Catechism.

4. A proposal to strike out from Larger Catechism, Q. 153, all the words following the words "faith in our Lord Jesus Christ."

5. A proposal to effect a corresponding change in Shorter Catechism Q. 85.

6. A proposal to make any other changes in our doctrinal standards which the proposed changes, if adopted, would render necessary to preserve the harmony of our symbolical teaching.

Without undertaking in this overture to give fully the reasons which impel us to make the above request, we beg leave to call your attention to the following:

1. It is well known that the proof-texts now in use were hastily compiled more than a hundred years ago; that they have not been revised; that many of them are inappropriate; that some do not correspond with the revised text of Holy Scripture nor with the best results of exegetical study.

2. It is well known that our standards are incomplete in regard to the work of the Holy Spirit and the important branch of the Biblical truth therein involved.

3. As to the proposed changes in the answer to Larger Catechism, Q. 149, and the corresponding changes in the Shorter Catechism, we submit that the statement which we propose to strike out is not sustained by the word of God, and offers to our people a practical standard of spiritual attainment far below that set forth in the Scriptures as attainable in this life.

4. As to the proposed change in the answer to Larger Catechism, Q. 153, and the corresponding change in the Shorter Catechism, we submit that these answers as they stand, appear to be out of harmony with our doctrine of justification, and are not sustained by God's Word. A diligent use of the means of grace should be diligently taught, for it is essential in this life to growth in knowledge and piety; but it is not required as a condition precedent to escape from the wrath of God due to us for our sins.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

The first proposition involves merely the revision of the proof-texts. We agree with all that is said on this point, both as to the historical fact concerning the adoption of the proof-texts and the further fact that their selection and arrangement might be improved. The law of the Church, as defined by the last Assembly that discussed this matter, is that the proof-texts are not considered a part of the text of the Confession. They were adopted by the Assembly on the report of a Committee, with certain foot-notes explanatory, two of which yet remain in the Confession, in spite of all the hue and cry that was made a few years ago regarding the unprecedented fact of a foot-note and the utter and absolute unconstitutionality of the same, by some of the ecclesiastical lawyers who are supposed to know the Standards of the Church verbatim et literatim.

Whether there is any crying need for the revision of the proof-texts is another matter. But no one who loves the Confession should object to perfecting the Scriptural proof of its propositions, that we may know the certainty of those things that are most surely believed among us.

But the second proposition regarding the Revision of the Confession cuts pretty deep. It aims at an additional statement concerning the "office and work of the Holy Spirit in the application of Redemption to the elect people of God." If we mistake not, the proof has been furnished as to the uselessness of such an additional statement, by reason of the exceeding fullness and satisfactoriness of the Confession on this very subject. And further, the Southern Church, if we know anything of its sentiments, does most positively object to any addition to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit in the line of Perfectionism. And a chapter written on the line of the other changes proposed would be just that.

In the second place, the overture contemplates certain omissions in the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, and the effecting of all other changes necessary to harmonizing the Confession with these changes. We undertake to show that while the movers in this matter may not believe in Perfectionism, the changes contemplated mean a surrender to that strange doctrine, and the omissions, significant always when it is a part of a creed that is omitted, are tantamount to the affirmation of belief in Perfectionism, pure and simple, crude and stark.

As was intimated last week, the real question is whether we shall have a perfect standard of holiness or shall lower that standard so that we may have so called perfection under the low standard. If we offend in one point we are guilty of all. Now a creed is what we believe to be true. It is true or not that a man doth daily break the commandments in thought, word and deed. Sins of omission are as much a breaking of the commandments as sins of commission. The law requires perfect love to God and man, and perfect expression of it in word and deed. Is there any man now living who can say at the close of the day, "I have not transgressed the perfect law of God this day even in thought. I have not spoken one word that ought not to have been spoken. I have done no act that ought not to have been done. Moreover, from a heart filled with perfect love to God and man, I have so controlled my thoughts that they have been positively good. I have spoken every word for God and for men that I ought to have spoken, and I have taken full advantage of every opportunity that I have seen or that I ought to have seen for doing good." If there are men who can say that, show us a few. If they are married men, ask their wives. That used to be D. L. Moody's prescription for spiritual conceit. And the beloved Apostle John has a saying that seems to fit the case, "If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar and his word is not in us."

So it seems to us that the Catechisms give us a high standard rather than a low one, and that the "practical standard of spiritual attainment," needs to be distinguished from the ideal standard of holiness which the Scriptures set, as an incentive to growth but not as an attainment in this life.

The other omission is of the phrase, "or by any grace received in this life," in the paragraph reading, "No man is able, either of himself or by any grace received in this life, perfectly to keep the commandments of God." The omission would make the paragraph assert that by means of grace received in this life men are able perfectly to keep the commandments of God. Well, grace does what it is intended to do. It regenerates. It sanctifies. But as the fact remains that there has never yet been a case of sinless perfection, we are not in favor of making the grace of God of none effect.

We suggest just here that the proof-texts on these points need revising badly if the changes are to be made. They should simply be revised out of the Bible altogether.

The last change proposed, with the explanation offered, is a mere quibble. The Catechism does not say that the diligent use of the outward means is essential to salvation, but only that God requireth them, evidently such use being conducive to the great essentials of faith and repentance.

We wish to make it clear that we do not accuse Dr. Gordon either of claiming perfection or of advocating perfectionism. But if this overture does not head straight toward a bald form of that doctrine, we confess our inability to understand the plain meaning of words. And the Lexington, Virginia, Assembly will lay that overture on the table with a dull thud that will send its vibrations all the way to Lexington, Missouri. Wait and see.

The Anglican Church Originally Presbyterian.

The geologists have a good deal to tell us about the peculiarities of island life and their theory is a very plausible one. They say that when the island became separated from the main land it contained the forms of life that were then developed. But after the separation new forms appeared that were not able to pass over to the island and old forms perished from the mainland that survived on the island. A familiar example of such survival is the kangaroo of Australia.

Just so the insular position of the British Isles, the absence of frequent communication with the continent, kept intact or but little changed, a form of ecclesiastical life that had already suffered evolution or devolution on the Continent. We saw last week that St. Patrick went from Scotland to Ireland as a missionary, being already the son of a deacon and the grandson of a presbyter, and that he ordained a large number of

An Hour With Him.

My heart is tired, so tired to-night—

How endless seems the strife!

Day after day the restlessness

Of all this weary life!

I come to lay the burden down

That so oppresseth me,

And, shutting all the world without,

To spend an hour with Thee,

Dear Lord,

To spend an hour with Thee!

I would forget a little while

The bitterness of fears,

The anxious thoughts that crowd my life.

The buried hopes of years;

Forget that mortal's weary toil

My patient care must be.

A tired child, I come to-night,

To spend an hour with Thee,

Dear Lord,

One little hour with Thee!

A foolish, wayward child, I know—

So often wandering;

A weak, complaining child—but, O!

Forgive my murmuring;

And fold me to Thy breast,

Thou who hast died for me,

And let me feel 'tis peace to rest

A little hour with Thee,

Dear Lord.

One little hour with Thee!

Which Way are You Looking.

By Dwight S. Bayley.

It was just after sunset, and I was enjoying a short wheel ride before supper. The sun had sunk behind the mesa, whose outline drew its back, rugged silhouette boldly against the red sky beyond. Presently I came to the railroad crossing, and there I dismounted to stand and watch the western glory. The rails stretched their parallel course east and west, and as I looked toward the east, to see if any train were approaching, I saw the track soon disappear into the gloom of the approaching night. But turning again to the west, I saw the rails become two paths of shining light, penetrating, and for the moment making me forget, the gathering dusk. And as I stood there in the sweet silence of the closing day, I thought of One who is the light of the world. How many, said I, find their path dark, and leading only into deeper gloom, because they are traveling away from the light. And how many, thank God! forget the surrounding dusk, and tread a path that is clear and joyful, because they are walking toward the Light!

Suffering.

The Rev. Dr. MacLaurin, Rochester, N. Y.

Suffering is a great school. We learn our best lessons in this school of suffering. We learn, for instance, to love truth and to know it by suffering from errors. We learn to love righteousness as we suffer from sin. But the greatest lesson we learn from our experience in life is the great central lesson of obedience. Do you know that it is the hardest thing in the world for you and me to become obedient as we pass through the school of suffering? I have learned obedience by the things I have suffered. Not only do we learn the lesson of obedience in the school of experience, but we really develop and consolidate our character.

The important thing in life is to have a great aim, and to possess the aptitude and perseverance to attain it.—Goethe.

“Women of God be swift to go; the doors are open wide, The times are full of promise: 'tis the flowing of the tide. Sail out upon the deep, broad sea, and let thy heart be brave;

A mighty work is waiting, a dying world to save.”

Every cross, since Christ the Light hung upon his, is a light-giver. O sufferer with any nameless agony, rejoice if thy cross lightens thy life as thy Saviour's did his. . . . Rejoice and glory in thy every pain as Elijah must have gloried in the fiery horses that bore him up to God.—Phillips Brooks.

The Chinese have many excellent traits of character. Those who labor among them declare their worth. The heroism of the Chinese Christians in the late uprising of the Boxers shows of what stuff they are made. The old slander that the converts were “rice-Christians” will never dare to lift its head again.

Christianity is before the Japanese nation as never before in these modern days. The year 1901 witnessed a wonderful awakening, and the present year is continuing the active campaign against the evil one. The work of 1900 added only about 650 to Protestant church membership; that of 1901 added more than 4,000. “Not by might nor power, but by my spirit,” was the motto, and God wonderfully blessed the Japanese Christians as they rallied under this banner.—S. W. Hamblen.

As one looks at the heathen world, terrified with superstitions, besotted by lust, and degenerated by worship of abominable gods, and then looks at the perfect stature of manhood in Christ Jesus, and remembers that this former stuff is to be made into the latter glory, we are apt to say: “Who is sufficient for these things?” The inevitable answer is: “No man.” Then we turn to the text: “Not by might, nor by an army, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord.” There is plenty of power in this Spirit to lift every heathen to a Christian, every sinner to a saint.—Bishop H. W. Warren.

A missionary pastor will give us a missionary people, and a missionary people will give us an overflowing treasury. One of the best ways to get men's souls for Christ is to get their wealth for God; hence our motive in urging men to generously support the cause of missions is the salvation of the heathen and the salvation of the contributor. If one would grow the missionary heart, he must betake himself to world's thought, world's plan, world's sympathy, world's benevolence, and world's prayers; he must fall in love with the world and pray and labor earnestly for the salvation of the world.—Dr. J. O. Wilson.

The Idols Converted.

A missionary in Travancore, India, saw one morning a native coming to his house with a heavy burden. On reaching it he laid on the ground a sack. Unfastening it, he emptied it of its contents—a number of idols.

“What have you brought these here for?” asked the missionary: “I don't want them.”

“You have taught us that we do not want them, sir,” said the native: “but we think they might be put to some good use. Could they not be melted down and formed into a bell to call us to church?”

The hint was taken; they were sent to a bell founder and made into a bell, which now summons the native converts to praise and prayer.

Paul's Farewell to Ephesus.

Acts 20, 28-38. April 5th, 1903.

Paul in his last journey to Jerusalem summoned the Elders of Ephesus to Miletus that he might give them his parting charge. He reviews his ministry in Ephesus and the province of Asia. He indicates the emotions that accompanied his labors and the trials and temptations which he encountered. He claims to have kept back nothing that could profit his hearers and that he made the substance of his preaching to Jews and Gentiles, "Repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ." He announces his purpose to go to Jerusalem, testifies that "The Holy Ghost witnesseth that bonds and afflictions abide him, "and declares that they should see his face no more." In the passage now considered Paul presents several important topics.

I. The Duties of Elders.—The apostle tells these church officers that they have been made "bishops or overseers in the Church by the Holy Ghost." Therefore they held their commission from the highest authority, and this was an incentive to fidelity in duty. He charges them to "Take heed to themselves." Rulers in the Church should primarily care for their own Christian character for progress in their knowledge and holiness and for rendering their conduct consistent with their professions and functions. Paul also directs them to "Take heed to all the flock." Elders should watch over all classes connected with the Church. The old and young, the weak and infirm, the strong and active, the stable, and the wandering, the sinning and fallen, should all be the objects of their care. They should specially attend to the inquiring, the despondent, the sick and suffering, the needy and the poor. The comprehensive duty of elders is "To feed the Church of God," or to shepherd the flock performing for its members all the offices that faithful shepherds of sheep discharge. This involves as described in the 23rd Psalm. Rest, refreshment, instruction, guidance restoration and leading in the paths of righteousness.

The apostle enforces the duty enjoined by reminding these elders, that the Church is dear to Christ, because "purchased with His own blood."

II. Warnings Given.—Paul having stated and urged their duties, warns these elders of coming evils. He tells them that "Grievous wolves shall enter not sparing the flock." These were ungodly and false teachers, who would enter the church, strive to make gain of godliness, and to render church members but baptized pagans. In every age this danger has been experienced, the world has entered the Church and assumed sacred vestments and symbols and terms with which to serve sin and Satan. Nor was this the only evil. The apostle warns that among Christians and within the Church should arise misguided men teaching heresies and "speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them." This too has been often witnessed in the Church, and multitudes of religious teachers have mingled truth with error to form parties and to win adherents for their personal views.

III. Counsels in View of Predicted Evils.—Paul urges watchfulness. He says that Elders should watch these approaching evils, that they may guard against them. They should watch themselves and the flock, lest they should be injured by these false teachers. They should watch such teachers lest they enter the fold and lead the ignorant and unwary astray. He also charges the elders to "remember," the earnest warnings given by himself. They should remember that these ills might not take them by surprise or cause them to despond.

He furthermore suggests the need of prayer and "commends them to God and the word of His grace which is able to build them up," and to give them an inheritance among all them that are sanctified, despite the evils to which they were exposed.

Christ Teaching about the Resurrection.

John 11:21-27. Topic for April 12.

When death entered the Bethany home and took from it the brother of Mary and Martha and the friend of Jesus, the sisters were left in sorrow and yet it was a sorrow that was tempered by hope. Their friend Jesus had performed many miracles and had even raised the dead and down in the heart of Martha, at least, there seems to have been the hope that death would yet give back the one who had been taken away. So when she heard that Jesus had come near to the town she went out to meet him. Her first words seem to indicate a deep faith. "If Thou hadst been here my brother had not died, but I know that even now whatsoever Thou wilt ask of God, God will give it Thee." Jesus at once answers her, "Thy brother shall rise again." In the language of the Master there was an assurance that reciprocated the faith of Martha. But the news was to good for Martha to believe it at once, therefore while she wished to believe it in just the sense of its meaning that her brother would be restored to his sisters again, she could hardly hope that such was true and so answered Christ's words as though He spoke of the resurrection at the last day. Her ideas of this last resurrection were no doubt vague and Christ at once brings its truth as well as the truth concerning the temporal resurrection of Lazarus home to her.

To do this He turns her mind away from something far-away and which was at best hazy in her mind and fixes her attention on Himself. "I am the Resurrection and the Life." That is, "I am the power of the Resurrection and I am the power of the higher life even as I am of this life." "He that believeth in me though he die (physically) yet shall he live (eternally), and he that liveth (physically) and believeth in me shall never die (eternally)." As a result of this declaration of Jesus, Martha makes a statement of belief in Jesus as the anointed of God.

The proof of the resurrection being real rests in the power of Christ, and His power was vindicated when He rose from the dead Himself.

These words of Jesus to Martha have been repeated thousands of times at the grave-side and they have brought comfort to many sore hearts.

Jesus turned the thoughts of Martha from the future resurrection and the dead-brother to the present living and life-giving Saviour, and so He would now turn our eyes away from these things which bear us down beneath their weight of sorrow and have us fix our gaze upon Him who is mighty to bear our burdens for us.

As He strengthened the weak faith of Martha by having her look to Him so He will strengthen our faith by having us look at Him.

The resurrection is but one more manifestation of the power of Jesus and He is waiting to manifest that power in us daily if we will but let Him do it.

From this teaching of Christ the great Spurgeon has drawn this lesson: You have lost those dear to you;—amend the statement—they have passed into a better land, and the body which remains behind is not lost but put out to blessed interest. Sorrow ye must, but sorrow not as those that have no hope. What is there to weep about concerning the glorified? Sound the gladsome trumpet! Let the shrill clarion peal out the joyous note of victory! The conqueror has won the battle; the king has climbed to his throne. "Rejoice" say our brethren from above, "rejoice with us for we have entered into our rest."

Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord henceforth: yea saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors and their works do follow them." Bless God evermore that over the pious dead we may sing his living promises.

May God grant to each of us the grace to believe in Christ Jesus here and now, and so obtain a resurrection to life eternal.

Joseph Parker's Successor.

The Rev. Reginald John Campbell, who has recently accepted the pastorate of the City Temple of London, as the successor of Joseph Parker, will sail for this country late in May, and remain sufficiently long to take part in the Students' Conference at Northfield, the last of June and the first of July.

In a recent issue of "The British Monthly," which devotes several pages to a sketch of "Campbell of Brighton," many interesting facts regarding his ancestry, education and pulpit service are given. From this article this summary is prepared:

Mr. Campbell was born in London in 1867. His father, the Rev. John Campbell, who now lives in retirement near Nottingham, had originally been a teacher, but at the time of his distinguished son's birth, was a Free Methodist minister in active service. His grandfather, the Rev. James Campbell, whom the subject of our sketch remarkably resembles in appearance, was a Congregational minister. Mr. Campbell's ancestry is of notable interest. From both parents he is of purely Scottish descent. The names of his great-grandfathers—James Campbell, John Johnston, John McAirie and Nathaniel ("Thani") Grant—are in themselves a good clue to their nationality. They were settled near Belfast for some generations, and belonged to the Ulster landed proprietor and gentleman farmer class—the "dnni-wassel" order, as it would have been called in Scotland. Mr. Campbell's grand-uncle, John McAirie, son of the McAirie above mentioned, was a slave owner in South Carolina, and fought on the side of the South in the great Civil War. But he treated his slaves so well that when emancipation was declared they refused to leave him, and remained in his service as long as he lived. There is no Irish admixture whatever in Mr. Campbell's blood, and his family can trace its descent clear back to its Highland home in Argyllshire.

Mr. Campbell was delicate from his birth, and when but a few months old, he was taken away to live with his maternal grandfather, John Johnston, of Craigywarren, near Belfast. Mr. Johnston was an elder of the Presbyterian Church, and his grandson's earliest recollections centre in the old meeting house at Clongwater.

The father of Mr. Campbell was in circuit work at Bolton, when his son rejoined him. The young lad, who was still in poor health, attended a private school in the town. He was a very distinguished pupil, particularly strong in literary subjects, and one year won prizes in classics, history and literature, and a special reward for being the best boy of his year. Then he was promoted to teach the lower forms in the school. Presently Mr. Campbell's father moved to Nottingham, and during some years' experience of teaching, both elementary and secondary, work of which he was very fond, the youth of eighteen attended the University College of the town.

Mr. Campbell's next position was that of assistant master at the High School, Ashton, Cheshire. He looks back with considerable satisfaction to the work he did there. He has the gift of influence, the power of taking a hold, both tender and masterful, on the lives of others, and he still has relations with some of the boys whom he taught. At Ashton, too, Mr. Campbell first came into close association with the Church of England. The head master of the school was an Anglican clergyman, an Oxford honors man; and with the vicar of the parish, the Rev. S. Wilkinson, a decided Evangelical, Mr. Campbell was soon on intimate terms. He was confirmed and took a humble part in church work, particularly in the Guild meetings. The young teacher was drawn towards the Church of England by the stately dignity and order of her services and by her claim to historical continuity. His stock of spiritual experience was at that time slender, but his attitude towards religion was profoundly reverent. Mr. Wilkinson advised his young friend to go up to Oxford and take Orders. He was now able to meet the heavy expense, but there were several difficulties in the way, the chief being that he had married a wife, Miss Slack, by name who had been a member of Mr. Campbell's father's congregation at Nottingham. However, these obstacles were surmounted, and in 1891, Mr. Campbell coming up to Christ Church, Oxford, entered upon the most epoch-making and decisive period of his life.

At Oxford, Mr. Campbell passed through the decisive spiritual crisis of his life. It is not for us in these pages to enter into controversial matters. It must suffice to say that Mr. Campbell came to the conclusion that he could not take the Orders in the Church of England. Perhaps the chief factor in his decision was this, that acceptance of the Anglican position meant that he unchurched his own worthy ancestors, and particularly his splendid old grandfathers, John Johnston and James Campbell, men whose shoe-latchets he felt he was not worthy to loose. He could worship quite comfortably in the Anglican ritual, and work in closest association with High Churchmen; but he could not excommunicate the multitude of faithful believers outside Anglicanism. When he related his decision to the Dean, Dr. Paget expressed his profound regret, said that Mr. Campbell would find a true, happy home in the Church of England, and added that probably if he left her he would find his way back again. Subsequently Mr. Campbell spent a whole day in Westminster Abbey as the guest of Canon Gore, discussing his difficulties; but the event was that he felt confirmed in his decision. Though he was compelled, in obedience to his conscience, to leave the Church of England, Mr. Campbell never ceased to acknowledge his indebtedness to her, and especially to the High Church party.

Mr. Campbell's career in Brighton is well-known, and we need not dwell upon it. Union Street Church and Queen's Square Church are now one, and the united congregation worships in the latter building, which is crowded whenever Mr. Campbell preaches. During recent years he has filled pulpits in every part of England, and has always attracted and charmed large congregations. It is reckoned that the morning congregation at Queen's Square consists of two-thirds of Mr. Campbell's own people and one-third of strangers; in the evening the proportions are reversed. With the exception of the throngs that waited upon Dr. Parker at the City Temple, (whom he is now called to succeed) there is perhaps no Nonconformist congregation in England which is made up of such diverse elements as that which gathers Sunday by Sunday to listen to the young Brighton preacher. Men and women of all classes of society, and of all denominations, and sometimes of several races are there. "Campbell of Brighton," has become an institution of the popular holiday resort. The intelligent and thoughtful visitor to Brighton, if he spends a Sunday in the town, thinks it incumbent upon him to hear Mr. Campbell preach.

Through the column which he conducts in "The British Weekly," the young preacher has come into contact with many perplexed souls all over England, and frequently visitors come from remote parts of the country to Brighton, merely to consult Mr. Campbell about their moral and spiritual difficulties. They open their hearts to him, he gives what help and guidance he can offer, and they catch the next train back. He is an omnivorous reader, and has always sought to guard his hours of study and meditation against intrusion. The writers by whom he has been most deeply influenced are: T. H. Green, John and Edward Caird, Newman and Dr. Fairbairn. No man in England knows the writings of the Principal of Mansfield College better than Mr. Campbell. Mr. Campbell's recreations are riding and driving. He rides three mornings a week, indulging himself in the possession of a horse, and he drives on the alternate afternoons. He finds that these exercises exhilarate without fatiguing him.—Reprint from The New York Observer.

Outline Bible Study—Galations, Chapter III.

Rev. R. A. Lapsley.

In Chap. 2:16-21 Paul states, first negatively ("a man is not justified by the works of the law"), then positively ("but by the faith of Jesus Christ"), the fundamental truth of the gospel. In this chapter we have the first part of his argument in support of this truth. The apostle's argument in this chapter may be divided easily into six sections—what are they? (First look on the chapter and see if you can mark off these sections for yourself, then compare with what follows.) Sect. 1, vs. 1; sect. 2, vs. 2-5; sect. 3, vs. 6-9; sect. 4, vs. 10-13; sect. 5, vs. 14; sect. 6, vs. 15-29.

Vers. 1. "O foolish Galations." What similar examples of sin and folly in departing from the truth, do you find in the Scriptures? See Jude 6, Gen. 3:1-6, Acts 7:39-42, Judges 2, 2, 12, 13, 2 Chron. 34:24-25, Acts 7:51-53. How would you show that this is a constant tendency of fallen humanity? See Ro. 1:21, 22, 25, 28. Is there danger of a similar apostasy now? See 1 Tim. 4:1, compare Acts 20:29, 30. "Who hath bewitched you?" How does Paul answer this question in 2 Cor. 11:3? "That ye should not obey the truth." What particular truth does he refer to? See the rest of this vers. and ch. 2:16-21.

Vers. 2-5. The apostle's argument in this section turns on the inseparable connection between faith in Christ and the gift of the Holy Spirit—how would you show this connection? See 1, the condition laid down in Jno. 7:39 first clause; 2, what the spirit is sent to do, Jno. 15:26 last clause, Jno. 16:14; 3, who sends the spirit? Jno. 16:7 last clause, Acts 2:33.

"Received by the Spirit." This epistle is specially rich in its teaching concerning the Holy Spirit. How many times is he mentioned in the whole epistle? What practical question ought all professing Christians to ask themselves? See Eph. 5:18, Acts 19:2.

Vers. 6-9. "Abraham believed God." What two conspicuous instances of Abraham's faith are given in Scripture? Gen. 15:1-6, Ro. 4:18-22, Gen. 22:1-18, Heb. 11:17-19. In which of these did he specially embrace the gospel? "They which are of faith." What was one chief hope of salvation cherished by the Jews? See Jno. 8:33, Mat. 3:9. How does Paul's argument cut off this false confidence?

Vers. 10-13. "Cursed is every one that continueth not." In what two particulars is the impossibility of salvation by the law here shown? 1, note the words "continueth not," see Ezek. 33:13, 18: 2, note the words "all things," see Jas. 2:10. Compare the first question, on ch. 2:16.

"The law is not of faith." What striking differences between law and gospel do you find in those verses? 1. The law says, vs. 12 last clause; the gospel says, vs. 11 last clause. 2. The law says, vs. 10 last clause; the gospel says, vs. 13 last clause. How do law and gospel differ in their influence over life and conduct? See, 1, a difference in motive, the law's motive, Ro. 4:4; the gospel's motive, Gal. 5:6 last clause; 2, a difference in power, the weakness of the law Ro. 7:14, Ro. 8:3 first clause; the power of the gospel, Phil. 4:13, Eph. 3:16, Ro. 8:4, Gal. 5:16, 22-25.

Vers. 13. "Christ hath redeemed us." This verse is a most full and precious statement of Christ's atoning sacrifice for sinners—compare refs. ch. 1:4. Study 1, who redeems us? vs. 13, first word; 2, from what does he redeem us? vs. 13, first clause, vs. 12; 3, what did he take on himself in order to redeem us? vs. 13, second clause, Is. 53:6; 4, in what special act did he take on himself? vs. 13, last clause, 1 Cor. 15:3.

Vers. 14. Three expressions in this verse, 1, "The blessing of Abraham," 2, "Through Jesus Christ," 3, "the promise of the spirit," point back to and sum up the apostle's argument in the preceding sections, vs. 2-5, vs. 6-9, vs. 10-13. Can you show which expression corresponds to which section?

(Note.—It has been thought best to cut these studies in two, and so publish part of a chapter every week. It is again suggested, however, that this is strong meat, not to be swallowed whole, but thoroughly masticated.)

Answers to these questions sent with return postage to Rev. R. A. Lapsley, R. F. D. No. 1, Staunton, Va., will be corrected and returned.

The Alabama Presbyterian College.

By Rev. J. G. Suedecor.

At the last meeting of the Synod of Alabama, the ministers present subscribed personally over ten thousand dollars to the endowment of a Presbyterian College in this State. This notable example of self-sacrificing liberality produced a profound impression among our laymen. Many who had heretofore opposed the proposal to establish a college in Alabama on account of its seeming impossibility, now say, "We are going to line up with the preachers!" This shows that whenever the preachers get through talking and get on the firing line, they will not lack for followers. The day the preachers put their money into the College, the College was assured. But between that initial impulse and the final materialization of the plans for the College stretches a long and difficult road. Happily, one of the preliminary stages has been accomplished in a very satisfactory manner.

After frequent meetings and long and careful deliberation, the board of Trustees decided that before lands or buildings or money were acquired, the whole scheme must become incarnated in some man who would consecrate his life to its prosecution. The history of such institutions, with their meager endowment and never finished equipment, is a long narrative of personal toil and self sacrifice. The man whom the Board decided, after a prayerful survey, to call to this arduous task, was Rev. William E. McIlwain. After some months of deliberation, Mr. McIlwain decided to accept the responsibility, provided the proposed enterprise was projected along the lines which he considered absolutely essential to its success, and which would take it out of the traditional ruts into which many small denominational colleges fall.

Last week the Board held a conference with Mr. McIlwain at Birmingham, and an outline of the proposed institution was agreed upon. In substance and intention, the main features of this new institution are as follows:

1. While essentially Presbyterian in ownership and influence, effort will be constantly put forth to attract the patronage of the public generally, and to make this institution useful to a large class of boys now unreached by educational advantages. It is therefore expected to make this college a powerful factor in the Home Mission work of our Synod.

2. This effort will be emphasized in the low cost of board and tuition. "It is intended," says President McIlwain, "to afford an opportunity for any poor boy with brains and backbone to get an education." No boy will, therefore, be turned away for lack of money, provided he possesses moral earnestness, and sufficient ability to make the investment worth while.

3. In order to attain these ends, an industrial department will be an essential feature of the institution. This department is not designed to be at all technical or professional in its scope. The Board recognizes that such education, in a modern way, is extremely costly, and may be best given by largely endowed universities, into which it is hoped our strongest graduates may ultimately find their way. The industries into which it is expected to embark more or less largely are such as contain in themselves the possibilities of self help. Farming will be the most extensive; successful experiment will determine others.

4. That the industrial feature as thus defined may be worked out with every possibility of success, the location of the institution is to be largely determined by the outlook in this direction. Not less than 150 acres of good farming land is required as a sine qua non of its location. The establishment of a college community in the midst of its own thousand of acres would be the ideal now in the mind of the Board.

5. While the industrial feature is not to be regarded as an end in itself, and may eventually gravitate into simple expedient for helping poor boys without pauperizing them; yet it is confidently expected that it will prove a real factor in the development of the student. The "Teaching by doing" is now thoroughly recognized as natural and scientific. If, for example, a boy should at this school be incidentally taught how to raise three bales of cotton on three acres of land, he would be made strong in muscle, independent in purse and confident in spirit.

6. In accommodating the course of study to a large class of boys who have had poor advantages previously, it is expected that it shall include much that is elementary; but in scholarship and character of the teaching force, in the upward range of the curriculum, and in the results aimed at, it is determined that this school shall lack nothing to rank it among the best in the land. It will be worthy, therefore, of the patronage of our best people, and at the same time will not be beyond the reach of the poorest.

From the foregoing statements, it will be seen that the Synod of Alabama is proposing a radical departure from traditional lines. The Northern Presbyterian Church has several institutions of the character here outlined, which have attained marked success. While none of these will be weakly imitated, their missionary spirit will be cultivated, and it is the fond hope and earnest prayer of the Alabama brethren that their institution will be a blessing to hundreds of boys whose outlook in life is now entirely blank. The new College expects to solve the problem of patronage. There are several well-manned and fairly endowed Presbyterian Colleges in the South which lack nothing to make them largely useful—except students. Their failure to attract patronage has determined the Board of Trustees of the proposed College in Alabama to offer its opportunities for an education to a new class of patrons. The opportunity for self help in this new school will make its own appeal. Indeed, every feature thus far developed in its organization points, we devoutly believe, to future usefulness and hence to success.

Mr. Mellwain has indicated his purpose to move to Alabama early in April, and to begin at once the great task of raising an endowment of $75,000. The location of the college has wisely been postponed for the present. The community receiving the benefit of its location will be expected to donate property, real or personal, to the amount of $25,000.

A Call For a Mission Teacher.

We hear calls coming from every side for laborers to enter the mission field that they may preach the gospel truth. This is as it should be, for preaching is the means ordained for giving the news of salvation to the heathen. Yet while this is true, other agencies are useful in opening the way for preaching the gospel and in conserving its results. The work of education is just as necessary in the foreign field as in the home field and the influence of a Christian teacher is even more potent in the former than in the latter.

With these considerations before us, we may state that the purpose of this article is to enter a plea for some consecrated Christian man to offer himself as a teacher in the mission work at Cardenas.

Cardenas has been, and probably will continue to be, the center of our work in Cuba. For this reason, if for no other, there should be a strong school here under control of the "mission." Such a school we now have and it is a strong arm of our work. It enables us to ground the children of the church in the teachings of the Bible, for the Bible is made a necessary part of the curriculum. It also, through the character of the instruction given, opens to us the homes of many that otherwise might never be reached by our work, and if the present standard of the school can be maintained, our whole work will gain prestige and favor with the people as a whole.

Heretofore there have been so many changes in the teaching force of the school that it is marvelous that the people still have confidence in us and in our school, but we recognize that the Lord has blessed us. A year ago prominent people of the city presented us a petition that we enlarge our school work and offer to the public a select school of high grade, giving us at the same time promise of their patronage. To have been able to accede to their request would have greatly strengthened our hold on the people as nothing else would, but we could not do it with any promise that it would be permanent and so it was not attempted. The opportunity still remains if we can only embrace it, but this we cannot do unless we secure a man to devote his whole time and attention to that work and that alone. Those who come with the qualifications and intention of preaching are not satisfied to teach more than a limited time at least and it is not right that they should. If they are called to preach, they ought not to be turned aside to other things.

The man that we need to secure is one qualified to teach at home in the ordinary branches of a public school. Human nature is the same here as there, the topics of teaching are the same, the problems of instruction and discipline are the same and a man who can cope successfully with these things at home can meet them here. Again the man we need is one who is willing to become a member of the mission, that is, to be appointed as an ordained missionary, whose special work shall be designated as teaching. We deem this qualification necessary in order to avoid any friction or complications that might arise from not having the school under direct control of the "mission." Again we need a man with a steady purpose. What is meant by this is that he comes with a well measured determination to devote as large a part of his life to the work as God may direct; that he shall not come with the intention of laying up riches, though he can be assured of a comfortable support; that he shall enter the work with a love for it and with an earnest desire to glorify God by it and by anything else that his hand may find to do. It might seem from what we have said that we are seeking an experienced man who has spent at least several years in the school room. But not so, for though desirable, experience is not indispensable. If he came with a determination to abide by the work and to make it successful; if he loves the work and engages in it because he believes he can thus best glorify God he will gain all the experience he needs after his arrival here.

The support of this teacher will be guaranteed by the school, which this year has paid the salary of a native teacher and an assistant together with that of one of our lady missionaries who came last Fall to work in the school, besides leaving a small sum over for the rent of the buildings after incidental expenses have all been paid. The enrollment has been 130 to 140 this session with a number of applicants refused for lack of room and teaching force. With a man permanently at the head of the school, the enrollment could be run up much higher and the facilities of the school improved very much. While we do not desire to secure any one who would take the school simply to make money out of it, yet the right man will never need fear that he will not get a comfortable living from it.

Though we would impress the fact once more that we need a man for teaching and that alone, yet we do not mean that this would close all other means of doing good. House-to-house visiting, assistance in the Westminster League, teaching in the Sabbath-school and an active part in the life of the Church would give him daily opportunities for exerting an incalculable influence for good.

It would be well if he could be on hand in September or even earlier to begin the study of the language. He could teach English in a few weeks and at the end of the session assume full control of the school. Of course, his support would begin on his arrival here. The action of the mission in the latter part of May will decide the character of the school for next year and it is necessary that any response to this appeal should be received before that time.

Is there not within the bounds of our Southern Church some young man with a talent for teaching who is willing this day to consecrate it to the Lord? If so, cast in your lot with us and labor to uplift your fallen brother in this part of the world and at that great day when the Lord comes to reward his servants He shall say to you, "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

The Song of Moses and the Lamb.

And they sing the song of Moses, the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb.

From the time when the morning stars sang together, rejoicing at the laying of her foundations, earth has had her singers; and in every age poets have recited the deeds of her heroes.

The sweet singer of Israel whose Psalms have been an inspiration to God's chosen of every nation, sang his music so deeply into the hearts of his people, that when captives they sat them down by the rivers of Babylon, they hung their harps upon the willows, and wept when their captors bade them "Sing us one of the songs of Zion." Wretched exiles! how could they sing the Lord's songs in a strange land—among strange gods? And from the bitter ashes of their woe came the piercing cry "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning."

Carried on farther by David's lines, we are shown the matchless work of God's hand told nightly by the stars; where "the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork."

Then the Psalmist calls upon earth to receive her King; and we hear the shout, "Lift up your heads O ye gates, and be ye lift up ye everlasting doors and the King of Glory shall come in." While to the echo "who is this King of Glory" comes the triumphant answer, "The Lord of hosts, he is the King of Glory." Throughout, this magnificent singer thrills us with his sublimity, or melts us with his pathos; as following his guidance he brings us—God's flock—up to our Shepherd who ever leads us with his rod and staff, and at eventide walks with us through the valley of the shadow.

David's son, also, sang songs full of the beauty of God's church; but alas! misguided monarch, his harmonious strains end with the discordant "vanity of vanities."

The grievous sins of Israel brought the prophet Jeremiah down into the dust when his notes of warning fell unheeded upon the ears of his people; and he wept fountains of tears as he foresaw their inevitable doom.

Job reaches the height of grandeur in his description of the majesty of Him "who spreadeth out the heavens and treadeth upon the waves of the sea." Then he proclaims the grand doctrine of the resurrection in the assurance "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Even when stunned by the crushing blows which have fallen upon him, still, truer than the north star, shines out resplendently the steady light of his faith in that Redeemer; and with the perfection of resignation his broken spirit cries out "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him."

But, grandly as the notes of these singers resound through the ages, to none of them is accorded as lofty honor as unto "my servant Moses," this most glorious of earth's musicians; this man who talked face to face with His Maker; whose countenance, reflecting the splendor of Heaven, had to be veiled from his fellow men when he descended Mount Sinai. And on that sublime occasion when God the Father granted to the wondering view of the two apostles, a vision of his Son in the full light of his majestic glory, it was Israel's mighty leader, with the great sin reprove, Elijah, who was permitted to complete the grand trio of the law, the prophets, and the gospel. Thus, beholding him clothed in such celestial light as could emanate from Jehovah alone, Moses stood by the side of that mighty Redeemer whose prophetic work he first sang upon the shores of the Red Sea; where triumphing over the hosts of the proud Egyptians he burst forth into exultations of praise. "I will sing unto the Lord for He hath triumphed gloriously! Thou in thy mercy hast led forth the people which thou has redeemed." Redemption! The song of Moses and the Lamb; that new song which no man can learn but the hundred and forty and four thousand which were redeemed from the earth. The song in which no voice of angel or archangel is heard—their harps awaiting in silence while the joy of salvation, "Blessing and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." The song of Moses, the servant of God, and of the Lamb.

☩ Sing ye to the Lord for he hath triumphed gloriously—the Angel of the Covenant who had led his chosen out of their house of bondage—the seed of the woman who had bruised the Serpent's head. Redemption! The song whose victorious prelude first rang out in the garden of Eden "and I will put enmity between thee and the woman," where the marvelous love of Christ for the world which he had created, and his determination to save it was so emphatically announced to the arch-enemy of man.

☩ How wonderful had been God's care over Israel! From the furnace of affliction he had brought them forth by the hand of his servant Moses. Through the flood he had borne them by the same faithful hand. Over their heads in the wilderness he had hovered, a cloud by day, shielding them from the desert's sun, a pillar of fire by night lightening their path, and guarding their rest—the Angel ever nigh; bringing water from the rock, and bread from Heaven. He led them like a flock, by the hand of Moses, the servant of God, the child of a slave, an outcast Hebrew concealed by his mother in a frail bark of bulrushes lest he fall into the hands of his cruel oppressors; but guarded by the eye of Israel's God which never slumbers, and placed by His hands in the very midst of his enemies; that the helpless son of Amram and Jochebed might obtain from his haughty foes all they could possibly bestow upon him; for "Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians and was mighty in word and deeds;" and having gained his secular education, he entered the quiet school of Midian, and before the rock of Horeb, meek and lowly, his soul knelt at the feet of the great Teacher, and the yoke was laid upon him—for the deliverance of his people. In the royal family, yet not of it. From the palace of Pharaoh's idolatrous court Moses came forth acknowledging no kindred save the despised Hebrews—recognizing no God save the Great I Am. Aaron through fear of the people might turn back to the calves of Egypt, but this leader of Israel bows only to Israel's God; and in the agony of deepest contrition for the sin of his people he supplicates Jehovah to forgive them, or else, with wonderful renunciation of self, he entreats that his own name be blotted out.

Now, having fought a good fight and kept the faith, he lays his armor down. Not his to lead the seed of Abraham into that Canaan promised four hundred years before by the sign of the smoking furnace and the burning lamp; for Meribah's sin there must be atonement. So, for the last time this servant of God presents himself in the tabernacle, and the charge received at Horeb is surrendered to Joshua.

Moses' love for the people is exemplified in his whole history. From the first passionate act of vengeance in Egypt when he smote the cruel enemy, down to this last day when he calls Israel together and gives them his parting instructions, we find nothing but the tenderest affection and solicitude for Israel's welfare.

Having finished his blessing, this Prince in Israel, in obedience to the command of God, ascends Mount Nebo, and views the land he may not set foot upon. On the summit he pauses. Below, stretching out over the broad plain, lies a vast multitude encamped by their standards.

Yonder in their midst, closely guarded by the Levites, his own family, Moses' eye, undimmed by age, falls first upon that central object of Israel's devotion, the tabernacle; the pattern of which he himself had received from the hands of the divine Architect. In this holy place had Jehovah revealed himself in the sacred light of the Shechinah. Before that door how many times had this man of humility plead for the sinful Israelites! How often had he bowed in the dust, and besought his God to turn away his wrath; daring boldly, yet with meekness, to remind his Maker of his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; interceding so mightily for "thy people which thou hast brought forth" that God's righteous anger was turned away and judgment was tempered with mercy.

Now the promise has been fulfilled; and it remains only to cross over and take possession of the land—a land of olives and figs; of fruitful plains, and cooling streams—and the army wait for marching orders. All Israel lies before his wondering eyes; and thrilled at the sight he notes each tribe. On the north, are pitched the tents of Dan, Asher, and Naphtali. Over there on the east, glistening in the first rays of the rising sun, chief among the tribes, he sees the royal lion of Judah, whose Scepter should smite the corners of Moab; whose dominion should not cease till Shiloh came. And next come Issacher and Zebulon. On the south, are seen the ensigns of Reuben, Simeon and Gad; while on the west, glorified by the last rays of the setting sun, spread far and wide the mighty tribes of Ephraim, and Manasseh—a double portion in Israel. The Angel which had redeemed Jacob from all evil had blessed "the lads"; and the blessings of his father had prevailed "unto the uttermost bounds of the everlasting hills," and had rested "on the head of Joseph, and on the crown of the head of him that was separate from his brethren."

And with them was "little Benjamin."

These passed before the eye of the great leader in grand review.

But to another was given the honor of conducting this chosen race into their land of milk and honey. Bitter must have been the disappointment to the old warrior. How joyously would he have marched at the head of these mighty ranks while Jordan rolled back her waves, as the Red Sea had parted its waters for the Lord's hosts! But to the will of Jehovah his servant bows in submission. Moses' life of service was now over; his race was run; but Canaan was not the destined goal of this victor; nor was that head so often bowed in intercession for Israel to be crowned with the fading laurels of earth. For him his Lord had prepared a "higher recompence of reward." After the scorching breath of the desert, he was to drink in the life-giving air of Heaven; after the weary march through the wilderness, he was to rest by the fountain of life.

For the trumpet's shrill call to battle, he was to hear the voice of the harp; instead of the lamb offered daily on the altar of sacrifice, he was to behold at the right hand of the Father the Lamb of God slain from the foundation of the world.

And so upon that lone mountain top, unseen by man but accompanied by God's own appointed guard of honor, noiselessly as the dawn of creation the soul of the great Levite left its earthly tabernacle, and Israel's mighty deliverer entered the presence of Israel's mightier—Redeemer.

And they sang of Moses, the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb.

If there was a prize offered for silly Bible criticism, we should propose at least a tentative award of first premium to the German who decides that the phrase, "Whatsoever he doeth shall prosper," in the third verse of the first psalm, is an interpolation because it "does not belong to the figure of the thriving tree." Has it really come to pass that a writer cannot drop a figure of speech when he is tired of it without committing the crime of an "interpolation" that some other innocent body must stand for? Even the high privilege of mixing our metaphors to suit our own sweet will, will be taken from us if such a canon of criticism as this is to prevail.—The Interior.

Educational.

We print in the Church News columns some items about the movement for the Presbyterian University, by the removal of Columbia and Clarksville, and their combination, either in Atlanta or Nashville. Both cities seem anxious for the University. The question is how anxious they will prove themselves, measured by dollars. We believe that this paper was the first to point out the changing conditions that have isolated Clarksville, the founding of Louisville Seminary, the union of Central University and Center College, the growth of Fulton College and Arkansas College, the founding of the new Texas Seminary and the prospective college in Alabama. But Columbia should not be disturbed in its steady growth by agitation over removal until the matter is in definite shape and the project is backed by an ample guarantee. The ideal thing would have been unite Union and Columbia and Davidson in Charlotte. Charlotte would have given more for the removal than Richmond has ever done, (North Carolina did the best part of the re-building anyhow) and we should have had one seminary with large endowment and the splendid traditions of the other two, with the nucleus for a great university in the center of Southern Presbyterianism. But unfortunately, Dr. Stagg was not in Charlotte then and the scheme was never broached.

Summer School of the South—Session of 1903, June 23 to July 31.

The Summer School of the South will open its second session at the University of Tennessee, Knoxville, Tennessee, on June 23, and continue to August 1. This session promises great advance beyond the achievements of last year, when the school had 65 professors and over 2,000 students. With the scope of its work extended, its organization made more complete and its material equipment improved, it is prepared to give the teachers of the South a more efficient service.

This school was organized in response to a growing demand on the part of progressive teachers in all parts of the South for a summer school of high grade, located at some accessible point where the summer climate is healthful and pleasant, the surroundings attractive, the accommodations ample, and equipment for work adequate. The large attendance at the first session of teachers from all the Southern States, the great interest taken in the work and the enthusiastic appreciation expressed from every quarter, indicate that the time was opportune, the place well chosen and that the principles underlying the organization were sound.

The friends of the school, moved by the unprecedented success of the first session, have decided to make it permanent. With this assurance of permanency, all temporary features have been eliminated and the organization has been adjusted to meet all the real needs of the teachers of this section. It is to be made a real university school of the broadest scope and highest character. To this end, the management has engaged a faculty of about eighty men and women distinguished for their scholarship and ability as teachers. The school will offer about one hundred and fifty courses in subjects ranging from the kindergarten to the university and covering the work of the elementary rural school as well as that of the city system.

The work is organized in eight departments:

1. College and high school subjects.
2. Common school subjects and methods, including kindergarten and primary grades.
3. Psychology and pedagogy.
4. Rural schools and county supervision.
5. City school supervision.
6. General lectures.
7. Library work and educational exhibits.
8. Meetings for educational campaigners.

Believing that the fundamental need of the teacher is broad and accurate scholarship, ample provision has been made for the best and most advanced academic instruction in all the subjects of the college, the high school, and the grammar school.

In English language and literature, courses will be offered in grammar, rhetoric and composition, Southern literature, the New England authors, Shakespeare, the pre-Shakespearean dramatists, Browning, and the history of the language and its literature. Among the instructors in this department are Dr. F. N. Scott, of the University of Michigan, Dr. Pierce Butler, of Tulane University, Dr. C. A. Smith, of the University of North Carolina, President Henry J. Snyder, of Wofford College, Miss Emily McVea, of Columbian University, and Miss Florence Skeffington, of the University of Tennessee. Dr. Lincoln Hulley, of Bucknell University, will give two courses in the literature of the Bible.

In the languages, courses will be given in Greek, Latin, German, French, and Spanish. The instructors in these subjects are Dr. Paul H. Saunders, of the University of Mississippi, Dr. Thos. W. Jordan, of the University of Tennessee, Henry J. Darnall, of the University of Tennessee, and Dr. Alcee Fortier, of Tulane.

Dr. Alfred Hume, of the University of Mississippi, and Professor Schmitt, of the University of Tennessee, will give instruction in the higher mathematics. There will be numbers of courses in arithmetic.

In history, courses will be offered in ancient history, the history of England, American history, history of international law, Southern history, methods of teaching history, with courses in sociology and political economy. Among the instructors in this department are Dr. W. H. Mace, of Syracuse University, Dr. Ulrich B. Phillips, of the University of Wisconsin, Dr. Turner, Dr. Johnson, and Professor Hoskins of the University of Tennessee.

In addition to advanced courses in physics, chemistry, biology, geology and geography, elementary courses will be given with special reference to the needs of the common schools. Among the instructors in these subjects are Herbert C. Gregory, of Yale University, Franklin H. Ayres, of Kansas City High School, William C. A. Hammel, of Maryland State Normal College, and Dr. Perkins and Dr. Wait of the University of Tennessee.

The work in nature study, agriculture, and horticulture is especially well provided for. A dozen or more different courses will be offered. It is believed that many students will want to give their entire time to the work of this department. Instructors already engaged are Professor Liberty H. Bailey, Julia Rogers, Florence Slater of Cornell University, Professor Gilbert T. Pearson, of the North Carolina State Normal and Industrial College, and Professors Soule, Keffer, Bain, and Fulton, of the University of Tennessee.

Instruction in all phases of drawing from that of the primary grades to advanced artistic drawing on the one side, and mechanical and architectural drawing and machine design on the other, will be given by Dr. Langdon S. Thompson, of the Jersey City Schools, Dr. Frank Parsons, of the Art Department of Teachers College, Elizabeth M. Getz, Supervisor of Drawing, Charleston, S. C., and Mr. Lanier of the University of Tennessee.

Special attention will be given to manual training and the domestic arts and sciences. The work in this department will be done by Professor William C. A. Hammel, of Maryland Normal College, Professor F. M. M. Richardson, Supervisor of Manual Training in Nashville, and Anna M. Gilchrist, of the Department of Education, of the University of Tennessee, with a competent corps of assistants. The new laboratory of domestic sciences and arts and the extensive work shops of the mechanical department in the University will all be at the service of this department.

All phases of the work of the common schools have been greatly enlarged by the engagement of a large corps of instructors. The work of the kindergarten and primary grades will be illustrated by model schools of children under the supervision of expert teachers. Among the teachers in the primary department are Mari Ruef Hofer, of Teachers College, Libby J. Eginton, of Brooklyn public schools, Finie Murfree Burton and Mrs. Robert D. Allen, of the Louisville Kindergarten Training School, Carolina G. O'Grady, and Misses Rule, Stoltzius, and Clark, of Teachers College, Winifred M. Haliburton, of the Asheville public schools, Netty M. Allen, of the North Carolina Normal and Industrial College, Celestia S. Parrish, of the Georgia State Normal School, Miss Van Hosen, University of Chicago, and P. P. Claxton, of the department of education, University of Tennessee.

In the department of psychology and pedagogy, every phase of the work is provided for. Courses will be given in analytical and experimental psychology, genetic psychology and child study, neurology, methods of teaching, school organization and the history and philosophy of education. Among the instructors in this department are Dr. Edward L. Thorndike, of Teachers College, Dr. Burtis Burr Breese, of the University of Tennessee, Dr. Charles McMurray, of the University of Chicago, Dr. Praston W. Search, of Clark University, Supt. E. L. Harvey, of Wisconsin, Dr. B. C. Gregory, Supt. of Schools, Chelsea, Mass., Dr. James L. Hughes, Toronto, Canada, and Prof. Wickliffe Rose, of the University of Tennessee.

In the departments of city and county supervision, the work will be conducted by lectures and round table discussions. The work in city supervision will continue for the six weeks, two hours daily, and will be conducted by Dr. Charles McMurry, Supt. J. H. Phillips, of Bingham, Dr. Seach, Supt. J. M. Geenwood, of Kansas City, Supt. Lawton B. Evans, of Augusta, and Dr. Henry E. Sanford, of New York.

The work in county supervision—the last three weeks—will be conducted by Supt. Harvey, of Wisconsin, Supt. W. W. Stetson, of Maine, Supt. J. Y. Joyner of North Carolina, Supt. Evans, of Augusta, Ga., and Dr. Sanford.

For the benefit of officers of schools, a course of instruction will be given in the selection, classification, and care of a library, which will be illustrated by a library of a thousand books, selected with special reference to the needs of small towns and country schools.

An important feature of the school will be an exhibition of school work in drawing, manual training, compositions, etc., and an exhibition of books, maps, charts, pictures, and other school appliances.

There will be a large number of general lectures. Since this is a real school, and not a popular teachers' assembly, instruction has not been sacrificed to mere entertainment. These lectures will be given by members of the faculty and such prominent leaders of thought as Dr. Albert Shaw, of the Review of Reviews, Dean Russell, of Teachers' College, Governor Aycock, of North Carolina, Governor Frazier, of Tennessee, and Dr. Charles D. McIver, of North Carolina.

This is but the barest outline suggestion of what the school offers in the way of faculty and courses of instruction. Dr. G. Stanley Hall said of the school last year: "It is the biggest one in the world. In numbers and interest it has never been surpassed. From observation I have been able to give the class work, its character is of the best. I think the greatest impression made upon me, next to the number, is the social quality of the students." In organization, equipment, and faculty, the school is much larger than last year, and promises in every way a higher degree of efficiency. Indications point to a greatly increased attendance from all parts of the country. The school will be cosmopolitan in spirit, in faculty, and in student body. Touch with this larger life and spirit is no less valuable than the instruction received in the class room. Every effort will be used to continue and develop the beautiful and wholesome social spirit of last year, so as to utilize to the best possible advantage this contact of personality with personality.

The only charge is a registration fee of $5.00. Board can be secured at low rates. All the railroads have granted a rate of one fare plus 25 cents for round trips.

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

We give considerable space this week to the notice of the Summer School of the South. This school was of interest last year to a wide circle of our readers and we again advise everybody that can go to attend. We shall have enough Presbyterian Standards there to go around. In accordance with the wide scope of the Standard we publish this week the portrait and sketch of the great Scotch preacher who succeeds Joseph Parker. Mr. Lapsley's Bible Study Lesson will be found stimulating and suggestive as usual. Mr. Snedecor writes interestingly of the Alabama Presbyterian College. The college will receive a mighty lift if Dr. Stagg goes to Birmingham. The call for a mission teacher is an earnest one. Can it not be heeded by one of our readers? We are glad to note a new contributor in the person of Miss F. C. DuBose.

Church News.

The Causes of the Church.
April.

Our offering for this month is for the education of candidates for the ministry. Remit funds collected to G. W. McRae, Treasurer, Memphis, Tenn.

PERSONALS.

Rev. W. D. Fulton, of Oxford, Miss., has been elected Chancellor of the Southwestern Presbyterian University at Clarksville, Tennessee.

Rev. P. B. Henderlite has been installed pastor of the churches at Accomac and Onancock, Va., Rev. R. E. Steele and Rev. A. S. Venable conducting the installation services.

We hear a pleasant piece of news to the effect that Judge Howard, of Tarboro, has decided to build a cottage at Barium Springs, in memory of Mrs. Howard, at a cost not to exceed $4,000.

Mr. G. R. Cannon, 306 West Grace Street, Richmond, has been appointed general treasurer of the Huguenot Association of the South, and will forward all funds from local societies, to France.

At a meeting of Mecklenburg Presbytery last week Rev. G. T. Thompson was dismissed to Indian Territory. Mr. Thompson's departure will be deeply regretted by his many North Carolina friends.

The Board of Directors of Princeton Theological Seminary, on March 23rd, elected Rev. Theron H. Rice, D. D., of Atlanta, Ga., to the Chair of Homiletics, made vacant last Spring by the resignation of Dr. Patton.

At a meeting of North Alabama Presbytery, held March 23rd, the South Highland Church was given permission to prosecute a call to Rev. S. J. Foster of Memphis Presbytery. Rev. F. E. Rogers was dismissed to take charge of the work at Mt. Pleasant, La., and Rev. Newton Smith to Ripley, Miss.

On Sunday Rev. J. W. Stagg, D. D., announced to his congregation that he had decided to accept the call to the First Church, Birmingham, subject to the action of Mecklenburg Presbytery. The church will be asked to unite with him in a request to Presbytery to dissolve the pastoral relation that has lasted now for seven years and that has been such a blessing to the Second Church and to Presbyterianism in Charlotte and in North Carolina. Dr. Stagg believes that there is an even wider field of usefulness in Birmingham. At the proper time we shall have a review of his pastorate in Charlotte. Suffice it to say now that we represent the entire community in Charlotte, as well as his loyal and devoted congregation, in expressing the deepest regret at his decision and at the same time the feeling that only the call of duty is being heeded in his determination.

Meeting of Presbytery

Ministers of Mecklenburg Presbytery will do the pastor of Tenth Avenue Church a kindness by sending the names of the Ruling Elders who will represent their churches at the approaching meeting of Presbytery, which convenes April 14 at 8 p. m.

G. W. Belk, Pastor.

TENNESSEE

CLARKSVILLE.—Whereas: The members of the Board of Directors of the Southwestern Presbyterian University are profoundly convinced that the interests in our hands are of the most sacred and binding nature, and believe that the interests of Christian education and of the Presbyterian Church, in the great Mississippi valley region, which were evidently considered by the original donors of the funds in our care would be seriously jeopardized by the consumation of any such scheme of consolidation as is now being advocated by brethren in Atlanta, and being further convinced that any such consolidation would, on both moral and legal grounds, be impossible, we do, therefore, hereby resolve:

That we refuse to consider any proposition, from any source, which contemplates the removal of the said university from its present location, in the city of Clarksville, Tenn., or the diversion of its vested funds, for the purpose of effecting a merging of this institution with any other.

D. W. Kennedy, Supt.

GEORGIA.

CORDELE.—The Ladies' Missionary Union will meet here on the 14th. All who are expecting to attend this meeting will please be kind enough to write at once to Rev. W. R. Owings, Cordele, Ga., in order that proper entertainment may be provided.

It is especially hoped that the ladies will attend from every church in the Presbytery.

ATLANTA; North Avenue Church.—At the North Avenue Presbyterian Church, Atlanta, Ga., on the afternoon of Thursday, March 5th, the Rev. John Balcom Shaw, D. D., of New York City, a member of the Evangelistic Committee of the Northern Presbyterian Church, addressed a meeting of Presbyterian ministers and their officers.

The object of this meeting was to enable those who are longing for a widespread awakening in our own church to meet Dr. Shaw and confer with him about the proposed plans of his Committee and learn of the great movement he represents.

In response to invitations issued by Rev. Richard Orme Flinn, Pastor of the North Avenue Church, a large number of ministers were present at this meeting, not only from Atlanta and vicinity, but also from all over the State, there being prominent representatives from nearly every Presbytery in Georgia.

The movement concerning the bringing of the Presbyterian University to Atlanta is arousing a good deal of enthusiasm, not only among the Presbyterians of Atlanta, but in all denominations.

On a recent rainy Sabbath morning, with a very small congregation present, $9,100 was subscribed at North Avenue Presbyterian Church, Rev. Richard Orme Flinn, Pastor, and there is prospect of increasing this contribution very largely. Rev. J. W. Walden, D. D., of Athens, gave a short introductory talk on the subject of Presbyterianism and denominational colleges in the early history of Georgia, which was followed by a sermon by Rev. Theron Rice, D. D., and it was in response to this that the amount named was pledged.

ATLANTA.—The fact that Nashville, Tenn., is working to secure the establishment there of the great Presbyterian university which it is proposed to form by the union of the universities at Clarksville, Tenn., and Columbia, S. C., became generally known in the city yesterday, and is stimulating the committee now working for Atlanta to more active endeavors.

Those interested in the work declare that it behoves Atlanta to act promptly if this city proposes to secure this important institution. The information came yesterday in a communication to Dr. Theron Rice, and it was to the effect that the Nashville chamber of commerce had taken hold of the matter, would seek to raise the required $250,000 and to outbid Atlanta for this institution.

There is every indication that the mass meeting next Wednesday will be largely attended. Citizens generally are manifesting great interest in the project, and everywhere is heard the dictum, "Atlanta must have the university." Many large subscriptions, it is said, will be reported at the meeting Wednesday, and after the meeting the committee expects to be able to give Atlanta's answer that the university must come here.—Constitution, March 21st.

VALDOSTA.—On last Sabbath, 15th March, terminated daily services which had been observed for two weeks in the Presbyterian Church here, with marked interest. For some time previous to these meetings the session was impressed with the importance of having protracted services.

The time seemed ripe for such an undertaking. The congregation was notified in advance, and their prayers invoked for the blessings of God upon the meetings. The Pastor, Rev. C. C. Carson, was authorized to secure such assistance as his judgment might suggest, but as the time appointed for the meetings approached, it was discovered that the brother we expected could not come. The session thereupon urged the Pastor to undertake the work alone, relying on such local help as he might secure from the excellent Pastors of the Methodist and Baptist Churches.

These brethren, let it be said, were cordially responsive and each of them preached twice during the series of meetings. Our Pastor, however, did nearly all of the preaching. The people exhibited their interest and appreciation by attending two services a day for two weeks.

The Gospel, as it fell from the lips of our beloved Pastor, in its purity and sweetness, appealed to Christian hearts not only among our own flock, but the members of other churches, who assembled with us to wait upon the ministry of the Word. The co-operation of brethren outside of our own communion was a delightful feature of the meetings.

God's spirit was manifest in the quickening of believers and the evident interest shown by many who have never confessed Christ. The interest continued to the close of the meetings. To such an extent was this apparent that the session consented to suspend the services with grave misgivings. The exhaustion of our dear Pastor, consequent upon cumulative labors for two weeks perhaps more than any other reason induced the conclusion that the meetings should close. Up to this time the session has admitted to fellowship as the fruit of these meetings, one adult and three children of the Sabbath-school. Others expect to unite with us on the coming Sabbath. At the very commencement of the services the efforts of the Pastor were particularly directed to the stirring up of believers to a sense of their obligations and privileges.

It is believed that many have been aroused to greater activity in the services of the Master. To Pastor, and to many of the people, the meetings were a benediction. It is hoped too, that the good seed sown during the meetings may yet germinate in the hearts of some who before these meetings seldom entered the House of God. One charming feature of the meetings was the singing by Miss Mary Carson of Kirkwood, Ga. Her selections were always appropriate, and her effective rendition carried the Gospel with singular attractiveness to a delighted auditory.

TEXAS.

TEMPLE.—Sunday-school Institute of Presbytery of Central Texas, Temple, Tex., April 8 and 9, opens at 3 p. m., April 8, and closes at 6 p. m. April 9.

Sermon at 8 p. m. April 8, by Rev. Geo. L. Bitzer, subject, "Our Children for Christ and the Church." The following subjects will be discussed: Aims of the Sunday-school Primary Department—Equipment and Methods. Training Teachers and Officers, Catechisms and Supplementary Denominational Course. Mission Schools, Sunday-school in Home Mission Churches, Revival Methods and Courses of Bible Study, Pastor's Part in the Sunday-school.

Round Table conducted by Rev. C. C. Weaver, Questions, Grading, Order, Home Study, Home Classes, Attendance of Sunday-school scholars on preaching, "Decision Days," Children's Day, etc. Library and literature.

Rev. Geo. L. Bitzer will conduct a discussion of Young People's Societies at 4:30 p. m., April 9. All Sunday-schools and churches which have no Sunday-school, are urged to send delegates to the Institute. Pastors and Elders are requested to be present.

J. A. Montgomery,

Chairman Com. on S. S., and Y. P. Societies.

Helping to Answer Our Own Prayers.

Rev. I. S. McElroy, D. D.

Some weeks since the Secretary of Ministerial Relief sent to each of our ministers a copy of his leaflet, "Shall there be a Scaling," and with it a few lines modestly suggesting that if this leaflet should be read from the pulpit some of the people would doubtless contribute to this sacred and needy cause.

A number of the brethren acted on this suggestion—others will do so perhaps,—and in every case thus far reported there was a gratifying response.

This was so eminently true of one of the churches of this city, Richmond, Va., that I think it will do other churches good to hear about it. The pastor stated frankly that as his church had already made a liberal offering he would not take a supplemental collection, but that he would be delighted if individuals in the congregation should see their way clear to contribute again to a cause so dear to his heart and involving to so large an extent the welfare of our church and the honor of our Lord.

He then read the leaflets in his most impressive manner and the following morning a member of his church sent her check for $500 to our treasurer, Mr. S. H. Hawes.

She is the same elect lady who last year sent her check for $1,000 to help start our Endowment Fund and this $500 is her way of helping to answer her own prayers that there shall not be a scaling this year of the small appropriations made to our Veterans and to the Widows and Orphans of our dead.

Data for Colored Work.

"I have sent report blanks to all superintendents of Colored Mission Sunday-schools, taught by white teachers of which I have knowledge. But I think there are others. And I ask all persons knowing of such schools not heretofore reported to send me information, as to their location, number of teachers and scholars, and name of the superintendent or some teacher."

D. Clay Lilly, Secy. Col. Evang.

Tuscaloosa, Ala.

Religious Directory.

A minister desires to correspond with some church, or churches without a Pastor. Please address: P. A. T., care Presbyterian Standard, Charlotte, N. C.

NORTH CAROLINA.

CHARLOTTE; Westminster.—Dr. J. H. Thornwell has been doing some excellent gospel preaching at Westminster Church, for the past ten days. There have been some fifteen additions to the church on profession of faith.

FIRST CHURCH.—Dr. Howerton has been preaching for a week at the First Church, the services being attended with much interest. He will continue the services the present week, doing the preaching himself.

GREENSBORO.—One of the most deceiving structures from an inspection from the outside is the new Sunday School building for the First Presbyterian church. Walk over the inside from top to bottom, then scan it from the outside and one will not realize he has been inside the same building. This is because of the peculiar style of architecture by which every available space is utilized and in doing this the beauty of the inside is really enhanced and made more convenient. The auditorium, including the gallery, will seat 1,400 people and every person in the house is in full view of the rostrum and what is more, is not far removed, the building being a semi-circle. Besides the auditorium there are 28 class rooms, each one seating anywhere from 10 children to 130, though in the smaller rooms many more can be seated without undue crowding. Around the auditorium on ground floor are grouped a number of class rooms, each one separate and as private as is desired, curtains being used instead of doors, thus avoiding all noise of closing and opening doors. In the rear of the rostrum is a large private room and other rooms for the pastor, superintendent and other officers. The gallery is the most marvelous piece of work of all. We'll say that the entire Sunday-school is assembled for the opening exercises. As soon as these are finished the pupils descend to the railing and every few feet there is a hallway leading to the rooms back of and under the gallery, each room being well lighted with two windows, while should it be necessary to use them at night each room is fitted with gas and electric lights. In winter it will be heated by steam. The acoustic properties are most excellent and the general arrangements as to convenience are simply superb. The seats, chairs, etc., will be here by June and the building will be ready for occupancy as soon as they can be put in.

Its cost is put down at $20,000, but if ten thousand more is not required to complete it it will be a marvel. Hook & Sawyer, Charlotte, are the architects, though Dr. Smith is really the author of the design and general plan.—Record.

DAVIDSON.—It is with unqualified pleasure, not to say delight, that your correspondent sends the news that Dr. John Sparhawk Jones, of Philadelphia, has accepted an invitation to deliver the baccalaureate sermon here at the coming commencement on the 24th of May. Dr. Jones was for a long time pastor of the Brown Memorial Church on Park Avenue, Baltimore, and the writer when a student at Johns Hopkins, heard him preach the greater part of two winters, and he makes bold to say that he thinks Dr. Jones is the most brilliant preacher he ever heard, and he has heard a great many very distinguished ones. Dr. Jones is not an orator, it may be, in the ordinary sense of that word, that is if one means by this that he has much of the fervid emotion of an impassioned declaimer or that he indulges in loud outbursts of either fierce denunciation or of glaring rapturous description. But his manner is far from lacking either force or fire. In facial expression, in pose, in control of voice and tone, he is a born actor, playing his part true to nature, or else one so perfect in art that the art is absolutely lost in a show of reality. He is a rhetorician of the most chaste and most brilliant type, a type that startles, fascinates, enchains one. He uses a manuscript, but it is no hindrance to naturalness in tone or to freedom in action. So far from impeding the movement of his thought or proving a clog that might tend to lessen the interest of the hearer, a manuscript is to him rather what wings are to the bird, it gives lightness and movement, the instrument with which he makes a strong, steady, sure, bold, inspiring flight. Davidson is exceedingly fortunate in having the promise for commencement of such a distinguished divine and it is hoped that all who can come to commencement will be here on Sunday to hear him. A very rare treat is in store for all who do come.

But the baccalaureate sermon is not the only attraction of commencement Sunday. Rev. Dr. Campbell, of Asheville, at one time the pastor here and a greatly beloved and esteemed one, and as all who have heard him preach know, one of the best preachers in the Synod, has promised to deliver the sermon before the Y. M. C. A.

The college and public anticipate much pleasure from a lecture by D. A. Tompkins, Esq., of Charlotte, on the evening of the 30th inst.

Rev. Dr. Graham is absent, holding a week or more of services with Rev. Mr. Wilson, the pastor at Marion, N. C.

Dr. H. C. DuBose is back again in Davidson. Our community is always delighted to have him here and to hear him speak.

Rev. William Black, Synodical evangelist, has no appointment for the fifth Sunday. His next meeting, however, will be at Benson, near Selma, where at present there is no church organization.

The new Bulletin of the College is an attractive number, with several beautiful cuts of campus and buildings. The special topic for discussion is "Entering College," and the pamphlet abounds in practical suggestions and useful bits of information for parents and their sons.

To Fayetteville Presbytery:

Reduced rates to all who may wish to go to the meeting of Fayetteville Presbytery at Sanford, April 14, 1903, have been promised by the Southern, Seaboard Air Line, and Coast Line railways. Churches are urged to pay their assessment for the Presbyterian Fund on or before this meeting. This is a very important matter. The Treasurer of the Fund is Rev. W. T. Walker, Rowland, N. C. P. R. Law, Stated Clerk.

Twentieth Century Builders' Fund.

This is the sixth call upon our subscribers and it is for the purpose of helping to complete the Church, located at Lilesville, N. C., in Mecklenburg Presbytery.

Mr. E. P. Liles, an Elder of that church, writes me that "The church is located in the prettiest site in our village. We have raised about $250 among our members, only 14 in number. The lot for the church was donated. Presbytery has helped them some. We need $300 to complete the church. When completed it will be the neatest little church in our village. The outlook for Presbyterianism is good. The ladies have raised $50 towards furnishing the church. We are working hard and need all the help we can get. Thanking you heartily for any assistance you may be instrumental in rendering us."

Does not that sound well? Who would not like to take part in such a noble work? Let us help build the church at Lilesville. Please send us $1.00 or as much more as you may wish to give. We would like to get 875 subscribers to our fund. This would raise the number from 125 to 1,000. Money can not be given to a better cause.

Address,

Rev. R. W. Hines, Mebane, N. C.

VIRGINIA.

Notes on Publication Work.

The Committee of Publication at Richmond have rented temporary quarters at No. 12 Governor Street, which they will occupy while erecting their new building on the corner of Sixth and Grace Streets.

It is a matter of gratification to the Committee that their efforts to circulate helpful and wholesome literature are meeting with such a cordial response, and in order that the publications issued for the Church may have the widest possible sphere of usefulness, it is the purpose of the Committee to continue to offer their special list of books at reduced prices until further notice. A number of new publications have been issued during the past year, which are meeting with great favor. Among them are Dr. Stagg's book, "Calvin, Twisse and Edwards on the Universal Salvation of Infants," Mrs. Wardlaw's book, "Candida," a story of mission work in Brazil; "The Ivy Vine," a charming book by Miss Annie E. Wilson; "That Dear Old Sword," by Mrs. Nettie Gray Daingerfield, a delightful book for young people, and "Dorris and Her Mountain Home," a translation from the German by Mrs. E. Ireland, a charming story for Sunday-school libraries. In addition a large number of tracts and leaflets have been issued, and there has just come from the press the "Manual of the Graded Course of Instruction for Sunday-schools," prepared by order of the General Assembly of our Church. This publication has been awaited with great interest by our Sunday-school workers, and it will meet every expectation. Dr. James A. Worden, the Sunday-school Secretary of the Northern Presbyterian Church, a man of international reputation in Sunday-school matters, says of this Manual,—"It is the most thorough, comprehensive and valuable of all the Graded Courses of Instruction which have been produced. It is a treasure, it is worthy of being studied and followed by all Presbyterian Sunday-schools. It has been a growth, and has all of the fruit-bearing qualities of a great tree that sends its roots downward and its stems and branches upward. If it was faithfully followed by the Sabbath-schools we would have a new generation and a better one of Bible students and intelligent Presbyterians." In connection with this Sunday-school Manual should be mentioned the new Home Department Quarterly, the first issue covering the lessons for the second quarter, and which is just out. The remarkable growth of this department of Sunday-school work made the preparation of a special quarterly a necessity, and it is hoped that it will be a great stimulus to the important work of linking the home and the Sunday-school together.

It will be of interest to the Church to know that the Committee will take into its own hands the receipt of all subscriptions for Sunday-school periodicals, commencing with the third quarter of this year, and will mail all supplies direct from their own office. The printers, Messrs. Whittet and Shepperson, who have handled this department of the Committee's work for twenty-five years, have rendered faithful service, but it is deemed advisable to take over this work to avoid confusion in the book-keeping department, and for the closer contact it will give the committee with the Churches and schools. All subscriptions and payments for renewals should be sent direct to the Committee after April 1.

The Treasurer will close his books for the fiscal year on March 31st. and all funds for Publication and colportage to be reported in the Annual Report to the Assembly should be in his hands by that date.

General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A.

The One Hundred and Fifteenth General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., will meet in the Immanuel Presbyterian Church, Los Angeles, California, on Thursday, May 21, 1903, at 11 a. m., and will be opened with a sermon by the Rev. Henry Van Dyke, D. D., LL. D., the retiring Moderator. The undersigned, as the Committee on Commissions, will be in the chapel of the above named church on Thursday, May 21, 1903, at 8.30 a. m. to receive the credentials of Commissioners.

Wm. Henry Roberts, Stated Clerk.

Wm. B. Noble, Permanent Clerk.

Correspondence with reference to railroad transportation and all papers connected with the business of the Assembly, should be sent to the Rev. Wm. H. Roberts, D. D., Stated Clerk, Room 515 Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

Wanted—A Medical Missionary for Korea.

A few months ago Dr. A. J. A. Alexander of Spring Station, Ky., was commissioned and sent as a medical missionary of our Church to Kunsan, Korea. After being only a few months in the field Dr. Alexander was providentially compelled to return home. The time that it will be possible for him to resume his work in Korea is uncertain. The need of a physician at Kunsan Station right away is imperative. If there is a young physician among our church members who would give his life to this work, and who would feel it his privilege and pleasure to do so, the Executive Committee of Foreign Missions would be glad to hear from such a one at the earliest possible day. The support of this missionary for whom we are calling is already promised and will be provided.

S. H. Chester, Secretary.

The World.

N. K. Fairbank, the millionaire manufacturer of Chicago, died at his home on the 27th ult. aged 73 years.

Major General Hector McDonald, commanding the British forces in Ceylon, committed suicide in Paris on the 25th ult.

In the recent fight between the followers of the Mad Mullah and the Abyssinian forces, co-operating with the British, there was a loss of a thousand men to the former.

United States Consul General Hughes, at Coburg, reports that the Germans are meeting with success in their efforts to establish the cotton industry in East Africa.

The report that San Miguel, the Filipino leader, was killed in Friday's fight near Mariquina, is confirmed. His body has been identified and delivered to his relatives for burial.

The burglar who robbed St. Isaac Cathedral and carried away the crown from the image of the Saviour, on which was one diamond worth $25,000 and many other valuable gems, has been captured.

Great Britain will expend $180,000,000 within the present year, towards increasing her navy. The increase contemplates 6 battleships, 11 armored cruisers and 18 minor types, 15 torpedo-boat destroyers and 10 submarine boats.

At Spier Falls on the Hudson river the greatest dam ever built for power production is being advanced toward completion. The work will give 50,000 horse power at a cost of $2,000,000. The lake formed by the dam covers 770 acres.

The State Engineer of New York reports that forty-three counties have taken advantage of the law giving aid from the State Treasury for the building of good roads. The total length of the roads asked for is more than two thousand miles. About three hundred miles have been macadamized, at a cost of $9,000 a mile. The dirt roads cost from two to three thousand dollars a mile.

Havana, March 28.—The treaty of reciprocity between Cuba and the United States as amended by the Senate of the United States, was approved at 8 o'clock to-night, in the Cuban Senate, by a vote of 12 to 9. This approval is absolute and is not hampered by any conditions, the questionable time limit having been dispensed with through the receipt of the cable message from Secretary Hay, in which it was positively declared that President Roosevelt would call a special session of Congress.

Later details of the strike riots in the town of Slatensk, show that the trouble was even of a more serious nature than at first reported. Twenty-eight persons were killed and fifty others were wounded.

The strike started in the State iron works, where 500 men walked out, demanding the release of three of their comrades who had been arrested. The Governor of the Providence, who went in to inquire into the affair, was mobbed as he was entering the house of the manager of the works.

The sponge industry in the United States is threatened with extermination, and in order to save it the United States Fish Commission is now making experiments which it is hoped will restock the almost deplete beds. This industry in the United States is confined to the one State of Florida, but the reckless manner in which fishermen are taking young sponges promises to kill the whole business at an early date. The same trouble is reported throughout the West Indies, the beds in some cases having been entirely exhausted.

For the second time Rudyard Kipling has lost his action against G. P. Putnam's Sons for infringement of copyright and trade mark and unfair competition. In 1899 the Putnams bought from Kipling's authorized publishers a number of unbound sheets of Kipling's writings and bound them up, together with some of his uncopyrighted writings, to form a Brushwood edition. On fifteen sets there was imprinted an elephant's head, inclosed in a circle. This, Kipling alleged, was his exclusive literary trade mark.

The Cedric appears to be a highly comfortable boat. On her maiden voyage a wine glass, brimming full, was placed on the edge of a sideboard and left undisturbed throughout the voyage, but not a drop was spilled nor did the glass move.

Gustavus Franklin Swift, president of the Swift Packing Company, died at his home, 3,488 Ellis avenue Chicago, March 26, of internal hemorrhages resulting from a surgical operation performed several days ago. Mr. Swift was 63 years old.

After repeated and vexatious delays, caused largely by a learned squabble among Italian historians, the great International Historical Congress has been called to meet in Easter week in Rome. The Government announces that for the period of two months, between March 1 and May 1, the members of the Congress, by merely presenting their membership cards, will be permitted to work at pleasure in any of the Italian State archives and libraries. King Victor Emmanuel has accepted the position of Honorary President of the Congress.

The decision of President Roosevelt, not to send the United States North Atlantic Squadron to Kiel for the regatta week is accepted officially as being wise, though Emperor William much desired the presence of the American warships to enliven the annual yachting season. It is understood here that the Washington view of the case was that the visit of the squadron to German waters would not have been considered by the European cabinets in the nature of a friendly demonstration, unless the warships also touched at other shores, and the United States Navy Department was not willing to enter upon a prolonged social campaign.

It is believed that the danger of a complication with Germany over the remarks of Admiral Dewey in a recently published newspaper interview, in which he gave utterance to rather unwise references to the Kaiser's Navy, has blown over. Admiral Dewey called on President Roosevelt to-day and talked the matter over with him. He told the President that he had been quoted quite correctly, but, at the same time, he explained that he meant to make no offensive comparisons and that he believed undue prominence and emphasis had been given to what he said.

The revolutionists of Nicaragua have left the department of Chontales, which has prevented President Zelaya's forces from attacking them. The official advices from Managua, however, say the rising has been suppressed. On the other hand, there are reports that the revolutionary movement is aided by another Central American government. If this is the case the outbreak is more serious than President Zelaya is willing to admit. The strict censorship maintained over dispatches allows only official news to leave Nicaragua. Consequently the real situation in that country is not known.

The decision of the Senate, by an almost unanimous vote, in favor of the ratification of the Panama Canal treaty with Colombia, marks the close of one of the most momentous and long-drawn-out controversies in the history of Congress. Moreover, to those who have followed closely the political history of the Panama-Nicaragua Canal struggle, this happy consummation will be regarded as a distinct triumph of common sense and sober second thought over much misinformation, some measure of misrepresentation, and a large measure of general ignorance upon what was first and last a highly technical subject.

News has been received from abroad that Prof. Hans Molisch, of Prague, has discussed a new use for bacteria. In a communication to the Vienna Academy of Sciences, he described the specifications of a mining lamp, the light of which is supplied by luminous bacteria. The lamp consists of a glass jar lined with a compound of saltpeter and gelatine previously inoculated with bacteria. In the culture thus constituted, bacteria developed prodigiously, in two days causing the jar to be illuminated with a bluish green light which lasted for several days and gradually disappeared in about a fortnight. The light is cold and harmless. Faces can be recognized, it is said, for a distance of two yards and large type can be read by it.—Scientific American.

Estimates calling for the expenditure of more than $12,000,000 in the construction of new railroads in Siberia have been submitted to the Russian government by the council of state, reports Commercial Agent Grenner at Vladivostok. Some of the proposed roads are for the purpose of opening up rich mines of coal which are now inaccessible. In the spring experiments are to be made with smokeless coal on board the ships of the squadron. It is reported that a private company has formed a syndicate of Russian and foreign capitalists to lay a railroad from the Main Asiatic to the Great Siberian line, arranged to traverse the fertile districts of Tomsk and serve as the shortest means of transportation into central and eastern Siberia, Mongolia and Manchuria. The project is of great importance.

It has been practically decided that the great International Archaeological Congress, which had been called to meet in Athens some time during the present year, will be postponed for at least twelve months. The Greek Archaeological Society, which has the whole matter in charge, has come to the conclusion that the preparations for the convention will require more time, as these include such important undertakings as the restoration of the temple at Phigalla, of the Lion of Chaeronea, of the Erechtheum, as also the renovation of the temple district of the Olympian Jupiter in Athens, and the completion of the diggings begun in Samos and several other localities. Some of these projects may consume even two years, and the President-elect of the Congress, Crown Prince Constantine, is to decide upon the exact date of the meeting.

The government of the Punjab Province of India has commenced an undertaking which when completed in five months' time will be the largest bacteriological enterprise the world has yet seen—the inoculation of 7,000,000 persons for protection against the plague, the only beneficial course yet discovered to insure immunity from this disease. The superintendent of the laboratory at Bombay is to supply plague serum at the rate of 50,000 doses a day. The serum is being supplied from England in 14,000 flasks, and will entail the manufacture of four huge sterilizers costing $1,500 each; the planning of a new system of pipes and sinks for extra gas and water and churns. A very good idea of the prevalence of the disease in India, and the high mortality that accompanies it, may be formed from the fact that in the third week of August there were 3,547 fatal cases. England has now been combating this disease for nearly six years, and no remedy attempted has proved successful except inoculation.

The wastefulness of the whole horrible coal strike, as estimated by the Commission, is simply appalling. The loss of the mine owners is set down at $46,000,000; of the railways, $28,000,000; of the miners, in wages alone, $25,000,000; a total of $99,000,000. It will be years before the advance of wages which the miners have gained, either in the form of money or in the curtailment of the hours of work, will make up the amount which has been lost in wages alone, and it is doubtful whether $25,000,000 more would cover the indirect losses which the strike has entailed upon them; and then it must be remembered that these concessions are far less than the demands originally made, while the recognition of the United Mine Workers' Association, which Mr. Mitchell declared to be of more importance than all other demands put together, has not been granted. In that particular the employers have been practically sustained by the Commission, while it is perfectly well understood that their losses during the strike, and also the increased wages of the miners, will at last be paid, not by the mine owners nor by the railways, but by the patient public which has been guiltless of all responsibility for the strike and its causes, whatever those causes may have been.—Standard.

Some fresh data has recently been gathered relative to the great Lisbon earthquake of 1755, when the city was destroyed and 80,000 people lost their lives, by fresh discoveries recently unearthed under the debris of the old city. Evidently Lisbon in former days was rich in costly temples, palaces, tombs and works of art, as the occasional discoveries of the Lisbon Archaeological Association testify. Recently a member of this institution observed the capitals of a highly ornate portico projecting, in an excavation, close to the spot where the tomb and remains of an illustrious personage of ancient Lisbon were unearthed in 1900, in the Alfama quarter. Excavations were carried out, a gate forced, and a beautiful mortuary chapel was unearthed, containing the tomb of a young girl, while within the tomb a skeleton clad in a coat of rich brocade ornamented with "glories," or representations of "OE spirito Sancto," was found. The fabric is still perfect in color and fiber, and if proper care is observed it may not deteriorate from exposure to the air. Further investigation has proved that this skeleton is undoubtedly that of the favorite daughter of King Alfonso, the child wife of Count Henry of Burgundy, grandson of Duke Robert, who fought successfully under King Alfonso's banner against the Moors in Spain, and was rewarded in 1005 for his services by the monarch, with the hand of his daughter, with Portugal as her dowry.—Scientific American.

An important congress has been held in London by the officials of the various great trunk railroads of Great Britain relative to the adoption of electric traction upon their different systems. The most important point discussed was concerning the position of the current rail in connection with the ordinary two rails, its distance therefrom, height, and position. As electric traction for trunk railroads is on the eve of introduction in Great Britain this congress was assembled to prevent various standards being adopted upon the different systems, which would thus seriously interfere with inter-communication between one company and another to the detriment of their welfare and traffic. By the adoption of one standard common to all the railroads, electric locomotives and trains could be as easily run over various systems as the present steam locomotives achieve the same object. Those railroads which are already introducing electric haulage upon certain sections of their roads are adopting different standards according to the amount of space available for the placing of the current rail, and although the difference is only a matter of one or two inches, yet it is of vital importance that they should adopt measurements which will be easily applicable to the other systems. This step is imperative, as Mr. Yerkes' electrification of the London underground railroad is in progress, and, as the trunk railroads have running powers thereon, the latter will have to adopt electric locomotives, since no steam locomotives are to be permitted in the tunnels after the conversion to electricity is completed.—Exchange.

There are at last two very serious breaks in the levees that protect the lowlands of Louisiana and Mississippi from the floods of the great river. One is in Louisiana, the other in Mississippi. The Mississippi State crevasse is on the east side of the river, a few miles below the city of Greenville. The water is poured into the great cotton region known as the Yazoo delta or bottom, which contains the counties of Tunica, Coahoma, Quitman, Bolivar, Sunflower, Tallahatchie, Leflore, Washington, Sharkey, Issaquena and Yazoo. This is believed to be the richest cotton land in the world, and although only a small part of the territory is under cultivation, its cotton product is very extensive. The water, after flooding the plantations and settlements and obstructing railway traffic, will flow into the Yazoo River and into the Mississippi. It is believed that plantations in the three counties of Bolivar, Washington and Sharkey will suffer from the flood water. The Yazoo Bottom has an area of about 14,000 square miles, considerably larger than the State of Maryland, and hundreds of millions of dollars should be willingly spent to protect it from the floods. The Louisiana crevasse is on the west side of the river, near the dividing line between the parishes of St. James and St. John. The water pouring through it overflows the neighboring sugar plantations, and will do great damage. If the water will leave the cotton lands in the course of a few weeks it will not be too late to plant for a crop, but the sugar plantations are likely to suffer most seriously. The land reached by this crevasse water is very flat and will allow the flood to spread out in every direction. The flood water from the St. James crevasse will find its way into Lake Salvador, and thence into Bayou Barataria and Barataria Bay. It will not come back into the Mississippi River. From what can be learned, there seems good reason to believe that the St. James levee was purposely destroyed. No such opinion can be formed concerning the Greenville crevasse from the information at hand, but it is conceded that the break occurred without warning in a levee where no signs of weakness had appeared.—Picayune.

Deaths.

"Grief is a tattered tent
Where through God's light doth shine;
Who glances up at every rent Shall catch a ray divine."
—Lucy Larcom.

Memorial and Resolutions adopted by Third Creek Church.

RAMSEY.—Dr. Jas. Graham Ramsey was born March 1st, 1823, and died Jan. 10th, 1903.

He was married to Miss Sarah J. Foster, Sept. 30th, 1846, who went to rest Aug. 1895.

There were eight children born to them of whom five survive, viz., Jas. H. Ramsey, Salisbury, N. C., Mrs. Margaret Foster Nelson, Fonsdale, Ala., Edgar B. Ramsey of Montana, Robt. L. Ramsey, El Paso, Texas, and Claud C. Ramsey, Seattle, Washington.

In 1843 Dr. Ramsey moved from Iredell, his native county, to Mt. Vernon, Rowan county, where he practiced his profession for about 51 years.

In the year 1851 he united with Third Creek Church, and in 1854 he was ordained and installed an elder, which office he magnified till his death.

In his death the State has lost a useful and honored citizen, the Church a faithful and consecrated member, and the session of Third Creek Church a dear brother and wise counsellor.

He died as he had lived, trusting his Redeemer.

Therefore it is resolved,

First, That we bow in humble submission to Almighty God, who has taken his servant to himself.

Second, That we will make it our constant endeavor to emulate his example, in that he was full of zeal and good works.

Third, That the sympathies of this session are extended to his dear ones.

Fourth, That we set apart a page in our Minute Book to his memory, and that a copy of this preamble and resolutions be sent to his children, and also to the Presbyterian Standard and Salisbury Sun for publication.

Robt. S. Arrowood, Pastor.

RANKIN.—Whereas, God has in His infinite wisdom and goodness called home to higher service and more abundant reward, our beloved brother, Rev. David C. Rankin, D. D., Dec. 28, 1902, at Seoul, Korea.

Resolved, We, the officers of The Missionary Union of Wilmington Presbytery, do place on record our feeling of personal bereavement in the seemingly irreparable loss our Church has sustained in his death.

Resolved, We would emphasize our great admiration of his varied gifts in the editorship of our Missionary Magazines, thereby placing them in the forefront of all such publications in the United States.

Resolved, We gratefully remember his fervent zeal; his irrepressible activity; his whole-hearted devotion; his inspiring enthusiasm and self-denying efforts in the cause of Missions. Ever ready to lay down his pressing work to help a struggling Union, he came to us at Caswell in 1900 and his words of cheer and hope, born of the Spirit and winged by the Spirit, rang so true and God-given that every heart was touched and a great wave of enthusiasm swept over the meeting.

Resolved, Though our Leader has been parted from us, we must not fold our hands and mourn, but turn with hopeful faces to his successor, and by our prayers and loyalty, "hold up his hands."

Resolved, We extend to his beloved wife our tender sympathy and pray that she may find comfort in looking backward over a life so full of usefulness and beauty and forward to the meeting with him in the life which is complete.

Resolved, A copy of these resolutions be sent to Mrs. Rankin, to the editors of "The Missionary" and Church papers and a copy be filed with the minutes of our Union.

Mrs. J. Johnson, Pres.

Elizabeth W. Murphy, Vice Pres.

J. D. Wood.

Annie E. Paddleson, Cor. Sec.

DIXON.—At his home near Graham, N. C., March 16th, Mr. Edwin R. Dixon, in his 77th year. Long a member of Providence Christian Church, received into Bethany (at organization in 1892) and made one of first Elders, zealous in the Lord's work, fearless but loving, honest, sincere, "an Israelite indeed," unique in place and character. His prayers, particularly, were striking for their originality, directness, quaint expression and brevity. "Well done."

SKIPPER.—John B. Skipper was born near McClellanville, S. C., Aug. 12th, 1861. He spent his whole life on the farm where he was born and reared, and departed this life in the hope of God's redeemed Feb. 13th, 1903.

In January 13th, 1895 under the ministration of Rev. F. L. Sleeper he made a profession of faith in Christ and united with New Wapataw Church and up to the day of his death was a consistent member and staunch supporter of the church.

For some years previous to his death he suffered greatly from prostrated health and spent much of his means in efforts to secure healing, but it was not God's will that restoration should come, so he suffered patiently till the Master called him. His hearing was so much injured that he gathered very little of the sermon, yet while unable to hear the sermon or the prayers of God's people, he continued to the last patiently to attend worship. When asked why he persisted in going to church when he could hear so little of the services, he replied, "it is God's house and the place where His people meet, and while I am there I am in good company." He grew up during a period when there were few educational advantages in his section of the State, yet denied the advantages of a liberal education, his native ability and strong common sense accompanied by energy and persistent work made him one of the most successful business men of his community. At the time of his death, New Wapataw church was without a Pastor, so one of the Ruling Elders conducted the funeral services, while relatives and friends sadly performed the last rites, as a good Christian was laid away in his last resting place. An aged mother, one brother and six sisters mourn his death.

Elder.

M'LEOD.—(The following resolutions were lost in transit to this office.) The undersigned, having been appointed by the session of Carthage church to draft resolution in regard to the death of Duncan Murchison, McLeod, beg to submit the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God, the Great Head of the Church, to remove from us, by death, our esteemed friend and brother, D. M. McLeod; therefore be it resolved:

First, By the death of our brother, Carthage Church has sustained a great loss in thus losing a most faithful and zealous office bearer, our church and Sunday-school true and faithful member.

Second, That as a soldier and citizen, he always showed himself to be a true man in the fullest sense; he was a typical Scotchman of the highest order, and was ever found faithful and true in all the walks of life.

Third, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the "Carthage Blade" and the "Presbyterian Standard" for publication.

Fourth, That the Clerk of the session be directed to spread this preamble and resolutions on the records of the session.

L. P. Tyson,

John L. Currie,

Jas. D. McIver.

The Household.

A Baby's Hand.

As soft as the petal of a rose
It lies on the downy spread—Yet, clenched, some day it may deal such blows
As the strongest man may dread.

It is tinted like a pretty shell
Cast up on some tropic strand,
And only the troubled years may tell
Of the work of that weak hand.

Never a daintier thing was made,
With its fingers frail and slim—
Yet God has given it strength to lead
A wandering man to Him.

O, little, frail thing lying there,
As soft as a flake of snow,
May it never be crimson-dyed and ne'er
Deliver a wrongful blow.

—Chicago Tribune.

Table Talk.

An occasional stuffed beefsteak or "mock duck," as it is sometimes called, gives a welcome variety to the menu when a "plain cook" provides for the household. Combined with oysters it is especially good though it is palatable with any "stuffing." To prepare it, buy two or three pounds of thick steak from the upper side of the round. If you have a butcher who knows his business, get him to cut a "pocket" in the steak large enough to hold the dressing; otherwise roll the stuffing up in the steak, binding it with twine or narrow strips of cotton cloth and securing the ends so the contents will not burst out. The dressing may be plain or combined with chestnuts or oysters. For a two-pound steak a cupful of bread crumbs, well seasoned with salt, pepper, butter and a little onion or any herbs, will suffice. Have ready a shallow, broad-buttoned kettle—a little iron Scotch kettle is best—in which a slice of pork and a little fat of beef has been fried crisp. Take out the pork and put in the roll, turning it until well browned. Add a half pint of water and a little salt. Cover closely and simmer slowly for two hours. Add more water if it shows signs of drying out. Unwind the string carefully, and lay the roll on a hot platter. Thicken the gravv with a little flour—if the flour is browned it gives a richer color—add a teaspoonful of Worcestershire sauce, if you like the taste, and pour over the roll. Garnish with a little parsley, and serve, cutting in slices through the roll. This is equally nice heated over the next day, or is delicious served cold with parsley.

A delicious salad may be made of stuffed olives cut in half, mushrooms, Brazil nuts cut in thin slices, and a few delicate tips of celery. Moisten the mixture with French dressing and fill into apple cups. The apples should be washed and polished, a thin slice should be removed from the stem end and the interior scooped out, leaving a wall of generous thickness. Put a tablespoonful of mayonnaise with which whipped cream may or may not have been used on the top of each. Do not replace the covers. A mixture of celery and apple, of apple and English walnuts or of apple and chopped cress may also be used in the apple shells. In any case, they should be served on a bed of cress or of lettuce.

A fruit salad dressed with French dressing or served with sugar and whipped cream is made of diced pineapples, bananas and stoned cherries. It may be served from the pineapple shell.—Exchange.

Growing a Grandmother.

He was a we little man, only three years old, but brave, courageous and uncomplaining—more so than any one knew, for, though only a baby, he had his trials, says the New York Times. The family had gone to a new country in the far West. It was a very new country, very different from the city in the East, where they had left many friends, relatives and, nearest of all, a dear old grandmother. The mamma was so busy in her new home that she had little time to devote to the babies, except to see that they were kept clean and well fed. So the little ones were lonesome sometimes, as mamma found out one day in a way that brought the tears to her eyes.

The little three-year old had been very busy and quiet, making a big hole in the ground with such earnestness that, fearing the little fellow was planning mischief, she went to see. The hole was completed when she reached the spot, and in it had been placed something that she took out and examined with wondering curiosity. It was the strangest thing to go into a hole in the ground—an old daguerreo-type, a picture of the dear grandmamma at home.

"Why, baby," exclaimed mamma, "what are you doing with this?"

"I fought," said the little man, with a quivering lip and all the pent-up loneliness of homesickness in his voice as he tried to explain—"I fought, maybe, if I planted it, anoizzer grandma would grow."

Mrs. Fred Unrath,

"I am pleased to give my experience with Wine of Cardui as I am very grateful for its help. After my first baby was born I could not seem to regain my strength, although the doctor gave me a tonic which he considered very superior, but instead of getting better I grew weaker every day. My husband came home one evening with some Wine of Cardui and insisted that I take it for a week and see what it would do for me. As he seemed to have so much faith in it I did take the medicine and was very grateful to find my strength slowly returning. In two weeks I was out of bed and in a month I was able to take up my usual duties. I am very enthusiastic in its praise."

Mrs. Fred Unrath.

hers, as are their ambitions, triumphs and defeats. Healthy women do not suffer miscarriage nor does a woman who is healthy suffer tortures at childbirth. It is the woman who is ailing—who has female weakness—who fears the ordeal of becoming a mother. Wine of Cardui builds up the womanly in a woman. It stops all unnatural drains and strains—irregularities which are responsible for barrenness and miscarriage. It makes a woman strong and healthy and able to pass through pregnancy and childbirth with little suffering. After the ordeal is passed the Wine prepares a woman for a speedy recovery to health and activity. Wine of Cardui, in re-inforcing the organs of generation, has made mothers of women who had given up hope of ever becoming mothers. Wine of Cardui will cure almost any case of barrenness except cases of organic trouble. How can you refuse to take such a remedy that promises such relief from suffering? Wine of Cardui simply makes you a strong woman, and strong, healthy women do not suffer. They look forward to motherhood with joy.

WINE of CARDUI

A million suffering women have found relief in Wine of Cardui.

Another Appreciation of the Aetna.

LUMBERTON, N. C., November 26, 1902.

J. D. BOUSHALL, ESQ., Manager Aetna Life Insurance Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir:—After a careful comparison of policies submitted to me by the Aetna Life, Bankers' Life of New York, Equitable of New York, Northwestern, New York Life and Prudential, I have accepted $10,000 in the Aetna on the 20-payment life plan, with option of 25 year 3 per cent. Gold Bond Contract.

I have been a policy-holder in the Aetna for nearly eight years, and therefore feel somewhat prepared to judge of its merits from actual results. With all due deference to other companies, it affords me great pleasure to say that in my opinion the Aetna cannot be surpassed for plain and liberal contracts, and for just, conservative and economical management. I now have $12,000 in the Aetna. My partner, Mr. W. W. Carlyle, has $16,000 and one of our clerks, Mr. John T. Biggs, has $2,000, nearly all of which was written and delivered by your special agent, Mr. H. T. Spears.

Wishing you and the grand old Aetna continued success, I am,

Yours very truly,

ROBERT D. CALDWELL.

The Home Circle.

With the Lepers in Surinam, West Indies.

'The world's a room of sickness, where each heart

Knows its own anguish and unrest,
The truest wisdom there, and noblest art,

Is his who skills of comfort best.'

—Keble.

Will you come with me, my reader, to one corner of this great "Sick room," and let us visit together the little Leper Colony of Groot Chatillon in Surinam, which lies on the Upper Surinam River, and is reached in some four or five hours by a small steamboat, which runs from Paramaribo three times a week.

Separated from the Government establishment by a canal is the little Protestant settlement of "Bethesda," founded in 1899 by the combined Protestant churches in Surinam. The spiritual oversight of the whole Colony is under the charge of a Pastor of the Church of the Moravian Brethren, Rev. Henry T. Weiss, who with his devoted young wife gives his life to the service of these poor outcasts of humanity.

It is to this "House of Mercy"—Bethesda—that I wish in thought to conduct my readers.

It is still, as will be seen, quite in its infancy, and help is much needed towards its growth and expansion.

Groot Chatillon is situated on a breezy and healthy spot at a sharp turn of the river, and, as one approaches it, the neatly painted houses of Bethesda can be seen, backed by the dark foliage of the yet undisturbed bush.

Bethesda is in fact a tiny village, composed of small wooden houses, raised from the ground on piles, and approached by short flights of steps, each house having its own little covered veranda.

They are made to accommodate two people, each patient having his own separate room with its veranda attached. Outside the houses is a cemented pathway, and in front the ground is laid out with shrubs and flowers, while in many of the verandas may be seen flowers in pots, which the patients themselves take pleasure in tending. The houses are kept scrupulously neat and clean and the patients seem to vie with one another in the care and adornment of their rooms, and very fresh and inviting they look, each with its comfortable camp-bed and clean coverlet and pillows.

Between the men's and women's houses is the "Schwesternhaus," the Sisters' House, a neat and pretty little rest-house approached by a green pathway, and appropriated to the use of the Deaconesses who spend their lives among the poor sufferers.

As before mentioned, the work is under the supervision of a Pastor of the Moravian Church and his wife, who live in a house situated close to the Chatillon landing-place, and with whom reside also the two Deaconesses who tend and nurse the patients.

The first Deaconess, Sister Lina, who brought the first leper to Bethesda, was called to her eternal rest after one year's faithful service, but there was no lack of others to carry on her work, and now the two young Deaconesses, Sisters Philipina and Martha, the latter a Christian Endeavorer, give themselves to the work with the most loving and whole-hearted devotion.

Let us follow them through a day's work. At half past five in the morning, clad in large linen "overall" aprons, they set out for the houses of their patients. Following them shortly afterwards, we find one of them busily engaged in preparing the breakfasts, assisted by one or more of the patients themselves, who, being less helpless than the rest, are encouraged to employ themselves on behalf of those less favoured.

A sound of sweet singing issues from the direction of the bath-room at the back of the houses, and venturing to open the door we find Sister Martha dressing and bandaging the deformed and ulcered feet of one of her patients, and meanwhile the two are singing together one of the "Songs of Zion." Let me introduce you, my dear reader, to this poor youth. Perhaps at first sight you shrink from him, for the terrible disease has disfigured his poor face till it is almost repulsive looking, and his hands and feet are bent and twisted and covered with loathsome sores, so that he is perfectly helpless and crippled. A Jew by birth and nationality, when C. first came to Bethesda he was a very trying patient to deal with, fretful and thankless, and not seeming to care what trouble he gave to the kind and patient sisters, but by degrees the love of God won his heart, and on the evening of the old year, 1901, at a little service held for the lepers, he yielded his heart to the Lord Jesus Christ, and accepted Him as his Saviour.

We pass on a little further and are greeted by a hearty "Good morning," from K. Though entirely blind—the disease having eaten away his eyes, and has left only ghastly holes over which in the day-time he wears a bandage to hide their unsightliness—K. is quick to recognize voices. He was the first leper brought to Bethesda, and is now looked upon as a kind of father in the little community. Poor K. was in good position in Paramaribo, the future looked bright before him, and love and happiness lay invitingly in his path, when suddenly a horror of great darkness fell upon him, for the dreaded disease made its appearance, and he knew that for him earthly happiness must be abandoned forever. The disease is gradually increasing, and little by little hands and feet lose their power, toes and fingers are eaten away, while the blindness is an added agony. He is very suffering to-day, and tears trickle from his sightless eyes as we speak to him. He is having his breakfast, and little Christian, the youngest of the lepers of Bethesda, a boy of only twelve years, is feeding him. But K. too has as we trust, opened his heart to the great love of Christ, and he is beloved of all, nurses and patients alike.

Ah! here comes Bill, with his true bright face! Dear good W. R., or Bill, as he is known at Bethesda, always cheery and helpful, a friend to everybody. Bill is the schoolmaster here, and teaches the younger patients, reading and writing. L., a girl of fourteen years, has learned to read and write since she came to Bethesda, and now may often be seen sitting on K.'s veranda, and reading the Bible to him. Bill, too, has a sad history. One of a family of eleven children left orphans and unprovided for, it had been his fond hope to do much for his younger brothers and sisters. He is an intelligent lad, and speaks English fluently as well as his native Dutch, and what is better still, Bill is a sincere Christian, and his patient resignation and acceptance of the will of God are evident in his whole life.

In his case the disease has not progressed so far, but there is no cure, and Bill knows that his days will go on in increasing suffering until the worn-out body is carried to the little graveyard.

In one of the rooms, that of a young man who was a carpenter, and is still able to use his hands in that way, it is pathetic to see a head-stone which he has made for his own grave of hard wood, upon which he has carved his own name, date of birth, etc., and left a space for the date of his death, which he has asked his friend Bill to fill in for him afterwards. For all these poor sufferers know that for them there is nothing to be looked for till the releasing hand of death shall lead them to that land where the inhabitants shall no more say "I am sick."

We might go on to relate the histories of the others of the inhabitants of Bethesda, each one with its own individual story of sorrow, but let these few suffice. Of the fifteen patients, there are five women, and the remaining ten are men. The oldest is a man of some sixty years, while the youngest is little Christian, a boy of twelve.

But let us return to the Sisters. After their work of the morning is ended, the mid-day meal finished, and the sick ones having a time of rest in their rooms, we should probably find these indefatigable souls in their little rest-house with a pile of needlework, making or mending for their charges! Later on there are dressings and bandagings a second time for the worst of the patients, the evening meals to be prepared and given, and the various preparations for the night.

But before we leave the little village, let us take a last look at the closing scene of the day.

The evening shadows are closing round Chatillon and the bright tropical moon is beginning to shed its silvery rays over the quiet scene, as we step towards K.'s room, and sit in his little veranda. Inside are gathered all the patients who can walk or can be carried there, for their evening worship. To-night is their "prayer-meeting night" and the little room is quite full. Among them sit the Sisters, one of whom gives out a hymn, which is heartily sung by all—for mercifully, the fell disease which has so marred their forms and faces has left their voices untouched, and they sing together sweetly and melodiously. Then one of the lepers reads a chapter from the Bible distinctly and clearly, and afterwards, one by one, they lift up their voices in simple pleading prayer.

It is a heart-moving sight, and one can almost see in fancy the figure of the Divine Healer, moving about among them and speaking His words of peace and power, as in the days of His life upon earth. There is such a true spirit of devotion among them—their prayers are such an out-pouring of soul into the listening ear of the Saviour, and we feel His presence very near and real.

There is a nice, simple, little Moravian church at Chatillon, where from week to week the pure Gospel is preached, and the people taught simply and lovingly of Christ and His salvation. It was my privilege to be present on the evening of Ascension day, when a little congregation of some fifty or more were gathered there. Brother Weiss held a short catechetical service for them, questioning them on the sermon he had preached there in the morning, and the readiness and intelligence with which they answered were as striking as was the dexterity with which he drew out from them, by illustration and suggestion, all that they knew.

The splendid self-sacrifice and devotion of those who dedicate their lives to a work like this, involving, as it does, so much that is repugnant to flesh and blood, and so undoubted a risk of contamination from the disease—a risk which is accepted willingly for Christ's sake—is past all praise. "They shall in no wise lose their reward." The heroism of a Father Damian travelled the world over, and his praises were on everyone's lips but there are hundreds of such heroes and heroines working in obscure corners of the world, heedless of the praise or blame of men, content only to hear His "Well done, good and faithful servant," at the last.

Of such are these dear Missionary brethren and sisters at Groot Chatillon. The privilege is offered to us of sympathizing with them in a practical way, by helping on the work to which they are devoting their lives. Nothing gives them purer joy than anything that is done for their dear lepers. And there is much that needs to be done.

It is needless to say that this sketch of the work is written in the earnest hope that the simple recital may move the hearts of Christians everywhere, and lead them to give to the support and expansion of this good and Christ-like work.

Would that many more of the poor lepers of Surinam, who now drag out their sad and suffering lives with no hope either for this world or the next, might be brought into the atmosphere of love, and purity, and prayer of little Bethesda! But for this, money is needed to build fresh houses, as well as for the keeping up of the work already existing.

Besides regular help towards the general expenses of the work and its gradual expansion, I should like to plead for help for three special objects which are urgently required at the present time for Bethesda.

1.—A Surgery, and proper Bath-rooms. At present the Sisters have to do the dressing of the patients' sores in a very small and ill-ventilated bath-room, which is most trying and unwholesome, both for nurses and patients.

In a disease such as this, plenty of space and fresh air are indispensable.

2.—A small Chapel or Prayer-room. For their morning and evening worship, and other gatherings for singing and prayer, they at present assemble in the room of one of their number, but it is even now difficult to seat them all, and in course of time will be impossible. Here again, it is inadvisable that they should be crowded into a small room, especially in the extreme heat of the Surinam climate, and a small Chapel for their use is much needed.

I have told my simple story, and now leave it with my readers.

Will it not be "an over-payment of delight" for anything we do or give now for a work such as this—a work which must surely be very near to the heart of our Lord Himself—to hear in the Great Day His Voice saying to us "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me?"

Loneliness of Age.

The loneliness of age! How few think of this, and treat with tenderness and consideration those who have outlived their generation, and whose early companions and friends have been taken from them! Unable to engage in the activities of life, they are no longer brought into contact and sympathy with those around them, and no tie of common interest and mutual dependence binds them together. They necessarily, to a great extent, live in a world of their own, with which those around them are not familiar.

The communings of their hearts are with the scenes of the past and the companions of other years who have long ago passed away. Lover and friends have been taken from them, and their acquaintances laid in darkness. The forms they admired and loved are gone, the eyes that looked into theirs with the tenderest affection are sightless, and the voices that cheered and stirred their souls have long since been silent. Their early world of hope and joy has become a desolation, and they sit in silence contemplating the ruin that has been wrought.—Exchange.

The Flower in the Field.

For the Standard.

Class B stood in a row while the teacher marked to-morrow's reading lesson. It looked rather dry and hard, but just at the end of it came a lovely bit of poetry.

"May we learn that verse?" asked Carl and Adele. "Must we learn that old verse?" asked Jim and Lottie. The four began together, but the first two spoke in such bright, crisp tones, that they had finished their question while the other two were still drawing along in the middle of theirs.

The teacher didn't answer any of them. She was looking at them, but seemed at the same time to be looking beyond them. Jim, who could never be quiet very long, touched her hand and softly asked, "What are you thinking about, and looking at so hard?" "I see," answered the teacher, almost as if she were talking to herself, "I see four little people at work in a field together. They all work pretty faithfully, pulling up Bad Grammar weeds, hoeing away at long rows of Spelling, and keeping the Addition and Subtraction borders trimmed neat and even.

"But there is one curious thing about these little workers. Sometimes they find the sweetest clusters of flowers, blue, white and crimson, blooming in unexpected corners. These they can have for the trouble of gathering. But—can you believe it?—while some of the little people pounce on the flowers, pull them, smell them, and fasten them on their breasts, the others whine: "O, dear, must we break our backs picking these old flowers? They never do stay on after we've pinned them, and they are not so very pretty, anyhow."

Carl and Adele heard the little parable with beaming smiles. Jim and Lottie giggled and grew rosier than ever. While Lottie whispered roguishly to Jim,

"Let's pick the little old flowers, this time."

Then Class B stood stiff and straight while the teacher issued the command it loved, and without which it would not budge, "Face!

Pace!

Now take your place!"

The Worth of a Boy.

Yes, it was Christmas Day. Johnny had been very aggravating all the morning.

"So noisy! so rude! so horrid!" said his lady sister Helen.

"Oh, I wish papa would send him away to school. I don't see how I can get along with him any longer."

"You must be patient," said mamma.

"I think that everybody has been too patient," replied Helen, pursing up her pretty red lips. "If he knew that he must behave like a gentleman why, then, he would behave like a gentleman."

So Helen proceeded to make him behave. She put on the most freezing manner possible whenever he came near her.

Whenever he asked her to tie his cravat, she pushed him away, and told him that she never meant to do anything more for him, he behaved so badly. When he wished to consult her about the hanging of mamma's present on the Christmas tree, she told him that he might get some other person's advice, she cared nothing about the matter.

Mamma had a headache that day, and was obliged to go to her room for an hour or two. We all know that when the mammas hide their face for any reason whatever it is the same as if the sun had gone behind a dark cloud. So, you see, the house was very dull for a twelve-year-old boy of an explosive disposition.

How were two or three hours to be got rid of after dinner, before the family were to gather in the parlor and pick the Christmas tree?

Johnny put on his overcoat and sauntered out. Presently he fell in with Harry Scott. Just the sight of Harry's jovial face, his sparkling eyes, his springing step, made Johnny's lonesome heart bound with pleasure. He knew that Harry sometimes used unmanly words, that he was not always truthful. But Harry was pleasant, and Helen was cross. One was like honey, the other was like vinegar.

"Come down to the skating pond," said Harry.

"Father said I musn't skate any till he got back. He won't be home till evening."

"That's what I call tyranny," replied Harry. "If I were in your place I'd strike out for freedom. The boss can't do anything to you if you don't mind him, more'n whale you a little."

"My father never strikes any of us children, said Johnny on the defensive.

"Then you are a ninny if you don't come along."

"But father said the ice was likely to be thin."

"Oh, what a baby you are! Come along."

So Johnny went back to the house, crept into the kitchen quietly, and took his skates from their place without being seen by anybody but Nora, the cook. By and by the shadows fell, and the gas was lighted in the handsome parlors.

Mamma, refreshed by her hour of quiet rest, came down in a pretty costume, with a bunch of Christmas roses in her hand.

May Ellsworth, one of Johnny's favorite cousins, arrived with a gift for Johnny to be hung on the Christmas tree.

Tall and graceful, sparkling all over with stars and crescents, candles and globes, loaded with wonderful secrets, stood the tree under the arch between the two parlors. The time had come to distribute the gifts.

But one was absent, the noise-maker, the peace-dispeller, the nerve-irritator, the enfant terrible.

One would say that his absence was fortunate, since he was such a trouble to the household. But, somehow, they could not go on without him. Why, half the things on the tree were for Johnny. The family had been revolving around Johnny during all the days of preparation for Christmas. But why did he not come?

The question resounded through the house and penetrated to the kitchen.

"He took his skates and went out two or three hours ago," said Nora.

A hush fell upon the assembled family. Johnny had gone to the river. Helen looked frightened. The mother's face was white with anxiety.

"I didn't think anything could keep him from the Christmas tree," said Cousin May. Then, seeing the effect of her words, she wished that she had kept silent.

"I will go and look for him," said big brother Ben, starting out upon the run in the direction of the river.

Helen stole to her mother's side, and put her arms around her neck.

"I am afraid it is all my fault," she said. "I was so hard and cross with Johnny, that he went off just to get away from me."

Mamma could only reply by a sad look in her soft, patient eyes.

"And you have told me so often," went on Helen, "to make sunshine for the boys, and trust for the rest; and maybe I shall never have a chance again to try to forget myself for Johnny's sake."

The minutes spent by the family waiting for Ben's return were full of, silent dread. And, oh, what relief came to those anxious hearts when an ear-splitting war-hoop was heard!

"It's Johnny," cried Helen, the fastidious, running to the door and clasp- ing the "dreadful boy" in her strong young arms.

"What's struck you?" said Johnny, amazed at the sudden show of affection, when he expected nothing less than a scolding from each individual member of the family.

"What ails you all?" as they crowded about him, eager to express their relief and joy.

"Where's Ben? Come, let's begin on the tree."

"Ben has gone to look for you," said the mother. "We have had a terrible fright. Why did you disobey father and go to the river?"

"I didn't go on the ice, mother. I was all out of sorts when I went out. But I guess the walk did me good. Anyway, I couldn't make up my mind to skate against father's orders."

"Bless the boy!" said the mother in her heart.

"He is my Christmas present," whispered Helen in her mother's ear. "See if I don't appreciate how precious he is all the year long till next Christmas Eve."—The Christian Register.

Just an Every-day Saint.

"Wait, Tommy; that button must be sewed on your jacket."

"But I'll be late for school, mother."

"No, you will not be late; give me your jacket and you amuse baby one minute; you know our clock is a little fast."

Tommy took Baby Ben to the window and called his attention to a passing "bow-wow" while the button was being fastened in place.

"Why, mamma, it's raining! I'll have to carry an umbrella to school, won't I?"

"Is it raining?" said Mrs. Chubb, anxiously.

"Yes, indeed; see the drops on the window. But I'll take that broken umbrella, and then if anything happens it won't make any difference."

Tommy was conscious that his umbrella was liable to accidents, and how could it be otherwise when it was sure to be used as an offensive and defensive weapon in his friendly skirmishes with other boys?

"Here's your jacket, my boy; now get your umbrella and scamper off to school."

Mrs. Chubb stood at the window and watched him. "Tommy," she called; he looked back. "Tommy, you may bring Billy home to dinner with you."

"All right, mother! Good for you!"

It was wash-day, and that invitation increased Mrs. Chubb's work a little, for she was her own cook on wash-days.

"But," she said to herself, "he needs a good dinner and he shall have it. I must hunt up some warm clothing for him, too, poor little fellow! He shall have that overcoat Tommy has laid aside, and I do believe I can mend the sleeves before time to get dinner."

The overcoat was brought, with a roll of pieces, and the mending went on, with occasional interruptions, for Baby Ben must receive a bright smile once in a while, and a little help, too, in his small endeavors at block-house building.

The coat being finished and the baby tucked away for his nap, Mrs. Chubb hastened to the kitchen and busied herself in preparing dinner.

After dinner the overcoat was given to Billy, and he buttoned himself up in it with great delight.

"Thank ye, Mis' Chubb, ever so much; mother said I'd just have to run to keep warm this winter, 'cause she couldn't afford to buy me an overcoat, an' now she'll see me come a-walkin' in with an overcoat on!"

"Well, I'm glad you like it, Billy; just put this roll of pieces in the pocket, so your mother can have them to mend with if needed. I'm glad I know of a good little boy to have that overcoat; it ought to be proud of having kept two good boys warm," said Mrs. Chubb as she started the children off to school, each with a nice red apple in his pocket.

"Hooray for us, Billy!" said Tommy; "that means you're one good boy and I'm another."

The next day Mrs. Chubb called on Billy's mother, a poor widow who worked hard to provide for her little family.

"Mrs. Blake," she said, "I would like to have Billy take his dinner with us during this term of school; you know we live nearer the schoolhouse than you do, and he can always be there in time." She did not add that the boy would be sure of a hearty meal, but Mrs. Blake thought of that and appreciated the kindness.

"It is very good of you, Mrs. Chubb, and Billy will say so, too. I know it will be some trouble to you."

"No, we busy housekeeping mothers cannot reach out very far, but we can improve our little wayside opportunities.

But good-by now, for I must look in on Mrs. Paley a few minutes. Do not forget to tell B'ly."

Mrs. Chubb found Mrs. Paley where everybody found her, and where she had spent many years—in her own room on a couch.

"How good you are to come!" said the invalid.

"I like to come," answered Mrs. Chubb cheerily, "because I always find you at home."

"Yes, but do you know home sometimes seems to me like a prison?"

"Such a pretty room as this surely cannot seem like a prison," said Mrs. Chubb with a smile. "Only see the pretty, bright carpet, lovely pictures, nice furniture, and two windows through which you have glimpses of God's beautiful world outside."

"Yes a beautiful world, but you remember Mrs. Browning says: 'Two little tears suffice to cover all!'"

"Ah! but the beauty is there just the same, and God is God; floods of tears cannot wash away that blessed truth."

Then Mrs. Chubb chatted about various matters, little incidents in her own home life; told some quaint sayings of Baby Ben, and gave a sketch of the pastor's prayer-meeting talk of the night before.

"Now good-by, dear," said Mrs. Chubb, "I see Miss Vail. I want to speak with her;" and, with a promise to come again as soon as she could, she closed Mrs. Paley's door behind her and hurried away.

"How do you do, Miss Vail? I am Mrs. Chubb; you remember we spoke at church last Sunday."

"Oh, yes, I remember."

"I wish to remind you of our church tea Friday evening. You will go I am sure."

"I do not know; I am so much a stranger."

"Yes, you are a stranger, but we are going to take you in and make you feel at home. You will soon make acquaintances. I am glad you handed in your church letter."

"I like the pastor very much."

"I am sure you do. Wasn't that a good sermon last Sunday! I will call for you Friday evening. Mr. Chubb cannot go to the tea, and I shall be glad of your company."

Miss Vail's consent to accompany her was given, and they parted at the next corner.

When Billy came home from school that afternoon his mother told him about Mrs. Chubb's invitation. He was greatly pleased, and searching through his limited vocabulary for words to express his feelings.

"Mother, Mrs. Chubb's a brick; she is a pressed brick, that's true."

"Yes, Billy, or perhaps she's a saint."

"Mebbe; not the kind with the long, white dress and shiny about her head, though; but just a kind of every-day saint."

"She's the kind we read of in the Bible, Billy."

"Where?"

"You'll see when we read our Bible to-night."

They read the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew from the thirty-first to the forty-first verses."

"Yes, mother, I see," said Billy.— Selected.

Why Johnny Didn't Smoke.

We were walking up and down the long platform of the railway station at New London one bright spring morning, and enjoying the fresh breeze that blew in from the south while we waited for the Vermont Central train to take us on to the northward.

There were other strollers besides ourselves, and we particularly noticed a handsome, dainty young athlete for his scrupulous neatness, his quiet demeanor, and his firm, erect carriage.

Presently he was accosted by a half dozen jolly young fellows, who were surprised and delighted at meeting him there. They plied him with hasty, cordial, boyish questions: "Where have you been?" "What have you been doing?" "How are you getting on?"

We dropped down on a settee near by, amused at the merry, lively chat. Presently some one offered our athlete a cigar.

"Thank you, no," he said. "I have given up smoking." And then he added, laughing a little, and showing a set of very white teeth: "The fact is, when I reached home there seemed to be no place for me to smoke, and I was under the necessity of giving up the habit."

"How was that, John?"

"Well, you see, I was glad enough to get home again, and after supper I went into the library and lay down on the sofa in front of the open fire, and, lighting a cigar, prepared for a smoke. Pretty soon ma came in. Not my own mother; she died when I was a little thing, but this one, ever since my father married her, has made a pretty and pleasant home for me. As she walked along, I heard the soft rustle of her dress, and then I heard her sniff, sniff, and presently she said: 'I fancied I smelled smoke.' I held up my cigar, and confessed I had been smoking a little, off and on, for some time."

"Oh, is that so?" she said gently.

"Well, Johnny, I don't know that it would please me to see you smoking on the street or when we are out anywhere. I don't think I could bear that." And I said: "Certainly not, ma. You can depend on me." But I threw my cigar in the fire, having lost my enjoyment of it somehow, although she did not scold.

"Pretty soon my father came in and he said, directly: 'Ma tells me you have learned to smoke, my boy. Well, I suppose I ought to be surprised that you didn't learn sooner, but don't let me see you smoking around the house. And I said, 'Certainly not, sir,' and was glad he had taken it so pleasantly."

"Before the evening was half over, my Uncle Tom, who is my father's partner in business strolled over for a little chat, and as he took a seat and looked me over in a way he has, as if we were taking an account of stock, ma said, in her soft voice: Johnny has a new accomplishment since he went away. He has learned to smoke."

"Dear me! is that so?" exclaimed

Uncle Tom. 'Well, why boys will persist in burning up their hard earnings is a mystery to me; but you won't let me see you smoking about the factory, I hope. I shouldn't enjoy seeing my nephew and bookkeeper and prospective partner about the works smoking.'

"Uncle Tom is a great go-to-meeting man. One evening he asked me to go with him, and as I had no excuse to offer, I went. There was a collection, and Uncle Tom said to me: 'I used to use tobacco and beer, but since I left it off I have put what money I save in that way into the Lord's work, and it gives me more pleasure than I ever got from smoke or drink.'

"I will do that too, sir,' I said, 'I will follow so excellent an example for a year, and then if I am no poorer, I will keep it up as long as I live.' So I began saving my dimes. I had to go to church to put them in the box, of course, and in that way I became interested in the religion I heard preached, and concluded that I needed it as much as any one. So boys, I am a Christian and a church member, and I feel as if I had been getting on quite a little."

"I like your speaking out and telling us about it," said the jolliest young fellow of them all. "It gives me faith to believe that you have got hold of something worth having."

"All aboard for the North!" shouted Conductor Doane. And the next minute we were moving rapidly away, leaving the group still talking.—Mrs. Annie Preston, In Onward.

Telephoning to Dogs.

A French tourist relates that some time ago he set out to cross St. Bernard's Pass by himself, and got caught in the fog near the top. He sat on a rock and waited for one of the dogs to come and attend to him, but in vain, and when the fog cleared away he managed to reach the Hospice. On arrival he observed that he thought the dog a rather overrated animal.

"There I was," he said, "for at least six hours, and not one came near me."

"But why," exclaimed one of the monks, "did you not ring us up?"

To the astonished tourist it was explained that the whole of the pass is provided with shelters at short distances from each other, all in direct telephonic communication with the Hospice. When the bell rings the monks send off a hound loaded with bread and wine and other comforts. The dog on duty is told what number has rung, and he goes straight to that shelter.

This system saves the hounds their old duty of patrolling the pass on the chance of a stray traveller being found, and as the pass is for about eight months of the year under snow, this entailed very hard and often fruitless labor.—Baltimore Sun.

To accept the inevitable; neither to struggle against it nor murmur at it, simply to bear it—this is the great lesson of life—above all to a woman. It may come late or early, and the learning of it is sure to be hard; but she will never be a really happy woman until she has learned it.—Dinah Mulock Craik.

[Monroe, N. C., March 18, 1903.]

Dear Mrs. McKelway:

I will try to write you a letter as I have never written one to you. I like to read the little letters and stories for children in the Standard. I have five sisters. Three of us go to school every day and all of us go to Sabbath-school except the baby and she is beginning to walk and is so cunning. Miss Alice Norwood is my teacher and I love her very much. I have lots of missionary chickens and I sell all the eggs for missionary money I took twenty-seven eggs out of the nests today and sold them. Some of my hens want to set, but I want them to lay eggs all the time. I want you to print this letter to surprise Uncle Henry. I will send a Bible enigma, but if you think it is too long to print it I will just ask a question, Who was it Jesus told not to bother about other people's business, but to attend to his own?

Your little friend,
Sadie Belk.

Age 10.

This is the enigma, and I wish you would print it because it is the name of somebody we all love.

What Prophetess lived in a college in Jerusalem? Who was Jethro's son-in-law? Who played on a harp before a King? What nation was always called children? What is the second letter of the second book of the Bible? Who was David's grandfather? Who was at one time the oldest man in the world? The whole is the name of a beloved Pastor.

Your friend,
Sadie Belk.

The Green Marble.

By Mrs. F. M. Howard.

Mary Ellen loved marbles. She had a little yellow bag with a drawstring run into the hem, and she had more marbles in it than she could count, still she wanted more and when her mother called her in to do an errand for her that one day she begged for a nickel to buy marbles with, in payment.

"Run right along fast then," said Mrs. Pierson, "for Nora is in a hurry for the raisins." Mary Ellen had on her pretty pink dress with the ruffles over the shoulders, and a hat with long sash ends which streamed out behind her when she ran, so she felt very good and obedient, and skipped away so briskly that the wind carried her hat ribbons out like banners.

She gave her orders at the grocer's, then went into the drug store where a large jar stood on the shelf, filled with marbles. Her nickel would buy but five of the handsome glass ones which she liked, but as the druggist turned them out she found six that she was sure she must have, they were all so lovely.

"Which will you have?" asked the druggist. He was getting tired of waiting for Mary Ellen to choose between the green little hand, and another customer was coming.

"Please sir, I want them all," said Mary Ellen.

The druggist laughed, for he had had a little girl at home of his own. "Pick out the five you like best sissy, and drop the other into the jar," he said as he tossed her nickel into the drawer, and went to wait on the other customer. She was all alone, and the two marbles looked more and more beautiful as she tried to choose between them. Four had already been slipped into her pocket, and but one more was honestly hers.

Poor Mary Ellen, she had never taken anything which did not belong to her in all her life before, but—oh, they were so pretty—and there was no one there to see—and she turned and fled from the store with a very red face and with six marbles in her pocket. It was a very unhappy little girl who went slowly into the pleasant sitting-room where her mother was hemming the strings for her new white apron.

"Did you buy your marbles, Mary Ellen?"

"Yes, ma'am." All the marbles but one came out of her pocket.

"They are real pretty, but what ails you child? Does your head ache?"

"No, ma'am."

"Did you leave the order?"

"Yes, ma'am."

Mary Ellen went out to the barn and took the green marble from her pocket. It did not look nearly so green and pretty as it had in the store, and the little girl most heartily wished it was back there again, safe in the jar. A little girl friend came to visit her a few days later, and she gave it to her, hoping to lighten her mind of its trouble.

"Why," said the little friend in surprise, "It's the very prettiest one you have. I wouldn't think you would give it away."

"I don't care much for it," replied Mary Ellen with a thankful heart as she saw it going into her friend's apron pocket. A week after the little friend came back with the marble.

"I guess I don't want it," she said. "It is always rolling away and getting lost. I think it is home sick for you."

Mary Ellen tried to laugh at the funny idea, but with a very sick heart; she was again the unwilling owner of a green glass marble.

She tried to lose it, but some one would always come running with, "Here's your green marble, Mary Ellen," until she hated the very thought of it.

Mr. Sanborn, the druggist, was a friend of Mr. and Mrs. Pierson, and often came to the house for a friendly call, and Mary Ellen had always liked him and enjoyed his visits. She saw him at the gate one day and almost shrieked aloud, in her fear that he had come to complain to her mother of the wicked little girl who had come to his store and stolen a marble, and she slunk away as fast as she could and hid in the barn.

"Why, Mary Ellen, I was real ashamed of you," said her mother after the caller had gone, and the guilty little girl had come in.

"Mr. Sanborn likes to hear you say your verses, and I wanted you to sing that nice little song for him which you learned."

Mary Ellen hung her head and made no reply. She could never sing for Mr. Sanborn again she knew, with that naughty heart of hers throbbing so fast and hard, and after that she would go a block out her way rather than meet him or pass his store.

Mrs. Pierson awoke one night in alarm. Mary Ellen was moaning and crying in her cot, her face flushed, her hands hot with fever. "Don't take me to jail, please don't, Mr. Sanborn. I stole your marble, but here it is. The green one—" and then her heavy eyes opened to look up into her mother's anxious face.

"You will take it back to Mr. Sanborn, and tell him how sorry I am," she sobbed after the story of her naughty act was told, and all of the sorrow and shame it had cost her.

Mary Ellen was a very sick little girl for many days, and even after kind Mr. Sanborn had sent her a bag of cool, sweet oranges as a token of his entire forgiveness the green marble haunted her dreams. She never cared to play with her marbles after she was well again, and never, never, never did she take anything which did not belong to her.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

How Nancy Belled the Rat.

By Zephine Humphrey.

Rats had gotten into the cellar. Nancy's mother was greatly distressed over the fact. As for Ethel, Nancy's older sister, she declared she was frightened to death, and was forever mounting upon chairs and sofas when the thumping began below. She looked so pretty and so appealing as she stood thus, with her skirts gathered tightly about her, her lips parted and her eyes glancing to and fro, that Nancy's heart went out in a desire to help her. Nancy, too, felt a vague, traditionary horror on the subject of rats. It was not for nothing that she had generations of petticoats behind her. But her own petticoats had not yet reached the state at which this inherited tendency develops into principle, and she held her mind free from prejudice. When Ethel said, "Nancy, take the candles and go bring some apples from the cellar, there's a darling," Nancy shut her lips together tight and went. The sudden scurry and rush across the dark floor when her foot touched the stairs caused her heart to leap up in her throat; but Ethel wanted apples, and Nancy loved Ethel.

"If only we could catch one rat," said Thomas, the gardener, "and tie a bell to his neck and let him go, he would scare all the others away."

This theory interested Nancy exceedingly. In spite of the combined approval of the rest of the family, she had not been able to look with favor upon the large steel trap, with its cruel springs. After all, rats had their lives to live as well as chipmunks and rabbits. And at the sight of chipmunks and rabbits even Ethel said, "How cunning!" Where was the fine distinction?

But a bell now, that was different. Nancy held her breath at thought of the fearful joy of living in bed at night and hearing it ring through the cellar and up the walls. It made her shiver deliciously in anticipation. Moreover, the house would be cleared and peace restored to Ethel's mind without pain to the rats. She longed to have the experiment made. Thomas longed, too, though with a somewhat different longing from Nancy's; but all their desire and their bribes of cheese were vain.

"Never see such clever rats, never in all my life," said Thomas, disgustedly, as morning after morning he descended the cellar stairs, with masculine directness, and looked at his empty traps. He moved with such ease and freedom. Nancy stood back on the stairs, and watched him admiringly. Not once did she see him start and draw one foot up out of harm's way.

One evening Ethel sent Nancy downstairs for maple sugar. The rats had been unusually noisy since supper. They had thumped and scrambled and raced, till poor Ethel had taken up a permanent position on the end of the sofa, with her feet tucked under her, and even Nancy, catching the infection, sat cross-legged in her chair. It seemed to her at first that she could not go down cellar. When Ethel asked her, she looked up apologetically, and was about to refuse, when the woe-begone expression of her sister's face smote her, and she got down from her chair.

"You're never afraid, are you, Nancy?" asked Ethel, touched by a sudden thought.

"No," answered Nancy, bravely.

At the head of the cellar stairs she stopped and stamped her foot several times. A sudden hush ensued in the wide, dark realms below. Then she set her lips, and went down. The draught from the open door behind her made the candle flare and drip in her hand. Great unformed shadows went sprawling across the darkness which shut her in. The silence was almost harder to bear than the previous noise had been. She dreaded to cross the floor to the cupboard; she dreaded still more to return, with her back to the cellar's horrors, and the feeling of them over her shoulder goading her into reckless flight.

At the foot of the stairs she stopped suddenly and felt her heart stand still. In the middle of the floor sat a large gray rat, erect and calm attentive. She had never seen a rat before. It was a new experience. She understood at once that they were not pleasant and friendly beasts, like chipmunks. This one was a bold, sly fellow, and he watched her narrowly, with black and glittering eyes. She was very much afraid of him. She did not know what to do. But it was nothing less than distressing to stand there motionless, being stared out of countenance by him, and presently she moved her foot a little, experimentally. At that the rat, being prudent as well as bold, dropped down upon all four feet, and made a heavy lunge across the cellar floor. Nancy was much relieved. She started for the cupboard. But in an instant she stopped again. Either the rat had made a mistake in holes, and tried to enter where a smaller than he had gnawed, or else he had eaten so much in his forages through the cellar that he could not return the same way he had come; at any rate he was stuck fast, and half his body and the whole length of his fine gray tail remained on the cellar floor.

R. M. COFFEY, C. T. A.,
Charlotte, N. C.

Nancy stared at him a moment, aghast. Then—she never could tell how she did it, she was conscious only of a quick, confused succession of ideas—Ethel, a bell, Thomas, her chance—without pausing an instant, she stepped on the tail, and screamed. O, it was horrible to feel it squirming beneath her, that long, thin, wiry tail. There was no doubt now about the reality of Nancy's heritage of fear. It seemed as if all the nerves of all her lady ancestors shivered and shook in her body. Her candle fell from her hand, and went out.

"Mamma!" she wailed in the darkness.

"Mamma, O mamma, come quick!"

And Nancy's mother did come.

"Precious darling, what is it?" she cried, almost falling down the cellar stairs in her haste. "Yes, sweetheart, mamma's here."

She ran to Nancy, and would have caught her in her arms, but Nancy, struggling with her sobs, held her back.

"No, mamma, no! Don't touch me. I can't get off. Call Thomas."

Thomas, holding the lamp, was already in the cellar door. He had run at sound of the outcry.

"By George! Miss Nancy, you're a trump," he exclaimed, suddenly realizing the state of affairs. "Stay on it, Miss Nancy; don't move; you're a brave, brave girl. I'll go for the bell. Stay on it." And he started in haste for the barn.

A bad three minutes ensued. They seemed like half an hour; Ethel, at the head of the stairs, stood weeping, her skirts squeezed up in one hand.

"How can you do it, Nancy?" she cried. "I couldn't stand there for my life. How can you bear to do it?"

But Nancy's mother said, "Hush, Ethel," and, holding Nancy's hand in hers, she talked steadily and quietly about a number of things, as if there were nothing the matter. As for the rat, he could force himself neither backward nor forward, so he had to lie still, but he chattered with rage in his hole, and his tail wriggle, O, frightfully.

When Thomas arrived with the bell, it was a great question how to attach it. Nancy's foot was small, and the rat was a powerful fellow.

"If you could just slide up his tail a bit, Miss Nancy," suggested Thomas, "and get on with the other foot too."

That was no pleasant proceeding, but Nancy gripped her mother's hand hard, and slid. Then Bridget, the cook (the whole household was on the spot by this time), took the rat firmly in a pair of tongs, and drew him carefully backward. How he screamed with rage and fright! Nancy felt sorry for him, in spite of her own dismay.

With a piece of wire Thomas made the bell fast to the rat's neck; then he said, "Now, Miss Nancy!" and with a bound Nancy sprang into her mother's arms, safe, and the rat went free.

When they tried to praise her she only hid her face in her mother's shoulder. Then her mother, holding her closely, said: "Why of course Nancy wants to do the brave, right thing. We can always trust her for that." And a little later, when she lay in bed, still in her mother's arms, and heard a faint tinkling down below them in the cellar, she smiled in pure contentment.

"I saved your life, you rat," she thought, sleepily, "and I guess you'd better be thankful."—Exchange.

A TRAIN FOR MILLIONAIRES

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

Clippings.

Gen. John B. Gordon, of Georgia, tells this incident in The Ladies' Home Journal, of the time when President and Mrs. Cleveland were making a tour of the South shortly after their marriage. General Gordon was then governor of Georgia.

"During the day I said to the President: 'Mr. Cleveland, wouldn't you like to see a real old Southern mammy?'"

"'I certainly should,' he answered.

"'Then I will send out to the plantation for my old mammy. She has nursed four generations of our family.

"'Tom,' I said to the coachman, 'take the carriage, go out to the plantation, and tell Mammy to put on her best frock and come in with you; I want to introduce her to the Honorable Grover Cleveland, President of the United States.'

"Tom went, and I did not see anything more of him until the reception was nearly over. The President and Mrs. Cleveland with a few other guests were grouped in the center of the room, when I saw Tom peeping in at the door.

"Beckoning him to me, I asked: 'why doesn't Mammy come?'"

"Unhesitatingly he replied from the door: 'Mammy say she ain't comin' to see no Grover Cleveland. She's seen bigger men than he is. 'She's seen her Mars John, an' she ain't keerin' 'bout seein' no President ob de United States.'

"Everybody laughed, no one more heartily than the president.

"'Well, Mr. Cleveland,' I said, 'I reckon you never had anybody sit down on you like that before!'"

Von Blumer: "Of course. We passed an awful dull evening there, and it is nothing more than right that they should pass one here."—Brooklyn Life.

It was down South that a woman going one morning to call upon a friend was met at the door by the small boy of the family, who opened it for her politely.

"Good morning, honey," she said. "Is your mamma engaged?"

That was a poser, and the child thought for a moment, forgetting to invite the guest to enter.

"I flink," he said finally, having seriously considered the matter; "I flink she's married."—Exchange.

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

The Deeper Harmonies.

Upon the wakened wonder of my soul
The deeper harmonies of nature roll
And break; and yet their cold waves have but found
An empty shell wherein strange echoes sound.
When Faith lies shattered at proud Learning's feet
What is there left to render music sweet?
When all the sacred altars are in dust
What shrine can Science rear that man may trust?
This is the death-in-life, this is the woe—
That seeing all, yet we may never know.

***

To touch the veil with touch all powerless;
To find the field, and find it flowerless.
To see the fires of Hope all cold and dead,
Her holy temples all untenanted.
To sail all seas and find no beacon light;
To strike! to sink! in gloom and endless night.
This is the bitterness, yea, this the woe—
To know the journey, yet not where to go.

***

Yet, on the edge of this despairing hell
There comes a Voice assuring, "All is well."
"This dread, this doubt of thy brief earthly span Are part and portion of the Master's plan."
"His scales are just, beloved, have no fear,
And in their balances the righteous tear
Is weighty; and the deeds of love and truth
Are seeds that shrine the germ of endless youth."
"And, foolish child, herein thy error lies---
To seek immortal things with mortal eyes."

—George F. Viett, Norfolk, Va.

Event and Comment.

They say the best translation of the Bible into Chinese has been made by Shereshewsky. He ought not to have had much trouble with the Chinese language, or any other.

We shall have for our readers next week a sketch and a portrait of Dean Farrar of England and note here simply the fact of his death on the twenty-second of March. Thousands know him by his Life of Christ.

The Pennsylvania Railroad has banished card-playing and drinking from its trains. As a purely business matter this is striking testimony to the unpopularity of rowdyism and to the fact that these two pastimes too frequently result in rowdyism.

Bishop Gibson has recently "consecrated" Sharon Church, in Fairfax county, Virginia, which was once a mission where Phillips Brooks preached his first sermon. We should have thought that sermon would have consecrated it years and years ago.

The bill that failed in the last Congress to erect a statue of John Brown at Richmond is just a watermark on the receding tide of fanatical ignorance. And Robert E. Lee's statue is going into the Virginia Alcove in the Capitol at Washington, just the same.

Dr. Pentecost says that "the religious condition of the American population in Manila is simply shocking." Some allowance should always be made for the exuberance of Dr. Pentecost's imagination. Still there are many people whose religion is like flour. It does not stand transportation to the tropics.

The British and Foreign Bible Society, founded a hundred years ago, "amid the ridicule of politicians and under the frown of the Church," has just celebrated its centennial, and Prime Minister Balfour, who does not go back on his Scotch Presbyterian training, and the Lord Mayor of London, were glad to be there.

Bishop Muldoon was a little unfortunate in his quotation from Scripture the other day in welcoming the new Archbishop Frehan. He used the words of David to Nabal. "Peace be to thy house, and peace to all that is thine." In America it is not usual for even an Archbishop to have a family, no matter what the usual custom has been in Brazil or the Philippines.

The Cumberland Presbyterian calls for "a gain of 300,000 members in seven years." Arminian inconsistencies will crop out of conventional Calvinism. There is rejoicing in Heaven over one sinner that repenteth and the man who seeks to win one sinner to Christ for Christ's sake has a bigger motive than the man who wants to see 300,000 members added to his church. If regeneration is God's work we can leave results with him and do our work faithfully. And the Calvinist does not like to limit Almighty Grace to a few hundred thousand souls.

Says the Central Presbyterian: "A new psychology is one of the pretensions of liberalism in the Church." This is "important if true." We did not know that the Church had anything to do with psychology, new or old. "The principles of psychology are as permanent as those of physics." This is true, but unimportant, because the principles of neither science are permanent. Before the days of Galileo it was a principle of physics that a two pound ball of lead would fall to the earth with twice the velocity of a one pound ball of lead. And if the Central would read Schwegler's History of Philosophy it would find that there have been a few changes in the principles of psychology.

Saloon-keeping is an immoral business but still it is a business. The saloon-keepers of Terre Haute, Indiana have organized a total abstinence union among themselves. They think it necessary to have sober men behind the bar, whatever may be the condition of those in front of it. This is the universal tendency of the modern business world, insistence on the sobriety of employees.

Rev. Charles Stetzle, a Presbyterian minister of St. Louis, is soon to begin a work which is greatly needed in the North and West, the work of placing the claims of the working-men before the churches and the claims of the churches before the working-men. He is said to be admirably fitted for both tasks. Down this way there is no such separation between the working-men and the churches until the Northern agitator comes to tell about the chasm between them and to abuse the churches. The working-man knows that he is welcome and the churches know that they could hardly get along without him, even in the definition of the word, working-man, that makes the rest of us gentlemen of leisure.

North Carolina will have to copy the New York way of doing things the next time we want any temperance legislation. The New York Assembly has just passed a law raising the license taxes fifty per cent, on the theory that "it is better to tax liquor than to tax land." This will result in the closing of many saloons, and breweries connected with saloons. But the way the law was passed was the remarkable thing. Sixteen detectives were on hand to keep the liquor men from bribing the legislators with a fund of $150,000, raised for the purpose, and then the party managers herded their members in the legislative chamber, kept the liquor lobby with liquid refreshments from getting nigh them, and so passed the bill.

The Anglican Church is not the only one that is now feeling the heavy hand of the State. The French Government passed a law requiring all religious and educational associations to secure governmental authorization. This was especially aimed at the monastic orders which have been considered the danger centres for the Republic. Many of the orders have left France and lately several applying for government authorization have been denied. It is said that no such thorough proscription has taken place since the French Revolution. A State-Church sometimes results in a Church-State, to the dismay of the ecclesiastics. The more we know of American religious liberty the better we like it.

Senator Hoar recently paid this noble tribute to the Southern people and we hope the New Englander's estimate of the incorruptibility of Southern statesmen may continue to be a true one in the years to come:

"Although my life politically and personally has been a life of almost constant strife with the leaders of the Southern people, yet as I grow older I have learned not only to respect and esteem but to love the great qualities which belong to my fellow-citizens of the Southern States. They are a noble race. We may well take pattern from them in some of the great virtues which make up the strength as they make the glories of the free State. Their love of home; their chivalrous respect for women; their courage; their delicate sense of honor; their constancy, which can abide by an opinion or a purpose or an interest for their States through adversity and through prosperity, through the years and through the generations, are things by which the people of the more mercurial North may take a lesson. And there is another thing—covetousness, corruption, the low temptation of money, has not yet found any place in our Southern politics."

The Conversion of Contemporaries. The Central Presbyterian of March 25th closes an editorial arguing the truth of the universal salvation of infants, dying in infancy, with the following paragraph:

"The recent action of our Assembly, which construes the disputed sentence in the Confession of Faith in accordance with its own doctrine of the final judgment, so as to deliver us all from the odium imputed to other interpretations, ought to satisfy all our Church and put a stop to an agitation fraught with so much evil."

Well, an agitation that has brought the Central to take the affirmative side of the question, Are all the dead children saved? must have been fraught with good as well as evil. And as for the "odium," we are glad that the Central has begun to feel what it has helped, in some degree, to bring upon the whole Southern Church.

Let us refresh the memory of our contemporary. The Assembly of 1900 passed a deliverance, declaring that "The language of the Confession cannot, by any fair interpretation, be construed as teaching that any who die in infancy are lost." The same Assembly ordered the deliverance printed where it would do the most good, as a foot-note to the Confession. The Standard approved the action. If the matter had been allowed to rest then there would have been no "agitation." The Central and all our other Southern contemporaries raised such a hue and cry about the foot-note, most of the historical and constitutional arguments being false, that the Assembly of 1901 rescinded the foot-note. And now the Central is so much afraid of amendment that it says: "We much prefer additions to our symbols, that might strengthen our fortification against the enemy."

Moreover, this agitation precipitated the discussion of the question whether all the little dead babies are in heaven, or whether some of them may not be in hell. Actually that discussion has been going on for nearly three years in the Southern Church, and in this Twentieth Century. And the Standard is the only paper, as we can prove by abundant citations, that has held, without a shadow of wavering, that all who die in infancy are saved. In 1900 the Central adopted the theory that the Confession was silent because the Bible was silent on that question. The Christian Observer, of July 25, 1900, published the following:

"If the Scriptures leave it (infant damnation) an open question and our creed agrees with Scripture, we may be well content. We have sometimes wondered what would be the effect of our knowing definitely that any or all infants were certainly of the elect, and so, sure of salvation, if they died in infancy. Might it not lead thoughtless and worthless people to conclude that it is better to let these infants die, for by so doing they are sure of heaven?"

The Assembly of 1901, by reason of circumstances over which it hardly had control, not only rescinded the foot-note, but passed the "fifth resolution," reading: "While we have a well-grounded hope, founded on Scripture, that all infants dying in infancy are saved, yet the Confession of Faith goes as far as the Scriptures justify a credal statement upon this subject."

The same contemporaries applauded this resolution, the Central, specifically, declaring for the "agnostic position," on the subject of infant salvation. Two editors of the Christian Observer were members of that Assembly and one was a member of the Committee that brought in that resolution, and rather insisted on putting through the Observer view, though warned that the Standard would have several things to say about it. In reviewing the action of the Assembly the Observer wrote, a few days before the meeting of the Assembly of 1902:

"But since the Scriptures do not reveal whether this or that person, this or that class of persons, are elect and hence to be saved, the Assembly held that the Confession goes as far as the Scriptures justify a positive credal statement upon the subject, when it says that elect infants dying in infancy are regenerated and saved, etc., for all the elect are surely saved, even though we cannot positively assert beforehand who they are."

Of course the Scriptures do reveal the election of individuals, as the eleven Apostles, for instance, and especially of classes, namely, the two classes: those who believe in Christ and the little ones of whom Christ said, "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

Christ says of the one class: "He that believeth shall be saved," and of the others, "It is not the will of your Father in Heaven that one of these little ones should perish."

And then came the Assembly of 1902 rescinding the "fifth resolution" and giving its splendid testimony to the real faith of the Church, the unanimous deliverance that reads: "We are persuaded that the Holy Scriptures when fairly interpreted amply warrant us in believing that all infants who die in infancy are included in the election of grace and are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit."

That unanimous resolution caused the Observer to see a great light. The Central speaks of "a discussion pending in our church papers." The Standard has not been giving much space to this lately. But the Observer has at last opened its columns to the discussion as to the proposed amendment of the elect infant clause. And the Observer of July 3, 1902, (the reader will notice the dates) says:

"Without exception it may be said that Calvinists hold a well-grounded hope, a comfortable persuasion, or a definite belief, that all who die in infant years are assuredly saved."

Now, really that is all that can be reasonably expected of the Observer all at once—"well-grounded hope that all are assuredly saved." The last two words are meant to convey the idea of assurance, while the first two are an effort to "save one's face," as the Chinese put it. And now the Central comes out strong. The declarations of the last Assembly for which the Standard fought single-handed against the field, "ought to satisfy all our church and put a final stop to an agitation fraught with so much evil." Exactly. The Central, consciously or unconsciously, gets its line of argument from an article by Rev. W. I. Sinnot, in the Presbyterian Standard of May 14, 1902. Mr. Sinnot argued, as the Central now argues, that the Confessional doctrine of reprobation and of the persons judged for their sins excludes all infants. Mr. Sinnot quotes Dr. Stagg's discovery of the opinion of Dr. Twisse, the Prolocutor of the Westminster Assembly: "Every one that is damned is damned for his sin and that wilfully committed and contumaciously continued in by them that come to ripe years." And the Standard published that and announced it as a demonstration of Dr. Twisse's position, in 1900.

Says the Central now, dropping its theory of the "silence of Scripture and the Confession," and abjuring its "agnostic position:"

"The Confession of Faith teaches that at the judgment 'all persons who have lived upon the earth shall give account of their thoughts, words and deeds, and receive according to what they have done in the body, whether good or bad.' No candid reader can doubt that this refers to those of responsible age. We have not a single member in our church who imagines that it includes others. There is not a particle of occasion for amending the Confession, which maintains the same testimony all through. It does not contradict itself."

We are glad to hear of the conversion of individuals as well as of newspapers. "We have not a single member in our church who imagines that it includes others." We suppose the Central speaks with authority. We are glad that the brethren have repented who wrote (let names be forgotten):

"In regard to the children of unbelievers, especially the children of the heathen, it would be difficult to prove from the Scriptures that they are saved."

"Our cause for the careless indifference to personal religion on the part of some parents and to their presenting their children to the Lord is this very feeling that if they die young they are safe anyhow."

"As the Standards are now they are absolutely silent on that question, because the Scriptures are silent on it. We may hope that it is so, but the Scriptures do not declare it."

When the Psalmist says: 'The wicked are estranged from the womb, they go astray as soon as they be born speaking lies,' it does seem to imply the possibility that the children of the wicked perish with their parents."

"As to other infants who are outside the Covenant, there being no promise of God including them, we can make no affirmation concerning them."

Of course it follows, from the Central's argument, that if none of those of responsible age are condemned at the Judgment, then all are saved. And then note the thoroughness of our esteemed contemporary's conversion from its former doctrine of the doubtfulness of infant salvation:

"If the Confession of faith actually sanctions a doubt, we would be far from approving its language on the point. But an obscure sentence cannot be fairly used for the purpose, in the face of its positive adoption of the Bible as its guide."

The Southwestern has also been led to take a firm stand on this question.

In the person of Dr. Mallard, its editor-in-chief, it contributed an article to the Presbyterian Quarterly, in which the following language occurs:

"As for myself I believe in universal infant salvation; that is to say in the salvation of all infants, in pagan or Christian lands, dying in infancy, baptized or unbaptized, and I think I have by good and necessary consequence, warrant for that belief. . . . I infer from the word itself the salvation of all infants dying anywhere, baptized or unbaptized."—Rev. R. Q. Mallard, D. D., in Presbyterian Quarterly, July, 1902.

That points as straight as the needle to the pole. But there are spots on the sun and, as the Central intimates, an "obscurity" in the Confession. That obscure clause acts upon the Southwestern exactly as the sunspots affect the magnetic needle. But in spite of this occasional wabbling we think that the Southwestern may also be accounted on the side of universal infant salvation. Thus all our esteemed contemporaries may be considered as having professed conversion, more or less satisfactorily.

But the obscurity is admitted. A church's creed and a political platform ought, of all things, to be free from obscurity. The Central's present interpretation of the Confession logically makes the two phrases, "elect infants" and "dying in infancy," refer to the same class, the former phrase describing the latter and not defining what dying infants are saved.

And in this light the Central's objections to an amendment removing the obscurity, disappears. The amendment would not be an "admission of charges against our reformed churches," as much as the present form of the clause has been an occasion of slanders, from both without and within the Church. The "stigmatizing the Westminster Confession" has been done by those who claimed that it was silent or doubtful as to infant salvation, and the Central has been one of the stigmatizers. Dr. Stagg's "little book," will take care of the fame of the fathers. And really, it is not the fame of the fathers that should concern us as much as the good name of our Church to-day. We have given enough quotations, and they have been quoted elsewhere, to show that the elect infants clause has been the occasion of earning a bad name for the Church. It has been a "handicap to reason and conscience." The attempt has been made even to explain away the language of the last Assembly, "with which the Church should be satisfied," as "only a persuasion." Here is something that we claim cannot be explained away, which has received the commendation of some of the ablest minds in our Church, since its first publication:

"Infants dying in infancy, being included in the election of grace, are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit."

We defy any one to give a good reason why this should not become the written creed as well as the real creed of the Church; why this confession of our faith should not become a part of our Confession of Faith.

Mr. John R. Mott, of Student Volunteer fame, has just begun his third tour of the foreign colleges. He goes to Australia and New Zealand.

Crime and Punishment.

The patriotic people of North Carolina are rightly disturbed at the appalling frequency of the crime of murder. The ministers of Louisville, Kentucky, have been led to consider the same reckless disregard for human life and the same immunity from punishment, at least adequate punishment. The murder of the beloved and brilliant Gonzales has stirred South Carolina to its shame and to the sense of its apparent helplessness to prevent the crime or to punish the criminal. People are everywhere asking, What is the matter? What is the remedy?

We believe it to be the wrong idea in the minds of the people as to the relation of punishment and crime.

Crime is the breaking of human law. Sin is any want of conformity unto or transgression of the law of God. Some crimes are not sins, except as it may be a sin not to obey the law of the land. Some sins are not crimes. Human law makes those things crimes that have an evil effect upon society. In the definition of crime, in all the prohibitions of the law, the end is the protection of society. But punishment for crime is neither to reform the criminal or to protect his fellows. That makes punishment a mere matter of expediency and not one of justice and righteousness.

These two theories of punishment find many advocates among the shallow pated. It is affirmed, with a great show of wisdom, that hanging a man for murder will not reform him. It is sometimes argued in a court of justice that a man should be punished, merely as a warning to others. Neither of these theories satisfies the instincts of men. When a foul deed of shame or of blood has been done, the natural instinct of men asserts that the guilty man ought to be punished, and not that it is merely expedient that he should be punished. On that ground, if the fears of Caiaphas were justified, that the Romans would come and take away the place and nation of the Jews because of the claims of Christ, then it was right as well as expedient that Christ should die, for the protection of society. The heart revolts at such a travesty of justice. And the other idea, that a man should be punished in order to reform him is equally inadequate. We do not shake our heads over a murderer, his hands dripping with the blood of his victim, and say, The poor fellow needs reformation. We say, He ought to be hanged.

In other words, while much may be admitted as to making punishment reformatory as far as possible, as to making punishment work toward the protection of society from evil-doers as far as possible, the great fact remains that punishment is retribution. And if that theory is beginning to be lost from our courts of justice and our methods of dealing with criminals, we should not be surprised at either the outbreak of crime here, there and everywhere, or the occurrence of lynch-law, as the expression of the natural instinct of men which the theories and the methods of the law deny.

Punishment is retribution. The criminal is punished, not primarily that he may be reformed; not that society may be protected from his further crimes; not that others may be deterred from crime, although all these benefits may flow from just punishment. But the criminal is punished because he has done wrong and he ought to be punished. The just punishment of crime, because it is crime, is the best mercy to the criminal, as making his satisfaction to the outraged law; is the best protection against the repetition of the crime by the same criminal, and is the best deterrent to evil-doers

So, the best view of retribution is that which regards it from the Divine standpoint. Retribution is not selfish revenge. It is not even the satisfaction of human law save as that law possesses Divine authority. The human magistrate is the minister of God. God has said "Thou shalt do no murder," "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." The officer of the law, whether legislator, or jurymen, or prosecutor, or witness, or judge, or sheriff, who carries out that divine law as it has been put into human law, is not responsible for the blood of his fellow-man. He who is the Arbiter of life and death has taken that responsibility from the shoulders of the officers of the law. Responsibility is theirs and likewise guilt when they are untrue to the Divine law.

Then they are no more the ministers of God for the punishment of evil-doers and for the praise of those that do well. Then they bear the sword in vain, and law becomes an iniquity and punishment a farce.

In Defence of the Education Boards.

Some weeks ago The Congregationalist, Boston, criticised the General Education Board because of the lack of New England representation on it. The Charleston News and Courier is quoted by the Charlotte Observer as saying, "It is remarkable that those who are directing the movement are those who have largely participated in the missionary work of New England fanatics in this part of the country, and that their chief distinction in educational work has been obtained through the association which they have had with negro educational enterprises." The criticisms of the Observer and the News and Courier were called out by an incident whose truth is now denied, the participation of negroes in the dining at the Unitarian Club, at which W. H. Baldwin and Walter Page, of the General Education Board were present. The annual Educational Conference, the most important event in the educational affairs of the South, meets in Richmond this month. The News and Courier, after its savage criticisms, naively suggests that it is going to have a representative in Richmond to get at the truth about this movement. It would have been better if both the News and Courier and the Observer had showed that much enterprise before. And it is always better to get at the truth before making or quoting with approval such statements as that which we reproduce in the first paragraph.

We attended the Conference at Athens, Georgia, last April. We hope to attend the next one. There was not from first to last a syllable uttered that could offend the most loyal Southern man. The Southern speakers were too numerous to mention, but they included such men as Hoke Smith and Clark Howell and Emory Speer of Georgia, Barringer and Alderman and McIver and Small and Aycock of North Carolina, Harry Tucker and Fraser of Virginia, Dabney and Claxton of Tennessee, Massey of Alabama, and Fulton of Mississippi, and Oswald of Louisiana. Their very presence was a guarantee.

And the speeches from the North were all that one could wish in the way of sympathy and appreciation of the Southern point of view.

The only man on the Boards that we recall as connected with a negro institution is Dr. Frissell of Hampton. He is a Presbyterian minister and a scholar.

le also knows the Southern point of view and is as outspoken in commendation of it as it is possible for a man to be. In fact, the whole trend of the movement, the recognition of the futility of negro education as it has been conducted, in the main, and the great possibilities of the uneducated Anglo-Saxon children of the South has been so evident to all that are not blinded by prejudice that the "Africo-American" papers have been hostile to the movement as has been the Observer. Whether what is hoped for can be accomplished in the spending of large sums of money we do not know. But the movement means nothing but good to the South and the benefactions thus far have been made with such sympathetic generosity that the ignorant condemnation of the movement in Southern quarters, to one who has been at pains to study it, seems almost a crime.

Review of Contemporaries.

The Presbyterian Standard of Charlotte, N. C., says that "St. Patrick was a Presbyterian." There is much authority to the effect that "St. Patrick was a gentleman of credit and renown." The statement that he was also a Presbyterian had not been confirmed up to the hour of going to press.—Brooklyn Eagle.

If the editor of the Eagle had been as loyal to his Virginian and his Presbyterian ancestors as he should have been, he would have stopped the press until he could have looked the little matter up.

Attention is called to a communication of Rev. C. F. Vardell, president of Red Springs Seminary, which appears elsewhere in this issue, and in which he states that it is not true that Dr. Walter H. Page dined with negroes at the Unitarian Club in New York. Mr. Vardell, as the guest of Dr. Page, was also at this dinner, and he states that the negroes came in after the dinner was over to hear the addresses of the evening. In justice to Dr. Page, whom The Observer holds in high esteem, it is a pleasure to make this correction.—Charlotte Observer.

[And we take pleasure in making the same correction to our readers, merely adding that the Observer owes an apology also to the Southern Education Board which it has been berating on account of the incident which is now denied.—Ed.]

A Texas ruling elder, who does not betray his identity, has written a long, strong article to the Christian Observer, of Louisville, Ky., pleading for such a revision of the Westminster Confession of Faith as will make it declare positively that all infants dying in infancy are regenerated and saved. Answering the stock argument of the defenders of the Westminster statement on this subject that the expression, "Elect infants dying in infancy, etc.," does not imply that there may be non-elect infants who die, the correspondent uses an illustration which pretty nearly paralyzes that argument: "The Constitution of Texas, as it existed prior to the war, provided that 'All free male persons over the age of twenty-one years, etc. . . . shall be deemed qualified electors.' Now if this provision of the Constitution became pertinent, would any judge hesitate to rule that the language necessarily implied that there were, or at least might be in the state, 'male persons twenty-one years of age' who were not free, and to whom because thereof, the elective franchise was not thereby given? The war came on, the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution was adopted, and in the similar provision of the Texas Constitution of 1869, the word 'free' is omitted, leaving it to read: 'Every male person,' etc. Why? Because slavery having been abolished, and all male person twenty-one years of age having become free, there remained no necessity for the adjective formerly used to distinguish the free man from the slave. If it be true, as our church as a whole doth verily believe is taught by God's holy word, that all infants dying in infancy were given by the Father to the Son in the Councils of the Deity before the foundation of the world, as a part of the reward of his atoning sacrifice, then they are all elect, and the word 'elect' as a distinguishing adjective, has no more place in the section under discussion, than has the word 'free' in the provision of the present Texas Constitution on the subject of the elective franchise."—Cumberland Presbyterian.

The "Union Seminary Magazine" for February and March opens with "The Pastor Among His People," by Prof. T. R. English.—full of practical good sense. Archdeacon Bruce, of Monmouth, England, writes on "The Bible in Its Relations to the Personal Life." Dr. Wells of Wilmington, on the "Treatment of Despair," and Rev. W. McC. White, of Petersburg, discusses "The Evacuation of Eastern Virginia by the Presbyterian Church," Dr. D. J. Burrell writes on "Antichrist."

Says the Dominion Presbyterian:

"There is a good deal of lively sparring at times between Northern and Southern denominational papers, indicating that the animosities created by the war of the rebellion have not yet wholly died out. For instance, the North Carolina Presbyterian Standard pays its compliments to New England in the following fashion—the reference being to the question of African slavery: 'The New England record on that question is not one to be proud of. It was the original promoter of the slave trade, voted against Virginia and other Southern States for the perpetuation of slavery at a time when it might have been peaceably abolished, and then sold its slaves to the South after they had proved unprofitable in New England. It then became oppressed with the iniquity of Southern Slavery, began the agitation that ended in a fratricidal war, and urged the suffrage policy which Secretary Root has just admitted to be a forty year failure. Since the foisting of a helpless people upon the whole nation it has been much more liberal with theories than with charities and has furnished more salaried reformers than dollars for reform.' It will now be in order for some New England journal to retort that they don't lynch negroes in that section of the Union."

If there were fewer mixed marriages in Boston there would be fewer crimes in the South for which lynching is the punishment.

Book Notices

The Year-Book of Prayer, 1903. H. F. Williams, Editor. Published by the Committee of Foreign Missions, Nashville, Tenn.

This little booklet takes the place of the Missionary Calendar—in fact it is a calendar and booklet combined. It is gotten out in compact, attractive form, and will prove a valuable reference book to any missionary worker or student. It has an excellent cut of Dr. Rankin, and many other interesting illustrations.

"The Story of the Churches: The Presbyterians." Charles L. Thompson. D. D. Price, $1 00. The Baker & Taylor Company, New York.

Dr. Thompson, who is Secretary of the Board of Home Missions in the Northern Church has written a history—not for the student of Church History, but a record of the life and work of the Presbyterian Church in America, in its most essential features. The story is put into a few chapters for popular reading, and as such, is commended those who wish to know the share Presbyterianism has had in the progress of our country. It is probably as hard for the Northern writer of Church history to be absolutely fair to the South, as it is for the Northern writer of secular history, and in this case, as formerly, we have to be patient with the misconception.

"Not My Will, But Thine."

"I am not sent a pilgrim here,
 My heart with earth to fill;
 But I am here God's grace to learn,
 And serve God's sovereign will.
 He leads me on through smiles and tears,
 Grief follows gladness still;
 But let me welcome both alike
 Since both work out His will.
 The strong man's strength to toil for Christ,
 The fervent preacher's skill
 I sometimes wish,—but better far
 To be just what God will
 I know not how this languid life
 May life's vast ends fulfill;
 He knows,—and that life is not lost
 That answers best His will.
 No service in itself is small,
 None great, though earth it fill;
 But that is small, that seeks its own,
 And great, that seeks God's will.
 Then hold my hand, most gracious Lord,
 Guide all my goings still:
 And let this be my life's one aim,
 To do or hear thy will."

Heart-Keeping.

Heart-keeping is very much like housekeeping. There must be a continual sweeping out of dirt and clearing out of rubbish—a daily washing of dishes, and a perpetual battle with all sorts of vermin. If heart-cleaning could be done up once for all, then the Christian might discharge all his graces, and have an easy time of it. And just because the assaults of subtle temptations are so constant, and the uprisings of sinful passions are so frequent, and the task of keeping the inward man what it ought to be is so difficult, many a one who begins a religious life becomes discouraged and makes a wretched failure. The question with every Christian is: Shall these accursed Amalekites of temptation burn up all my spiritual possessions and overrun my soul? Shall outward assaults or inward weakness drive me to discouragement, and disgrace me before my Master and before the world? Or shall they drive me to Jesus Christ, who will give me the victory?
 —Theodore L. Cuyler, D. D.

One of the historic tragedies of the Alps is the story of the young English climber who refused to take a guide, and started for the summit of Mont Blanc alone. He was vigorous, clear-sighted, and untiring. The first night found him safely more than halfway to the top, and in the morning he was seen by observers below, climbing upward toward the upper ridges of the mountain. Then he passed out of sight—never to be seen again. What disaster befell his ignorant feet no man knows, or under what part of the eternal snows of the great peak his bones lie to-day. If they were found, the epitaph above them might be, "He refused guidance."

Let what is natural in you raise itself to the level of the spiritual, and let the spiritual become once more natural. Thus will your development be harmonious, and the peace of heaven will shine upon your brow; always on condition that your peace is made, and that you have climbed your Calvary.—Amiel.

Contemplate the love of Christ and you will love. Stand before that mirror, reflect Christ's character, and you will be changed into the same image from tenderness to tenderness. There is no other way. You cannot love to order. You can only look at the lovely object and fall in love with it and grow into likeness to it.—Henry Drummond.

The Bible in India.

Bishop Welldon, speaking of the Bible and its circulation in India, bears this testimony to the power of the Word of God:

"Since I have been in India, I have seen, more and more, how, amidst the paucity of missionary workers, as compared with the population of 300,000,000 souls, the Bible is still the one silent, universal, and irresistible missionary, upon whose influence the church can always depend."

The reports of the British and Foreign Bible Society show that the circulation of the Scriptures throughout India now averages a half million copies annually, and by far the largest number of these are purchased by Hindus and Mohammedans. There are undoubtedly more copies of the Scriptures in India than of any other book.

Population and Area.

Mr. John R. Mott calls attention to the population of India as more than double the number which Gibbon estimated for the entire Roman Empire at the climax of its power. The population is about 300,000,000, one-third of the human race distributed over an area of 1,560,160 square miles. Robert E. Speer says:

"If to the countries of the Roman Empire were added the whole of Germany, the Slavonic countries not included in Russia and Scandinavia, the resulting empire, in population and extent, would be but roughly equal to India. And Great Britain rules this."

Do not pray for easy lives! Pray to be stronger men! Do not pray for tasks equal to your powers. Pray for powers equal to your tasks. Then the doing of your work shall be no miracle. Every day you shall wonder at yourself, at the richness of the life which has come in upon you by the grace of God.—Phillips Brooks.

The Sultan of Turkey is awakening to the signs of the times. The missionary schools are drawing the bright minds of the empire, for even in Turkey the idea is gaining that education is power, and the Sultan realizes that he must keep step, and he has established 50,000 schools for girls as for boys.—Mission Studies.

The century has closed, and still the Saviour pleads with hands which were pierced for our redemption, pleads by His agony and bloody sweat, by His cross and passion, and by that coming of the Holy Ghost which is the inspiration and strength of missions, that His Church at last will rise as one man to obey His last command—yea, pleads with her that the measure of her love to her brethren may be nothing less than the measure of His own.—Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop.

President C. C. Tracy, of Anatolia College, comments thus: "What a loss to the church if Phillips Brooks had become a foreign missionary!" exclaims his biographer, after setting forth the vast influence of that great man among us. Hold! Let us think a moment. How much greater was Phillips Brooks than the Apostle Paul? And we too exclaim: "What a loss to the church—and the world—if Saul of Tarsus had not become a foreign missionary!" If he, or such as he, had not forsaken all to go and preach the everlasting gospel to benighted Europe, the following appalling losses, so far as we can see, would have resulted: the New Testament would lack three-quarters of the Acts of the Apostles, thirteen powerful epistles, and the most shining example ever seen since Christ himself; the Christian age would never have dawned in Europe; western civilization would never have been evolved; we should all still be heathen; there would have been no great Germany, no mighty Britain, no glorious America, no New England, no Boston, no Phillips Brooks! Who knows whether the final triumph of Christ's cause and kingdom might not have been hastened by half a millennium if Phillips Brooks had become a foreign missionary?"

The Resurrection.

1 Cor. 15, 20-21—50--58. April 12, 1903.

In the 15th Chap. of 1 Cor. Paul emphasizes the importance of the resurrection from the dead. He gives a summary of the doctrines of the Gospel that he had preached unto them and that they had received, including that of the resurrection. To those who denied the resurrection he shows the sad consequences that would follow if their view was true. He affirms that if the resurrection was false then Christ had not risen, their preaching was vain, their faith was vain, they were yet in their sins, the Apostles were false witnesses of God, those who slept in Christ had perished, and living Christians suffering for and maintaining a falsehood, were of all men most miserable. In our lesson the apostle presents several important and closely related subjects.

I. The Resurrection of Christ.—He declares "Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept." In the context he proves Christ's resurrection by referring to the number of competent witnesses who had seen Him after He arose from the dead. He claims that he had been seen by Cephas or Peter, repeatedly by all the Apostles, by James, by about 500 brethren at one time and last of all by Himself. He affirms that many of these witnesses acquainted with Christ's person were still alive and ready to testify. Paul dwells upon the resurrection of Christ and maintains it as a vital doctrine for a number of reasons. It was needful to prove the truth of Christ's claims. He claimed to be the Son of God and the Redeemer of men and he predicted that He would rise from the dead. Had he not risen, His claims would not have been verified and He would have been deemed an impostor. His resurrection was essential to demonstrate the acceptance of His Redeeming work by God the Father. His resurrection places upon His obedience and atonement in man's behalf the seal of the Divine approval. Christ's resurrection is also essential to guarantee the resurrection of His people and to assure them of salvation and of immortal glory.

II. The Resurrection Body.—The Apostle affirms "That flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." Man's present physical nature is not fitted for the kingdom of glory. Paul then in the text and context shows that all Christians whether dead or living at Christ's second advent shall experience a radical change in their bodily nature. Their bodies now corruptible shall be rendered incorruptible. While now mortal they shall become immortal. Though they are "sown in weakness they shall be raised in power." Though "sown in dishonor they are raised in glory." Though "sown a natural body," suited to a fallen soul and an earthly habitation, "it shall be raised a spiritual body," adapted to a holy nature and a heavenly home. The resurrection body of believers shall be patterned after that of their risen Lord. "He shall change our vile bodies and make them like unto His own most glorious body."

III. The Victory Through Christ.—At the resurrection, "Death is to be swallowed up in victory." Each triumph over sin and temptation on earth is to be won through Jesus Christ. But the final victory over sin, death and the grave is to be attained by each believer through our Divine Redeemer when He comes to raise the dead and judge the world. Then shall all Christ's ransomed people join in the gladsome chorus, "O Death where is thy sting? O Grave where is thy victory." The sting of death is sin and the strength of sin is the law, but thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

Great thoughts go best with common duties. Whatever, therefore, may be your office, regard it as a fragment in an immeasurable ministry of love.—Westcott.

The Sacred Sabbath.

Matt. 12: 1-13. Topic for April 19.

"The Sabbath is to be sanctified by a holy resting all that day, even from such worldly employments and recreations as are lawful on other days."

How much these words mean! How little are they observed in these days of commercialism! One who emphasizes their truth runs the very imminent risk of being called "an old fogy." Below is copied a few paragraphs from a book written a little more than sixty years ago, but which is read very little nowadays except by theological students, but which ought to have a place in the literature of every home.

Speaking of how the Sabbath is to be sanctified, it says: "The Sabbath is not a means of conveying spiritual blessings, as the Word sacraments are. It is a holy season—a time set apart by God for the purposes of his worship, at which he hath promised particularly to bless his people, to meet with them in their assemblies, and to make his goodness pass before them. The Sabbath may, then, be said to be sanctified, inasmuch as it is set apart by Divine appointment for the worship of God, that it may be kept holy to him.

The Sabbath is to be sanctified by a holy rest, which is the meaning of the word Sabbath.

On this day we must rest from all worldly employments, or from all seivile work; by which we are to understand anything done for our worldly gain, profit or livelihood, which by prudent management might have been done the week before, or might be left undone till the end of the Sabbath.

Connected with worldly employments, from which we must rest on Sabbath, are ploughing, sowing, reaping, bearing burdens; buying and selling; working at one's ordinary calling; finding one's own pleasure; reading newspapers or profane history; studying the arts and sciences; writing letters about worldly business or making up bills or accounts; unnecessary journeying on this day; walking in the fields or highways for pleasure or diversion; making use of beasts for pleasure; speaking of the public news of the country, which is a frequent topic of conversation among those who are not spiritually minded; conversing about trade, bargains, profits and losses; feasting and visiting of friends; and unnecessary preparation of food. Now as this is one of the commandments of the moral law, it must be as strictly binding on us as on those who were before us. The law of God is equally holy, just, and good at all times; and God is as strict in demanding obedience now as he was formerly.

On this day also we must rest from those worldly recreations which are lawful on other days. By worldly recreations we are to understand worldly pleasure unconnected with worldly gain or profit. Those which are unlawful on this day are such as these:—visiting of friends; talking about the news of the day, or about public occurrences; innocent amusements, (for there are many which are highly sinful even on other days); travelling about worldly business, and such like things; together with several of those before mentioned, which may be referred to as recreations as well as to worldly employments. We may here remark, that worldly recreations tend to alienate the mind from the true work of the Sabbath, as much as, if not more than, worldly employments.

Moreover, if our recreations are to be the same as they are on other days, why specify the Sabbath as a day of rest?—why make any difference between it and the other days of the week?"

How many of us observe the Sabbath in anything like the way above taught? But then Mr. Alexander Smith Paterson lived sixty years ago and we are living in the first years of the Twentieth Century.

Life is not so short but that there is always time enough for courtesy.—Emerson.

Outline Bible Study—Galatians, Ch. III: 15-29.

To get a clear idea of Paul's argument in these verses two things must be kept in view: 1, that the Apostle is steadily pursuing one of the main objects of this epistle, to show that "a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ," ch. 2:16; 2, that the Apostle wants to show this in such a way as not to disparage the law, but rather to bring out the high place and usefulness of the law. Compare Ro. 3:31.

Vers. 15. "If it be confirmed." In what very solemn way was the promise which God made to Abraham confirmed? Heb. 6:13-17, Gen. 22:16-18.

Vers. 15. "Thy seed, which is Christ." This promise is usually called a Messianic promise—to how many representative persons in the Old Testament, besides Abraham, were these Messianic promises made, and will you name them? Gen. 3:15, Gen. 26:4, last clause, Gen. 28:14, last clause; 2 Sam. 7:16 and Is. 11:1, 10.

Vers. 17. "430 years." Light is here thrown on the same period mentioned in Ex. 12:40. Was the bondage in Egypt 430 years, or was it 430 years from Abraham to the Exodus? How is the correct view on this point strengthened by a study of Num. 26:59, Exod. 6:16, 18, 20?

Vers. 18. "It is no more of promise." Understanding that the word "inheritance" in this verse means spiritual inheritance, i. e. salvation promised to Abraham and his seed, can you state the Apostle's argument in vs. 15-18?

Vers. 19. "Wherefore then serveth the law?" The conclusion from vs. 15-18, is that salvation is not by the law—what then is the use of the law? See 1, "Because of transgressions." See this explained more fully in Ro. 3:20, last clause, Ro. 3:19; 2, "Till the seed should come," this is more fully stated in vers. 24 below. "Ordnained by angels." Who then had a part in inaugurating both, the Mosaic and the Christian dispensations? Dent. 33:2, Ps. 68:17, Acts. 7:53, Luke 2:9-14.

"In the hand of a Mediator." Who was the Mediator in the giving of the law? Exod. 20:19. How does this show the superior glory of the gospel? 1 Tim. 2:5, Heb. 3:1-6.

Vers. 21. "If there had been a law which could have given life." Instead of giving life, what is the effect of the law upon a sinner? Ro. 7:10.

Compare previous studies on ch. 2:16, ch. 3:10.

Vers. 24. "The law was our schoolmaster." In what two ways was the law a preparation for the gospel of Christ? 1. See Ro. 3:20, last clause, 1 Tim. 1:15; 2, see Heb. 10:1, first clause, Coloss. 2:17, Heb. 8:5, first clause, Heb. 9:23, first clause, Jno. 1:45.

Vers. 27. "Baptized into Christ." Does this refer to water baptism, or regeneration? Compare Titus 3:5 last two clauses. What light is here thrown on the much controverted passages, Coloss. 2:12, Ro. 6:4?

Vers. 28. "Neither . . . bond nor free, male nor female . . . all one in Christ." Show 1, in what respects all Christians are on a level—"one in Christ Jesus," Eph. 4:2-5, Phil 2: 2-5, Ro. 2:11, Prov. 22:11, Jas. 2:1-4; 2, in what respects the Bible recognizes social distinctions and differences of sex and age, Ro. 13:7, 1 Tim. 2:11-12, 1 Tim. 5:1-2.

Vers. 29. "If ye be Christ's." What special benefits are here mentioned which flow from the relation of believers to Christ? vs. 26, vs. 27, last clause, vs. 28, last clause, vs. 29, last two clauses.

"Then are ye Abraham's seed." How does this bear on and sum up the Apostle's argument from vs. 6 throughout this chapter?

Nazareth.

You chose, dear friend, for your letter my trip to Nazareth, that place of holy association, and here I am this Saturday, March 7, 1903, actually sitting in a native home in Nazareth; as far as I know the only American within ten miles.

At a tiny table, a foot high, are squatting all the members of the family, father, mother and children on a rug, this, we might say, constituting the chief living room, as the whole house is one large, lofty room with no partitions. It is pine with white wash inside, has a large couch around part of one side, probably the bed by night, a small wardrobe and—a good sight to the eyes, a book case, with a few books, chiefly religions. There is an arched alcove under the ceiling where seems to be the supply of provisions, as there are various bags and baskets of eatables. On the large round tin waiter on the tiny table are cakes of black bread, made of flour and water only, a dish of something like clabber and one of stewed vegetables.

With no knives or forks or plates they are merrily, with much chatter, making the food vanish rapidly. Most cordially have I been invited to partake with them but my lunch is just over and prefer taking these "notes by sight." Do you wonder how I got here, and how I happen to be alone in Nazareth? I am alone because a Southern Presbyterian training has a way of gripping the conscience in such a fashion that Sunday sight-seeing does not become holy by being in a holy land. My party went on to the lake of Galilee but I remained here for two days because it would have been necessary to come back on a four hour's drive to-morrow. My mind is rather bewildered on the question, for preachers had no scruples; but they were not raised on the Shorter Catechism, and this little glimpse of real life repays the sacrifice. My getting here was on this wise: wandering along hunting for something Protestant, somebody English in speech, I saw the words "Bible Depot" over a little shop. What a blessed word that "Bible" was! Within was a man past middle age, whose homely face glowed with fellowshiping love of the Master as he talked to me. His pretty daughter, a teacher, though only fifteen, a graduate from a missionary school, came in and was able to talk English with a charming properness of speech. With quiet hospitable dignity Mr. Elias Rizek invited me to his home, a ten or fifteen minute's walk; through the rain we plodded on up muddy hills, all the discomforts forgotten by me in the joy of such an opportunity.

There were six younger children at home—there is a boy in Jerusalem at school—and the affection between the father and the little ones was very sweet, especially with the bright-eyed baby girl. Mrs. Rizek is also a graduate of a mission school and she was as hospitable as if I had been an invited guest; the way "Welcome" was repeated was worth all the polite conventional reception speeches I ever heard. An old blind sister, when she was told of the Christian from America, groped her way to shake hands too. She had been eating olives—the black ripe ones—and trying to warm her hands over a small handful of coals on a little clay or metal brazier, their only fire on a day of damp, penetrating chill. We are shivering in all our winter clothes and wraps, these poor people are in their cotton garments except some worn coats and cloaks. Yet they are evidently happy, though in my further conversation I caught some notes of the struggle for such a family. The young daughter had intended to finish at Joppa at a higher school, but there was a cholera quarantine against this section, so when she was taken there by her father, she could not enter and on their return she took a school without pay because as he explained: "They had been good to me for she went five years to the school and they charged only a napoleon a year, ($5.00, I think) so I said she teach for you for nothing." She has a Sunday-school class tomorrow at some distance from her church; and her father walks an hour and a quarter—nothing is by miles—to Nain and holds service and preaches, though not an ordained preacher. He has been in this little Bible store thirty-three years at a small salary, yet is educating his children and of love for God's Kingdom proclaims the truth from Sunday to Sunday. He has a half-holiday Saturday and used it up guiding me to the various places I desired to visit, waiting with patient courtesy for me, willing to go an hour or so more and all from Christian kindness; for he did not desire to take the money I pressed upon him. Nor did his children say "Baksheesh," or look it even; on the contrary the daughter asked me to accept a piece of lace edging she had made. The variety, the exceeding wonderfulness of this is not to be appreciated in America; from Madeira through Algiers, Greece, Turkey and Syria the children learnt to hold out their hands and cry "Baksheesh" or its equivalent, before they learn "Da da" or "Govgov" and there is no difference between Moslem, Roman Catholic, or Greek Catholic; but Protestantism and the English language are not good soils for its support.

I have mentioned the "Orphanage" in which Mrs. Rizek and young Fareeda Rizek have been trained; I have been all over it to-day and have been more impressed with what it is doing and manner of it than with all the cathedrals and mosques and palaces and museums and antiquities of the whole trip.

The grounds are large, the buildings quite extensive on a most commanding situation, so commanding that there are almost impossible climbs before the visitor reaches the foot of the hundred and eight steps leading up to the porch.

There are seventy orphans, all that can be accommodated or supported, there being already a hundred applications on their books and their hearts ache over the ones they must refuse. The little lady who took me around and who had been in the work many years was kind enough to show me every room from parlor to kitchen. One room was the clothes room where all the garments not in use must be kept, each being numbered, the dresses for Sunday hanging on the wall, the slippers on shelves on one side, the other things in locked cupboards. Of course there is a uniform to avoid all feelings of discontent or vanity, and neat and warm were the brown dresses also the red-lined capes. Each dress must last five years, two years for nice, two for school, one for the Saturday work, to accomplish this they are cut down from big to little, patched and renovated most carefully. For the outer wants they have the wooden clogs on which they clatter about wonderfully fast. For their head-gear there is a winter handkerchief and a summer one. Do you wonder why I tell you so much about their clothing? Because I want to tell you that each orphan is dressed on 10 shillings a year; think of two and a half dollars, the price of a rather cheap pair of shoes, clothing a child for four seasons! "It takes close economy and much carefulness, but we wish them to learn such lessons, and we give them what we have," was the teacher's remark when I showed my surprise.

Each larger girl has a little girl under her charge, whom she must care for as an older sister would, and the girls do all the work, only one servant, a cook, being employed for that large household. As it was Saturday I had the pleasure of seeing the older girls at their work, and the dear little ones at their play. They played two Arabic games in which the motions were most graceful and accompanied with impromptu songs, for they often improvise as they play.

Monday, March 9,—such a rare day spent where my Lord dwelt for nearly thirty years! "As His custom was," we also went up to worship, attending both the Arabic and the English services. I could not understand the words of the former, but I could understand the expression of devoutness on the faces of the congregation and the earnestness of the pastor's manner. But oh! the blessedness of that Episcopal service, in a strange land! How all denominational lines fade away in a country not Christian; we are fighting shoulder to shoulder there. A North Carolinian, Mr. Strange, helped in the service, selecting the two passages most appropriate for the two lessons: "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me," in Isaiah and all about the life of Jesus in Nazareth and His visit to the synagogue. Never had they seemed so real before.

When, on Friday we were guided through the vile streets (the gutter a hollow in the middle filled with the refuse, the side walks wretchedly narrow, steep and unpaved), to the supposed holy places, "a true church of the Annunciation," being duly claimed by both the Romans and the Greeks, I felt almost sorry I had seen Nazareth the disillusioning was so painful. One church had a tiny cove up several flights of weak steps which we were told was the Virgin's kitchen. Our question about the Egyptian darkness was thus answered: "The light emanating from the Holy Mother of God illuminated the room and we can prove it was her kitchen for there is a hole in the roof for the chimney." With derisive laughter we proceeded to Joseph's carpenter shop and by small wooden doors in the floor of the church saw part of the original walls or floors. So much for the Roman Catholic; in the Greek Church of the Annunciation they gloat over the possession of the Virgin's Fountain, a tiny round place from which you can get a drink of water. Mary certainly drank of this water for it is the only spring in the place, but there is no telling where the fountain conveyed from it, or the village, stood. There is a fine one not far away and there we saw the maidens with their water-pots.

There are two or three Rocks of Precipitation, there is a building on the site of the synagogue where He was rejected, and there is one church with a large rock said to be the table on which Jesus and His disciples ate before and after His resurrection. With a disgusted feeling of disappointment over such absurdities I retired Friday night, but in that church Sunday hearing a most spiritual sermon from one of our party—Dr. Dunlap, a Presbyterian—listening to the sweet choir of girls from the Orphanage, looking upon the noble missionaries and native Christians, I realized with awe the truth of the last hymn:

"We saw Thee not when Thou didst come
To this poor world of sin and death
Nor e'er beheld Thy cottage home
In this despised Nazareth;
But we believe Thy footsteps trod
Its streets and plains, Thou Son of God."

Still more did I realize it as I stood in a storm on the hill above the Orphanage for I knew He had looked again and again upon that scene, but as I watched those orphans in their evening service singing "We are little ones of Nazareth," praying with touching reverence the God's Prayer, reciting the creed in heart-felt tones, repeating Bible promises with glowing faces, I knew my Master still walks the streets of Nazareth, that His presence is there in more power than of old "for even His brethren believed not on Him."

Who wants to take one of these the least of His little ones here where He a little boy once became poor that we might become rich? Only $35 a year will feed, clothe, educate, train for usefulness an orphan, thirty-five dollars, the cost of a piece of jewelry perhaps, or a reception costume. Who would like to set a light in a school or home in Palestine?

This letter is getting too long, but I cannot close without mentioning a visit at night to the elegant home of the old Arabic pastor, a noble man, well reputed everywhere we go. Its lofty sitting room had a small organ on which his daughter played while her brothers accompanied her on the violin and mandolin and the whole company sang Arabic and English hymns.

One of our party asked this courteous gray-haired gentleman many questions about Palestine—its condition, religiously, socially, politically, past, present and future, and we found him a whole treasure-house of information. A sweeter, more intelligent family circle, I never saw; "by the grace of God," to use his own expression, his father had found the light when he himself was a small child and here gathered were three or four generations of Christians.

With a closing prayer we sang, (Syrians and Americans) "Blue Galilee," and all the long ride through the bare, rocky hills, by the mud villages, through the guagmire of the plains, have the words rung on,

"O, Galilee, sweet Galilee,
Where Jesus loved so much to be."

With warm affection,

The Latin Thesis.

The majority of our Presbyteries postponed action upon the Latin Thesis until the spring meeting, and it is soon to be acted upon, deciding perhaps for another decade or score of years that our candidates for the ministry shall be required to put into a dead language a discussion meant for a set of men who are at least supposed to be alive and in touch with the modern world. The candidate prepares an elaborate and thoughtful discussion upon the thesis given him by his Presbytery; but when he attempts to put it into Latin he finds that his vocabulary, acquired by six or eight years of reading Latin history, philosophy and poetry, is sadly deficient in theological terms, and so he hunts up some old Latin Theology and begins to read it; but he is perhaps near the close of his seminary course and has many other pressing calls upon his time: so he ends by cutting down his "discussion" to two or three pages of familiar arguments, a mere outline that he would have been ashamed to hand up as a composition to his teacher in English ten years before. This discussion is referred by his Presbytery to a committee of two or three and is probably read by only one, who, if he happens to be a Professor of Latin in one of our church colleges, will probably report to Presbytery that, if it is meant as a test of the candidate's knowledge of Latin, he cannot recommend its approval, and that if it is meant to test his ability to discuss exhaustively an important theological question, the Presbytery could not judge from the "thesis" that the candidate was a deep thinker, or would "edify" an intelligent and cultivated audience. But just here some good Elder who sympathizes with the candidate, moves that "the examination be sustained," and the vote is practically unanimous, this showing that the "Latin Thesis" is regarded by all as a pious but pedantic farce.

The purpose of the "thesis" is defeated by making it a Latin one, and it becomes a test of nothing "in the heavens above, or the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth." Because we have been required to go through such an "initiation," we think perhaps we will "get even" with our predecessors, by requiring our successors to go through the same; like the students at a boarding school who haze the "new" students because they were hazed when they were recruits.

But some cry out that we would "lower the standard for the ministry." Not by one iota; for the preceding paragraph in the section (132) requires that the "Presbytery shall try each candidate as to his knowledge of the Latin language." On the contrary it will be raising the standard by making the discussion a real test of the candidate's ability to prove conclusively the thesis on some common head of divinity.

But a nervous fear of "revision" is leading many to vote against "touching" our standards at any point. If our fathers had acted thus, and if we should keep on acting thus, we would soon have a set of standards, so archaic and impractical as to be of no real use to us, and many would be in favor of a sweeping revision, or a "new working creed." Shall we change one little point at a time, such as the "Latin Thesis" and "elect infants," and thus keep our standards in harmony with the intelligence and practical needs of our church, or shall we "refuse to touch" them until we shall be classed by all practical people with our Primitive brethren who still think it necessary to "wash one another's feet," in order to be disciples of Jesus?

"The letter killeth, the spirit giveth life." Shall we have the life which comes from following the spirit and real purpose of our law? Or, shall we die clinging to the letter of a dead language?

Detering the Candidates.

By One of Them.

The only encouraging fact in connection with the continued falling off in the number of ministerial candidates is the concern on the part of leaders in Church life and the very general desire on the part of men and women everywhere to have the conditions changed. Many wise men have said wise things in reference to the causes of the present distress and a few reassuring ones would have us believe that the situation is not as bad as it has been represented. Even if the condition is not alarming it is discouraging and in addition to what has been said by older heads a few words from one of the candidates may not be out of place.

In the city of ——— there is a preacher of good education and average ministerial ability and of pleasing personality. This brother has been without a Church for more than three years during which time he has been compelled to engage in other work, though he has made all proper efforts to be located.

In another city near by there is a preacher of more than ordinary ability who has held several posts of honor in the Church. For good reasons this brother gave up the work in which he was engaged and intended to accept a pastorate in another locality. More than a year has passed and he is still without any definite charge.

A professor in one of our Southern colleges who is an ordained Presbyterian preacher has stated on several occasions that it is his desire to return to the pastorate. He is a good preacher and writes several letters after his name. More than one Church in the Synod in which this brother resides is vacant and some of them have been vacant more than twelve months. Any one of the Churches would do well to secure the services of this man and yet both the Churches and the man remain unsettled.

A small Church in ——— Presbytery which pays its pastor twelve hundred dollars per year was without a pastor nearly a year. During that time more than fifty men were recommended to the session by friends and twenty men wrote direct to the session to say in substance if not in words, "I think I would suit your people." The man finally chosen did not come from the list of applicants or those recommended.

One of the leading Churches in the Southern Assembly was vacant for more than two years, during which time the work suffered greatly. When a pastor was finally chosen it was done in such a manner as to cause those who knew the inwardness of it to grin. Another Church of equal importance having been vacant more than a year, the congregation declines to elect a pastor or to make any effort to secure one for the reason that a certain man wants to become pastor of the Church and some of the leaders are not willing to have the matter come to a vote.

In the city of ——— the Rev. Dr. ——— resigns his charge as pastor of ——— Church and gives as his reason for so doing "the uncertainty of support." In the explanation which follows the statement is made that too often the minister is compelled to move a long distance only to find after he has located that a few persons in the congregation can and do set about to make it desirable for him to move further on.

A statement comes from a not very reliable source that in the Northern Assembly there are one thousand vacant Churches and two thousand "vacant preachers."

These instances are mentioned from a number which have come to the notice of one candidate unsought and could be multiplied many fold. Undoubtedly the man whose call is clear should set his face like a flint and press toward the mark, ever repeating "none of these things move me." But during the period of transition, which candidates must pass through, these things are disheartening.

There should be a plan adopted by Presbyteries or Synods or the Assembly for the bringing of men and Churches together. It is possible to have this done and it seems high time we were about it.

Northern Correspondence.

As an educational center, Princeton enjoys special advantages. Prominent speakers and eminent ministers are attracted to this place from various causes. As a result of this the students and people have enjoyed a rich feast this season in the way of excellent preaching, instructive lectures, and entertainments of a high order.

Among the eminent divines who have occupied the pulpit of Miller Chapel, the Seminary Chapel may be mentioned: Rev. Neal L. Anderson, of Montgomery, Ala., Rev. Chalmers Martin, D. D., President of Pennsylvania College for Women, Pittsburg, Dr. Wallace Radcliff, Washington, D. C., Dr. Henry Van Dyke of the University, and Dr. Francis T. Patton, President of the Seminary, Revs. Dr. Jas. I. Vance, Henry Van Dyke, Prof. Jno. De Witt, Dr. Smith of Harrisburg and Bishop Foss of the M. E. Church, Philadelphia, have addressed the students of the University. Y. M. C. Associations are maintained both among the students of the University and Seminary. Prominent among lay speakers to address the associations were Mr. Robert E. Speer, one of the secretaries of the Foreign Board of Missions. His theme was "The Inner Life." Prof. A. T. Ormond of the University spoke at the last meeting of the Seminary Association on "Plain Morality." These addresses were sound, practical and impressive. Prof. Ormond spoke from a layman's standpoint of view, and for that reason to the greater advantage of his audience. The last one of these addresses was before the students of the University Association by Dr. Henry C. Minton of Trenton, Ex-Moderator of the General Assembly.

Princeton is thoroughly conservative in belief and teaching, both in the Seminary and University. President Patton may be accepted as the exponent of Conservative Theology in these institutions. A few Sabbaths ago he delivered a masterly discourse in the Seminary pulpit on the "Person and Deity," of Christ. No doubt the discussion was induced by the recent Delilzsch-Kaizer Wilhelm controversy. In any event, it was a strong problem in defence of the Deity of Jesus Christ, delivered in the most convincing and pleasing manner. The sermon was heard by an appreciative audience and left a splendid impression. The Doctor is a prince among preachers.

President Woodrow Wilson gives general satisfaction in his new position and is growing more popular each day. He is one of the fine students of the South, and already has taken rank as among the leading educators of the day. There are about 175 students in all attending the Seminary. The Ninety-first Annual Commencement will be held May 5. Rev. Dr. Duffield of New York is to preach the annual sermon. Dr. McEwen of Pittsburg, his alternate. The attendance at the University numbers over 1,300 students. It is reported about 50 students failed to pass examination at the end of last term. This indicates either that the standard of the institution is rising, or the ability of a certain class of students is falling.

Ex-President Grover Cleveland, celebrated his sixty-sixth birth-day on the 8th of March. He will not give the proposed lectures before the University students this year on "Public Affairs." But will leave about April 1, for the West, to attend the opening of the Exposition at St. Louis. No doubt he will meet President Roosevelt there. This will afford them both fine opportunity to confer together as to which one it will be best to become President next term. Taken in order of rotation it would be "Grover's" turn next time.

An entertainment and instruction course of "Illustrated Lectures on Biblical Geography" was exhibited in Miller Chapel in February. Two of these illustrated lectures were given by Rev. Putman Cady of New Amsterdam, N. Y. These consisted of views taken by himself of the "Dead Sea," and scenes along this "Jordan Valley." Mr. Cady successfully explored the East bank of the Dead Sea. He exposed himself to many hardships and dangers to get these views, so that his pictures are entirely new.

Prof. Wm. Tibbey of the University, gave the second part of the course. His views were mostly of "Jordan Valley" and "Pelia." He presented a great variety of views upon "Pelia," its old temples, the valley and surroundings. These views were the most magnificent we have ever witnessed. It is stated Professor Tibby delivered these lectures recently before the British Geographical Society. This course of lectures constitute a fine series of entertainments for any congregation, or society, fortunate enough to enjoy them. It is a delightful method of studying sacred Geography.

Rev. W. A. Shedd of Persia, gave a course of lectures on "The Historical Relations of Islam and the Oriental Churches." These lectures were of special value to those preparing for the Foreign Work.

Rev. A. W. Halsey, secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions visited the Seminary and addressed the students upon the claims and needs of the Foreign field. Rev. C. H. Fenn of China, at the same time presented the cause of Missions in that land. Also, a number of Synodical Missionaries from the Western States have most eloquently laid before the students their urgent appeals for reinforcements in the new States of the West. Dr. S. E. Wishard of Utah, made two most excellent addresses on "Mormonism," and an eloquent appeal for help in the Mormon State against the mighty. Rev. A. Christy Brown, D. D., on behalf of the Synod of North Dakota gave a fine exhibit of what has already been done in that new State and the urgent need of more help. Rev. Dr. Craig made a similar appeal on behalf of Arizona.

Rev. W. H. McMaster of Blairsville, Pa., made an address at a Union meeting of the Presbyterian Churches on "Christian Citizenship." The Princeton Press gave a complimentary review of the address. A bill is before the Legislature of New Jersey to erect a monument in commemoration of the battle of Princeton. The battle was fought a mile southwest of town on Jan. 3, 1777, but the monument will be erected in the town.

The New Doctrine.

By the New Doctrine is here meant the theories concerning the Bible, by which its contents are divided and arranged in a new order, so as to minimize or eliminate supernatural fact and supernatural revelation, substituting evolution for miracle; the reconstruction of theology in subjection to personal consciousness as final authority instead of to the Holy Spirit speaking in the Scriptures; and revolution in method of religious work and instruction, with a view to developing and directing the natural capacity for religion, instead of with a view to persuading to a willing acceptance of life and guidance as a gift from without, i. e., from God.

2. The New Doctrine in some forms or modifications is prevalent in most of the Universities of Europe and America. It controls most of the prominent positions and influential journals in the learned world. It publishes most of the books that command the attention of scholars. It organizes and directs great organs of influence like the Religious Education Association.

3. Men who hold the New Doctrine are sincere and earnest and many of them show a genuine and profound piety. It is a great mistake to impeach their character and motives.

4. Those who know and love the old and better way should with more zeal than ever do their utmost to train the young and to convert the common people to Christ. The old views are confessedly better adapted to evangelization, and are more easily taught to children.

5. We should clearly understand and teach the old truth. It is not to be preserved or promoted by either ignorance, or concealment of facts, or any form of false philosophy. Being the truth all truth can only aid it.

6. We must ourselves acquire the new learning, and capture for the better way the means of influence. We must assert our right to stand with investigators in every department of human inquiry, and there prove that the old truth is not hostile to true science and real progress.

7. And we have this consolation. The New Doctrine has not proved its ability to propagate itself in Church and Missionary effort, in home and individual life, from generation to generation. Holders of the New Doctrine may have character and piety to command respect and confidence, and our fellowship as brethren; but they have grown up in homes and churches of the old way. We may safely predict that their children and grand-children will show a type of character and life embodying the New Doctrine. Will that type have the virility of self-propagation. Here as everywhere the truth is the heir of the future. We need not, then, be alarmed or discouraged.

Novels in Sunday-school Libraries and Novels Supplied by Our Publishing House.

Messrs. Editors:

You would very properly, I think, comment unfavorably against the custom that prevails in some quarters of having novels to constitute a portion of Sunday-school libraries. We do not mean by this to exclude a book that is strictly Christian, but in the style of fiction,—such a book as William the Baptist. We would all consider it, I suppose, as not a novel, and as very suitable for a Sunday-school library.

But if it is wrong to have novels in our Sunday-school libraries, is it not more unbecoming to have novels advertised and sold by our Church Publishing House? It is a fact that our Publishing House sends out advertisements offering to sell novels at a cheap price, and soliciting patronage from our Christian people. This, it seems to this writer, is a perversion of the use of funds contributed by the Church for publishing Christian literature. Our Church evidently does not intend its publishing house to sell all sorts of religious publications,—but only such as are considered sound in doctrine. Much less does it seem reasonable that our Publishing House should sell novels. If I should order Ingersoll's or Tom Paine's religious writings from our Publishing House, it seems to me that it would be proper that I should receive a reply to the effect that our Presbyterian Publishing House does not handle literature of that kind. So if I should order novels it would be very suitable if the managers of our Publishing House would reply that they do not handle literature of that kind. Surely it is not the Mission of the Church to supply the people with novels. There are book-stores in abundance that are ready to offer all facilities in this direction. Our people are likely to read novels enough without any encouragement, and without any accommodating facilities, extended on the part of the Church. If it be pleaded in justification of this practice that our Publishing House adds very considerably to its revenues by selling novels and all sorts of literature,—this would be no weighty argument with Christians. The same plea would justify our Publishing House in keeping on hand for sale a full stock of gambling cards, and yet if our Publishing House should advertise and sell cards would it not properly be considered a scandal upon the Church?

Surely it is time that our General Assembly should look closely into its Publication work, and directs its agents to confine the Publication work to its legitimate channels. It is the Church that is running its Publishing House, through its paid agents,—and the Church has no commission to promote the circulation of novels,—but its commission is only to preach the Gospel. Our Publishing House has been very accommodating to send me any kind of books that I order but when I consider that it is God's Church that owns this Publishing House, and that is acting through its agents who manage this business I do not see how the Church can be consistent in being so very accommodating. If I should order scientific works, for instance, especially such scientific works as Darwin's or Huxley's, it would be right and becoming if I should receive a reply that our Publishing House handles only religious books, and only such religious books as it can conscientiously recommend. The Church has no authority to go beyond this, and if the Church is tempted to go beyond this by the desire to enlarge its business, and increase its financial gains,—then the Church is grievously wrong. It is well known that one of the evil effects of novel-reading is to create a distaste for solid, and Christian literature. If the Church, therefore, promotes novel-reading it is a suicidal policy,—it is undermining the very work the Church is proposing to do, to promote the reading of a sound Christian literature. Is it not time that our Assembly should look into this matter, and take steps to require that our Publishing House should come back into the "old paths?"

S. F. Tenney.

Largeness of Life.

There is but little sense in one's wishing that he had perfect love unless he also crave such a largeness of spiritual life as will make him a much greater force in the place where he lives than he has been. Christ did not say much about having his disciples obtain perfect love, but he did have a great desire that they should possess abundant life. He knew that if they had a fullness of his life in their mental and moral capacities they would possess such a wholeness of his love as would make them most thoughtfully and heartily obedient to him; it would cause them to readily forget all manner of offenses against them; it would lead them to liberally present their means for gospel support without their being urged to do so; it would make it comparatively easy for them to discharge their Christian duties in all directions. What causes a fruit tree of mature age and good size to bear a large crop? It is a largeness of life. When one sees a large apple tree in a fruit-bearing season with a very little crop on its branches, it is safe to conclude that its life is very small. Possibly it needs thorough pruning; if so, it is still true that its working life is really small. It is certain that if a fruit tree have largeness of life, that life will manifest itself either in fruit or in new shoots and fullness of leaves. Life, in the natural world, will make itself appear, whether it be little or much. No one needs to tell me whether a certain Christian, whose daily life I know well, has much or little spiritual life. I may not be capable of discerning all of the elements or features of his real life, but I may correctly judge whether his life be small in volume, or large and forceful. Largeness of Christian life exhibits itself in many traits of character, in genuinely honest dealings with all classes of people, in such a quality of speech that the man's words can be unreservedly relied upon at all times, and in a general deportment which everywhere makes the impression that he is a true Christian. The largeness of his life makes it quite unnecessary for him to frequently tell people that he once made a profession of religion and that he is now "trying to live a Christian life." Such a man does not "try to live" a Christian life, any more than does a geyser "try" to spout forth a large stream of pure water. The very nature of the geyser is to just gush forth its fresh water. Those Christians who have a small amount of life make hard work in "trying" to live decent lives. The reason why they have but little life is because they will not let Christ have his way in them and through them. C. H. Wetherbe.

A man must not choose his neighbor; he must take his neighbor that God sends him. In him, whoever he be, lies hidden or revealed a beautiful brother. The neighbor is just the man who is next to you at the moment. This love of our neighbor is the only door out of the dungeon of self.—George Macdonald.

One who has not learned to do a disagreeable duty with the same thoroughness and care he would bestow on the pleasantest task he can think of, has not mastered the alphabet of success.—Faith and Works.

The Open Court.

The "Little Book."

To the Editor of the Standard:

I have read Dr. Stagg's book through twice and have read it carefully. From start to finish I purposely endeavored to maintain a judicial frame of mind, all the while asking myself this question, Does he prove his case? I took up the book without any previous bias in favor of his proposition, for somehow I have never felt in the least responsible for what Calvin did or said or believed, any more than I feel responsible for all that King David or the Apostle Peter said and did. I have always supposed that Calvin, as great as he was, had his human limitations and fell into errors just as other men. Moreover, it has always seemed to me that by any fair interpretation, according to the laws of the English language, our Confession teaches that there are some non-elect infants who die in infancy, though I do not believe that the framers of our Confession ever meant to teach such a doctrine. The language is ambiguous and infelicitous, that's all. I state these facts so that you may know with what frame of mind I approached the book. And what is my conclusion? It is that the author has overwhelmingly proven his case in regard to all three men and especially in regard to Calvin. I was deeply interested in the quotations from Calvin. No man can read those quotations without thinking more highly of the great reformer, no matter how high his previous estimate was. Dr. Stagg has massed together his great sayings on the tenderest subject that he ever touched and thus has shown me the great loving heart of the man as I never saw it before. He has proven his point and has done a service to the Church. I want to thank him for the pleasure and the profit I have gotten out of the little book. If Calvin could speak I am sure that he would thank him too for vindicating his character from the dark aspersions which the maligners have been heaping upon him all these centuries.

Rock Hill, S. C. Walter L. Lingle.

[We publish such letters as this not merely to increase interest in the book but because we believe the wide circulation of the book to be of great value to our Church. If the elders would invest fifty cents each in its purchase they would have a good lot of ammunition against the attack of Anti-Presbyterian adversaries.—Ed.]

The Council of Seventy.

Nine times out of ten I am a McKelwayite as opposed to a G. Campbell-Morganite, though at all times, Mr. Editor, I am an old-line Southern Presbyterian. The one instance in which I am a follower of Morgan is, when, during the recent meeting held in Atlanta, he unequivocally refused to take part in evangelistic services with ministers and churches which deny the divinity of Jesus Christ. And the one instance in which I have to part company with you is when you endorse and well-wish the recent Chicago Convention of the "Council of Seventy," a considerable number of whom are either Unitarians or men who have been turned out of the Church for rankest heresy, or the boldest rationalists in the Church, such as Dr. Harper himself.

For my part, I don't want Unitarians and homeless heretics, etc., to furnish me with "an ideal, to advise as to principles and as to ways and means," for teaching my children or Sunday-school class. Yet such is their aim, in their own words. "Principles," "ways and means!" Who does not know how inseparable is method and matter of instruction. What "ways and means," for instance would a Unitarian use to teach a child of Jesus? Unquestionably those "ways and means" that would lead that child to regard the blessed Saviour as merely a good man.

This convention which was shunned by many of the orthodox churches of the United States (doubtless because, by very reason of their orthodoxy, they were not asked, as well as from disinclination to attend) in which rationalistic Chicago University, Union Seminary, N. Y., and Unitarian New England were controlling powers, that convention that blasphemously pronounced itself in some respects more important than the assembly of disciples on the day of Pentecost—this is the convention that for our benefit is to perfect and spread an ideal, to advise as to principles, etc!" And to show how modest this Council of Seventy is—we are told by them, "these principles, ways and means" are to be applied to: "1, Sunday-schools; 2, The Home; 3, Theological Seminaries and Colleges; 4, Academies and Private Schools; 5, Public Schools; 6, Y. M. C. A's, and Y. W. C. A.'s; 7, Young Peoples' Societies; 8, Mother's Clubs; 9, City and Village Libraries; 10, Church and Sunday-school Libraries; 11, The Religious Press; 12, The Daily Press." In other words they are organized to regulate and run the universe.

Give us the present admittedly imperfect Sunday-school method, untainted by that subset of poisons—rationalism—as opposed to this "modern," "scientific" method of this hybrid Harper herd. Besides, the Southern Presbyterian Church has enough scholarship and religion to make all needed improvements in the way of "perfecting ideals," devising "ways and means," etc., without the darkened counsel of the Council of Seventy. And if you are a doubting Thomas, read announcement in April Earnest Worker. But after all, our greatest need in home and Sunday-school is not a more logical system of Bible Study but a more faithful, prayerful, earnest and diligent searching of God's Word and by a trusting dependence on God through the Holy Spirit to teach it to our children and pupils.

Wouldn't it be better, Mr. Editor, anent this Council of Seventy, to hang out the red flag than to say—God speed you?
M.

[Our correspondent makes the mistake of confounding the Religious Educational Association with the Council of Seventy, which was in part responsible for the call of the Convention that was organized into the Association. One ass in the Convention made the reference to the Day of Pentecost and his remark met with no response. We have sometimes heard an unmistakable bray even in a Southern Assembly. We have received a letter corroborating Dr. Bryan's account of the Convention, while another Presbyterian minister accuses the Philadelphia correspondent of falsehood. We shall have the full proceedings of the Convention before long to read and will then give our opinion with a proper basis of fact.

Apropos the anonymous article—Medical Science in the Cove—in last week's Standard:

Jumbo was sick recently. A near neighbor who thoroughly appreciates what the old horse did in the fight on the moonshiners and who wishes for him added years of usefulness seriously recommended the forcing down his throat the bloody mass of a chicken's body, feathers and all, torn limb from limb before the indications of life failed.

"A sure cure for bots, sir, a sure cure for bots"

Jumbo refused such an indignity, the chicken escaped to the woods. A warm bran mash, a gallon of oats and a day's nibbling at the grass, just now appearing, recovered for him his wonted health.

Lately the old fellow carried a deacon to the city in order that he might secure the indictment of a bigamist. The significance of the incident is, that the deacon and not the preacher made the journey. The people are beginning to perform their civic duties and the preacher is able to give himself more and more to prayer and to the ministry of the word.

The bigamist is a fugitive from justice. The deacon is hot on the trail. The bigamist has been apprehended in Kentucky and will be brought back to Asheville for trial. The deacon is raising a popular subscription to defray the necessary expenses.

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

The news about the completion of the subscription of $250,000 for the Presbyterian University at Atlanta came after the first forms of the paper had gone to press. We call special attention therefore to the news and the editorial comment on it, found on page 20. Dr. Shearer's vision of the South Atlantic University seems to be realized. The brief article by Rev. F. P. Ramsey, on the New Doctrine, is timely and suggestive, and we heartily agree with Dr. Ramsey in his conclusion as to the attitude of sound and evangelical scholars toward it. Rev. R. A. Lapsley continues the Outline Study in Galatians, to the profit of those who are taking the course. Miss Mildred C. Watkins writes a charming letter from far away Nazareth. One of our candidates tells how the methods of some of the churches impress the candidates. Rev. J. A. Montgomery has an article on the Latin Thesis and Rev. S. F. Tenney gives a needed admonition with which we sympathize. Mr. W. H. McMaster sends a very interesting letter from Princeton. The Open Court contains some readable matter also from Rev. Walter L. Lingle and a correspondent who signs his name M.

Correction.—In last line of middle verse on cover, “where to go,” should read, “where we go.”

PERSONALS.

Rev. William Black is conducting a series of meetings at Benson, N. C., this week.

Rev. R. T. Walker of Allendale, S. C., may now be addressed at Hugo, I. T.

Rev. P. R. Law, of Fayetteville Presbytery, N. C., has been called to the Church at Boston, Ga.

Rev. J. C. Crowley has resigned the pastorate of the Church at Lake City, Fla., to take effect May 1st.

Rev. Charles S. M. See, D. D., died at Phillipi, West Virginia, March 19th, after a long and useful ministry.

Rev. J. C. Johnston, of McDowell, Va., has taken charge of the Church at Richwood, Nicholas county, West Virginia.

Rev. Thos. P. Hay, of Palatka, Fla., began his work as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Gainesville, Fla., on April 1st.

Rev. F. P. Ramsey has been given the degree of Doctor of Philosophy by the University of Chicago. He is now ready to resume regular ministerial work.

As will be seen from our Church News items, Rev. W. E. McIlwaine will remove from Ardmore, I. T., to Birmingham, Ala., and his friends will note his change of address.

Rev. Henry E. Dosker, D. D., the new Professor of Church History in the Kentucky Seminary, Louisville, will preach the baccalaureate sermon at the close of its session, May 3rd.

Rev. William A. Shedd, M. A., Missionary of the Northern Church in Persia, has recently delivered five lectures on The Historical Relations of Islam and the Oriental Churches, to the students of Louisville Seminary. The lectures were interesting and instructive.

Church News.

The Movement for a Southern Presbyterian University at Atlanta.

The readers of this paper are acquainted with the history of this movement up to the adjournment of the Georgia Synod last November.

When that Synod adjourned it was with the understanding that an energetic effort would be made at once to secure from Atlanta an offer of $250,000 to the Synods controlling the Southwestern Presbyterian University and the Columbia Theological Seminary in order to make possible and induce their combination and removal to this city. Your readers were promised additional information when there was anything more to report. That time has come.

Soon after the adjournment of the Synod, a number of the brethren who had this undertaking most at heart, feeling the immensity of the task, observed a week of prayer, during which a little company, meeting at 5:30 each afternoon, laid the whole matter before God, begging him, if it accorded with his will, to prosper it and if not to bring it to naught.

The effect was then inaugurated before the community. The Presbyterians undertook to raise $150,000. The citizens outside of our church, in view of the great benefit of such an institution to the people at large, were asked for $100,000. To secure the subscription of this large sum has taken months of toil, but as the weeks went by the enthusiasm grew. The whole city was enlisted. The movement has been one of the most remarkable in Atlanta's history and it has been successful! At this writing $250,000 and more have been subscribed to the fund. These subscriptions are payable to the men and are binding under the conditions set forth in the following form of subscription:

‘For the purpose of inducing the location in Atlanta or its immediate suburbs of a university to be formed by the combination of the Southwestern Presbyterian University and the Theological Seminary of the Synods of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama and Florida, I promise to pay to the following trustees, or their successors, to wit: T. H. Rice, S. M. Inman, J. R. Gray, J. K. Orr, Hoke Smith and Joel Hurt, the sum of ——— dollars in four annual payments, without interest. It is understood, however, that this subscription is made subject to the following conditions:

1. Subscriptions for this purpose shall be obtained amounting to not less than two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

2. The Synods controlling the said Southwestern Presbyterian University (now located at Clarksville, Tenn.) and the said Theological Seminary of the Synods of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama and Florida (now located at Columbia, S. C.) shall combine the two institutions first named and locate them in Atlanta, Ga., or its immediate suburbs.

3. The two institutions shall bring into the combination assets aggregating at least five hundred thousand dollars.

4. The first payment on this subscription shall be due upon the call of the above-named trustees at any time during the year nineteen hundred and four (not earlier than January first of that year), and the three remaining payments shall fall due on January the first of the years nineteen hundred and five, nineteen hundred and six, and nineteen hundred and seven, respectively.

5. If the 1st, 2nd and 3d conditions of this subscription are not complied with by January the first, nineteen hundred and five, this subscription shall cease to be binding.

The board of trustees named are authorized to fill any vacancies which may occur in their number."

Meanwhile, there are some facts which we want to make clear to the Church at large.

First: This is no effort on Atlanta's part to possess herself unlawfully of some one else's property. It is an offer of $250,000 in good faith and the best of spirit to the owners of these two institutions—an offer which they may honorably consider and accept or decline as they see best. And if the Synods at present controlling the institutions accept Atlanta's offer they do not surrender their proprietary rights in or their control over the institutions. All the Synods which now control the two institutions will unite in the control of the consolidated one. Nobody loses any property. The Church gains a quarter of a million and possession of one of the finest strategic points for an educational plant in the South.

Second: This movement does not contemplate any change at all in the thoroughly Presbyterian character of the institution. Atlanta has made her offer with the full understanding that this is to be a Presbyterian institution. The public has been assured that the school will not be offensively sectarian. None of our schools ever are. But it has been distinctly asserted that the school will be under Presbyterian control and dominated by Presbyterian ideals.

Third: This institution is not desired or designed for the advantage of the city of Atlanta or any local interest exclusively. Of course, it will be a great blessing to this city and State. This fact has been made plain and prominent in appealing to this city to invest its money in the proposed university, but the promoters of the enterprise are Southern Presbyterians who love and long for the prosperity of their whole Church and see in this plan the surest and easiest way to creating a really great institution, the joy and strength of our Southern Zion. We feel that the Southern Church has reached a great crisis, confronted by a great opportunity. What will she do to meet this call of providence? In a most generous spirit of co-operation every part should rally to the support of the whole. Generously has Atlanta made this great institution possible. She has opened the door. Let us consider the proposition with calm and open judgment.

Home Mission Notes.

The books of the Treasurer of the Assembly's Home Mission Office have just closed, showing that the receipts of the year were $36,447.57, being $1,153.79 in excess of last year, which is the largest amount raised for this work in the history of the Church. We are profoundly grateful for this prosperity, given of God in answer to prayer; but the demands of this year have exceeded all past records, and we have been compelled to make the largest appropriations ever made, amounting to over $37,500. As a consequence we will begin this year with a balance less than last year by over $1,000. At the same time our appropriations for the coming year will be even larger than the past. Unless the Church will make a strenuous effort to meet the demands we will be again embarrassed either by the necessity of scaling the appropriations or of abandoning a part of our new work.

We regret to announce the resignation of Rev. W. E. McIlwain, our Evangelist for the Indian Territory, who has been called to the Presidency of the proposed Alabama College. His work was greatly blessed in the organization of new churches, which must now be provided with pastors, calling for an additional outlay of funds. This may take the salary which was used for the Evangelist for the present. If the Church approves of this aggressive work by furnishing the means we will again put an Evangelist in the field for a still larger effort. Our faith in the Church leads us to believe that she endorses this work which has been so successfully operated the past year. The Lord bless it still more abundantly.

S. L. Morris, Sec'y.

Foreign Mission Receipts for the Year Ending Mar. 31, 1903.

Our receipts for the month of March were $28,962.84, a gain over those of last March of $9,354.45. The total receipts for the fiscal year were $180,452.29, a gain over those of last year of $15,575.29.

Our year was closed with an unpaid note in bank of $4,500. The amount advanced the Missions on the new year and paid otherwise, over and above the regular appropriations, is perhaps about sufficient to cover this deficit. It will be seen that the increase, although very gratifying, was not quite large enough to meet the increased cost arising from the twelve new missionaries who were sent to the field during the present year.

S. H. Chester, Secretary.

VIRGINIA.

NORFOLK; Second Church.—The new building was thrown open to the public for the first time on March 29th, Rev. G. B. Strickler, D. D., of Union Theological Seminary, preaching in the morning and at night. Twenty-one new members were received on that day—ten on profession of their faith and eleven by letter.

The style of the architecture is Tudor gothic, and the appearance of the Church is that of the English country church. The seating capacity is 1,000 and the site, building and furniture cost $50,000.

Rev. J. E. Thacker has been pastor for three years, and the outlook for the work is bright.

The situation of the new church is one of the most beautiful in the city, directly on the water, with the lovely Ghent section stretching out in front. The building is surrounded by a pretty lawn and will be ornamented with attractive shrubbery.

ACCOMAC.—On March the 22nd, the Rev. P. B. Henderlite was installed pastor of Makemie and Onancock Churches. In spite of most inclement weather, the attendance both morning and evening was very gratifying.

The Rev. R. E. Steele of Hampton Roads Harbor Mission, and Rev. A. Sidney Venable of Bay View, conducted services of unusual interest and impressiveness.

The people of the Eastern shore have given Mr. Henderlite a cordial welcome, and are sustaining their reputation for hearty co-operation, interest and activity in all branches of church work, and uncommon thoughtfulness and liberality to the comfort of this pastor.

During the month of February, Makemie Church had the pleasure of a visit from Miss Kemper, and much enjoyed the interesting and stimulating account she gave to the ladies of the town of our work in Southern Brazil. P. B. H.

MISSOURI.

SPRINGFIELD.—The church at this place has recently been visited by Mr. A. Y. Beatie of Louisville Seminary and the congregation were so well pleased that on the next Sabbath they made him a formal call which he has accepted, subject to the decision of the Presbytery. He will take charge the first of June.

LADDONIA.—Rev. W. Beale of Jackson, Mo., has received and accepted calls from Laddonia and Bethel churches of Audrain county. His address is changed from Jackson, Mo., to Laddonia, Audrain county, Mo.

ST. LOUIS.—The death of Rev. Dr. Francis L. Ferguson, March 11th, 1903, after a very brief illness, was a great surprise and shock to his many friends in St. Louis and elsewhere. For most of them had not heard of his sickness before seeing the announcement of his death in the daily papers. Dr. Ferguson was forty-nine years of age, a native of Missouri, a graduate of Westminster College and of McCormick Seminary, a hard student and fine scholar, an attractive preacher and faithful pastor. His first charge was Palmyra, Mo., then six years pastor of Prytania Street Church, New Orleans; and since 1891 pastor of West Church, St. Louis, in the Northern Assembly. He was a most useful minister, and it seems as if he was cut off in the midst of his days and his usefulness. But "even so, Father!"

GEORGIA.

THOMASVILLE.—This church has recently called Rev. S. L. McCarthy to become its pastor. There will be a called meeting of Macon Presbytery on the 31st inst., to authorize this church to prosecute the call. Mr. McCarthy has accepted, subject to the action of Florida Presbytery.

ALBANY.—Rev. Wm. H. Zeigler, who came to this church from Lexington Presbytery, Kentucky, Jan'y. 1st, has been blessed in his work here. There have been several accessions to the membership and more are expected in the near future. Bro. Zeigler will be installed pastor very soon, though the time has not yet been appointed by Presbytery.

Collection for Church and Christian Education.

To the Ministers and Churches of the Synod of North Carolina:

Allow me to call attention to Synod's one collection in April to this cause. I can only remind you of the growing importance of this cause as set forth in my last report to Synod which is published in the Appendix of the minutes of Synod. Sickness has prevented me from addressing you through the mails as I have usually done.

J. B. Shearer,

Synod's Agent and Chairman.

Improvements at Stillman Institute.

Those who so generously responded to my appeal for clothing for the students of Stillman Institute, as well as our friends generally, will be interested to know of the great improvements which are being made solely with the labor of the students.

We have sub-divided the lands into lots, fenced in so that some parts will be available for grazing the stock while others are being cultivated. This will make stock-farming, on a limited scale, possible. Then we have built a substantial hog lot for the fine Poland-China hogs given to Mr. Wilson. The barns and barn-yards have been greatly improved and remodelled, adding very much to the convenience of the place and the comfort of the live stock. A fowl-yard has been built, and the beginning of a poultry flock made. One of the old buildings is being made into a laundry, where the boys do their own laundering, and a forge for a blacksmith shop is under construction.

The land has been so carefully plowed, and so arranged for rotating crops that its value is greatly increased. Already, we have up and growing, corn, oats, rye, peas, turnips, lettuce, radishes, cabbage, onions, spinach, asparagus, tomatoes, and Irish potatoes, while the later plants and vegetables will be in season. We have made what I believe to be the cheapest, and most convenient, and, for the cost, most efficient hot-beds I have ever seen.

Our school room accommodations have also been improved, and we have a fairly well-equipped carpenter shop, though we need a first rate machine shop and mechanical power very much. We have made a system of water-works running from the well, which is truly a great addition to the place, and we hope to do some irrigation in the dry summer.

I have been having to do pioneer work all my life, and have grown rather to like it. There is considerable satisfaction in laying the foundations, and boundless opportunity is afforded to one who has tastes in that direction.

The boys, too, have greatly improved under this regime. Some of them work seven hours daily, besides reciting two and studying four. I believe they deserve what the Church and their friends are doing for them.

I wish some one would give us three thousand dollars for a memorial Industrial Plant, in memory of Kassongo, who was a martyr to his efforts at self-support and his desire for knowledge. It would be money well spent.

When I first became acquainted with Stillman Institute about ten years ago, the boys received seven dollars and a half monthly in cash and spent their afternoons playing croquet. I broke up the latter at once, and made war on the former practice, and though it has taken ten years, and I have been to Africa and back while it was being done, I have lived to see the time when we can say that the students pay the Church as much now as they formerly received, and their education is no whit the less thorough, while the money formerly spent on the students is available for the evangelistic work.

S. P. Verner.

Sailors' Rest at Newport News, Va.

It should interest Christian people generally to know that at Newport News there is a Sailors' Rest. As most of the readers of the Central are inland people, a word of explanation may be necessary. Sailors, oftentimes, are dissipated men, who, when they land, go to low resorts and spend all they have in gross vices and excesses. But many sailors are Christian men, and many more are boys from moral and Christian homes. Now when these come to land they are readily known by their clothing and their gait. As it is known that "Jack" has money, and that he is likely to part with it readily, all sorts of evil resorts are provided for him.

For example, in Newport News drinking saloons and dance halls are located as near as possible to the seaman's entrance into the city. In short, Satan sets snares for "Jack" at the point where he is most readily found. Now the Sailors' Rest, with its illuminated sign, catches "Jack's" eye before he can reach the first saloon. But that is not all. At the door he is met by the kind face of our own Rev. R. E. Steele, chaplain of the Rest, who makes him feel at home by word, look and handshake. He is shown into a small, but attractive hall. Other friends welcome him. He is at home, with good reading matter, free from temptation. Besides the religious exercises at stated times, there are amusements of a suitable character from time to time. Perhaps the writer's experience at the hall on the night of March 7th will interest you: After the cordial welcome at the door by the chaplain, an elderly lady was pointed out. "That is Mrs. E. M. Thacker, National Superintendent of the W. C. T. U. I wish you could have heard her talk to the boys on temperance and social purity. It was well done. About twenty of them signed the pledge. The other lady is Mrs. Bradley, of the W. C. T. U., and wife of the chaplain in the Soldiers' Home." This was the chaplain's talk in substance.

It was soon announced that an entertainment, musical and otherwise, had been provided for the "Tars" by the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. As these had not yet arrived, calls were made by the chaplain for volunteer songs by the sailors. In response an Englishman sang a song about the engine room. An older man, a Scotchman, sang a song about "Easy-Going Tam." An Irishman, a little tipsy, sang a song about Ireland. Then there were recitations by citizens; and in due time the ladies and gentlemen secured by the St. Andrew's Brotherhood arrived and furnished music of a very fine character indeed. The sailors were delighted.

Such is the work done at the Sailors' Rest. There is constant watchfulness shown, kindness extended, literature and amusements furnished, an influence exerted against dissipation of all sorts, and the way of life is taught by a faithful minister of the Word. Men far from home find a welcome and spiritual instruction. All friends wishing to aid in this good work can address Rev. R. E. Steele at Hampton, Va.

Alfred Jones, in Central Presbyterian.

The Young People's Missionary Movement.

There are nearly fourteen million scholars reported in the Protestant Evangelical Sunday-schools of the United States and Canada, and there are more than six million members in the Young People's Societies of these countries.

Within fifteen years the twenty-three billions of dollars that are said to be in the possession of the Protestant Church members of America will be controlled by these young people; add to this enormous material wealth the immeasurable and infinitely more essential spiritual power which God waits to bestow, and it will appear that with divine guidance there is nothing impossible to this host of Young People in the way of missionary achievement.

To develop a stronger missionary spirit among these millions of Christian young people, the Church of the future, is the underlying aim of the Young People's Missionary Movement, which was organized by Secretaries and official representatives of denominational missionary Boards at Silver Bay, on Lake George, last summer. The work of the Movement is done, not independently, but through denominational missionary Boards, whose representatives constitute its Executive Committee.

The Student Volunteer Movement has done a most important work in developing the Missionary spirit among the 150,000 college students of the United States and Canada. It is believed that an equally important supplemental work must now be done with the vast army of young people outside of college halls.

Among the methods used in the development of this great field will be the conduct of Summer Conferences for Leaders—a plan that has proven of inestimable value in the student work.

The first of these Conferences was held last summer at Silver Bay on Lake George, attended by 168 representatives, from at least sixteen different denominations. During the coming summer two Conferences will be held, one at Silver Bay, on Lake George, July 22-31, and the other in the early part of July, on Lookout Mountain, Tennessee.

The purpose of these Conferences is not, primarily, the incitement of Missionary enthusiasm, but rather the deepening of the missionary purpose through Bible study and prayer, and practical training for effective leadership among young people. It is expected that the Conference at Silver Bay will be attended by about 300 delegates, and the Conference on Lookout Mountain, by about 200. In addition to the Young People's Missionary Secretaries and official representatives of the various Missionary Boards, who are expected to attend, there will be representatives from State, District and Local Young People's Societies and Sunday-schools.

The Summer Conferences afford to denominational missionary Secretaries a clearing house for the interchange of the most successful plans of work among young people. Group meetings are held during the ten days where the Secretaries meet with the delegates from their respective denominations for conference concerning the denominational work of the ensuing year.

Arrangements are made for combining exceptional vacation privileges with the more distinctively spiritual and missionary features of the Conference. It is believed that these Summer Conferences will mark the beginning of a more comprehensive campaign conducted by the denominational Boards, during the fall and winter, and reaching the local Churches throughout the United States and Canada.

Meeting of the Assembly.

The Forty-third General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States will meet in the Presbyterian Church in Lexington, Va., May 21st, 1903, at 11 a. m., and will be opened with a sermon by Rev. W. T. Hall, D. D., Moderator for the last General Assembly. The undersigned will be in the lecture room of the church, May 20th, at 8 p. m., also May 21st, at 9 a. m., for the purpose of enrolling commissioners.

R. P. Farris, Permanent Clerk.

W. A. Alexander, Stated Clerk.

Notice.—Stated Clerks of Presbyteries will please forward to the undersigned at Clarksville, Tenn., their Statistical, Sunday-school, Societies, Systematic Benevolence and Narrative report, together with all overtures and other papers for the Assembly, including answer to overture from the Assembly proposing a change in the requirements for licensure, (pp. 288, 289, minutes.) if they can do so on or before May 14th; otherwise forward to me at Lexington, Va. It will facilitate the early publication of the minutes if the statistical tables are mailed to me in advance of the meeting of the Assembly. Clerks of Synods will please forward overtures and report time and place of their next meeting.

W. A. Alexander, Stated Clerk.

Presbyterial Treasurers will please send to me the assessment of their Presbyteries for the contingent fund of the General Assembly for 1903. The amount is one cent per communicant member of each Presbytery, as shown by the published rolls of 1902. See minutes of 1902, p. 341.

W. A. Alexander,

Treasurer of General Assembly.

Railroad Rates.—I have secured from the roads on both sides of the Mississippi River a rate of one-third fare for the return trip, plus 25 cents, for all who pay full fare going. Details will be published later.

W. A. Alexander, Stated Clerk.

Educational.

The Presbyterian University.

We print elsewhere the communication from Rev. Theron H. Rice, D. D., conveying the great news that Atlanta has subscribed the full quarter of a million dollars for the proposed University. The subscription on the face of it makes the condition that the University at Clarksville and the Seminary at Columbia shall be moved to Atlanta with their endowment and be combined in the University. The completion of the subscription by the Atlanta citizens, Presbyterians and all, puts a new face upon affairs. It becomes a matter for practical discussion and one in which the whole Church is interested, and the Synods of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Tennessee are directly concerned.

We have had a dream of just such a university in Charlotte, with Davidson as the nucleus of the Academic Department, the North Carolina Medical College as the Medical Department, a Law Department to be furnished by the splendid legal talent of Charlotte and other schools to be founded as occasion demands. But there is a difference between vision and reality. The opportunity has not been grasped and in the mean time Atlanta has acted. A quarter of a million dollars for a city of fifty thousand white people is a large sum. And from all accounts it has been given with an enthusiasm and with the cordial co-operation of all the denominations that argues well for the University itself. Georgia itself is an ideal State for a Presbyterian University, since the educational primacy of Presbyterianism there, despite its comparatively small numerical size, has been freely acknowledged. The need of a Presbyterian University, that would really be a University and not a college with an annex or two, is too obvious to need discussion.

Columbia Seminary has had a notable career of usefulness and of service to the Southern Church. It has an endowment large enough for the support of its able faculty, but a poor equipment of unsightly and antiquated buildings. Since the low estate it reached on account of the unfortunate Woodrow controversy, the echoes of which seem to be interminable in Columbia itself and on the floor of the South Carolina Synod, the Seminary has been steadily growing in favor and in the number of its students. That number is not nearly so great as it should be and doubtless will be in the years to come. But Union Seminary in Richmond is splendidly equipped and Louisville Seminary is to have also a magnificent set of buildings and the competition for students is sharp and students for the ministry, especially, should desire to do the best possible for themselves. The Seminary has no Presbyterian College of adequate equipment as a feeder, within the bounds of the Synods controlling it, namely, South Carolina, Florida, Georgia and Alabama, and only one of any kind.

The Southwestern Presbyterian University at Clarksville, Tenn., is situated in the Northwest corner of that State. As we have pointed out before Clarksville has to face the changed conditions that prevent its growth into a great institution. Its Theological Department must now compete with the splendidly equipped Seminary at Louisville and with the very promising Seminary just established at Austin, Texas. And on the College side it has now to compete with the new Central University of Kentucky, with its large endowment, with Fulton, Missouri, and Batesville, Arkansas, to say nothing of Austin College and Daniel Baker College, Texas. These are all Presbyterian Institutions, and of course there is the pressure of the State institutions and of the Methodist University at Nashville, Vanderbilt. And Alabama is projecting a college of its own. So the future looks anything but bright for the University at Clarksville, in spite of its handsome endowment and splendid faculty, with the distinguished Chancellor Fulton, recently elected, as its head. A University must have students, and unless we are mistaken there is a falling off in the number of students at Clarksville. The controlling Synods of this University are Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama.

And Atlanta is about the center of the two sets of Synods controlling these two Presbyterian Institutions and Atlanta makes an offer of additional and adequate equipment and the promise of continued support which, it seems to us, it would be the wisest thing possible for both institutions to accept.

We have been trying to look at the matter from the point of view of the good of the Southern Presbyterian Church. These large interests often conflict with smaller local claims. It is presumed that they will in this instance. Hampden-Sydney protested most vigorously against the removal of Union Seminary to Richmond, Virginia. Richmond, Kentucky, protested against the removal of Central University to Danville and its combination with Centre College. It is to be supposed that Columbia and Clarksville will both protest and it would be strange if they did not and it is a compliment to the institutions concerned if they do. We shall probably hear much of breaking faith with the dead and of the wrong of using an endowment in Atlanta that was given while the institution endowed was located in Columbia or Clarksville. But the worthier consideration is that the donors gave for the benefit of the Kingdom of Christ, and that it may be presumed a change of location proved to be for the benefit of the Kingdom would be in line with the beneficent purposes of the benefactors themselves. We open the columns of the Standard for a discussion of the issues and interests involved. But let the controlling view be what will be best for the Southern Presbyterian Church, for the increase of those who are to preach in her pulpits, for the furnishing of these ministers with the best equipment for service, for the training of the largest number of her sons to be her worthy representatives in every calling and profession. And when we decide the question this way, we may be sure that it will be for the best interests of the Kingdom of Christ, so far as we represent those interests, and for the glory of God.

Westminster College Notes.

This institution, at Fulton, Mo., is under the joint control of the two Synods of Missouri. The present has been a very prosperous year, the enrollment being the largest for years. The friends of the college have been remembering it too in a very substantial way. A year or two ago a handsome Science Hall was erected and well equipped, and now another handsome and useful building is about to be added.

For a note dated Fulton, March 30, brings the information that the excavation for the Dormitory is finished and that work on the building proper will begin at once. It will be 120x70 feet, with three stories and basement, modern in style and nicely furnished. It will accommodate forty-four students with rooms and a larger number at table. Such a building has long been one of the pressing needs of the college, and its erection this year, before the beginning of another session, means yet better days and larger numbers, as all friends of Westminster most devoutly hope.

And our correspondent mentions another most interesting fact. He says: Yesterday, March 29, a special meeting was held in the college chapel, when action was taken towards perfecting plans for sending to the Foreign Mission field a representative of Westminster. About a year ago the "Living Link League" was organized, its object being to get the Alumni and other friends of the college to unite in the support of a foreign missionary. It is hoped that such a movement will greatly increase the missionary spirit of the college. The officers elected yesterday were I. W. Lewis, President, and Prof. L. L. Campbell, Vice Pres. Mr. A. B. Dodd was chosen as the missionary to represent us. He had previously expressed his willingness to go out under these auspices. Both intellectually and spiritually Mr. Dodd has proved himself to be a man of unusual strength. He won the $600 scholarship at Princeton Seminary last year and is taking a post-graduate course there this year. We believe that all our arrangements will be completed for him to proceed to the field in a few months.

The trivial round, the common task,
Would furnish all we ought to ask;
Room to deny ourselves; a road
To bring us, daily, nearer God.

—John Keble.

It is a high, solemn, almost awful thought for every individual man that his earthly influence, which has had a commencement, will never, through all ages, were he the very meanest of us, have an end.—Carlyle.

The World.

It is announced that the granting of citizenship to Jews in Russia is planned for the near future.

The United States Entomologist estimates that the loss of fruit by insects is about $300,000,000 annually.

During the past year 1,520 locomotives were constructed at the Baldwin Locomotive Works in Philadelphia.

From the Scott yards at Greenock, Scotland, the largest oil-carrying ship afloat has been launched. The vessel is to have a gross tonnage of 11,000 and a carrying capacity of 12,500 tons of oil.

While in this country the movement against the strikers has had its initiative in the Courts, in Holland the matter has come up in the Dutch Parliament. That body has passed a bill declaring strikes illegal.

Sir Chen Tung Liang Cheng, the new Chinese minister to the United States, with his entire suite and party, including in all about 45 persons, who arrived in San Francisco last week reached Washington April 3rd.

It is believed that the steamer Bambara on her first trip from Marseilles to Dakar, French West Africa, with a cargo of 95,000 pounds of gun-powder and two cases of dynamite, has been blown up at sea and has foundered.

G. Hallman Sims, collection clerk for the Capital City National Bank, Atlanta, has been placed under arrest by United States Deputy Marshall Scott, upon a warrant sworn out by President Speer, of the bank, charging Sims with embezzling a sum estimated at nearly $94,000.

Extensive preparations have been made for the celebration to-day of the 85 birthday of King Christian IX at Copenhagen. His six children occupy positions in the world of royalty, the most prominent of whom are Queen Alexandra, and the widow of Alexander III, of Russia.

In view of the number of persons in the postal service, and the volume of business, it is no wonder that an occasional letter to the Presbyterian Standard gets lost, but a pity it is when that lost letter has in it a $2 bill. There are now 165,000 employes in the service, and they handled last year $904,225,235.86, and the rural routes are just beginning.

Last July, the British wooden steamer "Morning" sailed from England to relieve the "Discovery," which left England in 1901, for the Antarctic zone. The "Morning" arrived at Auckland, New Zealand, March 25, and reports that the "Discovery" has been in winter quarters at Victoria Land since February last year. These intrepid explorers had travelled to the south, reaching land in latitude 80 deg. 7 min., longitude 136 deg. This is the most southerly point yet attained.

With the river practically stationary and no further breaks in the levees, there were no developments of importance in the flood conditions in Louisiana. Between Baton Rouge and New Orleans, the embankments were subject to an unusual test by a terrible blow that lasted from Friday night to Saturday morning and lashed the river into fury, but the whole line held and there is still a feeling of hope that the lands along the lower river will escape devastation. The work of strengthening goes on without interruption.

The date for the meeting of the Columbian Congress has not yet been decreed by the government, which while desiring by all means the approval of the canal treaty, wanted to know the opinion of all the representatives beforehand, and therefore sent special commissioners throughout the country. It is said that lucrative positions have been offered to some of the Congressmen who were decidedly unfriendly to the canal project, which they will lose by going to the meeting of Congress. All the caucus representation will vote in favor of the canal treaty.

The Shamrock III will return to the Clyde in the middle of May, when she will be jury-rigged. The challenger will sail for America at the end of May.

During the celebration at Monterey, Mexico, April 2, of the victory of the republic with troops under General Diaz, at Puebla, April 2, 1867, political capital was made of the affair by the parties of the various candidates for Governor of the State of Hevo Leon and a mob of 15,000 citizens formed and marched to the residence of Governor Reyes and hurled a shower of stones at the Governor and shouted "Death to Reyes." The police were sent for and in the mix-up that ensued in dispersing the mob two policemen and two citizens were killed and many wounded.

The Sultan of Achin, Tooankoo Mohammed Daood, has surrendered to the Dutch, an event which is confidently expected to close one of the most extraordinary chapters in the colonial history of the world. Achin is a Moslem state in the northern portion of Sumatra which for some thirty years has been a theater of sanguinary war. Holland in all that period has been trying desperately to overcome the Achinese. The Sultan just conquered has led his people in battle for twenty years past his spirit being broken at last, it is said, by the recent capture of his favorite wife.—Literary Digest.

Of the means of saving life at fires, the most interesting are those upon which reliance must of necessity be placed when prompt action is necessary and the character of the apparatus at hand is limited. Prominent among the appliances in use is the lifenet. The approved type of net is circular in form and about thirty feet in diameter. It is suspended from a rim of steel, the net being attached by springs which take up the force of impact of a falling body. At a recent apartment house fire in New York city, twenty-five persons jumped without injury into one of these nets, which was supported by eighteen men. Of the number rescued, fifteen jumped from the third story, while the others leaped from the fourth, fifth, and sixth stories of the burning building.

David R. Francis, President of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, to be held at St. Louis, visited within fifteen days London, Paris, Brussels, Madrid, and Berlin, and had audiences with King Edward, President Loubet, King Leopold, and Emperor William. King Edward promised to send to the exposition the jewels of Queen Victoria's jubilee of 1897, President Loubet promised to attend the exposition in person, Leopold assured Mr. Francis that only his age and the distance will keep him away, and the Kaiser granted him an exclusive audience of fifty-five minutes and promised to send a quantity of the Hohenzollern family plate and some of his own personal treasures. The German Reichstag, with only two dissenting votes, appropriated $375,000 for the German exhibit, and, it is expected, will make the sum $750,000. The British Government has decided to recommend an appropriation of $150,000, with more to follow.

Dangerous possibilities in the position of Holland are threatening the peace of Europe with portents graver even than the Macedonian question. The factors in the case are three. There is, to begin with, the prospect that the young Queen of the Netherlands will die without issue. Next is the geographical circumstance that most German exports pass through the Dutch monarchy on their way to the outside world. Finally we see The Hague tribunal establishing itself as guardian of the peace of the world. Should Queen Wilhelmina leave no issue, the Dutch would consider the setting up of a republic in preference to the acceptance of the German heir to the throne. But this Emperor William would resist, for he regards himself as the divinely inspired champion of the monarchical principle. The fact that Germany must send her exports through Holland is the result of the aggravating accident which places in Wilhelmina's realm the mouth of the mighty river that runs through William's empire. And the climax is capped by the success of The Hague court, which must or may lead the Powers to insist upon the neutralization of Holland, thus banishing the pan-German dream of an empire stretching to the Zuyder Zee.—Literary Digest.

MORRISON.—Near Brauchville in Robeson county, N. C., Mrs. Nancy Morrison, at her residence on March 19th in the 90th year of her age, widow of the late Alexander Morrison. The oldest member of Midway Presbyterian Church, and the oldest member of her community. A long life well lived. Her life was a benediction to her church, to her community and especially to her family. She was the mother of several children, six of whom survive her "and rise up and call her blessed;" together with a number of grand-children. She was for many long years an open and avowed disciple, and so served her Lord, that her works do follow her—and she has doubtless heard from Him the welcome plaudit—"come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

This is the comfort and consolation of those who remain behind, and who do not mourn as those who mourn without hope. Within less than three months, three members of this family have been transferred to the Father's house of many mansions; while their bodies lie side by side in the dust to await the resurrection morn.

"Well," said the battle-scarred veteran, "I mounted the fiery animal, drew my sword from its scabbard, rose in my stirrups, cried 'Forward!' and sank the spurs deep in the quivering flanks of my gallant steed."

"Yes," exclaimed the boy, breathlessly, "Go, on, uncle. Tell me the rest of it."

"There isn't any more to tell Johnny," said his uncle, with a pensive sigh; "the horse balked."—Chicago Tribune.

The Household.

What a Mother Can Do for Her Daughter.

The first thing a mother can do for her daughter is to see that she is properly born. The doctrine of heredity as applied to physical and temperamental tendencies has been well proven. The science of the prenatal influence of maternal thought and environment upon the unborn child is likewise substantiated by abundant instances. The first and fundamental office of a mother for her child, therefore, precedes the date of its birth.

We hear much of fate and destiny and kindred bugaboos, but if the truth were known we should probably find that our destinies took shape beneath our mothers' hands before the hour when we first drew breath toward their fulfilment.

The mother who would give her daughter a firm foundation on which to build a happy, useful life should take that daughter's health into consideration before she is born, and thereafter do everything within her power to develop and improve it. Those lightly-regarded children's diseases, of whose symptoms and treatment young mothers are too often ignorant, frequently weaken and undermine constitutions to such an extent they never grow to be robust.

It is impossible to overrate the worth of a strong, vital, healthy personality in a woman. Her influence in the home is so great that her physical condition lightens or leadens the atmosphere of it. The woman of sound health is she who is the comrade of man, the inspiration and the uplift of him.

In the elementary stages of a girl's career, health has a very direct influence upon her character. The inclination to humor a sickly child is almost too great for a mother's resistance. It is impossible to submit a delicate girl to rigid discipline; and discipline is the stuff from which character is made. The children who are early taught conformity to rules acquire an inbred respect for law which amounts to a principle, and which simplifies the philosophy of their lives thereafter. Yet the rules must be wise rules, and consistent, else more is lost in the years of awakening knowledge than was gained in the period of unquestioning faith; and the discipline must be prompted by love and never by anger, else its lesson is lost, and the motive which actuates the punishment is less worthy than the offense.

Pattern succeeds where precept fails. The mother who would make her daughter progress must progress with her; nor will all the gain of this effort accrue to the benefit of the daughter, for if she profit by the experience and wisdom of the elder, the mother in turn benefits by constant association with the gaiety, the enthusiasm, the faith, the quick-recovering hope that are the emblems of youth.

It is impossible for a mother to do all within her power for her daughter, unless this bond of love and understanding exists. Without it, counsel is command, and criticism censure. With it, a mother can touch upon every conceivable subject, and be sure of its proper reception. She knows and sympathizes with the character with which she is dealing; for not only has she studied that character but she has helped to make it what it is. With this tacit understanding the mother's motives are as plain as the course they suggest. By this means do principles of morality and ethics fix themselves unconsciously in the daughter's mind, creating moral balance and a normal condition of conscience.

Knowledge is the flower of civilization; and, out of whatever soil it springs, its bloom is fair and sweet-scented. Mothers have contended that revealing what is vicious and insincere in human nature will shatter young faith and sully its innocence. Short sightedness of a by-gone school! Innocence founded on ignorance is an uncertain quantity at best—and misplaced faith is a mockery. The mother who, from shallow conceptions or a false sense of modesty, permits her daughter to traverse a road studded with pitfalls and by-paths, unmarked by danger-signals, cannot be held blameless if that daughter trips.

But there is no chaperon whose vigilance can take the place of individual character and conscience. The only chaperon whose back is never turned, whose sight or hearing is never dulled, whose espionage never flags, is a girl's own consciousness of right and wrong. Her greater or lesser respect for the commands of that chaperon will depend upon the character her mother has instilled; upon the fineness of her sense of honor, the depth of her personal dignity, and the quality of culture toward which her training trends—whether it be that thin-skinned variety of so-called culture, which is made up of worldly professions and superficial signs intended to impress, or culture that results from well established tastes and lofty tendencies, and is bred away down to the bone.

And culture? Culture is the commonplace, lifted out of the ordinary by those who are fearless. Culture is cleanliness. It is thoroughness. It has to do with clean linen, as well as clean morals. It stands for the lack of smut behind the inlets and outlets to character. Culture is not a knowledge of the best books, a entree to the best houses, a smattering of foreign languages, a taste for fine arts or a distate for the practical. Culture has to do with the practical. It grows out of a thorough knowledge and wholesome treatment of the practical. Its influence is as strong in interviews with the cook as with the king. Its magnitude increases and its power is as keenly felt in the judicious guiding of the Fall house cleaning, as it is in the presiding chair of a club for the liberal arts.

Household economics are nearer to love's ethics than we suspect; and the pit of the stomach lies close to the soul. Cold soup and bad service may not corrupt love; but the mind which is occupied with adjusting itself to these unfortunate conditions is for just so long a space detained from loftier and more profitable considerations.

The most desirable accomplishment a mother can bestow upon her daughter is a knowledge of every duty that pertains to the maintenance of a home. Music, languages, fine arts—the pursuance of these talents must depend upon the family purse, and their worth will depend somewhat upon the girl's future station. But into whatever walk of life her choice may lead her she will need—or should need—to be familiar with the requirements for homemaking. A mother can best impart this knowledge by affording practical experience—by allowing her daughter to supply the larder, to direct the servants, to arrange the menus, and to take temporary charge of the household regime. Add to this a knowledge of the exactions of husbands, the demands of sons, the requirements of daughters, and all the new and varied responsibilities of the married state; and girls will acquire a profound respect, not mixed with awe, for the marital institution. The number of them who marry in haste to repent at leisure will be reduced to a minimum—and the number of ideal homes will increase in proportion.

Yet this consideration for the practical, which is a means, should not obscure the ideal, which is an end. Healthy ideals do not clash with practical conditions. Neither do they create discouragement over the failure to attain to our highest hopes. It is better to have ideals that are never realized than to have no ideals at all. There is a gulf between ourselves and our souls' best aims. It is the gulf of imperfect human nature. But the higher we aim the better we live. Look up, and the stars are our guide. Look down, and the sewers beckon.

What a mother can do for her daughter, then, sums up to this: she can give her the benefit of a fair and equal start; she can give her the best moral, mental and physical training given materials will permit; she can build up between themselves a bond which shall be a solace in sunshine, a mainstay in storm; she can be not only a preceptor, but a pattern for culture and character; she can give her the benefit of her experience as a woman with a woman's world to conquer—the priceless nuggets of wisdom, gleamed from girlhood, wifehood, motherhood; she can train her in all that is practical, and direct her toward all that is ideal.—Lavinia Hart, in the Cosmopolitan Magazine.

So wonderful is the mixture that we can easily understand the state of mind of a little girl who asked her father, "Pa, where were you born?" "In Boston, my dear." "And where was mamma born?" "In San Francisco, my dear." "And where was I born?" "In Philadelphia, my dear." "Well," said the little dear, "Isn't it funny how we three people got together?"—Rev. Henry Van Dyke.

Addressing a Sunday school class in the course of a talk on "The Bible," Dr. E. Benjamin Andrews, now of the University of Nebraska, paused and put this question:

"What is it that men and women over all this broad land are reading on this bright and beautiful Sunday Morning?" "Mr. Dooley," answered a little fellow, quick as a flash.—New York Times.

The Home Circle.

Alice Caldwell Hegan.

By William Frederick Dix.

On a terrace, a little back from the street, in the handsome residence portion of Fourth Avenue, Louisville, is a commodious red-brick house, standing by itself in pleasant grounds, beneath whose hospitable roof there assembles periodically during the winter months a little coterie of clever women who read aloud original short stories, poems, and sketches which they afterwards discuss and frankly criticise. The hostess on these occasions is a young lady who, ever since she left school about ten years ago, has not been content to give all her energies to social pastimes, but has had a constant ambition to write. Slightly above the medium height, with dark hair and eyes, animated in conversation and intensely interested in almost every phase of life, Miss Alice Caldwell Hegan is one of the leading spirits of this Southern literary club, because of her charming vivacious personality, her social tact, and her cleverness with the pen. Until about a year ago she considered herself merely an amateur, and had tried various kinds of story and sketch writing with varying success. It was not easy for her to find time for regular work, because the members of her family were shining exponents of Southern hospitality.

We in the North can hardly realize what the Kentucky idea of "open house" means. The Hegan home was the city rendezvous of a large group of friends and relatives who lived in the neighboring but lesser towns of Lexington, Covington and Shelbyville, and in the country round about. These people, with delightful ingenuousness, would drop in, singly or in groups, for a few days' visit at any time, seldom thinking of giving notice before hand. Consequently the Fourth Avenue home was in its normal condition when overflowing with guests, and as the daughter of the house is of practical as well as literary turn of mind, her writing could be one only at odd moments and when there happened to be a quiet household.

Then, too, there were the week-end parties "out at the cabin," which interfered with work and which from early spring till late autumn were a family institution. This cabin was built of logs chinked in with plaster, built in the forest a few miles out of town, a forest which the Hegan family owned and loved. It had a great porch running entirely around it, with a "dog-trot" or open passage way through the center, with an outside stairway in it, rising to the bedrooms. On one side of this "dog-trot" was the large dining room, on the other a living-room, and the kitchen was in a "lean-to" at the rear. The countryside had been scored for quaint old furniture, and the cabin had four-post bedsteads, old pewter and engravings, rag carpets, splint-bottom chairs, and a round dining-table, with a revolving center raised a few inches and designed to hold the vegetable-dishes, so that one could secure some viand on the other side by turning this central part of the table around! Between meals one quenched his thirst from the water-gourd and bucket of spring water in the kitchen, and here, far from town, with the leafy Kentucky forests shutting out the world on all sides, the merriest of house parties assembled almost every week for a day or two of pioneer life, for tramping and riding, for lazy hours in the hammocks swung on the porches, and for companionship with congenial friends. Over the dining-room fireplace, just under the Revolutionary musket, is painted this motto:

He who a cheerful nature owns
A palace rears from hovel stones.

And this is the very spirit and idea of this little log cabin in the woods.

The longing to accomplish something grew stronger each year, and, after dipping into Kentucky history and trying various themes more or less historical, Miss Hegan suddenly realized that what she could probably do best was that which lay nearest at hand. It lay, in fact, so near at hand that she had been steadily overlooking it! The Cabbage Patch! For years she had been "executing unobserved acts of charity in this forlorn and unbeautiful part of Louisville. Here, "where ramshackle cottages played hopscotch over the railroad tracks," she had been a regular and welcome visitor. All doors were opened to her, and to her sympathetic ears the woes of the neighborhood were poured out. Winter after winter she had done much to relieve the stress of poverty, and the incident in her book of the letter to the newspaper, and the instant responses in money, clothes, and food it brought to a stricken family, was founded on an actual occurrence.

Curiously enough, that which probably made her such a welcome visitor among these people of the Cabbage Patch was what has been the chief element in her success—her strong love of humor. She has to a remarkable degree a quick and acute sense of humor, that is, which is funny and humor which is pathetic; she sees the pathos in life as sensitively and appreciatively as she does the incongruous and the absurd. So she thoroughly understood the various phases of lowly human nature in this squalid part of Louisville, and established among its people a strongly human understanding with them.

And so, when the idea came to her of writing up her own experiences, she had but to add a thread of fiction, to change a few names and concentrate the innumerable episodes, and the book seemed actually to write itself! It seemed absolutely spontaneous! Yet, when it was written, she mistrusted it and worked over it with painstaking care, and even when she felt she could do no more with it, she had the gravest doubts over this little record of some of her own experiences. Of course the introduction of the love episode was the fiction which strung the scenes in the story together, and it was with many misgivings that "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" was offered for publication.

About a year ago, Miss Hegan, while in New York, had the pleasure of calling upon her publishers and receiving in her hands the first copy of a modest little green-covered book of about one hundred and fifty pages. She turned the leaves with shy but intense interest, and wondered if it would ever be noticed among all the large and beautiful books that were coming out. This was her first real venture in the field of letters she had looked into from afar for so long. Almost at once the little tale began to be read and talked about; soon a thousand copies were sold, then five, ten, fifteen thousand! Her picture was sought after for publication; new editions were quickly exhausted; twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, sixty thousand copies went, and still the new editions are quickly disposed of; and within the year this Louisville girl has emerged as the writer of one of the most popular, most wholesome and human books of recent years.

What is the secret of its success? It is full of human love and sympathy. It was written from the heart, without self-consciousness or false motives, but with simplicity and sincerity. It shows a subtle earnestness of purpose which shines behind all its mirth. It is deliciously humorous because the humor is perfectly natural, it is pathetic without being sentimental, and with all its pathos it is never sad because there is not a note of despondency in it. Its optimism is constant, and it is a perfectly true and convincing picture of life.

Another book by Miss Hegan is about to appear. It is called "Lovey Mary," and the scenes are laid in the same Cabbage Patch. The question naturally arises, Can she repeat her success? There is no reason in this case why she should not. As she herself has remarked, "The Cabbage Patch is full of stories." And no one will doubt that if they are to be found, the author of "Mrs. Wiggs" will find them; for success has not robbed her of her freedom from self-consciousness, and any of the charity-deserving residents of that part of the town will tell you that she herself is still "the good angel of the Cabbage Patch."—The Outlook, Dec. 6th, 1902.

Winning and Keeping a Boy's Friendship.

By Prudence Pepper.

It has been said that if a boy is ever to become a true man, that vital spark of manhood exists and should be recognized in early, very early childhood. The parent, pastor, teacher, or friend who would receive a boy's loyal devotion must so introduce himself, that the embryo man, in his turn, will feel that his individuality is known and valued by a kindred spirit.

You must not only love the boy, you must like him, if you would be his friend. To no other will he consciously reveal himself. Search deeply and assiduously for some individual and likeable trait in the youngest boy of your acquaintance. When found, act in reference to it and note the result.

The necessity and value of counting young children as individuals cannot be insisted upon too strongly. When this theory is reduced to practice, how will adults conduct themselves toward the children and youth in whom they find likable qualities, and from whom they seek an honest liking in return?

Your little son will doubtless love you because you are his mother, the source of his greatest comforts and pleasures. He will like you or dislike you for the same reasons that lead other people to like or dislike you.

You must win your boy by the same gentle, womanly arts by which, years ago, you won his father's heart. You strove to make yourself pleasing in his eyes; in his presence you repressed the frown and restrained the impatient word. Try the same means of making yourself attractive to your little boy, and see what an ardent little lover he will become.

When you have won him, keep him. Never appear before him in dishabille of dress or manner, such as would cover you with shame and confusion if witnessed by adults not included in the family circle. Never find yourself about to speak to your boy as you would not dare to speak to a stranger, an enemy or your neighbor's child. Did you ever listen to a tiresome visitor, bid her a smiling farewell, ask her to come again, and in the next breath give vent to your restrained vexation by making a sharp reply to your child who has been waiting so long for a share of his mother's attention? Does he like "cross mamma" any better than your visitor would like a cross, discourteous hostess?

Teacher of youth, clothed in the brief authority delegated by parents by parents through school officials, do you ever stop to consider whether your pupils would voluntarily seek your presence or help because they like you? Do you sometimes speak to them as you would not dare to speak to their parents, or to their older brothers and sisters upon whose good opinion your social popularity depends?

A boy's reticence is just a little greater than his keen sensitiveness. For this reason, parents and teachers, we seldom, if ever, hear from him those just criticisms which would be a revelation to most of us.—Exchange.

Wings of a Dove.

At sunset, when the rosy light was dying,
Far down the pathway of the West,
I saw a lonely dove in silence flying
To be at rest.

Pilgrim of air, I cried, could I but borrow Thy wandering wings, thy freedom blest,

I'd fly away from every careful sorrow
And find my rest.

But when the dusk a filmy veil was weaving,
Back came the dove to seek her nest, Deep in the forest where her mate was grieving—

There was true rest,
Peace, heart of mine! no longer sigh to wander;

Lose not thy life in fruitless quest,
There are no happy islands over yonder;
Come home and rest.

—Henry Van Dyke, D. D., in "The Builders and Other Poems."

"It is so sweet to live
My little life to-day
That I would never leave it, if

I might forever stay!
I sometimes say.

"I am so weary, Lord,
I would lie down for aye,
Could I but hear thee speak the word,
'Thy sins are washed away!'

"The better mood that lies
These moods between, midway,
Come softly, and I lift my eyes,

Mendelssohn and the Queen.

He had been once making music with the Queen, and had been genuinely delighted with her rendering of his songs. As he was about to leave she said:

"Now, Dr. Mendelssohn, you have given me so much pleasure; is there nothing I can do to give you pleasure?" To be sure, he answered that he was more than amply rewarded by her Majesty's gracious reception, and by what would be a lasting remembrance of the interest she has shown in his music, but when she insisted, he said:

"Well, to speak the truth, I have a wish, and one that only your Majesty can grant."

"It is granted," she interposed.

And then he told her that nothing could give him greater pleasure than to see the nurseries and all the domestic arrangements connected with the royal children. The most consummate courtier could not have expressed a wish better calculated to please the Queen. She most cordially responded, and herself conducted him through the nurseries. Nor was the matter treated lightly; she had to show the contents of the wardrobes and give him particulars of the service, and for the time being the two were not in the relative position of gracious sovereign and obedient servant, but rather of an experienced materfamilias and an enlightened paterfamilias comparing notes, and giving one another points on the management of their respective children.

Unless there is a reserve of enthusiasm stored on the hills the humblest wheel cannot be driven in the valley. He who contributes just this one rare thing—self-sacrificing devotion—to his cause has done his part. Six hundred English dragoons once received a foolish order and rode to their deaths like heroes. "Magnificent," said a French general, "but not war." It was magnificent, and perhaps it was war, for it fired the imagination of England and raised the standard of duty for a country. . . . One who can plan is good; far better is the man who can stimulate. . . . History affords at every turn some impregnable fortress that was a despair of the wise and prudent, but was carried by some enthusiast with a rush. He cast his reputation, his life, all into the breach, and his body made the bridge over which the race has entered into its heritage.—Ian Maclaren.

So near is grandeur to our dust,
So near is God to man,
When duty whispers low, Thou must!
The soul replies, "I can."

—R. W. Emerson.

A Forced Masquerade.

By Helen Rolland Estey, in Forward.

In her happy haste, Charlotte Worthington fairly skimmed down the wide oak stairs and along the great hall.

It was a beautiful staircase and an imposing hall, almost like a bit out of an ancient palace mysteriously set down in the midst of this very modern American seminary. The sunlight, freed from its garishness by the stained-glass windows through which it filtered, fell in soft splendor on carved wood work and polished floor. Oriental rugs hushed the crude sound of footsteps, and gave back to the windows an answering wealth of color. Every girl in the school loved this glowing hall, which was like the rich, warm heart of the big building, full of bare recitation rooms and commonplace parlors and bedrooms. Charlotte rarely descended the staircase without halting at the bend in the stairs to drink in the rich beauty of the scene.

But to-day it was quite different. Without thought or glance for the surrounding beauty, she hurried down, oblivious of everything but the anticipated pleasure of a holiday. Her face dimpled with pleased smiles as she approached the bevy of gay girls grouped in the hall, waiting for her. Her appearance was the signal for the discharge of a volley of bright badinage. One and another flung bits of advice at her, suited to the importance of the occasion. The honor of the school demanded that any member of it off on a holiday should deport herself properly, hence the necessity for the chorus of advice that fairly deafened the laughing girl.

"Don't forget your Delsarte lessons, and hitch your chair up to the dining table with a series of awkward jerks," advised Marian Lowe, in life-like imitation of their Boston-bred elocution teacher.

"And don't forget to put a sprinkling of French words in your conversation, ma chere, or you will fail to impress people with the advantages you are enjoying at Mt. Holcomb Seminary. Au revoir! Soyez une bonne enfant!" mocked Ellen Hall, with the abominable accent which was the despair of Mademoiselle Foliere, the nervous little French teacher.

Then followed good-bys given impressively with mock heroics.

"Present my regrets to your estimable aunt, and tell her that the only reason I do not accompany you is—that she has not sufficiently insisted upon my doing so," Jeanette Townsend urged, with a saucy squeeze and shake of Charlotte's arm, meant to secure attention for this important message in the midst of the gay hubbub.

"Oh, oh, oh! Girls, let me go! Aunt Eleanor is waiting. Good-by! Good-by, Marian! Good-by, Jeanette! And—oh, why, Katherine! I didn't see you before, but good-by!" and Charlotte's gay farewell changed into a stiff little affair as she caught sight of Katherine Parr standing in awkward silence on the outskirts of the group. Try as she would, she could never speak to Katherine with the same easy abandonment that marked the usual free masonry of intercourse between the other girls.

The tall girl addressed reddened and replied stiffly that she hoped Charlotte would have a pleasant time. Her cool aloofness affected the laughing crowd like a douche of cold water, and an awkward minute followed. But the tide of girlish good nature and fun soon swept away the stiffness, and Charlotte departed, a pleasing vision of pretty gown, fluttering ribbons, and laughing face, amid the usual shower of merry good wishes.

She sank back in the cushioned carriage seat beside her aunt with a little sigh of delight as the glossy, spirited horses, which the coachman handled so cleverly, sped swiftly along through the quiet suburb toward the city.

"What a fortunate girl I am, Aunt Eleanor, to have you right here in the city so near me. When you come out to Mt. Holcomb this way and beg a holiday for me from Madame Colburn, I am the envy of the whole school," Charlotte said. Then, with a little quiver of the voice that meant just a wee touch of homesickness, she added:

"We are all so far away from home, you know, that anything 'homey' does seem so good."

Yes, of course, Aunt Eleanor knew. That was just the reason that she took time in the midst of her busy days to put a little "homeyness" into the boarding school life of her sister's only child. Besides, she knew that the chance to have a talk with "some one who understands" often saves a girl a good deal of heartache and many a blunder. So these holidays always had plenty of fun and chocolate creams, and, tucked in somewhere, a chance for a little quiet talk in Aunt Eleanor's room.

"How do you manage to get on so pleasantly with your working girl proteges, Aunt Eleanor?" Charlotte asked, soberly, as she sat curled up in a big chair in her aunt's room on the afternoon of this particular holiday. "Those girls we stopped to see this morning were as cordial and friendly to you as though they were not poor. For my part, I—I don't like girls that are poor!"

For one minute Aunt Eleanor looked up, grieved and surprised, not understanding.

"Oh, you ought to know I don't mean it that way!" Charlotte hurried to say, flushing as she saw the hurt look in the gentle face.

She did know, after that first minute's mistaken fear, that this wide-browed niece of hers could mean nothing that betokened shallow judgments. So she smiled kindly into the troubled brown eyes.

"Tell me about it, Charlotte."

"I am not sure that I can, Aunt Eleanor. It's all so intangible—and horrid. But I think—don't you think that girls who have—well, less than other girls have—I mean money and clothes and things—are so watchful for slights, and so ready to make much of trifles, that it is uncomfortable to be with them, and not jolly and easy as it is with the other girls?"

Then a minute's hesitation, and Charlotte asked, abruptly, "Do you know Katherine Parr at Mt. Holcomb?"

Mrs. Wilton gave a slight start of surprise, then answered rather briefly that she had met the young lady.

"Well, she is the very finest girl in our school," and the pretty head lifted with proud emphasis. "I think I really—yes, I do—I love her! But she is so stiff and touchy that you can't enjoy her any more than you could a prickly burr. She is always so afraid that we are trying to patronize her because she doesn't have things, you know, and so she bristles up at little things that the other girls would never notice."

"For example!" Aunt Eleanor questioned, helping; for she understood that there was some special hurt that stirred this earnest protest.

"You know the girls always give each other little trifles when they take the notion; if one of the girls should happen to like one of my rosettes for the hair especially well, why, I would think nothing of putting it in her hair and asking her to keep it, and she would dance round with delight, thinking of nothing else but just the mere pleasure of having something pretty." Charlotte's long, eager sentence ended, and a little frown gathered.

"Well?" encouraged Mrs. Wilton.

"Yesterday, Katherine was in my room, and I was showing her the box of gloves my mother brought me from Paris last summer. There was one pair which she particularly admired, and so I said I would like to give them to her. My, how she did bristle up! She dropped the gloves, thanked me icily, and said she had all the gloves she cared for! When she had gone, I felt so cheap and humiliated, I just cried—and heartily wished I might never see a poor girl again!"

The tone was full of angry indignation, but the tears glistening in her eyes told of some other feeling.

"Do you suppose, dear, that you would be the least bit in the world sensitive if you were the most plainly dressed of any of the girls in the school?" ventured Mrs. Wilton, slowly.

"No, not one bit!" was the quick, emphatic reply. "At least I know," she added, with indignant emphasis, "that I would not attribute the meanest, cheapest kind of feeling to nice girls just because, for reasons with which neither they nor I had anything to do, they happened to be better dressed than I. I think I should be generous hearted and broad-minded enough to believe that even well-undressed girls can be noble and fine-spirited!"

Aunt Eleanor touched the flushed cheek caressingly with her hand, and said, with the patient wisdom of years:—

"Think it over a little more, Lottie. Try to imagine yourself in Katherine's place in all these little happenings. Do you think it would make any difference in your accepting little gifts from the other girls if you had no pretty things to give them occasionally?"

Charlotte was glad that the maid's knock at the door made an answer to this searching question unnecessary.

"Dinner is served, and here is the box of roses you ordered for Miss Charlotte," was the maid's double announcement.

"For me? Oh, I do love roses!" and Charlotte buried her face in the fragrant mass of bloom. "How I would like to divide them with Katherine! But I'll not try that kind of an experiment again, soon!" she added, with a sorry smile.

The days passed swiftly at Mt. Holcomb Seminary, and the brief spring vacation of four days was at hand. A few of the girls were fortunate enough to have friends or relatives within reach with whom they were to spend the few days.

"No, I am not to go to Aunt Eleanor's, but to a cousin's in Plainville. I have never seen her, but she has recently married and moved there, and has kindly remembered our cousinship," Charlotte explained to a group of questioning girls.

"Where do you go, Katherine?" some one else asked.

"To visit an old friend of my mother's. I have not seen her since I was a little child, but she was very kind to my mother during the years of her widowhood, and now that she and her husband are old and lonely, and wish to see me, Madame Colburn thinks I ought to go. They live at Culver."

Amid the usual bustle and hubbub, the favored girls said good-by the following Saturday morning, waving farewells from the "bns," as it rattled down the gravel driveway, to the forlorn group left behind.

Charlotte stood before a trunk, staring in blank amazement at it.

"Why, it isn't my trunk, Cousin Mary! There has been some mistake! What shall I do? I haven't a thing to wear but this soiled shirtwaist and short skirt that I have traveled in—and there's my church and the party!" Charlotte exclaimed in a vexed tone. Then the humor of her vexation, and she sat down and laughed heartily, Cousin Mary, who was a happy young bride, joining in merrily.

"My clothes are an impossibility for you, of course," she said, glancing with a grimace from the reflection of her short, plump form in an opposite mirror to Charlotte's tall and slender figure. "I will have Frank telegraph at once, and try to trace your trunk, but it will probably be several days before it can be found and forwarded to you. And tomorrow will be Sunday, and the party is Monday!"

Charlotte stood eyeing the trunk ruefully, when suddenly her eye caught sight of the name on one end.

"Why, this is Katherine Parr's trunk!" she exclaimed.

It was clear to her in a minute, then, how the mistake had occurred. The Mt. Holcomb porter had taken both trunks to the station, and, confusing his instructions and the tickets, had checked Katherine's to Plainville, and had, no doubt, checked hers to Culver.

"What shall I do?" groaned Charlotte, between spasms of laughter.

"Do? Why, since you know these things belong to a friend of yours and will fit you, just use them. She would surely wish you to do so, and I don't believe she will have you arrested for robbery, either—especially since she is probably at this minute in the same predicament and likely to be forced to the same lawless procedure."

At that minute the bell rang and a messenger delivered a telegram addressed to Charlotte. It was dated at Culver and signed by Katherine. It read:—

Your trunk here by mistake. Shall I forward it to Plainville?

"It can't possibly get here in time to do you any good, dear," Cousin Mary explained. "Why not telegraph her to use your clothes, and ask permission to use hers?"

So it was settled that way.

It was a queer feeling, indeed, that it gave Charlotte to see herself in the plain, dark gown which had served Katherine for church and social affairs all the year. Unconsciously she found herself lifting her head haughtily with the little movement so characteristic of Katherine. She felt the prim dress fairly steeping her in primness, and she realized that her Cousin Mary, in her pretty, airy gowns, was forming a different opinion of her from that her other friends had always held.

The climax of her experience came at church when her cousin introduced her to some of her friends, and Charlotte found herself trying, in spite of her better taste, to say or do something to make these new acquaintances realize—that she was superior to her dress! Charlotte winced with shame as it flashed upon her that it was this very thing that she was unconsciously trying to do, and that one of her methods was Katherine's own—a haughty, aloof bearing. At the party, Monday evening, it was even worse. She hated herself for it, but she realized that she was measuring the words and glances of everyone with direct reference to their bearing on their probable estimate of her. She, who never before remembered thinking about her own or other girls' gowns at a party except in the most cursory way, felt humiliated to realize how persistently the thought of dress skulked behind all her talking and doing, to-night.

When one laughing girl, while telling a humorous story, laid her hand on Charlotte's shoulder familiarly, she drew away with the quick thought, "I wonder what she thinks of me, to presume so, on such a short acquaintance!"

Then, with a flush of shame, she realized that if she had been fluttering round in one of her pretty evening gowns, happy and gay, she would never have given a thought to the familiarity, but would probably have flashed a quick, happy smile at the girl in recognition of their mutual pleasure at "feeling acquainted" so quickly.

Long after she had retired that night, Charlotte tossed about in wakeful rehearsal of the evening's happenings. Her cheeks burned at the remembrance of the petty annoyances, the mental defeats and victories of the evening.

"It isn't such an easy thing to forget about dress when one doesn't have pretty things as it is when one does," she thought, repentantly, remembering some things she had once said to Aunt Eleanor on this subject. It had come to her quite clearly that it might require the greatest culture and self-discipline for a girl like Katherine to attain that perfect control of feeling and carriage which she had always expected of Katherine as an easy thing.

"But I would fight with myself till I attained it, I know I would," she insisted stoutly to herself; "else I should always hate myself—as I do to-night!"

Meantime, Katherine Parr, forced to masquerade as a richly-dressed girl in Grandmother Melton's plain little home, was getting some new views of life. In spite of all of her efforts to be gracious and kind, Grandmother Melton looked askance at the elegantly-attired young woman who had dropped down in her little cottage, and persisted in assuming that she must feel out of place amid its simplicity. Her apologies for the simple table fare, the absence of this and that convenience or luxury about the home, were so numerous and persistent that Katherine's patience was severely tested. It was exasperating to be forced into an attitude that compelled her to keep reiterating all the time that everything was quite good enough. She resented the assumption that she must be acting the role of critic, and was not a cordial friend.

"I don't think of these things at all and why should she? Why must they be mentioned? Why need she assume, just because of these clothes, for which I am not at all responsible, that I do not understand or love the true things of life? Why can't she think me capable of loving her for her kindness to mother, and for her very own wholesome self?"

Her indignation worded itself very much as another young woman's had done to her Aunt Eleanor some months before, but of this she was unconscious.

On Monday evening, at Mrs Melton's invitation, a half-dozen girls of Katherine's age came in to spend the evening with her guest.

Katherine had often enough known the experience of being the most plainly dressed in a group of girls; this evening she learned some of the discomforts that may fall to the lot of the best dressed girl. Sensitive as she was, she felt keenly conscious that these plainly-dressed new acquaintances stood aloof from her. Putting aside her usual reserve, she exerted herself eagerly to be kind and social. Her advances were received so coldly that she winced in humiliation.

"Why can't they see that I want to be friends with them?" she kept thinking. "They act as though they thought I were trying to patronize them, and resented it."

The uncomfortable visit drew to an end at last, and, with a sigh of relief, Katherine found herself on the train returning to Mt. Holcomb.

Charlotte had returned a few hours earlier in the day, and when she saw Katherine alight from the "bus" she hurried through the long hall to greet her, her face smiling with appreciation of the humor of the situation. Katherine saw her coming, drew back, hesitated a minute, then, with a sudden change of manner, rushed forward cordially. Throwing her arm about Charlotte with a hearty familiarity which delighted her friend, she began a laughing rehearsal of her side of the episode.

A few days later, sitting cozily in Katherine's room, the latter was saying to Charlotte:—

"You did not even know that I was here at your Aunt Eleanor's expense? And I imagined that you were trying to patronize me because of it! Well, I think our forced masquerade has taught us both something," and she smiled frankly into Charlotte's sympathetic face, glad that they understood each other at last.

Where leap the long Atlantic swells,
In foam-streaked stretch of hill and dale,
Where shrill the north-wind demon yells,
And flings the spin-drift down the gale:
Where, beaten 'gainst the bending mast,
The frozen raindrop clings and cleaves,
With steadfast front for calm or blast,
His battered schooner rocks and heaves.

To some the gain to some the loss,
To each the chance, the risk, the fight;
For men must die that men may live—
Lord, may we steer our course aright!

The dripping deck beneath him reels,
The flooded scuppers spout the brine;
He heeds them not, he only feels
The tugging of a tightened line,
The grim white sea fog o'er him throws
Its clammy curtain, damp and cold,
He minds it not—his work he knows,
'Tis but to fill an empty hold.

Off, driven through the night's blind wrack,
He feels the dread berg's ghastly breath,
Or hears draw nigh through walls of black

A throbbing engine chanting death,
But, with a calm, unwrinkled brow,
He fronts them, grim and undismayed,
For storm and ice and liner's bow,
These are but chances of the trade.
Yet well he knows—where'er it be,
On low Cape Cod or bluff Cape Ann—
With straining eyes that search the sea
A watching woman waits her man.
He knows it, and his love is deep,
But work is work, and bread is bread,
And though men drown and women weep,
The hungry thousands must be fed.

To some the gain, to some the loss,
To each his chance, the game with Fate;
For men must die that men may live—

A Boy's Essay on Bears.

Bears are of many sighses and all big. The chief kinds are the grizzly bare which is black; the sinnermou bare which is good and gentle; the white bare which bleaches its skin to hide in the snow and make a rug, and the black bare which is common and is careful of its cubs. Bares fight bees for honey, which is mean because the bees are little. Once a bare found some currant jelly sitting on a garden bench to dry and he ate it, and the lady hadn't any more, which was greedy. Bares are pigs.—Ex.

Another Appreciation of the Aetna

LUMBERTON, N. C., November 26, 1902.

J. D. BOUSHALL, Esq., Manager Aetna Life Insurance Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir :—After a careful comparison of policies submitted to me by the Aetna Life, Bankers' Life of New York, Equitable of New York, Northwestern, New York Life and Prudential, I have accepted $10,000 in the Aetna on the 20-payment life plan, with option of 25-year 3 per cent. Gold Bond Contract.

I have been a policy-holder in the Aetna for nearly eight years, and therefore feel somewhat prepared to judge of its merits from actual results. With all due deference to other companies, it affords me great pleasure to say that in my opinion the Aetna cannot be surpassed for plain and liberal contracts, and for just, conservative and economical management. I now have $12,000 in the Aetna. My partner, Mr. W. W. Carlyle, has $16,000 and one of our clerks, Mr. John T. Biggs, has $2,000, nearly all of which was written and delivered by your special agent, Mr. H. T. Spears.

Wishing you and the grand old Aetna continued success, I am,
Yours very truly,
ROBERT D. CALDWELL.

Children's Letters.

Hopewell, N. C., March 24th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I thought I would write to you as I have never written before. Papa takes your nice paper. I and little brother go to Sunday school. Mrs. Winders is our teacher. I like her very much. We live near Hopewell Church. Rev. R. D. Stimson our dear pastor has left us. We are very sorry. We miss them so much. I have a sweet little sister, Nora Bell—11 months old. She can say by-by, shake her head and patty cake. I must close, hoping to see my letter in print.

Your little friend,

Age 7. Chalmers McNeely.

Dear Standard:

As I have never written before I thought I would write to you. My papa takes your nice paper, and I like to read the children's letters very much. I go to the Second Presbyterian Church. Dr. Stagg is our pastor, and Miss Maggie Rankin is my Sunday-school teacher. We have a nice time at school playing games at recess. I am in the third grade, and my teacher's name is Miss Allie Wool. I got 94 on general average last month, but I hope to get better next month. I will close by answering Ruth Sadler's question. The shortest Psalm is the 117, and the longest is the 119

Newells, N. C., Mar. 23rd, 1903.

Dear Standard:

My papa takes your nice paper, and I enjoy reading the children's letters and stories. I have three sisters and two brothers. Our school was out last Tuesday. We had a picnic and the boys had a big game of baseball after noon. And a man came and took our pictures that morning. I can help Mamma cook. I haven't any pets. I have two dolls. I go to Robinson to church. Rev. J. A. McMurray is our Pastor. I go to Sunday-school and Miss May Stafford is my teacher. I will answer Eugene Alexander's question. King Solomon had one thousand and four hundred chariots and twelve thousand horsemen. I will ask a question, How many times is chimney found in the Bible and where?

Your unknown friend,

Age 13. Emma Hood.

Newells, N. C., Mar. 23, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I have been going to school, but it is out now. My teacher was Mr. John McMurray. I studied grammar, geography, fifth reader, Harrington speller, United States history, and Arithmetic. I have one sister and two brothers. I am the oldest. I can help my papa to plow, hoe and pick cotton. I can pick one hundred and fifteen pounds in a day.

Your friend,

Reidsville, N. C., Mar. 29th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I enjoy the little letters and stories in the Standard. My Papa is a preacher and preaches in the Presbyterian Church. I had a Maltese cat and it died, and I have a little dog and his name is Shot, and the kitten would lie down by the stove and the cat would get up close to Shot and go to sleep and I was so sorry when he died. Just two or three nights before he died, he stood on a chair and would touch the things on the Christmas tree with his paw and jingle them. He would take a nap on the centre table from supper till bedtime, close up to the big lamp to keep warm. Brother and Carl had some goats. One of them got into the well and Mamma saw a colored man going past and he came in and went down in the well and tied a rope around the goat. He was pulled up and strange to say he was not hurt. They were so bad that we had to send them to Grand-mamma in Orange county. I would like to come to Charlotte some time.

Dear Standard:

As I haven't never written to you before I will write a short letter, as papa takes your nice paper now. I love to read the little folks' letters, and the other good pieces. I go to school at Bethel Academy. My teacher's name was Miss Lura Brown. I liked her very well. I studied spelling, arithmetic, geography, grammar, and United States history, and took writing lessons, and I also go to Sunday-school. We have a nice Sunday-school at our church. My teacher is Miss Mattie Knox. I like her fine for a teacher. Our pastor is Mr. John M. Grier; he is a good preacher. I will answer Eugeno Alexander's question—It was Solomon's drinking cups that were a gold sound 1 Kings, 10: 21, And he had a thousand and four hundred Chariots and he also had twelve thousand horsemen—found in 1 Kings 10: 26. I will ask the little friends a question, Where is the word Cottage found in the Bible? I will close for fear of the waste basket, hoping to see my letter in print.

Your friend,
Bruna McConnell.

Rockingham, N. C., Mar. 29, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I saw a letter that the "Standard" wrote to the little girls and boys and asked them to tell about their pets. I have one pet cat named "Robin Hood." When the house of one of our friends was burned, Robin asked their homeless cat to come and live with us. He is a yellow cat named "Sam." Robin loves him but if any of us pet him too much Robin whips him. Then there is a little chameleon who lives on the grape vine. He came out one day last week in a rusty old overcoat with a rag around his neck. I watched him pull it off and eat it up, then he had on a bright green spring suit. When he wants to look fierce he sticks out under his throat a rosecolored pouch, so I named him "Will Scarlet." As for trips, I have just got back from Charlotte where I went to have my eyes treated, and Brother Reid says that I must not go to school any more this year, but goodness! I can't stay in the third grade forever! Well, I will close now. Good-by.

Dulcie's Play-mate.

A story for very little girls.

This is about one little girl, or two little girls, which? I am not sure, so I will tell about it, and let you decide. We will call the first one Dulcie because I think that such a sweet name for a girl. When she was very little, although there were so many big folks in the house she was the only baby and so she had only grown-ups for play-mates until Bonnie came.

Now Bonnie is the other one that I am not snre about, but you shall hear.

Dulcie was so full of play that when night came Mamma had hard work to get her to go to bed happy. Now you know Mamma's don't like to see their babies go to sleep with tears on their cheeks and trouble in their faces, and she was holding Dulcie on her lap, and wondering what to do next when she looked up and saw Bonnie. Yes there she was in the window pane close by!

"Oh, Dulcie," said Mamma, "just look at Bonnie come to see you, and to be rocked with you. She's been playing all day, and now she's come to put in her white gown and be rocked and sung to; and we must hurry for she's tired and she can't go to sleep till you do."

And Dulcie all delight at seeing a baby play-mate began to laugh and stretch out her hands, at the dear brown eyed little creature in the window who laughed and reached out too; and so they were friends at once, who every night, were undressed and cuddled and sung to sleep together. The little frown that gathered on Dulcie's forehead when she heard of bed-time always vanished as she leaned over and saw her comrade waiting for her. So presently the brown heads cuddled down, and Mamma began to sing a song of her own invention to the time of "London's burning." "Gandman's coming, Look out, look out, Shut your peepers little babies." When these words are said over and over they are soothing and soon both pairs of peepers were fast closed.

As Dulcie grew older her curiosity about the dear little friend who nodded and smiled and beckoned to her increased, and she asked many questions about her,—above all when she stayed in day light, and at last Mamma showed her. She took the little girl to the bureau, and stood her on a chair so that she could look in the glass. Sure enough, there stood Bonnie Leigh.

Dorothy's Mistake.

Dorothy had quite a long talk with mamma as to what she would wear. Mamma suggested a pretty new gingham as being dainty and suitable if they should want to play games.

"But, mamma," said Dorothy, "Marian's friend is from Boston, and her father is a m—m—"

"Millionaire?" suggested her mamma.

"Yes, mamma; and they live in a grand house, and have a cottage at the seashore, and—and—do you think she would play rough games as we do? O mamma, I would like to wear my pink silk."

Mamma smiled. She knew that Boston little girls were very much like other little girls; but it was hard to resist her daughter's pleading eyes, and it was better for her to learn some things for herself. So mamma helped her on with the pink silk. It was a pretty dress, of the soft pinky tint one sees in the inside of a seashell; and it was kept for very, very grand occasions.

Smiling, Marian opened the door. For an instant there was a blank look in here eyes; but it melted, into a smile as she helped Dorothy take off her hat, and led her into the parlor to meet the little guest. Dorothy fancied that little Miss Boston also looked troubled for an instant, but she smiled very pleasantly.

Dorothy noticed at once that both little girls were plainly clad, and it made her feel quite over-dressed; but Marian ran upstairs for her dolls, and the little girls were soon seated on the sofa, admiring Majorie and chatting merrily.

Suddenly Marian's brother Rob burst into the room in such a startling costume! It was not a baseball rig, and yet it was something like one—bright red and yellow and curiously puffed and slashed.

"Come on, girls!" he cried impatiently. "It's after two, and we're all ready. Harry Lee brought his trick monkey," he added with a delightful grin.

Marian gasped, and Miss Boston's upper lip trembled a little; but they were brave little girls, and very polite. They exchanged looks. It would never do to take that silk dress to the barn.

"Not this time, Rob," said Marian, quietly giving him a warning glance; for she saw a troubled look on Dorothy's face. But Rob was so stupid!

"Aw! why?" he cried. "When you've been talkin' about it all day? What's got the matter with you?"

"We're not going, Rob," said Marian, firmly, with a little spark in her eyes.

Rob turned and stamped down the hall and slammed the door. The pleasure was gone from his afternoon; for he, too, had counted on dazzling Miss Boston with his trapeze performance.

While Marian was trying desperately to think of something to say the troubled look on dear little Dor's face deepened. Suddenly all the visiting dignity disappeared, and she buried her head in Marjorie Marie's ruffled skirt with wild sobs.

"Oh, I wish I had my gingham dress on!" she wailed.

Then the other girls burst into tears. They crept as close to Dorothy as they could, but did not dare to put their arms around her on account of the pink silk. How Dorothy hated it!

All at once Marian sprang to her feet. "Come up stairs and put on one of mine!" she cried excitedly.

Up the broad stairs the three little girls tore wildly, leaving that elegant French lady doll with her waxen smile buried in the fur rug in front of the sofa.

"Hurry, hurry!" cried Marian, as they struggled with the fastenings of the gingham, which was a trifle small for plump Dor. "We'll be in time, after all."

A moment later Marian was pounding on the barn door. Rob thrust his head out. He grinned broadly before he thought, then he took in the smile and put on an injured look.

"I dunno whether I'm going to let you in or not," he growled.

But he did at last, although he continued to look grum until Marian took him aside and whispered something in his ear. After that he beamed again. He fairly outdid himself in his trapeze performance, and felt fully repaid when he heard Miss Boston say with a chirp of delight, "Why, he's like a real show man!"

Then there was a trick dog, then other boys performed, and last of all the trick monkey brought down the house with his funny antics. Then followed a glorious romp in the hay-mow and a delicious lunch of apple turnovers and ginger snaps. "I never had such a good time in all my life before," said Dorothy, as she smoothed her tangled locks and donned her pink dress again.

"I never did either," said Miss Boston. "That is the beautifullest dress I ever saw," she added. "I mean to ask my mamma to buy me one just like it." Dorothy smiled blissfully. A Sleepy-Time Story.

Ruth Sprague in The New York Press.

Can't get to sleep, my little boy, Phil? I'll tell you a story, if you'll keep still. There once was a giant who grew so high that he bumped his head on the evening sky;

And he thought a star was a firefly, For it burned his ear and went whizzing by.

With one big gulp he swallowed the sea, And he said: "This drink tasted gritty to me;"

He had swallowed clamshells and all, you see!

Huge roast turkeys he bites to him. He swallowed a thousand and still was slim.

He ate green cheese from the moon's pale rim,

And that's why the moonlight has grown so dim.

He thought the mountains were ant hills, too,

So he trod them down with his monstrous shoe,

And then he cried for something to do, He cried, "Oh, dear!" and he cried, "Boo, hoo!"

Then he cried salt tears till an ocean grew,

There his tear drops fell—this is truly true—

A monstrous ocean, all white and blue! But when he saw what his tears could do,

He wiped his eyes on a big white cloud, Then he wrung it out as he laughed aloud.

You thought it was thunder and hid your head

Under the sheets in the small white bed, And out you did not dare to peep,

Till the great big giant fell fast asleep, A-sleep—a-sleep a-slee—py sleep!

My boy and his giant are fast asleep.

A TRAIN FOR MILLIONAIRES

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

He was engaged to be married, and everyone knows how the engaged man talks when he gets a friend cornered.

"She is the loveliest and best girl that ever lived," he asserted.

"Sure?" inquired the friend.

"Sure! Of course I'm sure. You don't doubt it, do you?"

"Certainly not," replied the friend hastily, "only—"

"Only what?"

"Oh, I suppose it's all right, but I'd like to introduce you to Doble."

"Who's Doble?"

"Oh, another friend of mine, who told me yesterday that he was engaged to the loveliest and best girl that ever lived, and I'd like to have you two get together and settle the matter."—Chicago Post.

Judge.

Dressmaker—standing off and admiring it—"What a beautiful fit!"

Customer—"Yes, and what a beautiful fit my husband will have when he sees the bill!"

The present occupant of the White House until the recent renovation found it cramped quarters for a large family. With one or two of the little Roosevelts off at boarding-school, there were enough beds to go around but none to spare. Well, last winter the President was entertaining a foreign envoy of great state and many years, and invited him to the White House over Sunday. He was put in Ethel's room and Ethel, when she came back from school Saturday, went up to sleep with Alice, but unfortunately Kermit did not know of this arrangement.

So when early morning came, mindful of his strenuous inheritance, he crept to Ethel's room with a pitcher of water, and softly opening the door without awakening the slumbering ambassador, dashed forward and threw the icy water over the bed, with the shout: "Get up, you old lazy bones, get up!"

Then, when a gray head was lifted from the pillows, dripping and alarmed, the astonishment was mutual and the departure of the youngster instantaneous—without his pitcher.

First Lawyer: "How much is Jagsby's estate worth?"

Second Lawyer: "About ten thousand to Jagsby and two hundred thousand to us."—Life.

"If you had eight pennies and Billy had four, and you took his and put them to yours, what would that make?"

"Make trouble, I' spects 'cos I'd have to fight him 'bout it!"—London Punch.

An old man was passing the house one Sunday, taking exceedingly short steps. A little girl watched him for several minutes, and then said, "Mamma don't he walk stingy?"—Woman's Home Companion.

The Second Story Man—Well, Bill, how's business?

The Bank Burglar—Well, we're havin' a lot of competition from de fellers on de inside.—Puck.

Duty is what we think about when ill, or are reminded of by creditors.—Davidson's "Dumas."

Barber—How's the razor, sir?

Customer—Did'nt know I was being shaved.

Barber (flattered)—Very glad, I'm sure, sir.

Customer—I thought I was being sand-papered.

Aunt—"Arthur, how does it happen that Willie Jones is promoted at school so much oftener than you other boys are?" Arthur—"Huh! His father's a promoter!"—Chicago Daily News.

Visitor—That young fellow seems rather pert; acted as if he knew more than you. Merchant—Naturally. Visitor—Naturally? Merchant—He's my son.—Philadelphia Press.

Home Sunshine.

Very few housewives know the real value of a smile. If they did they would indulge in this inexpensive nerve tonic more frequently. How easy and harmonious the days go by if instead of a frown, the busy wives took a more hopeful view of everything and wore a smile on their faces. In overcoming household worries the smile is a doughty warrior, and seeming difficulties, when met with a hee ful smile, often melt away.

Children should be encouraged to smile, for it helps to cultivate a cheerful and aimable temperament, and does much to keep their young bodies in good order. In the sick-room, therefore, amusing and entertaining books only should be allowed, and less physic will be needed. During meals talking of a light nature should be allowed, for ten smiles during dinner will do a great deal to aid a weak stomach in digesting food. No matter how irritable and tired your husband is after a hard day's work, if he is greeted with a smile at home it will act like a stimulant to his flagging spirits.—Exchange.

Mushroom pancakes—Peel and chop some small white mushrooms and season with pepper and salt. Fry lightly in a little butter, have ready a fried pancake, spread the mixture over and put over this another pancake, press them together lightly and set in the oven a minute. Serve with mushroom catsup.

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL

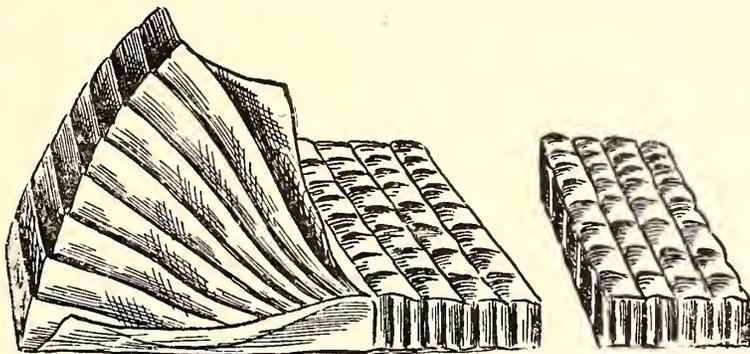

POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

Event and Comment.

Through the courtesy of the Church Standard, we are able to present to our readers the excellent engraving of Dean Farrar.

A Catholic exchange says that we must be Catholics or Rationalists. We have, ourselves, often wondered at the irrationalism of Catholicism.

The Christian Endeavorers are going to meet in Denver this year, on July 9. A tremendous gathering is expected and Denver is preparing a Western welcome.

We knew it was coming. Still we are sorry to see it. The Interior has an editorial on Palm Sunday, preceding its customary one on Easter. Presently it may get to observing Mid-Lent.

Rev. B. B. Warfield, D. D., criticises the English of the proposed additions to the Confession. The point of that joke is that Dr. Warfield should be teaching Henry Van Dyke a correct style.

Dr. and Mrs. Cuyler have recently celebrated their golden wedding and the Standard in behalf of all its readers joins its congratulations and well wishes to those of their hosts of friends all over the world.

The Pennsylvania Railroad is advertising a Home Mission tour, taking in the General Assembly at Los Angeles, for some $160. We wonder if it would not be better for the travelers to stay at home and send the money to the missionaries.

A respectable district in Brooklyn lately refused to allow a Y. M. C. A. to be built there, because it was for colored women. It looks as though it were a long way from the dream of the early abolitionists that a negro woman would some day be elected President of the United States.

The Southwestern takes us to task for publishing "the contradictory expressions of different witnesses." It is still thought to be the best journalism, in some quarters, to publish one side of a question, and to discredit what is said on the other, but he who knows only one side does not know that.

An exchange notes that the gifts of the Anglican Church for Foreign Missions are decreasing in proportion to the increase of the adornment of the home churches and administrative expenses generally. Too much alb and amice and biretta. Too little of judgment and the love of God. Ritualism and Missions are mutually exclusive.

"There are seventeen Protestant and twenty-two Catholic Churches in Manila, and the Catholics have been there as many centuries as the Protestants have been years."—Dominion Presbyterian.

If we had known in time that this was an advance editorial note of the Dominion Presbyterian, we should not have published it first.

So W. P. Fife has clerical sore throat and has gone to selling mining stocks. The man who sells mining stocks without any practical knowledge of mines is going into a gambling game with the cards stacked against his customers. And the worst of it is, that the Fife concern is evidently banking on Fife's reputation as a preacher of the gospel. It is a sad business.

After writing the editorial, A Significant Confession, we read a review of two books, in the Church Standard. The article was called, The Recoil from Destructive Criticism, and its opening sentence was, "We have long believed that the day of destructive criticism is fast passing to its close." So the two Standards wave together on this question.

Mr. Dooley once remarked that whether or not the constitution followed the flag it was clear that the Supreme Court followed the election returns. It has not been noticeable for the last few years that the Supreme Court of Presbyterianism followed the suggestions of its religious papers. But it is evident enough that the Christian Observer follows the election returns from the General Assembly.

It is just as well to remember that the commercial papers who are opposed to all legislation against child-labor are the ones that are screaming themselves hoarse about the meddlesomeness of the Southern Education Board. One of the Southern members of that Board gathered some statistics about child-labor in the cotton mills. Hence those tears. It is bad enough to put the dollar above the man. It is worse to put the dollar above the child.

Representatives of the Congregational, Christian Connection, Methodist Protestant and United Brethren Churches, are to meet in Pittsburg, April 22, to discuss a union of these Churches. We note that the Cumberland Presbyterian Church is not represented. After all its abuse of Calvinism it seems to prefer waiting the chance to be invited into the Calvinistic Camp. And we do not look for any of the others to be united except the United Brethren.

The Rev. Dr. Rainsford was guilty, not long ago, of a piece of profanity in the pulpit, for which he apologized like a man. He recently shocked his Episcopal brethren in Philadelphia with an expression in a sermon with which the Standard is not going to shock its readers. Profanity and blasphemy do not lose their immorality through repetition, but sometime gain in that respect, because of less provocation. Dr. Rainsford seems to have taken a part of New York, with his practical work among the poor. But he that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a city.

We give in our news columns the account of another Presbyterian University, called the Texas Presbyterian University. We learn from the address of Dr. W. H. Clagett, its founder, that "to-day the eyes of the entire nation are gazing with admiration upon the light of the star that rests over the place where the young child lies." We herewith nominate the Rev. W. H. Clagett, D. D., for the professorship of Sacred Rhetoric in the "Texas Presbyterian University."

Rev. W. H. Clagett, D. D., also says: "Its financial affairs are separated entirely from any church court, thus protecting it from the weakness that comes from the control by a body of men, ministers of the Gospel, the very nature of whose calling, if they are faithful to the work God has committed to them, unfits them for large financial transactions." Rev. W. H. Clagett is a minister. We would not presume to say that he has been unfaithful to his work as a minister. The inference is that he is unfitted for large financial transactions. We have been inclined to the same view, from the reports received from the Presbyterian ministry in Texas, whom Dr. Clagett calls "the only pessimists that I have met concerning the Texas Presbyterian University." The editor of the Standard begs leave to be enrolled among the pessimists on this particular point.

A Significant Confession.

The editor of a newspaper has one advantage which is sometimes forgotten by his constituents, the opportunity of a wide survey of the field of current opinion by means of his exchanges. It is a temptation as well as an opportunity. It is possible so to mass the testimony in favor of an opinion and so to neglect that on the other side as to convey a false impression. This, by the way, is one of the most familiar tricks of the trade. But the earnest and conscientious seeker after truth, possessing in moderate degree the judicial temperament, not swayed by partisanship or anchored to his own infallibility, occupies a most favorable position for rightly interpreting the signs of the times, because of this courtesy between papers that are congenial or helpful to each other which is known as the exchange list.

From this point of vantage the Standard has ventured to give to its readers the assurance that a strong reaction has set in against the extreme views of the Higher Criticism, a reaction that is felt by some that were once extremists themselves. In the religious press, generally, there is a much more conservative tone than was noticeable even five years ago and the radical positions are becoming more and more unpopular. For example, an article published some months ago in the Outlook, by Theodore D. Bacon, met with a storm of criticism from the correspondents of the Outlook and the editorial writers of other journals not considered the soundest, and received but a half-hearted defence in the Outlook itself. Mr. Bacon has broken out again, and his subject is The Coming Religious Problem. It is not our purpose to discuss the article itself. It will be abundantly attended to. We call attention to the following significant confession: "To sum up, in a word, the results which we have reached, the problem which we have to meet is 'How to maintain the spiritual life of the Church in view of the changed views concerning the Bible and the consequent undermining of our religious faith?' " We are not concerned with his attempted answer, which is miserably inadequate: "The answer to the problem I find to lie in a 'new theology,' founded on God's revelation of himself in human nature, of which the revelation in the Bible forms a most important part. For practical purposes the points on which we need to lay greatest emphasis at the present time are liturgy, authority, and most of all, the reality and necessity of the new birth." Liturgy is called for by the departures from Unitarianism into the Episcopal and Catholic Churches. Authority is to be found in "a theology based on the needs of the human heart," and even the last requisite is explained by the author's opinion that "regeneration is a normal event in human development."

Note well that the undermining of our religious faith is consequent upon our changed views concerning the Bible. We called the former article by Mr. Bacon "A Death-wound to the Higher Criticism." That ism might well say to this latest advocacy of its claims, "An enemy hath done this."

Even in the Theodore Baconian view, the Bible contains a revelation of God. It is a reasonable assumption that this revelation is what the Revealer wanted it to be. The Bible contains so many utterances as to the value and necessity of faith that it is impossible not to include them as a part of the revelation which the Bible contains. "Without faith it is impossible to please God." "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." "He that believeth shall be saved." It would be difficult to over-state the importance which the Bible attaches to faith.

And it is equally evident that there was and still is a view of the Bible that strengthens faith in God and in God's Son. It has been held by prophets and apostles and martyrs. It has been the inspiration of those lives of whom the world was not worthy. It has been the comfort of millions of dying saints and the consolation of the sorrowing in all the ages. Apparently this old, though by no means antiquated view, was admirably adapted for creating and increasing the great essential of the religion of the Bible, namely, faith.

And the "changed view," says Mr. Bacon, "results in the undermining of religious faith." The old view maintained the spiritual life of the Church in much darker days than our own time. The problem, now, says Mr. Bacon, is "how to maintain the spiritual life of the Church" with these changed views. Unbelief is one consequence of the changed views. Spiritual death is threatened, as another consequence. The practical mind is tempted to ask, "Cui bono?" What is the value of a view of God's revelation of himself that destroys faith and imperils the very spiritual life of the Church? Even Mr. Bacon seems to feel that he has a problem, in this loss of faith and spiritual life. He admits that both are desirable. Not irreverently, therefore, we would press upon him and all his kind the alternatives which his confession presents. Either God was mistaken in the worth of the instrument which he designed for the promotion of religious faith, or, that view of the Bible which undermines religious faith is a mistaken view. If the changed view is not as destructive of humility as it is of faith, it would seem that the latter alternative might at least be considered, even by the advocates of the changed view.

Retreating in Disorder.

They have a genius on the editorial staff of the Christian Observer. We do not presume to say who he is, but we wish to express our admiration for the successful performance of most difficult "stunts," to use a word that will soon be in the dictionaries. He can carry water on both shoulders, the buckets brimming full, and not spill a drop. He can balance himself on the top rail of a line fence and defy a suit for trespass from the property owners on either side. He can skate on the thinnest ice without breaking through. He can come as near concealing an opinion in a maze of words as any juggler with language that ever lived. And he can reverse himself without appearing to change his course. If he had lived in the times of the Delphic Oracle he would have been invaluable in the concoction of phrases which would mean everything or nothing and would suit in any circumstances. His generalities are so glittering that they fairly hurt the eyes. Let the paper take an unpopular position, say from 1894 to 1900, on the question of Organic Union. He can write an editorial in 1900 which will clearly show that the Southern Church ought never to have agitated such a question. Or, if the paper has been too outspoken in its hostility to the making of a Southern hymn-book, he can smooth things over with a velvet touch and show what an excellent book has been produced by a policy of criticism and delay. The latest feat is an editorial advocating either a foot-note or an amendment to the Confession of Faith on the elect infant clause! It is a master-piece. If it were not for the troublesome fact of a record on that question, one would suppose that the Observer had never put forth its doctrine as to the doubtfulness of infant salvation; had never opposed either a foot-note or an amendment, and had never had anything to do with that "fifth resolution" which opposed the amendment of the Confession on the ground that the "Confession of Faith goes as far as the Scriptures justify a credal statement upon this subject."

The editorial describes that fifth reason as having "simply asserted that the Confession is in harmony with the Scriptures upon the subject of the salvation of those who die in infancy." That is certainly safer, for present purposes, than quoting the resolution. It declares that the Jackson Assembly, which unanimously rescinded the fifth reason, and gave a positive declaration of faith in the salvation of all dying in infancy, "repeated in slightly different phrase the action of the two previous Assemblies." We take off our hat to such an exhibition of pure genius, and carefully conceal any opinion as to its moral quality.

The article admits that the question has not been "settled to the satisfaction of all parties in our Church." It therefore proposes first, that the negative foot-note of the Atlanta Assembly, that the Confession does not teach that any infants are lost, be sent down to the Presbyteries for adoption in a constitutional way, just as an amendment to the Confession is adopted. The only constitutional way in which a foot-note ever was adopted, judging by precedent, was the adoption by an Assembly. And we do not believe that the Southern Church, as represented by its genuine Southern instincts for straightforwardness, is going to take all that trouble merely to dodge the issue and leave it still an "open question," whether all those dying in infancy are saved or not. If it is going to amend, it will mend, and there will be no patch-work about it. As a second alternative the Observer actually proposes an amendment to the text. William McKinley once said that the tariff ought to be revised, but it should be revised in the house of its friends. If the Confession is to be amended on the subject of infant salvation it should have the amendment framed by those who believe in infant salvation. The Observer thinks that it would be useless to send down an amendment saying that all infants dying in infancy are included in the election of grace. So the Observer proposes to insert "persons" for "infants" and make the clause read, "Elect persons dying in infancy are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit." Now, we have no means of knowing what a constitutional majority of the Presbyteries would do as to amending the Confession so as to declare unequivocally and unmistakably that all the dead children are saved. We have never attempted to dictate to any court of the Church, and much prefer the advocacy of right causes to the securing of a majority vote on any compromise with the truth.

But we believe that if such a proposal should fail it would be on account of a natural and in some respects praiseworthy reluctance to amend the Confession, and not because the Church would hesitate to declare that all the dead children are saved.

And we feel sure also that every reader of the Observer, outside its editorial staff, will see the consummate folly of the amendment it proposes. As a defence of the Confession as it stands it is all well enough to say that the framers of the Confession meant "elect persons dying in infancy," when they said "elect infants." But to change the Confessional language would be simply to raise the old question, Does not the phrase "elect persons dying in infancy," imply that there are non-elect persons who die in infancy? And the last state of the Confession would be infinitely worse than the first.

But it is encouraging to see the Observer pressing for some change in the present language and the Central willing to accept an addition. It looks as if the doubtful brethren were really on the run and willing to take to cover anywhere. If only one of them who has the courage of his misgivings and the earnest conviction of his doubts could find a publisher and put down in cold type his views of the possibility or probability of infant damnation, the Assembly and the Presbyteries would come pretty near to voting unanimously the other way. If the Central and the Southwestern and the Observer and the Quarterly and Union Seminary Magazine have closed their columns to that side of the question, the Standard will try to print the production, unless our Twentieth Century type-setting machine and printing press absolutely refuse to take part in such a medieval anachronism.

An Instance of ### the Higher Criticism.

There are Higher Critics and Higher Critics. Higher Criticism is the discussion of such subjects as the date and authorship of the Books of the Bible or parts of those books. The Central Presbyterian, of April 1, furnishes an editorial example of the Higher Criticism in discussing the authorship of Psalm 119, and the part of the Bible already written to which that psalm refers, on the theory of the Davidic authorship. We are obliged to confess, however, that the Central is stronger on botany and ornithology than it is on the Higher Criticism, even at the unattractive season of the year between the giving out of the hay and the coming in of the grass.

Says the Central: "There is little or nothing in the scattering teaching of modern criticism to discredit the Davidic authorship of the long acrostic, the 119th Psalm. It contains nothing that demands a later date. It is like David and is worthy of David and from early Hebrew times was ascribed to David. Its sentiments perfectly harmonize with what the historical books teach concerning David's obedience and his zeal for God's glory." Now, this is exactly the method of the Higher Criticism, applying uninspired traditions, and literary likenesses, with some a priori considerations, to the determining of a problem of date and authorship.

We know there is a current opinion that David wrote all the psalms. But we always supposed that it was current among the people who believe that John the Baptist wrote the Book of Revelation and are fond of quoting from the Scriptures those two very useful texts, that "Cleanliness is next to godliness" and that "He tempereth the wind to the shorn lamb." Not so very long ago our friend, the editor of the Biblical Recorder, had a touching description of David out in the fields with his sheep, composing the Ninetieth Psalm, which is called in its Hebrew inscription and almost universally agreed among scholars to be "The Prayer of Moses, the Man of God." But then accidents will happen. When we ask, What authority does "modern criticism" discredit in denying the Davidic authorship of the 119th Psalm? we believe that the Central would be hard put to it for an answer.

Far be it from us to decide this problem of the Higher Critics. Still, we may be allowed to question that "from early Hebrew times it was ascribed to David." If so, there would probably be a Hebrew inscription to that effect. And the Central is considerably off its reckoning in ascribing to the "scattering teachings of modern criticism," the doubt as to David's authorship. A certain John Calvin, of Geneva, Switzerland, (for further information see a little book by Rev. John W. Stagg, D. D.) says on this point: "Concerning the author I affirm nothing, because one cannot by any probable conjecture guess who he was, neither does there appear any certainty in it, according to the unanimous opinion of interpreters. As David, however, excelled all others in this gift, I shall make no conscience to put in his name now and then." Dr. J. A. Alexander, in his admirable work on the Psalms, edition of 1861, quotes "some of the best interpreters" as holding that it was written "for the use of the returned Jews at or near the time of the founding of the second temple," and does not give any view of his own in opposition to this. We suppose that Calvin and Dr. Alexander will be acquitted of the sin of being "modern." Perowne, one of the soundest and most conservative of the commentators on the Psalms, gives three reasons for its being "probably referred to a time subsequent to the return from the Babylonish captivity."

And we think that the reader who will consider that there is not a word in the Bible to indicate that David wrote this psalm and will read it with an open mind will lean to the opinion that the writer's references to alien princes and kings, the persecutions from those in authority over him, for the sake of his religion, the temptation to idolatrous worship and other minute points are indications that it does not belong to David's time.

But our Higher Critic of the Central makes a point against other Higher Critics thus: "To him (the author of the psalm) the collection of the early Hebrew Scriptures was the Word of God. These very books, the Pentateuch, Deuteronomy, the Chronicles and the Kings, over which the critics are now contending, and tearing into pieces, these very books to his devout soul were God's own Word, and his language is exhausted in the repetition of its praises.

"The 119th Psalm seals the early Hebrew Scriptures as David had them and out of his own happy and profound experience of them, he testifies for them against the irreverent criticism of our day; against Robertson Smith and George Adam Smith and Lyman Abbott, and all the rest."

Softly there, dear critic. Haven't you made a slight mistake? If we understand you, you are contending for the Davidic authorship of the 119th Psalm against the "scattering teachings of modern criticism." While admitting the possibility of a different author, you say that the author refers to the books of Kings and Chronicles which made up a part of the Word, and that David thus seals the early Hebrew Scriptures against the irreverent criticism of our day, the critics, such as the two Smiths mentioned and Lyman Abbott, being now engaged in tearing to pieces these very books, among others.

Now the common Jewish tradition is that Ezra wrote Chronicles or at least edited that book, arranging the historical matter already gathered, of course under inspiration. And Ezra lived a long time after David. It happens that the First Book of Chronicles closes with the account of David's death, and it is difficult to see how David could have written that. There is one part of the Pentateuch that most Higher Critics refer to some other author than Moses, namely, the account of Moses' death and burial. Further, the Second Book of Chronicles continues the account of Solomon and tells of the other Kings of Judah and the Kings of Israel too, down to the destruction of Jerusalem, the last verse mentioning Cyrus the Persian. Yet the Central intimates that this is a historical book and not a prophetic, as must have been the case if its contents were known to David. Stranger still, the first chapter of the First Book of Kings contains the account of David's death, so it is difficult to see how he could have referred to these books in writing the 119th psalm. In fact this exhibition of Higher Criticism is about as puzzling as anything that the other Smiths aforesaid or Lyman Abbott ever wrote.

Seriously, we should not have called attention to this pardonable slip, for accidents will happen in the best regulated families and newspaper offices, except for the intolerance of the first paragraph. There is a legitimate research into the things which are not plainly set down in Scripture. Such research is not only allowable but a duty. And to include the inquiry of reverent scholars into the authorship of an anonymous psalm with the "scattering teachings of modern criticism" is an appeal to the ignorance or the prejudices of the reader that certainly was out of place in a Presbyterian paper, published under the eaves of that famous school of the prophets, Union Seminary, Virginia.

The honest desire to help other people, will, in the quickest and delicatest ways, improve yourself.—John Ruskin.

The South Atlantic University.

Great is the power of an idea. It only needs persistence on the part of its holder to become a reality. The Synod of North Carolina has annually smiled a broad smile, and appointed, at Dr. Shearer's request, the regents of the South Atlantic University. The editor of the Standard has had his little jokes at it, as the years passed by. And Dr. Shearer has never lost faith, and has proved superior to smiles and witticisms, and made his annual report.

And now it looks as though the regents of the South Atlantic University would really have something to rule after a while.

By the way, why would not that name do for the Presbyterian University that is to be at Atlanta? It will be Presbyterian, and yet it would be just as well not to call it Presbyterian. The Episcopal University is known as Sewanee. The Methodist University is known as Vanderbilt. The South Atlantic at Atlanta appears to belong to the eternal fitness of things.

It may be that the University has not come just as Dr. Shearer hoped it would. He may not approve the removal of Clarksville and Columbia. But he is the real father of the University, nevertheless. And we have written this to let him know that the great cause of Christian Education in the Southern Church is for all time connected with his name and that his brethren recognize his influence in this crown of the Presbyterian system, a real Presbyterian University.

And it seems to us that Columbia and Clarksville need not merge their identity even to the giving up of the names by which they are known. Why should there not be a Columbia Seminary and a Clarksville College of the South Atlantic University?

And surely this great opportunity is not going to be lost to our Church for the sake of a few local claims and local pride. To lose a quarter of a million dollars in order to show the usefulness of ten thousand would be poor economy. And especially when the effort has so signally failed to raise an adequate endowment for Columbia Seminary it seems to us that it would be a log-in-the-manger policy to refuse such an offer, carrying with it, as it does, a promise of usefulness for that noble institution, that will eclipse its former greatness even in its palmy day.

Dean Farrar of Canterbury.

The late Dean Farrar was a man of varied gifts who gave to the Church at large much valuable service. He was born in India in 1831, his father being chaplain of the fort of Bombay. At Cambridge he won the Chancellor's prize for a poem entitled "The Arctic Regions," and was ordained a priest in 1857. As headmaster of Marlborough college he achieved success in the same line as that of Arnold of Rugby. He became an ordinary chaplain of Queen Victoria; canon of Westminster Abbey, rector of St. Margaret's Church, Archdeacon of Westminster and Dean of Canterbury successively.

As a preacher Dean Farrar did not rank with Liddon, Spurgeon and Parker, but his sermons were polished, earnest and rich in illustrations. The amount of his literary work is surprising. His works on the life of Christ, the life of Paul and the early Church have circulated largely and when we realize that his many books were written while he was in the midst of his pastoral duties, taking his share in the burdens of the day, we can see how industriously he must have labored.

He had a great yearning sympathy for the man who was hungry for the truth and the man who wrought righteousness, no matter in what age or country or faith.

When Dr. Pusey attacked his lecture on "Eternal Hope," in which he combats the doctrine of everlasting punishment, Dr. Farrar replied with an exposition of his theme entitled "Mercy and Judgment," going deep into the original and transferred meanings of the Hebrew and Greek, but from this time on, his orthodoxy was questioned. His efforts to better the condition of young men in London, his prominence in the great temperance fights in Great Britain and his own pure and upright life, in addition to the power of his intellect and the beauty of his rhetoric, made him a man that the people delighted to honor.

During the last thirty years he labored abundantly, and when disabled by creeping paralysis to continue active service, he was carried to the Cathedral regularly that he might worship with his people.

Review of Contemporaries.

A noteworthy fact has come to our knowledge: A Presbyterian minister, one of the most noted in this country, a Higher Critic to the verge of destructiveness, but never wholly removing his foot from the solid foundation, for ten years devoted the Sunday evening discourse to critical discussions, and to bringing as far as possible the doctrines of revelation into harmony with current critical and scientific ideas, so as to make them acceptable to many who are skeptical. Within two years he has come to this conclusion: "I am having large congregations and I am making the people that come to hear me thinkers; they get the best ideas that I can give them, but I am not succeeding in making them Christians." He has therefore entirely changed his style, being convinced that men are not saved by doubts or critical questionings, but by affirmations supported by human experience, by statements of known and felt wants, and by the fervent presentation of remedies provided for them. Meeting this minister one evening in company with another equally eminent Presbyterian minister, shortly before the meeting of the late General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in this city, and having read reports of many of his evening discourses, we asked him the result of those services. To our surprise we received the admission that so far as making men Christians was concerned his efforts had been a failure. He then gave us the particulars above-mentioned.—The New York Advocate.

Book Notices.

From Love to Praise. Rev. Herrick Johnson, D. D., LL. D. The Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia, Penn. Price 75 cts. net.

Dr. Herrick Johnson needs no introduction to our readers, and this little book, containing eight sermons will be valuable addition to any library. The titles are: The Love of God for Every Man. Emptying the Sepulchre of a Dead Soul. The Word of God as a Character Builder. The Labor Question in the Kingdom of God. The Inescapable Conclusion. The Intermediate State. What shall the Resurrection Body Be? God's Great Praising Day.

"Dwellers in the Mist." Norman Maclean. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York City. Price $1.50.

Norman Maclean is a new and promising candidate for literary honors. The title of the book is a happy one, and the life he pictures is simple, poor, narrow. The minister, William Macleod, is a loveable man, made as tender as a woman by the loss of a little child, and he stands out a strong and striking figure. The descriptions are effective and while the book is sad, there are gleams of humour that lighten the shadows. It is a primitive society on the rock-bound islands off the West coast of Scotland, a society that has stern ideals and follows them with an earnestness born of strength.

Devotional.

Peace.

Is this the peace of God, this strange, sweet calm?
The weary day is at its zenith still;
Yet 'tis as if, beside some cool, clear rill,
Through shadowy stillness rose an evening psalm,
And all the noise of life was hushed away,
And tranquil gladness reigned with gentle, soothing sway.

It was not so just now. I turned aside
With aching head, and heart most sorely bowed;
Around me care and griefs in crushing crowd;
While inly rose the sense, in swelling tide,
Of weakness, insufficiency, and sin,
And fear, and gloom, and doubt in mighty flood rolled in.

That rushing flood I had no strength to meet,
Nor power to flee; my present, future, past,
Myself, my sorrow, and my sin I cast,
In utter helplessness at Jesus' feet;
Then bent me to the storm, if such His will,
He saw the winds and waves, and whispered, "Peace, be still."

And there was calm. Oh, Saviour, I have proved
That Thou to help and save art really near;
How else this quiet rest from grief and fear,
And all distress? The cross is not removed,
I must go forth to bear it as before;
But, leaning on Thine arm, I dread its weight no more.

Is it, indeed, Thy peace? I have not tried
To analyze my faith, dissect my trust,
Or measure if belief be full and just;
And therefore claim Thy peace. But Thou hast died,
I know that this is true and true for me
And knowing it, I come and cast my all on Thee.

It is not that I feel less weak, but Thou
Wilt be my strength; it is not that I see Less sin, but there is pardoning love with Thee,
And all-sufficient grace: Enough! And now
I do not think or pray, I only rest,
And feel that Thou art near, and know that I am blest.
—Frances Ridley Havergal.

Gather Sunshine.

Some persons are like the human heart, inasmuch as they sprinkle rest and kindness and heart's-ease all through their daily tasks. They weave a bright thread of thankful happiness through the web and woof of life's pattern. They are never too busy to say a kind word or to do a gentle deed. They may be compelled to sigh betimes, but amid their sighs are smiles that drive away the cares. They find sunbeams scattered in the trail of every cloud. They gather flowers where others see nothing but weeds. They pluck little sprigs of rest where others find only thorns of distress.

Like the human heart, they make much of the little opportunities presented to them. They rest that they may have strength for others. They gather sunshine with which to dissipate the shadows about them.

The grandest conception of life is to esteem it as an opportunity for making others happy. He who is most true to his higher self is truest to the race. The lamp that shines brightest gives the most light to all about it.—Good Cheer.

If a man's earnest calling, to which of necessity the greater part of his thought is given, is altogether dissociated in his mind from his religion, it is not wonderful that his prayers should by degrees wither and die. The question is, whether they ever had much vitality.
—George Macdonald.

Prayer breathes hope and prayer without hope is sinful prayer.—John Sergieff.

The sin which is as dear as a right eye must be given up if we want the salvation of our souls.

Missionary.

Lies About Missionaries.

With the hackneyed objections to missionaries I have nothing to do; they are as cruel and unjust as they are untruthful. All of the so-called "looting," for which Peking missionaries have been denounced by men on this side of the world, never enriched an individual missionary or his mission by so much as a single tale. When "officers and gentlemen," legations' attaches, soldiers, sailors, and foreign merchants were plundering and helping themselves to everything on which they could lay their hands during the chaotic days that followed the fall of Peking, it is really surprising that a few missionaries did not "loot" more as the only means of providing food for the hundreds of starving converts dependent upon them. Equally outrageous is the charge that missionaries are as a rule men of little education and of less than average ability, who are enabled by their calling to live in China amid a luxury of surroundings that would be impossible for them in any occupation at home. In wretched little Chinese houses in the towns of Shansi and Shensi that are visited by about one white man in every two years, I have had the honor of dining with missionaries who were graduates of universities, who could have filled any pulpit, or who could have graced any assemblage in New York or London. . . . Of all the missionaries with whom I came in contact in the interior, I did not find one who was not both brave and honorable, or who would not willingly have given his life in the cause of the Christianity in which he believed. The faults of missionaries are all of the head, not of the heart.—Francis N. Nichols in the December Atlantic.

A Sorrowing Chinese Mother.

I have seen to-day one of the saddest scenes we see in China—the genuine sorrow of the Chinese woman over the fact that her son is a Christian. She, believing with all her heart that unless she is worshipped after death her spirit will wander, naked and homeless, throughout eternity, I can almost sympathize with her real heartache, for that is the punishment the Chinese fear more than that of hell itself.

They have very hazy ideas of the region of endless torment, and very definite ones of this, for have they not seen and heard the screeching of the spirits? They know this is true, for everybody believes it.

But she told a woman to-day, and I heard: "This foreign koo neung (lady) says that the Heavenly Father has a place prepared, raiment and food and happiness for those who believe in Jesus. Now, if that could be true, there really would be no use in having a son worship you, would there? But we have no proof of it. If I only knew whether it were true or not."

She had forbidden her daughter-in-law's becoming a Christian, in the hope that she may burn incense to her memory before the ancestral tablet, which will be some compensation, though she can never go to the grave and worship as her son might, if he would. Oh, if he only would! But this son has been a Christian nearly twenty years, and he has no idea of doing such a thing, and the poor old lady knows it.—Miss Claudia J. White, in Foreign Mission Journal.

Where Was It?

"Where wast Thou sick, Lord, and we knew it not?
Had we but known, how swift had been our feet
To bear us to Thy couch! Ah! service sweet,
To watch beside Thee in the dreariest spot."
"Far off I lay, in Heathen lands, forgot
By thee and all. The blood of lepers beat
In the poor limbs. . . . The sun
Shone in an Indian room; thou didst not see
My form on that bare floor. Those broken hearts
Thou didst not bind. For that thou hast not done
It unto those, thou didst it not to Me."

Sunday School Lesson.

CONDUCTED BY REV. H. G. HILL, D. D.

The Law of Love.

Romans 13: 7-14. April 19, 1903.

Christian love in its varied manifestations, is superior to many other precious Divine gifts and the chiefest of the graces. It is the "bond of perfectness," between living creatures and rational beings and the strongest link connecting earth with heaven. In its binding power, it far excels self-interest or similarity of tastes and pursuits or the warmest natural affection. Christian love is the grand regulative principle of the believer's life and produces in the world more good fruit than any other agency known to man. In this lesson the apostle treats of this grace and presents several important topics.

1. Rendering to all their Dues.—In social life and in its varied relations, this is needful to promote harmony and to impart happiness. Bitterness, bickerings, disputes, law-suits, and personal contests and national struggles are all the baneful fruits of withholding from human beings their just dues. If righteous claims were met, labor strikes and rail-road wars and bloody struggles would soon come to an end. The apostle then does not needlessly charge his brethren "Render therefore to all their dues, tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom, fear to fear and honor to whom honor." If this direction was followed men would not defraud the government, but would pay their taxes or custom duties fully and promptly. Professing Christians would not withhold their tribute from the Lord's treasury until the Almighty sent drought or short-crops or numerous calamities to collect His dues. They would "honor the Lord with their substance and with the first fruits of all their increase." If guided by this precept the grasping and the avaricious would not grind the faces of the poor nor seize upon the just wages of the laborer. If this command was obeyed reverence for parents and their authority would not be wanting in children, the hoary head would not lack due respect and the civil magistrate would receive proper honor in the right discharge of his functions.

2. Love Fulfilling the Law.—Paul affirms that the debt of love can never be fully paid. He says "Owe no man anything but to love one another," and adds "For he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law." He then declares each precept of the decalogue would be obeyed if men were actuated by Christian love. He also states that every command of the second table of the law would be complied with if a man followed the direction, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Not only the second table of the law prescribing our duty to man would be fulfilled by love, but the first table presenting our duty to God would be fully met if Christian love ruled the conduct. If supreme love for God and His law regulated the life, we would have no other gods before Him, we would only worship Him in appointed ways, we would keep His Sabbaths holy and pay profound reverence to His august person and names.

3. Casting off Works of Darkness.—If we rendered to God and our fellows the love which is their due, and if we were controlled by that grace which fulfills the Divine law we would separate from much evil or cast off the works of darkness. "Christian love, like the principle of vegetable life in spring-time, not only produces lovely flowers and fruits, but casts off dead and decaying things." Paul urges his brethren to awake to activity in the Gospel day, to abandon those practices that flourish in the night of ignorance, idolatry and superstition, and to "put on the armor of light." He enforces these exhortations by declaring "The night is far spent," the day is at hand, and "Our salvation is nearer than when we believed."

An Evening With Alaskan Missions.

Job 38: 22, 23, 29, 30. Topic for April 26.

Alaska has an area of 531,000 square miles and a native population of 32,052, composed of Eskimos, Indians, Thlingets and Aleuds. Most of the Aleuds are members of the Russian Greek Church, the others are barbarians. Many are fetish worshippers, practicing polygamy, child-marriage, infanticide, slavery, witch-craft and sometimes cannibalism. They are a shrewd people. A missionary who had been among them writes: "I find the natives a peculiar people. At times you think you know all about them, and again you do not. While you are trying to study them they are studying you."

Previous to the purchase of Alaska by the United States, the established Church of Russia was the only Christian body doing work among them, except a small work done by the Lutherans. At the time of the transfer of this territory to our government, the Greek Church claimed a membership of over 12,000, but it is a question "whether the Russian priests should be classed as missionary workers, or their followers as true converts to the faith."

With the ownership of Alaska passing to the United States, the Russian government withdrew its support from the work and the mission was abandoned.

The Russians made no serious attempt to civilize them. The purchase by the United States was made in 1867 and for ten years the condition of the people went from bad to worse. "Soldiers, smugglers, sailors and freebooters introduced disease and wickedness in new and more enticing shapes. Each settlement became a pandemonium. In their terrible degradation they were avoided and neglected like lepers. Their inherited customs incited them to practices of extreme cruelty. Witch-craft with its horrors was universal."

In about 1875 a white man named Lawson, arriving at Sitka, married a native woman. He was a bad character and taught the natives to distil liquor out of Sandwich Island molasses and yeast. It was but a short time until almost every family had its distillery. The liquor they produced made them murderously drunk. Nearly all the money they received from the traders was spent for molasses out of which to make this rum.

The pioneer of protestant missions in Alaska was the Rev. Sheldon Jackson, D. D., of the Northern Presbyterian Church. In 1877 he sailed from Portland, taking with him Mrs. A. R. McFarland, the widow of a missionary. Arriving in Alaska they found a school had been started by a converted Indian who had crossed the border from Ft. Simpson in British America.

Dr. Sheldon made a tour of inspection and having his intense nature fired with zeal by what he saw, he left Mrs. McFarland at Ft. Wrangel and hurried back to the United States to interest the people of the Presbyterian Church in this new field and secured enough funds to establish several mission points.

During the absence of Dr. Jackson, Mrs. McFarland labored faithfully and became "minister, teacher, physician, lawyer, judge, jury, peace-maker,—in fact, she found herself called upon to act in almost every capacity required by a life in such a community." Ft. Wrangel was the headquarters for the mining camp and "drunkenness, gambling and all consequent vices were unrestrained." A home for girls was established in 1878 and here a number of girls were gathered and cared for until the building burned down in 1884. A new home and school is built at Sitka.

From this beginning so great has been the good accomplished and the transformation wrought, that "a visitor to this station at the present day can little realize the conditions at the time the work was begun."

From Ft. Wrangel the work has spread in all directions over Alaska. In the interior the missionaries get their mail only once in a year and yet there has been no lack of volunteers for work in these secluded places.

That Overture.

Availing myself of the Standard's offer of space in its columns for a reply either to Mr McMurry or its editor, I wish first of all to say that I am pleased to have its editor's endorsement of the statements made in the overture respecting our proof-texts. Here I set him against our brother McMurry and pass on.

In regard to the proposed change in the answer to L. C. Q. 153, I submit to the judgment of our readers that it is not a quibble, nor is it based on a quibble. The Catechism does not say that a diligent use of the means of grace is essential to salvation. If it did, I should have no quarrel with it; for I should understand "salvation" in its comprehensive sense—as applied to all except infants dying in infancy, for whom special provision is made. If the Catechism said that a diligent use of the means of grace is conducive to faith and repentance, I should have no objection to the Statement. But neither of these averments are made in our answer. The Catechism says that a diligent use of the means of grace, including in this phrase the sacraments as well as the word and prayer, is required of us by God "that we may escape his wrath and curse due to us by reason of the transgression of the law." This statement is not in harmony with our doctrine of justification and it is not in harmony with the Scriptures.

The place and office of the means of grace in salvation is Scripturally and accurately stated in Confession of Faith, Chapter XIV, Sec. 1. No exegetical torture can make the answer in the Catechism harmonious with this lucid and admirable statement of the Confession.

"On the practical side the question is, what are we to tell the anxious inquirer he must do to escape the wrath and curse of God due to him for his sins? Are we to tell him that he must believe and repent; or must we in our answer add to these saving graces the use of outward ordinances? Besides the Romanists and the High Anglicans, we are confronted in the Central Mississippi Valley with a numerous and aggressive body of "Christians" who teach that baptism is essential to salvation. They can now very plausibly quote our own Standards against us to sustain their own contention. If we are to stand consistently to our present position, we must discard the irrelevant proof-texts which we now cite to sustain it, and use those which are quoted by our opponents, such as Math. 28:19, John 6:53-58; Acts 2:38. Within the limited sphere of my observation there is a decided trend towards a ritualistic Gospel, towards a salvation by works. What we need is to emphasize the doctrine of justification by faith alone; the doctrine, as Luther called it, of a standing or a falling Church."

It is easy to condemn a thing and cast contempt upon it by using an approbrious epithet. A label is often more potent than an argument, and much easier to devise. The only perfectionism contemplated by this overture and its promoters is the perfectionism taught in the Confession of Faith, Chapter XIX, Sec. VII and Chapter XXV, Sec. III.

The only question as to L. C. Q. 149 is this: Is the doctrine there taught sustained by the word of God? It is said, "A creed is what we believe to be true." This goes for the saying. But a Church creed ought to be that which the Church believes God has revealed to it in his Word. This is pre-eminently true of our own Church and its creed. Our Church is nothing if it is not Scriptural. We may very properly believe a great many things which God has not revealed to us in his Word; but we should be restrained from erecting these beliefs into religious dogmas.

If any one is disposed to assert that he sins every day in thought, word or deed, that I do, that every body does, I have no zeal to contradict him. But when he says that God asserts this of each and all of his regenerated and believing people, I have a right to ask for the Scriptural proof. And such proof is not forthcoming. It is easy to quote texts. But no passage in the Bible, fairly interpreted in its connection, sustains this statement. It is at once interesting and instructive to observe that careful scholars at this point avoid the Scriptures and rely on argument for their proof.

Our position here also is very far from being a quibble. Our dogma, as it stands implies very clearly that God refuses, (for it amounts to this on our Calvinistic principles), to grant to his redeemed and regenerated people grace sufficient to keep them from actual transgression in thought, word and deed, any single day of their life on earth. Thus the learned, the devout, the beloved Dr. Thos. E. Peck argues the imperfection of the work of sanctification in this life "from the imperfection of sanctifying grace. Here the saints have only the 'first fruits,' (Rom. 8:23, 24, 25; Heb. 12:23)." See Miscellanies, Vol. 3, p. 107. The imperfection of sanctifying grace!

Not only is this dogma not sustained by God's word; it is flatly contradicted by a score of the clearest testimonies. Nothing but the training got from the repeated utterances of the false dogma, fortified by the sinful propensities of the human heart working themselves out in the lives of men, could blind our minds to the truth of God's word on this point. His grace is sufficient to keep his people from actual transgression, if they will only hear and believe his word. But how can they hear and believe, when the Church authoritatively teaches that his grace is imperfect, insufficient even to keep his people from daily actual transgression in thought, word and deed?

There is no proposal made, or intended, to cover that perfect standard of holiness set us in God's word. The proposal is to cut out the words which imply that it is impossible for a regenerate man, in whom the Holy Spirit of God abides, to keep from sinning any day in thought word or deed; and, with it, that ready practical inference, it is no use to try. The proposal is to cut them out, because they are not sustained by God's Word, and because they are out of harmony with the Confessional statements respecting sanctification and the perfection of believers accomplished by the Holy Spirit through the means of grace in this life. No exegetical torture can make the answer to Larger Catechism Q. 149, harmonize with Confession of Faith, Chapter XIX, Sec. VII, and Chapter XXV, Sec. III. The Bible everywhere, the standards also with an exception or two, offer a perfect standard of holiness for our attainment. In one wretched place the Catechism lowers this standard—unfortunately the human heart seizes on this lowered standard, and consoles itself with the reflection that it is all that God intends and requires.

Some brethren are manifesting great concern respecting our Confessional statement as to the salvation of the dead children, whose fate is safe and sealed. I submit that it will be far better to manifest concern respecting the statements which have regard to the salvation of adults. For surely neither in God's sight nor man's can a man be said to be saved, actually saved from sin, who sins every day in thought, word and deed.

"This brings us to the proposed additions to the Standards respecting the office and work of the Holy Ghost. Here I wish to say that I do not endorse the new chapter on this subject now under consideration by our Northern brethren. It is to be objected to on several and very serious accounts. It is not denied that our Standards have a great deal to say about the office and work of the Holy Spirit, all of which is Scriptural and well said. But full as our teaching is, on this subject, it is not full enough. It is lacking in several respects.

1. As to the work of the Holy Spirit with respect to Jesus. It will be said in reply that everything is included under the words "Sanctified and anointed by the Holy Spirit."

But special mention is made of Jesus' offering up of himself as a sacrifice by the Holy Spirit, Heb. 9:14. Why not teach from the same passage that Jesus lived a sinless life by means of the indwelling Spirit, and from other passages that he worked miracles by the Spirit, was raised from the dead by the Spirit, gave commandments by the Spirit, that in all his human life he was guided and controlled by the Spirit?

2. Our teaching is lacking in regard to the baptism by Christ of the New Testament Church with the Holy Spirit and the results of that baptism: the Spirit's continued indwelling in the Church and in every regenerated member, and all the glorious fruits of that indwelling, as is indicated in such passages as Acts 2:4, 38; 4:31; 7:55; 10:44-46; 13:2; Romans 8:9-13; Gal. 2:20; 5:16, 25; Eph. 3:14-19; 4:20-24; 5:18-21; Phil. 4:12, 13, 19; Col. 3:5; et similia.

3. Our Standards lack a gathering-together in one chapter of a series of comprehensive statements respecting the person and work of the Holy Spirit, corresponding with chapter VIII, of Christ the Mediator. Over and over again, in one connection and another, the work of Christ is stated and restated. This is well, but does not supercede the necessity for chapter VIII. So as to the work of the Holy Spirit. Over and over again his work in effectual calling and in the subsequent work of sanctification is stated and restated in different connections. But besides these separate statements we need a chapter on the Holy Spirit, the Comforter or the Sanctifier. In this chapter his personality and divinity should be stated; his office with respect to Jesus, to revelation and to the elect. Here should be incorporated the essential features of his work in effectual calling, in sanctification, and those neglected statements in Chapter XIX, Sec. VII, and Chapter XXV, Sec. III, which contradict our dogma as to the imperfection of sanctifying grace. Here, too, should come in some mention of that wonderful baptism of the New Testament Church by Jesus Christ with the Holy Spirit and its glorious fruits."

Some honored brethren write me that they think a chapter on missions of more importance than one on the office of the Holy Spirit. The Standards might well give more emphasis to missions. They can be made to do this by emphasizing the work of the Holy Spirit. Our Confession says that "Christ hath given (to the visible Church) the ministry, oracles, and ordinances of God, for the gathering and perfecting of the saints, in this life, to the end of the world; and doth by his own presence and Spirit, according to his promise, make them effectual thereunto." What possible objection can there be to the setting forth, in a chapter devoted to the Holy Spirit, his work of rendering these ascension gifts of Christ effectual. This gift of gifts, the gift of the Holy Spirit, is the crowning gift of Christ. It is the gift of Himself in his energizing power. A large part of the book of Acts and of the Epistles is designed to show that, under the New Testament dispensation, Christ gives a Spirit-filled ministry to proclaim a Spirit-inspired word in order to gather and perfect a Spirit-filled Church. I challenge any man to show that this great department of the Spirit's work, so emphasized in the New Testament, has any just or adequate treatment in our Standards. How could it have when the Westminster divines according to the letter and spirit of the New Testament, knew little and cared less about the great missionary work of the Church?

I am unable to understand how any earnest minded Christian, interested in any measure in the great work of world-wide missions, can object to a devout attempt in this way to place in our Standards honor upon the Holy Spirit by emphasizing his great office in clothing the Church with power to crucify the lusts of the flesh and to testify in all the world the glorious gospel of the blessed God, "for the gathering and perfecting of the saints in this life."

The only objection which I have heard to this overture, that has any force in it, is that the times are not opportune. Other Churches are tinkering with the Standards. We have more important work on hand. It belongs to us to discuss methods, machinery and points of order. On this question of opportunity opinions will differ.

"For my part, I think the times most opportune to discuss the great doctrines concerning the Holy Spirit, justification and the means by which it is to be obtained, sanctification and the great attainments which may be reached in this life by the omnipotent power of the indwelling Spirit and a diligent use of the means of grace—most opportune to perfect, if possible, our Standards on these subjects, while we leave our great system of Calvinistic, scriptural doctrine standing like a stone wall."

It is possible, some think certain, that the Lexington Assembly will dispose of this overture in short order. If so, it will not be the first time that God's truth has received scant attention at the hands of his people. But God's truth can wait. "The eternal years of God are hers." The time comes not infrequently when all that the friends of truth can do is to wrap it up in the word of their testimony and wait the Lord's time for its vindication. Often something much more painful than the vibrations of "a dull thud" has reached them. They have passed away; but the truth remained and in God's time prevailed. It may be so with us. If so, we shall console ourselves with the reflection that we are in good company, and are the successors and heirs of those who have freely criticized and honestly and earnestly striven to conform the Standards to the Word of God.

E. C. Gordon.

Lexington, Mo., April 4, 1903.

[Dr. Gordon apparently admits the truth of the statement that "everybody does sin every day in thought, word and deed." He denies, however, that this is revealed in Scripture. Our Saviour's teaching as to "unprofitable servants" seems to indicate that we will always fail, in this life, of the high and holy standard set for us, let us say, in the life of Christ. But, that aside, if the statement of the Catechism is true, as a matter of experience and observation merely, the omission of the statement would make it false, so far as our creed is concerned. It is too valuable a bulwark against perfectionism to be lost. The Presbyterian Church has not been troubled with perfectionism, and mainly because of this bulwark. And really, it would be difficult to prove that the spiritual life of the Westminster Churches is lower than that of those who have gone off into perfectionism, or whose creeds have had nothing to say about it, one way or another.

As to the work of the Holy Spirit and Missions, we think the ground was fully covered in the first point, and probably Dr. Gordon does not recognize how clear are the missionary principles of the Confession.

Somehow the greatest missionary work in the world is being done by the Churches that have had the Westminster Confession and doing is better than talking. Probably as much has been said on both sides as the interest in the question seems to warrant. We really think that there is nothing left for Dr. Gordon but the consolation he claims as a martyr for the truth's sake.

—Ed.]

Dr. Henry Van Dyke, moderator of the Northern Presbyterian General Assembly, recently proposed in an address at a Chicago banquet that the Brief Statement be known as "The Washington Creed," thus distinguishing it from the one which bears the name of its birthplace, the Westminster. It will be remembered that the Brief Statement was formulated in Washington, and Dr. Van Dyke makes the most of this by saying, "This is strictly American, too; it expresses the American spirit. You know, I think just as highly of Washington as I do of Westminster." And yet our Presbyterian friends forbid us to call the Brief Statement a creed at all.—Cumberland Presbyterian.

Outline Bible Study—Galatians, Chapter IV.

Vers. 1. "The heir." What word in the latter part of ch. 3 must have suggested the Apostle's argument in the first part of this chapter?

Vers. 4. "The fulness of the time." See the condition of the world at the time of Christ's coming: 1, What was the state of the Old Testament dispensation? See Heb. 8:13; 2, What was the condition of the Gentile world? See Ro. 1:18-32.

—"On that hard pagan world disgust
And bitter loathing fell,
Deep weariness and sated lust
Made human life a hell."

3, What special facilities were there for spreading the Gospel? See Acts 21:37, last clause, Acts 22:25, 26.

4, What was the divine appointment as shown in Dan. 9:24-27? Compare Gal. 4:2.

"Made of a woman." Why did Christ the Son of God become man? 1, Heb. 2:14, 9, last clause; 2, Heb. 2:17, 18, Heb. 4:15. "Made under the law." What two things are included in Christ's being made under the law? 1, Ro. 5:19, last clause, Mat. 3:15, second clause, Mat. 5:17; 2, 2 Cor. 5:21 first clause, 1 Pet. 2:24, first clause, Eph. 1:7.

Vers. 5. "The adoption of sons." What is adoption? What benefits accompany or flow from adoption? 1, vs. 6, Lu. 11:13, Ro. 8:15, 16; 2, vs. 7, first clause, ch. 5:1. How does 1 connect with 2? 2 Cor. 3:17, last clause; 3, vs. 7, last clause, Ro. 8:17, 1 Pet. 1:4; 4, 1 Jno. 3:2, third clause, Ro. 8:29, second and third clauses; 5, Heb. 12:7. How does 4 connect with 5? Heb. 12:10, last clause. What is specially displayed in our adoption? 1 Jno. 3:1.

Vers. 9. "How turn ye again." What use does Paul make of this great truth of adoption for the purposes of his argument? See this 9th verse and ch. 5:1.

Vers. 10. "Ye observe days." What one day alone is recognized as sacred under the New Testament dispensation? Rev. 1:10, Acts 20:7, 1 Cor. 16:2. What is the effect of honoring other days, or of honoring our Lord's day more than another? Compare 1 Kings 12:32, first clause, 33 third clause, 1 Kings 15:26, 34. How does the Apostle speak of such human observances? Col. 2:22, last clause, 23, first clause.

Vers. 12. "Through infirmity of the flesh." How does Paul describe this elsewhere? 2 Cor. 12:7, second clause, see margin R. V. How long had this continued? 2 Cor. 12:2, first clause. Was it only a physical infirmity? 2 Cor. 12:7, next to last clause. What prayer did it lead to and with what result? 2 Cor. 12:8. What four lessons did it teach Paul, and may we also learn from it? 1, 2 Cor. 12:7, first clause, Deut. 8:2; 2, 2 Cor. 12:9, first clause, 2 Cor. 9:8, first clause; 3, 2 Cor. 12:9, second clause, 2 Cor. 12:10, last clause, Heb. 11:34, third clause; 4, 2 Cor. 12:9, third clause, 10, first clause.

Vers. 15. "Ye would have plucked out your own eyes." What conclusion has been drawn from this expression as to the nature of Paul's thorn in the flesh?

Vers. 19. "Until Christ be formed in you." What two great doctrines are combined in this one expression? 1, 2 Cor. 5:17, Ezek 36:26; 2, 1 Thess. 5:23. 1 Jno. 3:3—How is 2 the proof of 1? Ro. 8:9, last clause. What means to these great ends do you find in 2 Cor. 3:18? 1, Human, first clause; 2, divine, last clause.

Vers. 21-31. The allegory of Sarah and Hagar. What false doctrine corrected in this epistle, does Hagar represent? What true doctrine is represented by Sarah? What class of persons is represented by Ishmael? What class by Isaac? What lessons does Paul draw from the allegory? 1, vs. 29, ch. 5:17, Ro. 8:7; 2, Vs. 30, ch. 2:16, last clause; 3, vss. 26, 31, ch. 5:1.

Looking over this whole chapter—you find that it falls into three sections; 1, argument; 2, appeal; 3, illustration—what verses in each section?

What notable experience of Paul is here alluded to, and in what verses? What passage in Old Testament History—give chapter and verse?

In what verses do you see the doctrine of: 1, the decrees of God; 2, the Incarnation of Christ; 3, his Priestly Office; 4, adoption; 5, New Testament worship; 6, Regeneration; 7, Sanctification; 8, Justification by Faith?

In what verses do you find practical lessons on: 1, Privileges of the Sons of God; 2, What is required in the Second Commandment; 3, humility; 4, all sufficient grace; 5, likeness to Christ; 6, Christian liberty?

(The remaining two studies, on ch.s 5 and 6, will be published two weeks apart, and may be expected April 29th and May 13th.)

A Bible Study.

By Rev. S. S. Laws, Washington, D. C.

It is from a study of our Bible that we learn the most important and the only rational lesson in the world's literature touching man's eternal destiny.

In the light of these Scriptures we see two, and only two, obstacles in the way of our entire race escaping from sin and entering Heaven. One is God's broken moral law, and the other is man's corrupt and enfeebled moral condition and character. Rectify these and the door of Heaven swings wide open to man. If nothing is done, it remains forever effectively closed.

It is the special message of the Gospel to make known the provisions made for the removal of both these obstacles. It is proposed in this paper to consider them very briefly and in the order named.

1. Define the Moral Law.—The moral law, with which we are here concerned, is God's settled mode of procedure with moral agents in His government of the world. This law underlies and is presupposed by the entire Gospel. Abstract it from the Gospel and the Gospel collapses and becomes chaos. Even the grace of God is unintelligible and meaningless apart from His justice. This law is a rational expression of the holiness and justice of the divine nature. Sin is contrary to that nature, and hence it is in conflict with the will of God and with this law itself. Now, the Apostle to the Gentiles lays "to the charge of Jews and Greeks that they are all under sin; as it is written, there is none righteous; no, not one." This places all men, Jews and Gentiles alike, as sinners under the moral law as broken. Ignore or eliminate this law, which takes strict account of sin, and the justice and the love of God dwindle into a weak and unregulated sentimentalism, and the logic of the Gospel flutters at loose ends in the breezy cross-currents of every wind of doctrine. This is the situation of all men under the broken law of God when the word comes to him that the cross of Christ is available.

2. The Nature of Law.—Doubtless this must be understood to understand the Gospel. The moral law is the bed-rock on which the Gospel is built. Every law consists of two parts—its precept and its penalty. Omit the penalty and it becomes a mere rule of advice. The moral law is no exception. The claims of every broken law on those subject to it are twofold, preceptive and penal; and the claims of the broken moral law on every sinner are preceptive and penal. This arises from the nature of law as law. The infraction of the preceptive part, or requirement, incurs the penalty, but it neither abolishes nor relaxes the continuing binding force of the precept. The preceptive requirement continues in full vigor, although the penal consequence be suspended over the offender for every violation or departure till fully satisfied. The accumulation of penal liability, therefore, may vest without lessening the preceptive claims of the law. Such, theoretically, is the exacting situation of those under the law, and such is the actual situation of those subject to a perfect law perfectly administered.

3. How, then, can man settle his accumulated penal liability? As legal-tender money alone is recognized by man's law as paying a man's debts, so in the moral government of God the only legal tender recognized in the court of Heaven, in settlement of man's accounts under the moral law, is righteousness. But men in their own character are destitute of this righteousness, according to the scriptural account of man's condition, for it is written and emphasized that "there is none righteous; no, not one." They have all turned aside. There is none that doeth good; no, not so much as one. For we have before laid to the charge both of Jews and Greeks that they are all under sin. "There is no distinction; for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God. There is none that seeketh after God; there is no fear of God before their eyes" (Rom. 3:9-23). Man, therefore, is not only bankrupt of the means to settle his existing liability, but that liability is daily increasing. This is undoubtedly a desperate, a hopeless condition. Yet it is every man's actual situation, and it threatens to become permanent, with all its dire consequences, unless deliverance come from some outside source. It is in this ruined state of liability and helplessness that the cheering word of the Gospel announces to man, that the very deliverance he needs has been provided and is available to him—that, in fact, it is freely offered to his acceptance, without money and without price, by the Lord Jesus Christ. Although this means of deliverance was a costly purchase to Christ, he generously and magnanimously offers it as a gift to all who will accept it. "For Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. X:4.)

4. Let us inquire more particularly what we are to specifically understand by this righteousness of Christ, which has this saving power. It is of supreme importance that our notion of it should square with Scripture.

In general, the righteousness under present consideration is that which satisfies the claims of law, broken or unbroken.

The original word for righteousness in Romans X:4, just quoted, is dikaionune; and the same word occurs in Romans 1:17, and there also, as here and elsewhere, it means that righteousness which satisfies the claims of God's law. It has primarily an objective sense, and does not designate an attribute of moral character in man or God. It is certainly not the righteousness of man, but his sinfulness that is revealed in the Gospel. When Paul glories in the Gospel because a righteousness of God is therein revealed as "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth," he cannot refer to its revelation of the attribute of justice in God's character, for that had driven man from Eden and pursued him, and would only have served to emphasize his condemnation and not to save the sinner. No. Paul evidently refers to the righteousness acquired by Christ in meeting the claims of divine justice as embodied and expressed in the broken moral law under which he was born, lived, and died.

And this righteousness is as distinct from his own personal moral attributes, and from the attribute of justice in the Godhead as a worldly fortune from its creator and owner. It is an objective, and not a subjective, righteousness which the Lord Jesus Christ is here distinctively revealed as having acquired by perfectly conforming to the precepts of the law by his voluntary and holy obedience, together with "bearing the guilt or penalty, penal punishment, of our sins in his body on the tree" (1 Peter 2:21-24). As it is written, "Now once, at the end of the ages, hath he been manifested to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." Heb. 9:26. Whose sin? Surely not his own sin. "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us" (Gal. 3:13). His death was penal and not a martyrdom, but a curse, a sacrifice, a sin offering. But when "he had offered one sacrifice for sin, for ever sat down on the right hand of God." Heb. 10:12. Such language would be grossly profane and inapplicable to any martyr that ever died. How blasphemous to affirm it of even the first martyr, Stephen.

The equipment of the Redeemer with a righteousness available for the rescue of himself from under the broken law and of sinners from their legal thralldom, because it meets the condemnatory as well as the preceptive claims of the broken law, was a distinct and marvelous acquisition. He did not have it prior to the incarnation. He did not bring it with him from Heaven. It was the supreme acquisition of his sojourn on earth. His resurrection and his ascension to the right hand of the Father, together with Pentecost, were the combined evidence, sanction, and seal of the acceptance of his work, and of the successful accomplishment of his mission of love to this earth for the acquisition of that unique treasure of righteousness which shall never lose its redeeming and saving power—a righteousness suited to all our sinful race, sufficient for all, and offered freely to all. (Heb. 1:3.)

Before the incarnation the most favored nation had been subjected to a ceremonial pupillage preparatory to the unfolding in its fullness of this unique remedial scheme of deliverance. "But when the fullness of the time came, God sent forth his Son, born of woman, born under the law, that he might redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal. iv:4). It was plainly under the ceremonial and moral law, therefore, where his mother and brethren stood that the incarnate Son of God was born, lived without fault or sin, grew to manhood, suffered and died under the frown of Heaven.

There is a significant circumstance connected with the offering of the two birds at the presentation of her babe in the temple by Mary of vastly greater importance than its indication of her poverty. The Levitical law (Lev. xii:6-8) provides "that one of these birds was for a burnt offering, and the other for sin offering." This was a confession and a proof that she was a sinner and, as such, under the broken law, and the circumcision of the babe ostensibly placed it along side its mother in the attitude of a like subordination to the law. He was born under it, lived and died under it and in satisfaction of its two-fold claims. The satisfaction which Christ rendered the law constitutes His redeeming righteousness. It is an exhaustless fund out of which the indebtedness of every sinner may be paid. It is this objective righteousness of Christ that satisfies God's law and is from God, to which Paul refers when he says: . . . "I suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but refuse, that I may gain Christ and be found in Him, not having a righteousness of mine own, even that which is of the law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is from God by faith." This righteousness which Paul reached forth and laid hold of outside of himself is not his own personal righteousness or moral character in any sense, but the acquired righteousness of Christ, which became his by faith when he was legally by faith or in covenant identified with Christ, so that what was Christ's became his and availed for his salvation (Phil. 3:8, 9). Does it not simply amount to this: that justifying righteousness is not man's personal righteousness in any sense whatever, but the righteousness of God provided by Christ and reckoned to his account as received by faith? But the righteousness of sanctification is personal righteousness.

The stipulation or covenant of works with Adam was his obedience of the unbroken law as the condition of confirmation in holiness and eternal life, and, being personally holy, he had both the natural and moral ability to render this obedience and maintain his integrity. The stipulation with Christ was his obedience of the broken law as the condition of his fulfilling the covenant of redemption. He took the law place of the fallen Adam. He undertook to render what was and is required of the fallen Adam, for which he was to receive a seed to serve him perpetually, and in subservience thereunto to have the mediatorial dominion of the universe until the end of this administration, but eternally the mediatorial relation to his redeemed people or spiritual body (Eph. 1:15-23; 1 Cor. XV:24-28).

When Adam disobeyed the precept he was necessarily overtaken by the penalty of the law under which he stood; his soul penally suffered the blight of sin in the loss of his moral ability or disposition to obey God, and his body became subject to the pains of death and perdition. The lapsed moral condition of Adam was an aspect of his punishment, and not the cause or reason of it. As transmitted to his natural offspring, it is termed original sin, and is therefore the penal consequence of their trial or probation and condemnation in him. It was not their seminal but their legal or covenant oneness with him that furnished the just and rational ground of this procedure with them. Omit the legal element from this primal transaction, and as the facts lie in our best information, it collapses into such confusion and gross arbitrariness that there is no possibility of justifying therein the ways of God to man.

Unless Adam's offspring were legally represented by him in his probation, there is no legal foundation for the treatment they have received in being born in a state of condemnation and sin.

I do not see how the ways of God towards man in the fall and in redemption can be justified except upon the recognition of man's legal or covenant oneness with Adam in one case, and with Christ in the other. The observance of the unbroken law was the stipulation or condition in the covenant with Adam called the covenant of works in Adam, and the meeting of the claims of the broken law, the condition of the covenant with Christ, properly called the covenant of redemption, which was with Christ, as with Adam, also a covenant of works and merit; so that all the blessings of salvation are due to Christ as the just and rightful reward of his perfect obedience and fulfillment of his covenant stipulation; but what comes to him of acquired right is bestowed on us as a gift of grace, unearned and undeserved. Hence the covenant of redemption and the covenant of grace are only different aspects of the same covenant, the former pointing to Christ as redeemer, and the latter to the redeemed as beneficiaries.

It must be forever conceded that there is no wrong nor vindictiveness, but only open, equal, and fair dealing in enforcing for disobedience the penalty of a just law upon all amenable to its righteous claims, or in the bestowment of a stipulated reward for a fulfilled covenant. All the descendants of fallen Adam stood in him and fell with him, and have justly heired his penal condition, and will continue to be thus born, so far as God's ways are revealed to us, until the end of time. They inherit his natural ability or constitutional powers of soul, but not his original holiness and moral ability nor even his fallible disposition to serve God—that is to say, they have in the fallen estate the intellect, the heart, the will, and the conscience with which to serve God, but the state of the soul is averse to God; the inclination and the disposition to do so are absent. These powers of the soul are in such condition or state as to be alienated from and averse to God, so that "they that are in the flesh cannot please God." It was for this reason that Christ said to Nicodemus, "Ye must be born again." But it must not be overlooked that it is man's natural ability, consisting of these inborn powers of soul that may know, love, and obey God, and not his moral ability or disposition to do so, that decides man's responsibility to obey the law of God.

The incarnate Son of God was born under the broken law with both the natural and moral ability to meet and perfectly satisfy its preceptive and also its penal claims; and he not only did so and effected his own triumphant deliverance, but in doing so he wrought out a righteousness which amply equips him as the redeemer and deliverer of all men in like condition from an otherwise hopeless thralldom. His acquired and exhaustless fortune of righteousness is fully adequate to save to the uttermost all who draw near to God through him. (Heb. vii:25.)

The Lord's Prayer for a succession of solemn thoughts, for fixing the attention upon a few great points, for suitability to every condition, for sufficiency, for conciseness without obscurity, for the weight and real importance of its petition, is without an equal or a rival.—Paley.

The Forward Movement.

Editor Standard:

In your issue of Feby 15th I noticed a contribution from Rev. P. H. Gwinn in reference to the Forward Movement, in which, if not speaking in a derogatory manner, he at least questions the orthodoxy and wisdom of it. No doubt the writer was sincere in his remarks, but they seem ill-timed and inappropriate.

The Forward Movement is what you might call the connecting link between the First and Twentieth centuries. It answers the call for more zeal and aggressiveness in world-wide missions, and obedience to the Great Commission, and at the same time meets the spirit of the age, for something live, tangible and definite. It says in substance, do not put all the great energy of this generation in the work and at the service of the Devil, but let God have a show.

The Forward Movement was the result of prayer and consecrated zeal, and the results of the first six months of its existence have unmistakably stamped it with Divine approval, and if the Southern Presbyterian Church is to take its proper place in the great crusade now just beginning for the evangelization of the world, it must be along some such line as this, a thorough awakening—calling us from our lethargy and selfish indifference.

God spake unto the children of Israel to go forward—and the development of this century—the opening of the Heathen world and its preparation for the reception of the Gospel—the annihilation of time and space by modern inventions, eliminating one of the great obstacles in the way of world-wide evangelization, speak as a certain voice from God to His Church to-day; Go Forward.

The metaphorical expression used by Mr. Gwinn, of this Forward Movement, suggesting God's people straining at the chariot wheels of the Almighty, is, and could not be applicable, unless this movement was undertaken, in dependence on human agency. To every thinking person, it is evident that God intends this age for one of Missionary enterprise. The Southern Church is behind the Northern Church, and behind some of its sister Churches, in zeal and interest for Missions, and now as it is waking up to take its proper place in the greatest work it has to do, some one rises to discourage it in a plea for orthodoxy.

Orthodoxy—what crimes are committed in thy name! Sometimes I think the Devils in hell must laugh when God's work is retarded,—the work of saving souls hampered, and Satan's kingdom strengthened—in the interest of orthodoxy.

When orthodoxy stands in the way of a direct command from Jesus Christ, we would better get rid of it.

The objections offered by Mr. Gwinn, boiled down to their last analysis, suggests approval of the Church's support of Missions in the past, and if any one feels we have done our duty along that line, they of course could not approve of the Forward Movement, but I would like to ask, how long would it take to carry to consummation our Saviour's last command. Because the Church has sinfully neglected this for nineteen centuries, surely any effort to aid in the great movement for world-wide Missions, now just taking shape, should not be frowned upon.

God does not intend to evangelize the Heathen world, except in answer to prayer and through the efforts of his people. I take it for granted, however, that Mr. Gwinn has a wrong conception of the Forward Movement. He certainly can not know the circumstances of its origin or the result of the first six months' work, ending Dec. 1, 1902. For instance a certain number of Churches which gave last year about seventeen thousand dollars pledged themselves for thirty-eight thousand this year.

Now, if this is not orthodox, it is the kind of heresy our Saviour approves of.

The Forward Movement was the result of prayer, is depending on prayer for its existence, and its goal—the time when God's Word shall cover the land as the waters cover the sea.

Rejoicing in Affliction.

By Rev. Chas. O'N. Martindale.

The more I know of the old, the more I love and honor them who are God's select men and women. It is of one such I propose to speak to those who read this message. I account it one of the greatest privileges of my life as a minister of the Word to have become acquainted with an aged saint of God who died here last October at the advanced age of almost ninety-five years, by name Mrs. Mary B. Storey.

For some while she had been quite feeble in body, though not confined to her bed; but her mind to the last was persistently bright and strong. She was a most devout Christian of the Presbyterian type, and loved to talk about her Saviour and His kingdom and His prosperity. Everything to which God's name was attached interested her, and her greatest desire for those around her was that they might all be even as she—safe in the keeping of Jesus her Lord.

But what I wish to call especial attention to is, the high view she gave me—as no one else had so plainly before—of the true philosophy of the infirmity of the body, such as is rarely ever met with and yet just what is to be expected of every ripening Christian. Out of the many conversations had with her, one was specially impressive. She was telling me of what most people look upon as awful deprivations and just occasions for lament. Said she—“I am not strong enough to walk or even to ride to God's house, though I would like to do so. I am unable to study God's Word even in very large print, though I greatly desire to do so. I am not able to read the newspapers or to hear the ordinary conversation of those within or from without the home as they come and talk and go, or to tell what is going on in the great world around me. I cannot pass the time in knitting or crocheting any longer, for my hands are too stiff and unsteady and my sight so poor I can't even see the clock on the mantel before me. But I thank God for His goodness to me in all this. It is best that I cannot see so well, or hear so well, or feel so well, or move so well, as I used to: for things worldly might and very probably would divert my attention and draw my mind away from God and proper meditation on His goodness and mercy to me. As it is, most of my thought is devoted to Him, and He is manifestly cutting off more and more of the connections binding me to earth and shutting me in more and more unto Himself, and so preparing me for the home-going to the Father. Oh, the love of the Lord my God and Saviour 'tis too high, too wide, too deep, too long, for a poor sinner like me to take it all in! His loving kindness, oh, how sweet! His goodness, oh, how great! His mercy, oh, how rich! I know all this, and besides, now as never before, how important and blessed it is to have God's Word stored up in the heart that one may be strengthened when weak and be kept from sin when tempted and tried.”

Affliction to her was cause for Rejoicing, even as with Paul in 2 Cor. xii: 7-10. Just before the end of her last illness she remarked to her former pastor, Rev. James Stacy, D. D.: “The Lord has been with me un-faithfully in the past. Pray for me, that my faith fail not, and that the faithful God fail me not, in my last hour of trial. He is my only hope.”

Is there not here somewhat that is directive, stimulative, encouraging to every saint of God shut in from the world, laden with infirmity, burdened with care, overshadowed with clouds no human skill can banish? Is not this godly woman's view of affliction the right view, the blessed view, the only view of trouble worth taking? How much is lost by those who fail to look on trial in this way? Full of the Spirit and of faith and of meekness, she saw the hand of her Lord in blessing through her very privations. And so may we!

In this world, the one thing supremely worth having is the opportunity, coupled with the capacity, to do well and worthily a piece of work, the doing of which is of vital consequence to the welfare of mankind.—Theodore Roosevelt.

Division of the Synod of Virginia.

The application of the just and biblical principle of Presbyterianism would obviate all of the present difficulties as to unwieldiness and at the same time preserve to us all the benefits of the undivided Synod. In fact the government of our country and Church are so generically similar that to a great extent their development has paralleled. To a greater or less extent our congressional districts and Presbyteries are coterminous. And there are so many moral and religious questions of a state interest that an invisible gravitation has conformed our Synods North and South into practical coincidence with state lines. We have just noted this tendency in Tennessee, Mississippi and Louisiana.

The benefits of such systematic organization can be pointed out in our Home Mission Work.

We need to develop the episcopal function of the Presbytery. We need Timothies and Tituses as eyes for our home mission work.

At present in Presbytery and Synod we select out the busiest pastor and saddle on him, practically without recompense, the work of two additional men; after we have killed him, and are murderers before a just God, we proceed to do likewise. Ex. One man, pastor of a large country parish; chairman of home missions of the largest Presbytery in the Southern Assembly; same for largest Synod for same assembly; appointed to raise the century fund in same Presbytery.

Is that sanctified common sense or unsanctified nonsense?

Within some twenty years the Synod of North Carolina has grown from about half to now almost the size of the Synod of Virginia. Why and how?

I do not believe that she has ministers and membership more consecrated—but she has system and episcopal oversight.

Now to obtain this, we must maintain the present Synod of Virginia and instead of disintegrating, we must organize.

Let the chairman and one elder from each Presbyterian home mission committee constitute the basis of the Synodical home mission committee.

Then choose a Gillespie as superintendent and chairman and have him give his whole time to knowing, and causing us to know, the best method of evangelizing every square mile of our Synod's bounds. A few adjoining members of the committee can act with him in an executive capacity in interims between regular meetings of the whole committee. He will keep the business in working order and the churches informed, and secure from the larger churches the support of home missionary pastors.

Each Presbytery could not afford such a thorough organization and equipment; a dual or tripod division of the whole Synod would necessitate two or three such committees, and therefore two or three times the office expenses. But by thoroughly and Presbyterianly and biblically organizing the work and the Synod itself, it can be done. This is in line with the method proposed for the Assembly's Home Mission Committee. Thereby we can gain all of the benefits of the episcopal system and avoid its arbitrariness, we relieve the busy pastors who are Presbyterian chairmen of their great burden and yet preserve their authority and co-operation within their own bounds. We thus continue the binding influences which hold our border churches from the magnetic attraction of the assembly North; retain all of the weight and conserving influence of the old Synod; and yet obviate all the cumbersomeness of the present conglomeration. The old Synod for ever, division no, never, and blest be the ties that bind our hearts in Christian love.

Consciousness of immortality is a mighty motive in life. If we think only of what lies in the little dusty circle about our feet we miss the glory for which we were made. But if we realize even dimly the fact that we are immortal a new meaning is given to every joy of our life, to every hope of our heart, to every work of our hands.—Dr. J. R. Miller.

KNOXVILLE.—The Central Presbyterian Church of Knoxville has just passed through a very precious season of grace. On Friday, March 27th., Dr. E. O. Guerrant came to the assistance of the pastor, Dr. M. W. Doggett. He preached his first sermon on the night of his arrival, and to the children and young people the next day evening, Saturday. Beginning with the following Sunday morning he preached twice daily, morning and night. He thoroughly caught the ear of the people from the very first sermon. And although several very rainy nights intervened the interest continued to increase. The preaching was truly with great power. His auditors literally hung upon his words. I have never seen a people more lavish in their expressions of appreciation of a series of sermons. The simple Old Story came from his lips as a New Story. Every truth was made clear and clinched with a practical illustration. His preaching might well be styled, "The Gospel Illustrated."

Sunday, which was the last day of the meeting, he preached three times to crowded houses. At the third service there were full six hundred people in the house. As a part of the visible results of the meeting 19 were received into the church on Sunday morning, all on profession of faith. There were ten other professions of faith at the remaining meetings, eight of whom will be received next Sunday.

During the week a large body of godly women met in the session room just before the morning sermon and spent one half hour in earnest prayer for a spiritual blessing. The Sunday afternoon service the Doctor spent in presenting the claims of the "American Inland Missions." The large audience was truly a representative one, being made up of the leading members of the different Presbyterian Churches of the city. The enthusiasm engendered in behalf of the great work was marked, and the writer will be disappointed if a very large contribution does not follow the Doctor into the mountains as a result of that meeting.

Our church has received a great spiritual uplift for which we are thankful and for which we praise the Great Head of the church.

MILTON.—The pastoral relation dissolved, a sad trial, and dear friends bidden good-by in the Asheville Presbytery, we came to our work in the Nashville Presbytery the first of March.

On account of the slow transportation of our household stuff we were kept from entering our new home almost a month, but under kind Providence we are at home once more. We found on arriving that a happy surprise awaited us.

Kind friends of all denominations around Hopewell Church had administered to our temporal needs a sufficiency for several months, fuel for at least half a year, and about thirty full grown fowls, and a nicely filled purse was not wanting.

We are so thankful to these people and to our Heavenly Father for these favors.

ALABAMA.

Alabama Synodical College for Women.

The Board of Trustees of Isbell College met at Talladega, April 6, 1903, and unanimously elected the Rev. T. P. Walton of the Synodical Female College at Rogersville, Tenn. President. He is a scholarly man and has made female education his life work. He will bring his whole literary faculty with him, most of whom have been associated with him for years. Miss Elizabeth K. Young of Staunton, Va., will be Lady Principal and Principal of the Preparatory Department; Miss Annie L. Austin of Lewisburg, W. Va., Presiding Teacher and Teacher of English, Latin and German; Mrs. Sallie E. Frantz, of Birmingham, Ala., Teacher of History and the Sciences; Miss Mary W. Shaner, of Plattsburg, Mo., Mathematics; Miss Eleanor Martin of St. Charles, Mo., Art and Music, T. P. Walton, Piano. The Director of Music and the Voice and Elocution Teachers have not yet been selected. The curriculum is the result of the work and experience of some of the best educators in the South. The course in English is that designated by "The Committee of Five."

After mature consideration, it was decided to name the institution "Alabama Synodical College for Women." The Board authorized the expenditure of two thousand dollars, if necessary, in thoroughly renovating and repairing the buildings and beautifying the grounds: the work to be completed

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

Under Event and Comment, please read Y. W. C. A. for Y. M. C. A. and save the editor from being ridiculous.

Dr. Gordon always writes well and his article in defence of his overture is readable and is really about the best that could have been done in defence of a poor cause. Rev. R. A. Lapsley gives another lesson for our study. Dr. S. S. Laws furnishes the first part of a most comprehensive treatment of Bible doctrines that will be seen to have a very pertinent application. We commend this highly to those who like strong meat. Shorter articles, such as the Division of the Synod of Virginia, The Forward Movement, Rejoicing in Affliction, add variety to the Contributed Department.

Dr. Hill is fine this week in his exposition of the Law of Love. The Westminster League has a most interesting lesson on Alaskan Missions, while the Missionary and Devotional Departments, for which the reader is indebted to the Associate Editor, are helpful and stimulating. In fact, we will not conceal the opinion that this is a pretty good issue of the Standard.

Lexington Assembly, May 21.

The undersigned requests the Stated Clerks of all the Presbyteries in connection with our Assembly to send him, as soon as elected, the names of commissioners with their addresses, also the names of alternates with their addresses.

All visitors, other than commissioners, upon application to him will be furnished a list of hotels and boarding houses, with rates, and any other desired information it may be in his power to give.

Commissioners may inquire of him as to routes, arrival of trains and other matters and such inquiries will receive prompt attention.

Chairman Committee of Arrangements,

Lexington, Virginia.

October 1, 1903. The Synod of Alabama owns the property, and it is awakening to increased interest in the education of its daughters within its own bounds. It is hoped that every member of the Synod will take a personal interest in our institution. The college is located at Talladega; an educational, social and religious center.

Fire at the Talladega Orphanage.

Last Tuesday morning fire was discovered in the laundry and for a while it seemed as though no human power could save any of our splendid brick buildings. The laundry was a two-story frame building with a large sewing room up-stairs where the week's wash had been sent for mending. Nothing was saved here except two sewing machines. The fire next seized the girls' bath house and then a store room where there was a considerable amount of provisions. With a strong wind sending the flames against the large brick building, occupied by forty girls, the destruction of the entire Home seemed imminent. The blessing of God upon the heroic efforts of the firemen and citizens of Talladega availed at last and the fire was confined to the frame buildings. The loss will amount to quite $2,000.

When the seventy children saw that their only earthly home, which had sheltered them so long, was about to be destroyed the most heart-rending scenes occurred. Some prayed, some wept; but the officers held them in good control; not one was injured. We are particularly thankful that the fire occurred in the day, and that no panic ensued.

Now friends, we must patiently and cheerfully go to work to rebuild. We ask your immediate help. Funds will be needed at once to replace the clothing and provisions destroyed, and to rebuild? Profiting by this sad experience nothing but brick will be used in the future. The insurance companies had cancelled our policies on these buildings owing to the extra risk of the laundry. The damage to the girls' dormitory will be several hundred dollars and is covered by insurance.

May we not appeal to our church to make good this loss? The Synod of Alabama nobly supports this home and has given large amounts for buildings and improvements. They will do liberal things in this emergency and we know this appeal will be heeded by them; but we believe our people in the other Synods would like to help. Make remittances to B. McMillan, Treasurer, Talladega, Ala.

MISSOURI.

PALMYRA PRESBYTERY.—Palmyra Presbytery met at Palmyra, Mo., April 7, and was opened with a sermon by Rev. T. T. Trimble. Rev. W. S. Foreman was chosen Moderator and Rev. T. T. Trimble, Temporary Clerk.

The most important communication received was one from Synod with reference to a suggested plan by which the expenses of all delegates to Synod should be paid out of a common fund, contributed annually by all the churches. After due consideration Presbytery decided against the plan, believing it had better not be undertaken. The Presbyterian sermon was preached on the morning of the second day by Rev. W. S. Foreman, subject, the Holy Spirit and text Jno. 16:8-11. The reports presented from the churches manifest some encouraging and some encouraging features. Among the former were the lack of proper Sabbath observance and the absence of family religion in many homes. Among the latter, to give cheer and encouragement, were the number and amount of contributions from the churches to all causes, especially to Foreign Missions. And the second evening was devoted to a popular meeting in behalf of this latter cause, when addresses were made by Messrs. Foreman, Gallaher and McClintic, and a collection of $15 taken.

This Presbytery in connection with the Presbytery of Hannibal, U. S. A., is endeavoring to establish a Presbyterian school at Rensselaer, Mo., and it was resolved to raise half the amount needed to purchase suitable property near the old Rensselaer Academy.

Rev. T. T. Trimble of La Belle and Elder W. S. McClintic, Monroe, were chosen as delegates to the General Assembly; with Rev. W. S. Foreman, of Memphis, and Elder J. S. Jennings, of Alexandria, alternates.

With hearty thanks for the hospitality and kindness of the Palmyra Church and people, Presbytery adjourned to meet at Big Creek Church on Tuesday, Sept. 1, 1903.

POTOSI.—Presbyterian Church at Potosi, Mo., has had quite a spiritual awakening in the last few weeks. Rev. J. Addison Smith, D. D., of Pattonville, Mo., came to us on March 9th and labored faithfully for over two weeks, giving us two services each day, and our hearts burned within us as he talked to us by the way and opened unto us the Scriptures. The Church was greatly revived and strengthened, both spiritually and numerically, receiving a spiritual impetus she has not enjoyed in many days. Dr. Smith, in our judgment, is totally exempt from all objectionable methods of modern evangelism, and has no questionable methods, or tricks to increase the membership; but relies wholly upon the Spirit of God to do His work, through the Word, faithfully and forcibly presented, while the matters of finance are left wholly with the deacons. Eight were added to the Presbyterian Church, and among these were two heads of families, and we confidently expect others in the near future. Many parents who had neglected to dedicate their children to God in the ordinance of baptism, were profoundly awakened to their responsibility, and came forward and had them baptized. The great importance of Sabbath observance was impressed upon the members of the Church, while the duty and privilege of family piety was greatly emphasized.

A. J. Cheatham.

KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE.—The Rev. Henry E. Dosker, D. D., who comes to take the chair of Church History in the Kentucky Seminary at Louisville is to preach the commencement sermon at the close of this session in this institution. The services will be in the First Church on the night of Sabbath, May 3rd. He has also been invited to preach the baccalaureate sermon at the close of session in June at Central University in Danville, Ky.

The Rev. Francis R. Beattie is to preach the commencement sermon for Mary Baldwin Seminary, Staunton, Va., on the 24th of May in the First Church at the morning service.

The course of lectures in Westminster Church, Louisville, Ky., on Church History, given by the Professors of the Seminary and ministers of the city are proving useful. Three of the twelve have been given with increasing interest each month. Dr. Tyler, the pastor, and Professors Newspress and Hemphill have been the lecturers so far. Professor Heath is due on the 24th of this month.

VIRGINIA.

WINCHESTER PRESBYTERY.—Commissioners to General Assembly are Rev. A. C. Hopkins, D. D., Charleston, W. Va., Rev. J. R. Graham, D. D., Winchester, Va., Elder H. C. Magender, Woodstock, Va., Elder W. C. Clayton, Keyser, W. Va.

Alternates.—Rev. Geo. Wm. White, D. D., Moorefield, W. Va., Rev. C. Ghiselin, D. D., Shepherdstown, W. Va., Elder C. G. Crawford, Kernstown, Va., Elder A. J. Thompson, Briggs, Va.

J. R. Graham, S. C.

PORTSMOUTH.—During the year there have been sixty-two additions to the First Presbyterian Church, twenty-nine of the number on profession of faith. The church is now supporting a missionary in China.

NORTH CAROLINA.

CHARLOTTE; First Church.—At the Communion service on the fifth inst., Rev. Jas. R. Howerton announced that thirty-eight members had been received since the beginning of this year, twenty-four by letter and fourteen on profession of faith in Christ. Dr. Howerton conducted a two-weeks' preparatory to the Communion, during which there was a marked deepening of the spiritual life of the Church. Two prayer-meetings were held daily and the attendance was good. The sermons were strong and helpful.

Rev. Edgar Tufts, of Banner Elk, N. C., preached at the First Presbyterian Church, Charlotte, last Sunday evening, and presented the interests of the Lees-Mac Institute and that mountain field in an effective way.

SECOND CHURCH.—Next Sunday will close Dr. Stagg's pastorate of this church. No definite steps have been taken toward calling his successor.

HIGH POINT.—Rev. A. S. Caldwell, pastor, has resigned this work, the resignation to take effect May first.

Barium Springs.

All Presbyterians of North Carolina will be rejoiced to learn of the good fortune that has come to their Orphans' Home in the gift of a cottage from Judge Howard of Tarboro.

This magnificent gift Judge Howard makes in memory of his sainted wife.

Our Church will now be enabled to care for a family of 30 more orphan children selected from among the many pleading for admittance to the Orphans' Home. A sorely felt need has been supplied and every lover of the fatherless will rejoice that God in His goodness so signally blessed the Church's work for her orphans.

Could a more beautiful monument be raised to a devoted wife and mother than is this home, a pleasant, attractive home for 30 orphan children and those who care for them? Think of the good resulting from this appropriate monument for generations yet to come, yea, verily, through eternity.

With this gift greater responsibility is laid upon each individual member of our Church. These 30 other orphans must be supported and trained. Do we shrink from the burden? Brethren, we have only made a beginning in orphanage work, a grand beginning 'tis true, still only a beginning.

Had we not received this gift the Church would have found it as hard to support our 127 orphans as we are going to find it to care for 150; or if another cottage should be given us, to support 180 orphan children. (In this new cottage can only be received orphans of one sex.)

The President of the Board of Regents once said within our hearing, "The growth of the Orphans' Home is wonderful, but what has been accomplished has been done with very little effort." Brethren, we haven't even gotten up steam yet. With 120 orphans the Presbyterian Church might have had a stand-still period, puff and blow to support that number. Thank God then for this new cottage, it is a step forward and Presbyterians will bravely come to the support of those whom the Lord has given them, and if He should graciously provide another cottage for the other sex of those orphans seeking the protecting care and training of the Church of their fathers, that Church will gladly respond by doing her duty, and then will not be taxed.

It is very gratifying to us that one and another is responding with gifts for "Little Joe's" Church. It is a cause very dear to the entire orphan household.

R. W. Boyd.

WADESBORO.—At a congregational meeting held Sunday, April 5th, the following additional officers were elected: Elders, Dr. J. M. Covington and D. A. McGregor. Deacons, T. W. Austin and W. P. Benton.

A call was also made to the pastor, Rev. Donald McIver, for all his time.

GREENSBORO.—The First Church Sunday-school offering for "Little Joe's" Church has amounted thus far to $185.

GRAHAM.—Sunday, April 5th was a busy day in our church. Sunday-school in the morning, session meeting just after, one young lady received into the communion and for baptism. During preaching service the pastor read the annual reports to Presbytery and exhibited the statistics on the blackboard. We have 208 members, after thoroughly purging the roll. Twenty-nine have been received—19 on profession and 8 adults baptized. Total contributions, $2,692, which is $13 per member, $40 per family. While many of our members are in good circumstances, one half are poor people. We have pledged $500 a year hereafter for foreign missions. After the sermon, the Lord's supper was administered. A congregational meeting was then called and the pastor's salary was raised from $1,000 to $1,200.

In the afternoon our regular quarterly children's service was held. Here are some of the interesting exercises: Recitation of the shepherd psalm and song by the primary department; golden texts by the junior department; announcing the honor rolls; baptismal service; naming and classifying all the books of the Bible; recitation of a portion of the Shorter Catechism; conferring diplomas and prizes for perfect recitation of the catechisms; tracing on an outline map Paul's three missionary journeys, the children naming all the places and events; collection for "Little Joe's" church.

The Graham pastors have formed a ministerial association. They have taken steps toward bringing the churches together in quarterly union services, and organizing them for charitable and evangelistic work. They expect soon to have erected at the county home a chapel where monthly services may be held for the poor and for the prisoners in the stockade.

DAVIDSON.—For the Oratorical Exercises of the Senior class in honor of Maxwell Chambers Day, the programme was as follows:

J. L. Anderson, Moore, S. C., Municipal Monopolies; W. W. Arrowood, Clover, S. C., Present Aspects of the Tariff; J. S. Bailey, Jr., Greenwood, S. C., The Sphere of the Journalist; H. F. Beaty, Mooresville, N. C., An American Home; W. J. Blake, Abbeville, S. C., Three Epochs in American History; P. P. Brown, Newton, N. C., The Man With one Idea; H. H. Caldwell, Harrisburg, N. C., America's Bulwark; R. D. Daffin, Jr., Mariana, Fla., The Middle Classes; W. M. Dunn, Jacksonville, S. C., The Quest for the Unknown; H. A. Johnston, Norfolk, Va., The Influence of Poetry; R. S. Johnston, Norfolk, Va., The Majesty of Law; W. H. Kirkpatrick, Blackstock, S. C., John Milton; H. A. Knox, Oak Forest, N. C., Woman's Sphere; H. G. McDowell, Asheville, N. C., Shakespeare the Poet; J. H. McLelland, Mooresville, N. C., A Vanishing Type; H. E. McMurray, Mt. Hill, N. C., America's Progress; A. R. McQueen, Carthage, N. C., The Deterioration of the Negro; A. L. Mills, Greenville, S. C., Individualism; W. P. Mills, Camden, S. C., Edgar Allan Poe; W. S. Patterson, Winston-Salem, N. C., The Factory as an Element in Civilization; F. M. Rogers, Winston-Salem, N. C., Cecil Rhodes; T. P. Sprunt, Charleston, S. C., A Knight of the Nineteenth Century.

The faculty acting as a committee for the Phi. society have awarded the Declaimer's medal to Mr. H. B. Smith, of the Sophomore class.

Rev. W. W. Williams, class of '95, is spending some time here. He preached most acceptably last Sabbath.

Dr. Smith is on an extended trip in this state, particularly in the eastern part, and also in South Carolina. He will be absent through most of the month of April.

The baseball team returned some days ago from a delightful trip to Georgia and South Carolina, winning games with the University of Georgia and Wofford College, and losing game with Clemson.

As an evidence of business growth and development in the town, keeping pace with the growth of the college, we may note the fact that the Southern States Trust Co., of Charlotte, a new but strong organization, has opened a branch bank in Davidson. Mr. W. A. Thompson is in charge, with Drs. J. P. Monroe and W. J. Martin as advisory directors. Deposits ran up above $10,000 the opening day, and there is every reason to believe that the bank will not only pay well, but will be of great value to the business interests of the college and community.

CHARLOTTE; Tenth Avenue Church.—On last Sunday the Lord's Supper was celebrated for the first time in the New Church. The pastor announced sixty-four additions since the last communion, which was held in the old church, just prior to the removal into the new.

The records show one hundred and thirteen members added during the year.

The Westminster League is largely attended, and the roll of the Sunday-school has almost doubled.

GEORGIA.

GAINESVILLE.—A very profitable meeting has just closed in the Presbyterian Church of this place, conducted by Dr. E. O. Guerrant of Kentucky. Preparatory services were held the week preceding, conducted by the pastors of the Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian Churches. These three churches united in the meeting and shared in the blessing. There was but one really good day during the week, but despite the mud and rain the people attended in large numbers to hear the earnest, powerful preaching of Dr. Guerrant and a profound impression was made upon the entire community. The last night the rain poured in torrents but a good congregation was present—the largest Dr. Guerrant said he had never seen in such weather. Sabbath afternoon he gave an account of his work among the "Highlanders of America" in the beautiful auditorium of Brenan college, which was well filled, although it seats twelve hundred people. Last Sabbath we received eight new members into the Presbyterian Church and the Baptists seven. Both churches expect to receive as many more in the near future, while the Methodists are continuing the meeting and will doubtless receive a number as soon as they "open the doors" of their church. There were about thirty professions of faith and altogether the meeting was unusually pleasant and profitable. Dr. Guerrant's visit will not soon be forgotten by the people of Gainesville.

I have recently had invitations to two important fields elsewhere, but am becoming more and more interested in my work here and in love with my excellent people, so that I have decided to remain here, and am in the midst of moving onto the property recently purchased by the church for a manse, where Mrs. McConnell and I are now "at home" to all our friends.

My church seems to be taking on new life. In addition to the purchase of property for a manse and site for a new church, we have recently put electric lights in our present building and every department of our work seems to be encouraging. I have been invited to preach the commencement sermon before the young men of the "North Georgia Agricultural College" the first Sabbath in June and also for the Public schools of Winder the fourth Sabbath in May.

T. M. McConnell.

MOULTRIE.—The church at Moultrie recently witnessed a unique and most impressive ceremony. Mr. and Mrs. L. E. Morgan in the presence of the congregation assembled for the morning service solemnly gave their only child to the Mission work in Africa. It was worth much to see this father and mother give their only child unreservedly and gladly to the Lord to be used in what seems the hardest work of the Church.

With prayer and thanksgiving little Lennox was set apart, dedicated to the work of carrying out the great commission. Without any hesitation the parents pledged themselves to train their son for his great work, looking with faith to the great source of strength. Surely it was an exhibition of great faith and love. If it was said of old times, "Greater love hath no man than this that a man should lay down his life for his friends," will this gift fail of its reward? Was it a sort of fulfillment of the command "Suffer little children to come unto me?" If yet other fathers and mothers would give their children the time of regeneration would not be so far off. Some mother will say as she reads this, I too will give my son. May it be so!

MISSISSIPPI.

The Presbytery of North Mississippi met at Grenada, Miss., April 2, 1903, at 7:30 p. m. The opening sermon was preached by Rev. C. H. Dobbs, Jr.

Rev. W. L. Milne was chosen Moderator, and Rev. W. D. Hedleston, D. D., temporary clerk.

Dismissed—Rev. J. D. Stormont was dismissed to the Presbytery of Utah of the Presbyterian Church of the U. S. A.

Received—Rev. J. L. McClung was received from the Presbytery of Transylvania.

Home Missions.—The committee of Home Missions report an imperative need of three or four additional ministers for the several vacant groups of churches. Rev. W. D. Hedleston, D. D., of Oxford, Miss., is the chairman of this committee.

Latin Thesis.—The Assembly's overture touching the Latin Thesis was answered in the affirmative.

Commissioners.—Rev. W. L. Milne and Elder R. A. Sha v of College Hill, Miss., were chosen principal and Rev. S. J. Martin and Elder H. W. Byers, of Orwood, Miss., alternate commissioners to the General Assembly.

Memorial Service.—Impressive memorial services in remembrance of the late Rev. G. W. Boggs and Rev. D. C. Rankin, D. D., were held.

Next Meeting.—The next regular meeting of Presbytery will be held at Sardis, Miss., Wednesday, September 30, 1903 at 8 p. m. After hearty and unanimous adoption of resolutions of thanks for the delightful entertainment of the members of Presbytery, Presbytery adjourned to meet at Water Valley, Miss., April 14, 1903, at 2 p. m.

MISSOURI

ST. LOUIS.—Communion services were held in all our churches in the city the first Sabbath of April, and additions since last communion were reported as follows: Grand Avenue, Dr. J. F. Cannon, pastor, four on profession and seven by letter; Central, Rev. J. L. Mauze, pastor, one on profession and four by letter; Brank Memorial, Dr. B. H. Charles, pastor, one on profession and ten by letter; and in Cook Avenue, Rev. J. T. Boyer, pastor, two by letter. It has been eleven months since Mr. Boyer took charge of this church, and during that time there have been forty-four additions, sixteen of them on profession of faith; the congregations have decidedly increased and pastor and people have been much encouraged. The financial condition of the church is also better than in any previous year of its history.

The Young Ladies Missionary Society of Grand Avenue Church decided in January last to undertake the support of a Missionary, probably in China, and have already raised and sent to Nashville $350 of the $450 needed, and the rest will be forwarded in due time. This is a long step in advance, being more than twice as much as was given last year; and besides this the Society has this year contributed to Synod's Home Missions, to a Sabbath-school Missionary in the Ozarks, Mrs. Rinehart, and to various city charities. This Society, its efficient officers and members, are all to be congratulated and commended for the fidelity, zeal and success with which they have prosecuted their work.

The Central Church has also much to encourage it during the past year, sixty additions, enlarged attendance, increasing interest and new life in all departments of church work; e. g., on the afternoon of the last communion a special meeting for the young was held, with good attendance and fine attention; and when an invitation was given more than a dozen not only manifested an interest but made an intelligent profession of their faith in Christ, these have been organized into a class of instruction by the pastor, and in due time will be admitted to the full communion, and the officers have determined to hold a similar meeting every quarter.

Texas Presbyterian University.

The Board of Trustees of the Texas Presbyterian University met in McKinney, Texas, the future home of the institution, for the first time on March 18, and continued in session three days. The reception of the Board by the people of McKinney was an ovation never to be forgotten. The children of the Public Schools, and hundreds of the citizens met them at the station on the arrival of the train, and a public reception was tendered them in the Opera House, with addresses of welcome from the Mayor of the City, representatives of the County, the Public Schools, and the Church. A two days' programme of public exercises, appropriate to the occasion, had been arranged, with addresses from members of both branches of the Presbyterian Church.

Wednesday night the Opera House was crowded to its utmost, the feature of the evening being an address by the President of the Board of Trustees, on "The Past, Present and Future Prospects of the University," followed by the address of Judge T. J. Brown of the Supreme Court of Texas, on "Texas, its Past, Present and Future." The following is from the McKinney Courier of March 19:

"To say the Opera House was packed last night only conveys a faint idea of the true conditions. It was no uncommon thing to see two occupying one seat. All the available chairs were crowded into the aisles, the windows were filled, and standing room was at a premium, extending down the stair-case into the street below."

The special purpose of this meeting of the Trustees was to decide which of the seven tracts offered by the citizens of McKinney should be selected for the site of the University. After a two days' conference with the Local Committee, after a tract of 192 acres, just North of and adjoining the city, one mile from the Court House, was selected. The ground occupies a high elevation, with a view in all directions, of eight to fifteen miles, and is considered the most beautiful location in the County.

A committee was appointed to select an architect, with instructions to have the grounds laid out and the plans for the building prepared as early as possible.

Immediately after the adjournment of the Board, the ladies of McKinney held a meeting and formed an organization for the purpose of securing funds for a second building, to cost $50,000. This will be a dormitory for young ladies, and will be in addition to the $80,000, raised by McKinney.

Temperance.

To the Men and Women of North Carolina.

The favorableness of conditions is itself a sufficient call to the men and women of North Carolina to gird themselves for battle against the saloon, their ancient and remorseless enemy.

Public sentiment against the saloon is stronger than it has ever been. It is recognized by all intelligent men as the chief source of the drink evil—an evil of the gravest character and greatest proportions; and enlightened citizens are convinced by painful experience that the saloon is the worst of the several forms of the liquor traffic. Moreover, the political leaders have grown weary of the influence of the saloon in political life, and are ready to join in an effort to destroy it. On the whole, therefore, the condition of public sentiment is most auspicious.

Again, the ignorant black vote having been eliminated, the saloon's hope in voting, as they have in the past, large numbers of ignorant negroes, is cast down, while, on the other hand, the intelligent and honest classes of the colored race who yet have the ballot have made a rule of voting against the chief enemy of their weaker brethren—the saloon. Of larger significance, however, is the fact that the white race feels at liberty to take up this question now, after long years of waiting and suffering, and they take it up with the determination to settle it and settle it right, and if need be of choosing officers of the law who will enforce their will when once it has been expressed.

Again, under the new Act of the General Assembly known as the Watts Act there are three changes that make decidedly for the temperance cause.

First, the saloon and distillery are excluded from the country districts. That is, evasion and destruction of municipal prohibition, such as has been accomplished by setting up saloons just outside of prohibition towns and cities, is now rendered impossible by a sweeping statute.

Second, elections may be held at any time of year, not within ninety days of a political election. Formerly the local option elections have been limited to the month of May in which many cities and towns hold municipal elections, and these have often served to muddle the issue. Now the issue may be presented without any complications whatever.

Third, We may have choice of prohibition, saloons, or distilleries, or dispensary.

These are decided advantages and should encourage every citizen who has the welfare of the Commonwealth at heart to go readily into this campaign against the saloon.

Let it be observed that the new Act does not go into effect until July 1, 1903. This accounts for the fact that we look for the elections not to occur earlier than September or October of the present year. But this is not the only reason. We are of opinion that this campaign must be commenced immediately. We must work thoroughly and earnestly, and six months is none too long a time. We cannot afford to take chances in a matter so grave. Frequently to lose an election will mean a set-back for ten years.

We expect that in every community there will be discussion of the dispensary question, and we take it, therefore, as the part of wisdom to declare our position now. We are first of all opposed to the saloon system. It is recognized as the worst form of the liquor traffic. We are, secondly, for prohibition. It is recognized as the only really desirable treatment of the liquor traffic. If in any community the argument shall be made for a dispensary, let it be based upon the understanding that a dispensary is favored only on the two grounds, namely (1) That it is an improvement upon the saloons, giving protection to the rising generation; and (2) That it will make way ultimately for prohibition. We regret to confess that we fear that there may be cities in our State in which an abrupt change from the open saloon to prohibition could not be so successfully made as we desire. In such cities the dispensary is the practicable half-way step. We respectfully recommend that the friends of prohibition take this question up and treat it according to their knowledge of conditions in their cities or towns, and that once a course shall be determined upon, every man who opposes the saloon system shall give it hearty support.

We expect that elections will be called for in every city and town in which saloons now exist. We would here remind the opponents of the saloons that they must get up a petition of one-third of the qualified voters and that thirty days notice of the election must be given. It is of the highest importance that the friends of temperance proceed immediately to organize in every town, and that they select officers and committees that are capable of wisely and vigorously conducting the campaign. An organization formed now will be able to do its best work in the summer and fall. This contest is wholly local. It presents the aspects of a general warfare, but each election is a battle in itself. The work will not be done, cannot be done, from headquarters at Raleigh. It must be done by the local organizations. Nothing short of a hand to hand canvass of every voter should be aimed at in every town and city.

The Executive Committee has called a temperance convention for July 7. The object of such a convention is mutual encouragement, to forward the campaign, to strengthen the movement all along the line; to elect field men, etc. If conditions seem ripe for this meeting, we shall have it. If not, the character of our movement being local, we shall not fear not to have it.

It is proposed to supply the demand for literature and for speakers, and it is expected that sufficient funds will be contributed to pay expenses. We shall rely upon the press of the State no little, but we shall also prepare a distinctive campaign literature. We here and now call for volunteer campaigners, promising them travelling expenses. We already have the names of some of the State's leading men and we expect the flower of the Commonwealth to join in this great battle for Moral Supremacy.

The movement is non-denominational. It appeals to all good men and women. It is non-partisan. It will sift the men in all parties. It is a movement in the name of God and Humanity against the saloon, and in it should be gathered the full moral strength of our good Commonwealth.

J. W. Bailey, of Raleigh, has been chosen manager of the campaign. Let every organization report to him the names of its President and Secretary. Let persons proposing to organize freely advise with him. Also send to him applications for literature, speakers, information, contributions, etc.

Finally, we appeal to all good men and women heartily to give themselves to this holy cause. The curse of the saloon is known too well—too well. We are verily in danger of growing so used to it and its terrible work that we will fail to apprehend its awful proportions. It is the source of ninety per cent of crime, seventy-five per cent of pauperism, and above fifty per cent of insanity. (The first two items are based upon the report of the Bureau of Statistics of the State of Massachusetts for 1895, and the third is based upon another official investigation in that State.) These facts are submitted to remind the indifferent that the question that we are raising is the most serious question that can be raised in America, and that the liquor evil is an evil that calls for the concern of every man that loves his fellow man, his God and country, his home and his children. We bid the friends of our cause to greet the conflict with a cheer, to face the old discouragements with overcoming faith and zeal born of desperate necessity, to give themselves to this cause freely, and throughout the struggle to reckon upon the conquering leadership of Him Whose we are and Whom we serve, for Whose will and glory we shall endure what we shall endure, and in Whose Name we shall conquer.

Respectfully submitted,

N. B. Broughton, Chm.,
T. N. Ivey,
J. W. Bailey,
I. C. Blair, Treas.,
J. A. Oates, Cor. Sec'y.,
J. O. Atkinson,
J. I. Johnson,

Executive Committee.

They tell a story of Mr. and Mrs. Carnegie being invited to dinner by a box holder at the Metropolitan opera house, the party going on to the performance afterward. As the dessert was reached the guest of honor asked the fashionable hostess what opera they were to see. "La Tosca" was the reply. "Ah!" said Mr. Carnegie, moving away his chair; "that's immoral; we cannot go to it;" and immediately the ironmaster and his wife ordered their carriage and departed.

Mr. D. G. Zeigler, an architect of Sumter has invented a machine for perpetual motion which he thinks has solved the problem which has puzzled the world up to this time. Mr. Zeigler would not make his invention public until he had it covered by patents in every country. In the near future Mr. Zeigler will use this machine for practical work.

The United States patent office has the following to say about the machine: "This invention utilizes the gravitative force of a traveling weight arranged to move in a circle and during each revolution to pass towards and from the centre of rotation in a path, to bring the preponderance of weight on the descending side of the rotative support, carrying the same weight, whereby, power is generated to perform effective work.

Manila, April 11.—The investment of Bacolod, which was captured by Captain Pershing's forces, after a fight in which a hundred Moros were killed, occupied three days. The final assault was made at noon Wednesday. Desperate fighting took place inside the forts. Seven cannon were captured and eleven Americans were wounded, a few of them seriously. It is probable that all the Americans will recover. The column approached Bacolod early on Monday and found new forts, which had been a year under construction, flying battle flags. The Moros did not wait to be attacked, but fired a volley, which wounded two Americans. Captain Pershing then decided to bombard the fortification, and Gately's batteries took up positions and shelled the forts and works until Wednesday morning, the infantry and cavalry supporting the attack. Many of the Moros left the forts on Monday and Tuesday nights, and escaped in boats on the lake. The assault on Wednesday was carefully prepared. The column carried forward a bamboo bridge, on which the troops crossed the moat under fire and afterwards scaled the walls. The fighting inside the forts was most desperate. Sixty dead Moros were found inside the walls and 40 were killed in the trenches. The whereabouts of the Sultan of Bacolod is not known. He is believed to have escaped Monday night.

In Memoriam.

LANNEAU.—In Jacksonville, Fla., at the residence of her Nephew, Mr. Joseph H. McLaurin, on the afternoon of March the 23d, 1903, Mrs. Francis Hooper Lanneau quietly, peacefully fell asleep in Jesus, after a long and lingering illness of several months, which she bore with patient endurance and meek resignation to the will of her heavenly Father. Mrs. Lanneau was born at Ecclesford, N. C., near Fayetteville, Aug. 13th, 1825. She was the daughter of Mr. John D. Eccles, an honored Ruling Elder of the Fayetteville Presbyterian Church and an elder sister of the late Mrs. Duncan McLaurin who entered into rest only three weeks previously. So that the two sisters so long and lovingly united in life were not long separated from each other in the land where partings are unknown.

On July 13th, 1851, she united with the Presbyterian Church, under the ministry of Rev. Adam Gilchrist, pastor of the Fayetteville Church. And from that day till she died, she was a consecrated, consistent and loyal member of the Church of her choice. She was bereft of both parents in the year 1856—her father dying June 15th, and her mother, Dec. 17th. After these sad events she left her native state going to Lake City, Florida, where on Dec. 24th, 1857, she was married to Rev. Bazile Edward Lanneau, who organized and served for several years, as pastor of the Lake City Presbyterian Church. There was born to them only one child, a boy, which died Feb. 20th, 1860, being only eight months old. During this same year on July 12th, the devoted husband passed away at Oakland College, Miss., in which he was professor of Ancient languages. The days of her widow-hood followed close on the day which bereaved her of her only child, and her life was again blighted with sorrow, but the withering of her fondest hopes of earthly happiness by the dispensations that rendered her childless and a widow did not weaken her faith nor cause her to faint in the day of adversity. During all the years that intervened between those sad events and the day her sun went down in a peaceful old age, she ever manifested a strong and unwavering confidence in her heavenly Father, trusting in His faithfulness under all the changing vicissitudes of life. To her,

"Prayer was the Christian's vital breath
The Christian's native air."

And in this delightful atmosphere she lived. Like her Lord and Saviour, she made it her "meat and drink to do the will of her Father in heaven"—and in further imitation of Him, she "went about doing good." Many are the homes and hearts of the poor in Fayetteville, Lake City, and Jacksonville especially, where she spent the last years of her useful life, that were made glad and comforted by loving ministries in which she so greatly delighted. During her residence in Jacksonville, Fla., she was identified with and an active member of the Newman Street Presbyterian Church, a regular attendant upon the services of the sanctuary, and a faithful teacher in the Sabbath-school. She was also an earnest and active member of the Ladies' Relief Society of the city, to which she gave much of her time and labor in caring for the poor and needy, and was regarded a veritable angel of mercy by those in distress, sorrow, and affliction. So not only is she mourned and missed by those to whom she was related by the tender ties of love and blood, but by many others, who were beneficiaries of her generous and loving charity. And to her belongs the high commendation of the disciple of Joppa, called Dorcas. "This woman was full of good works and alms-deeds which she did."

She was by nature refined and gentle, and by grace a vessel of mercy fit for the Master's use. A true, sincere and consistent Christian proving her faith by her works, depending on God's grace for support under trials and for strength to perform duty. She had a well-founded faith resting on Jesus' blood, which gave her a "strong consolation and good hope through grace. "And to her to live was Christ, and to die was gain." She left no children to grieve or mourn a mother taken from them, but loving and devoted nephews and nieces and an aged brother-in-law to whom she was devotedly attached and other friends and loved ones, whose hearts weep bitter tears of sorrow because she is not.

The mead of praise and commendation of the ideal woman, in her home, social, church and public life, contained in the following lines is appropriate to describe the character and conduct of this saintly woman, who now rests from her labors—

"She doeth little kindnesses
Which most leave undone or despise:
For naught that sets one heart at ease
And giveth happiness or peace,
Is low esteemed in her eyes."

W. H. Dodge,
Her former pastor.

LANNEAU. — Resolutions of the Phoebe Swart Foreign Missionary Society of the Presbyterian Church, Jacksonville, Fla:

Whereas, Our Heavenly Father has seen fit to call to her reward, our loved friend and faithful member, Mrs. Fannie Lanneau, therefore be it,

Resolved, That as a society we deeply deplore the loss we have sustained in her death, and would here bear loving testimony to her fidelity and earnest discharge of duty for many years as a member of this Society.

Resolved, That we extend to her kindred and friends our earnest Christian sympathy and commend them to Him, who alone can give true and abiding comfort.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family, published in our city papers, and recorded upon our minutes.

Mrs. W. H. Simmonds,
Mrs Harriet Baker,
Mrs. J. L. Dunn.
Committee.

GRAHAM. — After a protracted illness Miss Jane Graham at Hope Mills, No. 3, Feb. 21, 1903.

For many years she had been a consistent member of the Presbyterian Church and died in the faith. Hence, her sisters and brothers sorrow not as those who have no hope.

M'MILLAN. — Whereas, on March 3, 1903, Mr. Daniel McMillan in the eighty-fourth year of his age departed this life, therefore be it resolved:

1, That we bow in submission to the will of Him who rules among the armies of heaven and inhabitants of earth.

2, That in the death of this good brother Big Rockfish Church has lost a consistent member and an efficient officer. He was its oldest ruling elder and for many years clerk of the session. He was a kind father and husband, and an upright, faithful citizen.

3, That we cherish the memory of our departed brother, imitate his virtues, tender our sympathy to the aged widow, her children and grand-children and commend them to the Father of mercies and God of all comfort.

4, That these resolutions be spread upon our record and a copy sent to the family and Presbyterian Standard for publication.

By order of the session, April 4, 1903.
Dugald Munroe, Mod.
Lauchlin McDonald, Clerk.

GRAHAM. — At her home, Miranda, N. C., Saturday, February 28th, Mrs. John K. Graham fell asleep after a protracted illness, borne with unwavering faith and Christian fortitude.

The deceased was for many years a consistent and very useful member of Thyatira Church and her influence for good will be felt in the community for years to come. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the spirit, that they may rest from their labors: and their works do follow them." Pastor.

M'DOUGAL. — Died in Marion, N. C., April 3rd, 1903, Mrs. Margaret J. McDougal, in the seventy-third year of her age. Mrs. McDougal was an invalid and a great sufferer for a number of years before her death. This suffering was greatly intensified in her last hours, her death being caused by a severe burn about a week before the end. In all her afflictions her consistent Christian character shone with a pure light. She was one of those who have been purified through suffering. Mrs. McDougal was born in Argyleshire, Scotland, March 15th 1831 and was the daughter of the late Rev. Jno. C. Sinclair who removed to Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, when she was seven years of age and later preached in Mecklenburg and Cumberland counties N. C. She was united in marriage to Jno. Q. McDougal of Cumberland county, who died here in 1880 and leaves one daughter, Mrs. W. E. Landis, and a brother, Col. P. J. Sinclair, of this place to mourn her loss.

M'QUEEN.—"Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me."

After a wasting illness, the call came to our young friend, James Alexander McQueen, whose life-plan was just unfolding, and he went to "see Him face to face, to tell the story, saved by grace." He was the third son of Rev. Martin McQueen, was graduated from Davidson College with the class of 1899, and taught for two years near Charlotte, before going to Columbia University where he did the work for an A. M. degree. Near the close of the term a hemorrhage betrayed the lurking disease, and when he came back to the old home in Moore County, N. C. we looked into his face and understood. A few months were spent in Teays, in the hope that the dryer air would be helpful, but it was a losing fight from the beginning. He came home in February and died March 8th, 1903. We had counted so much on what he would accomplish, for he was well equipped for service; ambitions, frank, gentle, manly, golden-hearted, and he would have liked to "carry his shield;" but it was not to be. How we were reminded of the young student by the Brier bush as we watched him, patient always and hopeful.

He has gone through the open door to eternal youth. "What I do, thou knowest not now."

The Household.

The Truest Hospitality.

"The essence of hospitality lies in making one's guests feel perfectly at their ease," said Julia Dent Grant.

"Let me give you an instance of what I consider real hospitality," she continued. "Years ago I attended a little dinner given by an old and very dear friend of my girlhood. Her income was no larger than her dining-room, and that was so small that her party had to be limited to eight. The dinner was most excellently cooked and nicely served, but very simple and inexpensive. We scarcely gave a thought to each course as it passed, except to realize how charmingly homelike a feast it was.

A gracious hospitality made about us an atmosphere as genial as sunshine. I was the only guest present who caught a gleam of anxious bewilderment steal across our hostess when the dessert was set before her. The anxiety was gone in a second. It had been scarcely more obtrusive than a low-toned request of her maid for a large serving spoon. Immediately she was her own sparkling, cordial self again.

"Not a little comment was passed on that dessert; it was so novel and delicious. To more than one guest the hostess smilingly promised the recipe. The dish was new to me: it was a creamy, rich yellowish custard, perfectly chilled, and served with macaroons. That evening when we were alone I reminded her that I also wished the recipe before I went home. She looked at me for a moment with a quizzical smile and asked, "Really, didn't you know it was a failure?"

"I assured her I had no idea of what it was.

"I don't mind confessing to you now," she said, "although I had one terribly anxious moment when I glanced at the contents of that glass bowl. My little maid and I prepared the dinner all alone, and I left her to unmold a maple mousse. In her anxiety, when she found it would not come from the mold, she set it in hot water, and—well, you saw the result. I did not call attention to it; I could do nothing but serve it as it was."

"That was an instance," said Mrs. Grant, "of perfect hospitality. Imagine the uncomfortable end to a perfect dinner had she explained the circumstances, inveighed against a servant's carelessness and let us into the secret that we were eating a failure. Thousands of women would have done it from sheer annoyance and forgetfulness. The circumstance stands constantly in my memory as an instance of high breeding and the truest hospitality."—Collier's Weekly.

For Your Mother's Birthday.

An idea I carried out on my mother's birthday not long ago was such a complete success I thought possibly some other "Good Housekeeper" might like it. First I asked all my mother's sisters and number of her most intimate friends to write so that she could receive their letters on her birthday, with the result that eleven were received. Then I prepared my birthday box. There were eight or ten little gifts, and each was wrapped in white paper, tied daintily with ribbon, and on each was inscribed the hour at which it should be opened. For instance—at breakfast time there was a doily to be unwrapped, and at 9 o'clock a photograph frame. A box of candied cherries was supposed to follow her luncheon, at 1, while at 3 there was a book to claim her attention. And in this way the pleasure of being remembered was prolonged through the day.—Good Housekeeping.

A TRAIN FOR MILLIONAIRES

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

MRS. HELENA BLAU,

Young Milwaukee Society Woman.

THEN thousand cured women have written to tell how Wine of Cardui bestows the blessing of health on every woman who takes it, rich and poor alike. Mrs. Helena Blau, No. 123 Seventh Street, Milwaukee, Wis., is one of the young women whom Wine of Cardui has rescued from a life of suffering. She writes:

"Wine of Cardui is certainly 'worn out' women's best friend and I am pleased to give my experience with it. A few months ago I caught a severe cold, having been out in inclement weather, which settled all over me, particularly in the abdomen. I was in almost constant pain. I consulted a physician and took his medicine for a month and without any relief. I then decided I would try your medicine and it was a lucky day for me when I did so. I noticed a change in a few days and felt encouraged to continue taking Wine of Cardui, and my patience was rewarded, for in two weeks my pains had left me and I felt like a new woman."

Mrs. Helena Blau.

The woman who has suffered from female weakness should do anything within reason to secure health. Wine of Cardui is the medicine that appeals to reasonable women—women who hold operations and cutting in horror—women who know that Nature is the best physician. Wine of Cardui gives women back their health by giving Nature a chance to build up the wasted and diseased tissue. Wine of Cardui regulates the menstrual flow and Nature, when relieved of the drains or of the poisons in the system, makes the functional organs strong and healthy again.

Any woman who is silently suffering untold pains because she is too sensitive to undergo a physician's examination and treatment can find no excuse for not securing relief when Wine of Cardui is offered to her. There is no publicity to deter her. She can take Wine of Cardui in the privacy of her home, with as much assurance of a final cure as though a dozen doctors recommended it. Many physicians do recommend Wine of Cardui to their patients.

Why not get a $1.00 bottle of Wine of Cardui from your druggist today?

The Home Circle.

Easter Morning.

By Rev. Henry T. Weiss.
(Superintendent of Bethesda, The Protestant Leper Home, and Missionary in charge. Present address, 12 Church Street, Bethlehem, Pa.)

It is 5 o'clock in the morning. Over the tall trees of the forest on the opposite side of the Surinam river shines the constellation of the majestic Southern Cross. Myriads of stars move along in their silent course. Also in the cottages of Bethesda, the leper village, all is still. Only from one of these cottages is heard a cry of distress, the cry of an unfortunate inmate approaching his dissolution. 6.30 a. m.—Dull burn the few lamps in the chapel of the lepers in which, during the last weeks they have so often gathered in order, in spirit, to follow their suffering Saviour on his dolorous road to Golgotha's cross.

Quietly the congregation awaits the arrival of the missionary. Now he enters with the joyful Easter greeting: "The Lord is risen!" The lepers arise responding with the words: "He is risen indeed!" and triumphantly the words sound forth in the Easter night:

Hail, all hail, victorious Lord and Saviour!

Thou hast burst the bonds of death;
Grant us, as to Mary, that great favor,
To embrace thy feet in faith.
Thou hast in our stead the curse endured,
And for us eternal life procured,
Joyful, we with one accord,
Hail Thee, as our risen Lord.

The lepers now all pass out, in mute procession, into the starlit night, to the last resting place of the dead. Silently they move along, each one absorbed in his own thoughts.

On the edge of the forest, in dark outline, rises a cross from among the tall grass. They have now reached the peaceful grave yard of the leper colony. No high monuments of brass or stone adorn this resting place of the dead. No kneeling angels guard the graves of the sleepers. In vain would you seek even the simplest grave stone. The giant trees of the primeval forest stand here like a death watch. The waves of the Surinam river murmur a funeral dirge to the departed.

"I am the resurrection and the life! Whosoever believeth in me shall live though he were dead!" Thus sound the words of life and hope over the lowly mounds of earth.

Now rises, on the opposite shore, above the woods, the fiery orb of day. His beams tremble through the thick foliage of the primeval forest, they plunge into the current of the stream, they illumine the cottages where pain and suffering dwell, they surround with fleeting lustre, the cross on the field of death.

Struck by the wind the tall grass surges up and down—like a crystal sea—and the lowlands far and wide glisten and sparkle with heavy dew in the bright Easter morning light.

The company of cripples, men, women and children, all clad in spotless white, surround the graves of their former companions and friends whose long path of suffering has ended here. Not far from these Christian lepers a large number of heathen Coolis listen to their Easter hymn of rejoicing:

Jesus lives! henceforth is death
But the gate of life immortal;
This shall calm my trembling breath,
When I pass its gloomy portal;
Faith shall cry, as fails each sense,
Lord, thou art my confidence.

The hymn has perceptibly moved the swarthy sons from India's pearly strand as the expression on their faces would indicate. Leaning on his staff, bent forward, Buddha's priest looks down to the earth. He seems, at this moment, to feel something like a longing for Heaven and he is conscious that One who is invisible to the human eye, yet omnipresent, is here passing through the groups of Christian lepers and that He is mightier than Buddha.

The hymn has died away. The Christian congregation unites in prayer to the risen Prince of Life.

Those, among the lepers whose hands still remain, reverently fold them. The others cross their crippled members, while the Coolis place their arms over their breasts. The missionary in his prayer remembers the departed, he commends the living of this village of exiles from home and kindred, to the heart of the All-compassionate Saviour. He asks that an Easter blessing may descend upon the heathen peoples who still dwell in darkness and the shadow of death—far from the Easter light and hope. When the Amen has been pronounced the lepers extend to each other, over the graves of the departed, their crippled hands during the singing of the well known hymn:

We who here together are assembled,
Joining hearts and hands in one,
Bind ourselves with love that's undismembered,
Christ to love and serve alone:
Oh, may our imperfect songs and praises
Be well-pleasing unto Thee, Lord Jesus:
Say, "My peace I leave with you:"
Amen, amen, be it so.

Now they return to their cottages, the homeless exiles who, under Golgotha's cross, have found the way to their Father's home on high and peace on earth. Across their scarred and disfigured visages passes a beam of Easter joy. They know that God's messenger will some day approach their couch of suffering and gently bear them away from this valley of corruption into the land of the redeemed from many nations, where dwell the saints in light.

In your Easter joy, kind reader, will you not also remember the poor, crippled lepers of Bethesda? Your helping hand and sympathy is needed in order to extend the work. There are still thousands of lepers in Surinam who cannot turn to Bethesda for shelter because there is no room for them. Many there are who are anxious to come and be tenderly cared for, to find rest here under the shadow of the cross of Calvary. In the lepers' farewell letter to us they wrote: "As it is only love for us that prompts you to cross the seas. He will crown your labors with success; for where love is the compelling power, the Lord will command a blessing."

Westminster Abbey.

Rev. W. W. Moore, in Children's Friend.

Westminster Abbey is not wanting in architectural interest. Indeed it is pronounced by Mr. Freeman the most glorious of English churches, and is said to be the one great church of England which retains its beautiful ancient coloring undestroyed by so-called "restoration." The exterior is singularly impressive, whether viewed from the east, where the exquisite lacework of Henry VII.'s Chapel, with its richly decorated buttresses, rivets the attention at the first glance, or from the north, where we face the north transept, the front of which, with its niches, its rose-window, and its great triple entrance, is pronounced by Mr. Hare the richest part of the building externally, or even from the west, where, in spite of the two comparatively late and feeble towers, we have a noble front, the loftiest of which is well brought out by "the low line of grey wall which indicates the Jerusalem Chamber." The interior is still more beautiful, and, as we have already seen, this beauty culminates in Henry VII.'s Chapel, the loveliness of which is absolutely unrivalled in the whole world.

In the chapel of Edward the Confessor stands a scratched and battered wooden chair, six hundred years old, beneath the seat of which is inserted a thick, flat block of reddish sandstone. This is the celebrated Stone of Destiny, about the adventures and travels of which so many incredible stories have been told, from the time of its alleged use by the patriarch Jacob as a pillar at Bethel, till the time of its arrival at Scone, near Perth, in Scotland. It is certain that from the middle of the twelfth century all the Scottish kings were crowned on this stone, till it was captured and carried to London by Edward I., and that in the oak chair beneath which the stone was then enclosed all the kings of England since the time of Edward I. have been crowned, the last being Edward VII. on the 9th of last August. It has never been carried out of the church but once. That was when it was taken to Westminster Hall, across the street, that in it Oliver Cromwell might be installed Lord Protector. Thus it was that "the greatest prince that ever ruled England," as Lord Macaulay rightly calls him, the man who refused to wear the crown, but who wielded so much more of real power than any of those who did wear it that he placed England in the forefront of European nations and made her mistress of the seas, was not inducted into his office in the Abbey where all the other sovereigns have been crowned since William I., but in Westminster Hall, concerning the extraordinary historical interest of which we shall have something to say a little later. The chair which holds the Stone of Scone, and the mate to it, made later and used for the queen's consort, are, of course, covered with rich upholstery at the coronations, and much of the defacement of them is the result of driving nails into the wood for this purpose.

But the main attraction of Westminster Abbey is neither its architectural glory nor its connection with the crowning of the nation's sovereigns, but the fact that it is the chief sepulchre of Britain's great men. Not only is the building "paved with princes and a royal race," their memory a mingling of grandeur and of shame, but the uncrowned glories of the nation, the true and pure and gifted, lie there as well under our feet or are commemorated in stone before our eyes. Some English sovereigns are buried elsewhere, as Charles I. at Windsor, and Victoria at Frogmore; some pre-eminent men of action also, as Nelson and Wellington at St. Paul's Cathedral; some authors, too, of the first order of genius, as Shakespeare at Stratford, Milton at St. Giles, and Goldsmith in the Temple yard at London; and so on, but nowhere else on earth have the ashes of so many great men been brought together as in Westminster Abbey. Moreover, to many who are buried elsewhere monuments have been erected in the Abbey; for instance, to the three poets who have just been mentioned. That of Shakespeare is a marble figure holding a scroll on which are inscribed these lines from the Tempest, peculiarly appropriate in the building where so much greatness is buried:

"The Cloud capt Towers,
The Gorgeous Palaces,
The Solemn Temples,
The Great Globe itself,
Yea all which it Inherit,
Shall Dissolve,

And like the baseless Fabrick of a Vision
Leave not a rack behind."

In St. Margaret's Church, hard by the Abbey on the north side, lies the decapitated body of another great Englishman of the Elizabethan era, Sir Walter Raleigh, whose History of the World contains a passage which expresses, as no other within my knowledge has done, the feeling that comes to a thoughtful man as he walks through this solemn burial place of genius and power: "O eloquent, just, and mighty Death! whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised; thou hast drawn together all the far-stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two words, Hic jacet."

A sober autumn day, with the leaves changing and the atmosphere touched with melancholy suggestive of the passing of worldly glory, prepared us to feel the full force of Raleigh's sentiment, and, as we stepped through the doorway into the subdued light of the minster, and saw the multitude of white marble statues and tombs stretching through dim aisles and clustering in gloomy chapels, we were "lashed into noiseless reverence," and understood what Edmund Burke meant when he said, "The moment I entered Westminster Abbey, I felt a kind of awe pervade my mind which I cannot describe; the very silence seemed sacred."

Remembering that "too many tombs will produce the same satiety as too many pictures," and determined not to fill our minds with "a hopeless jumble in which kings and statesmen, warriors, ecclesiastics and poets are tossing about together," we began at the Poet's Corner, as every one should do on his first visit, and, merely glancing at the monuments of subordinate interest, gave our time to those of the men with whose lives and works we had some acquaintance from our former reading, thus spending a whole morning in the two transepts and the nave. What a list of glorious names is afforded by even this meagre selection! Chaucer, Spencer, Browning, Tennyson, Shakespeare, Milton, Gray, Burns, Scott, Goldsmith, Coleridge, Southey (the eight last named being represented by monuments, but buried elsewhere); Thackeray, Addison, Macaulay, Garrick, Samuel Johnson (with his degree of LL. D. chiselled after his name in the unscholarly form of "L. L. D."—a thing which would have mortified him, and which one would not expect to find in Westminster Abbey), Charles Dickens; Dr. Busby (for fifty-five years head-master of Westminster School, celebrated for his extremely free use of the rod and for having persistently kept his hat on when Charles II. visited his school, saying that it would never do for the boys to think anyone superior to himself);—all these and many more in or near the south transept; then in the nave, Major Andre (hanged by Washington as a spy), Lord Lawrence ("who feared man so little because he feared God so much"), David Livingstone, Charles Darwin, Sir Isaac Newton, Matthew Arnold, Charles Kingsley, Wordsworth, William Pitt, Charles James Fox, "Rare Ben Johnson"; then in the north transept, Lord Mansfield, Warren Hastings, and others, among them the monument of the "Loyall Duke of Newcastle" (1676) and his literary wife, a most voluminous writer, who was in the habit of calling up her servants at all hours of the night to take down her thoughts, much to the disgust of her husband. When complimented on her learning, he said, "Sir, a very wise woman is a very foolish thing."

A great deal of bad taste has been displayed in the monuments of this transept. There is a colossal tomb by Nollekens, the worst cut one in the Abbey, commemorating three sea captains: it represents Neptune, reclining on the bank of a sea-horse, and directing the attention of Britannia to the medallions of the dead, which hang from a rostral column surmounted by a figure of Victory. "Is that Christianity?" asked a visitor, pointing to Neptune and the trident. "Yes," wittily answered Dean Milman, "it is Tridentine Christianity"—a remark which has an exceedingly keen edge, though it may not be appreciated except by those who have some knowledge of the relation sustained by the Council of Trent to the beliefs and practices of the Romish Church. The sculptors were for a time "weighed down by the pagan mania for Neptunes, Britannias, and Victories." Goldwin Smith says "some of the monuments might with advantage be removed from a Christian Church to a heathen Pantheon, while some might be better for being macadamized."

Our Young People.

A Dog and His Monument.

For the Standard.

During the early days of last August, I spent a while in the lake region of England. Out of their midst rises the heather-covered old Mt. Helvellyn. If you cross this mountain, going toward the pretty village of Grasmere, you will see below you, a huge rock, and near it a monument.

Nearly an hundred years ago, a young boy came into the district on a fishing trip, with no companion but his dog. It was in the early spring, and there were traces of snow and ice on the mountainsides. Charles Gough left a village beyond Helvellyn one morning and never came back. The inn-keeper was not worried; he supposed that the young traveler had passed on out of the neighborhood.

On this rock, embedded in the side of the mountain, he slipped and fell. Three months later, a shepherd, looking for a lost sheep, wandered far out into the wilds and among the precipices. He heard the faint cry of a dog; following the sound he came to the body of Charles Gough, guarded by his little friend. How the dog had lived no one could tell. What the long waiting for his master to wake, meant to him, no one could know. The hill-foxes and the ravens came close, and the dog had to watch and work faithfully. With no thought of irreverence, my mind turned back to the Bible story of Rizpah.

Besides the monument of stone, two of Great Britain's best poets have given this dog a page of their genius; Wordsworth calls his poem-story "Fidelity," and Sir Walter Scott has named his for the grand old mountain, "Helvellyn."

A Promise and a Comrade.

By Agnes E. Wilson, in Forward.

"Be sure you take good care of yourself, my lad. Don't get to eating your potatoes, tops and all, just because you haven't anybody to share them with. When a fellow is living all alone, he is tempted sometimes to skimp himself a bit."

The big, athletic-looking fellow who sat before a student's table turned back when he had reached the end of the letter he was reading, and read these sentences with a mingled look of dismay and amusement.

"I wonder what you would say, Uncle Mark," he mused, "if you knew that, according to the present outlook, I shall not even have the tops to eat until your next remittance comes. I am absolutely penniless, my larder is in the condition of poor Mother Hubbard's, and I promised you upon the honor of a gentleman that I would never go in debt. Pony Thrale owes me three dollars, but Pony Thrale is at present in the bosom of his family. By the time he comes back, I shall probably be an emaciated skeleton."

Elliott Saxon got up and took a turn round the room, laughing a low, musical laugh as he walked about. He was not yet so hungry that he could not see the funny side of his predicament. The room was in perfect order, and the screen which concealed his gas stove and cooking utensils was drawn decorously into place. The stove had not been lighted that day; there was nothing to cook. Elliott knew only too well that behind the immaculate curtains which veiled the shelves there was nothing but three-quarters of a pound of sugar in a paper bag. Elliott wondered how long life could be sustained on three quarters of a pound of sugar.

His amused laugh ceased as he once more reviewed the situation. Elliott Saxon and his Uncle Mark were practically alone in the world. From a child, the boy had grown up with the old man, the two doing for themselves in the handy way which comes to some men who are deprived of the help of woman-kind. So, when Uncle Mark had figured out the possibility of gratifying Elliott's wish to go to college, it had come about quite naturally that the young man had determined on keeping "bachelor's hall."

The allowance had not seemed so slender at first. Elliott had considered that there was an ample margin, but there were some things upon which Uncle Mark had insisted.

"I want you to get the advantage of association with your fellows," the old man said. "You've lived too much alone. You'll need all this margin, and probably you'll want more. My experience has taught me that a margin is the easiest thing in the world to live up to."

Elliott had long since found out that Uncle Mark's experience in margins was a just one. They were "the easiest things in the world to live up to."

Easier than principles! And yet, during the two years of his college life, Elliott Saxon had kept the promises he had made to the old uncle. He had no idea of breaking one of them now, although he was really hungry, and saw no prospect of a dinner or a supper.

"I ought not to have gone in for athletics," he mused. "And yet, when a little college like ours has to compete with the big ones, it's a pity for a big, brawny fellow like me to stay off the team. I had it all counted up, too, and I could have come out even on it if Pony hadn't borrowed that three dollars." He hated to admit, even to himself, that his intimacy with Pony Thrale had been the thing which he could not afford. Handsome, brilliantly talented, possessed of all those qualities which young men most admire, Pomeroy Thrale was a universal favorite. Intensely democratic in his tastes, although he had more money to spend than any other young man in college, he had voted Elliott Saxon's bachelor establishment "no end jolly," and, finding in Elliott the qualities which he himself admired, had chosen him as a boon companion.

Elliott had been a little flattered, a little disturbed, and then, as he saw how frankly his friend accepted his economies, he was wholly charmed. It was quite impossible not to like Pony Thrale.

Elliott had stood out manfully against his friend's most serious fault. Pony Thrale had no conception of the value of money. Furnished with a most bountiful allowance, he was always, to use his own phrase, "in a state of complete impecuniosity" before the beginning of another month.

"I don't know where it goes," he would say. "I haven't any bad habits."

"Except that of spending money," Elliott would answer.

It had caused Elliott a struggle to say, "I can't afford it," in the face of his chum's free-handed extravagance, but hitherto he had said it. It had seemed churlish, however, to refuse to lend Pony the trifling sum which he had asked for two weeks ago. Then an unexpected assessment had been made in the Debating Club, and the treasurer of the Y. M. C. A. had been prompt in collecting dues. Pony had gone home to his sister's wedding, and Elliott was hungry and penniless.

It was no wonder that the laugh died on his lips. Then he turned to his closet and took down his oldest clothes.

"It's a pity if a man of my muscle can't earn a supper," he said, vigorously. "I'm ashamed to beg, but fortunately I can dig. And luckily, while Pony is away and Jack Claffin sick, there'll not be any team practice to amount to anything."

He had a very distinct idea of what he was going to do. The evening before he had overheard a bit of conversation on the street.

"It's the queerest thing," the unknown man had said, "that you can't get a man to do such a simple thing as put your lawn in order for the winter, and do it right, unless you watch him all the time. Why, half the people on the West Side"—The speaker had moved out of hearing, but Elliott had taken the cue from his words. He could put lawns in winter order, and over on the West Side they wanted it done.

The West Side was the ultra-fashionable part of town, but Elliott had no false pride about labor. He experienced two or three rebuffs; one lady would speak to her husband and would like to have him call later; but at last he found a place where they were evidently glad to engage his services.

He went to work with a skilled hand. Uncle Mark had been fond of growing things, and the little house had been full of books which told of their care. So he pruned and trimmed, arranged protection for tender shrubs, potted and put away blooming plants, and altogether accomplished his task so efficiently that his employer was glad to recommend him to another.

Thus he lived during the week of his friend's absence. It was on the afternoon of the fifth day that the man in whose yard he was working turned from the window at which he had been watching him, to the nephew who had been giving him an animated account of a wedding frolic.

"I've got one of your fellows working for me down here, Pomeroy," he said. "He knows his business, too. If he should fail in the law or the ministry or whatever it is he is studying for, he can always earn his living as a gardener. And he's the frankest, manliest chap I've come across lately. Said he was temporarily hard-up and needed money. I wondered about it a little. I thought when you fellows got hard-up you borrowed."

The nephew moved negligently to the window.

"We do when we can," he replied, lightly. "I don't know whether I brought enough back to pay my honest debts or not."

His eyes lighted on the athletic figure bending over a rose, which was being tucked away under winter blankets. A minute later, a dignified uncle was following a hatless and breathless young football player who was dashing across the lawn as if he were carrying the ball into the enemy's country.

"Saxon!" the uncle heard him exclaim. "Why, Saxon, old fellow! You don't mean—! Why, Saxon! And I owed you money!"

"That's all right, Pony. Glad to see you back. Didn't know you were in town. Don't dance round so, Pony; you'll step on that rose, next."

"But, Saxon! Oh, I say, this will not do, you know! Uncle, this is my friend, Elliott Saxon, the best half-back old Walsingham ever had."

"Proud to know Mr. Saxon," the uncle responded, cordially, with a merry twinkle in his eye.

"I don't want you to be 'proud to know' him," exploded Pony. "I want you to tell him to stop this nonsense."

"I never would turn off so good a workman," Mr. Landon replied. "However, if circumstances beyond Mr. Saxon's control prevent his finishing the job upon which he is engaged, I suppose I must release him."

"Pony isn't a circumstance beyond my control," Elliott answered, merrily. "I promised to finish this job to-day. Get out of my way, Pony."

Finish it he did, rejecting Pony's well-meant but not very efficient assistance. It pleased him that Pony waited for him, sitting in the frost-stripped little arbor, and keeping unusually quiet and thoughtful for Pony Thrale.

"I'll not attempt to apologize, Saxon," he said, as Elliott at last joined him. "I have just been doing some thinking, however, and you'll be glad to know, old fellow, that I realize that I've been culpably careless."

"I don't mean about this incident alone," he went on, as Elliott answered him lightly; "but when small sums mean the actual necessities to so many people. I oughtn't to be so wasteful. I never realized that that three dollars would feed you—for how long, Saxon?"

"Two weeks, Pony."

"Two weeks! Well, when carelessness like mine leaves a friend like you without the means of subsistence for two weeks, it's time for Pomeroy Thrale, Jr., to turn over a new leaf. Don't say anything polite, now, Saxon. You know it just as well as I do."

"Yes, I know it as well as you do," Elliott answered, with frank directness. His honest blue eyes were smiling into Pony's handsome dark ones.

"I can't very well turn a new leaf," Pony remarked, whimsically, "until I've paid the bills on the old one. And, I say, Saxon, if you see me inscribing any of that kind of literature on the new one, you tell me of it, will you?"

Just before commencement the next spring, two young athletes who were much made of in the Landon household were lounging in Mrs. Landon's sitting room.

"My roses never came through the winter so well," Mrs. Landon said, merrily, to the blue-eyed one.

"That is high praise, Mrs. Landon; the best compliment I have had lately."

"I will give you a better one, then," her husband replied. "Thanks to you, something else has come through the winter well."

"The clematis?" inquired Saxon, failing to catch the significance of his tone.

"I meant my nephew, Pony," Mr. Landon replied, his hand on that young man's shoulder.

"Oh, I say, uncle, your remarks are becoming personal," protested Pony. "And you'll make Saxon vain. I can just see him now going round, a professional reformer of misguided youth. I warn you, old man, that if you ever try to substitute preaching for good, stalwart, muscular practice, it will not work."

He ran away with this parting piece of impertinence. When the laugh had subsided, Mr. Landon spoke gravely:

"I mean it, Mr. Saxon. Thanks to what I then regarded as your quixotic fidelity to the letter of your promise, our spoiled boy is developing what he needed most to make a man out of him."

The Reliability Habit.

By William H. Hamby, in Forward.

I know a boy who is bright, honest, and industrious, and yet almost every time I meet him he is hunting a job. He has to work, for he earns his own living, but he never seems able to stay at one place more than a week or two. I will give you his record, and then you will know the reason.

Ray, that is his name, had a good position in a lawyer's office. One day the lawyer sent him with an important message to a client. He lost the message and the lawyer lost his case—and Ray lost his position. He was next errand boy for a store. The merchant needed him badly one afternoon when he could not be found. Ray gave a good excuse, and the merchant forgave his absence. A few days later, it was Saturday and a very busy day, he failed to come to the store at all. Monday morning, he tried to give another good excuse, but the merchant cut him short, saying he hired people to do things and not to make excuses for not doing them, and Ray had to hunt another job.

A farmer next gave him a trial. The first Sunday the farmer was away, Ray failed to feed and water the hogs. The farmer scolded him for his negligence, but he gave such a good excuse that the farmer did not discharge him. A few days later, he left the gate open and the cattle wandered into the wheat. The farmer thought this might have been merely an accident, and simply cautioned him to be more careful. But the very next day, instead of putting the calves in the barn, the cows in the pasture, and the sheep in the wood lot, he put the cows and calves both into the rye field and the sheep into the barn. Then the farmer told him the quicker he got back to town the better it would be for all concerned.

He was badly in need of work, and, in spite of his reputation for carelessness, I decided to take him into my newspaper office. The first day he leaned his elbow against a form and pied a whole galley of type. Two days later, I sent him to the telegraph office with a news dispatch. At the end of the week, I discovered it had never been delivered. Early the next week, I sent him with a valuable package to a neighboring town; he got off the train at the town, but left the package on. Then I saw I must either discharge him or go out of business.

For every one of these failures he could give a good excuse, but men can get plenty of excuses without having to pay for them. This bright boy, who might now be drawing a good salary, has such a reputation of being unreliable that the only work he can get is an occasional odd job of some rough work that carelessness cannot spoil. In the same town there are many boys not so bright, nor so active, holding good positions in line for promotion.

The person that counts is the one who can be depended upon. When a boy undertakes to do a thing, if he does it and does it on time, and thus establishes a reputation of being trustworthy, he is on the road that leads to success.

Every boy who wants to succeed must cultivate the reliability habit. Whenever anything is entrusted to him, he must concentrate his mind on that thing and see that it is done at once, and done just the very best that he can do it. In this way the reliability habit can soon be formed, and it is worth more than a gold mine.

A "Dear" Girl.

"There goes a dear girl," remarked Gilbert Marsh as he raised his hat in response to the friendly bow of a girl across the street. Geoffrey Willis glanced across his shoulder after the girl, then turned to his friend with eyebrows arched in surprise. Gilbert Marsh wasn't the sort of young man who goes about calling every girl he meets a "dear." He was a plain, manly young fellow with, just now, a very perceptible seriousness about him, notwithstanding the apparent lightness of his words.

"I mean dear in the sense that she is not cheap," explained Gilbert, fathoming the other's thought.

"Well, there are any amount of girls who aren't cheap," responded Geoffrey. "They're not so remarkable for their scarcity as your tone would seem to imply. One meets them at every turn, distinguishing them easily by the swish of their tailor made frocks or the misleading simplicity of their white evening attire. The angelic whiteness of these gowns almost makes a man lose his head till he suddenly remembers that they cost anywhere from three dollars a yard up."

"Poor Geoff!" laughed Gilbert. "So that's the sort of dear girl you have in mind, is it? Well, Edith Ward may be that kind, too. Her father is certainly rich enough to afford to buy good clothes for his only daughter. But I am certain she could wear the cheapest cotton article in the clothes line and look just as well. You see she's a girl who adorns her clothes. But I hadn't her wardrobe in mind when I called her a dear girl. I was thinking only of herself."

Geoffrey again turned a searching gaze on his friend, but Gilbert had spoken in a calm tone not in the least lover-like, and with a thoughtful expression on his face was looking straight before him.

"A dear girl because she doesn't allow herself to be 'cheapened' by undue familiarities from young men friends. She isn't the sort of 'cheap' girl who smiles on such little attentions. No, every caller at the Ward home is received in the bosom of the family as a friend and made to feel as one by Papa and Mama Ward and the four big brothers Ward."

"You don't mean to say it takes the whole six of them to chaperon this one immaculate young person?" said Geoffrey with an amused laugh.

"Chaperon?" responded Gilbert. "Of course, I don't mean that she has her whole family dancing constant attendance upon her. What I do mean is that no young man can be on calling terms with Edith Ward who isn't willing or worthy to be a friend of the family. She treats him with a frank, kind friendliness that 'puts him on his mettle,' as it were, making him wish really to be the truly manly young man she appears to think him. He goes out from her presence respecting her, and if not quite respecting himself, resolving to so live in the future that he can."

"Well, it's a grand thing for a young man to be able to respect himself," remarked Geoffrey, with sudden thoughtfulness.

"It is that. And there are more young men respecting themselves in this community than before Edith Ward came into it. Without particularizing the point, she soon let it be known that she recognized no different standard of morality for young men and maidens. She is very severe on the sowing of wild oats, but if you'll believe me it only makes her more popular. Say what you please, Geoff, young men care most for what they can respect, no matter how 'wild' they are. A 'cheap girl's' influence can go only so far, but one like Edith Ward unconsciously appeals to all that is good and sure and holy in a fellow's nature. By the most ordinary acquaintance with her he is uplifted in spite of himself.

"How enthusiastic you are, Gilbert!" said Geoffrey, noticing the other's shining eyes. "But how about the 'cheap' girls?—are they becoming less, or being uplifted? or does your 'dear' girl's influence apply only to young men?"

"No, she's a real girl's girl, and while she, by her actions, decrees all their little 'cheapnesses,' there's no offensive 'I-am.'

Another Appreciation of the Aetna
LUMBERTON, N. C., November 26, 1902

J. D. BOUSHALL, Esq., Manager Aetna Life Insurance Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir:—After a careful comparison of policies submitted to me by the Aetna Life, Bankers' Life of New York, Equitable of New York, Northwestern, New York Life and Prudential, I have accepted $10,000 in the Aetna on the 20-payment life plan, with option of 25 year 3 per cent. Gold Bond Contract.

I have been a policy-holder in the Aetna for nearly eight years, and therefore feel somewhat prepared to judge of its merits from actual results. With all due deference to other companies, it affords me great pleasure to say that in my opinion the Aetna cannot be surpassed for plain and liberal contracts, and for just, conservative and economical management. I now have $12,000 in the Aetna. My partner, Mr. W. W. Carlyle, has $16,000 and one of our clerks, Mr. John T. Biggs, has $2,000, nearly all of which was written and delivered by your special agent, Mr. H. T. Spears.

Wishing you and the grand old Aetna continued success, I am,

Our Little Folks.

CONDUCTED BY MRS A. J. MCKELWAY.

Children's Letters.

Minor, N. C., April 4, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I thought I would write to you as I have never written before. Papa takes your nice paper, and I enjoy reading the little girls' and boys' letters very much. I go to school and my teacher is Miss Carrie Mcay and I like her right well. We play town-ball, and sometimes we play baseball at school. I have 5 sisters and 1 brother. Papa's sister from Florida came home Wednesday. I was certainly glad to see her. We go to Poplar Tent to preaching, and Mr. McLain is our pastor, and Mrs. McLain is my Sunday-school teachers. I will close, hoping that this will not reach the wastebasket.

Your little unknown friend,
Mary Elouise Harry.

Harts, N. C., April 6, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am going to school. I study spelling, arithmetic, grammar, reader and geography. Our pastor is Rev. J. A. Gilmer. We all love him. My Sunday school teacher is Mrs. Turner. I have memorized the Child's Catechism. I have no pets. I have four brothers and two sisters. Our school will be out in four weeks. I will answer Sadie Belk's enigma. Anna was the Prophetess lived in Jerusalem. Moses was Jethro's son-in-law. David played on a harp before King Saul. Israelites was called children. The second letter of the second book X. David's grandfather Obed. After the flood Noah was the oldest man. The beloved pastor's name A. M. Dixon.

Your friend,
Meade Hart.

Waxhaw, N. C., April 4, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little boy eight years old. Grandma takes your good paper. We all like to read it. My school closed last Friday. We had a picnic. Miss Maggie Davis was my teacher. I studied reading, spelling, geography and arithmetic. Mama gave me a nice Testament for a birthday present. We go to Tirzah to preaching. Mr. Ratchford is our pastor. I live in the country, two miles from Waxhaw. I will not write any more this time but close my letter, hoping to see it in print.

Your friend,
Chas. A. Simpson.

State Hospital, Goldsboro, N. C.,
April 14, 1903.

My Dear Standard:

I am seven years old and I go to school every day and I go to Sunday-school too. I know about Paul at Ephesus and I can read very well mother thinks. I have read Grimm's Fairy Stories and I like Cinderella best of all. Hiawatha is a nice story too. He was as good as a white boy. He was smart; he shot a deer with his bow and arrow. I can draw an elephant. The first elephant I drew I made his hind legs first and went to his snout. Father says it was very funny, the way I did it. I was a little boy then. I have two brothers. They are big boys. They are smart boys and nice looking too. They study Latin and one goes to a military school. I think a lot of my brothers. I am reading about Mister Longfellow; he used to write poetry. He had some nice little children, he was a good old gentleman. Good-bye dear Standard. It has been mighty hard work for me to write this letter; it made me very warm and tired.

Your friend,
Preston Faison.

McDonalds, N. C., April 1, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl 9 years old. My uncle takes the Presbyterian Standard and I like to read the children's column. I will ask a Bible question, Who was the beloved disciple?

My Uncle Daniel McDonald died a month ago. I went to the burying in Richmond county. We also went to see my grandpa while we were up there; he is very feeble now. We have preaching twice a month. Rev. W. T. Walker is our pastor. I am going to school. I study Harrington's speller, Maury's Manual Geography, Sanford's Arithmetic, reading, history, writing and grammar. My teacher is Miss Anna McLeod. My Sunday-school teacher is Miss Edna Grantham. My father and mother are members of the Iowa Presbyterian Church, and I hope to be one too. I will close, hoping to see my letter in print soon.

Your little friend,
Donna Greyard.

Reidsville, N. C., March 26th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

In a Standard of a few week's ago, I read Dr. Rankin's letter about the children of Japan. He speaks of Marjorie and Jean McAlpine. I have two little sisters; their names are Marjorie and Jean.

I study the shorter catechism. I am on the sixty-third question. I am going to try to learn it perfectly and get a Bible.

I am in the Fourth grade at school. My teacher is Miss Mollie Womack. I am a member of a little Missionary Society. Our leader is Cousin Marion Craig.

I am your little friend,
Age 10. Elizabeth Craig.

Reidsville, N. C., March 29, 1903.

Dear Standard:

My cousin and sister wrote letters to you last autumn but I guess they didn't reach you for they were never printed. I am on the thirty-third question in the child's catechism. I play all sorts of games. I believe I like "Mamma and children," best of all. I also love my dolls dearly. I have no pets except a sweet little sister, Jean. I love to go to Sunday-school. Mother tells me Bible stories nearly every Sunday. Please publish this letter for I want to surprise father.

Your little friend,

Shelby, N. C., March 30, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I have never written to you before I thought I would write a short letter and tell you how much I enjoy reading your nice paper and especially the children's letters and stories. I am a little girl ten years old. I go to school every day. I am in the third grade; Miss Nannie Tiddy is my teacher. I go to Sunday-school; Mrs. Ramseur is my teacher. I belong to the Cornelia Spencer Reading Club. It meets every other Friday afternoon. I also belong to the Missionary Society; Mrs. R. L. Ryburn is the leader. Rev. William R. Minter is our pastor. I will close for fear of making my letter too long.

Your little friend,
Addie Sue Andrews.

Minor, N. C., March 30, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I have never gone to school. Papa and Mama tries to learn me at home. I live two miles west of Harrisburg. I have three little sisers. Papa takes your paper. I love to read the children's letters in it. I was pleased to read a letter in your paper from my friend Sarah Harry. I do hope some little girl will be glad to read mine.

You have eaten ostrich eggs,
And turned the turtles off their legs.

Such a life is very fine,
But it's not so nice as mine!
You must often as you trod,

Autumn's Farewell Dance.

One bright autumn day there was an universal rustle among the leaves and blossoms and feathery brown grasses that grew by the brook. There seemed, too, an unusual stir among the crickets and grass-hoppers. What could it be that had set them to tuning their little fiddles so vigorously? The Southwest wind knew. Since early morning he had flown about whispering a message to the birds, the bees and every living thing out of doors. This is the message he brought them:

"Mrs. Autumn invites you to a party to be given for our friends, the Birds, who are soon to go South for the Winter. The party will be given at Mrs. Autumn's country place, 'Out of Doors.'"

"Yes," said Mrs. Autumn, to her friends, "Spring gave the Birdies' Ball, and Summer has been made very happy by their songs. It will be a pleasure to me to give them a farewell dance."

Mrs. Autumn's daughters, September, October and November, were to decorate the house for the party. Lovely September brought sheaves of golden grain, plumes of nodding golden-rod and yellow corn.

"Oh, how beautiful, September!" cried October, coming in with her arms full of purple grapes and trailing crimson vines and scarlet leaves. Then, when November had added delicate brown grasses and scarlet berries, the house was beautiful indeed.

"I must order a new gown for the party," said September. "My last year's gown was spoiled by the equinoctial storm." So she ordered one of yellow, trimmed with tassels of the Indian corn.

"I, too, must have a new one," said October. "For when November came last year, I lent her mine. How well she looked in it! Every one said she was the most charming November ever seen."

"Let me paint you a gown for the party, October," said little Jack Frost. "I know your favorite colors."

"Oh, thank you, Jack," said October. "You may, indeed." So, that night, when the world was asleep, the little artist worked; and in the morning there stood October in a gown of crimson and russet, all dashed with purple and orange. "Now, Jack, do paint one for November," said October. "Perhaps we can persuade her to wear gay colors again this year."

"With pleasure," said Jack. But when he looked in his paint-box he was so sorry. "Oh, November," he cried, "I've nothing left but brown and white."

"Never mind, Jack," said November. "Brown is my favorite color." So November's gown was of soft brown, trimmed with oak leaves.

Soon the guests began to arrive. The Misses Poplar came first, all in lovely yellow. They were followed by the Misses Maple in crimson and yellow, escorted by their brother, Mr. Swamp Maple, in scarlet. The Beeches and Chestnuts were there in gay colors; the Oaks came in last in dull crimson and brown.

And what music there as for the dancing! High in a tree sat our old friend, Professor Wind, leading the band. The Crickets brought their violins. The Bumble-bees played the bass-viol, and the Woodpecker the drum. Grasshopper Green was there with his "dozen wee boys" who were quite grown up by this time. They had changed their little green jackets for brown ones, and each carried his little fiddle under his wing.

The Katydid's had been asked to entertain the guests by a story: The story of Katy. But before the time for story-telling came, a slight difference of opinion arose among them as to something Katy did or didn't do. And they became so interested in discussing the matter, that they forgot all about telling their story; not one word did they say all the evening except "Katy didn't! Katy did!"

Charlotte, N. C.

spray, saying good-bye to their friends. Their songs were not as loud and joyous as at the Birdies' Ball. Were they thinking of their empty nests? Were they thinking of the long journey before them? Yet, I know that not in the heart of one of them was a doubt that the kind Friend who had always led them would guide them over land and sea, and bring them safely back.

What a merry time the dancers had! Grandmother Spider said it made her feel quite young again to see them. Mr. Nutcracker frisking in and out of his hole, with his pockets full of nuts, said he would like to dance with them but that this was his busiest season, and what would the little Nutcrackers do next winter if he did not work!

As the party was given in honor of the birds, they were the first to thank Mrs. Autumn, and say farewell. "We thank you, too, dear, trees," they said, "for the shelter from sun and rain. We thank you, dear Wind, for rocking our babies so gently. We thank you, dear Grasses, for your help in building our nests. And we thank you, dear Earth, for the food we have had in abundance."

Then they fluttered away like a soft, brown cloud, to sleep with their heads tucked under their wings, and to dream of their long journey. As for the other guests, I really can't say when they went home. For when I fell asleep that night, the Crickets were still playing their violins, and most of the Katydid's agreed now that Katy did.—M. Gertrude Flynn, in Our Dumb Animals.

Davy's Ride.

'Twas such a warm, windy morning—just the time for a ride, Davy thought. So he harnessed his rocking-horse to Baby's carriage and carefully climbed up on the seat.

'Twasn't so long since he had been the baby, himself, and had been pushed about in the carriage. But now he was a big boy and wore trousers.

The carriage stood on the terrace. The terrace was steep, and beyond it the lawn sloped all the way to the orchard. Down in the orchard, Davy could see the pet calf, Clover, tied to a tree by a piece of rope.

Just beyond Clover was Judy. Judy had been washing the feathers from an old feather-bed. Now they were all spread out on a sheet to dry. Judy had just gone into the house for something when Davy started out for his ride.

Davy didn't mean to go very far. But the wind blew the carriage along gently. It was great fun.

"Get up, there," he called, leaning forward. Then the carriage started. How it did go—faster—faster—faster—toward the edge of the terrace.

Davy had time only for one scream when the carriage went over the terrace. But that was such a big one that it lasted all the way down the slope toward the orchard.

For, strange to say, the carriage stayed right side up and Davy stayed in. The rocking-horse fell over and was left behind.

Poor Mamma, with Baby in her arms, ran out of the house, screaming after the flying carriage. The twins raced along behind her, and Fritz, the old yellow dog, came behind them.

Bump, bump, bang! went the carriage. Davy didn't know what had happened. But Mamma did, and the Twins, and old Fritz. And they all ran faster than ever. Fritz barked wildly and Baby cried, though what about she hadn't the least idea.

Davy had run into the pet calf. The rope had broken and the calf was off, like a shot, down the road. The carriage lay in a heap on the ground. Davy had gone up into the air and was coming down, but nobody knew just where.

Straight into the wet feathers, which Judy had spread on the sheet, plunged Davy. When Mamma and the Twins and Baby and Fritz and Judy all reached the spot, he was picking himself up.

Mamma dropped Baby into Judy's arms, and caught him up. "Oh, oh," screamed Mabel, "he looks like a wild Indian—Davy does."

And he did. There were feathers sticking to his pretty pink waist and new trousers. There were feathers in his mouth and ears. They clung to his soft yellow curls. And one stuck fast to his fat little nose.

But he wasn't hurt. So, away they all went up the lawn, laughing instead of crying, this time. And Davy's ride was over.—Primary Education.

Snow Stories.

When over the earth, all shivering bare,
The sky drops down a thick white fleece,
We say that up in the clouds somewhere
A little old woman picks her geese—
A feather here and a feather there,
Handfuls downy and soft and fair,
Gray while falling, but white below,
She flings to all the winds that blow.

But there are children over the sea,
Mid Scotland's rugged mountains bred,
Who, fond of a fairy tale as we,
Call it the fairies making bread—
Bread for their breakfast or their tea,
And say that they work so carelessly,
And scatter the wheaten flour so,
It powders all the winds that blow.

Which is the prettier legend, Ted?
The little old woman picking geese,
Or the heedless fairies making bread?
Choose of the two which one you please,
And with tippet and overcoat and sled
Go out till your cheeks are rosy red,
And your whole little body all aglow!
Feathers or flour, you like the snow.

Clippings.

She was an unsophisticated country girl, and had been engaged as housemaid in the service of the Duke of Rutland at Belvoir. When she came, she was thus instructed by the housekeeper, "Whenever you meet the Duke, Alice, be sure to say, 'Your Grace.'"

The very next day, as the maid was going down the passage, the Duke chanced to meet her. Immediately the girl drew herself close to the wall, closed her eyes, and assuming a reverential attitude, said, "Lord, supply the wants of others, and make us thankful. Amen!"—Christian Register.

Baron Mikusch, of Budapest, was not so fortunate in repeating the clever sayings of others. A German with whom the baron was dining separated a single bean, which in German is bohne, and asked the baron what famous general it represented. The German had to explain, "Bohnpart." The baron treasured the bon mot until he sat at table with a distinguished company. Separating a bean as his German friend had done, he asked, "Can any one present tell me what famous general this represents?" No one replying, the baron answered "Napoleon." Fortunately for him he waited for his company to laugh before doing so himself.

Little Bobby has been forbidden to ask for dessert. The other day they forgot to serve him, and, as Bobby is very obedient, he remained silent, although much affected. "Josephine," said the father, "pass me a plate." "Won't you have mine, papa?" cried little Bobby; "it is very clean."—Tit-Bits.

Lippincott's Magazine tells a story of Bob, the negro janitor in a New England college, who is as quick-witted as the students who joke with him. One day he had burned off some of the dead grass in the college yard when a freshman came along, and said: "Well, Bob, that grass is just the color of your face." "Yas, sah," said Bob; and in about three weeks it will be just the color of yours."

Oh, winter is a base deceit,
Ill-humor still displaying;
Just snow enough to wet your feet,
And not enough for sleighing.—

1200 Bible Questions

In consecutive order without answers. The only work of its kind before the public. A new and simple plan, by which the masses are reached and induced to familiarize themselves with the Bible. Not a theory, but a practical outgrowth from years of experimental work by the author, the Rev. J. J. Hill. The questions are highly commended by those who have used them.

From Dr. S. M. Neel, pastor Central Presbyterian Church, Kansas City:

The questions have greatly stimulated and aided the ladies of my church in Bible study. It was an admirable thought of Dr. Hill's and I am sure all lovers of Bible truth who will use the questions will be grateful to him for thus helping them to gain a consecutive knowledge of God's Word. I wish every family of my congregation had these questions.

Pastors will find that women quickly take up the work, and all persons in a congregation should be urged to use the questions and take part in class work. A dozen questions each week make a good feature for the Sunday school or Prayer-meeting, and add new interest.

A copy of the questions may be had for 10 cents—three copies 25 cents—by writing the Tribune, Liberty, Mo.

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

Event and Comment.

Fighting Calvinism always was an expensive business. It cost Great Britain $300,000 to shoot every Boer that was killed in South Africa. But then it would have cost more than that to buy them.

The Western Section of the Alliance of Reformed Churches held a meeting in the Collegiate Church, New York City, last week, and a reception and a dinner was given the delegates at the Hotel Savoy.

The Torrey-Alexander evangelistic meetings in Edinburgh and Glasgow were attended with deep interest, and some fifteen hundred people made a profession of their faith in Christ at the former city. The evangelists are now preaching in Aberdeen.

The Presbyterian Banner innocently asks "Is there not some danger that the observance of Easter may be so over done as to spoil the day?" To which the Presbyterian Standard respectfully begs leave to affix the plauditory ejaculation, Hear! Hear!

The "dry counties" in Texas represent a total population of 2,218,039 and the "wet" counties a population of 725,825. And that is the reason the saloon people are scared to death about the prospect of a state prohibition law. The majority rules.

Mr. John Willis Baer resigned his position as General Secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, to become one of the secretaries of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. Another young Presbyterian, Mr. Von Ogden Vogt, has been elected to succeed Mr. Baer.

Bishop McVickar of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Rhode Island is making a manful and able protest against the bribery and corruption of the Rhode Island Legislators. When things get really bad enough to compel the interference of conservative clergymen, they are likely to get better pretty soon.

The mystery of life remains a mystery. Lord Kelvin speculates that life may have been brought to our planet by a meteorite. But what brought it to the meteorite? The floundering of scientific men when they get into this deep water are ridiculous. When we grant God, all lesser mysteries are explained. In Him was Life.

A Northern Presbyterian missionary to Brazil came all the way from that country to New York City, supposing that he had cancer of the jaw, only to find that he had an ulcerated tooth. That is more pathetic than funny and emphasizes the privations of missionary life. Even a good dentist is sometimes a blessing.

The Christian Scientists are to begin in Boston the erection of a million dollar church edifice, with an audience room for 5,000 people. Pride goeth before destruction and Boston has been too proud of its intellectual supremacy. This church is a monument to the fact that there are other than intellectual people in Boston.

The special evangelistic committee appointed by the General Assembly of the Northern Church is beginning to be spoken of as a permanency. The Interior protests with the sensible remark, "Nothing can sooner destroy the spiritual power of a church than the habit of looking to a headquarters for revivals furnished, ready-made, under guaranteed labels. We cannot build an irrigating system to supply the whole church."

The Emperor William is nothing if not a reformer. Recently he issued instructions to the Foreign Office about the style of the colonial reports, among the principles to be observed, mentioning the following: "The omission of rhetorical pathos, the shortening of long-winded sentences, and the exclusion of platitudes." The Emperor William is sometimes needed in America, with full autocratic power.

"The Gideons" is the name of a Christian organization among the commercial travelers. It already numbers 3,000 members, whose badge is a miniature silver pitcher with a tongue of flame rising out of it, and the motto, "I believe in Jesus Christ as my only Saviour." It is said that at least 50,000 earnest church members are drummers and it is hoped that all can be enrolled and will then be able in an unobtrusive way to show their colors as Christ's true soldiers.

As an instance of the unreliability of our system of collecting news, it has leaked out that Charles Bellairs, alias Cameron, alias Cheirton, alias Elaine, the agent in Cuba and the Philippines of the Associated Press, for years, is really Charles Ballentine, one of the "Professional Criminals of America" and that he attached himself to General Leonard Wood's fortunes just after having been released from the Florida chain-gang. A recent published effort to boost General Wood at the expense of Governor Taft was the occasion of his detection.

In the archaeological discussion started by Professor Delitzsch it is just as well to remember what the great authority on archaeology has to say. Professor Sayce declares: "Between Judaism and the coarsely polytheistic religion of Babylonia there lies an impassable gulf. And for the existence of this gulf I find but one explanation, unfashionable and antiquated though it be. In the language of a former generation, it marks the dividing line between revelation and unrevealed religion." There are a considerable number of the present generation that feel the same way about it.

Easter Sunday is the day when the Presbyterian choir sings Easter music and the Presbyterian Pastor, after carefully explaining that the annual commemoration of the Resurrection is not enjoined in the Scriptures and the observance of the day is of the nature of will-worship, calmly proceeds to preach an "Easter sermon." It was refreshing to read among all the Easter announcements in the Asheville papers, Baptist, Methodist, A. M. E. Zion, Christian Scientist as well as Episcopal and Catholic, the following announcement: First Presbyterian Church, Rev. R. F. Campbell, D. D., pastor; services at 11 a. m. and 8 p. m.

The Rev. Baylus Cade dropped rather suddenly from a peculiar kind of politics into poetry. He has been writing some very fine poems and this encouraged him to venture upon the higher art of writing prose. Writing in praise of Protestantism, Rev. Baylus Cade has this to say of Calvinism in the Charlotte Observer of April 12: "It is certain that Calvinism bars the gates of eternal punishment upon nine-tenths of all of Adam's children."

The learned Bacon said, "Reading maketh a full man." We pass the advice on to the Rev. Baylus Cade. Reading is a great corrective of ignorance, of both political and theological heresies. "The poet's eye in a fine frenzy rolling" will not do for sober prose. We could wish that Rev. Baylus Cade would read a little, while writing so much. We have hopes of him, if he will only read. If he does not put in at the bung it will certainly come out gas at the spile.

The Real Animus Against the Southern Education Board.

We have been at a loss to account for the violence and unreason of the sudden newspaper outburst against the Southern Education Board.

There were all the signs of a concerted attack. Papers that have not been so violently Southern hitherto have been going into hysterics, not to speak of throwing fits, because of the dreadful things that the Board may do to the South. So far as the published occasions for this outburst can be learned they reduce themselves to the following:

It was alleged that two of the members of the Board sat down to dinner with scores of other guests, and that there were two negroes at the table. It was denied, later, that the negroes were at the dinner and asserted that they only came in afterwards to hear the speeches. But the apology for the misrepresentation consisted in further abuse. Then it was asserted that Mr. W. H. Baldwin, whose long residence in the South has given him, as a matter of fact, the strongest Southern sympathies, once decided in favor of an impudent negro against a railroad conductor. The particulars are not obtainable, but of course the conductor must have been in the right and therefore the Southern Education Board wishes to put the negro on top. Another specification is that Dr. Frizzell, one of the members of the Board, is at the head of Hampton Institute, the great industrial school for the negroes. His views are not known by his critics and the character and methods of the Institute are not considered, but of course Dr. Frizzell is disqualified as an authority on education in the South. The last charge in the indictment against the Southern Education Board is the allegation that some years ago an offer of an endowment was made to Catawba College and it was found that the offer had a string attached, namely, that the college should admit both races to its privileges.

The reader can not fail to notice how pertinent these charges are. The Southern Education Board has as much to do with the offer to Catawba College as Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.

On the other side of the case, Mr. Robert H. Ogden made a speech in the Union League Club, New York City, the other day, against a motion to investigate political conditions at the South, with a view to restricting Southern representation. Mr. Ogden's speech was a warm defense of the South and the motion was tabled. More recently, at the meeting in aid of Tuskegee Institute in which Mr. Cleveland made his great address on the Southern side of the negro question, Mr. W. H. Baldwin and Rev. Edgar Gardner Murphy also spoke in the same vein. But these things were published in the news columns and kept out of the comment columns of the papers heretofore described. If there had been the slightest effort to learn the truth of the matters discussed, it could easily have been learned. For instance, in an address at Washington and Lee University, only last December, Rev. Edgar Gardner Murphy, the executive secretary of the Southern Board, speaking for the Board, said:

"There are certain things which the South has once for all decided, which she has a right to decide, and which I believe she has decided wisely. First, therefore, in dealing with the question of popular education, she has begun by placing her negro children in one schoolhouse and her white children in another. These races must be educated apart. The South, as one of our friends in Georgia has observed, is not ready to open or to discuss that question with anybody. It is a closed question. It is closed in one way, and no member of the Southern Education Board or of the General Education Board desires to open it.

"These races must dwell apart. They must live apart. Dwelling apart and living apart, they must be schooled apart. The educational burden of the South is thus a double burden, for its educational system is a double system. The cost of it is large. But the South, though twice as poor, would rouse herself to meet it, though the cost were twice as great."

It would have been difficult for ingenuity to have devised a slander with less foundation of fact than this idea which has been so industriously spread, that the Southern Education Board, with its Southern members, such as Dabney and McIver and Alderman and Murphy, and its Northern members, generous and sympathetic friends of the South, to a man, is planning a crusade for social equality and mixed schools. The Standard will match its record of devotion to the South with that of any or all of these papers. And it knows enough also of newspaper methods and newspaper ethics, too, to assert that there is absolutely no justification for this symposium of slander.

But there is a reason for it, and the reason was hinted in last week's Standard. Rev. Edgar Gardner Murphy has waked up the South on the question of child-labor in the cotton mills. The statistics he secured have furnished the papers which put the child above the dollar with ammunition that has been very effective; and North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, are all moving forward on legislative lines for the protection of the children and the giving them the chance of an education. Much has already been done. Much remains to be done and will be done, because the South is a land of kind-hearted people, mill-owners and all, who are not willing to increase private wealth or public prosperity at the cost of the children's rights to life and health and education.

As proof, we have only to mention the Baltimore

Manufacturers' Record, the Charleston News and Courier, and the Charlotte Observer, as distinguished for their opposition to the Southern Education Board, to call to mind the attitude of these papers toward the child-labor question. The Charlotte Observer, after arguing the case for years against child-labor legislation did bow its head to the inevitable last year and gave the mill-owners the good advice not to oppose such legislation in North Carolina. The Charleston News and Courier took the opposite course, and after pleading the cause of the children, betrayed them, for motives which the late lamented Gonzales of the Columbia State did not hesitate to impeach as unworthy of Southern journalistic traditions. The Manufacturers' Record has furnished the ammunition for the child-labor advocates. And in its last issue it puts several editorials in suggestive proximity: "Miseducation about the South," "More Southern Illiteracy Statistics," "Returning to Reason," and "Common Sense and Child Labor." The first three are direct attacks upon the Southern Education Board. It says:

"The Southern Education scheme is running the statistical business of Southern Education and it and it alone, is responsible for this unceasing flood of misinformation in Northern papers."

One would think that there had never been told any lies about the South in Northern papers until this past year. We speak what we do know and testify what we have seen when we say that the Ogden party of last year, by its visit to the South and the reports from it in the leading papers of the country, did more to disseminate right and just ideas about the South than any single agency ever accomplished, in so short a space of time, and furthermore that this "statistical business" is entirely in the hands of competent Southern men who would be ashamed ever to have published such wholesale misinformation as the Manufacturers' Record has done on the child-labor problem.

The Manufacturers' Record further deposes and says that a New England advocate of the Southern Education Scheme, "though not a member of the Board," is in favor of mixed schools. Of course if the Board is to be held responsible for all the views of people who are not its members it will have a large and varied assortment for criticism. But when a man with the brains of Editor R. H. Edmunds resorts to an argument like that he betrays the weakness of his cause. The last editorial mentioned is a quotation from a New England paper published at Fall River, of course protesting against child-labor agitation, for the influence of this agitation has waked up the North as well as the South. The editorial closes thus:

"Child-labor agitation in the South has brought to the surface divers Carries of the masculine gender."

So from time immemorial has man placed the finger of indication upon his sorest spot and invited the attention of a wondering world.

This is all that needs to be said. This concerted attack upon the Education Boards, just before the meeting this week of the Educational Conference in Richmond, has been made with unworthy motives and for unworthy ends. It is almost as bad to invoke the virtue of patriotism as it is to appeal to the instincts of religion, for the sake of bolstering up a failing and an unholy cause. The effort to prejudice the South against a generous and sympathetic body of men, of both sections, to weaken their influence for good and so to cripple their usefulness has been made partly for the sake of avenging defeats already suffered in the battle for the children's rights and partly to forestall further legislation against the evil of child-slavery. It is a compliment to the Southern Education Board that it is held responsible for good results. And the Standard feels that it is doing a public service to the South in thus unmasking these newspaper batteries of detraction and defamation.

The Country Cotton Mill.

It is undoubtedly true that many of the evils that have been connected in the public mind with the cotton mill in the South are really the inevitable conditions of city life among the poorer classes. Overcrowding is a temptation when space is dear, and other problems of the mill are, in their last analysis, the old problems of the city. It is worth one's while, therefore, to see the cotton mill separated from the conditions of city life and to note how it may be and in many instances is not only a business, but a beneficence, not only a dividend-producer, but a civilizer.

A recent visit to the largest of these mills in North Carolina made an impression which we wish we could reproduce upon the minds of others. Picture a village of twenty-five hundred souls, perched upon the brow of a noble hill, with the blue mountains in full view. Though near the mountains it is in the midst of the cotton fields and a hundred bales of cotton a day are brought from these fields to the door of the factory. A mountain stream with splendid fall is dammed with a high rock wall and near the foundations of the mill two giant turbines exert the strength of seven hundred and fifty tireless horses. Steam supplements this with seven hundred and fifty horse-power more. Within the mill are acres of spindles and acres of looms, 50,000 spindles, 1,000 looms, and the automatic wonders that are performed are startling in the suggestion of magic or of more than human intelligence. And the mill is complete with every facility for taking the baled cotton and converting it into baled cloth, with electric plant, machine shop, and even an ice plant and cold storage. For the mill is the center of the life of the whole community. And inside are employed a full thousand of hands.

The people have come mainly from the mountain districts, though some are the picked hands of other mills, who know when they have found the best place for themselves. They have come from isolated communities, with scant educational opportunities, and fewer religious privileges, and almost no chance for the pleasures of social life. They may have been more picturesque in the mountain cove. They are certainly more useful to the world in this factory village, and the conditions of happiness are as plainly improved as those of usefulness. Physically, they are a fine-looking race of people. In this particular factory no drunkenness is tolerated, nor moral laxity of any kind, not even profanity. A school, enrolling some three hundred pupils, is run for nine months of the year, the mill-owners supplementing the public funds from the profits of the mill. The churches are a credit to the people for whom they were built, here also the mill-owners having made large subscriptions, though the people themselves have contributed the greater part of the cost.

And thus there is an induction into the privileges and responsibilities of community life, with every opportunity for religious and educational improvement.

Another great institution is the much abused "Company Store." It is a fine type of the modern department store and the people are proud of the advantages it gives them. The stock of goods carried in all lines is fine and the goods are sold at most reasonable prices. There is not a shadow of oppression about the system, the wages being paid in cash, ranging from 60 cents to $4.50 a day, and the operatives are free to buy where they please, there being a "competitive store" near by. To one who knows something of former conditions it is a source of gratification to think of people buying good furniture and good clothes and pictures and books and stoves and other marks of civilization. Who was it that said, "When a native African gets to sitting on a three-legged stool he is a thousand miles above his fellows on the dirt floor?"

The homes of the people are roomy and comfortable, the cottages having three or four nice rooms each. This is an infinite distance from the one-roomed hut. Moreover, every cottage has an acre or a half-acre at the smallest, for a garden plot, where vegetables of all kinds can be raised. And nearly every lot had out-houses for the cow and the pig and the chickens. And there was all out-doors for breathing space.

There is no night work at this mill, spinning and weaving departments being evenly balanced, so that what is spun one day is woven the next. The hours are from 6:30 in the morning to 6:30 at night, with an intermission of forty-five minutes for dinner and the mill closes at three o'clock on Saturdays. Of course there is no Sunday work.

The whole village belongs to the stockholders of the mill and is under the control of the management. The officials are upright, Christian men.

It is a system of benevolent feudalism, if you will, but it is positively delightful to note the attitude of employer and employe, the mutual courtesy and good fellowship. They are partners in one big enterprise and each man has his part to do. We suppose that the labor unions will come after a while and the town will be incorporated and perhaps the better citizen will be evolved from the strife and the warfare of conflicting claims, but the present system is the best preparation for an undisciplined people to assume the sterner duties of life and it seems, in spite of the excellence of proved economic theories, that any change to the other conditions would be a calamity.

The mill is owned by Southern capital entirely and the stock is quoted at $250 a share.

We wish that some of our Northern critics could visit this mill and scores of others on a smaller scale, that have sought the water power of our Carolina streams. But we wish also that the visit could be postponed until one evil is corrected. There are too many young children in that force of a thousand workers. The number is not large in proportion to those of stalwart men and healthy, fresh-faced women. But one is one too many. There are two classes of people whom it would be hard to deceive about the age of these children, from their looks, the preacher who has labored among them, in church and Sunday-school, and visited them in their homes, and the public-school teacher. This deponent happens to have been both.

We know all the problems that are presented. After the three o'clock bell rang on Saturday, we made friends with a little group of children. A pen "with an ink-stand inside of it" was the introduction and then we talked. A little girl, just out of the mill, with the lint on her clothes, was nine years old, but had only been helping her big sister. It has been charged that there are workers in the mill whose names are not entered on the pay-roll, but who keep the same hours with the brothers and sisters that they help. Three other girls were nine, eleven and twelve, respectively, and they looked to be just what they said they were. Two boys were fourteen and twelve. The twelve-year-old had been working in the mill three years and the other five. Neither of these could read, but the fourteen-year-old said, wistfully, that he used to read and spell too, "but I done forgot how, since my daddy died." And that brings up the problem of a widowed mother's support, making the exception to child-labor that some of the laws allow.

We were assured that if there were any children in the mill under twelve years old, the management did not know it and did not want it. Doubtless there are some parents who will lie about their children's ages. Any railroad conductor could testify to that. And yet the railroads succeed in protecting themselves against carrying too many over-grown children. It would seem that some combination of the average size and weight with the certificated age might prevent this spectacle that is all too common, laws or no laws,—common North and South—of under-grown children toiling away their lives in the mills. Not only is the rule of the mill that we have been describing, fair dealing in every relation, but the orders are to help where help is needed. What a pity that there should be this dead fly in the ointment of a real beneficence! Why should not this great and prosperous industry, that is building up this section of the South so marvelously, be free from this reproach? It is idle to build schools, if the claims of the mill are to be set over against the claims of the school, instead of the school's becoming the educator of the skilled labor that is so much needed and that will conquer the markets of the world for Southern products. It is the poorest business policy, to say nothing of the question from the legal or the moral or the humane point of view, to grind the seed-corn in the mill.

The greatest American negro has written a book called "Up from Slavery." It is the fashion generally, with apologists for abolition and reconstruction, to make the estate of slavery the starting-point. The "Afro-American" harks back to the days of Southern slavery, as if the whole negro race had been created in that condition two generations ago.

On the other hand, those who have no friendly feelings for the negro at all, who, as Mr. Dooley says, believe that his advancement must be slow and "the slower, the better," are apt to take the view of the race's retrogression, since the days of slavery, and would call it "Down from Slavery." It is convenient for both extremes to forget the truths of history. The negro race has an historical connection with another continent than America, and no fair view of the whole question called the "negro problem" can be had, unless the facts of heredity, the environment that enwrapped the race for two thousand generations, and the comparative shortness of its contact with civilization and Christianity, are all taken into account.

For example: There is a servant in our home to-day, whose grandmother was a native of Africa, brought to America after she had become a grown woman. It is sometimes forgotten that the slaves were originally brought to America and did not always live here as slaves. Forgotten by English and New England Reformers that they were brought in British and New England vessels. Forgotten by Southern defenders of slavery that slavery began with the crime of man-stealing and that the demand was always equal to the supply of stolen men and stolen women. This woman never got rid of her appetite for grub-worms. And it was with difficulty that she was persuaded not to eat her children at birth. So the servant owes her life to the system of slavery which forbade cannibalism, such a convenient method of disposing of a surplus birth-rate not having been objected to in Africa. Moreover, according to the mortuary statistics, the same life is probably due to the fact that this cannibal grandmother was a Southern slave instead of a British slave in the West Indies. For the statistics prove that the death rate in these islands under British control far exceeded the birth-rate, while under the conditions of slavery in the Southern States a few hundred thousand slaves increased to four millions—a fact unique in history.

This woman herself was born in slavery, was married to a respectable negro who had a little farm of his own; is the mother of sixteen children, the most of them living; is a member of a Christian Church; can read and write; has been a teacher in a public school, and is such a savory cook that it is difficult to believe she is only two generations removed from an incurable taste for grub-worms.

In justice to the white people of the South let it be always remembered that slavery advanced the negro race, four millions of them, from a state of cannibalism, from slavery to the chiefs of their own race that was absolute in its inhumanity, to a condition of comparative civilization and Christianity. It was the greatest blessing as an enlightening and evangelizing agency that such large numbers of the African race ever received from the dawn of history until now. They were considered so far advanced from barbarism by our friends of the North that they were counted more worthy of the highest privileges of citizenship, the suffrage, than the illiterate whites of Massachusetts.

And when we consider how short has been the period under which civilizing and Christianizing influences have been exerted, the Anglo-Saxon, remembering the long centuries of training which his own ancestors required, should not be too impatient at the negro's slow progress. After all, it is a long way from the grub-worm habit to an intelligent use of the telephone. And that distance, with the white man's help, has been passed in two generations.

Close of a Notable Pastorate. On Sunday, Dr. John W. Stagg preached his last sermon as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Charlotte. He begins his work in the First Church of Birmingham next Sunday.

Dr. Stagg came to Charlotte from Bowling Green, Kentucky, a little over seven years ago, beginning work on January 20, 1896. He had been pastor at the Second Church, Nashville, before going to Bowling Green. He had been very successful in Nashville and in Bowling Green, having been mainly instrumental in securing Ward Seminary for the Presbyterian Church, in Nashville. But the Second Church, Charlotte, gave him a great opportunity, with its aggressive membership, and earnest, practical Christianity.

During these seven years 635 members have been received into the Second Church, and its roll, despite a large membership dismissed to Westminster and Tenth Avenue Churches, now has 1,004 names upon it. The liberality of the Church has been noteworthy during this whole period, more than $16,500 having been raised this year, with no extra congregational expenses. The congregations have been continuously large, even for that large membership, and the night congregations with the large number of young men in regular attendance, have been a feature of the church. Dr. Stagg's popularity has extended beyond the bounds of his own congregation and of Presbyterianism, and his decision to accept the Birmingham call has been followed by the most genuine and general expressions of appreciation and regret, from all classes of people, that we have ever known to attend a minister's resignation.

These things are the best testimony to his pulpit and pastoral work, and yet we should like to add our opinion that he is to-day in the very front rank of the preachers of the South, and in originality of thought and clear insight into truth is unequalled by any whom we have been privileged to know. While only those who have been with him in the sick room and in the chamber of death can realize his gifts in bringing to the suffering and sorrowing the comfort of the gospel.

Dr. Stagg leaves more than one monument, in Charlotte, to his genius for organization and the clarity of his vision. Westminster in Dilworth, with a self-supporting membership now of 300 is one of them. Tenth Avenue Church, costing $18,000 is another, and it required a man of his breadth of vision to insist on the removal of the old Graham Street Church, a colony of the Second Church, from its former location to its present site on Tenth Avenue, and the erection of a building worthy of Presbyterian traditions. The Presbyterian College for Women is another institution with which his name should be forever connected. We do not minimize the work that others have done. But the breadth of his vision, the fertility of his resources, his disinterested zeal and his unflagging energy, have made things actual that were believed to be impossible or possible only in much less worthy form.

Nor has his interest in Presbyterianism and in Presbyterian institutions been confined to this city. He has been a tower of strength to the Orphanage at Barium Springs. He has been one of the most loyal supporters of Davidson College that institution will be likely to find even among its own alumni. He has been the most hopeful and courageous advocate of the Synod's Twentieth Century Fund.

Finally, this paper desires to place on record an acknowledgement of its deep obligations to him. His contributions to its columns have not been few and his counsels have been invaluable. But more than this, he believed that such a paper was needed in our Southern Church and that faith never wavered even in the dark hours when the enterprise was threatened with disastrous failure. His faith in the success of the paper and men's faith in him have been the cause of whatever success has been attained. We "wish him mighty well" in his new field of labor and look for great things to be accomplished for Presbyterianism in Birmingham and the great Southwest.

The Sleep.

By Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

"It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows: for so he giveth his beloved sleep."—Psalms cxxvii. 22.

Of all the thoughts of God that are Borne inward into souls afar,

Along the Psalmist's music deep,
Now tell me if that any is
For gift or grace surpassing this—
"He giveth His beloved, sleep?"

What would we give to our beloved?
The hero's heart to be unmoved,
The poet's star-tuned harp to sweep,
The patriot's voice to teach and rouse,
The monarch's crown to light the brows?—
He giveth His beloved, sleep.

What do we give to our beloved?
A little faith all undisproved,
A little dust to overweep,
And bitter memories to make
The whole earth blasted for our sake:
He giveth His beloved, sleep.

"Sleep soft, beloved!" we sometimes say
Who have no tune to charm away
Sad dreams that through the eyelids creep:
But never doleful dream again
Shall break the happy slumber when
He giveth His beloved, sleep.

O earth so full of dreary noises!
O men with wailing in your voices!
O del-ved gold the wailers heap!
O strife, O curse, that o'er it fall!
God strikes a silence through you all,
And giveth His beloved, sleep.

His dews drop mutely on the hill,
His cloud above it saileth still,
Though on its slope men sow and reap:
More softly than the dew is shed,
Or cloud is floated overhead,
He giveth His beloved, sleep.

Ay, men may wonder while they scan
A living, thinking, feeling man
Confirmed in such a rest to keep;
But angels say, and through the word
I think their happy smile is heard—
"He giveth His beloved, sleep."

For me, my heart that erst did go
Most like a tired child at a show,
That sees through tears the mummers leap,
Would now its wearied vision close,
Would child-like on His love repose
Who giveth His beloved, sleep.

And friends, dear friends, when it shall be
That this low breath is gone from me,
And round my bier ye come to weep,
Let One, most loving of you all,
Say, "Not a tear must o'er her fall!
He giveth His beloved, sleep."

There is a beautiful overlooking power in love. It is keen to see all that it ought to see, but it is equally blind to what it is better that it should ignore. Where love is, a host of little things that might irritate lose their sting, because love laughs at them and refuses to consider. If we love, and our hearts are full of love, we pass by what, if we are loveless, we shall worry over or be vexed at. Love is a great smoother out of roughness, a great faculty of blindness toward unpleasant things.—J. R. Miller.

"Is there some one's heart to cheer?
Have you made life's road less drear?
You've a chance in this new year,
Do not wait."

Work Among Women in China.

(Extracts from an address made at the International Convention of the Students Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions, Toronto, Canada, March, 1902.)

By Mrs. F. Howard Taylor, of China.

What a great and beautiful subject that is. Evangelistic work among women in non-Christian lands, carried on by women.

Picture, if you can, a missionary home in some great city in the heart of China. The women have never seen foreigners before and are full of curiosity and interest, and they come about us in large numbers. Hundreds of them in the course of a week will throng into our homes. They have plenty of time; they are not in any hurry; they will bring their babies and their sewing, or their cotton spinning.

We always receive them with the greatest kindness and courtesy and lay our houses open from end to end. They go in everywhere and see all that is going on. We make them feel perfectly at home. We have hot tea ready all day long and spend just as long a time with them as they will spend with us in talking to them about the Lord Jesus Christ. Oh, how keenly they watch us! I was thinking just now as I sat here of what St. Paul said in his Epistle to the Galatians: "It pleased God . . . to reveal His Son in me, that I might preach Him among the heathen."

They watch our lives and learn more from them than they do from our talk. Very often they will come and say, after they have been watching us for a long time: "Now just tell us the truth, do not try to hide it. You have been very successful in hiding it so far. When do you do your quarrelling? We never see you quarrelling. And when does your husband beat you, at night?" They can hardly believe that we live without quarrelling and that sort of thing. That is a revelation. First win their hearts.

We have many ways of putting the Gospel before the women who come about us. There are our books, especially our Gospel and hymn books. We find the hymn book a very great help, as they have very retentive memories and love to learn the hymns. So we teach them hymns filled with gospel truth. They will learn verse after verse, and even the little children pick them up. Then we have large sheets of calico on the walls with verses from the Bible in large characters.

Nothing pleases them better than to have us teach them a few characters. We teach them a verse of Scripture hanging on the wall, or the Ten Commandments, or questions and answers from the catechism. We always have our Testament or Bible in our hands, and we read them the stories about Jesus and explain them.

Another is the work in the city. When there are two lady missionaries living together, or a Bible woman who can stay at home, then we are free to go out and visit in the city. All the women who come to us invite us to go to their homes. We visit where we are invited to go, and as we go up and down the streets, they come to their doors and ask us to step in.

If any one is sick they are glad to have us come and give medicines. If they are having a wedding or festivity of any kind, they ask us to the feast. If there is a case of suicide (it is very common), they send for us to see if we can save life. I have been sent for four times in one day to different houses in different parts of a Chinese city where women had attempted to commit suicide. All these things open the homes of the people, and we can get into them in returning their visits and bring Jesus to them.

As soon as we get into a village the women crowd around us from all the houses, and soon we are surrounded by great numbers. We live in the villages, too, staying with them in their own homes for a few days, or for a week or two at a time. It is chiefly the unmarried women who come to us, but the married ones also bring their little children and crowd around us in great numbers.

Paul's Journey to Jerusalem.

Acts 21:3-12. April 26, 1903.

Paul was on his last journey to Jerusalem and was anxious to arrive there by the feast of Pentecost. But Paul paused at various places on the way, despite his purpose and anxiety to reach the city where Christian interests centred and from which issued Gospel tidings for the world. Like Paul, all believers are "strangers and pilgrims in the earth," and seek a "city that hath foundations, whose Builder and Maker is God." We are journeying to the "new Jerusalem above," where appear the grandest manifestations of God and man and whence proceed the influences that exalt and gladden all holy beings.

But as Paul often paused in his journey to the earthly Jerusalem, so we in seeking the heavenly city, frequently tarry by the way. There were other reasons for the Apostle's delay on his journey besides the obstacles incident to the wayfarer and in the record of his advance to the destination sought, several things should be considered.

1st. Greeting Brethren by the Way.—Paul met with brethren at Miletus and Troas and Tyre and Ploemais and Caesarea. One object he had in view is stopping at these places on his way to Jerusalem was to greet his Christian brethren and to benefit them spiritually. He would give them the advantage of his own ripe experience, impart to them religious knowledge and develop their pious graces. His anxiety to reach Jerusalem yields to every demand for enlarged usefulness and he is willing to experience delay if thereby he can serve his fellows. So should it be with ourselves in journeying through this world in order to attain Jerusalem above. We should be willing to greet our brethren by the way and to abide on the earthly pathway so long as may be needful to our usefulness and the welfare of our fellow Christians. We should not be in such haste to reach heaven as to be unwilling to serve on earth. Another end attained by Paul in pausing on his journey and holding intercourse with his Christian friends, was to refresh his own spirit. He not only imparted good to them, but secured blessings for his own soul. Their prayers, their counsels and their manifested sympathy cheered the heart of the aged Apostle amid the burdens and cares and impending ills that marked the close of his active career. "He that watereth shall be also watered himself," and by greeting brethren by the way and mingling in pious converse we may not only impart but secure religious blessings.

2d. Philip, the Evangelist and His Daughters.—At Caesarea, Paul and his company were entertained at the house of a notable person. Philip had been one of the first seven deacons, chosen by the church at Jerusalem. But though selected to relieve the Apostles of caring for the poor and to "serve tables," he did not abide in that employment. He became a herald of the Gospel like Stephen, and is here called "Philip, the Evangelist." He preached the Gospel to the Samaritans and won converts among them as did Christ, His Divine Master. He was sent by the spirit in the way to Gaza to meet the Ethiopian Eunuch, and to expound to him the glad tidings of salvation through Christ. After making a convert of the Eunuch and sending him on his way rejoicing, Philip seems to have settled at Caesarea where Paul found him. His four daughters are said to have been "virgins who prophesied." We are not to understand by this that they were public heralds of the cross or rulers in the house of God or official expounders of the Scriptures. But they were channels, for at times making known the Divine will, just as Anna and other women mentioned in the Scriptures exercised the gift of prophecy.

Men may rise on stepping stones of their dead selves to higher things.—Tennyson.

What the Parable of the Prodigal Son Teaches.

Luke 15:11-32. Topic for May 3.

This parable has been called "the pearl and crown of all the parables in Scripture." Its teachings are so numerous and so profound that it would be impossible in this column to even catalogue them, so we shall content ourselves with emphasizing just one of them.

There is no one who reads this parable who does not think to himself as he sees the younger son chafing under the restraint of the home and in time going off into the far country to waste his substance. "How foolish of the young man to want to get away from his loving father's house! How senseless to go down into that far country to spend his substance on those things which 'perish with the using!' "When, however, the young man is brought to see the terrible depths to which he has fallen and thereby comes to himself, and hastens home to be received by the loving father with outstretched arms, and again restored to his sonship, the reader is apt to say, "It's all right, for it has ended well and the father has so overruled that the son is better off, perhaps, than if he had never gone astray." Here is where our reasoning breaks down.

There is no doubt but that the Prodigal returned: is safe and secure in the father's house, but suppose he hadn't gone astray! Would he not have been still better off?

There is a popular idea that it is necessary for the young to have a season of wildness and dissipation, and often the expression is heard from the lips of pious people, "Oh, he's only sowing his wild oats! He'll settle down one of these days and become a useful man in the Church and society, and a credit to his family." Never was a greater mistake. "If we confess our sins He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Truer words were never spoken, but while God forgives us, Nature does not, but wrings from us the penalty for the infraction of her laws. The young man who is the prodigal in his youth may escape the penalty for sin if he turns to God through Christ, but upon memory's walls have been painted pictures which will come up to haunt him in years to come. The voluptuary may turn to God and find mercy and forgiveness, but the joy of his Christian life will be marred by the remembrance of the face of the woman he wronged in the old days. The serpent never crawls over a life without leaving its trail behind.

Then the heritage which is handed down to the innocent is another fearful thing to contemplate. One of the most sorrowful sights the writer ever beheld was in the home of a man of God who for twenty years had been a close follower of the Lord Jesus. His piety was known all the country around. One day his son was brought home helplessly drunk. The father arose and went into the room where his boy had been put to bed and did not appear again that day. To a friend the remark was made, "What a sorrow that son must be to his father!" "Yes," was the reply, "more than you perhaps know. The sorrow of the father is increased by the knowledge that the son is but reaping the harvest from the seed which he sowed before the child's birth. In the son he sees himself as he was, and as he would be now were it not for God's grace."

To waste one's resources in prodigality means an irreparable loss.

Some one having said that D. L. Moody was a hypocrite, he replied: "Well, suppose I am. How does that make your case any better?"

Some seem to think they will not have to give an account of themselves to God if only they can show professing Christians who are worse than they are.

Gems.—Nothing, save holiness, commands such homage as a thorough mastery of facts.—A. T. Pierson.

Missionary Libraries.

The first missionary book ever written was inspired by the Holy Spirit Himself, and is called—The Acts of the Apostles. The wonderful growth of the Church during that period of missionary activity is known to all who have read this book, and we probably forget when we speak in a light way of missions that we are indebted to foreign missionaries, under the Holy Spirit, for the greater part of the New Testament.

Those who think that the day of miracles is past have only to read the records of missionary triumphs in foreign lands to realize that the Holy Spirit works just as wonderfully to-day as He did on the day of Pentecost, and it is only the ignorance of the Christians at home regarding these marvelous facts that makes us content to sit quietly by and have no part in bringing the world to Christ.

Possibly the highest authority on missions in the United States, Dr. A. T. Pierson of the Missionary Review of the World, says on this subject:

"To know the facts of modern missions is the necessary condition of intelligent interest. Knowledge does not always kindle zeal, but zeal is 'according to knowledge' and will not exist without it. In vain shall we look for an absorbing passion for the spread of Gospel tidings, for full missionary treasuries, or full missionary ranks, unless and until the individual believer is brought face to face with those grand facts which make the march of modern missions the marvel and miracle of these latter days."

Many of our women, knowing nothing of this work, dismiss the subject from their minds and conscience simultaneously, with the threadbare observation, "I don't believe in foreign missions." To say in this age of electrical wonders that you don't believe in electricity is not more absurd. Whether you believe in electricity or not, doesn't alter the fact that the whole world is being lighted by it; and whether you believe in foreign missions or not doesn't alter the glorious fact that the light of the Gospel of Jesus Christ is being carried to every country on the globe, and that the Bride of Christ is being made ready for His coming.

The question to-day is not, "Do I believe in foreign missions?" but "How can I learn more of the wonderful work that is being done in the world, and what part does God intend for me to have in it?"

Nine-tenths of the women in our churches when asked to read a missionary book, say, "I haven't time I—have as much reading already as I can do." Is the other reading as necessary as this? Have you ever thought how much time the average woman spends in reading fashion books? If she has a simple shirt-waist to make, she looks over books and books to see "what they are wearing now" and if this or that is more stylish. Is it because we think the fashions first in importance that we give them so much more consideration than we give to God's work in the world?

Why, if some of us were as far behind in the fashions as we are in missionary information, we would still be wearing polonaises and even hoop-skirts!

What does it profit to spend such time and thought on how we shall appear to those around us, if in the sight of God we are "wretched and miserable and poor and blind and naked?"

The world is to be brought to Christ. Each one of us is responsible for her part of the work; and it is the duty of those who are already interested to arouse the indifferent to a sense of their responsibility.

One of the speakers at the great Student Missionary Convention held at Toronto last spring places the indifferent Christian on the same plane with the heathen, as being both subjects for missionary work. He says in part:

"A complete triumph of the foreign missionary enterprise involves two conversions. On the one hand the heathen; on the other hand the unevangelized, unconverted millions of indifferent Christians at home. The one party is entrenched behind religious superstition, racial conservatism, prejudice of tradition and ignorance of the truth of God: the other is entrenched behind religious inertia and selfish satisfaction with personal salvation, ignorance of the extent and character of the missionary campaign, and consequent skepticism concerning its results. It is our problem to arouse Christian people, enlisted as they are under the banner of the cross, to a sense of the world's need and to a readiness to do what they can to meet that need."

Admitting, as we all do, the ignorance and indifference of the Church at home and the necessity for information, what can we do in a practical way to meet this condition? The natural solution of the problem is to get the people to read missionary books—but that solution presents another problem: How shall we get them to read?

Now, to be very practical, I present a plan which has been used here and in other places with good results.

Form a club by getting a number of women who are willing to read at least one missionary book a month to give one dollar each—the average price of good missionary books. (If two women wish to pay 50 cents each and read the same book, so much the better.) Have the books passed on at regular intervals. If the matter is presented in the right way, you will be able to get at least a few women who will join the club because they think it their duty, and if you once get them to do their duty in that line it will soon become a privilege, provided the books are carefully selected. A few suggestions as to the kind of books may not be out of place here. Don't get books simply because they are cheap, but select each one as carefully as if you intended it as a gift for a friend. By all means get live books. Remember the purpose is to arouse interest in missions, and the woman who knows absolutely nothing of the work (even though she be a member of the missionary society!) will not read a dull book for the information she can get out of it.

They must also appeal to the eye—have attractively bound books, and don't cover them! In our own club we have some books that do not look very interesting on the outside, and we find that they are not read as generally as those whose covers are up-to-date. The contents are just as thrilling, but they won't "thrill" very successfully through a black binding.

After the books have been read, they should be disposed of by a vote of the club in such a way as to keep the largest number in circulation.

For the benefit of those who may want to start a club, I give names of a few books which I can personally recommend as possessing all the necessary qualifications.

First in the list I would place In the Far East, by Mrs. Howard Taylor, as that is the finest missionary book I have ever read. Others which are full of interest are, Life of John G. Paton; Mary Reed, Missionary to the Lepers; High Caste Hindu Woman, by Pandita Ramabai, herself a Hindu; The Little Green God; Transformation of Hawaii; Kin-da-shon's Wife; Across India in the Twentieth Century; Seige of Peking, and oh! there are scores of them that are just as entertaining as any novel and have the added recommendation of being true.

Judging from the interest that has already been manifested in our little club here, I believe if we could get at least one of these clubs in each town, the missionary sentiment of our churches would be transformed. But even if we should do that the work would be only begun, for until all of God's children are laboring earnestly to make Him known, His purpose in their lives will not have been fulfilled. There is so much to be done, and there are so few who are interested!

It is the appalling fact that for every Christian woman in America, there are two hundred who have never heard that there is a Christ. What are you doing for your two hundred?

Did you ever try to think Christ and His influence out of your life and see what you would have left? Try it—and as you begin to realize with what a wonderful salvation He has saved you, think of your two hundred in the unutterable misery of heathen superstition, and resolve, for Christ's sake, to learn more of His work so that you will be better able to do what He wants you to do.

The Presbyterian University—Our Church's Great Opportunity.

The Presbyterians and the citizens of Atlanta have raised the large sum of $250,000, which they shall place before seven of our Synods this fall as a bona fide gift to Christian Education on the condition that these Synods will agree to bring together and locate at Atlanta, with a combined endowment of $500,000 the two institutions now under their control at Clarksville, Tenn., and Columbia, S. C.

This movement was inaugurated by leaders in our Church outside the Synod of Georgia. It started with men who loved these institutions and the great cause of Presbyterian education. It came in the form of a suggestion to the Synod of Georgia. The Synod of Georgia took up the suggestion with enthusiasm and it was due to the untiring efforts and persistent work of the committee appointed by the Synod of Georgia to prosecute the work that this magnificent offer has been presented to our Church. It will go before the Synods this fall as a great and generous invitation from a loyal and enthusiastic people and it will be for them to say whether it is worthy of consideration or not. I have faith enough in the wisdom of our Church to believe that it will receive this offer with grateful appreciation.

Our Church is committed to the policy of Christian Education. With remarkable unanimity the Presbyteries from Virginia to Texas have declared themselves on this question. If our Church is going to carry on this great work, it must be up and doing. Conditions in education are rapidly changing.

Twenty years ago colleges with $50,000 endowment would maintain themselves with credit and command patronage, but not so now. Prof. Babbitt of the University of the South, than whom I know no one better qualified to speak with authority, has named $500,000 as the minimum endowment of a successful college of the present day. I refer you to Dr. Smith of Davidson and Dr. Blanton of Central University, both of whom are leaders in education in our own Church, to pass judgment on Prof. Babbitt's statement. For a full discussion of this subject I refer you to the Proceedings of the Association of Colleges and Preparatory Schools of the Southern States, November, 1901.

Have we as a Presbyterian Church, a single college that can measure up to this conservative estimate? Must we, therefore, take a back seat in education? I think it is time that our people are knowing the facts about our position in the educational world. There is only one Association in the Southern States that has undertaken to systematize the educational work done by our colleges, to bring into harmony the work in the Preparatory Schools and to co-ordinate this with the college work. This Association has necessarily drawn the distinction between colleges and preparatory schools and it includes among its members all those institutions in the South that have met its requirements and have come up to the college standard. I beg to submit a list of the colleges that have come up to the college standard. I beg to submit a list of the colleges that have been admitted to membership in this Association in the order of their admission. Vanderbilt University, University of North Carolina, University of the South, University of Mississippi, Washington and Lee University, Trinity College, University of Tennessee, University of Alabama, College of Charleston, West Virginia University, University of Missouri, University of Texas, Central College, Randolph-Macon Woman's College. In this list I find not a single Presbyterian college. It is true that Washington and Lee has a honored place there, but we can not as a Church lay claim to Washington and Lee, although we recognize the fine work it has done for us and we value its influence as Presbyterian. I have reason to believe that Davidson College will at an early date fall in line with these leaders in education. We think it deserves to be named among the first colleges and hope to see it a member of the Association next year. Still it remains that we have not a single member now and we have not a college that has sufficient endowment to insure its future success. You will notice that the Methodists have four colleges on this list, the Episcopalians one, the Baptists one, and the other institutions are our most strongly endowed state Universities.

This shows very forcibly where we stand in the educational field, for with the exception of two or three good colleges that have withheld membership in this Association on account of some technicality, this list gives us the colleges of the South which are doing the leading work in education.

The greatest opportunity in the history of our Church is before it. Never before in the history of our Church have we had open before us such a door.

The cry from every quarter is "Give us money." The prayers of the Church are ascending to the throne of God in every Presbytery for money to carry on the great work of education. Well, right here $250,000 is placed before our Church in answer to prayer. Will the Presbyterian Church accept it and use it to the glory of God in Christian Education?

What will it mean? It will mean that at one bound we shall enter the field of education with a great University that will stand right at the top. It will be to us what Princeton has been to the Northern Church, but it will mean more than this. This institution will be devoted to the interests of our Church from the start and will be the great fountain head of Presbyterian power and influence. We need just this in our educational system, this cap-stone unto which the best men from our colleges will go to work in their special fields, when the colleges have finished with them. It will foster and build up in every part of our South first-class preparatory schools to feed the colleges and the greater University. It will mean system in our work for education and that means power. We need to pray that God will raise up some consecrated and gifted man to guide in wisdom the work of this institution that will be so much to our church. We want a man who can do for the great Palmer University what Gilman did for Johns Hopkins.

For this University the $250,000 will be far from adequate, but it is proposed that these Synods will add to this sum at once an additional $250,000. This has always been the plan of the promoters of the movement. We have confidence that the Synod of Georgia will add $50,000 to the already magnificent sum now presented to the Church. Most certainly we will have in this University an institution that will command support from every part of the Church and this is just what many of our best colleges can not do.

Just one word more. It has been said that what we need is not a big University, but a larger number of small colleges, as it is the small college that makes men. I would not take away one iota from the mead of praise and honor that belongs to the small college. They have turned out noble and strong men. We have many leaders in our Church that have known no education except what they received in the small college, but if you knew what these very men are thirsting for, you would find that it is a broader, more complete education than that they enjoyed. How they feel their limitations as they are called to higher and higher work for their Church! We begin to lose confidence in the man who does not yearn for a higher training, a larger equipment for his work. How do you account for so many of our men longing for further study at Princeton, at Edinburgh? Yes, our small colleges have made some big men, but did you ever think how much stronger they would be if they had the advantages of a arger education? Let these big men answer the question for you. I refer you to the alumni of Princeton. The study of that list will show you what such an institution will mean to our Church.

The institutions at Clarksville and Columbia have done noble service and their influence will long rest upon our Church, but in God's Providence they have been called to go up higher. God grant that those to whom these institutions have been committed may accept the call!

A Bible Study—Part II.

By Rev. S. S. Laws, D. D., LL. D.

5. The vicarious attitude of Christ in this entire procedure claims special attention, as aiding to an insight into its true nature. There are two entirely distinct aspects of sin which in this connection it is exceedingly important to notice. One is its penal reatus—its guilt or liability to the penalty or punishment. The other is its preceptive culpa—its defilement or corruption and evil desert. As Christ was holy and undefiled, in his humiliation, on assuming the sinner's law-place, his character being absolutely conformable to the precept, it was only the penal liability of sin which he had occasion to assume in order that he might stand for and be justly treated, as he was in fact, as a sinner of the deepest guilt. "He was despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. The chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed."

This alleged vicarious aspect of the Saviour's life and death seems so original and anomalous that it challenges inquiry whether it may not be an alien notion fabricated and foisted into the case. But there is no novelty in it. The religious education of the Jewish people had of old familiarized them with the idea. "It has been well remarked (by a converted Jewish scholar) that the difficulties of modern interpreters of the Messianic prophecies arise chiefly from their not perceiving the unity of the Old Testament in its progressive unfolding of the plan of salvation. As the Old Testament and Jewish tradition taught that the object of a sacrifice was its substitution for the offender, so Scripture and the Jewish fathers also teach that the substitute to whom all these types pointed was none other than the Messiah"*

The character of the Messiah as a sufferer is pre-eminently set forth in Isaiah. In the 52d and 53rd chapters the Messiah's vicarious sufferings are described no less than twelve times.

It is interesting to notice with what unequivocal explicitness, in his recent work on Isaiah, the Rev. S. R. Driver, D. D., Regius Professor of Hebrew, Oxford, England, an eminent so-called higher critic, sets forth, in commenting on these chapters of Isaiah, the vicariousness of Christ's sufferings. He accepts in good faith the prophetic and Messianic character of this Scripture, but it will be most satisfactory to quote his words. He says: "It will be observed that the idea of vicarious suffering is here distinctively enunciated; the subject of the prophecy suffers not with the guilty (involved with them in a common catastrophe), but for them." And again: "Whereas, in fact, it was we who had gone astray, and the penalty, instead of recoiling upon us, lighted in its entirety upon him, leaving us free. So far, in a word, from being guilty himself, he bore the guilt of others and relieved them of its penal consequences."

Nothing could more effectively emphasize this vicarious view, which was the very heart of the preparatory system; and it is confirmed by the harmonious language of the New Testament Scripture, in which the Saviour is in terms spoken of as an offering and a sacrifice for sin as the lamb of God, and kindred passages. Said John, the forerunner, "Behold the lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world" (John 1: 29, 36).

*Such early works as the Targum Jonathan and the Jerusalem Targum frankly adopt the Messianic interpretation of these prophecies. It was only to avoid their application to the Nazarene that this interpretation was rejected for one applicable to Israel as a nation.—"The Temple," by Dr. Edersheim.

Says Peter, "Knowing that ye were redeemed, not with corruptible things, with silver or gold, . . . but with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, even the blood of Christ" (1 Peter 1:19). When a lamb or other animal was offered as a sin offering, the worshipper presenting it placed his hands on its head and confessed thereon his sins; and having thus, by divine direction, symbolically transferred to it the liability to the death penalty for sin, he then himself slew the lamb as his substitute or vicarious offering. Without the shedding of blood there was no forgiveness. The priest caught the blood in his bowl and disposed of it at the altar of atonement (Lev. iv:32-35). "Christ, our passover, is sacrificed for us" (1 Cor. vi:7). This vicarious death of the sacrifice in the Jewish system typified and was intended to be realized in the Christ, the suffering Messiah. The Apostle Paul wrote to the Corinthians, reminding them of the Gospel preached by him to them, "For I delivered unto you first of all that which also I received, that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures" (1 Cor. xv:1-3). The scriptural death for sin was vicarious. Undoubtedly, in point of law, we do what our representative does for us: Qui facit per alium, facit per se. Adam and Christ were not private, but public representative characters; those represented by Adam broke the law in him and became thereby as justly exposed as he to its penal consequences; those represented by Christ met the claims of the broken law in him and became the possessors of that righteousness "which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is from God by faith" (Phil. 3:9). This legal antithesis is most concisely and clearly presented (Rom. v:19): "For as through the one man's disobedience (Adam) the many were made sinners, even so through the obedience of the one (Christ) shall the many be made righteous." To attempt to explain away this comprehensive and fundamental feature of God's ways to man is veritable quibbling. This is God's own plan.

The Son of God, in his own proper person, did not for the time divest or empty himself of the transcendent glories of Deity and, through the medium of human nature, voluntarily stoop to be born of a woman and born as a servant under the law for his own sake, as no such obligation rested upon him, but it was a voluntary humiliation for the sake of others, that he might redeem them that were under the law. Now, it is a negative fact of surprising interest that since the fall of Adam no promise has ever been given that any man should have heaven or any other gift as his reward, were he to perfectly obey the law in his own proper person. There is no such promise to be found. The reason of it is plain enough. It was not possible for man to meet the condition. It would have been as irrational as, in the physical sphere, to promise a man a reward if he should jump over the moon. There are just as downright impossibilities in the spiritual sphere as in the physical, and man's meeting the claims of the broken law is one of them. Such a promise would have been a mere bluff, and God does not trifle. No! So far as deliverance from the law is concerned, the only outlook for man himself has been, Do this and live; do this and live. But this is perpetual bondage. There has been no covenant made since Adam, except with the Christ, and the reason of its being made with him was his ability to make good its stipulation. Really, this is the very idea which Paul has in the main so concisely expressed in Galatians 2:15-16: "We being Jews by nature and not sinners of the Gentiles, yet knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law (i. e., his own works of the law), but through faith in Jesus Christ, even we believed on Christ Jesus, that we might be justified by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the law; because by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified." "And in none other is there salvation; for neither is there any other name under heaven, that is given among men, wherein we must be saved." (Acts iv: 12).

The Gospel does not undertake to do for man what he can do for himself. If man could satisfy the claims f the broken law, there would have been no salvation except by works. The Redeemer undertook to provide and did provide a redeeming righteousness for man because man could not provide it for himself. Man in his enfeebled condition could not keep the precept of the unbroken law, much less in addition meet the accumulated penal claims of it now broken.

6. As a matter of course, the old problem of the innocent suffering for the guilty confronts us here. It is the innocent Christ who suffers for the guilty sinner. To many this is "a stone of stumbling and a rock of offense." But a Bible study ought to clear it out of the way by exposing its plausible, but shallow, fallacy.

The specific work of the atonement, which wrought out the redeeming and saving righteousness spoken of in what precedes, includes everything in the life of the Son of God from the incarnation to the ascension. It has not been sufficiently noted—it might almost be said that it has been overlooked—that this procedure is a special modification and an exceptional episode in the moral government of God, and out of analogy with the ordinary course of nature. Hence inquirers, not having succeeded in finding its parallel in the ordinary course of nature, have unwisely fallen into an adverse conclusion, the true rectification of which is a truthful insight into the nature of the case on its own merits.

The 73d Psalm has for millenniums stood as a direct notification that the ordinary course of this world is by sin put out of joint. The Psalmist distinctly assures us that it was only when he went into the sanctuary of God and considered man's latter end and the adjustments of the future life that his faith in God was saved from collapse. The pleasures and pains of this life are not distributed according to desert. It is often the case that the wicked escape deserved punishment and flourish like green bay trees, whereas the righteous beg their bread and go mourning all their days. In his admirable essay on Evolution and Ethics (1893), Prof. Huxley makes some interesting suggestions and concessions. His general position is that "the cosmic process has no sort of relation to moral ends;" "that the ethical progress of society depends, not on imitating, but in combating it;" that the seeming paradox that ethical nature is at enmity with cosmic nature is, nevertheless, "a truth as great as it is plain" (Huxley's Works vol. IX, 83, and VIII). In discoursing along this line he takes occasion to remark "that thousands upon thousands of innocent beings suffer for the crime or intentional trespass of one." The material in support of this view that multitudes of the blameless suffer and perish from the fatal operation of the sins of others is abundant. A common motive of tragedy, ancient and modern, has been the unfathomable injustice of the nature of things. Man's inhumanity to man has made countless thousands mourn. Edipus was blameless, but by the natural sequence of the cosmical process he was driven to slay his father and wed his mother, "to the desolation of his people and his own headlong ruin." And Hamlet, the no less blameless dreamer, was in spite of himself dragged into a world out of joint; involved in a tangle of crime and misery, created by one of the prime agents of the cosmic process as it works in and through man (Ibid., p. 58). The noted J. S. Mill, in studying this problem, so far lost his balance as to conclude, as Augustine when playing the philosopher, before he became Christian, had done, for the Manichean ground, that the mixed condition of this world's events points to a creator neither perfectly good nor omnipotent.

In the early church controversies Origen, in the first half of the third century, in answering Celsus, and in more modern days Bishop Butler, in The Analogy, in the first half of the eighteenth century, and various other distinguished authors and divines, have vainly sought to justify the ways of God in the case of the vicarious service and sufferings of Christ by an appeal to the natural course of events the so-called cosmic process. But the conscience of man revolts at and is dumfounded by the moral indifference of nature and sympathizes with the outlook of the Psalmist for farther light. There is an initial presumption that the providential procedure of the atonement, if founded and conducted on the strict principles of eternal justice and equity as well as of love to remedy the discordant evils of the cosmos, would transcend and differ from its ordinary process; and thus we find that at every step it moves in the realm of the supernatural and the miraculous, which are not identical but are akin and closely allied. There are nearly one hundred miracles recorded in the Old and New Testaments, manifesting goodness and justice as well as power and wisdom and not one of them is reducible to the laws of nature; and therefore they are not scientific events; yet there was, in the direct action of God's power, an adequate cause of their occurrence. This action, however, is not uniform, and hence is not reducible to law. It is believed that the abstract conception of no miracle in the Bible is susceptible of theoretical explanation by reference of it to a law of nature, notwithstanding the great progress of the sciences. All the known laws of nature are reduced to abstract conceptions. Whether the events occurred or not, therefore, the recorded conceptions of them present a problem, in that they transcend the sciences; and hence, instead of the recorded miracles weakening the Gospel, their evidence cumulatively strengthens it by their inexplicability by the most advanced sciences. Such occurrences compel the rational recognition of an energy beyond and other than that of nature. The energy supremely manifested by the earthly career of the Messiah from birth to ascension was of this transcendent kind. The Saviour's earthly career is not reducible to nature's formulas. The miracles, having an adequate cause, are philosophic, though not reducible to law.

Annual Report of the Society of Soul Winners.

It is with great pleasure we make another annual report of the work of our Society to the hundreds of faithful friends whose generous help has sustained us during the year. And it is with profound gratitude to God who has crowned these humble efforts for His glory with such signal tokens of His favor.

We began the year—April 1, 1902—with only $32.16 in the treasury. During the year we have received $7,099.37 (Seven thousand and ninety-nine and 37-100 dollars, and this without even asking a collection from any church. The Treasurer, Maj. Bullock, reports $6,815.2, and the Secretary has $251.69 for deposit; and we had $32 16 balance 1st April, 1902. The Treasurer has paid out $6,383.71. Salaries due 1st April $470. Leaving a balance in the Treasury of $245.66.

This money has come from the generous hands of individual Christians of every branch of the Church all over the United States and Canada, Cuba and England, South America, China, and the Sandwich Islands. God alone could reach and move loving hearts in all these lands.

Beginning with one missionary in 1897, God has so blessed this work, that, during the past year, we have had over seventy faithful men and women at work in the most destitute parts of the mountains of Kentucky, Tennessee and North Carolina. No more consecrated or self-denying missionaries ever gave their lives and labors to this cause in any field of service. They asked and received only a bare living, (none over $30 per month), and their salaries have been promptly paid every month, and the Society closes the year without owing a dollar, and with $245.66 in the treasury.

These faithful missionaries have conducted over 100 Sabbath-schools, with over 3,000 pupils besides teaching twenty day schools, distributed ten thousand Bibles, Testaments and tracts, visited and cared for hundreds of the sick beyond the reach of physicians, clothed hundreds of the poor (especially women and children,) who had no other helper; taken the Bread of Life to thousands who were perishing without it,—beyond all churches and preachers, and received over five hundred persons into the church on profession of faith. During the year the Society has built five new churches, and three mission houses. It has built the Witherspoon College in the Cumberland Mountains, which opens this month to receive hundreds of mountain boys and girls beyond all other institutions. This was accomplished through the self-sacrificing gifts of material and labor by the mountain people themselves, and the generous help of friends in New York. The Society is also engaged in building a Seminary in the Great Smoky Mountains of Tennessee, which we hope to open this summer to hundreds of bright youths in that region.

Since September the Society has published a paper for the benefit of these neglected people, and it has carried the Gospel to thousands of humble homes, that never had a religious paper before. It is published at twenty-five cents a year to put it in reach of the poor.

During the year nearly every mission in the Cumberland and Alleghanies has been visited either by the President, Dr. Guerrant, or the Field Secretary, Mr.
Murdock, or General O. O. Howard, whose trip through the Cumberlands was a blessing to all who heard him.
But with all this there yet remains tens of thousands of these, our own countrymen, beyond "the reach of the Gospel who never saw a church or heard a sermon they could understand." These Highlanders are not degenerate people, enfeebled by vicious habits, and indifferent to the blessings of the Gospel, as thousands are, who live in the slums of the cities. They are a brave and independent and high-spirited people whose poverty and location have isolated them from the advantages of education and religion.

General Howard says of them, "They are a bona fide Anglo-Saxon people, and those of Scottish and Huguenot descent. They are a very serious people. Many are bright and smiling and always hospitable. Their names are almost identical with those of the mountaineers of New Hampshire, and of Vermont and their characteristics much the same as those of what we call
"The Green Mountain Boys." Of the work of this Society he says: "The most of the people were in absolute need of Gospel teaching when the Soul Winners undertook the great work of organizing and supplying the settlements and all the mountain work with Christian teachers and competent men to preach the simple truth. To my mind their success has been marvelous. Feuds are nearly broken up, enemies have become friends, children who cannot read or write are reciting the Lord's prayer, the Ten Commandments, the Apostles Creed, and catechisms. The influence of the common school is hardly felt. It wants the patience and perseverance and self-sacrifice of Christian men, and perhaps more of Christian women, to push the work further and further, to meet the necessities of these splendid children, who are not at fault that they are born and bred in the mountains. The Soul Winners have been doing this work with eminent success."

To this one we add the testimony of another honored servant of God, widely known both North and South, who says: "The Society of Soul Winners is doing the most and best work with the least money of any missionary society on earth so far as I know."

The work is only limited by our want of means. A field as large as the German Empire, with three millions of people, nearly all white, eagerly wait for the coming of the messengers of life. We could send hundreds of faithful Christians to help them if we had the means. For the present year, looking to God who has never failed to supply all our needs, we have engaged a larger number of consecrated men and women to go and bear the glad tidings to those who never heard it. One dollar will put our paper (the 'Soul Winner') in five poor families; ten dollars a month will support a native evangelist or a mission teacher.
Twenty dollars a month will support a theological student, and thirty dollars a month will support an ordained minister and his wife.

Two hundred and fifty dollars will build a church or a mission house. To the American Bible Society for the gifts of Bibles, and to the good women who have sent boxes of clothing to the poor, to the great religious and secular papers, North and South, which have given us most valuable assistance, and to the hundreds of God's children in many lands whose noble charity has enabled us to carry on this work, we return our sincerest thanks and pray God to reward them as He only can.

Trusting in Him we go forward, trying to do His will, begging the help of your prayers and gifts for this great work. Beyond the great mountains outstretched hands and beseeching voices, cry, "Come over and help us." They are your own countrymen, your neighbors.

Will you hear and help or leave them to perish? God waits your answer for the Judgment day.

Edward O. Guerrant, President,
Leonard H. Willis, Secretary.

Address all communications to the President or Secretary at Wilmore, Kentucky.

A Note from Mrs. D. C. Rankin.

It has been with very sincere regret that I learn the note of thanks I wrote two months ago to the many friends who have expressed for me words of such tender, loving sympathy in my deep sorrow, had not appeared in the pages of The Missionary to which I sent it for publication.

Not until yesterday upon my return to Nashville, did
I know that the note had never reached the Editor's desk. And now I am constrained to let the many dear friends know through the pages of our weekly church papers, that while I have not for many reasons, been able to send to each one of you a personal line of thanks for all your appreciation of my beloved husband and his work, and for your loving sympathy for me, I have not been forgetful or neglectful of it all.

If I could, it would be a sweet, though sorrowful, pleasure to write to each one of you separately, telling you how grateful I have felt and how much of comfort your loving words have brought me, and more than any words can ever express to you, do I appreciate your tributes to him and his work for his Lord and the Church. You each in turn, come up before me in your words of tenderness and love, and while I may not send the written line, I am sure you will accept this word of thanks as a very personal heart-felt expression of appreciation of all each one of you have been to me in this hour of deepest sorrow.

Very truly and appreciatively, your friend,
Nashville, April 11th. Mary C. Rankin.

Dr. Parkhurst and the South.

To the Editor of the Standard:

As I see from your frequent editorials on the subject that you are deeply interested in the negro question, I enclose a little clipping that may interest you:

"Uncle Lewis Richardson," one of the best and most highly respected colored citizens of this county, was laid to rest in Bethel cemetery last Tuesday.

He was a life-long member of the white folks' church;
his funeral was preached by a white minister, Rev. G.
L. Chastain, of the Hamilton Street Methodist Church and his remains were laid to rest by white pall-bearers, Messrs. J. A. Lowry, S. A. Frazier, Frank Coogler and George Stafford, who are among the leading citizens of Whitfield county.

A large number of white people gathered about the grave as mourners.

Although their children joined the colored church, yet 'Uncle Lewis' and his good old faithful wife, 'Aunt Jane,' have been life-long members of Bethel Church, a white church in their neighborhood, where they worshipped among the white people.

His remains were laid to rest in the white cemetery at Bethel, where his white friends and family are buried."

A few years ago Dr. Parkhurst said in Atlanta that the only difference between the Southern people and the Northern people on the negro question, was that the Southern people hated the negro and acknowledged it, while the Northern people hated him just as cordially and refused to acknowledge it. The last part of

That statement may be true but I am sure the first part is not true and I have always resented it. The Southern people do not hate the negro. They have the most cordial feeling for him when he proves himself worthy of respect. This clipping proves that. The old man mentioned in this article lived three miles from Dalton, Ga. I knew him well. He had the respect of everybody in that community. In fact, the people had a genuine affection for him. I was conducting a meeting in a school house near his home on one occasion when a little incident occurred that impressed me very much. Uncle Lewis and his wife were there every night. It was my custom to ask some man in the audience to lead in one of the prayers. After I had been preaching there for several nights one of the best citizens in the community came to me and said, "I want you to call upon Uncle Lewis to lead in prayer. These people would rather have Uncle Lewis lead in that prayer than to have any other man in this community." I called on him the next night and I shall always remember the fervent prayer that old man poured out to God. The house was filled with people. A great many of them were rather rough boys, but there was a profound stillness in the house while he prayed. I have often thought of that little incident. That and this clipping together prove to me what I have always believed and that is this: Although there is not going to be any social intermingling of the races down here in the South and although the white people will never for a moment submit to negro rule, yet the humblest negro in any community may command the respect, confidence and love of the white people, if he will only prove himself worthy.

I wish that such papers as the New York Independent could get some of these ideas into their heads.

I enclose this clipping and relate this little incident, thinking that perhaps they might serve you for illustrations sometime when you are writing on this subject.

Very sincerely yours,

Walter L. Lingle.

Theology for the People.

I have read and re-read with a great deal of pleasure and profit Bro. A. R. Shaw's book, "Theology for the People." I have enjoyed the whole book, and the chapters on the "Plan of Salvation," "Process of Salvation," "Christian Life," and "Sacraments" I have found of special interest and benefit, as they have given me a fuller conception of this Bible doctrine. He has accorded to Adoption the important place it should occupy in Systematic Theology, and has drawn a clearer distinction between Adoption and Justification than any writer with whom I am familiar.

I feel sure this book will prove helpful to all careful readers, laymen and ministers. The simple, concise, and lucid definitions of deep doctrinal truths make it a valuable reference book.

Mill Bridge, N. C.

The refusal of the Union League Club of New York city, at a not very well attended meeting last week, to take from the table and order the passage of resolutions calling for investigation by the club of conditions in the South—especially the suppression of Negro suffrage—is significant. The chief opponent of the plan to investigate was Mr. Robert C. Ogden, who is so deeply interested in the General Education Board and in the maintenance of friendly relations between Northern and Southern whites in working out the policy of diffused education for whites and blacks. When the Union League Club takes the position that for policy's sake the North would better not inquire too closely into political happenings in the South, it shows how fundamental a change of attitude in the North has come to pass.—The Congregationalist.

Reverence is the chief joy and power of life—reverence for that which is pure and bright in youth; for what is true and tried in age; for all that is gracious among the living, great among the dead—and marvelous, in the powers that cannot die.—John Ruskin.

My Guide.

Through all my chequered wand'rings,
Wherever I have strayed,
On mountain heights or valleys
Where falls the deepest shade,
An unseen hand has led me,
Upheld my stumbling feet,
And with true manna fed me,
With bread from heaven, sweet.

When the shadows grow oppressive
And I seem to be alone,
In the stillness of the valley
He maketh Himself known.
The darkness then will vanish
When that still voice I hear.
For Love's sunlight will banish
All clouds of gloom and fear.

And when the way grows clearer
My heart revives anew,
And His presence seems the dearer
For the trials we've passed through.
Is it to draw me nearer
The bosom of my Guide,
My soul must suffer terror
And be so often tried?

Although, to me, mysterious,
To Him my way is plain,
Then I must leave it to Him
Until the heights we gain,
Where all is bright and glorious,
Where all are satisfied,
And looking back victorious
I'll thank and bless my Guide.

Across the Furrows.

The day is waning, slowly sinks the sun,
Toward his setting past yon western hill.
The day of toil, with many furrows won,
Soon ends and I shall rest by yonder rill.

My day of toil, made bright by tender thought
Of those beneath the old farm roof, our home—
Inspired by love, another day I've wrought,
That harvest days may to my loved ones come.

And as I turn the sod, I fondly dream
Of coming days, rich with the golden grain,
And hear the mill-wheel down by yonder stream
Humming most merrily, a glad refrain.

Hark! there's a call, a sweet and tender voice,
Across the furrows, greets my list'ning ear,
"Daddy, I come" It makes my heart rejoice:
It is my darling lassie, drawing near.

Her little feet toil the steep furrows o'er,
Leave her soft footprints in the mellow earth.
Undaunted now, she only struggles more,
Her happy face aglow with love and mirth.

The day is done, homeward our way we take,
The toil forgotten, she beguiles the way:
Her merry voice the gloaming doth awake
With sweetest vespers heard at close of day.

Years now have passed and I shall hear no more
Across the furrows, "Daddy, here I come!"
Her little journey through life's field is o'er,
And I shall meet her in our heavenly home.

Rabbi Hirsch, the principal Jewish divine of Chicago, is reported to have said in a lecture on the evening of Good Friday that the account of the gospels relative to the crucifixion of Jesus is impossible from a Jewish standpoint, and in support of that premise he entered at length into an argument to prove that not the Jews, but "the Romans and the clan of priests," put the Nazarene Prophet to death. It seems in order to suggest to the rabbi that before a man starts out to disprove the Bible, it would be useful for him to read it and see what it actually does say.—Interior.

Carson, Rev. J. M. Spencer, and Rev. A. A. Wallace. Rev. W. T. Howison was dismissed to the Presbytery of Lafayette. Rev. Wisel Beale was received from the Presbytery of Potosi, and Rev. J. C. Carson from the Presbytery of Holston. Rev. J. R. Finley of Lafayette Presbytery was invited to sit as a corresponding member. Visiting brethren Rev. Alpha Ingle and Rev. Robert McIlvoy.

Commissioners to Assembly, Rev. W. H. Marquess, D. D., Louisville, Ky; Alternate Rev. W. W. Elwang, Columbia, Mo. Elder, J. C. Crawley, Keytesville Church; alternate, Mr. Jno. T. Brown, Fulton Church.

Special Committee on non-representation appointed, consisting of Rev. W. W. Elwang, Elder N. T. Gentry and the Stated Clerk.

Overture from General Assembly touching Latin Thesis answered in the affirmative.

The Assembly was overtured to take into consideration the advisability of removing the headquarters of the Home Mission Committee to some point nearer its Home Missionary field, preferably some point west of the Mississippi river.

Next meeting, Westminster Church, Sept. 1st, 7:30 p. m. Moderator for next meeting Rev. J. E. Kerr. Dr. J. F. Cowan was appointed to preach at next meeting on Infant Baptism.

Presbytery declined to adopt Synod's proposed plan for the payment of expenses of delegates to Synod as being impracticable.

The report of the Treasurer showed the following amounts contributed during the past year.

Foreign Missions $830; Assembly's Home Missions $185. Education, $46. Publication, $26. Ministerial Relief, $146. Colored work, $49. Bible Society, $16. Westminster College, $25. Presbyterial Home Missions, $746. Presbyterial, Synodical, General Assembly, Assessment, $243.

The report of the Home Mission Committee showed all fields supplied with preaching excepting four weak churches, two of which may be supplied later in the summer.

Presbytery has on its roll eight candidates for the ministry, one of whom is in the Theological Seminary. The others are in college or at work.

A. A. Wallace, S. C.

MISSISSIPPI.

The Presbytery of Central Mississippi met at Edwards, Miss., April 7th, at 7:30 o'clock, p. m., and was opened with a sermon by Rev. M. E. Melvin, the retiring moderator, from Psalm 121:1.

Organization—Ruling Elders, L. Foote, of Canton, was elected moderator and Rev. G. A. Grillbortzer clerk.

Present—16 ministers and 18 Ruling Elders.

Received—Rev. P. H. Hensley from Red River Presbytery, Rev. Morrison Brown from Memphis Presbytery, and Rev. W. W. Harrison.

Petition from Presbyterians at Utica, for an organization. A committee was appointed for this purpose.

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

In speaking of the scribes who are the enemies of the Southern Education Board, mention should have been made of Mr. Edward Ingle, also a correspondent of the Manufacturers' Record and of the Baltimore Sun, whose articles have been widely copied in a class of Southern papers elsewhere described. Mr. Ingle is extreme enough to deny the negro the right even to an industrial education and he therefore grossly misrepresents the people of the South, at least those of good breeding. Just about the best test of a Southern man's antecedents is his attitude toward the negro.

Among our contributed articles the one on Missionary Libraries is a most practical treatise on an important subject. Our Women's Missionary Unions are producing some good literature. Professor H. B. Arbuckle contributes an illuminating discussion of the Presbyterian University. Dr. Laws continues his admirable doctrinal articles. Dr. Guerrant makes out a very good case for the Society of Soul-Winners, which is really doing an amazing amount of work. The note from Mrs. Rankin will be read with affectionate interest and Rev. W. L. Lingle sends us a clipping and some wise comment thereon. The poems we publish this week are really poems and that is more than can always be said of rhyming verses.

The editor hopes next week to have something about the meeting of the Educational Conference in Richmond.

Church News.

PERSONALS

Rev. E. O. Guerrant has returned home from his Southern trip, and asks his friends to address him as formerly, at Wilmore, Ky.

Rev. Angus McDonald has resigned the pastorate of the Moore Memorial Church, Nashville, and will become the Superintendent of Home Missions of the Synod of Tennessee.

The First Church, Greensboro, N. C., has just subscribed $950 for the Synod's work in Ashe and Alleghany counties.

Sunday School Institute—A full and practical program was carried out and an increased interest manifested.

Presbyterial sermon on Sabbath Observance, by Rev. R. J. Beattie.

Calls from Greenwood church for Rev. W. W. Harrison, and from Goodman, Franklin and Mt. Hermon churches for Rev. Morrison Brown, were accepted.

Commissioners to General Assembly—Principals, Revs. F. L. McCue and W. A. Alexander, D. D., and Ruling Elders J. R. Dobyms, (Jackson First) and S. P. Armstrong (Vaiden).

Alternates—Revs. M. E. Melvin and S. S. Newman, and Ruling Elders L. F. Montgomery, (West Side, Jackson) and S. M. Shelton (Vicksburg).

Our Standards—The following resolutions were adopted:

1. It is the firm conviction and faith of this Presbytery that the Standards of our church are a just and full statement of the doctrines of God's Word, and that there is no sufficient reason for the agitation of the question of changing these standards.

That we wish in expressing our gratitude to the great Head of the Church for his blessings upon the witness our church has borne in her Standards in the many years of her glorious past, to record our emphatic disapproval of any revision of these Standards or any movement looking thereto.

3. That in view of the injury that is to come to the cause of truth, as well as the Home Mission and Foreign Mission work, and other work of our church from this agitation, that the Commissioners to the coming session of the General Assembly be urged to act in full accord with these resolutions.

Next meeting—Carrollton, Mississippi, October 6th, 1903.

F. L. McCue, Stated Clerk.

TOMBECKBEE.—The Presbytery of Tombeckbee met at Okolona, Miss., April 8, 1903. The opening sermon was preached by the retiring moderator, Rev. J. F. Turner. Present, six ministers and ten ruling elders.

Officers—Ruling Elder, H. S. Gilleylen of Aberdeen, Miss. Moderator, Revs. J. F. Turner and T. D. Latimer, clerks.

Dismissed—Rev. J. W. Moss was dismissed to the Presbytery of Meridian and Rev. D. M. Armentrout was dismissed to the Presbytery of Ebenezer.

Next place of meeting—Bethel.

Commissioners—Rev. D. H. Ogden of Columbus, Miss., and Elders S. L. Wilson of Vanvelet, Miss., were chosen commissioners to the General Assembly. Rev. J. F. Turner and Elder H. Woods, Jr., were chosen alternates.

Latin Thesis—Presbytery gave its assent to the overtone on Latin Thesis without a dissenting vote.

Essayist—Elder L. T. Carlisle of West Point, Miss., read an interesting and highly appreciated essay on the theme: "The Calvinist as a Civil Factor."

Ministerial Relief—The Presbytery recommended that a committee be appointed in each church for this course and that each church try to give 7 per cent of its minister's salary to this cause.

Sermon and Essay—Rev. T. D. Latimer was selected for next Presbyterial sermon. Subject: Sanctification.

Prof. D. A. Hill was selected as essayist, subject: "The Personality of the Holy Spirit."

Sunday School Institute—A Sunday-school Institute was ordered held at the fall meeting of Presbytery and the Sunday-schools are expected to send delegates.

Sunday School Workers—A committee was appointed to raise funds and put a Sunday-school worker in the field during the summer months.

Ancient Minutes—The stated clerk was authorized to print a certain amount of the "old minutes" of the Presbytery which begins in 1825 and give an unbroken account of Presbyterianism in East Mississippi for 78 years.

Home Missions—An adjustment of this committee was made which gives the working force of the committee to the Columbus Church. Full authority was given this committee to think out and execute such plans as seemed best as long as they were within constitutional bounds.

Thanks—The usual vote of thanks was tendered for hospitality, etc.

VIRGINIA.

NORFOLK; Second Church.—Sunday, April 5th, was the first communion in the new church, and 7 new members were publicly welcomed, 16 on profession of faith and 11 by letter.

ROANOKE PRESBYTERY.—The Presbytery of Roanoke met at Pamplin City, April 7th, with thirteen ministers and seventeen ruling elders in attendance. Rev. C. C. Owen, M. D., of our Korean mission, now at home on account of his health, was chosen Moderator, and Ruling Elders, Dr. L. G. Redigo and J. L. Hagan, Temporary Clerks.

We had the pleasure of having with us as corresponding members Rev. W. S. Campbell of East Hanover Presbytery, Rev. J. H. Davis and Rev. W. L. Bedinger of West Hanover, Rev. W. C. Maxwell of Norfolk and Rev. W. M. Thompson of the Synod of Brazil; also as visiting brethren, the very genial Moderator of the Appomattox Baptist Association, Rev. P. T. Warren, and the late pastor of the Pamplin City Baptist Church, Rev. J. H. Couch.

Mr. Campbell was present as secretary of the Virginia Bible Society, and Mr. Maxwell as Superintendent of the Synodical Orphanage just established at Lynchburg.

They ably presented the needs of these two institutions. The Orphanage is but started; the Bible Society is pressing forward in its old work of trying to supply the destitution of the Scriptures, so surprisingly great, existing among both the white and the colored people of the State. The backwardness of the Christian people of Virginia, of all the churches, in sustaining this work is remarkable.

The Franklin Street Church, Danville, was dissolved, at the request of the pastor, Rev. W. T. Doggett and the approval of the congregation. It has been from the start a "mission" of the First Church.

On account of impaired health, incurred during his work in Mid-China, Licentiate James W. Bondin, of Danville, feeling himself unfitted for the work of the ministry, surrendered his license to preach as a probationer.

The Presbytery has more than met the call made upon it for its share towards paying the debt resting on the Fredericksburg Home and School.

The order was rendered for the preparation and distribution of a pastoral letter on Family religion; it having been ascertained that less than one fourth of our families maintain family worship.

Mr. Arthur H. Clarke, a member of the Danville First Church was taken under care as a candidate for the ministry.

A night session was held in the interest of Foreign Missions, at which the Moderator addressed the Presbytery and congregation on Korea, and Rev. W. M. Thompson on Brazil, and the annual report on Foreign Missions was read by the chairman of the F. M. Committee. Thirty-six churches contributed during the year $2,114. The "Societies" of the Presbytery gave $300 of this amount.

The six contiguous churches under the pastoral charge of Rev. Messrs. Henry, Miller and Elder, have undertaken the support of Rev. W. B. Harrison and wife in Korea.

The First Church, Danville, gave and from the start has supported Mr. Paxton in China. The "Woman's Missionary Union" of the Presbytery has been doing a good work in furtherance of the cause.

Under the Home Mission Committee report the chief interest awakened was in regard to the Lynchburg and Patrick county fields both of which are now without Presbyterian preaching, and our people there are discouraged. Special steps were taken to endeavor to supply and encourage them, which it is hoped may prove successful.

Announcement was made of the death during the past year of those aged and venerable Ruling Elders, Wm. G. Friend of Drakes Branch, and T. J. Spencer of Briery; also of the death of H. A. Wiseman, an Elder of the First Church of Danville. Mr. Wiseman was an alternate commissioner to the next General Assembly. Capt. C. A. Ballou was elected in his place. The principal is Dr. J. K. Leigh of Clarksville. The ministerial commissioners elect are Rev. H. A. Brown, D. D., Saxe, Va. Principal, and Rev. T. S. Wilson, South Bcs'on, Va., alternate.

On the question of a division of the Synod of Virginia, Roanoke Presbytery voted by a large majority for division, and the same in favor of the proposed division into three Synods.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Notice.

The Board of Directors of Columbia Theological Seminary will meet in the Seminary Chapel Tuesday, May 12th, 1903, at 12 m.

W. W. Mills,
Sec. of Board.

Foreign Missions in May.

In presenting our appeal for help to the Foreign Mission cause during the month of May, your Executive Committee feels constrained first of all to express its gratification and its gratitude to God for the response which so many of our churches have made during the past year to the proposition laid before them by the representatives of our Forward Movement, to assume the salary of a missionary or the support of a station in some special field. The gratifying gain of over $15,000 in our annual receipts was largely due to this cause.

Now if this good work which it is proposed to continue during the present year, can be supplemented by generous free will offerings in all the churches during the months devoted to this cause, then we feel confident that we will be able to report to the General Assembly of 1904, a contribution from the church of, certainly not less, and probably more than $200,000.

This is the amount required to support our work on its present basis. For enlargement we shall need at least $1,000 more for each new missionary sent out. In order that there may be some enlargement we appeal for liberal gifts at the May collections.

But our special and particular anxiety is that there may be no repetition this summer of what has occurred during the past two summers, which is that, during the summer vacation months when receipts are always small, after the Executive Committee has exhausted its bank credit to provide funds to supply the missions with absolute necessities, they have also been compelled to strain their credit with foreign banks to obtain their necessary food. We ask for a large May collection to save our missionaries from such embarrassment and our Church from such discredit as this. We ask every minister, in presenting the cause, to lay this pressing need on the hearts and consciences of his people. We ask everyone who reads this appeal to consider it as a personal and individual request for help.

But while considering, as we must do, the material need of this work, let us never lose sight of the truth that it is pre-eminently a spiritual work and a work of faith. It is a work in which God calls us, as He did Israel at the Red Sea, at Jordan and at Jericho to attempt the impossible, but in which He has enabled us again and again in the past, and will enable us also in the future, to accomplish the impossible, when we attempt it in faith, in patience and in prayer. We request all lovers of this cause to unite with us in the prayer that our Church may receive more and more abundantly of that divine gift through which God's ancient promise may be fulfilled in us, "I will bless thee, and thou shalt be a blessing; and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

Fraternally yours,

The Executive Committee of Foreign Missions.
S. H. Chester, Secretary.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Twentieth Century Fund.

Since my last report, subscriptions to the Fund have come in amounting to something over $8,000.

Rev. D. P. McGeachy is canvassing Concord Presbytery and doing splendid work.

I would call special attention to a subscription in Wilmington of $1,000 to found a scholarship in Davidson College for the benefit of the first honor graduates of the Clarkton school.

E. C. Murray, Treasurer.

BRYSON CITY.—The Presbytery of Asheville met at Bryson City April 7th, 1903, at 8 p. m. There were present twelve ministers and seven ruling elders.

The opening sermon was preached by Rev. D. M. Douglass retiring moderator, from the text John 5:39.

Organization.—D. M. Killian, elder of the Waynesville Church, Moderator; Rev. S. W. Newell Temporary Clerk.

Received—Rev. R. B. Grinnan from the Presbytery of Lonisville. A call for him as pastor for whole time, by the Hendersonville Church was accepted and order taken for his installation on the 4th Sabbath in April, Rev. R. F. Campbell, D. D., to preside, preach and propound the constitutional questions, Rev. S. W. Newell to charge the pastor and Elder J. D. Murphy of Asheville to charge the people.

Latin Thesis—By a vote of nine to five the overture of the General Assembly as to the Latin Thesis was answered in the negative.

Commissioners to General Assembly.—Rev. Frank D. Hunt and Elder T. S. Boswell of Brevard, Principals; with Rev. R. S. Eskridge and Elder D. M. Killian of Waynesville, Alternates.

Time and Place for Next Meeting—Davidson River Church, October 6th, 1903, at 8 p. m. Rev. D. M. Douglass and Elder L. C. Neill were appointed committee of Arrangements and Devotional Exercises. Rev. R. B. Grinnan was appointed to preach the Doctrinal sermon on the subject of sanctification. Rev. R. S. Eskridge was appointed to remain over Sabbath after Presbytery and preach for the Davidson River Church, with Rev. E. Mac Davis as alternate.

Overture—The following overture to the General Assembly was adopted and ordered to be sent up, "The Presbytery of Asheville does hereby overture the General Assembly to add to the statistical reports a column in which to express the offerings of the church for Orphans' Homes, so that we may be able to know what the Church gives to this object as well as to the other benevolent causes."

Foreign Missions—On Wednesday night a popular meeting in behalf of this cause was held, at which Rev. D. M. Douglass, Presbytery's Agent of Foreign Missions, presided and made his annual report, which showed a gratifying increase in the contributions to this cause. After reading the report the Presbytery listened to a very entertaining and instructive address by Rev. R. B. Grinnan on Japan.

Home Missions—Thursday night a popular meeting in behalf of this cause was presided over by Rev. R. F. Campbell, D. D., chairman of the Home Mission Committee who presented a full report of the work for the year past. After the reading of this report interesting addresses were made by Revs. T. W. DeVane, our worker in Graham county, the first and only Presbyterian minister who has ever lived in that county. E. Mac Davis whose field of labor takes in parts of Madison and Buncombe counties and who has done a most remarkable work in building up our Church in a section that up to the time he entered it knew nothing of Presbyterianism; and R. P. Smith our Presbyterian Evangelist whose indefatigable labors and earnest consecration have done so much toward making our work a success. These addresses were full of cheer and good comfort for the success of the work.

Ours is essentially a Home Mission Presbytery and it would encourage the whole Church if the report of this committee could have been heard. I give a few extracts from it: "Never before has the cause of Home Missions in our Presbytery been more prosperous or brighter in prospect," "Ninety-five members have been received in the mission field and there has been general improvement and encouragement all along the line." "Rev. R. P. Smith, our General Evangelist has been indefatigable in his labors and the Committee can not too strongly express their appreciation of faithfulness and efficiency. Much of the success of our work is due to the policy of having a general evangelist, and we feel that we have the right man for the place."

The following recommendations of the Committee were adopted:

1. That the churches receiving aid from the Home Mission funds be urged to increase their subscriptions to pastor's salary as rapidly as possible, in order that the Home Mission funds may be devoted more and more to the opening of new work.

2. That pastors and sessions be instructed to take collections in all churches for all the benevolent causes and to endeavor to get every church to meet its apportionments, especially for the cause of Home Missions.

3. That Rev. R. P. Smith be elected general evangelist for another year."

It is very gratifying to note that the churches helped by the Home Mission fund are steadily advancing in the matter of self-support. The educational department of our Home Mission work has been greatly blessed and is accomplishing much.

The usual reports were all adopted and ordered to be forwarded to the General Assembly.

The Waynesville Church asked permission of Presbytery to change the terms of the call for their pastor, Rev. Frank D. Hunt from three-fourths to whole time that church to pay his entire salary. The consideration of this request was referred to an adjourned meeting to be held in Asheville the 28th of this month so that the Bethel Church which now has one-fourth of his time might be heard from.

Rev. E. A. Sample resigned as Stated Clerk and Rev. Frank D. Hunt was elected to take his place.

Rev. Frank D. Hunt resigned as Presbytery's Agent for Colored Evangelistic work and Rev. E. A. Sample was elected to succeed him in this position.

Revs. S. W. Newell and E. Mac Davis and Elder W. S. Terrell of the Bethel Church were appointed a permanent committee on the Sabbath.

The following Presbyterian agents were appointed: Bible Cause, Rev. T. W. DeVane; Sabbath Schools and Young People Societies, Rev. R. B. Grinnan; Ministerial relief, Rev. C. C. Brown.

Rev. T. F. Deitz of the Baptist Church and Rev. Marsh of the Methodist Church were invited to sit as visiting brethren.

A communication from Fairfax College, Winchester, Va., offering a scholarship to any young woman preparing for Foreign Mission work was received and referred to Rev. E. Mac Davis, our Agent for Education to answer expressing the thanks of Presbytery.

A vote of thanks to the Bryson City people for their kind hospitality was adopted by a rising vote. Presbytery then adjourned with devotional exercises to meet at Asheville Tuesday, April 28th, at 4 p. m.

Attest: Frank D. Hunt, Stated Clerk.

MONROE.—Rev. Geo. H. Atkinson was formally installed as pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Monroe April 9th, in a most impressive and interesting service. The officiating ministers were Rev. Dr. J. R. Howerton, Rev. J. A. Dorritee, of Charlotte, and Dr. S. M. Smith, of Columbia. The pretty new church was well filled, and, besides the home people, there were a number of visitors present.

SALISBURY.—Concord Presbytery met in Salisbury, N. C., April 9th, at 8 o'clock p. m., and was opened with a sermon by Rev. W. J. Tidball from Phil. 3:13, 14.

There were present during the sessions 27 ministers and 33 Elders.

Rev. J. A. Gilmer was elected Moderator, and Rev. W. C. Brown and Rev. R. S. Arrowood, Temporary Clerks.

Corresponding members.—Rev. T. H. Law, D. D., Rev. E. Tufts, Rev. D. P. McGeachy, Rev. E. E. Gillespie.

Installations Reported: A. J. Crane at Bethphage and Gilwood churches, Rev. L. M. Kerschner at Spencer, Rev. W. W. Edge at Morganton and Rev. John Wakefield at White Hall.

Dr. T. H. Law addressed Presbytery on the Bible Cause, Rev. R. W. Boyd spoke in the interest of the Orphans' Home of the Synod and Rev. J. A. Scott in regard to the Statesville Female College.

Rev. Edgar Tufts was received from Savannah Presbytery. Commissioners to the General Assembly: Rev. J. M. Wharey, D. D., Mooresville, Rev. J. A. Scott, Statesville, Elders O. D. Davis, Salisbury and J. H. Reid, Mt. Mourne, N. C., were elected principal commissioners, and Rev. W. T. Matthews, Hickory, Rev. J. A. Gilmer, Mill Bridge, Elders J. M. Guy, Marion, and W. G. F. Harper, Lenoir, N. C., alternates.

Siloam Church, McDowell county, was chosen as the place for the next stated meeting of Presbytery and Oct., 2, 1903, at 3 p. m., was fixed as the time.

Rev. T. D. Johnston requested Presbytery to dissolve his pastoral relation with Quaker Meadows Church, and that church was cited to appear at an adjourned meeting at Statesville, May 28th, at 2 o'clock p. m., to give answer why this request should not be granted.

Mr. Harris Johnson, a member of Centre Church was taken under care of Presbytery as a candidate for the ministry.

A church organized by Rev. J. A. Harris, evangelist of Yancey county, at Loafers Glory, Mitchell county, was received and enrolled.

Also Presbytery organized a church at Chestnut Hill, Salisbury on Sabbath afternoon, April 12th, 1903.

The Presbytery adjourned to meet at Statesville, N. C., on the 28th day of May, 1903, at 2 o'clock, p. m.

KINGS MOUNTAIN PRESBYTERY.—The first regular meeting of this young and aggressive body was held appropriately in mission territory, at Henrietta, where a church has been recently established and building erected. There is a population of 5,000 people within two miles of the church.

Rev. R. Z. Johnston was elected moderator and Rev. W. H. Wilson, clerk, both by acclamation. The reports from the churches showed a good degree of advancement, and the Presbytery is evidently bent on exercising a strict episcopal oversight over the churches.

The Presbyterian Standard received a very cordial hearing and from the kind speeches of the brethren about it we gathered that it was the best religious paper in the country, though not yet ready for translation or guilty of sinless perfection.—Ed.

Kings Mountain Presbytery met at Henrietta April 10th, 7:30 p. m.

Opening sermon was preached by Rev. A. J. McKelway, D. D., of Mecklenburg Presbytery.

Moderator: Rev. R. Z. Johnston, Lincolnton, Temporary Clerk: Rev. W. H. Wilson.

Present: Eleven ministers and eighteen Ruling Elders.

Corresponding members: Rev. A. J. McKelway and Rev. R. W. Boyd.

Rev. J. M. Forbis was received from the Presbytery of St. Johns, Florida.

Commissioners to General Assembly: Rev. R. C. Morrison; alternate Rev. S. L. Cathey Ruling Elder, W. M. Allison; alternate, F. A. Henderson.

Commissioners: To install Rev. J. M. Forbis at King's Mountain, Revs. W. R. Minter and M. McG. Shields and Ruling Elder, R. L. Ryburn. To install Rev. J. M. Forbis at Bessemer City, Revs. R. A. Miller, J. J. Kennedy and Ruling Elder C. E. Adams.

Presbytery's Home Mission work is alive and active; and the reports from the churches show advance along all lines.

Monday night April 13th, Presbytery adjourned to meet at Lincolnton, Tuesday, May 12th, at 8 p. m.

GREENSBORO; First Church.—This church though burdened with the erection of a $30,000 Sunday-school building, has not suffered its benevolent contributions to be diminished thereby. On the contrary, it has given more this year to the benevolent causes of the church than ever before in its history. Perhaps as a consequence, its addition of new members this year has also broken all past records. See Mat. 3:10.

CHARLOTTE; Second Church.—At a joint meeting of the Officers of the Second Presbyterian Church of Charlotte, N. C., held Tuesday, April 7th, 1903, the following resolutions were offered:

Whereas, our Pastor, Rev. Jno. W. Stagg, D. D., having signified his intention to tender to the Presbytery of Mecklenburg his resignation of the pastoral charge, to accept a call to the First Presbyterian Church, of Birmingham, Ala.

Resolved: We, having met for the purpose of taking into consideration the uniting, with him, in his request to Presbytery to dissolve the relations now existing between us, do assent to the request of Dr. Stagg, only because we deem it our duty to submit to the orderings of Providence in thus removing our beloved pastor to another, and probably wider, field of usefulness. But the parting brings regret, as it severs a connection and terminates an intercourse of the most pleasant and agreeable character,—closes a ministry of multiplied benefits and blessings, and removes from us a shepherd and overseer, faithful, earnest and conscientious.

And now, that we separate, we invoke upon himself and family, and upon his labors in the future, the Heavenly benedictions, and commend him to the love, esteem and confidence of the Church and community in which his lot is cast.

Resolved: That copies of this resolution be furnished respectively, to Dr. Stagg, the Presbytery of Mecklenburg, the First Presbyterian Church of Birmingham, Ala., and to the Presbyterian Standard of this city, for publication.

CHARLOTTE.—Dr. John W. Stagg preached his last sermons as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church on Sunday. His text in the morning was Job 2:4. "All that a man hath will he give for his life." Explaining that this was a part of the Word of God, but yet a word of Satan, he declared that the statement was both true and false. It was a proverb from the experience of men that was used by Satan. He recited the incident of a missionary to Brazil, who had given up life in the worldly sense and would doubtless have given up his life, literally, for the sake of the gospel, gathering his little store of worldly goods and going the long and expensive journey to New York with the bare hope, as he thought, of saving his life from a deadly disease. He mentioned that one of the richest men in the world would give all his money for the ability to eat and thus to prolong his life.

On the other side, a man will give up life, either quickly or deliberately, for a cause. The dignity of manhood itself is the ability to sacrifice life for something that is dearer than life. The church has never failed to furnish her martyrs when there was need for them. It is this conception that has made the religion of Christ all-powerful, because he put his own blood into it. There are men here who would die for the sake of their honor. There are men who would die for their families. There are men who would die for their country. Are there not men also who would die for Jesus Christ?

The sermon closed with a strong appeal for continued loyalty to the church and its officers, especially during the period of vacancy. The main auditorium was filled to the last seat, with the regular congregation that worships at the Second Church.

There were many full hearts and not a few tearful eyes as his people felt that he had spoken peculiarly to them for the last time, and it was an eloquent moment when his officers gathered around him at the close of the service.

At the evening service the other Presbyterian Churches of the city and the Tryon Street Baptist Church were closed, that all might have the opportunity of hearing Dr. Stagg's last sermon. The congregation began to gather three quarters of an hour before the time and when Dr. Stagg entered the pulpit, every seat had been taken in the main auditorium, the lecture room and the galleries, probably fifteen hundred people being gathered there. Rev. J. A. Dorrittee made the opening prayer, and Dr. Barron led the congregation in a fervent petition for the Divine blessing upon the preacher in his new field of labor. The occasion was one on which not a few would have yielded to the temptation of playing upon the emotions of the audience, the last sermon of a fruitful pastorate of seven years, with all the sacred and tender associations connected with the pastor's work. Dr. Stagg, with perfect good taste and in the manliest way, turned the occasion into an opportunity to set forth the central fact of the religion in which he believes, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. His text was from John, 20:23. "Whose soever sins ye remit they are remitted unto them, and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained."

In his original and striking way the preacher set forth the two great facts of the text, sin and redemption. Comparing the text with the confession of Simon Peter, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God, and the words of Christ on that occasion, he declared that the truth was that which had the power to bind and to loose, to separate men from their sins or to bind their sins to them forever. Upon the great fact which Simon Peter declared Christ has built his Church, the everlasting fact that Jesus is the Christ, the Saviour, the Son of God. This truth is separate from all else; it is absolute in its independence. No preacher or priest, no man or multitude of men, no institution or Church, can bind or loose, save with the power of this truth. The proclaiming and the receiving of this truth is the power that saves. When that truth is received the man is saved. When that truth is not received, the man is damned. Any occasion in which God is made known to men is an important occasion. And if this conception of the power of this truth to bind and loose men is ever grasped it makes life more solemn and earnest and free from flippancy and worldliness.

While the truth is independent of men so far as what it contains, it does depend upon men for its proclamation. The great need of the world is to find its way back to God. And the highest attainment of life is to be so devoted to the truth as to hold all that we possess, time, talents, means, as an opportunity for promoting this truth.

This truth is the point of union among all the churches, that Christ is the Son of God. The distinctive things in the churches are not what save men. But all are founded on this great rock of the ages. And so the church, any church of Christ, becomes the important institution of a community. It speaks of God to men. And the minister should be heeded as the man in this community in whose business all other business transacted on these streets find their meaning.

And the unpardonable sin is the rejection of this truth. It is the vilifying of the Spirit in his testimony to this truth about Christ. And men may be now in process of committing this unpardonable sin. God has as it were exhausted infinite resources in sending his Son to die for men and his Spirit to testify to the truth. And so the truth rejected, bids men to their sin so that there is no separation forever.

Dr. Howerton closed the service with an earnest prayer for the blessing of God upon the sermon and upon all the sermons of the pastorate now brought to a close and for the continued blessing of God in the new work that is to be done by his servant.

Presbyterianism in Charlotte is in a most flourishing condition, as may be seen from the reports of the churches published last week and this. At the First Church there were 24 additions on examination and 47 on certificate, bringing the total of communicants up to 655. This church contributed $17,742.82 for all causes during the year, a magnificent total. Among the items may be mentioned $1,686.25 for Foreign Missions, $4,165 for Home Missions, including local mission work in Charlotte and the suburbs, and $4,165.99 for Education, including $3,185 for the Presbyterian College here.

The First Church is erecting a neat church building for the church at Seversville, which has just been ordered organized by Presbytery. The building will cost some $1,500 and the membership will begin with 28. A seminary student will have charge of the mission work during the summer, when it is proposed to secure a permanent successor of Rev. George Atkinson who has lately gone to Mouree.

The Second Church received 24 members on profession and 43 by certificate during the year, bringing the membership up to 1,004.

The church contributed $16,684.00 to all causes. It was never more united or imbued with a more aggressive spirit and it is bent on securing the very ablest man to be found for the pulpit just made vacant by the removal of Dr. Stagg. It has employed Rev. H. W. Hoon this year as pastor at East Side Chapel, which is also prospering. Tenth Avenue Church is growing also in self-supporting ability since the removal into the handsome new building. It will soon be entirely independent of the fostering care of the Second Church, though the mother church has assumed the greater part of the indebtedness for the church building, in the form of building and loan stock. One hundred and thirteen additions are reported for the year, bringing the present membership up to 404. Westminster Church has recently enjoyed a season of refreshing as the result of the meeting conducted by Dr. Thornwell. There have been added forty members during the year, making the roll 302 and the church has paid all its apportionments and is making a strong effort to support a foreign missionary. The Ladies Missionary Society of this church is worthy of special mention for the interest and attendance of its members.

SALISBURY; Chestnut Hill.—Concord Presbytery met in the Academy of this flourishing suburb on last Sabbath afternoon at 4 o'clock and organized a church of nineteen members. F. M. Ward and W. D. Watson were chosen Elders and A. J. Winecoff and Wm. Jones, Deacons. Rev. Dr. Wharey conducted the ordination service, all members of the Presbytery present joining in the laying on of hands. It was a most impressive service. Quite a number of others would have united but had failed to secure their letters.

The prospects of this congregation for a good, healthy growth and of doing good service are very flattering.

A Tribute to Dr. Rankin.

We, the members of the Ladies' Missionary Society of Alamance Church, feel most keenly our loss in the death of Dr. David Cyrus Rankin.

He grew up in our midst and received his spiritual training in our church, and in the family of his uncle, that noble and broad-minded man, Dr. C. H. Wiley.

We have watched his development with the greatest interest and pardonable pride and have followed him with our prayers, first as school-boy, then as minister, and last in his crowning work as Editor of our Missionary periodicals.

He was ever a welcome visitor here, where, according to his own statement, this Society was first organized about 1820, his grandmother being one of the first officers.

We rejoiced with him when the way was open for him to make a tour of the mission fields, which had so long been the desire of his heart; and we had anticipated the genuine pleasure of hearing him give an account of what he had imbibed in the far East; but, oh, how sad, from a human view, that he who loved home and his own people so dearly should be called upon to endure sickness and death in far off Korea!

Yet we trust that his profound interest in missions—his life and death may inspire his own Church and the Church at large, to greater zeal and renewed interest in the cause he loved and served so well, and that "he being dead yet speaketh" even more forcibly than ever before.

We are glad that our Church was permitted to give to the Presbyterian Church, and to the world, a man of such true character, fine sensibilities, consecrated intellectual powers, and intense missionary zeal. We feel gratified that the man and his work was appreciated, as evidenced by the wide expression of personal loss and regret that he was not permitted longer to carry on his much needed work.

We bow in humble submission to the will of our Father, knowing that it is well with our Brother; and "we sorrow not as others which have no hope."

In our sorrow we extend our sympathies to his wife and other relatives, and pray God's blessing upon them.

Preach better, and ever better, every new Sabbath morning, because there is simply no limit to the unsearchable riches of Christ—the absolutely unsearchable riches of grace and truth and sweetness and beauty that are in Jesus Christ. The rhetorical heat and the adulatory elation of the pulpit deceive and intoxicate many a young preacher's heart. He takes it for what it is not. He is only a beginner; and he does not yet know the sin that so easily besets him, He does not yet know the secret plague of his own heart. Not till many years have passed by, and many disappointments and disenchantments have come, and especially, not till he sits still and sees other men doing his work far better than he ever did it; not till he has passed through that last furnace and supreme scrutiny of a minister's motive will he know and be sure whether it was God's glory or his own that was his secret strength all the time of his bounding heart and his youthful eagerness for the Sabbath and for the pulpit.—Alexander Whyte, D. ## The Household.

The Baby's Complaint.

Oh! mother, dear mother, no wonder I cry,
More wonder by far that your baby don't die;
No matter what ails me, no matter who's here,
No matter how hungry the "poor little dear,"
No matter if full, or if all out of breath,
She trots me, and trots me, and trots me to death.

I love my dear nurse, but dread that great knee;

I like all her talking but woe unto me!
She can't be contented with talking so pretty,

And washing, and dressing, and doing her dirty;

All that's very well, I can bear soap and water,

But, mother, she is an unmerciful trotter.

Pretty ladies, I want just to look at your faces,

Pretty cap, pretty fire, let me see how it blazes;

How can I? my head going bibity bob,
And she trots me the harder the harder I sob.

Oh, mother, do stop her, I'm inwardly sore,

I hiccup and cry, and she trots me the more.

Thank mercy, I'm still; oh, blessed be quiet!

I'm glad my dear mother is willing to try it;

Of foolish old customs I know she's no lover,

And the wisdom of this she can never discover.

I'll rest me a little, and just look about,
And laugh up at Sally, who peeps in and out,

And pick up some notions as soon as I can,

To fill my small noddle before I'm a man.

Oh, dear, is that she? is she coming so soon?

She's bringing my dinner with teacup and spoon;

She'll hold me with one hand, in t'other the cup,

And as fast as it's down she will just shake it up;

For thumpity thump, with the greatest delight,

Her heel it is going from morning till night,

All over the house you may hear it, I'm sure,

Trot, trotting! just think what I'm made to endure.

Suggestions for Varying the Daily Meals.

"Alisa's" case is so much like my own I can sympathize. Close study of the problem has helped me to plan much better than formerly, and I can perhaps offer a few helpful suggestions. You can not have much variety at a meal, but make up for this by varying the meals from one to another. The meat problem is the serious one, but careful selection and pains in preparing will accomplish wonders. Provide yourself with a meat chopper, if you have not one, and see that you have seasonings always at hand, as whole cloves, stick cinnamon, bay leaves, celery salt, extract of onions or the onions themselves. Varying the seasoning will make your dishes appetizing. You can get lean shin beef for ten cents a pound or less. Of this, by boiling first and seasoning variously, you can make hash, meat pie or serve it as a simple stew; or you may grind it and make croquettes, or even flat cakes. Grinding it raw, you will have Hamburg steak, which, seasoned, mixed with raw eggs and broiled in one piece, is delicious. The breast of lamb carefully broiled is delicate and cheap, or it may be gently stewed and served with tomato sauce. Neck of lamb seasoned with spice makes a good stew, and cheap; also beef kidney. Add an onion and a bit of lemon peel in cooking the latter. Veal of the leg below the outlet is cheap, and may be used the same as the beef mentioned above. Used cold with celery and a salad dressing, it is almost as good as chicken salad.

A beef heart, stuffed, boiled first and then baked with vegetables to season, is exceedingly good, and will give you "left-over" meat for more than one meal.

Old beans, peas, macaroni, eggs and cheese make good substitutes for meat. Make soup of beans or peas and season with salt pork, onion and herbs; or, make croquettes of the beans, peas or macaroni, serving with cheese sauce if liked. Hard-boiled eggs served with cream sauce, seasoned with parsley, make a good dish, and melted cheese on toast is nutritious and palatable.

Sympathizer.

"Alisa's" request and appeal to her fellow-housewives have drawn forth so many letters of encouragement and sympathy that I may gather them into a symposium some day. The touch of nature that makes the whole world kind is never more manifest than when good women hear of a sister in trouble.—Exchange.

Care of the Eyes.

The very best tonic for the eyes is cold water. Few understand that the eyes may be kept bright and sparkling by dashing cold water into them night and morning. The effect is magical. Give the eye a bath once daily. Take a teacup of cold water, hold the cup close to the eye, and open and shut the eye in the water several times.

Sleep is a great beautifier of the eyes. If your eyes are tired and ache, rest them and sleep. When you have nothing to do close your eyes and wet them also. If your eyes burn lay on them a cold compress of water, and sleep. Nervous headache and pain in the eyes may be relieved by hot compresses applied to the forehead and eyes and the back of the neck. Follow this treatment by a half hour's rest or sleep.

Do not live in darkened rooms and expect your eyes to be strong. Looking much at the cheerful grate fire is injurious. When at work be sure you have a strong light from above and back of you, or from the left side. Do not read or work by a flickering, unsteady light. Eye strain is sure to result.

Do not read while travelling in cars or moving vehicles. Never read lying down, nor while convalescing from an illness.

Rest of the eye is frequently necessary by looking away from your work to a distant object, or shutting them for a moment. Do not work any longer than two hours at any one thing, less time if the eyes become tired and sight blurred. If the eyes are weak do not work them by artificial light.

Rules for Dainty Hands.

Don't cut the nails without first holding them in warm water to soften them.

Don't cut the cuticle or any part of the flesh around the nails.

Don't polish the nails too highly; they should have only a natural gloss.

Don't cut the nails in points, but carefully arch.

Don't file or scrape the nails—it only helps to thicken them. They should only be rubbed down with the very fine emery and cinnabar powder which is used for polishing shell and ivory.

Don't allow the nails to remain long soiled with anything that will stain them.

Don't wash the hands oftener than necessary; dry them thoroughly after every washing.

Don't wear gloves that are a size too small or that fasten too tightly. This prevents free circulation and makes the hands red.

Don't wear rings that are too small; the inevitable result is disfigurement—red and swollen hands and knuckles.

Don't wear bracelets so tight that they affect the circulation, or so loose that they rub on the wrist joints.

Mocha and Java coffee mixed—one-third of the former and two-thirds of the latter—is considered the most satisfactory combination by the majority of persons. Buy coffee in small quantities and unground; keep it in air-tight cans and grind it only as required. The finer it is ground the stronger will be the extract. There are many kinds of coffee pots in use, and many are modifications of the French coffee pot or piggin. The coffee should be ground as fine as the mill will make it. Allow half a cupful of the ground coffee to a generous quart of water; this makes sufficient for five cupfuls of coffee. Place the coffee in the cloth or strainer in the top of the pot arranged for the purpose, pour the boiling water upon it and set the pot back, allowing the water to filter slowly. When it has filtered through, set the pot over the heat, and when the coffee is just at the bubbling point pour it out and at once return it to the top of the pot to filter again; do this a third time and then serve at once. This process produces a clear, bright coffee and needs only five minutes if the heat is brisk.

A simple dessert whose garnishings give it quite the company touch starts with some small light cakes baked in round tins and served fresh from the oven, with a hot chocolate sauce poured over them and a spoonful of whipped cream placed lightly on top of each.

The Home Circle.

A Rainy Sunday.

For the Standard.

Storm and wind swept o'er God's day,
Sweet bells rang out far away,
As a woman clad in gray,
All unshrinking, made her way
To the church to praise and pray,
The rain despite.

At a window on her way
Sat a maid, whose face so gay
To the passer seemed to say,
"Off to church on such a day,
"Just to hear the parson pray!
"And what a fright."

But I saw the one in gray
Later wend her homeward way,
And God's peace pellucid lay
In her eyes. The sun's last ray
Heard the other, weary, say,
"It has been a tiresome day,
"I long for night."

The Peace Which Passes Understanding.

By Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford.

Miss Lucia had gone down into the city with a gay expedition to what they called the slums. But she never went in that manner again. It became something in a way sacred, into which she must enter alone, as into a prayer; and by and by it grew to be a sort of sacramental service.

For after this first glimpse of the sorrowful side of the world, of want and wickedness and the horrors of life in the darkest depths of the city, she was full of questioning as to why such things were allowed; and the world seemed a dreary and cruel place. She had her own sorrows, which accented and heightened all this background of other people's sorrows; but she felt she could bear hers better if it were not for theirs. And the first thing to do seemed to be to make theirs lighter, or to help them bear them. And she took up the task, not eagerly, but as if she must.

It was while she was going about from one place of suffering to another that she met Mrs. Redlands. "You are doing God's work, dear," the little woman said one day when Miss Lucia had gone in, and taking the tiny alcohol lamp from her bag had made the tea of which they were drinking a cordial cup together. "You have enlisted on the Lord's side. You're helping him fight the evil of the world."

"Evil!" said Miss Lucia. "Why should there be evil in the world?"

"Why should there be good?" said Mrs. Redlands. "Why should there be a world at all?"

"I don't know. I don't know," said Miss Lucia, a wistful look in her dove's eyes.

"And no one else knows," said Mrs. Redlands. "If it were meant to be known, it would have been proclaimed from the house-tops. There are some things better than knowing, and one of them is faith; and the Lord that knows all things and knows what is best, knows there is more comfort and joy to be had from faith than from all the knowledge of the cherubim. When I was a child I was told that the cherubim were those who knew and who went on God's errands, but that seraphim were those who loved and who stood in God's presence. And I had cast in my lot with the seraphim before I knew that," she said, with a little laugh. "Wouldn't you rather be filled with love, love throbbing in you like the fire in a red coal, and stand in God's presence, than know all the secrets of the universe?"

Miss Lucia looked at her, more than a trifle amazed. For here was this little bent and shriveled creature, living at the back of a tenement-house, in one small room, half underground, where the sun never came, and where the damp oozed through the wall, talking high philosophy as if her thoughts kept always such a level.

To be sure, the place was exquisitely neat, and the little woman herself, although her hands were sodden and her figure drawn by disease, was as clean as if in her Sunday best instead of a thin old cotton gown. But her face, when Miss Lucia glanced at it again, a white and wan and pinched old face, seemed to wear a glory. The eyes looked out steady and wide, and blue as a bit of sky, and the smile was beatific. Was it an old woman, Miss Lucia asked herself, who, for the little cleaning her rheumatic joints would allow her to do, had her room from the janitor, and a pittance that one day gave her bread and one day gave her meat, and many a day gave only an egg or an apple all day long? Or was it a saint in a dust-colored gown and coarse white handkerchief? "I—I—don't understand," said Miss Lucia, after a moment. "Would you—mind telling me how you came here?" No one could ever refuse anything to that winning voice of Miss Lucia's. "Why, I was led," said the little woman, with a confident air, as if she still felt her hand in the grasp of the one leading her.

"Do you mean?"

"O, if you would like to know, my home was far away. My father lived in the fear of God. My mother lived in the love of God. I was born with the love of God in me. Before I could speak I felt it. I remember what it was to me in my childhood—the sunshine seemed to belong to his smile, the blue sky to his home; I was happy like a little springing animal, and I always felt it was the Lord giving me my happiness. I was sure that he was beautiful as the flowers he had made. I never picked a rose that it didn't make me feel it was something belonging to him. And the stars at night always seemed to me to be the lamps twinkling about his courts. He was as real to me as the universe itself. I didn't see him, but the door was always just about to open. My heart was full of love!"

"How fortunate, how fortunate you were!"

"How blest I was!"

"Why should one person be given such love, such faith in infancy, and another not find it even now?"

"It is one of the questions not to be solved by us," said the little old woman. "If we could answer such questions, we should perhaps know how to make a world."

"I would like to make a world with no evil in it!"

"O, my dear, you would lose a great happiness if there were no evil to overcome."

"I can't think that evil is in the world just to give us the pleasure of overcoming it."

"And you can't think of any better reason. Why then do you think of it at all? That isn't the task given you to do. Why not leave to God his own work? The bee that stings the peach for its honey could never tell the reason of the sweetness, the soft colors, the down, the rich juice. Are we any better able to tell the why and wherefore of this earth? We don't know how we came here on this round ball swinging in space in the first place. It belongs to the power that put it here. Till we ourselves can make one blade of grass grow, create one new life, one new flower, don't you think we would better trust the power that can?"

"And did all that come to you because you loved God in the beginning and grew up in that love?" asked Miss Lucia.

"It is a great thing to have grown up in that love," said the little woman, joyously. "But if one hasn't done so, wouldn't it be well to think of some of the multitude of reasons for this love? That might give one just a germ of love, and then if one treated that as one would the seed of a precious flower—gave it sun and air and food and care—you can't tell what a glorious blossom it might become!"

"I don't know," said Miss Lucia again, wrinkling her brow doubtfully. "And see how you have loved the Lord, and yet—and yet"—gazing round the narrow room.

"Where I am? How I am? Can one be any more than content? And if I am content, what further is there to ask?"

"You are—content?" said Miss Lucia, turning in wonder.

"I don't believe any of the people who live in palaces and who roll in their carriages, the people who wear purple and fine linen, and fare sumptuously every day, are half as content as I am," said the little woman triumphantly. "I hope they are. I wish they were. But they can't be any more so."

"And yet!"

"O, you would see, if you were in my place, that the things you are thinking of don't count."

"But you were born to better things. You were educated—you must have known luxury!"

"Yes. And I am glad of the experience. I enjoy remembering it, too. But I never—I seldom miss it. When the darkness of this room chances to oppress me, I think of One who had not where to lay his head, and then I don't want to fare better than he; and I feel I have not a right to so much as this; and it opens into more than a castle hall. And when I would sometimes like some surer or some more bountiful food, I remember them walking through the fields, rubbing the ears of corn in their hands, and my crust becomes shew-bread. Yes, now and then I wish I had some hot tea or a bit of chicken to carry to the sick woman on the next landing; but I know that if the Lord thought it best for her to have it it would be there."

"And you can acquiesce in such misfortune?"

"I have acquiesced in worse—if there is anything to be called misfortune. For I suppose you would call it that to be stripped of your money and left without relatives while still a young woman"—there was a melancholy in the tone in spite of her.

"And you didn't miss them!"

"Of course I missed them! But I thought of my mother's joy in her new life, of my father released from the old awe and fear, of my brother spared temptations—and presently I forgot myself."

"You poor child!"

"You mustn't pity me. I didn't pity myself. And before I could quite forget myself, it drew me still nearer to God."

"And then the money?"—

"O, I was young and strong. I found occupation, and had all I needed. In a time I married. And if I was happy before, if, in a way I was in heaven before, I was in the seventh heaven then. But I never left God out of it. I felt as if he not only had given it to me but was sharing it all with me. And my husband—I don't know how to say it—my husband seemed a part of God himself. And then there came a dreadful awakening. The husband I—the man who"—her voice choked—"he—he used money—I was sick—we needed it—he betrayed his trust." The tears filled the old eyes. But they did not overflow. "I thought at first it was because I had loved him too much. As if I were the one concerned there! As if any one could be loved too much! As if every pulse of love we give another isn't given to God himself! No, no, he had been sure of himself, strong in himself, proud of himself; God had pity on him and took the false foundation out from under him and left him clinging to the rock that was higher than he. And we had a great content then, a great happiness. But all that trouble took the vital force out of him. I saw the life fade out of him before my eyes. O my heart, if that heavenly hand had not held mine where should I have been in that bitter loneliness! Then I took the child and came away where the shame would not reach him, and after a time I gave my music lessons to such scholars as I could find, at cheap rates, for had no one behind me. At first the minister helped me. He was still a stranger when I learned what was before me. My boy was brought in from the street with a broken back. O, even the heavenly hand failed me for a time then. I lived and breathed through the boy. As he lay there with nothing but suffering before him, my soul trembled inside me to see him, to think of him. I held his little thin hand without a thought, a feeling, unconscious of anything but pity, O in a passion of tenderness. And when he went, I went a little way with him. Perhaps it was then I found again the hand I had lost," said the little woman smiling now, "for I was sick a good while and knew nothing. I was in a hospital, and after that for a long time I was in a place where they take care of people whose nerves have given out. And then by and by I took what I could find to do, and I went my way holding that hand. And I have seemed to walk just above the sorrow and trouble, even for a while to be insensible to pain. And pain was severe enough; for exposure and want have brought me by slow degrees to this which seems to you so grievous—as once it might have seemed to me. But the presence never leaves me now; it is with me while I go about my work; it is with me when I sit down to rest; it is with me when I wake in the dark night and hear the roar of the city like the wave of a sea breaking on the shore."

"And it makes you happy even here?"

"Even here," said the little woman, with a pleasant laugh.

"And you want nothing better?" asked Miss Lucia, half bewildered.

"O yes, I have my dreams. Sometimes I think of the dwellings into which the Lord entered in the old days in the old land. I think how glad I would be to have been the woman who broke the alabaster box over the Master's feet—O just to have done that for him! Or I think of the joy of the woman in the throng who touched him, or of the one who was bent double and the Lord smiled on her and said, 'Thou art loosed from thy infirmity.' Or when I am sitting in the dark, may be, I think if a light should softly come all about me here, and there should be a great glow, and the sound like soft music of sweeping garments, and I should feel a hand upon my head and all should be dark and still again. O truly something like that has happened! There was no glow, there was no sound, there was no touch, but at once my heart was in a rapture, and I felt the presence, a real presence, I felt the love! Yes, I did! I was sure that for one instant the Lord himself had been in this little low room!"

"Mrs. Redlands—O—do you think—could that happen to one who had not been, like you, born into that love?" said Miss Lucia, trembling, and putting down her teacup.

"Try it!" said the little woman joyfully. "Try it, dear! Just take it for granted that the Lord is good, that he loves you, that he is there and waiting for you. He will become a living power in your heart and your life. Yes, he will. And you will think you never knew happiness before!"

Miss Lucia was silent a little while, as she sat there. "I don't suppose," she said then very timidly, "that you feel, living down here, that you do all the good you could do somewhere else? I have a great house that I bought since I began—began—"

"To help the poor?"

"And I have made a home of it for women who have no other home," said Miss Lucia hesitatingly. "And if you would go up there and live in the sweet, clear air and in real comfort you would live a great while longer!"

"I don't want to live a great while longer, dear."

"Not if you are doing good? You have done me a great deal of good today. I always knew there must be some reason for my always wanting to come in here. I know you could do others a great deal of good if you were up there. There are people needing you there. And you can't always work enough to pay for this room," as the little woman shook her head. "But you will pay for all you have there by just being you! Won't you come? You shall have a room looking to the East!"

"And it would be the Chamber of Peace. But somehow, dear, I think my place is here. If it were God's will—No, even when the time comes that I can't work it will make the people tender if they help me out and they don't have much here to make them tender!"

"I want to be made tender," cried Miss Lucia. "And all these people about you now can come and see you!"

"O, but there is work for me here."

"And there is more work for you there, Mrs. Redlands. I am coming for you rain or shine. And you needn't talk to me," said Miss Lucia, laughing sweetly. "I know it is God's will!"—The Interior.

Protection for the Birds.

In incorporating the Audubon Society, the last Legislature passed the following laws:

Sec. 4. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any person within the State of North Carolina to kill or catch any wild bird other than a game bird, or to purchase, offer or expose for sale, transport or ship without the State any such wild bird after it has been killed or caught except as permitted by this act. For the purpose of this act the following only shall be considered game birds: loons and grebes, swans, geese, brant, river, fish and sea ducks, rails, coots, marsh hens, and gallinules, plovers, shore and surf birds, snipe, woodcock, sandpipers, yellow legs, chewink or towhee, and curlews; and the wild turkey, grouse, partridge, pheasant, quail, dove, robin and meadow lark.

(a) It shall be unlawful for any person within the State of North Carolina to take or needlessly destroy the nests or eggs of any wild non-game birds except as permitted by this act.

(b) The English or European house sparrow, owls, hawks, crows, blackbirds, jackdaws and rice-birds are not included among the birds protected by this act.

(c) Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction be fined one dollar for each egg, nest or bird killed or taken by him, or shall be imprisoned not less than five days and not more than thirty days for each offense. Provided, that the provisions of this section shall not apply to any person holding a certificate giving the right to take birds, their nests or eggs for scientific purposes as provided for in section 5 of this act.

True Heroism: A Talk With the Boys.

There is hardly a boy who does not in his heart of hearts wish that he could be a hero, and not a few have sighed at the thought that they possess even less chance than their brothers of proving that they, too, were opportunity given, could show themselves capable of doing great deeds.

It may be admitted at once that to only a small proportion of boys, and to a very small proportion indeed of girls, is it given to gain fame in the world. But there are vast numbers of both, and perhaps more girls than boys, who possess the true spirit of heroism. Remember Longfellow's noble words:

"Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time."

Believe that this is so, boys: remember that each of you has it in his power to influence others for good or for evil, to leave a track behind you that will act as a guide to others to firm ground or to a quagmire in which they may be overwhelmed. There are others younger than yourselves, even if you are boys at school, who may be influenced by you for good or for evil. This is a great trust that has been placed in your hands, and your own future as well as theirs will assuredly be influenced by the course you may take now.

True heroism consists in doing what is right, come what may. In war this may mean giving your life for another; in peace it often means sacrificing money, honor, position, for what is honest and right. The first qualification toward heroism is absolute truthfulness. Come what may, be the consequences light or serious, a true hero boy or girl will never tell a lie. Lying is the mother of cunning, of meanness, and most other vices. Every boy and girl should feel in his or her own heart that a lie is the most contemptible, the most cowardly sin that they can commit; and of all forms of lying, the worst is the cowardly one of lying to escape punishment. If a boy does wrong—and the best of us may get into mischief or do wrong at times—it may be that the whole course of life will be influenced by the answer he gives when questioned concerning it.

The coward will lie to screen himself; but the boy who has a shadow of heroic feeling about him will boldly confess to his share in the affair and take his punishment. Then he can look the world in the face again; he has paid the penalty, he has no need to be ashamed of himself, while those who have lied are regarded with contempt by their fellows, and suffer a lasting feeling of shame and fear on their own part that the truth may come to light some time or other. I consider, of all virtues, absolute truthfulness stands first and forms the foundation of heroism.

Next to truthfulness comes unselfishness. There is noble unselfishness in the soldier who will rush out from shelter and risk death in carrying in a wounded comrade. So equally, though in a less striking degree, is the unselfishness of the boy who will set aside his own pleasures for the sake of others. Everyone admires the girl who is content to stay at home to take the burden off the shoulders of a weakly mother, by aiding her willingly and cheerfully in her household work and by relieving her of the care of the little ones. And we admire equally the unselfishness of the boy who, instead of thinking of nothing but his games and amusements when he is once free from school, will occasionally devote a half holiday to the amusement of the little ones, who will repay him a hundredfold for the pleasure that he has given up, by their affection and love for him.

Truthfulness and unselfishness go far to make up true heroes among boys and girls. As they grow up there are fresh opportunities of showing heroism. Comparatively few are able to choose the exact position in life that they fancy they would prefer. It is heroism to accept the life that falls to them, cheerfully and contentedly making up their minds to do their very best in that position to which it has pleased God to call them, striving earnestly and always to do their best to give satisfaction to their employers and to use their leisure hours sensibly and rationally.

Undoubtedly there are as many real heroes among girls as among boys. Throughout life girls and women have to bear many burdens. How many true heroines are to be found among women! Patient, brave women, who hide their troubles from the world, make the best of things, and carry a cheerful face even when their hearts are breaking. These are the great heroines of life. They work and suffer in obscurity; no one honors them for their patience; their little deeds of kindness and self-sacrifice are done quietly, and no one supposes that they are heroines. In sick-rooms at home, in hospitals, in out-of-the-way slums, women are doing heroic work, and you boys should honor them for it. No comparison can be made between these heroines of private life and the men who perform heroic deeds in battle. One is done in the heat of the moment; it is laudable and praiseworthy, but it is to a certain extent the outcome of the virtue of a race. Soldiers have in them the blood of a hundred fighting ancestors. They have in them also the remnants of a time when all men fought for their lives, when their position was little beyond that of the beasts of the field. I do not deny that it is heroism, I am proud of their deeds, but yet I feel that the truest heroes lie among those who do and suffer quietly, without hope of praise, without a thought that the work that they are doing is noble, without a thought of the opinion of others—this is the highest and noblest class of heroism.

It is in boyhood and girlhood that true heroism must be felt if it is ever to be attained in riper years. Boys are apt to make heroes of those who are strongest and most skillful in games, and to despise those who are unable from ill health or constitutional weakness to bear their full share in any sports. They do not reflect that the skill and prowess of their champions are largely the result of good health and physique, and that the shrinking, delicate boy may be as true a hero as the captain of their football or cricket team.

Above all, perhaps, they admire the boy who won't peach. I think that this kind of bravery is often carried to an excess. I consider that schoolmasters who insist that a boy who has bravely owned up to his own share in a piece of mischief should tell the name of his comrades are very much to blame. The boy has shown his readiness to take his full share in the punishment; he should not be asked for more, still less should he be punished for refusing to peach on his more cowardly associates. But certainly he ought not to bear the punishment due to them; and when the fault that has been committed is a disgraceful one, and the boy is asked if he knows who has committed it, I think that refusing to answer is not an act of heroism, and that he is more than justified in giving the name of the boy who has brought disgrace on the school. I know very well how strict is the code of honor among boys on such matters, but I think that when carried to an excess it is a mistaken one. Boys have the honor of their school at heart as much as their masters have, and it would be far more creditable to them to denounce a boy who has smirched that honor than to shield him.

To sum up, then, heroism is largely based upon two qualities: truthfulness and unselfishness, a readiness to put one's own pleasure aside for that of others, to be courteous to all, kind to those younger than yourself, helpful to your parents, even if that helpfulness demands some slight sacrifice of your own pleasure. You must remember that these two qualities are true signs of Christian heroism. If one is to be a true Christian, one must be a Christian hero. True heroism is inseparable from true Christianity, and as a step toward the former I would urge most strongly and urgently the practice of the latter.—Home Magazine.

How a Snake Moves.

Now any one who has looked at the skeleton of a snake—and it is really a very beautiful object—will have been struck by the great number of ribs, which may be as many as ten hundred and fifty pairs. In these lies the secret of the ability of the serpent to do some of these wonderful things. The lower end of each rib is connected with one of the broad scales that run along the under side of a snake, and when a rib is twisted slowly backward, it pushes on the scale, the edge of the scale catches on the ground or whatever object his snakeship may be resting on, and the body of the snake is pushed just a little bit forward. Of course, each rib moves the body but a mere trifle; but where the ribs are so many, and they are moved one after another, the result is that the snake moves slowly but steadily ahead.—From Nature and Science, in April St. Nicholas.

I can skate as well as any of the boys, so I am going to try, and if I get the gold piece it will buy us enough bread, meat, potatoes and coal to last nearly a month; then you needn't sew any for a week or two, just rest up a little, you know. Aren't you glad, mamma?" and Ralph Euston threw his arms around his mother's neck, and kissed her.

Mrs. Euston looked up from her sewing with a smile, and said: "Don't build too high hopes on that, Ralphie, dear. There will be many larger boys than you, and, of course, one of them will win."

"Bnt, mamma, the prize is only for boys under fourteen. Mr. Dobson said so," and Ralph went out into an old shed and brought in a pair of old skates which he proceeded to rub up until they shone almost equal to a new pair.

"It will do no harm to try," said his mother. It will be exercise for you; bnt I wouldn't set my heart too much on the prize. It isn't likely you will win when so many other boys have better skates, and can endure longer because so much more warmly clad. If you only had an overcoat and a good pair of mittens," and she sighed, wearily.

"Don't worry about that, mamma, I'll not feel cold when I'm skating."

When Saturday afternoon arrived, Ralph Enston was the first one on the pond, but other boys began to come, and soon the place was crowded with them. Mr. Dobson was there, too, and a great many who were not to compete, that they might witness the race.

Only twelve boys entered the contest, and when they were drawn up in line, abreast, and Mr. Dobson said: "One, two, three," they were off like a flash, gliding over the smooth ice.

Faster and faster they went, until it was plainly apparent that bnt three boys might win.

George Arlton and Leon were side by side, while closely behind them came Ralph Enston.

George and Leon were comfortably dressed, and made a pretty picture with their eyes sparkling and their cheeks glowing. They were nearly fourteen years of age, while Ralph Enston was but twelve.

"Ralph is close behind, I can almost feel his breath on the back of my neck," said Leon to George.

"He ought to take the prize anyway, for he needs it more than we do," said George.

"If he only had a better pair of skates, I believe he would," laughed Leon.

"A little rickety, aren't they? I say, Leon, suppose we slack up a little and let him get ahead?"

"Oh, come off, now, you don't mean it?"

"I do, too. I'd like to see what he'd do if he got the prize. I don't care for the gold piece so much do you? I've got more'n $10 in my bank now."

"I've got more'n thirteen in mine, but that don't make any difference. Every boy wants all he can get."

"Bnt we don't need it like Ralph does. See how old and patched his clothes are; and he has no muffler or mittens."

"Can't help that. Who wants to let somebody beat?"

"It won't be $5 for each of us, because I can't get ahead of you, nor you, me. The five will have to be cut in two."

"Hurrah for Leon Dukes!" shouted a crowd on shore.

"Hurrah for George Arlton!" shouted another crowd.

But old Mr. Dobson shouted: "Hurrah for Ralph Enston!"

"He sees he's smaller than us," said George.

"Rather he'd have the prize anyway I s'pect."

"I'll slacken a little if you will," said George, and the next second Ralph Enston glided past them and reached the goal first.

Such cheering and hurrahing broke from the spectators as startled the very cows in the woods, then Ralph skated back to receive the $5 gold piece, with a happier look on his face than any one had ever seen there before. His face was radiant, his eyes full of tears and his fingers trembling as he reached them out for the money.

With a hasty but hearty, "Thank you, sir," he clutched the prize, then darted straight for home, amid deafening cheers.

"Going to take it to his mother," said Leon, in a whisper to George, "I'm glad we let him beat."

"So am I. Never felt so good in my life," laughed George.

"I say let us boys take up a collection and buy him a new pair of skates. What do you say?" said Leon.

"All right," responded George, and soon a pretty velvet cap was passed around the crowd, and not less than $15 were contributed.

Old Mr. Dobson was delighted, and himself took the money over to the poor little cottage.

As for George and Leon, they kept their own secret; but if there were any happier boys in Graysville that night than Ralph Enston, they were George and Leon.

A Great Man's Humble Start in Life.

Dr. Lorenz, who has wrought such wondrous cures of crippled children since he came to America, was the other day induced by what he thought was too great praise of himself to tell the accompanying story of his life. In an address to an assembly of medical men in Philadelphia, after having told them they made too much of his work, and that he felt ashamed when he heard them praise his work beyond its merits, he gave this account of his unpropitious start and early hardships:

"Forty-four years ago I was a little and very poor boy. One day, wandering along the street, I found a single glove. I put it on. It was much too large and contrasted harshly with my feet, which were bare. Proud and happy, I walked to my home and showed my treasure to my mother.

"My dear boy," she said, "you will have to work very hard to find the other glove."

"In the many hardships of late life I often remembered the significance of those words. Bnt at the age of 30, after many struggles, I had overcome all obstacles as a student, and rose to be first assistant to the late Professor Albert. I taught general surgery, and the dream of my life was to become a famous surgeon — to rummage in the interiors of fellow-mortals.

"Bnt the dream never came true. I contracted a peculiar form of eczema. I could not follow my chosen work. I thought that the other glove was gone forever, and I could scarcely resist the temptation to blow out my brains. In complaining of my lot to Professor Albert, he said to me:

BEST EVIDENCE

The best evidence of the acceptability of any brand of an article of common use is the quantity sold. "GOOD LUCK" Baking Powder has, from the start, steadily increased in favor with the House-keepers until it now supplies largely more than half of the entire amount of Baking Powder consumed in the entire South. "GOOD LUCK" is frequently sold in train-load lots, the last of which consisted of One Hundred and Sixty-nine Solid car-loads.

"If you can't get along with wet surgery, try dry surgery."

"So it was not by love, but by necessity that I became a dry surgeon. But necessity is the mother of invention, and, after twenty years of hard work, I found at last the other glove. And it has brought me the esteem and appreciation of the profession and the grateful thanks of many a mother."—"Cumberland Presbyterian."

At His Word.

The clever young man was wandering up and down the platform of the railway station, intent on finding an empty carriage in the express which was almost due to start. But, alas, his search was in vain.

Still, it is difficult to disappoint a clever young man when he has set his mind on to getting something. An idea occurred to him, and, assuming an official air, he stalked up to the last carriage, and cried in a stentorian voice:

"All change, here; this carriage isn't going!"

There were exclamations low but deep from the occupants of the crowded compartment; but nevertheless they scurried out of the carriage, and packed themselves away in other parts of the train.

The smile on the face of the young man was childlike and bland as he settled himself spaciously in a corner of the empty carriage, and lit a cigar.

"Ah," he murmured, "it's a grand thing for me that I was born clever! I wish they'd hurry up and start!"

Presently the station master put his head in the window and said:

"I s'pose you're the smart young fellow who told the people this carriage wasn't going?"

"Yes," said the clever one. And he smiled.

"Well," said the station master, with a grin, "it isn't. The porter heard you telling the people, and so he uncoupled it. He thought you were a director."

Stray Stories.

A Marvelous Rosebush.

In the town of Hildersheim, in Germany, is a rosebush said to be one thousand years old, and sprouts from its branches have realized fabulous sums. Some years ago a rich Englishman offered $50,000 for the entire tree, but the sum was indignantly refused.

This wonderful plant clings amid thickly grown moss against the side of the famous old Church of St. Michael. It is claimed that it has bloomed perennially since the days of King Alfred, and this statement has never been disputed, for its record has been as carefully kept as the pedigree of the bluest-blooded family in the kingdom. It is supposed to have been discovered through the medium of King Louis of Hildersheim as far back as 1022.—C. E. World.

Children's Letters.

Concord, N. C., April 7, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little boy nine years old. My papa is dead. I have two brothers and six sisters. My little nephew, Preston, is the only pet I have. I go to school and am in the third grade. Miss Lizzie Young is my teacher. I love her very much. I go to Sunday-school at the Cannonville Presbyterian Church. Miss May White is my teacher; I love her too.

I will close by answering my cousin Howard Price's question, Ehud was left-handed.

Your friend,
Millard Alexander.

Hanover, C. H., Va., April 5, 1903.

Dear Standard:

My great aunt has been staying with us this winter and she takes your nice paper and I love to read the little letters, but she is going away to-morrow and I will miss her so much and miss the reading of the little letters.

I have two sisters and two brothers. My youngest sister is a little baby and I love her very much. I will answer Samuel Smith's question, Wash-pot is found in Psalm 60:8 and 108:9. I will also answer Grace Dunris question, Handkerchief is found in Acts 19:12. I will ask where is barefoot found in the Bible?

Your unknown friend,
Sarah Cardwell.

Elmore, N. C., April 2, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I will write to this good paper for my third time. I am going to school. It will be out in two weeks. I will be sorry for I like to go to school. At school we have speeches every other Friday and compositions on the Friday we don't have speeches. For to-day we had to have compositions on the United States. We all had very good ones. It was not as windy in March as usual, but the wind is blowing right hard here to-night. We have been finding some wild flowers I love to hunt wild flowers. The farmers are busy planting their crops. Papa has planted most of our corn and has planted some cotton. I have been going to Sunday-school most every Sunday, but last Sunday it rained and blew so I could not go. I hope I can go next Sunday. I love to go to Sunday-school. I have three little brothers, that love to go to Sunday-school. When we go we get little papers. I like to read them and they like to hear them read. I will answer some of the children's questions, Obed was David's grandfather. The word music is found in Eccl. 12:4. The shortest psalm is the 117th, the longest 119th. I will ask a question, Where is the word Presbytery found in the Bible. I will close.

Your friend,
Ethel Gibson.

Dear Standard:

We are little twin sisters and as we have never written to your nice paper before, we thought we would write to you a short letter. Our papa takes your paper and we enjoy reading the children's letters and other stories. We have four brothers and two sisters. Our school has closed, but we are studying at home. Our church is Rocky River. Our pastor is Rev. R. J. Hunter. We like him very much. Our little brother has a pet kitten; he calls it Toney Woucy, and a shepherd dog; he calls him Nero. We will answer Myrtle McCord's question, The words dishes, spoons and bowls are found in Exodus 37:16. We will also ask a question, Where is the word Penknife found in the Bible. We will close, hoping to see our letter in print.

Dear Standard:

While little sister Christine and Mama take a nap, I will try to write you a short letter. Christine came to us Christmas night. She is bright and pretty and plays with me and my dolls. I am eight years old, but I only started to school last November. My papa is a Doctor. We used to live up there in North Carolina, and I have enjoyed your paper with the stories and little letters ever since. Presbytery meets here this week. It is very rainy. I hope to go to see my Grandpa at Bullocks, N. C., soon. I hate to leave my pet cat, Jack Straws. He ought a lizzard the other day, and the lizzard bit him in the lip.

Dear Standard:

I have not seen any letters from Raleigh, so I thought I would write one. My grandma has been taking your paper ever since it started. My papa reads the letters and stories to me and my little brother Herbert every Sunday evening and we enjoy them. We had a little entertainment not very long ago to raise some money to put a porch on one of the buildings at the Barium Springs orphanage that was burned and we made about $50. There were about 40 children in the entertainment. It was held at the Olivia Raney Library hall. I have two big rag dolls. I love them very much, one is a girl named Annie and one is a boy named "Sunny-Jim." Before I close I will ask two questions, How many books in the New Testament? How many of these did Saint Paul write?

before and you were so kind as to print it, I thought I would write again. I enjoy reading the letters ever so much especially when they ask question about the Bible. My mother and father are both Presbyterians. Our pastor is Rev. Peter McIntyre. We love him dearly. I have just been reading 'Easy steps for little feet.' It is stories of the Bible. We do not go to Sunday-school because it is so far. Mamma gives us lessons from the catechisms. We can repeat the ten commandments. And the books of the Bible. I will answer Bruna McConnell's question, The word "cottage" is found three times in the Bible. First in Israel 1:8; Second 24:20; Third Zep. 2:6. I will close now by asking how many times is knife found in the Bible and where?

Dear Standard:

I am going to write you a little letter as I have never done so before. Our school closed Friday week. Our teacher was Mrs. F. J. Cox. I am so glad old cold winter is gone, and the pleasant spring has come to visit us. I have twenty-five little biddies. Papa has set his cabbage out. I am making me a quilt. I study history, geography, spelling, grammar and arithmetic. I will close now by asking how many books there are in the Bible.

Kate McPhail.

What Pa Doesn't Know.

Most every day when I'm at school
The teacher tells us things
About the birds and animals
And Presidents and kings,
And then, at night, when I ast pa
If what she says is so,
He reads his paper right along
And says: "Oh I, dunno!"

One day she told us that the world
Is round, just like a ball,
And that there's nothing down below
It's standin' on at all,
I ast pa if she told the truth.
He read his paper through,
And put his feet up on a chair,
And said: "Oh, I dunno!"

And once the teacher said the sky
Ain't heaven's floor, and tried
To make us think no angels walk
Along the other side,
And so that night I ast my pa,
And all he said was: "Oh,
Don't bother me about such things;
I'm busy I—dunno!"

I used to kind of think somehow
That my pa knew a lot—
But that was wrong, or if he did
I guess that he's forgot.
Since I've started into school,
Most every day or so
I hear about a hundred things
Pa doesn't seem to know.

New Scholar.

When Grace got to Sabbath-school on that afternoon her teacher had not come yet. But the other girls were there, with their heads, close together talking busily. As soon as they saw Gracie they told her what had happened.

"Do you see that dreadful-looking, ragged girl down by the door?" May began once. "Well, what do you suppose Mr. Hart did? He came here to us and asked us if we wouldn't let her in our class. The ideal!"

"What did you tell him?" asked Gracie.

"Lucy told him that our class had plenty of scholars, and we'd rather not. But I should think he'd know better. I should think he could see that we didn't suit together."

Gracie looked at her little neighbors with their starched frocks and smooth hair and clean faces, and then at the girl by the door; they did not suit well together, it was true. But Gracie's face was grave.

"I don't believe Mr. Hart can find any class for her here," said Lucy. "She ought to go to another Sunday-school."

"Oh, no!" cried Gracie. Then she stopped. But the others were all looking at her, and she had to go on. "You couldn't send anybody away from Sunday-school, could you, any more than if it was heaven?"

No one of the other little girls had any answer ready for this. And, taking courage from their silence, Gracie added:

"Miss Barbara wouldn't like it, I know; nor God, either."

"I believe I'll go tell Mr. Hart we've changed our minds," said Lucy. "Shall I?"

"Yes, do," said May.

And in about one minute more the strange little scholar was being welcomed into the class as if she were a princess royal.

As their teacher, Miss Barbara, came up the aisle, Mr. Hart stopped her and told her about it. This was why, when Sunday-school was over, Miss Barbara called after the children, and kept them for just a moment under the shade of the big tree by the church yard gate.

"Girls," she said, smiling down upon them, "I believe if Jesus Christ were to speak to my class this afternoon, he would say 'I was a stranger and ye took me in.'"—Mayflower.

"Tom," and His Family.

Tom is a Dominic rooster. Last winter his feet were frozen. After a short time the legs came off just below the knees, and the stubs healed over nicely. At first we intended to kill him and end his helpless sufferings; but every one was "chicken-hearted" about it. So he lived until a neighbor boy, Dan, asked for him for a pet.

It is entertaining to see Tom get about. Having no toes, he cannot well balance himself, yet in a way, he is quite expert at it. Usually he sits flat on the ground, and we teased Dan that, as Tom was good for nothing else, eggs should be put under him, that he might hatch them. Tom has refuted that slander. When Tom wants to make a journey he spreads both wings as a sort of combined balance pole, sail and rudder. Then, with his stub-legs thumping the ground, away he

1200 Bible Questions

In consecutive order without answers. The only work of its kind before the public. A new and simple plan, by which the masses are reached and induced to familiarize themselves with the Bible. Not a theory, but a practical outgrowth from years of experimental work by the author, the Rev. J. J. Hill. The questions are highly commended by those who have used them.

From Dr. S. M. Neel, pastor Central Presbyterian Church, Kansas City:

The questions have greatly stimulated and aided the ladies of my church in Bible study. It was an admirable thought of Dr. Hill's and I am sure all lovers of Bible truth who will use the questions will be grateful to him for thus helping them to gain a consecutive knowledge of God's Word. I wish every family of my congregation had these questions.

Pastors will find that women quickly take up the work, and all persons in a congregation should be urged to use the questions and take part in class work. A dozen questions each week make a good feature for the Sunday school or Prayer-meeting, and adds new interest.

A copy of the questions may be had for 10 cents—three copies 25 cents—by writing the Tribune, Liberty, Mo.

goes—somewhere. The rudder part is uncertain, and often he will spin round like a top or run in a small circle several times before he can stop at equilibrium. It is very comical to see him. He crows as cheerily as any rooster. He cannot defend himself, and other roosters have to be kept away from him.

The thing that distinguishes Tom and entitles him to a biography is his interest in and care for the little chicks. When a member of one flock gets to the wrong coop Tom proceeds to see it safely home. Getting his wings and stubs in motion, he first makes for the wanderer, which he seizes by the neck with his bill. Then he starts on the uncertain trip to the home coop. Sometimes the course is straight, and sometimes zigzag or roundabout. But with the chick dangling and squawking he preserves until he reaches the right place. It is a laughable performance, though the chick appears not to see the fun in it. The mistress regards Tom's attentions in that way as cruel, if well meant, and switches him for it. Then he flutters away with a crestfallen air, and creeps under a shed. From that safe retreat he sends forth his defiant chanticleer.

A mother hen died and Tom took her unprotected brood literally under his wing. He cannot lead them about through the day, but at night he gathers them in the little box and covers them with his feathers. They accept it in a matter of fact way. Whether Tom will yet take to hatching his own brood remains to be seen.

Altogether we think Tom is an unusual specimen of his race and a citizen of mark. He takes a philosophical and sensible view of life. Though handicapped, he makes the very best out of everything. He seems as happy as if he had two good feet.—Christian Advocate.

A German skeptic, Hienrich Heine, having spent a day in the unusual task of studying the Scriptures, said, "What a Book! The whole world is in it—promise and fulfillment, birth and death. The whole drama of humanity is in this Book. It is rooted in the deepest abysses of creation, and it towers up behind the blue gates of heaven." A French unbeliever, Ernest Renan, said, "The Bible is, after all, the great consoling Book of humanity."
