By CHAS. M. STIEFF, the Southern Piano Manufacturer. For NINETY days, from Wednesday morning, May 27, to August 25, 1923, inclusive, we want every person representing a home in North or South Carolina where there is no Upright Stieff Piano to call at our warerooms, 211-213 N. Tryon street, Charlotte, and register, giving their name and address. These names will go on our books in numerical rotation and to each person registering we will issue a duplicate of their number as it appears on our books. Those living outside of Charlotte can be registered by sending their name and address and enclosing a two-cent stamp for return of number. On Wednesday, August 26th, duplicates of these numbers will be placed in a box and taken out by a little girl. The Twelfth Number taken out will be given a beautiful Upright Piano. Remember it costs you nothing but your name and address, and this instrument is given away by Chas. M. Stieff in appreciation of the phenomenal sales of the Stieff Piano and to advertise the wonderful KOHLER Piano, which we control in the South. Write us now. Equal chance to all.

A Day in June

For a cap and bells our lives we pay,
Bubbles we earn with a whole soul's tasking ;
'Tis heaven alone that is given away,
'Tis only God can be had for the asking ;
No price is set on the lavish summer,
And June may be had by the poorest comer.
And what is so rare as a day in June ?
Then, if ever, come perfect days ;

The flush of life may well be seen
Thrilling back over hills and valleys ;
The cowslip startles in meadows green,
The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice,
And there's never a leaf or a blade too mean
To be some happy creature's palace ;
The little bird sits at his door in the sun,
Atilt like a blossom among the leaves,
And lets his illumined being o'errun
With the deluge of summer it receives ;
His mate feels the eggs beneath her wings
And the heart in her dumb breast flutters and sings ;
He sings to the wide world, and she to her nest—
In the nice ear of Nature which song is the best ?

Event and Comment.

Christendom says that foreign missionaries should be sent to Belleville, Illinois, where they lynched and burned a negro the other day for attempted murder. They should evidently be foreign to Illinois.

The Liberals and Conservatives on the Board of Trustees of Lane Seminary, the other day, had a clash and the Liberals resigned and the Conservatives were left in charge. Cincinnati had better consolidate with Louisville anyway.

There has been a strong protest against the licensing of Dance Halls near Providence, Rhode Island. The appeal to the salacious, from degraded womanhood to degrading manhood, is one of the vilest things tolerated in American life.

Mr. Joseph W. Folk, of St. Louis, on whom the extremes, Mr. Watterson and Mr. Bryan, are meeting as a Presidential possibility, is a North Carolinian by birth and a Methodist by grace. He early emigrated to Tennessee, but we trust that he will never fall from grace.

The Emerson revival has been made by Unitarian extremists "an orgy of heathenism", to quote from one critic. It abounded in such blasphemous expressions as "Emerson was as sinless as Jesus." Unitarianism is heathenism and the sect is really responsible for the condition of "Pagan New England."

They are debating the question in New England whether the Lord sends rain in answer to prayer. New England might get more comfort out of the declaration that "He sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." But we never could understand why a man who admits that the Lord reigns could doubt that the Lord rains.

Dr. W. W. Moore has been in Charlotte for the past few days, with an added vigor to his step, a healthy tan to his cheek and a thousand memories of the East in his fertile brain. It was good to hear him talk; and Union Seminary students have feasts of good things for the years to come as he adds his personal experience and observations to his scholarly knowledge of Oriental life and history.

We hope that the Anti-Saloon Convention which meets in Raleigh on July 7th will be noted for the attendance of conservative Presbyterians from all over the State. It is the desire of those who have heretofore had the conduct of the campaign to place it in conservative hands, for the welfare of the cause itself. And we hope that our great denomination in North Carolina will not be poorly represented in the Convention.

The Austin Theological Seminary catalogue is at hand. We had neglected to notice that Dr. Smoot was elected by the Board of Trustees at a recent meeting, Professor of Church History and Polity. There is no danger that the Austin boys will be taught a Northern view of American Presbyterian history or be left in ignorance of the vital distinction between a Committee and a Board. We wish the new Seminary, with its enlarging work, the highest success.

One hundred and twenty-eight Congregationalist ministers of England have signed a statement that they will not pay a general tax for sectarian education. That would be too many preachers to put in jail. The magistrates might have to go and fetch them out, as the rulers of Philippi were once bidden to do. But why is an McLaren sulking in his tent? And why is English Presbyterianism not more fully identified with this great struggle for religious liberty?

The article on page six is a text for preaching on the subject of faith in the men who at personal sacrifice of time and labor conduct the Assembly's business. The trouble frequently comes in the form of criticisms by the men that the Assembly leaves off its committees, for good and sufficient reasons. That has been the trouble in Nashville as well as in Richmond. But the Assembly ought not to constitute itself a court for the airing of such grievances or for the exploitation of demagogism in general.

The decline of candidates for the ministry is a local and temporary evil. As a matter of fact, the whole number in America has been steadily growing from year to year and the percentage of theological students for other callings is larger now than the average. We need more men and better men in the Southern Presbyterian Church, and the Church should not only pray for an increase, but see that she does not discourage young men of self-respect, by penuriousness in the matter of providing the means for the long preparatory course which she prescribes.

The Congregationalist says:

"Two published sermons are before us, both by distinguished American preachers. The one bearing the latest date shows by its ideas and by many of its sentences, that it is an imitation of the earlier one, without improving on it. It was published by request. The preacher who has yielded to the temptation to crib could not resist the temptation to print."

Dear Congregationalist! May we have one guess? Was it the Brooklyn man who laid a bomb-shell under the Presbyterian Church, with the result that he was blown through its open door, across the street, into the Congregationalist Church?

Said the President of our State University recently: "Let us have no nonsense about the school-house taking the place of the church as the centralizing point and influence in the community, a statement made by one of those who spoke at the Richmond Conference. Education cannot replace religion. The training of the mind is altogether subordinate to the cultivation of those higher qualities of heart and soul which make up character and are adequate for the satisfying of our infinite yearning for the God-like life and the perfection of eternity. It will be a sad day for our State should the school ever supplant the Church."

That was well said. Of course there were a few utterances of the Richmond Conference that nobody was responsible for. We beg leave to remark, however, that this sounds as though a State Institution believed in Christian Education.

Dr. Hillis complains that "the loss of one's influence is one of the things that every Christian preacher has to suffer at the hands of careless and incompetent religious editors." In the same article he says, "I made no criticism of either Dr. Abbot or President Cleveland." He said in his sermon which the "religious editors" picked to pieces, after mentioning the names of Abbot and Cleveland, "Both the statesman and the editor have, for the moment, lost faith in the Republic. * * * If these men who have lost their great convictions on universal suffrage are to lead, the colored race has come to a great crisis." Manifestly, Dr. Hillis is as careless about recollecting what he has said himself as he is about remembering that he is sometimes stealing other men's thoughts. And he should not lay his loss of influence on the "religious editors" or even on the editors of religious papers.

The Blight of Unitarianism. Unitarianism is both old and new as a doctrine. It is old as a doctrine of men; it is new as a doctrine of men who call themselves Christians. In the time of Christ, Unitarians were called simply sinners. "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." Arianism was an exceedingly mild form of modern Unitarianism, yet it was near enough to the modern error to have been afflicted with the same barrenness. The old Arianism literally perished from the earth while the Catholic Faith, in the true sense of that term, spread over all the world. After the Reformation Unitarianism gained a foot-hold in Poland and did what Calvinism would never have done, suffered the dismemberment of native land and the blotting out of the nation from the earth. It still claims some 60,000 followers in Transylvania, whose neighbors and kinsmen of Servia have just been disgusting the world with the crime of assassination. The old English Unitarians, of the Priestly stripe, would be disowned by their modern co-religionists of America and so would be, in all probability, the first Unitarian dissenters from the harshness of New England Congregationalism. It has been a fault of the New England mind that it could not rest in the golden mean of truth. When one remembers the question which the old Congregationalism put to candidates for the ministry, "Would you be willing to be damned for the glory of God?" one can hardly wonder at a reaction toward liberalism of some kind.

In the sense that Unitarianism is old, its age is nothing to its credit. Unbelief as almost as old as faith, on earth. The Jews who said that Christ was a blasphemer, because he made himself equal with God, were Unitarians. Mohammed was Unitarian, and so is the whole Mohammedan world to-day.

"Abdul the Damned," to use the name which Mr. Gladstone, we believe, gave to the present Sultan of Turkey, is interrupted in a meditation on the next Armenian massacre by the muezzin's cry, "Allah Allah," "There is one God." It was the old-time custom for those who denied the divinity of Christ to be called, by Christians, Infidels, whether they were Turks or Englishmen. But those of this unbelief to-day are paying some homage to the forms of Christianity while denying its power. They have struck out of the old Unitarian credal expressions even the Scriptural terms which might be interpreted as implying the Divinity of Christ. They deny the miraculous birth of Christ, as well as his pre-existence, and are doubters if not deniers of his resurrection. This is new, in the sense that people who think this way have been called by various names, such as Mohammedans, Infidels, Unbelievers, but have never called themselves Christians before.

Neither is this newness to its credit. As was well said by Dr. C. R. Hemphill, in a recent sermon in Charlotte, if the Christian world in all these centuries of holding fast to the fundamental doctrines of the divinity of Christ is mistaken in its interpretation of the Bible on this point, then it is impossible to learn anything of what the Bible teaches.

And modern American Unitarianism has been in existence long enough to answer the question, What about your fruits? The answer to this query has generally been a list of distinguished New England literati and statesmen, from Emerson to Senator Hoar. But the answer is not satisfying, for there are men of distinction and of genius who do not make any pretensions to Christianity. Other forms of infidelity and unbelief can show the same fruits, if these be called fruits.

But when we ask, What is the religious condition, the moral condition, even, of that part of New England which has been Unitarianized, our friends of that unfaith are beginning to hang their heads. They speak in general terms of the influence of Unitarianism upon the other forms of Christian faith. They claim their converts in Congregationalism and even in Presbyterianism, though these converts have not the courage of their convictions nor piety enough to give up their ecclesiastical pie. But what of New England?

"Pagan New England" is an expression that startled the country a few years ago, but investigation on religious lines has since shown that the rural communities of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and Massachusetts are retrograding more rapidly than any part of the United States, and that in the matter of ordinary decency and morality. New England writers, with certainly no bias against New England, have told stories of concubinage and bastardy and even incest, that are as shocking for the excessive frequency of their occurrence as for the shamelessness of the sinners. The people do not attend church; they have almost forgotten that there is a day of rest, not to speak of a day of worship. The Congregational and Episcopal Churches in the towns and cities have made a brave fight against Unitarianism. But where it drove the other churches out, the country is practically churchless, even lacking the Unitarian preaching that it once had. The people are becoming degenerates, and this is true not of a foreign-born population or of mixed breeds, but of the native American stock.

It is no wonder, then, that Christian people who know these facts to be true dread any touch of the body of this death. And those who labor for inter-denominational causes will lose far more than they can gain by any compromise with Unitarianism. The Religious educational Meeting in Chicago, a few months ago, is discredited by the fact that there was one Unitarian speaker on the programme more than by anything that was said in the whole conference by Christian men of every shade of belief.

It is said that there is a reaction in Unitarianism itself; that some Unitarian preachers are beginning to speak in an evangelical strain, and the congregational government and absence of all creed from the Unitarian churches, allows this. Unitarianism is not growing, but rather declining, and it must be evident that if Christianity had depended upon an Unitarian conception of its founder it would never have accomplished anything for the evangelization of the nations and would be as dead to-day as Stoicism or Gnosticism. Unitarianism is a deadly blight wherever Christianity is leavened with it, and its blighting effect is seen nowhere more clearly than in the gradual decline of the system itself, and the frightful condition of the second and third generations of its adherents.

Back to Primitive Christianity. We suppose that no one could have read that sermon of John Wesley's, last week, without thinking of the purity and the simplicity of the Early Church. There is a freshness about the New Testament story that reminds one of Eden and the new created world. "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common." The ideal of human brotherhood was never so perfectly reached in human history. And the saddest fact is that even in New Testament times the fair picture was blotted and obscured by the strife and jealousy of the disciples.

It seems to us that the great reformation for our age will have for its watch-word, Back to Primitive Christianity, Back to the Primeval Church. This was the watch-word of the Reformation of the Sixteenth Century. Luther and Calvin and Knox broke away from the traditions of the Roman Catholic Church and their inquiry was, What were the doctrines and ordinances of that age when men spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost; when they could say, without presumption, "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us." But that Reformation, as sorely as it was needed, was a reformation of belief. The works followed the faith, of course. But the emphasis was on matters of faith.

The Wesley revival was in line with the Reformation of Duty that is the need of our own age. Wesley saw that men needed a return to the simple life and simple faith of the Early Church. The sermon on Scriptural Christianity was an epoch-making sermon. It was preached to the learned professors and high ecclesiastics at Oxford as well as to the younger men forming the body of the students. There is no uncertainty in its tones or wavering in its fearless denunciation of the indifference of professing Christians to the great need of a dying world.

The missionary revival of our own century pre-eminently the century of missions, is another instance of the Reformation of Duty. As the Wesley revival was an awakening to the need of personal work for individual souls, so the missionary revival was an arousing of the Church to the work of evangelizing the nations. It might be said, however, that both found their inspiration in the New Testament Church. The great evangelizing age, both personal and national, considering all the circumstances of poverty and opposition, was the First Century. The same great apostle who carried the gospel to every part of the Roman Empire, when he was bidden remain in one city for a while, "by the space of three years, ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears."

There are signs of this getting back to first principles, though some of us are not going all the way back at once. Our Episcopal brethren are harking back to the customs and forms that obtained in the old Anglican Church, before the Reformation. Perhaps our Presbyterian hosts are a little prone to consider the Westminster period as the golden age of the Church. So far as doctrine goes it was a great age, an age of the giants. But the very spirit of that age was its consuming desire to get back to the doctrines and the principles of order that the apostles themselves ordained and taught.

And now we all need to learn anew that spirit of brotherhood, that spirit that will not suffer a brother to lack while we have wherewithal to give him, the spirit of Christian simplicity, of Christian communism, if you will, which is infinitely removed from political communism. Dr. Van Dyke's sermon before the Northern Assembly struck this key-note. Our civilization has grown too complex. We are occupied too much with the mint and anise and cummin of social and church life and we are in danger of passing over judgment and the love of God. Our preachers need to return to a proclaiming of the great essentials of the gospel and to have done with the refinements of doctrine or of ecclesiastical claims. Back to the Church that came from the creative hands of the Christ! There is the meeting place for a united Christendom and the only one. Back to Primitive Christianity.

The Temperance Cause.

The Richmond Times-Dispatch is one of those high-toned secular papers that is frankly and vigorously on the side of temperance. The ground is being narrowed every year for those who stand on the platform of a free and unlimited coinage of drunkards.

The Times-Dispatch has this to say of the progress of temperance:

"The whiskey question is now claiming the attention of medical science and students of penology the world over. It is generally agreed that whiskey is a fruitful source of crime and of insanity. By order of the United States government, a report of the proceedings of the Sixth International Prison Congress, held in Brussels two years ago, has just been published, in which it is stated that as an immediate and essential influence on crime, drinking exceeds any of the other recognized causes.

"Dr. Robert Jones, medical superintendent of the Claybury Lunatic Asylum at London, recently made an exhibit, showing that of the 110,000 certified insane persons now in England and Wales alone, alcohol is assigned as the cause of insanity in 21.5 per cent. of the males and 25 per cent. of the females.

"Taking this statement for a text, the New York Medical Record says that almost every country in the world is taking up the drink question, alarmed at the inroads which the unbridled consumption of alcohol has made and is making into the prosperity, health and morals of their people.

"But more than all this, business men are insisting that their employes must be sober, knowing full well that the man who keeps his brain beclouded with alcohol is in no condition to do first-class work."

The Publication Committee and the General Assembly.

(Editorial Correspondence.)

Richmond, Virginia, June 16, 1903.—Having been absent from the sessions of the late General Assembly, hearing a rumor that there was some dissatisfaction in the Committee with the acts of the Assembly touching the Publication and Sabbath-school Work, and having a desire to see and investigate matters at first hand, the editor of the Standard has come to Richmond. Fortunately or unfortunately both Dr. Phillips, the present Secretary of Publication, and Mr. Magill, the newly elected Secretary, are absent from the city. But the books and accounts have been thrown open to my inspection, I have talked with members of the committee and made a somewhat thorough investigation of affairs on the ground. The matter is serious enough to call for the attention of the whole Church and we feel, with some pardonable pride, that the Standard has made its reputation for the discussion of such questions, from the stand point of the ascertained facts and a disinterested opinion regarding those facts.

To begin at the beginning, the Publication Work of the Southern Church was once visited with disaster. The Church's very honor as a Church was at stake. Dr. Hoge, Dr. Palmer, and others of the giants of those days, threw themselves into the breach and saved the day. The Assembly put in charge of the Publication work the late lamented Dr. J. K. Hazen.

Dr. Hazen was the right man for the place and his energy and prudence and the confidence which the Church soon learned to place in him, made a solvent out of a bankrupt concern and success out of failure.

But the fact of the past disaster in this work has hung over the Church ever since, making it timid about new enterprises. It would have been only natural that Dr. Hazen himself, having given the best part of his life to the work of retrenchment and economical management, should have been, in his later years, reluctant to enter upon the enlargement of the work called for by the doubling of church membership and its increasing prosperity. But before Dr. Hazen's death, the committee, very largely under the splendid organizing skill of Dr. Phillips, perfected a plan for the future of the work, to which Dr. Hazen gave his cordial approval. The work was to have three departments, an editorial department with the best man to be procured in the Church for the position of editor: a Sunday-school Department, of which Dr. Phillips was already the head, and the Business Department, with a Business Superintendent, in charge, as had already been provided by the General Assembly. Dr. Phillips, who had been Dr. Hazen's main-stay during the time of his declining strength, and who had been acting as assistant treasurer, by the appointment of the committee, was elected Business Superintendent. A sub-committee of some of the finest business men in Richmond are associated with the Business Superintendent, so that this part of the work is rendered absolutely safe, so far as human prudence can make it so. Upon Dr. Hazen's death, Dr. Phillips was elected Secretary, with the salary of $3,000 that attaches to that office, and two members of the committee, Dr. J. P. Smith and Rev. J. Calvin Stewart, were asked to act temporarily as Editor and Treasurer, at a salary for each of $50 a month.

Dr. Phillips' genius for organization now began to display itself, and he infused so much new life into the whole department that it was seen that there would be a large increase in the income. In November, Mr. R. E. Magill, of Nashville, a fine business man, of exemplary Christian character, was elected Business Superintendent, the office carrying with it that of Treasurer. Dr. Phillips had been Mr. Magill's beloved pastor. The editor has not yet been selected, but the income of the office now, with the saving made by making a new contract with Whittet and Shepperson, will be ample for the salary of the editor, for whom the committee is now searching.

The committee, after mature deliberation, decided that the work of the Secretary could best be performed by the Superintendent of Sunday-schools.

The cause was henceforth to be known as the cause of Publication and Sabbath-school Work. With the separation and practical autonomy of the three departments, under the workings of the committee, it was felt that the Sunday-school department should be given the position of honor, and that the Secretaryship, with the work of representing the whole cause before the church courts, should belong to the Sunday-school department. Under the new plan of organization, the Secretary would have no control of the business department, except by way of general oversight, nor of the editorial department. Furthermore, the man who had planned the whole system, who had brought Mr. Magill to the department he has so admirably filled, and who had been made by force of circumstances thoroughly familiar with all the departments of the business, was Dr. Phillips. So the committee, with these plans in view, nominated him for the position of Secretary of the Committee of Publication and Sabbath-school Work, it being distinctly stated that he was to continue the work he had been doing as Superintendent of Sunday-schools. It was felt that if any one deserved the honor and the larger salary attached to this office, for hard work done and for the successful carrying out of the plan projected, it was Dr. Phillips.

This was the situation when the Assembly met. And the Assembly turned down the recommendation of the Committee, made the Financial Department the position of honor, and elected Mr. Magill, Secretary, with the Secretary's salary, of course, while relegating Dr. Phillips to the Sunday-school Department at a lower salary.

Evidently there was a misunderstanding of the case. The Executive Committee of Publication, of thirteen members, was unanimous for the arrangement proposed, as was the majority of the committee appointed from the Assembly. There were two members of the latter committee who seem to have made the false impression upon the Assembly. One of them was an Ex-Congressman from Georgia who had the idea that he had found a mare's nest and could exploit himself by the announcement of the discovery. The other was an elder from Texas, the abstract of whose address, as published in the Christian Observer, shows him to have been as ignorant of the facts as his comrade, the Georgia Colonel, was demagogic in his use of them.

In the first place, it should be presumed that a committee, such as the Publication Committee, is a committee of gentlemen. The committee was criticised because, in a transition period, and at a crisis brought about by the death of the former Secretary, two members of the committee accepted salaried positions as editor and as treasurer.

It was done to save the Church's money. And if anybody thinks that a competent editor can be obtained for his whole time for $50 a month, he should be allowed to try the work for one week, so as to hear from the Church about it.

And we happen to know, on the testimony of another, that Dr. J. C. Stewart, who has had practical training as a banker, undertook the work of treasurer at a salary of fifty dollars a month, for two months and a half, when he found that it demanded entirely too much of his time and care, and gave it up. He received for this service, the sum of $125, of which he returned $100 to the Church as an offering for Foreign Missions. And then we turn to the church from which our congressional brother hails, and we find that the whole church, including himself, gave $40 to Foreign Missions last year, and we venture to add that if he gave $100 out of his $5,000 a year as Congressman, it is the first instance on record where mobility of mouth was joined to a looseness of purse-strings for a good cause. For the cause of Publication, this brother's church of 127 members, including himself and his absorbing interest in the welfare of the Publication Cause, gave last year the munificent sum of $3.00.

He had heard of "complaints of the lack of business methods on the part of the committee." Of course a committee should have been mighty careful; what became of the Congressman's part of that three dollars. So let us see if the complaint was justified.

The committee found itself in possession, this year, of a house in the down-town, wholesale section of the city, built of burned brick with cheap labor just after the war. The house could not have been repaired for $100,000, in order to receive the proper income from it, for less than $12,000. It was feared that it would not stand any remodeling at all. So it was sold for $64,000 and the real estate agents here in Richmond say it brought a fine price. The bank which purchased it had to tear it down before building anew.

A building near by was rented for $500 a year, situated on a side street, but where more business has actually been done than in the old building, since it was there conducted in the second story. A splendid lot was purchased on Sixth Street, between Grace Street and Broadway, for $25,000. Thirty feet were sold off this lot to a large department store, for $5,500. An elegant brick mansion on Grace Street, will rent for $700 or $800 a year, or can be sold for $15,000. This will leave room for a $25,000 Publication Building, worthy of Southern Presbyterianism, which will be erected in the best part of the city for such a business, with the residence part and the retail business part of the city surrounding it. And with the sale and the proposed sale of the parts of the original lot mentioned, the lot for the building will have cost about $5,000. I have been over the whole situation as to the locations and am familiar enough with Richmond to know whereof I affirm.

Ten thousand dollars was set aside out of the sale of the old building as capital for the publishing business. Mr. Magill, who has gotten a wonderful grasp of the business part of the publication work, thinks that not a cent of it will be needed, as not a cent of it has been touched.

The committee this year, with Dr. Phillips making the plans, saved $5,000 by the business-like method of letting out the work to be done by contract and agreeing to give it to the lowest bidder, which happened to be Whittet and Shepperson, with whom the old contract had been standing for twenty-five years. A large part of the old accounts due, some $10,000 worth, have been collected this year. The collections for the cause have really increased $2,500. And the work this year is in the most prosperous condition in its history along all lines. The sales of books have increased from $30,000 to $43,000 while the collections on former accounts have increased $10,000. The Sunday-school collection in October went from $1,439 last year to $3,802, this year. And the committee will tell anyone that the large part of the increase is due to the infusion of new life by Dr. Phillips.

And the Texas brother was highly indignant because the Committee paid Dr. Phillips the Secretary's salary, for doing the Secretary's work, in addition to travelling 19,000 miles, visiting Synods, Presbyteries, Churches, Institutes, Conferences and what not, conducting the work of the Sunday-school missionaries and making himself generally useful about the house. That Texas Presbytery sent two anti-salary men to this Assembly, the other being the minister who brought up the old objection to the salary of the Foreign Mission Secretary.

We believe that the Publication Work of the Southern Church is just on the eve of an enlargement that will be astonishing. At the same time it is on the solid basis of being a self-sustaining work. Up to the limit of the size of our constituency, the more it enlarges, the more it can be enlarged. It has such men on the committee, as Judge Wellford and Mr. M. M. Gilliam, who have been with the committee ever since its reorganization after the Baird trouble, and who are two of the best known lawyers in Richmond; Mr. George Bryan, another lawyer representing large corporate interests; Mr. J. G. Tinsley, one of the organizers of the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, and Mr. J. S. Munce, one of the best business men in this city. And these men all give their valuable time to the work as do the ministerial members, such as Dr. Stewart, Dr. Smith, Dr. Rosebro, Dr. Winn, Dr.

Witherspoon, Dr. Cecil, Dr. Strickler. It is simply preposterous to suppose that a committee of the Assembly, in three or four days, interspersed with receptions and excursions, can learn as much about the affairs of the Church as the Executive Committee knows after months and years of hard work and constant observation and experience.

And the worst thing about the whole business is that the committee appointed by this Assembly did not seem to want the knowledge that it might have obtained. It listened to "complaints" and rumors, and did not ask before it the two men who could have given them the fullest information, Dr. Phillips and Mr. Magill. Dr. Smith almost invited himself before the Committee but was asked no important questions. And the objections which the Georgia politician and the Texas brother made in the Assembly they had already made and the objections had been answered in the committee itself, a majority of whom were against them.

The Southern Church is getting too big and its interests too important for it to be subjected to such irresponsible criticism of those interests. It is enough to make any business man weary to listen to the haggling over a little larger expense account when there is evidence of a correspondingly larger income. The one cannot come without the other. And the brains that can direct the work of others and accomplish results worth procuring are valuable in the markets of the world. The Northern Church knows about the work that Phillips has done if the Southern Church does not.

Well, Dr. Phillips feels hurt at the implied and also the rudely expressed lack of confidence in him. We are liable to lose him unless he can be re-assured of the Church's confidence again. We can speak for the Synod of North Carolina right now, and say that the overture from that Synod not to take Dr. Phillips out of the Sunday-school work was passed by the Synod out of the high regard it had for him in the capacity of Sunday-school man, and the regard it felt for the great work. We said at the time that a mistake had been made and that it would have been better for the Synod to allow the Assembly to attend to its own business. But this overture was used against the plan of making the Sunday-school man the Secretary of the whole work, in which position he would have been better able to direct the Sunday-school work itself, as we think, than in the subordinate place.

Fortunately for the cause, Mr. Magill is a most admirable selection. There is a perfect understanding between himself and Dr. Phillips. In fact he was elected on account of the clear business-like statement that he made to the Assembly, after the Assembly had decided to divide the two departments. And it should be remembered also, that Dr. Phillips was magnanimous enough to refuse the offer of a co-ordinate secretaryship, after the Assembly began to repent of what it had done, because he knew that the work needed one head. Perhaps there are others who can reassure Dr. Phillips as to the confidence that the Church has in his work.

We have told the members of the committee that there is nothing to be done except to accept the will of the Assembly and work out the plans as best can be done under the new conditions. We have thought that the committee also was entitled to a vindication of its work and its wisdom, before the Church.

And the Church ought to recognize that something of trust and confidence is due its committees and its secretaries. We talk about the excellence of our Southern Presbyterian Committees as compared with the Northern Presbyterian Boards. We believe that the distinction between a Committee and a Board is one of the "distinctive principles" of the Southern Church. Well, it will be easy to recognize that the Board also has its advantages, if the Presbyteries keep sending to the Assemblies and the Assemblies will tolerate ignorant meddlers with what they cannot understand and conscientious vandals who delight to tear down what it has cost time and brains to build up. ## The Friendship of Christ.

Robert Louis Stevenson says: "The dearest friends are the auldest friends; the young are just on trial." A friend must be tried and proved before we can take him into our life and give him our fullest confidence. We often hear persons in some sore trouble say, "I never knew I had so many friends until my trouble came." We can learn friendship's holiest and best only in time of need.

Human friendships oft-times fail for years to realize their richest possibilities, because there has been nothing to test their faithfulness or bring out their best. All this while they are only surface friendships, sincere and true, but not deep. Then some experience comes which demands the utmost which friendship can do in the way of service and sacrifice. The ordeal is past, the test has been made, friendship has not failed; it has kept nothing back in the time of need. And now the friendship grows to its holiest and best. It is no longer a mere surface attachment; heart has become knit to heart, life and life have blended in one.

It is thus also with the friendship of Christ. Many Christians go on for years with only a surface attachment for him. It is no fault of theirs, perhaps. There has been nothing in their life to compel them into closer relation with Christ. They believe in him as their Saviour, they take his promises and lean on them, they accept his commandments as the law of their life and obey them; but they have never learned to know Christ as their personal friend. By and by something happens which compels them to trust him in the darkness—to trust everything to him. In the deep need, the sore stress, or the great sorrow, when the friendship of Christ is put to the proof, it does not fail. After that Christ means more to the heart than he ever meant before. He becomes a friend as well as a Saviour. His love flows about them and fills their heart. They have really found Christ anew—have found a new Christ.

We dread the hard things in life—the burdens, the crosses, the responsibilities, the loss of earthly good, the pinching times, the struggles, the sorrows; but really, if we are Christians, these are life's best things, because they become revealers of spiritual blessing. The beatitudes illustrate this. "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst;" "Blessed are they that mourn;" "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you, falsely, for my sake." The world would never write a beatitude for such experiences as these. It puts these experiences down among the misfortunes of life. What is the Christian secret of blessing in these ways? It is not that tears and hunger and reviling are good in themselves, but that they bring us to points in life where we find spiritual food. As night reveals the stars, so do these experiences reveal the divine meanings of the words of Scripture; and, as through our necessities we discover the golden qualities of our human friendships, so through the sterner and harder things of life we find the richest blessings of the friendship of Christ.—Dr. J. R. Miller, in "The Joy of Service."

Friendship is power and riches all to me;
Friendship's another element of life;
Water and fire not of more general use,
To the support and comfort of the world,
Than friendship to the being of my joy;
I would do everything to serve a friend.

Let us no more yearn for present employment when God's providence bids us "be still," than we would think it good to yearn after cessation while God bids us work. Shall we not miss a blessing if we call rest a weariness and a discontent, no less than if we called God's work a thankless labor? If we would be holy in body and spirit, shall we not keep smooth brow, light heart, whether He bids us serve His table, or wait our summons? Edward White Benson.

Emancipation of Mohammedan Women.

A new book has been written by Kasem Ameen, a learned Mussulman jurist, which is described as nothing less than "epoch-making." The author makes a strong unprecedented plea for the emancipation of the Mohammedan woman, who is still considered a mere chattel. Speaking of her present relation to man the author says:

"Man is the absolute master and woman the slave. She is the object of his sensual pleasures, a toy, as it were, with which he plays, whenever and however he pleases. Knowledge is his, ignorance is hers. The firmament and the light are his, darkness and the dungeon are hers. His is to command, hers is to blindly obey. His is everything that is, and she is an insignificant part of that everything."

Ameen's panacea for the evils of the present condition is education. "The girl," he says, "must attend school if we are to have capable, conscientious and enlightened mothers." Hence the necessity of breaking through the barriers of seclusion and abolishing gradually the use of the veil. These customs, he contends, are not even conducive to domestic happiness:

"Ask those that are married if they are loved by their wives, and they will answer in the affirmative. The truth, however, is the reverse. I have personally investigated the conditions of a number of families that are supposed to be living in harmony, peace, and love, and I have not found one husband who truly loved his wife, or one wife who evinced a sincere affection for her husband. This outward appearance of peace and harmony—this thin veneering—only means one of three things, namely, either the husband is made callous and nonchalant by incessant strife, and has finally determined to let things take their course: or the wife allows herself to be utilized as an ordinary chattel, without uttering a protest; or both parties are ignorant and do not appreciate the true value of life. In this last case, the parties are nearer to a sort of happiness than in the former two, altho' their happiness is negative in quality and evanescent in nature."

The condition of woman being so degraded, it follows that the children must be wanting in good culture and right breeding. The ignorance of the mother produces the mentally deformed child—the demoralized man. It is to this ignorance that the writer ascribes the humiliating and degrading condition of the Egyptians. He asks:

"Is it not the result of such conditions that we are all victims of moral paralysis? We are never moved by anything, however repulsive or attractive it may be. If we see a beautiful object, we praise it under our breath, and if we witness a foul deed we disapprove of it with a shake of the head, without being inwardly moved to admire the former and denounce the latter. . . . We have such a low opinion of woman that when we want to denounce a man for his rascality we say: 'He is brought up by a woman.'"

Kasem Ameen's remarkable book is the subject of spirited discussion in Mohammedan circles. Its teaching is vigorously opposed by the conservatives; but the radical element, composed largely of young Mohammedans who have been educated in Europe, is in sympathy with the reforms advocated.—Translation made for The Literary Digest.

"Open the door, let in the air;
The winds are sweet and the flowers are fair;
Joy is abroad in the world to-day;
If our door is wide, it may come this way—
Open the door!"

"Open the door of the soul, let in Strong, pure thoughts which shall banish sin;
They will glow and bloom with a grace divine,
And their fruit shall be sweeter than that of the vine—
Open the door!"

Closing thought: Paul's career not beyond reproduction.

It is relatively easy to run over the leading incidents of this quarter's work; they are closely connected. The voyage to Jerusalem, with its many forebodings, presaged the unreasoning attack upon Paul and the implacable hostility which made the home of his early days the one place where he could no longer live. This enmity compelled his arrest and caused his detention, and finally occasioned his appeal to Caesar. His manful insistence on his rights caused the voyage to Rome and his detention there until the imperial tribunal should adjudge his case.—Frank K. Sanders.

Young People Training for Public Life.

Gen. 41:38-42; Acts 7:35, 36; Dan. 6:1-4. Topic for July 5.

At no time in history more than now were strong, well-equipped men needed for taking charge of the public affairs. As one scans the columns of the secular papers the fact stands out in most appalling distinctness that the honest men and the good men are not always in power.

Every day new cases are narrated of men who have gone wrong when put in public places. It is not hard to find men who will act honestly when every act is open to the gaze of the public. The temptation comes when a man gets into a place of power and has the opportunity for doing wrong without anyone else being the wiser. Many times we are surprised to find, when a man goes wrong in public life, that he has been able to cover up his crookedness so long. But the very fact that he knew that his acts could be covered up was the first thing which tempted him to do wrong.

The question which should engage us therefore is, "Can a life be so moulded that opportunity for corruption will be no temptation?"

To this question we may give an emphatic, "Yes." In the three instances which are mentioned in the passages of Scripture referred to above, we have examples of men who had characters so formed that nothing that could offer itself could make them swerve from the line of righteousness. In Joseph, Moses and Daniel we have samples of men in high places who lived so blamelessly before their fellowmen that they have forever proved that it is possible in public life to follow a high standard of uprightness.

In these three men we see a principle as the basis of their lives. This principle is best understood by the statement which is made concerning Daniel, but which is just as true concerning the others: "Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself." This steadfastness of purpose was not the resolution of a moment, but the working out of a principle. It had been there a long time before the crises of their lives came, otherwise they would never have passed the crises successfully.

It is therefore very essential that in the lives of our young people there be this fixity of purpose to follow the path of righteousness or when the testing-time comes they will not be able to stand firm. Nor can these firm purposes be made too soon.

That they may be made, there must be a groundwork of truth instilled by the teaching and examples of their elders. It is interesting to note too, that in the case of Moses this indoctrinating with truth must have taken place while he was very young, for it is not probable that the daughter of Pharaoh left him with his mother more than a few years at most. These firm purposes can be formed in early childhood and adhered to through life, but not in one's own strength.

This leads us then to the second element that is absolutely necessary in order that our young people may be in training for public life, and that is a constant, firm reliance upon God. It is this alone which makes it possible to carry out the fixed purpose to do right.

And just here is where so many go down before temptation. Not all of those who make shipwreck of their own lives and of the affairs which are intrusted to them, start with any intention of doing wrong. They no doubt resolve to do right. But alas! Poor mortal flesh is at its best weak, and in time the well-meaning public citizen gives way to the policy which the mammon of this world dictates, and ruin is the result.

The time is upon us when we must have the state's best citizens in the places of trust, and the state's best citizens are those with a firm purpose to do right, backed with as firm a reliance upon God for strength,

A Bible Study of the Two Obstacles between Man and Heaven. Part II. The Moral Obstacle.

Rev. S. S. Laws, D. D., LL. D.

(Owing to the pressure of Presbyterian and Assembly Reports, Dr. Laws' Bible Study was discontinued for a few weeks, but it will now be carried forward to its completion.)

It should be stated, however, that whilst the accepted comment of Calvin, as qualified, is viewed as legitimately warranting the inference in support of the Saviour's utterance, yet Calvin nowhere explicitly recognizes the universal salvation of those dying in infancy. Perhaps because of not seeing or recognizing the age limits given above. In this comment we can see, however, that he builded better than he at the time knew, as many another honest and earnest inquirer for truth has done. Every man is entitled to the benefit of his inconsistency. (Appendix b, p. 74.)

This case of infants as thus given in the gospels does not stand alone.

Alongside of this New Testament case, thus somewhat logically formulated and validly sustaining a genuine presumption, should be placed the cumulative evidence of the classic Old Testament case of infant salvation. The narrative is in the xi and xii chapters of 2d Samuel. This son of David died when only seven days old, and hence uncircumcised. When on the death of the child the king's manner changed from mourning to cheerfulness, his servants were so surprised that he explained to them and said: "While the child was yet alive I fasted and wept, for I said, who knows whether Jehovah will not be gracious to me, that the child may live? But now he is dead, wherefore should I fast? Can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he will not return to me" (xii:22-23). We learn from Psalms, undoubtedly Davidic, that it was in the immediate presence of God in Heaven that he expected to meet that child. This case teaches several important truths: 1, the immortality of infants; 2, the salvation of infants; 3, heavenly recognition; and, 4, salvation without church ceremonial. Yes, David expected to meet and know that child when he should behold the face of Jehovah in righteousness. 5. Moreover, it explodes the infidel perversion of the old Hebrew faith as ignorant of a future life. The Saviour brushed away that perversion when he reminded the Sadducees of the interview of God with Moses at the bush, in which he avowed himself the God of the living Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob hundreds of years after their earthly death. David certainly knew and held this doctrine of immortality, which furnished the setting for his cheering hope of meeting loved ones in the hereafter.

A valid collateral support of the case just given of David's son, as having an important bearing on the belief in the universal salvation of all infants dying in infancy, is derived from the application of the logical canon of Professor Jevons, viz., "That what is true of one thing will be true of any other thing, on the condition of there being an exact resemblance between them in all material circumstances." He reduces all reasoning to this single type. In the case before us the truth is that, as to their salvation, in all material particulars the resemblance of all infants dying in infancy is conclusively exact. If, then, the salvation of a single infant be conceded, whether that of Bathsheba's child or some other, that supplies the nucleus around which the material, as distinguished from conventional or arbitrary, resemblances may cluster in support of the universal salvation of infants. Such a case seems to render pertinent the proverb Ex uno disces omnia. The notion that the Abrahamic covenant or promise effectively determined the salvation of this or any other particular infant or adult is alien to the record.

In refuting the reason alleged in support of irregular practices in the administration of infant baptism, Calvin says: "But it is alleged there is danger lest a child who is sick and dies without baptism should be deprived of the grace of regeneration. This I can by no means admit." He denies that the grace of God is more restricted now than of old, when it was "sufficiently efficacious to insure salvation before the eighth day" (B., 4, 15, 20, and 22).

At the final judgment the record is explicit. The criterion of works is alone recognized as the rule of judgment. The dead were judged out of the things which were written in the books, according to their works. Infants have no works to precede nor to follow for condemnation or reward. There emerges a distinction between the primal judgment on our race for disobedience and the final judgment. The primal judgment on account of Adam's sin was universal, but there was deliverance from it through Christ; hence the final condemnation will be on account of each one's own original and actual sin, unforgiven, and take effect consequently on only a part of the race, but from it there will be no deliverance. The one work which will favorably or fatally determine man's destiny at the final judgment, and for which infants are not accountable, is indicated in the Saviour's answer to the multitude who followed him to Capernaum from the miracle of feeding the five thousand. "They said, therefore, unto him, What must we do that we may work the works of God? Jesus answered and said unto them, This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent."

The exemption of infants from final condemnation, however, is certainly not due merely to the absence of sinful works or practices such as may lie to the charge of adults. Edwards speaks of "the method of God's judgment by which the final state of the wicked men is determined," and answers that "each one is dealt with according to his own wicked heart or sinful nature and practice." Original sin, unpardoned and unwashed away, undoubtedly goes forward to the judgment day, and associated with it are the actual transgressions which in each case have proceeded from it. Chalmers recognizes it as the common doctrine, "not merely that all men are to blame for the sins they personally commit under the instigation of an evil nature transmitted by Adam, but that they are also to blame for the proper individual act of transgression done by Adam himself in the Garden of Eden." But it must not be forgotten that this act was a federal and not a private act, and that all represented incurred its guilt. May it not be said that every actual transgressor is accessory after the fact to Adam's first sin?

The one work of God that delivers adults is, as we have learned from Christ, the believing on him as the one sent of God. But the acquittal of infants will be on account of their regeneration by the Holy Spirit and cleansing from original sin and the pardon of inherited guilt on account of the imputed righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ. This establishes them fully and finally in the company of the redeemed and elect of God.

The venerable Doctor Miller was accustomed to say to the students at Princeton, when asked if all infants are saved that die in infancy, that we have a comfortable hope. Do not the considerations submitted touching Bible facts and teaching, without pursuing the matter further, warrant us in entertaining a comfortable faith in the universal salvation of infants dying in infancy?

If his doctrine be true, and as a matter of fact the enlightened and undeceived heart and intelligence of God's people hold it sacredly true, then the citizenship of Heaven will consist chiefly of those redeemed from the ranks of infancy, and not of believing adults. It is the most wonderful exhibition of sovereign grace.

Rusticus on the General Assembly.

dear Brother:

As it has been many years since I was a member of the General Assembly, it was with some misgivings that I learned that I had been chosen to represent my Presbytery at the Assembly of 1903. Having led a retired life at the Cross Roads, far from the "madding crowd," the issues before the Church were all new to me, and many of them were almost inexplicable. However, the old woman insisted that I needed to rub up against men, to overcome my tendency to mossbacking. So in due time, after being rigged up by the village tailor, I emerged from my retirement and joined the Assembly caravan on its way to Lexington. At Lynchburg we found a goodly array of members already on the C. and O. train waiting for us, among whom I met friends of years gone by, male and female.

The nature-loving editor of the Central Presbyterian is there, and as we wound along the banks of the James river he actually forgot dried leaves and grasses in his view of misty beauty, such as foamy cascades and the placid expanse of transparent water. From the time we reached Lexington till we left, nothing could exceed the hospitality shown.

Homes were opened as well as hearts, and few members were placed at hotels, that modern form of entertaining angels unawares. Of my own home while here, I am afraid to speak, for what would be the sincere expression of my heart might seem to others fulsome praise.

It was in the home of an old friend, whose children had known as infants, and whose paternal pride is now justified in having one of the dearest groups of boys and girls I have ever met.

As the father of three boys whose future fills me at times with anxious forebodings, I stand with reverence before parents who have fought the good fight, and who can say, "Behold I and the children which God hath given me."

Besides the members of the Assembly, there were visitors in great numbers, and their presence added much to our pleasure, because as we grow old and love to live in the past, the sight of old friends brings back that past with a vividness such as nothing else can.

Ruff was there, looking like a priest, "all shaven and horn"; Fleming, the old Latin phrase, "in statu quo" personified and clothed in flesh and blood; Buck Laird, with the same florid look, but with his hair dashed with grey with a bare expanse on top. Frank Brooke was largely present, armed fully with the spirituality of the Church, on a still hunt for Roosevelt, with Whaling and Morris in hiding; "Old Gal Wilson," bronzed by the sun and bent by time, but otherwise the same big-hearted fellow, as when we graduated together in the seventies; Prof. Hoge, or Hogue, as he now puts it, looking only a little older than when as "Buck Addie" he blushing walked between the double rows of boys on his way to his recitation room.

But time would fail me to tell of others. I can only mention dear Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Peck, who did so much for the pleasure of us all in those old days, and whose pleasure we all would so gladly contribute now, if we only knew how.

Both of them live again in their daughters, and thus perpetuate their influence and their blessing.

But to turn from friends to the Assembly, the opening sermon was worthy of the preacher, our old friend Dr. Hall, and it sounded like a bugle blast, to quote a favorite expression of Pierson, in this age of cavilling and doubt.

The election of Moderator is always an interesting study to me.

Six men were nominated in speeches that remind me of what Byron said about a woman or an epitaph—though in fact it was truth unduly exaggerated. Men never know how great they are, till they are nominated, and I would like to be nominated for that reason, though I must confess that the looks of the corpse during the obsequies when the panegyric is being pronounced, does not indicate a very high degree of enjoyment.

Dr. Hopkins, our old friend, was finally elected, though many of us felt that we could be happy with either, if 'tother were away.

When the secretaries appeared before the foot-lights to perform their annual stunts, it was found that the printed reports in two instances were conspicuous by their absence. One was delayed by a printers' strike, but whether they struck on account of its dryness, I did not hear. Another was actually stolen, en masse, en route, and over the Assembly there spread a smile of grim satisfaction when they realized that lex talionis would get in its work, and that the poor fellow before he had read half through, would conclude that honesty was the best policy, and would return it.

Their unerring judgment was vindicated, when later in the day the missing package was returned. It is left to the imagination to decide whether the thief took his own life, or died from the effect of "information on the brain." The speaking members numbered three, all young, all persistent, and all long-continued.

When one prefaced his remarks by saying, "I do not intend to speak much," I was reminded of Sheppard's answer, when some one asked him if the natives in Africa stole much. "No sir," he said, "they do not steal much, but they steal often."

Once two of them were on the floor, exchanging remarks, while a long-suffering Assembly sat between them, and as they ground out their grist, it was like being between the upper and nether mill-stone.

The Moderator suffered the most, for others could walk out when the torture became too great, but he had to face the music.

It was amusing to see his parliamentary attempts to check the flow of words. Once he admonished the young brother to stick to the subject, when he should have said, "stick to your seat."

However, all things have an end, and this perpetual speaking eventually did, though it was only when the Assembly ended, and the members dispersed.

Though I have been long absent from public gatherings, I find that there is little new in the way of illustration. There are two occasions when I can always tell what figure of speech will be used.

Few men when addressing an audience of young ladies can resist the temptation to speak of the time in their lives when they addressed one.

Then whenever union between churches is proposed, who can refrain from bringing out that ancient chestnut of courtship?

Ordinarily I would not have been surprised at the usual appearance of this piece of humor when union with the Reformed Church was mentioned, but when it was introduced by an Ex-Moderator, and that too with the pride of original possession, it was a bit beyond me.

When I mention that it was received with laughter, no one must henceforth say that Americans are lacking in reverence for rulers.

The flood of overtures this year was beyond all former experience. They were on every subject, and some of them did not speak much for the wisdom of Presbyteries.

Some of the questions asked were such as any pastor could answer, and therefore they should never have been sent to take the valuable time of the Committee on Bills and Overtures. Again some of the criticisms of the Records of Synods were hyper-critical. For example, valuable time was consumed in discussing the criticism that Missouri Synod had acted in an unconstitutional manner in raising a fund for meeting the travelling expenses of delegates, it being argued that the Book of Order required individual Churches to pay the expenses of their representatives.

There was a Foreign Missionary meeting with a variegated programme. There were excellent and thrilling addresses by our returned missionaries, yet through them all there ran a vein of complaint, such as missionary addresses generally have.

This is natural, when one thinks over it. These men live isolated lives, with hearts wrapped up in the interests of their peculiar field, to such an extent that they forget that there are other fields.

They are bound to magnify the importance of their work and field, and to think that the committee has not done full justice to them, forgetting that the committee has to look, not at one, but at all—and to divide the money proportionately among them all.

Then again, when a missionary decries the movement for Christian Education, on the ground that money is needed for foreign work, he forgets that this very movement for Christian schools is for the ultimate benefit of the foreign work.

The first part of the missionary programme came at night, and consisted of stereopticon views of Japan with an accompanying lecture by Rev. J. W. Moore. So far it was excellent and very impressive, and if the manager in charge of the instrument had let good enough alone, the Assembly would have been spared the audible protest that broke the darkened silence of the crowded church.

The room was dark, and upon the wall the successive Japanese views had passed, when there was thrown upon the wall a picture of the Rock of Ages. It represented a female dressed in a garment, as variegated as Joseph's coat, or a barbershop pole,—clinging to a stone cross rising in a raging sea.

Leaving out the coloring, the idea of the picture is confusing. It is true that the hymn says, "Simply to thy cross I cling," and so far the picture is expressive, but when it further says, "Cleft for me," and the artist tries to embody this idea also in the picture he confuses the idea, for a cleft rock in a raging sea, as shown in the picture, affords no protection to a sinking maiden.

I am no judge of art, it is true, and I speak with reverence, but common sense is bound to reject such pictures as we have in these views.

There were to have been four pictures in this scene, and each one was to change into the other, by some process of artistic evolution. The stone cross had changed into the stone cross with the clinging maiden having reached a place of safety. This was to have changed into another picture having also another maid floating around in the stormy sea, to be changed into the last view, in which she was to have been rescued.

But alas for human plans—for just then, there rang out the indignant words, "As a Presbyterian minister I protest against such pictures," and the show stopped. The poor maid is still a-floating; the frightened operator beat a hasty retreat; "and subsequent proceedings interested him no more."

The Publication Committee also was on a sea of trouble.

Many were the charges, wise and otherwise, brought against their conduct of the business by men who relied more upon rumors than evidence.

But then the extreme anti-ritualists sharpened their knives and began to read the Earnest Worker, to show that Easter observance was taught and careless interpretations of Scripture promulgated, it looked as if the jig were up.

The chairman of the committee, however, explained some charges and confessed judgment on others, and thus calmed the storm.

Our brother Phillips, as acting Secretary of Publication, was frequently mentioned in the debate, and when one read from the Earnest Worker that the Evangelist Phillip's daughter preached, one dreamy brother thought that a new charge had been brought against the Secretary, and that his daughters were preaching.

You and I were trained under Dr. Peck to look upon Committees in the sense that Thornwell advocated them, as servants of the Church, and creatures of each Assembly.

It was generally commented upon at this Assembly that Committees were fast becoming Boards in their exercise of power and their impatience of criticism.

When officers resign or die, they put men into the position, and then take it as a reflection upon them, if the Assembly refuses to endorse their action.

Then it was frequently noticed that whenever our committee was attacked, the members of other committees rallied to its support.

I say this in no bitter spirit. I value highly the self-sacrificing labors of our committees, and I have confidence in their wisdom on most of the questions coming before them, yet it would be better for their work if they would invite criticism rather than resent it. The usual attack was made upon the salaries paid our Secretaries, and as usual the Assembly indignantly rejected all propositions to reduce.

The manner in which these attacks are made is unfortunate, and many of the charges insinuated are offensive, yet these annual or biennial attacks are expressions of popular discontent. It is true that they are exaggerated, and that they fail, yet it is a symptom of what people in small congregations are thinking and saying. After seeing the several attacks on the Secretaries I am convinced that Job would have changed his famous wish, and would have said "Behold my desire is that mine adversary would be a Secretary."

I have tried to give you a pen-picture of our proceedings, yet I have left out many actions, the wisdom of which time will prove.

Lexington surpassed herself, and the pastor proved himself a host of great tact, kind consideration and infinite patience, barring the discussion of the elect infant.

I shall retire to the classic shades of my own home, with only pleasant memories of the Assembly of '03.

Yours,

Rusticus.

North Carolina's Strategic Point.

Dear Standard:

Methodism has its "valley of the Nile" in Trinity College, the Baptists in Wake Forest, the Episcopalians in the University of the South and we in Davidson. Each are doing a great work and there is a vast field for each. But to the Church the world is the field and we should wake up to this and go forward, by occupying and fortifying the strongest strategic points and then on down to the lesser places, "Beginning at Jerusalem."

I hold that Chapel Hill is the best point for mission work in the destitute counties of North Carolina to-day and the Presbyterian Church there has been without a pastor at least six months—our young men almost an entire school year without a pastor. Over one hundred Presbyterian boys without their pilot at a time when he is most needed, at a time when they are filling their minds with material facts, and their hearts adrift so far as the Presbyterian Church is concerned. Materialism, Rationalism and every other ism will come from education of the head and not of the heart. The other churches are doing well what they can, but they cannot do our work: there is work for all and we must do ours; at the same time let us doff our caps to them for guarding the walls, while our sheep were unprotected in the fold, and "some were wee lambs at that."

"Well, what must we do." The Church there must do what they can, and Synod must do the rest. Orange Presbytery her share and her share only. These young men are only one battallion of an army of perpetual transients sent to Orange Presbytery for a few years, when they return to their own Presbyteries and are replaced by others from all over the Synod. Chapel Hill is a State school, supported by the entire State, and in an ecclesiastical sense our Church there is a Synod's Church and should be supported by the entire Synod. As well might the rest of North Carolina ask Orange county to support the entire Faculty at Chapel Hill for the benefit of the rest of the counties as for Orange Presbytery to support the Church there for the benefit of the boys there from the other Presbyteries. One hundred Presbyterian boys there without a pastor. What should we do? Synod should supplement the contribution of Chapel Hill Church and make the salary two thousand dollars, put one of our strongest men in every respect there and occupy the best missionary held in North Carolina at present unoccupied so far as our Church is concerned, and open up another feeder for our Theological Seminaries there, to help supply Southern Presbyterian ministers for our Churches, North, South, East and West, and on the Islands of the seas, and at the same time only do our duty, that's all.

The Southern Presbyterian minister, as the Southern Presbyterian Laymen, can be relied upon for orthodoxy and want of ism and schism. Do we need such men? Does the world need them? "Let Synod answer by its action."

"The Mill Problem."

The industrial changes in the South in the last few decades have brought our Southern Church face to face with a problem which demands a prompt solution.

Within these few decades the South—or at least a large and important part of it—has been changing from an agricultural into a manufacturing section. The people have been leaving the country and flocking to the towns, and a large portion of them become connected with the rapidly growing cotton mill industry.

For more than a hundred years the Presbyterian Church has had its strength in the prosperous agricultural communities of the South, and among the professional and business classes in the towns. In the exodus from the country the town churches have been built up, but an investigation will show that they have not been built up by transfers from the country churches in proportion to the losses which these churches have sustained—in fact, if not always in name. (It is an alarming fact that the "non-resident" rolls of some of our churches are painfully long.) There has been a leakage somewhere, and it requires no special acuteness of vision to see that the loss has been in the manufacturing towns. All through the mill population of the South there are descendants of many generations of Presbyterian ancestors. A part of our problem lies in the fact that if we do not give spiritual care to the mill people, we are "not providing for our own." If it should ever come to a question of relative importance, is it more important to keep open the buildings which have been deserted, or to preach the Gospel to the children of those who once worshipped there? In our Master's work, shall sacred memories count for more than living men? Then it needs no prophetic vision to see that the wealthy men of the South will, in the future, be the manufacturers; or that a large number of the most successful of these will rise from the masses of the mill workers—carrying with them whatever form of religious belief or unbelief they have acquired in the surroundings where their work began. If the mass of the mill population be left without Christian influences, the mass of the wealth in the South of the future will be in unchristian hands; and whatever Church reaches them now will certainly wield in the future the power of consecrated wealth. The Church which neglects them in the day of their poverty cannot hope to win them in the day of their power.

So the "mill problem" for our Church has in it not only the plain duty, as a branch of Christ's Church, of preaching the Gospel to a large class of our people, but also the fixing of the conditions which will in the future either contract or expand the Church itself in members and in means.

For years I have seen the facts—as all thinking men must see them. I saw, too, that very little was being done; and that, worse still, there was a disposition to give up the work—or rather not undertake it at all—as a hopeless task. Troubled by the situation, I determined to find out myself whether or not it were true that the Presbyterian Church must stand idle and helpless in the presence of such a work. What I have to say on this subject is based upon a little more than two years of personal experience among the cotton mill people. This writing for publication about work in which I have had a part is repugnant to me; but experience, not theory, is what we need—and I know of no way of presenting what I feel that the Church is entitled to know, except by giving the facts about the work as I have come into personal contact with it. Let it be understood then, if you please, that this is written not because I want to do it, but because I feel it to be a duty resting upon me—and that the numerous I's are the I's of experience, and not of egotism.

I may as well confess in the beginning that I flagrantly violated what I regard as one of the first laws of ministerial propriety, by seeking the place instead of letting it seek me. It might be added that there were not so many rivals in the wooing as there are said to be on some occasions. Moreover, I was told that in taking up this work I was wasting some talents which my more partial friends credited me with possessing; and I was also informed that I was not the sort of man anyway to succeed either as preacher or as pastor in this sort of work—that I would "preach over the heads of the people," and would not be able to mingle easily with the masses. This statement is made to show that whatever measure of success is to be recorded is not to be credited to any special aptitude for the work on my part; but that something, at least, can be done under circumstances not altogether favorable.

Another thing that seems to be against the success of our work in this particular field, is the fact that the managers and principal owners of the cotton mills use their means and influence entirely in the interest of a church of a sister denomination. We cannot expect to have a salaried officer of the mills connected with the Presbyterian Church. There is even the impression among some of the mill people—doubtless without foundation in fact, but nevertheless exerting its influence—that a member of the Presbyterian Church cannot hold any position in the mills securely.

These two disadvantages were offset by one very great advantage in the willingness of the mother Church—the Concord First—to do its duty in the matter of financial support and personal work.

Under these conditions, I became the first pastor of McKinnon Church in February, 1901. The Church had been organized in May, 1900, after about 18 years of chapel work by the Concord First Church; and at the time when my connection with it began, there were 72 members on the roll. Confining myself to what has taken place since my pastorate began, I shall try to answer the more important questions and objections which I have heard in connection with the "mill problem."

1. The first and most important question is, Can the Presbyterian Church reach the cotton mill people and organize them into a Church?

Let the facts answer. In the two years and four months of my pastorate we have received 169 members into the Church, and have now an enrollment of 226—all of them working people, and nearly all of them cotton mill people. Our Sunday school enrollment is 598. We have a Ladies' Missionary Society with 57 members. Our prayer-meeting attendance ranges from 40 to 100; and the average attendance at the preaching services is considerably larger than the membership of the Church.

2. Will the mill churches, if established, become self-supporting? From April 1, 1901, to March 31, 1902, the average contribution per member was nearly $9.00—including the amount paid on the fund for the new church building which was erected that year, with the generous help of the First Church. Last year the average was $5.40, without the building fund. If the present rate of increase continues—and there is nothing to indicate that it will not—the Church can become entirely self-sustaining by the close of the present ecclesiastical year.

3. Does it not require some extraordinary, un-Presbyterian methods to reach the people?

We have not even had a protracted meeting—more than a few days preaching preparatory to communion occasions—since I have been here. There has been nothing but the plain preaching and teaching of the Word. We have found the Sunday-school one of the most effective departments of our Church work, but it ought to be that in every Church. We have carried on reading-room and night-class features, but they are only incidental. Our people are just like other people. Their environment is a little different—that is all. The sort of work required to build up a Church here is essentially the same as that required to build up a Church anywhere.

4. It has been asserted that the country Presbyterian Churches of our county (Cabarras) give peculiar advantages for our work among the cotton mill people in Concord.

Let the facts answer. Of the charter members, not more than half come originally from the country Churches in Cabarras county. Of 169 members received since March 1, 1901, only 17 came from the Presbyterian Churches of the county. Fifteen have been received from the Presbyterian Churches in the town—14 from the First Church, and one from Cannonville; and very few of the 15 came originally from the Presbyterian Churches of this county. Thirty-six came from Presbyterian Churches outside of the county, but only three of this number came from our neighboring Presbyterian county of Mecklenburg; thirty-six were received from other denominations; and the others were received upon profession of faith. The facts will hardly justify the explanation that Concord's mill churches are due to peculiarly favorable local conditions. You can find Presbyterian material in all the mill towns of any size—if you only look for it.

5. It has been a question as to whether the chapel or the organized Church were the better plan for this sort of work.

After about 18 years of faithful chapel work, the First Church colonized 50 members. In less than three years since the Church was organized 194 members have been received—including three who came in directly from other churches at, and just after, the organization.

During the period of chapel work the contributions from the field probably did not average over $25 to $30 per year. Last year the receipts were over $900; more than $290 from the Sunday-school alone. In the chapel days the people expected to have things done for them. Now they are actively engaged in opening up a new field of work. Of the 50 teachers in our schools half came from our own Church—our mother Church furnishing the other half.

Brother, what are we going to do about it? The work is before us. Our duty to the Master and the very preservation of our Church demand that we enter upon it in earnest, and without further delay.

You say it can't be done? Our facts are better than your theories. It has been done—and that without specially favorable local conditions, or special aptitude on the part of those in charge.

You say that they will have to be "carried" indefinitely? The facts show a cotton mill Church, less than three years old, contributing far more liberally than some of our oldest established churches.

If the work is not done, let us be honest enough to say "We will not," rather than "We can not."

Women's Foreign Mission Societies.

A paper read by Mrs. C. H. Wiley at the Annual Meeting of the W. F. M. Union of Orange Presbytery, at Lexington, March 26, 1903.

I have been asked to write of the rise and progress of Women's Foreign Mission Societies in Orange Presbytery, but it has been an almost impossible task because so many societies have failed to keep a definite record. This is greatly to be lamented. Of course there can be progress without positive knowledge of the date of our beginnings, still it is encouraging and stimulating to take our measure from time to time, as the small boy so loves to do, to see how much we have grown!

But too many of our societies cannot say positively how big they were the first time they measured!

We know in a general way that of the earliest Women's Foreign Mission Societies formed in 1873, twenty-six in number, three were in North Carolina, and even before that—as far back as 1825, Dr. Wiley in his sketch of old Alamance Church, records the name of the "Female Benevolent Society," of which his mother was secretary, and these ladies, "by hard labor of the hands, not by means of fairs and festivals, nor by begging, raised five hundred dollars, and among other things educated an Indian boy whom they called David Caldwell."

We know also that in 1830 another "Female Benevolent Society" was formed in Greensboro with twenty-two members. Mrs. Frances Paisley being "Directress," and that during the first year they raised one hundred and seven dollars. This, however, was not wholly for foreign missions.

In 1832 a foreign mission society was formed in Wilmington by Rev. Thomas Hunt, the pastor, of the First Church, but as women had not at that time been encouraged to take part in church work, Mrs. MacRae, who is my authority for this statement, says she thinks it was probably a mixed society.

The next recorded date of a society is that of Chapel Hill, in 1854, with Mrs. Ashe, as President. It was organized by Dr. Mitchell, and while at first its contributions were used for the home needs, it was understood that its ultimate design was for the aid of foreign missions.

Now comes a wide gap in the history of woman's work for missions. We have no information concerning societies between 1854, and 1874. At that time Dr. Houston, who had returned from China for a visit, formed a society at Center Church, Fayetteville Presbytery. This society Mrs. MacRae thinks was one of the first in the state.

We see in this a striking instance of what takes place when the fire of love for souls in heathen lands is kindled.

The Holy Spirit breathes upon it and lo! a mighty blaze results!

As we read the statistical accounts from the various societies, we find that it was after that visit of Dr. Houston to many of the churches of the Southern General Assembly that the leaven of his zeal began to work and the churches began to organize Women's Foreign Mission Societies.

Beginning with the year 1875 we find the organizing as follows:

The Ladies' Foreign Mission Society of the First Church, Winston-Salem, March, 1875, with 17 members. The Ladies Foreign Mission Society of Raleigh First Church, organized September, 1875. The Ladies' Foreign Mission Society of Greensboro First Church, the outgrowth of the old "Female Benevolent Society"—but now regularly a foreign mission organization, was re-organized in 1875 with twenty-six members. This society raised seven hundred and eighty-four dollars in three years. The society at present numbers seventy-three regular members, and may be considered a venerable mother of societies since the "Emma Grey Society" which was organized as the Young Ladies' Society of the same Church, being the outgrowth of the Sunday-school class of Mrs. J. A. Gray, in whose memory its name was changed to the Emma Gray. This society has now a membership of sixty-seven. The society of the Presbyterian Church of Graham was also organized in 1875. This society at present numbers twenty regular members.

The society of Westminster Church, Greensboro, was organized about 1888 with ten or twelve members. During the last ten years interest in Foreign Missions has steadily increased. They are educating two girls in Japan, besides assisting in paying salary of a missionary in the mountains, and clothing a boy at the Orphanage.

The society of Hawfields Church was organized in 1886-87 with Mrs. S. H. Chester as President. "There were a large number of members."

The Ladies' Foreign Mission Society of Burlington, was organized in 1886 or 87 with about twenty members.

The Woman's Foreign Mission Society of the Duram Church was organized in January, 1891. with Mrs. R. D. Blacknall as President with twenty-one names enrolled. The present membership is forty-four. The Foreign Missions Society of the Lexington Church was organized in December, 1889 as the Young Ladies' Missions Society, with fourteen members. It is now called the Ladies' Foreign Mission Society, and has twenty-four members. Twelve of the fourteen charter members are still in the society. The Woman's Foreign Mission Society of Leaksville was organized in 1892, with five or six members, and Mrs. L. H. Walker, President. It has now twelve members.

The Woman's Missionary Society of the Reidsville Church was organized in 1893, with eleven members, and Mrs. J. T. Parmill, President. The number enrolled to-day is twenty-one.

The Ladies' Missionary Society of Mebane was organized in November, 1896 with six members, and Mrs. J. T. Dick as President. There are now twelve members.

The Ladies' Aid and Missions Society of North Wilkesboro Church was organized November, 20, 1893. President, Miss Ella Bouchelle. The present membership is ten or eleven.

The society of the Ashboro Presbyterian Church was organized in 1897, with six members, and Mrs. A. H. Worth acting as President.

The R. L. Wharton Society of the North Winston Chapel was organized in 1901 with Mrs. A. F. Hall President.

Quite a number of the Ladies' Societies failed to report, and therefore this is an imperfect list of the workers. It is proper also to explain that, with the exception of the mention of the Raleigh society, these statistics refer only to Orange Presbytery as it is now.

I will be pardoned for speaking a little more at length of the society of the First Church of Winston-Salem, of which I was first president, and I do it because there is encouragement and inspiration in telling of the labors of this little band which began its life as a sewing society, and with the old-fashioned name: Female Society, and as its constitution reads had as its object, "to raise means for the benefit of the Sabbath-school of said Church, and for Foreign Missions."

None of them were wealthy, and how we sewed, and denied ourselves as doubtless many others have done! In this way we were able to give and the Lord rewarded us, for, though the society was very feeble for a while, in 1877 it was revived, and has renewed its youth, like the eagle, so that now with her daughter, the Wiley Band, and her grand-daughters the D. C. Rankin Society, the E. V. Lee Band of North Winston Chapel, and the Wharton Band, also of the Chapel, the Ladies' Foreign Mission Society of the First Church of Winston-Salem begins to feel quite venerable. She looks back on her early struggles for life, her discouragements and renews her faith in God's promises, and says to those coming after her: "Be of good cheer! Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord!"

So far this sketch has had to do with the growth of the grown people's societies, but the work has not been confined to the women of our Presbytery, and there is probably, more to cheer us in the story of the Children's Bands, than in the former, for is not the material for our future Women's Foreign Mission Societies to be found here? We verily believe that ten, twenty years from now, intelligent and zealous workers will be found in the Woman's Foreign Mission Societies, who will point to the cradle rolls of our Mission Bands, saying: "See there! My name is on that Roll!"

The Wiley Mission Band of Winston-Salem was organized in 1879 and has therefore the honor of being the oldest of all the children's bands within the bounds of Orange Presbytery as it is now. It began with five members, and now numbers fifty.

The Earnest Workers of Lexington comes next, as to date, having been organized in 1886 by Mrs. W. P. McCorkle, now of Savannah.

Since then seventeen Bands have been organized, aggregating four hundred and eighty-seven members. Think of that friends! Nearly five hundred of our young people making ready to take up our work, when God shall call us up higher. It is surely an inspiring thought, to those who are working with these Bands.

Now if any one is inclined to doubt the stimulating effect of the Union, let her glance over the dates of the organization of the societies and the amounts contributed, and she will see how much the activity of both Women's and Children's bands have been increased since 1898, when the Presbyterian Union of Orange Presbytery was formed.

In 1898 our Union had eleven societies and two Children's Bands, with three hundred members, contributing $697.12. At present these eighteen societies, and seventeen bands with eight hundred members, with contributions amounting to $2,170.24.

May this stimulate us to work more faithfully, more prayerfully; with more self-denial both in time and money, and deeper gratitude to Him who has prospered the work we have undertaken!

"The Same — Forever."

Heb. 13:8.

The pink and perfumed beauty of the rose Delights you for a fleeting day,
Then fades and dies
Despite your sighs,
As dies the glory that at sunset glows
Upon the brow of dying Day.

The hours of life's happiest days are bound Fast to Time's chariot. "Stay! stay!"
You cry in vain,
Time will not deign
To heed your prayer, your cries are drowned
While the glad hours are borne away.

Friends die, or sadder still, change and grow cold.
Between you and the hearts once true
Oft rolls a sea—
A silent sea,
And never crew was found so bold
As 'cross its waves to pilot you.

Is change then writ on all things fair? Ah, yes!
Only One changes not. His love is sure
A steady light,
The sun of Righteousness shines on to bless,—
"The same to-day—forevermore!"

This love can never fail. It must abide Untouched by Time, unchanged and pure.
Athwart the sea
Of mutability
Like vesper bells at eventide
Ring out: The same!—forevermore!"

—O. H.

Tell Him.

The little sharp vexations, and the briars that catch and fret,
Why not take all to the Helper, who has never failed us yet?
Tell him about the heartache, and tell him the longings, too;
Tell him the baffled purpose when we scarce know what to do.
Then leaving all our weakness with the One divinely strong,
Forget that we bore the burden, and carry away the song.

—Phillips Brooks.

Dr. T. H. P. Sailer, formerly of the University of Pennsylvania, will conduct, at the Young People's Conference at Silver Bay a normal class for the training of Mission Study Class Leaders.

The Lexington Assembly and Ministerial Relief.

1. By a unanimous vote, and with a heartiness that commends in the most impressive manner possible this sacred cause to the liberality of our people, the Mrs. Mary Stewart legacy was assigned to the Ministerial Relief Endowment Fund.

2. The General Assembly, on its own motion and without any recommendation from the Executive Committee, has called for "at least $30,000 to be contributed this year" for the support of our aged and disabled ministers and of the needy families of our deceased ministers. This is an increase of 75 per cent. over the contributions made to the Annual Fund last year, and every dollar called for by the Assembly will be needed, and more also, if we are not to remain "far behind other churches and come sadly short of what we ought to do in this respect."

3. The General Assembly did not see the way clear at this time to assign a better month than July for collections to be taken to meet this call for $30,000.00 but appointed an ad interim committee to report to the next Assembly what changes should be made in the calendar of collections, and therefore we are, for the present year at least, dependent chiefly upon the July collections for the means with which to meet the solemn obligations resting upon our beloved Church to minister unto the relief of these noble and needy servants of our Lord.

4. This fact gives great emphasis to the following resolution which was adopted most heartily: "The annual collection prescribed by our Assembly should, without fail, be taken in every church. Previous to such collection the necessities and merits of this cause should, either by a sermon on the subject or other full explanation by the pastor, be brought before the congregation." If all our ministers will comply with this recommendation and present this cause from their pulpits with a fullness and earnestness somewhat in keeping with its merits, the $30,000.00 called for by our Assembly will be furnished by the loving hearts and liberal hands of our people.

5. The General Assembly, in the fullness of a great desire to greatly increase the liberality of our people in this direction, adopted the following resolution also: "In view of the fact that the beneficiaries of this sacred cause are largely widows and orphan children, we call upon our Sabbath-schools and our Ladies' and Young People's Societies to give this cause a liberal support." We are glad to believe that this call will not be unheeded by our Sabbath-schools and Ladies' and Young Peoples' Societies.

We have reason to believe that our ruling elders will give special attention to the interests of this sacred cause. One of the noblest of these said on the floor of the Lexington Assembly: "States delight to pension their veterans, soulless corporations provide for their aged and disabled workers, and shall our Church lag behind in the care of our needy ministers who have spent their all in the service of our Lord? Nay, verily, but we will go from this Assembly to awaken a larger interest in this most deserving cause."

On the same occasion another elder, widely known and highly esteemed for wisdom and good works, said: "The sacred duty of supporting our ministers who have worn out their lives in God's service, and whose meagre salaries have not allowed them to accumulate a competence for their families, cannot be questioned. It seems needless to do more than to state the needs of the case. A fund of $30,000.00 is called for to meet the immediate needs of this cause, and if properly presented to our people they will respond liberally."

With confidence in the cordial co-operation of our ministers, and in the liberality of our people, we await the returns from the July collections for the relief of our 161 beneficiaries, who, with their dependent children, make more than 400 persons whose needs are great and whose claims are sacred and supreme.

Will not every Church do something for this cause this month?

"Let each one wheel with steady sway
Round this task that rules the day,
And do our best."

Envelopes and leaflets supplied on application.

By order of the Executive Committee,

I. S. McElroy, Secretary.

Report on Foreign Missions

The Report of the Standing Committee on Foreign Missions was so nearly in accord with the abstract given in a previous issue of that we do not publish it in full.

After commending the faithful work of the Executive Committee, the Assembly is asked to call upon the Churches for $250,000 to further prosecute the work. The Forward Movement is gratefully acknowledged, and the election of a field secretary is deferred for the present.

The request of the Korean Mission to organize itself, with other Presbyterian Missions, into an independent Korean Presbytery was referred to an Ad Interim Committee, consisting of Drs. Hemphill, Curry, and Rice, and Judges J. E. DuBose and H. C. Merritt.

The appeal of the South Brazil Mission from the action of the Executive Committee in authorizing Rev. S. R. Gammon to raise funds for the establishment of a Boy's School in Lavras, has received most careful and serious consideration. The Assembly sustains the action of the Committee, on the ground that it has not exceeded the discretion necessarily allowed to the Committee in the Application for the rules of the Mannual, and 2, on the ground that the Presbyterian idea of the Church and of Missions involves educational as well as evangelistic work.

For the better conduct of our foreign affairs in general, the Executive Committee and its secretary are instructed.

1. To strengthen the internal organization of the Committee so as to secure the highest efficiency, to work its Sub-committees more regularly and thoroughly, effect a more systematic and perfect organization in the various Presbyteries.

2. To see that the secretary exercises a close and careful supervision over all the correspondence of the office, except that which relates to the Editorial Department.

3. To take a more immediate and constant direction of the itinerary of returned missionaries, exercising due regard to their need of rest and their capacities for home service.

4. To inaugurate as soon as possible a more direct, satisfactory and convenient method of remitting funds to our mis-ns, and to provide, as far as practicable, against the emergencies that arise frequently in the financial department of the work.

5. To carry out the plan of the Editorial department for the publication of a monthly or quarterly bulletin, which shall be a special medium of communication between all the missionaries of our Church and shall keep them informed regarding all matters of interest and value in the proceedings of the committee and the progress of the work.

6. To take such measures as will secure to our Missions a greater facility and effectiveness in the use of the spoken languages of the fields where they labor.

7. To develop and utilize the native force in the various fields as rapidly as practicable.

8. To exercise the most rigid economy in the purchase of property, the opening of new stations, and the equipment of medical and educational plants; to restrict within proper limits the industrial and eleemosynary departments of work; and to have supreme regard in all educational agencies to the essential work of missions, the Planting and Development of the Christian Church in Heathen Lands.

9. To plan wisely and labor aggressively for the widening and deepening of the great Missionary Revival for which we have prayed and to which the providence of God is pointing.

10. The Assembly earnestly exhorts all its Synods and Presbyteries and Sessions to co-operate with the Executive Committee in carrying out these directions and to pray without ceasing that the Holy Spirit may fill all our People with the desire and purpose to evangelize the nations.

11. The Assembly elects the Rev. S. H. Chester, D. D., Secretary, and appoints as its Executive Committee for the ensuing year the following:

Revs. S. H. Chester, J. H. McNeilly, W. M. Anderson, J. W. Bachman, C. R. Hemphill, W. S. Jacobs, T. C. Cewan, Messrs. W. H. Raymond, G. H. Baskette, J. D. Blanton, W. J. Adams, Revs. J. F. Cannon, G. W. Patterson, Wm. Irvine, Messrs. C. A. Rowlands, Jr., A. M. Carroll.

Converse College Commencement.

Sabbath morning the baccalaureate sermon was delivered in the spacious Auditorium to a crowded house by the Rev. T. D. Bratton, Bishop-elect of Mississippi. The text, "Ye are the light of the world, and ye are the salt of the earth," was illumined by careful and richly illustrated expositions delivered in the straightforward, concise and manly style so characteristic of Dr. Bratton. At night he also preached before the Y. W. C. A. of the college from the words, "I am crucified with Christ," etc., exhibiting in a striking way the practical solution of the paradoxes of life and death, Christ and self in the Christian's experience.

Monday morning was devoted to the graduating exercises. Hon. Locke Craig, of Asheville, N. C., in the annual address maintained in glowing imagery and passionate emphasis the ultimate supremacy of the intellectual and moral, despite the apparent triumph of a commercial and industrial age.

This was followed by the presentation to the winning athletic club the Hyppolytans, of a beautiful loving cup.

Then came the awarding of Diplomas and certificates to 31 young ladies and conferring of degrees with an address by President Robert P. Pell.

Monday night was devoted to the public exercises of the Carlisle and Philosopherian Literary Societies. A salutatory by Miss Virginia Jones, a valedictory by Miss Rebecca Reid, a vocal solo by Miss Helen Snow, a pianoforte solo by Miss Dayse Radford, a debate on the Monroe Doctrine, and the distribution of the Society diplomas comprised the menu of the evening. The commanding, masterful handling and graceful manner of the young ladies were the subjects of enthusiastic comment. The literary societies, aided by the alumnae and the students, propose to erect a $10,000 building, in which will be located the society halls, a banquet room and library. While it is sad to think that the great mill industries built up by Mr. Converse have recently been largely destroyed by the flood, it is comforting to realize that this college, founded and fostered by him and his associates and bearing his name, has not only escaped without the loss of a single dollar, but has the brightest prospects before it.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

WAPANUCKA.—Sunday, June 7th, was the tenth anniversary of the organization of this Church, and the occasion was observed in a befitting manner. The pastor gave a historical sketch of the church, and spoke on the "conditions underlying the success of a church."

The church enters upon its second decade, with bright prospects before it. We have a large and flourishing Sabbath-school, [that seems to grow continually in interest and numbers. The Church recently took one share in the Mid-China Mission of $50, and the Ladies' Society and the C. A. Rowland Society for girls, each devote one meeting a month to Foreign Mission topics.

Recently subscriptions were taken with a view to introducing the envelope system of collections and a liberal offering was secured for each Sabbath.

We hope to begin soon the erection of a building for our Presbyterian School, for which a generous friend of Home Missions in the East has given the money.

Best of all, we are erecting a neat house of worship in a splendid location, and hope to occupy it soon. It is, so far, the only church building in a town of 1,500 people and we are rejoicing in the prospects of such a wonderful opportunity for usefulness in the Master's service. Truly God has done great things for us, for which we are glad, and we are encouraged to enter upon the work of another decade with new hope and vigor.

VIRGINIA.

LYNCHBURG.—In the spring, the First Church purchased a manse at a cost of $5,500. The committee in charge has spent $2,500 in repairing and remodeling. The house is now most comfortable and has every convenience, hot water heat, electric lights, has a fine garden as also flower garden.

The ladies of the church furnished nearly all the horse, and in addition sent a check to the pastor's wife to cover all expense incident to moving.

Not content with so many evidences of appreciation, they "showered" the manse with a "shower" party last week. Useful and ornamental articles, as also a goodly supply for the store room, were left.

A grateful pastor and family are very proud of such a congregation. The pastor's address is now 707 Clay St.

NORTH CAROLINA.

DAVIDSON.—The Davidson Summer School which Mr. Archibald Currie, instructor in the college, opened for the first time this summer, has made an excellent beginning in point of numbers. Its object is to prepare more thoroughly than previous training may have made possible students that expect to enter college in the fall. The session lasts eight weeks.

Dr. H. L. Smith is to deliver two lectures at the University of North Carolina during the coming week before the members of the Summer School there.

The Piedmont School for teachers will not open here till the 8th of July.

Rev. Dr. Graham who has been absent for a few days at Wrightsville will spend the Sabbath with his brother in Fayetteville, Rev. Tucker Graham. Rev. Dr. H. H. Harding will fill his pulpit here.

The summer absentees just at present from the college are Dr. Martin and family at Blowing Rock, Dr. Shearer in Charlotte, and Professor and Mrs. Douglas at their father's home in South Carolina.

HYDE COUNTY.—I desire to return my most heartfelt thanks to those who have so kindly responded to my request for aid in repairing the damage done to our Church at Swan Quarter, by the recent storm. I have received fourteen dollars, the most of which came from friends whose names I do not know. We are sincerely grateful for what we have received, but our immediate needs are not yet supplied. We are very much in need of forty dollars more. It is unpleasant to make a second request, but the progress made by our beloved Church in this county is encouraging, and the outlook is hopeful; and "the love of Christ constraineth us." Kind friends, we appeal to you in the name of Jesus, who will abundantly reward you.

Sincerely yours,

J. H. Jarvis.

BURKE COUNTY.—For two years Rev. T. D. Johnston has preached in Burke county. He was installed over Quaker Meadow—which is, I believe, the oldest church in the county. He preached also at Glen Alpine and at Bridgewater, and at Anderson's Chapel in Morganton. In the two years that Brother Johnston has been here, the work has grown steadily, and is now in better condition than ever before. Recently Brother Johnston accepted a call to Burgaw, and on June 1st left for his new field.

General regret is expressed at his leaving, not only by his own people, but by the people of Morganton, to whom he had endeared himself by his genial disposition, his earnestness of purpose, and his many Christian virtues. We all wish him continued success in his new field.

MISSOURI.

WESTMINSTER COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT.—A very successful year of this college closed June 11. The attendance of students was the largest for many years, and the usual high standard in all things was well maintained. The only shadow over the bright present and future was the fact that this was the last year and the last Commencement of President John McCracken; for after four or five years of most acceptable and successful service as President, he several months ago resigned his position to become assistant to his father, Chancellor McCracken of the University of New York.

By reason of the great floods, most of the members of the Board of Trustees were unable to be present; not a quorum: so no honorary degrees were conferred and no new President elected.

The Commencement exercises proper were held in the chapel on Thursday morning. There were two full graduates, Mr. Raymond S. Brauch and Mr. Cary C. Shaver. The Bible prize, on the subject "Eternal Life," was awarded to Mr. Milton Campbell, and the Scholarship Medal to Mr. Trimble McCutchan. All these young men are from Missouri. Dr. McCracken very appropriately was the chief speaker; and in most impressive and happily chosen language he spoke of the college, its position, work and prospects, and bade a kindly farewell to those with whom he had been so pleasantly associated. Universal regret has been felt by all friends of the college at the young President's departure: and real sorrow was manifested and expressed by audience, Board and Faculty as they listened to his farewell address and bade him good-bye.

The Board will doubtless soon be called to meet for the purpose of electing a new President.

LEXINGTON; Wentworth Military Academy.—Prof. Wm. M. Hoge, for years connected with the Kemper school at Boonville, Mo., as teacher and co-principal, and more recently (Public) School Examiner for the State, has been associated with Col. Sandford Sellers in the conduct of this school, the oldest military and one of the best and most successful of the Boys' schools of the West. And under the excellent management of Messrs. Sellers and Hoge it will doubtless maintain its high rank among the foremost schools of its class.

Rev. E. D. Allen, who for a year has faithfully served the churches of Blackburn and Odessa, has recently resigned his charge, having accepted missionary work further West.

The Prairie Church recently, at the close of his first year of service, presented their young pastor, Rev. Chas. H. Morton, a handsome gold watch and chain, as a token of their appreciation and affection.

The Remedy for Breathitt.

The unhappy condition of this great county in the Kentucky Cumberlands has attracted the attention of the whole nation.

The presence of a battalion of the State guards and three rapid fire cannon to hold court, in time of perfect peace, is a singular spectacle in this country. It is no wonder then, that a nation's eyes are turned on this people and country, and everything concerning them is of more than usual interest.

Very much has been written, both wise and unwise, true and untrue concerning this people.

If forty years knowledge of them and their country, and twenty-five years experience among them as a minister of the gospel, can justify this article, then I may be permitted to speak with some freedom, of things I know.

These people are not brutal or degenerate, as some may suppose. They are not naturally bloodthirsty or savage. I have travelled among them as a physician and minister for forty years, and I do not know a kinder, more hospitable people anywhere. Of course there are bad men there, as there are everywhere; but they are exceptions. Most of the troubles have grown out of the lax administration of the law, and the unlicensed sale of whiskey; and these things are not easily remedied in a mountainous country, among an uneducated people, living in a primitive state of society, where every man is a "law unto himself."

Those who know the history of this county are not surprised at the present condition of things. It has not been many years since the county seat was without a school house, and the whole county without a church. The writer of this article organized the first church in Jackson, and every other one in the county. At that time there was but one regular preacher in that whole county, of more than ten thousand people, and he was a venerable Methodist minister, superannuated on account of his age. At this very time, there are thousands of people in that county who are destitute of the privileges of the gospel. Many who never saw a church or heard a qualified preacher. Is it to be wondered at that drunkenness and murder and all sin prevail in such society, where God's law is not only unobserved, but unknown?

The crime of Breathitt is the shame of us all. These are our neighbors, our "kith and kin." Their poverty and destitution should have had the greater claim on our sympathy and charity. Yet it is only within the last score of years we have been trying to remedy the evils of a century of indifference and neglect.

To state these facts is to suggest the remedy. Breathitt without the gospel is no worse than any other county without it: indeed it is not so bad as many, bad as it is.

"You talk about questions of the day! There is but one question, and that is the gospel. It can, and will, correct everything needing correction. All men at the head of great movements are Christian men. During the many years I was in the Cabinet, I was brought into association with sixty master minds, and all but five of them were Christians. My only hope for the world is in bringing the human mind into contact with Divine revelation."

This is the testimony of Mr. Gladstone; great not only as a Christian, but in every other department of greatness.

And a greater than Mr. Gladstone said, "Make the tree good and the fruit will be good." That is religion and reason too. An infidel will admit it. To change the conduct of a people you must change their character. Guns cannot do that. Only God can convert character. The remedy for Breathitt, is the remedy for Bourbon and Fayette and the world. It is the gospel, whose fruit is love, joy, temperance, forgiveness, etc.

The martial remedy has been tried in Breathitt before. Hundreds of armed men arrested some law-breakers and suppressed violence for awhile, at an enormous cost to the State, but they did not eradicate an evil passion, nor convert a lawless man. God alone can do that, and He does it by the preaching of the gospel. That is the remedy for Breathitt: the only remedy, and the all-sufficient remedy.

Recognizing this fact, the churches in Kentucky have been making some effort to send the gospel there, among their poor neighbors. It is still limited, and entirely inadequate.

Realizing this, The American Inland Mission was organized in 1897, and an appeal made to all Christian people everywhere to help save this people. The response has been most gratifying. During the last year, over ten thousand dollars have been received for this cause, from all over the world. This has been used to give a frugal support to over seventy faithful men and women of every church, who have gone to preach and teach the gospel to the long neglected mountain people, in Kentucky and elsewhere.

During this year they have conducted over one hundred gospel schools, with three thousand children in attendance; built five new churches and three mission houses, and one college in the wildest part of the mountains; distributed hundreds of garments among the poor, and tens of thousands of Bibles, etc., where they had none before.

This is not a spasmodic effort, confined to travelling evangelists, for a few summer months. This mission has gone on summer and winter since 1897, with hundreds of educated and consecrated men and women, who are laying the foundations a new generation of people who know and honor God and His law. A distinguished clergyman, widely known North and South, says, "The Soul Winners' Society (American Inland Mission) is doing the most and best work, with the least money, of any missionary society on earth, so far as I know." After a visit to many of its missions, General O. O. Howard, the venerable Christian soldier says, "The most of the people were in absolute need of gospel teaching, when the Soul Winners undertook the great work of organizing and applying the settlements and all the mountain work with Christian teachers and competent men to preach the simple truth. To my mind their success has been marvelous."

To all men who love God and their fellow men, we appeal for help. Every sentiment of patriotism and humanity and Religion calls us to remove this stigma from our country, and deem this great body of our countrymen.

Your offerings can be sent to Edward O. Guerrant, President of American Inland Mission, Wilmore, Ky., or to Major Robert S. Bullock, Treasurer, Cashier Fayette National Bank, Lexington, Ky.

Speakers at the Lookout Mountain Conference.

Among those who are expected to speak or assist in the conference for Young People's Leaders to be held on Lookout Mountain July 1-8, are the following:

Rev. W. R. Lambuth, D. D., Secretary of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, Nashville, Tenn.

Rev. John F. Goucher, D. D., President of Woman's College, Baltimore, Md.

Prof. O. E. Brown, of Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn.

Mr. Luther D. Wishard, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Young People's Missionary Movement, New York City.

Rev. Ira Landrith, D. D., Editor of The Cumberland Presbyterian, Nashville, Tenn.

Mr. S. Earl Taylor, Young People's Secretary of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, New York City

Rev. A. L. Phillips, D. D., Superintendent of Sabbath-school and Young People's Work of the Presbyterian Church, South, Richmond, Va.

Rev. H. F. Williams, Editor of The Missionary, Nashville, Tenn.

Rev. W. R. Dobyns, D. D., Kansas City, Mo.

Mr. J. E. McCallloch, Young People's Secretary of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, Nashville, Tenn.

Rev. T. H. MacCauley, D. D., Chattanooga, Tenn.

Messrs. Moffat, Stuart and Preston of the Forward Movement.

Rev. William F. McDowell, D. D., Secretary of the Board of Education of the Methodist Episcopal Church, New York City.

Rev. S. H. Chester, D. D., Secretary of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, South, Nashville, Tenn.

Rev. G. L. Wharton, D. D., of India.

Rev. W. J. Willingham, D. D., Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Baptist Church, South, Richmond, Va.

There is every indication that this conference will be the beginning of a new and better organized missionary effort in the churches of the Southern States.

The Character of the program is quite different from anything that has previously been attempted in the South. The conference is a training school rather than a convention, and was for its purpose the preparation and equipment of leaders in the more effective prosecution of distinctively denominational work.

Temperance Convention—Raleigh, July 7th.

On account of the Summer School at Raleigh the railroads have granted a rate of one fare plus 25 cents for the round trip, July 6, 7. This will enable many to attend the Temperance Convention. It is a most important meeting, and the friends of Temperance should take this opportunity to manifest their interest.

The entire State will be organized with a view, 1, to enforcing the Watts Act; 2, to establishing prohibition in towns and cities; 3, to obtaining more effective legislation.

Educational.

Scholarships at A. and M.

Examinations for admission to the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Raleigh will be held July 9th, '03 a. m., in every county Court House in the State by the County Superintendent of Schools. The results of these examinations will be considered in awarding scholarships at the college. Each county is entitled to as many scholarships as it has members of the House of Representatives.

Texas Presbyterian College for Girls

The first Commencement of this institution has just been held; and it was very gratifying to the Board of Trustees to know that it was a perfect success in every respect. Rev. J. O. Reavis preached the Baccalaureate sermon Sabbath morning, May 31st, and Rev. C. L. Ewing preached to the undergraduates that evening.

The chapel walls were decorated with beautiful paintings, the work of the pupils under the superior instruction of the Art teacher. Several patrons were present; and all expressed themselves as well pleased with the conditions and progress made by the pupils. A rain the night before, and on the morning of the Commencement day, diminished the attendance; but even then the chapel was comfortably filled.

There was only one graduate, Miss Minnie H. Ewing, who took the degree of A. B. She had an excellent essay, and read it well. The Baccalaureate address of President Evans was well adapted to the occasion; and the day passed very pleasantly. The Board passed resolutions, commending the phenomenal success of the work by the President and faculty during the past session.

All the officers of the Board were re-elected, including the Executive Committee, for one year. The Financial Secretary, Rev. J. J. Grier, made a satisfactory report. He has been simply laying the foundation of the work; and expressed himself as well satisfied with the situation. He is furnishing the Presbyterians of the Synod with information as to the prize they have secured in this college. We believe that when they come to know what they have, they will not be slow to support the college. What we need now above every thing else, is more room. This is absolutely imperative. Applications for room are pouring in from different parts of the state; and the President is embarrassed in giving answers to these applications.

We do not wish our president to be placed in the same embarrassing attitude of the Irishman who was helping to chicken. He asked the first guest what part of the fowl he would have; and he answered, "I'll take a leg;" and the second said he would take a leg; and the third said he would take a leg. "Faith," said the host, "and do you think I'm carving a spider?"

One of these was for a room for three girls—two sisters and a friend. During the two days I was present, Dr. Evans received three applications; in all about twenty-five. The building last session was filled, and the question is, How can we place thirty more in it on the 7th of next September, the opening of the term?

To meet this, the Board has ordered the Building committee to commence the second building, of which we already have plans, as soon as there is $5,000 in hand; and build only as the money is forthcoming.

Members of the Presbyterian Church of the Synod of Texas, do please furnish money to our Financial Secretary as rapidly as possible, that the building may not be delayed for lack of funds. Really, we shall need $5,000 to begin with, in order to place the material on the ground; but being absolutely essential to have another building right away, we determined to begin, and depend upon the Presbyterians to push the work to completion.

If the Presbyterians of the Synod will give us the money, when the Synod meets in Milford next fall, we promise to surprise every one who attends—and we hope there will be many mothers of girls among the number—and the common expression will be, as it has perhaps been with every visitor who has seen it, "I had no idea we had such an institution within our bounds!"

Cordially,

M. C. Hutton, President Board Trustees.

Secretary Hay is preparing to open negotiations with Nicaragua and Costa Rica.

The recent anti-alcohol congress held in Bremen, Germany, gave striking testimony to the advance of the temperance cause on the Continent. The city was remarkably cordial in its attitude towards the delegates; the mayor welcomed them most heartily, the Senate gave a costly banquet and two thousand of the citizens were enrolled in a Moderation Society. The government gave 10,000 marks to the Congress and nearly all the nations of northern Europe sent representatives. The scientific discussions were taken part in by distinguished authorities and there was a unity of opinion as to the direction in which the influence of all thoughtful men should be thrown.

New York, June 19.—The World to-day publishes a dispatch from Princeton, N. J., quoting former President Cleveland as saying:

"It is perfectly absurd to suppose for an instant that I have any desire to re-enter public life. Nor have I remotely entertained the thought since I left Washington more than six years ago. The matter is as far from my thought as it was in 1896 when all must admit that it was not within my hearing or sight. I have no higher aspirations than to pass my days in peace with my family around me and take no part in politics which any private citizen cannot take with utmost propriety."

The catalogue of the North Carolina State Normal and Industrial College shows an enrollment during the past year of 494 college students and 366 pupils in the Practice and Observation School.

The dormitory capacity will be increased before the next annual session.

Students secure free-tuition by agreeing to become teachers in the public or private schools of the state for at least two years after leaving the college, and in no other way can free tuition be secured. All the free-tuition students cannot secure board in the dormitories where board is furnished at actual cost, but places will be reserved in the dormitories for 175 free-tuition students and 175 tuition-paying students. Provision will be made for fifty free-tuition students and twenty-five tuition-paying students with board in private families.

Professor Munroe Smith, in an article in The Columbia University Quarterly Review, gives some statistical comparisons showing the recent growth of Columbia. "Leaving out the undergraduates, and including only the faculties of theology, law, medicine, and the graduate school of philosophy, Columbia comes first with 1,744 students, and Harvard only second, with 1,483. Leaving out the college undergraduates, and including the schools of applied science, Columbia has a student population of 2,795, and is easily first among American universities, while Harvard is fourth, after Minnesota and Michigan. But even including college undergraduates, of whom Harvard has 2,434, Columbia is second to Harvard alone, and also in the whole student population, including non-residents, the figures here being 5,575 for Harvard to 5,034 for Columbia.

A recent newspaper despatch quoted in The Electrical Age states that Sherman Hobson a railroad man of Pueblo, Colo., has just perfected an appliance which, if all proves true that is claimed for it by its inventor, will greatly reduce railroad collisions and save thousands of lives annually. "The new appliance is a sort of looking-glass to be hung on each side of an engine to enable the engineer and fireman to see the road-bed for six miles, both in front and in the rear. The chief value of the invention is that it does not make any difference if the road is curved or straight. The instrument works on the principle of a mirage, and it has been named by its inventor the 'miragescope.' It has been tested from Denver to Grand Junction on the Denver and Rio Grande and the Colorado Midland, and also passed favorable tests on the Colorado Southern and Missouri Pacific."—Literary Digest.

"The Kongo Free State is accused of having duped the civilized world. A host of reports emanating from missionaries, traders, and officers openly accuse the Government of resorting to forced labor, of employing cannibals as troops, of hurling them in raids upon the peaceful population, of practising violence and cruelty in the collection of the excessive taxes levied upon the unfortunate savages. Horrible stories have dealt with nameless atrocities, with demoniacal acts perpetrated against the natives. Thousands of fugitives have abandoned the villages, seeking refuge in the forests or with the missionaries. In a single enclosure, according to an eye-witness, there were on one occasion as many as eighty amputated hands sanguinary evidence of the activity of the tax collector. Such is the bill of indictment brought against the Kongo Independent State and its sovereign. . . . It is right to wait for the defense. Every accused, and particularly every accused state, is entitled to plead in its own case."—The Paris Temps.

After a struggle of nearly three months, it appears that the textile operatives of Lowell, Mass., have tired in their fight for an increase of 10 per cent. in wages in the cotton mills and are willing to declare off the strike, which was inaugurated March 30th.

The Summer School of the South

Five thousand inquiries have been made to the railroads, and the number of actual students will, according to present indications, exceed three thousand. Six especially constructed buildings will be used besides the regular halls of the University of Tennessee, and one thousand homes, a sixty-five room hotel, and every boarding school in the city of Knoxville will be used to accommodate the teachers.

Every class of work from kindergarten to university is included, making a total of one hundred and fifty courses to be taught by nearly one hundred instructors. There will be no open lectures each day and a sermon every Sunday evening, while exhibits of new and foreign games, apparatus, books, and educational inventions will be open at all times. Certificates will be granted only when actual credit has been obtained. In this way the certificate of the institution will be recognized in any section of the United States.

An Interesting Statement

A comparison of North Carolina today with Massachusetts and Connecticut in the year 1850 shows:

POPULATION
Conn., 1850.	Mass., 1850.	N. C., 1900.
370,792	994,514	1,893,810
ASSESSED VALUE OF PROPERTY.
100,000,000	$597,936,995	$341,222,009

The comparison is made with these states for the year 1850, for the purpose of showing that North Carolina to-day offers a more inviting field for Life insurance operations than did either of these states at the time when most of their companies began business.

About this period there were organized in Connecticut and Massachusetts whose combined population was 1,365,306, the life insurance companies, the combined assets of which to-day $303,980,085, being nearly equal to the entire wealth of North Carolina at its assessed valuation.

The reports of the Insurance Department of the State of North Carolina shows that this state is expending yearly the vast sum of $2,586,026 for life insurance.

Who can escape the conclusion from foregoing facts and figures that we are committing financial suicide by sending our surplus wealth to outsiders instead of creating strong and valid life insurance companies of our own?

That there is need of such institutions in North Carolina no man will question, and never were the opportunities better.

We have a climate unexcelled, a soil that produces everything and capable of the highest degree of cultivation. We have every variety of mineral product. We have hundred of thousands of unharnessed horse power in our water courses.

We have large areas of country rich in resources waiting for the activity that comes with the introduction of the railway. We have millions of feet of timber of all kinds taken away year after year because we have not the factories here to convert it into finished product. We have immense deposits of iron ores. We have untold millions of gold in our mines in ores that can be profitably worked by modern methods.

We have thousands of miles of unimproved highways. There is no limit to the possibilities of North Carolina if we but had the means to develop them. North Carolina's urgent need to-day is the ABILITY TO COMMAND THE USE OF MONEY. For generations we have been committing financial suicide. Year after year we reaffirm our dependence and incompetency by sending to other states our moneys to buy insurance protection.

The Southern Loan and Trust Company through its Life Department will contribute something to the cure of this financial malady. The company feels justly proud of its past financial achievements and undertakes the great and responsible business of life insurance with a confidence born of success. If you would encourage progressive yet conservative home enterprise, and would conserve the wealth you create by keeping it at home, and would have a hand in the upbuilding of a great financial institution of your own making, you can accomplish all these ends by purchasing the protection of the life contracts of the Southern Loan and Trust Company.

This is what might be called a cracker-jack notice from the Franklin Times and needs no introductory; though it may be stated that it is the custom of the companies to use no dilatory tactics when a loss occurs, but come right up to the scratch. The Times says:

"The insurance adjusters were here last week to adjust the losses in the recent fire, and while there was but little trouble in settling some of the losses we understand that there is right much 'squabbling' with others. But the Times is glad to state that all of the losses sustained by the home companies, all of whom are located at Greensboro, have already been promptly paid without a kick. The amount these home companies lost was nearly five thousand dollars and the losers who had policies in these companies have already received checks for their losses.

"In view of the fact that these are home companies and appear to act fair and just to their policy-holders the Times takes pleasure in commending them to our people. Their prompt settlements with their policy-holders here, without a single kick, has certainly made a fine impression upon those of our citizens who are in the habit of insuring their property. The general agent for these home companies is A. W. McAlister, of Greensboro, and the local agent is W. J. Byerly." —Daily Record, June 9th, 1903.

Cool Looking Rooms.

R. E. Merryman.

In hot weather, when everything out of doors looks hot and dusty, how refreshing it is to enter a room which not only has a lower temperature, but is arranged in such a way that the eye is refreshed by its cool appearance. To arrange rooms for cool effects requires considerable judgment and some work, but it pays in the added comfort of the family.

Bare floors are the first requisite. A few rugs, preferably shaded greens and browns, will relieve the plainness. The floor should be stained or painted. Prepared wood stains are excellent for this purpose, as they are so easily applied. They come in a variety of colors, and have only to be dissolved in water to be ready for use. The floor should have one or two coats of oil after the stain dries.

Blues and greens are cool looking colors, and one of them may be chosen from the color scheme of the room. A wall paper of cream and green is very pretty, and the furnishing can easily be made to harmonize with it. Willow or reed rockers are comfortable and may have head rests of pale green with a little pink in the figures and pink ribbons to tie them with.

Foot stools of various sizes should be of the shaded browns or greens to match the rugs. The desired colors may be secured by using dyes for coloring the rug rags, and some suitable material for tools. A rattan couch with a supply of pillows in cool shades, is both comfortable and cool looking. Vases and bowls of flowers with plenty of foliage, placed on shelves and tables about the room give the finishing touch. Window blinds should be kept closed during most part of the day, except when the window is opened for use, when they can be drawn so as to shut out the glare and admit a shaded light. Some kinds of plants grow well in the shade and can be used for such rooms. The writer once saw a long box of Wandering Jews placed under a mantle in a summer sitting room, the vines reaching almost to the floor. An open fireplace may be made very attractive by having a box fitted into it, with growing ferns and wild flowers. Have a box made that just fits over the grate and, if possible, have it set in the back, sloping gradually down to the front. Paint the box a shade of green and fill with rich foliage from the woods. In choosing plants with which to fill it, choose those that thrive without sunlight.—Household Ledger.

Cheery People.

Oh, the comfort of them! There is one thing like them—that is sunshine. It is the fashion to state the common on the other end foremost—i. e., to catter the cheery people by comparing them to the sun. I think it is the best of praising the sunshine, to say that almost as bright and inspiring as the presence of cheery people. That the cheery people are brighter than the sunshine is very easily proved; for who has not seen a cheery person make a room and a day bright in spite of the sun's not shining— in spite of clouds and rain and all doing their very best to make it bright? Therefore, I say, the fair way to compare the sun to cheery people. Never, which ever way we may state the comparison, it is a true and good one, neither the cheery people nor the sun need take offense. In fact, I believe they will, always be such good friends, and work so steadily together for the same ends that there is no danger of the sun's grudging the other the credit of what has been done.

If there were only a sure and certain way for making a cheery person, how we would be to try it! How thankful we would all be to do good like sunshine! To cheer everybody up, and help everybody along!—to have everybody's faces brighten the minute we came in sight. Why, it seems to me that there is not to be in this life any pleasure half so great as this would be. If we looked at things only from a selfish point of view, it would be worth while to be a cheery person, merely because it would be such a satisfaction to have everybody so glad to have with us, to see us, even to meet us on the street.

"I just likes to let her in at the door," said a Irish servant one day, of a man I knew, whose face was always bright and bright. "The face of her one good, shnre!" Some one once asked a great painter, whose pictures were remarkable for their beauty and beautiful coloring. "Pray, Mr. —, how do you mix your colors?" "With brains, madam, with brains," growled the painter. His ill nature spoke a truth. All men had or might have the colors he had used; but no man produced the colors he produced.

So I would say of cheeriness. Patience, sympathy, and humor, are the colors; but patience may be mere doggedness and reticence, sympathy may be wordy and shallow and selfish, and humor may be only a sharp perception of the ridiculous. Only when they are mixed with love—love, three times love—do we have the true good cheer of genuine cheery people.—Selected.

The baffled hopes, the impulse slow,

Holyrood Palace.

(For the Standard.)

There are countries and cities and buildings in Europe about which cluster romances of centuries. Such a country is Scotland, such a city is Edinburgh and such a pile is Holyrood Palace.

Talking one day with a Presbyterian minister who spent the previous winter in Edinburgh, I saved the mention of Holyrood for the last, smacking my lips in anticipation of his interest. He explained that he had only seen it for a few moments the last days of his stay. Later in the same day I told my experience to another Presbyterian minister; he comforted me by telling me that he spent a winter in Edinburgh and never saw the Palace at all. I have not thought of Holyrood since, without a pang of pity for such wasted opportunity.

Its name keeps alive the fact that the first building on the site was a religious house. The Abbey of Holyrood was built by David I. for the Canons regular of the order of St. Augustine, not far from the shadow of the mighty fortress, his home. The story of its founding in 1128 runneth thus:

Good Churchman though he was, David went hunting one Holy Cross Day, in spite of the protest of his confessor, in the valley lying at the foot of Arthur's Seat; at that time it was a forest abounding in game. At the foot of the crag there rushed upon him "the fairest hart that ever was sene," throwing him and his horse violently to the ground. David threw back his hands between the antlers of the stag to save himself from the blow, when "the holy croce staid incontinent into his hands." The wild deer fled at sight of the sacred emblem, and the king, admonished afterward in a dream, resolved to build a house on the spot where "he gat the croce" and dedicate it to the "Holy Rude," the Virgin, and all the saints.

A more authentic reason for it to be dedicated to the Holy Cross was that the mother of King David carried with her to Scotland a cross of gold which enclosed what was believed to be a portion of the "Rude" on which Christ suffered.

The Palace proper was built by James IV. for his English bride, Margaret, who crossed its threshold in 1503. Much was spent on its embellishment before his death at Flodden. In 1536 young James V. journeyed over to France to "spy the pulchritud" of the daughter of the Duke of Vendome, but became enamoured of the "seiklie" daughter of the French King. On the 19th of May, 1536 the second bride came to Holyrood; forty days after, she slept the long sleep in the Abbey Church. So intense was the national grief that the mourning dress was worn in Scotland for the first time.

After the manner of more modern widowers, royal and otherwise, James comforted himself with Mary of Guise.

Their daughter, Mary Queen of Scots, took up her residence in the Palace in 1561, immediately on her return to her native country. The first Sunday after her arrival, preparations were made to celebrate Mass, and then the troubles began. How beautiful she must have been, is seen from the fact that her stern and disapproving subjects exclaimed "God bless that sweet face," as she passed through the streets of the old town.

Going through the Canongate entrance, at which stands a Highland sentry in his picturesque uniform, a great picture gallery is at the head of the stairs. On its walls hang remarkable portraits of Scottish Kings, one hundred in all, from the misty days of Fergus I. to the going down of the Stuarts. This room has been forever made sacred to the memory of Prince Charlie, by that far greater prince, Sir Walter Scott.

On its floor Flora McIvor and Rose Bradwardine danced on the eve of Preston pans; to-day it is used for the election of the sixteen Scottish representative peers.

In the ancient tower are the rooms of Queen Mary—leading up to them is a circular stone stairway much worn by the tread of the centuries. In what is known as the "audience chamber" is the bed of Charles I. when a resident of Holyrood, its faded curtains being of richly embossed velvet. On it slept Prince Charlie the night before Culloden: after the battle the Duke of Cumberland here rested from his victory. In this room Queen Mary played chess and read Livy. Here Rizzio sang to her, and here were held the "divers controversies" when John Knox came up from the Nether Bow to plead for her soul.

Opening into this is her bed-chamber—the most interesting one in Scotland. Over in Versailles the room of the fated Marie Antionette claims a kindred interest.

On these pillows rested her head, uneasily, not because of her crown, but her conscience. On the beautiful paneled ceiling her eyes looked while she told her beads according to the faith of her childhood. The decayed hangings of the bed are of crimson damask with green silk fringe and tassels. The walls are hung with tapestry picturing the fall of Phaeton.

On the north side of the room is a small door half hidden by the tapestries, opening into the supper-room, whence the unhappy Rizzio was dragged screaming from her side to fall dead at the head of the stair. The dull stains of his blood may still be seen. Each step is full of interest, pathos, and suggestion.

Of the old Abbey there remains only the ruined nave. Under the flag stones sleep many of those who sat on Scotland's throne. Beneath the old East window Queen Mary was married to Darnley and lived to weep another day. The curious noted that her wedding dress was the same she wore at her first husband's funeral. Back of the Palace is the little room where she took her baths in white wine.

Charles I. was crowned in the Abbey and over its door is yet the tablet inserted by his order: "He shall build one House for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever." How the irony of fate was exemplified! The queer old horologue standing in the North garden was also erected by Charles I. A part of the palace was burnt (whether intentionally or not, will never be known) by Cromwell's men who were stationed here on their return from Dnnbar's victory over by the sea. It was restored, I think, by Charles II.

Between the Palace and the castle lie the quaint old part of the city—the one that carries in its bosom, St. Giles, the home and grave of John Knox, the Covenanters' prison and Monument, Greyfriar's, the Market Cross the Heart of Midlothian and the University. Over to the right is the matchless new city, but its sights and sounds are a long way off in time and distance from the palace which stands, dark with the dust of the ages, guarded by Arthur's Seat, the heather-clad mountain that looks down upon it.

The living portion of the palace was always kept in readiness for Queen Victoria, in order that she might be worthily received, without notice of her coming, as she journeyed once a year twice a year from London to her favorite Balmoral. But when King Edward visits Edinburgh in August—so the papers say—he will stop at a moderate hotel, and two members of the North Carolina Synod spent a winter in sight of its turrets and buried their noses in the logy. Such are the ravages of time.

Mrs. Wiggs' Sunday-school

When one is inclined to believe that the color of all the world is drab, it is good to read of some such humble philosopher as "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," the heroine of a recently published book of that title. For many years Sunday afternoon had been a trying time in the Cabbage Patch neighborhood, so Mrs. Wiggs had organized a Sunday-school class over which she presided. By 2 o'clock on this particular Sunday the school had begun. Every seat in the kitchen, available and otherwise, was occupied. The boys sat in the window, and on the table, and the girls squeezed together on improvised benches—two plauks placed across chairs. Mrs. Wiggs stood before them with a dilapidated hymn book in her hand.

"Now you all must hush talking, so we kin all sing a hymn. I'll read it over, then we'll all sing it together:

"When upon life's billows you are tempest tossed,
When you are discouraged, thinking all is lost,

Count yer many blessings, name 'em one by one,
An' it will surprise yer, what the Lord hath done!"

Clear and strong rose the childish voices in different keys and regardless of time, but with a genuine enthusiasm that was in itself a blessing. When they had sung through the three stanzas Mrs. Wiggs began the lesson, which had to do with Moses; but before it had proceeded far she was hit in the eye with a paper wad. It was aimed at Billy, but he dodged and she became the victim. This caused some delay, for she had to bathe the injured member, and during the interval the Sunday-school became riotous.

Mith Wiggs, make Tommy trophittin' in my hat!"

"Mith Wiggs, I know who hit you!"

"Teacher, kin I git a drink?"

It was not until Mrs. Wiggs, with a king tied over her eye, emerged from the bedroom and again took command the order was restored.

"Where is Bethlehem?" she began, reading from an old lesson paper.

"You kin search me!" promptly answered Chris Hazy.

He ignored his remark, and passed to the next, who said, half-doubtfully:

"Ain't it in Alabama?"

"No, it is in the Holy Land," she said.

A sudden commotion arose in the back of the room. Billy Wiggs, by a series of skillful manoeuvres, had succeeded in moving the chair that held one of the planks, and a cascade of small, indignant girls were tobogganing side-wise down the incline. A fight was imminent, but before any trouble occurred Mrs. Wiggs locked Billy in the bedroom and became mistress of the situation.

"What I think you children need is a talk about fussing and fighting. There ain't no use in me teaching what they done a thousand years ago, when you ain't got manners enough to listen at what I'm saying. I rec'lect one time during the war, when the soldiers was coming around the camp, trying their best to keep from freezing to death, a preacher come 'long to hold a service. When he got up to preach, he says, 'Friend's, my text is chilblains. They ain't no use a-preaching religion to men whose whole thought it set on their feet. Now you fellows git some soap an' pour it in yer shoes, an' keep them shoes on till yer feet feel as well; an' the nex' time I come and yer minds'll be better prepared to receive the word of the Lord.'"

"Now that's the way I feel 'bout this here Sunday-school. First an' foremost I am goin' to learn you all manners. Jes' one thought I want you to take away, an' that is, it's sinful to fuss. Now we'll sing. 'Pull for the oar.'"—Selected.

Ruskin's Sermon to the Pews

Once we begin to regard the preacher, whatever his faults, as a man sent with a message to us, which it is a matter of life and death whether we hear or refuse; if we look upon him as set in charge over many spirits in danger of ruin, and having allowed to him but an hour or two in the seven days to speak to them; if we make some endeavor to receive how precious these hours ought to be to him, a small vantage on the side of God, after his flock has been exposed six days together to the full weight of the world's temptations, and he has been forced to watch the thorn and theistle springing in their hearts, and to see what wheat had been scattered there trampled from the wayside by this wildard and the other, and at last, when deathless and weary with the week's labor, they give him this imperfect and rigid hearing, he has but thirty minutes to get at the separate hearts of a thousand men to convince them all of their weakness, to shame them for all their sins, to warn them of all their dangers, to try by this way and that to stir the hard fastenings of those doors where the Master himself has stood and knocked, yet none opened, and to call at the opening of those dark streets where wisdom herself has stretched forth her hands and no man regarded—thirty minutes to raise the dead in—let us but once understand and feel this, and we shall look with changed eyes upon that flippery of gay furniture about the place from which the message of judgment must be delivered, which either breathes upon the dry bones that they may live, or, if ineffectual, remains recorded in condemnation, perhaps against the utterer and listener alike, but assuredly against one of them. We shall not so easily bear with the silk and gold upon the seat of judgment; nor with ornament of oratory in the mouth of the messenger; we shall wish that his words may be simple even when they are sweetest, and the place from which he speaks like a marble rock in the desert, about which the people have gathered in their thirst.—From "The Stones of Venice."

Mrs. Miller had received a small check from her father, and went down to the bank to cash it without consulting her husband. The bank teller was very polite, but was obliged to insist that for business purposes Mrs. Miller was a perfect stranger to him. When Mr. Miller returned at night his wife poured out to him her grievances, which had accumulated and gathered momentum during the day. "Well, my dear," he answered "I'll cash the check for you." "But that does not make up for all the time I lost. I couldn't do all my shopping while I was down town because I didn't have quite money enough. The idea of having such a stupid man handling all the money!" "But, my dear," said Mr. Miller, in apologetic sympathy for the teller, "it is one of the rules of the bank not to pay money to strangers. You have to be identified first." "Identified! Identified! Couldn't the man read? There was my name right on the back of the check. How stupid you men are! And that wasn't all—" "But, Annie," broke in Mr. Miller, "how could the teller be sure it was your name just because you wrote it?" "Well, maybe he couldn't. But I'd just stopped in at the photographer's and got those pictures of me that you said looked exactly like me; and I showed the man all six of them. I explained that if I had only one I might have stolen it, but the six all together proved that I must be the one that signed my name on the check. The stupid way the man looked at me was simply ridiculous."—Youth's Companion.

Our Young People.

Dorothea Denby's Qualifications.

By Mary Morrison.

There! I wonder how many more times we shall have to move that popcorn. This is the third time. You said last spring when we lugged it up into the woodhouse chamber that you would dispose of it right away and here it is yet. Probably the rats will get at it here too and we shall have to tote it off somewhere else."

Dorothea Denby sat on the bottom of the upturned bushel basket and delivered this short impromptu oration to an unappreciative audience of one who ran nimbly down the attic stairs. She got up and followed deliberately.

Charlie Denby stood before the mirror in the family sitting room, restoring to order his usually carefully arranged hair which unusual exercise had reduced to a riotous disorder.

Dorothea surveyed him with disdain. "You should have been named 'Clarrissa, the fair.' Of all the ridiculously vain specimens, a curly-headed boy beats everything," she said scornfully. "Why don't you sell that popcorn?" she continued, returning to the charge.

"Echo answers 'why.' For lack of a purchaser, my practical sister," answered Charlie, whirling about on his heel and regarding her whimsically.

"You haven't tried to find one," she retorted.

"Don't be inaccurate in your statements, my dear. To your knowledge I have written to three different parties in regard to it, and they each and all replied 'Nixey,'" he said, with an air of conscious rectitude.

"Three different parties in two years. You don't call that trying, I hope. You ought to have written to three a month. Why don't you get a new popper and sell hot buttered popcorn? I would if I was a boy and needed something to do as bad a you do."

"That's it, my dear. If I was a boy perhaps I would; being a man it is entirely out of the question you see."

"A man!" Dorothea stared in amazement.

Charlie put on his hat and tilted it a bit to one side, observing the effect, then he waved her a farewell "Ta, ta," and ran down the front steps.

"Oh dear! now he will hunt up Tom Shaw and the rest of the day will be wasted and there are those potatoes to pick up and two trees of apples to pick," lamented Dorothea, looking after him.

"They have got to be taken care of today whether or no," she said, perching her cape bonnet over her eyes and girding herself valiantly. "Mother needn't know whether it was Charlie did it or I; it will only worry her," she decided.

Her idea of the morning recurred to her at intervals all the forenoon. Here were twenty-eight bushels of fine popcorn going to waste because nobody came forward and wanted to buy it. Popped and put upon the market it would furnish employment and a considerable income for several months. Of course "a man" could not be expected to descend to so trivial an occupation. A boy might do so without compromising his dignity. Charlie had better go back to knee pants; it would pay him better than sauntering about the streets waiting for something to turn up. If a boy might improve such a chance to better his fortune, why not a girl, especially since her needs were greater than her income. She looked down at her short skirt contemptively. Why not indeed! She wasn't a young lady with hampering long skirts; she was only a girl. She could pop corn deliciously and offer it for sale. It was surely as honorable to sell as to buy. If people liked popcorn why not sell it to them as well as sandwiches or chocolates? She had no false pride. "Hot buttered popcorn," she cried out suddenly as she reached for a big Canada Red on an upper limb. Bijou at the foot of the tree gave a short bark and looked eagerly about for strangers. Dorothea laughed, but her cheeks were crimson. She imagined herself with an audience of strangers such as trooped off the twelve o'clock train at the G. R. and I. depot every day. This was the most appropriate place for her venture; passengers stopped here twenty minutes for dinner. "Hot buttered popcorn," she called again, and offered her basket of apples to a belated robin who hopped suspiciously away. She was getting used to it; her cheeks did not flush up this time. Pshaw! it was nothing. What if she was a girl. Girls had to live and help take care of their mothers too sometimes. People were sure to buy. Why hadn't she thought of it before? She could almost hear the jingle of silver in her pocket. Of course it was Charlie's popcorn, but he would be only too glad to sell it to her at the same price he had made Petchel and Comstock. He had offered it to them at forty cents a bushel, but they were already overstocked.

The apples rattled into the basket with nervous haste; she was anxious to begin her new venture. The first thing was to persuade her mother that it was a perfectly proper and desirable thing to do; a task which she felt might be difficult, but difficulties were nothing. She expected them; she expected also to rout them all, foot and horse. She carried the last basket of apples down cellar and deposited them in the barrel. It was not full; the two trees had not filled three barrels. She wished there were more. Apples were a poor crop this year, she thought regretfully; then she ran up stairs. "Mother, do you like hot buttered popcorn?" she asked.

"Why certainly; have you been popping some?"

"No, but I'm going to," she declared going back down stairs. When she returned she carried a crimson cornucopia full of creamy-hearted kernels of perfectly popped corn. "It will just melt in your mouth," she said, as she offered it to her mother.

"It is certainly very nice indeed, dear. This is the way Uncle Melvin used to like it. He used to enjoy popcorn," Mrs. Denby said dreamily, tasting the homely dainty.

"Almost everybody likes popcorn, Dorothea kept silence a moment, then asked the question which was trem- on her tongue's end. "Would you d very much if I sold popcorn, moth-

You?" Mrs. Denby looked at Doro- a as if she had taken sudden leave of senses.

Yes, me. We have got twenty-eight hells of popcorn that the rats are car- g off every day. We can't sell it in ear; I can prepare it deliciously. y should I not reap the benefit of my wledge instead of giving it to the s, and going without things and let- g you sew yourself to death and— rying just because I am a girl?" othea stopped pantingly and looked er mother, who returned her look ightfully.

Of course there isn't," declared othea gleefully. "I'll begin to get dy now, this very minute," she cried itedly.

"It will be very charming, mother," declared Dorothea.

"What would Uncle Melvin say?" suddenly asked Mrs. Denby in dismayed tones.

"Our unknown uncle will never dream that his niece, Miss Dorothea Denby, has fallen so low as to sell popcorn on the street. Denver is very, oh very, far away mother. Uncle Melvin does not trouble himself with our downfalls or uprisings, and we don't want him to," she added proudly.

Mrs. Denby smiled, but the smile ended in a sigh. Denver was far away indeed. It had been years since she had seen her only brother.

It was the first day of October when Dorothea started out. A white woolen sweater, a navy blue skirt and a big basket of crimson cornucopias made a patriotic combination which won for her a second glance that was instantly met by a courteous exhibit of her wares, usually with the result of adding a nickel to her rapidly increasing wealth.

Charlie watched her with interested disapproval from the safe shelter of Griggsby's tobacco store. She would be able to pay him his price for the popcorn perhaps, but he did not care to go out on the street until she had gone on.

Dorothea Denby selling popcorn. The idea was startling at first to her mates and associates; then the very novelty of the situation won for her customers galore who always returned for more, after tasting the contents of the gay colored cornucopias. She gave such very good measure too; no stingy little five-cent paper bags. Dorothea knew how to make her goods attractive and a few kernels of popcorn more or less did not signify. It was easy to make a customer; the next thing was to keep him.

After the first few days she grew to like her work; there were so many chances to flash a bit of sunshine into waste places. A red bag of popcorn was not much, but Timmy Ryan had regarded Dorothea as an angel ever since she found him crying on the postoffice steps over the loss of a dime which was to have bought starch for Mrs. Ryan's washings. It was her last ten cents; and now she would lose her customers. Timmy could not imagine washings without starch. Under the exhilarating effects of Dorothea's unexpected generosity he went back to the crossing and searched with new vigor, a proceeding which was rewarded with success. That it was due in some mysterious manner, to the gift he never for a moment doubted, as it probably was. Sympathy, kindness and renewed courage—they come along as a natural sequence.

It was some time before she could summon courage to go to the depot for customers, but she finally went. She longed for new fields to conquer. Travelers bought popcorn; she had it for sale, she argued. It was an appetizing refreshment and helped to please weary, fretful children. Meanwhile the dimes and half dimes grew apace. Charlie looked askance at the plethoric condition of Dorothea's purse. Forty cents was a pitifully small sum. Dorothea was making twenty times forty. He seemed to have been done out of something. Forty cents for a whole bushel of popcorn was a ridiculous sum. He did not realize that it was the three "p's," push, perseverance and pluck that made it valuable. These commodities he had not offered for sale. Crude popcorn was a drug in the market. One day a train containing a company of emigrants stopped at the depot; Swedes and Norwegians, bound for the far West. Several of their number got off the car and walked about the station. A Norse woman and her five children came into the waiting room. The children, tired with their long journey, clumped about in their queer clumsy shoes and eyed Dorothea and her basket wistfully. Here at last was something familiar. She offered it to the woman, but she shook her head; she had no money for extras. There were but few in the waiting room. At a window an elderly gentleman in a gray suit stood looking out at the waiting train. Then he consulted a timetable which he took from his pocket. Finally he sat down with an air of resignation. He had decided to wait for the Western bound "flyer" which came through at three o'clock. His eyes took in the occupants of the room from the stolid Norse woman and her brood to a white-haired old lady in spectacles who was anxiously interrogating the ticket agent as to the exact time the train would wait. Then they rested on Dorothea with her basket of popcorn. Something about the bright girlish face struck a vibrating chord in his heart and he turned to watch her as she contemplatively surveyed the family of emigrants. She was evidently considering the feasibility of making a small donation.

Just then a gay party of school girls came into the room. They had come to see one of their number off on the train. Seeing Dorothea, they pounced upon her gleefully. "Hot buttered popcorn. Here Dottie, Lou wants some to take on her journey." "Give me two." "Blue cornucopias to-day; run out of red paper?" "Oh Dottie, how do you keep them so crisp? We'll take all you've got."

But Dorothea drew back. "Wait a minute, girls, part of this is disposed of." She went over to the row of small Norwegians and put one into each hand and one into the hard hand of the mother; then she went back to the girls.

"Say, Dottie, did you get your pay in advance?" whispered Lou.

Dorothea nodded as she distributed bags of corn and gathered up nickels.

The whistle gave a warning toot and the girls rushed out on the platform. "Oh, dear! have I got to go with those people?" Lou's tones were expressive of disgust as she stood in the car door.

At the foot of the steps two small Norwegians whom she had overturned were crying affrightedly, while the mother was vainly trying to climb into the car with the three smallest. Dorothea sat her basket down beside the man with the gray suit. Then she sprang across the platform and picking up a small Norseman in her arms carried him up the steps and into the car.

Why Dorothea Denby! How do you but they have cholera or smallpox something? Don't put them down e." Lou shrank back in her seat and her portmanteau up protectingly side her; but Dorothea did not stop. She put the child into an empty seat and stepped back after another.

When the train moved on a Norse man leaned far out of the car window and watched her out of sight. She was loath to lose sight of the first welcoming face of this strange, new country. When Dorothea went back into the car the strange man was absent eating popcorn.

"I have been trespassing, I'm afraid," said apologetically, holding out to her a nickel in payment for the sack he had in his hand. "This tastes familiar in some way; something as I remember it used to taste thirty years ago before a hickory log in the old fireplace at home. I never knew but one person who could flavor it exactly like this and his name was Dorothea Pennington."

She looked at her curiously. Dorothea gave a gasp of surprise. "Mother!" she exclaimed excitedly.

"If your mother's name was Dorothea Pennington, I think it was."

"It is Dorothea Denby now," explained Dorothea.

"Yes I know, and you are—"

"Dorothea Denby too, and you are—?"

"I am Uncle Melvin. You have heard of me perhaps." Dorothea nodded gravely, "You are very like your mother and your father."

"He has been dead several years." A title note of protest had crept into her voice. "That he should not know—and his only sister, too."

Melvin Pennington felt its implied reproach. "There child! it is disgraceful, I know, but the fact is, Charlie and I, well, we did not hit it together in any way, and we let the years carry us apart. I've regretted it a good many times. I see you have gone into business for yourself," he added briskly. "Anything in the line of business appealed to Melvin Pennington."

Dorothea nodded; her cheeks flamed warningly. If Uncle Melvin meant to make any unpleasant reflections she was ready to answer him, but Uncle Melvin had no such intentions.

"I think you are making a success of it," he said.

"Yes I am," declared Dorothea.

"Haven't got a big contract on hand, have you?"

"Only until I get something better."

"That's right. It's a good thing to know when to take hold and when to let go. Opportunity travels on the fast train."

Uncle Melvin did not go West on the ten o'clock "flyer." Two days after he asked Dorothea a question which took her breath.

"How would the position of forewoman in my canning factory suit you?" he asked.

"Could I? What would I have to do?"

"Oh, do you really think I could?"

Uncle Melvin's eyes twinkled. "Why don't you ask me what your salary is to be? That is usually a more important question than the duties of the office. Yes, certainly, I think you could fill the place or I should not have suggested the matter. You have the necessary qualifications—faithfulness, perseverance, and human sympathy; the minor details are easily learned. Your salary will be fifty dollars a month to start on."

Dorothea stood dumb. She could only look her joy through tear-filled eyes; then she turned to her mother. "Oh, mother, we will be perfectly happy won't we?" she said.

"Tut, tut! young lady. I haven't said anything about taking your mother along."

Dorothea's cheeks blazed up, then turned pale. She straightened up. "You don't mean we are not to go together, Uncle Melvin?" she asked quietly. Three were still several bushels of popcorn to dispose of.

"Your mother has decided to take a trip for her health back to old Chantauqua county for a couple of months and Charlie here has concluded to buy back the rest of that popcorn and open a popcorn route in Denver. If he makes a success of that, maybe we will be ready for something else," he said quizzically.

Dorothea looked from one to the other in bewilderment; then she went and sat down.

"I'm ready for all the wonderful things that can possibly happen now. What comes next she demanded.

"Dinner," declared Uncle Melvin, solemnly.—The Interior.

The Life of An Ant Queen.

How long may an ant queen live? In their natural habitat some queens doubtless have short lives; but by reason of the protection afforded them, and the seclusion enforced by the workers, they probably live much longer than other members of the community. Within artificial surroundings they attain a comparatively long life. The oldest emmet queen known to science was one preserved under the care of Sir John Lubbock, later Lord Avebury. A number of years ago, during a visit to this distinguished naturalist at his country-seat High Elms, Kent, the writer for the first time saw this venerable sovereign, living in the ingenious artificial formicary which had been prepared for her. She was then in the prime of life, as it afterward appeared, being seven years old.

In the summer of 1887 Sir John was again visited, this time at his town house in London. After greetings, he was asked about his royal pet.

"I have sad news to tell you," he answered.

"What? Is the queen dead?"

"She died only yesterday. I have not had the heart to tell the news as yet even to my wife."

Having offered my hearty condolence, I asked to see the dead queen. Sir John led the way to the room where his artificial nests were kept. The glass case which contained the special formicary in which the old ant had lived was opened up. Lying in one of the larger open spaces or rooms was the dead queen. She was surrounded by a crowd of workers, who were tenderly licking her, touching her with their antennae, and making other demonstrations as if soliciting her attention, or desiring to wake her out of sleep. Poor, dumb, loving, faithful creatures! There was no response. Their queen mother lay motionless beneath their demonstrations.

"They do not appear to have discovered that she is really dead," remarked Sir John. Afterward he wrote me of another queen which died at the age of fourteen. The ants dragged her body about with them when they moved until it fell to pieces.—Rev. Dr. H. C. McCook, in Harper's Magazine for June.

Children's Letters.

Point, S. C., June 6, 1903.

Dear Standard:

My aunt takes your nice paper and I enjoy reading the little letters very much. I also like to read the little stories. I have recited perfectly the child's catechism and received a nice little Testament, and I am studying the shorter catechism now. My pastor is Rev. W. B. Arrowood. I like him very much. I like to go to school but it is out now. I will close.

Your friend,

Eunice Craig.

Point, S. C., June 6, 1903.

Dear Standard:

We take your nice paper and I read the children's letters first of all, and then the stories. I go to Sunday-school nearly every Sunday. I have recited the child's catechism and received a nice Testament and am studying the shorter catechism now; and Cousin Mary Neal Bigger is my Sunday-school teacher and Rev. W. B. Arrowood is our pastor. I will ask a question, Where is Grass-hopper found? I will close.

Your friend,

Mary Glenn Craig.

Hickory, N. C., June 14, 1903.

Dear Standard:

Our town is a delightful place, situated in Western North Carolina. We came here a year ago, from Moore county, and the longer we stay the better we like it. We have about three thousand inhabitants, with nearly every kind of mill you can imagine, eight churches and five schools and colleges. A great many people come here to get the benefit of the fine climate and water. There is to be an excursion from Lenoir to Barium Springs on the 26th inst., which will take in all the towns along the route. That includes Hickory, so my brother Willie and I are going. We both work, he at the Radical Remedy Co., and I at Mr. Bowles' dry goods store, so we have part of the money we make. Our pastor, Rev. W. T. Matthews is going with us on the excursion. For fear you may tire of my first letter, will close, for I may want to write another some time.

Sincerely,

Charles Matthews Hassell.

Age 10 years.

Rosehill, N. C.

Dear Standard:

I have written to you once before and I thought that I would write again. My sister Sudie wrote to you a few weeks ago and I want to write now. I recited the child catechism and received a nice little Testament. Our pastor gave it to me. I certainly was proud of it and have been studying the shorter catechism. I have not learned it yet. We Presbyterians are going to have us a chapel here sometime. We are working for it now. I hope they will commence building it real soon. We do not have any Presbyterian services here at all now. It doesn't seem right not to have any. I have four sisters and no brothers. My little brother died. We all missed him so much. He was such a dear little thing. We all thought so much of him. We live out in the country, one mile from Rosehill. We have been living out here one year, this spring. We lived in Rosehill before we moved out here.

Your little friend,

Alma Southerland.

A Country Birthday.

By Abbie Farwell Brown.

When Charlie was seven years old he had a little birthday party, which was great fun. When he was eight years old he had a bigger one, which was even more fun. His ninth birthday party was larger and still jollier. So Charlie was looking forward to his tenth birthday, hoping for the best time of all.

But just two months before the June of his tenth birthday Charlie's papa and mamma moved with him into the country to live, in a tiny house, on a tiny farm, with the nearest neighbor half a mile away. And all the little girls and boys who used to play with Charlie and help to make jolly his birthday parties were left far behind.

Charlie was delighted with his new home. He loved the barn and the meadow and the little garden which his papa had given him. There were no little boys or girls near, and he was not going to the new school until fall. But he had the farmyard folk for his friends, and all outdoors for his playground. It was wonderful for a little city boy. Charlie had so many other things to amuse him that he had quite forgotten about his birthday. But one day he came running into the house crying:

"O mamma! How can I have a birthday party next week? There is no one here to ask for a party!" and his little face was drawn into sad puckers.

"I have thought of that, Charlie," said his mother, gravely. "I think we cannot have quite the same sort of party that we had in the city."

"O mamma! No children, no music, no games and cake and ice cream? What is the good of a birthday if I can't have a party?"

"But that is a city party," said mamma. "We are not in the city now, we are living in the country. There are other kinds of parties. We don't want a city party here, do we, boy dear?"

But Charlie was silent, remembering the jolly parties which the children had enjoyed in the long, bright city parlor which had been his home before papa lost his money.

"What will it be like?" he asked at last. "What happens at a birthday party in the country?"

"O, that we can tell better when the day comes," answered mamma wisely. "It will not be a bit like your other parties, I am sure of that. But I think it will be nice. Wait and see, Charlie Boy, wait and see."

There was a whole week to wait, a week in which the world seemed making ready for Charlie's party. The trees began to put on their gayest green, the flowers were prinking in chins. But the four kittens had nothing to say for themselves.

"They are too little to write, I think," said mamma. "You know they have only been here three weeks. But they will come to your party. Don't forget to call on the tallest Sunflower in the garden."

So Charlie ran down to his little garden, which looked prettier, fresher, gay-er, than ever before—all in honor of Charlie's tenth birthday. The head of the tallest Sunflower seemed to be nodding merrily at him, and when he came nearer he saw that a little white note was tied about her neck with a yellow ribbon. Charlie stretched up on tiptoe and untied it. This is what he read:

Dear Charlie Boy: What a lucky chap you are to have us flower guests at your party! A whole garden full, all your own! Don't you think the little city boys and girls would be proud to be here with you now, out of doors in the fresh air? We give our sweetest perfume to you. You can pick as many of us as you like. Then you must go to the meadow and see what old Brindle-cow has to say to you.

Your Flower Friends.

"They write better than I can," thought Charlie. "I must learn to make my letters as neatly. How silly to be beaten by the Flowers!"

Now with Carlo and the kittens frisking at his heels, and with a pretty nosegay of his own flowers in his buttonhole, Charlie led his party to the meadow. There was the old black and white cow with her little new bossy. "You shall come to my party," laughed Charlie, going up to Brindle and stroking her nose. Then he saw tied to one of her horns a bit of paper, which she shook at him with a low "Moo!" Charlie tore it off and read:

Friend Charlie: Bossy and I come to your party. And my gift is to be the bowl of milk which you will drink for your supper. You could not have that, so foamy and hot, in the city, could you, Charlie? Now go to the further corner of the barnyard and see what you will find.

"My party seems to be everywhere!" sang Charlie happily, as he danced away from the meadow toward the barnyard. What many friends he had! As he came near, the hens and chickens, the ducks and geese ran out to meet him; the horses neighed in their stalls and the little pigs grunted in the sty. "Yes, you are my party," said Charlie, in answer to their noisy greetings, "and I thank you for your kind birthday messages."

In the further corner of the yard beside the chicken-house was something which Charlie had never noticed before. It was a tiny covered pen, with netting about the sides. Ho peeped through the netting and what do you think? There was a mother rabbit and four tiny babies cuddling together and nibbling at a bunch of carrots. How their little noses wiggled! How bob-tailed and furry they were! "O, are you my guests, too?" cried Charlie, hardly able to believe his eyes. "I always wanted rabbits when I lived in the city."

Then he saw a piece of paper tied to the netting, and on it were these words:

Good morning, Charlie. We are little strangers, the last guests to arrive at your party. We have come to stay, Charlie, if you will be good to us. Now are you not glad that you are a little country boy?

And Charlie cried, "Yes, I am! O, I am glad to have this country birthday!" And there he stayed with Carlo and the kittens, enjoying his party beside the rabbit-hutch, until the dinner bell rang.

"Well, Charlie, have you had a good birthday party?" asked mamma at the table.

"It is the best one of all!" he answered. Then he went around and gave his papa and his mamma each a big hug. But the best part of his party was, that it lasted all that day and for many days afterward. And that is why a country birthday is the best kind to have.—The Interior.

How Mrs. Mayhew Was Honored.

By Sallie Campbell.

Tim and Teddie Mayhew had not gone to Sunday-school very long. They used to live in the country, you know. Perhaps that was the reason why they paid so much more attention to the lesson, and seemed to think of it so much oftener during the week, than a good many of the boys that I know.

One Sunday their teacher had been talking to them about the Fifth Commandment. It took Tim and Teddie a long time to get home that afternoon, they had so much to say to each other. Their mother had come to the gate and was looking down the street for them. The boys laughed softly when they saw her.

"She doesn't know,—does she?" whispered Tim.

"We'll make it a perfect surprise to her."

"She's nicer than any of the others' mothers," whispered Teddie back. "We aren't going to let everybody else be honoring their mother and not honor ours some, I guess."

Then they started to meet her on a run.

Sunday was a nice day in the Mayhew family. On other days Mrs. Mayhew had to go out to work, or else she was busy washing at home. But on Sunday everything was different, and it was lovely.

At supper Teddie said:

"Mother, don't you ever have a birthday?"

"Dear me, I guess so!" she laughed. "But there isn't time to think of everything."

"When is it?" asked Tim.

"The end of next month,—the 26th."

Teddie and Tim looked down at their slates, and thought: "That suits beautifully!"

Pennies were scarce among the Mayhews.

"I'd rather it would be pennies," Mrs. Mayhew used to say, "than a good many other things,—family feelings for one. I don't know how ever a poor, hard-working widow woman and her at the time slipped by and they were far behind the fifteen cents which needed. For you may be sure that had long ago picked out the "sur-" in the shop-window. It was a eous bird of paradise in china, with e wonderful wings, brooding over a which the polite clerk told them a "jewel-case,—for the ladies to put r jewels in, you know."

What's jewels, Ted?" asked Tim when they were staring outside again iringly. Diamonds," answered Teddie prompt- "and—and crowns, and such egs".

But mother hasn't got any," said

I'm going to buy her some, though, as I get big," answered Teddie.

So am I," said Tim. "And then ll have the jewel-case all ready to them in,—won't she?

o, that important point being settled, y morning they looked in at the shop ously, and every morning they saw r bird of the brilliant plumage seat- afely on her nest. But the fifteen nies were slow to come. By the mid- of the month they were only five; ther week went by and then there e six days left.

What'll we do," said Tim, "if we 't earu ten cents anyhow at all?"

We've got to earn it," said Teddie, y determined look on his freckled y. And Tim felt satisfied that it ld be earned.

u Saturday a great ball match was e played, and Teddie and Tim, like rest of the town, were wild about it. y had picked out the very telegraph e from the top of which they could ch the game with as royal satisfac- as though they had each paid a dol- for a seat on the grand stand.

But on Saturday morning Bill Lowe pped them on the street:

"I say," he asked, "do you two fel- s want to earn ten cents apiece?" Did they!

"Well now, if you'll stay around lace this afternoou, and look after outfit, I'll give you that."

Bill's "place" was a modest peanut- l-candy stall on a busy corner of main street.

"I want to catch the trade," he ex- ined, "down to the last minute before game, and right after. This town's ng to be chock full of people, I can you. During the game I'll be selling the grounds myself, and I'm looking somebody to leave in charge. You two could do it. There won't be much to do, only just keep anybody from pick- ing things up. What do you say?"

It was a little hard, but they did not hesitate long. The bargain was soon struck, and Bill went his way.

"I'd have had to give any one else two or three times the money! Poor babies! they ain't cut their eye teeth yet on trade, the way some of us have. They'll get rich faster by and by, when they know more."

But Teddie and Tim were pretty rich that afternoon.

They bought the bird of paradise on the way home. But it took a great deal of thinking to know what to do with the other ten cents, which they were both agreed must be expended on the birthday celebration. Toward the end Tim waxed in favor of "vi'lets,—one of those little bouquets of 'em like the other ladies wear." Teddie was uncer- tain of the wisdom of this choice, but he yielded, at last, good-naturedly, and "vi'lets" it was.

On the morning of the 26th the presentations were made in due form, Teddie being master of ceremonies, and though the boys had expected much from their mother in the way of sur- prise and pleasure she more than fulfilled it all. Of course, they had meant to say nothing about the ball game, but secrets among the Mayhews were not fashionable, and, having just trium- phantly come out on one, it was not to be marveled at that they could not at once support another. And so by and by they had told her all about Bill Lowe and his bargain. Then a shocking thing happened, something that they could not remember ever happening be- fore,—Mrs. Mayhew began to cry!

Dear! Dear! What could be the mat- ter?

"Nothing, nothing!" sobbed Mrs. Mayhew, "Only to think that of all the nice boys living in all the world to-day, me own two darlin' sons would beat the whole of 'em!"

Oh! if that was all, that was all right.

I dare say, though, some of you think that Teddie and Tim were very foolish boys not to give their mother something more useful than a bird of paradise and a houquet of violets. But they were just little fellows, you see. And then, besides, if you could have known how many, many times afterwards, when the work was hard and the day was long, Mrs. Mayhew remembered her jewel-case on the mantel-piece, and the bunch of brown pressed flowers in her Bible and how it took the ache out of her head and the "kink" out of her back, and made her forget that the minutes were slow, perhaps you would have thought that they were pretty useful, after all.—The Sunday-school Times.

Clippings.

Brown — I understand that Senator Green wanted you to act as his private secretary.

Simmons—He did; but I wouldn't accept the position, because I would have to sign everything Green, per Simmons. —Selected.

It was discovered during the examination of some colored teachers in Mississippi that the imprisonment of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John was the most important event during the reign of Mary, Queen of England!—Exchange.

Clarice: "Clarence, we must compel those lawyers to settle father's estate."

Clarence: "Oh, no; as long as they don't settle it, we can imagine there's something left of it."—Detroit Free Press.

A showman to the jungle went
And caught a fierce young gnu;
Said he, 'I'll teach him to perform,
And sell him to the Zoo.'
This man was very much surprised,
And quite delighted, too,
For, lo! each quick and novel trick
The new gnu knew!
—St. Nicholas.

Rev. Dr. Goodman—I'm so sorry your husband isn't here, Mrs. Smith. I'm afraid you forgot to tell him I intended to preach to-day on municipal problems.

Mrs. Smith—Indeed, I did not. I told him that the last thing, but he said he would stay at home and read his Bible. —Town and Country.

At a banquet a dean, speaking of the criticism sometimes made regarding ministers, said he had no doubt the theological seminaries could turn out better ministers if they had better material to work with. "You must remember, though," he said, "that we have nothing to make ministers out of except laymen."

Mr. Smith—in street car—Madam, take my seat.

Mrs. Jones—who has been standing fifteen minutes—No, thanks. I get off at the next corner.

Mr. Smith—That's all right. So do I.—Chicago Journal.

A stranger asked whether the congregation understood the sermons of their rector, a very erudite preacher. "Understand 'im?" said the verger. "Not we! We don't want to understand 'im: that wouldn't do for us! No, no! We pays for the best, and we has the best."

Mamma: "Don't be so selfish. Let your baby brother play with your marbles a little while." Tommy: "But he means to keep them always." Mamma: "O, I guess not." Tommy: "I guess yes, 'cause he's swallered 'em."

A visitor to a farm was especially struck by the great ruggedness and strength of one of the stalwart harvest hands, and said to the farmer: "That fellow ought to be chuckfull of work." "He is," replied the farmer, "or he ought to be, because I hain't never been able to get none out of him."

A Mile With Me

By Henry van Dyke.

WHO will walk a mile with me
Along life's merry way?
A comrade blithe and full of glee,
Who dares to laugh out loud and free,
And let his frolic fancy play,
Like a happy child, through the flowers gay
That fill the field and fringe the way
Where he walks a mile with me.

And who will walk a mile with me
Along life's weary way?
A friend whose heart has eyes to see
The stars shine out o'er the darkening lea,
And the quiet rest at the end o' the day,—
A friend who knows and dares to say,
The brave, sweet words that cheer the way
Where he walks a mile with me.

With such a comrade, such a friend,
I fain would walk till journeys end,
Through summer sunshine, winter rain,
And then?—Farewell, we'll meet again!

BY PERMISSION OF THE AUTHOR.

Event and Comment.

In the remarks elsewhere about Organic Union we got to mention two differences between the Northern and Southern Churches. The Northern Church has not passed some resolutions about the use of tobacco at the Southern Church would never stand. And in the ministry belong, in almost solid bodies, to opposite political parties.

That was a curious crank that the Sultan took the other day in insisting that the word "Macedonia" could not appear in the Bible that is being circulated in Turkey. There is now no such country as Macedonia according to the Turkish theory. The Sultan might probably find several other things in the Bible that would be offensive to the sensibilities of the Sublime Porte.

The Central Presbyterian congratulates itself on a new use to which it is put. The birds are building their nests with it in Virginia. When ungrateful men throw the paper away the grateful birds pick it up and rear their young ones on its first page. The next thing we know the birds will be warbling prose poetry about the grass and the leaves and the flowers and the brooks and the sky and the birds themselves.

The Presbyterian Journal rises to remark that "The Westminster Confession as revised we believe to be the strongest humanly-constructed document on earth." The late lamented Dr. Purves declared that the amendment that was proposed and afterwards carried out was like "picking flies off the pillar of truth." The Journal looks at the pillar now instead of the flies and says, "My! How strong it is, now that the flies have flown."

One of the most interesting things Dr. W. W. Moore told us about Egypt, the other day, was the work that the United Presbyterian Church is doing for the people. Other Protestant denominations have yielded this territory very largely to them, and they are doing a most excellent work, one of the most successful in all the East. We gathered that it is an ordinary thing to hear the Psalms of David floating out across the Nile in song.

The Northern Church is learning as the years go by. The Interior says that it dreaded the passage of any resolutions touching Mormonism for fear they might react some time as involving the principles of religious liberty. There is only one more step to be taken before reaching Southern Presbyterian ground, namely, that the Church has nothing to do with a man's civil rights, even the right of revolution, and that it is very uncivil for a Church to call him a traitor and after the war was over.

The Reformed Episcopal Church held its triennial meeting this year in Chicago the latter part of May. It elected by ballot, without nomination, Rev. H. S. Hoffman, D. D., of Philadelphia, to the office of Missionary Bishop and he was consecrated in Philadelphia on June 13, by Bishops Fallows, Stevens and Sabine, with a large body of Presbyters, as our Reformed Episcopal brethren prefer to call them, instead of using the abbreviation "priest." And that "consecration" is all regular, men and brethren of the Protestant Episcopal Church, because the first Reformed Episcopal Bishop just ran off with the power of confirmation and consecration that had been handed down through the ages to him, and how could it be taken away from him?

The Congregationalist seems to get a grain of satisfaction out of the fact that the Illinois lynchings occurred, one "in Santa Fe, on the Mississippi," and the other in the "southern part of Illinois." The Mississippi flows in a southerly direction and so both lynchings were "southern." It is said also that the leader of the Delaware mob was a Virginian, though the people who know his native state are unacquainted with his name. Southern crimes of this sort are at least not accompanied with hypocrisy.

The Living Church has these directions for an enquiring lay reader: "He should place the alms basin on the credence; not on the altar. He should offer the closing prayers from outside the altar rail."

Now we wonder if it makes as much difference what the alms basin is put on as how much is put in it, or where the petitioner stands in relation to the altar rail as compared with where he stands in relation to the Hearer of Prayer. Is it not possible still, as in the olden time, for the word of God to be made of none effect through such traditions?

It may not be generally known that Helen Keller is a Southern girl and the daughter of a Confederate soldier. She was not born blind and deaf but became so through an illness when she was nineteen months old. The one word that she seemed to remember from infancy was the word "water," and though she pronounced it less and less distinctly, as she grew older, it was the link that brought her to connect an object with the sign given for it with the fingers, her teacher spelling it for her as the water from a pump streamed over her hand. She is now a beautiful and accomplished girl who can read and write English, French, Latin and Greek, and is a happy, grateful Christian.

Dr. David J. Burrell, of New York, is no unworthy defender of the faith. He strikes straight from the shoulder and his sincerity and manliness are winning him a wide hearing in New York City. Recently he said,

"The young man who attends the Union Theological Seminary in these days and accepts what one of the instructors has recently said as to 'The absurdity of believing the Scriptural account of the supernatural birth of Jesus Christ' would be a colossal fool, in my judgment, to consecrate his life to the preaching of the Gospel."

Of course he meant Union Seminary, New York, not the older and orthodox seminary of the same name in Richmond. But it strikes us that Dr. Burrell is about right.

Speaking of a courtesy which is a common thing in Virginia, the request of the Episcopal Church in Lexington that the members of the Presbyterian Assembly might fill its pulpit, the Southwestern of New Orleans and the Presbyterian of Philadelphia seem equally surprised. The Philadelphia paper says, "This is an almost unheard of act of churchly recognition by an Episcopalian organization and can scarcely be duplicated in the North;" and the New Orleans paper says, "It is a pity that the Virginia Episcopal spirit is not more prevalent." Somehow Virginia Episcopalians have never believed that their religion was incompatible with good manners, or that any "canon" was subversive of the canons of good taste. But the editor of this paper once preached from an Episcopal pulpit, even in North Carolina, though it was explained afterwards that the Church had never been consecrated.

Out With the Saloon. The Anti-Saloon Convention of the State of North Carolina meets in Raleigh on July 7. The importance of the meeting can hardly be over-estimated. The attendance will indicate more or less certainly the interest which the people of this state have in the promotion of sobriety. The earnestness of the meeting will send a thrill to many a locality that is struggling against the evil of the saloon, while a lack of earnestness would chill the ardor of many who are fighting the good fight. Let every community send its delegation of earnest, practical men.

The Anti-Saloon League of the state, as represented by the Executive Committee, feels somewhat gratified with what has already been accomplished. The Watts Act was not all that we wanted, but it gave us the best fighting chance the enemies of the saloon have ever had in North Carolina, while practically wiping out the saloon's rival in evil works, the country distillery. Moreover, the movement has hitherto been conducted with a conservatism that has won the respect and the allegiance of men that are too often repelled from the cause by intemperate fanaticism. The broad platform on which it invites all to stand is that of hostility to the saloon. It is admitted by all students of the liquor problem that the saloon is the worst possible solution of that problem. It is the aim of the good citizen to decrease drunkenness and thereby to diminish the evils that flow from that curse. We have contended that the saloon increases drunkenness, is the great panderer to that vice, and that any other method of handling that problem is perforce better than the worst method. So the League has been in favor of all restrictive measures designed to diminish the evils of the saloon system.

The League has disclaimed any interference with any man's habits or convictions on the subject of total abstinence. It has not undertaken to dictate for any locality the form of redress for the evils of the saloon. It advocates prohibition where that can be obtained by a majority vote of the people and can be enforced after being obtained. It advocates forbidding by law the shipping of liquor into prohibited territory, where there is sufficient local sentiment to support that. It advocates the establishment of a dispensary for those localities, where it is thought that prohibition cannot be voted in or could not be enforced with reasonable strictness. It is even willing to leave to the locality interested the question whether for that particular locality the dispensary is the final solution of the problem or a stepping-stone to prohibition. Where even the dispensary cannot be secured, it is in favor of the early closing of the saloons, the removal of screens and clouded glass and side doors, and the piling up of the license taxes.

But really there is no reason that the saloon should not be voted out of North Carolina altogether and that very soon. We have no city of more than thirty thousand people. Our problems in North Carolina are hardly the problems of the city at all. We have eliminated the illiterate vote that could always be counted on to vote solidly for the perpetuation of the saloons. There are few communities that can count a majority of its registered vote as in favor of the saloon, and these can be reached at length by agitation and education. Our neighbor, South Carolina, has abolished the saloon by an amendment to the constitution itself. The only alternatives there are prohibition and the dispensary. There is no reason why we should not make them the only alternatives in this state, with far larger prohibited territory than South Carolina.

So let the Convention be well attended. If there is no local league to send delegates come on your own responsibility and you will be recognized. In union there is strength. In the elbow-touch is confidence for the battle. Next summer we shall be in the midst of a Presidential campaign in which another State Legislature also is to be elected. We should be able to make such an impression upon those in authority over us or to be in such authority that we shall get whatever else is needed in the way of additional legislation, as well as inspire our friends to greater efforts in the cause.

While these considerations appeal to good citizens generally, there is another appeal and an overwhelming one to the Christian. The greatest enemy to the Kingdom of Christ in all this land is the saloon. Our citizenship is in heaven, in the heavenly Kingdom. Let us be good citizens. Let us resist the enemies of the Kingdom with its promise of righteousness and peace on earth.

It used to be, "Down with the saloon." But the saloon had a way of rising up again after awhile. Let it be, "Out with the saloon," clean out; out of the State and a constitutional bar put up to keep it out. We can get along better without it. We do not need it in our business. Then on to Raleigh. And out with the saloon.

Organic Union. On the invitation of the Cumberland Assembly, though by pre-conceived arrangement, the Northern Assembly appointed a committee on fraternity and union. The Cumberland Assembly did the same thing at the same time. On the invitation of the Cumberland Assembly, the Southern Assembly declined to appoint such a committee, courteously, of course. In answer to overtures from Synods and Presbyteries, the Southern Assembly expressed its willingness to appoint a committee of conference on union with the (Dutch) Reformed Church, whenever that body should signify its desire for such appointment. The Northern Assembly unanimously ratified the amendments to the creed which even the Southwestern Presbyterian does not seriously object to, with the exception, of course, of the foot-note declaring the belief of the Church in universal infant salvation. The Northern Church also appointed a committee of seven members, with the wise Dr. Nichols of St. Louis as chairman, to consider the feasibility of erecting separate Church courts for the colored Presbyterians, a matter which the Interior declares to be somewhat embarrassing on account of the interested comments of the "gallery folk," namely the Southern Presbyterians. So much for the facts. What do they indicate? What is their relation to the question of the union of these different and differing members of the Presbyterian family?

It is to the credit of the Cumberland Church that it has expressed its preference for union with a Calvinistic rather than with an Arminian body. Despite the utterances of many who lean farther towards Arminianism than towards Calvinism, the Church itself has turned down the invitation to join certain Arminian bodies and has really been enthusiastic on the subject of joining the Northern Presbyterian Church.

It is probable that the talk about union with the Dutch Reformed Church will go as far as the appointment of the committees on conference and the conferring of the committees.

But the Standard, in the spirit of honest inquiry as to the mind of the Church, would like to ask a few leading questions by way of suggestion rather than the eliciting of discussion, just now.

Will not the effect of an agitation for union with the Dutch Reformed Church, with its differences in forms of worship and in the standards themselves, finally provoke the question, Is there not a church that is nearer to us by historic ties, having the same forms, or rather want of forms, and the same standards? If union with the Dutch Reformed Church is a good thing, why is not union with the Northern Church a better thing?

Has not the bugbear of doctrinal differences, to be emphasized by credal differences, been demolished by the actual course of events? Does it not seem to be the case, that the Northern Church is coming over to the Southern view of the ecclesiastical relations of the negro race? Does the Southern Church, with all its real or assumed indifference to union with the Northern Church exactly relish the idea of a possible union between that Church and the Cumberland? Have we not had a sneaking feeling that in time, with all differences removed, the two Churches, Northern and Southern, would be re-united, and do we like the prospect of indefinite post-ponement of that dream by reason of the union of the other two? Is there any difference between the views of the pulpit and the pew on this subject of re-union any way? Which is ahead of the other in its grasp of the essential elements of the case? Should union between the Northern and Southern Assemblies take the form of the merging of the two Assemblies into one, or the erecting of a federation of American Presbyterianism, with territorial lines and local self-government for the respective Assemblies, the Northern, the Southern, the Western and the Pacific, with an American Presbyterian Council?

Or shall our Southern Church take the position that the autonomy of the Southern Church is more precious than any privileges it might obtain as part of the larger body? Do we really want any sort of union with anything on earth?

It seems to us that these questions really go to the heart of the matter and that they are worthy of being pondered, while there is no issue before the Church that is being debated and that has to be settled. Of course in intimating that they be made a theme for meditation rather than discussion we do not mean to shut off the discussion from the columns of this paper, if the brethren are minded to discuss it.

Clarkesville and the Presbyterian University.

So far as the Board of Trustees of Clarkesville is concerned the project of the removal of the Southwestern Presbyterian University will not be carried out at an early date. The Board took a unanimous vote against the plan of consolidation at Atlanta and as an answer to the claim that theirs was a university only in name, proceeded to establish colleges of law and medicine in connection with the University. The Board claims that the institution is essential to the work of our Church in the great Mississippi valley. At the same time it deplores the agitation of the subject of removal as having done great harm.

It has been our experience that when agitation is looked upon with so much dread the harm has already been done. Students are essential to an institution; otherwise the endowment fund is diverted far more really than by a change to a location where that fund could do more good. And the number of students is declining at Clarkesville. Nor does it seem that the man needed for this condition can be secured as the head of the institution. Nevertheless, we rather like the spirit of the Clarkesville Board, especially the enterprise that has resulted in the addition of the two departments of law and medicine to the University.

We think that so far as Clarkesville is concerned judgment should be suspended. The controlling Synods that really have the disposal of the institution will not meet until after the session opens. We understand that a large proportion of the alumni are in favor of the consolidation at Atlanta and of course the Board, meeting in Clarkesville, could not help being brought under the influence of the strong local sentiment against removal which is a credit both to the town and to the University. Let it be understood that there will be a fair appeal to the controlling Synods of both Columbia and Clarkesville to decide the matter. The threat about going to the civil courts has accomplished only the setting of some good Presbyterians in a more determined effort to remove it. It is not good to talk about fighting such matters in the civil courts.

Let us see what we shall see next fall at Clarkesville. In the mean time, we understand that sentiment is growing in South Carolina for the consolidation plan.

Since penning this, the article from Dr. Alexander has come to hand. After reading it we see nothing to change in this. The Board is not greater than its creators, the controlling Synods. But we give Dr. Alexander the floor and are glad to open our columns to this matter which is not a Clarkesville nor a Columbia nor an Atlanta matter, but one intimately concerning the whole Southern Church.

Review of Contemporaries.

We really thought that our friend, the editor of the Biblical Recorder, had become converted from the former error of his way. But the closing of the Greensboro Female College was too much for his newspaper instincts and he breaks out again after this fashion:

Greensboro Female College, the Methodist educational institution of the State for women, has fallen. It has failed after nearly sixty years of usefulness.

The State of North Carolina struck it down. The newspapers say that the College failed for want of students. Its debt amounts to $48,000. They know that the direct cause of the closing of the College's doors is the State's Normal and Industrial College.

The State College rises. The Christian College falls. And Christian people go indifferently on!

The Greensboro College was well managed. Men and women worked hard for it. But leading Methodists faltered. One of their editors—now fortunately retired—took to himself great honor for advocating the State's policy; we trust he is happy and proud this morning;—other leading public men, Methodists, editors and politicians, were proud to stand up in North Carolina and claim to be too broad to protest against the State's policy; others fought John C. Kilgo, the one man amongst them who stood boldly for Christian Education, and the man that has saved them, as if he were a criminal. We congratulate them to-day upon their broadness. Methodists might have saved Greensboro Female College. But now it is too late. They are chargeable with its death. But they cannot bring life back again. Christian Education for their women is a dream of the past. The daily paper that calls upon them to build again knows too well that it does not mean what it says. In light of this failure, it would be unworthy of ignorant children. No they have surrendered the education of their women to the State.

The warning is ominous. As went Greensboro Female College so shall the other Christian Colleges go, unless a halt is called upon the State. For the present, Wake Forest, Baptist Female University and Chowan may stand; but let the State go on in its mad career, and nothing can save them. The Greensboro College was worth $125,000; and $40,000 has been expended in improvements. It was strong. It did not die of weakness.

Now, of course, the theory that the State of North Carolina struck down the one Methodist College at Greensboro, is bosh, balderdash, buncombe and other words to that effect. The State Normal undoubtedly increased competition, but competition ought to have been a stimulus instead of demolition. Since the starting of the State Normal the Baptist State University has been built and is in a flourishing condition. And the Presbyterian Church has rehabilitated Peace Institute and Statesville Female College and has built up the colleges at Charlotte and Red Springs to an excellent degree of equipment and of attendance, and has planted a good school at Kenansville. The theory that a State Institution is fatal to a Methodist college and stimulating to five Presbyterian colleges is unworkable.

Seriously, the Biblical Recorder is putting itself against both civilization and common sense in that sort of talk. Why should 175,000 Baptists and 165,000 Methodists be afraid of State competition while 35,000 Presbyterians support their own institutions with increasing success each year and welcome all the aid that the State can give to the cause of education.

P. S. If the editor of the Biblical Recorder and the president of the State Normal each know what a good fellow the other is, we should never hear another word about State aid and the educational millennium would be due.

P. S. again. Why should the Presbyterian Church be able to keep five flourishing female colleges open in North Carolina and the Methodist Church with all its money and its numerical strength celebrate the Two Hundredth anniversary of John Wesley's birth by closing the one such college it had? We hope the answer to that question will be the re-opening of its doors.

The Congregationalist has this to say of a Christian Ancestry:

Any man may well give thanks for a Christian ancestry. It is one of the best gifts of God. It cannot make a man a Christian, but it brought the blessing of the presence of God about his infancy. One may go out of a godly home to evil; but he is not likely to go so far away as others. The ranks of the worst are recruited now and then from the homes of the best, but in vastly less proportion than men sometimes think. The restraint of the home training has formed the mind, if not controlled the spirit, the ways of the Christian life are homelike ways, the Word of God is familiar to the thought. Even the prodigal remembers the peace of home.

Such a gift as the experience of a Christian childhood it is at once a privilege and a duty to pass down to our own children. When the child of a Christian home becomes a home maker, the spirit of the new life should not be less Christian than that of the old. There may not be the same observances, but their equivalent in power to testify for Christ should be employed. Every Christian home stands at the end of long and costly development and attainment. When the evolution ceases, degeneration at once puts in its claim.

Christ takes us where we are. If we inherit good, he asks for service at the level of our good. If we are born with evil tendencies, a large part of our work will be in the overcoming for which he gives us strength. We are never helpless. The powers of the universe are really on our side calling us to be of good courage, to take our place and do our part. Our mere existence is a pledge of an ancestral victory, not in anywise complete, but offering hope in our own conflict. In so far as we recognize our evil tendencies, we know how and what to fight. And in our battle we are fitting ourselves to be factors in the great world victory of Christ.

The Interior deposes as followers as to the elect infant clause in the Southern Assembly:

To be nominally consistent we ought to be very sorry over the refusal of the Southern General Assembly either to amend the "elect infants" clause in the Confession or to add to it an explanatory footnote. But consistent or not, we are not sorry,—not a bit. The course which the Southern commissioners took is the straightest, nearest road,—a regular cut-off, in fact,—to a radical and adequate revision of the old standards, and we are glad to see them traveling that path so rapidly even if they haven't found out yet where they are going. Every time the Southern Assembly declares that it will not alter the ancient Confession it calls the attention of more people to the need of changes in the book, and that results in a stiffer demand for the changes. The agitation for revision was more insistent at Lexington this year than the agitation which the Assembly at Jackson last year thought it was suppressing, and what is more important, it has a wider range, attacking more of the Confession's vulnerable points. Now, thanks again to the stimulus of denial, it is very certain that next year's meeting at Mobile will have to reckon with still more positive, more inclusive, and more numerous proposals for revision. Thus rising from year to year, the flood will finally overflow the dam, and the necessary relief will come with a rush just as it has come in the Northern Church. And our Southern friends will be just as happy over it then as all of our folks are now. We don't worry over them in the least; they are predestinated to come out all right.

It is just as well to keep the record straight by say-ng that the Interior fought for a "radical revision" of the Confession and was overwhelmingly defeated by the reaction towards conservatism largely produced by Interior radicalism, one of the most conspicuous proofs of which is the present conservatism of the Interior which is able to imagine the amendments just adopted as a "radical revision."

It is the claim of some of the friends and advocates of the now accomplished Revision of the Confession of Faith that it leaves the teachings of that venerable symbol untouched. Why, then, does the Cumberland Church instantly drop weapons and extend arms for fraternal embrace of their ancient foes when the cause of enmity was the statements of the Confession on Election? Why does Dr Van Dyke felicitate the Northern Presbyterian Church on the cessation of heresy trials as the logical outcome of an altered creed? We cannot answer the question without being rude! We leave it to our conferees across the line!—The Southwestern Presbyterian.

A citizen of Charlotte once asked in two languages, English and the profane, the question, "Why does a boy do anything?" We might ask in English, "Why does Cumberland Presbyterianism do anything." It never knew why it began to be and like the old darkey's goat which devoured the tag showing its destination, "It has done eat up the place it is gwine to." As for Dr. van Dyke, he had the authority of a paper published in an atmosphere where the moss grows thick and long, that there was no particular objection to the amendments, except the one explaining the elect infant clause to the satisfaction of all right-thinking people. And both Dr. Van Dyke and the Southwestern ought to know that not a line of the Confession that has given trouble to the heretics in recent years was so much as foot-noted.

The choice of Dr. Henry Wace to succeed Dr. Farrar as Dean of Canterbury meets with general approval. Dr. Wace is sixty-six years of age, and a man of unusual character and gifts, whose great services to his Church merited such recognition as he has now received. His broad Evangelicalism makes him a particularly fitting successor to Dean Farrar. After serving for eight years as Professor of Church History at King's College, he became President of the College in 1883, and from that time for twenty years has acted as Examining Chaplain to successive Archbishops of Canterbury. In 1896 he resigned the principalship of King's College, and received the appointment to the city living of St. Michael's, Cornhill. Dr. Wace was Bayle lecturer in 1874-75, acted as co-editor with Sir William Smith of the Standard Dictionary of Christian Biography, and edited also the Apocrypha for the Speaker's Commentary and the Primary Works of Luther. With characteristic tenacity of view he stood alone among the members of the council of King's College in refusing to approve of the recent abolition of religious tests.—Episcopal Recorder.

Book Notices.

Old Time Stories of the Old North State. L. A. McCorkle (Mrs. W. P. McCorkle. Savannah, Ga., D. C. Heath and Co., New York. On sale at Stone and Barringer's, Charlotte, N. C. Cloth, 168 pages, with maps and illustrations. Price 35 cents.

A series of stories intended to impress upon the children of North Carolina those events in which this State took the lead. Thus we have the story of the first colony established in the New World; of the first child born of English parents on American soil; of the first armed resistance to British tyranny; the first declaration of independence, etc. These stories have all been culled from authoritative sources and no liberties have been taken with the facts in any case save in the way of imaginative description and dialogue necessary to place the incidents before the minds of the children in a vivid light.

Four Princes. The Growth of a Kingdom. James A. B. Scherer, Ph. D., J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia.

Biography is the best history, as well as the best romance, and it was an excellent idea of the Author to tell the story of the growth of the Christian Church centered around four types of men. The first belonged to the apostolic age and was a Jew; the second to the Fourth century, and was a Graeco-Roman; the third to the Middle Ages and was a Franco-Italian and the last to the Reformation and was a Teuton. Thus varied ages, races, professions, temperaments and types are studied. St Paul represents the seed-time; Constantine the blade, Bernard the hidden ear and Luther the grain. Each was a martyr, in the first analysis of the word, and the blood of martyrs, Tertullian says, is the seed of the Kingdom.

To all whose hearts yearn for the time of the golden harvest this book is of absorbing interest. Dr. Scherer has done his work most admirably. To read Four Princes carefully means a widened outlook and a deepened sympathy.

The Laos of North Siam. By Mrs. L. W. Curtis. Introduction by Robert E. Speer. The Westminster Press, Philadelphia. Price $1.25 net.

"The author has recently spent four years among this people as a missionary under the Northern Presbyterian Board, not only living in the larger cities and towns, but touring among the remote villages, living in close touch with the people, and often spending days and nights in their own homes. Thus she feels that she knows them, and loving them as she does, she wishes to bring them before the American public, that they, too, may become interested in them, and may have their hearts stirred to do something towards sending to them the Word of Life."

We feel that this book belongs especially to North Carolina since Mrs. Curtis, a native Carolinian, has written it, and so many of the incidents are grouped about our Dr. D. McGilvary, who was educated first at Bingham, then at Davidson, before going to Princeton, who has labored so long, so faithfully and so fruitfully in that far-off country. Though our Church has no mission station in Siam, no Southern Missionary Society can afford to be without this portrayal of Laos land. It is delightfully told; the scenes live before you and you close the book with your missionary interest intensified.

The Teachings of the Lord Jesus. The Westminster Press, Philadelphia. By Rev. W. S. Bean, D. D. Price 40 cents.

A brief, clear, and well-ordered account of the main topics under which our Lord's teachings may be classified. Admirably suited for Young People's classes or for private study.

A Short History of American Presbyterianism. Paper cover. The Westminster Press, Philadelphia. Price 25 cents. By Rev. A. T. McGill, D. D., Rev. S. M. Hopkins, and Rev. S. J. Wilson.

These three discourses delivered before the General Assembly in Philadelphia, in 1876, constitute a good account of our Church for the period covered. They are historical in form, carefully wrought out, and so divided as to furnish a clear and easily mastered course of instruction on our early history.

Life and Letters of Robert Lewis Dabney, D. D. By Rev. T. C. Johnson, D. D. To be issued by September 1st, by the Presbyterian Publication Committee, Richmond, Va. Advance sheets of this book give evidence that the story of the "Life" will be worthy of the life, and of the author, and every Southern Presbyterian will want a copy. Orders may be sent in now.

Devotional.

They Shall See Him.

Passing through the narrow valley of a city the other day we heard a woman's voice in cheering song. The words of the refrain, upon which she lingered, seemed strangely out of place in that environment. She sang:

"And I shall see Him face to face,
And tell the story, 'Saved by grace!'"

Looking up toward the place from whence the song came, we saw a poor old servant woman, down on her hands and knees, scrubbing the second floor of a dwelling. In a moment that sweet song took a depth and beauty of a charm unimagined before. That poor scrubwoman, in her weary toil, was a "Daughter of the King," an heir of eternal glory, for a short time away from home, a pilgrim and a stranger in the earth. What she sang, as she looked up into the face of the Unseen, was sober truth:

"I shall see Him face to face!"

The drudgery shall cease. The rags shall drop off from the old body. The prisoned spirit shall be set free. The dust and smoke and din of this weary world shall vanish out of sight. New scenes shall open to the unveiled eyes, even a world which needs no light of moon or star or sun, for "the Lamb is the light thereof."

It is worth while to tarry and toil and suffer here for a little while, to live for Jesus in a world that "lieth in the wicked one," with the faith and hope of that better time in the heart, when we shall assuredly

"See Him face to face,
And tell the story, 'Saved by grace!'"

Each in His Own Way.

The bird praises God by singing; the flower pays its tribute in fragrant incense as its censer swings in the breeze; the tree shakes down fruit from its bending boughs; the stars pour out their silver beams to gladden the earth; the clouds give their blessing in gentle rain; yet all, with equal faithfulness, fulfill their mission. So among Christ's redeemed servants, one serves by incessant toil in the home, caring for a large family; another by silent example as a sufferer, patient and uncomplaining; another with the pen, sending forth words that inspire, help, cheer and bless; another by the living voice, whose eloquence moves men and starts impulses to better, grander living; another by the ministry of sweet song; another by sitting in quiet peace at Jesus' feet, drinking in His spirit and then shining as a gentle and silent light, or pouring out the fragrance of love like a lowly and unconscious flower; yet each and all of these may be serving Christ acceptably, hearing at the close of each day the whispered word, "Well done."—"Glimpses Through Life's Windows."

Lead Me Deeper Into Life.

"Lead me, yea, lead me, deeper into life—
This suffering human life wherein Thou liv'st
And breathest still—and holds't Thy sway Divine,
'Tis here, O pitying Christ, where Thee I seek—Here where the strife is fiercest, where the sun
Beats down upon the highway thronged with men,
And the raging mart. Oh, deeper lead
My soul into the living world of souls
Where Thou dost move." —Selected.

The first thing you are to do when you are upon your knees is to shut your eyes and, with short silence, let your soul place itself in the presence of God; that is, you are to use this or some better method to separate yourself from all common thoughts and make your heart as sensible as you can of the divine presence.—Andrew Murray.

"Love, we are in God's hand.

How strange, now, looks the life He makes us lead;
So free we seem, so fettered fast we are!
I feel He laid the fetter, let it lie!"

—Robert Browning.

After a year's work in the home-land these valued Servants of Christ go back to the labors chosen so many years ago, and with them will go the prayers of the Church.

A Glimpse of African Heathenism.

In a series of extensive quotations from the venerable Bishop Crowther's journals, given in the February issue of The Church Missionary Gleaner, is the following terrible description of superstitious cruelty:

"About four days before our arrival at Ohambele, an old, rich woman was dead and buried. The proceedings of the burial were stated as follows: When the grave was dug two female slaves were taken, whose limbs were smashed with clubs; being unable to stir, they were let down into the grave, yet alive, on the mat or bed on which the corpse of the mistress was laid, and screened from sight for a time. Two other female slaves were laid hold on and dressed up with best clothes and coral beads; this being done, they were led and paraded about the town to show the public the servants of the rich dead mistress whom they would attend in the world of spirits. This was done for two days, when the unfortunate victims were taken to the edge of the grave and their limbs were also smashed with clubs, and their bodies laid on the corpse of their mistress and covered up with earth while yet alive. We can only imagine what would be the feelings of these unfortunate victims. Some of the Bonny converts attempted to rescue these last two females by a large offer of ransom to buy bullocks for the occasion, but it was refused them. Can there be any doubt as to the urgent necessity of sending Christian teachers among this poor ignorant people, who are slaves to Satan and yet glory in their shame? After these atrocious deeds were performed volleys of trade cannons were fired for days in honor of the dead. I counted ten of these cannons in the street opposite the house of the dead, about four or six pounders each."

"You must sing your own song, and sing it always. You may make a place for yourself. It is there for everyone. Take the world to your heart. Read only great books, think only sublime thoughts, love, love, love ever and always. You may become a poet. Greater than that there is none."—The American Weekly.

There are times when the most patient of us feel rather glad that we do not live forever. Respect our mortal tabernacle as we may, and treat it tenderly, as we ought to do, we may one day be not so very sorry to lay it down, not only with all its sins, but with its often infirmities.

Israel Asking for a King.

1 Sam. 8, 1-10. July 5, 1903.

For about 450 years after the death of Joshua, Israel had a checkered experience in the land of Canaan. They failed to drive out the idolatrous inhabitants of the land and made alliances with them contrary to divine directions. These evil associations caused them to forsake Jehovah and His worship and to serve the false Gods of the heathen around them. Their disobedience and idolatry led to the Lord's forsaking them and giving them into the hands of their enemies. When in distress they appealed to Jehovah for help, He repeatedly gave them deliverance by Judges raised up from different tribes. The last of these Judges was Samuel and near the close of his administration an important change, mentioned in our lesson, occurred in their form of government. In the passage before us, several subjects should be noticed.

1. Samuel and his Sons.—Samuel was a man of rare excellence of character and had rendered the nation signal service. He had pious nurture in the home and in the sanctuary and had held devout communion with the Lord from his childhood. He had maintained his religious integrity despite the evil example of Eli's sons in whose company he had been raised. In his early manhood he grew in grace and wisdom until all Israel recognized him as a prophet of the Highest. He not only upheld law and administered justice, but established regular circuits, in which he laboriously discharged his functions. In his old age he associated his sons with him as judges who might aid him in his arduous work. In doing this without any Divine direction or sanction he may have been influenced by a father's ambition for his sons or by undue parental partiality. His sons, however, did not walk in their father's ways and proved unfit for their responsible duties. They yielded to covetousness, "took bribes and perverted judgment." Yet their very names indicate consecration to Jehovah, and Samuel doubtless endeavored to give them pious training. Why Samuel's sons were so unlike their father and why the children of godly persons are often impious and immoral is a mysterious subject. The fact indicated transmitted depravity and perhaps the multiplied and absorbing public duties of Samuel may have interfered with the thoroughness of his home training. Sometimes public men are better acquainted with national affairs than with the characters of their own children and give too little time to the mental and moral culture of their offspring.

2. The Demand for a King.—Moved by Samuel's advancing age by the delinquencies of his sons and by desire to resemble other nations, the Elders of Israel came to Ramah and desire of Samuel a King. They said unto him, "Behold thou art old and thy sons walk not in thy ways: now make us a king to judge us like all the nations." This demand displeased Samuel and the Lord. It discouraged Samuel because it showed dissatisfaction with him as well as his sons, ignored his many and valuable services to the nation and by its abrupt insistence manifested an utter disregard of his views and feelings. It displeased the Lord who deemed it the culmination of their repeated departures from Him and declared "But they have rejected me that I should not reign over them."

3. The Demand for a King Granted.—The Lord sometimes grants things that He does not approve and that He sees will be attended with disaster. It is wise, therefore, to make our requests with submission to His will and to ask Him to decide what is best. He directs Samuel to hearken to the peoples' voice as to having a king, but to do it under protest and to inform them as to the character of the king and concerning the added burdens that he would cause them to bear.

What the Holy Spirit Can Do for Me.

John 16:5-15. Topic for July 12.

The Bible teaches us that there are three persons in the Godhead, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one God, the same in substance, equal in power and glory. We do not understand the mystery of the trinity but we accept it as a fact because the Bible says so. We speak of the Father and the Son and it is not hard to fix in our minds that they are persons.

We speak of the Holy Spirit, too often, using the impersonal pronoun, "it," in our speech, at least, ignoring the fact that He is a person, just as the Father and Son are persons.

Christ taught about the Holy Spirit, and left it very clearly on record just what His work would be. It is to apply in all its fulness, the redemption purchased by Christ.

In the Scripture which we are considering at this time, we find Jesus telling His disciples about the work of this Comforter. We will not have space to more than consider very briefly the threefold work of the Spirit as taught in the eighth verse of this sixteenth chapter of John.

He reproves, convicts, or establishes the fact of sin, and that because Christ is not believed on. Christ came into the world to save us and our salvation, so far as we are concerned, depends on our belief on Christ. It makes no difference how good we may be in the eyes of the world. Our friends who know us best may say of us that we are excellent folks. We may be above doing anything that is dishonest, or immoral, or that is harmful to our neighbor. We may even be very positive in our lives of honesty, morality, and helpfulness to those about us, but if we do not believe on Christ, the fact of sin is established against us. The Holy Spirit does this by taking the things of Christ and declaring them unto us. This work makes every man to appear even in his own eyes as guilty, and the sense of his miserable condition is pressed home upon him.

But the Holy Spirit does not stop at this point. If so, no man would be saved. He further establishes the fact that righteousness is not an impossibility. That it has been furnished in a way so satisfactory to the Father that He has again received back to Himself the Son who went to render this obedience unto the righteous requirements of the law. As the sinner cannot furnish a righteousness for himself, the Spirit shows him how the righteousness of Christ becomes available; that by imputation it becomes the convicted sinner's, and is accepted by God as the sinner's own.

But the joy of the ransomed sinner would be short-lived if the work of the Spirit stopped at this place. He goes further and establishes the fact that the enemy of man has been tried and, after expending his greatest energies, has gone down in defeat before the Son of God. Until Jesus appeared in the flesh, no man had been able to overcome the devil. When once a power gets the reputation for being invincible, it has an easy time in making conquests, for those who go into the conflict with it, do so knowing that they have no chance to succeed. Such was the condition of man. But when Christ came, He measured sword lengths with this hitherto invincible enemy and came off conquerer. The prince of this world was judged and found wanting. He who gained the victory becomes our body-guard. The Holy Spirit establishes the fact that the devil is no longer triumphant and we may therefore take heart.

He also becomes our teacher and our guide, teaching us the things which He receives from Christ, and guiding us through all the affairs of life.

To have Him do these things for us, we must yield ourselves to Him, for in such proportion as we make this surrender will He do His perfect work in us.

A Bible Study of the Two Obstacles between Man and Heaven. Part II. The Moral Obstacle.

Rev. S. S. Laws, D. D., LL.D.

The second class of persons, to whom the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and is sent by the Son, is adults.

Of them it is just as true as of infants, that they must be born from above. This birth is the initiative of a new life in each case, the difference being that in the adult this new life ordinarily has a career in this world. This new life is not a matter of inheritance, nor the result of education, nor of spontaneous generation, as Drummond aptly points out (The Natural Law, etc.), nor the product of moral suasion. Moral influence and suasion of the most emphatic stamp failed to save man, when in a state of innocence, from the fall, and did not draw men to the Saviour when on earth, and is but an accessory to the Holy Spirit's agency in the recovery. "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born anew." Those who believe on his name are "born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John i:13). "Wherefore if any man is in Christ he is a new creature (creation)." Under the impression that the new spiritual life is the result of moral suasion, Melancthon remarked that if he were as eloquent as the Holy Spirit he could convert as many souls; but he changed his mind, and confessed that he found that old Adam was stronger than young Melancthon. No; Paul may plant and Apollos water, but the increase is of God.

To assign the locus of this vital change in the human soul calls into requisition a sound psychology. The doctrine of innate ideas, once prevalent, has passed forever. All our knowledge of religion, as of other things, is acquired. But the human mind has innate powers, and every child born of a human mother has identically the same number and kind of powers as every other, whatever the nationality, condition, or color. The fundamental powers of intelligence, sensibility, and will, whose activities lie in the domain of consciousness, strike their roots down into a common subsoil of habits and dispositions whose changes are subconscious. These subconscious states, which do not rise to the height or grasp of consciousness, are the hiding-places of character, of internal impulse and motive. Here are the deep and permanent springs of activity. The change that passes upon the spirit in regeneration is located in this subsoil or substratum, a sort of tertium quid above, or not so deep down as the essential constitution of the soul, but a substratum beneath and common to its powers; and, as the changes in this seat of the soul's habits are subconscious, that explains that we are not conscious ordinarily, if ever, of the new birth when it occurs, any more than we are of our natural birth (James' Varieties of Religious Views, p. 227?). Some claim to be conscious of it—in fact, to know the exact time and place of its occurrence, as was the case of Dr. Phinney, who gives the hour and minute and the log on which he was sitting when born into the kingdom. Doubtless some noticeable and perhaps extraordinary experience arrests the attention in such cases, but whether that be the change or some consequence or concomitant of it may be a question. However, it is only necessary to note that, if this immediate cognition occur in any case, it is certainly not the common experience of the children of God, and it is to any one a precarious proof of the new birth. The absence of it should be no surprise nor discouragement.

That of which we are or become distinctly conscious is a group of experiences so novel and unique that some such radical change as that termed the new birth is called for in explanation of them. I once was blind but now I see. Christ is now my joy and my song.

It is in this subconscious domain of the soul that the finger of sovereignty secretly touches the springs of human action; here sovereignty and freedom meet, for God is certainly sovereign and man is certainly free. Heaven, then, is their trysting place. Nothing is clearer than the corollary from this than that the will may be and is determined with certainty in perfect accordance with the will of God and man's own freedom. Every man is free who does as he pleases, whether he please to do right or wrong, and he always pleases according to the set character of the dispositions of his soul. Man's naturally perverse dispositions prompt him to act perversely, and the touch of God's finger, moves to the right, so that he either leaves us to our perverse, natural dispositions or contrariwise worketh in us through them to will and to do. "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God who worketh in you both to will and to work for his good pleasure" (Phil. ii:13).

God, the Creator of all things, hath endued the world with inherent causal energy, and as Governor he sustains and controls the same and ordereth all events to fall out, according to the several natures of second causes; either necessarily, freely, or contingently. Moral agents, as free second causes, possess natural originating and operative energy. In his renewed state man also has co-operative energy which is divine brought into requisition at every step of his growth in grace.

There is one thing common to all sane adults which differentiates them from infants, and that is the rational exercise of the natural or innate power of faith. This is pre-eminently the religious faculty. It may be truthfully said that it is the profoundest of our philosophical powers. It is natural and not moral ability which determines man's responsibility. Hence, as man has the natural endowments to know, love, and obey God, his alienation does not exempt him from the duty, though it does mar the free privilege and joyous choice of this service. If the adult has the native endowment to know and love and serve God, that makes him responsible for that service, even though he is indisposed to render it: if he has the natural, though not the moral, ability, the obligation is fixed. The Holy Spirit was sent forth in power to convict not the infant but the adult world of sinners by "enlightening their minds into the knowledge of Christ and enabling them to obey the call of the Gospel." This is not possible to infants. "Ye (adults) are all sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus. Whom God set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood . . . for the showing of his righteousness at this present season, that he might himself be just and the justifier of him that hath faith in Jesus" (Rom. iii:21-26). "Being, therefore, justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. v:1).

5. It may be well, however, briefly to inquire, Does justification, as ordinarily viewed and accepted, bring as it should, the peace of mind thus emphatically announced as a consequence thereof? Take the Shorter Catechism definition with a modification: "Justification is an act of God's free grace, wherein he pardoneth all our sins and accepteth us as (legally and personally) righteous in his sight, only for the righteousness of Christ imputed to us and received by faith alone." Faith, together with the assured indwelling of the Holy Spirit, as the creator of personal holiness, link the moral with the legal condition.

The pardon and acceptance here represented truthfully, as solely on account of the righteousness of Christ as their meritorious ground, may be, and usually are set forth as quite apart from the personal righteousness of the party thus justified. There often seems to be something lacking here. What is it? In a financial liability the law takes hold on the money in question and is fully satisfied when the money is touched. But sin in the government of God is the analogue of crime in the government of man, and criminal law takes hold on the person of the offender. Take the case of a certain State treasurer. When elected he was known to be a sportsman. His game soon got the better of him. He embezzled many thousands from the treasury of the ate. His bondsmen at once paid the loss. That let him off financially. But he was indicted for the crime of theft, tried, and condemned to the penitentiary for many years. Justification is no such disjointed patchwork as this. In like manner the law of God takes hold, not on the purse, but on the person of the sinner—the offender. When Christ undertook to meet its aims on us he rendered satisfaction, not with gold or silver, but in the holiness of his person and with his own blood. But surely not for himself did he suffer. Our personal release from the claims of the moral law, is not merely that of a bankrupt from the money claims of the civil law or the penal claims of the moral law, but that of a moral bankrupt from the preceptive and personal claims also of the law of God on character. The release proclaimed in justification, therefore, must take account, not only of our penal relation to the broken law, but also of personal character. It must be not simply forensic or formal, but personal. When the sinner is pardoned and adopted, must it not be that he is not acquitted on the meritorious ground of Christ's righteousness, irrespective of his own personal, moral character, but that he is by virtue of his relation to Christ, who takes the place of the law in relation to him, viewed and treated in justification as though already personally holy? There is an established alliance between abolishing the penalty and abolishing the power of sin, between the removal of the guilt and of the removal of corruption. The reatus and the culpa must go together.

The putative and personal righteousness lock hands in justification. The clause of the Catechism definition of justification, bracketed above, indicates an essential feature of the transaction which should be articulately recognized. The objective and subjective definitions are extreme. Justification presupposes faith, and faith presupposes regeneration; yet both faith and the new birth are internal constituents of sanctifying righteousness, though not the meritorious ground of pardon and acceptance.

The sharp distinction, therefore, usually made between justifying and sanctifying righteousness, as though one were exclusive of the other, is neither technically nor realistically accurate. Two fundamental constituents of personal righteousness, therefore, are placed under requisition in pardon and acceptance. The actual experience of the new life and the personal exercise of faith accepting Christ are in distinct contemplation by the divine mind when man is accepted as righteous. Something more than the imputed righteousness is in contemplation. The imputed righteousness of Christ and the perfected personal righteousness make up the content of this concept of the righteousness of the glorified saint. They are not separable.

The whole procedure has a legal basis, and this validly brings into requisition a fundamental principle known to the law as the doctrine of equitable conversion, according to which that, which is provided for as rightfully ordered to be done, is viewed and treated as if already done. This principle treats that as done which ought to be, and is to be or must be done when adjudged or rendered necessary by the equities of the case. The reasonable lapse of time in the process of realization is not material.

The story is that a will came into the hands of an English lawyer in the latter part of the eighteenth century, which directed that certain real estate should be sold and the proceeds used in settlement of some claims. The lawyer tossed the document with a guinea on the table of a young man in his office named Edward Law, with some remark to the effect that there was a conundrum for him. The obvious difficulty, on the very face of the will, was that the effect of what was directed would be to break the descent of the land and to vest in the legatee a chattel interest to that extent in the reality. The established law was that real estate could not be dealt with as chattels. Very well, the young man worked up the case and submitted to the court that what was proposed, though out of the ordinary course of the law, subserved strictly the ends of justice. The court sustained his position and gave the legatee an interest in the land, which was hedged about by the law with vastly more technicality than chattel, to the extent directed not as land, but as chattel, and the land was that far treated as if converted into chattel. This young lawyer afterwards received a retainer and brought forward a case, subservice of this decision in favor of equitable conversion, and the court refused to hear him, remarking that it was useless for him to try to overturn his former argument. This young man became Lord Ellenborough and Chief Justice of England, conducted the defense of Warren Hastings, and died in 1818, aged sixty-eight. This principle of equitable conversion is now accepted without question as settled law throughout the civilized world.

In Romans viii: 28-30, is that memorable sorites in which, according to the all-comprehensive purpose of God, the stages or steps of salvation are connected as the links of an adamant chain. To be justified is inseparable from being rendered conformable to the image of the Son. The sanctification is so certainly coupled with justification as to be viewed as one whole. The perseverance of the pardoned sinner is so assured as that he is at once entered on the books and treated as a saint. This principle only emerged into the consciousness and practice of the legal profession in the lifetime of Lord Ellenborough, who died in the early part of the last century, and yet of old it seems to have had an important bearing on the divine procedure in delivering man from sin. The righteousness of Christ received by faith not only assures acquittal from the penal claims of the law, but as surely also secures the work of the Holy Spirit in conforming the character to its preceptive claims. This faith works by love, purifies the heart, and overcomes the world. Faith tends to spiritual sight, promises to possession, and hopes to fruition.

Another apt illustration of this comprehensive view of justification, as covering the contemplated perfecting of the whole sphere of man's life, the first step in which is taken in regeneration and manifested in the exercise of faith, may be obtained from an incident connected materially with the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, in 1789. Patrick Henry vigorously opposed its adoption in the Virginia convention and delayed action for a month. Mr. Jefferson, who was abroad and favored the adoption, wrote advising to make the rectifications of the instrument conditions subsequent and not precedent, trusting to the honor of those with whom they were dealing to join with them in subsequently perfecting the document by amendments. This counsel prevailed, and hence the first ten amendments of the Constitution were adopted at once. The imperfect instrument was accepted with the understanding that its perfecting should be an assured after-care. The doctrine of perseverance is comprehended in justification.

Sabbath Desecration.

On Sabbath, June 19th, Southern railroad officials held a meeting in Greensboro to discuss the situation which with the frequent recurring wrecks is certainly a matter for grave and serious consideration. It might be whispered to them that the most important step to be taken is to stop the desecration of the Sabbath. There is little to be expected or hoped for in the way of good results from the decision of a body of men who, having in the past so flagrantly violated God's law of the Sabbath, defiantly persist in such violation by selecting the Sabbath as the time for a business meeting. God rules and they have read history to little purpose who have not learned that His judgments follow the persistent desecration of the Sabbath.

Other than railroad officials need to heed God's warnings in His Word against this sin. If they will not heed His Word surely the dealings of His Providence as read in history should arrest attention.

Removal of Southwestern University Bad Policy.

By W. McF. Alexander, New Orleans, La.

Who would wish this? The brethren who advocate the removal surely cannot understand the condition, the facts. No son of the Presbyterian Church could wish the Church to prove recreant to a sacred trust, to mis-appropriate funds, to act in bad faith both with the living and dead! Now, I readily believe that no advocate of removal, no matter how eager he may be for a big million dollar University, would wish any unrighteousness to be done in order to bring it about. But that is just what would happen, should the Board of Directors vote to remove the Southwestern Presbyterian University from Clarksville, Tenn., to Atlanta, Ga., and merge it in a great million dollar University in that city. They would break faith with the City of Clarksville and with the original donors who made the Southwestern possible. This, the Board of Directors unanimously recognized as soon as they examined the condition of the trust funds put into their hands. Hence the following unanimous official action taken by the Board:

"Whereas, the members of the Board of Directors of the Southwestern Presbyterian University are profoundly convinced that the interests in our hands are of the most sacred and binding nature, and believe that the interests of Christian education and of the Presbyterian Church in the great Mississippi valley region, which were evidently considered by the original donors of the funds in our care, would be seriously jeopardized by the consummation of any such scheme of consolidation as is now being advocated by brethren in Atlanta, and being further convinced that any such consolidation would, on both moral and legal grounds, be impossible, we do therefore, hereby resolve: That we refuse to consider any proposition from any source, which contemplates the removal of the said University from its present location in the city of Clarksville, Tenn., or the diversion of its vested funds for the purpose of effecting a merging of this institution with any other."

It was hoped that this action would at once stop all agitation on the subject of removal, but it seems not to have done so. The threat is now made to continue to ignore the Board and to appeal to the Synods this fall. It is meet therefore that the facts be laid before the Church at large, and especially before the controlling Synods.

1. The sole control of the Southwestern University is vested in the Board of Directors. The Synod's power is limited to the election of the said Board. The Synods have nothing more to do with the control of the University than a congregation has with the control of a Church. That is a matter for the session alone. Surely Presbyterians can understand this.

The Synods entered into a solemn agreement called the "Plan of Union" when the university was established, in which they limited their power to the election of directors, and gave the sole control of the university into the hands of the Board of Directors. Here is the article: Resolved, 4. "The sole government of the Institution shall be in the hands of a Directory, consisting of two members from each Synod, one elected each year after the first, of whom one-half shall constitute a quorum.

With a view to securing necessary confidential relations between the Directory and the Faculty, the presiding officer of the Institution shall be ex-officio the presiding officer of the Board of Directors."

Now that "Plan of Union" is in the nature of a constitution, binding the Synods and the Board of Directors and is fundamental law for the control of the University.

How then can the threat to bring this matter before the Synods this fall be carried out? The Synods have nothing to do with it save only to elect Directors. The Directors are not delegates and so can not be instructed, but representatives and are bound by the Plan of Union, not by any passing sentiment or vagary that might take hold of a Synod. If the Synods allow so much as a discussion of the removal on the floor, they will be violating the "Plan of Union," and meddling with a matter which they have solemnly delegated to other hands, and they will also, it seems to me, be impeaching the personal uprightness and integrity of their representatives on the Board of Directors. Are the Synods ready to do this?

The only right thing for any one of the Synods to do, should the matter be brought before it, is, either, 1, to refer it to the Board of Directors for their sole and final action. or 2, to lay it on the table as a matter with which they cannot meddle without violating the Plan of Union.

I have faith in the Presbyterian conscience and I believe this is what will be done.

2. The Legal Difficulties.—It has been heralded abroad that there are no legal difficulties in the way of removal to Atlanta. This heralding is based upon a brief prepared by an eminent lawyer of the Clarksville bar, at the instance of the Atlanta brethren. But they neglected to herald the Principle on which that opinion rests. It is briefly this: The Presbyterian Church has had peaceable possession of its property for some twenty-seven years, and in Tennessee peaceable possession for seven years gives absolute ownership and bars out all previous conditions—i. e., in the opinion of this lawyer, the statute of limitation applies, and the law would let the Church violate the conditions attached to her trust gifts because she has had peaceable possession for over seven years!—but is the Church ready to take any such cloak as that for unrighteousness even though it were legal? God forbid that she should have fallen so low! What! prove recreant to sacred trusts, misappropriate and pervert funds from the end for which they were given, because the state by statute of limitation permits her to do it—the Church, the Bride of Christ stooping to a deed like that! "Tell it not in Gath, Publish it not in the streets of Askelon, Lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, Lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph." It is but right to say that the lawyer giving the above opinion is personally opposed to moving the University, and that he confined himself in his professional opinion to what the law would permit.

Surely the brethren who obtained that opinion never read it carefully, or else, not being lawyers, they failed to grasp the principle which underlay it, else they would have dropped immediately all agitation as to removal.

2. But let it be just as widely heralded that there are other lawyers just as eminent and able, who differ in toto from the above opinion as to the legal aspects of the question, saying emphatically that neither the University, nor its vested funds can be moved. I have in my possession the opinions of two of the ablest lawyers at the Clarksville bar to this effect.

3. Another legal difficulty is this, no sooner should an attempt be made to move the Southwestern than it would be plastered and shingled all over with law-suits entered by men who gave to it and by their heirs, so that the matter would be tied up in the courts for from five to twenty years, and at the end of the suits, the Southwestern Presbyterian University would be wrecked and Atlanta get no benefit whatever! Are the Synods ready to precipitate any such destruction? Is not the Southwestern too valuable an institution to be wantonly wrecked? Brethren, be not deceived, the legal difficulties are such that to attempt the removal means ruin to the Southwestern and that without benefit to Atlanta.

III. The Moral Difficulties.—After all, why should a Church settle a question involving moral principles on legal grounds? The Church should always ask "can we do this thing righteously in the sight of God and man?" before asking "What will the law permit us to do?" Not then on mere legal grounds, but on the eternal principles of right and wrong this question should be settled. Can the Board of Directors decide on such a removal without bad faith to both the quick and the dead? Most assuredly they cannot. A few facts from the past history of the University and its bequests will abundantly show this.

The very purpose for which the University was founded shows this. The Southwestern Presbyterian University was founded by the Synods of the Mississippi Valley to meet, in the words of the Synods themselves, their "mutual needs in the matter of education." Is there any less need to day for Christian education in this great valley, the very garden spot of these United States with a population growing so rapidly that no man can foretell its future? All the money given was given by people in this valley or by people interested in this valley and for the education of the sons of this valley. The McComb gift is no exception, he laid the foundations of his fortune in this valley and never lost his interest in it. Now, how can the money given for this definite purpose be turned away from this valley and poured out on the South Atlantic Coast without moral obliquity in the Board of Directors who should dare to so prevent their trust? The Synod of Nashville about 1872 overtured the Synods of Memphis, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Alabama to appoint commissioners to consider their mutual needs in the matter of education." These commissioners were appointed and met in Memphis and adopted, the Plan of Union "which is recognized as the nature of fundamental law as far as it goes for the Board of Directors." This Plan of Union was adopted by the Synods named and also by the Synod of Texas. Then the Synods proceeding according to the Plan of Union elected the Board of Directors. This board again met in Memphis on May 14th, 1874 and after considering a number of proposals for locating the University, permanently accepted the offer of Clarksville, Tenn., and of Stewart College, making the latter the nucleus of the proposed school.

Notice that Dr. B. M. Palmer was a member both of the Commission that drafted the Plan of Union and of the Board of Directors that located the University at Clarksville and also of the number who secured a charter from the State of Tennessee, and all this was ten years before the Woodrow Controversy,—then how account for the assertion that it was the Woodrow controversy that first drove Dr. Palmer to Clarksville and away from Columbia?

No! it was the needs of this great Mississippi valley that caused Dr. Palmer to take such an interest in The Southwestern Presbyterian University, and I know that his interest never flagged in it for the same reason. Through Dr. Palmer much of the money was raised for the Southwestern. Mr. McComb told me out of his own mouth that it was through Dr. Palmer and for his sake that he gave the Southwestern University his bequest of one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. D. N. Kennedy, one of the only two surviving members of that first commission and now a member of the Board, and its secretary all these years, who has himself given largely to the University, a man upright, and honorable in all the relations of life, and without reproach, states that three-fourths of the assets of the University—excluding the McComb gift—was given by Clarksville and on the express condition that the University should be permanently located at Clarksville. Mr. Shearer, who had most to do with the founding of the University, bears the same testimony. He says: 1. In the rehabilitation of Stewart College there was no thought of any thing but permanency. In fact so large a part of the money was contributed by citizens of Clarksville and their immediate friends, that the mere suggestion of removal would have been considered an outrage. More than this, while I was canvassing the southwestern Synods for concentration of effort to establish a university, I was often asked if it would be possible to remove Stewart College to some other point, and to effect some combination with some other institution elsewhere, and I always replied that it was impossible.

2. You will remember that a number of communities made handsome propositions to secure the location of the proposed university, and it goes without saying that they all contemplated permanency. But for this they would not have bid at all. When the Trustees of Stewart College and the citizens of Clarksville, the corporation of Clarksville and the Synod of Nashville, jointly through them and with them made their bid, it contained not only the stipulation for location, but also certain other stipulations, all of which were accepted by the university. This bid when accepted became a contract, binding all the parties to all the stipulations therein contained, and these stipulations are carried out year by year and have no limitations of time. This contract is not of the nature of a partnership from which either party may withdraw at pleasure, but is a permanent and absolutely binding contract. More than this, the ratification by all the Synods of all this, and their continued co-operation in the same, constitute an absolute moral obligation binding them and through them the part of the Church they represent, to consider it a sacred covenant."

He must be blind indeed who cannot see that there is a moral obligation to keep the University at Clarksville. The case is just this, twenty-five years ago, Clarksville made as strenuous efforts to raise money to secure the university as Atlanta has recently made and on the same condition that it be permanently located at Clarksville. Let us turn the tables a little. Will the trustees appointed in Atlanta to take charge of the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars recently raised in Atlanta for the securing of a million dollar university consider a proposition to give that money to Clarksville and let us have a million dollar university in the Mississippi valley? Oh, no! Why not? Because that would be playing false to their trust. That money was raised with the distinct understanding that the university was to be located at Atlanta, and it would be a perversion of funds to use it in any other way. Ah, Yes, exactly. So with regard to Clarksville with this difference. The men who gave the Atlanta money are alive and could put in their protest should that board of trustees pervert the funds, while most of the people who gave money to the Southwestern are dead and can not enter their protests. Some of them, however, are alive and their protests are vigorous. What a howl Atlanta would raise if that Board of Trustees should attempt to take that two hundred and fifty thousand dollars away from Atlanta and give it to Clarksville, and I think it would be a just howl too. And the most outraged men of them all would be the brethren who are now advocating the removal from Clarksville. Let the Atlanta brethren tell, if they dare, why it would be wrong to give Atlanta's two hundred and fifty thousand to Clarksville and then they can understand why it would be morally wrong for the Board of Directors to give them the Southwestern Presbyterian University!

2. But let us see some of the conditions of the bequests: 1. Oct. 24th, 1855. The Board of Trustees of Montgomery Masonic College convey all the grounds and property belonging to said college to the Synod of Nashville, upon the condition, said Synod will keep up and sustain a first class college and academy in the town of Clarksville and pay off the liabilities and debts against the college amounting to about nine thousand dollars. The Synod accepted this offer on these terms.

2. May 11th, 1874. The Board of Directors of Stewart College and the Synod of Nashville offer to the Southwestern Presbyterian University all their grounds, buildings, apparatus, notes, subscription lists and franchises on condition of the location at Clarksville, also fifty thousand dollars of Tennessee bonds from the city of Clarksville on the same conditions and the further condition that the city of Clarksville, shall be entitled to have at all times as many as ten students in the Southwestern Presbyterian University, located at Clarksville, Tenn., to be educated free of charge. This offer was accepted by the University in May, 1874.

3. The McComb gift. On Jan. 7th, 1899, Mr. J. J. McComb, of New York, made a gift of thirty three thousand, five hundred dollars in six percent. bonds to the Southwestern Presbyterian University, upon the following conditions: Having confidence in the stability, purposes and aims of the Southwestern Presbyterian University of Clarksville, Tenn., I hereby give and bestow upon the Southwestern Presbyterian University $33,500 in bonds. It shall have and hold and use for the purposes herein set forth to its own exclusive use forever. On Nov. 10th, 1899, he added $66,500 to this gift.

Nor was this bequest made blindly. Mr. McComb watched this particular institution for some fifteen years that he might be satisfied that the Southwestern Presbyterian University at Clarksville and the work it was doing there was worthy his confidence. He had annually made a gift of the University to help support it through all those fifteen years, and when satisfied that this particular institution at Clarksville was praiseworthy, he gave his $100,000, and the condition accompanying that gift was that "It (the Southwestern Presbyterian University of Clarksville, Tenn.) shall have and hold and use for the purposes herein set forth for its own exclusive use forever."

Now, how could honorable men in the face of such conditions deliberately disregard them? He must be blind indeed who, after knowing the facts cannot see that the moral difficulties in the way of removal are insuperable and make such removal impossible.

The Rev. Thomas Hamner, a Young Peoples' Preacher.

When Thackeray delivered his lectures on the four Georges in Richmond, I went with my father to hear one of them; but alas, the Athenaeum where many brilliant lectures were delivered in those days, was too small, and we could not get in—a matter of regret ever since. In the beginning of the lecture on George I, Thackeray says:

"A very few years since, I knew familiarly a lady, who had been asked in marriage by Horace Walpole, who had been patted on the head by George I. (Horace, or the lady?) This lady had knocked at Dr. Johnson's door; had been intimate with Fox, the beautiful Georgina of Devonshire, and that brilliant Whig Society of the reign of George III; had known the Duchess of Queensberry, (the patroness of Gay and Prior) the admired young beauty of the court of Queen Anne. I often thought as I took my kind old friend's hand, how with it I held on to the old society of coits and men of the world."

The writer has known a man who had part in laying the foundations of the city of Washington and who, in this pursuit, often saw the "Father of his country," as he passed about through the newly laid out city which was to bear his name; and thus if gifted with Thackeray's imagination, in holding this old gentleman's hand, as I often did, I might have felt that I was linked to scenes of the Revolution, to the mushroom-like springing up of the wonderful organizer of the United States—now much more like a great oak under whose shadow the nations may gather,—and behind all this, to the colonial days, when this great government was all undreamed of, and the young Washington and his fellow cavaliers would have shed the last drop of their blood for the Home in which the four Georges sat.

But, what has all this to do with the Rev. Thomas Hamner? Well, nothing except that it suggests as reminiscence, I have a dear old friend now whose hand, when I take it, connects me with the scenes of our first great struggle; for that hand probably patted the cheek of Lafayette. When two years old, she was taken to see Washington's French friend and helper, as on his tour southward, he passed through Maryland. This lady is one of a large family who were brought into the Presbyterian Church under the ministry of the Rev. Thomas Hamner, a less known brother of the Rev. James Garland Hamner, D. D., who, after a long and useful life, died in Baltimore a few years ago, leaving a son and a grandson of the same name to follow him in the ministry.

In Howard county, Md., there seems to have been no people of Presbyterian antecedents, Scotch Irish, Huguenot, or other; but somewhere about sixty or seventy years ago, the Rev. Thomas Hamner came thither as a Home Missionary, and labored most faithfully and earnestly. He was no great preacher, I think, for I have never heard people talk about his preaching. It was always of his earnest work in establishing and conducting Sabbath-schools that he spoke. He was probably there but a short time—a few years at most, but the fruits of his devotion to the Master's service still remain. Only last December, I stood in the snow by the open grave of one who indirectly, at least, owed her attachment to the Presbyterian Church to his ministry. One of the best and wisest of friends, a most devoted wife to her husband now in great feebleness awaiting his discharge, and united with him as a stay and prop of the Presbyterian Church founded by the Rev. Thomas Hamner; she has gone to her rest and reward.

A few miles away, bearing the same family name, still lives my old friend upon whom Lafayette solemnly pronounced a blessing as he took her, a little infant, into his arms. The blessing of God has rested on her through a long life of devoted service as a Christian and a Presbyterian. With her husband who was for nearly thirty years the pastor of a large church in Philadelphia, she lived as a "help-meet for him" in his great work. In her widow-hood, she is continuing in connection with a beloved sister, her work in the old church founded by Mr. Hamner, and served for a time by her husband in his earlier ministry, and has lately built a beautiful manse for the young pastor now in charge. A few years or two ago she enriched the library of Hampden-Sidney College with the bulk of her husband's books, after inviting the writer to take his choice of those specially adapted to his needs.

In this family were eight sisters, some of whom have remained in the old church and some have gone to a distance and have been helpers in other Presbyterian Churches, while an only brother has been, for almost half a century, an elder of this church. When young they all came under the influence of this earnest servant of God, the Rev. Thomas Hamner, and the print of his moulding hand has been plainly visible on their lives and characters. All of them have lived to old age, and in spite of severe affliction in some cases, I may truly say, a good old age. About twenty years ago, their mother, over ninety years old, smiling from her bed of death, bade them a cheerful adieu, for a time; and they cheerful and happy in old age, have, some of them passed over the river to meet her again, while others are waiting for their call.

These facts may impress some readers with the importance of establishing and maintaining Sabbath-schools, and with the use which God may make of a humble, earnest work in his service. Who can estimate the possible results in the future of that work in which Dr. Phillips is the earnest and devoted leader? Poindexter.

Letter from California.

Coronado Beach, San Diego, Cal.
June 13, 1903.

Presbyterian Standard,
Charlotte, N. C.

They do business on business principles here in California, not only in the way of entertaining the Presbyterian Assembly, but in every way.

So much has been written of our elegant reception and entertainment as Presbyterians that I will simply add my Amen to that, and proceed to call attention to the practical side of California life, which I am sure will interest many of my old friends among your readers.

While I enjoy the balmy air of Southern California—for the climate is perfect,—and admire the grand scenery—for I am a lover of nature,—what most attracted my attention was the high degree of perfection to which their business methods have been brought; while labor unions are not as powerful here as in the East, we find the country districts bound together by a web of associations, that is simply wonderful. The ange, lemon, peach, pear, grape, olive, almond, wal-honey and even to egg producers each have a separ-association, controlled by their best men and by as combining, they are enabled to get much better ces for their products.

This was strikingly demonstrated to me by an association that handles eggs; the community in which it erates sells no cheap eggs, but preserves them all during the period of low prices and do not sell any un-they bring at least 30 cents a dozen.; eggs in Cali-fonia never bring less than 12 cents a dozen, and gen-ally go up to 35 or 40 cents during the winter. I ced the Secretary if it was not difficult to get so many farmers to bring their eggs in regularly for preserving; he said the most of the people preserve their eggs at home, the association furnishing the preserver, and telling them when to bring the eggs in for shipment; he said "We have intelligent people out here; they will not sell their eggs for 12 cents a dozen, and holding them four or five months can get 35 cents for them. It would be as foolish for the farmer to sell his wheat for 30 cents a bushel, when he knew by holding it four or five months he could get 75 cents.

I asked him if people could not make money in the East preserving eggs, as I would like to try it. He said they could; that he started preserving eggs in Indiana, with $10. and in seven years made sixteen thousand dollars; that there was no locality where people could not make 150 per cent. preserving eggs, as eggs get low in summer and high in winter everywhere, and that a person starting with even $5, would soon be rich by reinvesting the proceeds each year.
 I then asked him if he would sell me the formula and at what price. He said they did not sell formulas free to any one that wrote for one, or gave them to those that called, so if any of my friends in the East want to try preserving eggs, you can get the formula with complete directions free, by addressing the Egg Producers Association, Oceanside, California. The eggs keep perfectly for a year and you cannot tell them from fresh eggs and it only costs a cent a dozen to preserve them; if you write for a formula you should enclose 3 or 4 two-cent stamps as it takes money to pay postage and printing. I am going to preserve some as soon as I go home for this is something that a minister can do without conflicting with his duties in the least; I am going to start with $10 and reinvest the proceeds for ten years and then I can buy a California home too.
 Another thing that greatly interested me was the beautiful preserved fruit of all kinds that you see here.
 They put it up without heating or sealing and it tastes like fruit freshly picked; it does not shrink up or get soft, as our canned fruits does, and you can keep it in its fresh state for years, for a cost of about a cent a quart. Anyone can also get this formula for keeping fruit without heating or sealing, free by addressing the California, Fruit Association, Carlsbad, California. (Of course enclose stamps, for postage, etc.)

Many of you have no doubt seen fruit kept in this way at the expositions where California fruits are exhibed; it is simply grand and then so little trouble, and cannot conceive why people in the East do not put up fruit in this way. If they had to pay a big price for the formula, it would perhaps be more generally used, as we in the East, like things that come high; but for one never expect to have any more canned fruit about my home, when with less trouble and less cost, we can put it up cold and thus always have fresh fruit on our table.

The dairy business is particularly good business here.
 Milk and butter always command a high price, while prices are not higher than in the East; butter is now selling at 30 cents a pound, and people of moderate means, that will keep a few chickens and cows, can live nicely here in Southern California.

Of course Orange groves are beautiful, but it requires an artesian pocketbook that flows a large stream, to maintain an Orange grove; in fact I think irrigation of the pocketbook, fully as essential as irrigation of the orange grove.

When I return home I will write you more of California business methods, as they can teach us old land marks in the East; many things we know not of.

Rev. Thomas Walker.

Holiness of Life.

In his spiritual structure, man, by natural generation, becomes partaker of but one nature and that a hopelessly fallen and, from center to circumference, a totally depraved one, utterly incapable of a single act of holiness, is not subject to the law of God at a single point, neither indeed can be. By regeneration he becomes partaker of the Divine nature also. Extremist natures meet in his one person, constituting a kind of Devil—Divinity, strangest and most paradoxical structure perhaps in God's universe and nowhere in wide creation does all heaven and hell so close and clashing meet as in the human breast. The bringing of order out of confusion here constitutes the technical ministry of the Second and Third Persons, if not the whole Trinity.
 The success or failure of creation evidently points here.
 What length and breadth and height and depth of significance is ours! and yet how insensible! By inspiration alone can man be understood and appreciated.
 Twice born he becomes like Christ dual-natured in his one person. Unlike Christ one of these natures is sinful while the other only is holy. These two natures are irreconcilable. They grapple and are incessantly at war with each other. Infernal ditching has been eternally provided for. Which in our credal conviction must it needs be? Man in his Divine nature does not, neither can sin; neither does or can he die. Final perseverance is an absolute necessity of his Divine nature. So vital, however, through the flesh are the passions of his old nature that he through natural life continues to sin in proportion to the comparative tenure and assertive power of that nature. At death, or the twinkling change that awaits us, our sinful natures fall precipitately down a steep place and are forever choked.

So, then man, taken in the limited sense of his sinful nature, or in the wide sense of embracing both natures, does sin more or less habitually. It is only when taken in the limited senses of his Divine nature that it can be said of him, in this life, that he sinneth not.
 Man's sinful nature, or at least the sinfulness of it, sloughs at death entirely, and Christ's perfect nature is perhaps the only trophy of human nature at all that reaches the hallowed hereafter.

The Inner-Room.

In every home there is a sacred spot,

Dear to all dwellers there.

The Ingle where, (earth's cares a while forgot,)

We mingle hearts in prayer.

Where'er we roam, through years—o'er land or sea,

Or make our dwelling place,

No spot becomes more dear to you or me,

Than childhood's "throne of grace."

Mem'ry recalls the hour of evening prayer

As twilight closes day.

A voice (now silent) trembles on the air

And bears our souls away.

Away from earth, from childhood's grief and pain,

Bringing sore hearts, sweet peace;

Ah; mem'ry makes old children young again;

Bids present worries cease.

This inner-room—blessed Ingle of the home—

Our hearts would cling to thee—

Nor may we from our hallow'd mem'ries roam,

Where 'ere our homes may be.

What is true rest? Not idleness, but peace of mind.
 To rest from sin, from sorrow, from fear, from doubt, from care; this is true rest. Above all, to rest from the worst weariness of all—knowing one's duty, and yet not being able to do it. Perfect rest, in perfect work; that surely is the rest of blessed spirits, till the final consummation of all things.—C. Kingsley.

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

The little poem on cover page was written for a very limited and beautiful edition of The Blue Flower and we are glad, through the kindness of Dr. van Dyke, to give it to our readers.

Dr. Laws continues his thoughtful treatise, and, as mentioned elsewhere, it gives us pleasure to present another view of the proposed removal of the Southwestern Presbyterian University. It is only by considering the matter in every light that the wisest action can be possible. There is a deep significance in what Poindexter says of the Rev. Peter Hamner and a world of encouragement to the Sunday-school worker. The warning note on Sabbath Desecration is a timely one and Holiness of Life is worthy of consideration. The Inner Room will carry us back to the hour of the childish Good-nights, while the many friends of Dr. DuBose, will, on the eve of his long journey, welcome the sight of his genial face. The Departments of Dr. Hill and Mr. Hoon are up to their usual grade of excellence and Mr. Walker may set us all to preserving eggs for a side line. Mr. Clarkson's story of Mecklenburg's Declaration was borrowed without his knowledge.

In the absence of the Editor (who is shaking out the cobwebs at the Knoxville Summer School,) we make bold to say that the whole paper is worth the price of it. The Standard is nothing if not modest.

The Proposed Presbytery in Korea.

Dear Brother:

Perhaps the enclosed Memorial of the Presbyterian Council of Missions in Korea, which was presented to our late General Assembly and referred to an ad interim committee, will be of interest to the Church at large. The text of the Memorial is as follows:

"We recommend:

First, That when there shall be at least 12 churches, with one or more ordained elders each and at least 3 Koreans, who the Council deems ready for ordination to the ministry, a Presbytery shall be organized under the following provision:

(A.) The Presbytery shall be constituted of the ordained Missionaries (Ministers and Elders) of the Presbyterian Missions in Korea and of one representative Elder from each organized Church.

(B.) This Presbytery when so constituted shall be the Supreme Ecclesiastical Court of the Presbyterian Church in Korea, until such time as in the exercise of its own authority the Church constitutes a Synod or General Assembly.

(C.) The Missionaries who are members of the Presbytery shall be members of the same only as far as concerns their rights and privileges of voting and participating in all its proceedings, but ecclesiastically they shall be subject to the authority and discipline of their respective home churches retaining their full ecclesiastical connection with those churches.

(D.) The relation of the Missionaries as members of the Korean Church shall continue until such time as by an affirmative vote of two-thirds their number, withdrawal from the relation shall be deemed advisable.

Second. Since the Presbytery when constituted as an Independent Ecclesiastical body has full authority to adopt its own standards and its own rules for ordination of ministers, organization of churches and all other ecclesiastical acts, we recommend:

(A.) The appointment of a committee to prepare such standards as it deems best, these to be reported to the Council for adoption and then presented to the Presbytery for its consideration when a Presbytery is constituted.

(B.) The appointment of a committee to prepare Presbyterial rules and by-laws, these to be reported to the Council for adoption and then presented to the Presbytery for its consideration when a Presbytery is constituted.

Third, That each Mission request its Board of Missions Executive Committee or Ecclesiastical Court having jurisdiction over it, for liberty to co-operate in the organization of an independent Korean Presbyterian Church.

Respectfully submitted,

For the American Presbyterian Church, North, S. A. Moffett, F. S. Miller.

For the American Presbyterian Church, South, L. B. Tate

For the Australian Presbyterian Church, G. Egnel.

For the Canadian Presbyterian Church, W. R. Foote.

THE FORWARD MOVEMENT FOR HOME MISSIONS.—The first collection for this work in Albemarle Presbytery was taken at Henderson on the 21st inst. Although the Henderson people have recently subscribed and paid in about $500 for the cause of Foreign Missions, the pastor of the church, Rev. J. H. Henderlite and his congregation cordially welcomed Dr. W. D. Morton, who represented the Home Mission work of the Presbytery and beyond the efficient aid they have already extended to Home Missions, they contributed in cash subscriptions chiefly, nearly three hundred dollars for his worthy cause. This noble example is worthy of imitation throughout the Presbytery.

WANTED AND NEEDED.—We can use two organs, new or second hand, to good advantage. One for the Plum Tree church which has opened up very encouragingly, the other for chapel services in Lees-McRae Institute. If any individual, Sunday-school, society or church, has an instrument that is not now fulfilling the purpose for which it was intended, if they will ship it to me at Elk Park, N. C., I will see that it is placed where it will do as much, if not more good, than it ever has done.

We will also need another piano for Lees-McRae Institute. Think of only one instrument in a school of this size and importance where about 10 per cent of the pupils take music and a great many more would take it if they were able and were able to furnish them another instrument to practice on!

SOUTHERN STUDENT CONFERENCE.—The Southern Student Conference which has just closed at Asheville was attended by two hundred and sixty-five students, representing the leading institutions of learning of the South. The sessions of the Conference were held at Asheville School which is located five miles from Asheville on the Murphy Branch of the Southern railroad. Messrs. Mitchell and Anderson, the proprietors of the school, turned their entire equipment over to the Conference and were untiring in their efforts to make the stay of the delegates pleasant as well as profitable.

Eight days were spent in conference in reference to definite religious work among young men and in the consideration of the question of choosing a life work. Each day began with a Missionary Institute which was followed with a Mission Study Class and Bible Classes. The eleven o'clock hour was given to a platform meeting when addresses were delivered by prominent Christian workers. The afternoons were given up to recreation. Life work meetings were held on the mountain side at seven o'clock and the day's work closed with a College Conference on some phases of college Christian work.

The speakers included Rev. Carter Helm Jones, Louisville; Dr. O. E. Brown, Vanderbilt University; Prof. W. W. White, Rev. Clayton S. Cooper, Rev. Fennell P. Turner and H. P. Anderson, of New York; Ira Landritzb, D. D., of Nashville; J. Waters McGill, State Secretary, of Tennessee; W. D. Weatherford and Rev. W. R. Lambuth.

As a result of the Conference twenty-six young men volunteered for service in Foreign Fields, making a total of fifty-one Volunteers in the Conference. Eleven men decided to enter the ministry and eight the Y. M. C. A. work. This conference was held under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association and will mean much for the colleges during the coming year.

Lees-McRae Institute.

The most exciting event since the close of school was the killing of a big black bear a few days since, within sight of and almost on the institute property. The chase lasted about forty-eight hours. In less than thirty minutes after the bear was killed there were forty-five men on hand, ready to help get him out of the laurel thicket. They came so fast (having heard the dogs and the gun shot) that it looked as if they were springing up out of the ground. In a very short time the bear was pressing the scales in Mr. Banner's store down to 92 pounds net.

The Institute is now occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Banner. They will keep it open for summer boarders until first of September, when the fourth year's work of this Institution will begin. Mrs. Banner has had considerable experience in this kind of work. The school will get a percentage of the receipts for rent, so that if any of the readers of the Standard expect to come to the mountains this summer, they will find a pleasant home in the Lees-McRae Institute, and at the same time have an abundant opportunity of seeing our school property.

Our enrollment during the past session was 85. Twenty-one of these recited during the session the Shorter Catechism. Taking out those who had previously recited it, it will leave about 30 per cent. of the enrollment who memorized this little hand book of theology. About the same proportion did this the year before. Besides a large number of little children who have recited during the same time the Child's Catechism.

During the session nine of our pupils united with the Presbyterian Church, on profession of faith, and one by letter.

Suppose these results are duplicated every year for twenty years! Calculate, if you can, the direct and indirect effect they would have upon the mountains.

An important change has practically been decided upon in regard to the time of opening and closing of the sessions in the future. The next session will open about first of September and close about Christmas. We will then take a vacation until the first of May, after which our sessions will begin about the first of May and close about the first of January. This will give us an eight month's session during the most delightful part of the year. It will also cut the running expenses down very considerably. We hope that this change will relieve many a poor mountain girl from farm work and in lieu thereof give them the opportunity of a Christian education and a thorough training in domestic duties. It is a bold stroke to try to stem the current of popular opinion and long practice among the mountain people of putting the girls on the farm as soon as they are large enough to use a hoe.

Still another change that we hope to effect at an early date, is the separation of the two sexes, by a distance of several miles (I use the word "several" with its mountain usage, meaning anywhere from two to a hundred). In other words, we think it best to locate the boys' boarding department at another place. Both divisions are to be under the same man and same management. The boys' department will probably be located somewhere in Mitchell county, while the girls' department will be kept at Banner Elks in Watanga county. Each will be a help to the other. The teachers in the boys' department will send the girls as fast as they are ready to go off to school, to us at Banner Elk and vice versa. Carrying one half of this principle one step further, we will then send both girls and boys to our old established colleges until this Institution can offer them as good opportunities as any in the state.

In view of the great work that is to be done along the line of Christian education in the mountains, in view of the great success that has crowned our efforts; in view of the fact that the Presbyterian Church has been the pioneer in this work in many places in the mountains; in view of the fact that if we do not continue to push this work we will lose much of the ground that we now occupy, (The Episcopal Church, I rejoice to say, is now building a superior school within eight miles of us, to cost not less than $10,000); in view of the great amount of money the Presbyterian Church in North Carolina is now endeavoring to raise for the other institutions under her care; in view of the help that has come to us from other States (about one half of our contributions have come from the North, and at least two-thirds outside of the Synod of North Carolina); in view of the sympathy, encouragement and financial support that the mountain people themselves have given us; I say in view of these facts, and with due reverence, but with all the earnestness of my soul, that it will be a burning shame if this great work is allowed to suffer or go down for the lack of a comparatively small sum of money.

Five thousand dollars is needed. It is needed right now to establish the boys' department.

We also need a male teacher to take Mr. Hall's place at the head of the teaching force. One who is not a Christian, or who is not a good teacher, or who is ashamed to work need not apply.

Edgar Tufts.

MISSOURI

Commencement of Synodical College, Fulton, Mo

The Commencement exercises of this institution were both abridged and saddened by the very serious illness of Mrs. J. M. Spencer, wife of the President,—she is much better now. The baccalaureate sermon was preached by Dr. Thos. V. Moore, of Omaha, Neb., from "What is your life?" and is spoken of as a discourse of unusual ability, appropriateness and power.

After the usual art exhibit and annual concert on Monday and Monday evening, the regular Commencement exercises were held on Wednesday, June 3, when diplomas were given to eight young ladies, the regular graduates, and medals and prizes awarded to the successful contestants. So another year of this old and well known school was closed. Its reputation for large attendance, thorough instruction, and excellent moral and religious training has been well maintained. And the prospects for another year are most encouraging.

UPPER MISSOURI PRESBYTERY.—A call meeting of the Upper Missouri Presbytery was held in the Presbyterian Church, Plattsburg, Mo., June 22, 1903, at 11 a. m.

The business for which the meeting was called was to dissolve (if the way be clear) the pastoral relation between Rev. R. L. Brown and the Lawson Church. As the Church concurred with Bro. Brown in this request it was granted by Presbytery. The stated clerk was instructed to give Bro. Brown a letter of dismissal to any Presbytery he may desire, between this and the next regular meeting. After supplying this church several months Bro. Brown was installed its pastor for a year ago the 30th of May.

Chas. P. Foreman, S. C.

VIRGINIA.

NORFOLK; Second Church.—Five new members received into this Church of which Rev. J. Ernest Thacker is pastor.

LEXINGTON PRESBYTERY.—Lexington Presbytery met in adjourned meeting at Staunton, Va., June 3rd.

Glenville and Coal Valley Churches were cited to appear at an adjourned meeting to be held in Staunton, Va., July 2nd 10 a. m. to show cause why the call from Olivet Church should not be placed in the hands of Rev. E. B. Druen their pastor.

Mr. R. Gamble See of Fort Defiance, Va., was examined for licensure and ordination, and was ordained on Sunday June 7th, at Augusta Church.

Rev. J. N. VanDevanter was appointed to preside, etc. Rev. A. M. Fraser, D. D., to preach the sermon and Rev. L. B. Turnbull to deliver the charge to the Evangelist. Mr. See goes to Brazil as a missionary.

Wm. C. White, S. C.

NEW DUBLIN CHURCH.—This old Church has lately enjoyed a rich season of grace. Beginning Friday night before the fifth Sabbath in May and continuing through the first Sabbath in June, Rev. J. B. Morton, of Pulaski City preached for us twice a day, save Saturdays. This strong, yet tender preaching greatly delighted our people who came faithfully to the house of God even in the face of very threatening weather, and the result was that God's children were revived and souls were saved. In short, the preacher did his part, the people did their part, and God did His part—He always does. During the meeting and since twenty-one persons have been received into the Church, eighteen of them on profession, making twenty-nine new members since the beginning of the present pastorate last October.

And on the second Sabbath in June the following officers were elected:

Elders—Henry C. Wysor, E. D. Withrow and Francis Bell; Deacons—J. Howe Kent, Chas. W. Harman, and Chas. H. King. These are all good men and it is earnestly hoped that they will all accept the office and the responsibility thus laid on them as from the Lord.

ARKANSAS.

Great and devastating floods have swept down the valleys of the Smoky Hill, Solomon, Republican, Blue Neosho, Cottonwood and Kansas rivers, entailing an immense loss of life. Our church interests have suffered materially and these people need the prayers and helpful sympathies of all until they recover from this great calamity.

HARPER.—Rev. H. P. Cooter, who has been serving the churches of Scandia and Webber for the past two years, has accepted the invitation of this Church to take up the work in this field. He will begin his labors here at once.

WICHITA.—Rev. Rudolph Caughey, who has been supplying Oak Street Church for the last three years, has received a unanimous call to take charge of our Church in Marion. Mr. Caughey has done a most substantial work in this Church and leaves it with deepest regrets on the part of the people. Marion Church is to be congratulated in securing his services, as he is one of the rising young men of Kansas and a preacher of remarkable ability for one so young.—Rev. Edwin Huyler, who has been supplying Lincoln Street mission for almost two years, is at his home in the East recuperating his health and taking a much needed rest. Mr. Roy C. Fleming, son of our Synodical missionary, and a middler in Princeton Seminary, is supplying for Mr. Huyler during his absence.

KANSAS CITY.—It is with deep regret that we announce that Rev. William Foulkes, D. D., the beloved pastor of the First Church, has resigned his pastorate and will locate elsewhere. For three years he has served this Church most acceptably and a strong pressure was brought to bear upon him to recall his resignation by the congregation. Before coming here Dr. Foulkes served the Church of Salina for twelve years, where he did a great work and was universally esteemed and beloved.

TEXAS.

CORSICANA.—The Presbyterians of Corsicana have contracted for a fine new edifice, to be completed by the middle of October.

It will have an Auditorium to seat 500, a school room which can be thrown into the main room, an infant class room, Pastor's study, etc. Electric lights and other modern conveniences are to aid in the comfort of the people who worship. The cost will approximate to $12,000 when furnished. At present we worship in company with our esteemed brethren of the A. R. P. Church. They are extremely cordial and considerate, towards us.

We are appreciating the Apostolic injunction set forth in verses 5 and 19 to 21 verses.

WEST VIRGINIA.

RICHWOOD.—Richwood Church has received recently two handsome and much appreciated gifts. One, an elegant communion service, the gift of Mrs. W. G. Parke, of Scranton, Pa., the other a check from her husband, Mr. Parke for a good sum to be used on the church building.

Several names have been added to the church roll lately.

Denver Convention.

Owing to a change in the program the Southern Presbyterian Rally at the Denver Christian Endeavor Convention will be held at the First Avenue Presbyterian Church, and will be a Joint rally in conjunction with the (Dutch) Reformed Church in America.

Sunday-schools for Colored People.

The beautiful incident of General "Stonewall" Jackson's making a contribution from the fields of battle for the colored Sabbath-school at his home in Lexington is one of the most characteristic acts of that great hero's life. But the best fact about it is that the Sabbath-school was one he taught in himself.

In this lies a great opportunity to our white people. As an Englishman, of Roanoke, said: "Here we have the truth at our doors." There are at least 300,000 negroes under the direct personal influence of our Southern Presbyterian people in their homes, shops, and fields. Not one per cent. of these are Presbyterians, and it is safe to say that not one per cent are even Christians. With what face can we contribute to Foreign Missions, and refuse to instruct these ignorant people under the shadows of our homes?

It is true that most of the colored people in the employ of white Presbyterians are members of some other denomination. But that will not prevent them, or any others, from attending Sabbath-school taught by Godly, educated, white, people. Most of the members of the Tuscaloosa colored Sabbath-school, whose superintendent, General Johnston, is a State Senator, are from the colored Baptist and Methodist churches, whose pastors are only too glad for them to come under the good influence of the respected white leaders of the moral and religious life of the city.

A true gentleman may be known by his behavior to a negro. It is from the highest social classes of our white people that we are finding most help for our colored Sunday-schools. On a recent visit to Meridian, Mississippi, I found an honored member in the Presbyterian Church, the cashier of the First National Bank, Mr. Bardwell, volunteering personally to engage in this work. Let others of our elders, deacons, and laymen, emulate his example. It is far easier, for many reasons, for them to take the initiative in it than for the pastors. A few might object to a pastor's strenuous efforts in such a work, and his so doing might possibly cause some friction. But no such objection can ever arise in the case of a lay member of the Church, who has long resided in a locality, and whose efforts could not be made a source of trouble to himself in any way.

Mr. Bardwell remarked that even from the lowest motive of self-protection—we must try to make better men and women of our colored population, or they will ruin our civilization. Thus, whether from the highest motive, devotion to our Christ—or from the lowest, reasonable self-interest—we ought to do our duty to these people who are still our wards and dependents.

I should like to hear from any one interested in this matter. Tuscaloosa, Alabama.

Educational.

The Standard office is the pleased recipient of a large number of school catalogues which show a state of progress that speaks well for the educational conditions in this section. However we wish to call particular attention to the catalogue of one of our youngest institutions, the North Carolina Military Academy, at Red Springs. It is an attractive presentation of what is offered to the patrons.

Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia.

Last year the Board gave to Col. Venable, of Baltimore, good friend of the college and the donor to it of the Seminary buildings, the right to beautify the grounds with the aid of a landscape gardener. In doing this he has enclosed all the college and seminary building with a neat fence. From within this he has removed all fences and unsightly and broken trees and shrubbery between the college and seminary building. Only the former president's house remains. The effect of this is very good and when the open space is planted with shrubbery and walks and drives are made in every needed direction, it will be very attractive. The old seminary building never looked more attractive than it does since this change, as it stands amid the giant oaks about it and rises from the green sward of its lawn.

At the lower edge of the quadrangle a lake has been formed, which lying just in the edge of the grove will make quite a romantic spot.

The Commencement exercises were unusually attractive this year. The speeches were excellent, and there was better attendance of students and strangers than for several years. Nineteen young men received diplomas. In distributing its honors the Board conferred the title of LL. D., on Prof. John Gilley Fales, of Central University, Kentucky, and that of D. D., on Rev. D. A. Penick, of New Monmouth Church., Virginia.

Hampden-Sidney now enters upon a new era of its life. By the act of the Synod and Board of Trustees, the relations between the College and the Presbyterian Church have been made closer. By this arrangement the Synod agrees to appoint each year a list of names and from these the college agrees to select the Trustees to fill the vacancies on its Board. The college thus becomes more formally identified with the Presbyterian Church.

Presbyterians may now feel that when they give their money to the establishment and maintenance of an institution that it will not under some of the modern methods of manipulation pass from under their control and into other hands.

It means too, that Christian men and women who love the institution shall not be wounded by the existence with the countenance of the Board and Faculty, of forms of dissipation condemned alike by the Church and individual Christian men and women. One of the first acts was the abolishment of the german club.

The results have been most satisfactory. The last Commencement was one of the most enjoyable for years and the attendance in spite of counter attractions elsewhere was better.

The college has not been forgotten by its friends. There is now in prospect from legacies about $30,000, and from the Alumni Endowment Fund about $4,000, and for the L. L. Hollday scholarship about $1,000. The appeal has been made to each Alumnus of the college to give ten dollars a year for ten years. If every Alumnus would do this quite a handsome sum would be realized.

The college has now seven professors, besides fellows, offering to young men all the advantages of a liberal education. The expenses have been reduced to minimum. An excellent club under the management of a cultured woman offers board to students at about $9 per month. Hampden-Sidney is removed from proximity to saloons and other places tempting the young. It is now more accessible to the outside world than ever. Its moral tone is unsurpassed. Its surroundings are those of culture and refinement. Its faculty is made up of men whose work is seen in the place their students take in the professions. It is an ideal spot for young men seeking an education and one of the safest places we know of to which parents may send their boys.

Within the last few days, a fortune has been taken out of the Barringer mine, near Misenheimer Springs, in Stanly county, N. C. Six tons of ore containing an average of $20,000 a ton in gold have been taken out. The ore contains masses of almost pure gold as large as a man's fist.

When a loan of $175,000,000 was asked by the British Government a little while ago, at three per cent., $6,000,000,000 were offered from three Nations. No greater expression of confidence in a Government already carrying an enormous debt, could be forth-coming.

A Convention of Road Supervisors, Civil Engineers and others engaged in, or interested in road-building in North Carolina, is hereby called to meet in Raleigh at the North Carolina College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts on July 21, 22, and 23, 1903, for the purpose of effecting an organization and to give opportunity for practical discussions and interchange of ideas.

The revolutionary movement in Russia seems to be spreading unceasingly and reaching regions hitherto free from radical agitation. Leaflets directed against the existing condition of Russian home affairs and demanding revolutionary changes have been circulated broadcast during the month of May in 34 cities and towns of the Empire. Serious street disturbances have occurred at various places.

The Hawaiian legislature has made an appropriation of $3,000 to induce Dr. Goto of Japan to come to Hawaii and give his personal attention to the leper colony at Molokai. Dr. Goto has a treatment for leprosy which experts say has no curative properties, but is valuable for its cleansing effects; in some stages it retards the progress of the disease. The lepers of the settlement have faith in its curative virtue, and the legislature has made a grant of money for the purchase of the remedy besides the amount appropriated for Dr. Goto.—Exchange.

Returns from the recent election for members of the German Reichstag give the following figures: Socialists, 3,008,200 votes, an increase over the preceding general election of 900,000, nearly 43 per cent. Center Party, 1,752,816 votes, an increase of nearly 300,000. National Liberals, 1,289,700, an increase of 226,000.

The renewal of wooden railroad ties on the 200,000 miles of railroad track in the United States causes an enormous drain upon the forest resources of this country. When we remember that the average number of ties to each 30-foot rail is sixteen, it is easy to compute that the total number of ties on all the railroads is about 35,000,000, and that if the average life of the tie is five years, there must be needed for renewal about 7,000,000 ties yearly.

Madrid, June 28.—Fourteen bodies and 50 injured persons have been extricated from the wreck of the Bilboa train which overturned at Nejerilla river last night.

According to official information, 30 persons were killed and 60 others seriously injured. Many of the injured were dead. Of the three hundred passengers on the train it is stated that only six escaped unhurt.

The Earl of Rosebery has written to the chairman of the London county council, submitting a plan for the establishment of a great institution for advanced scientific and technological education, at a cost of $1,500,000, towards which Messrs. Wernher, Beit and Company, the well-known diamond firm, and others, offer large contributions. A site for the institution has also practically been secured. Lord Rosebery asks the council for an annual grant of $150,000 for the maintenance of the institution.

One can appreciate a big clock on a tower or a railroad station; but a mammoth watch, such as that at the St. Louis World Fair, will doubtless create a great sensation. The watch will have a polished metal case, and will lie on its back and will be so large and roomy that people will be able to walk inside it among the moving wheels. It will be 75 feet in diameter and 40 feet high, with neat little stairways running all about. The balance wheel will weigh a ton and the hair spring will be 300 feet in length and made of the strongest steel bands, two inches thick, bound together.

The reply last week of President Roosevelt to a delegation of Jewish citizens who requested his aid and the Government's sanction for a petition to the Czar protesting against the Kishenev massacres, not only defined the position of the United States in the matter, but was an extremely vigorous and interesting tribute to the achievements of the Jewish race. That official action by our Government was impossible was clearly shown. It would be a gross insult to a friendly country to assume that its Government instigated or willingly permitted such atrocities. The petition to which President Roosevelt's attention was directed was in its nature a private and not a governmental affair. Nevertheless, the reply of President Roosevelt, prepared as it was with some care and almost officially given out for publication, contained a deep expression of sympathy for the victims and of horror for the appalling calamity at Kishenev.—The Outlook.

The Standard acknowledges with pleasure, the invitation to be present at the unvailing ceremonies at Guilford Battle Ground, on the 4th inst. Col. W. A. Henderson of Tennessee will deliver the annual oration. Subject: Heroes of King Mountain." To the Guilford Battle Ground Company is due the thanks of the people of North Carolina, for redeeming from waste the spot on which was fought the battle on March 15th, 1781 between Gen. Nathaniel Greene and Lord Cornwallis. The one hundred acres of this battle field is laid out in walks, drives and avenues. There are nineteen monuments completed and two in course of construction. Landscape architect Wilfong gives to the site the touch of beauty that only a sheet of water can add. The museum of relics is a most valuable feature than one who has not seen it, can realize. The addresses on these annual occasions "rise to the dignity of history." One's patriotism will be stirred anew, and one's gratefulness to the fathers who blazed the way, will be deepened by spending the day on the spot where some of their best blood was poured out for the land's sake. If you have not seen it, go. It is a pleasant drive of (we think), six miles from the city of Greensboro.

Deaths.

Resolutions adopted by the Ladies' Aid and Missionary Societies of the Warrenton Presbyterian Church, June 16th, 1903.

Whereas, it has pleased our Heavenly Father to remove from us, our President and faithful co-worker, Mrs. C. N. Wharton, beloved wife of our pastor, therefore, be it,

Resolved, First, That we bow with submission to the will of Him, who doeth all things well. We deeply mourn her loss to us, and to the Church she dearly loved, and contributed to so generously, whose interest she so bravely worked for, even during her illness. "She being dead yet speaketh."

Resolved, Second, That we commend to our members (a little band) her example of devotion to duty, and thorough consecration to her Master's service, her strong, abiding faith in the promises.

Resolved, Third, We honor and cherish her memory and sincerely sympathize with our beloved Pastor, and her bereaved mother, in their deep affliction, and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to them, and to the Presbyterian Standard for publication.

Mrs. Booth,
" Dowtin,
" Fleming,
Miss Williams,
" Tannahill.
Committee.

CLARK.—Died in Raleigh, N. C., June 17th, Archibald T. Clark, in the 65th year of his age. After many years of patient suffering he fell asleep in Jesus. He was a member of the First Presbyterian Church this city, to which he was transferred by letter about four years ago.

Unable to walk, the result of an accidental gun-shot wound thirty-two years ago, nearly one half of his life was spent in an invalid's chair. Early after receiving this injury he gave his heart to Christ, and lived henceforth a sincere, consistent Christian life. He was perhaps best known in Laurinburg, where he lived 21 years, and was engaged in active business so long as his health permitted. He enjoyed the love of many friends, and was respected by all who knew him as an upright, honorable Christian gentleman. He is survived by a widow and two daughters, who mourn his loss.

His body was laid to rest in the cemetery at his old home, Laurinburg, June 18th, to await a glorious resurrection. R.

MISS FAY LEE,

President of the Shakespearian Club, Kansas City.

"Your booklet came to my home like a message of health when I had suffered with headache, backache and bearing-down pains. I was weak, nervous and hysterical and had not consulted any doctor, thinking it would pass away in time, but instead I found that the pains increased and were more frequent. I decided to try Wine of Cardui and in a short time was much improved. It seemed to act like a charm. I kept up the treatment and the result was most satisfactory. Words fail to express my gratitude for the suffering that is now saved me. I am in fine health, physically and mentally. I can only say 'thank you', but there is much more in my heart for you."

nervous tension. The nerves soon begin to give way under the strain. You perhaps jump at any unusual disturbance, or laugh or weep, hysterically, at no apparent cause. That is what Miss Fay Lee, 603 1/2 North Seventh Street, Kansas City, Kansas, was coming to when she rescued herself by taking Wine of Cardui. The Wine made her a strong, healthy woman again, as it has made a million other women strong and healthy. By inducing regular menstruation the entire system is relieved of the terrible wasting drains. The ligaments which hold the womb in place are strengthened by a healthy flow and that organ is returned to its normal position. Returning health is the result. This is what Wine of Cardui has done for thousands of the best women in America.

BEARING-DOWN pains are the worst that women know. If you are suffering from this trouble you need not be uncertain about it. The pains in the abdomen and back that feel as if heavy weights were pulling down on the nerves of the stomach are "bearing-down pains". They may not be particularly severe at present but they are growing worse. That headache which nearly drives you distracted now is caused by the terrible

Taking Care of Love

"One needs to be clever, as well as loved, to love successfully," the Wanderer's Wife was fond of saying. "Love, particularly married love, is the most difficult of the fine arts. Love needs enormous taking care of—needs amusement, distraction and perpetual refreshment. . . .

"The first thing to remember in marriage is that, talking without cant, each has other needs in life besides the other. These needs may be pleasures the other cannot share, or they may be simple, innocent habits or personal methods, with which marriage so often disastrously and stupidly interferes—such as the need, say, of a silent hour alone, or of a solitary walk. The truest lovers do not occasionally get on each other's nerves—that is why a large house is best for love to live in, and why love in a cottage seldom succeeds.

"Then, while one of the true delights of marriage is that of doing things together, there are times when a certain impatience of this perpetual duality of our actions is to be feared, and an irresistible restlessness to do something and all by one's self—just as when one was a girl or boy—comes over us. For once not to have to share, for once to have our little adventures commissioned even by the most sympathetic companion! For once to be allowed to get that there is such a being even as the best husband in the world!"—Richard Le Gallienne, in Ainslee's.

Tired Out.

"What ailed that dear Mrs. Rivers?" asked one friend of another.

"She was tired out, and it brought on nervous exhaustion. She has been laid up for repairs like a ship in the dry dock, for the last six months, and as yet there are no visible signs of improvement, though her doctor is hopeful."

"But what tired her so terribly?"

"Well, she sewed too much. Those three little daughters had to be exquisitely dressed, and their mother made most of their pretty frocks, all tucks and ruffles and embroidery and insertion, with her own hands. Simpler clothes would have done as well for growing children, but Mrs. Rivers could be satisfied with nothing that was not elegant and elaborate. Then she belonged to three clubs, every one of which demanded a great deal of close study, Italian literature, English history, Greek art; I can hardly tell you how hard the women had to work just to keep up with the others. And Mrs. Rivers did a good part of the sewing in her church work; she was on committees in the Ladies' Aid Society and the Missionary Society, and was called upon whenever there was extra work on hand. Mr. Rivers protested, but she would not put his pleadings aside. Her mother was worried, but she only laughed. The end of it all was she broke down suddenly in the middle of everything, and the world is going on without her, and she is a nervous wreck in the very heyday of her youth."

"Women are apt to make that sort of mistake," said the friend shaking her head. "How unwise it is to get tired out too soon."

"Yes, how unwise, but how great is the temptation. The very air about us is full of excitement and vitality. We rush as if there would never be another day. To take things moderately is a lesson that as yet few women have learned by heart."—Exchange.

A Legend

There has come to my mind a legend,
A thing I had half forgot,
And whether I read it or dreamed it,
Ah, well, it matters not.
It is said that in heaven at twilight
A great bell softly swings,
And man may listen and hearken
To the wonderful music that rings,
If he puts from his heart's inner chamber
All the passion, pain and strife,
Heartaches and weary longings
That throb in the pulses of life:

If he thrusts from his soul all hatred,
All thoughts of wicked things,
He can hear in the holy twilight
How the bell of the angels rings.
And I think there is in this legend,
If we open our eyes to see,
Somewhat of an inner meaning,
My friend, to you and me;
Let us look in our hearts and question,
"Can pure thought enter in
To a soul if it be already
The dwelling of thoughts of sin?"
So, then, let us ponder a little;
Let us look in our hearts, and see
If the twilight bell of the angels
Could ring for you and me.

The Home Circle.

Why Charlotte, N. C., Doesn't "Keep" the Fourth of July.

(From "The Hornet's Nest," by Hon. Heriot Clarkson.)

About the same time (early in the Eighteenth Century) and later, the Scotch and Scotch-Irish (Scotch from Ulster in the North of Ireland) were settling Western North Carolina along the Piedmont region. Alexander Craighead thundered from his pulpit at Sugar Creek Presbyterian Church. This Church is four miles North of Charlotte, the Church has been rebuilt several times. He was well versed in the history of his Church. "No free assembly, no free gospel;" equal rights to the Protestants of all denominations. He believed in the rule of the people in Church and State. From those fathers of freedom of conscience, Knox, Buchanan, Boston, Erskine and others, he no doubt drew inspiration. Craighead is buried in Sugar Creek Church graveyard. In the cemetery, (Elmwood) in Charlotte is a monument erected to his memory, and on it these words: "Advocate of American Independence from 1743" "Inspirer of the Mecklenburg Declaration." The Presbyterian Clergy one year after his death (1767) were for the first time in North Carolina allowed to perform the marriage ceremony. Who can tell if this was not through his influence? Nine years later we find that the May Convention of 1775, held in Charlotte, is composed of members of Sugar Creek Church (the parent Church) and the other five Presbyterian Churches in Mecklenburg county and one in Iredell, (then Rowan). The Chairman of that Convention was naturally elected from the congregation of Sugar Creek Church, the present Church. He was Abraham Alexander, and is buried in old Sugar Creek Church graveyard.

Of the persons chosen to meet in the May assembly, one was a Presbyterian minister named Hezekiah James Balch, and there were seven elders, and other members of the Presbyterian Church—in all twenty-seven. While the Covenanters were meeting in Piedmont Carolina the Huguenots and their allies were doing the same in Eastern Carolinas, when the proposition went forth for a general convention of all the States to confer together for mutual protection against the unjust taxes imposed by Great Britain without representation.

The time was ripe—who cares about the dates, May 20th or May 31st, 1775, or both? It was a citizenship that had come down from independent ancestry. The Stamp Act—exorbitant fees by public officials—the restrictions on the clergy other than those of the Established Church—the antipathy of some to the English Government—the dislike to the government on account of the fact that the king had disallowed the charter to the Presbyterian College, (Queen Museum) situated in Charlotte, which had been granted by the North Carolina legislature—taxation without representation. All these wrongs were keenly felt, and the people were restless and discontented. At the instance of Col. Thomas Polk (a great uncle of President James K. Polk, who was born in Mecklenburg) the Commander of the militia, two delegates from each company were called together at Charlotte as a representative committee.

It is said that they were notified to meet on May 19th. The men selected were: the Reverend Hezekiah J. Balch, John McKnitt Alexander, Col. Thomas Polk, Hezekiah Alexander, John Phifer, Ephriam Brevard, Adam Alexander, James Harris, Charles Alexander, William Kennon, Zacheus Wilson, Sr., John Ford, Waightstill Avery, Richard Barry, Benjamin Patton, Henry Downs, Matthew McClure, Ezra Alexander, Neil Morrison, William Graham, Robert Irwin, John Query, John Flanniken, David Reese, Abraham Alexander, Richard Harris, Sr., John Davidson. These men met in the court house, which was then standing on what is now known as "Independence Square." The court house was packed to hear the proceedings. The wisest and best men had been selected. The meeting was organized by Abraham Alexander being called to the chair, and John McKnitt Alexander being selected as Secretary. Fiery speeches were made. A speech was being made on the burdens that had been borne by the people. The unjust taxes that had to be paid, the restrictions put on the nonconformist, and the speaker expressed the belief that the only hope of redress was Independence. The test had come. An old man, one of the oldest in the Convention, arose—"How can we declare ourselves free and independent?" said he "Have we not sworn allegiance to King George?" A middle-aged man arose—he was cool and deliberate—he turned to the window and looked out "See that beautiful oak yonder, with the leaves on it," said he, "suppose you swear to do a thing as long as those leaves are on the tree, and the leaves fall off, are you bound by your oath?" The court house shook with applause. The tide was turning. The King ought to be resisted as they were taught, if he "exceed his bounds and do against that for which he should be obeyed." Men were seen to gather at the large windows in the court house looking Southward, (now South Tryon Street) a horseman is seen rapidly approaching. He passes Queen's Museum—"Liberty Hall"—the Fanenil Hall of North Carolina—he approaches the court, he dismounts, several gather around him, he tells them hurriedly of the news brought to Charleston, that innocent blood had been spilt at Lexington. In that day the people of Mecklenburg were closely allied with Charleston, as it was the principal place where the people of Mecklenburg and the up country traded. The young horseman was required to tell the Convention of the news brought from Boston. The tale was told of how their Massachusetts brethren had been slain. The warm Southern hearts were moved at the wrongs. The oaths were forgotten. General Joseph Graham wrote some years after that the man who in the Convention called attention to the oath, although a strong patriot, was for years after looked upon with suspicion. A committee was appointed to prepare resolutions declaring themselves free and independent. The Convention is said to have met on May 19th and adjourned to May 20th. The following resolutions were adopted:

"1. That whosoever, directly or indirectly, abets, or in any way, form manner, countenances the invasion of our rights, as attempted by the Parliament of Great Britain, is an enemy of his country, to America and the rights of men."

"Resolved 2. That we, the citizens of Mecklenburg county, do hereby dissolve the political bands which have connected us with the mother country, and absolve ourselves from all allegiance to the British crown, abjure all political connection with a nation that has wantonly trampled on our rights and liberties, and inhumanly shed the innocent blood of Americans at Lexington."

"Resolved 3. That we do hereby declare ourselves a free and independent people, that we are and of right ought to be, a sovereign and self-governing people under the power of God and the General Congress; to the maintenance of which independence, we solemnly pledge to each other, our mutual co-operation, our lives, our fortunes and our most sacred honor."

"Resolved 4. That we do hereby ordain and adopt as rules of conduct, and each of our former laws, and the crown of Great Britain cannot be considered hereafter as holding any rights, privileges or immunities among us."

"Resolved 5. That all officers, both civil and military, in this country, entitled to exercise the same powers as authorities as heretofore; that every member of this delegation shall henceforth be a civil officer and exercise the powers of a Justice of the Peace, issue process, hear and determine controversies according to law, preserve peace, union and harmony in the county, and use every exertion to spread the love of liberty and of country, until a more general assembly of country, until a more general assembly be established."

"Resolved 6. That a copy of the resolutions be transmitted by express to the President of the Continental Congress, assembled in Philadelphia, to be laid before that body."

These resolutions were unanimously adopted and subscribed by the delegates (A spurious copy of the original declaration a few years ago was gotten up in Charlotte with forged signatures on for the purpose of sale. The original was destroyed by fire.) Captain James Jack was engaged to deliver the resolutions to the President of Congress; and also the delegates in Congress from North Carolina. The resolutions were read aloud to the people in Charlotte and proclaimed amidst shouts and huzzas. Captain Jack, on his way to Philadelphia, stopped over in Salisbury, and court being in session, Mr. Kennon a lawyer, and one of the signers, read the resolutions aloud in open court to a large assembly, and they were approved by present except two lawyers who afterwards were made to suffer severely by their disapproval. Patriotism a Phase of Religion.

Patriotism is an important phase of ion. A child of God has a duty to his country which is God's, and to his country which God has given to honor and defend. This is a u for young men to consider, and h young men have gloriously illus-

 War of the Revolution. What deeds ove of country is one of the noblest ions of the noblest men. It has acterized the great and illustrious l ages. Jesus wept when he foresaw fate of his beloved Jernsalem.

 ington risked everything, dared ything for America. Lincoln laid the strength, all the tenderness, all resources of his mighty heart upon altar of the Republic. Not a shadow elf ever fell across his purpose to save Union. To be truly patriotic is to h elbows with the world's immortals.
 iotism is not a sentiment, but a ser-
 ; it is love pouring itself out upon ve land, it is self-sacrifice for the

Our Young People.

A Day for Showers

"It's to be this evening—the tin-shower."

"The what?"

Mrs. Leggett looked hazily at her visitor, her intellect momentarily clouded by the sudden discovery of a distracting lack of connection between her shirt-waist and the belt of her skirt. She had been making beds the moment before, and the one pin she had hastily spiked into the front of her belt had failed of any effect on the general whole. "Oh, yes, of course, I understand. It's for Bessie Mershom, isn't it? I know she's to be married next month. Milicent was telling me about it last week. Every one is to meet at your house, you say, before going to the Mershom's? I don't know whether Milicent will be able to go, after all, but—"

"Oh, yes, I will!" said Milicent, eagerly. She was a pretty, stylish-looking girl, with an air of young ladyhood not warranted by her fifteen years. "I can go with the Farleys, mother, if you don't want to go. What shall I take, Mrs. Bird?"

"Oh, any little thing," said Mrs. Bird, indulgently. "Bread-pans are always useful, or cake-tins." She rose from the end of the sofa, holding a black silk bag in one hand—a tall and straight and severely trim woman, with the end of a quill feather projecting obliquely over her large nose. "It's a shame to disturb you so early in the morning, but I was just passing on my way home from market. Mr. Bird took the seven-fourteen train in this morning, and I declare I'm quite tired already. It gives you such a long day!"

"Yes, it does," said Mrs. Leggett. She forbore to remark that her husband, being a travelling man, had left that very Monday morning on the six o'clock train, and that she had been up before five to get the meal that he had hardly tasted in his last hurry. The morning had been one long procession of breakfasts among her six children, with preparations for a washerwoman who did not come. Mrs. Leggett never mentioned her domestic affairs among her neighbors; people always answered her at cross-purposes, she had found.

When women bemoaned their temporarily husbandless or servantless condition, they invariably said to her, "But of course, it's so different with you; you're used to it."

"I think I'll buy jelly-cake tins," said Milicent, after the guest had departed. "I want to take Bessie something decent. Three will be enough; they're fifteen cents apiece. I priced 'em the other day. When can you give me the money, mother?"

"I can't give you anything until the letter comes." Her voice had an unusual sharpness in it, which made the daughter look at her in surprise. They all knew that "the letter" meant one that came the first of every month enclosing a tiny check for the rental of a tiny backwoods cottage which was Mrs. Leggett's sole patrimony. "It ought to have been here in the first mail."

"Didn't father leave you any money?"

Mrs. Leggett's face looked hard. "Not enough to last the week out."

Milicent's eyes began to grow moist. "If the check doesn't come in time! All my friends will be at the shower. I suppose I may just as well make up my mind to stay at home. I suppose"

"It's no use talking to me now, Milicent; you'll just have to wait and see. Yes, I know I'm all coming apart, but there's no sense in your trying to pin me together until I've wiped down the stairs. You had better go up and straighten the boys' room— Well, never mind, then if you have to practice. What is it, Emily?"

She turned to the second daughter, who was short and wiry and black-browed like her mother. The red bow on her small pig-tail accentuated the narrow face and the gleam of the dark eyes that appealed to the mother almost more than the blonde prettiness she adored in Milicent. She had a strangely fellow-feeling for the girl who was like her.

"What is it, Emily?"

"When can you give me that quarter, mother?"

"What quarter?"

Emily looked tragic. "I knew you wouldn't remember. You said if I told you in time—and I did, a week ago. It's for the box the Busy Bees are sending to the Orphans' Home—we each give a towel. Miss Gladys said we could get good ones for twenty-five cents apiece. We're to help pack the box this afternoon, and have lemonade and cake. I told you, and now—"

"Just as soon as the check comes," said Mrs. Leggett, "you can get it cased, Emily."

"Can't you let me have the money now, and pay yourself back afterwards?" asked Emily, astutely.

Mrs. Leggett shook her head. She admired Emily's persistency more than Milicent's sensitiveness.

"No. If I once begin that—"

"Suppose the letter doesn't come?"

"Oh, I think it will, Emily," said the mother, gently, turning to her work on the stairs. "I want you to take father's collars to the laundry now. What's the matter? Why don't you want to go?"

"I hate to look at the Chinaman," said Emily, doggedly, "and I don't want to go down town twice; it's too warm. I want to go when I can buy the towel."

"Oh, very well," said the mother, weakly, "Alice can take them."

"Alice wants to buy something, too."

"What?"

"Miss Dorothy, her teacher, she's to sail to-morrow, and the girls decided yesterday to give her a handkerchief-shower this afternoon. Alice wanted me to tell you. Minnie and Chrissie Wells are each going to take a whole box of handkerchiefs, but I told Alice that one handkerchief ought to do if it was a nice one. How much do they cost with initials on them?"

"I'll tell you when the check comes," said Mrs. Leggett. "Where is Tom? O Lancy!" She stood up and straightened her back, tired from bending over the stairs. Her tense features relaxed.

 der young arm, the arm that was being already to wield a weapon in the fight. Lancey had "a position."

 e "What is it, Lancey?"
 Mother—I hate to ask you—but—just to-day— You know how long Barton's been sick, and we want to

 "A medicine-shower?" asked Mrs.
 gett, coldly.
 lancey stared at her, offended. "What on mean, mother?" You know he er would take a cent for training the
 s. We always meant to give him ething, and we voted Saturday to buy a chair. My share is only a quar-anyway."
 "If I get my check to-day, you can ve it," repeated Mrs. Leggett, parrot-
 e. That little five-dollar check resented all the overflow of luxury in entire family. If she had uses of her n for it, she kept quiet. She was used being close-mouthed. What, indeed, s the good of being anything else?
 "Mother, I want some money! Mrs. ce sent me for it!" A small, freckle-ed boy rushed in as Lancey walked off.
 's for the ice-cream for the Fresh Air

 s I can help take it to 'em! I want

 "For goodness' sake!" Mrs. Leggett hat's let loose on you all? You can't en my check comes I'll see about it.

 at is Tottie up to? He's so quiet!"
 "He's b en eat ng dirt," said Tom, omily. "It's all over him; Emily's t taken him in. And can't I have—"
 "No, you can't!" said Mrs. Leggett, rtly. "You can take your father's ars to the laundry."
 There was something queer about that nday, apart from the strain of watch-for the mails. The children could dly tell what it was that made the use so unpleasant. Mother, who ally felt every heart-beat of each mem-of the family as if it were her own, d a strange look in her eyes, and when helped them at dinner she looked over their heads. Even Lancey began feel a sort of rose tment against her.
 was foolish to lay it all on the letter!
 e was doing nothing to make the hard uation easier for them, and they knew could if she wanted to. What else re mothers for?
 "It's come, it's come!" Emily, who d been sitting all dressed in the parlor udow, waiting in defiant expectation, s the first to spy the letter in Lancey's nd, and joined in the mad rush to ther's room. She took the missive, t even then her eyes did not light up.
 t she start d as she open d the pages ide, and then looked again on the en-ope. The familiar little blue slip was t there.
 "There isn't any check." She put ill, and they can't pay the rent until next month."

"But they'll have to!" cried Emily, imperatively.

"No, they can't," said Lancey, in dejection.

"What are we going to do?" Alice's eyes were pleading.

The mother threw the stocking away from her with a fierce gesture. "I don't see what you all look at me like that for! I don't see but what we're just as well off without that check as with it. I'm just sick and tired of giving to people who have more than I have!"

"Mother!"

"I have never had enough of anything—never!" She sat beuding forward, her face tense, as her flock stood uneasily round her. Only Tottie was happy, emptying his mother's work-basket.

"I have never had enough of anything, no, not in my whole life! My father failed in business and then he lost his health. I've told you all about it lots of times. I taught school, but I could never buy anything for myself, not that you could call buying; we just lived. When married your father, I didn't even have my half-dozen of everything, let alone a dozen, like other girls. I didn't have any 'showers!' And as soon's we were married your father failed."

"He didn't lose his health," said Emily, aggressively. Gloom was settling down like a fog, the gloom that follows inevitably the depression of the mother who makes the atmosphere of the household.

"No, but I lost him!" retorted Mrs. Leggett; "that is, I lost his society. I married to be with him, I suppose, and what do I see of your father? Off for six weeks and home over Sunday! He's no more than a visitor. And with all his being away, I don't see that we get anything more for it! I'm tired of giving to tin-showers and wooden-showers and anniversaries and testimonials and missionary boxes! My baking tins—I haven't had new ones since Lancey was born. I helped pay for the table-cloths in the missionary box—six of them. I've never had more than three, or enough napkins, or enough white spreads, or kitchen things. I've just scabbled along and kept house on old things I'm ashamed to let anybody see!"

"I don't see what you talk like that to us for!" said Emily, in a high voice. "We can't help it; we go without things enough. As soon as I'm able—"

"There!" said Mrs. Leggett, in a tone so fraught with poignant feeling that Emily stopped short. "I can't even be cross when I want to, you all get so cantankerous, too. I can't let myself go a minute! I've got to be everlasting sunshine, no matter how I feel. I suppose I'll just have to make up my mind to go on and do always as I have been doing—doing without. I've never had enough of anything in my whole life—but children!" She stopped suddenly, and her eyes roved over the group in its gloom and forlornness—Lancey's handsome head leaning wearily against the red curtains, Millicent's graceful figure drooping, dark-browed Emily with a trembling lip, and the other children with an air of being beaten. They were being driven off the earth to the waters under the earth. How young they looked, how dear, how beautiful! It was as if a dark veil had been swept off from her face.

A tender smile radiated from the mother as her intense maternity reasserted itself with its old supremacy—a smile so enfolding, so ineffable, that the children lifted up their heads and visibly bloomed and drank in life, and radiated the joy back again. This was the being they knew; this was mother.

"I've never had enough of anything in my life but children." Her voice broke with an exquisite music on the rock of her compunction. "Heaven knows, I'm a rich woman. I ought never to complain as long as I have my children."

"Are you really glad you have us, mother?" asked Alice, while Tottie came nearer to bask in the sunshine. His mother drew him close and kissed the top of his fair head, a joy as of new wine running through her veins each time her lips touched the warm curls.

"I don't know where I've been today!" she protested. "Lancey, there's a quarter in my top drawer you can take. I can spare it as well as not. Of course, you want to give, don't you, dear? And there's that picture-frame over there, Millicent; it looks like silver, but it's a sort of tin. If you polish it up and take out the photograph, it will be as nice as anything for the shower. As for you, Emily, I've got three towels put away out of those Cousin Ada gave me Christmas; you can take one of those. Alice—let me see—Alice. Why don't you take the little pink handkerchief-case you bought at the fair? I think Miss Dorothy'd like that better than handkerchiefs, if she's got so many."

It was the old transmuting touch the children knew, the magical conjuring of love. "Tom—well, I'll make some lemonade, and he and Tottie can ask the little boy next door, and play they're little 'Fresh Air Fun's' in the back yard. I"—she put her arms round all the clustering group she could gather to her—"I don't know what's possessed me to talk as I've done this afternoon about being poor, when I've got my blessed children! Mother's as rich"—Mary Stuart Cutting, in Youth's Companion.

The Escape from the Fort.

By Mary Allaire.

The little gray house stood on the edge of the clearing. The village was a mile away on the west, while the nearest neighbor was almost a mile away on the other side. The children in the little house were never lonely for there were eight of them—the youngest five and the eldest thirteen. They worked and played together; they did everything in pairs—went after the cows, weeded the garden, washed dishes, darned and knitted stockings in groups at night. They knew nothing of boys' work or girls' work; each did what he was told, or helped his "chum," for, even if they were brothers and sisters, each had his choice companion.

These little children lived in Connecticut long, long ago, when England sent over her soldiers to make the colonists

R. M. COFFEY, C. T. A.,
Charlotte, N. C.

ent. The children in those days sides with their parents, and in the school-house down the road near ever there were "Tories"—those wanted a king—and "Continental" those who wanted independence. The was not friendly when the big and girls discussed affairs under the at recess.

Hitchcock's children, from "the on the plain," as it was called, ged to the Continentals; they knew if war really came their father d join the army and fight against the h. The oldest boy, William, had go announced that he would go which announcement always made hum, Alice, pale. When she saw ather give William a gun and go to the woods, she knew then that ar came William would go, for the g in the woods was so regular, and ys from the same place; William practicing, learning to use a gun. these children forgot the war for at a time; "Tory" and "Continental" sat side by side at school in the friendly manner. The games in yard were played with no thought ar, of Tory or Continental. Satur- when all the work was done, Wil- and Alice, Hannah and Robert, a and Edward, Polly and Silas, ed games, among the most popular hich was "soldiers." Down by the k one Saturday a fort was built, that engaged all the force. The ring of stones, the making of the ade, kept the eight busy. At last as done, but there was nobody to . No one was willing to be a sh soldier. The mere suggestion ght on the signs of a real war. am was General, of course. Alice made his epaulets of red cotton, and cockade in his hat of rooster's ers. His sword was beaten out of an. All this bravery and no ene- to fight! Clara—fat, good-natured, one who was willing always to do t no one else would do to make their es go—announced that she was will- to be a Tory. This was a great ession, and gave promise of sport.

once William met the opportunity a General. The fort was defended he Continentals; all the women children had taken refuge there. were supposed to be Continentals, there was one Tory, a woman who going to help the British capture town. This Tory was to open the and slip out to the captain of the ish soldiers and tell him how to enter ort and capture the people. There no British, so the Tory must be ured. Besides, for one to get out- the fort and away would show that sentry did not do his duty, that he asleep. The Tory must get outside ort, and try to get away. Being overed, she must defiantly shout, "I a Tory!" and run, pursued by the eral and his forces, who were to be red by their people in the fort.

he plan was greeted with enthusiasm. he garrison, the women and the dren, all lay down for the night. sentry nodded at his post. The y crept nearer and nearer the gate; a stick lay on the ground; she pushed it aside, wriggled through, and, stooping low, began creeping over the ground. The sentry started up, discovered the figure creeping toward the woods, raised his gun, a stont branch with a bent twig for the trigger, which snapped with a beautiful sound, and roused all in the fort. "I am a Tory!" was shouted back in Clara's loudest voice, as she stood up straight and ran for the woods.

"Are you?" she was asked in an angry voice, and Clara's mother stood before her with red cheeks and flashing eyes. Clara was seized by the shoulder, and marched before her mother toward home, all the garrison following, conquered and not knowing why. When the house was reached, Clara and her mother disappeared within; the garrison and the rest of the people from the fort, including the rag dolls and the ones made from sticks, sat on the fence and the grass beneath it, Dobbin and Gray looking over the bars at the silent group plainly anxious to know the reason of this unusual experience.

The sounds from the upper chamber made the garrison and the women and children more sad. William shut his hands several times, Alice rubbed her eyes, while Polly threw her precious rag baby on the ground, and cried so loudly that her mother appeared at the door. She called to the garrison and the people to come to the house. A solemn procession of seven marched at her order. When the mother had wiped Polly's eyes, straightened the doll's clothes so that her head was visible, and kissed Polly, she stood up, and, facing the children, said: "I want it understood that there are no Tory children in this family, not even in a game."

Then she went into the house, and before the children Clara was convicted of a great crime; on the whole, they were quite ashamed of Clara, or were until Alice caught a glimpse of a tear-stained face pressed against the window in the garret, and then the culprit seemed to be some one else. It was confusing.

William and Alice went after the cows. They had strayed off near the ridge, by the sound of the bells.

Polly and Silas went down to the creek, and nearly drowned the rag doll, because they put her on a raft much too small for a lady of her weight.

Hannah, Robert, and Edward, Clara's chum, settled down on the grass near the currant-bushes, in sight of the garret window, and Edward's antics made Clara smile, which was all the reward he wanted.

At tea-time Clara had two helpings of apple-sauce and the largest piece of gingerbread, warm and delicious.

The next time their mother went to town she left Polly, the five-year-old baby, with Alice for the first time, and took Clara.

The fort by the creek was strengthened and the stockade enlarged, but it never sheltered any Tories; the attacking party were always Indians.

In the Hitchcock family there never was another Tory—Clara blushed at the word—all were Continentals.—The Outlook.

Children's Letters.

Belmont, N. C., June 21, 1903.

Dear Standard:

Papa takes your nice paper and I enjoy reading the children's letters very much.

We go to church at Belmont. Our pastor is Rev. R. A. Miller. We like him very much.

I have recited the child's catechism, but have not received my Testament yet. Hope I will soon. As this is my first letter, I will close by asking a question, Where is the word Julia found in the Bible?

Your friend,

Age 9.

Ethel Cathey.

New Bern, N. C., June 19th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I had a pretty black bunny last summer, that made a hole in the ground for a nest. One night we heard a noise and in the morning bunny was gone and we think a coon ate him. I have a sister named Laura and she is sick, and a brother named Charles. I hope to see this in print as it is my first letter.

Your little friend,

George Allen Ives.

Age 7.

A Frontier Boy's Prayer.

By Rev. W. B. D. Gray.

July Fourth dawned brightly on a large party in camp on one of the many tributaries of Bad River. It was in the Big Sioux Reservation, near to a ranch house, where wood, water, and milk could be procured.

Like good American citizens this party were determined to celebrate the anniversary of our nation's independence in a fitting manner. Picnic excursions, with fishing, shooting, and horseback riding, filled the day, while music, storytelling, and fireworks lengthened the evening far into the night. The sociability of the ranchman and his family added much to the pleasure of the occasion. A cordial invitation to visit them in their home and accept their hospitality for the night was gladly accepted by two of the party. The house consisted of three rooms, a kitchen and two sleeping-rooms.

In one five cowboys slept. In the kitchen, after being fed, a party of belated travellers were allowed to sleep lying on the floor, rolled up in their blankets, leaving the remaining room for the family and their guests.

The experiences of that night were striking. As darkness and sleep were quieting all, a little boy whispered, "Pa, did those rockets" (referring to some Roman candles he had seen fired for the first time) "shoot high enough to hit God?" A whispered reply, and then the mother said, "Now say your prayers and go to sleep." The infant began, "Now I lay me," and added a prayer of his "very own," asking the loving Father to "bless papa, mamma, and the baby; his two little brothers; Mary, the maid-of-all-work, Charlie, Jim, and Joe, the cowboys, and the two strange men in the other bed." The guests mentally responded with an earnest "Amen," and as the sweet incense of that loving prayer was wafted heavenward they slept in conscious security.—Exchange.

Bunker Hill Monument.

No children who have begun to study the history of our country should go to Boston without making a visit to Bunker Hill Monument in Charlestown. It is but a plain granite shaft two hundred feet high, and many monuments in the world are much finer. But there is not one that is more important, not one that American children should look up at with such joy as at this one, raised to keep fresh in the mind of the world the struggle for the personal liberty of human beings that took place on the hill where it stands.

This battle was fought on June 17, 1775. It was between trained British soldiers led by skilled generals, and plain American citizens who had left their farms and workshops in New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Connecticut, and come to encamp around Boston with the Massachusetts men, because King George's soldiers were in the city to put laws in force that would, sooner or later, take away the freedom of every American colonist. The Americans had not wanted to fight; but now, at last, they were ready to do it, and to die too, rather than any longer submit to bad laws and to taxes that would make them and keep them poor men.

For weeks King George's soldiers and these oppressed men had been face to face, each side determined not to yield. On the sixteenth of June the Americans learned that the British were going to take possession of this hill in Charlestown—a very important military position. So they hurried over there and took it themselves, and then they worked all night and fortified it.

The British were astounded the next morning—the morning of the seventeenth. Their ships in the Charles River began at once to fire at the hill and the soldiers rushed up furiously to attack the Americans, never doubting that they could make them run!

But we Americans never do run, and they got so deadly a fire that they turned and ran themselves.

The British soldiers soon formed again, however, and came rushing up once more, but were driven back the second time and when they went down the hill it was with one-third of their number destroyed.

Still they rallied, and came on the third time—and now the Americans had shot off all their powder, and could not, of course, hold the hill, and went away quietly, leaving the British to take possession. But the red-coats fighters had lost so many men, and their generals were so struck by the courage of the Americans that they did not think it well to follow up this sort of a victory. They knew the battle was in reality a triumph for the Americans, since it had proved that they could hold their own against the finest troops in the world.

Supreme Court of Illinois, a resident of this city, commenced the practice of his profession in Knoxville with only $1 in the world. The honorable Judge of the Circuit Court of this district worked his way through college and to his profession.

"But real success consists in something else than simply getting rich or acquiring fame. He is the truly successful man who, going forward and being industrious and economical, and trying to the very best of his ability to make an honest living for himself and family, forgets not at the same time to be just, kind and benevolent, and to have a contented mind.

"Many a man, having labored and toiled incessantly to get rich, and, coming at last to himself, while thinking over what riches have cost him, has been ready to confess. 'My life has been a failure. And were I to live my life over again I would simply seek for a moderate competence, and shun the insane crowd that are striving might and main to become rich.'

"There are charms in life devoted to self-culture, to doing good unto others, and to studying the ever-pleasing works of nature as they lie spread all about us.

'Facts seem to indicate that about the fairest start a man can have is to start with nothing. Those who start rich usually become poor; those who start with nothing, provided they start right and have good health, good principles, good habits, and fair education, are likely to come out quite as well at the end as their fellows.'—The Presbyterian.

Growler.

It was a brave thing for Tommy to do; but, then, Tommy was a brave little fellow, though he didn't look it, with his yellow hair all about his dear baby face.

Tommy was a stranger in the town. He had come with his mamma to board in a pretty cottage near the great one where the Chambers family spent their summers.

Tommy had always wanted a dog—a regular-built, big-jawed bull-dog. And when he was wakened that first morning in the cottage by a tremendous roar he jumped out of bed and ran to the window.

Sure enough, there, in the very next yard, was a big white bulldog with a broad, ugly mouth and a jaw that looked as if it had been smashed.

Tommy was delighted; but it must be confessed that through his delight there went several little shivers of fear. While he was getting dressed he talked about his dog neighbor, and all through breakfast he could think of nothing else. His mamma did not permit him to eat doughnuts; but he asked her, in a very low voice, if he could have one to take over to the bulldog. She smiled and laid one upon his plate.

There was a wire fence between the two gardens. Tommy and his mother went at once to the gate.

"May we come in and call upon your fine white bulldog?" Tommy's mother asked of the gardener.

"Sure, ma'am, ye may come in. But th' furter ye kapes from tat crayther th' better off ye'll be—ye an' th' bye. No wan goes near Growler. Th' cook pushes his bones an' wather up wid a rake. He's bin on his chain fer a month now; but he's gettin' worse an' worse."

The old gardener shook his head toward the big dog, who stood pulling at his chain. The dog knew that something unkind had been said about himself. This made him angry. He gave a terrific growl and tried to get at the gardener. Tommy stood very close to his mother and reached up for her hand.

"Poor creature!" said Tommy's mother. "It will ruin any dog's temper to keep him chained."

"Sure, an' Growler's timper was ruined intirely long before he was born," said the gardener. "Kape th' little fellow back, mum, Growler's cross t' eyes."

"Perhaps bad boys have teased him."

"That they hev, ma'am. Durin' th' winter th' caretaker av th' cottage didn't mind his business well, an' wan day some av th' village byes managed t' throw a coat over Growler's head an' tie a tin cau to his stump av a tail. Since thin he's bin pertickler hard on byes. But he won't be long. We're jist kapin av him till young Mr. Graham comes home from college. He'll put an end t' sich ugliness. He's a good shot—is young Mr. Graham!"

"Has anyone tried being kind to him?" asked Tommy's mother.

The gardener didn't answer this question.

"Ye'd better look sharp, father th' bye," he said, and turned again to weeding his flower beds.

The dog grew quiet. Tommy's mother did not know whether to go or stay. Tommy pulled her hand and held up the doughnut. "I think he'd like it," he said. "It smells so good."

"Well, wait a minnte and you may toss it to him."

They went a little nearer. "Poor dog! good old fellow!" said Tommy's mother.

Growler could hardly believe his ears. Some one speaking kindly to him!

"Poor doggie!" came Tommy's sweet little voice. "Dear old fellow!"

Over and over they said the words as they stepped a little and a little nearer. Tommy held out the doughnut. Growler saw that it was something good. Maybe he smelled it. Then, when Tommy tossed it over to him, he jumped on his hinder legs and caught it in his mouth and swallowed it with a gulp.

"I don't believe he tasted how good it was," said Tommy.

His mamma laughed.

They called him "good dog" and "dear old fellow" a good many times. Then they went away, and Growler stood looking after them and wishing they had stayed or taken him with them. He wasn't cross that morning. He kept thinking of those two dear people and hoping they would come back. But they didn't come. He was tired of being chained. He wanted to run and stretch his legs. In the afternoon he became cross again, and the gardener shook his

Eating Crusts.

The awfulest times that ever could be
They had with a bad little girl of Dundee,
Who never would finish her crust.
In vain they besought her,
And patiently taught her,
And told her she must:
Her grandma would coax,
And so would the folks,
And tell her the sinning
Of such a beginning.
But no, she wouldn't,
She couldn't, she shouldn't.
She'd have them know—
So they might as well go.

And what do you think came soon to pass? This little girl of Dundee, alas!
Who wouldn't take crusts in the regular way. Sat down to a feast one summer's day; And what did the people that little girl give? Why, a dish of bread pudding—as sure as I live!

—Mary Mapes Dodge.

My Dolly's Asleep.

"My dolly's asleep," the wee bit maid
Sat on the doorstep and cheerily played.
The skies above her were dark with a frown,
The rain fell fast o'er the dismal town.
It drenched her frock and dripped from her hair,
But the little mother did not care.

And she hadn't a mother to look at her,
As she sat on the doorstep and did not stir,

A light of love in her happy face,
And dolly close in her fond embrace.

But what do you children, with dolls to spare,
Beautiful dolls with golden hair,

Dolls which open and shut their eyes
And look so gentle and cute and wise,

Suppose was the dolly this wee bit maid
Cradled and cuddled as there she played?

You needn't be sorry. I tell you true
The child was contented the whole day through,

Through her doll was only a bottle, found
In an ash-heap in the wet, cold ground.

Fancy and love had joined together,
And the dear little heart was light as a feather.

Though the wild wind blew and the wet rain fell,

Her dolly and she were happy and well.
—Margaret E. Sangster, in Youth's
Com.

I remember a poor woman saying to say, 'The Lord take this for some one who needs it more than I do.'"—Bishop

Robert E. Speer.

WORDS OF COMMENDATION.

The Rev. P. R. Law, of North Carolina, says:

A short visit to the North Carolina Military Academy furnishes the occasion for these reflections. We were delighted with what we saw and heard. The advantage of the Military feature were manifest. There had been a prejudice in our minds against such schools. It has all been wiped out. We are a convert. There is a discipline about it that is needed and unattainable, save in this way. There was a regularity in the doing of things illustrated by the movement of the hands of a clock. It is a Christian school. The highest moral tone is inculcated. Over eighty cadets are enrolled. It is a well drilled and manly student body. The standard of scholarship is all that could be asked. The corps of teachers are cultured and experienced school men.

Washington, D. C., May 28th, 1902.

It affords me much pleasure to add my testimonial to the high standing and efficiency in educational work of Dr. Samuel W. Murphy, A. M. I first knew Dr. Murphy when as a pupil I entered his school some years ago. Owing to his effective teaching and liberal and progressive views, I feel that I cannot recommend Dr. Murphy too highly and I shall ever wish him the highest success.

L. Heisler Ball, M. D.,

United States Senator from Delaware.

Hon. Geo. W. Peck, Governor of Wisconsin, says:

Dr. S. W. Murphy:

My Dear Sir: I desire to express to you my high appreciation of the Institute under your management, and to say that the improvement of my son, from first to last, for two years has been all that I could wish. I have no fear but that the boys who go out from under your charge will be young gentlemen, with an education that will be of use to them through life. The military part of the instruction is doing all of the scholars good, making them prompt, obedient, and balanced—in fact, gentlemen as well as scholars.

Yours very truly,

Event and Comment.

The latest thing in priestly circles is the hearing of confession and the granting of absolution over the telephone by a priest to the wife of a Mason who would not let the priest come inside of his house. The world does not love.

The campus is infallible. Harvard students now divide law into four classes: common law, equity, Standard Oil law and lynch law. If the truth were told the Standard Oil law to Standard Oil has a good deal to do with its seizure by the mob.

Three canons of the Church of England took part in the "recognition" of Rev. R. J. Campbell in the City Temple, London. After this we should hear less of the canon that forbids the interchange of pulpit courtesies between Episcopal and other Protestant ministers.

Dr. George Adam Smith, who has been ill at Lakeside Hospital, Cleveland, for more than a month, of typhoid fever, is on the road to recovery, at last reports. The distinguished Scotchman has many sympathizing friends in America, who have been anxious for him and will be glad to know of the promise of recovery.

Those who have been surprised and gratified at the splendid progress that Cuba is making as a self-governing State might have their surprise diminished and some their gratification increased by the knowledge of the fact that President Palma is a Presbyterian. Cuba is copying the United States in more than one particular.

The Jews of New York City are not only taking possession of the business life of the town, but are winning the prizes at Columbia University. With New York as inviting as it is, what is the sense in trying to colonize at Jerusalem? Besides, any well-regulated Zionist could make out that Jerusalem meant New York.

We are glad to see the several Methodist protests against the disbanding of its college for women, in North Carolina. We trust that one of the new plans proposed will materialize. And we admit that the business end of our little criticism of the Biblical Recorder was the second postscript in which we endeavored to incite our brethren to good works.

The Religious Education Association will have a meeting of its board of directors during the session of the National Educational Association in Boston, at which time a permanent general secretary will be elected. The Association is pledged to "the organization of the growing sentiment of the country in favor of a systematic and determined application of pedagogy to religion and religion to education." The attempt to give more education to the Sunday-schools and more religion to the secular schools is a praiseworthy one.

The Lutheran General Synod met in Baltimore, June 1. Rev. E. J. Wolf, D. D., of Gettysburg, Pa., was chosen Moderator. The Foreign Mission Board reported encouraging progress in the mission fields of India and Africa, the proposal to abandon the latter field having been declined on account of the new encouraging conditions. The Home Mission Board has 95 missions to support, having recently added 49 new stations. This Synod meets every two years and of course is only one branch of the great Lutheran body in America.

We are thankful to say that our War Department has instructed the Philippine Civil Commission to dismiss the scheme of making the opium traffic legalized monopoly. Christian England has not yet recovered from the Opium War with China.

About the most impudent emanation of Unitarianism we have seen for some time is President Eliot's reference to "the unfortunate survivals of the doctrine of the deification of Jesus, which Emerson dealt with as a lack of faith in the capacity of man." One would think that Unitarianism was not in a lean and beggarly minority of the civilized world. "Unfortunate survivals"!

The Unitarian Register notes the weakness of the Congregational scheme of government in the proposal to unite the Unitarians and the Congregationalists. Both have a Congregational form of government. The Register says that the only union possible would be that of unconditional surrender to the Congregationalists, in which case individual Unitarian Churches would "revert to their former condition of external independence." However, it is about time for the "unconditional surrender" of Unitarianism to any receiver-ship that feels like undertaking the task.

Those who have been reading Ida M. Tarbell's story of Standard Oil must recognize that the Standard Oil Trust, under the management of the elder Rockefeller, Henry M. Flagler, and others, started wrong. It has a record of deceit and lawlessness, of devouring widows' houses, which no pretence of long prayers afterwards can atone for. That much is certain. And this also is sure: nothing that started wrong ever ended right. African slavery started with man-stealing, for example. Our trust-makers should be more careful about violating the principles of righteousness even than the laws of economics.

Dr. Alexander McLaren, the great preacher to preachers and Sunday-school Teachers brings his official ministry to a close by resigning his Manchester pastorate. The Christian Work and Evangelist speaks sympathetically of his career:

"It may be confidently expected that his pen will not be idle, and that he will bring nearer completion tasks and projects in his mind, the result of which will be to enrich permanently the whole Christian Church. Nor is it possible to think without deep gratitude and pride of the undimmed splendor of the long career now in a sense terminated. It is a career that has shone more and more unto the perfect day. To the ministry of the Gospel Dr. McLaren brought gifts of the highest and rarest order, gifts which would have won for him an eminent place in literature, or in any career he might have chosen. But it is his use of the ten talents which has chiefly marked him out. Beginning almost as a boy—he was only nineteen—he has gone on to ripe age concentrating himself with an almost fierce intensity on the work of his life, never looking aside, and never turning back. No extempore speaker that we ever heard of has so completely mastered the art of expressing himself with unvarying, unerring distinction and precision. To his own denomination he has been most loyal, and he never showed himself more heroic than in the patient drudgery he went through for the Baptist Centenary Fund. He is still in the plenitude of his power and usefulness. The very finest of his sermons have been among those recently preached. The whole Christian Church will unite in wishing for him a long and golden evening, and in the prayer, Seurs in cealum redat."

The Evolution of Evolution.

It is somewhat gratifying to the Christian Scholars who refused to be carried away by the theory of evolution that obtained a decade or two ago, to learn that this theory is largely discredited by present-day scientists. The Darwinian theory was always more or less repugnant to the Christian consciousness. Darwinism was materialism that bordered on Atheism. It should be remembered that there were always a large number of reverent scientists who accepted evolution itself as a theory, while denying the validity of some theories of evolution. The doctrine is more widely accepted to-day in the whole realm of thought than it ever was. It is only the method of evolution that is the subject of discussion among the scientific men of to-day, and even the unscientific have gotten a heap nearer to understanding it since the time when the Christian Observer wrote: "Evolution teaches that from a cow may come a sheep and that the offspring of an elephant may be a man."

The Darwinian theory held that the different forms of life have come to us by augmenting the differences that may be seen to exist in all individuals even of the same species. The extreme types, the ones most widely different, persist, while the middle types drop out and perish. It is a known fact that no two plants or animals are exactly alike. In the struggle for existence those that are best fitted to live, survive. And natural selection continually widened the gulf between the forms that were once similar.

It was a pleasure to hear the other day from the editor of Country Life in America, Professor Bailey, of Cornell University, an exposition of De Vries' theory of evolution. Professor Bailey announced himself as "an extreme evolutionist." He believed that all life was from one starting point, though he did not know, as he confessed, whether it was thrown full-handed from the Maker's hand or was the result of chemical compounding. He believed that evolution had nothing to do with religion, although it might touch theology, the science of religion, to which he paid a noble tribute in passing, praising especially its conservatism. He declared that the time had been when the man who did not bow down and worship Darwin was cast into the fiery furnace of criticism, as an ignoramus or a bigot. But the Darwinian method was itself that of a speculative philosophy. Its results were uncertain. The present method is that of experimental study, the method which will probably obtain during the next ten or fifteen years, then to be superseded perhaps by a new method. Professor Bailey declared that there might be twenty philosophies wrapped up in the doctrine of evolution. It is becoming therefore, for the theorists to be humble and for the dogmatists to be patient while both sides wait for more light.

De Vries is the great authority to declare that a new species may begin suddenly, per saltum, and thus become fixed and perpetuate its kind. The question, What is a species? is a puzzling one. There are two species of grapes in America; there are also twenty-five species. Finally each individual may be a species itself. The species, or the individual, is made up of an indefinite number of units, the color, the size, the shape of a leaf, for example. Nature is always forming new species, as to one of these units. When there is a combination of these units, different from what went before, we have a new species. The units are gradually built up into the new species. And there are two periods observable—the fixed period and the mutation period. The theory is accordingly called, The Mutations Theory.

The theory has become well established, so far as it could be done by experiments in the vegetable world. First there would be changes effected in the size of the leaf of a plant, then in the shape of the leaf, the changed size being retained; then in the color of the leaf, the changed size and shape being retained. We would then begin to say that this was a new kind of plant, the leaves differing in color, shape and size. Flowers and fruits can be changed in the same way.

As regards the evolution of the universe itself, science is just on the eve of abandoning the old atomic theory. A recent article by Frederick Boyd Stevenson expounds the new theory, which has the weight of such eminent authorities as Professor Thomson, of Cambridge, Professor Crookes, Professor Lodge, and M. Currie, of Paris. It holds that all matter is one in origin and identity of substance. Each atom, instead of being indivisible, "a manufactured article," is in reality a whole stellar system, with the units of the system, called ions, all in motion in their respective orbits. Thus there are 11,200 ions in the atom of oxygen and 137,200 in the atom of gold. These ions are electrical, so that the kinship, if not identity, between matter and electricity is embraced in the theory. The separation of these ions into other groups makes chemical combinations. And then there comes the startling speculation, that the earth and the other members of our planetary system, are only larger ions of the atom called the solar system, and move in their orbits, by the same law that controls the ions of an atom of oxygen, while the sun itself may be but a larger grain of the wonderful new substance, called radium, with its 120,000 ions in rapid revolution around it. This new substance, a grain of which costs a fabulous price to extract from other matter, radiates light and heat, through solid and opaque substances, without apparently losing aught of its weight. By the use of it the blind have been enabled to see the outlines of figures upon a screen.

Behold, What hath God wrought! Certainly this theory brings us face to face with the Infinite. If the earth is but the ion of an atom, how great may be this universe of ours, and is this the first or the millionth one of the universes? If an atom of oxygen is a stellar system, with its planets, and life extends through such infinite variations as to size on the planet that we call earth, what about the planets of these infinitesimal systems? The imagination reels as we approach either the infinitely great or the infinitely small.

In the mean time it is just as well to remember that "God is where he always was," to quote from Professor Bailey again; that he is in heaven and all's right with the world; that matter and life are the same that they were after all our discussion of their problems, and that the universe is in safer hands than ours. And it is even a better time, than ever before, for man to do justice and to love mercy and to walk humbly with his God.

Review of Contemporaries.

The refusal, one day last week, of German naval officers to call upon Collector Crum of Charleston, who is acting by the President's appointment during the adjournment of the Senate, illustrates the fact that race prejudice is not confined wholly to the South or to Americans. It is a safe rule to regard local sentiment in making an appointment; whether the sentiment in the case corresponds with the views of the appointing power is not, perhaps, material. The fact is, "the negro problem," so called, bristles all over with sensitive points which call for the highest order of tact in handling. The instant penalty of a blundering application of theories remote from the fact and based on loose information, always has been and always will be reaction and a putting back of the clock by just that much. We fear that the condition of the negro in his relations with the whites in the South to-day is less favorable than it was when President Roosevelt took up the work where President McKinley laid it down.—Christian Work and the Evangelist.

The Protestant Church of Geneva, Switzerland, is beginning to take serious thought as to its condition in view of the large Roman Catholic immigration of recent years. An important paper on this subject was presented and followed by discussion at the recent annual meeting of the National Evangelical Union, which includes with the National (Reformed) Church, the Free Churches, the Popular Mission (founded many years ago upon the plan of the McAll Mission in France) and the Young Men's Christian Association. Pastor Guillot, who presented the paper, stated that of 133,600 inhabitants of the canton, 54,000 were foreigners, and the number was rapidly increasing. Very many of these foreigners brought with them the strong anti-religious free thinkers, yet under present circumstances they are more inimical to the religious interests of the country than the others. Aided by contributions from their mother-lands, they are carrying on a very active propaganda, which is evidently guided by far-seeing minds. A large proportion of the pedagogic section of the college is now in the hands of foreign Roman Catholics; they are rapidly becoming naturalized, and are acquiring property, evidently with aid from abroad. There seems to be a near probability that they will become a majority in the electoral body, the franchise being based upon property. M. Guillot urged the necessity of meeting these conditions, first by modernizing the Church service, which is of the stiff and formal character of two centuries ago, especially by paying greater attention to singing; and then by other methods, among them "Thursday schools," which, introduced into France by Dr. McAll, have since the secularization of public instruction in that country been adopted both by Protestant and Catholic churches. Another method proposed was a series of evening meetings in the cathedral, addressed by distinguished orators; and still another, a sort of home-study system, neighborhood meetings, for popular instruction in the national history, which is quite as much religious as political. The most important suggestion—if it is adopted—was of founding a well endowed and well conducted popular daily illustrated religious newspaper, to be sold at a very low price and largely given away. The discussion brought out the fact that the common people have become very suspicious of all charitable enterprises and other Christian works, believing them to be based upon enlightened and calculated economic selfishness. For a similar reason evangelization becomes necessarily difficult, interested motives being suspected. The necessity of multiplying lay evangelists was emphasized.—Christian Work and the Evangelist.

The Secretary of the U. S. navy has ordered the closing of the Puget Sound Navy Yard at Bremerton, Wash., and there is intense excitement in that city in consequence. The cause of the closing seems to be indicated by the following paragraph from the New York Tribune: "From time to time the Navy Department has had occasion to complain, because the employees at the yard and sailors from the ships were demoralized by the liquor saloons, gambling places, and other vile establishments that were licensed by the Council. Promises were made that there should be an improvement, but the Council refused to revoke the licenses of the places complained of." This is a drastic remedy, but it will probably prove effective in more ways than one. The saloon-keepers and their friends will understand the effectiveness of such a piece of boy-cotting.—Dominion Presbyterian.

The Belfast correspondent of the Glasgow Weekly Leader thus describes the character of the Torrey-Alexander evangelistic meetings held recently in the North of Ireland city: "Owing to the crowds desirous of hearing Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander having grown far beyond the capacity of any church or hall in the city, the two meetings on Sunday were arranged to be held in one of the great city markets, kindly granted for the purpose by the Belfast Corporation. Both at the afternoon and evening services the long stretch of floor space of the great enclosure was a densely packed mass of humanity. It was computed that the aggregate attendance at the day's meetings, including the one held at eight o'clock a. m. in Grosvenor Hall, was twenty-three thousand. Between seven and ten thousand were turned away from each service in the market owing to want of room. By those most competent to form an opinion the meetings of Sunday, in point of numbers, enthusiasm, and spiritual results, are without a parallel in the history of revival in Belfast. At Friday's and Sunday's meetings alone between seven and eight hundred confessed Christ, among whom were people from almost every town and district in Ulster. The whole province has been awakened as it has not been since 1859.—Dominion Presbyterian.

When it is remembered that one of the most marked signs of moral decay in the Roman Empire, toppling to its final ruin, was the looseness of the marital tie, when women numbered their husbands by the consulates, constantly changing, we can but be startled at the statistics of divorce in this country of ours, supposed to recognize the Bible as supreme in morals! The Southern Christian Advocate is authority for the following figures: In Indiana in 1900 there were 4,699 divorces, or one in every six marriages. In Rhode Island, about as populous as a county, 714 applications for divorce to the courts! South Carolina is the one State which in her statutes treats the bond as inviolate.—Southwestern Presbyterian.

Greetings to Young Preachers.

The pathway back and forth between the pulpit and the editorial office is not a long one. nor, very difficult to travel, and it seems quite fitting that a religious newspaper should extend its cordial greetings at this season, when the theological seminaries have graduated so many promising students, to the young preachers who are about to enter upon their labors for Christ at home or abroad.

It is not to be expected that any of these young men know all that is before them—and it is well that they do not—nor that they have in a few years of theological study already possessed themselves of sufficient advice and practical counsel to last them all their life. No man, young or old, can prepare himself at any one time with a stock of wisdom or grace sufficient to last to the end. Wisdom and grace, like daily bread, are given in successive installments as they are needed. But there are certain general principles of action which young preachers would do well to adopt for their guidance, which the added experience of the years will never disprove, but only endorse the more emphatically.

In the first place, and all along, the maintenance not only of a virile type of piety, but also of a cheerful, springy kind of faith and of an optimistic temper is very important to ministerial success. The joy of the Lord will be the preacher's strength. The apostle of pessimism is not needed in this age, which is full weary of its own folly and sin. The half-convinced, equivocating teacher, whose discourse bristles with interrogation points, is not a help. The call is, and in the future increasingly will be, for the man of positive conviction, who holds tenaciously with one hand to the great rock of truth, while with the other hand, he seeks to lift his brother man out of the mire of sin, who all the while possesses the Pauline quality of victorious faith, and who lives his life in the spirit of unconquerable joy. That sort of a Christian optimist will win his way wherever he goes.

It is to be hoped too, that the young men now graduating from the seminaries will continue their search for truth all through their ministry. It is not by accident that we have spoken of the students who are now graduating from the seminaries. It is to be expected that these men will not cease to be students at any future time in their lives. It will be their privilege to study first of all the Bible, that rich store-house of truth, and with the Scriptures, all books or literatures that help to explain the Bible, or that tend to elevate thought and to enrich life. The wise preacher will also seek to study men, and will be alert to make the wider revelations of God that are to be found in the world of nature and throughout the broad range of human society.

It is to be assumed also that love will be the characteristic spirit of the life of the young but growing preachers. Love was, or should have been, the motive drawing the student to the ministry in the first place. It must continue to be the impelling motive throughout. A loveless minister would be a contradiction in terms. Unless the Church exhibits a better kind of love than that of the world, and more of it too, and unless the minister be, if possible, a whit more loving even than the average church member, the richest fruits of the ministry of Jesus Christ, who loved men and gave Himself for men, will never be garnered. Though a man speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not this intense love for his fellowmen, he is ministerially nothing.

There are other qualities which go to make up the character of the approved minister of Jesus Christ, which will come more and more into evidence with the message of the years, if the individual minister takes pains to cultivate his own soul while seeking to cure the souls of others, and there are many lessons which cannot be learned from text-books, but are to be acquired only in the school of experience. We trust that that school will not be to the graduates of 1903 a bitter school. That life will be easy for them we do not suppose. Life is not easy for anyone, not even for the righteous, and least easy of all for the ungodly. But the life of the average minister—difficult as are the modern problems which confront a pastor—is on the whole very blessed and happy. The ministry is still an approved profession, a sacred calling. It presents glorious opportunities, and even its hardships may possibly, as we would fain believe in the case of this year's graduates will actually, assist the moral development of the soul and issue in the end in a richer blessedness. Feeling sure that the young men now entering the ministry have made no mistake in adopting the calling, we extend to them the kindest Christian greetings and wish them "God speed" in their holy work.—New York Observer.

The Summer School of the South.

(Editorial Correspondence.)

Knoxville, Tenn., June 29, 1903. There are several summer schools this year of great interest and importance, but the one at Knoxville is still the Summer School of the South, pre-eminently. It holds the title and it has the largest attendance and the largest number of distinguished teachers for its varied course of study. It is difficult to see what department of study a teacher could wish to take that is not found here. The men in charge, Dr. Dabney, Professor Claxton, and others, have kept in such close touch with the needs and the aspirations of the teaching force in our Southern States, that they have abundantly met those needs and satisfied those aspirations after a more excellent equipment for service.

The courses of study this year are as follows: Kindergarten, Drawing and Art, Vocal Music, Musical Interpretation, Manual Training, Domestic Science, Reading, Expression, Physical Culture, Nature Study, Physiology and Hygiene, Geography, Geology, Physics, Chemistry, English Language, English and American Literature, Literature of the Bible, Latin, Greek, Romance Languages, German, History, Sociology, Mathematics, Bookkeeping and Banking, Psychology, Neurology, Education in general, City Supervision, County Supervision and Literary Instruction.

The names of a few of the specialists in the several departments are mentioned:

Bailey of Cornell, editor of Country Life in America; Dodge of Columbia, Gregory of Massachusetts, Hammel of Maryland, Mace of Syracuse University, McMurry of Illinois, Phillips of Wisconsin, Scott of Michigan, Alphonso Smith of Chapel Hill, Snyder of Wofford College, Search, formerly of Clark University, Thorndike of Columbia, Greenwood of Kansas City, and Dabney, Claxton and Wait, of Knoxville.

And the preachers and lecturers before the school are, among others:

Bishop Gailor, Bishop Hoss, President Mullins, Dr. J. I. Vance, Dr. A. L. Phillips, Dean Russell, Albert Shaw, Governors Frazier and Aycock, President McIver, President Frost, and Edgar Gardner Murphy.

Perhaps to the teacher who is in close touch with his fellows of the craft, these names are more significant than ought else. For the general reader a few words of description and discrimination may not be out of place.

One of the most pleasing lecturers at this school is Dr. Preston W. Search, now superintendent of schools in Holyoke, Mass. He is tall, of distinguished appearance, with something of Western breeziness about him, and with a natural eloquence, when pleading the cause of the child, that is very effective. We heard him twice. In his introductory lecture he mentioned the tremendous fact that 150,000 school teachers step out of the profession each year, while the same number take their places in the school-room. He contrasted the German method with the American, the splendid organization of the Prussian schools, with one male teacher for every class of not more than 20 pupils, giving his life to his task. We presume that a large number of the 150,000 teachers step out of the school-room into homes of their own, to become after a while, teachers in the private schools of the homes of this nation. For with us "teacher," ordinarily means one of the gentler sex. Of rise they make the best teachers in the world. but inarily, this is not their life-work and it would be a pity if it were. We agree with our versatile President in his views as to race suicide. But the Prussian ideal, while it gives employment to more men, than men, necessarily gives the opportunity of matrimony to more women, since they do not compete with the men, and gives the teaching profession itself a dignity, a life-work, that it does not always attain in America. Dr. Search believes that the Normal schools are not meeting the demands laid upon them and that if they are not lifted above their present grade of work they will soon pass away. The Normal School advocates do not doubt reply that Dr. Search is almost enough of an idealist to be called a crank. But they say also in his book "An Ideal School," is worth reading by every teacher. Dr. Search's account of his experience with a dull boy, and how his teacher rescued him from failure, once by calling attention to his well-blacked eyes, and another time by making him say over for the benefit of the school a geography lesson he had happened to learn well, was a rare bit of humor and pathos. Over here in one of the lecture halls is a young fellow that the teachers, that is the women, are raving over. Professor Ulrich Bonnell Phillips, of Georgia and Wisconsin, a fair-haired Saxon, of Southern birth, with the opportunity of making a name for himself. He predicts a brilliant career for Professor Phillips, a tractor in history in the University of Wisconsin. He has written a book, Georgia and States Rights. It is a good idea to have those Northern students taught correct theories of American history by men like a young professor, and Woodrow Wilson.

We were particularly pleased with Professor Phillip's lecture on the Colonial Frontier Settlements, as it was almost an exact verification of our own opinions. That is a species of flattery that is irresistible in its warming influences upon the heart of the auditor. He showed that for more than a century the settlements were concentrated to the coast region and the region of the navigable rivers. The plantation system prevailed, with aristocracy and its system of slavery. Back of the East Region with its English settlers were the Scotch-Irish, who had been frontier people in Ireland and were trained for conquering the wilderness. They came to America from the two ports of Philadelphia and Charleston, and were more in numbers than any other colonizing stock in America. They had been trained in the industrial trades in the north of Ireland, were democratic in instincts and Presbyterian in religion. They settled Western Pennsylvania, then moved Southward and Westward, by families, communities and congregations, to Virginia and North Carolina, meeting the Northward wave of the same immigration that had come into America at Charleston. They settled the Piedmont Region without the knowledge or authority of the people of the Coast Region.

In Virginia, especially, the Scotch-Irish were not in sympathy with the Seaboard, and a struggle began between them in questions growing out of suffrage, office-holding, and the rights of the Established Church. The Seaboard had the advantage of being already entrenched in power, while the Scotch-Irish were the most independent of all the immigrations. The lecturer showed an extraordinarily minute and accurate knowledge of the early history of different sections of North Carolina, and a private interview after the lecture indicated that he was sound on the question of the Mecklenburg Declaration. Professor Phillips will some day be a great historian.

In the afternoon we stopped to hear Dr. Lincoln H. Bailey, Professor of Hebrew at Bucknell University. He is lacking in culture but abounding in common sense. His work was on the Literature of the Bible, and he went for the allegorizers in good hammer and tongs fashion. After listening to their satisfactory delimitation for a while we said Amen, and departed. The lecture which pleased the assembly of teachers most, that day, was the closing one of a series by Professor L. H. Bailey, of Cornell University, the editor of the most beautiful magazine published in America, Country Life. The subject was Evolution, and his treatment of it pleased even such a defender of orthodoxy as Dr. T. M. Lowry of Knoxville. We have given an abstract of the lecture, elsewhere. His closing period, was delightful, using the familiar picture of life as a journey, in the day; childhood a long and level stretch, with mystery surrounding it; youth, the toilsome, yet stimulating ascent of the steeps and mountains; while for him and for others there, the time had come for the quiet travel in peace and joyfulness, "down all the golden afternoon."

Now these are just samples of the lectures of one day, when the writer hardly had a fair chance through having to talk to so many friends. The time would fail to tell of the feast of good things provided. If anybody wants to study any particular thing next year, from Egyptian hieroglyphics to the latest germ-destroyer, let him write Dr. Dabney and it will be on the programme next year, with a specialist to teach it.

But what interested this scribe most of all, was not the big men, whom it was a pleasure to hear, not the splendid equipment for the work of the summer school, but the teachers themselves, that is the students. There were twenty-five hundred enrolled the first week, and there will be 3,000, at least before the term is over. And they are doing earnest, honest work. There is not as much disorganized enthusiasm perhaps as last year, but the rules are stricter. No one is allowed to take more than four separate studies and there is more opportunity given for study and research to the pupils themselves. As we looked into their earnest faces, with the glow of intelligent sympathy shining forth, and thought of the eagerness with which the opportunities, these splendid opportunities were being seized, of the inspiration that is given for the coming months of toil, and of the influences upon the thousands of pupils to be under their care, we could but thank God. Nor should our people be ungrateful to the Southern Education Board, which has been the financial backer of this scheme, which is using the comparatively small means at its disposal so wisely, and which, for the most unworthy ends, has been mercilessly criticised by Southern newspapers, the more the shame. Well, the criticism has been an advertisement and the severity and injustice of it defeated itself.

Besides this school at Knoxville, there are the ones at Charlottesville and Chapel Hill that have heretofore been so successful there; then there have been established two more in North Carolina, at Raleigh, in connection with the A. and M., and at Davidson, with the faculty and equipment of the college, at the disposal of the school. There is one this year at Athens, Georgia, which Miss Parrish told us would have an enrollment of 700 students, one at Oxford, Miss., and one at Monroe, Louisiana. It is safe to say that between seven and eight thousand teachers are gathered at these summer schools of the South.

Nor must we forget to mention what pleased us most. How the whole assembly of teachers and professors gathered at the close of the morning session in the Pavilion, and spent a few minutes in simple, devotional exercises together, the reading of the Scriptures, prayers and singing. We send on the message that we gave the teachers at that gathering. The South is proud of its increasing prosperity. But it is not going to pay too great a price for it. It is not going to neglect the cultivation of mind and heart and spirit. With the growth of national wealth there is a corresponding and most significant advance in education. And in the South, thank God, education is not and we pray may never be divorced from religion.

Crucified With Christ.

What would it mean to you and to me to hang upon the cross with Jesus Christ; to feel in our palms the burning pain of the nails; to look down into the faces of the sneering crowd distorted with malice; to hear the insults from men we loved; to look in vain for the faces of disciples and know we were forsaken by all; to feel upon the cheek the burning kiss of the friend who had betrayed; to feel one's self crushed down there by the sin of the world, which love had sought so long to conquer? . . . If you and I hung there with Him and realized what sin meant, do you think that we ever want to sin again?—John Hopkins Denison.

Heavenly Pedagogy.

God is the greatest of educators. His fatherhood and teaching are more wisely exercised than ours. We anticipate the child's wishes and his needs until he comes to believe that our gifts cost us nothing, and need be repaid by no gratitude. God requires his children to ask, and thus trains them in the recognition of his giving. That "your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things" is not a reason for not asking at all, but rather an assurance that we shall receive if we ask. So he teaches us to love him by making us work and give for his sake. We do for our children, and we think this will make them love us. But he knows that we love those most for whom we take pains or make sacrifices, not those who do this for us. So he refrains from doing and giving when he can throw that upon us, and he gains thereby a truer affection from us. At every step he acts with reference to the growth of our spirits in love and wisdom, rather than to mere external results, which capture the imagination. His pedagogy goes to the roots of life.—Ex.

Christ was humiliated into our condition that we might be exalted unto His. Christ was crucified with man that man might rejoice in being crucified with Christ. Both the depth to which He went to seek man and the height up to which He would carry man were set forth in the cross. Alas for him who, . . . looking at the crucifixion, does not see both of these, does not learn at once how low his Saviour went to find him, and how high he may go if he will make his Saviour's life his own!—Phillips Brooks.

Whether we do little or great things is comparatively a minor matter. But whether all that we do is done as in God's sight, and at God's appointment and command, is ever a mighty matter. Few of us are set at mighty undertakings, but all of us have the opportunity of giving a cup of cold water to a little one in God's kingdom in the spirit that will be recognized as a gift to the King of kings. As St. Augustine expressed it, "Little things are little things, but faithfulness in little things is something great."—Sunday School Times.

There are friends who are to us like a great rock in a weary land. We flee to them in the heat of parching days and rest in their shadow. A friend in whom we can confide without fear of disappointment; who, we are sure, will never fail us, will never stint his love in serving us, who always has healing tenderness for the hurt of our heart, comfort for our sorrows, and cheer for our discouragement—such a friend is not only a rock of shelter for us in time of danger but is also as rivers of water in a thirsty land, when our hearts cry out for life and love.—Exchange.

Remember that acquaintance with God can come through no casual introduction. Calling on God in the morning and leaving your visiting card of devotion, but having no care as to whether you find him at home, and really catch sight of his face; talking to God through an interpreter, through the minister or the sacraments or the hymn-book,—but knowing nothing of real and intimate personal conversation with him,—this is not acquaintance with God.

Missionary.

Why?

"Because I think the need is vastly greater, the possibilities of a life more far-reaching."

"I desire foreign missionary service because the voice says, 'Go.' I am making application because the intense desire comes from the depths of my heart. I am not seeking a life of ease. I ask for the hard things which alone reveal God to me."

"In my infancy I was consecrated to the Christian ministry by my parents and grandparents. From my fifteenth year I have had the steadily growing conviction that I should go to the foreign field. I prefer Shansi because I believe Oberlin should send at least one man to the field where so goodly a number of heroes were called upon for the supreme sacrifice. I pray God that their mantle of devotion and consecration may fall on me. My desire is to put my life where it will count most for my Master. That seems to me to be in the foreign field. The need and the opportunity appeal to me."

"I prefer the foreign service mainly because I think fewer are willing to go than to stay here; because it has been my goal for many years; and because I believe I can win the hearts and help the minds of the people into the love of Jesus Christ. I owe the knowledge I have received to the nations that have it not. I want to be a missionary until I am seventy years old, and die in the harness."

"Because it was Christ's last command; because there are those who are calling for the help missionaries give; because of what the work done by the help of Christ will mean to those to whom I go, and most of all to Christ."

"An earnest love for the land of my birth (China) and desire to share the blessings of God's love with those who greatly need them. There are hardships in anything worth doing. The work in China is grandly worth doing. I remember many of the hardships, and hope to be prepared to meet many more gladly."

"The desire of my life since I was nine years old has been to serve my Heavenly Father among those who have never heard of him. I believe it to be the best investment of the life with which God has intrusted me, until he shall require it. I owe a debt to my God. I owe another to humanity. Neither of them can I ever repay, but I must to my utmost. The giving of my life to God in service among those who would not hear of him in any other way, for Christ's sake, will help toward the payment of my great debt."

"To carry the message of Christ's love in all its fullness to the people to whom I believe God sends me, so as to draw them to God."—The Missionary Herald.

Is it a Small Gift or a Large?

Giving according to what we have is what has God's approval. It is not the amount of the gift, but the spirit of the giver as shown in the gift. As an old divine said on this point, "The Lord looks not so much at what we've given as at what we've got left." The two mites given by the poor widow in the temple treasury were commended of our Lord, not because of their amount, but because "she of her want did cast in all the living that she had." Many a scanty giver has claimed generosity by measuring his gift by the amount of the widow's contribution, instead of her spirit. Mr. Moody once rebuked a wealthy giver who said, as he proffered a trifling sum, "I'll give the widow's mite." "Don't call that a widow's mite unless it's at least half your earthly possessions," said Mr. Moody.

Rev. George F. Pentecost, D. D., who for some months past has been in the Philippines, is seeing most encouraging result of his work. In Manila particularly he is reported to have had marked success, having been greatly used in awakening the consciences of Christians who had become careless in their lives.—Exchange.

Saul Chosen King.

1 Sam. 10, 17-27. July 12, 1903.

Samuel summoned the people to Mizpeh for choosing a king. This place was noted in the history of the people for a signal deliverance wrought by Jehovah for the people by the overthrow of the Philistines. The Lord had insisted upon having a king, though warned of the nature of the kingdom and concerning the nature of the ruler who would inflict upon them. The Lord granted their request and had already designated Saul to Samuel and prepared the man for his new station by giving him His spirit. But the people were called to Mizpeh for a more public and solemn choice. Here Samuel is faithful in reminding the people as to what their change of government implied and that the Lord condemned their conduct. The record before us presents subjects that may be considered under three heads.

Israel's Rejection of Jehovah.—Up to this period Israel had lived under a pure Theocracy enjoying a government, directed by their Divine king. For four hundred and fifty years, when oppressed by their enemies on account of their sins the Lord had raised up Judges who gave them deliverance.

They were now determined to have a king to judge them and fight their battles and to make them like to surrounding nations, they deliberately reject Jehovah from their king and set aside the form of government which the Lord had established for them. They did this in spite of the shameful ingratitude for all the deliverances that had been wrought for them from numerous enemies, afflictions, and tribulations. Hence Samuel affirms, "Ye have this day rejected your God who Himself has brought you out of all your adversities and your tribulations, and ye have said unto Him, 'Nay but set a king over us.'" In choosing and trusting human agents instead of Jehovah of hosts, Israel has had many imitations.

Saul Chosen King by God.—Though the Lord had refused Israel's demand for a king he does not permit the nation to choose one for themselves. He had already pointed out to Samuel and qualified for office before this national gathering. But at Mizpeh, there was a public choice made by lot and confirmed by Jehovah. The Lord always directs in the selection of rulers. "For promotion cometh neither from the east nor from the west nor from the South, for God is the Judge: He putteth down one and setteth up another." On this occasion, however, the Lord made it clearly manifest that the king was of His own choice, and that he must rule under His authority. He also taught the king and his people that his confidence in office depended upon His obedience to God's revealed will.

The Beginning of Saul's Reign.—The commencement of Saul's kingship was in many respects auspicious. The chosen king Himself had very impressive, royal qualities. When discovered, hidden among the reeds, he stood a head and shoulder above all the others. He manifested also some attractive moral attributes.

He was modest, diffident and self controlled. He was provoked and disparaged by some "he held his tongue." When brought forward by Samuel as the king chosen of God, he is cordially greeted by many of the people who shout "God save the king." When he devoted to his own house to Gibeah, he is attended by a noted band "whose heart God had touched." But there were worthless characters "Sons of Belial," who despised him, asked disparaging questions and treated him with no reverence. New and untried men on the threshold of their career often meet with such characters who are disposed to find fault and predict failure. Men like the Scotch candidate for the eldership, who put their chief business "to raise an objection."

Religion Between Sundays.

Acts 2:42-47. Topic for July 19.

"Week-day Religion" is altogether too rare. There are many who have a record for being faithful attendants upon the services of the Lord's house on the Sabbath, whose religion goes little further. A great many people have the idea that religion is like one's best clothes, — to be put on for one day and then laid aside until another special occasion comes around when they will be brought out again. But this is not the record we have of the early disciples. Their religion transformed their natures and from that time onward throughout their lives, they put their service of God down in its right place; it became the most important thing in their lives.

The creed of many of us is all right but our practice is all wrong. We sing, "Religion is the chief concern of mortals here below," and proceed to give it not even a secondary place in our lives, but relegate it to a very low place. In fact in the lives of many of us, it is the thing we think about when we have nothing else to engage our attention.

It is not the hardest thing in the world to make a public profession of Christ and then to attend to our duties in our Church relations so as to escape the censure of our fellow men. But it is hard to live a life between Sundays which will be a constant confession of Christ in the presence of those who observe us in the home and on the streets and in our daily avocations. And yet this is the important thing.

In Romans 10:9, we are told that if we will confess Christ . . . we shall be saved. Many people have the idea that the mere confession of being the disciples of Christ, made once, will save us, but such is not the intention of the Scriptures. Our lives are to confess Christ at all times and under all conditions. If in the home, when surrounded by those who being near to us by ties of blood are the observers of every act of our lives, the judges of every word of our mouths, we give way to petulance and fits of evil temper, we are not confessing Christ.

Many of us who live victoriously amid the large trials of life, fail most signally in the small things. But let us always remember that the way we conduct ourselves in the humdrum affairs of life is after all the true criterion by which we are to be judged.

Often times a boy has the reputation of being a manly little fellow when he goes out in company, while those who know him best are aware that in the home he is stubborn and a positive trial to those who have to deal with him. And "the boy is father to the man." Many times a girl has the name of being one of the brightest and most attractive creatures away from home, but those who know her best know that she has the knack of making herself very disagreeable in the home. Here is where "Between-Sunday-Religion" will display itself. The boy or girl who has the true spirit of Christ will be a joy and a comfort in the home as well as away from home.

What is true of children is doubly true with regard to grown-ups. In the children we can make some allowance for childish forgetfulness, but with the older class, there ought to be no need of allowance being made. The religion of Jesus should make the life better and purer and sweeter, and more attractive everywhere.

"Between-Sunday Religion" will make one perform the work of the six days more faithfully. It will make one treat every person crossing life's pathway with more consideration. It will reach into all the little details of life, and, if we only realized it, people will judge of the religion of Christ more from the outward expression of that religion as manifested between Sundays, than from what is seen when we are dressed in our best clothes and are on our best behavior.

Let us therefore remember the injunction of Christ to "Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation."

A Bible Study of the Two Obstacles between Man and Heaven. Part II. The Moral Obstacle.

Rev. S. S. Laws, D. D., LL.D.

A few things seem to be uniquely consequent on any proper view of the removal of the moral obstacle:

1. One is that the pardon set forth in the Gospel evidences the divine origin and character of the whole scheme, both in its conception and in its administration. It is profoundly original and without parallel. It is utterly impracticable in any human government to thus freely dispense pardon. It is possible and safe only on the part of a ruler who can change the heart of the pardoned offender. There are more than (50,000) fifty thousand inmates of misnamed penitentiaries in our country. It matters little what might be the professions and appeals that would lead to it, a general pardon or jail-delivery by the President and the Governors of the States, letting loose these people, would be like threatening to break up as by a moral earthquake the very foundations of safety, peace, and good order in society. There would and could be no assurance, that those released would not go forth with the same depraved dispositions and impulses which had placed them under duress. The release of individuals now and then is done cautiously, in view of the contingencies; but in the government of God every one who is penitent is freely pardoned and given a new heart, and the Holy Spirit of love and obedience is vouchsafed unto them. The contrast is radical and palpable. The conditions of deliverance are such as to induce an abiding peace of souls and godly fear. "There is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared." This is original and divine. Omniscience, love, and power unite. The conditions of its bestowment are awe-inspiring.

2. Another consequent and associated feature of the case is the changed relation of the pardoned to the law of God. The relation to the law is no longer direct, but only mediate through Christ, who is its end. "Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. x:4). All the pardoned are enlisted under the bloodstained banner of the Lord Jesus Christ as soldiers in the army of the redeemed, and his will and word are now their law, and as completely control their individual and collective movements as the movements of a worldly army are controlled by the commands of its general. His word is their law of life and death. Chalmers states this transfer of allegiance thus: "Having removed the law through his death out of the station it had before occupied as the first husband, he then rose again and now stands in its place as the second husband. We are emancipated from our old relationship to the law, and as disciples we have entered into a new relationship to Christ, with all the obligations of service which spring therefrom." This is scriptural and important. The wife owes a duty to her second husband (Christ) as well as to the first (the law.) Christ our second husband has his claims upon our obedience and dutiful regards as really as did the law which he has supplanted. It is here that, with the law, the predominant feeling which prompted our services may have been of servile obligation, mixed with great fearfulness, because of the deficiencies into which we were perpetually falling. But with Christ the predominant feeling which prompts our services is the sweet and spontaneous affection to one from whom we are ever sure to obtain the kindest indulgence. "The love of Christ constraineth us." It is not the service of a cold, grim code, but to a loving person—freedom and not slavery. But still it is evident that under this second economy there will be service, possibly much greater in amount and certainly far worthier in principle, than all that was ever rendered or possible under the law, ceremonial and moral. Hence the freedom and the cheerfulness of the new obedience, this direct service of Christ is the soul of Christian liberty and joy, and it is proof against temptation and anti-nomianism. Our life is hid with Christ in God. We obey the moral law mediately through Christ, who is its embodiment, and hence our absolute guarantee of meeting all its claims for the future as his righteousness cancels the past claims. The difference between the obedience to an abstract code and to a concrete person is illustrated by the obedience of children to the law of the State. They may never have seen a statute book or code. They simply obey the parents whom they love and who, as law-abiding citizens, are embodiments of the law of the State to them. By obeying their law-abiding parents they obey the law of the State, though they may never have seen a statute book. Thus we obey the law of God by obeying Christ.

3. This second submission and obedience of the Christian directly to Christ, involves not only the question of our relation to the Jehovah Jesus Christ, but also of his relation to the moral law. Did Christ consciously and of deliberate purpose live the life that the broken moral law of God required of all subject to it, or was his life an exception and merely one of filial spontaneity transcending the exacting legal claims of a subject of the moral government of God?

The expressions God's law and the law of God, or Moses' law and the law of Moses, often include both the ceremonial and the moral law; but Christ's conformity to the Mosaic law of ordinances, from the time of his circumcision to the paschal supper, is so much a matter of course as to need no special or detailed notice, but, leaving out of view the writings of Paul and Luke, what is, in brief, the evidence furnished by the evangelists in their gospels and letters that the Christ had the requirements of the moral law steadily before him and fully complied therewith—that he trod the narrow path of perfect obedience to its demands? Only a very partial notice of this topic is practicable.

1. To begin at the beginning, in the annunciation to Joseph (Matt. ii:21) we find the following injunction: "And she shall bring forth a son; and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for it is he that shall save his people from their sins." The name Jesus (Jehovah—Saviour) is significant, therefore, of the burden of his mission to earth as a Divine Saviour from sin, and he gave evidence of being fully aware of this. The fact of the incarnation here announced was a manifest assumption of the legal and moral obligations resting on every man in the government of God. During his public life he was reproached for associating with publicans and sinners, but when he heard it he said: "But go ye and learn what this meaneth. . . . I came not to call the righteous, but sinners" (Matt. ix:13). He evidently understood himself. But we have no scriptural conception of man as a sinner apart from his relations to the moral law. This is the import of the definition of sin given by the evangelist John in his first epistle, chapter iii:4: "Every one that doeth sin doeth also lawlessness; and sin is lawlessness." He had previously stated: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us. My little children, these things I write unto you that ye may not sin. And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but for the whole world."

The forgiveness and cleansing here spoken of suggest the external and internal aspects of the lawlessness of sin. The lawless fail to measure up to the standard of the moral law, and hence fall under its disapproval or condemnation; and when, in this immediate connection, it is said, "But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus, his son, cleanseth us from all sin" (i John. i:7; ch. ii:1-2), the cross rises before us and the thought is vividly taken back to the atoning sacrifices of old economy which therein found their realization. The legal as well as the moral or spiritual element is pervasive of such scriptures—pervasive, therefore of the Saviour's actual life as on record.

2. In proof of the consciously legal aspect and purpose of the Saviour's entire earthly life, as exploiting the domain of sin as a rescuer therefrom, the Sermon on the Mount is a most pronounced witness (Matt. v. 1-10).

This discourse was given at the beginning of his public ministry, and the supreme subject of it is undoubtedly the moral law. The exposition of it therein given is the most incisive, profound, and comprehensive on record. The Rabbis had so overlaid both the ceremonial and the moral law with their traditions as to almost smother the life out of both of them. In the course of his public ministry the Pharisees angrily reproached him because some of his disciples ate their bread with unwashed hands, contrary to the traditions of the elders. He with spirit replied—retorted—ye have the commandments of God and hold fast the traditions of men.

"Moses said, honor thy father and thy mother. Ye no longer suffer him to do aught for his father or his mother, making void the word of God by your tradition, which ye have delivered; and many such like things ye do" (Mark vii :2, 3, 8, 12-13). The principle of this isolated case of rescuing the 5th commandment by sloughing off the perverting accretions of the Rabbis and elders is effectively elaborated in the chapters of Matthew, containing the Sermon on the Mount, wherein several of the commandments of the decalogue are rescued from the overlying rubbish, and various current false doctrines are repudiated and valuable positive lessons are impressively and beautifully presented and enunciated.

The exalted view of the moral law given in this discourse has permanent value, but its immediate importance arose from the circumstance that the Saviour set it forth before the public as the standard of living for himself as well as for others. Hence the importance of his announcement: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy but to fulfill. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away from the law, till all things be accomplished" (Matt. v :17-18).

On the cross, immediately before his last words, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit," Jesus, referring to his life-work, made the announcement. "It is finished" (Jno. xix :30).

He had said to his disciples:

"If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments and abide in his love" (Jno. xv :10). As he assumed to be a law unto his disciples, so his Father had been a law unto him.

Removal of the Southwestern Presbyterian University—The Needs of the Mississippi Valley.

The four controlling Synods contain about 55,000 Presbyterians or almost one fourth of the Presbyterians of the Southern Church, now what sane reason can be given why this people who awoke to the needs of Christian education and provided for it twenty-five years before Atlanta had her dreams disturbed—what sane reason can be given why this people should give away their institution to Atlanta, and leave themselves destitute? He that provideth not for his own household is worse than an infidel. That is what Georgia is trying to do. She finds that she is destitute of a denominational school and she wants one. I praise her, but don't try to rob your neighbor of her school! Georgia can go to Clarksville as easily as this valley can get to Atlanta. Take away the Southwestern University, and you leave not only the four Synods destitute of a first class college but the whole Mississippi valley from New Orleans to Louisville a distance of over six hundred miles. Now the money given to the Southwestern was given to overtake this very destitution and to pervert it to any other purpose is impossible to right thinking men.

But they tell you that "conditions have changed," and "concentration is the spirit of the age" and that "Clarksville is a Presbyterian oasis in a Presbyterian desert," with a lot of other vague phraseology, by which it is sought to create the impression that the Southwestern is and has been a failure, and for that reason, it should be moved.

Now, I assert that it neither is, nor has been a failure. It has supplied admirably the educational needs of our people in this great valley. The proof of this is the marvelous success of its alumni. We can give a young man all the work that he can do for four years and longer at the Southwestern and what more can any school do? There is a bigness that is too big. The faculty is as able as of any institution of our Southland. They come into personal touch with the students and in such institutions the best education is received. We graduated this year eighteen fine young men, but look at the success of her alumni! Beginning here in New Orleans, two of the most important pulpits are filled with her alumni, another fills the ancient chair in the Sophia Newcomb College for Women, take the railroad to Mobile and the most important pulpit there is filled by an alumnus, so at Montgomery, Ala., likewise two of the most important pulpits in Birmingham, at Nashville, the largest church in the Assembly is presided over by an alumnus; in Atlanta, the great Coryphaeus himself, the alleged head and front of this removal movement, is pastor of the most important Church in the Synod of Georgia and he is an alumnus. Charlotte, N. C., till recently the two most important pulpits there were filled with Southwestern men, as at Wilmington, N. C., the most important pulpit there is filled with an alumnus, at Petersburg, Va., is another alumnus in the most important pulpit there, in the far North East of our territory, the most important pulpit of our Church in Baltimore is filled with an alumnus, the successor of Dr. Charles F. Deems in New York city is an alumnus, at Chicago in Evansville stands another alumnus, at Little Rock, Ark. stands another alumnus in the most important pulpit there, down at Austin, Texas, in the chair of Latin, in the University of Texas is another alumnus, and so around the circuit—but enough! How can any man in the face of such facts pronounce the Southwestern a failure! What other institution within the same time can point to such a record? Within the faculty at Clarksville that "prince of theological teachers" himself is an alumnus. No, no, we may not have great numbers of students, but our quality has been "mighty good." We have been giving the Church men, and that after all is what the Church wants.

But that "Presbyterian desert"—I have looked into that also, and I find that the Synod of Tennessee contains 18,317 members according to last minutes, while the Synod of Georgia has only 16,279. There must be also a little desert down Georgia's way! Then the Presbytery of Nashville has 5,377 members only about 700 members less than Atlanta Presbytery. Clarksville is not so badly located after all. Besides no big city is an ideal place to which parents should send their boys with characters as yet unformed. There are too many temptations and pitfalls on all sides. So also, a million dollar university at Atlanta would mean double the cost of educating a student. Instead of from $200 to $300 per year, as now at Clarksville, it would be from $500 to $700 at a big university in a big city.

Let us not be caught by the idea of Bigness and aside from moral and legal questions do a foolish thing in giving away our own institution and leave this great field unoccupied. That would make a Presbyterian desert indeed!

V. As to that million dollar university at Atlanta.—Where is it? How could it be made even should both Columbia and the Southwestern be combined? All the endowment of Columbia must be kept for theological education, and part of the endowment of the Southwestern must be kept for the same purpose. It would take all of Atlanta's two to three years' subscriptions and more to buy a suitable site, and house the two institutions as well as they are now housed. Then what would be left for the University? Why less than the vested funds of the Southwestern right now. They would enlarge the theological faculty, but the academic faculty would have to be decreased. It would simply mean that you could give your boys no better academic education at Atlanta than can now be given at Clarkesville. Our endowments, plant, site, etc., are worth to us now at Clarkesville near a half million, it could not be sold for that but it is worth that for University purposes. Shall we sacrifice our buildings, grounds, etc., and take our endowment to Atlanta for more buildings, grounds, etc., there? Aside from the moral and legal questions involved, would it not be more sensible to use Clarkesville as the nucleus of a great million dollar university than Atlanta? Common sense would say, give the $250,000 of Atlanta to Clarkesville, move Columbia there, and we will have largely increased endowment and a better school than can be made by a combination at Atlanta.

The Atlanta brethren without consent took our University as a lever to pry out of Atlanta's pride an inflated subscription list. If was not courteous, it was not fair, it was not right. In doing so, they depreciated our university in the eyes of the Church at large, and they have hurt it. So much so that the Board of Directors did not think it expedient to elect a Chancellor till after the meeting of the Synods this fall.

Not that there is any danger of removal but that no man would wish to enter upon such a work till the agitation ceases.

They tell us, "You have no students"—well, there are some left and we are making men out of them. But why? one reason is that this agitation has depreciated our university in the eyes of parents. Don't depreciate our stock in order to create a sentiment in favor of giving away our University—to yourselves!

Now, I freely admit that the brethren advocating this removal have not seen all these things, else they would have stopped long ago. They have said that they do not wish to "do any unrighteousness," and I believe it. But the clamor of a great Million Dollar University right on their territory has blinded them to the facts on the other side. No, no, they do not wish to do an unrighteousness but it would be an unrighteousness shou'd what they are advocating be carried. It is to prevent such unrighteousness that I have written this paper, at the request of the Board of Directors.

The Legal and Moral difficulties and the Needs of the Mississippi valley all cry out, "It is impossible to move the Southwestern Presbyterian University to Atlanta!" I trust that they will create their own school at Atlanta, but let our University alone to do a greater and a grander work for the Mississippi Valley and the Church at large in the future than she has done in the past, and let it be known that we are not ashamed of that past.

Let the people of these four Synods rally to the support of their university, and they will find that they will never have cause to regret that they sent their sons to the Southwestern Presbyterian University. Notice, we have the word Presbyterian in our title. We are not ashamed of it nor afraid people will find it out. It is our glory! But the new projected Million Dollar University will have an academic department, "not offensively sectarian" with a Presbyterian Theological Seminary attached thereunto, but with the word Presbyterian expunged from the title! Lest it offend!

The Foot-Washing.

A Sermon by Rev. John W. Primrose, D. D.

John 13:14, 15. If I then, your Lord and master have washed your feet ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you.

I do not remember ever having heard a sermon on this incident. Our Lord made it prominent, and it becomes us to inquire why. What is its significance?

It is not a rite like baptism and the Supper. On Thursday of holy week the Pope washes the feet of twelve persons. Some small sects practice it as a Church ordinance. But while not a rite it is an example and an example of the Master is as much to be followed as a rite is to be observed.

The disciples were seated at table—that is, according to the prevailing custom, they reclined. This posture enabled one to wash the feet of another who "sat" at table. It was in those days an ordinary act of hospitality. It has now, of course, fallen into disuse because of the change in the style of foot-wear. Then people wore the sandal which was removed when one entered the house, and the soiled feet were washed. It is obvious that Christ did not commend his example merely as an act of hospitality, or of kindness.

Something in this act of Jesus excited profound astonishment in the disciples which found expression through Peter, of course. He remonstrated with emphasis: "Lord, dost thou wash my feet?" and though Jesus assured him that he should know later on, Peter again declared "Thou shalt never wash my feet." The thing amazing was that the Master should do this thing. It was usually done by a slave. Great then is their astonishment when they see their teacher and master, he who was so soon to ascend the throne of Israel, doff his upper garment and appear only in his tunic like a slave, with a basin in his hands and towel about his waist. Upon this dialogue between Jesus and Peter we shall not dwell, as it has no direct bearing upon the incident itself.

Jesus admits that their surprise was reasonable: "Ye call me Master and Lord and ye say well for so I am." He did not expect them to understand at once, and told them that they should understand later; and before they rose from the table he made them know what was done. One thing he emphasises: that their dignity would never suffer in the imitation of his example, nor could it suffer since the Master was greater, and in this case so very much greater than his servant.

The first verse of this chapter is an introduction to the next five chapters. John says that Jesus, having loved his own, he loved them unto the end,—that is, he manifested his love even when he saw the approach of death; and in such things as his washing their feet, his farewell address, and his touching intercessory prayer. In the third verse, we have words especially introductory to the incident now before us. He did this thing—the washing of the feet of his disciples knowing—"that he was come from God and went to God." In other words,—in the full realization of his exalted nature and destiny—he condescended to this mental act.

Now we have seen that Jesus "purpose was not merely to inculcate hospitality or kindness. What then? The disciples had been engaged in an unseemly quarrel about precedence. Nor was it the first time that this had happened. Disgraceful as it was it was a common occurrence. James and John once solicited the chief places in the kingdom. Their mother also was very ambitious for them and interposed in their behalf. This too, gave great offence to the ten. Jesus showed them a little child and said that unless they became like little children they not only could not be great in the kingdom but they could not get into it at all. We must always bear in mind that these disciples confidently expected that the kingdom would immediately appear. They thought of it too, as a carnal kingdom. Christ will indeed reign on this earth but under greatly changed conditions. All things will be made new. The new earth will be adapted to the spiritual nature of the resurrection body. Jesus did indeed have many things to tell them which they could not then take in.

On this occasion the company was seated at table. Jesus rose to wash their feet. Surely this was something they ought to have done for him. Why this neglect of so obvious a duty? Luke tells us there was strife among them which should be accounted the greatest. On the brink of his betrayal and a cruel death they are disputing over the spoils of office. Knowing all this, truly their Lord was manifesting his love for them to the end and notably in this act of consecration. He himself, their king, proceeds to wash their feet. In act and in words he tells them what constitutes greatness in the kingdom of God. Jesus said of them as he said on that other occasion: "Ye know that they who are accounted to rule over the Gentiles lord it over them; and their great ones exercise authority over them, but it is not so among you: but whosoever would become great among you, shall be your servant and whosoever would be chiefest shall be bond-servant of all." By his own example then, Jesus illustrated the principle by which true greatness is estimated in his kingdom of glory.

Not many more words are necessary to develop this principle. Who is the great man in that kingdom?

Many overlook the truth that degrees of honor and grades of rank shall obtain in it the kingdom. All alike are the recipients of eternal life for eternal life is the gift of God. Life and incorruption are the purchase of Christ's righteousness; honors and rank are the rewards of our own righteousness. Every one shall have his own reward according to his own labor. The trial of our faith shall be found unto praise and glory and honor at the appearing of our Lord. Such is the undoubted teaching of the Scriptures.

Goodness of heart manifested in self denying service for others is the measure of greatness in the kingdom of heaven.

The king himself is greatest. He subordinated his majesty to his goodness. His deity and his sovereignty are used as means whereby to gratify his goodness. For the joy that was set before him—the joy of making sinners and enemies holy and happy—he endured the cross, despising the shame. He thought not his being equal with God a thing to be grasped—a thing too highly prized to be for a time surrendered in the redemption of others, but made himself of no reputation. He exemplified in his own person his saying that it is more blessed to give than to receive.

To make others happy he consented to learn sorrow. To make others holy he consented to be treated as a sinner.

To make others kings he took on him the form of a bond-servant.

Praise and glory and honor are things which men are not accustomed to relinquish for others' good. They do not make themselves of no reputation in order to honor the obscure, by making them worthy of honor. In the kingdom of heaven they who rank nearest the Master are they who are most like him in this life. For it is to be observed that the crown must be won in this life. The judgment of rewards like the punitive judgments shall be according to the deeds done in the body. The greatest in heaven or, it were better to say, in the kingdom, will be those who esteemed earthly rank, dignity, riches, influence, social position and all things of man estimation as means of doing good to those less favored than themselves. Ah! what a revolutionary thought. There are gradations of rank among the angels in heaven. There, are principalities and powers. Doubtless, during the time of their probation these distinctions were established. So among men, there shall be thrones and principalities and powers. The thought may suggest itself to some that these inequalities would give rise to jealousies, but this were impossible. The distinctions which shall obtain in the kingdom will not be conferred arbitrarily. That which causes heart burning and bitter jealousies among men is largely the fact that pre-eminence is due or thought to be due to partiality and to error in the appraisal of men's merits. That they should so think is due largely to the self esteem and the self seeking of our imperfect human nature. But neither of these imperfections will have place in the kingdom. There, we shall know even as we are known. There too, jealousy and envy will have no place in the hearts of just men made perfect. The humblest will be quick to see, appreciate and accord praise most cordial to them who have most closely followed in the footsteps of the Master. There will be a great host of us there to make up the rank and file who will cheerfully concede honor to whom honor is due. But, while it is true that the crown of righteousness is won in this life; while in the perfected kingdom there will be no more co-operation with the Christ in the work of hastening the kingdom, it does not follow that there will no service remain for the saints. All things are yours; the world, that is, the universe, is yours.

A celebrated astronomer has lately returned, as the result of his observations, to the theory that the earth is the center of the universe: that ours is the only inhabited world; and that God's work here is only the beginning of a still grander enterprise. However this may be, it is most reasonable to suppose that God, since the universe is his people's, is preparing them for the exploitation of that universe. We may be sure that through all eternity he will have for them a service which shall satisfy their aspirations, engage their energies, enlarge their powers and win for them new honors. This thought is reasonable enough, at all events, to put to rest the unquiet thought, often expressed, that this little orb of ours is too small to engage much of the Almighty's attention. One day with him is a thousand years and a thousand years is one day. Furthermore the work of redemption is a far greater work than that of creation. He spake, and creation was accomplished; it took him thirty-three years and new experiences of obedience and suffering and death to redeem sinners.

The present is then the time in which to win the honors of the kingdom. And they are to be won by imitating the goodness of the Master, who came not to be served but to serve. Not he is greatest who aspires to dignities but he who is helpful to others. The apostle Peter bids ministers that they do not lord it over God's heritage; and the apostle Paul wrote the Corinthians that by his expostulations he did not mean to lord it over their faith but to be a helper of their faith. Obviously the institution of a hierarchy of church dignitaries with its gradations of power and challenge of the world's veneration is not in accord with the teachings of the Master.

All arrogance, all assertion of self importance is utterly at variance with the lesson of the text. Many who assume the right to take the highest seat shall be bidden to give place to another more honorable than themselves, and they will begin to take the lowest seat. Doubtless among the ancient worthies who are mentioned with approbation in the Holy Book there shall be found very, very many of whom the world has never heard. Many a mother hidden from the world's gaze in the obscurity of poverty who has reared a son to honor the Master and taught her children the riches of grace, shall be bidden to go up higher. Many a man, who, without brilliant gifts, and with a meager and begrudged support has labored among obscure people to make them heirs of the kingdom,—will be honored in the sight of angels. Many a poor person who out of a willing heart has made self-denying sacrifices to hasten the coming kingdom will emerge from obscurity and shine like the morning star.

The teaching of our Lord in this incident and elsewhere is disregarded not only by those who bid for distinguished consideration and are greedy for reputation, but they also who fret about neglect. These are unhappy because their merits or their persons are not adequately appreciated. It is much to be deplored that the great truth of my text has been so obscured—the truth, viz.:—that we are here to serve and not to be served. The Church is instituted indeed with its ministry to serve, but how serve? To qualify its membership to serve others. To help their faith that they may serve others. Very many people seem to think that they owe the Church nothing unless they have received an equivalent. The Church they think was instituted to serve them with entertainment or in some way afford them gratification. On the contrary it was instituted to equip Christians for the service of God. To avail themselves of this design they should wait on its ministrations and its ordinances. They should hunger to learn in order to practice,—in order to be more efficient.

Let us remember that the true servant of God really wishes to do the Master's will; that he honestly purposes to do that will. And let us remember that failing this honesty of purpose, the question is not as to the measure of greatness we shall attain, but whether we get into the kingdom at all.

This great principle which informs us of the nature of true greatness,—of God-like greatness—and teaches us its imitation, and affords us an adequate motive thereto, many men are now aiming to filch from Christianity and to pass off upon the world as a new invention of late culture under the new name of altruism. It is a plagiarism. It is as old as revelation. It was signalized in the person of Jesus. It was undreamed of by mankind. It is unattainable by man unless he be shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace. This goal—conformity to the character of God in Christ Jesus—is not even striven for, save by such as realize that God himself left the glory which He had before the world was, and took upon Him the form of a bond-servant, and made Himself of no reputation, that His enemies might see, and appreciate and assimilate true greatness of soul.

"I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done to you."

The Eutychians.

By the Country Parson.

I do not refer to that ancient heretical sect by this name, who so far as I know have no modern successors, but to the descendants of one Eutychus, of whom we read in Acts 20, and who is the father of all those who go to sleep in church. The Eutychians may be divided into a number of tribes or families, who will here be noticed according to their generation.

First, we take note of the Physical Infirmary Eutychians. These are all they who by reason of age or disease or recent and unavoidable loss of sleep, find it physically impossible to keep their eyes open in church. They are to be carefully distinguished, however, from the second and third tribes, who will be noticed later on.

The discriminating pastor will look with indulgence and compassion on all such. There, well up towards the front, is Elder Soundmind; for years there was no more wide-awake, appreciative listener than he. But ten months ago he had a stroke, and now just as soon as he takes his seat, his eyes close in spite of him. And there is sister Faithful, eager to hear the word, always in her place with erect form and shining eyes. But for three weeks little Tommie Faithful has had the whooping cough, and his mother has been out of bed every hour of the night to keep him from choking. No wonder that to-day she sits with dim, half-closing eyes, every sense dulled with overpowering weariness. But in marked contrast to Elder Soundmind our Sister Faithful is Second, The Ox-in-the-ditch tribe of Eutychians. These are they who have given Saturday night to business or pleasure and then wonder why they find it so hard to keep awake Sunday morning. For example, you may take the Country Parson's neighbor Peter Push-the-work. Late last Saturday night I heard the threshing engine pulling out of his barn-yard; and it must have been close to Sunday morning when Peter blew out his lantern and rolled into bed. And a week ago it was the same thing. He was out in the corn field as long as he could see, then stock had to be fed and supper eaten, and after eleven o'clock, he was still doing odd jobs around the barn. In fact, I think that Peter always remembers the Sabbath day by working extra late Saturday nights.

And just across the aisle from Peter is Miss Belle Butterfly. The party at Mr. Goodtime's broke up religiously at 11.55, p. m., and then Miss Belle and her escort started for her home. They took it leisurely however, and stopped for a word more at the gate, and well, it was 1.30 a. m., when Miss Belle closed her bright young eye, and so this morning they did not look so bright during the sermon. And shall I mention Sister Scrubemwell, who is out calling till towards evening Saturday, and postpones needful operations until after supper, and then there are the five little Scrubemwells to be attended to, Sunday clothes to be laid out and a dozen other things to be looked after. Those five shiny faced youngsters do look nicely Sunday mornings, but I wish it were possible for Sister Scrubemwell to get to work at it Saturday afternoon. I did want her so much to hear that sermon, and she just could not keep her eyes open. Then there is,

Third, The Want-of-religion Eutychians. Of course when the preacher is describing the joys of heaven, the man whose whole heart and mind and soul are set on things of earth is not specially interested in the sermon. And the day is sultry, and everything is still, only the sound of one voice, and that a very familiar voice; and so Brother Worldly's mind thinks for a while about last week; business plans for next week; trade, then dreams he has just made five hundred dollars on a successful deal—and wakes with a start to hear the preacher say, "Let us pray!" Is the preacher judging Brother Worldly too harshly, if he sometimes fears that this wide awake man of business (on Saturday and Monday) will never see those heavenly things which he can't stay awake Sunday to hear about?

These are some of the descendants of Eutychus, according to their names, and in this present generation. Others might be spoken of; and in particular I want to tell some time soon how on one Sunday a whole congregation were led astray and joined the Eutychians, and how that was partly the fault of our friend Rev. Reuben A. Longsticker—but that is another story, to be told another time.

Entering into Temptation.

Rev. T. L. Cuyler, D. D.

The only thing that our loving Master has taught us to pray constantly to be delivered from is—the danger of temptation, and the power of evil—or the "Evil One," the Revised Version has it. The word "tempt" in the Bible commonly signifies a direct enticement to sin under the inducement of pleasure or profit. Unless there is something attractive in the object presented to us, we cannot call it a temptation. Whiskey and arsenic are both fatal poisons to a drunkard; but the whiskey is the only temptation, because it is the one that appeals to his appetite and promises immediate gratification. The strength of a temptation depends commonly on the strength of sinful desires within us; it requires no grace to reject what we do not like. A torch does no mischief when it is tossed into a snow bank; it is the torch in the powder-mill that makes the fatal explosion.

A man wearing peculiarly inflammable clothing would have no right to be working in a blacksmith's shop where the sparks are flying. Therefore our allwise Master lays on us the solemn injunction, "Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation!" A person enters into temptation when he wilfully places himself under the influence of a sinful enticement, and continues to parley with it. If any disease is an epidemic, then everybody is exposed to it; but the person who goes unvaccinated into a house where the small-pox is prevailing, has no right to ask God to protect him from the terrible disorder. The Christian who goes off to his lawful business in the morning may properly ask God to preserve him from the snares he may encounter during the day; but when evening comes and he buys ticket to some salacious performance in a theatre, he has no right to pray "deliver me from evil," for he has wilfully thrust his fingers into the devil's mouth. No amount of praying and no number of good resolutions will save you if you remain under the influences that lead you to go wrong. A physician may enter a house from professional duty, while no one who entered from sensual desire could escape without self-destruction.

The moment that any one goes towards a dangerous object, with a secret desire after that object, that moment he or she enters into temptation. Many persons put a bottle of wine on their table at the bidding of fashion, or from the fancy that the wine is "good for them." That does not alter the inherently deceitful nature of an alcoholic drink. The man that plays with sinners must not complain when he is stung. Probably no church member has ever dreamed of becoming an inebriate when he "entered into the temptation" of using alcoholic stimulants. He took the risk. The saddest case of this kind that I ever knew in my own church was that of a good man who fell into drunkenness from the use of whiskey as a "tonic." The danger began when he began to like his medicine. What is true of an intoxicant is equally true of gambling or of violations of sexual purity.

The Open Court.

An article by Walter L. Lingle in an April number of The Standard gives a delightful account of the love and respect in which old "Uncle Lewis Richardson, one of the best and most highly respected colored citizens" in his community in Georgia was held in life and in death. Mr. Lingle refuted by his own testimony and by argument the false idea that the Southern people hate the negro. I wish to add my testimony to Mr. Lingle's and go a step farther. The example Mr. Lingle cited was one of the anti-bellum negroes and the opinion prevails in many quarters that it is only the ex-slaves that command the respect and regard of the Southern white people. But I could give you the name of a young colored man, a mulatto, and of the younger educated class too, who is as highly respected and as greatly beloved as any ex-slave in North Carolina. I will go farther, and say deliberately that I do not know any man, young or old, rich or poor, white or black that has more friends, real friends mind you, of all ages, colors and conditions than this worthy, industrious, kindly negro brother of the newer generation. He is a man of high Christian character and morality, a Deacon in the Colored Presbyterian Church here in Wilmington—and, while he is the most conspicuous example that I know, he is not by any means the only young negro who is respected and loved by the best white people in the community where he lives. No! Dr. Parkhurst does not discriminate. We of the South do not hate the negro—we are the best friends of the negro, and in nearly every case give the honor to every man in his several station and relation, as superior inferior or equal, that is his due whether he be white, black or "colored." There is a class of brutes that we unceremoniously lynch. But we discriminate between them and those who are human.

Yours truly,

W. M. Cumming.

From a Country Manse.

Readers of The Standard may remember something of the recent work of the "Lend a Hand" mission, in assisting to place libraries in Sunday-schools, and these might be interested in a scene which took place the other day at the country manse.

Nearly a dozen of our girls were gathered about a big table in the Pastor's study: there were piles of attractive books, bundles of paper, scissors and a glue pot. Everybody was busy, fitting covers, pasting and labeling the volumes, secured through the good offices of this Lend a Hand mission, from a Church in far-away Connecticut. Over ninety books there were helpful, uplifting, which we trust will do good work in filling the hearts and minds of our boys and girls with ennobling aspirations.

We hope too that this is to be the nucleus of a new library; that the people will assist the children to sustain what has been thus begun, that the one pound from these friendly hands, may become five pounds and its usefulness be great.

There is another reason why I should like to see our country schools interested in this and kindred matters. Dear friends, we read and hear and talk a great deal about the Home Mission work in the mountains, and great is the need and merit of that work. But do we realize that while all of us cannot go to do that work, it is coming, has come to very many of our country churches in this Synod? The old families we have long known were drifting out, to swell the numbers and assist in the labors of the Church elsewhere, and in their stead are flocking in the poor, the ignorant; sometimes the semi-heathen of other counties. Hundreds of them either have no Church connection, or are entirely removed from their own connection. Now is the time for our people to make their Sunday-school attractive as well as profitable, and to gather in the children of the newcomer, and begin to train them for God. To do this, we shall have to make some innovations, offer inducements, and stimulants, sometimes, to win those who are without, but in doing so we should but study the methods employed in other mission work, and if we put forth prayerful and faithful effort I believe we shall soon begin to reap a reward. Perhaps we shall not then have to mourn so much our decimated numbers, our declining churches, and instead may see about us lives reclaimed from ignorance and sin.

Leigh.

The University Church.

An article in your issue of the 24th inst., expressed so clearly what must be in the heart of every son of North Carolina who gives the subject earnest thought, that I am urged to add an indorsement to its words. I refer to the article by J. L. Henderson on the importance of the church at Chapel Hill as a strategic point for Presbyterianism. A wise minister recently said to me, "What we need for God's work is young men of the very best families, who have been born to the advantages of culture, refinement and consecration; we have plenty of plain material, plenty of brick and pine, what we need to build the Church of God is the marble and ebony and precious stones." If a stranger were to ask when in North Carolina he would find the largest assembly of such young men would we not point him to the University? If one fifth of the students there are Presbyterian is it not a matter of the utmost importance that they be looked after? The Church there has always been weak, in the early years of its life, it was served by Dr. Elisha Mitchell, Dr. James Phillips and Dr. Charles Phillips, with whom salary was of no importance, so they be not silent; then Dr. Shearer and so on through the list of faithful servants of God. The congregation is necessarily a floating one, the burden of the support of the Church has always fallen heavily on a few. These things ought not so to be, the Church at the University is a state matter, it cannot be self-supporting because there are not members enough to support such a man as the place demand. The need is urgent for one of our strongest, most attractive, most compelling men to occupy a pulpit that reaches the flower of the young men of North Carolina and the salary to command such a man should be raised by the Synods, after the little Church has done all within its power. The pulpit at the University is even of more importance than that at Davidson, because at the latter place Presbyterianism is amply well able to take care of itself. Many parents send their boys to Chapel Hill and are proud of the "broad," and "liberal" culture received there, but they also want them to be "broad" and "liberal" Presbyterians, and to this end would like to see the pulpit there filled by a man well able to build upon the sure foundations laid there by those who wrought for love of the Presbyterian Church in North Carolina.

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

Dr. Laws continues his discussion of the obstacles between Man and Heaven and is making with it a valuable contribution to the theological literature of our day. Dr. W. McF. Alexander concludes his article against the removal of the South Western Presbyterian University from Clarksville to Atlanta. We shall have some mighty interesting reading on the other side of that question next week from two Georgia contributors. Dr. Primrose furnishes an admirable sermon on the grace of humility and the exaltation of service. While our old friend, Country Parson, gets even with some of the pillars of the Church, who are also sleepers. Dr. Cuyler's always evangelistic pen writes a needed lesson about entering into temptation. Several timely matters are discussed in the Open Court. And the other departments will be found more or less readable and helpful.

A WORD FROM THE BUSINESS MANAGER.

It is both expensive and disagreeable to send out bills, and duns in this hot weather are doubly irritating; still we must collect what is due us. Will not each subscriber please notice his label, which indicates the date that the subscription expires, and see whether or not he is in arrears? If your label is before July 8th, 1903, you are in arrears, as subscriptions are payable in advance. We would appreciate your remittance at once.

PERSONALS.

Since the notice in regard to Rev. M. McG. Shields' acceptance of the call to High Point was printed, we understand that the congregation (in a meeting held on Sunday the 5th inst.,) declined to concur with Mr. Shields in his request for the dissolution of the pastoral relation and the matter will be contested before Presbytery.

Changed addresses:

- Rev. C. M. Barrell, from Norton, to Buckingham, Va.
- Rev. J. R. Servier, from Bristol, Tenn., to 1458 Rivermont Ave., Lynchburg, Va.
- Rev. F. F. Jones, from Hayesville, N. C., to Champ, Dinwiddie county, Va.
- Rev. R. H. Rhoads, from Carthage, Mo., to Conway, Laclede county, Mo.
- Rev. C. H. Hyde, from Outhbert to Cordele, Ga.

A Valuable Tract.

An edition of five thousand copies of "God's will to Man and Man's Duty to God," with introduction by Rev. Alfred H. Moment, D. D., has been published. This is the famous shorter catechism used as a treatise, and will be valuable in the hands of Christian workers.

If you can use a few copies to advantage, write to George Allen, Raleigh, N. C., and they will be sent by mail without charge.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

LOCKHART.—Just closed an eight day's meeting at Lockhart. The last four days the pastor was aided by Rev. B. P. Reid, of Reidsville, S. C., and there was much seriousness. Six persons united on confession of faith.

Religious Work Among Operatives

To the Presbyterians of South Carolina:

The problem of religious work among the factory people of the State has doubtless already attracted your consideration. When you bear in mind that about 100,000 of our white population, or one in five, are resident at the cotton factories, you will readily grant that their moral well-being is of vital importance to you. They are widely scattered among us. The most of you, perhaps, as you look out from your homes, can see the smoke from some factory chimney. The problem is at our doors. If they need help of any sort, and you give it, then has charity begun "at home."

These people are not being reached by the Church. Here and there, a Church led by some zealous minister, is exerting great influence, but the mass of the people is untouched.

Religion is outside of and foreign to their lives. Among them, the regular church-goer is rare; the family, going to the house of God in company and sitting together there, is a most unfamiliar, almost a forgotten sight.

Observation and enquiry lead to the conclusion that it is quite the exception for fathers and mothers among them to attend any service for worship on the Sabbath Day.

Tennyson wrote of his cousin Amy:

"Thou art mated with a clown. And the grossness of his nature will have weights to drag thee down."

It is not hard to apply these words to ourselves under present conditions.

What shall we do? Certainly not stand all the day idle. Rather let us go into the vineyard and work, trusting that whatsoever is right we shall receive.

The writer proposes the plan of protracted services, using the very best talent obtainable in both the preaching and the singing. He has arranged to secure a tent seating about 700 to 800 comfortably, and expects to hold three such meetings in August and September. He will use the new "Psalms and Hymns," and will distribute very freely the best tracts to be found on Sabbath-keeping and Temperance. The meeting will be entirely under Presbyterian control, and the harvest of souls which we expect under God, will we hope, be largely for the Presbyterian Church. This is certainly a new procedure for the writer, it is somewhat new for the Presbyterian Church in South Carolina. The new conditions warrant new methods of work, but we "continue in the things which we have learned and have been assured of, knowing of whom we have learned them." The writer asks your prayers, that God will bless these efforts with signal success.

Wm H. Mills,

Evangelist for Synod's Committee of Home Missions.

The scheme as outlined above has been submitted to the chairman of Synod's Committee on Home Missions and receives his most cordial endorsement. He is confident that the friends of this cause throughout the Synod will lend material and spiritual aid to their wise and zealous Evangelist in this great effort he is launching in behalf of needy souls.

This scheme will cost about $150, and we most cordially invite subscriptions towards this expense from churches or individuals. These subscriptions may be sent either to Rev. W. H. Mills, North Augusta, S. C., or to Alexander Sprunt, Chairman, Charleston, S. C.

TEXAS.

ALVIN.—Evangelist R. E. Johnson, of Chicago, closed a three week's tent meeting here June 22nd, with 260 professions, 600 to 800 were in attendance at night. It was to many us the grandest meeting we ever witnessed, in character and results. No excitement, no loud preaching, but a wonderful amount of prayer, Holy Spirit and Holy Word. Sin and salvation were the chief themes. The gracious Savior as presented in song with a sweetness and power I never heard before, by J. R. Hemminger.

The Presbyterian Church received 20 members on prayer-meeting night, and expects 15 more at next appointment. This will bring our roll to 115, 76 additions in the two years and two months since Rev. W. E. Shive came to this charge. meantime a manse has been built, a 50 foot lot added, the church fueled and furnished with carpet and matting and imitation of stained glass, and the debt paid off.

On the 5th Sunday of May Rev. J. S. Herrington, the former pastor conducted dedication services and we had a great day.

On account of the pastor's special effort in securing Mr. Johnson, he raised a purse of $50 to send him to Winona, Ind., for two weeks in study with the Bible Conference of Christian workers, Aug. 16.

Our hearts are so glad that our only vent is in a more joyful and faithful work.

VIRGINIA.

STAUNTON.—Lexington Presbytery met in adjourned meeting in Staunton, Va., July 2nd.

The call of Olivet for Rev. E. B. Druen was under consideration.

The churches of which he is pastor—Glenville and Coal Valley—declined to consent to a dissolution of the pastoral relation.

After hearing from all parties, and a long and careful consideration of the whole matter, the Presbytery declined to place the call of Olivet Church in the hands of Mr. Druen.

The Presbytery placed upon record its sympathy for Olivet, and its admiration for the way they have bravely tried to keep up their church work, and the wish that they may soon have a pastor.
Wm. C. White, S. C.

MISSOURI.

LAFAYETTE PRESBYTERY.—At an adjourned meeting held in Springfield, Mo., June 27, the pastoral relation between Rev. W. L. Hickman and the Church at Independence was dissolved, the Church uniting in the request with very kind words for the retiring pastor himself and of appreciation for the faithful, laborious and successful work he had done during the five years of his pastorate. Rev. J. W. Wallace was directed to preach and declare the pulpit vacant; and leave was given Mr. Hickman to labor without the bounds of Presbytery.

Rev. E. D. Allen was granted a letter of dismissal; and his present address is Idaho Falls, Idaho.

At the request of the Church at Hughesville, where Presbytery is to meet, the time of the next stated meeting was changed from September 8 to September 1, 1903.

SPRINGFIELD.—At a recent meeting of Lafayette Presbytery in Boonville, Mr. A. Y. Beatie was licensed and also examined for ordination, and a call from the Church at Springfield having been placed in his hands and accepted by him, a commission of three former pastors of the Church, Dr. Boude, Dr. Abbott and Dr. Leyburn with Elder F. C. Roberts, was appointed to ordain and install him. Dr. Boude, by reason of the serious illness of an Elder at California, Mo., was unable to be present, much to the regret of all. Rev. G. W. Muey was put in his place at the adjourned meeting of Presbytery the night before.

The Commission met and ordained and installed Mr. Beatie on Sabbath, June 28; Dr. Leyburn preaching the sermon, Dr. Muey, Moderator of Presbytery, presiding and charging the people, and Mr. Abbott charging the pastor. The day was a beautiful "Lord's Day;" the congregation was large, quite filling the house; the services were interesting and impressive, and the young pastor was warmly welcomed. And his pastorate begins under very happy and promising auspices.

Mrs. J. W. Moore, of our Japan Mission, formerly Miss

Kate Boudé and supported by Ladies' Union of Lafayette who has recently been visiting a number of the Churches in Lafayette and other Presbyteries of Missouri, was in Springfield the day of Mr. Beatie's ordination, and at 4 o'clock she met the ladies of the Church and others present, and gave a most interesting address upon Mission work in the far East. Indeed all Mrs. Moore's addresses have been very instructive, interesting and inspiring, as well as helpful to the good women of the Churches visited by her. All this the writer learns from others, for only women are present at these meetings; and in reply to the question "Can any men attend the service this afternoon?" the answer was "I am a Southern Presbyterian and so are you." So I durst not go!

Mr. and Mrs. Moore expect very soon to return to their field of labor.

KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE.—Work on the first two of the group of buildings which are to form the new Presbyterian Theological Seminary of Kentucky will be begun within the next few days, contracts having been let yesterday by the Executive Committee, which met in the office of the Fidelity Trust and Safety Vault Company. The contractors will begin at once tearing down the old Long residence and the erection of the dormitory and the refectory. The two buildings will be in the southeast corner of the lot at First street and Broadway. The refectory will be set back in the lot and will face Broadway, while the dormitory, which will be known as Haldeman Hall, will face westward, running south toward Broadway.

The seminary will form a handsome addition to the public buildings of the city, and the trustees of the seminary are anxious to complete their plans as soon as possible. At present they have but enough money to pay for the two buildings for which contracts were let yesterday, and the others will not be begun until the necessary funds have been raised. The contracts let yesterday amount to a little over $36,000, and it is estimated that it will cost in the neighborhood of $125,000 to complete the other buildings of the group. The money for the erection of Haldeman Hall was provided for by Mr. W. N. Haldeman during his life time, supplemented by his heirs and executors since his death. This building will contain rooms and studies for twenty-four students and will be provided with all modern conveniences. The refectory building will contain the dining-hall, kitchen, pantry, laundry, engine and boiler-rooms, matron's quarters, servants' rooms and accommodations for twelve students. The money for its erection was contributed by a number of persons, all connected with the Presbyterian Churches of Louisville.—Courier Journal.

ARKANSAS.

LITTLE ROCK.—The Constitutional requirements having been complied with, I hereby call a special meeting of the Arkansas Presbytery to convene in the Central Church of Little Rock, Ark., Thursday, July 9th, 1903, at 5 o'clock, p. m., to receive Rev. J. F. McKinnon from South Carolina Presbytery, and if the way be clear, to place in his hands the call of the Central Church for his pastoral services, and provide for his installation.
R. W. Porter, Moderator.

NORTH CAROLINA.

DAVIDSON.—The catalogue or prospectus for the Piedmont Summer School for Teachers at Davidson, July 8th to 31st was issued some days ago, and is an attractive pamphlet. It is illustrated with a number of cuts of the various buildings of the College and views of the campus.

Popular lectures will be an important feature of the school. Among these we may name the following: Birds and Bird Life, by T. Gilbert Pearson; Literature and Life, Hmalet; A Study in Character, by Thomas P. Harrison; The Chemistry of Cooking, by William J. Martin; Rural School Problems, by J. Y. Joyner; Teaching with Authority, by Rev. A. J. McKelway, D. D.

Supt. R. J. Cochran deserves unqualified praise for the zeal and activity that he has manifested in arranging for the establishment of the school, and in providing such a full and apparently interesting programme. If the several contiguous counties co-operate with Mecklenburg in this new enterprise, as it is expected that they will do, there is no reason why the school shall not become a permanent institution and do commendable work in the interest of public education in North Carolina.

WADESBORO.—Rev. Wm. Black has just closed a very helpful meeting in the Wadesboro Presbyterian Church.

For ten days Bro. Black preached the word boldly, and fearlessly denounced sin. Large and attentive congregations came to the services.

The meeting was of great value to the Church in that it revived the members. As one result of the meeting there were about 30 to join the different churches of the town. Eight of these have come into our Church. Our Church is encouraged. We have received 18 members since the meeting of Presbytery.

MALLARD CREEK.—At a congregational meeting held June 28th a unanimous call for the services of Rev. J. E. Summers of Elmwood, N. C., was made.

AMITY.—Within the past two weeks the session of Amity Church have received eight members on profession of faith—2 young men—six girls—all baptized children of the Church.

GASTONIA.—The Charlotte Observer of July 3rd states that Rev. McG Shields, pastor of the Church at Gastonia, has accepted a call to the First Church at High Point, N. C., and will enter upon his new pastorate August 1st. Mr. Shields is one of our most energetic, consecrated and capable young ministers, and the work at Gastonia has prospered under his care. The handsome new church building was erected during his ministry and his influence has been felt in all that told for the betterment of the progressive town.

High Point, with its rapidly increasing population is to be congratulated. Both Mr. Shields and Rev. I. N. Clegg who takes charge of the Second Church, are from Carthage, N. C.

MISSISSIPPI.

MT. OLIVE.—Rev. M. S. Smith has been installed as pastor of this Church, by Rev. Charles Oberschmidt, for Meridian Presbytery. At a meeting held in connection with the installation and following it for four days, there were eleven accessions to the Church, ten of the number being on profession of faith.

HAZLEHURST.—Mr. Ernest Brainard, a member of this Church, returned from Clarksville a few weeks ago. He has completed the A. B. and B. D. courses at the S. W. P. U. and been dismissed to the Presbytery of Meridian.

KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE; Stuart Robinson Church.—Rev. H. W. McLaughlin, of West Virginia, has accepted the call of this Church.

Minister Needed.—A good field, three churches, salary sufficient for a single man or one with small family, needs a minister. Address Rev. C. T. Thomson, D. D., R. F. D. 6, Lexington.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Annual Mid-China Conference.

At home our Methodist friends have Conferences and Presbyterians have their Presbyterial meetings, but as our General Assembly has not seen fit to grant us permission to establish a Presbytery, we must content ourselves with another kind of annual gathering.

The Annual Conference of missionaries, Chinese preachers, office bearers and other church members connected with our Southern Presbyterian work was established some seven or eight years since. Its object is to bring together a number of our Chinese brethren and discuss various questions and difficulties met with in every part of the field. A number of devotional meetings are also held for our mutual spiritual upbuilding. Not only men, but a number of women usually attend, though the latter are quite orthodox as regards speaking in public; indeed neither R. A. L. nor the "Country Parson" could find anything to complain of in this line.

The Conference this year met at Kashing on May 15-19 and was opened with a sermon by Mr. Sang, a licentiate of Hangchow, his subject being "Servants of Christ." Mr. Sang is an able speaker, sometimes quite eloquent, and always furnishes food for thought in his discourses. Mr. Lew, of Soochow, was chosen chairman and made a good presiding officer. The Chinese have no rules governing public assemblies, but take much interest in the parliamentary rules which have been translated into their language. Some of the topics this year were exceedingly interesting and the discussions helpful especially to our young missionaries who need to get the Chinese point of view on many practical questions. A glance at the programme will give you an idea of the kinds of questions we handle at such meetings. The programme by the way was printed in our Presbyterian weekly paper which has been in existence now for a year and has proven a great success, filling a long-felt need. The following are some of the subjects: What method can we use to make the officials and people understand the real aim and character of the Church so as to prevent the evil-disposed from using the name and influence of the Church falsely? Why are there so few candidates for the ministry? How can we follow up those who have been taught something about the Gospel while patients in hospitals? Should we receive into the Church those who, because they are in the employ of others, cannot keep the whole of the Sabbath day? Should Bibles or religious literature be sold to people when they first come and claim to be enquirers? What good method is there for teaching the Gospel to enquirers who cannot read? Should we ask heathens for money to help carry on the Lord's work or accept it when offered voluntarily? What can we do to stimulate Christians to read the Bible daily?

The question of how to get officials and others to understand the aim and character of the Church has attracted the attention of missionaries all over the empire, especially during the last two years since there have arisen so many disciples falsely so called, who make use of the name and supposed power (since it is backed by foreigners) of the Church in the management of their personal affairs. Posters have been put up in public places denying the connection of the Church with such affairs and missionaries have personally warned officials against imposters. The China Missionary Alliance, an organization composed of missionaries from every part of the empire, has prepared and sent to all high officials a full statement setting forth the true character of the Church of Christ. The Chinese brother who opened the discussion warned the missionaries to be careful as to who they employ as personal teachers and servants, as both these classes have abundant opportunity to get hold of the foreigner's card and use it outside for all it is worth; he also warned the Chinese preachers against allowing themselves to be used as tools in the hands of others, saying that there was much temptation to yield as bribes in the shape of money and presents are frequently offered for their services.

A number of reasons were given to account for the small number of candidates for the ministry. Among others were mentioned the fewness of schools for training young men and the fact that many young men have not yet come to the point where they are willing to face the contempt which is accorded them by their fellow citizens because they give themselves to preaching the so-called "foreigner's doctrine." They are often considered mere servants of foreigners. The situation in this respect is much improved in many sections now, their connection with the Church giving them an influence and prestige which they did not have before. It was gratifying to see that there was no inclination to give up a proper observance of the Sabbath day. This is a very difficult question to some that we have to face all the time. The Church Imperial Postoffice is now employing a large number of English speaking young men, many of whom are from mission schools and are church members. What shall be the position of the Church in regard to their Sunday work? The question of receiving money from heathens for the Lord's work occasioned a lively debate. The consensus of opinion seemed to be that we should be careful about such contributions and should not receive them at all if we knew that they were ill-gotten gain. Also that the giver should be made to understand clearly that there was no merit attached to such gifts, it being an idea prevalent everywhere in China that the doers of "good deeds" obtains merit thereby. Also that the Church puts itself under no obligations to carry out his ideas as to the expenditure of the money or gives him control over buildings or property purchased with it.

One afternoon was devoted to a woman's meeting and on the last evening we had a most delightful and inspiring consecration meeting. Some time was set aside in which to hear reports from the various stations. All but Kiangyin were represented. The work for the last year has been for the most part encouraging. Fifty members were received on profession of their faith and there are upwards of one hundred and y enquirers besides numbers who come often to hear the spel but have not yet become candidates for baptism. The orts from hospitals, dispensaries and schools showed a full profitable year's work. On Sunday an able sermon was ached by Dr. Davis and the Lord's Supper was administered by Mr. Dozen to more than one hundred and twenty municants. A gathering altogether most pleasant and fitable was closed by a service of praise and thanksgiving en all joined most heartily in singing "Blest be the tie that ds" and "God be with you till we meet again." The ging throughout the meeting was the best we have heard n a Chinese audience. J. Mercer Blain Kashiug, China, May 26th, 1903.

Foreign Mission Receipts for June.

Our Foreign Mission receipts for June were $43,167.36. These $18,167.36 was from regular contributions, and $5,000 was a donation from an individual member of our church whose name we are not permitted to divulge. The deity of the donor, we are sure, does not render the gift acceptable to Him to the promotion of whose cause it is consecrated with love and prayer.

The total receipts for June, 1902, were $18,517.49. Of this amount $2,000 was from legacies. There were no legacies in this year's June receipts. The gain in regular contributions for the month, therefore, is $1,648.87.

S. H. Chester, Secretary.

The Montreat Bible Conference.

The Fifth Annual Session of the Montreat Bible Conference will convene August 9 to 18, at Montreat, N. C., under the direction of Rev. Walter Holcomb. The conference will embrace a wide scope of Bible instruction.

The following well-known speakers will be present:

Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, D. D., Monticello, Ind. In speaking of Dr. Biederwolf, Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, of the Winona Bible Conference, says he is one of the very strongest men in conference work. Rev. Chas. W. Byrd, D. D., pastor of the First M. E. Church, South, Atlanta, Ga., comes to us for the first time. Dr. Byrd is one of the most interesting and helpful preachers in his denomination. Rev. A. C. Barron, D. D., pastor Tryon St. Baptist Church, Charlotte, hopes to present for part of the conference. Dr. Barron is a strong spel preacher and will be heard with delight at Montreat. Rev. W. M. Vines, Pastor of the First Baptist Church, Asheville, N. C., will deliver some lectures during the conference. He is a strong, helpful speaker.

Northfield Conference.

The twenty-first annual session of the Northfield General Conference for Christian Workers will be convened July 31 and continue through August 16. In past years these gatherings have afforded a meeting place for those who are one in their love for the Lord Jesus Christ and devotion to His service. The basis of unity has been the recognition of the atoning work of Christ in His death and the hope of immortality through His resurrection. About the standard of an exalted Christ we have been united. It is the purpose of those to whom it is entrusted the management of these gatherings to keep them loyal to these fundamental truths, that thereby their hope and usefulness may be increased from year to year. To all Christians, therefore, who are engaged in carrying on the great soul-saving work begun by the Master Himself and entrusted by Him to His disciples for all time, a most cordial invitation is extended to be present at this Conference, which will be addressed by various teachers having a deep knowledge of God's Word and a wide experience in His work. In addition to those who have been heard from the Northfield platform in the past years there will be several new speakers this season.

It is earnestly requested that those who love our Lord, whether able to be with us or not, unite in prayer that during this season at Northfield Christ may be so lifted up that His presence may be drawn nearer unto Him and thus made more effective in His service.

W. R. Moody.

The General Assembly of 1874 and Ministerial Relief.

The Executive Committee of sustentation of Revs. Geo. M. Howe, D. D., J. B. Adger, D. D., J. R. Wilson, D. D., A. M. Miller, D. D., D. McQueen, D. D., and J. H. Bryson and

General F. W. McMaster and J. W. Davis and J. Adger Smythe presented to the General Assembly of 1874, through the venerable Dr. Leighton Wilson, senior Secretary, the Annual Report, which was received and adopted.

In that part of the Report which treated of the Invalid Fund, now changed to Ministerial Relief, the following striking sentences are found:

It has been a real pleasure to administer this fund this year; for while it has not yet attained the proportions which it ought to reach, there are evidences that the Church is becoming more deeply interested in this branch of her work, and there is reason to believe that many wants have been relieved and much comfort provided through this source. Indeed, there is no method of computing the amount of good which has been accomplished by this unpretending agency. Fathers and brethren, upon whom the afflicting hand of God has been laid, have been strengthened by the sympathetic aid extended to them; and mothers of Israel and sorrowing widows and helpless children have been made to feel that though the Lord hath stricken, He hath not forsaken them nor left them to the cold charities of a heartless world. The Church of Christ, His body, caring for her feeble members and providing for her poor, presents herself in one of her most amiable aspects, and no duty can be more incumbent on her than of nurturing her standard-bearers, who, having given themselves to her service, are cast by her sovereign Lord upon her care, or of providing for the widows and children of those who, while enduring the heat and burden of the day, were too much engaged in their "Father's business" to give attention even to the tender concern of the future temporal welfare of their loved ones. If the Church is not true to this trust, then what credentials can she furnish that Christ is her Lord? Surely it is a cause of thanksgiving that the General Assembly has evidence of the increasing response which our Christian people are making to this solemn obligation; and it may be confidently hoped that this grace, which has begun to develop will continue to grow until it accomplish its full results.

Respectfully submitted by order of the Executive Committee of Sustentation.

J. L. Wilson,
Richard Mellwaine, Secretaries.

Served Him Just Right.

A case which will be of special interest to the people of the entire State developed here a few days ago when a saloon keeper of Salisbury was bound over to the Superior court on the charge of selling whiskey in Spencer without license. It is proposed that this made a test case on behalf of the State of North Carolina.

Spencer is a prohibition town, made so by its charter, but it has been suspected for sometime that the saloon keepers of Salisbury, were selling liquor here and a few days ago C. W. Pool, a saloon keeper of the former place, erected on one of the principal streets in Spencer a large sign, advertising that he would deliver whiskey in this town. A young man eighteen years of age ordered (of his own accord) a quart of whiskey over the telephone from Pool's saloon and it was delivered by an agent of Pool, the agent collecting the money and giving a receipt therefor.

Warrants were issued for Pool, charging him with selling whiskey without license and for selling to a minor, it being the contention of the prosecution that as the whiskey was delivered and paid for in Spencer that the place of delivery became the place of sale. The case was tried before Justice Miller, of Salisbury, who decided that the defendant was guilty of selling liquor without license and bound him over on that charge, the charge of selling to a minor being dismissed. The defendant was bound over under section 1076 of the Code and it is confidently expected that he will be convicted, as the general law and decisions in similar cases go to show that under like circumstances the place of delivery is the place of sale. (See Vol. 17, American and English Encyclopedic of Law, pages 301 and 302.)

On account of the legal points involved this case will doubtless attract attention throughout this and adjoining States.

Respectfully,
A. M. Craig, President Anti-Saloon League,
Spencer, N. C., June 22nd.

There is now under consideration, with the approval of the British government, a scheme for building a ship canal through Scotland, from the Firth of Forth to the Clyde, at an estimated cost of $50,000,000. The British Admiralty is now constructing a great naval base on the north of Forth, for the use of the North Sea fleet, and the cutting of the canal would at once double the strategic value of this base, since it would enable the fleet to reach the Atlantic by steaming a distance of only forty miles. Commercially, the canal would be valuable as opening up a direct route from the North Sea to Canadian and New England ports.

So great is the size of a modern transatlantic liner that the total area to be covered every time she is painted runs up into the acres. Since the great ships of the first-class companies are painted every voyage, the calculation shows that to keep the one hundred or so vessels of the International Mercantile Marine Company in first-class shape requires the painting of some 2,250 acres each year at a cost of between one-quarter and one-half million of dollars. A curious fact in this connection, which is a direct compliment to our climate on this side of the water, is that on account of the larger number of fine days on the eastern seaboard of the United States, the painting of the vessels is almost invariably done on this side of the water, even in cases where the headquarters of the company are in some English or Continental port.

Educational.

The North Carolina Military Academy at Red Springs continues its record of substantial growth and the testimonials given it are remarkable, coming as they do from such distinguished patrons as Senators Ball and Daniel and Governor Peck.

Homer Military School at Oxford is one of the old established schools of North Carolina, with a fine reputation for scholarship, discipline and the inculcation of good manners along with the teaching of letters and morals. It begins its forty-third year in September.

Chicora College, Greenville, S. C. under the management of Rev. S. R. Preston, D. D., is one of our institutions for the education of women that is attracting wider and wider attention from those interested in education. The surroundings of culture and home training are excellent and the worthy President has commended himself to the public generally as a successful teacher of young women. The equipment of the school has recently been much enlarged.

The University, as all North Carolinians refer to their State University, is at the highest mark of prosperity and usefulness that it has ever reached in all its long and honorable history of more than a hundred years. It is the oldest State University in America. President Venable's administration has been a most wise and successful one.

Deaths.

MACLAUHLIN.—At her home in Childress, Texas, April 24th, 1903, the pure spirit of Mrs. Flora Margaret MacLanchlin went home to God.

She was born near Cameron, N. C., May 29th, 1879, and was the youngest daughter of John C. and Jane Ferguson, who preceded her to the Home above.

Flora graduated from Red Springs Seminary, May 21st, 1901, and as an evidence of high esteem and love was chosen as a representative by the Missionary Society of the seminary to teach a mission school at Barnardsville, in the Mountains of North Carolina.

Though naturally of a timid and shrinking disposition, yet she was a bright, energetic, ambitious student. A devout and loyal Christian, a special favorite of her teachers, and beloved by her school mates and all who knew her.

She was married July 9, 1902, to Rev. A. Muldrow MacLanchlin, with whom after bidding good-bye to friends and loved ones in North Carolina, she left for their far-away home and work in Texas.

She was truly one of the purest and noblest of women; devoted to her husband and his work. His comfort and joy, a help-meet in the broadest, fullest and sweetest sense of that term.

At home and wherever she went, she exemplified in a simple, but most beautiful way, the religion of Christ, her Saviour.

We did not know that we were saying our last "farewell" and that we would never see her face again on earth. The whole parting scene is now vividly portrayed. The young husband and wife said "Good-bye" to all and drove away full of bright-hopes for the future; but now how changed!

While teaching at Barnardsville she contracted bronchial pneumonia, which finally developed into an acute form of consumption.

All that loving hands and medical skill could do was of no avail. She left a husband and infant daughter, also a host of friends and relatives to mourn their loss. The wife and mother is gone, the little home that promised so much is broken up, and the heart of the husband is crushed, lonely, and sad. May the God of all Grace give him strength to bear his great sorrow for the glory of His Grace.

"Not now but in the coming years,
It may be in the better land,
We'll read the meaning of our tears,
And then, some time we'll understand.

God knows the way. He holds the key,
He guides us with unerring hand,
Sometime with tearless eyes we'll see,
Yes, there, up there, we'll understand."
Red Springs, N. C., June 8, 1903.

MACLAUHLIN.—Margaret Ruth, infant daughter of Rev. A. Muldrow MacLanchlin, has gone to be with "mother" who went to Jesus when baby was one month old. Seven weeks after, June 12th, Jesus took this little Lamb into His bosom. A little flower budded on earth to bloom in Heaven.

M'LAURIN.—Died at her father's home in Elk Park, N. C., on June 8, 1903, Mrs. McLaurin, wife of Rev. L. A. McLaurin. Several weeks prior to this, both she and her husband were at the same time, on beds of typhoid fever in their home at Raeford, N. C. They sent their baby to the mountains and the mother followed as soon as she was able to travel, while the father was expected a little later. But before he could come, the wife and mother was called to that Home that is higher and more beautiful than the mountains.

Her last message to her husband was, "Tell him I love him." Then with the family around the dying bed she said:

"I love you all, but I love Jesus most of all, and I know that He loves me." Thus passed away with a triumphant death, at the early age of twenty-four, this womanly woman of strong character and devoted piety.

The funeral was conducted by Rev. Edgra Tufts in the Methodist Church where she had been baptized and married, assisted by Rev. Wellbourne of that Church. The services were concluded with the reading of a telegram from her husband, in which he said "Thy will and not ours be done," and referred the family to 1 Thes. 4:13-14, "But I would not have you to be ignorant brethren concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not even as others which have no hope, for if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

MALLOY.—Whereas, we, the members of the Ladies' Foreign Missionary Society of Jonesboro Presbyterian Church have been greatly bereaved in the death of Mrs. C. F. Malloy, therefore be it resolved:

1, That Mrs. Malloy was a faithful member of our society, as well as of our church. The deceased was a devoted servant of her Master in whose service we greatly miss her.

2, That we extend our sympathy to her family especially her two daughters and son. May the God of all grace comfort their hearts.

3, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Presbyterian Standard for publication.

Mrs. A. C. Vick,
Mrs. C. H. Russell,
Miss M. Lee Seawell,
Com.

M'BRYDE.—Miss Catherine McBryde, of Lemon Spring, N. C., a consistent member of St. Andrews Presbyterian Church, departed this life June the 9th '03 in the 54th year of her age. For many years she was a great sufferer. She now realizes "that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us."

Pastor.

Resolutions of Respect

M'IVER.—Whereas, we, the members of the Ladies' Foreign Missionary Society of Jonesboro Presbyterian Church have sustained a great loss in the death of Mrs. Mary Epps McIver, wife of Mr. J. Alton McIver, therefore be it resolved:

1, That in the death of Mrs. McIver we have lost a friend who was near and dear, and whose life was pure and spotless. As President of our society she was ever faithful and we miss her greatly.

2, That we extend our sincere sympathy to her family and all who loved her so very dearly.

3, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Presbyterian Standard for publication.

Mrs. C. H. McLeod,
Miss Kate Bryan,
Mrs. Flora McIver,

The Household.

Laundering Table Linens.

By R. E. M.

The housekeeper who would have perfectly appointed table—and who housekeeper who is worthy the name would not?—must be sure that her table linens are properly laundered.

The lovely flower decorations, shining silver and cut glass are lost upon a yellowed cloth that has perhaps been streaked with poor bluing and starched too stiff.

Perhaps the careless laundress is not entirely to blame for this state of affairs. She does not know as well as the housekeeper how the linen ought to look and it is the duty of the owner who pays for the work to see that it is properly done.

The small embroidered pieces are best washed at home. This can be done in a wash bowl, using warm pearl-line suds and rubbing them gently between the hands. Rinse well and spread between clean dry towels to partially dry, then iron on the wrong side with a moderately hot iron. Use a blanket covered with one thickness of white cloth for the ironing table. This will make the embroidery stand out well. After the embroidery has been well ironed the white parts may be ironed on the right side with a small iron.

All fruit, tea and coffee stains should be removed from the table cloths and napkins, before washing, by pouring boiling water through them. If this is done as soon as the cloth is taken from the table after a meal it will keep it clean a much longer time, and as the washings are wearing on the cloths, it is one of the items that may be considered economical. If possible have the table linen washed at home, where they can be properly attended to. It is well to allow them to soak over night in warm pearl-

The Home Circle.

Livingstone's Birthplace.

By the Rev. George M'Pherson Hunter.

Old Bothwell is a quaint old-fashioned place little known outside of Scotland. Yet it has given two pages of history thrilling with interest to Scotch people. Queen Mary of Scotland married an Earl of Bothwell, to her own and the Earl's undoing, and at Bothwell Brig was fought one of the great battles of covenanting times, when Christ's crown and covenant was the battle cry. The Bothwell of to-day is spotlessly clean, trim and well built, and seems anxious to impress a stranger with its importance.

On the main street stands an old church, hoary with age but well kept, and still strong and flourishing, keeping its hold on the townspeople and local gentry. The minister, a grave, courteous, dignified old gentleman who might have been the original Dr. Davidson of Ian McLaren's "Bonnie Brier Bush" sketches; a perfect type of the Auld Kirk minister, invited us within the church and chapel. And if any one would like to know what it is like, let him enter one of the Dutch churches in New York State (the older churches I mean), imagine a box pulpit instead of the American style of pulpit, and he has seen the inside of Bothwell Parish Church. Leaving the church and crossing the street, along one sharp turn, you are in the road that leads to the Blyntyre Bridge. Down a steep, winding, well shaded road you are brought in full view of the River Clyde. A long bridge built of wood and steel has to be crossed before you enter Blyntyre. It costs you nothing to get on the bridge, but you must pay a penny to get off.

From the center of the bridge the windings of the river are seen, winding through the steep green banks on either side, which are heavily timbered with beeches and elms. Seen from the river the houses of Blyntyre are all tumbled together, some of them with their gables facing the river, others with sombre gray fronts frown down on the quiet slow moving stream. A few less pretentious houses, as if ashamed of their fronts, had their backs turned on old Clutha. Away to the right, peeping over the trees and seemingly up in cloudland, grim and gray against the autumn sky, stood "Old Bothwell Castle's ruined towers Stand lonely 'mong yon woody bowers, Where Clutha fondly winds around.

Long, long hath slept brave Wallace
Shade,

And broken now his battle blade,
The tear that fell from Beauty's eye,
The broken heart, the bitter sigh,
And deadly fneads have passed away,
Still thou art lovely in decay."

Up the steep hill face by a winding path brings you into Livingstone's end of Blyntyre, and there is nothing idyllic about it. Nothing suggestive of the "Cotter's Saturday Night," it rather suggests the miner's Saturday night. Square of stone houses, "Collier's rows," squalid, dirty, unkempt women and children, uncouth-looking, slovenly men, some of them with a distinctly Jewish look, greet you. We came to an old graveyard with the fence torn down, the grave stones nearly hid in the long grass, the names scarcely legible—none of the inscriptions could be made out in full—and a woman guessing what we were looking for, volunteered the information that she "didna think ony Leevingstones were beerit there." By her appearance one would not have taken her for an authority on missionary folklore, but everybody seemed to know the Livingstone family.

After leaving the graveyard and the poorer quarter of the town, the streets and terraces bore distinctly African names: "Hala" Terrace, "Shire" Street. But as Livingstone lost his way in the African forests, we had lost our way in the labyrinths of the streets of Livingstone's native town. An inquiry at a miner-looking man, brought forth proper directions. "Man, yer in the wrang end o' toon, Leevingstone's hoose is jist lookin' doon on the river." So we hied onrselves to the "ither end o' the toon." The "toon" seemed to have no proper ending, but straggled away out and lost itself somewhere in yellow fields. "When you get to the ither end ask, Awbody kens Livingstone's hoose," was shouted after us as a parting direction. Yes he was right. Every boy and girl seemed to know all about Livingstone, and guessed we were in search of his birthplace; for before the questions were properly asked the directions began to flow. The information and familiarity with Livingstone affairs was refreshing, at least one prophet had honor in his own country.

The house where David Livingstone was born and bred has nothing imposing about it, unless it be its situation on the bluff overlooking the Clyde, a plain, unadorned two storied stone house, with two Norman-like turrets encasing the outside stairs. David was right when he designated his parents as "honest poor;" plainness and poverty is written over the whole house.

Within, the rooms are small; they had little idea in Livingstone's early days of the value of light and air. The beds are concealed holes in the walls, and the floors plain uncovered boards. Davie had swept these floors and the outside stairs, cleaning even, as his mother gratefully remembered and recorded, "under the door-mat."

"Mother, if you'll bar the door, I'll scrub the floor for you." "A concession to local prejudices," says his biographer. No, I think not; rather it was a fear of being caught by the "lassies;" floor scrubbing is their prerogative, and they resent "lassie-like boys." It would have injured his standing in their eyes, subjected him to taunts and jeers, and David Livingstone was very human. Out of the windows can be seen the factory, the Clyde winding past, Bothwell Brig, scene of a famous battle, and "Bothwell Castle ruined towers," where Davie climbed higher than any other boy in the locality and carved his name above all the other names. "The boy was father to the man," for has he not climbed higher as a missionary and explorer in Africa than any other boy, and cut his name more deeply and indelibly on the D Continent?

On the gable of the house a plate has been set in by the factor of the Blyntyre estate, with the inscription, telling simple words that in that house on a March day in the year of our Lord 1817 was born

David Livingstone.

African Explorer and Missionary.

Burns has said some severe things about factors:

"Poor tenant bodies, scant o' cash,
How they maun thole a factor's snash.

That factor, whoever he is, has aton for the sin of his professional brethren who have oppressed the Scotch peasants. Shall not much be forgiven them for o man's sake?

At the foot of the hill bordering the river Clyde, where Davie doubtless learned to love rivers and received the impetus to spend his latter years in tracing the source of the mystic Nile, stand the ruins of the famous factory.

Much has been written about Davie's factory life, yet I am inclined to think the river Clyde had much to do with it after life and work. On the banks of the river he first learned to explore, to divine the floral varieties, hunt for fossils, and collect shells in the carboniferous limestone quarries along its banks.

"It is impossible to describe the order with which I began to collect shells in the carboniferous limestone. A quarryman watched me with the pitying eye which the benevolent assume when viewing the insane. 'However,' said 'did these shells come into those rocks? 'When God made the rocks He made shells in them,' was the dampening reply."

Davie was more than a mere book worm and "grind" in his boyhood. He was an explorer and "potcher" salmon was and is crown property in Scotland zealously guarded by the leasees of the fishing rights. One day Davie caught five salmon; to elude the eyes of the watchers was nearly as difficult a task as salmon catching. Charlie, his brother saved the whole situation, his trousers were large, probably his father's, with a few inches cut off their length. In the baggy trouser leg the "muckle fish" was safely stowed away. The Deacon (their father), sternly rebuked the offence, but forgave, and, the family dined on royal salmon that day. The factory where Davie worked from 6 a. m., till 8 p. m., is now a heap of ruins, but it was there he earned his bread, learned his Latin, and many other things that made him the "greatest man of his generation." The roof has tumbled down and portions only remain of the beams that supported it; the walls are crumbling in decay, broken shafts, spindle pulleys, rafters, beams, lie in confused heaps, and are seen through the glass windows.

The ebbing tide of once a thriving industry in Scotland has left Livingstone's old factory a stranded wreck. What was once throbbing with life and energy is now a broken brick wilderness. No one near knew what had become of the owners. Perhaps it was local ignorance and indifference, but we could not even guess ir names. "They are all deed awa' g syne," was the melancholy answer inquires concerning the owners. David Livingstone, the humble piecer also "Deed and awa' lang syne," and the moral of it all?" Well! "He o runs may read."—Christian Intelligencer.

Knew all His Symptoms.

One of the anecdotes related by Dr. S. Mitchell in his story, "Doctor North and His Friends," might well be personal experience of the author. The Doctor North, was travelling from Ferrisburg by the night train, which was crowded. In one of the oars he found a man stretched across two seats, asleep. He awakened him, begged pardon for disturbing him, and asked for a seat. After a little time the two entered into conversation.

At length the man asked, "Do you know Dr. Owen North?"

Rather astonished, I said, "Yes."

"What kind of a man is he?"

"Oh, a very good fellow."

"He is like all them high-up doctors. He takes big fees, doesn't he? I want to know."

"No," said I. "That is always exaggerated. Why do you ask?"

"Well, I've had a lot of doctors, and I don't know of no better, and now I haven't much money left."

Upon this, my friend confided to me the details of his physical woes in detail. We talked before daybreak. It was too dark to see the car for either of us to see plainly the face of the other.

About ten the next day the man entered my consulting room. As I should not have known him except for a rather peculiar voice, I, too, remained unidentified. I could not resist so excellent an opportunity. Looking at him, I said:

"Sit down. You have a pain in your back, don't you?"

"That's queer! I have."

"And you are blind in the left eye, and your digestion is bad," and so I went on.

At last he said, "I never saw a doctor like you! It scares a man, 'most. Can you cure me?"

"Yes," said I, and wrote out directions. It was really a simple case. He produced a well-worn wallet I intended to take a fee, and said: "I owe you for the seat and the good night."

"Well, I declare! I see, now! You are the man. But law! why did you let it go? I'd have sent you the whole township."—Youth's Companion.

The pressure of a hand, a kiss, the smile of a child, will do more to save a man's soul than the wisest argument, if it is rightly understood. Love alone is power; and where love alone is power; and where love alone seems to fail it is where self has stepped between and dulled the potency of the rays.—Macdonald.

When everything goes against you, and it seems as if you could not hold out a minute longer, never give up then—there is just the place and time that the wheel will turn.—Mrs. Stowe.

Pippa Passes.

"Tomorrow I must be Pippa who winds silk

The whole year round, to earn just bread and milk:

But this one day I have leave to go And play out my fancy's fullest games."

"Do you know that there are children working in factories and shops and mills, children that work all day long every day in the year? Many of them never see trees or flowers or green grass, and never have time to play. "Pippa Passes" is a poem about a little girl who worked 364 days in each year, and played just one day. She lived in Asolo, a small town in Italy, and worked in a silk mill, winding silk on spools from morning till night. She had no father, no mother, no sisters or brothers. Her real name was Philipa, but she was called Pippa because it was shorter.

Although she worked all the time Pippa was a happy child. She had dreams of something very pleasant happening to her some day. She liked to think what she would do if she were rich and lived in a big house. She liked to fancy herself a grown up lady in a trailing gown, with all that she wanted to eat, and with a carriage to ride in. These dreams did not make her discontented; they helped her to bear her hard life cheerfully.

You may be sure that Pippa enjoyed her holiday when it came, once a year. She thought about it long before, and long after. Before it came she planned and hoped and wished and dreamed of the good time she should have. After it passed she lived it over and over in her mind, and she hardly knew which made her the happier, the planning for it or the remembering of it.

One of the things which made time go pleasantly and fast for Pippa was a way she had of pretending that she was some one else. She knew herself to be so small, so unimportant, that she liked to fancy herself some grand person whom she admired. She often "played like" she was this or that or the other person, and this, as I have said, made her forget her own troubles.

On the morning of one of her holidays she awakened early and ran to the window to see what kind of weather it was. The sun was rising and it shone golden and bright, promising a fine day. Pippa hurried with her dressing so as not to lose a minute of her play time. As she had no one to talk with, and she was so happy that she could not keep still, she talked to herself, and then to different objects in her room. A sunbeam darted into the basin of water when she was bathing her face, and she talked to it, and watched it break into bits as she splattered the water. A lily was in bloom on her window sill, and she talked to it, saying it ought to love her because she took care of it. She spoke to the beautiful day as if it were a person. She said:

"Oh, Day, if I squander a wavelet of thee,

A mite of my twelve hours' treasure,

The least of thy gazes or glances,
Be they grants thou art bound to or gifts above measure

One of thy choices or one of thy chances,
Be they tasks God imposed thee or freaks at thy pleasure

My Day, if I squander such labor or leisure,

Then shame fall on Asolo, mischief on me!"

Indeed, Pippa was gay as a bird while she thought of the twelve long hours of rest and play. She wondered if the four happiest persons whom she knew would have a better time that day than she. She decided that she would "play like" she was Ottima, a beautiful rich lady who lived not far off, and then she changed her mind and decided to be Phene, because Phene was to be married that noon, and Pippa thought it would be grand to be a bride. But then she happened to think of a woman who had a son she loved very much, and she changed her mind again and decided to be the mother. Yet she had no sooner done so than she remembered a priest who had been kind to her, and she thought she would rather be the priest.

All four of these of whom Pippa thought had some one to love them, and she had, no one. That was why she wished to be in their places. She thought if some one cared for her, as Ottima's lover cared for Ottima, or as Phene's husband cared for Phene, or as the son cared for the mother, or as God for the priest, why, she would be very joyful. But while she was fancying these things, Ottima, and Phene, and the mother, and the priest, were far from being happy, and Pippa, without knowing it, was able to do them a great deal of good.

Ottima had just done a wicked thing, and as she stood by the window talking with the man who had helped her to do the wrong, Pippa passed, singing. These were the words she sang:

"The year's at the spring
And day's at the morn;
Morning's at seven;
The hillside's dew-pearled;
The lark's on the wing;
The snail's on the thorn;
God's in his heaven—
All's right with the world!"

Ottima and the man heard the song, and as the words, "God's in his heaven," rang out, they were suddenly ashamed of what they had done, and were so sorry that they prayed to be forgiven.

Pippa went on and soon she passed the place where Phene, the bride, was talking to her husband. Some one had played a poor and foolish joke on the husband and he was very angry. He was saying what he would do to get even, and just as he said it he heard Pippa's song. Her sweet young voice and the good words she said made him see that he ought not to be angry, and he too was sorry, and prayed, and was made better.

Then Pippa, still singing, passed the mother and her son together. The son was planning to do something which he did not do, and his mother was trying to coax him not to do it. They too heard the sweet song, and the son's mind was fixed, and he hurried away barely in time to escape a terrible punishment he would have had if he had stayed.

When Pippa went on her way singing, she passed the house where the priest was waiting for a bad man who wished the girl to cheat some one, and the priest almost tempted to do it by thinking of the much good he could do with the money. At the very moment the evil thought entered his heart, he heard the girl's clear voice, and he quickly rejected the temptation from him and cried out to be forgiven.

And so Pippa sang all the way to the village, not knowing that any one heard her. She danced and played games, and had a good time till evening, and then she went home. She entered her room, talking to herself. She put a flower which she had gathered in Ottima's garden near her lily, and said she liked the best because it was natural, because it had not been trained by a gardener, but had grown and blossomed, tended by her but herself. She undressed and went down to sleep, wondering why her happiness must end; wondering why the red sun must drop into a black cloud, and all be dark. She wondered if she would be any nearer the four persons whom she thought so happy. Then she said a prayer and lay down to sleep, with a line of a hymn in her mind:

All service ranks the same with Pippa had no idea that her songs had been good. She had no idea, either, that her uncle who had that day learned that she was his dead brother's child was waiting to take her to live with him. Her uncle was the priest whom she loved, and he went after her, and took her to her home and she never had to work in a silk mill again.—From Browning, in Interior.

A Handicapped Hero.

By Berta E. Bush.

"But I can't do anything, Annt Kate; I'm lame."
 The smooth brown head went down suddenly into Aunt Kate's lap, with a long sigh, which in a smaller boy or a girl would have been an outbreak of sobbing. Willard did not often speak of his lameness. It was a bitter disappointment to him to find all to have their young athlete turned into a life-long cripple.

"They all thought I could do great things, and make the name of the family famous, and now—O Annt Kate, I might as well be dead!" said the boy, bitterly.

Aunt Kate smoothed the brown head in silence for awhile. Then she said, "Willard, did you ever read Sidney Cartier?"

"Why, no, Aunt Kate," said Willard, looking up in surprise. It sounded like an attempt of the little six-year-old sister to 'change the subject' when her own gift was under discussion; but it did not like Aunt Kate to do that.

"No—yes," said Willard, again. Sidney Lanier wrote that splendid Boys' Gossip and The Boy King Arthur, didn't he? I used to read them, and think I would go through the world like one of his knights, but now"—and the boyish head went down again, and the sob was very near.

"Sidney Lanier's life was one long fight against overwhelming odds. He knew from the first that he could never conquer the disease that threatened him. He lived and worked like a prisoner in sight of the gallows, but he never for one moment relaxed the struggle. His greatest poem was written with a pencil when he was too weak even to speak. If ever a man was handicapped it was Sidney Lanier, yet he accomplished more in his short life than most men gifted with perfect health and vigor have done.

"Willard, there is nothing that can keep you from doing all that you meant to do, if you are determined to succeed. Handicaps are the greatest blessings sometimes. The people who have no difficulties to overcome do nothing."

Willard sat up straight, with a determined look on his face.

"Please tell me some more about Sidney Lanier, Annt Kate," he said.

"He was a Southern boy, born in Georgia. When he was nineteen years old the war broke out, and he enlisted with a younger brother, to whom he was tenderly attached. Three times he was offered promotion, but refused it because it would separate him from this brother.

"The great passion of his boyish life was for music. He loved the violin, but he played the flute because his father did not like to have him play the violin. He made one instrument take the place of the other. Some one has said that no one but Sidney Lanier could get violin tunes out of the flute. How much cheer that flute brought to his comrades in camp no one could measure. Wherever he went he brought music. He was captured toward the close of the war, but he managed to take his flute with him, and made even his prison walls echo with melody.

"At the close of the war he went home desperately ill, and during his sickness his mother died of consumption. Sidney himself recovered; but one lung was congested, and from that time he knew that he was fated to die of the same disease.

"His first hemorrhage was in 1868, only a month after he was married. For thirteen years he struggled with the disease day by day, a sick man, striving, from his couch, to support his wife and children by means of a profession in which many a well man has almost starved. He had no regular salary until within two years of his death. He had to move constantly from place to place in search of the health which, alas! he never found. If any man ever had an excuse for being 'blue' and dismal it was Sidney Lanier. But look at his books! There is not one complaining note. They are so bright and stirring that it is like a trumpet call to read them.

"Byron and Shelley and a host of modern poets have written verse so despondent that the heart is wrung in reading it. Sidney Lanier, whose life was one long struggle with death, and death winning, fills his poems with faith and hope and cheer.

"He saw always the beauty of holiness, and, as he loved to turn the phrase round, 'the holiness of beauty.' He never doubted God's power nor his own. He never so much as thought of evil, save to uplift from it. In all his works there is not one reference which even by suggestion might degrade. And he was never bitter, although he had every reason to be.

"Read Clover, Willard, and see how patient he was with The Course of Things. Read The Song of the Chattahoochee, and Owl Against Robin, which is the quaintest and most amusing answer that an author ever penned to the critics who tormented him. And, O Willard! read The Ballad of Trees and the Master. It seems to me the greatest lesson on patience that could be written."

Willard rose slowly, took his hat and limped off to the library to get Lanier's poems. Annt Kate watched him toiling painfully down the street, with a sigh on her lips, but a light in her eyes. For she knew that one hero makes others, and that handicaps bravely carried are blessings to others as well as to self.—The Colors.

Tom's Idea.

"I ploughed up the Pike meadow this morning, and I want you to pick out the stones this afternoon, Tom," said Farmer Green to his son at the dinner table one day.

Tom said nothing, but he looked his dismay, and forgot to eat the piece of turnip which he held balanced on the end of his three-tined fork.

"Throw them over to the west side of the lot, then they will be out of the way," continued his father, as he put on his hat to go back to his work.

"Yes, sir," said Tom.

The door shut, and Tom groaned. "I was going over to Sam's to make that boat this afternoon," he explained to his sympathetic mother. "I thought that meadow wasn't going to be ploughed till next week."

"If you go right about it, perhaps you can get through in time to go to Sam's," advised his mother.

"'Twill take the whole afternoon to do it all alone, and I shan't get through before dark," said Tom, dismally.

Mrs. Green said nothing more, and began to wash the dishes.

Tom wandered out to the hen yard with his hands in his pockets. He stood watching an old biddy call her chicks about her, when suddenly a bright idea struck him. "I've got it!" he cried, giving such a war-whoop that the hen and her chickens scattered in eleven directions. He turned on his heel and rushed into the house very differently from the way he had gone out a few moments before. "I'm going over to Sam's," he said to his mother.

She looked at him, and saw a roguish twinkle in his brown eyes. "Well," she said. "Only, Tom, don't fail to have your work done by night."

"No, ma'am," trying to look sober, though he smiled in spite of himself. An hour later he came into the dining room, where she was sewing, and tilted himself on her rocker, while he coaxed: "Say, mother, can't I have a few of the fellows to supper, and won't you make some hot biscuits? the village, and won't get home o'clock, so he won't care." "I guess so," she answered. "I was to make biscuits anyway, and I'll make a few extra just as well." "I did not ask him why he wanted to go to supper, but she knew he was going out some bright idea of his own, mother-like, was ready to help, she watched him curiously. Soon she heard him sawing in the shed; then he came to ask for red paint.

The boys came at 4 o'clock, according to Tom's invitation. There were four boys besides Tom.

Green looked out of the kitchen window, and saw Tom taking them to the Pike meadow. Over on the west side of the meadow she could see some object standing on the stone wall, but she could not tell what it was. Then she saw the boys stoop and fill their hands with stones. Then they formed a line and took turns throwing the stones at the object on the other side. They heard their shot flying, little by little moving nearer their target. Meanwhile the mother's wife baked her delicious biscuits and laughed to herself.

At 6 o'clock the five young slingers were drooping in to supper, hot and hungry.

"That was a fine target, Tom," said the mother to her admirers. "Where did you get it?"

"I made it," said Tom, promptly. "I used some paint left over from the boat, now."

While they were eating, Mr. Green came home unexpectedly. He spoke to them all, then, turning to Tom, he said, "Did you pick the stones out of the meadow this afternoon, as I told you, and throw them on the west side, as I said?"

"Yes, sir, we did," said Tom demurely, while the other boys, seeing through the trick for the first time, fairly shouted. "Archer's Young People."

Do you know how many books are in the Bible? You once knew but have forgotten? Let me tell you one good way to remember, so as never to forget. First, write down the words Old Testament. How many letters are in the word 'Old'? 3. How many in the word 'Testament'? 9. Put three and nine together and you have 39—the number of books in the Old Testament.

Next write down the words New Testament. There are also in 'New' and 'Testament' 3 by 9 and you have 27—the number of books in the New Testament. Of course by adding 39 and 27 you have 66—the number of books in the Bible.

Every boy or girl who reads this over should never forget how many books are in the Bible.—Sunday School catechism.

In heaven everybody will be beautiful. As the righteous soul is naturally beautiful, as the spiritual body is but the beauty of the soul, . . . and as happiness beautifies all that it penetrates or touches, ugliness will have no more place in the universe, and will disappear with grief, sin, and death.—Alexander D. D.

Children's Letters.

Lowesville, N. C.

Dear Standard:

I have not written to you in a long time, so I thought that I would write.

I am staying at my Uncle's in the country about eighteen miles from Charlotte. I and my cousin have a fine time. There is so much room and such pretty places up here.

We have the nicest little goat named Bill; he will play with us and follow us all around.

I am trying to raise some cotton this year and make a little money, but it is looking pretty bad now.

I do not go to church much; it is so far away, but I spend part of each Sunday reading the stories in your paper I like to read them.

I will answer Nancy Gordon's questions, Matthew is first found in Gen. 3:20, Moon in Gen. 1:16, and Mulberry Trees in 2 Sam. 5:23. I will close by asking where is the word Spain found in the Bible?

Your unknown friend,
W. P. Belk.

Hopewell, N. C., June 23rd, 1903.
Dear Standard:

I am a little girl of six summers. I come for my first time, desiring to join in the Happy Band of little girls and boys.

Grandma takes your good paper, and reads the letters to me, which I so much enjoy.

I go to Sunday-school every Sunday morning. My teacher's name is Miss Rebecca Vance. I think so much of her; she is so good to us, her little girls.

I have three sisters, younger than myself. Their names are Ethel, Helen and Della May. We have a good time playing train. I love to help mother by doing many little turns. This is my first letter and I want to surprise Grandpa by seeing it in print. I will ask a question, where is the word Pulpit found in the Bible?

Your little friend,
Iua E. Wilson.

Suddenly Sick

Bessie, coming in from out-door play, stopped at the door of the kitchen just in time to see mamma start upstairs with a tray, on which was arranged a dainty dinner for her sister.

For three weeks poor Aunt Carrie had been very ill with fever, with doctors coming at all hours of day and night. But now she was getting well and could sit up in a large chair with a great many pillows. She was thin and pale, and not strong enough even to stand up.

Bessie was an only child, and during these weeks of suffering for her aunt, and anxiety and watching for her mother, the little girl had been rather neglected, she thought. She was thinking now that mother never once enquired if she were ready for her lunch, but was all attention to Aunt Carrie, who sipped the broth slowly, and could not even cut her own meat.

How very inviting the little dishes looked, on the pretty tray, and oh, how good the broiled chicken and young asparagus smelt!

Bess crept to the arm of the big chair and gazed at every morsel her aunt took.

"Run away, dear," said mamma; "sick folks don't like to be watched when they lunch."

This was said with a kiss, and Aunt Carrie smiled lovingly on the rosy little face; but Bessie, in her heart, was angry and indignant. In all her spoiled little life she had never been told to "run away" and "keep quiet, dear," as much as for the last month.

She went slowly to the door, where she stopped and said: "I'm sick, mamma; I believe I'm going to die."

She saw mamma and Aunt Carrie exchange glances, and then mamma went quickly to her, and putting her arm around her, asked, "Where do you hurt, dear?"

For a minute Bessie had to think. Then she put her hand on her arm, and said, quite cheerfully: "Right here; it's a awful pain."

Mamma thought she had better lie down, and Aunt Carrie loaned her cologne, which she said helped her to get well, and mamma rubbed her head.

"I—I guess I'm hungry," the invalid announced later, after she had grown worse and had been regularly put to bed. She glanced longingly at Aunt Carrie's tray as he spoke.

Mamma hurried off with just a backward glance at her sister, who hid her face behind a big book she was glancing through.

Half an hour passed, and mamma reappeared, bearing a tray, on which was spread a delicious lunch, just like that enjoyed by Aunt Carrie. There was the same brown chicken on crisp toast, the same creamy asparagus, a bit of mashed potato and something nice to drink, with lots of cracked ice.

Mamma looked warm and tired, and it must have been a good deal of extra trouble to prepare it.

Bessie bounced on the edge of the bed, and did not wait a second, but ate her lunch, every speck but the bones, without delay. Then she lay back with a sigh of contentment.

"I guess I feel better," she said.

But mamma darkened everything, and after wheeling Aunt Carrie off to her own room for a nap, went away to see about the family luncheon.

For half an hour Bessie lay very still, as she imagined sick people did; then she remembered the dress she had begun for her doll, and that her cousins, Mary and Lucy, were coming to play with her.

So she went to the door and called to her mother please to bring her clothes, that she was well again.

But her mother looked surprised, and said: "Oh, no; it is time for your medicine now."

"But I'm well!" insisted Bessie.

"My dear," answered her mother, in the firm tone no one ever disobeyed, "you said you were sick, and sick people take to say it was almost as good as not being in school at all. It was the time Mr. Fletcher took for telling them something of what he called "current events;" that is, what he had gotten out of the newspapers the day before. But to-day his big "Daily" lay on the platform at his feet, and he seemed to have something else on his mind.

"Boys," he said; after a minute's silence, "I want to tell you a jungle story to-day." There was a murmur of approval through the school. "But to be honest with you," continued the teacher, "my story has much less jungle and much more truth in it than those of your princely story-tellers, Kipling and Seton-Thompson." Still the boys did not look discouraged, and Mr. Fletcher kept on:

"There came out of the jungle into my town, when I was a boy, a beautiful, glittering serpent, whose name we boys did not know. Our mothers, indeed, and some others, said it was a young boa-constrictor; but the men that hung about the streets, whom we boys thought very wise, laughed at the idea. They said this little snake was perfectly harmless, never grew any bigger; that, of course, women and preachers (and they sneered when he spoke of preachers) were afraid of it; but we boys, if we were the right sort of boys, could fool with it as much as we pleased without being hurt.

"I believe what these men said, and I fretted a good deal that my mother made a point of my having nothing to do with this interesting visitor from the jungle; but in my heart of hearts I knew that my mother was worth all the other people in the world—to me—and so I obeyed her command, and let the thing alone. "Ah, boys!"—and here Mr. Fletcher's voice got a little husky—"blessed is the boy who has that sort of mother, and knows it. Well, a friend of mine, whom I will call Casper, was very fond of the little snake (for it was a little one when it first came among us) and he was always playing with it. But I must make my story short—first for your sakes, because you have your lessons to learn, and then for mine, because it makes me unhappy to remember these things. In short, the jungle visitor was a boa-constrictor. And it grew faster than anything you ever imagined. Casper found out too late its terrible power over him. When he wanted to escape he could not; no, not though we all tried to help him. The deadly thing was wound so tight around his limbs that no human power could wrench it away."

Mr. Fletcher had turned rather pale and his forehead was damp, as if he were making himself do some hard thing in telling this story. This is a sad story, boys," he said; "but it is a true one—so true that several hearts are breaking under it. Perhaps you guess what I mean; that boa-constrictor was the spirit of gambling! And when I see a boy bet another boy anything—even a piece of chewing gum"—Mr. Fletcher turned to Teddy and Alec with a sad sort of a smile—"I am bound to tell him that he is playing with a boa-constrictor. It may be a very little one, but God only knows how fast it grows, and how strong it grows, and how cruel it is. Ah, boys! I met my poor friend on the street yesterday, and he clutched me by the arm, and said out loud, there on the public street: 'Fletcher, take me home and lock me up, and see if you can't save me from this gambling devil that is destroying me!'"

There was not a sound in the school room; you might have heard a pin drop, till Mr. Fletcher gave himself a shake, as if he must get rid of some painful thought, and said: "Well, boys, it will be a long time before I tell you as grisly a story as this again. First class in history, come forward!"

Then every boy in school saw one little chapped red hand fumbling for another one very much like itself, and a grimy piece of chewing gum changed back to its original owner; but nobody laughed this time.—Elizabeth Preston Allan, in Sunday School Times.

What Money Could Not Buy

"How long do we stop here, conductor?"

"About an hour, I am afraid, sir; the freight ahead is pretty badly wrecked, and it will take some time to clear the track."

The passengers grumbled, and talked about "double tracks," as delayed passengers mostly do, but John Pendleton thought it was fun to stop out in the deep woods for an hour. John, being a city boy, thought the woods a fine place.

"Please let me get out, father," said John; "I want to play wild Indian awhile."

"Don't get out of sound of my war whoop, then," said his father; "mind, now; keep close to the car."

It was all the more fun because it was getting dark rapidly, and it was easier to pretend that Indians were hiding behind the trees, and panthers and wolves lurking in the shadows. But in a few minutes John was back at the car window.

"Father," he said, "I can see a little cabin through the trees; they have just lighted a lamp in it; may I run over to it? I want to see who lives there."

His father consulted his watch. "I can give you thirty minutes," he said "here, take my watch along, and don't be a minute later than half an hour in getting back."

John dropped the watch in his pocket, and sped away through the trees. When he reached the door of the log cabin, he stopped for a minute. What excuse had he for knocking at the door?

"I'm real, sure-enough thirsty," said the breathless runner "I'll ask for a drink of water." He rapped loudly.

"Come in," said a voice, in tones of surprise, and he opened the door. There was only one person in the cabin, a black boy about John's size, and he was laid up in bed.

It did not take our young traveller long to get his drink, nor to find out that the boy's name was "Jake" that his father was a wood-chopper, and that he himself had had his leg broken by a falling tree, some weeks before.

"Daddy generally gits home by this time," said Jake, "but I reckon he's gone to de sto' to git some victnals Mammy, she cooks for de Harrisons, 'bout mile from here, and she ain't git home till arter supper."

"You must be awfully lonely," said John.

"I ain't mind it so much in day time," said Jake, "but that one hour after it gits dark is wus 'an all de days'."

John felt his heart swell with pity for the poor bed-ridden boy. What could he do for him? He had only a few minutes to spend; he had no money in his pocket, but he took out a handsome knife, and his silk pocket handkerchief.

"Here, Jake," he said, "keep these to remember me by."

As he passed them over to the bed, the shadow from the little lamp Jake had lighted threw a great picture of his hand on the wall.

"Oh! look here," cried John, "do you know how to make a wolf's head? Put your two hands together, so thumbs up now curl the three first fingers of your left hand a little (only a little), and stretch your fourth finger wide now, move it up and down—see?"

The lame boy burst into a merry laugh, and the shadow of a wolf's head, with moving jaw, fell upon the white wall.

"Here's another," said John eagerly, "but it is harder to do. Put your right hand over the left, leaving the first and fourth finger tips up for ears, second and third fingers bent this way, for a snout; two fingers of left hand for lower jaw, thumb and other fingers for legs—here!"

Another peal of laughter greeted the shadow of a pig sitting upright.

"Now I must run," said John; "I wish I had some money to give you"—

"Lord love you, young master," said a voice at the door, "you is done give 'em to Jake what money couldn't buy, 'an 'at is a good hearty laugh."

Jake's father looked ready to cry with pleasure, and as John bounded away, he left the lame boy eagerly showing him his new amusement.

"I envy you that chance, my boy," said John's father, as the train moved on, "of lightening that poor creature's weary load."

"Father," said John softly, "maybe 'at is what God stopped the train for."

"It would be just like Him," answered his father in the same tone.—Exchange.

WORDS OF COMMENDATION.

The Rev. P. R. Law, of North Carolina, says:

A short visit to the North Carolina Military Academy furnishes the occasion for these reflections. We were delighted with what we saw and heard. The advantage of the Military feature were manifest. There had been a prejudice in our minds against such schools. It has all been wiped out. We are a convert. There is a discipline about it that is needed and unattainable, save in this way. There was a regularity in the doing of things illustrated by the movement of the hands of a clock. It is a Christian school. The highest moral tone is inculcated. Over eighty cadets are enrolled. It is a well drilled and manly student body. The standard of scholarship is all that could be asked. The corps of teachers are cultured and experienced school men.

Senator Daniel, of Virginia, says:

United States Senate,
Washington, D. C., Feb. 24, 1898.

Dr. Sam'l W. Murphy gave great satisfaction as a teacher of my two sons. I was much impressed by his ability and fidelity, and take great pleasure in commending him.

John W. Daniel.

Senator Ball, of Delaware, says:

Washington, D. C., May 28th, 1902.

It affords me much pleasure to add my testimonial to the high standing and efficiency in educational work of Dr. Samuel W. Murphy, A. M. I first knew Dr. Murphy when as pupil I entered his school some years ago. Owing to his effective teaching and liberal and progressive views, I feel that I cannot recommend Dr. Murphy too highly and I shall ever wish him the highest success.

L. Heisler Ball, M. D.,
United States Senator from Delaware.

Hon. Geo. W. Peck, Governor of Wisconsin, says:
Dr. S. W. Murphy:

My Dear Sir: I desire to express to you my high appreciation of the Institute under your management, and to say that the improvement of my son, from first to last, for two years has been all that I could wish. I have no fear but that the boys who go out from under your charge will be young gentlemen, with an education that will be of use to them through life. The military part of the instruction is doing all of the scholars good, making them prompt, obedient, and balanced—in fact, gentlemen as well as scholars.

Yours very truly,

Geo. W. Peck.

Event and Comment.

The Established Church of Scotland (Presbyterian) now numbers 674,293 members and contributed to foreign missions last year the sum $276,500 besides wiping out an old debt on the work.

Rev. John Watson and his devoted wife have just celebrated their silver wedding in Liverpool and he took the occasion to tell his people that he was also married to them "till death do us part."

Presbyterianism surely girdles the world. Here is the Scots Church in Melbourne, Australia, getting George Adam Smith, of Glasgow, to supply them for a year during the absence of their pastor.

Why is it that the disciples of Calvin are broad enough to acknowledge the greatness and the usefulness of John Wesley while the Wesleyan celebrations have been full of abuse of Calvinism, abuse that is slanderous because it is ignorant?

Only $30,000 is lacking of the $80,000 to be raised for a church and parish house as a memorial of Malie B. Babcock. Certainly this is a worthy method of perpetuating the memory and the usefulness of a good and great man.

Princeton Seminary receives $2,130,391 from the bequest of Mrs. Mary J. Winthrop, which has been mentioned before. Princeton has deserved this great gift and we do not know any institution in the North more likely to make as good use of the money.

There is something pathetic in the fact that Ira D. Sankey, in his blindness, has sold his beautiful country home and gone to live with his son in the city. The beauty of earth can no more touch his senses. But there remains, after his life of usefulness, the opening of his blinded eyes to the glorious vision of heaven.

Liberia has a population of 1,000,000 negroes, 500,000 of whom are civilized. It has twenty primary schools with an enrollment of 1,200. Liberia and Hayti are two great arguments against the transportation and colonization of the American negroes. The Southern negro, especially, does not know when he is well off.

Mr. Jacob Riis, of New York reform fame, began life as a Lutheran, became a Methodist, then a Congregationalist and is now an Episcopalian, on account of the zeal of the Episcopal Church in New York for the social betterment of the "submerged tenth." There is thus a chance that Mr. Riis may rise into Presbyterianism finally.

Minister Combes says frankly that the disestablishment of the Catholic Church in France is only a question of time. The last test-vote in Parliament was 140 for to 265 against disestablishment. With disestablishment looming up in England, also, it may not be long before the American idea of a Free Church in a Free State will universally prevail.

Describing the crowds that thronged to hear Reginald J. Campbell at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, a Brooklyn paper says: "Scenes in and around Plymouth Church reminded old members of the time when Henry Ward Beecher attracted throngs of people." From which we gather that Newell Dwight Hillis, with all his sensationalism, is not attracting "throngs of people."

The Independent rejoices that the General Synod of the Reformed Church has struck the word "obey" from the bride's vow in the marriage service, and hopes that it will proceed to expunge from the New Testament the invidious command of St. Paul "Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands." If we may judge from the returns of New York and Newport fashionable society an amendment substituting "other women's" for "your own" would be immensely popular.

Mrs. Eddy dropped into poetry at the late Christian Science Anniversary in Boston. It is not exactly the kind of poetry that Boston was accustomed to in the days of Longfellow, Whittier, Holmes and others. Still it rhymes, and only one line out of the four is like Mephibosheth the son of Saul, lame in its feet. The first line goes trippingly,

"Truth happiness life in hamlet or town."

Mrs. Eddy probably does not know that "happify" is a mongrel word, with an English prefix and a Latin suffix. But the larger the area of Mrs. Eddy's ignorance the more satisfactory she seems to be to her followers.

This issue is quite largely occupied, pictorially and editorially, with the subject of education. But this is the time of the year when many young people are thinking about the next term of school and when many anxious parents are searching for the best that they can afford to give their sons and daughters. The Standard is unaffectedly glad that our Presbyterian Institutions stand so high as compared with others, and that those in North Carolina compare so favorably with Presbyterian Institutions elsewhere. In the matter of the education of their children Presbyterians have always been moved by the consideration of the merit of the institutions themselves rather than by the claims of Church loyalty. It is a pleasure to know that the two considerations are so perfectly harmonized in the present educational situation.

Rev. E. A. Bishop, the Methodist minister whose daughter was outraged and murdered by the negro whom the Delaware mob burned alive, issued before the lynching the following letter, which has well been called an "immortal document":

"Dear Friends: Mrs. Bishop and our children join me in this expression of deepest gratitude for your Christian sympathy and tender ministrations in our agonizing grief. Though comparatively strangers, you have been as dear friends whose hearts had been proved by years of acquaintance.

You have helped us bear our sorrow, made a hundredfold more intense by a most revolting crime. Our cup of bitterness is full, and we ask you to join us in our appeal to all citizens of our commonwealth to refrain from violence.

The officers believe that they have all evidence necessary to convict the prisoner, and without doubt as soon as the court can reach his case he will receive sentence to pay the full penalty of his atrocious crime. If he can be legally tried this month, by all means let justice be swift; but if not, then let us wait calmly until the law, in its majesty, may remove the vile wretch from society.

Any other course of procedure would bring a kind of glory from those of his class; would intensify the suffering of the afflicted family; possibly endanger the life of a delicate woman, and certainly dishonor the laws of our commonwealth.

Let us not try to atone for one crime, no matter how hellish, by committing another."

We leave this letter to make its own impression.

The State Anti-Saloon Convention.

Those of us who have been responsible for the conduct of the campaign against the saloon and distilleries in North Carolina for the past year or more, were devoutly grateful for the splendid endorsement which the Convention in Raleigh last week gave to the principles and the methods that we had adopted. It was a body of earnest, conservative, intelligent and conscientious men, and their enthusiasm was that of the men of vision who bring things to pass. Some fine addresses were made, notably those of J. W. Bailey, Henry A. Page and Senator Simmons. The sum of $5,000 was asked for, for the campaign, $3,000 of which was pledged at that meeting and the following Declaration of Principles adopted:

"The North Carolina Anti-Saloon League is an independent body, maintaining friendly relations with similar associations in other States, but it is entirely independent in its acts, and it is non-partisan in character.

"Its purpose is the abolition of liquor saloons and distilleries by all proper means; the creation and crystallization of a righteous public sentiment and the proper enforcement of all laws against the liquor traffic. It favors the firm and just enforcement of the Watts law, and it earnestly requests future legislatures not to incorporate small towns with the privilege of licensing saloons or distilleries.

"It calls the attention of Boards of Commissioners of the various towns and cities to the danger of whiskey distilleries and rectifying establishments, now forbidden to operate in the country, removing to incorporated towns or cities. This should be prevented.

"The organization favors calling an election under the existing law in every town or city now licensing saloons where there is a reasonable chance of carrying the election against the saloon. This league pledges its assistance in all such elections."

A new executive committee was elected and by the nomination of one of the old members two names were added to the old committee which the Convention had re-elected.

And now a word to the friends of the movement, everywhere. There is evidently a tidal wave of opinion in North Carolina now against the saloon. Some of the most far-sighted of our politicians have seen its advance. Like the tide that taken at its flood leads on to fortune, this wave may sweep the saloon and the distillery both out of North Carolina, if not checked by the indolence or cowardice of the friends of temperance themselves.

We have now a strong central committee in touch with a State Committee, for which at least one member in each county is desired. Let the work of organization now go on apace, and let there be the beginning of a campaign now, in every town where the saloons exist, to see that the moral forces of the town are organized against the saloons. The Central Committee does not desire to interfere in local affairs by way of dictating what form that fight shall take. But it will be glad to render all possible aid to the cause wherever the fight is begun.

A few basic principles are fundamental. The saloon is an institution of Satan's kingdom. We are on the side of Christ's kingdom. We have been taught that when we pray "Thy kingdom come," we mean, among other things, that the Kingdom of Satan should be destroyed. Let us work as we pray. We can make our prayers effectual by doing all in our power to answer them ourselves. If we love Christ, if we love our fellowmen, let us see to it that the reproach of the saloon is lifted from this old commonwealth, for which, so far as our influence extends, we are responsible.

The Standard has long ago defined its attitude on this question, but a restatement of principles seems to be called for. The Biblical Recorder has an editorial in its issue of last week on "The Future of the Denominational College," which is worthy of careful study and calls for a frank expression of agreement or disagreement. It recites the conditions under which the denominational colleges were founded: when State Institutions were weak, when the State Aid principle was not firmly established, when denominational fealty was strong, and when competition for students was not considerable.

Now, this would indicate that the Recorder is in a somewhat pessimistic mood. But it is not altogether justified by the facts. In this State, for instance, the University is older than any of our colleges and has always been supported by State aid, though this has been very meager throughout its history.

Then, are we willing to admit that denominational fealty, at least in the South, is weaker than it used to be? Its denominationalism is less fanatical. It does not make the abuse of other denominations its principal stock in trade. But it is more intelligent and it has gained by the exchange of sense for bigotry. The only conditions that we admit is the increasing competition for students. And yet there are those who still believe that competition is the life of education as well as of trade.

The Recorder notes among the changed conditions the rise of technical institutions such as the A. and M. College in this State, the increase of appropriations to State Universities, and the establishment of State Institutions for women.

Well, if the Church Institutions have failed to provide a technical education for our young men, certainly it is the duty of the State to provide it. We do not ieve that the Recorder would close the A. and M. at leigh this year if it could. It is doing too necessary work in educating for the industrial world the young n who enter its doors. As to the increase in appo- tions, every town understands to-day that educa- n, in any true sense of the word, is more expensive w than formerly. Unless education by the State is mortify every feeling of patriotism by inadequacy, State has to provide the money for the equipment, laboratories and the various specialists of the sev- l schools that are necessary now. In this State we getting to be a more prosperous people than we ever e. It is only fitting that the State University ould reflect something of the improved conditions of homes of our people. As to the colleges for women blished by the State, which in North Carolina is the ate Normal," let us ask, What Church Institution s teaching its pupils how to teach in the public ools, when it was founded? Has it not already sent ndreds of teachers, trained to teach, to these schools? o we not need good teachers for the schools in North olina more than anything else?

"Finally the tendency of gifts is to the great insti- tutions." Well, as we have no great institutions in orth Carolina this does not concern us, any more than e talk of State Aid for Higher Education means any- ing to those who know what Higher Education really and what we have in North Carolina. We quote the xt paragraph:

Measure these conditions well, and you will agree at the situation is most grave. You will understand e assurance with which we pointed out that the State w the Greensboro Female College, whose death-cries- ntinue to ring up and down our Commonwealth. ou will understand the earnestness of the citizens who- uld explain the matter away with soft and soothing- rds.

You will also understand why denominational col- ges have passed in the North; why they have never d a chance in the West, and why they are struggling e life in the South—the field of their last stand in all e world. You will also understand with what serious- ss it has been urged from the platform of one of our ate institutions that the denominational colleges go- t of existence as distinct institutions and group them- ves about the State institutions. You will also un- rstand why a rising generation of dead-beats and- upers have besieged our colleges, State and denomi- tional, demanding everything free!

Of course the dead-beats should be beaten dead, but- had supposed that one idea of education, whether by- urch or State, was to give the "pauper's" son a- ance to do better than his father did. Are our col- ges for the rich only? It may have been "urged- th seriousness from the platform of one of our State- stitutions," but it was serious folly all the same and- suppose the Institution itself was not responsible.

As to the passing of denominational colleges in the- orth, Princeton University in New Jersey is a pretty- r type of a successful Presbyterian University, just- Washington and Jefferson college in Pennsylvania- of a Presbyterian College. Yale is Congregational- d Harvard is Unitarian. These are not as sectarian- they once may have been, but neither are the denomi- tional newspapers of that section of the country. As- r the denominational institutions never having had a- ance in the West, we have been of the opinion that- resident Harper, of Chicago, was running an institu- on there that was not poverty-stricken exactly and- at answered to the name of Baptist, while we happen-to know of a grandson of North Carolina, Walter Rankin, who has built up a Presbyterian College in Wisconsin, by main strength and awkwardness, in the face of State competition.

And as to the allegation that "the State slew the Greensboro Female College, whose death-cries continue to ring up and down our commonwealth," this is pathetic, but it is not sense.

In the first place it seems to be a pretty lively corpse yet. As this is penned the chances are that the alumnae of the college will succeed in purchasing the stock for $25,000 according to the offer of the Board of Trustees, which means also the assumption of a debt of $40,000, the principal of which is not due for ten years. So it would seem that the college has been run, not only without endowment, but with an interest charge on a debt of $40,000. Besides, the trustees were offered $75,000 for the college property which was the reason for closing the college just now. It cost $42,000.

Furthermore the Greensboro Christian Advocate puts as the reason for the closing of the college the apathy of the Methodist Church. It says:

The reproach of Methodism in North Carolina is her apathy in the matter of giving moral and material support to her educational institutions. They have allowed Greensboro to languish, while Davenport, Rutherford, Weaverville and Brevard have gone vainly begging for the help they have needed, and Trinity would have been dead and buried but for the benefactions of a few whose unselfish donations have never been fully appreciated.

It is true that after having printed this, our contemporary read the little post-script in the Standard and lost its temper, which we can pardon this hot weather. It says in the same issue:

Just as our columns are full, we find the following in the Presbyterian Standard:

"P. S. again. Why should the Presbyterian Church be able to keep five flourishing female colleges open in North Carolina and the Methodist Church with all its money and its numerical strength celebrate the Two Hundredth anniversary of John Wesley's birth by closing the one such college it had? We hope the answer to that question will be the re-opening of its doors."

Mr. McKelway is exceedingly anxious to be known as very smart. We suggest that he "go 'way back and sit down," or else take a new start. It seems that he does not know that in North Carolina, besides Greensboro, the Methodists have Davenport, Louisburg and Littleton Female Colleges, each chock full of girls, besides a large number of girls at Rutherford, Weaverville and Trinity. Upon the whole we are doing fairly well, and if Mr. McKelway, Joe Reece and the rest will continue to help (?) attend to our business, we have good hope of yet coming out at the end of the lane.

Expressing our sympathies for "Joe Reece," who has to live in the same town with the editor of the Greensboro Christian Advocate, the Standard desires to apologize for overlooking the colleges mentioned above. But while the two paragraphs quoted are slightly confusing, taken together, we get these questions out of them for the Biblical Recorder. If it was the "apathy of Methodism in North Carolina" that struck down the college, why lay the death at the doors of the State? Or, if the Methodists have these colleges and the Presbyterians five, all "chuck full of girls," why was it that the Greensboro College alone fell a victim to the cruel hand of the State? And then suppose it enters upon a new career of prosperity under new management, as we all hope. What becomes of the Recorder's contention? And suppose they build the million dollar Methodist College for Women at Durham, will not State competition be responsible for that too? The facts are that the Presbyterians, the Baptists, and the Methodists are educating more boys and girls right now than ever before and the State is doing the same thing.

And now what is the State of North Carolina if it is not the people of North Carolina? And who are the people of North Carolina? Why they are mostly Baptists and Methodists and Presbyterians and Episcopalians and Lutherans and Quakers and so on. And these say through their representatives in their church courts, We must have Church Schools in which to train for our church its boys and girls. This is one of the most effective methods of denominational propagandism and we adopt it. And then these same people, Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Lutherans, Quakers and others say, through their representatives in the Legislature, We must have a State University and a State Normal and a State A. and M. The same people say these two things, and they put their money into the church treasuries for the church college, and they pay their taxes into the state treasury for the state colleges, and they know that both contributions are going to the great cause of education and that there is no conflict between Church and State in this matter. Rivalry between the institutions themselves is wholesome, if it is fair and honorable, just as rivalry between the colleges of a single denomination helps to put each on its mettle as to equipment and standing and helps to get pupils that would never go to any school except for the competition for them.

The Standard believes in Church Education and also in State Education. It could not believe in the common schools if it did not believe in State Education. The Catholic Church is consistent in teaching that no education should be by the State and in fighting the public schools. The Recorder is illogical and inconsistent because it believes that the State should educate the child in the formative period of its life and that it is wrong for the State to educate him after the character has been largely formed. The Standard believes in Church Education because it believes in the right and the duty of every church to propagate itself through the influences it can throw around education. But the Standard believes that a good deal of the talk about Christian Education is beside the mark. Christianity shrinks from self-advertisement always. It cannot be imparted and it cannot be prohibited by any process of education anywhere. And when our State Institutions in North Carolina have at their heads and in their faculties just the same sort of Christian men that our Church Colleges have, the Standard would feel a little hypocritical in talking about State Institutions as Anti-Christian or even Un-Christian. The Churches should support their own institutions as nobly as the Presbyterian Church in North Carolina is supporting Davidson and our five colleges for women. And then, instead of abusing the State and the State Institutions, they should see that those institutions, from the public schools up, should have thrown around them all the influence of the Church and of the Church's ministry.

The centennial addresses on Emerson have indicated more than anything else the weakness of his hold upon mankind. The contrast between him and Wesley is a proof that the only immortality is that of Christian service.

The Presbyterian University.

We published last week and the week before Dr. W. McF. Alexander's article against the removal of the University at Clarksville to Atlanta. We publish this week articles by Rev. J. W. Walden, D. D., and Rev. C. C. Carson, of Georgia. These are in no sense replies to Dr. Alexander, except in so far as they may inadvertently have corrected some of his statements. We have had on both sides an independent presentation of the facts of the case.

But Dr. Alexander, not having these antagonists in view, seemed to be replying to certain positions taken and phrases used in the Standard. We devote some space therefore to a review of his article.

In the first place we have a very great sympathy for those who are not inclined to this removal. We honor their feelings while we dissent from their judgment.

In the second place it seems to us bad policy for either Columbia or Clarksville to be denying "control" to what are called the "controlling Synods." They are dependent on these Synods for their students. Nor does it seem to us that the expression, "the sole government of the Institution shall be in the hands of a Directory" conclusive on such larger questions as those of the removal of the institution itself. That is not a question of "government." The idea that a discussion of removal on the floor of one of the "controlling Synods" is the violation of a so-called contract between the Synods and its own creature the Directorate, or is an impeachment of the personal uprightness and integrity of the trustees, is an extreme view of the matter that rather discredits the other statements and arguments.

The question of the legal difficulties is a more serious one. It may be recalled, however, that "legal difficulties" by the bushel were predicted of the removal of Union Seminary to Richmond, Virginia. They did not materialize when the time came. Dr. Alexander admits that an eminent lawyer of the Clarksville bar who is opposed to the removal of the University says that it may be legally removed, that the Presbyterian Church has had peaceable control of it for over seven years and may do what it will with its own. Thereupon Dr. Alexander makes a point about the "statute of limitations." It may be permissible to make an ad captandum argument on such a question. If so it is certainly permissible to point out the fallacy. The reason why a "statute of limitations" has an ugly sound to people is that it is plead by rascals who wish to escape paying an honest debt. On the other hand it is a righteous law that there shall be some limit to the control by the former owner over property passed from one hand to another. The law of Tennessee recognizes that circumstances and conditions change. And the property has been in the possession of the Presbyterian Church for twenty-seven years. American law constitutionally denies the right of entail, the control for generations of property by the dead hand. And the fact is that property has to be given in Tennessee according to Tennessee laws.

This on the supposition that the lawyer is correct. At any rate it would be an excellent matter for conference, and we may as well say that we have nothing but contempt for the threat of law-suits, which would be fatal to Clarksville itself, however much damage they might do to other interests. As Dr. Alexander has brought that threat out it might be said that it will do more to ouse Presbyterians on the other side than anything else, and has already had that effect where it has been made.

As to the moral difficulties, these should be final, if they exist. It is admitted, we understand, that a part of the endowment was given on the condition that the university should be located at Clarksville. This is the local claim which the advocates of removal have admitted and which they propose to yield. But when the ground is broadened, that it was meant for the Mississippi Valley, the case is somewhat weakened. And when we reflect that the Presbyterian Church has been thinking all this time that the funds were largely given for the cause of Presbyterian Education and that some of the donors were even credited with having given to Christ, then the question of locality is submerged in the question of usefulness. If the money has been given to Presbyterian Education the question is, where would it do the most good?

It would be a real breach of faith with the donors if that money is less effectively used than it might be for the sake of local and selfish ends.

Moreover, the very trouble now is that the Mississippi Valley, in the broad and comprehensive sense in which Dr. Alexander uses the term is so supplied with colleges and seminaries that the conditions that led to the founding of Clarksville have wholly changed, while any one not blind can see that its opportunity for becoming a great Presbyterian University is gone forever. Louisville Seminary makes the Divinity Department of Clarksville worse than useless for it is taking several of the most valuable professors from the larger life-work that they ought to have. The new seminary in Texas cuts off the supply of candidates from that direction. There are three Presbyterian Colleges in Arkansas and Missouri, and two splendid Presbyterian Colleges in Texas; and if the Million Dollar University fails at Atlanta, there will be one in Alabama. This leaves Arkansas, Mississippi, Louisiana and Tennessee, to supply a Presbyterian University with Divinity Students, and three, less Arkansas, to supply the Academic Students.

There is a fallacy also about these four "controlling Synods" that are not to presume even to discuss control, "giving away their institution to Atlanta and leaving themselves destitute." Let us glance at a map of the Southwest Territory. We see at once that Atlanta is nearer in distance, and (from what we have heard of railroad connections) a good deal nearer in time, than Clarksville is, to about all of Louisiana, including New Orleans itself where Dr. Alexander lives, to most of Mississippi, to nearly all of Alabama, and to a good part of Tennessee itself. Leaving aside Arkansas, (and the part of Arkansas is about as near one place as the other) which has its own college and an excellent one, the greater part of these "controlling Synods" mentioned is nearer to Atlanta than to Clarksville. The talk then about these Synods leaving themselves "destitute" of Presbyterian education is purest buncombe, is it not Dr. Alexander? The "controlling Synods" could still control, and the location would be more convenient to them, and the constituency of our Presbyterian University would be increased from 55,000 to a round 100,000 to say nothing of the general patronage of the whole Church, if the University shall prove worthy of the name, University, and of Presbyterianism, itself. It is to give up such a splendid opportunity as this is that these trustees are thinking of the local claims that have been pressed upon them. It may be sentiment, but it is not patriotism, and it is the kind of love for Southern Presbyterianism that the Standard prefers not to have.

As to that "Presbyterian desert," we have frequently heard the region in the Northwest corner of Tennessee so spoken of. The Standard thought that it had put it pretty neatly in saying that Clarksville is "an oasis in a Presbyterian desert." Dr. Alexander makes us mean that the Presbytery of Nashville and the Synod of Tennessee were Presbyterian deserts. By no means. The trouble is that they seem to have deserted Clarksville far more than its deserts. And then we all know its splendid roll of alumni. But so far as we can learn they are such far-seeing men that they differ widely with the trustees as to what ought to be done in the matter of removal.

And then the idea that the recent agitation about removal is responsible for the small number of students at Clarksville is another despairing wail. Did the students know that the agitation was going to begin and therefore stayed away?

Nor do we think there need be any worry about the lack of equipment or endowment or students either, once Columbia and Clarksville are combined at Atlanta. It will be an exchange of a city of at least 100,000 people for a town of 10,000. And local patronage counts for much. Atlanta will doubtless have a university, now that it has signified its wish for one, and if the Presbyterian Church does not rise to this opportunity, the Methodist or the Baptist will, or they are not as smart as we think they are.

Let us have the Million Dollar University for the sake of Southern Presbyterianism, for the sake of the Kingdom of Christ.

The Presbyterian Church of England has 79 churches, 2,325 communicants and 10,620 candidates for baptism as the fruits of its mission work in Formosa.

The thinking men of our time are honoring Wesley not merely as a great religionist, but as a man of broad human sympathies and uncommon sagacity. The ideas which he hoped to set afloat have since his day come into their own, and open minds in our day, outside his churches as well as within them, are yielding him honor by yielding allegiance to his principles and accepting his thought. We trust that this general airing of the liberality and ecumenical quality of Wesley's thinking will help to clear away the singular misapprehension as to Methodism which prevails in those quarters where it is looked upon as a narrow sect.—Christian Advocate.

Dr. Torrey and his singer, Mr. Charles M. Alexander, were given an ovation on their return to Chicago the other day, after an evangelistic tour of the world, lasting eighteen months. They compute that not less than thirty thousand people have been won to Christ, in Hawaii, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, India, England and Scotland. Dr. Torrey declared that they had emphasized five great truths of the Gospel: "the power of prayer, the power of the Bible, the power of the blood of Jesus, the power of the Holy Spirit and the power of personal work." He said that the world-wide revival for which men have been praying has begun. We are unfeignedly glad to hear such a report and trust that others besides Dr. Torrey will find out how much more blessed and important it is to proclaim the gospel of salvation to sinners than to be splitting hairs about premillennialism and Keswickism with which too many able preachers of the gospel have been too much occupied of late.

The Offer of a Career.

Jesus offers to the young man a career, something to do, something to be, the doing of which and the being of which will realize what is in a young man's heart to hope and dream about. It is hidden in the words, "Follow me."

Jesus had a great trick of saying to men, "Follow me." He found a man counting his tax money, and He said to him, "Matthew, follow me." He found a man fishing, and He said, "Peter, follow me." He found a young man by the wayside, and He said to him, "Philip, follow me."

Wherever He went He had the knack of drawing men after Him, as if that were enough, as if that were all. So it is. And He was right when He said to the young man, "Here is your life, here is your career; follow me."

What difference would it make to follow Him particularly? What is exactly the demand that is made by the Saviour to-day, supposing a young man wants to follow? It is this: when Jesus wants a man, He wants all of him. A man with heart free for Him; a man with a man's love going to Him; a man and a man's life; a man that will not think of anything else when he is following Jesus.

Have as much money as you like. Have all ambitions that you like and that you can keep in your heart. But Jesus wants you, and if you give Him not yourself, your whole heart, and if you consider not all that you have His, to be administered for Him, to be freely laid aside at His bidding, you can't follow Him. Make up your mind to that.—From a Sermon by Rev. Charles W. Gordon ("Ralph Connor").

Principles.

It is not strength of brain that saves a man, or orthodoxy of creed, or connection with a Church. All these have often proved to be but ropes of sand. They are not proof against the tides of temptation. There must be firm, heaven-implanted principle; for no one is safe in business, or in politics, or in social life, or anywhere, when conscience is unloosened from God. The parting of the cable may be unseen for a while, it may even be unsuspected: but it is a mere question of time how soon the back-slider may strike the rocks. Jesus Christ never insures anyone who unites with His Church, and yet has no "anchor sure and steadfast which entereth within the veil," and "binds fast to Christ Himself." And if you ever reach heaven, my brother, you will come in, as I have often seen vessels come into yonder harbor of New York, with the storm-tide anchor swinging proudly at the prow. "There are ships," said the eloquent Melvill, "that never go down in life's tempests. They shall be in no peril when the last hurricane shall sweep earth and sea and sky, and when the fury is overpast, and the light that knows no night breaks gloriously forth, they shall be found on tranquil and crystal waters, resting beautifully upon their shadows." These are they who have been piloted by the Holy Spirit; these are faithful ones whose inner soul was anchored to Jesus Christ.—Theodore L. Cuyler, D. D.

Do you envy the fisherman who lent his boat to Jesus? He offers us the same honor and He begs us to do Him the same favor; He comes to each of us and asks us to let Him have our daily work as His preaching-place—the office and workshop, the counter, the desk, the mother's work in the home, the servant's work in the house—this is the pulpit He seeks. Will you let Him have it to-day?—Mark Guy Pearse.

Happiness is to feel one's soul good; there is really no other; and one may have this happiness even in sorrow; hence there are some griefs that are preferable to any joy, and that would be preferred by all who have felt them.—Joubert.

Missionary.

Two Missionary Facts.

At the World's Fair, in Chicago, there was one part of the world represented in the great exhibition that seemed to impress every one with a sense of its hopelessness. The Japanese were clean and intelligent, the South Sea islanders most interesting, the Eskimos stout but well-behaved, but the West Africans were an unpleasant sight. From the bloody, rudely carved idol post on which a chicken was beaten to death every day as a sacrifice, to the savage and meaningless dances, which the tribe delighted, everything was degraded, heathen and scarcely human. The chief, and even the women, begged for drink and for money from the passers by, and quarrels and frantic noise were incessant. "Well," said one man to his friend, a Christian minister, "I shall never give another cent to missions in West Africa, for such tribes are not worth converting; they are degenerate and never can be reached."

The minister did not forget the remark, and he had the pleasure, this year, of meeting his friend again, a telling him two missionary facts about West Africa. Last Christmas a new church in Lolodorf, in the Kamerun country, was finished. It was the first Church organized among the Bulu natives. The first meeting took place under a banana tree, in May, 1900, and the natives have built the church largely themselves, out of their scanty means. The building holds three hundred people, but it is crowded every Sunday, and multitudes gather outside. In one series of special services forty-one natives were converted.

In this same West African country, not a hundred miles away from Lolodorf to the westward, are the Fanga and Kribi tribes. They are on the coast, where, if possible, the natives are apt to be more degraded than in the interior. Yet these two tribes, this year, supporting, of their own free will, a Bible reader to the heathen tribes round them. If men capable of such Christian love as this for their fellows are "degenerate" then the more degenerate West Africa becomes the better for its future!

There are two sides to every mission work among degraded people. One is the hopelessness of the situation, humanly speaking; the other is the hope of the gospel. We can look at either side. But the wisest thing is surely to look longest at the latter. No tribe has ever been found so degraded, so lost, that the gospel cannot reach them, and in time transform them. No mistake is made in sending missionaries to the most hopeless spots on our globe. The only mistake is not sending more missionaries, and making more effort than we do now.—Selected.

Bread Upon the Waters.

A lady in Scotland, whose husband had left her a competence, had two profligate sons, who wasted her substance with riotous living. When she saw that her property was being squandered, she determined to make an offering to the Lord. She took twenty pounds and gave it to the London Missionary Society. Her sons were very angry at this, and told her she might as well cast her money into the sea. "I will cast it into the sea," she replied, "and it shall be my bread upon the waters."

The sons, having spent all they could get, enlisted in a regiment and were sent to India. Their positions were far apart, but God so ordered in His providence that both were stationed near good missionaries. The elder one was led to repent of sin and embrace Christ. He shortly afterwards died.

Meanwhile the widowed mother was praying for her boys. One evening, as she was taking down her family Bible to read, the door softly opened and the young son appeared to greet the aged mother. He told her he had turned to God, Christ had blotted out his sin. Then he narrated his past history in connection with the influence the missionaries of the cross had on his own mind; while his mother, with tears of overflowing gratitude, exclaimed: "Oh, my twenty pounds!"

Sunday School Lesson.

BY REV. H. G. HILL, D. D.

Samuel's Farewell Address.

1 Sam 12:13-25. July 19, 1903.

The last words of eminent men are usually valued and remembered. Samuel made his parting address to Israel at Gilgal, when Saul was publicly inaugurated as king, and the aged judge was retiring from the burdens and responsibilities of office. In this address he vindicates the purity of his administration and calls upon the assembled nation to show that he had wronged anyone. He also reviews God's dealings with them and the repeated deliverances. He had wrought for them through multiplied and able leaders. The portion of the address which constitutes our lesson may be presented under three aspects.

1. Israel Warned by Samuel.—The faithful judge warns them that a mere change in their form of government will not deliver them from evil. He tells them that safety is to be secured only by they and their king continually following the Lord their God. He assures them that it will be well with them "If they fear the Lord and serve Him and obey His voice, and do not rebel against His commandment." He solemnly warns them, "But if ye will not obey the voice of the Lord, but rebel against the commandment of the Lord: then shall the hand of the Lord be against you as it was against your fathers." How fully these warning predictions are sadly verified the student of Israel's subsequent history is entirely aware. No nation can avoid manifold ills by a radical change in their form of government, but only by cherishing that righteousness which results from obeying the commandments of Jehovah.

2. The Sign Given to Prove their Wickedness.—The Lord and Samuel would impress upon the minds of Israel that they had committed gross iniquity in demanding a king not only by plain words, but by miraculous signs. Hence at wheat harvest when it was uniformly fair, Jehovah at Samuel's request sends a storm of thunder and lightning and rain. The sign chosen shows that the Lord directly controls the atmosphere, the clouds, the rain and the elements of nature. It also proves that Jehovah sends rain and storm in answer to man's prayers. One effect of this sign was that it developed great reverence for the Lord and Samuel. It is said "And all the people greatly feared the Lord and Samuel." It also impressed the fact and magnitude of their sin and the value of intercessory prayer. It is affirmed, "And all the people said unto Samuel, pray for thy servants unto the Lord thy God, that we die not: for we have added unto all our sins this evil thing, that we have asked us a king." This demand for a king was sinful, because it manifested distrust of God and of the institutions He had established for Israel, and because it involved the rejection of Jehovah as their real king and an attempt to substitute for Him a mortal ruler. The sin was aggravated by an obstinate persistence, even when told, that the demand displeased the Lord and earned as to the ills a king would inflict upon them.

3. Samuel's Counsels and Promises.—The faithful judge does not part with his people without giving them wise counsels and comforting assurances.

He urges them not to fear, though they had done wickedly and not to turn aside from following the Lord. He counsels them to serve the Lord with all their heart and not to turn aside after vain idols that can not profit or deliver. He assures them that "The Lord will not forsake His people for His great name's sake: because hath pleased the Lord to make you his people." He assures them that not only their welfare, but the Divine glory was involved in purifying and preserving them from sins and foes. He also promises to intercede for them and to give them religious instruction. He says "As for me God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you: but I will teach you the good and right way."

A Mission Study of South America.

Luke 2:25-32. Topic for July 26.

As the Southern Presbyterian Church confines its work in South America to Brazil, that country alone will receive our attention at this time.

"The Presbyterian Church in Brazil" is the result of the co-operative work of the Northern and Southern Presbyterian Churches. The work of our own Church is done in North and South Brazil. The work in South Brazil was begun in 1869; in North Brazil in 1873.

Brazil was an Empire with the Roman Catholic Church as the state church until November, 1889. At that time the empire was overthrown and the republic proclaimed. The new government was positive, and Church and State became separate. It has remained so ever since, but the last presidents have been more and more favorable to the Roman Church and the present executive is a devoted Roman Catholic. Protestant missions have had a much better chance under the republic than formerly, but the Catholic League is very energetic in its work at present and all kinds of obstacles as well as dangers themselves are being thrown in the way of evangelical work.

Yet the work in Brazil has been successful and the increase last year in every phase was gratifying.

The population of the fields that are supported by our Southern Church is about four and a half millions. To do the work among this mass of people we have 31 missionaries and 26 native helpers. Do a little problem in division and see how many souls are dependent upon each worker for the story of salvation. It ought to startle you.

These workers do their work in 21 organized churches and at 77 out stations: places of religious meeting. There are 2,318 communicants. Of this number 343 were added during 1902. This was an increase during the year of nearly 17 1/2 per cent. Besides these members there are 2,324 adherents of the Presbyterian Church.

Of the total number of communicants, 1401 are in North Brazil. The average attendance upon the services of the Church in North Brazil was 1400, besides two stations which made no report in this respect. Our home churches might get a profitable lesson from the fidelity of these Brazilian Presbyterians in their attendance upon the services of the sanctuary.

In North Brazil the 1401 members contributed $2,112 to all causes during the year, or an average of $1.50 per member. When we stop to think what sacrifices this meant in nearly every case, it ought to make many of our people at home blush to think of the little they have done.

Our missionaries in Brazil are hard working men and women as indeed all of our missionaries are. Here is the report of one of them for last year: 1. During the year there were distributed 2,432 books; these included Bibles, New Testaments, gospels, tracts and other books. 2. Additions by baptism, 42 adults and 86 children. 3. Contributions for the year, $975. Few of our workers at home can show as proportionately good results.

Our committee in making its annual report says as to the needs of the work in Brazil: "We need to assist the Church in Northern Brazil to develop its educational work, so that the native force needed to evangelize the field can be trained on the ground. The cost of sending a candidate for the ministry from any of the points in Northern Brazil to Sao Paulo is prohibitory, and when they are sent they find the fields that are open to them in Southern Brazil more attractive than their own home fields and are tempted not to return to Northern Brazil. There is great need for a boarding school for the sons of our protestant believers in Southern Brazil. At Campinas we have a building and grounds for such a school and a competent teacher should be sent at the earliest day to re-open that work."

A Bible Study of the Two Obstacles between Man and Heaven. Part II. The Moral Obstacle.

Brief notice has been previously taken of this exposition of the moral law, and it is beyond question the most incisive on record. And it is a circumstance perhaps worthy of notice, as indicating that, in undertaking to fully meet the exalted and exacting requirements of this holy law of God as thus expounded, he was drawn and actuated by love, the name of the Father is mentioned in it thirteen times; whereas in the whole of the Old Testament Scriptures God is spoken of as Father only seventeen times. When but twelve he was absorbed by his Father's business, and the language of the Psalmist was the breath of his life,

"O, how love I thy law!

It is my meditation all the day."

—Ps. 119:97.

On Tuesday before the Friday of his crucifixion, which was his last appearance in public, and it was in the courts of the Temple, after he had made such unanswerable responses to the hostile questionings of the Herodians, the Pharisees, and the Sadducees as to silence them, a lawyer, who had been listening to the controversy, stepped forward and asked him the important but difficult and unsettled question. "What commandment is the first of all?" Jesus answered, "The first is, Hear, O Israel!—Jehovah our God is one Jehovah; and thou shalt love Jehovah thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. The second is this: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these." And when Jesus saw that he accepted the answer without quibbling, he said unto him, in view of his open-minded candor in receiving the truth; "Thou art not far from the Kingdom" (Deut. vi:4; Mark. xii:28-34). One of the Evangelists records the added remark, well worth preserving, "On these two commandments the whole law hangeth, and the prophets."

It is not practicable to pursue this topic farther at his time. It is seen that at the opening and at the closing of the record of the Saviour's public ministry, the moral law of God was conspicuously before his mind. Even his baptism numbered him legally with the transgressors. The intervening record presents much of like import, as in his answer to the young ruler about keeping the commandments, but distinguishing as ever between the letter and the spirit, and indicating the superiority of faith in himself to faith in riches. The law is appealed to to convince him of sin and helplessness when understood aright, and not as the way of life.

Jesus' ministry was among the Israelites who had been taught a knowledge of the true God, and of his written law; but Paul was commissioned to bear the message of salvation from sin to the Gentiles, and he based his teachings on identically the same foundation of the moral law as did Jesus. He teaches the very doctrine of the evangelist in setting forth the life-work of Christ, that "sin is lawlessness." He writes the Romans, "There is no respect of persons with God"—the true God, before whom he arraigns them as sinners. "For as many as have sinned without the (written) law shall also perish without the (written) law: and as many as have sinned under the (written) law shall be judged by the (written) law. When Gentiles that have not the (written) law do by nature the things of the (written) law, these, not having the (written) law, are the law unto themselves, in that they show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness therewith, and their thoughts one with another accusing or else excusing them."

In a word, it is the same law in two languages—The Conscience and the Moral Law—as it is written in the heart and as it is written in the Bible. Jews and Gentiles are under the same law of God. Any lawlessness as tested aright by either of these standards, is sin and requires forgiveness and cleansing. This is the gospel of Paul, and this is the gospel of Jesus. It is identically the same gospel, and each announces the same deliverance from the same law. In each all are sinners: In each the blood or cross of Jesus, the Son cleanseth us—Jew and Gentile—from all sin, and in each "if we confess our sins, he is faithful and righteous to forgive our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." In both the love of souls and the love of God, the hatred of sin and of Satan, are alike conspicuous as the prime, internal motive force of attraction and repulsion.

They who separate Paul from Christ as a teacher of the Gospel are guilty of divorcing what God has joined together as one. "For to me to live is Christ" (Phil. i:21). "For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; or whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's" (Rom. xiv:8).

Paul received his commission as an apostle directly from Christ (Gal. i:1). He had about half a dozen interviews with Christ, and received his gospel directly from him: "For neither did I receive it from man, nor was I taught it from man, but it came to me through revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal. i:12). Paul's gospel was not second hand, but as directly from Christ as the gospel on record in the evangelists, to say the least. This is beyond question if Paul was a truthful and honest man. No inspired writer was more perfectly the mouth-piece of Jesus Christ than was Paul. Back from Paul to Christ! is the slogan of reckless presumption, and is about as senseless as would be back from Jesus Christ to God!

The Saviour commends the Jews for searching the Scriptures (Jno. v:39) because they "bear witness" of himself. Addressing the disciples on the way to Emmaus, who were utterly despondent over the crucifixion, he said: "O foolish men and slow of heart to believe in all that prophets have spoken! Behooved it not the Christ—the Messiah—to suffer these things and to enter into his glory? And beginning from Moses and from all the prophets he interpreted to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself" (Luke xxiv:25-27). Very soon after, on that same evening, he appeared to "the eleven" whilst the disciples from Emmaus were relating to them their interview with the risen Christ, and having given them convincing evidence of his identification he repeated his appeal to Moses and the other Scriptures and added: "Thus it is written, that the Christ—the Messiah—should suffer and rise again from the dead the third day, and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name unto all the nations, beginning from Jerusalem." In the calm light of his resurrection sojourn of forty days, with the vision of his complete earthly career vividly in view, he reminds them that what had occurred was what he had told them, whilst with them, must take place in fulfillment of what Moses and the other Scriptures had foretold concerning himself. He had not been taken by surprise, nor was he in the least disconcerted, but ever true to his mission as Jesus, he enjoins them to publish the gospel of deliverance from sin through or in his name unto all the nations" (Luke xxiv:47).

Deliverance from sin is deliverance from the guilt of lawlessness under a broken law and from idwelling lust which begets sin. Law was the back bone of the old Scriptures that testified of the Christ—the Messiah—who was to come and to "bare the sin of many" and open the fountain in the house of David for the cleansing of sin and uncleanness; and the law is the vertebral column of the gospel.

"What a gladness in the glory of the better land to know That some poor, waiting, longing, doubting, fearing souls below,

In our gracious human loving, we the love of God did show."

A Protestant View of Leo XIII.

Pope Leo XIII came to be universally regarded as a man. Roman Catholics, of course, always so regard him. They sincerely believed that his selection as Pope was due to the influence of the Spirit of God in the conclave of Cardinals who elected him. Among Protestants, he made upon Roman Catholics an impression of goodness or spirituality or saintliness second to that of no other pontiff and greater than that of many another. But his status in Protestantism or in the non-Catholic world was more significant than in the papal office. Thanks, in part, to the simplicity and openness of his mind, and, in other part, to the increasing respect and kindness of the mind of the race, Pope Leo was respected, esteemed and admired by Protestants to a greater degree than any of his predecessors in the office. John Henry Newman, among Catholics, is said alone to have shared, in the two centuries which the Pope lived, on even terms with him, the veneration of the non-Catholic world. The goodness of the man is the admission of all. That admission is a proof that he was good—eminently good. The goodness of the world may be deceived about a character, but it cannot be.

He put his goodness in the front not only because it was there, but because he would have put such a quality at the front in any estimate of qualities which might have made, or in any summary of another's character, which he might have set forth. In itself, goodness is that which on earth creates for the man the estate which will carry into the heavens. It is not the synonym of greatness, but it is the savor of it and the superior of it. It is that on which and for which the Master of the world looks. The rest under the Divine Lights is but "the ether and prunella," except as it may be used for the uplift of man and for the glory of God. All questions about other Popes aside, the goodness of the man who religiously reigned as Leo XIII was not only unmistakable and undeniable, and it was not only universally admitted, but it was also universally acclaimed. We are aware that it is sometimes referred to as a quality in which any one can excel, and on that account it is under rated. But it is not under rated by those who appraise standards aright. He from whom Christianity takes its name put goodness in a place supreme and unique. They who follow Him follow Him near or afar off according as they do or do not so rate

We shall not analyze or subdivide the quality. That is the theologians or psychologists or philosophers or physicians to do. Goodness, the quality as instinctive to the child as it is evident to the wisest and most learned, is injured and weakened by analysis the same as the perfume of a flower, the silence of the woods, the blandness of the air or the scientific examination of a mother's love. Goodness in itself is as all-embracing and as all-encasing as the atmosphere. It is the spirit of our thought about God. It states and is God Himself. That idea of the Divine, flawlessly incarnate in Jesus Christ, and making Him not only the target and the anthesis, but best of all the Forgiver, the Redeemer from them, is also the one which idealizes life and immortalizes man in proportion as man can embody and outpour it in his own life. The goodness of Leo XIII was apparent only made the goodness of Leo XIII apparent and effective. The quality was in him without station. He was station, exalted as it was, shed less luster on the quality than the quality shed on it. The triple crown was something which he could put on or off. The quality of goodness was resident, regnant and radiant in him and is inseparable from him. And all the world came to know this and to rejoice in it. That was the greatest fact of his great reign.

We not only take it that all other facts were lesser in their moral rating, but were lesser in their mental value and power. He was very learned. He was very patient. He was very wise. He was very firm. He was very consistent. But there were and are his equals in these respects. He made his learning the handmaid of the goodness of his purposes. He made his wisdom the servant of the benignity of his designs. He made his patience the armor in which he defended himself from misrepresentation, and serenely awaited the dissipation of prejudice and of passion. Thus, all his qualities, his firmness, consistency, courage, all became the panoply, so to speak, of his inherent goodness. Richelieu was his superior, we presume, in the arts of diplomacy, though this Leo was a great diplomat. But how tiny and tinsel Richelieu seems beside him! Bismarck was more than his peer in sheer force, and quite his equal in intellectual tenacity, but the gruff sage of Friedrichsruhe was himself overcome by the quiet power and the moral persistence of the "shadowy particle" of the Vatican. We do not know of any being of modern times in whom character came to a more exalted and to a more undisputed coronation than in this Pope, unless it be George Washington. And Washington himself owes something to the Homeric tendency of the world to idealize and heroize, say once in half a thousand years, some one man, with whom to feed and justify the worshipping instinct of the race. This Pope in his own lifetime owed nothing to this instinct. He owed nothing to aloofness, to distance in time or to identification with a unique part for a country or for a race. He was the latest of many Popes. He was constantly in evidence. He was constantly in contact and in conflict with political rulers, and with parties or factions in his own communion. He was constantly felt and seen in functions, conclaves, consistories and councils. Discount and depreciation had constant opportunity for their work upon him. They could take away nothing from him. And this fact was due and is due to the simple, transparent goodness of the man, a goodness greater than his greatness, and the greatest part of that greatness itself.

It is this which makes his illness a world sorrow. It is this which will make his death, which cannot apparently be long averted, a world loss. It is this which has made his long reign quite as much a power for all religion as for that compartment of it of which he has been the head. The spiritual sovereign of the first and, therefore, of the oldest and of admittedly the largest division of the Kingdom of God, organized on the earth, his life has been simple music set to noble words. In the tone has been no discord. The theme has been that of his Master: On earth Peace, and to men Good-will.

When we reflect what would have been the measure and the meaning of baseness or of bitterness or of selfishness or of over iniquity in his case, our obligation to his excellence, our debt to his goodness, as a world, as a race, can be suggested. But it can only be suggested. We know that all faith was made better and stronger because he was a man of faith. We know that all prayer, whether by direct response or reflex action, was made finer and more calming and more qualifying, because he was a man of prayer. We know that love and truth and gentleness and charity were exalted in and by the example which he set of blessing those who cursed him, of forgiving those who injured him and of doing good unto them who spitefully used and persecuted him. It is given unto all of us to follow him, as we can, in the things in which he followed Christ. But it was given unto him to follow his Master on a plane level to the observation of the entire world, and with an effect of influence upon all of it.

We speak not of his reign, that is for historians. We speak not of his policy, that is for statesmen or theologians. We speak not of his Church, that is for devotees to commend or for sectarians to rend. We speak for those who are large enough to recognize that religion is the greatest force in the world, and that its subdivisions are the great factors in that greatest force; for those who recognize that morally, spiritually and historically the Church of Rome is among the greatest facts and factors in existence, and that the head of it is the supreme exponent of an unequalled human lordship of the conscience and of the heart. Speaking thus, from a height above all disputes of a polemical sort, we are glad to be able to acknowledge the kingship of character which is the kingship of goodness in this man, and to believe that all non-Catholicism, as well as all Catholicism, will be a sincere mourner at his bier when the silver cord shall be loosened and the golden bowl shall be broken, when the day shall break, when the shadows shall flee away, when he shall know as he is known and when the white flower of a blameless life and of a pure purpose shall expand into the eternal fruitage of a heavenly felicity in the songs and in the service of the sons of light and of the Sun of Righteousness.—Brooklyn Eagle.

The Proposed Presbyterian University at Atlanta.

By Rev. J. W. Walden, D. D.

A full and authoritative statement concerning the proposed University at Atlanta is called for, in order that there may be no misapprehensions in the mind of the Church at large, and especially of the Synods directly concerned. The following from the Atlanta Journal of June 19, will explain the exact situation, and will reveal the aim and spirit of those who have been seeking to promote this movement:

"To the Synods of Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, South Carolina and Florida:

"Fathers and Brethren: The undersigned were appointed by the Synod of Georgia, at its last session in 1901, a board of trustees, to establish a male college within the bounds of Synod.

"While taking the first steps towards carrying out the order of Synod, it came to our ears, that a combination of Southwestern Presbyterian University and Columbia Theological Seminary, as a University, to be located in Atlanta, might be effected, provided Atlanta Presbyterians would raise $250,000 for housing the proposed institution.

"Immediately we made known to Synod what we had heard.

"Synod promptly decided such a plan to be desirable if feasible, and ordered us as a board to pause in our work, until it could be ascertained if Atlanta would raise this amount.

This action was taken at a called meeting of Synod in May, 1902.

"At the regular session of Synod, November, 1902, the same action was taken, only the 1st of April, 1903, was set as a limit, after which, should the plan fail, we were to go ahead in our efforts to establish a Synodical college.

"As is well known, the Presbyterians of Atlanta, assisted by the citizens generally, were successful in securing bona fide subscriptions for the amount named, and the committee having the matter in charge so informed our board. This committee consisted of T. H. Rice, S. M. Inman, J. R. Gray, J. K. Orr, Hoke Smith and Joel Hurt, to whom all subscriptions were made payable as trustees.

"Acting in the name of the Synod of Georgia, and after mature consideration, we hereby overture your venerable bodies, each of you respectively, to appoint two ministers and one ruling elder as your representative to meet in Atlanta Wednesday, December 9th, 1903, 10 a. m., Central Church, in an educational conference of Synods, in order that conclusion may be reached.

1. As to the feasibility of the combination of the two named institutions, and, 2, as to the plan by which such combination may be arrived at, if found feasible, the report of this conference to be made to adjourned meetings of the Synods, in January, 1904.

"To this overture we invoke your prayerful consideration, and we earnestly bespeak your favorable action thereon.

"Respectfully, Board of trustees of the Synod of Georgia for establishing a college.

J. W. Walden, Chairman;
C. C. Carson,
L. G. Henderson,
D. W. Braimen,
C. D. Montgomery,
B. I. Hughes.

In connection with this statement of the situation, a few points ought to be stressed, in justice to all parties and as bearing upon the issue.

1. This movement had its origin in the Synod of Georgia in an avowed purpose to found a denominational college. Atlanta's offer to give the $250,000 was distinctly understood in all newspaper articles, in all public meetings, and in all approaches to private individuals, as the making of a gift to Presbyterians for Presbyterian University. Indeed, before any appeal was made to the public at large, the Presbyterians conducted a campaign, under the leadership of Dr. T. H. Rice, in the interest of Presbyterian Education. The appeal for the $150,000 given by Presbyterians was made, to the Christian motive, and to Presbyterian zeal. A week of prayer was spent over the movement at its incipency. When Dr. Rice made the statement to the public, that the University would not be "offensively sectarian," he did so to correct a popular misapprehension, that only Presbyterians could attend the University and that it would only educate ministers.

2. When the Synod of Georgia expressed its approval of the proposed combination, there was not even a suspicion, that the Southwestern Presbyterian University would not be in favor of it. When later on, the Synod endorsed it again, Synod had no knowledge of any official objections. Indeed, from many quarters the friends and alumni of the Southwestern Presbyterian University expressed themselves as being so in sympathy with the plan, that the objections that were made by individuals seemed strikingly exceptional and purely personal and local.

3. No official objection was made till the last of March, a few days before the subscription of the $250,000 was completed, when the Board of Southwestern Presbyterian University called in extra session to elect a Chancellor, expressed its disapproval of the plan. It seemed to be true then, (and it still seems to be true) that the Directors, some of them at least, failed to understand the facts of the movement in Atlanta, or to appreciate the motives of those leading in the movement.

4. From that date, April 1st, to June 18th, nothing was done towards furthering the movement, except to make statements and give explanations in an unofficial way. The Atlanta Committee did inform the Board of Directors of Columbia Theological Seminary of what had been done, but did not ask for any action. Indeed, request was made that no action be taken.

5. The Synodical Board of Trustees were requested by the Atlanta Brethren, to take the matter in hand as previously authorized by Synod, and did so at their first meeting, June 16th. They did this in the face of the adverse action of the Southwestern Presbyterian University Board, not because they were disposed to ignore this Board, but because friends and alumni of the Southwestern Presbyterian University out of, as well as in, the controlling Synod have expressed themselves as having a different judgment in the promises from the Board and as not being satisfied till the question of feasibility, legal and moral, has been more thoroughly and more largely exploited and examined.

6. In view of the foregoing facts that brought us to the place where we felt called upon to take some action as a Board, representing the Synod of Georgia, there seemed to be a call for the very action which we have taken, as set forth above. Of course if the controlling Synods are convinced that insurmountable obstacles, legal and moral, are in the way, and do not desire any farther investigation of the matter, they will so express it, in answer to our overture to them, at their coming sessions, and that will end the matter.

That which has moved us, and those whom we represent is the strong desire to avail ourselves of the magnificent opportunity now held out, to secure a great Presbyterian University for our Southern Church under the most favorable and hopeful auspices, at a strategic point, from which the Mississippi Valley, and the Gulf States, and the South Atlantic States, can be easily and effectively served. The Fathers who founded the Southwestern Presbyterian Union intended to plan such an institution. Its location at Clarksville, was accident, and not an essential to their purpose. For the Charter of the Institution reads: "The object and scope of the Institution proposed, shall be to found a school of instruction in the various liberal and professional studies, and in such special and polytechnic arts and studies, as may be deemed necessary, and to be under the patronage of the Presbyterian Church in the United States."

What the fathers sought to do, we are endeavoring to accomplish, by offering to the Southwestern Presbyterian Union, a position and power that will enable it not only to serve a part of the Church, but to serve that part in a better way, and besides to serve the whole of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, in a way that both the demands of the times and the Church at large are calling for. We cannot resist the strong persuasion that were Drs. Palmer, Waddell, Lynn and others, on the field and in the land, they would hail with grateful joy this consummation of their early aims and aspirations, for Southern Presbyterian University education.

And all this, let it be said in conclusion, we have done under legal advice from a competent source, as to the feasibility of the removal of a large portion of the endowment of the Southwestern Presbyterian University, in which judgment many friends and alumni in the Controlling Synods have expressed themselves as coinciding, and yet with respectful recognition of the differing opinions.

Such a conference as we propose, we feel sure will be the best plan for settling all the questions of difference in a broad and binding way.

It will do the Southwestern Presbyterian University good and not harm. It will satisfy all parties. It will enable us to avail ourselves of whatever Providence means to give us, out of a movement so strikingly spontaneous and seemingly of God, from the beginning and all along the way.

The Proposed Presbyterian University.

A brief history of the Twentieth Century Educational Movement in the Synod of Georgia.

Facts are necessary to a wholesome discussion and an intelligent conclusion. Having been identified from its inception with the educational movement in the Synod of Georgia, which has culminated in the overture recently adopted by the Board of Trustees, to the seven Synods, looking to the feasibility of consolidating the Southwestern Presbyterian University of Clarksville, Tenn., and the Theological Seminary of Columbia, S. C., in a great Presbyterian University at Atlanta, Ga., I am persuaded to trace as briefly as possible the history of this movement in the Synod of Georgia.

This movement may be appropriately termed "The Romance of History" so far as the Twentieth Century Educational enterprise in the Southern Presbyterian Church is concerned.

About three years ago Rev. W. M. Hunter, then the Evangelist of the Presbytery of Savannah, became convinced of the importance of a Presbyterian High School to be established and controlled by the Presbytery. Through his zealous and sanguine efforts the Presbytery was persuaded to undertake the project. To this end the purpose of the Presbytery was announced and various committees were given the opportunity to bid for the location of the school.

The Evangelist succeeded in awakening substantial interest on the part of the citizens of Boxley, Ga., in the proposed school. He appeared before the Presbytery, which was to determine the issue, armed with a petition and with a subscription from the citizens of Boxley amounting to about $4,000. Out of about fifty names on the list there were two or three Presbyterian signatures. The small number of Presbyterian names was not due to apathy, but to non-residence. The citizens wanted a school, and were not only willing but anxious for it to be under Presbyterian control.

This petition gave definite direction to the enterprise. The Board of Trustees was appointed to prosecute vigorously, and then to open the institution at the earliest possible date. To this end the Board called for "bids," giving ample time for the mustering of forces. The writer returned to Valdosta and immediately set to work to capture the prize. The prevailing feature of this work was face to face encounter and heart to heart talks. It could not be done without the assistance of the citizens, regardless of church affiliation. The mayor was induced to sign a call for a mass-meeting to consider the overture from the Presbytery. At this meeting I outlined the plan of the Presbytery. At the conclusion of my remarks the proverbial ambition of Valdosta asserted itself. One of the citizens, Mr. W. L. Converse enthusiastically exclaimed "I subscribe $1,000 for a college for Valdosta." This offer immediately, so far as Valdosta was concerned, transferred us from a High School to a college basis. Our interest did not fail to "provoke others unto good works." The Blackshear people went to work with commendable determination, stimulated by the reports from Valdosta. Soon another mass-meeting was called and at this gathering of representative citizens $20,000 was offered for a college, and six citizens were appointed to prosecute the offer before the Board of Trustees, soon to be in session at Waycross, Ga. This being a sort of preliminary meeting the matter was not decided. The board was under instructions to establish a high school and hence could not consider the college proposition. A majority of the board seemed to think the high school proposition more promising of success under the control of a small Presbytery. Valdosta withdrew from the contest for the high school and held to the overture for a college. Boxley and Blackshear were formidable rivals for the high school and the prize was eventually awarded to Blackshear.

What to do with the twenty thousand dollar offer from Valdosta became a burning question with the Presbytery. The session of Presbytery drew near. The Synod was also to convene soon in Valdosta. One of the brethren said in Presbytery "Synod will laugh at us if we go before them with the ludicrous offer of twenty thousand dollars for a college." As the debate waxed warm and interesting this same brother made an eloquent appeal for the proposed overture to go before Synod saying in substance "This is the largest offer that the Presbytery has ever confronted and we should follow on to know the will of the Lord." The overture was adopted. The offer to the Presbytery of Savannah from Valdosta was transferred to the Synod of Georgia. Rev. T. G. Fair, D. D., Major J. O. Varnedoe (one of my elders) and myself were appointed a committee to prosecute the overture before the Synod of Georgia.

Dr. R. C. Reed, Chairman of the Synod's Twentieth Century Educational Committee read his report which contemplated the raising of $75,000 by the Synod to be distributed among the institutions already established and wholly or partially under the control of the Synod. The brethren were, at least, not fully aware of the enthusiastic and fortified committee appointed by our Presbytery. And now the history of the college movement begins to assume definite proportions. Our committee was given the privileges of the floor. It was my pleasure to make the initial address. I was followed by Dr. Fair and Major Varnedoe successively. One of my former elders, Dr. W. P. Williams, of Blackshear was a guest in my house. In this guest-chamber, far from the noise of battle, we had together prepared a resolution to be offered at the opportune moment as a substitute for Dr. Reed's report. In brief this substitute was "That the Synod of Georgia undertake to establish jointly with the Synods of Alabama and Florida, a male college to be located central to the three Synods. The word "central" had primary reference to Valdosta. The resolution, after one of the most enthusiastic hours that I have ever enjoyed in the Synod of Georgia, was heartily and I think unanimously adopted.

Board of Trustees was elected, consisting of one member from each of the six Presbyteries. We went to work with a vim. We arranged for a conference with the committees of the Synods of Alabama and Florida, at Montgomery, Ala. The Florida committee was represented through correspondence, giving approval of the joint effort. The Alabama brethren did not have power to act, so they decided to call a meeting of Synod to consider the proposition. The proposition was courteously but emphatically declined, the Alabama brethren thinking it wise to establish a Synodical college.

Again the question—What to do? The situation was somewhat complicated. It was decided by the Board to call a meeting of Synod and report what we had done, or rather, what we had failed to do. We thought that we were meeting to secure additional instructions and to make pronounced and strenuous efforts for a Synodical college. On the eve of the meeting of the Board of Trustees for the purpose of adopting a report to be made the same evening to the called session of Synod, suggestion from eminent sources outside the Synod of Georgia came into the possession of our Chairman. These suggestions were that the effort of the Synod of Georgia be directed toward the consolidation of the institutions of Clarksville and Columbia in Atlanta, Ga. These suggestions constituted an unofficial but impressive overture. At this critical juncture did Providence indicate the course? What response should the Synod of Georgia make to this probable obligation imposed by distinguished brethren of the Synods wherein the two institutions mentioned were located? This information we thought that Synod ought to have. Synod received it and instructed the Board to "pause" in the original scheme until additional information could be received. We fully obeyed. We were guilty of a work of supererogation. Not only did we "pause" but we came to a full stop. We needed the rest. This was in May. During the summer Dr. Walden and Dr. Rice felt some strong pulses, indicative of large and influential Presbyterian hearts.

In November Synod was to meet in North Avenue Presbyterian Church of Atlanta. Again our Board met. We asked for additional time to "pause." And here begins the Atlanta movement, one that I am persuaded has been more or less misunderstood. A popular impression seems to have gone abroad that Atlanta with her characteristic zeal and prodigious ambition, initiated the movement. Not so. The reverse is true. In this particular Atlanta is blameless. The Board of Trustees and the Synod knew that such a stupendous enterprise was contingent upon the good will and the proverbial generosity of the citizens of Atlanta. The Synod of Georgia is responsible for the Atlanta movement. With one or two exceptions the Synod voted for the Board of Trustees to make an effort to raise two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the purpose of housing the consolidated institutions. In order not to delay the original plan of the Synod, and also to stimulate Atlanta to her best endeavor the Board was limited to April 1st, to determine the Atlanta feature. Rev. J. W. Walden, D. D., Chairman of the Board and Rev. T. H. Rice, D. D., Pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, Atlanta, made first a personal canvass in order to secure the substantial attachment of representative Presbyterians. Largely through the intense zeal of Dr. Rice the undertaking was consummated, through a series of incidents remarkable even for unique and incomparable Atlanta. The closing mass-meeting in the Grand Opera House will be for years the most inspiring occasion in the memory of the oldest inhabitant.

All honor to Atlanta! Through her as an instrumentality, the Synod of Georgia is enabled to make the overture, which involves more for the future of the Church than the wildest imagination can forestall. We are standing on the bank of the Rubicon. Shall we continue to stand or shall we cross the turbulent stream? Can we refuse to utilize the munificent offer. Being the Secretary of the Board of Trustees this history may be considered official information.

Personally I was in sympathy with the original movement and spent hours of earnest toil in the hope that a Presbyterian college might be located in Valdosta, the metropolis of the most rapidly developing section in the South. For some wise reason both the high school and the college have failed to respond to my original and natural desire. My interest, however, from the very beginning has transcended any local considerations. I shall be content with the wisdom of our seven Synods.

Let us hear through the church papers from the brethren. "A condition not a theory confronts us."

The Twentieth Century Movement has been sweeping, comprehensive, almost revolutionary in superb achievement. The Synod of Georgia has caught the inspiration and has flung out her banner to the breezes of heaven. Seven Synods of our Southern Assembly—seven—the scriptural number of completeness and perfection—seven—the number of colors that make the beautiful rainbow of promise, are to give earnest consideration to the magnificent possibility of a great university.

In God's purpose the day may not be far distant when we shall see a mammoth Southern Presbyterian University, an imposing and impressive reality.

Such an institution the Church needs and the logic of Presbyterianism demands.

Charles C. Carson, Sec'y Board of Trustees.

A Notable Occasion.

Dear Mr. Editor:

It was my privilege last Sunday in Reidsville to take part in the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the pastorate of our beloved friend and brother, the Rev. D. I. Craig. Spite of the nearly two hundred chairs that lined the aisles and were placed in every available spot to add to the seating capacity of the spacious edifice, numbers had to stand outside unable to enter. Services in other churches were suspended and all Reidsville, it seemed, had turned out, regardless of age, sex or denomination, to testify its love and admiration for Bro. Craig. After the sermon a big experience meeting was held and from ministers and members of his own and other denominations came spontaneous and most loving tributes to his worth and usefulness. In telling of the good he had done to them strong men faltered and broke down, overcome with emotion. It was a memorable and touching scene, honorable alike to the good people of Reidsville and to their eminent fellow-citizen. For twenty-five years he has borne among them the white flower of a blameless life, and how many homes and hearts its fragrance has sweetened and blest eternity alone can reveal. If the spirits of the saints in glory are permitted to revisit the scenes and friends of their earthly life, then surely the house that day was bright with the presence of those who had gone up thence, and who from beholding the King in His beauty had returned to behold again the face of that beloved pastor whose ministrations had been their guide in life, their comfort in death and are to-day their grateful memory in heaven.

A notable feature of the day's worship and enjoyment was the rarely beautiful music rendered by Mr. Francis Womack and his accomplished choir.

Bro. Craig is in the prime of life with not improbably his best work yet before him. Long may it be before the Saviour calls him to that upper realm where instant vision shall be perfect and immortal labor shall be immortal rest.

Wanted: A Home Department D. D.

My dear Mr. Editor:

I have been greatly exercised in my mind lately about these "Home Department" things. I notice that we have "Home Department" Sunday-schools—business courses—engineering courses and such like

And some I see have secured a "Home Department" Ph. D., and it looks just as well on a letter head as if they had worked hard for three years at Johns Hopkins or Cornell to get it. Now what I want to know is, whether there is such a thing to be had as a Home Department D. D.

If so, I want to get one. It will add so much to the dignity and appearance of my letter heads. Any information therefore, that you or your readers can give me, "along this line" will be very gratefully received by me.

A Criticism and a Bribe.

My Dear Editor:

Your recent visit to Richmond, Va., for the purpose of straightening out the General Assembly and the Publication Committee seems to have set your head on one side. No one will question your right to investigate all matters connected with Publication and the Assembly nor to discuss such questions "from the standpoint of the ascertained facts and a disinterested opinion regarding these facts." But when you turn aside to malign certain members of the late General Assembly and single them out and hold them up to public ridicule, and that, too, upon what appears to be mighty slender grounds; and, furthermore, when you go out of your way to cast reflections upon the Presbyteries from which these brethren come and to exploit the Churches of which they are members for supposed niggardliness, you seem to us not only to overstep the bounds of propriety, but to trample under foot the sacred rights of justice.

What, pray, can be your excuse for characterizing two members of the Assembly, who led the opposition to the recommendation of the Publication Committee, as demagogic in methods, parsimonious in gifts, possessing mobility of mouth out of proportion to looseness of purse strings, ignorant meddlers and conscientious vandals who delight to tear down what it has cost time and brains to build up?

We modestly submit that when you use your valuable paper for such personal and objectionable criticism you transcend the limits of fair and honorable discussion and are in danger of sinking to the level of the veriest ecclesiastical demagogue. With all your investigation, elaboration and justification, one thing at least must be evident to your keen mind; namely, that the two commissioners whom you choose to ridicule did not have the Lexington Assembly by the heels nor its brains in their pockets. The mind of the church was largely made up on this matter before the Assembly met, far in advance of the mobile mouths of the Texas or Georgia contingents. They were only the occasion, not the cause. Observe the overtures from the lower courts and count the vote. You will note that we have said not a word as to the merits of your general contention, nor do we care to speak on that subject in this connection. There is a difference, however, between just criticism and unjust insinuation; and the Standard would do well to observe this distinction.

P. H. Gwinn.

Received as God's Word.

Whatever may be said as to the inspiration of the Bible, whether its very words be inspired, or whether only the writers of it were inspired, the fact is potent that the Bible makes a decided distinction between the Word of God and the word of men.

And this fact appears throughout the whole Bible. It is also clear that during the old dispensation, when the prophets and priests directly spoke to the people they invariably sought to impress their hearers with the truth that there was a marked and wide difference between what God said and what they themselves declared. When they said, "Thus saith the Lord" they wanted the people to recognize most impressively the truth that it was God himself who was dealing with them and not man. There was a great proneness then, as there is now, in many people to doubt that God did verily speak to them through human voices in the persons of the prophets; and this opposition sometimes manifested itself to the extent of persecuting the prophets because they dared to assert that it was God's word which they were delivering to them. The true prophets did not complain when their own word was disputed and rejected; they were prepared to meet denials of their own authority; but it was with a much different feeling when they confidently asserted that a message which came to them from the divine Spirit was God's Word, and not their own. If the people rejected such a message the responsibility upon them was fraught with fearful gravity. And the same thing was true of Christ's inspired apostles; or, if we speak of them simply as Christ's chosen messengers of his will, the principle holds true. Back of them was the authority of Almighty God, confirmed by Christ.

Note these words of Paul's in 1 Thess. 2:13. R. V.:

"We thank God without ceasing that when ye received from us the word of the message, even the Word of God, ye accepted not as the word of men, but, as it is in truth, the Word of God." And bear in mind that it was not a written message which Paul then referred to; it was the message which God gave him to speak to the people and hence it was the Word of God. And Paul was exceedingly thankful to God that those persons had accepted the message as God's word, in contrast with the word of men. And observe that those believers did not need "the crucible of criticism" to decide for them whether or not it was the Word of God. In the simplicity of a reverential faith they received the word and this was one chief reason for their rapid growth in faith, spiritual wisdom and Christian manhood. They get the most good out of the Bible who ardently accept it as the Word of God; and ministers are most effective when they sincerely present the Bible as being God's word indeed.

C. H. Wetherbe.

Helps by the Way.

A brother in Missouri writes:

We ministers need all the "helps by the way" we can get, and a suggestion from one quarter sometimes inspires another. The recorded incident did me great good. A few days after I had buried one of the lady members of my Church, I received the following letter from her husband:

"Permit me to thank you for the words of comfort bestowed upon myself and family in our sad bereavement: and I wish to add the enclosed as a mere token of our appreciation of the same.

Very sincerely, ———.

The "enclosed" was a check for ten dollars. The money was appreciated but more the kind words. How many many services we pastors render, which are taken as of course by our people, and those of the community to whom we render like services, for which we never receive even a kindly word of "appreciation."

The Wind.

O wind, world-breath, blow far and free!

Reveal by myriad, soulful chords,

Man's lineage and his destiny—

His spirit's birth,—in speechless words.

From what far fountain flows your might,

Trade-winds of God, that sweep and fan,

In viewless, swift, mysterious flight,

The spirit of each living man?

To what abysses vast, ungauged,

Plunge all your subtle clans of air?

Where rest your eagle-circlings caged,

Whose Hand holds you in thralldom there?

From God ye come—to God ye go!

And where He wills, ye bend your flight.

Spirit is born,—O winds that blow,—

Born of the Spirit Infinite!

rs being from Mecklenburg and Iredell. Mr. J. A. Butler, superintendent of the schools in the latter county, has co-operated very cordially with Supt. Cochrane, in his efforts to establish the institute on a satisfactory basis. The enthusiasm that those connected with the work have shown leads to the conviction that this first session will by no means be the last. The large, spacious campus with its shady walks and green lawns and the college buildings all open for any purposes needed makes Davidson an ideal place for a summer session.

Rev. Dr. D. J. Brimm, formerly of Columbia, assisted by Mr. Cosby, will have charge of the Presbyterian High School at Rock Hill, the coming year.

REIDSVILLE.—Sunday, July 5th, 1903, was a red-letter day in the history of Reidsville Presbyterianism, being the 25th anniversary of the pastorate of the Rev. D. J. Smith. On the 1st Sabbath in July, 1878, this beloved minister began his labors with this people and has been to them through all these years a loving and tender shepherd and faithful teacher and exponent of the truths of the gospel. It was fitting that they should give expression to their appreciation of him in a formal way and invite their brethren of the other churches to join them in doing honor to one whose life as a minister and a man, has been a blessing to the town. Better were the words of gratitude and praise spoken last Sunday in the presence of this faithful soldier of the Cross than all the funeral eloquence and eulogies that may mark the close of his earthly labors.

The services were very beautiful and impressive. The principal address was delivered by the Rev. Egbert W. Smith, D. D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Greensboro. Two motives, he said, impelled his presence. The wise man had said, "Thine own friend, and thy neighbor's friend, forsake not." He remembered the first sermon he ever heard Mr. Craig preach. "It was in my father's church in Greensboro one Sunday night twenty-three years ago. Though many sermons I have since heard have faded from my memory, I remember this one, the text and the treatment. It made a deep impression upon my mind." Dr. Smith spoke in the warmest appreciation of

Mr. Craig as a friend, minister and Presbyter. He had said it behind his back that he had never been thrown into the Church courts without having additional cause to appreciate his wisdom, gentleness and spirituality. He was the soul of courtesy, but bold as a lion in contending for principle. As a minister he had not sought wealth or applause, but was content to tread the path his Master had. Ten-elevenths of Christ's life on earth was spent in the quiet village of Nazareth performing the common duties of life. One need not be prominent to be great. Dr. Smith's address was exceedingly happy, as was also his prayer, in which he especially invoked God's blessing upon the pastor's devoted wife and children. When Dr. Smith concluded Mr. E. F. Hall, who had charge of the exercises, invited the brethren of other churches to add a word. Rev. W. P. Ware, Mr. C. J. Mathews, Mr. P. H. Wilkerson, Rev. E. P. Ellington and Mr. Z. H. Neal responded in the order named. All paid a high tribute to Mr. Craig's consistent life, his unflinching courtesy, and his sympathetic spirit in times of trial and sorrow. Mr. Ware spoke of him as our pastor," saying all claimed him. Mr. Ellington spoke eloquently of Mr. Craig's words of sympathy for him in a recent trial. He had heard it said that everybody in Reidsville envied Mr. Craig when there was a funeral to be conducted. That fact spoke volumes for their confidence in his religion.

Mr. Craig responded with much feeling, saying he appreciated the kind things said of him, but took no credit to himself. He felt the praise of his brethren was extravagant. "If I am anything, by the grace of God I am what I am." He could say in sincerity that he loved his brethren, regardless of church lines. He read a summary of his work of the past twenty-five years.

The services were concluded with the communion.

Rev. D. Vance Price, pastor of Main Street Methodist Church, who had hoped to take part in the services, was too unable to do so, though present the greater part of the time.

Rev. W. P. Ware and Rev. E. P. Ellington, of the Methodist and Baptist Churches, respectively, occupied seats on the platform.

The New Dormitory at Davidson.

Among the many improvements now in progress at Davidson, perhaps the erection of a new and modern dormitory building is the most important. A rather full description of the building will be of interest to all the friends and alumni of the college.

General Construction.—The building is beautifully located on the north edge of the campus, immediately overlooking acres of green lawn and shade trees, about three hundred feet east of the Shearer Biblical Hall. It is built of selected red brick, almost equal to the regular pressed brick in finish, and liberally trimmed with granite. Two belts of granite run around the building, and a broad cornice surmounts the front and side walls.

Not including the annexes for bathrooms, the building is nearly square, measuring fifty-eight by seventy-six feet, and three stories high, with a basement for furnace and fuel.

A solid brick wall divides the whole building into two parts, each having its own stairway and entrance. This wall has no openings and extends above the roof. Its purpose is to lessen noise, as well as to give fire protection. On the front is a porch, eighteen feet long, with cement floor and heavy pillars.

Each half of the building contains fifteen rooms, five on each floor, thus giving thirty rooms to the whole building, to accommodate sixty students. There are only five dormitories opening on each hall, and the halls, while thoroughly lighted and ventilated, have been purposely made small.

Bath rooms, etc.—Back of the building are two brick towers, running from the ground to the roof. In these are the large bathrooms, six in number, giving one to each group of five rooms. These bath rooms contain a slop-sink, a hot and cold water faucet, two closets, and a shower-bath with hot and cold water. They have cement walls and floors, and communicate with the halls by a narrow passageway. They are thoroughly ventilated, and are to be heated, as are all the halls, by steam. There is thus a well-equipped bathroom within ten or twelve steps of every room in the building.

Ventilation.—Great care has been taken in the matter of light and ventilation. Every room in the building has two large outside windows. Every outside window, except those on the third floor, has a revolving transom above it, reaching almost to the ceiling. Each door in the building has also a revolving transom opening into the central hall. As the well of the stairway extends through the roof, and ends in a large glass-covered ventilator, this gives a constant current of air from the outside windows through each room into the central hall and out at the top of the building, whenever the window and door transoms are open. The rooms on the third floor have each a regular factory ventilator set in the ceiling and extending through the roof, in addition to the transoms over the doors.

From near the floor of every room a special ventilating flue runs through the brick wall to the top of the building, terminating in a chimney, thus giving thirty ventilating flues drawing air from the floors of the rooms, in addition to the general system described above. All window-sashes, both above and below, are hung on pulleys.

The bathrooms are specially ventilated, and are in a tower outside of the main building.

The Dormitory Rooms.—Each room in the building is meant to accommodate two students, and the smallest one is about sixteen feet square, not including the closets. Every room has either one or two closets. On the wall, six feet above the floor, runs a picture shelf entirely around the room. This has a small ledge to prevent photos, etc., from slipping off, and will furnish an easy means of providing for small pictures and other ornaments. There is also a regular picture-molding near the ceiling, so that it will be easy to hang or place any ornaments without driving tacks or nails in the walls. The walls will be tinted light olive and pale green. The whole building will be heated by steam, and is already wired in anticipation of an electric plant in the near future.

To prevent or deaden any noises the floors have been most carefully constructed, with the ordinary lath and plaster of the ceiling, eight inches above this the regular flooring. All these rooms are to be furnished with single iron bedsteads, bureau, washstand, table, etc., and the new building will make a notable addition to the equipment of the college.

The constitutional requirements having been complied with, Concord Presbytery is hereby called to meet in the First Church, Concord, N. C., July 17th, at 11 o'clock, a. m., to transact the following business:

1. To act upon a petition for the organization of a Church at Harrisburg, and name the same.
2. If the way be clear, to appoint a commission and set a date for the organization of said Church.

I. A. Gilmer, Moderator.

CHARLOTTE—The Commission appointed by Mecklenburg Presbytery to organize the Seversville Church met on Sunday, June 28th. Twenty-eight members were received by letter from various Churches and the following officers were elected: Elders: Robert O. Robinson, R. E. McQuay, F. J. Redman, Richard Stewart. Deacons: W. W. Severs, L. J. Todd and J. E. McKnight. The commission met again on Sunday, July 5th. Seven members were received upon examination and one by letter. The elders and deacons elect were duly ordained and installed, thus completing the organization of the Church.

This little Church starts out with bright prospects; the building is completed practically free from debt. It is nearly carpeted and is situated in a portion of the city which has good prospects of steady growth. Arrangements will be made soon for a regular supply of the pulpit.

TEXAS

COMMERCE—We have just closed a successful meeting at this place. Dr. J. D. McLean, of Tyler, preached for twelve days in a most acceptable manner. The congregations were impressed by his familiarity with the Scriptures. He produced a "Thus saith the Lord" for every position taken.

The Church was given a spiritual uplift and nineteen members added to its communion, sixteen on profession of faith and three by letter from other denominations.

E. B. Fincher.

VIRGINIA.

The Presbytery of Roanoke will meet at New Concord Church on Tuesday, Aug. 11th, at 8 o'clock, p. m.

H. A. Brown, S. C.

PORTSMOUTH.—The First Presbyterian Church has made temporary arrangements with Rev. J. W. Staley, of Suffolk, Va., to preach at Prentis Place chapel Thursday evening.

The Church has given its pastor, Rev. A. R. Shreve, vacation during the month of August. He hopes to spend a portion of the time in the mountains of North Carolina.

Availing himself of the quiet of the mountain sojourn will seek to express in simpler language certain portions of his book, "Theology for the People," with a view to a second edition. During his absence from Portsmouth the pulpit will be supplied by Rev. Edwin Muller, D. D., of Lexington, Ky.

KENTUCKY.

BOYD.—Beginning June 22, Dr. S. Addison McElroy, of Cynthiana, preached for us at Boyers Church, Boyd County, every night throughout the week. His sermons were simple and clear presentations of the old truths, and were listened to with marked attention and interest. God's people were quickened, and souls saved. Four united with the Church on examination and were baptised. One was received by letter. The installation of pastor was to have taken place on Sunday morning, June 28th, but was postponed to the evening service, the pastor elect having been called to conduct the funeral services of a member of this congregation at Berry, Ky. Dr. S. A. McElroy preached in the morning to a full house, and after recess for lunch on the grounds conducted a communion service.

At the evening service the committee appointed by the Presbytery to install Rev. H. R. Overcash pastor of this Church met. Rev. W. T. McElroy, of Winchester, preached and presided. Rev. S. A. McElroy charged the pastor and Rev. C. A. Leonard, of Cynthiana, charged the people. The service was very impressive and was attended with close attention and interest by the members of the congregation.

This congregation recently elected Dr. F. P. Garrard and Mr. Thos. Perrin, deacon, who will be ordained and installed on the next regular preaching day, Second Sunday, July 12th, D. V. The committee appointed to install Rev. H. R. Overcash as pastor over Mt. Pleasant Church, met Sunday morning, July 5th. In the absence of Rev. W. T. McElroy appointed by Presbytery, Rev. T. Thomson, preached, presided and charged the people. Rev. H. L. Cocherham charged the pastor. Elder M. E. Nichols, of Georgetown, was also present as a member of the committee.

This is a field of great possibilities, and the pastor takes up the work, hoping to accomplish much for the Master. He has been heartily received and every week brings renewed tokens of love and appreciation.

MISSOURI.

MT. OLIVE.—This Church, of which Rev. Dudley Claggett is pastor, in connection with Longwood, was built just fifty years ago. And the congregation propose celebrating the semi-centennial by the erection of a handsome new building. The money, some $4,000, has been raised, the plans adopted, and they hope to be in their new house of worship by the close of the year.

BETHEL CHURCH.—Rev. J. E. Flow, a recent graduate of our seminary at Richmond, Va., who was secured by the H. M. Committee to supply this Church, is on the ground and expects to begin work July 5th. Bro. Flow will give all his time to this Church. Our H. M. Committee is acting wisely in giving more attention to the country churches, and securing for them the very best possible. This is one of the oldest churches in Upper Missouri Presbytery, having celebrated its sixtieth anniversary last September. It is in the heart of a fine farming community and now for the first time in its history is preaching all the time and we expect great development on all lines.

KANSAS CITY; Walrond Avenue.—Rev. N. H. Main, pastor of this Church, has been invited to address the Sabbath-school conference of the Lafayette Presbytery to be held at Lexington, Mo., the middle of July. His subject is: The Sabbath-school, its Potency as a Factor in the Work of the Church. Before occupying the pastorate of the Walrond Avenue Church, Kansas City, Bro. McCain was a member of the Lafayette Presbytery for more than ten years.

ST. JOSEPH; First Church.—Rev. Dr. W. R. Dobyns, pastor of this Church, has been attending the Conference for leaders in Sunday-schools and Young People's Societies. This Conference was held on Lookout Mountain, July 1-8.

GOWE; Walnut Grove.—These two Churches, in the Upper Missouri Presbytery, have recently been grouped together, and now there is a good prospect of having them supplied, for a while at least, by Rev. X. Ryland, of Lexington, Mo. Bro. Ryland is now at home enjoying a much needed rest after a long and useful service as an evangelist in the Synods of Missouri and Arkansas.

LAWSON.—Rev. C. P. Foreman, pastor of the Church at Plattsburg, Mo., preached here by appointment of Presbytery on Wednesday evening, July 1, and declared the pulpit vacant, Rev. R. S. Brown, their pastor, having recently resigned.

A Noble and Generous Deed.

Rev. S. L. Morris, Secretary of Home Missions, has received the largest contribution ever given by an individual to the cause of Home Missions, and possibly to any of the causes of the Assembly.

It was the handsome sum of $25,000, donated by one who on more than one occasion has manifested special interest in the great cause of Home Missions.

It was the expressed wish of the donor that this money be invested, and that the interest be used annually to supplement the gifts of the Church. This liberal donation will call forth the thanksgiving of God's people to the Supreme Giver for having put it into the heart of one of His children to render such blessed service to the Church. It will give great encouragement to this cause, which has never received hitherto proper acknowledgement of its importance on the part of the Church; and this gift will serve for many years as a balance wheel in the fluctuation of interest to keep the work up to a uniform standard.

Such munificence will perpetuate not only the memory of the giver, but continue the work of the donor on earth long after the Father hath called His child unto Himself in glory.

Coming just at the critical time when the Church is encouraged by the past success of the committee, to enlarge the sphere of operations so as to include the destitutions of the whole Church, let us hope that it is the beginning of a rising spirit of liberality which is being awakened to meet the great demands now confronting this department of the work of the Church.

Will not others assist in putting this work on a firm and satisfactory basis?

Presbyterianism Flaking Progress in the Southwest.

All Christians rejoice when Zion prospers and her tribes increase. Especially does the heart warm when good things come to the members of our Presbyterian family.

Such good things are in store just now for the Northern Presbyterian and the Cumberland Presbyterian Churches, if they unite.

Will organic union be effected? Rather ask, how can it fail?

The Cumberland Presbyterians favor it almost to a man. They are asking no concessions. They find that the new Amended Creed teaches what they have all the while believed. Many of them are much pleased with the "Brief Statement," which, though not a part of the Constitution, was ordered to be printed by the General Assembly, "for the instruction of our (their) people in the Reformed faith."

If Arminians are to be found in the C. P. Church, they may reconstruct their views, as many an Arminian has done before; or they may drop off to the Methodist Church.

In the Northern Assembly opposition is hardly to be expected. It is ever the weaker body that developed opposition to organic union; the weaker body that is afraid of being "swallowed up."

It may be taken for granted that union will be consummated. The Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., will add to its membership 200,000 souls, and acquire large Synods in Texas, Arkansas and Tennessee. Some of the Northern Synods, as Missouri and Illinois, will receive a large number of churches and ministers. Great will be the growth of zeal, power and effort.

It would be impossible to tell which Church is likely to receive the greater benefit.

I. Profit to the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

1. Their theological position clearly defined before the public. Removed is the temptation of theological novelties in order to get a footing on the narrow ground between Calvinism and Arminianism, the temptation that proved too strong for Prof. Burney.

2. No more the reproach of illiteracy. One marvels that even now such reproach should exist. The writer has known C. P. pastors in Huntersville, Ala., and Corsicana, Tex. They did not suffer by comparison with the other pastors in those cities. If other C. P. ministers are less well equipped for their work, perhaps we, too, live in glass houses and should not throw stones!

The C. P. Church is fast building and endowing colleges and theological seminaries. It is rather heavy wit, the suggestion that they are unable to comprehend the plain meaning of the Confession of Faith!

Would that every Church paper had an editor as capable as the Rev. Ira Landrith!

Once united with the scholarly Church, North, "then, if not till then," this reproach must die.

3. The enthusiasm of numbers. In a body about 1,400,000 strong.

4. The power of wealth.

5. Northern Presbyterians, moving South, will become members. In time past many of these people have come into our Southern Church, and became useful members.

Sometimes they have felt at home in their new relations; sometimes they have not. After union, the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., will be found in many parts of the South and Southwest and spreading more and more. It will rarely be necessary for a Northern Presbyterian on moving to Alabama, Texas, or Arkansas to go out of his Assembly.

II. Profit to the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A.

1. An end to evil rivalry in those Synods where the two Churches are not strong, as Missouri and Illinois.

2. An end to the reproach of sectionalism. It can no longer be termed "the Northern Church." It can no longer be regarded in the South as a foreign body. In Texas, for instance, the Cumberland Presbyterians number 30,000. The united Synod will have about 34,000 members. Much larger than our Southern Synod! There will be a large Synod in each of the States of the Southwest.

3. In very truth it shall have become a truly national Church, with the nation-wide outlook, sympathy and effort. With wider borders and truer knowledge of the whole country, it will be prepared to deal in wisdom with the negro problem and with other vexing local conditions.

The Amended Confession, prepared by Conservatives, reveals a Church sound to the core.

Controversy over, the united Church, her Amended Confession in her right hand, has turned with tremendous energy to evangelistic work, Dr. Chapman leading in this blessed movement.

How can we fail to rejoice in God's great gift to our brothers?

Growing wiser in polity! Always sound in doctrine! And preaching with a new zeal the everlasting gospel!

Corsicana, Tex.

CALVIN.—Mr. Calvin was born in Caswell Township (New Hanover county) now Pender county, Sept. 22nd, 1828 and died May 22nd, 1903. Truly we as a Church and community have lost a true faithful brother and friend. Mr. Calvin was a man of sterling integrity, possessing all the acquirements that go to make up a noble Christian gentleman. He was a member of Moore's Creek Presbyterian Church, now Caswell, for more than fifty years and was elected elder about the year 1860. He was a man that ruled well as an elder, and was intelligent and consistent in all his dealings with his Church. As a husband and father he was tender and affectionate and always helpful. As a neighbor he was sociable and kind and was always ready to help those who were in distress from whatever cause, being moved to action by the very spirit of God. Surely it can be said he was a man of prayer.

During his last illness he was patient and resigned to God's will believing that all things would work together for his good, his faith bright and his stay secure, and we abide in full hope that we shall meet him in a better land where there shall be no more death neither sorrow nor crying. Now be it resolved,

1. That while we feel keenly our loss in his death, we bow in humble submission to God's will knowing he doeth all things well.

2. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Standard for publication, a copy to the bereaved family and be recorded in the Record Book of our Church.

G. J. Moore,

BROWN.—First, Whereas brother J. Ross Brown was suddenly called away by the explosion of a lamp, we, the members of the session of Amity Church desire to put on record our sense of loss in his death and to tender to his family our deepest sympathy. We trust an all-wise and merciful God to bless this loss to our Church and to his family, the God who causes all things to work together for good to those that love Him.

2. Brother Brown was the first fruit of the pastorate of Rev. G. W. Belk his ordination and brother Brown's profession of faith being on the same day, June 8th, 1889. He was made an elder Jan. 19th, 1890, serving faithfully till the time of his death. He was a sincere earnest, faithful, and wise elder and a kind father and will be sadly missed in his Church, in the community and in his home.

CARSON.—The Ladies' Aid and Missionary Society of Taylorsville Church wish to express their deep sorrow for the death of one of its most valued members, Mrs. Dorcas P. Carson, who left her earthly home to live in Heaven June 16, 1903. She was an earnest and faithful member of the Society and its faithful secretary from its organization—ever active in its interests and constant in her attendance on its meetings—always urging all to do their duty and never let the interest die out. May her mantle fall on shoulders able and willing to go forward in the Master's work. In the house of God her feet delighted to dwell. Her accustomed place in the sanctuary was rarely vacant and the communion of saints she held as "a feast to her soul." We would humbly bow to the will of God and adore his wisdom in removing our sister from our midst, yet we deplore our great loss. We shall greatly miss her, but she has only gone before. The warmest sympathy of our hearts goes out to her loved ones, with the prayer that God may bless and comfort them as he alone can. We too have lost a friend and mourn her absence. "One by one we are crossing over."

"At the crystal river's brink
We shall find each broken link
Then the star that faded here,
We shall behold more bright and clear.

Mrs. Mary Moore,
Mrs. Alice Stevenson,
Committee.

Resolutions of Respect from Davis and Thomas Presbyterian Churches:

Whereas, it has pleased our Heavenly Father, in His all-wise but mysterious Providence, to call home to Himself our beloved pastor, the Rev. R. W. Carter, on the evening of May 7th, 1903, be it

Resolved, 1, That we bow in humble submission to the decree of Him who doeth all things wisely and well according to the counsel of His will, and believe that without a single exception our heavenly Father causeth all things to work together for the good of those that love Him.

Resolved, 2, That while we do mourn our loss, we shall ever remember with profound gratitude to him who has called him home, to his God, his works of faith and labors of love among us as a pastor and as a friend. We pray that God's blessing may so continue to abound upon the works of his hands that they may be established to our everlasting and His eternal glory. We bear testimony to our pastor's faithful sympathy and unwavering devotion to truth and duty. While in the pulpit and in our homes, he has been an able teacher and as our leader, a loyal servant of Jesus Christ. Forceful as a preacher of the Gospel, tender in sympathy for the sorrowing, and brave in condemning what he believed to be wrong. We cherish his memory as a true man of God.

Resolved, 3, That we most tenderly and sincerely sympathize with his bereaved family and friends, especially his devoted wife, and affectionately commend them to the Father who loves them and to the Word of His Grace.

Resolved, 4, That this action be inscribed on the records of the church of which he was pastor, and that copies be sent to the Church and local papers and to his afflicted family.

The Home Circle.

A young man who had been brought up in a religious home spent a summer in a community of strangers, persons who, though of considerable social standing, yet gave little consideration to the things of religion. The young man wrote home, after a few weeks, "Religion never before seemed so important to me as it does here, where it is discounted. You cannot imagine the smallness of the lives and interests of these folks. Their conversation, and especially their constant social bickerings, would astonish you. Nobody seems really happy, with a deep-down unchanging happiness. As near as I can make out, all this is due to the lack of real spiritual impulses."—The Philadelphia Friend.

New Occupations for Educated Woman

By Mary Caroline Crawford.

Our colleges, high schools, and seminaries will have graduated this year, as for several years past, tens of thousands of alert, healthy, mentally well-equipped girls, a large proportion of whom must enter the world's life and become self-supporting. The great and pressing problem is, "How?"

No longer in these days is it a foregone conclusion that because a girl has received a good education she will support herself as a teacher. Happily for our children, the teaching profession has now attained a dignity which places it beyond the hit-or-miss services of any college or high-school graduate. Moreover, girls themselves are branching out in this twentieth century into trades and professions which offer more opportunity for individual resources and individual enterprise than does the profession of the pedagogue. The girl of the period wishes to get into touch with the larger life of the world to feel, through her occupations, some pulsations of our own Time Spirit. For this reason she seeks new fields of labor. But, rather paradoxically, many of the new activities in which educated women are engaging with signal success prove, when closely examined, to be reversions to the primitive occupations of their grandmothers. Only the aspect of them has changed.

A notable example of this is afforded by the highly successful bakery which is now being carried on in Cambridge, Massachusetts, by two clear-eyed, level-headed, well-born and well-bred college girls. The furniture in the sales room of this unique establishment is after the most approved William Morris standards; on the walls are quotations from Tolstolian books on the dignity of labor; beautiful pictures, tastefully framed, decorative palms, and a handsome rug complete the equipment of this highly interesting bakeshop. And here, in the artistic setting they have created for their excellent wares, the two college girls themselves are kept busy all the time disposing of their bread and bread-sticks for just twice the sum charged by other bakers.

"Without a vision," remarked wise old Solomon, "the people perish." The young brains behind this Laboratory Kitchen have caught the vision of better things in the industrial order, and they are inspiringly working it out. That their efforts are meeting with great success is a tribute to the public's receptivity as well as to the value of their idea. To this idea there are, of course, two distinct sides—that of the worker and that of the product. Of the former too much can scarcely be said. But on the latter it is not our purpose here to dwell. Suffice it, then, to remark on this point that bread for which people are glad to pay twice the ordinary price must possess a merit not to be had in the wares of the corner shop. That is plain on the surface.

Now for the workers themselves, and the idea for which their Laboratory Kitchen stands—an idea very well worth publishing to intelligent young women the country over. Miss Stevenson, the manager, is a South Carolinian, and when she lectures, as she sometimes does on her trade, she begins by remarking: "My grandfather was a judge, but I am a baker." She firmly believes, as one very soon discovers from a talk with her, that there is not really, and so should never have been socially, that great gulf we have honored for years between people who work with their brains and those who work with their hands; and she feels strongly that there is a place commercially for the college-bred in the improvement of the quality of the necessities of life. Hence the text engraved on every package that leaves the shop: "There is nothing finer than common bread, unless it be bread of a finer kind."

The way in which this original young woman came into the profession of bread-making is most interesting, for naturally something akin to "conversion" has to be experienced by a Southerner of aristocratic training before the point of view that bread is worthy of a life's devotion should be attained. While a student at Converse College in her native State, Miss Stevenson became greatly interested in chemistry, specializing for three years on the subject. Later she spent several terms at Radcliffe College, Cambridge, studying English, that she might be able to express clearly and well what she had to say about chemistry. All this time her intention was to follow the beaten track, and teach chemistry. At about this stage of her student career, however, she fell under the influence of a large-brained woman whose breadth of scholarship and sane philosophy of life communicated to her such a grasp upon the underlying principles of things as was calculated to work a veritable revolution in the girl's point of view. There began to be borne in upon Miss Stevenson the truth that bread, because it is one of the necessities of life, is a thing needed in perfection. Whether there would be a demand for a bread made in perfection she did not know. But the accident of meeting then Miss Frances Elliott, the daughter of a Toronto physician, who had likewise specialized in chemistry, and as willing to make with her the hazard of a bakery such as she had thought out, decided her course. Miss Elliott had also been a pupil of the inspiring teacher, and she was a graduate of the University of Toronto. Further, she too had studied in Boston and knew its ways. Cambridge was accordingly chosen as the place in which to make the experiment of the Laboratory Kitchen.

The girls had been told that the one on the Charles was hospitable to ideas but at first they did not find this to altogether true. For some time, indeed, the college folk, with whom they had previously maintained pleasant social relations, looked upon their venture with skepticism. Then one day the much lamented and universally beloved Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer, hearing that two college girls had started a Laboratory Kitchen there in her neighborhood, went down to their pretty salesroom, and over the purchase of some bread for her own luncheon, made their acquaintance and asked permission to call upon them in the little home they had set up a block or two away from the bakeshop. After that there was no question in the minds of the Cantabrigians.

At the beginning, while they were perfecting their recipes, these two young enthusiasts did all the baking themselves. Within three months they paid expenses. The demand proved to be much greater than they had expected. "I find people appreciate a good thing in any line when it is made with an eye on the retail side, not on the cash register," commented Miss Stevenson in speaking of her immediate success.

"Personally," she continued, "I am immensely interested in the economic side of this business. I myself so firmly believe that people need workers more than talkers that I am very glad indeed to have proved that a girl can earn a living in labor of this kind. We now have five helpers, all of fine quality. We're busy enough to need two shifts in the kitchen, with eight hours a day for each. When it becomes necessary to keep the ovens going all the time, we shall need on more helpers. We bake ninety loaves at a time, and make three kinds of bread—a health variety from a formula purchased of a New York physician, cream bread, and whole wheat bread. The health bread is for people who cannot digest the other kind, and it has our recommendations. Mrs. William DeHowells said it saved her life, and the Department of Chemistry at Washington has pronounced it the only bread ever analyzed which is free of yeast when done."

Miss Stevenson defends, whenever she has opportunity, her firm conviction that the process of breadmaking is very interesting to the educated woman because of the intelligence required to perfect it. And breadmaking appeals, for far-reaching reasons, she holds, to the college woman. First, because of its fundamental relation to daily life—the nourishment of the body being the first step toward right behavior of the mind; second, because of its possibilities; and what the modern mind realizes to be an elementary and very significant field of life, the business field, this occupation, she says, should claim a high place. Business is today the great field in which all classes are included. And yet it is the only field which has no controlling ideal. There is but one way, she said partner believe, to save the nation from the present warfare between master and slave, and that is for the educated to come down from their vantage point as onlookers and enter the work-arena, matching trickery with selfishness with service. Then, there is room for the college-bred man here—which is much.—The Out-

How to Have Constant Good Company.

By Mildred C. Watkins.

The most charming companion I met was a plain little woman whose for years had been entirely given up the care of an invalid demented father, old man who demanded her constant presence in his darkened room during his long hours, and in the few spare moments she had while going through the routine of household duties.

Her room, living in the backwoods where she never saw any society, she gained a clarity of mind and a power of expression superior to many of her old schoolmates, who had shown greater promise, but had possessed every advantage. Instead, she was neither "smart" nor particularly studious at school, but exceedingly fond of fun, excitement and com-

One day I asked her the secret of the change. She laughed: "I have been enjoying constant pleasant company for the last years."

I stared mystified. She drew from her pocket a little quotation book and pointed to two quotations, "My own thoughts are my companions," and "They are never alone who are accompanied with their own thoughts." There were several other quotations written on the margin of the pages were well thumbed.

She said earnestly, "Looking back over my girlhood I know there is a fatal defect in the training of our girls; our mothers, our actions, receive attention we are given advice and instruction in every detail but in our thinking. I did not have even a conception of entertaining myself by my own thoughts; I wanted all the time to be amused by something or somebody outside of myself. Then came the plunge into sadness, poverty and illness, at first I believed I should become insane, then God must have directed me to this little book too worthless to be sold when our library went. One quotation chained my mind, "Our thoughts are heard in heaven," and I began recalling my thoughts. How disgusting I was with them! Round and round I went weary of repining they had called, or even if not repining how proud, how unelevating they had been!

From that hour I determined my thoughts should be inspiring companions, and in sewing up a seam they should not be "So long and tiresome, wonder how long before I get done," and so on, and on over and over again. Why! I would take a little trip while sewing that

Our Young People.

Some Mysteries of History.

By Priscilla Leonard, in Forward.

The little Princes in the Tower—what a pathetic tragedy was theirs, as we look at it across the centuries! No wonder that, when the two royal children disappeared from their rooms in the Tower, there were many followers of the House of York who still hoped against hope that these Babes in the Wood had somehow escaped their wicked uncle, the terrible hunchback Richard, and might be in hiding somewhere, ready to come back when it was safe to appear. The only thing known about their fate was the brief announcement, by Richard, in 1483, that they were dead. But there had been no funeral, no date of death given, even; and for ten years no one could say, authoritatively, what had really become of the sons of King Edward the Fourth after the Tower gates had closed upon the royal lads.

Meanwhile, England was at peace again, after a long agonies of the Wars of the Roses. King Richard the hunchback was dead long ago—slain on Bosworth Field. His conqueror, Henry Tudor, had married King Edward's only known surviving child, the Princess Elizabeth, and was reigning as Henry the Seventh. It was well understood that he was not searching for his young brothers-in-law, nor did he propose to yield the crown to them if they appeared and claimed it. It was, therefore, not altogether safe, even now, for any claimant to come forward. Yet, in the same year that the caravels of Columbus crossed the Atlantic, a handsome, golden-haired youth, resembling the royal House of York astonishingly, came to Ireland from the Low Countries, and proclaimed himself to be Richard, Duke of York, the younger of the two Princes in the Tower. He wrote letters to the Earls of Desmond and Kildare, great Irish nobles of that day; and later in 1492, Desmond himself wrote a letter to King James of Scotland, setting forth the claims of young prince and forwarding a statement from him, to this effect:—

Young Perkin Warbeck (for so he had been known thus far) was the younger son of King Edward. His brother and he, boys of thirteen and eleven, had indeed been doomed to death in the Tower by Richard the Third. The murderers had killed Edward the Fifth (poor, helpless little king, whose title was but a fatal mockery!), but the one who was told off to kill the younger boy was moved with pity at his childish pleading, and not only spared his life, but smuggled him out of the Tower, and sent him abroad secretly, to friends in the Low Countries. Little Richard, in return, made a solemn promise that he would not reveal who he was for eight years. During these eight years, he had wandered in various countries, under the name of Perkin Warbeck. He had been in the service of an English noble woman, a Portuguese knight, and a Breton merchant, and it was on business for the latter that he had come into Ireland, where so many had recognized him as the true heir of the House of York that he felt the time had come to avow his identity, and assert his rightful claim to the throne of English.

"The news," says an old historian, "hereof came blazing and thundering over into England that the Duke of York was sure alive." It also went abroad in France and Flanders. The Duchess Margaret of Burgundy, sister of Edward the Fourth, had lately made a very bad blunder by believing the claim of a lad named Lambert Simnel, a flagrant impostor, to be the little Duke of York. However, she was still hoping to find her lost nephews, and so, by her influence, succeeded in inducing King Charles the Eighth of France to invite this new pretender to court. When the young Perkin arrived in France, his claims were received without doubt; Charles assigned him a magnificent suite of apartments, settled a princely pension upon him, and gave him a special guard, and other marks of royal honor. Some prominent nobles of the Yorkist party came over from England to see the young Plantagenet, Sir George Nevil, Sir John Taylor, and above a hundred of the lesser gentry attached themselves warmly to his cause, and he began to have a court of his own about him. He bore himself, all agreed, with great dignity, and had a personal fascination which strongly recalled that of Edward the Fourth, whom he also, by common report, resembled most strikingly.

France and England were at this time at war. Henry the Seventh was the craftiest and wisest king of his time, and he thought the situation was too dangerous to continue. So he made peace at once with France, but asked, as one of the conditions, that Perkin Warbeck should be given into his hands. To the honor of Charles the Eighth, he refused to do this, but warned the youth to leave his court, as he could no longer protect him. Perkin accordingly sent word to the Duchess of Burgundy, asking her to receive him in Flanders.

Just here comes in a contradiction—the first one of the many which we find in the story. Some historians say that Margaret, having been deceived by Lambert Simnel, would not receive this new pretender until she had thoroughly sifted his claims, and that he convinced her, against her will, of his identity. Others say that she was so anxious to support his claim—any claim against Henry the Seventh, in fact, whom she hated—that she sent for him, and instructed him in his part, teaching him many details which he did not know. When we learn, however (even from those who do not believe that Perkin was the Duke of York), that Margaret had not been in England for forty-five years, and had really seen nothing of her brother's family, it is hard to see what she could have taught anyone about the details of the youth of the little Duke. Besides, Perkin, before meeting her, had already convinced Scotland, Ireland, France, and many of the most close and familiar adherents of the House of York that he was the true prince. He and his little court, at any rate, now removed to the Low Countries, where the Duchess of gundy, the Archduke Philip, and the Emperor Maximilian all backed him, and acknowledged him as royal. The Duchess gave him the title of "The Rose of England," and his "grace and princely behavior" won all hearts to him.

Henry the Seventh became a good deal troubled over the matter. He demanded the surrender of the pretender into his hands, but the Archduke Philip refused. Henry banished all Flemings from England, and laid a strict embargo upon their goods. He executed several English nobles for plots in favor of Perkin and thus "did extremely quail the spirit of Perkin and his complices." The Duchess of Burgundy, at the same time, was writing to Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, and to the Pope herself, and getting encouragement all round. An invasion was planned, backed by Philip and Maximilian, and on the third, 1495, the Plantagenet pretender and his little army landed on the coast of Kent.

There is no doubt that he expected all England to rise in his behalf. But the work of the Roses had done their work. Such bloody, useless, and exhausting wars had ever been known in England. When they ended, the great barons were destroyed, and, indeed, the whole nobility reduced to a mere handful. There were left only the monarchy and the people; and the people were so exhausted by war that they wanted only peace, and would not have risen for a body, no matter what his claim or his charm. Besides this, Henry had ordered to be published everywhere a document concerning the two Princes in the Tower, purporting to be the confession of Tyrrel and Dighton, the two murderers hired by Richard the Third to kill his little nephews. The real examinations of Tyrrel and Dighton, however, were not given out, even to the king's council, "the matter being left somewhat perplexed," and Tyrrel was disposed of by being beheaded for treason. Dighton, "who it seemeth, spake for the king, was forthwith set at liberty," and told to spread his statements everywhere.

This revised version was, that Brackburn, keeper of the Tower, had refused to murder the princes; that one night had been removed, and Tyrrel put in his stead; that the children, under Tyrrel's command, had been smothered in bed, and that their dead bodies had been seen by Tyrrel and Dighton outward, and had been buried under the stairs. When King Richard, however, was told where his nephews had been buried, he said, "It was too base a lie for them that had been king's children." So the little bodies, by the king's warrant, were taken up by the priest of the Tower," and buried again in this priest in some unknown place. The priest and King Richard both being dead, this place could not be found; but there was no doubt that the little princes were both dead. This was Dighton's story; and as the young Queen Elizabeth, the queen-mother, Elizabeth Woodville, showed no belief in Perkin Warbeck's claim, the people of England refused to believe it, either, and the men of Kent, so far from rising and joining him when he landed, drove his followers back to the ships, after capturing eighty of them. The pretender weighed anchor at once, and sailed for Ireland, where he besieged Watreford and failed again. Then he took his little fleet and army to Scotland, and there he found welcome, friends, and a wife.

MAIL ORDERS ARE GIVEN SPECIAL ATTENTION,

James of Scotland evidently believed thoroughly in the last heir of the Plantagenets. He made tournaments for him, helped him invade England, and gave him the beautiful Catherine Gordon, his own kinswoman, to wife. Henry of England employed spies in Scotland, and tried to seize Perkin, but did not succeed. The young pretender seems to have been of a merciful, as well as a gracious, disposition. When James raided English villages and plundered the peasants, Perkin "entreated him not to thus afflict his people." If he were not the Duke of York, he certainly showed every characteristic of a kingly nature, and James of Scotland admired him greatly. He remained in Scotland until 1497, but now his romantic career was drawing to a close.

From Scotland, after an ineffectual invasion of the northern counties, Perkin went back to Ireland, and thence to Cornwall, where he gave battle to Henry at Tannton, with some seven thousand men at his back. The battle went against him, and he fled for sanctuary to Beaulieu, where he was besieged, and at last, on a solemn promise of pardon from the king, surrendered. He was at this time but twenty-five years old, but his days of liberty and life were well nigh over. His "confession" was proclaimed everywhere, by order of the king, but this printed paper (setting forth that he was not the Duke of York, but the son of John Osbeck, of Tournay) was so confused and unsatisfactory that "men were in more doubt than before." Before long Perkin kept under guard, yet found means to escape, and it was believed that Henry was only too glad to have this excuse for more severity when he was recaptured. This time he went to the Tower, where Richard of Warwick, son of Clarence Plantagenet, was also confined. The two became great friends; and both of them won the favor and kindness of the keepers to such a degree that a plot was formed for their escape. It is charged by many historians that Henry the Seventh actually allowed and encouraged this plot, so that he might, by its discovery, get rid of the two last scions of the family of York, and clear the way for his own son Arthur's marriage with Catherine of Spain, whose father would not permit her to marry the heir of Henry until the Tudor succession was thus absolutely established. We can believe anything of Henry the Seventh in the line of policy and treachery; and certain it is that he seized his chance, when the plot was revealed, to send both Warwick and the pretender to the block. In 1499, both were beheaded by order of the king, after Perkin's confession had been repeated, and thus ended the short career of Perkin Warbeck.

But his mystery survived. King James of Scotland, to the end of his life, upheld that he was no pretender, but the true Duke of York. Catherine, his wife, had the same absolute belief in him, and the Duchess of Burgundy and the King of France never changed their opinion that he was the real heir of the English crown. Historians have taken sides for and against ever since. Bailey, in his interesting history of the Tower, upholds Perkin Warbeck's claim, and believes his confession to have been a fraud or wrung from him by threats of torture. Walpole, in his Historic Doubts, sides with the young pretender. Yet the finding of the bones of two children under some stairs in the Tower, in Charles the Second's reign, is a strong fact on the other side—although Tyrrel and Dighton's testimony that the bodies had been removed from beneath the stairs seems to conflict, again, with this discovery. If Perkin Warbeck were not the Duke of York, who was he? Nobody (as in the case of Lambert Simnel) ever came forward to identify him, either before or after his death, which, if he were an impostor, would have been very likely to happen. This golden-haired, gracious, kingly-mannered unknown moves across the page of English history a living mystery. Would not the "White Rose of England" have made a better king than Henry the Eighth? It is an idle question, and yet it inevitably suggests itself as we read the story of the Princes in the Tower.

The Girl Whom Nobody Liked.

She was sure that nobody liked her. She had told herself so again and again, with a queer tightening about her heart that was like real pain. And then she tossed her head and set her lips in a defiant little smile. Nobody should know that she cared. Never!

It was on her eighteenth birthday that Aunt Elizabeth made a suggestion which caused the girl to open her eyes, and then to laugh a little. It was such an odd idea, so like Aunt Elizabeth!

"Then I'm to 'hold up' everybody I meet till I've said something brilliant," she observed.

"Not exactly," Aunt Elizabeth smiled, unruffled. "But I've noticed that you pass your acquaintances with a mere nod or a curt 'good morning.' Wish you would try the experiment of saying something pleasant to each one unless there is some good reason against it."

"It will grow rather tiresome," said the girl, and she shrugged her shoulders.

"Try it for a week," suggested Aunt Elizabeth; and rather to her own surprise, the girl found herself promising.

She came very near forgetting her pledge when she met Mrs. Anderson on the street next morning. In fact, she had passed with her usual uncompromising nod, when the recollection of her promise flashed into her mind. She prided herself on being a girl of her word, and she turned quickly.

"How is Jimmy to-day?" she said, speaking out the first thing that came into her head.

There was a good deal of detail in Mrs. Anderson's answer. Jimmy had been sick with the measles, and then had caught cold and been worse. Mrs. Anson poured out her story as if it was relief to find a listener, and as she looked on, that particular listener found herself more interested than she would have believed possible in Jimmy and his mother. She said that she had some old map-books which Jimmy might enjoy looking over, and Mrs. Anderson flushed and thanked her with more gratitude than the slight favor seemed to warrant. At the next corner was Cissy Baily, and the girl wondered if her promise to the washerwoman's daughter, a poor people of that sort. But she did not let herself wonder very long.

"It was very kind of you to bring me the clothes so early last week, Cissy. You was in a hurry for that blouse." Cissy Baily did not know what to answer. She smiled in an embarrassed way, and looked up and then down. But the girl whom nobody liked had seen something in the uplifted eyes which warmed her heart and made that one-eyed conversation something to remember.

The day went by, and she did not find opportunity to say anything very brilliant. She stopped Mrs. White to ask if she would like to read the book she had just finished, and she patted little Barbara Smith's soft cheek, as she inquired if the new baby sister had come down at all. When she could think of nothing else, she said, "Hasn't this been a beautiful day?" Her earnestness never surprised some people who had not the opportunities for realizing that there was anything unusual about the day.

By the time the week was over the girl whom nobody liked had learned a valuable lesson. She had found out that hearts respond to cordiality and kindness, just as the strings of one musical instrument vibrate in unison with the chord struck in another. It is not a new discovery, since long ago it was written in a certain wise Book: "A man that hath friends must show himself friendly;" yet this is one of the truths that each person must rediscover on his own account. And the girl who was learning to love everyone, and was tasting the joy of being loved, thanked God that she had not waited any longer before finding out the wonderful secret for herself.—Selected.

man severe he was, and stern to view; knew him well, and every truant knew; all had the boding tremblers learned to trace the day's disasters in his moving face; all well they laughed with counterfeited glee at all his jokes for many a joke had he; all well the husy whisper, circling round, conveyed the dismal tidings when he frowned. But he was kind, or, if severe in thought, the love he bore to learning was in fault; the village all declared how much he knew—was certain he could write, and cipher, too, and he could measure, terms and tides of presage, and e'en the story ran that he could gauge.

In arguing, too, the parson owned his skill, For e'en though vanquished, he could argue still; While words of learned length and thundering sound Amazed the gazing rustics ranged around; And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew, That one small head could carry all he knew, But past is all his fame. The very spot Where many a time he triumphed is forgot.

Our Little Folks.

CONDUCTED BY MRS. A. J. MCKELWAY

Children's Letters.

Waco, N. C., July 5, '03.

Dear Standard:

My papa takes your paper and I enjoy reading the nice little letters written by the children. My papa and mama are both deaf and dumb and have two little brothers, Byron and Robert. We all can hear and talk and went to school at Waco and studied reading, spelling and arithmetic. Mrs. Sallie Mass was my teacher and do not go to Sunday-school. We have not got any Presbyterian Sunday-school and live in the country one mile from Waco, we have no preacher now. M. Cathey was our pastor, and will close as this is my first letter by asking a question where is dog found in the Bible.

Your little unknown friend,

Age 9. Aubra Lee Brown.

Minor, N. C., July 4, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I have written once before and my letter was in print I will make another attempt to write.

I am a little country girl twelve years old. We live fifteen miles from Charlotte and seven miles from Concord. I like living in the country very much.

Our school is out; it has been out most two months. I went to school and liked it very much. I studied spelling, arithmetic, grammar, geography, physiology and history. I have five sisters and one brother; his pets are a sheep, a dog, a cat and two colts; he has a Texas pony that he rides and yesterday when it got tired it tried to buck with him. He got off in a little bit and has not been on it since. I love to ride horse back, it is such fun. We have nineteen head of horses and have a big barn. Papa has been taking the Standard a long time. I love to read the children's letters very much.

I have an aunt in Japan that is a missionary; she has three little boys. She was at home about four years ago. She didn't have but one little boy when she was at home. He certainly was cute. I guess that I had better not write any more as my letter is so long. I will close, hoping to see my letter in print.

Your little friend,

Sara Harry.

Quaker Meadows, N. C.

Dear Standard:

My grand-mother takes your nice paper and I enjoy reading it ever so much. We go to church and Sunday-school at Quaker Meadows. It is four miles from our home to the church.

I have two little sisters, Kate and Sallie, and four brothers, Forney, Lewis, Clarence and Kanie. My mama does not know that I am writing this letter and I want to surprise her. Hoping to see this in print, I am,

Your friend,

Age 9. Mary Ramsaur.
July 4, '03.

Mooresville, N. C., July 1, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I have written to you but once before I thought I would write again.

I have two cats. I also have 2 missionary hens and 3 little bantans. We have a nice society, with 24 members. It meets the first Saturday in every month.

Every year we try how much money we can earn for it from January to November. I have $1.50 now. I sold eggs in the early spring. I am raising bantans for sale now. I must close for fear of the waste basket.

Your friend,

Age 9. Carey Wilson.

Mount Olive, N. C., June 26, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I must write to your kind paper once more.

We have been having lots of rain lately.

I have just finished some pillow cases that I have been hem-stitching for mama. They are going to build us a new school house and oh! how glad I am.

I will answer Mabel Clark's question. "Loft" is found in the Bible 9 times, first in 1K. 17:19, second, Ps. 131:1, third, Prov. 30:13, fourth, Is. 2:11, 51, 26:5, sixth, 57:7, seventh 20:9. I will ask one, Where is the word "linen" found? I must close now,

Your unknown friend,

Eloise McPhail.

Mount Olive, N. C., June 25, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl 12 years of age.

I enjoy reading your little letters ever so much. I like to play with my dolls. I have four—two large ones and two small ones. My largest one is named "Kathrine."

I will answer Frank Dakmer's question. The word "consumption" is found first in Lev. 26:16, second 28:22, third 10:22, fourth, 28:22.

I will close now by asking where is the word "conquer" found.

Your unknown friend,

Kate McPhail.

Begonia, N. C., July 2, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl twelve years old. My aunt takes your nice paper. I like it very much. I live in the country and have a nice time picking blackberries. I am not going to school now, but I hope school will start very soon. My father and mother died when I was fifteen months old. My mother died about a week before my father. I am living with my uncle. My cousin has a bad, sore foot and had to have the doctor to dress it every few days. A mule stepped on it and crushed it. I will close by asking a question, Where is snout found in the Bible.

Your unknown friend,

Eva Carothers.

Dear Standard:

As I have seen no letters from Murphy, I thought I would write. My papa takes

How the Woodpeckers Were Saved.
A pair of young downy woodpeckers were in an apple orchard one spring day, drummed so hard with their sharp bills on the dead limbs of the trees that the farmer working in the field raised his head and asked his son if it were thundering.

"Oh, no," said the boy, listening to the clatter of the birds' loud drumming. "It's a pair of sapsuckers, and they build their nests in the orchard and save their eggs, sure I'm standing here."

The two woodpeckers were drumming on the worms and insects, and they did not hear his remark, so pecked and drummed round the trees until a series of small holes were made through the bark of the dead wood.

"This is a rich feeding ground, my son," said the male woodpecker or sapsucker to his mate. "I never saw so many worms and insects in an orchard.
I don't see how the trees live at all."

"The owner must be very careless with the trees," remarked his wife, "to let insects eat them up like this."

They clattered away with their bills in a series of sharp drums which rolled away on the clear air. Then Mr.
Woodpecker stopped long enough to eat a bit of grub, and said, "Why not build your nest here in the orchard? We should have all the food we needed for the summer right here among the trees."

"I don't know," responded Mrs.
Woodpecker, shaking her head doubt-fully. "It seems to me that a farmer that is so careless about his trees might be very careless about protecting his bird friends. He might shoot us or rob our nests."

"Everybody knows that woodpeckers are good for trees, and no one would bother us," replied her mate laughing at the fears of his young wife. "Now here is a fine dead limb on that old apple tree. We could drill a hole in it, and build a nest that no one could ever reach. Not even a cat could get up on such a dead limb and reach down in the hole, for we will dig deep and long."

There was no further protest from Mrs. Woodpecker, but she looked askance at the farmer's son slyly walking through the orchard and watching them. She did not like the appearance of things; but she did not like to oppose her mate, and saw that his mind was set upon building in that orchard.

So the following day they began house building, and in just the opposite way in which most birds would go to work. They began by tearing down instead of building up. They pecked a round hole in the dead limb, and then when they reached the heart of the limb they turned the course of the hole downward, always pecking and clattering away so that their work was known to everyone.

"Ho, ho!" said the farmer's son; "you will build in the orchard. I'll wait until you have eggs; then I'll pay you a visit."

The spring days grew milder and balmier, and the home of the woodpeckers was nearly finished. When the hole, a foot deep, had been finished, they brought fine hair, feathers and leaves, and with these constructed a warmth at the bottom of the dark tunnel in the limb of the tree.

One day when there were two little eggs in the nest, Mr. Woodpecker fluttered round from tree to tree, and drummed harder than ever. He had to find food for his mate as well as himself, and later he would have other mouths to fill.

But they were not so happy when, one morning, they saw the farmer's son sneaking through the tall grass of the neglected orchard, and stop before the tree and climbed it. The two sapsuckers did not protest in loud cries at this intrusion, but waited until the boy reached the rotten limb. Then they said in a breath, "He dare not climb any higher."

The boy looked greatly disappointed, for he had found the limb very much decayed and weak. He shook it with two hands, and ventured a little farther. His father, passing through the orchard, shouted to him:

"Look out, or you'll fall! That limb can't hold you!"

"Oh, I guess it will. Anyway, I'm going to have those eggs. I've been waiting for them all spring."

"They're not worth breaking your neck over. I'd try a ladder."

"That's it," said the boy. "I'll get the ladder; but you must help me?"

"There it is!" said the terrified Mrs. Woodpecker. "A farmer that doesn't keep his trees free from worms and insects has no idea of a woodpecker's value. Now they'll rob our nest. I'll never build in an orchard again."

"Wait and see. They haven't reached our nest yet."

But when the farmer and his son appeared with the long, slender ladder; the two woodpeckers felt their hearts flutter; and they hopped round uneasily from limb to limb.

The ladder was raised with difficulty, and the boy began to ascend it. The top end rested on the rotten limb above the nest, and it swayed and cracked threateningly when the boy got near the top.

"Be careful there!" shouted the farmer.

"Oh, I'll be careful; but I'm going to have the eggs. No two birds can get the better of me!"

The boy shouted back these words, and then made two quick steps upward. He was within a few feet of the hole, and his eyes glistened with anticipation. The two woodpeckers retreated farther up the limb. Then a sharp crack and boom of the rotten limb frightened the boy, and he shouted in fear. He could see the limb falling backward and with a loud crash it fell to the ground, carrying the ladder and boy with it.

There was a great wailing below, and the farmer carried his son away to the house, but he was not so much hurt as frightened.

The two woodpeckers looked at their home, and found that the limb was broken off above their hole and the nest was still undisturbed.

"We must leave now," said Mrs. Woodpecker fearfully, "and find another home."

"Oh, no, we are safe," replied her mate. "They will never dare try it again."

"They've had their lesson."

"Yes, and we've had ours. We'll never build in an orchard again where the trees are neglected. You can tell a man by the condition of his trees"—S. S. Visitor.

Pony in White House Elevator.

Archie Roosevelt, who was recovering from an attack of measles, had a visitor the other day whose call will do more to restore him to health than all the medicine the doctor can give him. Soon after Archie began to convalesce he begged to be allowed to see his spotted pony, Algonquin, who is his constant companion when he is well. It was too soon for Archie to leave his room, and Mrs. Roosevelt was compelled to decline the request. Charles, the groom, who looks after Algonquin, and who also is a great chum of Archie's, thought the matter over, and concluded that if Archie wanted to see his pony he should do so.

Without confiding his plan to any one he led the pony the other day in the White House and along the corridor into the elevator. The attendants were too much surprised to say a word until after the elevator had disappeared. When the second floor was reached, Charles led the pony to Archie's room and rushed it in. To say that Archie was delighted expresses it mildly, and the pony also seemed to enjoy the visit. This is the first time that a horse has ridden in a White House elevator.

 still he continued his rageful tune,
 he barked till his throat was dry.
 The little dog bounced like a rubber ball, his anger quite drove him wild;
 he said, "I'm a terror, although I'm small,
 I dare you, impudent fellow, to call."
 The moon only smiled and smiled.
 The little dog barked at a terrible fate,
 he challenged the moon in vain,
 so calmly and slow as the workings of fate,
 the moon moved along in a manner
 undisturbed,
 he smiled at the dog in disdain.
 The moon, 'neath a hill that obscured the vest,
 the moon sank down out of sight, but smiled as it slowly dropped under the crest;
 the little dog said, as he lay down to rest,
 "I scared it away, all right!"

A Devoted Mother.

Had a little sick dolly,
 now what I should do;
 I'd tend it with care, and give it fresh air,
 I'd go to the doctor's, too.
 When if the doctors should hand me some candy pills from the shelf, the dolly said, "Oh, I can't take them;
 I can't!"
 I'd swallow them all myself.
 You know, of course, I could never use force,
 I'd swallow them all myself.
 I am a careful young mother.
 When dollies are sick and weak
 I bid them to walk; I don't let them talk,
 I'd even permit them to speak.
 When I give them a straw ride,
 I'll wrap up in each little self, smiling to see with what vigor and glee
 they skip and sing myself.
 A selfish and good and wise mother should let the skipping and singing herself.

 munion.

Event and Comment.

Another foreign Presbyterian Church on American soil is the Magyar Presbyterian Church, in the Presbytery of Lackawanna. It is called the Logan Memorial Church in honor of the faithful missionary to these Magyars, Dr. S. C. Logan.

The first thing we know there will not be any trusts. All we have to do is to believe that they are illusions of mortal mind. Mrs. Eddy has given this enigmatical and highly suggestive advice on the subject, "Trust in Truth and have no other trusts." Of course the Science and Health Trust comes under the head of Truth.

From a somewhat close study of the press dispatches we are ready to affirm that the cultures that have been sitting around in the Vatican to see the poor old Pope die have given out just whatever they pleased to the public, regardless of its truth or its falsity. Your shaved Italian is still able to revive the traditions of Machiavelli.

They are starting the "Acorn No-Treating Saloon" in New York City, whose object is to eliminate private profit from liquor-selling, divorce the liquor-traffic from politics, decrease the consumption of liquor and dissociate immorality from drinking. The Metropolis of the country will some day wake up to the possibilities of the Gothenburg or Dispensary System.

One of the things that has surprised Rev. Reginald Campbell, in this country, is that "liberal theologians are not evangelists and evangelists are not liberal." That is an easy one. Evangelists are not liberal because, according to the observation of Mr. Campbell himself, they might thereby cease to be evangelists. But Mr. Campbell said a mighty true thing about the bossy preachers and their slanders of each other.

Ottawa Province, Canada, is supposed to be one-third Methodist. A Methodist minister, Rev. Salem Bland, with neither bland or peaceful intent, says brusquely that if the Methodists had not been spending their strength on such questions as those of the kind of amusements Methodists might enjoy, there would not be the disgustingly rotten state of affairs in the politics of Ottawa. Doubtless the devil made a diversion while the Methodists were condemning amusements.

They are not doing any fooling with Christian Science in Canada. A man has just been tried, convicted and the judgment affirmed by the court, the judgment being manslaughter and the crime his allowing his sixteen-year-old boy to die of diphtheria. The plea was that the father had treated the boy according to the tenets of the Christian Science sect, but it was of no avail. And to think that we actually license that kind of murderous fraud in North Carolina, by act of Legislature! One of our candidates for Governor will have some explaining to do along that line.

The new magazine, called Christendom, is the exponent of "liberal" Christianity. It publishes in a recent issue the creed of the Reformed Jews in America, in which, of course, there is no word about Christ, but only the statement that "Israel has been chosen of God as his anointed servant to proclaim unto the families of mankind his truth." Christendom comments upon "the essential religious character of this creed" and says, "A Judaism with such a creed as this will differ little from so-called 'liberal' Christianity." Christendom speaks with authority on that particular point. Still, it is in order for it to change its name to "Unitariandom".

The Presbytery of New Brunswick has just been requested to organize a Hungarian Presbyterian Church in Trenton, on the request of 160 Hungarians. Why is it that this is a matter of congratulation among Presbyterians while the setting off of a negro Presbyterian Church is looked upon as a cruel instance of race prejudice?

We did not know that the Panama Canal had a religious side to it, but Senator Morgan knows more about it than anybody else and he says it has. In an article in the Methodist Quarterly Review he says that our Government, in upholding the present party in power in Colombia, is guilty of repressing the Liberal Party, which is the only hope of the country in the effort to escape from the tyranny, moral and intellectual, of Rome; that the Colombian President is a puppet of Rome, and that the United States Senate has actually signed away the religious liberty of all our own citizens who shall be engaged in the construction of the Canal. The slime of Panama mud is not exactly pleasant to any Americans who know the history of the scheme, and it would not be a great grief to anybody and certainly a great blessing to the South, if the Nicaragua Route should be adopted.

Tennessee is getting famous for its bogus degrees. There is a D. D. factory at Harriman, called a University, that has been in evidence before the courts of Great Britain, in a suit brought for libel by one of its doctored ones. Mrs. Dr. James Crow, Director of the School of Domestic Science in this University, was found to be the housekeeper for an oil-agent. Then there is a so-called law school in Nashville, that recently sold an LL. D. to a one-horse lawyer in North Carolina, and a one-horse preacher in Virginia, we understand. These are frauds, of course. But so is the Ph. D. degree, obtained by a correspondence course in such a University as the one in Indianapolis, that has dubbed two of our Southern Presbyterian ministers, whom we know of. The thing is disgraceful, of course, but it does not do any particular harm, as the recipients of these degrees virtually confess that they could not earn one by work or receive one as a spontaneous tribute from a reputable institution. Just call them "Doctor" and smile.

We rather suspected that the sober Episcopal thought of the country would not sustain Bishop Potter in his recent outburst against Rev. R. C. Fillingham, an Anglican clergyman. Mr. Fillingham is one of the agitators of the order of John Kensit, claiming the right under the law to protest against Romanizing practices in the Church of England. As the Anglican is a State Church, it is under State Laws, and these agitators have been within their rights and have been sustained under the laws. Mr. Fillingham went to St. Mary the Virgin's Church, in New York, and was shocked at its idolatry, especially its "bun-worship," as he somewhat humorously described its High Mass with the Romish ceremonials, and intimated that he might make a public protest against the departures from the Anglican and Protestant Episcopal forms. Bishop Potter was evidently thrown into a panic and replied hotly that he believed Mr. Fillingham to be a fraud, suspected him of being a lunatic and that if he dared interrupt the services at St. Mary the Virgin's, he would be thrown into the street. Mr. Fillingham made a dignified reply and sailed for England, leaving good "copy" for the New York papers and probably satisfied with the very effective manner in which the attention of the public has been called to the abuses he is fighting. But he threatens to return to America in the fall to create disturbances in the highly ritualistic churches.

An Agnostic's Boast.

William Ernest Henley died in London on Sunday of last week, at the age of fifty four years. He was known to the readers of English Literature, some years ago, at the friend of and collaborator with Robert Louis Stevenson. Later he became known and then speedily forgotten by the bitter attack he made upon the memory of Stevenson. Equally forgotten have become his fierce criticisms of other men who have attained fame and whom the literary public liked better than they did Henley. But he did write one short poem which will probably live. He called it

"Invictus"

Out of the night that covers me
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever gods may be
For my unconquerable soul.

In the fell clutch of circumstance
I have not winced nor cried aloud,
Under the bludgeonings of chance
My head is bloody, but unbowed.

Beyond this place of wrath and tears
Looms but the horror of the shade.
And yet the menace of the years
Finds and shall find me unafraid.

It matters not how straight the gate,
How charged with punishments the scroll;
I am the master of my fate;
I am the captain of my soul.

Now that reads well, with the possible exception of the second verse which suggests Chance under the figure of a policeman with his club. The last verse has been much quoted, sometimes very aptly, in the announcement of manly independence, of freedom of thought or speech or action. But the poet's eye looked beyond, into the eternal world, and, Henley, himself, while thanking "whatever gods may be" for his "unconquerable soul," bids defiance to the punishments of the other world, however charged the scroll may be with them.

A secular paper would like to know how this modern Ajax faced death at last. The question is a pertinent one. It is known that Voltaire sent for a priest on his death-bed. What about this man who claimed to be the master of his fate, the captain of his soul? Well, the sad fact is that the malevolence and bitterness of his later years were excused by his friends on account of an alleged insanity said to be derived from a shameful and nameless disease. The "bludgeonings of chance" were the consequences of his own disgraceful life, for which it was not to his credit if he held his head unbowed. It ought to have been bowed in humiliation and repentance.

Fine words are easier than the blameless life. Even if there be a blameless life, there is no moral greatness in such an attitude of defiance to the higher powers. Reverence is the basis of true character, and he dies as the fool dieth, who shakes his puny fist at the Almighty.

The fallacy of the whole thing is, that it is not the "unconquerable soul," as Henley defines it, that is really unconquerable. Those who have been conquered by the power of the love of Christ, and have dedicated their lives to him—these are the unconquered of men, and the unconquerable—witness the noble army of martyrs. They feared God and they had no other fear. In all probability the poor wretch who breathed his last a few days ago was one of those whom conscience made a coward of, and the bold words of his poem were no part of his real experience.

Put in contrast with this egotism the song of that Judean Shepherd of the long ago: "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want. Yea though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

Millions of the sainted ones of earth have died with that psalm echoing in their ears. Who cares to face his Maker with the Agnostic's boast?

"I am the master of my fate, I am the captain of my soul."

One of the more immediate fruits of the Southern Education movement and the consequent bringing of the best brains and hearts of both the North and the South together, has been the hearing that has been given Southern men at the North, in defence of the opinions which are almost unanimously held in this section of the country. The present opening of the eyes of the Northern people on the negro question is one result of the frank and candid statement of their case, by Northern men in conversation or on the platform, in the hearing of those Northern men who are the moulders, in large measure, of Northern public opinion. The word "traitor" has long ago disappeared from the Northern vocabulary, when referring to Southerners who fought against the Federal Government. The word "rebel" is another impolite word that has been almost banished from select literary and especially journalistic society. And now Judge Emory Speer of Georgia, who won the hearts of the educational tourists at Athens, Georgia, a year ago, has made a speech, a commencement speech, in behalf of the honoring of R. E. Lee as a National hero; and The Outlook, whose editors, Dr. Abbott and Mr. Mabie, have been most open-minded toward Southern conditions and traditions, prints an editorial with the ption we have chosen for this one, "The Loyalty of Robert Edward Lee." We quote the last two paragraphs entire:

It is hardly possible that any man in the North could have gone through the spiritual struggle that Robert E. Lee went through during the days when war was threatened. In the North those men that wavered were choosing between a low motive and a high one. Robert E. Lee was beset by two conflicting high motives. That he chose to follow that high motive which kept him with his State, The Outlook believes to have been an error of political judgment; but it was not a moral error, not even an error of political morality. He who is loyal cannot be a traitor, and Lee and the men of his stamp were as loyal to their conscientious convictions as were the men who fought against them. The test of patriotism, like the test of any other moral quality, is not success, but loyalty to conviction; and by that test Robert E. Lee stands to-day among the purest, though among the most tragically misled and misunderstood, of patriots.

One of the most pathetic, from one point of view, from another one of the most stimulating and enlightening, utterances that have come to us from the desperate days before the breaking out of the war is in a letter in which Lee mentions his own son, an officer in the regular army at the time: "The times are indeed calamitous. The brightness of God's countenance seems turned from us, and his mercy stopped in its blissful current. Tell Custis he must consult his own judgment, reason, and conscience as to the course he may take. I do not wish him to be guided by my wishes or example. If I have done wrong, let him do better. The present is a momentous question, which every man must settle for himself, and upon principle." The man who wrote these words can teach lessons of patriotism to America of to-day. The defeat of his armies, which meant triumph to the South as well as to the North, may have changed his conception of what duty to his country signified; but his loyalty to that duty as he conceived it was as steadfast before as after his defeat. It is such steadfast loyalty that is the essence of patriotism. At some other time we may inquire into the nature of the two diverse conceptions of patriotism which contended for supremacy during the days of the Civil War. It is our purpose here to emphasize the truth that those who were loyal to the one conception were loyal to the other. The real issue was not between patriotism and the want of it, but between two forms of patriotism, one State, the other National. If willingness to sacrifice what is passionately prized next to honor itself is any criterion as to the degree of patriotism that begot such sacrifice, then those Southerners of whom Robert E. Lee is the type are to be counted among the patriots whose lives constitute the real riches of the Nation.

In other words, the State was the Southerner's Fatherland. The unanimity of that sentiment was far greater than the wish that the State might separate from the Union of States. And we think that some distinction should be made before the bar of history between the States that rushed into secession, although even there those who provoked secession by nullifying the Federal laws were not guiltless, and those States that were driven into it. When the Federal Administration broke its promise and sent reinforcements to Fort Sumter, Virginia had not seceded. It was trying to make peace between the sections. But the breaking of faith in the Sumter affair caused the storming of the fort. And when that had "fired the Northern heart" and troops were called for to invade and subdue the Southern States that had seceded, what were Virginia and North Carolina to do? They believed in the right of secession, however much they may have doubted its expediency. History has confirmed that belief. They could not remain neutral in the war that had been declared. So they cast in their lot with their Southern sisters. North Carolina did not pass the ordinance of secession until May 20, 1863. And when the State had acted, what was the duty of loyal citizens of that State?

The Outlook has answered the question. And may we remark, in passing, that there are still some very ugly resolutions in the records of the Northern Presbyterian Assembly, anent the disloyalty and rebellion of Southern Presbyterians, resolutions that have not only never been expunged, but which were reiterated in the most emphatic way, only a few years ago.

Nevertheless, the judgment of The Outlook is the judgment of history.

Teaching With Authority.

A Sermon delivered at the Davidson Summer School for Teachers.

A. J. McKELWAY.

Matthew 7:20. For he taught them as one having authority and not as the scribes.

The scribes of our Lord's day were the teachers in the schools, as the scribes who became Rabbis were the professors in the colleges. I may bring our text, therefore, to a more practical basis by translating at once, "He taught them as one having authority and not as the school-teachers.

The contrast was made by the people, by the great congregation that thronged the slope upon whose summit, in the position of authoritative teaching, Jesus sat. It was not necessarily an ignorant multitude that drew that distinction between the sermon from the mount and the teaching of those who sat in Moses' seat. The school-house was no rarity in old Judea. Josephus tells us of the introduction by Joshua, the son of Gamla, of schools into every town and the compulsory education of all children above the age of six years. The number of schools said to have existed in Jerusalem must have been fabulous. But it was deemed unlawful to live in a place where no school existed and the city allowing such a condition of affairs deserved, said the law itself, to be excommunicated or destroyed. It was in the ordinary Jewish schools that the Great Teacher himself was taught. He was no graduate of the higher Rabbinical schools and so constantly astonished his auditors with his knowledge of the Scriptures. But we may easily imagine him, seated on the ground, within the semicircle of pupils that was the teacher's "crown of glory," and poring over that sacred roll whose lines of symbol, type and inspired prediction converged upon himself.

The scribes were, first of all, copyists of the sacred literature. Now copying is always a narrowing task and we may well attribute to the influence of their work in the early history of their order and in the early practice of the individual scribe, that slavish adherence to the letter that made the scribes impervious to spiritual truth. It was not long, in their work of imitation, before one who had ventured an additional idea became one to be copied. Little by little the accretions grew upon the sacred books, grew in the reverence of these traditionalists as well as in the volume of the additions. Besides the books which we know as the Old Testament there was the Mishnah, or second law. And this consisted of two parts, the Haggadah, that which had been said, and which rested its authority upon the authority of him saying it, and the Halakhah, that which had been heard, and which was so binding it was not open to discussion. In addition to the Mishnah, there had been handed down by oral tradition and not yet committed to writing, the Talmud itself, which is fearfully and wonderfully made, a conglomeration of law reports, theological debates, digressions, anecdotes, proverbs, fancies, quaint sayings, legends, and stories that are always superstitious, often profane and sometimes obscene. It was truly a burden grievous to be borne, this mass of tradition. There was no end to it. For while it was utterly forbidden to contradict a teacher who had gone before, the widest latitude was given those who wished to add to his words. Rabbi Joshua would kiss the stone on which Rabbi Eliezer sat as being sacred like Sinai from which God had spoken. And the greatest of them all, Hillel the Scribe, mispronounced a word throughout life, purposely, because his teacher had done so, ignorantly. Surely that was the golden age of the school-room.

Imagine the contrast, to ears grown accustomed to the discussion of what constituted a burden that might be borne on the Sabbath Day, when there fell upon those ears, with the tone of authority that was its own witness of truth, Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of Heaven; Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. What was it that made the difference? We can feel it, even if we can not state it. What was it that drew from those astonished multitudes the exclamation, as that voice, clear and sweet beyond expression, penetrating to the utmost verge of the throng with words of truth and life, ceased and was still, "He teaches as one having authority and not as the scribes"? This be our theme of study together.

May I say, without offence, as one who is not altogether unfamiliar with the school-room, and who is never more certain of a life of usefulness and honor than when in the school-room—may I say that this profession which we are met here to exalt is not altogether beyond the reproach which the multitude cast upon the scribes? It is still too much the estimation of the world outside the school room and the college hall, that the teacher's profession is a narrowing one; that it is too much occupied even in this Twentieth Century with the mint and anise and cummin. That the ignorant teacher is too self-satisfied and that those who keep in touch with their craft have cumbered themselves with traditions. The world has noticed that the principles of the science of teaching itself seem unsettled; that while there is a steady advance in theology into wider realms of thought, in medicine to assured positions, even in law to a realization of the new conditions in the life of the world, in the science of teaching all things seem in a state of flux. If there are some of you who will deny this charge and claim that your principles are well established, I can only appeal to the rest of you whose fixed principles are diametrically opposed to the first. The world may be mistaken, but I bring you the message of the world that says you also are too great worshippers of great names. The scribes of old had their Hillel and their Shammai. And you have your Herbert and your Pestalozzi. The tone of authority is lacking and the cruel world accuses you of being faddists, and the faddist is the traditionalist who is subject to change without notice. May I presume to call you back to the fundamentals that can give authority, that gave authority to Him who spake as never man spake?

I mention four: knowledge, wisdom, sympathy, character.

I. The scribes had knowledge as well as the Christ. The knowledge-faculty, the memory, had been exercised to its highest capacity since childhood. And perhaps they had the advantage of some of us, in that they had never wasted time in the study of methods which might have been more profitably given to the acquisition of the mastery of teaching itself. There were no facts, within the limited field of their knowledge with which they were not familiar. I am not here to-night to decry knowledge nor to quote the hackneyed distinction between the pride of knowledge and the humility of wisdom. Get knowledge. Knowledge is power. To know is to accomplish. To know is to be.

I know of no profession, with the single exception of journalism, that makes such demands that its members shall know things. It is impossible to know too much, impossible to have too wide a range of knowledge or to know too clearly what is known.

Now what was the difference between the knowledge that our Lord had and that which the scribes had acquired? We need not complicate the question by the supposition of his divine knowledge. He grew in knowledge. There were some things of which, as the Son of God, he professed his ignorance. What was the difference? The knowledge of the scribes was perforce circumscribed within such narrow limits that it was imperfect knowledge. They knew just as well that the Almighty and his Angels took audible part in the discussions of the Academies, as they knew that God created the heavens and the earth. They knew all the traditions of the magnificence of Solomon and could repeat all that history and fable said about him. But they had never comprehended that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like the lily of the field. Nor did they know men, while Christ did. He needed not that any should tell him what was in man. He read the hearts of men as from an open scroll. The teachers of the scribes were books and book-men. The teachers of the Christ, may we not say? were the fowls of the air, toiling not, spinning not, but fed of the heavenly Father; the flower of the field, clothed in divine beauty, though tomorrow to be cast into the oven: the wind blowing where it listeth, mysterious in source and destination, reminding one of the breathings of the Almighty Spirit: the sky with its tokens of fair weather and foul, suggesting the signs of the times which he saw so clearly and prophesied so minutely. He knew Judas the Traitor and John the Beloved, before ever they knew themselves. It was because of the sweep of his knowledge, that he spoke with authority. Above all he knew the Word of God as the scribes had never learned it. After all, there is but one book, as Walter Scott said on his death-bed who had written many. And he who knows not that, in its spirit as in its letter, is ignorant indeed.

This is an age of widely diffused information, and the man who can read has himself to thank if he is without knowledge. Specialization is worse than useless that has not under it the foundation of general knowledge. The doctors have found that out, and they have carried specialization to such an extent that it takes now, as Dr. Patton has said, about six doctors to keep a man in his usual health. But the man that treats the eye must know about the whole body, because the body is one. And so the teacher who would specialize must realize that truth is one. How defective must be the teaching of the history of North Carolina, though the teacher have every fact from the Roanoke Settlement to the meeting of this summer school at his tongue's end, if he have not known something of the history of the world. I would commend to every teacher the widest possible course of reading, the closest possible study of nature, the most eager searching into the secrets of the soul, the clearest appreciation of the varied life of this wonderful world in this wonderful age, and the facts, gathered here and there and stored away will fit into each other in the great temple of truth so that there need not be heard even the sound of the hammer of the workman. I am not emphasizing the clearness of knowledge which you must have concerning the things which you directly teach, that is taken for granted; but that general knowledge which makes an acquaintance with some people a liberal education.

Do you remember how Christ said to those stupid disciples of His once, "I have yet many things to say to you but ye cannot bear them now?" So there should be in the mind of every pupil the consciousness of the teacher's reserve of knowledge. Perhaps some of us remember, how at some period of school or college life, the teacher drew aside for a moment the curtain that concealed a whole landscape of undiscovered country. And was there anything so appealing to the instinct of acquisition, to the appetite of the mind, as that glimpse of the things beyond? I shall never be grateful enough to my alma mater, that its spirit was the impressing upon all its students that its work, though nothing to be ashamed of, ought to be but the beginning of knowledge.

II. Knowledge came, but wisdom lingered for the scribes. And Christ was wise. The philosophy of Thomas Gradgrind stops with knowledge, with the perception and enumeration of facts. Wisdom is the perception of truth. Knowledge in true perspective and proportion becomes wisdom. The perception of the relation of things, the sense of the relative importance of things, this is wisdom. Knowledge deals with facts, wisdom with the principles that explain facts and that underlie conduct. There can be no wisdom without knowledge. But the wise man may be but poorly equipped with knowledge and still be wise, while mere knowledge can never confer wisdom.

Note how the wisest of all teachers dealt with the tribes. After innumerable attempts to catch him in a word, they brought to him to decide, what was a burning question among the Jews, whether it were lawful to pay tribute to Caesar or no. The more conscientious of the Jews still held to the theory that God was king. Then Caesar was the rival of Jehovah and to acknowledge his kingship was idolatry. We may suppose that people then as now are more conscientious about refusing to pay taxes than they are about paying what was due, and in this case the claims of religion and patriotism were joined to that of selfishness, so that the doctrine that tribute should be paid was an unpopular one. On the other hand the very men who asked in that question were thinking to appeal to the Roman authority against Christ, if he should dare to say that the payment of tribute was unlawful. Christ said, "Bring me a penny," an object lesson. "Whose image and superscription is this," he asked them, and they told him, "Caesar's." The situation has its humorous side. Christ has made them confess that they are at least enjoying the conveniences of the Roman Empire, the coin of the realm, guaranteed by the credit of the Empire itself, a pledge of stability in trade and protection in the rights of property. These are the things for which taxes are paid. Christ was too wise to touch the historic phase of the controversy about the tribute or to discuss the abstract right of the Roman to rule over the world. But here were those who were accepting the benefits of that rule. And more than that, the important thing was the sovereignty of God over the life and not such casuistical questions as the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar. And the two lessons came with irresistible force as the Master framed the epigram, Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's.

Once they came to him asking him for the authority which he did the mighty works and made the wondrous claims for himself. Tell us, they said, by what authority thou doest these things. Again the ludicrousness of the scene obtrudes itself upon the attention. I will ask you a question, he said to them. A question about authority, since that is the theme. "The baptism of John, was it from heaven or earth?" And they were wise enough to see how neatly he had turned the tables on them, these boasted dialecticians, these sifters of hairs. They said to each other, If we say, men, the people will stone us, for they have come to believe that John was a prophet. And if we shall say, God, he will ask us why we did not believe him. And so there was nothing left but the saddest of all sad things for those school-masters of the olden time, the confession of ignorance before their pupils, the people. We cannot tell whence it was, they are obliged to answer. And so they cannot press Him for an answer to their question about himself.

One of the most instructive studies in the Bible is the comprehensive treatment of the wise man and of the fool. Perhaps one reason for the popularity of the parables of Solomon is that they seem to deal adequately with the fool. The main idea of wisdom and of folly is the ability or the inability to recognize fundamental principles. The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. It was the rich fool, who said to his selfish soul, My barns bursting with plenty, Soul, thou hast much laid up for many years, take thine ease, eat, drink, be merry.

No teacher can teach with authority who has not a firm grip upon the essential things of life. No man can teach what he does not know. The whole subject matter of agnostic teaching is the uninteresting information that the teacher does not know, something that the ignoramus can teach without going to so much trouble.

There are some things that it is worth more to know than all the books can teach or the schools can impart. Hear the Master and the scribes once more: There was a whole department of knowledge from the scribal point of view in the matter of food and the manner of preparing it and eating it. Sanitation had become an imposing ceremonial. And Jesus brushed it all aside with the truth, Not that which entereth into a man defileth him but that which proceedeth out of the man. Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts and all the crimes.

Jesus Christ was wise because he saw the supreme importance of the moral and the spiritual. The unlettered of our fields or factories who believe in God and try to keep his commandments, are wiser far than the brilliant genius who despises the moralities and is blind to all spiritual truth. The wise man of the Bible is he that does the right and speaks the truth, that believes in the triumph of righteousness and in the inevitableness of the punishment of wickedness. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. And the conclusion of the whole matter is this, Fear God and keep his commandments.

It is not true yet in the South that this note of conviction as to the great essentials of religion, the great fundamentals of the gospel, is wanting. But how much of our literature, of the books that we read and that unconsciously influence us, lack that note which ought to be dominant in the life of men. There are some things that are settled and that we can afford to regard as settled and the conviction of their truth will give the tone of authority to our teaching.

III. And what shall I say of the sympathy of Christ? It brought Him from Heaven to earth, to begin with. For this, He who was in the form of God thought it not a prize to be retained that he was equal with God, but made himself of no reputation and took upon himself the form of a servant and was made in the likeness of men. That he might sympathize with the sons of men, he became obedient even unto death, bowing his head to his appointed fate, passing through the grey and cheerless doorway alone, but leaving it luminous henceforth for all who trust in him.

Not only must the teacher who wishes to command attention and respect possess sympathy, but in order to teach at all, one must have it. One must enter into the pupil's ideas, must "feel him think." Sympathy will awake response at last in the dullest brain, as it will stimulate to its highest endeavor the brighter minds. In order to enter into the Kingdom of childhood, as into the Kingdom of Heaven, we must be converted and become as little children. To the unsympathetic teacher the child instinctively wraps itself in an oilskin coat from which the distillations of instruction roll like water from a duck's back. The teacher who has the fellow-feeling, between whom and his pupils there is comradeship, may do what he will with them. Patience, perseverance, zeal, these are all comprised in loving sympathy.

I regard this as so self-evident that I shall not dwell upon it, but outline rather the exemplification of this quality in the teaching of the Master himself.

Every illustration used in teaching is a proof of sympathy thus far, that the teacher sees that the pupil does not understand or cannot understand, and the effort is made, through an apprehension of the pupil's limitations, to make him understand. We call the illustrations of Christ, Parables. And how full of them his instruction was. Even his miracles had as one design for them their use as object-lessons of truth.

Christ might have said to the disciples, "Truth is differently received by different people." Upon some minds it makes no impression, others receive it with emotion, but lack a thorough perception of it, others allow the cares of this world to crowd the truth out of their minds, while others still receive it and act upon

The marks on the Face.

I know a man who has a terrible scar on his face; and yet he is a beautiful man to look upon. As if to make up for the awful disfigurement accident has placed upon the man's features, some force working from within has been chiseling away there until now one forgets when gazing upon his face all about the fearful marks, seeing only the grace of the soul shining through.

It is not the scar on the face that makes a man ugly to look at; it is the scar on the soul that shows through and makes one dreadful to behold. Sin, cutting deep into the inner life, the heart-life, does more to mar the face than any disease or accident possibly could do. You and I have seen men from whose very faces we turned with sorrow and loathing. Upon every feature were written the awful lines telling of a life snken in the very depths of evil, a life lived in absolute forgetfulness of all that is high and true and holy.

Then, there are other faces upon which God seems to have pictured what high and holy thinking and noble living will do for those who love him. No defect in personal appearance can spoil the beauty of a face thus made glorious by the hand of the Master.

And yet, do we not sometimes think God is harsh in his dealing with us? Oh, how the chisel hurts us! Deeper and deeper the keen edge of sorrow and bitter experience forces its way down into our hearts until we cry out in very agony, "God pity and spare me! I can endure no more!" Yet, if we listen we may hear him saying: "My child, weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning! When that morning cometh you will see that every touch of my hand has been in kindness. I love you, and it is because I do love you that I have been working to bring out all that is lovely and grand in your life and character.

Shall we not, then, thank him here and now for all the experiences of life which so puzzle us to-day? We want to be beautiful—beautiful in face, life and soul. We want men to love and trust us, and we want God to approve of us when at last we come up before Him. And it is the life that mars or makes beautiful. We have seen how God can take the face upon which sin has written many a story of shame and wipe out every trace of the old life and set in its stead the lines of purity and loveliness of character, changing our vile bodies that they may be fashioned like unto His glorious body. May we not, then, welcome every experience which shall bring about in us such a transformation?—
E. L. Vincent.—Exchange.

Dr. Joseph Parker was once asked by a somewhat skeptical friend: "What did the Almighty do for the Martyr Stephen but permit him to be stoned to death?" The answer was: "I think the Almighty did more than at first sight may appear from a casual reading of the record. He did not visibly appear to the murderers; he was not audibly heard by any man in the crowd, he did not send a visible angel to deliver the martyr in the hour of his agony; but on these grounds it would be an infinite mistake to suppose that God did nothing for his servant. I tell you that in that moment of suffering and helplessness God enabled Stephen to say, 'Lord, lay not this sin to their charge!' That was what the Almighty did; and when the true value of spiritual ministry is known, it will be allowed that, in working this miracle of forgiveness in the spirit of the martyred man, God did more for Stephen than if he had sent a legion of angels to protect him from the ruffianism which wrought this death."

If we had prayed more, we need not have worked so hard. We have too little praying face to face with God every day. Looking back at the end, I suspect there will be great grief for our sins of omission—omission to get from God what we might have got by praying—

Some Fruits in the Koran Fields.

Mokpo, March 17, 1903

On my return to the Mokpo fields from America, the enthusiastic reception given me by the native Christians was very gratifying; and it was a great pleasure to note the development of the work. The local congregation is preparing to erect a nice, neat house of worship: for which they have already secured and prepared an excellent site overlooking the native town. It is to be built almost exclusively with native funds—two or three members subscribing what would equal one hundred dollars U. S. currency from their standpoint.

But it is about a recent trip to three or four of the stations that I wish now to speak. At the first place, about five miles from Mokpo, Mr. McKutchen and I spent the night and had an attentive audience of about fifty at the evening and morning services. Of these only one or two, as yet, claim to be Christians. At the next place, the magistracy of Naju, thirty five miles further on there are two professing Christians and we had an audience of eight or ten more. At Patatan ten miles to the north we had good congregations of eight of the eighteen applicants were received into the catechumen class. At Hannamal there were five applicants, three of whom were received. At Engge, a village in an exceedingly populous district, fifteen miles from there the Sunday morning congregation numbered about a hundred. Twenty five of these were applicants for baptism, of whom eleven were taken into the class. This group of believers has already built a neat house of worship that will accommodate about three hundred and has in it a nice room for the missionary to occupy on his visits. At each of these last three places regular Sunday and midweek services are held, conducted in turn by the believers. They are earnestly asking that we send them a leader who is better instructed than any of their own number and have practically agreed to support such a leader from the start, and pay all local and incidental expenses, thus falling in line with the self supporting principle on which we are trying to establish all our work.

A recent letter from Mr. Junkin states that he has just had seventy six applicants for baptism in his field—thirty one of whom were baptized and the rest assigned to the catechumen class for further instruction. Mr. Tate also writes in an equally encouraging way about his field. So our prayers are being answered and many are anxious to learn the way of life. On all sides there are calls for the missionary that he cannot answer. Our hands are more than full and we urgently need more workers to help look after the work already established. To say nothing of the vast outlying districts where the name of Jesus has never been heard.

May our hearts all be cheered in the fall by receiving several new workers for whom we have been praying and working.

Revival in Asia Minor.

A remarkable revival is going on in the city of Aintab, Asia Minor. It began with the Week of Prayer and a missionary writes to the London Christian "Prayer meetings became daily food, nay, daily life. Men who ridiculed religion; men who had come to church regularly and contributed to its current expenses from human motives, respectable men, church members, officials, men of high social standing, business men wrapped up in the one absorbing passion of amassing money—all stood up before the crowd, confessed their sins, and asked for mercy and pardon promising to make, as far as was in their power, full restitution. Nor has the movement been confined to the wealthy or respectable people. It is general along the whole line. Gamblers, drunkards, actors, the lowest type of people in that country have come to church, first from curiosity to see what was going on, not infrequently to ridicule and to cause riot; but before they were left, some have been converted men, and have even become eloquent preachers to their fellows.—Exchange.

Saul Rejected as King.

I Sam. 15. 13-23: July 26, 1903.

The Lord gave to Saul a Commission to destroy the Amalekites and all their possessions, on account of their wickedness and to fulfill His own predictions. Saul had express directions given him and had no more discretion in the matter than Joshua had when instructed to destroy the Canaanites. He was like a warrior sustained by a competent force, and commanded to execute a death's sentence. He had no option, but to obey the Divine Lawgiver. It was upon Saul's return from this expedition that he met Samuel at Gilgal, and the events mentioned in our lesson occurred. The teaching of this lesson may be presented under three topics.

1st. Complete Obedience Demanded.—Saul claimed "I have performed the commandment of the Lord." Samuel called attention to the audible evidence that he had failed to render perfect obedience. The King admits that while the refuse had been destroyed, the best of the sheep and oxen had been spared, and that while the Amalekites generally had been slain, Agag, their King had been taken prisoner. Perhaps Saul preserved Agag, to grace his triumph and he declares that it was not so much he as the people, who had spared the animals. He also affirms that of the spoil taken they purposed to sacrifice unto the Lord their God. Samuel sharply reproves Saul for his disobedience for "flying in the spoil and doing evil in the sight of the Lord. He vigorously enforces the lesson that partial obedience will not be accepted, and that nothing short of complete compliance with Divine directions, will secure God's approbation. He also shows that the effort to cast our own responsibility upon others is vain and that the most plausible excuses for disregarding Divine commands will not avail.

2. There is no Substitute for Obedience—Saul had to confess that his obedience had not been sincere and complete, but he proposes to condone his disobedience by valuable sacrifices. He designs offering to Jehovah some of the very best of the spoil and thinks that will make satisfaction, for his palpable neglect of Divine commands and for appropriating to himself some thing that should have been destroyed. Many others have reasoned like Saul and have endeavored to substitute formal acts of worship or gifts to the Lord for sincere obedience of heart and life. Not a few have built costly churches or reared stately charities, or dedicated large sums of money or paid for costly pageants or ceremonies, in the vain hope that these would win Divine favor, and atone for willful disobedience to God's plain commands. Samuel's words to Saul overthrow all such hopes and demonstrate that the Lord will accept nothing as a substitute for complete heartfelt obedience. The faithful Judge says "Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold to obey is better than sacrifice and to hearken than the fat of lambs." Christ perfected as Redeemer "becomes the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey Him."

3. Disobedience Leads to Rejection.—The path of disobedience is a downward one, and it becomes increasingly easy to repeat offenses. Saul disobeying respecting the Amalekites, soon disregards Divine commands as to the priesthood and its functions. Samuel here intimates the consequences of his disobediences, and in the next occasion declares it with much more emphasis. Nor does he fail to show the sinful and dangerous character of disobedience before indicating the sad result to which it leads. He classes disobedience to God's righteous commands with capital crimes that merit death. He affirms that disobeying God is opposing the will of the creature to that of the Creator, and raising the standard of treasonable rebellion against the sovereignty of Jehovah.

Lessons from Paul: Overcoming Our Hindrances.

II Corinthians 12:7-10; 10:10. Topic for August 2.

Protestants unite in giving to Paul the honor of being "in labors more abundant." No other of whom we have record did so much for the extension of Christianity. Because of the wonderful amount of work done by the apostle, we are too easily led to think that he was a man who had no hindrances to his work so far as his own physical condition and intellectual acquirements went. But in any such conclusions, we are induced more by measuring the results attained than by studying the facts in the case. Because of this we are inclined to think that there is no use of our taking Paul as an example for us. We put him in a class so far above us as to almost make him of a different creation. But let us study the Word and see what it teaches us.

Probably the best known picture of Paul represents him as standing in the presence of Agrippa. In appearance he is head and shoulders above the Roman soldiers who stand around. His is a commanding presence. But that picture is a mis-representation. His enemies in Corinth said of him, "his bodily presence is weak." Even his enemies would not have dared to say this to the Corinthians if the truth were otherwise. Paul had spent eighteen months in Corinth. He was known there. Then he speaks of himself thus, "I, who am base among you." The superstitious pagans among whom Paul labored believed a weak or deformed body to be a curse from their gods. It can be readily seen how much then Paul's weak body hindered him in making a favorable impression upon his hearers. Besides, this weak body made his long journeys and frequent exposures a grievous hardship. We are also told by his enemies, and Paul accepts it without any dissent, that "his speech is contemptible." We have been accustomed to think of Paul as possessing the eloquence of an Apollos. The passage referred to above would indicate otherwise. Paul had been educated to all the narrowness and bigotry of the Jews, and while his accepting Christ changed the whole aspect of his belief, we all know that it is hard to give up preconceived ideas and to adjust ourselves to new ideas, even when we are fully persuaded that the old ideas are wrong. The careful reader of the epistle to the Romans can see there not only a powerful argument for the Christian doctrines of grace, but a battle-field also. It was on this field that Saul of Tarsus made a last stand against Paul, the apostle, and the ideas of Saul of Tarsus forever went down in defeat.

Now it was with all these hindrances in his way that Paul did his great work. How was he able then to accomplish so much? In the twelfth chapter of Second Corinthians we have the answer. Paul had prayed three times that the thorn in the flesh, whatever it was, but which we may rest assured was something which interfered with his work, might be removed. Instead of the obstacle being taken away, God told him, "My grace is sufficient for thee, for my strength is made perfect in weakness." The apostle at once begins to rejoice, glorying in his infirmities because that through them the power of God is to be worked out perfectly, and he gives utterance to that paradox, "When I am weak, then am I strong." He had learned the lesson, that it is only by becoming weak to self that one can be strong in God. What Paul learned, we all must learn. If we would have the power of God resting upon us in its fulness, let us realize our own weakness and fall back heavily on God. Instead of the hindrances in our lives dragging us down, let us learn from Paul's experience that they can become the means of God's strength being made perfect in us. A weak body; a speech which is not enticing; a mind with a trend in a wrong direction; all these hindrances can be overcome by relying firmly on God's Spirit.

Teaching with Authority.

its teachings. And the disciples might have understood that but would they have cared much for truth in that form or would they have remembered it? What Jesus did say was, perhaps pointing to some husbandman bearing the grain basket on his arm as he scattered the seed, "Behold a sower went forth to sow, and some seed fell by the wayside and the fowls of the air came and devoured them up, some fell upon stony places where there was not much earth, and forthwith they sprang up because they had no deepness of earth, but when the sun arose they were scorched and presently withered away. Some fell among thorns and the thorns sprang up and choked them. But others fell upon good ground, and brought forth fruit, some thirty fold, some sixty, some an hundred fold." And who could forget that picture? It has lived, not only in the sacred story, but in poetry and song and on the painter's canvass.

What homely and yet what apt illustrations some of them were. The woman who took leaven for her three measures of meal—how striking the simile for the progress of his kingdom. For we know now that the principle of the leaven is life, not death. That the tiny vegetable forms change the character of the whole mass, as particle by particle the meal is touched and transformed from unleavened into leavened bread. So with Christ's disciples in this world. By contact with the children of the world these are changed also into the Christ-like character until all shall be like him and the world shall be leavened with his truth.

Take the Master's dealings with Thomas. Thomas was a dullard, a skeptic, a hard-headed materialist with no perception of spiritual things, almost impudent in his self assertiveness and his spirit of contradiction of that which he could not understand. How patient was the great teacher with Thomas! When Jesus had set his face to go to Jerusalem, for the sake of the comfort that was so sorely needed in the desolate home at Bethany. Thomas said, doubtless with a gesture of despair, Let us also go that we may die with him. That is, there is nothing left for poor us but to be sacrificed to his wilfulness. And what was Christ's answer to that? It was "Lazarus, Come forth."

And though he that was dead came forth at that mighty voice, when the voice itself had been stilled, and the loved form was lying in Joseph's tomb, Thomas was in the depth of black despair, perhaps with resentment mingled with his grief that he had counted the Christ as one who should rule over Israel. And now this is the end. So Thomas was about his business when the Lord appeared, and refused to believe the testimony of the other disciples. And then the Lord appeared to them all and to Thomas with the rest; and said, "Reach hither thy finger and behold my hands, and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side, and be not faithless but believing." And Thomas said, "My Lord and my God." It is Drummond that remarks that where the church has said too often of the heretic, Burn him, or even in our day, Cast him out, Christ said, Let us teach him.

The true teacher has the parent's sympathy for the children of his charge. There is many a crusty old bachelor of a pedagogue, as the world looks at him, whose paternal heart fairly beams with love and pride over his boys and girls. There is many an "old-maid school-teacher" into whose heart the Christ-child has come, who is a mother indeed to the little ones entrusted to her care. And where the love is, there is the true wisdom, and whether the knowledge be great or small, there are lessons learned that last with life and send their influence on towards the eternal years.

IV. And this naturally leads to the last great essential of authoritative teaching, character. After all has been said, it is character that tells, whether in the microcosm of the school-room or the larger world. The heart of the wise teacheth his lips to speak.

Character is something that cannot be concealed. It is a mark that is visible. Reputation is the idea of one's character which it held by strangers. But character is what a man is as his intimates know him. What is so intimate as the relation between teacher and taught, as they come into contact with each other day by day and week by week and month by month and often year by year? The teacher may think that he knows each one of his pupils. The pupils have an easier task. They put their heads together and the average of the opinions which they have expressed is struck, and that is the teacher's character. There is a proverb that the campus is infallible. It is as true of the school as of the college. The school-yard is at last unerring in its judgments and its discriminations.

What was the real difference between Christ and the scribes, to get back to our text? It was this, that whereas he went about doing good, they sounded the trumpet before them as they gave their alms, that whereas Christ brought back to life the son of the widow of Nain, they devoured widow's houses, that whereas they made clean the outside of the cup and platter, he was holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners. Given the scribe such knowledge and wisdom as man may attain and such affectation of sympathy as would deceive the very elect, and let the character be waiting, and the people would still cleave to Christ and say, He teaches as one having authority and not as the scribes. Again I call you to witness from your own experience. Does there not shine into your hearts even now the memory of some teacher of the old days, who was perhaps like Shakespeare in knowing small Latin and less Greek, who was innocent of pedagogy, and yet who manifested those qualities of sincerity and honesty and justice and integrity that made his character one that made its own mark upon your life. For the school-room is not only a place where instruction from the books is doled out to the pupils. It is a miniature of the school of life, with its work and its play, its rivalries, its disputes, its contentions, its love affairs, its friendships, a school where the children may learn the exercises of every virtue and also unhappily, of every vice of the grown-up world. What is it, that makes the teacher the king of his realm, that makes his word law and his sway absolute over all hearts? It is his character. And what is it that makes the inculcation of fine precepts and the instilling of lofty sentiments a very stench in the nostrils? It is that fatal lack of character that nothing else can supply.

Let me close then by commending to you all the study of the life and methods of the Great Teacher that study which, if undertaken with the true spirit of sympathy, of itself serves to conform us unto his image. If we would not be doing the most thankless task in all the world, if we would grow always into larger vision, if we would have our work endure even unto the day when the wood and the stubble shall be consumed, then let our lives reflect in some faint measure the rich glory of his life. Be not discouraged from the fact that His were the attributes of divinity. For He emptied himself of his glory and was made like unto his brethren. His knowledge, His wisdom, His sympathy were beyond description or expression. But chiefly this was recorded of him, He did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth. His own challenge, Which of you convinceth me of sin? has been unanswered through the ages. There went forth with his words as there flowed even from the hem of his garment, virtue.

May He be the teacher of us all. May we find Him to be the same patient Master that he was when he dealt with Peter and James and John and Thomas. May we find that in the contemplation of His life, beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, we shall be changed into the same image and from glory to glory.

And so when life's lessons are learned and we have graduated from the school of earth, when the day of final examination has dawned, may the record be written of us that we have sought knowledge and craved wisdom and given the inspiration of our sympathy and strive to be conformed to the character of the Great Master of the School of Haven.

Bible Study of the Two Obstacles between Man and Heaven. Part II. The Moral Obstacle.

Rev. S. S. Laws, D. D., LL.D.

(Concluded.)

A final word must be spoken respecting the relation of the sacraments of the supper and of baptism to the two obstacles which have been under consideration what precedes:

1.) The Supper. In it there are two elements and two sacramental actions. The elements are bread and wine. The sacramental actions are the consecration of the elements, setting them, or so much of them as may be used, apart from a common to a sacred use, the breaking of the bread and the pouring of the wine, the taking of the elements to the communicants, and finally the actual reception and participation of the elements by the worshippers. Now, every item in this count is significant.

When the elements are, by an act of worship, consecrated or set apart, they signify the doctrine of the incarnation: This is my body; this is my blood. By metonymy, a part is taken for the whole. Before this consecration the elements have no special significance. The bunting on the shopman's counter means nothing; but when the red and white stripes with a field of blue stars are set apart and combined in a flag, then it is full of meaning and symbolizes the power and honor of the United States.

The breaking of the bread and the pouring of the wine symbolize the doctrine of the atonement—body broken and blood shed for sin. The breaking of the bread is part of the institution and its omission is a mutilation of the ordinance.

The distribution, or gift of the elements to the company of believers, signifies the grace of God in the unsearchable gift of His Son to become incarnate, live and die for sinners.

But no one has, in fact, communed till both the elements are taken and received into the system. And this means the act of faith receiving Christ as offered in the Gospel. "By grace have ye been saved through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works, that no man should glory." (Eph. ii: 8).

That on which the soul feeds in this ordinance is not the elements, not the bread and wine, but the truth thus symbolized. These four fundamental truths—the incarnation, atonement, grace, and faith—personally apprehended and appreciated, bring into conscious realization what Jesus has done for us as a Saviour from sins. This is intelligible and is all the mystery there is about it. If you have faith personally in these truths the sacrament is simply a pictorial sermon, as a means of grace and sensible seal of the covenant promises of God.

(2.) Baptism is likewise a symbolic ordinance. The element is water. Among other and important uses, water especially serves as a cleansing agent. When brought into relation to the body it removes defilement. As water cleanses and purifies the body of uncleanness, so the Holy Spirit washes away the turpitude, the depravity of sin from the soul.

As the Supper symbolizes the work of the Christ, so the sacrament of Baptism symbolizes the work of the Holy Spirit. The two taken together pictorially signify the removal of both the obstacles which bar our way to heaven. Faith and holiness are the watchwords that gain admittance to heaven.

The spiritual meaning of the ordinances of the Mosaic dispensation has passed over into the new ordinances of the Christian dispensation, whilst the old ordinances as sensible observances have been superseded, the pass-over by the Lord's Supper and circumcision which, as an ordinance, signified by a surgical operation the cutting away or separation from the natural descent of original sin and all the corrupt consequences, by baptism. The circumcision of the heart meant a new heart, so that the symbolic lesson from circumcision was the same as that from baptism—the removal of sin from the soul. The significance of the old ordinances is concentrated in these two Sacraments. The lesson is not lost, but framed anew.

Long after the Christ had taught Nicodemus that we must be born again—born of the spirit from above, symbolized by the cleansing of water—the Jewish converts insisted that entrance into the Christian Church should be through circumcision. They seem to have attributed to it something more than the significance of a mere fleshly mark, and esteemed it as equivalent to baptism. However, when Christ came the obligation of the sensible religious observances of the ceremonial ordinances ceased. Their aim was accomplished. They no longer had any binding claims. The freedom of gospel service superseded the ceremonial law. The observance of circumcision, temple worship, and the festivals were no longer obligatory and became things indifferent. Hence, when the Jewish converts engaged in certain ceremonial practices through the force of habit or custom, it was not as a Christian duty. And the attempt to make circumcision a condition of membership in the church and Christian fellowship was effectively resisted, and, after a comparatively brief struggle, abandoned.

It came to be understood that as the Supper succeeded and superseded the passover, so Baptism succeeded and superseded circumcision.

There is nothing new or novel in either sacrament. All they do is to exhibit symbolically the old truths of the Bible familiarly held forth verbally and ceremonially. The significance of the whole scheme of salvation, in its great fundamentals, is sensibly and significantly set forth by them in a new manner. The truth is old, but the sacramental manner of sensibly symbolizing or picturing it to the imagination is new and as impressive as simple.

Let it be noted that it is from the very nature of these ordinances as symbolic that the taking of a single crumb of the consecrated bread or a single drop of the consecrated wine is as complete a communion as the eating of a loaf of bread or drinking a goblet of wine. In like manner, and for the same unanswerable reason, a single drop of water brought into contact with the body—whether the body moves to it or it to the body—in the solemn terms of administration presented by our Lord, as completely symbolizes the cleansing of the soul from sin by the Holy Ghost as a tank full or an ocean of water.

The actual change of soul from death in sin to life in God effected by the regeneration which is the initial act of the Spirit's symbolized work on the soul is like rising from the grave of sin to life. It is this subjective change or awakening that is analogous to the resurrection or awakening of Christ and not the mode of baptism itself.

The rising of the soul from spiritual death to spiritual life is the real point of comparison; for the body of the Saviour rose from physical death to physical life. Analogy is a resemblance of relations and not a direct resemblance of individual things; and so here the relation of the dead soul to the living soul is like to the relation of the dead body to the living body of the Christ. The analogy thus goes on all fours, as the saying is; but the four terms of these relations cannot be derived from the mode of baptism, for it is a case where the relations rest on the difference between the facts of life and death, neither of which is realized in the mode of baptism. Those who think they find the resemblance there misapprehend the case and simply confound the symbol with the thing symbolized—a lapse from Bible truth as real as that of transmuting the eucharist.

The ordinance addresses the senses, but the significance of it is spiritual and points to the removal of the moral obstacle from between man and heaven, as the Supper points to the removal of the legal obstacle.

This resurrection of the soul, as distinguished from the bodily resurrection, is pre-eminently and articulately designated in Scripture "the first resurrection." All who have been or shall be regenerated and raised to this newness of life are in some way associated with Christ in his mediatorial dominion. "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection * * * over these the second death hath no power" (Rev. xx:6; John v:21, 25; Eph. ii:4-6).

"We were baptized into his death. * * * We were buried with him through baptism into death that like as Christ was raised from the dead * * * so we also might walk in newness of life * * * Even so reckon ye also yourselves to be dead unto sin, but live unto God" (Rom. vi:3, 4, 11). In baptism confession is made of faith in the reality of the sensible bodily resurrection of Christ to a new life not simply nor mainly as a mere historic fact, but as evidencing and guaranteeing the exercise of the same power in raising the soul from death in sin to a new life in God. "Through him (ye) are believers in God that raised him from the dead * * * so that your faith and hope might be in God" (i Peter i:21). In Col. ii:11-13, appeal is first made to circumcision as having the same confessional import as baptism, and transition is immediately made thereto: "Buried with him in baptism * * * raised with him through faith in the working of God who raised him from the dead." Our resurrection is then described as spiritual. The physical resurrection of Christ confirms our faith in God's power to effect our spiritual resurrection. As God raised Christ's dead body to life, so He is competent and pledged to raise the dead soul to life. As in healing the paralytic and pardoning his sins, the physical and spiritual go together.

All this is the work of the same spirit of God. As faith in the bodily resurrection of Christ implies faith in and points to the resurrection of the soul, so the surprising reflex of this truth is seen in Rom. viii: 11, where the indwelling of this Spirit of God becomes the assurance of our bodily resurrection.

Encouragement.

"A bruised reed He shall not break, and smoking flax He shall not quench."

The presence or absence of genuine encouragement has much to do in shaping the character and destiny of mankind. The universal need of the help of encouragement, arises out of the changed conditions of the race, by reason of its apostasy from God. I was a fearful ruin that sin wrought in the fortune of the race, when poisoning its life current at the fountain head, it changed the pure waters of holiness and happiness into the turbid stream of guilt and depravity: laden with all the miseries of this life and the unutterable woes of the lost in the world to come. As soon as a sinner realizes his true condition, either through the elementary instruction of natural religion, or under the search-light of divine truth, applied to him by the Holy Spirit; does he begin to indicate in some manner and to some extent his present distress and fearful foreboding. Among the many sad scenes of this world, that of discouraged people is not the least; timid, irresolute, and helpless, they are wrapped in a gloom, near akin to the shadow cast by approaching despair. The counterpart of this spectacle makes the world brighter and happier. We see it in the little child learning to walk under the encouraging smiles of a loving mother, and in the strong man grappling with the great issues of life, nerved alike by the lessons of the past and the visions of the future; and above all, when a life for the first time becomes radiant with the blessed hope of salvation.

In the redeeming work of Christ there is provision both for the life that now is, and that which is to come; and full indemnity from the power of sin is proclaimed for both worlds. On the terms of the gospel, the Redeemer offers the bliss of Heaven and also the peace of God on earth: victory over the last enemy, death, and also over the life-long enemies, self, the world, and Satan.

True religion is a preparation for death and judgment, and also a help and comfort while living. Christ is our Advocate with the Father in Heaven, and at the same time our refuge and strength on earth. Burden-bearing is inseparable from life in this world, but for every conceivable condition there is compensation in the divine assurance, "My grace is sufficient for thee."

In the words now under consideration, the Evangelist, quoting from the prophecy of Isaiah, gives a most encouraging description of the character of our Lord. Under the imagery of Christ not rejecting a broken reed and a smoking taper His tender compassion for His weakest followers, is strikingly exhibited. The reed-stalk, at best, is a feeble growth, and when broken or crushed is well nigh useless; and the most that can be said for a smoking taper is, that the fire is not entirely extinct. These emblems of weakness set forth the true standing of many in the household of faith. There is spiritual life in them, but it is very weak, and there is sincerity of purpose, but it is weighed down by manifold imperfections. The blessed truth that Christ will not destroy this class on account of their infirmities should be as welcome and cheering as the gentle dew of night reviving the drooping flowers. But this is not all of the glad tidings I would bring to such believers.

The context, and other scriptures teach, that Christ will lift up and strengthen the broken reed, and relight the smoking taper, and carry forward His work of grace to completion.

In the fold of the good Shepherd there are weak and feeble sheep, as well as strong ones; they are all His. He knows them by name, and tenderly careth for them. The good Shepherd is come, that the sheep might have life more abundantly. In the same fold there are lambs as well as sheep. "He taketh the lambs in His arms, and carrieth them in His bosom." Let no one then despise the day of small things in the religious experience of himself or others. Weak faith as really is strong faith, gives the believer an interest in Christ, the difference between the two is in the degree of comfort and usefulness that follows.

The light of the morning dawn is faint and unsteady, but is vastly superior to the darkness of night; and better still, it is the sure prophecy of an approaching perfect day. During the forty days between our Lord's resurrection and ascension, He was frequently in touch with broken-reed and smoking-flax-discipleship, and in this association there is full verification of His wonderful tenderness to all such. On the morning of the resurrection He appeared first to weeping, disconsolate, Mary Magdalene, and in a few words of tender sympathy changed her mourning into joy, and sends her, as the first herald, to announce His resurrection to His brethren, and to Peter, the one of all the company that most needed a kind word from his Master. The same day He joined Cleopas and his companion, as with sad hearts they went to Emmaus, and making Himself known to them, they joyfully returned to Jerusalem telling what they had seen and heard. In the evening, greeting the assembled apostles with the friendly salutation, "Peace be unto you," He gave them infallible proofs of His identity and revived their drooping faith and hope, and a week later, He even condescended to meet the extreme demand of unreasonable Thomas.

In the formal restoration of Peter to office, on the shore of Tiberius, faithfulness and love were mingled together. The thrice repeated question, "lovest thou me?" varied only by the words, "more than these?" contained a delicate reference to the empty boasting and profane denial of the past. But the words "feed my lambs," "feed my sheep," evidently mean forgiveness for the past and confidence for the future.

In the varied deficiencies of believers at the present day, it is easy enough to trace a marked family-likeness to these early disciples. The stock of spiritual knowledge in some believers is small in quantity and defective in quality. Their faith and hope are weak, their growth in grace, feeble, and the current of their spiritual life runs low. In this enfeebled condition, some are further weighed down with the burdens incident to poverty and poor health. While others are troubled with the infirmity of a temperament as impulsive as that of Peter or as doubting as that of Thomas.

Now, let it be noted, that the resources of language, literal, and figurative, are taxed to their utmost in expressing the tender concern of the blessed Saviour for all such troubled, needy disciples. To the large class of the weary and heavy laden, He says, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." To all those staggering under the manifold burdens of life, in a sinful world, His word is "cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He will sustain thee." And to that vast multitude, who are dissatisfied with their present religious attainments, and who are thirsting for something higher and better, His message is "whosoever will let him take of the water of life freely."

The condition of Bartimeus, the blind beggar, as he sat by the wayside, was one of extreme sadness. But he was a man of earnestness, of faith and of action. Powerful forces are these, in any life. In this instance, they united in the irrepressible cry, "thou son of David, have mercy on me," and the answer came back, "thy faith hath made thee whole." The needed blessing was found by him who earnestly, believingly, and promptly sought it.

The Consolidation.

The question of consolidation of Schools in Atlanta is now before a number of our Synods. It is one on which every Minister and Church in these Synods must vote. A full and clear understanding of the question is not only desirable, but imperative, if the voting is to be intelligently and rightly done. A question of such local importance is of general interest to the Church. All our brethren should and I trust can meet on the common platform; "We desire to do right, and to do that which is best for Christian Education in our beloved Presbyterian Church." What is right in this case? It is said that legal and moral questions are involved. As I understand Dr. Mc F. Alexander's articles: The position of the Board, as stated through, and by him, is that the endowment raised for the Southwestern Presbyterian University was all raised and donated on condition that the School forever remain in Clarksville Tenn. and thus the end of the institution was primarily to benefit the Town or City of Clarksville, by educating young men there; That this condition might be obviated by reason of limitations fixed by Tennessee laws, but that it would be immoral to thus obviate this difficulty and not comply with the expressed condition in which the fund was raised and donated.

From this promise he builds his argument on the legal and moral side of the question.

Thus those favoring the consolidation and consequent removal of the Southwestern Presbyterian University maintain that the founders of the institution, and the donors thereto, were founding and giving to a Presbyterian Institution to educate young men; that this was the primary purpose, and end of the founders and benefactors of said institution in establishing and supporting it; that all endowment, apart from that raised by Clarksville, certainly was raised not for Clarksville, but for the Southwestern University to educate young men. That the building up of the Town of Clarksville was only an incident.

Dr. Palmer gave his "heart's blood" to Southwestern Presbyterian University as an institution to educate young men, not to it as an institution to be located at Clarksville; that he was not born and reared in Clarksville; that he spent no part of his ministerial life here; that he had no ties to bind him to that town or city, more than to scores of other towns in the South; that the McComb Endowment "given through Dr. Palmer, and for his sake," was donated for the same purpose namely: because it was an institution to educate young men, and not because it was an institution located in Clarksville; that Clarksville was selected as a location for the University because of its geographical position; that if there can be found a better geographical position, where the end of the institution can be better accomplished, that there will be nothing illegal or immoral in removing it to that position; that the founders of the Southwestern University desired to secure young men, for some of its schools at least, from our Synods in Kentucky and Missouri, and from the Synod of Arkansas, none of these synods having at that time within their bounds a Theological Seminary of our Church, that these synods have now allied themselves with other schools and Seminaries, so that Clarksville is now on the extreme border of the most Northern of the synods controlling the institution; that the position that once seemed wisely chosen, does not so appear now. Kentucky, Arkansas, and Missouri do not send their young men to Southwestern Presbyterian University at Clarksville, Tenn. Tennessee gives only a feeble support outside of Clarksville, and hardly enough there to take up the free scholarships; that the main support comes from Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana; that if the institution can be removed to a place where it is as accessible to Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama, and gain the support of two or three other synods, and $250,000.00 additional endowment, and educate more young men, wherein is the immorality in removing it?

Brethren of integrity differ as to which of the above positions is right; so far as I can see, Dr. Mc. F. Alexander did not adduce a single thing in support of his statement, that the McComb endowment and the other endowment, apart from the $5,000.00 raised in Clarksville, was given on condition that the institution forever remain in Clarksville. Unless there be something that he did not state, I can see nothing immoral or illegal in the proposition to consolidate.

The question as I see it is, "is it for the best interest of Southwestern Presbyterian University, established to educate young men to be consolidated with other schools and removed to Atlanta?" Surely, the Conference to consider this question cannot be immoral or illegal, unless the Conference do something immoral or illegal. Is it for the best interest of our Church and the cause of Christ to remove it? If it can be rightly done and the removal will enable the Institution to give an education to more young men than now attend it? The answer must be the removal if it is for the good of the Church and Christian education.

The interests of the Town ought not out-weigh the interest of our Church. Can we reasonably hope that the proposed University will have a larger attendance and educate more young men than now attend the Southwestern Presbyterian University? The number of Presbyterians in Tennessee is compared with the number of Presbyterians in Georgia and is 18,000 to 16,000 in favor of Tenn. But has Tennessee sent her boys during the past 20 years to Southwestern Presbyterian University? If she has not done so in the past, can we hope that she will in the future? Will not Atlanta with her many strong Churches give better support to the University than Clarksville can with her one Church? Will not Georgia give better support than Tennessee has done? Will not Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida each increase their support? Is it quite just to say that this is a movement in which the Atlanta brethren are trying to take "without our consent," the University, when the Alumni in this Synod, all save one of the many that have spoken to me, and nearly all of the Pastors and Elders of the Synod earnestly favor the consolidation, believing it to be for the best interest of the University? when perhaps the Faculty of the University would be forced to say if questioned, that their good judgment approve the consolidation. Who is in the best position to know whether the Atlanta subscription is a genuine bona-fide offer? Honest intelligent bankers, business men and ministers in Atlanta, or an honest intelligent minister in New Orleans? Dr. Alexander says it is not a good subscription. The Atlanta brethren say it is a good subscription. Has Dr. Alexander examined the subscriptions? The members of the synod have a right to know whether it is a good offer or not. Unless it is known to be a bad offer, it ought not to be declared bad.

It is said that there are temptations and pit-falls for youths in large cities. This is true, and also true of smaller cities. Clarksville is not an exception. Clarksville is about the size of Jackson, Mississippi, and of Charlottesville, Virginia. Does any one imagine that these smaller cities are free from pit-falls? No Alumni of Southwestern Presbyterian University, or of Millsaps College, or of the University of Virginia will tell you that they are free from pit-falls. Dr. Alexander says "that if the Synods allow so much as a discussion of this question of consolidation, they will be violating the Plan of Union, impeaching the personal integrity and uprightness of their members of the Board; that the sole control of the Southwestern Presbyterian University is vested in the Board of Directors; in another place he speaks of "the four controlling synods." He does not explain what he means by controlling Synods; would it be illegal and out of order, and an impeachment of our trustees if we discuss the question, at the approaching meeting of the Synod, of asking the Atlanta brethren to give $250,000.00 to the Southwestern Presbyterian University, and let it remain in Clarksville, Tenn.? If, when the report of the Southwestern Presbyterian University is made to Synod, that report should contain the resolutions passed by the Board relative to removal, should every member of Synod put his finger on his mouth, and let the trustees move to refer it to a committee without discussion? When referred to the committee, would the committee have a right to read and discuss the report? If so, is not the committee a part of Synod, and should they not report on the report to Synod? Would it not be strange if controlling Synods could not even discuss questions of vital interest to their institutions? The Southwestern Presbyterian University has a splendid faculty of noble men. Its Alumni are worthy of their Alma Mater, in influence, position and power; they add to her honor. No one desires to discount her great and enduring work. Can we make the circle of her influence wider by giving to her greater opportunity? This is a question I think her friends may rightly discuss. A cause must antedate its effect. It is not just to attribute the falling off in the number of students at Clarksville, and the question as to the Chancellorship to this discussion as to removal, for the discussion is of later date. I will not discuss the importance of the great University to our Church. I feel we all see clearly, that if we hold the high position that we now have in the educational world, that such an institution, as the consolidation promises to give, is necessary. Is it not true that the plan for the Southwestern Presbyterian University instead of being originally for the "Mississippi Valley" grew out of a movement in 1871 to have a Southern Presbyterian University, which movement failed, because of inability to secure the co-operation of local institutions, especially in the East and Northeast. (See Assembly's Digest p. 211).

"What does Dr. Alexander, speaking for the Board, mean by the "great Mississippi Valley," for which he assumes the institution was founded? I say "assumes" for it is nowhere stated in the official papers so far as I can learn. Does he mean by "Mississippi Valley" the country drained by the Mississippi River and its tributaries? Then Jackson, on the Pearl, is not in that valley; and one half of Mississippi is not in that valley; 4-5 of Alabama is not in that Valley; and 1-3 of Louisiana is not in that Valley and Texas, once with us, is not in that valley. Does he determine the valley by accessibility? Then Atlanta is in that Valley, for it is 75 miles nearer New Orleans than Clarksville is to New Orleans. Texas was once with us, and was invited again to join the compact in 1897 and New Orleans is nearer to Atlanta than the nearest point of Texas is to Clarksville. Texas too, was admitted to the Compact, after the Plan of Union was launched. If it was not revolutionary then to take in Texas, how is it revolutionary now, that Texas and Arkansas have withdrawn, to take in the synods of Georgia, South Carolina and Florida? Where did they ascertain that the "Plan of Union" must remain unchanged forever?

The Synods once voted on changing the Plan of Union as to the Chancellor being Ex-Officio President of the Board, the synod of Mississippi voting for the change. Why did not the Board say then that it was a violation of the "Plan of Union" to discuss the matter and ask that it be tabled. Dr. Alexander has not told us what he means by "the four controlling Synods?" I will suggest an answer: The Synods may discuss the Plan of Union and change it; They may "discuss" what the Board does, even if they do not change it. Now since it is plain that Dr. Alexander's Mississippi Valley is determined by accessibility, and Atlanta is in the "Valley" being nearer, by the number of miles given below, to the following places than Clarksville is, 75 miles nearer to New Orleans; 65 miles nearer to Meridian; 25 miles nearer to Columbus; 75 miles nearer to Winona; 20 miles nearer to Kosciusko; and 100 miles nearer to Birmingham, Montgomery, and Mobile.

The question for us to consider is, "is it desirable to have a "Great University at Atlanta."

Where do you Educate your Children?

The above question is timely and paramount for Presbyterians. In the spirit of sincere kindness it is propounded. The various schools and colleges of the country have closed their year's work, and flushed with feelings of pride over past success and of enthusiasm for the future, their teachers, their agents, their representatives are in the field, going from town to town, from family to family, seeking patronage by every plausible inducement, by every wooing persuasive, irrespective of denominational affiliations. And many Presbyterian parents, either from forgetfulness or indifference or pecuniary considerations, send their children to schools of other denominations. Is it right? While there may be nothing intrinsically wrong in it, till, it exhibits marked inconsistency, and shows a great lack of appreciation for one's own institutions and the efforts on the part of one's own Church to provide for the education of its children.

It is a fact which is too sadly manifest; alas, too prevalently true, that there are many schools under Presbyterian management, under Presbyterian supervision, Presbyterian and Synodical, which are in a languishing and repining condition because Presbyterians fail to give them adequate support. Probably it is too often forgot, and too little remembered in this age of much mooted "boad mindedness and liberalism" that the educational institutions of any denomination, whether Methodist, Baptist, Episcopal, Presbyterian, or Catholic, constitutes the right arm of its power. When Cardinal Manning would arouse English Catholics to "lengthen the cord and strengthen the stakes," he pointed them to Catholic institutions with the timely admonition to build these, patronize these, as the surest means of increasing the potency and efficiency of Catholicism. It is profoundly true, not merely for Catholics, but for Presbyterians, the most potent means for promoting the progress and increasing the efficiency of any denomination is to give it schools and institutions of learning and adequately support them with contributions of money, with a library of select literature, and with pupils and students. The surest way to limit the progress and decrease the influence and efficiency of any denomination is to deprive it of institutions of learning or to leave them to the wild boar of the wood to ravage them and to the feet of the passerby to tread down to barrenness and uselessness.

That it makes a difference where Presbyterians educate their children is plain and obvious. By means of its schools each and every denomination, in a small way, propagates itself. Presbyterian children in schools of other denominations are more or less under that influence, moving in and breathing that atmosphere, and are gradually weaned from their own church; if not wholly so, yet partially, and their fidelity and usefulness to their own Church is estranged and weakened in proportion. Ministers and leading men of a given denomination are constantly visiting their schools, addressing the students, magnifying the essential features of their church, and to suppose for one moment that it has no influence upon the pupils is absurd. To suppose that children of one denomination can attend the school of another denomination without there being brought to bear upon them influence likely to win them is equally absurd. A Presbyterian whose wife died and left him with two daughters sent them to a Catholic school. They were then about five years old. They entered Presbyterian Protestants; they came out Roman Catholics. In a school which is under the control of a denomination which is Armenian there are about forty Presbyterian boys session after session. The principal employs every occasion to minimize Calvinism, and more frequently than once, has told the students that Calvinism is becoming obsolete; that Presbyterianism is waning in its influence. In another school under the same denominational control there are anywhere from twelve to twenty Presbyterian girls, annually. For aught their parents know these Presbyterian girls are allowed to attend the Presbyterian Church. But are they? On Sabbath morning they are permitted to attend provided it suits the convenience of some teacher, and every Sabbath night they are ushered off to the church which uses the school as its drawing card.

These instances are sufficient to arouse the generality of Presbyterians to loyalty and fidelity to their own institutions. This is their sole intention, not a quarrel, not a war on other denominations and their schools and noble efforts; but a word of timely admonition to Presbyterians. If a man's church and faith is worth anything to him, it must be worth something to his children. If there is anything in Presbyterianism for father and grandfather, for mother and grandmother, there is something in it for the children and grand-children. What that is, will be determined by the manner in which the children and grandchildren are trained relative to it. Probably this may savor of sectarianism. It is not wise to fear that supposed stigma. In a very pertinent sense all are sectarians; and those who most vehemently decry sectarianism are most sectarian of all. The social, the intellectual, the moral, the religious world, has always been, and is no less now, an arena of contending ideas and systems. And as one mingles with the representatives of various ideas, he will scarcely be deceived into thinking that they stand meek and unhesitating and aimless. They do not stand like the ass which Stern describes, who seemed to invite abuse, and to say to every passerby: "Don't kick me, but if you will you may." No! all ideas, the false as well as the true, all systems, the heretical as well as the orthodox, all denominations, the Catholic as well as the Protestant, and Protestant of one head as well as Protestant of another, are positive and assertively, working by every possible means, employing every persuasive art to further their influence and to increase their efficiency. It is no time, therefore, for Presbyterians, the people who have given the world and this country such lofty ideals and everlasting principles, to allow their knees to become weak or their hands slacken in the support and maintenance of their institutions, because some may cry "sectarian?" Every man, in his character, in his speech, in his actions, is sectarian. He would amount to nothing, either good or bad, either socially, politically, intellectually, religiously, without being sectarian. Let Presbyterians fear not the cry "sectarian!" in this age; but rather, rally to the loyal support of their own institutions, and thereby, "lengthen the cords and strengthen the stakes."

Faith Transcendent.

This life may be a gladsome round
Of love and beauty blended,
But even in its happiest hours
We sigh for joys long ended,
And stop 'mid laughter, song and play,
To mourn for some dead yesterday.

Fame's dazzling star serenely shines
And lures another wooer,
Yet even as its lustre burns
The dark begins to lower,
And many curse their lofty aim
Who court the fickle star of Fame.

The light that lights the lover's eye
Sheds radiance celestial,
Yet love's pure flame oft' serves to fire
A lust that's all terrestrial.
And heavenly pictures lovers paint
Too oft' are touched with worldly taint.

The Springtime charms, and fettered feet
Would fain find fancy's goal,
But Springtime longing in the heart
Makes sadness in the soul;
For 'mid life's artificial frost
We feel its wealth of sunshine lost.

The peace that friendship still imparts
Is ours so long the fates are fair,
But let them frown! then seek the hand
Late at our side—it is not there.
For friendship's reared on golden sands,
And storm waves beat at last all strands.

But thou sweet Faith, that lights the night
Of gloom, when souls with grief are torn,
Thy star's not dim, my aching sight,
Full long thy radiance hath borne.
Last Friend and best! thy feet Hope shod,
Leave prints that point the path to God.

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

Dr. Laws closes his series of articles, which have been a distinct contribution to the theological literature of the day. He has discussed, with great ability, the two obstacles between man and heaven, and incidentally his treatment of the universal salvation of infants was most timely and convincing. We hope that these scholarly papers may be published in permanent form. The article on the Consolidation of Clarksville and Columbia at Atlanta, is written by a Mississippi minister whose name is withheld for the present. It is a convincing proof that all are not of one way of thinking in that Synod. The article by Rev. R. L. Benn is a timely contribution to the educational numbers of the Standard. Encouragements, by the widely known and loved L. McK., is helpful, as his contributions always are. The poem by George F. Vielt, like all of his that he has favored the Standard with, is a good specimen of poetic art.

Rev Thomas A. Hoyt, D. D

We print elsewhere a cut of Dr. Hoyt, who was at one time one of the best known preachers of the Southern Church. He was born at Beech Island, South Carolina, in 1828, was educated at the University of Georgia, received his theological training at Columbia and was pastor in Louisville, Kentucky, at the outbreak of the Civil War. He was so ardent a supporter of the Southern cause that he was forced to leave Louisville and refuged to Canada until the close of the war. After becoming eminent in the business world of New York City, at the close of the war, he again entered the ministry and became pastor of the First Church, Nashville, Tenn. He was Moderator of the Southern Assembly in 1880. In 1884 he was called to the Chambers Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, which he served with great acceptance, in spite of his staunch adherence to his Southern traditions and opinions. He managed with fine business sense the consolidation of the Chambers and Wylie Churches into one of the most prosperous organizations now in Philadelphia and then was made pastor emeritus, by his devoted people. The editor remembers with gratitude his personal kindness while on a visit to Philadelphia and the outpouring of affection on the occasion of some notable anniversary of his. He has been a frequent contributor to the Standard since that time and his death is felt here as a personal loss.

At the funeral services, held Friday, July 3rd, in the Chambers-Wylie Memorial Church, Rev. Dr. E. Trumbull

Lee, D. D., LL. D., pastor, presided. Rev. Robert Hunter, D. D., offered the invocatory prayer. Rev. Loyal Y. Graham, D. D., gave an extended account of the life, character and services of Dr. Hoyt, and all felt that the eulogy of him as a man, preacher and theologian was well deserved. Rev. George S. Burnfield, D. D., Moderator of Presbytery, made the closing prayer. The officers of the church, elders and trustees, served as a guard of honor. The large congregation present testified to its affection for its departed pastor by word and deed, and the leave taking presented many an affecting scene.

Church News.

VIRGINIA.

RICHMOND.—At the Grace St. Church the Communion was observed yesterday morning. The Session received ten (10) new members into the church, 7 by letter and 3 on profession of faith. The pastor, Dr. Jno. Witherspoon, leaves this week on his vacation, which he will divide between Rehoboth-Bead, Delaware, and Castile, N. Y.

NORFOLK; Second Church.—Rev. Dr. J. Ernest Thacker, pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, this city, left last night at 9 o'clock for Newport News, from which place he sailed early this morning on the steamship Powhatan for London. Before leaving here last night he conducted his regular Wednesday evening service, and it being known that he was about to go abroad there was a large turnout of his membership to say good-bye and wish him a good time while away. Before leaving he was presented by his congregation with a ticket to London and return and a well-filled purse of American gold. He will be away for two months and goes for a rest. He will spend most of the time in England and Scotland, and will make a brief trip to the Continent, taking a run over to Paris. His pulpit here will be supplied during his absence by different Presbyterian divines, and the congregation is delighted to have for the first few Sundays Rev. Mr. Griffin Bull, of Atlanta, Ga., who, with his wife and children, are summering here—on a houseboat off Willoughby Spit. Mr. Bull is a member of the Second Presbyterian Church here, having been raised in Norfolk, and the people of that congregation feel great gratification at the large success that has already attended his ministry. He is a fine preacher and has a splendid standing in the Southern Presbyterian connection.—Public Ledger.

Rev Walter Henderson Robertson.

Just as our pages were being carried to the press on Monday of last week we learned the fact that Rev. Walter Henderson Robertson died on the night of Thursday, July 2. He was one of those whom people cannot fail to cherish and to love. By all his friends he was esteemed and trusted.

He was a native of Amelia county, Va., born June 7, 1847. He was of a family of prominence; his literary education was at the University of Virginia, and his theological training at Union Theological Seminary, Hampden-Sidney. He was licensed in 1880 by Abingdon Presbytery, and ordained by East Hanover Presbytery April 15, 1881. His first pastorate was in Gloucester county, Va. In 1885 he became the pastor of the Warrenton and Litchfield churches, in Fauquier county; there he has labored for about eighteen years with great acceptance.—Christian Observer.

Winchester Presbytery.

The Presbytery of Winchester met in adjourned meeting in the Martinsburg Presbyterian Church, June 30, 1903, 3:30 p. m. Present twelve ministers and seven elders.

Pastoral relations dissolved.—Presbytery dissolved the pastoral relation between the Kearneysville Church and the Rev. Chas. Ghiselin, D. D., as requested by him; but postponed the consideration of his request for the dissolution of the pastoral relation with the Shepherdstown Church, till the stated fall meeting of Presbytery, Sept. 1.

Presbytery dissolved the pastoral relation between the Moorefield Church and the Rev. Geo. W. White, D. D., by making him pastor emeritus on a salary of $200 a year. The following paper was adopted by a rising vote.

In granting the request of the Rev. Geo. W. White, D. D., for the dissolution of his pastoral relation with the Moorefield Church, Winchester Presbytery desires to place upon record its appreciation of Dr. White's exalted Christian character, his literary and theological attainments and the eminent services he has rendered to the cause of Christ in a pastorate lasting for thirty-seven years. He has been a tower of strength for the cause of religion and the Presbyterian Church in the whole South Branch valley and the adjacent regions, and the influence of his ministry has been manifest in many quarters besides his own immediate field. Gifted with social graces of a peculiarly winning character, of a benign disposition and able to adapt himself to all classes and conditions of men, his ministry has been a blessing not only to Christian people, but also to the great unconverted world without the Church and Presbytery can only deplore the necessity which requires the severance of a pastoral relation which removes from active service a brother beloved, and one so well fitted to win souls to the Redeemer.

Presbytery further desires to express its earnest wish and to offer its devout prayer that God who has led and sustained our dear brother hitherto may comfort and sustain him even to the end of his life, granting him many years of usefulness in the tender relation now existing between him and the Moorefield Church and crowning his labors at last with an abundant entrance into the Kingdom of Glory.

Conference of Sabbath Schools and Young Peoples' Societies.

For several years in Lafayette Presbytery the Committees of Sabbath Schools and of Young People's Societies have arranged for an annual union Conference, at which addresses are made and questions discussed pertaining to these two great interests of the Church's work. Usually the conference meets on Tuesday evening and continues in session during the next two days and evenings: one day being devoted to Sabbath Schools and one to Societies and their work, and the evenings being given to addresses of a more general character.

The Conference this year met in Lexington, Mo., July 14-16, with an attendance of eighty-seven, chiefly young men and women, from 16 or 18 churches of the Presbytery. The Conference was opened with an address on "Character Building," by Rev. G. L. Leyburn; the first day was given to Young People's Societies and their work, with questions as to best methods, means, &c, the second to the Sabbath School, its place, purpose, management, &c, &c; on the second evening there were two addresses, one and an excellent one—by Judge Samuel Davis of Marshall on "The type of Christian Character in Woman which contributes most to the welfare of the Church and the World," and by Dr. W. R. Dobyms of St. Joseph on "Calvanism and Missions," or rather this was to have been his subject, but owing to the late arrival of a train he gave instead a brief account of the Conference at Lookout Mountain which he attended, and closed with a strong and stirring appeal to the young people present to take into serious and prayerful consideration God's present call to Mission work at home or abroad, before finally deciding their life's work. On the third evening there were addresses on "The Sabbath School and Home Missions" by Dr. O. W. Gauss, who for some months has been doing most efficient work in the lower Ozark H. M. field, and a second address, the closing one of the conference was on "Our Children for Christ and His Service."

Of the second day I cannot speak, being compelled to go elsewhere, but of the first it may be said: All the papers and addresses were admirable and interesting, but the afternoon was the most valuable and helpful: first there was an excellent address on "Christian Patriotism" by Mr. A. D. Harrison, a young lawyer of Kansas City, which was well conceived, carefully thought out and forcibly delivered: then followed what was the most noteworthy feature of the convention, an earnest and able discussion of the general subject of the spiritual life, especially the place, the need, the worth, and power of a true spiritual life; the special topics were, Plea for a deeper spiritual life," "Prayer and its relation to this life," "The word and its relation thereto," and "Filled with the spirit," and the speakers, Rev. Messrs. Bell and Ross, two of our younger men, and Drs. Chaney and Gordon. To all that was said most earnest and devout attention was given, and it is hoped that for many there will henceforth be a deeper, higher, broader spiritual life. G. L. L.

SEMINARY.—Zion (Seminary) church was organized in 1891 by Bro. Chandler. From that time we have worshipped in the school house. It seems best that we have a house of our own. Our growing Sunday School, and increasing congregations need it. We give to Mrs. M. Faler and Mr. M. Faler Mangold, Hazlehurst, our thanks for a site. We thank the King's Daughters, Crystal Springs, for help in advance. This is an appeal to all the "willing hearted" Ex. 25:2, for help. We will put up a plain house in which we can be at home. #### MISCELLANEOUS.

Home Mission Notes

Our work in the Presbytery of Central Texas is progressing reasonably well. During last year three churches were organized. If we were able to place a Superintendent in the field, there are a number of places ripe for a Presbyterian harvest. This is a compact Presbytery, consisting of 15½ counties, 14,500 square miles, and a population of 500,000. It is the practical centre of the Baptist, M. E. South and Christian denominations in the state, as each have their university within our bounds. Naturally it is also the centre of intense home mission activity, with no little rivalry. The Methodists have their Conference secretary who devotes his entire time to home mission work, and the others have missionaries, colporteurs and evangelists in sufficient numbers. Our sole dependence for evangelistic work so far is upon the committee and other pastors of the Presbytery. An extensive summer's work has been planned, and is being executed. The chairman of our committee has been directed to visit all the home mission churches to advise with them about the work, encourage them to self support, and endeavor to secure even a more effective organization.

A practical, satisfactory organization of Presbyterian home mission work is attained when every church in the Presbytery, together with the Assembly's committee, pledge a fixed yearly amount sufficient to keep a superintendent and a colporteur in the field, and to supplement the salaries of our faithful men in the field to a living basis. The superintendent by helping weak churches towards self support would relieve the committees of cost and responsibility and enable them to enlarge the orders of their work to other fields. This organization places the work on the same basis as pastoral support in the individual church, and is the place it should occupy in the minds of the people.

The Assembly has opened the question of the salary of the home mission pastor. Even more attention needs to be given to this subject. These consecrated men labor without complaint, hindered and handicapped by an insufficient support. Theirs is indeed a labor of love, and of self denial shared gladly by their devoted wives. The average salary paid by our home mission groups is $550. The local collections, and the appropriation of our Assembly's committee enable us to raise the average to $674. This is a small amount, when you stop to count the cost of living, travelling expenses, books, etc. The churches say "this is the best we can do." A live superintendent doubtless would be able to improve this some in the course of a few month's work.

It is surprising how well some of these churches can do when they will. Zion, a little country church of 8, pays \$300 per year for one Sabbath Mart, heretofore giving \$250, met the other day, and listening to the appeal of her own elder, doubled their contributions. McGregor, heretofore giving \$175, has recently raised over \$500. Wortham, giving heretofore about \$150, has raised sufficient to have a pastor  $\frac{3}{4}$ th of his time. Of course these amounts mean that the churches desire to reduce the number of the churches in the group, so the pastor will have a more compact work.

It is hoped the members of our weak churches, remember to help their pastors in other practical ways. An occasional "pounding" where the salary is small, is not missed by the "pounder," but is an expression of confidence and love, very helpful to the "pounded." It is easy to help, by remembering his needs, and by sharing your abundance. A little prayerful thoughtfulness easily grows into practical helpfulness, and the lesson is learned "it is more blessed to give than to receive."

Texas is trying hard to overtake the vast work the Master has opened. Our work is expensive. We have many churches to erect. In this Presbytery we have twelve more organizations than buildings. We were compelled to organize or lose the opportunity that opened.

Our colleges are young and in need of endowment. The seminary needs endowment, and we have to build an orphanage, and other costly pioneer work needs to be done, and must be done, and is being done. We have a force of a little more than 20,000 Presbyterians to do this work in a state whose population is 3,048,000 people. Dr. Morris has faithfully presented the needs of the West, and in giving the people the information, they will respond to the need. When this costly pioneer work is overtaken, a large per cent of the money now necessarily spent at home will be turned into the home and foreign mission funds, and by her contributions Texas will repay the money at compound interest, which the General Assembly's committee is now spending to help her. The Highland church at Austin is an illustration of this. In 1899-00 our home mission committee was supplementing the salary of their pastor $300; today they are supporting a missionary in the Foreign field, and make large contributions to the home mission work.

As one looks over the field, and reads of home mission efforts in every Synod, we are compelled to "thank God and take courage." True the work is immeasurable. Many obstacles oppose us. Unauthorized evangelism for a season, with its high pressure methods renders more conservative and spiritual preaching less effective, but this is dying of itself, and the people are heeding the Spirit's call to the "Kingdom of Grace," and want a doctrine based upon the Sovereignty of an Eternal God. The exceeding fickleness of things temporal, and the effervescing bubbles of an emotional religion, make them sick of sensationalism, and to thirst after the presentation of God's love and mercy and grace. As a conservative elder remarked, the other day, "the time for Presbyterianism is come." Not only in Texas, but everywhere. God's work is the same in every state, in every nation. Let our people not forget to pray that we may arise to meet the needs; that we may carefully and honestly accept the opportunities presented to us; that we may put forth every effort to reap the white harvest that stands waiting in the fields, to the honor and glory of God, through Jesus our Redeemer.

Columbia Seminary

Rev. and Dear Brother:

At their recent annual meeting, the Board of Directors of the Columbia Theological Seminary laid upon me the duty of sending to you this personal communication relative to the condition and future plans of this institution, of which you are in part the owner and ruler.

Their appeal to you for increased sympathy and co-operation is first of all based upon the fact that they are acting as the agents of yourself and your brethren, and are by your appointment doing a work for the Master, which in His providence is placed primarily and ultimately in your hands. We feel that for the right conduct of this work He will look to you as well as to your agents. And under this conviction we beg your consideration of the facts that follow; and after due consideration of the facts, we plead for such action as you believe will be acceptable to the great Head of the Church.

1. The Board received from honored brethren in Atlanta notice of their purpose to propose to the Four Controlling Synods in the near future a plan for removing the Seminary to Atlanta, and there uniting it with the endowment of the Southwestern Presbyterian University now located at Clarksville, Tenn. After full exchange of views in the Board, this paper was spread upon our minutes without expression of opinion, our apprehension being that the decision desired by our brethren being expressly stated to be from the Four Controlling Synods, it was best to leave the whole matter with them.

2. The Board found your Seminary to be again showing signs of life and improvement. Twenty-seven students matriculated, an increase of two over the past year. The alarming decline in the number of candidates for the ministry is making itself felt in all our colleges and seminaries. In some of them it is even more conspicuous than with us during the present year.

The health of the faculty and students was graciously preserved during the term, and with commendable fidelity the regular courses of study were pursued. It may be safely said that our honored professors, by taking increased burdens, have offered all the work that any student could do with thoroughness during the term. A larger number of instructors is desirable. It would certainly attract more students to have them. And the Board is ready to fill vacant chairs, as rapidly as our improving finances will permit. But we are fully persuaded that four able and consecrated teachers can give full employment to every student during another term. The chief loss, besides the one indicated, is in withdrawing our professors, to some extent, from lines of investigation connected with their own departments.

We have assurances now from the Assembly's Committee on Education that the decline in candidates has been mercifully arrested, and if only the Four Synods will unite heartily in sustaining their Seminary, there can be no ground for doubting the revival already showing itself.

3. The financial condition gave to the Board encouragement and pleasure. This continued improvement is due under God to the energetic policy pursued by the Investing Committee. The experience of many years in the Seminary and elsewhere having satisfied them that of all forms of investment open to us none is safer or more remunerative than loans on real estate fully secured by first mortgages which leave a wide margin of value in the property, the Committee have promptly and prudently, with the consent of the Board, converted other investments into these loans. The results have fully justified their policy. Our income has promptly paid the current expenses, and has given us at the same time a balance with which to make long needed improvements on the property of the Seminary, and also to begin the restoration of certain special funds to the Perkins' Chair and the Smythe Library lost in former years.

For more than a year the Board has been feeling the need of lighting the Seminary buildings with electricity, and of placing in each dormitory a bath-room supplied with hot and cold water, together with all other conveniences of a modern mansion or hotel. And so being advised that the city has extended her system of sewerage, this long felt need will now be supplied. At the opening of the next term, the Seminary will be able to give these comforts to our candidates in addition to her excellent dining hall, which reduces the cost of board below $10.00 a month. The Board is confident that, while making no claims for massive or showy architecture, there will be no institution in the land that can offer more of solid comfort. And this improvement will be effected without in any wise lessening the reasonable sum left in the hands of the faculty for helping such of our students as may not be sufficiently provided for otherwise.

Plans have also been for some time under discussion for utilizing a large section of the campus, which is adjacent to Taylor Street. As many will remember, this large section has not hitherto rendered any tangible service, being bare of shade trees and no longer used for gardening purposes. The Board felt justified in authorizing its committee to erect on this ample ground four up-to-date homes for our faculty, provided a good sale can be effected of the houses and lots in the city, which are now occupied by three members of the faculty. In this way the rent at present paid for Dr. White's residence will be saved, and the saleable value of the Seminary's property enhanced in any future contingency.

In view of all these facts, honored Brother, we bespeak for your Seminary a full share of your interest and co-operation. It is your Seminary. It is deeply involved in all your work as presbyter and as pastor. From its doors have hitherto gone forth that great company of godly men by whose consecrated labors, to a large extent, the Presbyterian type of Christianity has been established and upheld in all these Synods and far beyond their bounds. And from it should come—with earnest co-operation will come—the men who are to take our places and preach Christ crucified to our children. For of this we may be assured, if we send our sons far away from home, many of the best and brightest will not return to us at all, being naturally led to accept work in churches that will have much to offer; and some will return with traditions out of harmony with our people.

Yours faithfully and fraternally,

Wm. E. Boggs.

President Board of Directors, Columbia Theological Seminary.

A Three Days' Tour in Japan.

Recently the sin of us missionaries in not sufficiently using our pens has come home to my conscience quite keenly. It is said that the Church is not fully informed concerning her great work of giving the Gospel to all nations. Doubtless we at the front are largely chargeable with neglect to send some "war bulletins" as often as we should. In order, then, to do my small part in a measure, let me invite the friends at home to join me in just an ordinary tour—a trip of only three days.

Get your small "grip" ready, then, a few sandwiches, on Tuesday night, so that we need not rise so early next morning. Five A. M. has struck while we are talking about it, and the faithful "ricksha" man is already at the door to take us to the train. Thanks to the sandwiches, we do not need to worry about breakfast, but go right along to the station.

For thirty-one cents U. S. currency, we buy third-class tickets for our forty-mile journey, and ride with the "great majority," thus gaining opportunity to sell some Scriptures on the way. Sitting at our ease, we go howling along and accomplish the journey in two and one-half hours, as against seven weary hours which the bicycle trip formerly required. After you have counted the twenty tunnels and noted some of the villages between, you are prepared to believe that this is rather a hard trip for a wheel. So while we comfortably sit, enjoying our breakfast, we can look out of the windows and note some of the steep slopes which formerly took an hour to "do," where a tire has sprung a leak or the chain once broke or where a rain over-took us, sending us home drenched and muddied. These few incidents make us reach the conclusion that this new railroad was built especially for our benefit. But for the slight formality of paying our way, we almost feel that the road belongs to us. Now, the last tunnel is finished and as we rattle down the slope to the "great well" down, we gather our bundles to get off. No, we don't stop at so easily accessible a place as this, but reserve it for the last.

Meanwhile, lest you should feel that you had thus far been carried too much "on flowery beds of ease," we dice to push on thirteen miles over the mountains, to Black River. For this journey there is no mode of travel but a slow pack-horse, or "shauk's Mare." As our preacher has been gone two hours, we set out a-foot to catch him, taking as nearly nothing as possible. The first half of the journey being across low hills and the deep ravines of the rushing river, is easy, and we reach the half-way point in two hours. Then comes a long steady climb of nearly two hours. Happily we saved a sandwich or two from breakfast, so these we draw out and "discuss," while we rest beside a clear mountain brook. Ah, this has given us strength and courage for the stiff part of the climb, which we attack with such zest as soon to conquer it. From this lofty ridge we get a grand view of the land to be conquered for the Master. We can clearly see the hamlet wither we are bound, but as fully ninety minutes are required to reach it, we turn to descend. In good time we arrive, and receive a hearty welcome from one or two lonely, but faithful brethren there. The preacher, too, was already here. After resting a while the remainder of daylight is spent talking to a group around the brazier, for it is still cool here in May. Questions in the Scripture and also from everyday life are freely discussed, till it is time for the evening meal.

Friend, do you like rice, do you eat with chop sticks? If not, I am sorry, but you will have to learn to do it. After supper we get together in a little more formal way with a few additions to our number. Sitting there on the matted floor, we talk of the "things of the Kingdom" till far into the night. A Scripture passage is explained and solemnly laid upon their hearts; questions are raised and answered; the host puts in a frequent, earnest word, pleading with his wife and his neighbors to join him in the worship of the true God. His wife and two men are more than half-persuaded, and give signs of a decision that night. With a prayer we separate and go to rest.

Next morning dawns dark, doubtful; and we learn a lesson in the value of optimism. The question is, shall we return to Great Wells, according to appointment? If we do not, we shall practically lose this one day out of the three to which we are limited, but the misty rain has begun to fall; if it comes on to rain in earnest, umbrellas will not protect us from a drenching which may be dangerous to health. We decide to risk it and, donning cloven socks and straw sandals, we set out. Half-way up the slope we meet a pack horse and man. As we pass them we ask, "will it clear up to-day?" "Not a chance of it," was the decided reply. Turning to look down the valley, the thought springs up, "Well, if I face down that way, I, too, would say no chance of clear weather, but up at the mountain top it looks almost ready to clear now." This, then, is optimism. Looking up to the hills from whence cometh our help. True, it was raining then and did not clear till noon, so that some might say that the man was facing facts and we faucies. In the same way scoffers in the Orient often accuse us missionaries of shutting our eyes to unwelcome facts and persisting in optimistic statements in spite of these stubborn facts, and almost a disregard of the truth. So say our enemies, but our reply is the same in both cases. By looking upward to the light on the hills, instead of down at the valley full of clouds, we were emboldened to venture on and accomplish our journey in safety; also, the clear weather did come, contrary to the man's dark prophecy.

In the same way, refusing to gauge our hope by the valley of this world, filled with the dark clouds of sin, but lifting up our eyes unto God, and insisting upon the view that our hopes of success "are as bright as the promises of God," we are emboldened "to attempt great things for God." And often in success we find the promise true, "At eve there shall be light."

But we have "moralized," so much that I fear the rest of the journey must be passed over in silence. After the oriental foot-washing and the exchange of the cloven-footed socks for normal foot gear, we caught the train for the destination ten miles beyond. Here the afternoon was filled with pastoral visiting and the night brought a goodly company to the chapel, where we did our best to deliver the message. Next morning, after a delightful prayer-meeting with the family of host, we came back to "Great Wells," and put in the whole day visiting among those interested. Some pathetic incidents occurred. One young farmer, an earnest Christian, has persuaded his wife to read the Bible with him, but his father was too fond of nice wine to care for anything else, while his mother belonged to a band of Buddhist women specially convened to temple service, so she was afraid to have anything to do with this new religion. At another Christian home, the old mother is convinced of the truth of the gospel, and wants to believe, but unreasoning fear of her neighbors' tongues prevents her as yet. Full knowledge of the detail in many such cases made them seem to us most pitiful. All we could do was to pray with and for them.

That night was our best meeting, when more than a score of really earnest hearers listened to the explanation in a simple way, of the wonderful beatitudes, and heard of the difference between the blessedness of the citizens of the Kingdom of Heaven, and the poor fleeting joys of this world. They lingered long after the sermon, talking of these high themes, and gaining some little light we trust. Next morning the early train brought us home in time for breakfast.

St. Petersburg, July 18.—The reason the Foreign Office authorities gave for the refusal to accept the Kishineff petition was the unalterable objection of the Russian government to outside interference in international affairs of the empire and that even had the petition been acceptable, as a diplomatic document, Russia would have regarded the publication of the text before transmission as unusual.

The Treasury department's figures for the fiscal year show that the excess of receipts over expenditures was $52,710,936, which may be compared with $92,000,000 in 1902 and $77,000,000 in 1901. Income was $558,887,526, and outgo $506,175,590. Owing to the repeal of war taxes, the internal revenue receipts were reduced by nearly $42,000,000, but the receipts from customs show a gain of about $29,500,000.

Secretary Root has instituted a timely reform in the matter of army contracts. He has issued an order which prohibits the acceptance of contractors' bonds which are signed by Members of Congress. The total gold production of the world from the discovery of America by Columbus to the year 1900 is, according to the report of the United States Mint, in round numbers, $9,811,000,000. Pure gold of this value would weigh about 16,272 tons, and occupy a space equal to 27,039 cubic feet. Graphically this amount could be represented by a solid circular tower of gold 20 feet in diameter, and 86 feet high. The total yearly world production of gold since 1900 would increase the height of such tower about 3 feet each year.—Exchange.

Throughout the cotton belt there has been a general improvement in cotton which has made vigorous and healthy growth. There is, however, general complaint of grassy fields in the coast districts of the eastern section and in Texas, the crop being in a better state of cultivation in Mississippi and over the northern portion of the central districts. Boll weevil in Texas are less numerous. The general outlook for tobacco is very promising, the least favorable reports being received from Ohio, where, however, the crop is doing fairly well.—Report of Crop Condition.

In the making of a school the first great necessity is a teacher. In Sampson county, North Carolina, during the year 1902-03 a real teacher was put in charge of a country school. The house was much too small for the 75 children who came to be taught. That woman organized the large boys and they succeeded in getting the co-operation of the parents. A new room was added to the small school house at no cost whatever to the district school fund. An entertainment was given and the proceeds bought the nails and other hardware necessary to erect the building. The labor of the boys and their parents did the rest. And that was a poor community, too. What is needed more than all else in making a school possible in every community in the South is one real teacher—a teacher who has personality and who can lead.

We have heard so much of what is poetically termed the "teeming millions" of China, that the official census recently published by the Imperial Treasury Department of China is of no little interest, since it furnishes a method of determining just how many "teeming millions" there are. It appears that the Celestial Empire contains 426,000,000 inhabitants, and that China proper—the eighteen provinces—contains 277,000,000. The table is given in the Movement Geographique of Brussels, to which readers are referred for details. The number of inhabitants per square kilometer varies from 11, in Ho-Nan, to 32, in Kan-Sou, and is, on the average, 18, in the eighteen provinces.—Scientific American.

The population of the North Atlantic States (New England and the Middle States,) at the last census, was about 21,400,000. That of the North Central States was 26,800,000. One million 370,000 pupils were enrolled in the former section, against more than 5,800,000 in the latter. In the North Atlantic Division the total number of secondary students in public and private schools was 234,000; in the North Central, 290,000. The undergraduate attendance in the public and private universities, colleges and schools of the ethnology of the North Atlantic Division in 1900 was 33,000; in the North Central Division, 37,000. If we turn to the subject of expenditures for education, we find that in the public schools of each of the sections something like $90,000,000 are expended annually. The income of the universities and colleges in the North Atlantic section amounts to about $10,000,000, while in the North Central section it reaches a little less than $10,000,000.—The World's Work.

Prof. Flinders Petrie announces some important discoveries made while excavating at Abydos. At a depth of about 100 feet, an old temple site was discovered, in which the remains of ten successive temples were found, ranging in age from about 500 to about 5000 B. C. So far as religious discoveries are concerned, it would seem from some relics found that Osiris was not the original god of Abydos. Up to the twelfth dynasty Jackal, god of Wepaut, and then Khentamenti was honored. About the fourth dynasty the temple was destroyed, only a great hearth of burnt offering remaining, full of votive clay substitutes for sacrifices. This confirms the account given by Herodotus that Cheops had closed the temples and forbidden sacrifices. An ivory statue of Cheops was found, which shows for the first time the face and character of the great builder who made Egyptian civilization what it was for thousands of years after.—Exchange.

Educational.

Dr. Munroe has gathered around him in the North Carolina Medical College a faculty whose skill as instructors is best proved by the remarkable record their pupils have made before the State Board of Examiners and in the practice of their profession. From small beginnings he has built up a medical college that is a credit to the State whose name it bears. Those who are contemplating the noble calling of the physician will make no mistake in taking a medical course at the North Carolina Medical College.

Cluster Springs Academy has made a name for itself on account of the homelike influences that surround the boys who are domiciled there and the thorough nature of the instruction that is given. It has a fine faculty, and no parent need hesitate at committing a son to the care of these gentlemen. This also is a Presbyterian School.

Statesville Female College is one of our Presbyterian Institutions that is doing an excellent educational work at a very low price, we believe the lowest of any in our Synod. It is an excellent school, situated in a charming and cultivated community, with every condition of healthfulness secured. Dr. Scott is to be congratulated upon the success with which he has brought up this old and honorable college of our Church.

Summer School at the Agricultural and Mechanical College.

Nothing better illustrates the new enthusiasm in education in North Carolina than the large attendance of teachers at Summer Schools.

This year the Agricultural and Mechanical College, feeling that its beautiful campus, breezy buildings and trained teaching staff ought to contribute their quota of helpfulness to the State's teachers, joined hands with Superintendent Moses and other teachers from the Schools and Colleges of Raleigh, and opened its doors for a summer school.

The success of this school, different in many ways from most summer schools, has been little short of phenomenal. The enrollment at the close of the second week has been over three hundred and twenty-five teachers. The enthusiasm of those present and the amount of work done has been truly gratifying. Twenty-two teachers have been kept busy by the earnest pupil-teachers seeking better equipment for their next year's work.

While the attendance in the literary departments has been very large, the interest that the teachers have manifested in the study of agriculture, nature study, drawing, basketry, and sloyd work has been very marked. Classes are taken to the fields and forest for special study and observation.

I tell you, said a county superintendent yesterday, when the news of the advantages of this school spreads, as it will spread, you will have a thousand teachers here next year.

Swann. Nearly eight year before her decease she was married, and became an affectionate wife and mother. Her love for the Church and her regular attendance upon the services of the sanctuary was an example to the flock with which she worshipped. After serving God faithfully for almost thirteen years her loving Saviour in his inscrutable wisdom called her away from her devoted husband and her little son, and introduced her into the blissful service of her heavenly home. Her remains were laid away in peace to await a joyful resurrection unto life eternal and to a changeless home among the blessed.

WRIGHT.—Ellen King, infant daughter of I. K. and Nannie Cobb Wright. Born Aug. 25, 1903, ten months after, June 24, 1903, Jesus took this little lamb into his bosom. A little flower budded on earth to bloom in Heaven.

ALEXANDER.—On Sat July 4, "Sadie" the three year old child of Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Alexander died of pneumonia at their home in Carmell, N. C.

She was a bright interesting child winning the affections of all who knew her. She could sing unusually well for a child of her age, and sang some very sweet songs. When on her death bed she told her mamma she was going to die and would go to Heaven, and expressed a wish that her papa and mamma come too. "Auntie."

BUIE.—Mrs. Martha Buie was born November 24, 1838 and died at her home in Lumber Bridge, N. C., January 9, 1903.

She led a singularly blameless life. For many years she was an unusually exemplary member of the Church. Her faithfulness in the discharge of the several duties that fell to her from time to time was beautiful. She loved the ordinances of the Lord's House. She was never absent from her place in the sanctuary without good reason. The light of her life shone for the comfort and encouragement of all about her. There was joy in her soul and others felt it. As a neighbor, and friend she was exceptionally helpful and beloved. Her face and rare geniality made her a delightful companion. Such a person would naturally be popular and she had a great host of friends. When she died there was a void made only now and then by the departure of persons of notable characters. The Church lost one of its most consistent and loyal members and the social circle at large one of its most useful and attractive factors. The end came suddenly and we dare say unexpectedly. But doubtless it was a triumphant death. As we live so we die. Out of a large family only one sister survived, Mrs. J. D. Brown of Fayetteville, and one child, Miss Annie Belle Buie, to mourn her death. Blessed are the dead also who die in the Lord.

Rules for the Sickroom.

Here are a few rules of the sick room that are worth remembering:

Never allow the patient to take the temperature of himself. Many patients are more knowing than nurses when there is a question of temperature

Never put a hot water bottle near the skin. Its efficiency and the patient's safety are both enhanced by surrounding the bottle with flannel.

Never allow a patient to be waked of his first sleep, either intentionally or accidentally.

Never imagine that a patient who sleeps during the day will not sleep during the night. The more he sleeps the better he will be able to sleep.

Never hurry or bustle.

Never stand and fidget when a person is talking to you. Sit down.

Never sit where your patient cannot see you.

Never require a patient to repeat a message or request. Attend at once.

Never judge the condition of your patient from his appearance during conversation. See how he looks an hour afterward.

Never read a story to children, if you can tell it.

Never read fast to a sick person. The way to make a story seem short is to tell it slowly.

Never confine a patient to one room, if you can obtain the use of two.

Never allow monotony in anything—Southern Churchman.

The Virtue of Hot Milk

It is worthy of reiteration that milk heated to as high a temperature as can be drunk or sipped, about one hundred degrees, but not to the boiling point, is of great value as a refreshing stimulant in cases of over-exertion, bodily or mental. To most people it is like milk it does not taste so good hot, but that is a small matter compared with the benefit to be got from it. Its action is exceedingly prompt and grateful, and the effects much more satisfactory and far more lasting than those of any alcoholic drink whatever. It supplies real strength as well as exhilaration, which alcohol never does.—Herald and Presbyter.

Sherbet.—Sherbets and water ices require a little longer time to freeze than ice cream, but are so much more enjoyable after a hearty meal they are gaining in popularity. The following is a satisfactory recipe for sherbet: Mash one quart of fruit to a pulp, add one pint of sugar, one pint of water, the well-beaten whites of three eggs, a bit of lemon juice and freeze. In freezing use plenty of chopped ice and salt, a layer of ice three inches deep covered with an inch of salt.—Frigid.

DRAKES' PALMETTO WINE.

For Indigestion, Flatulency, Constipation and Catarrh of the Mucous Membranes. Every case is cured absolutely with one dose a day; gives immediate relief and cures to stay cured. Each trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine will be sent prepaid, free of charge, to every reader of Presbyterian Standard who needs it and writes for it. Address your letter or postal card to Drake Formula Company, Lake and Dearborn Streets, Chicago, Ill.

Borrowed Philosophy

Do not that which you would not be known."

When you're good to others you're to yourself."

Beware of little expenses; a small will sink a ship."

If you would know the value of ey, go borrow some."

One man may be more cunning than her, but not more cunning than y one else."

Somehow, I never feel like good gs b'long to me till I pas 'em on to ebody else."—Mrs. Wiggs in "Lovey y."

Three are no fields so fair and sweet hose through which climbs the hard of sacrifice.—James Buckham.

Life is not so short but there is always e for courtesy.—Emerson.

is with the thoughts satan is most . . . By accompanying and pois ng them, he prepares the way for e open sins, undermines resolutions principles, weakens the force of bet- habits, inflames the passions, and ually familiarizes men to evil.— op J. Jackson.

Christian joy is an experience of great h and solemnity. It never overlooks adness and sternness of life; it is er shallow and unreflecting; it is rained, tender, sympathetic, confi- t. We know it when we see it in ace of any whom we love; it helps —R. J. Campbell.

The Home Circle.

Mrs. Manly's Friend

"I wonder if it is worth while for me to go in," Mrs. Hood said to herself, glancing up from the sidewalk to a handsome, gloomy looking house; gloomy looking because every shade was down, hiding the lace draperies, and suggesting darkness within.

In that house was Mrs. Hood's best friend, but there seemed very little chance of the lady's being admitted to see her. For Mrs. Manly had three weeks before lost her happy, handsome, young husband, after only a few years of perfectly happy married life, and she refused to be comforted. She did not make any noisy demonstration of grief: she did not make any demonstration at all; but she shnt out the sunshine, and the companionship of friends, and said her life was over, and all she asked was to be let alone.

Only her two sisters had leave to speak to her, and they came away from the house more and more hopeless each day, of getting Mrs. Manly to feel the least resigned or submissive.

"It is enough to make your blood run cold," said the oldest sister, to hear the way Rose talks—when she talks at all. I told her I didn't think she was behaving in a very Christian way, and that I was sure God must be displeased with her for being so rebellious: she said for that matter she didn't think God had behaved in a very Christian way himself, to strike down her husband in his splendid youth, and that God couldn't be a much displeased with her as she was with him! Did you ever hear such a thing!"

"Poor child—poor Rose!" said Mrs. Hood, to whom this was told; "how unhappy she must be to cherish such feelings toward her heavenly Father."

"Indeed I am afraid God will send some fearful thing upon her, to punish her for such blasphemy," said the sister.

"Oh no," answered Mrs. Hood gently, "God doesn't treat his children that way; he is sorry for this broken-hearted woman, as I am for my willful little girl when she sobs herself to sleep, and will not let me take her in my arms and forgive her."

Mrs. Manly's sister listened with the perplexed air of one who only half understands: but there was a new note in this voice, which made her say impulsively, "Anne, I wish you'd go to see Rose; you might do something for her."

"Would she see me?"

"No, if you sent your name up; but I'll tell Haskins to let you in, and you just go right up to her room. O Anne, please try!"

It seemed a doubtful experiment; but having promised, Mrs. Hood resolutely set herself to make the visit. And yet, when she first reached the door, courage failed her, she could not go in; she passed the steps and walked on, square after square.

Conscious, however, which is said to make cowards of us all, has much more to do with nerving us up to deeds of heroism; such as Mrs. Hood's, when she finally rang the bell, and entered her friend's gloomy looking house.

Haskins, having received orders, admitted her, but showed plainly that he did it with reluctance, and dreaded the consequences for himself. His countenance did not give the intruder any encouragement. Still Mrs. Hood forced her trembling knees to carry her up stairs, and unannounced she entered the young widow's room.

Dim as the light was, she could see that Rose's pale face flushed with anger at her intrusion; but the die was now cast, and she plucked up courage: besides, she felt that any change would be good for Rose, even anger, if it broke up this deadly, despairing calm. Mrs. Manly did not allow the slightest demonstration of sympathy on the part of her friend: she gave her a cool hand shake, saying formally, "you are very kind," in a tone which plainly meant, "You are very impertinent."

But Anne Hood would not be baffled: "I would not have thrust this visit upon you, Rose," she said, avoiding all circumlocutions, "if I had not felt that I must deliver a message I have for you."

Mrs. Manly's eyes questioned her coldly.

"One of your friends," Anne went on, "he calls himself your best friend, and I suppose he knows what he is talking about, thinks he had done something to offend you, and he wants you to forgive him: will you?"

"Whom are you talking about?" asked Mrs. Manly, and there was a suspicion of interest in her tone.

"Ah, but he wants you to say that you will forgive him, before I tell you his name: he loves you; he did not mean to injure you; he thinks you are misjudging him; but just because of his old and proved friendship, he wants you to forgive him beforehand."

"If he is really the friend that you say he is, Anne"—and now there was really some earnestness in Rose's voice, "I forgive him of course I; do not even ask an explanation; it is enough that he is my friend."

There was a moment of perfect stillness between the two friends, and then Anne said in a voice that shook with emotion, "O Rose, Rose, the name of your friend is the Lord God, merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy! If you were willing to trust a poor human friendship, and to accept the word of a friend that he had not meant to harm you—if you could say that you would not even demand an explanation, because he was a friend—surely you will not refuse to believe your heavenly Friend when he says he does not afflict you willingly! When he says, what he does you may not know now, but you shall know hereafter! When he says, 'Like as a Father pitieth his children'—"

But the long anguish of rebellion was over: the young head was bowed in the trembling hands, and the tears were raining down!

And then Mrs. Manly's friend gave the greatest proof yet of wisdom and loving kindness: she kissed the bowed head—once—twice—and again, and went out, softly closing the door behind her.

Just Be Glad.

Be glad. When you have said there is to say about life's sorrow, disappointment, and pain, about the selfishness and wrong that sweep over the earth like dark shadows; about the shortness of its days and the certainty of its night it still remains blessedly true that the universe is thrilling with the song of gladness.

Be glad for the beauty of the springtime, the blue of the skies, the music of the birds, and the glory of the sunsets. Listen to the laughter of the little children, answer to the handclasp of friendship, grow warm in the love of countless happy homes, and be sure that somewhere over and above all is a great Love that makes all these things possible.

Note the noble lives around you—commonplace, it may be, but unselfish, brave and true. Note the deeds of quiet self-sacrifice, the swift rush of human kindness to stately walls to shelter the weak and helpless, and believe, if you can, that the kingdom of Christ is not coming in the hearts of the children of men.

O, put away gloom and grief, and complaining! Do His work, trust His promise, and be glad.—Selected.

Sweetbrier

Not long ago, on an excursion in the woods, I picked up a branch of sweetbrier, and hid it in my dress. I soon forgot what I had done, but all day long I smelled a spicy fragrance. Every woodland path had the same sweet odor. Even the rocky cliffs and caves breathed perfume. I was surprised to notice that as I met different people with all kinds of wild flowers and ferns, all woodland treasures had the same kind of fragrance. On the boat as we sailed homeward I thought: "Some one is taking home a quantity of sweetbrier, for the air is full of it."

Late at night, when I took off my dress, I was surprised to find the sweetbrier tucked in my bosom. All day long I had carried near my heart the sweet perfume which I had supposed came from others. "How good it would be," I said to myself as I closed my tired eyes, "if I could carry such a sweet spirit in my breast that every one I met would seem lovely!" It made me think of the legend of the potter who found a lump of clay which was fragrant as a rose. Even after the vase had gone through the fire it held its delicate perfume. "What makes you so sweet when the other things of clay have no odor?" cried the potter. "I lay it at the foot of a fragrant rose, and the sweetness became mine," answered the vessel of clay.

There is a legend that the room in which Mary spilled her precious ointment never lost its fragrance. It is certainly true that all deeds of love linger in the memory of those who have helped long after the material benefit has passed away. Some people are so simply constituted by nature, so physically well and joyous of disposition, that they cannot help being sweet. How to be sweet with delicate health, or when living with uncongenial people, is the prob-

m. But it can be done. The love of God hidden in the heart will sweeten the dul's atmosphere as the sweetbrier did the air around me.

I read this the other day, which impressed me greatly: "I would as soon think of putting strychnine in the water poisoning any one's mental atmosphere with complaints and groanings." as if we did not all of us sometimes put the poison of complaints into the ears of our friends! I often think of Charles Kingsley's little son:—

Be good . . . net let who will be clever;

Do noble things, not dream them all day long, and so make life, death, and that vast forever

One grand, sweet song."

—Watchman.

When a Woman's Beauty is Gone

Beauty often goes early in life, and there are few more pathetic figures than the women who have lost it and have nothing to put in its place. The wise girl lays up a store of attractions against the time when those with which she started may be lost, and there is no better way of making one's self an agreeable companion for others and for one's self than by constant reading of good books. One of the finest compliments ever paid a woman was the remark of an eminent man concerning a well-known woman of his time, that to know her was a liberal education. No woman can have the quality of mind which makes association with her not only delightful, but stimulating, and educational, unless she is well read; and the well-read woman must read constantly and with intelligence.—Ladies' Home Journal.

God has promised to satisfy—but he did not promise when. God has time enough, and so have you. God has boundless resources, and his resources are yours. Can you not trust him? Trust and wait. He knows what is best for you. He has reason for denying you now, but in the end he will satisfy.—Maltbie D. Babcock, D. D.

Our Young People.

Franz's Sister

Both troubled and perplexed looked John Liebert when he came into the house that day with a bill in his hand.

"What do you think, mother?" he exclaimed. "Mr. Carson charged me one hundred and eighty dollars for that foundation board! How you s'pose it was, hey? I paced that fence many a time while I was to help him build it, and I think to pay him no more as seventy dollars or sixty!"

The paling fence along the front of Liebert's farm was an improvement that had interested all the family. John Liebert, who had helped the carpenter build it, had taken special pride in the work, but neither his wife, his daughter Louise—Weezy—nor his son Franz had been backward about admiring it. That the carpenter's bill should come to three times as much as Liebert had planned was, however, a serious blow to the stolid German, and his wife saw the need of soothing words.

"Maybe Mr. Carson makes a mistake," she suggested.

The farmer shook his head. "William Smith figered it up mit a lead pencil and paper, and still the bill was right."

Still Mrs. Liebert, although mystified and distressed, clung to the hope that her husband's original estimates were correct.

"Shust wait till Franz comes home from school," she said as she put away the bill and the paper on which their neighbor had worked out a result. "Maybe our Franz can figger better as William Smith. He's real good in multiplication tables now."

"Ach, so!" A gleam of relief crossed the father's face. Vexation displaced it a moment later, however, when his daughter Louise looked up from her knitting and said, timidly:

"Won't you let me try the sum, father? I can cipher as well as Franz."

"Hush, Weezy!" her father said, impatiently. "'Tain't for you to be speakin' out so bold—and figgerin' is for men!"

"Anyway, I could learn to do it if you's let me go to school like all the other girls do," the little girl persisted. She was not a wilful or a forward child but this matter of schooling lay very near her heart. She had practically taught herself to read and write, and she had learned a good deal by listening to Franz when he studied his lessons aloud; but she longed for more knowledge. Unhappily for her, John Liebert was not a progressive man—and this was fifty years ago.

"Hush, Weezy!" he said again, and with a touch of anger in his tone. "My mother didn't have no book-learnin'; your mother ain't got no book-learnin'? what for should you have book learnin'? You sha'nt go to school. It couldn't make nottings out of you but a girl! What for should a girl be foolin' mit books? But Franz," he added, a moment later, "he shall after supper figger." Accordingly, that evening

Franz was set at work on the problem of the fence. His mother stood ready to snuff the candle. His father paced the floor restlessly. "Figger mit great carefulness, Franz," Mr. Liebert would say every now and then, stopping to look over the boy's shoulder.

After a while it became evident from Franz's muttering that he had found something the matter with the work he was examining. Mr. Liebert's breath came faster.

"Well, Franz, you found the mistake?" he asked eagerly.

"Wait a little yet," answered Franz, deliberating.

The family interested, stimulating by growing hope, was becoming momentarily more intense.

"I knew our Franz would figger better as William Smith," declared Mrs. Liebert, proudly, while Weezy smiled from her corner by the chimney.

"No—yes," said Franz after a few more moments of suspense. "Nine—six—three. No—yes; here it is! I've found it now! Franz's tone was full of triumph.

"And I am right!" Of course I am right!" shouted his father. "I knewed all the time I was—"

"No, you ain't right, father," corrected Franz. "Neither one of ye is. It's one hundred and eight-two dollars and fifty cents. William Smith forgot to add the inches."

An ashen paleness overspread Liebert's face. He sat down and buried his face in his hands. In the days that followed, too, he took his trouble very seriously, brooding over it in the house, and spending hours out of doors pacing along his new fence, and trying to discover how he could have made such a mistake. He lost his appetite, and grew thin and haggard and absent-minded.

"Poor, thick-headed Liebert!" the neighbors said. "He will surely go crazy about that fence."

Finally came the gray November morning when the bill was to be paid. Liebert carried all the money there was in the house when he drove away to Shalerville to meet the carpenter. Mrs. Liebert watched him out of sight. Then, too unhappy to attend to her household duties she stood looking out at the frozen fields and the clouds scudding over the leafless trees. Little of them she saw, for her eyes were full of tears.

Weezy was in the room, scratching away at a slate. She had done a great deal of that of late. Just now it fretted Mrs. Liebert to see her do it—amusing herself when the family was in trouble!

She turned to reprove the child. But all at once Weezy dashed down her slate and pencil and jumped up excitedly.

"O mother, I've found it!" she cried. "I've found the mistake! Father was right about the fence!"

"See, mother!" Her cheeks glowed red and her eyes shone like stars. "William Smith didn't reduce the feet to yards—that's how he made the bill so large. It ought to be sixty dollars and eighty-three cents, just one-third of what our Franz reckoned!

Weezy—his little girl—that she should be so smart—was wonderful!

He took Weezy by the hand, and they walked out of store. The sight of Black Prince at one of the hitching-posts startled him afresh. He looked from the horse to his daughter.

"And you rode Black Prince mitout any saddle!" he gasped.

He tied the fiery horse to the back of the wagon, and lifted Weezy to the seat. He was silent for a long time after that. Of what was he thinking? Weezy wondered. She did not want to talk. She could enjoy her success without the help of words. She was conscious, too, that her father regarded her differently, that she had won a quality of his esteem which he had not accorded her before—and that though awed her to silence.

But now they were clear of straggling streets of the town. She turned her head for a last glance. As if that movement had broken a spell that was upon him—"Weezy!" her father said, suddenly, calling her to him.

"Yes, father?" She looked up, submissive. "Well, Weezy, I say nottings, now if you want to go to school mit Franz."—Youth's Companion.

Sebastian Fernandes.

Charles R. Morton, in The Children's Friend.

The subject of this sketch was a youth, just passing into manhood at the time this story begins. He lived some years ago with his parents, brothers and sisters in this town. Perhaps he had many plans of some day becoming an important and rich man; for it was at the time that the railroad reached here and the coffee crops were bringing splendid prices. But, these plans were all blighted, for poor Sebastian fell sick, and his skin, that was once soft and tender, began to grow thick and ugly. Soon the wretched white patches appeared, that were a sure sign of leprosy.

The parents loved their boy, and did all they could to cure him. They tried all kinds of medicine, and often they were so careful with his diet that he would almost starve. But he was willing to do anything to be relieved of that loathsome disease. They were Roman Catholics, and naturally resorted to their charms and saints. Old women were sent for to bless him, and to make the sign of the cross over his sores, but they grew larger.

He was told by a traveller that a miraculous saint image of the Virgin Mary in the State of Minas could cure him of his malady, but he must take her a present. Those who suffered with sores must take her an image made of wax representing Lazarus, the poor man who died in the streets, waiting for the crumbs from the rich man's table. His brothers went to find all the wax they could, and brought back enough for the sisters to make a large image of Saint Lazarus. Then the father and afflicted son started, horseback, on their long journey, to get relief through the power of the saint in Minas. On the way they spent a night in the home of a Protestant family, and as it was their custom, told the object of their journey. The people were asked if they knew of any miracles that the saint had performed. At other places they had heard of diseased persons being cured by this saint, and were surprised when the people at this home said that they knew not of any miracles performed by images; still further, they doubted that the image in Minas could cure the young man. They told him of Jesus, and how he could cure the leprosy of the soul as well as that of the body. But, thought he, this Jesus is away in heaven, and my prayers can not reach him; I must go on, and get help from the saint that is upon the earth.

The Protestant family felt such an interest in him that they gave him a New Testament, and told him that he would get more help from it than from the image. He did not believe what they said, yet accepted the book because the people had been very kind to him and his father. They took the image of wax to the priest who takes care of the miracle-working image, and after making many prayers to it, and being sprinkled with holy water, the young man returned home with the same leprosy and much discouraged.

The disease was so manifest now that the people of Casa Branca protested against Sebastian's living in town, for it is against the law for a leper to live in town. So the parents bought a small farm near here and built two houses upon it. The smallest was for Sebastian to live in, but close to the other where the family lived. As soon as the little house was finished, Sebastian moved out to the farm, where he spent many an hour alone. All this time he had kept his Testament, but had read very little in it. He there commenced reading it in earnest, and soon his broken heart and crushed spirit began to take a new hope. He read his Testament through, and then re-read it. It was a pleasure to meet with others now, to tell them of what he had read in the wonderful book. He lost all faith in images, and by the gift of the Spirit's grace found a joy that he never expected to find in this life.

When the time came for the family to move, the furniture and other things were sent some days ahead. The mother, thinking that her son would like to pray to some of her saints, sent him the key to her "oratorio." He opened it and took out her images, but not to worship them. His mind had undergone a change so much that he no longer looked upon them as saints, and wanted his mother to believe with him. He therefore put her images into the hens' nests, and, in fun, sent word that he hoped to have a lot of eggs for her when she came. She was horrified and greatly enraged; so much so that when she heard of it he decided that it would be wise to return her saints to their places in the "oratorio." When she came, the first question was about her saints, and was greatly relieved when she found them in statu quo, instead of in the hens' nests. Not many days passed before Sebastian invited her to hear him read some in a very interest-book he had found. She listened to reading in the gospels, in the epistles, and then some of the visions of the apostle of love. She asked several times what book was it he had. But he always replied, "Never mind, mother, I will read some more to you to-morrow."

Day by day he would read to his mother, and often of an afternoon the whole family would be sitting around to hear the reading of the holy writ. The mother became so much interested that she insisted upon knowing about the book. She was dumfounded when she learned that it came from a protestant home, and that they taught the truth about Jesus and his salvation. The priest had told them that the protestants received their religion from Satan, so now they saw that he was deceiving them. They consequently lost faith in him and in their images.

As is often the case on the mission field, the hand of Providence guides some worker to those homes where the light of the word has already begun to shine; so, in this case, a colporteur, sent out by our missionaries in Campinas, came as far as Casa Branca, and to the modest home of Sebastian's parents. After selling them some Bibles and other books, he had to answer a great many questions about his Church and ministry. Sebastian was deeply interested, and wished very much to meet with a minister and to hear him preach. The colporteur promised them a visit from a minister, and it was not long before the Rev. Teixeira, one of our ministers, appeared there. He preached to them the pure gospel, and before leaving had the privilege of receiving Sebastian and his mother into the Church. On later visits the father and other of the children joined. This family was the first in all this section of country to accept of Christ as their only Saviour. When the Rev. Mr. Boyle, who was then living in Mogy-Mirim, went on his long trips to Bagagem, Aragnary, and the State of Goyaz, he always made this home a stopping place. Sebastian looked forward with great pleasure to those visits, and would wonder if he would be living when the next one came around.

He suffered intensely, but patiently, and his body became more and more loathsome to him as he grew in grace and the knowledge of God. He longed and prayed to be taken, until one soft and quiet afternoon the good angel came with the summons to "go up higher." The spirit that had dwelt so long in flesh, corrupted by sin and disease, was at last released and wafted into the mansion of rest!

In a town near here the mother still lives, and rejoices in her hope of eternal salvation. Not very long ago the writer had the pleasure of receiving into the Church the youngest brother of Sebastian, and it was he who told the story of Sebastian's conversion. Thus we see that the poor leper not only found the great Physician for himself, but for the large family of which he was a member.

Children's Letters.

Mt. Holly, N. C., July 9, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I have been wanting to write to you so I thought I would get my Cousin Ada Campbell who is making us a visit. I can't write very well. I am only seven years old. I live right near the Catawba river. We call our place Riverview because we can get such a pretty view of the river. We had a picnic up on the river not very long ago. We spread our lunch on a large flat rock. After lunch, we went down to play in the sand. And no sooner had we started when it came up a shower and we had to run to get to the house. I go to church at Belmont our pastor is Rev. R. A. Miller. I hope my letter will not find its way to the waste basket as I want to surprise my papa. I will close.

Lois May Campbell.

Goldsboro, N. C., July 7, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I have seen so many letters from the girls and boys in the Standard, I thought I would write too. My papa takes the Standard, and I like to read the children's letters, because they are so nice. I go to the Baptist Sunday-school. Our pastor is Rev. J. B. Jackson. I like to hear him preach. I go to the graded school. I will be in the fifth grade next session. I have no pet but my baby sister, who is only a year old. I have three sisters and one brother.

Yours truly,
Alice Graham.

Age 9.

Osbourne, N. C., July 1, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I have never written to you thought I would write you a short letter I am a little crippled girl and am 10 years old. I have never been to school but 4 days in my life. Mama teaches me at home. Mr. C. S. McCall gives me your nice paper and I like to read the children's letters very much. I have two sisters and one brother. Their names are Cassie, Lottie and Lannie.

Little James' Bible.

"Papa, tell us a story." It was Robert who was speaking "Yes, papa, tell story 'bout Bible," said Nellie, the wee one, who when the others had gone to school brought out a Bible, saying, "Papa, read; read 'bout baby in brook; baby cry."

Well, little folks, I will tell you about a little boy down East and his Bible. One Winter I taught school in N—, boarding in the only religious family in the place, although there were other families in which some member was interested in religion.

One day I mentioned my surprise that in so godless a community their family should all be interested in the Bible. At this their grandmother said, "Ah, sir, we used to be just as bad as the rest; yes, sir, worse than any who are here now. It all comes of little James' Bible."

"You see about five years ago none of us used to go to Church or Sabbath-school; we didn't care anything about God or religion only to laugh at it. Why, sir, we didn't even have a Bible in the house, and some of the children didn't know there was such a book.

"One day a Bible man called and tried to sell us a Bible—he sold them cheap too; but none of us would buy one.

"Somehow little James—he was alive then—wanted a Bible; whether because he was attracted by the beauty of the book, or because God put it in his heart, He alone knows.

"However, none of us would buy him one; but the Bible man, as he left, 'Well, my nice little boy, if you want a Bible you shall have one; here is one I will give you, it is a nice pretty book, and you can get grandma to read it to you and tell you some of the pretty stories about Jesus.'

"Sure enough that afternoon James brought the book to me to read some stories. I didn't know where or what to read, but he had remembered the man said there were nice stories about Jesus; so when I asked what I should read, all he could say was, 'Read about Jesus.'

"At length I found the place where it tells about the birth of Jesus and how they laid him in a manger. And such questions as that child did ask! As I look back it seems as though God was very near him and we knew it not.

"Many a night after I put him to bed has he kept me there talking to him about Jesus. One day, I remember, I had been reading to him about Jesus taking little children up in His arms and blessing them. That night when I put him to bed it was all he could talk about.

"At length he said, 'Granny, do you suppose Jesus would take me up in His arms?' I told him I didn't know, but I hoped so. He lay a long time silent when with a smile looked up and said, 'He would, Granny; I know He would.' I asked him how he knew, and he said, 'Cause I like Him.' That night when I left him asleep I saw the sweetest smile on his face that ever a child had.

"Some weeks after this, I was reading one evening about Jesus praying, when he looked up and said, 'What is that, Granny? How do they do that? What is that for?'

"I told him it was talking to God, and that we could talk to Jesus now just as He used to talk to God then. 'Oh, Granny, why don't you do it? How do they do it? Show me how.' In an instant he had swept fifty years of my life away, and I was child again at my mother's knee. Falling by the bedside I cried out, 'O Jesus, thou Lamb of God, take me, forgive all my sins, make me a child again in thy cause, answer the prayers of a sainted mother and make me thine. Take this little boy too into thy care and keeping, I give myself and him to thee.'

Slipping from his bed little James crept to my side; folding his hands as I had done he prayed, 'Jesus, take this little boy up in your arms, take Granny, take papa and mamma, take us all;' and back to bed he crept again. Then he noticed I was crying, and asked what made me cry. I told him I was crying because I was such a great sinner. 'But, Granny, didn't you read where Jesus said, "Thy sins be forgiven thee?"' And putting his arms about my neck he kissed me saying, 'Don't cry, Granny; Jesus will take care of that,' and with the same sweet smile he fell asleep.

'All night long his words never left me. In the morning I said, 'Dear Jesus, I am very wicked woman, but you have promised to forgive my sins. I believe it, I give myself to thee, now take care of me;' and soon I had a smile in my heart if not on my face. After this we always prayed together every night.

"One day about the middle of the afternoon, he came to me to put him to bed. I did so, noticing how hot and tired he seemed; the next morning he was in high fever, out of his head, and wandering, but all the burden of his thoughts seemed to be Jesus. At times he seemed to be looking for Jesus and couldn't find Him, then again he thought Jesus was looking for him and didn't know here he was. At other times Jesus had found him and was carrying him in His arms. How contented and happy he was when that sweet, sweet smile came back then.

"At length he came to himself, and the first thing he asked for was his Bible. I gave it to him, and he never let it go out of his hands after that.

"One day, he had been failing; we were all about his bedside, when he looked up and said, 'Papa, mamma, read my Bible. Jesus wants me, I am going where he is. He is going to carry me in His arms.' He looked up; the same sweet smile came over his face, he stretched out his wasted arms. 'Oh, He is coming. I must go. Papa, mamma, kiss me quick—good-by.'

"His puny arms fell upon the bed, his little emaciated finger fell across his open Bible; as we looked we read, 'A little child shall lead them'—and that is why we all love the Bible." —Morning Star.

"That's quite a responsibility," said Miss Hollister, smiling at Dorothy's important air. "Your mamma must be very sure that you are to be trusted."

"Well, you see it makes people very queer to be sick such a long time," Dorothy explained, lowering her voice confidentially. "Dale never used to cry, but now he cries about everything that he doesn't like, and then he gets feverish, and mamma's afraid he'll have a relapse. Mamma knows I'll let him beat in all the games, and that's why she dares to leave me to take care of him."

It was not easy to get along with Dale. Dorothy hardly knew her brother, and a dozen times a day she was obliged to comfort herself by remembering mamma's assurance that Dale's temper would improve as his body grew stronger. This afternoon it was worse than usual, for Dale had become so accustomed to his mother's presence, that he was inclined to resent her leaving him, even for a few hours. Dorothy tried her hardest to be entertaining, with rather unsatisfactory results. "And if he gets to fretting, and is worse," she thought despairingly, "Why, mamma won't dare to go away again for ever so long."

They were in the midst of a rather uninteresting game of authors when the sound of distant music reached their ears. Dale dropped his cards and looked at Dorothy with big brightening eyes. Then she smiled.

"It's a hand-organ," he cried. "I wish he'd hurry and get to our house. Do you 'spose he'll stop here, Dorothy?"

"We'll give him some money, and then he will," replied Dorothy, jumping to her feet, and running to her bank. But though she shook it with all her might, not the faintest jingle answered her. Dorothy's bank had a way of being empty, but it had never failed its mistress at quite such a crisis as this.

"O, I wonder if there isn't a nickel or a penny lying around somewhere," cried Dorothy, darting around the room distractedly, and looking into all sorts of unlikely places.

"He's coming, Dorothy! Hurry," cried Dale, who had pressed his face against the window pane.

"But I can't find any money. Maybe Norah's got five cents," and Dorothy flew down to the kitchen, only to meet another disappointment. Norah had just finished explaining how she had sent all her month's wages to her mother in Ireland, when Dale's voice, choked with tears, called over the bauisters, "He's gone by, Dorothy. He isn't going to stop."

"O, yes, he will, Dale," Dorothy called back cheerily. "Just wait a minute."

Dale heard the outside door slam. Going back to the window he saw a small girl, with flying curls running after a little Italian, bent double under the weight of his heavy organ.

The man looked surprised when Dorothy pulled his sleeve, and he broke into her explanations with a gentle murmur in his native tongue. Dorothy's heart sank. If he did not understand English, how was she ever to explain what she wished. Then all at once she discovered at his side, a small boy with big black eyes and gleaming white teeth, who was peering around at her with an air of interest.

Dorothy took a long breath, and told the whose story; how her brother had been sick and how the least little thing made him cry, he was so nervous, and how when he cried he grew feverish, and was worse again. Then she told how much Dale wanted to hear the music, and how she had looked in her bank for money, but in vain.

"And wou't you play for us today, and trust us for the money till the next time?" cried Dorothy, appealingly. "O, please, please do!"

The white teeth of the Italian boy flashed in a smile as she ended, and when he had translated Dorothy's speech to his father, he smiled too. Without another word the three went back to the corner. The Italian stationed his organ just under the window from which Dale was looking down so eagerly, and still smiling, began to grind out his music.

What a treat it was, even if the organ was a trifle asthmatic, and wheezed sadly over "Listen to the Mocking-Bird!" Dale beat time on the window sill, his face wreathed in smiles, and Dorothy sat by, overjoyed to see him happy. The hand-organ man played every tune through twice, and the boy rattled his tambourine vigorously, smiling up at Dale as he did so. And at last the concert was ended and the musicians waved their caps for good-by and went slowly down the street.

It was ten days before they came again, and Dorothy worried a little over their non-appearance. "I hope they didn't think I wanted them to play for nothing," she told her mother. "I 'specially asked them to trust me till next time, but they don't understand English very well."

But one night at dinner the strains of "Listen to the Mocking-Bird," came wheezing through the window, and Dorothy was on her feet in a minute.

"It's our hand-organ man," she exclaimed. She flew to the window and a dark-eyed man and a dark-eyed little boy greeted her with a flash of white teeth. "I've got ten cents for them upstairs," Dorothy cried. "Dale and I have been saving up."

"I think I'll have to add a contribution," said her father, taking a quarter from his pocket, and brother Tom cried gayly: "Pass the hat, Dorothy. We all want to put in something."

"It is a good thing the hand-organ season is nearly over," papa said to mamma, when the music ended, which was not for an hour or more. And Dorothy and Dale wondered, as they had often wondered before, at the strange notions of grown-up people.

A Little Digger of Weeds.

"Ninety five, ninetysix, ninety seven," counted Marian, with a long sigh. "Three more to make a hundred!"

Little Marian in her gingham sliik gown, armed with a strong kitchen knife, was digging out dandelions for two cents a hundred. It was in the little green plot between the walk and the curbing. She had it free from weeds now, and she was to dig nowhere else. She had dug out some with the knife, and some with her sturdy little fin-ers, lying flat on the ground. The little rip had been kept so well mowed that the dandelions grew very low and close among the short grass and were so easy to take out. She would have tried to go over and dig in the school-yard across the way, for there the dandelions were big and strong, each one crowned with fluffy blossoms; but she had been told to do her digging in that small green plot, so there she stayed.

"Oh, ninety-eight," cried Marian, pulling out a stunted bit of a plant that she had dug up. "But, dear me! I don't believe there's another one."

Still, after a long search, she did discover another tiny mite growing almost under the edge of the sidewalk.

"Ninety-nine! Now, if I could get just one more!" sighed Marian, examining the grass with an anxious eye. "Who'd ever s'pose that dandelions would go and grow just ninety-nine of themselves, and then stop short?"

"Hello!" said Johnny Briggs, stopping short at sight of the little figure lying on the ground. "What's the matter with you?"

Johnny Briggs was a new boy just moved into their block.

Marian told him. "And I don't s'pose I'll ever get that two cents," she said, "though I lack only one; but there isn't a single one more!"

"Does your mother always count things?" asked Johnny.

"No," said the little girl. "She just asked how many, and I tell her."

"Then it's easy enough," said Johnny. "She'd be sure, just looking at them, that there must be as many as a hundred!"

"Johnny Briggs!"

"Anyway," suggested Johnny, red spots coming into his cheeks. "how do you know you didn't make a mistake when you counted?"

"I know I didn't," said Marian. "I counted 'em nine times."

"See here, wait a minute!" said Johnny; and way he darted across the street.

"There!" cried he, returning with a dandelion plant and tossing it into Marian's basket. "Now you are all right."

"No, I'm not," said Marian, shaking her curly head. "Johnny Briggs, I think you're a kind boy; but I guess you're not honest! If you're going to live in our block, I hope you'll be honest. You see we're trying to make our block the nicest block in this street. That's why mamma and I are digging out our weeds."

"I'm pretty honest," said Johnny, who was also pretty red. "And say," he called back at the gate, "s'pose, may be, every time I see a dandelion I'll think about keeping the block nice!"

Little Marian sat on the ground a few minutes longer, thinking about Johnny Briggs. "I guess he'll be a nice boy to have in the block," she thought. She liked very much what he said at the gate.

When Marian carried her pan of weeds to her mother, she said, "Mamma, there's only ninety-nine in this hundred; but there isn't one left to dig. Couldn't I do something else to make for that out other dandelion?"

"Yes," said her mother, smiling. "You may run and wash my only little girl's hands for me, and then bring me my purse."—Carroll Watson Rankin, in Little Folks.

WORDS OF COMMENDATION.

The Rev. P. R. Law, of North Carolina, says:

A short visit to the North Carolina Military Academy furnishes the occasion for these reflections. We were delighted with what we saw and heard. The advantage of the Military feature were manifest. There had been a prejudice in our minds against such schools. It has all been wiped out. We are a convert. There is a discipline about it that is needed and unattainable, save in this way. There was a regularity in the doing of things illustrated by the movement of the hands of a clock. It is a Christian school. The highest moral tone is inculcated. Over eighty cadets are enrolled. It is a well drilled and manly student body. The standard of scholarship is all that could be asked. The corps of teachers are cultured and experienced school men.

Senator Daniel, of Virginia, says:

Dr. Sam'l W. Murphy gave great satisfaction as a teacher of my two sons. I was much impressed by his ability and fidelity, and take great pleasure in commending him.

Senator Ball, of Delaware, says:

Washington, D. C., May 28th, 1902.

It affords me much pleasure to add my testimonial to the high standing and efficiency in educational work of Dr. Samuel W. Murphy, A. M. I first knew Dr. Murphy when as a pupil I entered his school some years ago. Owing to his effective teaching and liberal and progressive views, I feel that I cannot recommend Dr. Murphy too highly and I shall ever wish him the highest success.

L. Heisler Ball, M. D.,

United States Senator from Delaware.

Hon. Geo. W. Peck, Governor of Wisconsin, says:

Dr. S. W. Murphy:

My Dear Sir: I desire to express to you my high appreciation of the Institute under your management, and to say that the improvement of my son, from first to last, for two years has been all that I could wish. I have no fear but that the boys who go out from under your charge will be young gentlemen, with an education that will be of use to them through life. The military part of the instruction is doing all of the scholars good, making them prompt, obedient, and balanced—in fact, gentlemen as well as scholars.

Yours very truly,

Geo. W. Peck.

Event and Comment.

The Bible Society has just celebrated its eighty-seventh anniversary. In brief its work may be summarized by the statement that it has distributed seventy million copies of the Word of God printed in one hundred of the languages of earth.

A new departure in England is a summer school of theology that has been convened by Principal Fairbairn at Mansfield College, Oxford. Over two hundred students were enrolled, some of them women and the fact indicates the revival of interest in the Queen of the Sciences.

Dr. Hillis is now discussing Church Unity with the Baptists, after having done all he could to disrupt the Presbyterian Church, of which he was a minister while serving Plymouth Congregational Church. As a promoter of Christian unity Dr. Hillis has not been a great success.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan has been trying to hold services at Carnegie Hall, "with only modest success in point of attendance." Mr. Morgan must sometimes feel discouraged at accomplishing the deepening of the spiritual life of America in a very brief time. If he will just preach the old gospel, there are few that can do it better.

The Methodists are now talking about limiting the tenure of office of their bishops and putting younger men into the places of those who are to be retired on account of old age. The Methodist Young Men's League of the Northern Church calls for ten new bishops, none over forty-five and all elected for eight years only.

It has doubtless been noticed that the Denver Young People's Convention was smaller this year than it has been for several years. The Christian Endeavor movement, like the Y. M. C. A. and other protests against a defect in the work of the Church, has probably seen its best days, or at least the days of its greatest enthusiasms and largest claims.

Six vacation schools have been opened in Chicago and the number of applicants is twice the number that can be accommodated. One of our Mountain Educators has been talking about opening a nine month's school in the mountains for girls including the summer months, with vacations in the winter time, and if people would only break with the old traditions of a school term it would be an excellent thing.

The London Spectator sums up the case against the rule of King Leopold in the Congo Free State thus:

"It is indeed an anachronism that the closing years of our enlightened nineteenth century should have witnessed the deliberate establishment in Africa of a despotism more cruel than that of Turkey, and more relentless and overbearing toward native and foreigner than that of the Czar of Russia."

We are glad to remember that it was a Southern Missionary Mr. Morrison, who called the world's attention to this abuse anew.

We mildly suggest, that it is "up to" the Archbishop of Naples to explain how it was that the Pope died after the world was assured that the clotted blood of St. Januarius, (whoever that may be) liquified in due form, in token that the prayers for the Pope's recovery, were answered. Says the Brooklyn Eagle, whose eloquent tribute to the Pope we copied the other day: "For audacious inaccuracy, for lawless manufacture, and for confident ignorance, Rome as a reporting center in a period of world interest exceeds any other place in existence." Of course, fabrications and falsehoods are so fashionable as to have grown contagious.

We print elsewhere the fact recorded in the Congregationalist that the negro delegates to the great Educational Meeting in Boston, were cared for by being "lodged with families of their own race," and that their "separation from whites, so far as entertainment went, was as complete as it would have been in any Southern city." And this in Boston! Moreover, "the problem was simplified for the reason that negroes were less than one in one hundred." Seems to us that here is a pointer for that committee of the Northern Presbyterian Assembly that is to decide whether there should be a white Presbytery and a colored Presbytery in the same territory. However, this is not our funeral.

While the Northern attacks upon the negroes are going unpunished we suggest that Southern judges and juries are adequately attending to the sporadic peonage cases and that the following report of the action of the Georgia Legislature is food for thought both North and South. The article is clipped from the former South-hating but now converted New York Sun:

Atlanta, Ga., July 6.—Advocates of schemes to block negro education by State aid are in a bad minority in the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of Georgia. To-day, after a sharp debate, the House, by an overwhelming vote, rejected the resolution introduced by Representative Byron Dower, of Decatur county, calling for a distribution of the State public school funds according to the taxes paid by the race. This would mean the death of negro education in Georgia, as the blacks pay only one-fifteenth of the taxes, while they get nearly half the funds voted to common schools by the State. Several times attempts have been made to pass laws restricting negro suffrage in Georgia, but each time they have met the same fate as the tax division act.

The whole Church will rejoice in the steady prosperity of Union Seminary. The latest addition to her well-managed material resources is the William G. Busey Bequest of $30,000.00. The material growth of the institution has been so quiet and steady since its removal to Richmond that we doubt if many of our people know how rapid this growth has been. In April, 1898, the gross assets of the Seminary were estimated at nearly $296,000.00. The gross assets now are estimated at nearly $536,000.00. So that in the five years since the removal of the Seminary to Richmond there has been an increase in the gross assets of about $240,000.00.

This remarkable development must be gratifying to all our people, especially in view of the very large proportion of our ministers who are trained in this Seminary. But the Seminary, while now equipped with an admirable outfit of buildings and provided with a considerable endowment, as endowments go in Southern institutions, should receive still other donations from benevolent people, if it is to continue to furnish the large proportion of ministers expected from it. There is no better investment of money than in our own training schools for ministers. Send one of them a hundred dollars or a thousand or ten thousand, as you are able, and then put one of them in your will for a similar amount.

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

Protestantism and Catholicism. We publish elsewhere the first of two papers by Dr. W. W. Moore, on this general subject, that are enlightening. Dr. Moore has studied conditions in Italy at first hand. He knows that American Catholicism is perforce prevented from doing the things that Italian Catholicism is unashamed of. But the events of the last few days have made other contrasts that are so striking that The Standard desires to make a few remarks of its own about them.

Practically the whole Protestant world has felt and expressed its sympathy with the dying sufferings of Pope Leo XIII. Further than that it has acknowledged the purity of his character, so far as his personal life has been known, and has felt how much infinitely worse it would have been for the cause of religion in general if he had not furnished a contrast to the lives of many of his predecessors. Protestantism, because it acknowledges the power of truth and does not tie salvation to any forms and ceremonies, to any church or creed, hopes that it is well with the soul of Leo. It declares that salvation is by faith in Jesus Christ, and however much that faith may be mixed with idolatry and superstition, it may still be saving faith. It has rightly concluded that since we cannot shut out of salvation any member of the Catholic Church, or any priest of the Catholic Church, who professes this faith in Christ, so we cannot shut out, by our judgment, the head of the Catholic Church. Nevertheless, Protestantism recognizes that in this matter it is generous as well as just, since Catholicism is still so bigoted and intolerant that it could never make any such admissions with regard to Protestants, nor apparently is able even to understand the disinterestedness of Protestantism in its prayers and messages of sympathy. It has perverted those expressions into the desire for a re-union with the Catholic Church, than which nothing is further from Protestantism, with the possible exception of a left wing of one branch of Protestantism. It is a poor return for the sympathy that has been so freely expressed, and the generous estimates of character that have been so widely published, that the Church at Rome should intimate this to be a sign of repentance and return to Rome itself.

Further, Protestantism is puzzled, not a little, in the attempt to reconcile with the most exalted character the tolerance of the shams and frauds by which the Romish Church in Europe feeds fat. The bogus miracles, the fraudulent relics, with which the city of Rome itself teems until they become a stench in the nostrils of men, what about these things? The late Pope has been set forth before us as friendly to scientific investigation and to the cultivation of the liberal arts. Is it possible that he himself believed in the efficacy of these relics, or in their genuineness, even? Mark Twain declared that he found in Europe several kegs of the "nails of the true cross." His satire is confirmed by every open-minded traveler. Any Protestant who goes to Rome with his eyes open, comes back to America a better Protestant a hundred times than he was before, from very disgust with Catholicism, spite of its splendid churches and gorgeous ritual.

Supposing that the Pope knew that these were not genuine relics, and without going into detail the most of them are so far-fetched in their claims as to be absolutely absurd, then how could he as an honest man, countenance them and their worship and their lying miracles, and receive into the papal coffers, the money that the faithful poured out in visiting these shrines?

It is true, as was said recently by an Italian statesman, that under Leo's reign the Cardinals no longer allow their concubines to ride through Rome in their carriages, flaunting the colors of the Cardinals before the multitudes and advertising the disgraceful relations between them and these princes of the Church. But the great majority of these people of Italy believe that the iniquity is only covered up for the sake of decency and because public sentiment under the excommunicated King of Italy will not tolerate in Rome what was tolerated in the States of the Church. And could not the Pope have done something to cure the frightful immorality of the priests in Italy, to say nothing of France and Spain and South America? Where is the record of his protests? And in this connection it is remembered that while he wrote an encyclical on divorce, he granted, for a consideration, of course, a dispensation to the Duke of Aosta to marry his own niece. That is something that stirs the Anglo-Saxon blood to a feeling of almost horror, a papal sanction of incest, in the plain, severe truth.

Further, Protestantism believes in Civil Liberty as well as Religious and it humbly hopes that no expression of sympathy for Pope Leo, and none of its prayers for his recovery, and none of its eulogiums upon his personal character, will be perverted into a want of sympathy with the Italian Government in its brave and hitherto successful fight to give the people the blessings of liberty. Protestantism has been hardly able to reconcile with its ideas of gentlemanly conduct the long course of criticism and treason against the Italian Government in return for its generosity to the Papal Government. And it knows that the "Prisoner of the Vatican" was a prisoner "because the door was locked on the inside."

And then Protestantism cannot help contrasting the death of such a saint as Moody with the death of the Pope, the simple faith of the one in the atoning death and the ever-living power of a Saviour, with the Pope's vain trust in saints and images, his expressed desire to die on a certain day as it was the day of Our Lady of Carmel, "whom I especially worship." And Protestantism especially will not be slow to contrast the calm assurance of its own world that D. L. Moody went home to God and that no masses or prayers are needed for his soul, with the confession which the whole Catholic World is making daily in saying masses for the repose of the soul of the very Head of the Church and the Vicar of Christ, according to its faith. Of course it is understood that the theory of purgatory and the fact that it ordinarily costs something to pray a soul out of purgatory has brought its millions into the Papal Treasury. But Protestantism is content with its own serene faith that the souls of the faithful immediately pass into glory.

We have thought that these things needed to be said. Catholicism is making the most of the advertisement it has received and is receiving. It could do not better than reciprocate the expressions of good will, by diminishing something of its own bigotry and intolerance, the kind that excommunicated the King of Italy for his patriotism, for example, and, according to Leo himself, allowed him to die unreconciled to God because he was unreconciled to the Church. If the Protestant and Catholic Communions shall have been brought closer together, so that Protestantism's objections to Catholicism can be fairly heard, good will have come of it all. But we do not anticipate any great change in this regard and it is just as well that Protestantism should not make a fool of itself, while practicing the charity that thinketh no evil.

Reply of the Texas Elder.

[We give the prominence to this article that was given the original criticism and that is given the editorial reply at the end.]

To the Presbyterian Standard:

A friend of mine has been kind enough to forward me a copy of your paper issued under date of June 24th, 1903. In this copy I find an article under the heading of "The Publication Committee and General Assembly" and published as Editorial correspondence, and signed A. J. McK. I take it therefore that it is intended as a straight editorial directly from the editor, A. J. McKelway, and as such I shall treat the article, if you will be kind enough to permit an "ignorant Texas Elder" to have space enough in your paper to reply to it. The editor, in this article, as enlightened as he made himself by his visit to Richmond, failed to deduce one solitary fact which was not plainly presented in the report of the committee to the assembly, and yet after stating the facts, upon which the debate arose, goes on to say that evidently there was a misunderstanding of the case. How could there have been a misunderstanding when the minority committee report, as it was presented, was prepared on the facts stated by the Executive Committee, which facts in the main were just the same as presented by this wise and learned editor?

The first misstatement discovered by me in the editorial of any importance in this correspondence, is in that, that he says a majority of the committee appointed by the assembly was unanimously in accord with the unanimous report of the Executive Committee. This statement, remarkable as it is in its language, is not true. The editor is excused for intentional misrepresentation in this item, because he may have been misled by the fact that there was a majority and a minority report. But if he had been moved by the same Christian spirit which actuated some of us in this matter, he would have taken the pains to learn the fact which was developed on the floor of the assembly, that one of the majority arose in the assembly and explained that he had voted in the committee with the majority under a misapprehension of the question, which misapprehension had been due to his deafness, and that another was unavoidably absent from the committee when the vote was taken and who voted with the minority in the assembly, thus showing that a majority of the committee was in fact supporters of the minority report. But this "holier than thou" editor says that two members of the committee seem to have made a false impression on the assembly, (meaning Col. Livingstone and myself.) The intimation contained in its reference is wholly untrue, even though it is made by this "holier than thou" editor after a thorough investigation by him. Because every fact stated by the ignorant Texas Elder was read out of the Executive Committee report, and commented on by him before the assembly, and not one fact was stated that was not in the report. Now if this ignorant Texas Elder was ignorant, it must be charged up to the contents of the report, and not as he elsewhere states upon rumor—which is also untrue.

Now this editor says that in the first place it should be presumed that the Executive Committee of the publication committee are gentlemen. I am obliged to the editor for this suggestion of courtesy due to this committee, by an ignorant Texas Elder. O, If this Solomon could have been present to make this suggestion at the time when the Elder might have been saved this rebuke! I will state, however, that that presumption was indulged in to the very fullest extent and an open speech and honest declaration made by myself, that I know this committee was composed of brethren of the purest and best type of gentlemen, having the welfare of the Church at heart and doing the best they could. But I stated that they were only creatures of the assembly, and I desired to know when had the time come that the servant was greater than the master. I reserved the right of the assembly to differ with the recommendation of the committee if in its wisdom it did not agree in judgment with the committee. I will, although an ignorant Texas Elder, venture to suggest to this "holier than thou" editor that he ought also to presume that the members of the Presbyterian General Assembly are also gentlemen. And modestly also suggest that first class gentlemen frequently differ in their judgment, both in the effect of facts and in business matters. I will also suggest to him, that even in the assembly, itself, 120 commissioners disagreed with 51 of their compeers, and adopted the "minority" report, although not one of them was willing to criticize or disparage a single member of the Executive Committee.

This editorial also says that the committee was criticised because certain members of the committee accepted salaried positions. This is not true. The reference in our speeches was made to show that too many salaries were being paid. In fact the same objection would have been made if these salaries had been paid to others. Again, in fact, so far as I was concerned, I did not know until I was advised afterwards that these gentlemen were members of the committee, my mind not being on that view of the case.

This Editor also says that the Texas brother was highly indignant because the committee paid to Phillips the secretary's salary for doing the secretary's work. This is not true in any sense. I am surprised that this "holier than thou" editor would even characterize me as the "Texas brother," even in sarcasm, having the opinion of the Texas Elder which this article indicates. The "Texas Elder" in his speech was endeavoring to show that after the death of Dr. Hazen, the committee raised the salary of Dr. Phillips to $2,750 although his salary had been made only $2000 for S. S. Superintendent, etc., by the assembly, and by the assembly, assigned to fixed duties different from those then conferred by the committee, and subsequently, and that just before the session of the assembly, had again raised his salary to $3000 and fixed his duties permanently, but suggesting that it was not done to forestall the action of the assembly. I asked then if they did not so intend why did they not wait for the assembly to meet; that it would have been in my judgment in better taste than to twice raise his salary and change his duties to something not contemplated by the assembly.

In reference to Dr. Phillips, I will further state that the burden of my speech was in commendation of his services in the work to which he had been elected and assigned by the assembly, and insisted that he should be retained in that work. Here again I was sustained by the Synod of North Carolina and three Presbyteries, who had overtured the General Assembly to that very point. It seems however that this great self-appointed adviser of the Church did not agree with his state synod on this point. This synod according to this "holier than thou" editor was as ignorant of their own desire as was the nameless Texas Elder. I congratulate myself on the fact I am found in good company when I contemplate my surroundings. I find although an ignorant Texas Elder, that I know, from the report of the Executive Committee on Publication, as much and the same facts learned by this wise editor after he had gone all the way to Richmond to learn it for himself. I find that I had more confidence in the report of these gentlemen than the editor, because I accepted it as true and understood it just as he found it to be, although he had to go all the way to Richmond to get it into his gracious brain. I find myself in the company of twice as many of the commissioners on the floor of the assembly as there were against me, and as stated before, I find myself in the company of the Synod of North Carolina and three Presbyteries. It seems that as ignorant as was the Texas Elder, he had at least instinct enough to travel in the company of a large majority of the Presbyterian Church of the whole South.

In this reply I have not referred to Col. Livingstone's speech or any part he took in this matter, confining what I have here stated wholly to my own position. He is able to attend to his part of this matter without any help from me, although he may be wiser than the ignorant Texas Elder and conclude to treat the article with the silent contempt which it deserves.

I will conclude by saying that I did animadvert on the business manner of Dr. Phillips in getting up and publishing the statement of expenditures and receipts as presented by him and characterized that part of the report as unbusiness-like, because it did not particularize the items so as to be intelligible to the assembly.

If the Presbyterian Standard was to be read only by the members of the assembly I certainly would not have dignified the "editorial correspondence" with any notice, but unfortunately it circulates all over the Church and perhaps, without this reply many hundreds of Christian people will not know anything more than they find in the paper of June 24th.

Respectfully,
A. J. Baker.

The Critics of the Committee of Publication

The writer of the above communication puts the words "ignorant Texas elder" in quotation marks as if the editor of the Standard had called him that. We did not. We referred to the elder from Texas. It is no crime in the eyes of the Standard to be either an elder or from Texas. We also said that he was ignorant of the facts of this case under discussion. The elder therefore impeaches himself for ignorance of the rules of controversy in quoting what was not said or intended. And at the same time he disclaims the very charitable judgment that he was ignorant of the facts. We may also suggest that so far as we know we have never claimed to be holier than anybody.

The writer calls attention to an error, our presumption that the majority report was signed by a majority of the committee. He specifies that one member was absent when the report was made up and that another was so deaf as to have misunderstood the issue, else he would have been with the minority and turned it into a majority. Of course this is a very serious mistake of ours. It reminds us of a story we have told before, about the criminal who beat his old mother, who was said by an inaccurate newspaper to be eighty years old. The paper received a letter from the man behind the bars, saying that a grave injustice had been done him, since his mother was only seventy-nine years old. But we have no objection to the allegation of deafness and imperfect comprehension against any of the folks who signed that minority report. Nor do we particularly object to the exhibition above of the intellectual calibre of one of the two men who overturned the carefully matured plans of perhaps the ablest committee of our Church, and came near producing chaos.

Consider the crassness of it. Here was good Dr. Hazen, incapacitated for weeks, lying upon his death-bed, and the Publication Business of the Southern Church needing daily attention. It was a piece of good fortune, for which the Church can not be too thankful, that Dr. Phillips was at hand to take charge of the business. And yet the Committee in this crisis, is unmercifully criticised for adding fair pay to Dr. Phillips' salary, for the responsibility laid upon him as business superintendent, and the arduous labor involved in it, in addition to his duties as Superintendent of Sunday-school work. The most "soulless corporation" does not require extra work and longer hours without paying for it. And the extra work was rated as being worth $750.00 a year. Again the Committee is criticised for paying, and Dr. Phillips for accepting, the Secretary's salary for the Secretary's work, when the Committee appointed Dr. Phillips as Secretary. In a printing office any type-setter or foreman must pay the regular wages that he receives for any "sub" that does his work. And this is a principle of common honesty. And then the elder who knows it all is surprised that the Committee, even after Dr. Hazen's death, assigned the duties of his office to Dr. Phillips and the writer actually proposes as his solution of the problem that the Committee should have waited for nine months or more until the Assembly met, before making any provision for fulfilling those duties. It is rather an important view for a member of an Assembly to take of his responsibilities that the business of the Church shall come to a standstill rather than that his action shall seem to be forestalled. And this is the idea of the Publication Business that this influential member of the Assembly held. Further, this critic of the things he undertood so well, was shocked at the number of salaries that were paid. Here was Dr. Hazen, so long the head of the Publication Work, dead. There is no editor of the Sunday School Literature, there is no treasurer to keep and to keep up with the accounts and the business is one that must not be delayed. Dr. Phillips has his hands full of the Sunday-school Work. So Dr. Stewart, of the Committee is urged to act as treasurer on account of his experience, and Dr. Smith of the Central Presbyterian, is asked to act as editor, on account of his experience, each for the munificent sum of fifty dollars a month, and Dr. Phillips is made first, Business Superintendent and then when a competent business superintendent is found, is made Secretary, still doing his Sunday School Work; and for this the Committee is arraigned before the Assembly. If our correspondent does not plead ignorance he will be convicted of heartless cruelty. He does plead ignorance of the fact that the treasurer for nearly two months and a half and the editor were members of the Committee. The Committee was authorized by the Assembly to fill the vacancy caused by the lamented death of the Secretary. It would have been derelict in its duties if it had failed to do so. And it was authorized to pay the Secretary's salary for the Secretary's work.

Again our correspondent pleads guilty of criticising the unbusiness-like publication of receipts and expenditures, by Dr. Phillips. Now the irony of this ignorance is, first, that Dr. Hazen received from the Assembly the special permission of lumping the salaries in one sum. We all knew what he got, and we were confident that he would not employ more help than was needed for the business. Sometimes, as in the extraordinary sales of Christmas Books last year, a good deal of help in the way of clerk-hire, was needed. And then Dr. Phillips had had nothing to do with receipts and expenditures since the advent of Mr. Magill, and he was criticised for an unbusiness-like report prepared by Mr. Magill who was thereupon elected Secretary for his business-like qualities.

Probably all this was so evident that we should not have wasted space in pointing it out. The matter we meant especially to comment upon was the action of the Synod of North Carolina. That action was construed as being hostile to Dr. Phillips, when, in its desire for him to remain in the Sunday-School Department, it really paid him a compliment. But the thing that has not yet dawned upon the elder from Texas or his defender, Mr. Gwinn, is that under Dr. Phillips' own plan, the wish of the Synod of North Carolina was to be carried out in both letter and spirit. There were three departments to be made of the work, one of them the Sunday School Department, with Dr. Phillips at the head, another the Business Department, with Mr. Magill at the head, and the third the Editorial Department, which Dr. Smith is filling temporarily at one-third the cost to the Church that a man for his whole time, competent to do that work, will have to be paid. There is the separation that the North Carolina Synod asked for, and Dr. Phillips is at the head of the Sunday-School Department. Furthermore, we have the assurance that the Committee had the interests of the Sunday School work at heart as much as or more than any people in the Southern Church and their plan was to exalt the Sunday School Department by making its head the head of the whole, since it must have one head. It was the Assembly, under the lead of the Texas elder and the Georgia Colonel, that made the financial department supreme over all by the election of its head—a most competent man, as we have insisted—the head of all. And then that Assembly committee, or its anti-Publication members, will never be able to explain to the Church why they did not invite before it Dr. Phillips or Mr. Magill who could have explained to the full, the items of receipts and expenditures, a report that had already been rigidly audited by a committee, by the way. That is the thing that stands out as condemnation either of wilful ignorance or sheer incompetency for handling the business entrusted to them. Not thus do men act who want to know the truth and to tell it. And the fact remains, according to the assertion of the Chairman of the Committee, that the matters brought up in the Assembly by these two worthies were matters that they had brought up in their Committee, which had been fully answered in that committee. Perhaps there were none so deaf as those that would not hear.

And we should like to say to Mr. Gwinn, now that we have mentioned his name, that he forgot the savage criticism of honored brethren by these two men whom we have rebuked. We have nothing to say as to the advantages or disadvantages of Populism in politics or in government. But the Church has no use for it, least of all the Presbyterian Church. And the sort of attack that was made, like others that have preceded it, on questions of salaries, disregarding altogether the conditions of success and of advance, were Populism, pure and simple. We made no attack on churches or Presbyteries, but we are minded to repeat a witticism of Rowland Hill's seeing that the provocation was repeated. We once saw a manuscript from a preacher in this Texas elder's Presbytery, that criticised the Secretary of Foreign Missions for riding on the trains at the Church's expense, whereas our Lord and Master walked. Rowland Hill's comment was that on one occasion the Lord rode, and that his critic reminded one of the animal. We are ready for the next bray of that sort.

Dr. Alexander Whyte used a homely and striking figure the other day, in telling his people to "put a knot in the corner of their consciences to remind them to pray for their pastor." We pass the advice down the line.

Review of Contemporaries.

An Honest Confession is Good for the Soul.

In view of sharp criticisms made by New England papers and people on the social separation of the races in the South, Boston's treatment of the colored delegates to the National Educational Association is of considerable interest. About three hundred of them reported. They were courteously received at a special desk set apart for them at head-quarters and were in every instance, with a single exception, lodged with families of their own race. One party which included one colored woman applied at several houses for entertainment, but they were told, according to the report in the Advertiser, at each place, that all the rooms were taken. At last they were received in a house at the South End kept by a white woman. Principal Booker T. Washington, who was on the program, did not appear. If he had come he probably would have stayed at the Crawford House, which he usually makes his head-quarters and where he is always welcome. We have heard no complaint from any Negro teachers or their friends that they were not properly cared for. This, perhaps, is to a large extent due to the fact that they were in the hands of a special committee of their own race with Mrs. Ruffin at its head. The problem was simplified for the reason that Negroes were less than one in one hundred of the delegates. Their separation from whites, however, so far as entertainment went, was as complete as it would have been in any Southern city.—The Congregationalist.

The importance of the work done by the American Tract Society is evident from various particulars of its seventy-eighth annual report. On one hand the half-million immigrants arriving at Ellis Island, on the other hand the unchurched regions in various States, both new and old, present inviting opportunities for the circulation of Christian literature. This is in general what the Society undertakes to do for people of all tongues spoken in this country.—The Outlook.

Simpler Living.

Suppose that the Christian life, in its daily manifestation, should come to be marked and known by simplicity and happiness. Suppose that the followers of Jesus should really escape from bondage to the evil spirits of avarice and luxury which infect and torment so much of our complicated, tangled, artificial modern life. Suppose that instead of increasing their wants and their desires; instead of loading themselves down on life's journey with so many bags and parcels and boxes of superfluous luggage and bric-a-brac that they are forced to sit down by the broadside and gasp for breath; instead of wearing themselves out in the dusty ways of competition and vain show, or embittering their hearts because they cannot succeed in getting into the weary race of wealth and fashion,—suppose instead of all this, they should turn to quiet ways, lowly pleasures, pure and simple joys, "plain living and high thinking." Suppose they should truly find and clearly show their happiness in the knowledge that God loves them and Christ died for them and heaven is sure, and so set their hearts free to rejoice in life's common mercies, the light of the sun, the blue of the sky, the splendor of the sea, the peace of the everlasting hills, the song of the birds, the sweetness of flowers, the wholesome savor of good food, the delight of action and motion, the refreshment of sleep, the charm of music, the blessings of human love and friendship—rejoice in all these without fear or misgiving because they come from God and because Christ has sanctified them all by his presence and touch.

Rev. Henry van Dyke, D. D.

The Divine Friend.

"A friend loveth at all time and is a brother born in adversity. Faithful are the wounds of a friend. Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart so doth the sweetness of a man's friend by hearty counsel. Thine own friend and thy father's friend forsake not."

"Leave God to order all the ways,
And hope in Him whate'er betide;
Thou'lt find Him in the evil days
An all-sufficient strength and guide.
Who trusts in God's unchanging love,
Builds on the rock that naught can move."

It cannot be that I was made so that my thirst should run to the river, and my curiosity to the book, and my friendship to my friend, and yet that my soul should hold back and hesitate when it is offered the chance to go to God.—Phillips Brooks.

Fellowship.

If Christ should come to-day!
If we could find him on the broad highway
Or city street,
Oh, would we crowd to touch his garment's hem,
Or kiss his feet?

If he should come to-day!
Above all honors and the paltry things
That men call great,
Is he enshrined, and have we kept our faith
Inviolate?

O gentle, pitying Christ!
Delay not coming to the weary soul,
So sick of sin;
Draw close thy cords of love until his heart Shall take thee in.

Then come at morn or eve!
Whether in manhood, youth or feeble age,
Thy visit fall,
To him who loves thee all is well, since Christ
Is all in all.

Notes From the Wide Field.

Africa.

Present Work in the Continent.—Much has been done for the evangelization of Africa, but a vast work still remains before the church of God shall have done its duty in the evangelization of that continent. The Christian Express of Lovedale brings together some facts in regard to Africa which are quite impressive. According to this article in the Express, 104 Protestant missionary organizations are at work in the continent and are using the Word of God, which has been translated in whole or in part into 117 languages or dialects. In the line of education there are 8 colleges, 59 theological and training schools, 83 boarding and high schools, 63 industrial training institutions, 2 medical schools for training nurses, several kindergarten and some thousands of primary and village schools. In the line of medical missions there are 43 hospitals and 107 dispensaries, where, on an average, 150,000 patients are treated each year. There are 3 leper hospitals, 23 homes for rescued slaves and 13 orphanages; there are 33 mission presses and 33 mission magazines. Notwithstanding all this, the great mass of heathenism in the continent has hardly been touched.

Prisoners to become Preachers.—A most interesting fact is reported from South Africa, showing that among the Boer prisoners who were captured and sent to St. Helena, Ceylon, India, and the Bermudas, a work of grace has been going on, so that no less than 175 young men during their exile have formed a purpose to become missionaries to the heathen. This movement was fostered by some ministers of the Dutch Reformed Church, who found in the prison camps an unusual opportunity for spiritual work. It seem that some ministers became voluntarily exiles that they might seize this opportunity for Christian service. In the spiritual awakening which was the result, many of these young Boer prisoners were not only converted, but resolved to give their lives to Christ for service in the missionary enterprise. These 175 young men who have returned to South Africa pledged for this work are most of them under twenty-five years of age. They have been in training where they can continue their education, and the various Dutch churches of South Africa have undertaken to provide for their support. One congregation adopted twenty-one of these students, involving an annual contribution of $2,500. All this betokens a new spirit in South Africa, and gives great promise for a speedy advance in the evangelization of that portion of the continent.

The Sleeping Sickness.—We have heretofore made allusion to that most singular disease which, so far as we know, first appeared on the Congo and has since broken out in Uganda, where 10,000 deaths from this cause have been reported in the last thirteen months. A patient, when attacked, falls into a slumber from which it is difficult to arouse him, and he falls back into sleep until the end comes; for there are few, if any, who recover when attacked. The increase of this disease is causing great alarm in all parts of Africa, and the English government has sent a scientific commission to Africa to study the disease and seek a specific for its cure. It is now believed that it is caused by a parasite in the blood, and the guilt of disseminating this parasite is laid upon the mosquito. This is a heavy load to lay upon that insect, in addition to what is now believed concerning him as to the dissemination of malaria. But the matter is most serious, and is causing no little commotion in all parts of Africa.—Exchange.

That land is henceforth my country that most needs the gospel.—Count Zinzendorf.

"What though it cost some sorrowing
To go as he would have us go?
They only know, who love their king,
How near the thorns the lilies grow.

Samuel Anoints David.

I Sam. 16: 4-13. Aug. 2, 1903.

Saul had forfeited the kingdom by disobedience, and the Lord had revealed His purpose of making another king. Samuel had departed from Saul in displeasure and grief and had plainly told him of Jehovah's design to transfer the kingdom to another and better man. For a time the aged judge mourned over Saul's transgression and fall, though he did not visit him. But at last he receives a commission from the Lord, to go to Bethlehem and to anoint a new king from among the sons of Jesse. Samuel objects that he would do this at the peril of his life, and that Saul would kill him for furnishing a rival. Jehovah repeats His command and shows His servant how to go. Our lesson presents several points of interest.

I. Samuel's Visit to Bethlehem. He was told to go as a priest to worship the Lord there by sacrifice. None could object to his performing such functions and he could invite whom he pleased to engage in this service. The town trembled at his coming and feared that he came to raise the standard of revolution. Not only Samuel but the elders of Bethlehem dreaded the vengeance of Saul, and were disturbed lest civil war with its attendant evils might be inaugurated. Hence the elders said "Comest thou peaceably?" and Samuel replied "Peaceably, I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord; sanctify yourselves and come with me to the sacrifice." He calls Jesse and his sons to the sacrifice. It was appropriate that the whole family should attend public worship and all could be present without exciting comment. It was fitting too that Jehovah should be sought through the ordinances of His appointment when a king was to be chosen. The worship furnished a sufficient reason for the assembly and was a suitable prelude to the anointing. Samuel came to Bethlehem with only a partial knowledge of his duty. He knew that a son of Jesse was to be made king, but he did not know the individual. He came to conduct worship, but he also came to designate the future sovereign of Israel. We too are often called upon to act with partial knowledge, and to do the will of God as it is gradually revealed to us.

II. David Chosen King. When Jesse's seven sons successively passed before Samuel, the seer was impressed by their physical appearance, but the Lord intimated to him, that none of them were approved by Him. David had to be sent for from the sheep folds, before he could be anointed. He was chosen to be Israel's king, not by Jesse, nor his brethren, nor the elders of Bethlehem, nor Samuel, but by Jehovah of hosts. The grounds of choice were not external and visible, but internal and spiritual. The Lord chose David because of the rare moral qualities that he possessed and habitually displayed. He had the very qualities that Saul lacked. He was generous and not selfish, humble and not proud, self-sacrificing and not self-indulgent, trustful and not faithless, submissive and not rebellious against the Divine will. Hence Jehovah says to Samuel respecting the choice, "The Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." Israel's second king, like the first, was chosen not by man, but by God. He was chosen from humble and obscure station for most exalted and conspicuous rank. He was chosen not for physical endowments, but for spiritual gifts and graces.

III. David's Anointing. David selected as king must be consecrated and qualified for office. Hence Samuel is commanded "Arise and anoint him; for this is he." He obeys without hesitation or protest.

"Only thine own to be,
Only to live to thee.

Thine with each day begun,
Thine with each set of sun,
Thine till my work is done."

Lessons from Paul: A Passion for Souls.

Romans 1: 1-17. Topic for August 9.

To Paul, the gospel of Christ was the power of God unto salvation. He believed this with his whole heart, and believing it he could not rest as long as there was anyone whom he might possibly reach who did not have this gospel. He longed to go to Rome and preach Christ there, but for years he was not permitted to do so. But he could write to them and though they were strangers to him, yet he would not let such a little obstacle keep him from declaring the counsel of God.

Paul showed forth this same zeal in his whole life. He was so anxious to have his kinsmen saved that he could wish himself accursed for their sakes.

This same fire which was burning in Paul should burn in every disciple of Christ. If the gospel is the power of God unto salvation, then we who have experienced this power in our lives should make it the chief object of our lives to carry the truth to others.

Are we doing this? Do we even show any great concern about the salvation of others? Or are we content to allow some one else to do the work, and be satisfied if we have given a little of our substance to send some one else to make known the "unsearchable riches of His grace?"

From Paul we may learn that a true passion for souls will lead us to think much about the welfare of other people. As we think about them we will unconsciously find ourselves planning some way by which they may be helped. A lady a few weeks ago wrote a letter to a minister telling him about her brother who was not a Christian. The man had had a godly father and mother but he was a wilful boy and would not heed their instruction. The woman asked the minister to go and see the brother and plead with him to give up his evil life. She said she could not go. She gave no reason why she could not. The minister went at once to see the man and found the sister who had written the letter already on the ground. After she had written to the preacher, she continued to think about her lost brother until she was compelled to get up and go to him herself. So will every one do who will begin to think seriously about the soul of some one else. To think seriously, leads to planning, and planning to carrying out the plans. We therefore should each think about what the other man needs and this will give us an anxiety for his salvation which will usually lead to action.

What has been said about meditating upon the needs of others holds equally as good about praying for them. If we have the kind of a passion for souls which Paul had, we will make mention of others in our prayers without ceasing. There is nothing that will interest us more in the welfare of others, than praying for them by name. One of God's children told the following from his own experience a few years ago. He was riding along the road one day when he met an old colored woman who had been a servant in the family for years. The old woman planted herself in the middle of the road and stopped the rider as he came along. "Massa Tom, Does you pray for ole Dinah?" she asked. "Why of course, Aunt Dinah, I pray for all my folks." "But does you pray for ole Dinah? Does you ask the Lord to bless ole black Dinah?" And the man had to confess that he never had mentioned the old woman by name before the throne of Grace. Afterwards he did pray for her by name and he found that from that time he had an interest in the old woman and her salvation which he never had experienced before. If we would have Paul's passion for souls, we must pray for people by name. Our interest in them will grow in proportion as we plead for them before God.

"Now is the time! Ah, friend, no longer wait
To scatter loving smiles and words of cheer
To those around whose lives are now so dear:
They may not need you in the coming year."

The Atlanta Educational Conference of Synods.

By Rev. J. W. Walden, D. D.

In support of the proposed Conference of Synods to settle the question raised as to the feasibility of combining the South Western Presbyterian University and the Columbia Theological Seminary in Atlanta, a few words of reply should be made to the article on this subject, appearing in a recent issue of the church papers, written by Dr. W. McF. Alexander.

After an introduction in which the action of the Board of Directors of the South Western Presbyterian University is quoted, Dr. Alexander argues against the proposed removal of the South Western Presbyterian University from five stand-points.

1. The Control of the University.—Dr. Alexander here confuses "control" with "government." The plan of union says that the Directors have "government," not "control."

"Government," as ascribed in the plan of union, to the Directors clearly means "administration." Dr. Shearer, in arguing before the Synod of Georgia, several years ago, for the adoption of the Church Educational Scheme, made the distinction between the ecclesiastical "control" of an institution and the "administration" (that is to say "government") of it, by Trustees or Directors. He cited the South Western Presbyterian University as an illustration and said, as one of the founders, that this institution was so organized, that while the Synods retained "control," they delegated "administration" (or "government") to the Directors, the chosen representatives of the Synods.

Most unquestionably, under the operation of this sort of an organization, if the Directors were in favor of so radical a movement as the change of location, that question belongs so obviously to the realm of "control" rather than "administration" (or "government") that the Board of Directors would, or should refuse to take the responsibility of bringing about the change, until so advised by the "controlling" Synods. How proper, therefore, that the Synod of Georgia, in her proposal for combination, should approach the "controlling" Synods, as the source of authority in the premises.

To those who know the mind of a large number of the brethren in the "controlling" Synods, it is plain, that the premature and peremptory treatment of this matter, by the Board of Directors, is going to create a great deal of dissatisfaction; indeed has already done so.

Nothing short of the decision of a select, authoritative conference of the "controlling" Synods will satisfy all parties.

By all means let's have the Conference!

II. The Legal Difficulties.—Dr. Alexander asserts that the principle upon which legal advice was given to those of us who are moving in this matter was that of the statute of limitations. Here his mind is confused and his utterances are likely to confuse others.

It has never entered our minds that any of the property or endowment of the University, given on the express condition of securing its location in Clarksville, ought to be removed. His confusion grows out of his erroneous view that all the property and endowment are so bound. In this difference of opinion there is a call for a select, authoritative Conference of the "controlling" Synods, to look at the matter from all sides and apart from undue local influence.

By all means let's have the Conference.

III.—The Moral Difficulties.—Dr. Alexander tries to show that "eternal principles of right and wrong" are threatened by this movement, in two arguments.

1. "The very purpose for which the University was founded shows this." That the South Western Presbyterian University was established for the Mississippi Valley, in any exclusive sense, is nowhere stated in the Plan of Union. While Synods of the Mississippi Valley did unite in founding this school for the meeting of their "Mutual wants in the matter of education," yet from the beginning the Synod of Texas united with them, as did also the Synod of Alabama. And though providing immediately for themselves, they evidently had in view the range of the whole Southern Church. For the Charter reads: "The object and scope of the institution proposed shall be to found a school in the various liberal and professional studies, and in such special and polytechnic arts and studies as may be deemed necessary, and to be under the patronage of the Presbyterian Church in the United States."

Are the "eternal principles of right and wrong" violated if the friends of an institution adjust themselves to the current of events so as to carry out in the largest and most effective way "the object and scope" which the founders of the Institution had in view, viz: the higher education, as defined, under the patronage of "The Presbyterian Church in the United States,"—the whole Southern Church?

What Mr. Kennedy and Dr. Shearer think the original donors meant, when making their gifts, is worthy of attention, as a matter of historical interest, but this lays no claim upon the institution. Are the terms of the gift "nominated in the bond?" That is the question. As to a portion of the property and endowment, the answer is readily in the affirmative. But what about the other portion? There are differences of opinion. The "controlling" Synods ought not to be satisfied until that question is settled by a select, authoritative Conference, called by them for the purpose.

By all means let's have the conference!

2. "The conditions of the requests." Now Dr. Alexander comes down to business. Let us notice his points, carefully.

(1). "As to the buildings." Most clearly the buildings were given, on condition that they be used for the school in Clarksville. If the South Western Presbyterian University decides to move to Atlanta, by all equity, the original buildings must be left to the parties to whom they will revert. No one has ever thought or said anything to the contrary.

(2). "As to the other funds." The fifty thousand dollars of Tennessee bonds, by the same equity as that controlling the buildings, must revert to Clarksville. Possibly the amount of funds given by the Synod of Nashville, the Synod of Tennessee, its legal successor, may be willing to allow to go with the moving University. It may be that she will not, though it looks as if she would have the right to do so.

(3). "As to Mr. McComb's gift." Dr. Alexander's legal mind is certainly confused on this point. It may be that the "glamour" of the one hundred thousand dollars blinds him here. At any rate, his legal vision is not clear, as he reads the condition of his gift (made at different times) to the South Western Presbyterian University. How is it possible for any unbaised mind to see any condition tying this gift to Clarksville? Only and solely because in giving the geographical location of the institution, to which his money was to go, he defined it as the "South Western Presbyterian University of Clarksville, Tennessee." Only this and nothing more! And we would be violating the eternal principles of right and wrong to use this $100,000 for the South Western Presbyterian University if this institution should decide, that its essential mission (its "purposes and aims") could best be promoted by changing its residence! But the friends of the institution in favor of moving it will be willing to give it the benefit of a doubt even here, for the time being, provided only that the question is finally settled by a select, authoritative Conference of the "controlling" Synods.

By all means let's have the Conference!

IV. The needs of the Mississippi Valley.—Atlanta is more accessible to the Mississippi Valley than is Clarksville. Take down your railway folder and you will see. In the olden time, when the steamboat commanded the stream of travel and trade, the Mississippi Valley was provincially separated unto itself. But these are the days for railways. They have shifted centres and wiped out lines of separation. They are rapidly unifying all parts of the country. They even break up State lines, in many ways. And what a centre of railways Atlanta is! Toward Chattanooga and Nashville; toward Birmingham, Memphis, and Little Rock; toward Selma, Meridian, Jackson, Vicksburg and Shreveport; toward Montgomery, Mobile and New Orleans; toward Macon, Columbus, Savannah, and Jacksonville; towards Athens, Charlotte and Richmond; towards Raleigh, Columbia and Charleston so the spokes of the wheel run out and bring within the rim of Atlanta's influence nearly all the Southern States, to a larger extent, at least, than does any other Southern city. And this advantage and increase continues with the swift sweep of our modern progress. "The Mississippi Valley" is a geographical memory, so far as provincial distinction and demarcation are concerned.

Leave Jackson, Miss, at 30:30 o'clock some Monday night and you will be in Atlanta at 10:30 o'clock Tuesday morning; but leave at 11:30 o'clock the same night and you will not be in Clarksville until 7 o'clock the next night.

All that Dr. Alexander says so strongly of the success of the South Western Presbyterian University, as evident in the character of its alumni, is widely known and disputed by no one. And just because it has produced so many fine alumni it will be found that these broad progressive men in the "controlling" Synods, from love of their alma mater, are not going to be satisfied to have this question settled in any other way than by a select, authoritative Conference of these "controlling" Synods.

By all means let's have the conference!

V. As to that million dollar university.—Under this head, Dr. Alexander ceases to be a logician and becomes a skeptic. Well, if Dr. Alexander is sent by the Synod of Louisiana to the Atlanta Conference we will disabuse his mind of all doubt on that score. "Come and see!"

By all means let's have the Conference!

The hour for action in securing a great Southern Presbyterian University is now ripe! What Vanderbilt is to the Southern Methodist Church, what Sewanee is to the Episcopal Church, this institution will be to the Southern Presbyterian Church! In a city of great enterprises, geographically and commercially strategic to the whole South, in which there is no college, the growth of which has reached a stage where a literary institution is a popular demand, in a city which will attract to the school national attention, in such a city to plant a University (flanked by a theological Seminary) on a broad basis, in a consecrated Christian purpose, is to do large things for the immediate future, in behalf of our beloved Church and our adorable Lord.

By all means let's have the Conference!

Pasquino's View of the Pope.

One of the interesting objects in Rome is a mutilated statue called Pasquino which stands at the corner of the Orsini Palace, one of the most central and public places in the city. The reason for the interest attaching to this almost shapeless pie of marble is that for centuries it has been used for placarding those satires upon the popes which by their exceeding cleverness and biting truth have made the name of pasquinade famous the world over. No squib that was ever affixed to that column had a keener edge than the one known as the "Antithesis of Christ," which appeared at the beginning of the Sixteenth Century and runs as follows:

Christ said, "My kingdom is not of this world."
The Pope conquers cities by force.

Christ had a crown of thorns.
The Pope wears a triple diadem.

Christ washed the feet of His disciples.
The Pope has his kissed by kings.

Christ paid tribute.
The Pope takes it.

Christ fed the sheep.
The Pope wishes to be master of the world.

Christ carried on his shoulders the cross.
The Pope is carried on the shoulders of his servants in liveries of gold.

Christ despised riches.
The Pope has no other passion than for gold.

Christ drove out the merchants from the temple.
The Pope welcomes them.

Christ preached peace.
The Pope is the torch of war.

Christ was meekness.
The Pope is pride personified.

Christ promulgated the laws that the Pope tramples underfoot.

That was the Italian view of the Pope then, and the Italian view of the Pope now is not greatly different. The late Pope, Leo XIII. seems to have been a man of correct outward life, a thing which every fair minded Protestant is glad to recognize, especially in view of the scandalous immoralities which characterized the lives of so many of his predecessors on the pontifical throne, but the fulsome eulogies of him which have been so industriously published by the secular newspapers throughout the English-speaking world are not endorsed by the Italian people. In fact twenty out of the thirty odd millions of Italy's inhabitants have forsaken the church altogether, refusing on principle, on ethical grounds, and on political grounds, to cross its threshold, a thing which could not be if they shared the extravagant view of the Pope's saintliness and unselfishness which have been urged upon the public during his sickness and since his death by the newspapers with a nervous insistence which of itself excites suspicion. Let it be remembered that the King, able, conscientious, patriotic, devoted to the welfare of his people, and the Prime Minister Zanardelli like his predecessor Crispi, and the members of Parliament, and the army and navy, and the whole government which has given Italy such wonderful stability and prosperity since the overthrow of the corrupt and degrading papal dominion and opened before the nation a future of so much promise, are all standing aloof from the Pope. Let any one see one of the great pilgrimages from every part of Italy to the tomb of Victor Emmanuel, who freed Italy, as I saw it this very year, and observe the immense popularity of the great liberator and his successors of the House of Savoy, and let him note the remarkable unanimity of Italy's public men in declaring the Papal Church to be incapable of bringing holiness into character and life, and he will see that the view of the Pope which the newspapers have sought to force upon the people of the English-speaking world simply cannot be that of the thoughtful men of Italy. It is not possible for a logical mind to separate absolutely in thought the character of the Pope from the character of the system of which he is the head.

But, says some one, do well known public men in Italy make such declarations about the Romish Church publicly? They do, and I will give a few of them in their own words. The great statesman Crispi once said in the House of Deputies, "The day is coming when Christianity will kill Roman Catholicism." Dr. Raffaele Mariano, Professor of Philosophy in the University of Naples, who, as he tells us, was "born in the Roman Catholic Church" and was "a fervent Catholic from infancy," speaking of the vast difference which he found between the teachings of the Church and the New Testament when he at length got hold of that, says, "Therefore, Roman Catholicism is not only not Christianity, but it is the very antithesis of Christianity." the Hon. Giovanni Bovio, a member of the House of Deputies, called the Papal Church "a branch that is withering up on the tree of Christianity." Elsewhere, when showing that the Papal Church is impotent to minister salvation, to give redemption from sin, he tells us of the well known rejoinder of the great theologian, Thomas Aquinas, when the Pope was showing him all his money and riches, and said, "You see, Thomas, the Church cannot now say what it said in early times 'Silver and gold have I none.'" "No," answered Aquinas, "nor can it say 'Rise up and walk,'" implying, says Signor Bovio, that a church impotent to say that is outside of Christ.

Let us think charitably of the late Pope by all means, but let us not betray the truth. A venerated teacher of our Church used not say, "Charity thinketh no evil, but charity is no fool." W. W. M.

Arraignment of the Race.

This article is written in the interests of the negro by one who honestly wishes him well. The negroes, represented by a conclave of the leading members of the race, recently entered a grievous complaint that the race was being judged by the comparatively few atrocious criminals who meet vengeance at the hand of the mob. They bitterly protest against the injustice of this wholesale reproach. Now it is right here that they and many of their white friends are strangely in error. Strangely,—because of the palpable fact that—there are some honorable exceptions—the sympathies of the race are manifestly with the criminal. The complicity of the race is a plain matter of fact, and so openly avowed as to be beyond question. It cannot be contradicted without stultification. Every body knows that if a negro commits a crime (against a white person) his race,—either in the North or in the South,—will harbor and hide him from the officers of the law, thus making themselves particeps criminis. This in itself is enough to make a "race issue." The supposition is inconceivable—but suppose the Jews acted after this fashion—we should certainly have another race issue,—and to account for resentment on the ground of race "prejudice" is sheer stupidity and in some instances—downright malignity. This complicity of the race is the true cause of the "race issue".

This fact is too plain for denial; and the sooner it is generally recognized the better for the peace of the country. Until the better classes of the negroes appreciate its truth no real progress towards respectability is possible for the race. The fact meets with almost daily illustration. In Wilmington, Del., too recently to be forgotten, a mob of negroes thronged the streets to "avenge" the death of—whom? A negro who had disgraced his race by the most odious of crimes: a negro whom an infuriated white mob had lynched in a manner discreditable to their race, but who deserved death, for it was not fit that such a monster should live. For the maiden whose life was first wrecked and then taken, not only the negro mob but a negro preacher—presumably a representative of negro respectability—had not one particle of sympathy. The whites he denounced as demons for killing the viper of his race whose cruelty to the maiden was far more diabolical than his own burning. I repeat that this general sympathy with crime is the real cause of the race issue; and the race itself makes it. And this instance is only a sample of the invariable. It uncovers a horrible state of morals. That preacher and his race need to be referred to Ps. 5:11, 4: Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill? He in whose eyes a vile person is contemned.

A still more recent case occurred in Evansville, Ind., as recounted in the papers of July 6th. The headlines announced a "Clash of races on the Streets of Evansville." A white mob was storming a jail with the purpose of lynching a negro. Negroes were incensed and a small war between the races was precipitated. Now there was no question that the negro deserved death; nor was there any apology for the white mob taking the law into their own hands. But what was it that so enraged the negroes? We quote from the Memphis Commercial Appeal of the 6th.

"To-nights riot was the immediate outcome of the shooting of Patrolman Massey, Friday, by Lee Brown, a negro. Brown and another negro had engaged in a quarrel and Brown had sworn to kill his antagonist.

He ran towards his home to secure a revolver, and Patrolman Massey, hearing of the trouble, lay in wait for Brown. As the negro came back armed, hunting his enemy, Massey stepped from a doorway and laid his hand on his shoulder. Brown turned quickly, a revolver in his hand, and shot the policeman in the abdomen. "Now why so enraged was the mob which sought to lynch Brown? Does anybody believe that they risked their lives because they were zealous to uphold the majesty of the law? Certainly not, for they themselves were engaged in riot, theft and murder. Were they enraged against the policeman? Why should they be? Brown had sworn to kill another negro and with this intent had armed himself, when arrested. They should have felt very kindly towards Massey and very wrathful towards Brown. Why were they so rampart for vengeance? Simply because the negro resents any white interference with negro crime—whether that interference be lawless or lawful. The negro almost invariably resists arrest and will draw a deadly weapon and take life though his offence be trivial; and if he escape to his fellows they will hide and harbor him always. They themselves thus make the race issue.

Booker Washington once struck the nail on the head when he said—if we be not mistaken—that the true solution of the problem was for the race to distinguish between good negroes and bad negroes. At present they make no such distinction. As a race they sympathize with the bad negroes.

And the misguided whites who prate about "prejudice" and bemoan the "injustice shown the negroes" especially if they be men of political prominence, are the parties really responsible for the recent increase of crime and lynching.

Attraction.

In your paper of Feb. 8th, I read your article "Questions for Parents." I was very much impressed by important truths which it contained. I feel like expressing my opinion along this line.

I have taught in the Sunday school and I find that the longer you teach the more you learn about it and to sum it all up in one word, attraction is absolutely necessary in a Sunday-school.

The teachers must put their whole soul and body in this great responsibility which they have taken upon themselves. "For where your treasure is there will your heart be also." I have learned by experience how true that is. I always made it a rule while teaching to meet my class with a smile and made it a rule never to sit down during recitation, then consequently I was facing the whole class at once. You can see very clearly how I kept their attention.

Someone may say how did I do this? By going from one end of the pew to the other. Now there is a great deal in the way any one teaches. I have seen teachers go to their classes and sit down in the middle of the seat and open their Earnest Worker or Catechism or what ever it chances to be and ask the few questions laid down, careful not to change the questions or ask any more or any less. When they have done this turn their backs to the class, fold their hands and seem to feel as if they had done their whole duty as a teacher. Now dear Christian teachers this is not attraction which is absolutely necessary for your class. After a few Sabbaths you have less pupils and you may wonder why because you are not using your influence and that must be attraction. You must get your Bible, study it and pray for a special blessing to rest upon your class and self and by doing this I will assure you that there will be a change in your class. You must carefully prepare your lessons though the week, and not leave it until Sunday morning. Then if you have done this you can meet your class well equipped and feel like you had won the hearts of those who had been entrusted to you. I remember well one summer while teaching a class that it became so large that our beloved Superintendent would come to me and say your class is too large. I must make another class.

I would say very well but don't take many of the dear children for I feel so attached to them. So the class was made and what was the consequence in a few Sabbath-schools? All of those dear faces were back again in their old places, eager to hear my voice or it seemed so to me. Now what about this? Could I tell the children you must go to another class? No indeed. I had simply endeared those children to me and their hearts were won and just as a magnet attracts certain things which it comes in contact with, so must we attract our pupils. Now one more thing about Sunday school is we should have something at the close of it for the children. I would suggest a Christmas tree, or some kind of an entertainment as a reward for their diligent attendance. Some will have objections to this plan and will begin to make excuses as did the three Bible characters of old. If I give any thing I am afraid of offending some of my fellowmen or some of the children's feelings will be touched and to console their own mind they'll fold their hands and say let's not have anything at all or they will say the roads or the inclement weather will keep the children away, etc. Then what happens? There is a gradual falling off of attendance, and some morning you may go and find only a few pupils and why? Simply because that Sabbath school is dead, there is no attraction about it. How well I remember when only a child of six, how I would walk a mile to Sunday school, for I had been told at the end of that school I would receive a present. Now that shows how it is with children, they expect a reward for their service. If there is not some benefit derived from this plan why is it that all of the towns and large cities year after year have these Christmas trees?

It does seem to me if the people in the country would attach more importance to this great work, our Sunday schools would not be such a failure. Our Shorter Catechism is so often neglected. You'll ask where does the fault lie? Some will say at home and of course this is true for it is the duty of all Christian parents to instill these precious truths in the minds of the children, but this does not excuse the teachers. I once had a pupil of a Sabbath school to say to me, "I would know more of my catechism if my teacher would ask it to me every Sunday." Teachers should be very careful not to neglect this great opportunity, for, if we do, where are our pillars of the Presbyterian Church to come from in the future? I hope that all of our teachers in the country may be benefitted by these few remarks and feel that our Sunday-schools have increased rather than decreased. Silence.

The Needs.

During the month of June many of us have had the great door of the Home Mission field opened to us by our faithful treasurer and loyal ministers.

First that we might see the work's need; and secondly, that we might give of our means to have the gospel preached in this part of "all the world."

I am now in a Home Mission field, but not such a purely Mission field as in the Providence of God I had the privilege of laboring in last year and a portion of the previous one. I had two noble little bands to minister to, but much of the surrounding territory was destitute of the Gospel and the people truly sat in great darkness.

Why God called me away from this needy field I do not know, neither will I question the propriety of his purpose, "Even so Lord for it seemeth good in thy sight," but I loved the work.

No work appeals to me more than the Home Mission field, I am deeply interested in Foreign Missions and would not pluck one laurel from the brow of any faithful and sacrificing one who is planting in darkest heathendom the cross of Christ from which radiates the glorious Gospel light. A man may be very praiseworthy and charitable when his own house has been provided for, to zealously help others; indeed both may be performed at the same time and in accordance with God's Word, Bear ye one another's burdens. But to provide for others and neglect his own is infidelic.

There are a few obvious reasons why we should contribute freely to the support of the Gospel in the Home field.

First it is here at us. We sometimes fold our arms with a sigh and wonder why we were not called to the Foreign Field. Ah! brother look upon the need near you.

A second reason is the eagerness of the people for the Gospel. It was sad to turn away so many calls to "come over to our school house and preach for us; will get you a crowd." Oh! I see their pleading faces now.

A third reason is their need of the Gospel. In some places they have preachers of a kind; a kind that live not by the Gospel, but by horse swapping, aiding in political schemes, often performing manual labor for six days in the week. No Bible, no Sabbath, no churches in many instances, and in their stead, cards, whiskey and vice.

A fourth reason is the willingness of noble men and women to go to these forsaken fields, endure hardships untold, eating what they eat, sleeping where they sleep, while they prepare the soil and sow the blessed Gospel seed. You can't leave your business, your wife or husband and the dear babes, but you can give as the Lord has prospered you to send those who can and are willing to go.

In the last place you and I, being members of Christ's Kingdom and co-workers with Him are, in loyalty to our Lord and King, duty bound to promote the interest of his and our kingdom in all the world.

Hear these words—"When saw we thee hungry, thirsty, a stranger, naked, sick and in prison"—"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me," and one day the King will say, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

The Nashville Presbytery asks for $3,500 to prosecute this work. This amount was apportioned to the churches in her bounds, $126 falling to the Hopewell group. We (excepting the pastor) thought this was more than we could ever reach. However a sermon was preached on the subject, blank cards were passed through the congregations, the people were asked to write their names with the amount they would give to be paid in three installments—June, August, and February. All the churches with one exception subscribed the amounts apportioned, and paid one third in cash. Cripple Creek $12, Stones River $32, Hopewell $32, Mt. Vernon $7.

We write this hoping it may encourage others.

Hoping the Lord may greatly bless this cause during August and February. We are,

Sincerely,

Milton, Tenn.

Fraternal Union.

An old Scotchman had quarreled with his wife and had not spoken to her for several days. The little dog and the cat were lying lovingly together by the fireside. The lady of the house said to her pouting husband, "Why cannot you and I get along as happily together as that cat and dog?" His resolute reply was, "Ah, Jane, you just tie them together as we are, and then you will see sights." So I fear as to the Union of the Southern with the Reformed Presbyterian Church. Their standards of doctrine, Sunday gowns and ritual of worship all differ from ours.

The Northern Presbyterian Church is Calvinistic to the very core, just like our own. It has never held that slave-holding is a sin per se; neither have we. In practice it favors separate congregations, Presbyteries, and Synods for the colored people; so do we. It did not absorb a heretical church when it united with the New School; neither did we. They have apologized—and we have "unanimously accepted" their apology—for ugly things said by them against us during the war: so there are no old scores to be settled. They have decided judicially that women shall not preach in their pulpits. That is one step further than we have gone; so there is no difficulty there.

One-tenth of their preachers are Scotchmen; another tenth are Southerners; the other eight tenths are orthodox by conviction and choice,—and also for their personal safety.

As to the objection by our popular editor that the Northern preachers are Republicans, I have to say that there are probably seven hundred Democrats among them while there is at least one Republican of Western Virginia in the Southern Church.

Our editor also complains that their views differ from ours on the subject of tobacco: It is true. We claim that the use of tobacco is a decent habit to be exhibited on the street; they claim that smoking should be done in private. Again we claim that we should use the genteel word chew; they claim that the word chaw is good enough to express such a habit.

But ought we to allow that one word to divide two great Churches? I favor the appointment of a learned committee to remove the difficulty.

The Unity of God in the Light of Physical Science.

Dante represents Saint Bernard wondering about Paradise till his view "hover'd the brink of dread infinitude." With his eye earnestly fixed on the everlasting splendor, Saint Bernard saw "in that depth in one volume clasp'd of love, whate'er the Universe unfolds, all properties of substance and of accident; he beheld compounded yet one individual light the whole."

In those few lines of poetry you have Dante's statement of the truth older than Moses and the Pentateuch: The Lord our God is One Lord.

The Lord our God is One Lord—of course he is; for if He were two or three or many there were the universe a chaos and human history confusion worse confounded. But not so. There is one God, one law, one element and one far off divine event to which the whole creation moves!

"Infinite Ideality!
Immeasurable Reality!
Infinite Personality!
Hallowed be Thy Name!
Halleluiah!"

The Lord our God is one Lord—that is a text of Scripture. The reader, maybe, reckons Scripture below par; and as for the poetry of Dante and Tennyson he will have none of it.

Let him take this then: "I tell you there is somewhere, somehow, a Supreme Intelligence working through the seen and through the unseen and in some strange unknown fashion shaping the destinies of mankind."

There the reader has a quotation, not from a musty Hebrew roll, nor from a writer of the Italian Renaissance, nor from the poet laureate of the Victorian age, but from an up-to-date man of Science—Edison the electrician.

A supreme intelligence working through the seen and through the unseen! How like the God of the Bible that sounds. All the way across the centuries this physicist strikes hands with Moses; and like Moses takes his shoes from off his feet for the ground whereon he too stands is holy.

Five thousand years ago, in the valley of the Nile, the priest of Isis filled with awe, sang the unity of God; and Abraham proclaimed it on the Plains of Mamre. In this year of grace, 1903, in the laboratories of chemistry and biology, the votaries of science filled with the same awe, acknowledge the same unity. The universe is found to be a universe. In every part of it the same laws of heat, light, gravity, and uniform causation prevail. Therefore the old time polytheism is dead. Science proves what faith believes: One God and Lord of all, one law, and one element in all and through all.

Five thousand years ago there was placed on the fane of the temple of Isis at Sais this inscription: "I am all that was and is and shall be; nor my veil has it been withdrawn by mortal." [Moses heard the voice from out the bush proclaiming: "I am that I am." So full and overwhelming is the universe with the need of divinity that in this year of grace 1903, that ancient inscription is seen to be written all over the face of nature. So loud and insistent is that mysterious voice that all nature is seen to be vocal with God's praise. It seems that the architects of science have builded a nobler temple than the altar of unhewn rock built by Abraham. It seems that the hierophants of nature have introduced us to a sublimer worship than the smoking sacrifices of ancient Egypt. It seems that they justify the first of all the commandments and prove that the Lord our God is one Lord!

Recent discoveries in the fields of anatomy, chemistry, psychology and sociology all tend to prove a real cause above nature. To Johannes Muller the father of physiology, every look into a microscope was a service to God. To Kepler, every look into a telescope was to read God's thoughts after him. Harvey, Copernicus, Newton, and Galileo were antecedently convinced that there is purpose in nature, i. e. that the universe is grounded in reason, is an effect and therefore must have a cause. This conviction led them to their scientific discoveries.

Investigators have searched throughout the physical universe, weighing, measuring, analyzing, foretelling. Their spectroscopes have revealed the constituent elements of sun and stars. Their geological surveys have shown written on the rocks, the history of life. Their telescopes have detected in the Milky Way planets in the very process of creation. Their microscopes have brought the invisible within the range of vision. They do this and reduce the diverse forces of the universe whether electric, thermic, chemic or magnetic to one eternal, infinite and omnipresent Force. The content of this Force ever remains the same. To it nothing is ever added; nothing is ever taken away. It changes its form but never its volume. That is what is meant by the correlation of forces and the conservation of energy. These two conclusions of science compel us to maintain that the universe has a correlative and a complement in the unseen.

Sir J. William Dawson insists that if we deny that implication then we cannot believe in the possible existence of the material universe itself and must sink into nihilism.

Sir John Herschel declares it reasonable to regard the force of gravitation as the direct or indirect result of Consciousness of will existing somewhere.

"There is but one God; therefore the world is harmonious," reasoned Bacon. "Its laws therefore are simple, its quantity of energy is a constant quantity and its forces are correlated and transmutable from one to another." On these simple fundamental principles Bacon based the Novum Organum and the whole system of inductive knowledge has grown therefrom. Science by thus resolving the multitude of forces into one Central Force, a sort of a Fountain head of Power proves nature to be what Alexander von Humboldt liked to call it—"One living whole," an harmonious and growing organism, the expression of the thought and will of the eternal spirit who was before all things and by whom all things consist. Science thus affords us a physical proof of the text: "The Lord our God is one Lord."

Compare the proofs of God's unity opened to Adam or David with those opened to us by this doctrine of the correlation of forces! Compare the proofs of His unity open to Moses or Isaiah by the ipse dixit of Jehovah with those opened to us by the investigations in chemistry made by Cooke, in geology by Winchell, in paleontology by Falconer, in astronomy by Kepler, in natural history by Agassiz!!

Since Bacon's day inductive science proves what faith believes: One God and Lord of all, one law, and one element in all and through all.

It was by faith that the writers of Scripture discerned the unity of God. As Max Muller says: "If I were asked how it was that Abraham passed through the denial of the gods to the knowledge of the one true God I should be content to answer that it was by a special divine revelation." We moderns discern that unity and possess the knowledge of it by experimental proof and physical demonstration!

So sure is Edison of the existence of a Supreme intelligence that he says that he could demonstrate it with mathematical certainty and that one day he may make the attempt.

And Mary Sullivan, honored throughout the world, for her researches in physical geography declares that nothing afforded her so convincing a proof of the Deity as the purely mental conceptions of numerical and mathematical science which by slow degrees have been vouchsafed to man and which are still vouchsafed by the differential calculus, now superseded by the higher algebra.

The great investigators have ascertained the facts; the great thinkers have interpreted the facts. This is the interpretation: "We are under necessity," Herbert Spencer says, "of thinking of this external energy in terms of the internal energy and this gives rather a spiritual than a materialistic aspect of the universe. We are ever in the presence of this Universal Power. It is manifested throughout the universe and in ourselves wells up under the form of consciousness."

Note that quotation carefully: "We are under necessity of thinking of this external energy in terms of the internal energy."

In other words the only power within one's self is will, free reasonable will. Will is the only causality that lies within. If we are under necessity of thinking of the external energy in terms of the internal we must think of it as will. Will is seen to be the only element that can be charged with the power of the world. If we must interpret nature in harmony with what we know of human will then we are sure that the likeness between the world within and the world without reports a real correspondence both as to idea and to causality. We justify our faith that the sole power in the Universe is the Divine Intellect and Will!

Back of all phenomena, back of all fitful apparances and transformations, back of all changes and transmutations, back there you find unity of the substantial basis of the world. There you come upon the Great I Am. You come upon Him as suddenly as Moses did when he led his flock to the backside of the desert and came to the mountain of God even to Horeb!

"Farther and farther back we push
From Moses and his burning bush,
Why art thou there? Above, below,
All nature mutters, 'Yes and No'
Tis the old answer, We're agreed
Being from being must proceed
Life be but life's sources."

In Summer Time.

Tis Summer time, the long and lazy hours
Are slow of wing.
We watch their flight, while all our drowsy powers
Are echoing
Tis Summer time.

And I would seek some cool sequestered glade,
By mountain stream
And there beneath the beachwood's sheltering shade,
Would lie and dream
In summer time.

The cattle seek the woodland's grateful shade
And sweet content
Rests like a benediction on this glade
And hours there spent
In summer time.

I hear the tinkling sheep bells far away,
The hum of bees,
As on swift wing they toil from day to-day,
(For winter's ease)
In summer time.

Soft breezes play around the fevered brow
Wooing to rest,
And here in wakeful, happy slumber, now
May I with zest
Greet summer time.

The sparkling brook joins in bright nature's song
Pure notes and true,
While woodland harmonies, their note prolong Strains ever new
In summer time.

Or should my fancy seek old Ocean's shore Glad would I be
To watch thy crested waves, and hear thy roar,
Oh restless sea!
In summer time.

To count the swanlike sails in distant view
As bound afar
They plow the waves, and answer quick and true.
The jolly Tar
In summer time.

To watch the seagulls fighting with the gale
In daring flight
As out to sea they follow some swift sail
Nor heed the night
In summer time.

The heart at ease can ever find some spot
In every clime
Where earthly shadows for the time forgot
Earth seems sublime.
Blest summer time.

To weary hearts pent up in cities' heat
Panting for life,
To weary limbs, and aching, lagging feet
Worn down with strife
In summer time.

To these may come few days of peaceful rest
Along life's way,
But they shall find beyond the distant west
Eternal day,
Glad summer time.

Pine Groves.

As through the high clere-story of a temple
The glory-light streams o'er the minster-walls,
So through clear space between high branches ample,
A shaft of light far through the forest falls.

A light, green-tinted by the airy swaying
Of star-like pine-tufts on the sky's deep blue,
Traces illuminations softened, raying
A stellar beauty all the woodland through.

The slant beams bathe the boulders, gray, old altars,
And bar the pillared boles of many a tree:
Sweet orisons from thousand leaved psalters
Murmur and swell, a wind-breathed minstrelsy.

A templed coolness, a cathedral splendor,
Faint incense from the myriad fringed green,
Greet us, as with the salutation tender,
"Peace be to you, within these shrines serene."
Mrs. Merrill E. Gates.
1315 New Hampshire Ave., Washington, D. C.

"Every gentle deed you do
One bright spirit brings to you—
One more angel watch to keep
By your pillow while you sleep;
Softer makes the wind's weird song
Through the pine trees all night long,
Clearer makes the white stars gleam
While you dream,
While you dream."

"The gospel of a life like hers
Is more than creeds and scrolls,
The dear Lord's best interpreters
Are loving human souls."

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

Dr. Walden ably and earnestly discusses Dr. Alexander's paper on the South Atlantic University, or whatever name it shall be called, that is going to be established in Atlanta, though Dr. Alexander thinks not. We think that a case has been made out for the Conference at any rate. Pasquino's View of the Pope is one of two articles signed by the well-known initials, W. W. M., and will help as an antidote for some of the mush and gush that has lately been written on the subject of the Papacy. Dr. John W. Primrose has a word to say about the arraignment of the negro race. Rev. T. A. Patton, D. D., makes a strong setting forth of "The Needs." Dr. James P. McMillan makes a plea for "Fraternal Union" and Rev. E. Mac Davis has a thoughtful article on the Unity of God. We wonder how many of our Home Missionaries "keep up" as well as Mr. Davis?

The poems at the close of the Contributed articles are of real merit and the Devotional, Missionary, Sunday-school and Young People's Departments, seem to the editor who does not have anything to do with preparing them, to be just about as good as any that are to be found in any religious paper with which he is acquainted. This is our Fourth Educational number and this is not the last.

TENNESSEE.

The pastorate of Rev. R. R. Evans, of Germantown, Tenn., whose death occurred last week, was not less notable because it was a quiet one, in a small community, not widely known.

Fifty-three years in the same charge tells its own story. The faithfulness of the pastor, his character, and his work are all testified to by the time he has spent in this one field.

COVINGTON.—On July 19th, Rev. James D. Wallace was installed as pastor of the church in Covington, Tenn., by a commission of Memphis Presbytery composed of Rev. W. L. Caldwell, of Memphis, who preached the sermon and charged the people; Rev. W. M. Scott, of Memphis, who charged the pastor, and ruling elder, Jas. R. Hall, of Mt. Carmel church.

Rev. W. Moore Scott preached in the Covington church Sunday night. On Friday evening, July 7th, the Ladies' Aid Society, assisted by the Young Ladies' Auxiliary of the Covington church gave an elegant reception to the new pastor and his wife at the delightful home of Mrs. Kate Ried, to which all of the members of the church and a few friends of other denominations were invited.

Three new members have been received into the Covington church during the past month.

MT. CARMEL.—Rev. Thos. Hall, our missionary to Cuba, is at Mt Carmel, Tenn., for a month's vacation. Rev. E. E. Patterson, of Sommersville, W. Va., is supplying the Mt. Carmel church for the months of July and August.

Miller charged the pastor and Chief Justice, H. G. Bunn charged the people. The First and Second churches called in their services and united with the Central church. There was a large congregation and the services throughout were interesting.

Information Wanted.

I write this to request that if any of the ministers of Orange Presbytery, (or of its officers or members) know the present P. O. address of Mr. A. R. Harrison, late student of Davidson College, and who about six weeks ago entered on Colportage work within our bounds, that if such will inform me of it they will advance the interests of this important work and will greatly oblige our agent at Richmond and me. My address is Milton, N. C.

Joseph Evans,

Agent of Colportage for Orange Presbytery.

July 20, 1903.

JONESBORO.—We have just closed a meeting of eight days at Jonesboro. Rev. G. W. Belk, my classmate at U. T. S., pastor of Tenth Avenue Presbyterian Church, Charlotte, N. C., did all the preaching. Bro. Belk faithfully performed his duty. He reminded me of Paul who "ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears." His sermons were all good. They were in many respects far above the average. Bro. Belk greatly endeared himself to us all, and we hope to have him with us again. As a result of the meeting there were seven additions to the church and we give all the praise to God.

K. A. McLeod.

AN IMPORTANT MATTER.—Claims the immediate attention of the Presbyterians of the Synod of North Carolina. In the last "Fatherless Ones" is an appeal for friends to complete the industrial building at Barium Springs, which will cost about $2,000.00. The special need is the furnishing of the Laundry and Mr. Boyd does not want the gifts for this to interfere with the regular contributions. There are 35,000 Presbyterians in the State. One penny from each member will amount to $3,500 which will furnish the funds to do this work. Will not some good woman in each church present this cause, and secure an amount equal to at least one cent for each member of the church? This is an urgent matter, will take but little time or trouble but what a blessing to our Orphan household. The annual collection of "Peters Pence" in the Roman church brings in over $2,000,000. Let no one wait for another. Act at once, so that the Laundry can be completed before winter. God's blessings upon a prompt response to this appeal.

Sincerely yours,

C. W. Robinson.

(The need above mentioned speaks for itself. The plan outlined is simple and practical. Let us pull all together.)

GASTONIA.—At a meeting of King's Mountain Presbytery, Tuesday night, the 21st., after a full consideration of the resignation of Rev. McG. Shields, the Presbytery unanimously declined to dissolve the pastoral relation. The congregation was represented by two elders, five deacons and three private members. As noted in these columns, Mr. Shields had resigned the pastorate, subject to the action of Presbytery, in order to accept the call of the First Church at High Point.

DAVIDSON. The beginning of the second week of the Piedmont Summer school finds the enrollment approaching 50, so that the attendance has been altogether larger than was expected. Dr. Harrison gave an instructive and entertaining lecture the first of the week on "Literature and Life." On Wednesday evening, Rev. A. J. McKelway, D. D., favored us with the address he made lately at the Knoxville Summer School. His subject was, "Jesus as the model for the teacher, in His possession of knowledge, wisdom, sympathy and character." He elaborated each of these heads, illustrating in the main by incidents drawn from the New Testament. Of course the address was strong and forceful and at the same time a helpful and interesting presentation of the subject.

On last Sabbath morning Dr. Graham preached a sermon designed especially for the teachers. He, too, had as his topic the Saviour as a teacher, but treated from an entirely different point of view from that of the lecture by Dr. McKelway. It was a timely topic, touching the teacher's life and work and in tangible form, presented in Dr. Graham's usual effective and elaborate style. Dr. Martin will talk to-night on some features of cooking from the chemist's point of view.

A few evenings ago, instead of the formal lecture, an old fashioned spelling bee was conducted by Prof. Baird, of Charlotte. A large number took part. The prize, however, was won by a 13-year-old Davidson boy, Norwood Alexander, a grandson of Dr. J. B. Alexander, of Charlotte.

Report of Agent for 20th Century Fund.

To Drs. Graham and Smith, Committee:—

As your agent and the Synodical Committee's agent in the 20th Century Educational Canvass I would make the following partial report.

From February 20 to July 20 some 19 churches have been visited—mainly in Concord Presbytery. These churches though largely country churches and though in several the work is not yet complete, have subscribed or paid in almost nearly $8,000.00, running from a total of nearly $5,000.00 (including former subscriptions) at Concord to but little over $100 in one or two of the smallest congregations. Owing to unavailable circumstances the canvass is as yet incomplete at Morganton, Newton, Thyatira, Rocky River and Westminster, but in each of these places the work will be completed without additional cost to the committee.

One of the most encouraging features in the canvass has been found in revisiting those places where subscriptions were made one or two years ago. In every case the subscription lists were found to be in excellent shape and were easily collected up to date.

In a few cases opportunity has been given your agent for evangelistic service and a number of engagements of this sort are at present in sight. The pulpits and the purses in nearly every case seem to be opened willingly and taking all things into consideration there is every reason for encouragement.

Below is given a list of places visited with amount subscribed or paid.

DETAILED REPORT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Concord, First Church, $3,000, in addition to $2,000 given a year ago; Morganton, $310, incomplete; Newton, $200, incomplete; Taylorsville, $455; Unity, Franklin, Third Creek, Cleveland, $735, Thyatira, $150, incomplete; Rocky River, $125, incomplete; Mocksville, $650; New Salem, Clio, Concord, Iredell, $495; Westminster, $500, in addition to former subscriptions; Gastonia, $200, in addition to former subscriptions; Lincolnton, $100, in addition to former subscriptions; Salisbury, $800, in addition to former subscriptions. Total, $7,725.00.

The cash collections can not be given accurately without reference to Dr. Murray's books, but the total is not far from $1,000, while the expenses have been up to date, including salary, $585.73.

Yours in service,

D. P. McGeachy.

ALAMANCE.—We have raised the necessary money to beautify the inside walls of our splendid church building.

MEBANE—This is the seventh call on our subscribers, and it is for the purpose of helping to complete the Church, located near Malloy post office, Rockingham County, Orange Presbytery. Mr. James V. Price, an Elder in the Wentworth Church, writes me: "That they have spent about $500, including work given on the building. $150 will complete it. $65 is now due for work done, the balance of the $150 will be necessary for painting, finishing and seating. While the neighborhood is a poor one, the outlook for our Church is good, having a very nice Sabbath-school, running summer and winter, attendance over 30. The congregations are good."

Who would not like to take part in such a noble work? Let us help to complete this Church. Please send us $1.00 or as much as you may wish to give. Money cannot be given to a better cause.

Remit promptly, please, to Rev. R. W. Hines, Mebane, N. C.

GOSHEN GROVE—On Sabbath, July 5th, 1903, a commission of Wilmington organized a church of 19 members, with two elders and two deacons in the field of Rev. P. McIntyre. The church is called Goshen Grove Presbyterian Church. A large congregation was present.

MISSIONARY UNION.—Delegates to Ladies' Missionary Union of Fayetteville Presbytery, which meets at Mt. Vernon Springs Church, Aug. 26 and 27th, will please notify Miss Nannie White, Ore Hill, N. C., in order that accommodation may be provided for all who wish to attend.

Very respectfully,

Mrs. M. C. Lane.

Mt. Vernon Springs, N. C., July 20, 1903.

GEORGIA

BLACKSHEAR.—The prospects are very bright indeed for the opening of the Presbyterian Institute. It now seems that every room in the boys' dormitory will be taken some time before the opening of the school September 15th. The Trustees have been fortunate in securing a Principal, Mr. Thos. G. Wilkinson, a graduate of the University of South Carolina, and a special student of Cornell University. Mr. Wilkinson has arrived on the field from Beaufort, S. C. where he has been Superintendent of the Public School, and is now preparing for the opening of the Institute. A. L. Patterson.

ALBANY.—The commission appointed by Macou Presbytery for the installation of Rev. W. H. Ziegler as pastor of the Albany Church on May 23rd last, was composed of Rev. J. W. Quaterman, Rev. C. H. Hyde, Rev. R. E. Douglas and Elder Miller of the Albany Church. By reason of illness on the part of one of the commissioners the pastor of the Church requested that another date be fixed.

On Sunday July 12th all were present except Rev. C. H. Hyde who was engaged in an evangelistic tour through Oklahoma Territory.

Just before eleven o'clock, the hour appointed for the installation, a heavy rain accompanied by quite a wind kept many from Church who otherwise would have been present at the services, which were solemn and impressive. At the evening service the Baptist and Methodist pastors, with their congregations, worshipped with the Presbyterians, filling the building to its utmost capacity.

Mr. Ziegler has taken hold of his work with a strong, firm hand and has secured for himself a warm place in the hearts of his people and of the entire city as well.

This Church has only recently felt able to call a pastor for all of his time; now that it has thus boldly taken this step and secured the services of so able a minister as Mr. Ziegler, we feel assured that under God's blessing there is a future of great growth and usefulness in store for it.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Great Need of Missionaries.

Editor Presbyterian Standard.

A few weeks ago your issue contained a strong appeal from Rev. J. R. Graham, of our mission at Tasingkiangpu, for an increase in our foreign force in the North Kiangson Mission. My aim in writing this is to emphasize that appeal. I feel inclined to do so from the fact that his article does not cover the whole ground, and also because I think it well to add my own testimony to what he has said. I begin by one or two preliminary remarks.

1.—Brother Graham estimates the population in this province north of the Yang-tz River as being 12 (or 11) millions. I feel sure that this estimate is far below the actual population. If one looks at the province he will see that nearly two thirds of it lie north of the river, and this is notoriously one of the thickly populated parts of the empire. The whole population of the Kiangson province is ordinarily put down as 39 millions. But should it be so low as 25 millions, we should have to put at least 5 millions of these on the north side of the river. I have traveled rather extensively over nearly all of the province and can testify to the large population.

2.—Mr. Graham does not touch the field south of the great river. But our field extends 100 miles south of it. Here at Chinkiang my colleague and myself are trying to work over a field two hundred miles long, 100 miles on each side of the river, and in doing so are not encroaching on the territory of any Protestant missionary of any denomination. Between Chinkiang and Soochow, 120 miles southeast of us, there is no Protestant missionary and not even a native helper, save one under our care at Tanyang, about 20 miles south of us. In the part of the field south of the river, and including Chinkiang, we have no less than six cities that we are trying to work, none of which, except Chiukiang, have any mission stations, or even "out stations," except the one just mentioned—Tanyang. Two of these cities, Chinkiang and Changchow, halfway between us and Soochow, can be put down safely as having a population each of less than 200,000, the other four ranging most probably between 100,000 and 50,000 each. But these cities do not by any means represent the bulk of the population. There are many large and smaller towns, some of which would rank as good sized cities in the States. Then there is an uncounted country population. But our work here at Chinkiang has grown some and now that this vast field of which Chiukiang is the centre is left to one missionary with possibly three or four helpers to evangelize. While there are three other societies represented at Chinkiang, they are all very weak, only one of them having more than one ordained missionary, with little or no prospect of increase.

I hope anyone reading the above can see the fact—an appalling destitution and a farce—one might say—ridiculously inadequate to supply the demands. Our needs are, more ordained men, fitted for the work, and also Christian teachers to grapple with the educational problems now coming up here. We have started a school here—a Christian school and self-supporting, excepting the missionary's salary. We sorely need an efficient Christian teacher from home to take this burden off our hands. Then we need all the help necessary to push forward the training and putting in the field a large, well-trained native force. The latter has been woefully neglected heretofore as a general thing. As long as we have no theological school, we shall have to take the time at our various stations to teach and train men for the work. But in whatever way it is to be done, we need to give this part of the work most earnest and prayerful attention.

Yours sincerely,

A Sydenstricker.

Chinkiang, China, June 6, 1903.

The Lookout Mountain Missionary Conference.

In response to an invitation sent out by the Executive Committee of the Young People's Missionary Movement, one hundred and sixty-four delegates from 9 of the central and southern states, also 4 foreign countries, met for an eight days conference for prayer, Bible study and the discussion of ways and means for furthering the interest in world-wide evangelization in the Church and Sabbath school.

The Young People's Missionary Movement is the outgrowth of a conference held in the city of New York, Dec. 11-12, 1901, which was attended by the leaders in work among young people; such men as Dr. F. E. Clark of the Christian Endeavor, Amos R. Wells, John Willis Bear, Rev. A. L. Phillips, D. D., Luther D. Wishard, Robt. E. Speer and others.

An Executive Committee was formed at this conference having as its members some fifteen board secretaries of the different denominations.

The first Conference of the Young People's Missionary Movement was held last summer, July 6-25, at Silver Bay, Lake George, N. Y. This was a very successful conference, and it was there decided that an invitation would be sent to the leaders in Missionary Movement in the Southern, and Central States, to hold a similar conference at some convenient spot in the South.

The first conference of the Young People's Missionary Movement, South, was held at Lookout Inn, Lookout Mountain, July 1-8.

The Young People's Missionary Movement is not an independent organization, but is a federation or clearing house, furnishing a medium of co-operation for the various denominational Missionary Boards, home and foreign, in the prosecution of their denominational work among young people.

WHY THIS MOVEMENT.

The great dearth of properly qualified leaders for organized, aggressive work in Missionary activity is alone a sufficient reason for these conferences.

A second reason is that several denominations are at present inaugurating special movements for developing their young people in missionary work.

These conferences bring together the denominational secretaries and young people's leaders.

The fundamental reason for the importance of such a conference is for a deeper spiritual life through Bible study, prayer and unity of Christian effort.

PERSONNEL OF THE CONFERENCE.

There were present 164 delegates from 8 different denominations, and from 19 States, representing twenty different vocations in life, showing that it makes no difference as to one's vocation in life; if he names the name of Christ he must be His witness "unto the uttermost parts of the earth."

It was a great pleasure to be thrown with so many of our Church in our denominational conference.

There were 53 Presbyterians present. It was a pleasure to see our Home Mission Secretary, Rev. S. L. Morris, D. D., our Foreign Missionary Secretary, Rev. S. H. Chester, D. D., and Dr. Phillips' bright and enthusiastic countenance; also the three noble young men of "Our Forward Movement" Preston, Moffett and Stuart.

Our most capable and efficient editor of "The Missionary" added much by his presence.

Our church is indeed greatly blessed in having as the editor of our Missionary magazine one so thoroughly qualified as Rev. H. F. Williams. God speed him in his new position.

AS TO THE CONFERENCE.

The morning session of three hours was devoted to Bible study, discussion of missionary methods and there were two mission study classes, home and foreign.

The spiritual hour, or Bible hour was conducted by Rev. W. R. Dobyne, D. D. of St. Joseph, Mo. Dr. Dobyne took up the study of the first thirteen chapters of the Acts of the Apostles, naming them,

Ch.	I.	The	Church	Commissioned.
"	II.	"	"	Empowered.
"	III.	"	"	Accredited.
"	IV.	"	"	Tested.
"	V.	"	"	Disciplined.
"	VI.	"	"	Equipped.
"	VII.	"	"	Vindicated.
"	VIII.	"	"	Scattered.
"	IX.	"	"	Delivered.
"	X.	"	"	Extended.
"	XI.	"	"	Named.
"	XII.	"	"	Persecuted.
"	XIII.	"	"	Obedient.

In the discussion of Ch. XII, Dr. Dobyne said, "The church is always persecuted in proportion to the power manifested through it by the Holy Ghost. When the Church begins to be effective, when results of its work begin to be manifest, then persecution comes. I do not mean mere Church activities, for the Church may be a bundle of activities yet be accomplishing nothing of real value. We make too many compromises with the world. By competent statistics it is shown that in the last decade fewer members were added to the church than in any of the five preceding. Yet during these last ten years, with missionary societies, young people's movements, and other agencies, the Church has been more widely active than ever before. The secret of it is, not that these activities are valueless, or that the world will be conquered without them, but that the Church has not been full of the Spirit and power of God. A popular Church, a respectable church, is not only not a persecuted church, but it is also a church of compromises and ineffectiveness. Bone and sinew we come from heroic withstanding of persecution, and the church of bone and sinew, the Church that is alive with vital power for God, is a Church that must awaken antagonism in the world. Not only is persecution a sign of effectiveness, but also a means to effectiveness in its purifying power."

The second hour of the morning session was the missionary institute conducted by Mr. C. V. Vickery of New York. Here ways and means were discussed and outlined as to promoting missionary reading, missionary meetings, etc. The third hour was devoted to mission study classes, the Home Mission Class led by Dr. A. L. Phillips, the Foreign Mission by Mr. J. E. McCullough.

The afternoons were devoted to recreation, and visiting the many beautiful places of interest about the mountain and vicinity.

The conference had the pleasure of listening to a very interesting address on the second afternoon of the conference, by Dr. McCallie, who was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church during the gloomy yet stirring times of the early sixties.

At the close of this address the delegates adjourned for a trip around the mountain top, led by Dr. Bachman, present pastor of the First Presbyterian Church.

The speakers at the platform addresses in the evening were men of wide experience and ability.

It was a special treat to hear Rev. J. T. Goncher, D. D., of the Woman's College, Baltimore. His wide experience and readiness always to assist, added much to the success of the conference.

Two of the most impressive services were those of Saturday evening, July 4th, at which Dr. A. L. Phillips spoke and on Sunday evening at which four of the student volunteers, Preston, Starn, Moffett, and Pettus gave their reasons for going as foreign Missionaries.

The meeting of the fourth was held on Point Lookout, the city with its electric lights in the distance down in the valley, the Moccasin Bend of the river, the numerous Chinese lanterns hung on the trees by the delegates, the servant of God, speaking with earnestness at the foot of the stone steps, and the delegates seated in amphitheatre fashion, made a most impressive effect. The power and presence of the Spirit of God was manifest from the very first meeting at which Dr. W. R. Lambuth of the Methodist Episcopal Board, South, who presided at each session of the conference, said, "There are three things we must remember: All power is of God. God's power is available. All things are possible to him who believes."

A little band of volunteers got together the first days of the conference and asked God for ten new volunteers for the foreign field. Their prayer was answered by fourteen volunteering; others contemplate the work. Six of these fourteen are Presbyterians, and a splendid company of Christians. One is a graduate of the Woman's College, Baltimore; one is a kindergarten teacher who will go to Japan, her sister going to China; one a young bank-clerk who gives up his position to go as a witness for Christ in some foreign field; another will become a trained nurse to go to China, another gives up the active pastorate in the home field.

WHAT THE CONFERENCE DEMONSTRATED.

First. The nearer Christians get to the purpose of Christ in evangelizing the world, the closer denominations get to each other and their differences wither into insignificance.

Second. In the words of Dr. Goncher, "There are no such things as home and foreign missions. Everyone who is at home with his God is in home missions, and every one who is foreign to his God is in foreign missions." Or as Miss Laura Haygood has said "Wherever there is a soul out of Christ there is your foreign field."

Third. That when the Church calls for her best, raising her standard for efficiency, God's Spirit will cause them to volunteer.

Fourth. That such a conference fills a great want in the life of the Church, George Atkinson.

"Every man who takes part in the burning or lynching of a negro is a murderer, and should be so considered in the eyes of the law." These words were used in an address delivered in Milwaukee by Justice David J. Brewer, of the United States Supreme Court, and their application to the prevailing "epidemic" of race riots and lynchings is noted by papers throughout the country.

The increasing activity of the revolutionists in Macedonia and the difficulties encountered by the Turkish troops are producing an unpleasant effect, and it is believed the existing situation will lead to fresh demands on the part of the Powers, including the establishment of efficacious European control.

Since China reluctantly agreed to open the two Manchurian ports to the trade of the world (which was regarded as a diplomatic triumph of Secretary Hay,) the officials at Washington are at a loss to understand a letter sent by Prince Ching, to Minister Conger, refusing to open the towns. In his letter he dwells upon the impossibility of China opening to foreigners towns which are not in her possession, but which are held by Russian troops, and points out the complications which would be likely to follow. It is believed, however, that a compromise may be reached by including one town—Ta-Tung-ao—in the new commercial treaty.

A battle between the revolutionary forces at Ciudad Bolivar and the Venezuelan government army, commanded by General Gomez on July 20th, raged madly. Block after block was disputed, the government troops entering the city slowly. The city appears to have been struck by a cyclone. The soldiers on both sides had no food for two days, no ambulances are being used and the fighting still continues. The Dalton block, the property of the United States consul, where all the leading German and French firms reside, being attacked. The jail is in the center of a terrible resistance. All the defeated revolutionists have concentrated there. It is estimated that 200 or more have been killed in that vicinity.

Choosing a New Pope.

"The very name Conclave—derived as it is from clavis, a key—suggests an assembly with locked doors. Privacy and security from outside interference are of the first importance in the election of a pope. The assembled cardinals are strictly enclosed until their deliberations result in an election.

"This practice dates from the latter part of the thirteenth century when the cardinals are assembled at Viterbo after the death of Clement IV. and deliberated for two years and a half without coming to any decision. The people then locked them up in the bishop's palace for some weeks, but as this resulted in nothing, they then took off the roof and limited the food of their eminences to bread and water. The cardinals then appointed a small committee to elect a pope, and thus the business was brought to a satisfactory conclusion by the election of Gregory X.

"The Conclave is now held in the Vatican, tho the cardinals are empowered to assemble elsewhere if they think fit.

When the last rites have been performed over the dead Pontiff, the supreme electors enter the conclave chanting the "Veni Creator." They walk two by two, the bishops in front, the priests behind them, the deacons afterward. A master of ceremonies precedes them. He carries a cross, the face of which is turned toward them. Formerly the Governor of Rome stood at the side of the Dean Cardinal. The procession comes out of the church by the large door and goes to the Pauline Chapel by the royal stairway. It passes before the pontifical major domo, who waits for it in front the equestrian statue of Constantine. In the Pauline Chapel the Dean Cardinal recites the orison "Dens qui corda fidelium," invites the Cardinals to unite for a prompt and holy election, then tells the Secretary to read the bulls of the conclave, which all the members of the Sacred college take oath to observe.

The cardinals then take possession of their cells. The first master of ceremonies dismisses the Ambassadors, the Princes, and the prelates who have remained until the last moment with the cardinals to encourage them and causes all the means of exit except that to the royal stairway to be closed. The three Cardinals who are chiefs of the orders visit the conclave with the master of ceremonies in order to assure themselves that it is in order. Should a Cardinal arrive in Rome after the opening of the conclave he would be introduced to his colleagues by the door of the royal stairway. It is at this door that Ambassadors present themselves.

The day after the opening of the conclave the chiefs of orders and Camerlingo pass in review the members of the solemn assembly.

The election by ballot takes place twice a day in the Sistine Chapel, in the morning after the mass and in the afternoon after chanting the "Veni Creator Spiritus." All Cardinals are compelled to vote under pain of excommunication. The ballots are of the size of ordinary letter paper, with blanks for names and seals. Each Cardinal inscribes his name and that of the Cardinal for whom he votes.

The elector folds this paper in a certain manner indicated by black lines, holds it between the thumb and the index finger, and deposits it in a large silver chalice ornamented with a figure of the Holy Ghost. He kneels at the altar, makes a brief prayer, and pronounces in a loud voice the words of an oath, the formula of which is written on a black-board near the tabernacle.

If, on the first ballot, one of the Cardinals receives two-thirds of the votes of those present, he becomes Pope by law immediately. The Cardinals then sing the "Te Deum" as a thanksgiving to God for the election, and one of the Cardinals proceeds to the balcony overlooking the Square of St. Peter's and announces the election to the people assembled here.

Immediately on being elected Pope, the Cardinal so chosen selects the name by which he desires to be known as Pope.

If, on the first ballot there is no election, the Cardinals retire to their rooms, reassembling either on the evening of the same day or the next morning. In order to avoid delay in the choice of a Pope, there is a provision which gives to every Cardinal the right to rise in his place after the taking of a ballot and transfer his vote to that Cardinal who has received a majority of the votes, but not two-thirds. Election by this method is called "electio per accessum."

When the Cardinals find it impossible to agree in the choice of a Pontiff, they may delegate the right to designate a candidate to one or several of their number.

Should the number of votes not correspond to the number of Cardinals in conclave, all the papers are burned. After access the ballots are burned in a furnace, whether the election was accomplished or not.

When the election is finished, the Secretary of the Sacred College, the Cardinals who are the chiefs of orders, and the masters of ceremonies assemble in the Sistine Chapel and receive the elected one's consent. He is led before the altar of the Sistine Chapel, where he sits in an arm chair, and the Deans of the Cardinals adore him—that is, they kneel before him, kiss his foot, his hand, and receive from him a kiss on the cheek.—Selected.

Educational.

We call special attention again to a few of our advertisers who are making a special effort to reach the constituency of The Standard.

There is a notice of Union Seminary on our first page which should be gratifying to all the people of its two loyal Synods, North Carolina and Virginia.

Columbia Seminary is also prospering, having, as we have lately shown, a large share of the students under the present uncrowded condition of the Southern Church as regards its candidates. Its faculty is one that commands the respect and confidence of the whole Southern Church.

Princeton Seminary is now the best endowed of all the Presbyterian Seminaries of America and is entering upon a new career under the Presidency of Dr. Patton. The Southern Church has always felt a warm interest in Princeton Seminary on account of its unswerving orthodoxy and its consequent kinship with the Presbyterianism of this section. If our young men feel that they must pass by our excellent Southern Seminaries we hope they will go to Princeton.

Our cover pages have beautiful representations of two of our North Carolina Church Schools, Elizabeth College in Charlotte and the Normal and Collegiate Institute at Asheville. Both are nonsectarian in the ordinary acceptation of that term.

Elizabeth College has a magnificent plant and is a credit to the city where it is located and to those who founded it. Its wide patronage is indicative of its high standard and its commendable work. The musical course in its Conservatory is unusually fine.

The Normal and Collegiate Institute has been a blessing to North Carolina, especially to its Western section. It has given its excellent opportunities to hundreds of girls who would never have had any education at all except for this splendid charity. But it has done more than this, having received many others who were attracted by its low prices, taken into consideration with the excellent advantages it offers. Its industrial features are especially to be commended.

One of the very best schools in the country for boys is the Fishburne Military Institute. It aims to have only the best boys enrolled so that the influences of bad companions are almost wholly eliminated. The Principal has had much successful experience in this work and the school is heartily commended, especially to the Presbyterian public.

Central University, Kentucky, is the consolidation of Centre College and the Southern University formerly of Richmond, Kentucky. The combination of these two schools has put a fine equipment and a good endowment at the disposal of the Presbyterian Church in Kentucky both North and South. It is doing excellent work in the cause of Church Education.

The new Seminary at Austin with the new members of its faculty promises to supply every reasonable want for sound theological learning in the great Empire of Texas. We have watched the steady growth of this institution with much pleasure and predict for it a wide field of usefulness.

The Standard takes this opportunity of thanking its many advertising patrons and of saying to those who are looking for places to educate their sons and daughters that we do not carry a single educational advertisement that does not tell of an institution that is worthy of confidence and of patronage.

"Education means life; and universal education—universal not merely in the persons admitted to it, but in the vital topics with which it deals—means universal life—a vitalizing of the farm and the factory, the full recognition of the truth that all toil can be intelligent, and, therefore, all toil can be itself educative."—The Outlook.

"Teaching seems to be the only profession or work in the world in which experience and professional preparation are not considered of indispensable importance."—Dr. J. L. M. Curry.

Deaths.

Only 'good-night'—beloved, not farewell—

A little while and all His saints shall dwell

In hallowed union indivisible—
Good-night!

Until we meet again before His throne,
Clothed in the spotless robe He gives His own,

Until we know even as we are known—
Good-night!

PAYNE.—Departed this life on July 9th, 1903, at the residence of Mr. L. B. Nelson, in Atlanta, Ga., of Bright's disease, Rev. Henry Nelson Payne, D. D., President of Mary Holmes Seminary, of West Point, Miss., and one of the most devoted servants of Christ.

Born at Horseheads, in Cleming Co., New York, on Nov. 4th, 1840, Dr. Payne professed conversion in his eighteenth year, during a season of revival in Janesville, Wis., and resolved soon afterwards, in obedience to the prompting of the Spirit, to devote himself to the Gospel Ministry. Having prepared himself for college by dint of hard work and great self denial, he had just matriculated at Beloit College, when President Lincoln issued the first call for volunteers, and another path of duty opened out before him. Enlisting in the Union Army, he entered the service as a private in Co. A. of the 13th. Regiment of Wisconsin Vol. Infantry, and displayed from the start as a soldier, the same qualities which characterized him throughout life, as a man: Christian fortitude, heroism and fidelity to principle. Later on in the struggle, Dr. Payne was commissioned Captain of the Liberia Guards, an independent Company of troops which he organized himself; and in recognition of his splendid soldiery, he was subsequently promoted to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel. At the close of the war, he entered Hamilton College at Clinton, N. Y., graduating with distinction in 1868. He received his theological equipment mainly from Lane and Auburn Seminaries, his Professor of Theology in the first named institution, being his distinguished Uncle, Dr. Henry A. Nelson. Being licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Cayuga, on April 13th, 1870, he was shortly afterward called to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of Minneapolis, Minn., and was formally ordained and installed on Oct. 5th, 1871. Intimate ties were formed between pastor and people, and as the fruitage of this initial pastorate, many new souls were born into the Kingdom of Christ. Before entering upon his pastoral work in Minneapolis, Dr. Payne was united in marriage with Miss Elizabeth A. Porter, daughter of Rev. Lansing Porter, of Auburn, N. Y., to whom he had become engaged while in the Seminary at this place, and from the union thus happily sealed, five children were born to them: Annie E., Charlie L., (deceased), Porter, Mary A., wife of Rev. Henry N. Rullard, and Howard.

Dr. Payne resigned the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church of Minneapolis, on May 1st, 1875; and subsequent pastorates were successfully and happily filled in Onondaga Valley, N. Y., Lima, N. Y., Oxford, N. Y. and Boone, Iowa. In the spring of 1885, he represented the Presbytery of Fort Dodge as a Commissioner to the General Assembly, which met in Cincinnati, and while here, he was greatly impressed with the needs of the work among the Freedmen, which seemed to be languishing at the time for the lack of proper attention. Such was the impression which this important work of the Church made upon him that later on, when elected Field Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Missions for Freedmen, he promptly accepted the call to this arduous ministry of love among an alien race, notwithstanding that at the time, he was considering an urgent call from the Presbyterian Church of Le Mar, Iowa. In the fall of 1885, he entered upon the duties of his new office as Field Secretary, locating first in Charlotte, N. C., where he remained for one year, and then transferring his headquarters to Atlanta, which continued to be home for nearly twelve years. Splendid results accrued from his faithful labors as Field Secretary; and though his duties involved prolonged and repeated separation from loved ones, and entailed many hardships upon him, he was rich in spiritual compensation, and was crowned with the benediction of heaven. While engaged in this work, Hamilton College, his Alma Mater, conferred upon him the degree of D. D. In 1895, Dr. Payne was appointed on a committee to select a site for the rebuilding of Mary Holmes Seminary, which had formerly been located at Jackson, Miss., and after visiting the field, it was decided to locate it at West Point in the same state. At her request of the Freedman's Board, he superintended the construction of the building, giving it faithful and competent attention; and when the school was ready for re-opening, he was unanimously elected to the Presidency. Accepting the position, he began his executive duties on January 1st, 1897, and from the start, was signally successful in building up the interests of the Institution. Despite the setback occasioned by another fire, the Seminary, under his able management, more than doubled, in attendance its corps of teachers was enlarged, and the efficiency in every way increased. On account of enfeebled health, brought on by incessant labors, from which he allowed himself too little rest and relaxation, he was forced to resign his position early in the spring of 1903, and the Board, in recognition of his faithful services, voted him appreciative and grateful acknowledgment, and agreed to accept his resignation only upon the qualification of his successor. In severing his connection with the school, Dr. Payne also closed his faithful ministry of eighteen years in the service of the Freedman's Board, having given it the best energies of his heart and brain, and having resigned it only for his summons to the skies.

Coming to Atlanta in May of this year, where he was cordially welcomed back again by many devoted friends, he lingered without murmuring until the end came, displaying throughout his entire illness, a resignation and a fortitude which fitly crowned his long career of useful service, and re-affirmed with patient emphasis, his devotion to the Master, in whose footsteps he had so fearlessly followed, and upon whose bosom he had so lovingly leaned.

SCHERER.—Died at the home of her son, A. L. James, in Lawrinburg, N. C., June 23rd, Mrs. Harriet I. Scherer, in the 75th year of her age.

Mrs. Scherer was born in Salisbury, N. C., Oct. 8th, 1828, her parents being Michael and Isabella Brown. In her girlhood she made profession of faith in Christ and united with the Presbyterian Church. She lived a long, happy, useful, Christian life, ever finding her Saviour more precious, and His Service an increasing delight.

Mrs. Scherer was twice married. Her first husband was Dr. Hand James, of Wilmington, N. C., to whom she was united in marriage Oct. 14th, 1847. They had six children, three sons and three daughters. Of these only two sons survive their mother. Dr. James, having died in Alton, Ill., in March, 1862, the widow and children soon returned to her former home in Salisbury. Five years subsequently she was united in marriage to the Rev. S. Scherer, a minister of the Lutheran Church, with whom she lived happily till his death, giving herself to the care of his three sons, born to him by a previous marriage, aiding him in his work, a help-meet indeed. These three sons, and one born of this marriage, the Rev. J. A. B. Scherer, Phd. of Charleston, S. C., all became ministers of the gospel, and all fill honorable stations in the Church. Mrs. Scherer was a good mother and left the impress of her Christian character upon her children. They "arise up and call her blessed." After Mr. Scherer's death she moved to Lawrinburg, to make her home with her son, became again a member of the Presbyterian Church, the Church of her ancestors, in whose communion she lived till her death. Mrs. Scherer was a woman of lovely Christian character. She was conspicuous for her piety, her zeal in the Master's Service, and her good works. She loved the house of God, and found great pleasure in its worship; she loved the Word of God, was a daily student of it, and treasured its truths and its very words in her memory. She died in the exercise of a triumphant faith, not only willing but longing to depart and be with her Lord. Her surviving children and grand-children find comfort and solace in the grace of Christ, and treasure her memory as a precious heritage.

WILSON.—After an illness of more than six months, Mrs. J. A. Wilson "fell on sleep" July 4th, 1903, in Kinston, N. C., at the home of her son, Mr. H. H. Wilson. She had been, for some time, a member of the 1st Presbyterian Church in Greensboro, where she lived for some years. A letter of dismissal from that Church to this had been sent, but before it could be acted upon by our session she had, as we believe, been received as a member of the fold in heaven, where sorrow and sickness and death shall be no more.

She was fifty-five years of age and leaves three sons; H. H. Wilson, a ruling elder in the Kinston Church, Claud T. Wilson, of Morristown, N. J., and Ronald B. Wilson of Greensboro, N. C.

Health as a Duty.

A wise man who chose to pose as a fool once said that "health is the primary duty of life." Yet the majority of us do not consider health a duty. It is a gift from God, a piece of good luck, what you will, anything but a requirement laid on mankind. We exact of a man that he be kind, that he be honest. If he is not either of these the more shame to him; but if he is unhealthy we count him unfortunate, and pity him. It would be better to regard health as a duty. We inherit some of our trouble, to be sure, but Nature is on our side, fighting for health, and most of our illness is brought about by our own indiscretion. Let us shoulder the new responsibility. We should live wisely and temperately in all things, neither over-eat nor over-drink; we should keep away from intoxicants, and above all, we should not allow ourselves to worry about anything, because that harms us physically as well as mentally. We should regard an act that is likely to interfere with our well-being with as much abhorrence as we would a lie or a theft, which is a blow at character. This is the part of wisdom; it is also the part of morals. If a man is sick he will more easily yield to temptation; all the moral and mental rest inevitably on the physical, and with good health [to his aid one is able to face with fortitude the various problems of life.—Woman's Home Companion.

The Doctor's Wife.

A recent book is entitled "The Woman Who Toils." It is the story of two women who, in order to investigate the condition of wage-earners, worked for months in factories and shops, shared in every respect the life of the working women, and made careful records of their experiences. It is a painful narrative, and even allowing for some exaggeration of the miseries of the life, one must read it with keen sympathy for the factory-worker and the shop-girl.

It is not however, quite fair to imply by the little of the book that the wage-earners are the only women who toil, and who toil severely. It is doubtful if the worker in factory, or shop ever endures the continuous strain of body, mind and spirit which comes to the wife of the farmer, of the artisan thrown out of work, or of the country physician. The doctor's wife is typical of them all, and appeals most strongly to the imagination.

She must never be too tired to be wakened by the night-bell and her quick sympathy with her husband's hard task brings her to her feet, to prepare a cup of coffee or of hot broth for him, before he is off on his distant errand. This is but the beginning of the "meals at all hours" throughout the day. She must be up early to have the house in order before patients begin to arrive. She cooks and dusts, and answers the door-bell with a baby on her arms, and with the voice of her other children in her ears. She carries also much of the burden of her husband's practice. A patient is to be encouraged here and admonished there. The doctor will be home soon. He will come to see the baby's sore throat just as quickly as possible. He spoke hopefully of the sick mother last night. When he says you must take the medicine, you must surely do it, even if it does taste bad. So she passes from kitchen to office and back again—the nursery full of her vigorous children, set up wherever she may happen to be.

How many a doctor could truthfully say that he should never have pulled through a certain epidemic of typhoid, or the winter when all the children had diphtheria, if the wife had not been support, comfort and hope! Then the accidents she has treated, the blood she has stanchied, the courage, sinking at the first faint odor of ether, she has sustained! By day and by night, year in and year out, she bears in her slender arms the welfare of children, of husband, of community—and feet, hands, head and heart are all at the service of any one in need.

All honor to the woman who toils—whether in shop or factory or school-room. But if there is one who deserves it most richly, it is the woman who toils in that home through which ebb and flow the tides of life of the whole town—the home of the country doctor.—Youth's Companion.

A North Carolina Life Insurance Company Places a Premium upon Temperate Habits.

The Southern Loan and Trust Company, an established banking institution of Greensboro, N. C. with $200,000.00 capital, has recently organized a Life Insurance Department and has introduced a new feature in life insurance which is attracting considerable attention. This company insures the lives of individuals under substantially the same rules as are observed by other companies and at standard rates, but a special rate and premium is offered to those who are temperate in their habits. Experience and medical and life insurance statistics have established beyond question the fact that abstaining from the use of intoxicants contributes very considerably to length of life, and the Life Department of the Southern Loan and Trust Company which began business this month is recognizing this fact by offering a reduced rate and premium to those who have been temperate in their habits and who are temperate at the time they make application for insurance on their lives. There is no other insurance company in America that is conducting its business on this plan and that is making this fair and equitable distinction between those who use intoxicants and those who do not.

Railroads, corporations and individual employers have in recent years been placing a premium upon sobriety by making temperate habits in employees one of the standard qualifications. But this North Carolina insurance company is the first to recognize the important part which total abstinence in the use of intoxicants plays in determining the average mortality of individuals, by charging a standard rate and premium for insurance on the lives of those who are not total abstainers and a reduced rate and premium for insurance on the lives of those who are total abstainers. This is done for the fair and just business consideration that a class of men whose life expectancy is increased on account of their regard for a law of health more important than any other, are better life risks as a class than any other and that for such decrease in the risk there should be a corresponding decrease in the price charged.

As a general proposition a man who takes a drink semi-occasionally only will not live as long as the man who does not drink at all, and the one should therefore pay more for insurance on his life than the other. It is not right that those who are careful in their habits and who faithfully observe the laws of health should pay for the life insurance of those who are ignorant, careless or indifferent in these matters. The principle is a broad one and is based upon business morals and equity and is sure to meet with the cordial endorsement of thinking business people, and it is a source of congratulation that the idea has originated and is being put into practical operation by strong creditable North Carolina institution. The sober industrious people of North Carolina will do well to remember this and to investigate the plans and rates of the Life Department of the Southern Loan and Trust Company of Greensboro when they have occasion to seek that protection offered by life insurance.

A little girl walking by her father's side on a starry night, was asked of what she was thinking, and she gave this beautiful answer: "I was thinking if the wrong side of heaven is so glorious, what must the right side be."

If you want friends, "touch their hearts!" This is the way to gain all great ends,—just touch the hearts of men! You can not move them half so easily nor so far, either by persuading their intellects, firing their imaginations, or smiting their consciences, as by touching their hearts.—S. S. Times.

...the appointment—make some ex-
...e."

"No, dear," and Miss Kellogg, the
...ly principal, spoke pleasantly but ...fully, "unless you've a more satisfac-
...y reason, of course you can't be re-
...used. Your appearance need cause no
...sitation—young ladies shouldn't think
...much of dress. I supposed you were ...love that, unlike so many, whose sole
...ambition seems to be outdoing some one
...se in superfluons finery. No; Doctor
...women would never consent to your re-
...saining in another's favor—worth to ...ress, nothing else. Besides, it's an
...onor you should covet—not throw ...away!"

"I believe the poor child is worrying
...herself thin," remarked Eleanor Wilson
...to her chnm, a fortnight before com...mencement. "It isn't her examinations;
...girl of her intellect never has fears
...from that source."

"I think I know the cause of her 'de...cline,' as Alice Randall calls it,"
...laughed Julia. "It's not a deep-seated
...malady—nothing chronic. Bnt, laying
...aside all joking, I believe the valedic-
...tory appointment is at the bottom of it.
...I've noticed she hasn't seemed herself
...for two weeks, and then I've heard a few ...things that tend to strengthen my sus...picions."

"Doesn't she want to speak—is that
...it?"

"It isn't the speaking, so I've heard,
...but her dress. She's nothing to appear
...in—only her 'reception gown!'" The ...muslin for a long time had been so known
...among the girls. "Do you blame her
...for feeling as she does—especially when
...the salutatorian," and she glanced over ...to the bed where lay a charming creation
...of satin and lace, just from Madame La
...Manette's famous establishment, "ap...pears in such fairy-like finery! I would
...pine under the same circumstances—I'm ...sure of it."

The last two weeks were busy ones for
...Eleanor Wilson. Besides her duties as ...class president and chairman of the com...mittee on arrangements, her article to be ...delivered in Latin, took an unusual ...amount of time. Yet with all these ...things to take her attention, there was ...another matter she couldn't keep out of ...her mind, a matter with respect to ...which not even her closest friends were ...consulted.

"I know how she feels—though, of ...course, not by experience, but I can im...agine," soliloquized Eleanor thought...fully. "She's sensitive—Dorothy is—
...but so noble-hearted, and with such beau...tiful spirit! I suppose I might," and
...she hesitated, an "of-course-I-ought-to"
...expression puckering her brow.

She went to her trunk and took out a ...plain muslin dress, one that had never ...been finished.

"I might wear it—perhaps I—"

But here was the other dress—the ...handiwork of Madame La Manette, and ...with a sigh, made up of r. solution and
...doubt, Eleanor spread the muslin gar...ment on the white coverlet. Not even ...her chnm saw her smuggle it out of the ...room that afternoon.

"Yes: I can have it done in time,"
...said the little dressmaker briskly.

"I shall make such an appearance tomorrow," thought Dorothy bitterly. 'Twas the evening before graduation. "If it wasn't for you, little mother—the disappointment—I'd give it up even now. It's so hard to go before all those people with Oh, well, it's the only dress I've got, so I'll have to make the best of it."

Such a commencement morning was rarely experienced at Bancroft Seminary; it was cool and beautiful, a perfect June morning. Miss Kellogg could hardly remember when, on that occasion, it had not stormed, or at least been cloudy.

No member of the graduating class had an opportunity to visit another before the exercises, so busy was each with her own preparations.

Half suppressed exclamations of surprise were heard from the girls, as Eleanor Wilson came to the front of the platform to deliver the salutatory. "Her dress must be beautiful," thought Dorothy, without looking up, "and mine—nobody knows how I feel!"

Dorothy didn't summon her courage to look at the speaker till Eleanor was nearly through, and then—could it be possible, or did her eyes deceive her! For there stood the tall, graceful figure of the most popular girl in Bancroft Seminary, clad in a muslin gown, more simply made than the one, she, Dorothy Dascomb—had on!

In a moment she realized what it meant—a sacrifice for the sake of a member of the class—for her.

All through the exercises, until her turn came, Dorothy Dascomb was under the influence of strangely conflicting emotions. She scarcely heard her name, as it was announced in the clear tones of Doctor Bowen.

She held her paper firmly before her, as she began to deliver that valedictory, yet her eyes only now and then sought the carefully written pages.

"I thought her subject was 'Motive Principles,'" whispered Julia Thomas to Alice Randall, wonderingly.

"It was—it's on the programme, that's the way it's printed!"

"But she isn't speaking on that;"

"No; her theme is 'Unselfishness'—plainly so. How came she to change? Or—yes; she's extemporizing!"

It was but a moment before the speaker had the attention of every one present—tired though they were with the length of the exercises.

The audience was swayed with her wonderful pathos and power. Never before had they listened to such eloquence from a member of a graduating class. Men and women leaned forward that not a syllable be lost, and when she ended with a passionate appeal against self-inflicted misery, brought about by an over-sensitive dwelling upon one's circumstances and surroundings, there wasn't motion in the large audience room. It was the silence of conviction.

"How came you to do it—speak on another subject without preparation?" whispered her mother proudly, as they left the hall together.

"Eleanor Wilson's unselfishness, and the foolish sensitiveness of Dorothy Dascomb—nothing else."—The Morning Star.

He Died Trying.

This boy I knew was born and spent the early years of his life on a farm near a small town in southern Nebraska. It was an uneventful life, filled with monotony and grind. From want of money the father was unable to hire requisite help, so at the tender age of eight years my young friend was put to herding cattle. Although he was yearning to start to school, he could not be spared, as the father was making every sacrifice to send an older brother away to school, so little Phillip "remained by the staff" until perhaps fifteen years of age, without much if any schooling, and little knowledge of books or the outside world. He then entered school with the understanding that a part of the tuition might be paid in work of different kinds. Early and late he toiled, denying himself in every way in order to cause the father as little expense as possible. With increase of knowledge came an earnest desire to become a medical missionary, to be of service to mankind, as only a consecrated life can be, but with the desire came also almost insurmountable difficulties. Teachers tried to dissuade him because of lack of education, home friends pressed him with the thought that he must not desert mother and father, that his duty was on the farm. More and more the conviction fastened itself upon his mind that the goal once reached he would be enabled to do more for the family than he could possibly hope to do in any other way. So, in the face of great opposition, he toiled on.

Two years passed in this way, when news came that his brother was dying in the Western home, so studies were cheerfully dropped, and through the long months that followed he nursed that brother to the close of his life as tenderly as a woman, meanwhile doing all possible to lighten the arduous duties of mother and sister. This duty discharged, it was too late to enter the junior year, so he bravely started out to earn money to assist the father and help a younger sister to a year's schooling preparatory to taking nurse's training.

With the opening of the next school year he started his work, but only a few months passed before he showed signs of failing health due to overwork and the worry incident to his brother's illness, and studying and sleeping in cold and poorly ventilated rooms. With the same fortitude that he had battled with other difficulties he fought this tyrant—consumption—giving up school and nursing for a year, though needing the tenderest care himself. He made money enough to materially aid his sister in her work, help carry on the old home, and pay his last year's expenses at school. In the middle of the year all of his bad symptoms returned, and he was obliged to "surrender arms" to the conqueror—death—with aspirations unrealized, but with a consciousness that he had done his best. Had he succeeded?

The question presents itself, Does a life of self-sacrifice pay? The answer comes in the memory of that sweet, unselfish life that must ever be a benediction to all who came in contact with it.—The Chantauquan.

Two Successful Negro Boys

(Booker T. Washington in the August World's Work.)

After having spent several years at the school, during which they worked upon the school farm, Frank and Dow L. Reid left Tuskegee at the completion of the B. Middle Class. Frank, the older brother, left in the year 1888, and Dow in the year 1891. Before coming to Tuskegee these young men had lived upon a rented farm with their father, but on returning home they decided to buy a farm of their own. They entered into an agreement to purchase a farm of 320 acres, four miles from the old homestead, and with little or no money but with a determination to succeed, they began to cultivate the land. They agreed to pay $5.50 per acre for the place, and regardless of the fact that they had little money at the time they bought the farm, within a few years the whole amount of $1,760 was paid. In addition to this farm, the Reid brothers, as they are styled for miles around, have bought another farm of 225 acres at $10 per acre. This farm is about two miles away from the first place mentioned. When the last payment upon this last purchase is made in the fall, after the crops have been gathered and marketed, it will make a total of $4,010 made and paid for land alone by these young men since the younger one left Tuskegee some twelve years ago.

The stock and farming implements on these farms are far superior to those seen upon most of the plantations. On the farm of 320 acres are seventeen fine horses and mules, all large and in good condition; there are thirty well-bred cows and fifty fine, healthy-looking hogs, besides a large number of chickens and guineas which furnish plenty of eggs for the families' use. The farming implements, including plows, mowers, rakes, harrows, etc., are of the latest improved Deering make.

The four double wagons, the single top buggy, the road wagon and go-cart are all in good order and are kept under cover when not in use. Not infrequently do we find farmers in the South, who, when the crop is made, leave the plows, the mower, the rake, and, in fact, all the farming implements standing out in the field in all the weather during the winter months. A visitor to the Reid brothers' plantation, however, will not find this to be true with regard to their farm machinery. Each piece of machinery on this plantation has a place under a shed built for the purpose, and is kept there when not in use.

A large cotton-gin with an eighty-tooth saw, is owned and operated by these young men. Last year, besides ginning the 125 bales of cotton raised upon their own plantation, they ginned the cotton raised by nearly all the other farmers in the neighborhood.

Work is always tending to humility. Work touches the keys of endless activity, opens the infinite, and stands awe-struck before the immensity of what there is to do.—Phillips Brooks,

I always have a good time up there. I have four little cousins that live right near and we play together all the time. I help mama gather the eggs and feed the little biddies, and now I have to pick up apples every day for mama to dry. I will ask a Bible question then close. Where is churning of milk found? ### The First Great Indian School.

There was in the town of Carlisle, in Pennsylvania, at midnight, October 5, 1879, a very strange and interesting sight to be seen.

A great crowd of people were waiting for the train to come.

And when it came puffing in, there alighted from it eighty-two wild Indian boys and girls just from their homes out in Dakota. They were in their native dress and wore blankets; their hair was long; their faces were painted; and they had on beads and other Indian ornaments.

Everything was as new to them as they themselves were to the big crowd.

They had never seen a train before they had ridden all that distance in one; they were in strange part of the country; they knew nothing of the people, or the language; they could talk only Indian. Poor homesick children!

"You can't teach Indians!" said many of the white people who heard that there was a plan to educate them.

Colonel Pratt knew better. He had been long in the army and had had to do with Indians. He had had Indian prisoners in Florida who had worked well, and some of these had asked to be educated; and he had taken them to the school for colored students at Hampton, Virginia, where they had done well.

Colonel Pratt felt sure Indian boys and girls were like other boys and girls when they were treated in the same way. So, he persuaded the government to make the old Carlisle barracks, where soldiers used to be, into a school. And with these eighty-two wild Indian boys and girls, and white teachers to help him, he began the First Indian School among white people. This was twenty-three years ago.

Did the Carlisle Indian school succeed? Are there any Indians there now? Yes; instead of eighty-two, there are now one thousand Indians at the Carlisle school. They dress as we do; they speak our language; they study in their school-rooms the books that we have in our schools; they have reading-rooms where they read the latest papers and magazines; they have a library with a good many books; they have debating societies, both of boys and of girls, where they discuss questions that interest the world to-day.

And now there are many large buildings at the school where these young Indians live and study and work; there are shops where the boys are taught carpentry, shoemaking, tinsmithing, blacksmithing, harnessmaking, tailoring, etc., and how to run the steam furnaces and other engines used in the place. There is a bakery where Indian boys make the bread eaten by the pupils. Indian boys raise the vegetables for the school, take care of the cows, and do the other work on the school farm. The Indian girls learn to sweep, dust, cook, sew, and do all things that belong to good housekeeping.

Every year hundreds of Indians go out in the summer vacation and work with the farmers about Carlisle, the boys on the farm, the girls in the house, and earn money, and then come back to school in the autumn. So they learn how white people live in their homes. And these white people like them very much.

But it is not all study and work at Carlisle; sometimes, it is play. The girls have croquet, basket ball, and other games. There is a fine gymnasium where both boys and girls exercise.

And have you never heard of the Indian football team which comes to play with the Harvard and the Yale teams, and with other colleges? People speak of how fairly the Indians play, and how polite they are. This Indian football team is from the Carlisle school.

Some Indians are lawyers; some are carpenters, blacksmiths, masons, wagon-makers; many are farmers not their own lands; they are earning their living precisely as white young men do. Some are soldiers; a few Indians were among the Rough Riders whom Col. Roosevelt, now our President, led at Santiago, and one was his orderly. Some young Indian women are nurses. A few write for papers and magazines, and a few draw and paint. Many Indians, young men and women, are clerks and teachers and workers in various Indian schools.

For when it was found how well the Carlisle school succeeded, the government established other Indian schools in different States away from the Indian homes. There are now twenty-five. So, we have to thank Colonel Pratt, not only for what he is doing in his own school, but for what his example has been doing in the education of Indians. Also, among the homes of the Indians in Dakota, Nebraska, California and other States are eighty-eight boarding schools where Indian boys and girls stay for years, going home to see their parents only at vacations. Besides these are one hundred and thirty-eight day-schools. Here the small children come and stay all day, and go home again at night; they often have to walk miles to do this.

So, when you think of Indian children, remember that over twenty-five thousand of them are going to school just as you do, and are studying and reading the same books as yours. A good many copies of "Little Folks" have gone out to the Indian schools. The little Indians love the magazine.—Our Little Folks.

How Much?

By Sally Campbell.

"Yesterday was mother's birthday," remarked Billy Stone, as he walked proudly by the side of Miss Fowler, his Sunday-school teacher. "We gave her presents."

"How nice! I suppose you love her very much, don't you?"

"Lots."

"Well, Billy, my man," said Miss Fowler, stopping a minute at the corner where she was to turn off, "don't forget our lesson last Sunday. You know what the Bible tells us about how true love shows itself."

Yes, Billy knew. He walked on, thinking of it, and presently his round face grew very sober.

"Yesterday we told mother that we gave her the presents with our love. To-day is only a day off, and I wouldn't get up in time for breakfast. I was late at school; I made the twins mad, and I sneaked out of the back door so as not to have to go for the mail. I can't see how anybody by looking at the way I've acted could tell that I liked my mother at all.

It was beginning to rain when Billy reached home. He and the twins, who had been playing in the yard, all went into the shelter of the kitchen together.

Mrs. Stone, at her work in the next room, looked out of the window with a sigh. She had so much to do, and there was so liable to be trouble when children must stay in doors.

Billy thought of this too.

The twins were hanging their caps up with a scuffle.

"I say, Robin," asked Billy abruptly how much do you love mother this afternoon?"

Robin turned round and stared at him.

What a queer question! It was not a bit like a boy.

"Why?" he giggled. "Do you want to write poetry about it?"

"Poetry!" sniffed Billy. "I want to know how much—just plain how much. That isn't poetry is it?"

"That's arithmetic" said Dora.

Dora was the oldest of them all. She was bolstered up in a big chair by the fire; she had been ill for a fortnight.

"How much" repeated Robin. "How can you tell how much you love a person?"

"In plenty of ways" said Billy wisely. "I tell you right now. I love mother a boxful."

With that he picked up the kindling box and marched out into the shed.

A light broke upon the twins.

"Oh-o!" cried Harry "that's what you mean is it? Well I love her a pailful" seizing the water bucket and starting for the pump."

"I love her a scuttleful" said Robin; and he plunged down the cellar steps after coal.

Dora looked at the clock. She had looked at it five minutes before and said to herself:

"I do believe that my darling mother is going to forget the medicine this time. I shall not remind her that is one thing sure certain!"

"But I guess" she said now reaching for the bottle with a weary face "I guess at least I can love her a spoonful."

There was a shout of laughter.

Mrs. Stone heard and glanced anxiously toward the door.

"I hope there is no mischief on foot. I'm in such a hurry to get this sewing done."

"Don't you think" Kitty said "that all of us together if we hurried could love mother this roomful before she came in and caught us? I'll clean the stove out and blacken it."

They worked like beavers. The last tin was hung on its nail and the last chair set back to the wall when Mrs. Stone's step was heard coming rapidly down the hall.

Her mother looked around the tidy room and when she saw how spick and span it was, and when she saw the ring of smiling faces, she kissed them every one, and her own was just as bright as the brightest.

There's not another mother in the country," said Mrs. Stone, "that has such children as mine!"

"There now, do you see!" said Billy to Robin. "Can't you tell how much you love a person? It feels nice, doesn't it?"—Sunday School Visitor.

How Polly Saved the Swarm.

"Oh!"

Polly was swinging lazily in the hammock when she said it. Then the hammock stopped with a jerk, and Polly tumbled out in a hurry.

Straight to the northern spy-tree she ran, and looked up excitedly at the great swaying bunch of buzzing black things on the lowest limb. Then she scurried away to the house.

"Grandma, grandma—grandma, the bees have swarmed! They're in the northern spy-tree, the 'normousest lot of 'em!" screamed Polly's shrill little voice. Grandma was deaf, but oh, dear mè! she could hear that. Her knitting needles clinked together in a little heap in her lap.

"You don't say so!" she cried. "Now, ain't that too bad, and your grandpa away, and all the men folks! Ain't that too bad, Polly?"

"Will grandpa feel dre-adj'y, grandma?"

"Oh, dear me, yes. He'll feel terribly to have it happen when he ain't here. They're very choice, those bees are, and he sets such store by 'em. Ain't it—too—bad?"

Poor grandma's sweet, mild face was creased with little criss-cross line of distress. She looked down at the crutch on the floor, and shook her white head.

"I can't help it. I could've once, but I can't now."

Polly was thinking hard. She and grandma were all alone on the farm that forenoon, and the bees had swarmed. Why couldn't they have taken another day for it? They might cluster there in the spy-tree an hour or two, and they might stay fifteen minutes, and then fly to the woods out of reach. Then how'd grandpa feel?

"A swarm of bees in June Is worth a silver spoon," murmured grandma, dolefully.

"But that isn't so bad as in May, when they're worth 'a load o' hay,' grandma," Polly added cheerily. Her mind was all made up. Grandpa shouldn't lose his bees.

"But I won't tell grandma. I'll s'prise her," she thought.

How Polly did hurry! She knew just what grandpa always did—grandpa or Abner. Hadn't she watched them 'hundreds o' times?' But she was a little girl of course: how could she help that? Grandpa shouldn't lose his bees 'cause o' that! Polly's lips shut together so hard that her little white teeth clicked, and then she went to work.

A saw—a ladder—the mosquito netting—hurry, Polly, hurry! She tilted the ladder against the tree, and covered her curly brown head snugly with the netting; but she never thought of the thick black gloves grandpa always wore.

With a long breath—three long breaths, one to get ready, two to get steady, three to go—Polly was up the ladder, and the little saw was creaking gently through the bee limb,—very gently, for Polly knew it must not "wiggle" too much. The bees buzzed and flew around her and bumped against the mosquito netting, but they didn't seem angry, really.

"Nice little bees, dear little bees! There, there, Polly won't hurt you!" crooned Polly. "Polly's going to carry you home, that's all. What made you—made you—run away? There, there, there-re!"

The limb was in Polly's hand then, and she was creeping down the ladder. How they buzzed! The whole world was full of bees. Suddenly Polly felt a sharp stinging pain in her hand, and she nearly dropped the limb,—not quite. Grandpa shouldn't—ow!—lose his bees. If a sting was anything, poh! Or—two stings.

When Polly and the bees got to the hive-row, there were three little aching, purple spots on Polly's hand; but the bees were safe!

Polly lifted off the top of an empty hive, and laid the ball of buzzing, piled-up bees inside as fast as she could. Then she went away to watch.

"Grandpa says they'll call the rest of the bees to come in, too. Hark! Yes, I guess they're calling. If only— Oh, I hope the queen bee's in there! They'd be homesick little bees 'thout any queen."

She rubbed the swelling hand, and tried not to wince at the keen pain. It was several hours before she could forget it, though, and then maybe—who knows—it was as much grandpa's hearty praise as grandma's poultice that helped her.

"A s-warm o' bees in J-oo-ne Is worth a sil-ver sp-oo-n," sang Polly, happily, to herself. But she didn't know that grandpa was going to give her a "real live" silver spoon before long, to eat her honey with!—Constance Hamilton, in Sunday-School Advocate.

A FLOURISHING INSTITUTION.

An Epoch in the History of Elizabeth College for Women, Charlotte, N. C. Additional Instructors are secured, and the General Standard is Elevated to a University Level. The Conservatory of Music one of the Best in the South.

This institution started out six years ago with an advanced course of study, backed by sufficient means to maintain it. It has adhered to the policy announced at the first, of employing only teachers who possess sound collegiate culture and post-graduate study in Institutions of acknowledged standing in this country and in Europe.

The public was quick to appreciate the advantages of this institution. During the first session students were enrolled from four States. The sphere of the institution's influence has steadily widened and during the session just closed students are enrolled from ten States—North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, Virginia and Pennsylvania.

The college is entering on a new epoch in its history. The authorities have decided to advance the course one year beyond its present high standard.

This action of Elizabeth is a matter of general educational interest. The course leading to the Bachelor of Arts degree has been advanced so as to be on a level with the usual Bachelor of Arts course in the universities of the South. In view of the advancement of the course, the college has re-arranged the chairs, so as to enable each teacher to give his entire attention to one department. This has led to the addition of three new members to the faculty.

Another action of this institution of much interest is the decision to introduce the system of tutoring, so the students in any of the collegiate classes will not be hindered by such students as may be irregular in one or two branches, all irregular work being done under the direction of a special tutor. The authorities consider that this system will result in distinct gain both to the college and to the students. It will relieve the regular students of all hindrances caused by students who are deficient in a branch or branches to have the advantage of special direction and tuition.

From the beginning the college has furnished opportunities for elect courses in the collegiate department. It will increase facilities for this. Ample provision, as heretofore, will be made for post-graduate work.

The Music Conservatory courses and the art courses, and other special branches, have been slightly advanced beyond their present high standard. Six degree courses are offered in music. Certificate courses are offered in art, in elocution and in the commercial branches.

Asheville Normal and Collegiate Institute

MAIN BUILDING

THIS Institution was established by a few friends of the higher education of young women and placed under the efficient control of the Woman's Board of Home Missions for the Northern Presbyterian Church. The admirable site of some thirty-five acres, which it occupies, forms one of the most delightful suburbs of Asheville, famous for the beauty of its scenery and healthfulness of its climate. The building which furnishes it a home can easily accommodate 225 pupils. No pains have been spared to make its sanitary arrangements as perfect as possible, and nothing could be more complete than the heating apparatus recently put in at large expenditure.

A liberal choice of study is afforded the pupil in the various departments, Normal, Commercial and Musical, under Christian teachers trained in the best schools of the country. In the Department of Domestic Science the pupil is taught (a) to draft, cut and fit garments and millinery. (b) and to prepare food in the most economical and appetizing manner.

A Specialty is Made of Health Culture

And whilst aiming at correct Scholarship, the management never forget that the Institute is pre-eminently a Christian school, and its highest end the development of Christian character. The Bible is a text book in every department and its daily study is obligatory on every pupil.

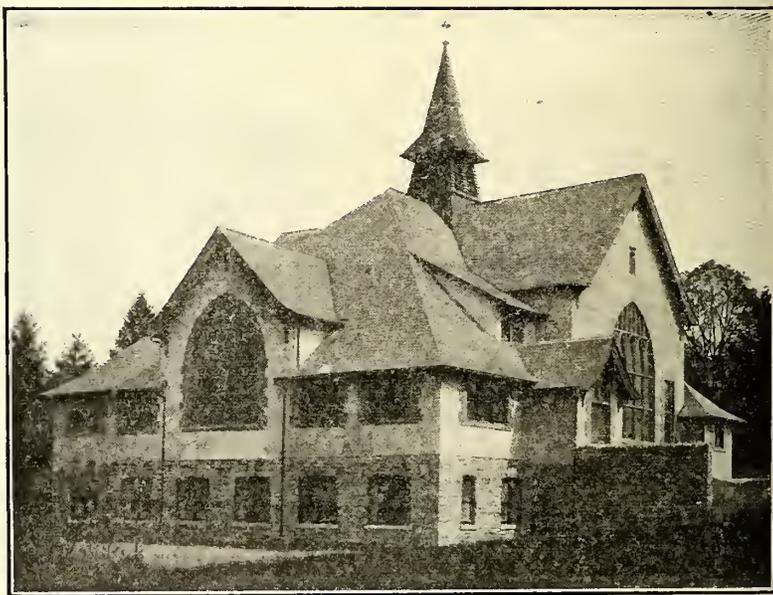

As in the case of the famous Mt. Holyoke School, and Mr. Moody's, at Northfield, all pupils are expected to share in the domestic work of the household under the supervision of the Matron. This occupies ordinarily not more than one hour a day. The time so spent is found conducive to health, and to the development of character, and is an admirable preparation for the duties of after life. The aim of the Institute is to provide solid and thorough training in each department under competent teachers, qualified to use the best modern methods. The cost to the pupil has been reduced to the lowest possible limit that the advantages offered may be put within the reach of the greatest possible number.

The success of the Institute has more than justified the expectations of its founders, and it is fast being recognized as one of the most beneficent institutions in the South. Since the opening of the school in the fall of 1892 there has been a steady increase in the number of pupils. During the session of 1901-1902, 272 were enrolled, 222 being boarders.

Dr. R. F. Campbell, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Asheville, in a letter to the Presbyterian Standard, writes: "I know of no school in which the industrial, intellectual and spiritual factors that go to make up a complete education are so harmoniously and successfully blended. No one can read the history of its origin and development without being convinced that it was planted by God's own hand, and has been from the first under His nurturing care."

"I have visited the Normal and Collegiate Institute and regard it superior as to its management, the liberality and wisdom of its methods, the quality of the work done and the culture of its teachers."

Event and Comment.

According to the Interior we were wrong and it was right in the matter of religious freedom in Russia. As we do not understand Russian we take the Interior's word for it that "three years in a fortress" is the penalty imposed upon any man who uses his public position to influence or induce any member of the orthodox church to join the ranks of another religious community. A parent having his child baptized by any other rite than that of the Greek Church can be imprisoned for a year, while any convert from the orthodox church of Russia may be fined 300 roubles and punished otherwise as a schismatic. The Interior declares that since the "edict of toleration" scores of Lutheran pastors have been sent into exile for ministering to people claimed as parishioners by the Russian priests. If this is so Russia had better try an edict of intolerance.

The Methodists, North and South, are making a hymn-book together for the use of both churches in the hope that the old discords will disappear and that the harmony may be prophetic of future complete attunement. We have noticed that the "church organs" generally help in the discord.

The late P. M. Arthur, Chief of the Brotherhood of Engineers, the best labor organization in America, perhaps because he was the best chief, was a faithful and consistent member of the Methodist Church. To him more than to any other man is due the rigid rules of the Brotherhood on the subject of temperance, whereby thousands of lives have been saved that drunken engineers would have sent to their death.

Says the Congregationalist, Boston, Massachusetts: "The death of the Pope on Monday according to precedent fixes the meeting of the conclave for the election of his successor for July 30." Come to think of it the Pope did follow an unbroken line of papal precedents by dying.

The New York Christian Advocate asserts that at least four hundred children have died from injuries received on the Fourth of July, the most of them of the horrible malady of lock-jaw. That fact ought to unlock the jaws of some of our legislators so that a stop could be put to this annual slaughter of young Americans.

When a secular journal of the general reputation of the New York Sun casually remarks, in an argument, that John Calvin taught universal infant salvation it begins to look as if a little book composed in Charlotte had gone pretty far.

The self-perpetuating power of the papacy in its general policy is evident from the fact that the Popes appoint the Cardinals, while the Cardinals elect the Pope. All but two of the present College of Cardinals were appointed by Leo XIII. Their policy is what his was. The hope of reform under those conditions is dim indeed.

They are going to have a jubilee in Rome next year, with the usual contributions from the pilgrims and strangers, thank you, because it is the fiftieth anniversary of the proclamation of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of Mary. The Protestant world might also rejoice that the Church was in blissful ignorance of this superstition for eighteen hundred and fifty years.

The Volunteers of America is the Ballington Booth secession from the Salvation Army, the result of a family quarrel and military discipline. The Volunteers have nevertheless six regiments and raised $86,000 for their work last year. Mrs. Ballington Booth has the supervision of the prison work, and the organization now reaches sixteen State prisons and fourteen thousand prisoners. By the way, to how many of us would our Lord's words apply, "I was in prison and ye came unto me?"

And here is a pretty How-dye-do. The Anglicans are dissatisfied with the new Education Bill because it does not give them as much power as they thought. The Dissenters are making the law odious by their passive resistance, at least some of them are. But Lord Halifax writes that within five years the Church will have lost half her schools in Lancashire and gives as the reason the fact that "The militant Dissenter has managed to seize the chairmanship of more than half the educational authorities in this district, and to fill the administrative places with what I may call 'busy-bodies.'" Good for both kinds of Dissenters, those who won't pay unjust taxes and those who prefer to administer an unjust law themselves.

Lord Halifax's Dissenters remind one of the oldtime Mecklenburg Presbyterians who had their grievances, as to educational matters too with the Church of England. Their projected college in Charlotte, that might have been another Princeton by this time, was refused a charter by stupid King George, and after Charlotte had been named for his queen and Mecklenburg itself for the district in Germany from which she came. But the Presbyterians saw that the Established Church was not established in Mecklenburg through the simple expedient of getting Presbyterian elders appointed vestrymen. It was simple but effective.

If the Catholic Church does not mind it will lose all that it has gained from the universal reverence paid in America to the character of the dead Pope, by the political machinations that are going on in the election of his successor. The betting in Rome, with odds of twenty-five to one against Rampolla is a little disconcerting. And when the Cardinals get locked up like a recalcitrant jury to keep them from undue influence by the outside world, after plotting for weeks and months together, the spectacle is likely to be too much for the American sense of humor. Better not prolong the agony about that election.

The Rev. M. A. Matthews, D. D., reports how that his church is "growing spiritually," which shows the inferiority of a Northern to a Southern Church when served by the Rev. M. A. Matthews, D. D. The last church he served in the South reached a state of spiritual perfection beyond which growth was impossible, according to the reports.

The fact that the recent Epworth League Convention was the largest ever held, while the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor was the smallest for years, is a pointer as to denominational societies.

One of the most useful branches of Y. M. C. A. work is that among railroad men. Last year the railroad companies themselves, it is pleasure to report, contributed a quarter of a million dollars for the support of this work, the railroad men and their friends giving a hundred thousand more. The membership has now grown to 62,000 and is rapidly increasing.

Southern Institutions and Honorary Degrees.

A friend sends us the account of a meeting of the Berrian Baptist Association (colored) which has been having an enthusiastic session in Savannah, Georgia. The following item is of special interest, in view of the discussion that has been going on in English papers regarding the value of American degrees, and in the Northern press concerning Southern institutions of learning:

Last night it was announced that among other things during the evening the degree of Doctor of Divinity would be conferred upon the pastor of the church, Rev. C. W. Griffin. The honor was accorded to Rev. Griffin by the Sanitarium, Nurses' Training School and Business College, of Washington, Ga.

We submit that this effectually disposes of the cavil that American honorary degrees are not honorable titles, honorably acquired. The slander that D. D.'s especially have become like the Dukes that Richelieu created in France when it was equally a disgrace to be one or not to be one, is fully met by the circumstances here. It was proved in the case of Harriman University that the Director of the School of Domestic Science for that distinguished Tennessee Institution, (right now the most famous Institution of that State, in England,) was Housekeeper for an oil agent. But what of that? Where better could a Doctor of Divinity learn how to make things run smooth than from such a Director? In fact there have been known most successful pastors who were oily themselves. The Outlook, with that spirit of sectional pride for which we have sometimes rebuked it before, makes itself very needlessly merry over that Harriman University. It quotes with great gusto the cross-examination of the worthy English clergyman who brought suit against the Christian World for libel, because that irreverent paper poked fun at his degree.

Says the Outlook:

In describing the "university" in question, the clergyman's counsel declared that it was established in a prohibition town by "the Temperance party of America." "We like to have our universities," said this lawyer, "under the shade of cathedral and ancient and historic buildings. In America they are of a more practical turn of mind, and they like to have their universities not so much near a cathedral as far away from a public house." He asserted that it was a flourishing institution of three hundred students and twenty-seven instructors; that the clergyman had studied, taken examinations, and had received first his bachelor's degree and then his doctorate; and that as a Nonconformist finds it almost impossible to obtain academic dignity from English universities, he was forced to turn to America.

On being cross-questioned the clergyman admitted that although Harriman was his "Alma Mater" he had never been near it. He had been at Ocean Grove for his examinations.

Question. You are proud to have a Harriman degree? Answer. Yes. (Laughter.)

Q. And yet you never went there? A. No, and for good reasons.

Q. Possibly! Is Ocean Grove, where you were examined, about a thousand miles from Harriman, or how far is it from Harriman? A. I suppose some eight hundred or a thousand miles.

Q. Is that the nearest you have got to Harriman? A. No.

Q. How near did you get to it? A. I went further south to Baltimore to preach, and to Washington, and I rather think that that would be the nearest point.

Q. I am afraid I do not know the distance; it is a large country; but did you ever get within one hundred miles of it, or within five hundred of it? A. I could not say, unless you showed me a map. (Laughter.)

When further cross-examined, the clergyman proved to be somewhat confused as to the Latin form of the doctor's degree for which he applied. This, perhaps, is not surprising, in the light of the Latin used by the chancellor in the following letter submitted in evidence:

The American Temperance University,
 Harriman, April 16, 1900.

My Dear Dr.: Your letter of March 27 duly received.

I will fix your degree as per your wish, Divinitatis Doctoris . . . I have so arranged your name as to cause my books to show that your degree has been earned, and it will come pro merito, and not pro honoris. This is conferring the favor of recognizing your scholarship and literary work through the years. I am quite sure this will be gratifying, and, besides, it makes sure the degree at our commencement.—With great respect: always your friend,

J. F. Spence.

We should like to ask if the free and off-hand composition of Latin by the Chancellor, with the disregard, the privilege of genius, which he shows to grammar and ethics is not a guarantee of his scholarship and so of his fitness to recognize scholarship in others. But English prejudice against America is in this instance matched by Yankee prejudice against the South.

Nor is the Outlook content with this exhibition of its Anti-Southern spirit. It proceeds to heap ridicule on another Tennessee Institution, which we recently referred to as having given a Doctorate of Laws to a North Carolina lawyer and to a Virginia Presbyterian preacher. Not to do the Outlook injustice we quote it at length:

Another institution in Tennessee, boasting the resounding title of "The American National Nashville College of Law," has been dealing in degrees given, as its sister institution would say, "pro honoris." Its "President and Dean, ex officio," has been sending out letters (only two have reached this office) stating that "the college will confer a title upon some worthy educator or jurist of your State," and that the name of the person addressed has been suggested. Questions are inclosed to be answered, of which these are samples: "Married or single?" "Profession or avocation?" "If not a graduate, state time studied in years." "Do you believe in the co-education of the sexes in a college of law?" "Do you chew or smoke tobacco or drink intoxicants of any kind?" "Do you take exercise daily?" "Was Pope right in saying: 'Drink deep or taste not of the Pierian Spring?'" "Are you a subscriber to 'American Legal Lore?'" A fee of ten dollars is required in advance to cover the "cost of the issuance of the diploma, and engrossing name in the same." In an accompanying circular the college song is printed with the statement that the "Alumni. . . appeals to all lovers of the law. . . to have this song sung all over the United States, and to have it published in all newspapers and magazines, and inclose a copy in all your letters." As we cannot sing it all over the land we comply with the request as far as we are able by printing the remarkable production here:

Down in the beautiful Southland,
In a spot so dear to one and all,
Stands our noble Alma Mater,
The Nashville College of Law.

Chorus:

Sound its praises, sing them ever,
Help it onward, loud the story tell
Welcome to thee, our Alma Mater,
Welcome, all welcome, farewell.

Down in our sunny Tennessee,
'Midst hills, music, echo, and sound,
Where all in nature smiling seems,
Stands the pride of an Athens town.

Ah! No one in the cold and calculating North can know the thrill with which a true Southerner reads those lines "Down in our beautiful Southland. In a spot so dear to one and all." We all have such spots, in our memories, not our characters. And then that reference to sunny Tennessee strikes a chord in every heart of the sunny South. Nor can any one who thinks of Vanderbilt University and of Ward Seminary deny the proud title that this learned son of the South gives to fair Nashville, "an Athens town." What could be more appropriate? And why should there be considered any incongruity between a College of Law and the practice of the arts poetica. How it would enliven quotations from Blackstone to put them in rhyme and how much better the arguments [of learned counsel would stick in the minds of judge and jury if they could be given the swing and rhythm that this poem has!

But if the Outlook is still disposed to carp at us after this vindication, we ask a consideration of the claims of the Sanitarium Nurses' Training School and Business College as a fit institution for conferring the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Should not a live pastor know about sanitation? Should not every pastor be a trained nurse? Does not Matthew Henry in his scholarly commentary on the Song of Solomon say that the reference to the teeth of the fair Shumamite is to be explained by the interpretation that the ministers of the church, like faithful nurses, chew the strong meat of the Word for their charges? And then does not every tyro know the importance of a business education for a minister? How else could he manage to invest his salary wisely unless he has a business training? We contend that the Sanitarium Nurses' Training School and Business College of Washington, Georgia, is eminently suited to confer the degree.

And the Northern papers need not be throwing off on the Southern Institutions, white or black. There is a University in Indianapolis, Indiana, named after a Southern Institution in Kentucky, that can grant a Ph. D. that is just as good to the ordinary man, and ensures one's being called Doctor just as certainly as a Ph. D. of Johns Hopkins or an LL. D. of Yale. And it can be obtained by simply copying a good thesis; it is best to be on the safe side and copy a good one. And then we know a minister, who, alas! is no longer in the Southern Presbyterian Church, whose very presence at an insignificant school in Gordon county, Georgia, transformed it into Gordon University, in the ministerial directory, and who got his D. D. after an eloquent commencement sermon from a Normal School. He is now, according to the advertisements in the Northern religious press the most successful preacher in the Northern Church save one, the only really successful one in the great Northwest.

So just let our institutions of learning and their honorary degrees alone, will you, editors of the Christian World, London, and the Outlook, New York.

The Living Church reminds us of the decision of the late Pope regarding the validity of Anglican Orders. We remember at the time that a sudden coolness developed on the part of some Episcopalian friends toward the Bishop of Rome. We do not know, but suspect that it was a good lesson.

Now that the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country has decided by such a large majority of its dioceses that it is a Protestant Church and is going to be called Protestant for a while longer, it should give no offence to recur to the effort of Lord Fairfax and the Romanizing party in the Church of England to get a papal certification to the validity of the Anglican Orders. It must have been a considerable temptation also to the Vatican as opening the way for that union with Rome for which so many Catholics are fondly hoping and a few Anglicans. The claim of this party in the Anglican Church was that their church was not Protestant; that it was still the Catholic Church in England, from which the Roman Catholics had split off, they being the true schismatics. It recognized however that the Catholic Church was a sister Church, as no Protestant Church was or could be. And then it would be a great comfort if the Holy Father would acknowledge the justice of the claim that Anglican Orders were as valid as those of the Catholic Church itself. For the validity of orders is a very important thing, seeing that we are regenerated by the sacraments of baptism and are confirmed by a lineal descendant of Apostles, who in turn must ordain those who are allowed to administer the sacraments.

So Lord Fairfax put this question to the Infallible Pope, Are the Anglican Orders valid? And the Pope thought a long while and finally said that they were not. You see even papal infallibility cannot afford to contradict itself too soon. And there were too many historic precedents of the anathemas which Rome had hurled against Anglicanism together with the rest of Protestantism. Leo did not seem to be so bothered about Henry the Eighth as about Edward the Sixth. He declared that the Anglican Church had been Protestantized under the reign of Edward. Therefore its orders were invalid.

There are two things about this that amuse the looker on in Venice. First it was just a little taste of the medicine that had been given others. The Anglican Church had been denying the validity of the orders of the other Protestant Churches. And they were somewhat at an advantage because the rest of Protestantism did not deny theirs. It held that the Anglican Church was a true Church of Christ and therefore that it had a valid ministry. But this broad-minded courtesy could not be returned. There were only two Churches that held to an Historic Episcopate, the Anglican and the Roman. And now the very Head of the Roman Communion himself, says that the Anglican Church has no valid orders but has been Protestantized.

And the other amusing thing is that last statement. It would seem to be conclusive against those who wish to drop Protestant from the name of the Episcopal Church in America. The Protestant Church unanimously says that as it reads the history of the Reformation the Anglican Church was Protestant. The Catholic Church also says that the Anglican Church is Protestant. One Church claims it as one of the household of faith, the other denies it as an alien. It would seem that the evidence is all in that the Protestant Episcopal Church is a Protestant Church.

Review of Contemporaries.

As touching the matter of honorary degrees given by our colleges, one is almost tempted to speak of this annual June performance as "a midsummer madness." Our English exchanges bring it to our attention this year because a London parson with more ambition than discretion has lately made himself ridiculous, and ruined a "university" in Tennessee, by telling how he obtained his blushing honors. He paid his good pounds sterling, answered a few hocus-pocus questions, and straightway had doctorates "to burn." He would be happier to-day if he had burned them; because, tempted to display them, some paper fell foul of his titles and he retaliated by suing the journal, and the defense took a sardonic satisfaction in showing that the university was a fake and the recipient of the degrees a fool. He was laughed out of court, as he deserved to be. It must be confessed that it was "a mean Yankee trick" by which he was flim-flammed out of his bright guineas; but no way has ever yet been devised to prevent a certain class of people being parted from their cash. Apparently it is in consequence of this incident that the Congregational Union of Great Britain gives notice that hereafter it will in its year-book print no American degrees which are not bestowed by a certain trio of universities named. We thought that was coming. And so we have a trust in degrees as well as in pork and pig-iron. But everybody save the rankest outsider knows that an honorary degree from any of our colleges, big or little, is like kissing; it "goes by favor." No, not though he spoke with tongues of men and of angels would a liberal university bestow the slightest notice upon a conservative scholar, any more than a Presbyterian college would adorn a Catholic prelate, or a Methodist institution scatter its "LL. D's" over Princeton's campus. Each theological school must take care of its own favorite sons; and the badges of the scholar are bestowed upon the champion of a particular "view," heterodox or orthodox as the case may be; although, notoriously the surest path to the highest academic distinction is that which leads to victory at the polls.—Interior.

The missionary organ of the United Free Church of Scotland, says that Presbyterianism is "both historically and in fact, the dominant form of Church life in South Africa. It holds this position through the Dutch Reformed Church. It is obviously desirable that there should be only one great Presbyterian Church in South Africa, but it will be long before the feelings intensified by the recent war are sufficiently subdued to allow the forces that generally make for union to become effective." The political sore caused by the war in South Africa are steadily being healed, and it is to be hoped that ecclesiastical differences will as speedily be adjusted and harmonized.—New York Observer.

The Crime of Complacency.

No man has a right to be satisfied with what he has done. A famous artist was once found by a friend gloomily contemplating his last painting. "I see nothing wrong with it," said the friend. "Neither do I," replied the artist. "I'm satisfied, and—I shall never paint another great picture." The same truth was in the mind of a grand old veteran in Christ's cause, who said, when congratulated on the manifold achievements of his life: "It is not what I've done that I think of, but what I've left undone." As Robert Browning wrote:

"Life has no place for satisfaction in well-doing.
On the earth the broken arcs; only in heaven a perfect round."—

Sunday School Times.

How often we cry mightily to God, as if he were far away, resident only in the starry heavens, when, if we would drop into silence we would find him near at hand in the sweetness of our solitude. The still small voice finds him when the thunder and the earthquake fail. But the heart's cry, however uttered, is never unavailing. It is the soul's preparation for the answering presence. It makes our solitary hours the very gate of heaven through which God comes to us walking softly, as he did in the garden in the cool of the day. Prayer is ever God's pathway into these troubled hearts of ours. And the more we call, with confidence in his answering grace, the more confidently can we enter the quiet hour and wait for his appearing.—United Presbyterian.

Giving the Presbyterians a Pointer.

Our General Assembly's State Clerk, Dr. Hubbert, can give the Presbyterians pointers on how to get out the minutes of an Assembly in a short space of time. The Interior refers to the fact that the Northern, Southern and Cumberland Presbyterian Assemblies met on the same day, and adjourned within a day or two of each other; yet the Minutes of our Assembly are out while it will be weeks before the Minutes of the Northern Assembly are out. The Interior says:—"Of course we know very well that it is immensely more work to publish the minutes of our Assembly than to issue the document just mentioned, but the sight of those Cumberland Presbyterian Minutes does make the six weeks that will elapse before we shall see our own book, seem like a mighty long period of time."—Cumberland Presbyterian.

(And where are the minutes of the Southern Assembly?)

The Science of a First Cause.

Lord Kelvin is the foremost scientist in Great Britain and you may not write "agnostic" after his name: he has on use for the term except as to designate those who do not know but who ought to know if an intelligent Supreme Being exists—for between knowing and not knowing there is no middle term.

The other day in discussing a lecture on "Present Day Rationalism" by Prof. Henslow in the University College Christian Association course, Lord Kelvin came vigorously to the defense of the position that science leads steadily toward—and not away from—a sound religious faith, including, of course, an insistence upon the doctrine of Final Causes. Thirty years ago Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall and Herbert Spencer were the leaders of an intellectual revolt against religion; and their followers were proclaiming war upon all creeds, as moldy relics of superstitious ages. Lord Kelvin is not of that school. Nor was he content simply to challenge the postulate that with regard to the origin of life science denied creative power. He went further.

Professor Henslow had stated that modern science neither affirms nor denies creative power in the origin of life. Lord Kelvin replied that science positively affirms creative power and makes every one feel a miracle in himself, since it is not in dead matter that the man lives and moves and has his being, but in the creating and directing power, to the recognition and acceptance of which science inevitably and irresistibly leads the student of nature. Modern biologists were coming once more to a firm acceptance of something and that was a vital principle. Agnostics they might be in science but they only knew the Creator in his works and were absolutely forced by science to admit and to believe with absolute confidence in a directive power. Lord Kelvin made a rigorous application of the logical law of excluded middle and contended that there must either be scientific belief in creative power or acceptance of the Ciceronian theory of a fortuitous concurrence of atoms. Because biologists could not escape from the conclusion that there was original creative power when they studied the physics and dynamics of living and dead matter, science was not antagonistic to religion, but a help to it. He should consider it impossible to believe that a number of atoms falling together of their own accord or in obedience to accidental external influences will form a crystal. Some people believe that in the course of millions of years atomic habits might be formed so that this would come to pass, but his imagination was not sufficiently active to permit him to believe that a million million of years would give us a beautiful and orderly world like that in which we live. It is the creation of a spiritual influence, and science cannot remain ignorant of the fact that such an influence was at work in all natural phenomena. He believed in free thought and free discussion, but was convinced that the more we have of it the more certain it is that men of sound judgment will recognize that there is no antagonism between science and religion.

In the course of his address Lord Kelvin had put this incisive inquiry: "Is there anything so absurd as to believe that a number of atoms by falling together of their own accord could make a crystal, a spring of moss, a microbe or a living animal?" On reflection he perceived that a crystal was an unfortunate illustration, since in structure it differed from the cellular formation of which plants and animals were made. He accordingly hastened to admit that a crystal might result from a fortuitous concurrence of atoms, but contended anew that a similar explanation could not be offered for the origin, existence and growth of plants and living beings, for which scientific thought was compelled to accept the idea of creative power. Lord Kelvin closed his brief but weighty confession of faith with this striking passage: "Forty years ago I asked Liebig, walking somewhere in the country, if he believed that the grass and flowers which we saw around us grew by mere chemical force. He answered: 'No! no more than I could believe that a book of botany describing them could grow by mere chemical forces.' Every action of a human free will is a miracle to physical and chemical and mathematical science." This is emphatic testimony from the foremost man of science in England respecting the creative mind as the only possible source of life. It differs widely from the scientific atheisms of Tyndall, Huxley and Spencer, which was accepted a quarter of a century ago as the highest wisdom of the educated world. We exclude Darwin from the list, for in the very last work he put forth Darwin discerned "an Infinite Supreme Intelligence" behind all Nature.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

In the report of the Suchow, China, Mission of the Southern Presbyterian Church the statement is made that one of the most important features of the new order of things is the frequency with which the people from villages near the city send deputations promising to furnish chapels if the missionaries will come and use them. There are other motives than that of learning something about the doctrine of the Christian Church in these requests, but it is an indication of the many ways in which China is open to Western thought.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

Book Notices.

"Books mentioned below may be ordered of Presbyterian Committee of Publication, Richmond, Va., at publishers' prices."

"Pioneering in Central Africa;" A new book on Africa, by Mr. S. P. Verner.

This is a timely volume, coming as it does just when Congo affairs are so frequently before the public. Mr. Verner's book gives facts. It describes the native life, his experience at the court of the immense red king, Noombe, his life among the pygmies, the scientific characteristics of the people and country, the methods of the Belgian government, the commercial and industrial features, and the opportunities for future development. Mr. Verner has had abundant experience with the pen, having written for many magazines in this country and Europe, and being a member of eminent scientific bodies.

Those who are interested may write him at Tuscaloosa, Ala.

Genealogy of the Reese Family, by Miss Mary Reese, Auburn, Ala. Whittet and Shepperson, Richmond, Va.

This book is dedicated to the descendants of David Reese, signer of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence of North Carolina, May 20, 1775, and is a monument to her intelligence, patience and industry. The names of Avery, Baker, Bevins, Burdett, Caldwell, Cherry, Croft, Davidson, Erwin, Harris, Johnston, Knox, Lanier, Lewis, McDowell, McGuire, Miller, Napier, Rankin, Reid, Robinson, Scales, Schenck, Sharpe, Story, Taylor, Todd and Witherspoon enrich and adorn the volume.

The name "Reese" is Welsh in its origin and was originally written "Rhys." In 1599 a family of Rhys emigrated to England and changed the spelling to "Rees." They were Presbyterians, were at the siege of Londonery and in 1688 at the battle of the Boyen. In 1700 they came to America and modified the spelling to "Reese." Several brothers and two sisters landed at New Castle, Delaware, and from that point they removed to Pennsylvania, Maryland and North Carolina. David Reese was a Ruling Elder in Sugar Creek Church and a spiritual man. He was a signer of the Declaration of Independence at Charlotte, N. C. Five of his sons fought in the Revolutionary War.

Under Calvin's Spell; A Tale of Heroic Times in Old Geneva, by Deborah Alcock. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York, 365 Pages.

To the ministry, who presumably have been students of the man Calvin, as well as of his doctrines, there may be nothing new in the characteristics thus brought out, but for the average reader there is much that is thrilling and altogether interesting in this story of three centuries and a half ago. The beautiful city, guarded by Mt. Blanch, (which was called by the young French refugee, "the great white throne,") is sacred to the memory of the Reformation. Here Calvin, bent on making it a pure Theocracy, to be governed in strict conformity to the law of God, was following in the footsteps of Savonarola, who taught Florence for a few years that her Lord was King, till even the little children shouted on the streets "Viva il Re Gesu." Here the man who was in the fore-front and who bore the burdens placed upon him with a grand calm faithfulness, served not himself nor his friends, but tried "to do the will of God." The story is well told, with keenness of preception and a great, warm sympathy.

Truth is the highest virtue and seldom grows wild. It is difficult to speak the truth, and those who have tried it longest best know how difficult it is.—George Mac-Donald.

Devotional.

Persistent Prayer.

By Rev. Theodore L. Cuyler, D. D.

"There's nae gude done, John, till ye git into the close grups," so said Jeems, the door-keeper of his father's church, to Dr. John Brown, the immortal author of "Rab and His Friends." None but a Christian of long and deep experience would have said that. It was not a slight and transient touch of the angel of the Lord that gave Jacob the victory at Pen-uel; the persistent wrestler's words: "I will not let thee go except thou bless me," showed the close grip. That was a prevailing prayer.

Hardly any great truth is more timely at present than this. There is a temptation with human nature to transient spurts in religious feeling. A week of prayer is appointed and observed with more or less of sincere devotion. The end of the week, in quite too many cases, ends the praying, whereas it ought to be the beginning of a more vigorous faith, a more fervid zeal, and more effective effort to secure the answer to our petitions. Genuine faith creates a condition of things in which it is wise for God to grant what under other circumstances would be denied. He grants to a persistent faith what He would have denied to a feeble faith. I wish that that Syro-Phoenician woman would come in at one of the meetings during a Week of Prayer. She would tell us how our loving Master held her off for a while at arm's length to try the mettle of her faith. If she had not come into the "close grup," her suffering daughter would never have been healed. The answer of our Lord to her would be an admirable motto for the walls of every prayer room: "Great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt."

The case of that dead-earnest woman who carried the day by persistence is repeated many times in our Bible. Bartimeus was cured of his blindness because he "cried the more a great deal." When the apostle Peter was lying in a dungeon in peril of death, we are told that prayer was made for him "without ceasing." Suppose that the leader of that meeting in the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark, had said, "Well, the hour is up: we've prayed enough; let's go home." They would have missed the glorious surprise of seeing Peter march in without a fetter on his limbs. I never can forget how near I once came to playing the fool by quitting a little church in despair just on the eve of the most unique and powerful revival I ever enjoyed.

Yet, in spite of these repeated voices out of God's Word, there is grave danger that His people may now rob themselves of a sorely-needed descent of the Holy Spirit. One danger arises from trusting to human predictions instead of trusting to prayer and honest effort. Unless one has been admitted to the secret counsels of the Holy Spirit, there is a profane assumption in announcing that "the opening of this new century will witness a wonderful awakening." Genuine revivals commonly come unpredicted and unheralded. In January, 1858, certainly no one dreamed that within three months New York City would see noon-day prayer meetings thronged by six or eight thousand people, and the whole city stirred as by a Pentecost.

Another danger arises from a subtle self-seeking in some form or other. When success is sought to minister to spiritual pride, it becomes a fatal snare. I met with a capital remark lately that will bear quoting. It was this: "One can do a great deal of good in this world if one doesn't care who gets the credit for it." We cannot expect much from a certain style of visionary religion which talks about its high attainments and indulges in spiritual ballooning. Spurgeon said, in his shrewd way: "Until I get wings I shall stay on my legs." The old simple Gospel truth, preached with blood-heat in the pulpit; the simple, child-like faith in God's promises; and the tight, personal grip on Jesus Christ, are about the best methods for not only a "week of prayer," but for all the weeks afterward.—Borough of Brooklyn, New York.

Missionary.

Of the soil of Africa the European nations are almost complete owners. Great Britain had 2,500,000 square miles before the absorption of the Dutch republics, and not including Egypt and the Soudan, which would add 1,000,000 more. Portugal has about 850,000, Spain 200,000, Germany 800,000, and Italy 600,000. Can civilized nations acquire rights without also incurring obligations? If a nation takes another people's land, the least that can be given in return is enlightenment and the gospel.

Instead, we have given as our greatest gift to Africa the curse of the liquor traffic. In 1884 the imports from Europe were nearly 8,000,000 gallons, and from America about 1,000,000. The area in which liquor may be freely imported we have happily greatly circumscribed, and in this area increasing duties have been imposed, but the curse is still there. "It is my sincere belief," said Sir Richard Burton, "that if the slave trade were revived, with all its horrors, and Africa could get rid of the white man with the gun-powder and rum which he has introduced, Africa would be the gainer by the exchange."

On the west coast of Africa the first Protestant mission was established in Sierra Leone by the Church Missionary Society of England in 1804. In 1811 the Wesleyans followed. The American Baptists began work in Liberia in 1821. In South Africa the Moravians came first in 1742. Robert Moffat entered the field in 1816. The American United Presbyterians began their great work in Egypt in 1854, and have now more than 6,000 church-members and 13,000 pupils in their schools. The London Missionary Society began work in Madagascar in 1818. Now almost every great Church is represented in the effort to heal "the world's open sore." The most wonderful success of all the missions is, perhaps the mission of the Church Missionary Society in Uganda.

That work began with martyrdoms, but no martyr for Africa can have done more for it by his death than David Livingstone, who first called it "the world's open sore," did both by his life and his death. "In the annals of exploration of the Dark Continent," said Stanley, "we look in vain among other nationalities for such a name as Livingstone's." He travelled 29,000 miles in Africa, and added a million square miles to the regions of the globe. May the spirit which filled him, and which is nobly embodied in the words over his body in Westminster Abbey, rule our lives too.

"For thirty years his life was spent

In an unwearied effort

To evangelize the native races,
To explore the undiscovered secrets,
To abolish the desolating slave trade,
Of Central Africa,

Where with his last words he wrote,

'All I can add in my solitude is,
May Heaven's richest blessing come down
On every one, American, English, or Turk,
Who will help to heal

This open sore of the world."

R. E. Speer in S. S. Times.

Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop pays the following tribute to the Chinese: "After eight and a half years of journeyings among Asiatic peoples, I say unhesitatingly that the raw material out of which the Holy Ghost fashions the Chinese convert, and oft times the Chinese martyr, is the best stuff in Asia. Above all, every true convert becomes a missionary, and it is in this spirit of propagandism that the hope of the future lies." This should form a great encouragement to increased missionary effort in behalf of China.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

"I owe my salvation to three words you spoke when all the world was against me: 'I trust you.' They led me to the God I am trying to serve."

David and Goliath.

I Sam. 17: 38-49. Aug. 9, 1903.

From the time of his anointing by Samuel to the period of this lesson, David had a varied experience. He had continued to feed the flock and to defend it from enemies. He was becoming familiar with those scenes of natural sublimity and beauty which furnished many of the images of his lyric compositions. He was developing those heroic virtues of faith, fortitude and courage, which afterwards made him the trusted chief-tain of Israel. His musical talent had caused him to be summoned to Saul's presence that he might soothe the king, when tormented by an evil spirit, and became familiar with the scenes and usages of royalty. When war commenced with the Philistines he had returned to his home to look after domestic affairs, while three of his older brothers joined the army. Sent by his father to carry food to his brethren, David reaches the camp, when the Philistine champion defies the armies of Israel and inspires the host with dread. His encounter with Goliath supplies some suggestive thoughts.

I. David Enters Battle with Divine Trust and Proved Weapons.—He depended for success not upon his own strength or prowess, but upon the might of Jehovah. He says to the Philistine, "Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear and with a shield; but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of host, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied." "This day will the Lord deliver thee into my hand." His trust was in the Almighty and so should be ours, in every conflict, and he expected victory through Divine aid and co-operation. Nor would he engage in the struggle with Goliath, using weapons that he had not tested. Saul tried to persuade him to employ his own armor, which did not suit David and with which he was not familiar. But the champion of Israel wisely declines. He prefers to use the staff and sling and stone which had given him victory in the past. It is well for us in spiritual warfare not only to trust God, but to employ approved weapons. We can not fight successfully the Lord's battles, with worldly or satanic armor. We must "fight the good fight of faith," with "the sword of the spirit which is the word of God." The apostle declares that "The weapons of our warfare, though not carnal, are mighty through God to the pulling down of strong-holds."

II. Goliath's Pride and Defiance.—The contrast between the personal appearance of David and his opponent was not greater than between the spirit they manifested. The Philistine was proud and haughty, while David was humble. Goliath trusted in himself, but David put his confidence in Jehovah. The Philistine arrogantly declared "Come to me, and I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field." David truthfully affirms "This day will the Lord deliver thee into my hand; and I will smite thee and take thy head from thee; and I will give the carcasses of the host of the Philistines this day unto the fowls of the air, and to the wild beasts of the earth, that all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel." Puffed up with pride displayed in boasting, Goliath disdained David, and defied him, and the armies of Israel and the living God of hosts. But "who has hardened himself against God and hath prospered." The Philistine champion, like many another worm of the dust, manifested that "Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall." "Potsherd may strive against the potsherd of the earth, but woe unto him that striveth with his Maker."

Esau filled his life with regret for trifling one day; Esther's was full of glory for one day's courage. Peter slept one hour and lost a matchless opportunity; Mary's name is fragrant forever for the loving deed of a day. Do your best now.—Maltbie D. Babcock.—The Presbyterian.

Lessons from Paul: Tact with Men.

I. Corinthians, 9: 19-23. Topic for August 16.

Nowhere is tact more needed in dealing with men than on the religious side. In business transactions a man wants to be treated with in a business way, but business methods cannot always be used in dealing with men about the salvation of the soul. There are of course cases where all that is necessary is this frank, business-like way of approaching the matter, but in thousands of cases this will not do. Some men are so very shy about being approached on this subject that they are constantly on their guard and flush like a covey of birds on the first intimation of what they consider danger. We may be sure that Paul had to deal with all classes of men in his work and if we will study his life we may discover the secret of success in dealing with men. In the first place we notice that Paul always tried to approach men along the line of their own thoughts. He was not a trimmer in the sense that he appeared to believe a thing simply because someone whom he hoped to reach believed it. But he would take the other man's point of view as his starting point and from this, by natural reasoning, lead up to the story of Christ. To the Jew he started with the law and led on to Christ who was the fulfilling of the law. To those who were without the law, he didn't come with the law, but showed that Christ made men free from law. To the Athenians on Mars Hill he began his message by speaking of one of their own altars erected "To The Unknown God" and Him whom the Athenians ignorantly worshipped, Paul declared to them.

From Paul, then, we learn that there is a right way and a wrong way to approach every individual. From a closer study we learn this general rule: The natural way is always the right way; the unnatural way is always a wrong way. This means that we must study every individual or class of individuals whom we approach. There is no sphere of usefulness that is so inviting, nor where the fields are so white unto the harvest, as that of the individual's work for individuals. By far the largest portion of those who are won for Christ are won by personal work. The truth of this statement does not in any way minimize the influence of the pulpit. The most successful preacher is the one who knows how to do personal work, and possibly there are more bunglers in this field of work than in any other. Some people have the idea that all those who are outside of the fold, being in one class, are to be treated in exactly the same way in trying to win them to Christ. But never was a greater mistake made. No two, scarcely, are to be treated alike. To be successful we ought to make a careful study of each person's individuality. To do this, one ought to win the confidence of the person whom he would win for Christ. If this is done and one follows the leading of the Holy Spirit, the way will nearly always be opened by the person himself, so that there will be no trouble in talking to him about Christ. Sometimes it will be days or weeks before an opening offers itself, but the worker should be content, waiting and praying, being confident that God will open up the way in His own time.

An unwise and untactful approach of a man has often put a grave obstacle in the way of doing him good. But while we should beware lest by the lack of tact we drive men away from Christ, we should also keep in mind that we should have our eyes open for opportunities to do this work for our Lord. It is not enough for us to pray for opportunities, but we should ask as well that our eyes be opened that we may see the opportunities when they present themselves, and then seeing the opportunities, that we be given the courage and the tact to enter the door of opportunity that has been opened. Study Paul's life carefully in this regard and see what his experience teaches us in the matter.

Elizabeth A. Allen.

Yes, let em unburden and rest in the shade,
For far from the fountains my foot-steps have strayed.
The darkness is falling and chill is the wind,
And hope and ambition were long left behind.
There are vows unfulfilled, and debts all unpaid;
I fain would unburden and rest in the shade.

I fain would unburden. The way has been drear;
The flowers of spring-time are frosted and sere;
The sun of my life is inclined to the West,
The fires of affliction have left me unblest.
My heart is sore heavy with mounds newly made;
I fain would unburden and rest in the shade.

The seasons still come and the seasons still go
With blossomful summers and winters of snow;
And I fancy I hear in my lone retreat
The joyous sounds of returning feet!
But no! 'tis a dream that is born but to fade:
I fain would unburden and rest in the shade.

I fain would unburden: the days of my youth,
When the whole world seemed framed in a setting of truth,

When sin and deception alike were unknown,
And life was as light as a lily unblown—
Are lost in the stress of a pitiless trade.
I fain would unburden and rest in the shade.

When blushes would mantle my cheek and my brow
At hint of the vulgar, all unheeded now;
When Fancy unfolded her fairest delight,
And Hope was a beacon that dazzled my sight,—
All, all on the altar of Folly are laid:
I fain would unburden and rest in the shade.

With sin for my comrade I went on my way
And never looked off to the reckoning day;
And my foot-steps have wandered world-wide from my God!

And I tremble to think of the tracks I have trod.
For sorrow the foot-step of Folly attends,
And Pleasure's a traitor that fails all his friends.

I fain would unburden; Fate e'en has denied
The pitiful pittance that scarce would provide:
And Fame, the false phantom has led me to sound
Deep waters, and night-time is closing around!
On a tempest-tossed ocean my soul is astray
And I long for the banks of the Beautiful Bay.

Life's hazard, life's winnings, its spoil—take them all!
They darken my soul like a funeral pall.

Yes, take them, and welcome! I mourn the lost truth
That flowed with the fount of my beautiful youth.
I turn from the Hell by unrighteousness made,
To that Bourn where the weary may rest in the shade.

The Fruits of Romanism.

Do our newspapers really mean the things they are saying about the Roman Catholic Church just now? Is it possible that they are as ignorant as these statements would indicate? If so, it may be well to quote once more a few well known opinions from historians and travellers from other lands, in addition to the testimonies already quoted from the public men of Italy as to the effect of Romanism upon individual and national character.

In the first chapter of his History of England, Lord Macaulay, speaking of the Roman Catholic Church, says that "during the last three centuries, to stunt the growth of the human mind has been her chief object. Throughout Christendom, whatever advance has been made in knowledge, in freedom, in wealth, and in the arts of life, has been made in spite of her, and has everywhere been in inverse proportion to her power. The loveliest and most fertile provinces of Europe have, under her rule, been sunk in poverty, in political servitude, and in intellectual torpor."

Charles Dickens, in a letter written from Switzerland in 1845 to his friend and biographer, Forster, says: "In the Simplon, hard by here, where (at the bridge of St. Maurice over the Rhone) the Protestant cantons ends and a Catholic canton begins, you might separate two perfectly distinct and different conditions of humanity by drawing a line with your stick in the dust on the ground. On the Protestant side—neatness, cheerfulness, industry, education, continued aspiration, at least, after better things. On the Catholic side—dirt, disease, ignorance, squalor, and misery. I have so constantly observed the like of this since I came abroad, that I have a sad misgiving that the religion of Ireland lies at the root of all its sorrows." Writing from Genoa in 1846, Dickens says, "If I were a Swiss, with a hundred thousand pounds, I would be as steady against the Catholic canons and the propagation of Jesuitism as any Radical among them; believing the dissemination of Catholicity to be the most horrible means of political and social degradation left in the world."

In connection with Dickens' remark about Ireland, we may quote the remarkable statement of Mr. Michael McCarthy, himself a Roman Catholic, in his book, Five years in Ireland, pages 65 and 66, where, after describing the welcome of the Belfast Corporation to Lord Cadogan on his first visit in 1895 to the Protestant North of Ireland, and their glowing statements about the peaceful and prosperous condition of their city and district, contrasts this happy condition with the unhappy state of the "Rest of Ireland," meaning by that the Roman Catholic parts. "In the Rest of Ireland there is no social or industrial progress to record. The man who would say of it that it was 'progressing and prospering,' or that 'its work people were fully employed,' or that there existed 'a continued development of its industries,' or that its towns 'had increased in value and population,' would be set down as a madman. It is in this seven-eighths of Ireland that the growing and great organization of the Catholic Church has taken root."

Mr. Gladstone, in an article on Italy and her Church, in the Church Quarterly Review for October 1875, says, "Profligacy, corruption, and ambition, continued for ages, unitedly and severally, their destructive work upon the country, through the Curia and the Papal Chair; and in doing it they of course have heavily tainted the faith of which that Chair was the guardian." Elsewhere he says, "There has never been any more cunning blade devised against the freedom, the virtue, and the happiness of a people than Romanism."

Sir Walter Scott, in his Journal, Feb. 28, 1829, calls Popery "a mean and depraving superstition."

Mr. Hobart Seymour, in his paper on The Comparative Morality of Protestantism and Popery, gives the following figures from Governmental official returns: The illegitimate births annually on an average of ten years were, in Roman Catholic Brussels 35 per cent., in Paris 33, in Munich 48, and in Vienna 51; whilst in Protestant London they were 4, in Birmingham 6, in Manchester 7, and in Liverpool 6. The murders similarly calculated were annually in Belgium 18 to a million of the population, in France 31, in Bavaria 32 and Austria 36, whilst in England they were 4.

Dr. Alexander Robertson, speaking of the time when the Pope governed the States of the Church, and of the Foundling Hospitals in Rome, says there were more of them in that city of celibates than in any three cities of Europe put together.

Nathanael Hawthorne in his Marble Faun speaks of Roman Catholicism in Rome with "its pretense of holiness and its reality of nastiness, equally omnipresent." He uses many other expressions in that book which show how clearly he saw the rottenness of Romanism. Yet his daughter, Rose Parsons Lathrop, became a pervert to Romanism and is to-day a fanatical member of that apostate body. So it is perhaps not altogether superfluous to remind our young people occasionally of the debasing part Romanism has played in the world and to cite for their information the testimonies of men of unimpeachable character, as to its baleful influence. And there are many others as striking as those already given. Indeed they can be furnished in any number if necessary. But perhaps these will suffice for the present. The fact that one man has led a correct life as to externals does not justify the sweeping and indiscriminating "wash" with which the secular editors have treated the people of this Protestant land in regard to the character and purposes of the Church of Rome. Let our people read history, or visit Italy, or listen to our missionaries to Papal lands, or think a little.

The Necessity of Training Our Young People in Missionary Work.

By Mrs. Candace R. Emmett.

(Read before the Woman's Missionary Union of Albemarle Presbytery, April 17, 1903, Kinston, N. C.)

"And they brought young children to him, that he should touch them; and His disciples rebuked those that brought them. But when Jesus saw it, He was much displeased, and said unto them, Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the Kingdom of God. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the Kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein. And he took them up in his arms and blessed them." Then, if our blessed Master ordained that the little children should not be sent away, but should be blessed, aye, in his very arms, should not we nurture, encourage, and inculcate into their little lives from the earliest years a love for Him and His cause?

Every blacksmith knows that the iron is most easily and perfectly shaped when it is hot, because then it is most plastic, and that every minute's delay makes the shaping harder, and less perfect. So with the sculptor, who molds a beautiful child in wax or clay. It will be hard to do and badly done if the plastic material has been allowed to harden. In a cracker or biscuit we often see the maker's name, but every child knows that it had to be stamped there while the dough was soft.

These illustrations all remind us that if a human life is to bear God's name and character most perfectly—the Christian life must be the first life. Away with the notion that boys must sow "wild oats" first and then be converted. Most of the Bible Saints chose God as a first choice. Let us begin life aright.

What more beautiful in the wide stretch of imagination than little Samuel, given to his God, even with the prayer for his coming; then at three years old formerly presented at the Tabernacle to his Lord, in fulfillment of the parent's vow; then given over to the keeping of Eli to be reared in the Tabernacle as a servant of God.

The heart of the mother is glad in this sacrifice—the sentiment of which is so beautifully expressed by Alexander in . . . Hannah's Offering.

To Shiloh from the mountains,
Where Ephraim's grapes are trod,
The mother brought her offering Unto the house of God.

The merchantmen from Edom
Give spices rich for gold,
But she doth bear a gift more rare,
Unto that sacred hold.

There are lambs in Ephraim's pastures,
Pure as the drifted snows
That lie on the brow of Lebanon,
Forever like a rose.
There are heifers in the valley,

And costly gifts they are—
But she doth bring a living thing,
That is more precious far.

The little face that nestled
Upon her heart at night,
The lips that lisping "Mother,"
First filled her with delight;
He that in all home music
Was her one golden chord,
She brings him now to shrive her vow,
And leaves him with the Lord.

O Christian, when thou bringest
An offering to God's shrine,
Take of the thing that is closest twined
Around that heart of thine—
The hope, or the pride, or the dearest love,
That ever thy soul has known,
Lay them down there, in Christ's own care,
And he will bless the loan."

She gives utterance to a song of praise as worthy to be called a Magnificat as the song of Mary.

We see the little fellow learning to open and shut the doors of the temple, to trim the lamps of the golden candle sticks. We again see him at twelve years old, developed both spiritually, and mentally, so that the Lord expects him to listen, understand and obey when He calls. What more natural than the reply "Speak Lord, for thy servant heareth."

From henceforth he is indeed a prophet of the Lord. And so have many of God's trusted prophets been trained in his name—reared for his work. Let us call to mind Jeremiah, John the Baptist, and Timothy. Would that every home had a Eunice and a Lois! Sad experience teaches us that this is not true, hence the necessity of training our young people in bands, and I would urge that all the Church forces be utilized. Often times is it true that the most unpromising material proves the most valuable—

"Only a useless bit of stone,
By some hand, into the gutter thrown;
Ugly and useless there it lay
Till Michael Angelo passed that way,
He bore it homeward with patient care,
Seeing an angel hidden there."

We know that the children of this generation must make the men and women of the next, and when we hear of tens of thousands of heathen children being reached by the "saving influence of the gospel," we feel encouraged to hope that it will not be long till every creature shall have heard of Christ the Lord. Surely we can see the need of training these forces when we remember that God has given 500,000,000 of the human family over to us, that we may have the privilege of showing them the plan of salvation.

Wishing, simply, does not create material. Work, persistent, systematic work, must be done. Let me call attention to the special obligation upon us as a Woman's Union, the systematic and conscientious training of the children. Some one has said that the child is a great deal bigger now than he was a century ago, and the Church is more fully realizing the fact, but we should not relax our vigilance. It is on the subject of missions that their culture should be broad and deep, and nothing in the sweep of church enterprise is so ennobling, so prolific of the best results as a training in foreign missions. It strengthens the faith, widens the mental horizon, and prepares the child for good service along all lines. Other churches are awake to the importance of this matter, and so must ours be. We must tell them of what Christ is doing through our missionaries all over the land. It would be better for them to know what He is doing in China today than what He did with Nebuchadnezzar thousands of years ago. We are constantly talking of what He did in Egypt, but say nothing of what He is doing in Japan, China or the South Sea Islands.

Bishop Thoburn tells us that he has learned that whatever of intelligence and enthusiasm we are to expect from the Missionary meetings must come from the young, and often from the very young. He relates along this line a little incident that occurred in Southern Ohio. A young preacher believed that he could get the people roused up on the Missionary question, and so prepared one of those tremendous sermons which young preachers sometimes do prepare, and announced when he began that he was going to preach on Missions, and then was going to take up the collection himself—no one else would be allowed to do it. So he preached his big sermon, and there was an old farmer in what they used to call the "men Corner," who sat in the front seat. The preacher came down from the pulpit with his pencil and paper and said "I will begin with Father Smith first as he happens to be sitting first. How much will you give?" And the old farmer looked at him out of one eye and said "What did you say it was for?" "It is for the Mission cause to send the Gospel to the heathen," and the old farmer said "You may put me down for a dime." Well, that may be somewhat of an extreme illustration of getting older people enthusiastic on the subject of Missions, but there is much truth in it.

Children appreciate the cause just as soon as you state it. They have enthusiasm, they have faith, and they have devotion. It is economy then to give our best attention to the young people as it saves time and money, so far as securing Missionary supporters. We need the young. The work calls for it and we want them in early life to give their best thought, and their best enthusiasm.

Children will be what their leaders make them. They are ready and eager to do good. Nothing catches the heart of a child so quickly as the need of the world. The future defenders of the faith are now in the Sunday School. The youths of to-day will be the warriors of tomorrow in the Mission cause. In order to promote the spirit of Missions, there must be distinct objects kept in view. What are these objects?

1. We must implant in the hearts of the children God's purposes and commands about Missionary work. Large portions of the word of God fairly blaze with Missionary zeal. With such a Bible, a great Missionary work, it is for the teacher to be on the look out for these things, and so teach its truths that the child will be impressed with the idea of winning the world for Christ. We see what we look for in the Bible, and if we desire to cultivate an interest in the Missionary enterprise, we can find abundant material. Read the Sermon on the Mount and we are in a Missionary atmosphere. Read the Epistle of the Missionaries sent forth by the Holy Ghost, and lo! we are standing in missionary grounds. Go back to the prophecy "I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance." "The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." "The glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together." These martial words appeal to the child. The commission is "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." We must not hesitate so long as the nations cry—"Come over and help us." Some one has said "Children always write with indelible ink. If the mind is wax to receive, it is adamant to retain impressions."

The second object is—we must impart to the minds of the children the Missionary intelligence of the day. The facts of the Missionary work must in some way be inculcated. Books of Missionary character were never more fascinating, information was never more closely at hand, and the magazines for children give a wealth of information.

"Knowledge of Missions is an education in itself." The Sunday School leader is not prepared without it.

Object 3.—We must cultivate in the lives of children the principles and habit of giving. The principles of giving are as wide as the world. God's best gifts are givers. The waters are ever in motion to give life. Take any gift of God and it reaches the end of its being by giving.

Tell it again, and yet again with unction; tell it until the heart of the child shall throb with emotion, deep and tender, that "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son." Tell it over and over that Christ has said "The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life." "It is more blessed to give than to receive." "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver." The leader must illustrate and proclaim these things out of his own experience. "Give and it shall be given unto you. The child is not helping a cause so much as he is being helped. The service of giving makes the whole life a benefaction to the world. The children of to-day, the generation of to-morrow must be trained to give, as well as to study, pray and praise.

Let us then be up and doing until the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth, so that when the message comes, as come it will: "The Master calleth for thee" it may be said of us— "She hath done what she could."

"Oh church of the living God!
Awake from thy sinful sleep!
Dost thou not hear that awful cry
Still sounding o'er the deep?
Is it naught that one out of every three,
Of all the human race,
Should in China die, having never heard
The Gospel of God's grace?
Canst thou shut thine ear to the awful sound,
The voice of thy brother's blood?
A million a month in China
Are dying without God!
And ye who cannot go, oh! help
With the wondrous weapon, prayer;
While ye uplift your hand at home,
The cross shall triumph there,
And give you freely from your store
To the warriors in the field,
The more you give to you the more
Barrel and cruse shall yield,
So only can you cleanse your hands
From the guiltiness of blood!
For a million a month in China
Are dying without God."

"The Other"

By Rev. Charles C. Carson. Luke 2: 3-40.

The salvation of the thief on the cross was a practical demonstration of Christ's ability to "save unto the uttermost." That the son of God went out of this world between a gateway of two thieves was eminently in accord with His mission. The Prophet Isaiah speaks of Him as being "numbered with transgressors." His association in the very article of death with sinners of degraded type magnified the grandeur of His character in willing and flexible condescension to "men of low estate." The opportunity to prove His compassion for lost souls as he hung upon the cross was more than compensation for the ignominious death He suffered.

The closing hours of Christ's life were crowded with significant incidents, but no one of them speaks with deeper pathos and more appealing impressiveness than that which has to do with the penitent thief.

The two extremes of humanity appear in the person of Christ on the one hand and the thief on the other. Jesus, whose character was perfect, in whom His enemies could find no fault. The thief whose distance in life from Christ can be best illustrated by the "Impassable gulf" that yawned between Dives and Lazarus. More than this; Christ was the embodiment of the measureless perfection of Deity, and the thief was the incarnation of satanic malignity. The affinity between these two characters is the marvel of marvels—the miracle of Grace—the eloquent tribute to the most glorious attributes of God—love and mercy.

The character of the thief is the dark back-ground that brings into bold and beautiful relief this picture of exquisite touches. In an earthly court when a man is on trial for his life, his previous character has an important bearing upon the issue of the case and is frequently used as a convincing argument in favor of leniency or acquittal. In the trial of the soul before Christ as the Judge, not the man's previous character, but his present need and desire are the determining factors. This thief was doubtless a Jew—probably had been an enemy of Christ and the course for which He stood. Belonging to that race of which Jesus was a member, his sympathy with His mission might reasonably have been pronounced and encouraging. But, doubtless the measure of his baneful influence had been given against this "disturber of the peace." He had become a hardened criminal—so much so that he joined his voice with the depraved mob about the cross and mocked the peerless and innocent man with whom he was now associated in ignominy.

But the glory of the Gospel consists in its prompt and gracious response to the expressed need of the soul, regardless of previous condition of servitude.

The helpless and depraved condition of the thief was no barrier to the designs of Christ. Rather did it furnish the opportunity and incentive to the exercise of His boundless mercy and saving ability.

The very condition Christ came to meet confronted Him in the person of the pitiable wretch who was swinging out into eternity. The genius of Christ's mission was sublimely manifest in this incident. The purpose of His suffering was to have vindication in the very hour of His crucifixion—a trophy of God's grace was to be awarded Him in the supreme moment of His obedience unto death. All other attendant circumstances on this dark hour were to be eclipsed by Christ's matchless and prevailing interest in the soul that needed the healing touch of His omnific finger.

An interesting theological question thrusts itself upon us. By what power was the thief enabled to discern his guilt and to apprehend the mercy of God in Christ? The spirit of God who works when and where and how He pleases must have moved upon his heart and impelled him to a changed attitude; seeing Christ enforces the necessity for Him, and in this light the thief saw light.

A man may seek to argue himself into irresponsibility, but the sober and serious movement fosters inevitably the thought of responsibility. The God of the universe will ever and anon press His sovereign right upon a man's conscience. The Being against whom sin is committed is none other than the Infinite and authoritative God, and the soul under conviction submerges itself into the abysmal thought of the Psalmist. "Against Thee and Thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight." The absorbing thought of the aroused soul is the presence of a great moral personality in the universe, who has in His righteous grasp, the destiny of men. Self-condemnation is not the verdict of the Pessimist, but the calm and deliberate conclusion of the optimist. The Justice of God finds vindication in the "Amen" of the self-condemned soul. A man may say my punishment is greater than I can bear, but rarely does he aver my punishment is greater than I deserve.

The thief admitted that his reward was due for his deeds. This is the steady teaching of the scriptures and throughout the sacred volume, incidents that emphasize this rational attitude are given. The sinner never with propriety asks for God's justice, because he knows that the consistent answer is condemnation, but the recognition of impending and deserved justice presses the appeal for mercy. All the world is justly guilty before God. This measurement of desert is sanctioned by the Word of God, and to this sanction the condemned soul gives hearty response.

Christ on the one hand. The thief on the other. Physically near, spiritually distant. Prayer and faith the medium of connection. The thief prayed, "Remember me," condescend to give me a thought. The thought of Christ is sufficient. The thief believed that Christ would hear requests and give blessings. There probably came to his mind the many distressed and forsaken, who had been the unworthy, but joyful recipients of Christ's disposition. His life had been one of constant and manifold benedictions. He had lifted up His hands in blessings without number. These had been prodigal and had fallen with impartial hand. If any distinction were made it was with reference to those who were most helpless and needy. The thief entertained the highest possible human conception of Christ. His faith was sublime. "No such faith shown by others—even Christ's disciples. The dying thief eclipsed all other believers."

In the judgment of man the thief deserves nothing but condemnation. Christ might have allowed this poor soul the deserts of justice and an eternal portrait in the gallery of rogues, but here as in other instances, He was moved with compassion and was true to His Divine Mission of salvation. Christ thought enough of "The other" to hear and answer his prayer in the moment of His crucifixion agony. He thought enough of the sinner by His side to grant him the greatest of all boons—salvation from himself, and a place in His eternal kingdom. He thought enough of him to bestow upon him the grace of God, through which alone salvation is possible. He thought enough of him to make him "meet for the inheritance of the saints in Light." He thought enough of him to snatch him as a brand from the burning. He thought enough of him to make his dire extremity His own glorious opportunity.

This incident is frequently cited as a warrant for the postponement of the reception of Christ until the dying hour. It undoubtedly pays tribute to the Infinite reaches of God's grace. It teaches the comforting lesson of possible death-bed repentance. Yet, while it enforces the lesson "never despair," it also emphasizes the other lesson, "never presume." One of these malefactors was taken and the other left. One was pardoned and one was left to the just condemnation of his own sins. What made the difference? Do not fail to see it. It is radical—it is urgent. It is inevitable. The attitude of these two malefactors toward Christ and the cross on which He hung determined woe for the one, and weal for "The other." Your attitude toward the cross of Christ will determine whether you are saved from your sins, or left to die in your sins.

What think ye of Christ? If you are a sinner you are in your dire extremity. Now is Christ's opportunity. That present moment was the thief's opportunity to accept Christ. This present moment is your opportunity. Christ is just as able and willing to save you now as He was then to save the penitent thief. He is just as near you now as He was to him if you will call upon Him. But you must call. "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." Saved just as you are without trying to make yourself better. The thief hadn't time to improve his condition, and this is neither rational, nor possible. Just as he was, just as you are.

The lives of both of these robbers had been appallingly wicked and despicable. Christ is on the cross of atoning sacrifice. One of them had nothing to do with this just man. "The other" prayed, "Lord remember me when Thou comest into thy Kingdom." The unpardonable sin is the sin that is never pardoned, and the sin that is never pardoned is willful and final rejection of Christ. Why was one lost and "The other" saved. Because one rejected Christ and "The other" accepted Him.

The Way.

This year being the centennial of the birth of Ralph Waldo Emerson, it is fitting that the literary world should be aglow with words of praise for his writings—and his life.

He is justly considered a seer, a master among men for all ages. His life was kindly, and his writings, in a happy style, carry cheer and inspiration. In our blind struggle for the Way—and Light—what is the message from this great philosopher? "The way of life is wonderful: It is by abandonment." Emerson is regarded as the prophet of the New Thought. This movement has swept over the States, and has many adherents. It is characterized by sturdy optimism, earnest purpose, and settled confidence. The direct aim being the promotion of health and happiness. The New Thought is said to embrace the Mental Science organizations, the Philistines, Christian Scientists, all of whom while they reject the miracles of Christ—the supernatural—take them back in the supernatural found in Theosophy, Hypnotism, Mind Cure.

The creed simple of the New Thought is to "think health, think happiness." Catholicity of spirit is emphasized, and while it advocates high endeavor we hear the words of Emerson sounded forth; "Nature will not have us fume and fret." "Life is a festival only to the wise."

Dowden says the children of light should borrow from the children of the world, but remain the children of light.

What then can we as Christians, borrow from these teachers who by their beautiful lives show us the grace of benevolence and serenity?

Have they found a New Thought? or is it not "dropping empty buckets into empty wells and drawing nothing up?"

Mathew Arnold held that Emerson's optimism was the root of his greatness, and the source of his charm, as Carlyle's pessimism was his ruin.

But, as old as the everlasting hills is the theory of the influence of joy upon the mind and body. Plato acknowledged the influence of a quiet mind upon the body. Christian Science, says Prof. George Willis Coker, is New Platonism. Mind cure dates back to the dawn of civilization. Hypnotism has been practiced in all ages. Truly, there is nothing new under the sun! The two types for all times are Plato and Aristotle. Alcibiades we recall as an example of victorious optimism. Diogenes of defeated pessimism. George Eliot said she was neither an optimist nor a pessimist, but a meliorist.

We love to quote Robert Louis Stevenson who lived above the aches and pains of a "silly stupid body." He prayed that he might always wear a "glorious morning face."

It is no wonder that so many turn to teachers who proclaim happiness and peace. The world is seeking happiness. It loves your smiles, and your encouragement, not your tears and discontents—your comfort, not your complaint.

For a long time I pondered over the lack of joy among the children of the King. But not until a wise man showed me, fully, my own lack, did I long to help others.

I was talking of the difficulties and perplexities of life; "But you have found the Way, you should be happy." I undertood. I should be happy! Are we living up to our privileges? We know that however beautiful a life may be, "no one cometh unto the Father but by me" said the Master.

Are we so full of the joy of Christ that our friends are anxious to have this priceless treasure?

In the hour near the betrayal, Christ said: "These things have I spoken unto you that my joy might be full." What an incomparable legacy—Christ's joy in us!

He abandoned all the glory of his Heavenly Home that our lives might be full, that in this world, we might know the holy joy of the soul. "Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." For His message rings clearly down the centuries—for you—and for me: "I am the Way." Elizabeth Ray.

The Cry of the Little Peoples.

Richard Le Gallienne.

The cry of the little peoples went to God in vain;
The Czech and the Pole, and the Finn, and the Schleswig Dane.

We ask but a little portion of the green and ancient earth,

Only to sow and sing and reap in the land of our birth.
We ask not coaling stations, nor ports in the China seas;

We leave to the big child nation such rivalries as these.
We have learned the lesson of time, and we know three things of worth:

Only to sow and sing and reap in the land of our birth.

Oh, leave us our little margins, waste ends of land and sea;

A little grass and a hill or two and a shadowing tree;
Oh, leave us our little rivers that sweetly catch the sky,
To drive our mills and to carry our wood and to ripple by.

Once long ago, like you, with hollow pursuit of fame,
We filled all the shaking world with the sound of our name;

But now we are glad to rest, our battles and boasting done;

Glad just to sow and sing and reap in our share of the sun.

And what shall you gain if you take us and bind us and beat us with thongs,

And drive us to sing underground in a whisper our sad little songs?

Forbid us the very use of our heart's own nursery tongue—

Is this to be strong, you nations, is this to be strong?

Your vulgar battles to fight and your shopman conquests to keep;

For this shall we break our hearts, for this shall our old men weep?

What gain in the day of battle—to the Rus, to the German, what gain,

The Czech, and the Pole, and the Finn, and the Schleg-wig Dane?

The cry of the little peoples went up to God in vain,
For the world is given over to the cruel sons of Cain;
The hand that would bless us is weak, and the hand that would break us is strong.

And the power of pity is naught but the power of a song.
The dreams that our fathers dreamed to-day are laughter and dust,

And nothing at all in the world is left for a man to trust.
Let us hope no more, or dream, or prophesy, or pray,
For the iron world no less will crash on its iron way;
And nothing is left but to watch, with a helpless, pitying eye,

The kind old aims for the world, and the kind old fashions die.

Educational Complaint.

To the Editor of N. C. Presbyterian.

The following appeared in the Davidson College Bulletin, March, 1903.

"It is a lamentable fact that many students learn to pass entrance examinations in Latin, Greek, and English who can neither spell correctly nor punctuate properly, and whose written work is not only crude and inelegant, but full of glaring mistakes in grammatical construction. Such a student is not prepared for college, and the high school offering him for matriculation brings discredit upon its training."

Davidson does not stand alone in its complaint. Other college have been speaking plainly on the same line. Where does the fault lie? The young men are not wholly to blame. No doubt, they were encouraged by their teachers to get into the advanced studies before mastering the lower branches. The fact is, the common English studies are looked upon as of secondary importance in our present system of instruction. The idea is to get out of them as quickly as possible and to enter upon the higher courses. The teachers themselves lay far more stress upon the higher education, than they do upon the lower, thus making a wrong impression upon the public, as to the value of a thorough elementary knowledge, the very basis of all true education.

Perhaps some may say that the time has come for a reform. But that has been said time and again. The people have been submissive to a wonderful degree, to the existing state of things. They have been waiting and waiting for some change for the better. They want to see some improvement, something tangible and substantial. But the pent-up feeling is beginning to break forth in unmistakable expressions of disapproval as to the workings of our school system. One need not be surprised at a great educational revolution in this country, starting with the people. So much dissatisfaction and so many complaints mean something.

The question may be asked, where must the reform begin? There is much talk about the betterment of our schools. That something is wrong in our educational machinery is very evident, but how to reach it is the question. We are free to say that there will never be any betterment, till we get back to the fundamental principles of education from which we have departed. No educational campaign will be a success practically, unless it be more on the line of a better lower education for our people. Mark that.

We are willing to admit that it is hard to eradicate an evil, when it gets under full headway and entrenches itself. The only way to remedy the educational evil, is to begin at the bottom, go upwards, cut off all excrescences, and by the use of common sense methods to make our education what it ought to be—serviceable to every one in any position from the lowest to the highest. The lower education is not intended for any particular class. It is necessary to all alike. It is to be had mostly in the primary and secondary schools. If one does not get it there, he will never get it in the highest institutions of learning. The State should see to it that the children should have a clear and definite knowledge of the elementary English branches. What it gives, let it be of the best kind.

There is no antagonism between the higher and lower education, the latter being a support of the former, giving it a solidity that it could not otherwise have, and indispensable to its completeness. There would not have arisen so much trouble, had the common schools been kept within the constitutional limit. But our educators chose to introduce the higher studies, giving them the time that should be devoted to the elementary branches strictly, and when they did that, a blow was given to the lower education from which it will take time to recover.

We are now reaping the fruits of that educational mistake. No one need wonder at the severe but just strictures made by our colleges upon our high schools, even those that are considered the best, for their neglect of the essentials of education. A. Kirkland.

At Nightfall.

O Lord the shadows fall the night draws near
And like a tired child I seem to hear
Thy tender voice say: "Lay thy work aside
And 'neath the shadow of my wing abide;
Roll off the burden of thy cares on Me
Quaff the pure tonic which sleep offers thee.
Father I come! and bring not work alone
But the day's failures—sure Thou wilt condone
And knowing that who rests in Thee
By day or night must happy be!

As Others See Us.

(Respectfully referred to those who secured the Kongo Resolutions at Lexington, Va. See Matthew VII, 34, 5. S. P. V.)

Dear Friends,

We venture to address you in the name and on behalf of the religious Society of Friends in Great Britain, a body of men and two men who are earnestly desirous that the practice of Christian living, among themselves and others, should be brought into harmony with the teaching and example of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Our hearts have been deeply pained as we have had our attention drawn to the 'Lynching of persons, both white and colored, with the terrible scenes of lawlessness and cruelty that frequently accompany them, in some of the States of your Union.

From trustworthy records it appears that in the past ten years many hundreds of persons in the United States of America have been thus, without legal trial, put to death. Many of these have been burnt alive, or otherwise tortured; and we have sorrowful evidence that in some districts such doings have been condoned, and even actively applauded, by those who in other respects are right-thinking citizens. In addition to this, there is the demoralising effect of such spectacles on the men, women, and children, large numbers of whom sometime witness them.

We earnestly desire to avoid falling into a spirit of hasty or harsh judgment on these matters. We recognize with humiliation that there are grave faults in the conduct of our own people that need correcting, and we welcome with the utmost thankfulness the evidence that many among you are fully alive to the claims of humanity, and are doing all they can to remedy the evils alluded to. We leave out of consideration altogether political and radical problems, and difficulties which, at this distance, we can very imperfectly understand, and appeal to you on the broad and simple grounds of Christian principle and human justice.

Our Lord Jesus Christ, in the day of His earthly ministry, when the zealous performance of outward forms of religion was receiving more attention than the practice of love to men, quoted with approval the words of an ancient prophet, "I desire mercy, and not sacrifice." In direct anticipation of His teaching was the saying of another prophet, that what the Lord requires of us is "to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with our God." He taught that the sons of God must be "merciful, even as the Father who is in heaven is merciful;" and declared that those who refused to act kindly to one of the least of His brethren were refusing kindness to Himself. In full accord with this spirit, His great Apostle urged that "Love is the fulfilling of the law."

As Christians, we believe that it is this spirit of love and tenderness which has so largely removed the barbarous cruelties and the lawless injustice of the dark age, and, in proportion as it has had free play in any country, we trace to its influence the development of an ordered common-wealth, in which to the weakest members are granted the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and justice.

In the name of Christ, who died for all men, regardless of name or wealth, race or color, let ours, both in England and America, do what we can to form a public opinion based on the principles of His life and teaching.

We are, in Christian love,

Your Friends.

Signed, on behalf of the "Meeting for Sufferings," representing the Society of Friends in Great Britain, Henry Lloyd Witson.

(Clerk).

"The Bar."

"The saloon is sometimes called a bar

That's true.

A bar to heaven, a door to hell;
Whoever named it, named it well.
A bar to manliness and wealth,
A door to want and broken health;
A bar to honor, pride and fame;
A door to sin and grief and shame
A bar to hope, a bar to prayer,
A door of darkness and despair,
A bar to honored useful life;
A door to brawling senseless strife.
A bar to all that's true and brave
A door to every drunkard's grave.
A bar to joys that home imparts
A door to tears and aching hearts.
A bar to heaven a door to hell
Whoever named it named it well."

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

We may as well confess that the proof-reading in this issue is abominable and explain that some of the printing force are taking a vacation and the office is a little demoralized in consequence. This is an apology to contributors as well as to the reader.

Nevertheless and notwithstanding, there is good stuff in the Standard this week. The poems by O. H., who has been too long silent as we think, and George F. Vielt are well worthy of sympathetic perusal. Dr. Moore gives us the second article on the Fruits of Romanism. By their fruits ye shall know them. The Necessity of Training for Missionary Work is a thoughtful article. The Cry of the Little Peoples is surely a cry that should have been heard. The letter sent us from England by the Friends, is couched in respectful terms. How is it that people never feel like quarrelling with the Quakers? Perhaps we should be insulted if that letter came from any other than the Society of Friends. The regular departments of the paper are up to the Standard, we think.

A Premium Offer.

GEORGIA

Agnes Scott Institute.

The Board of Trustees of Agnes Scott Institute, Decatur, Ga., have just let the contract for a new building 40 by 80 feet. It will be constructed of brick, and will have two stories. The first story will contain a gymnasium 40 x 60 in the clear with 18 feet ceiling. One of the attractive features of the gymnasium will be a swimming pool and also shower baths and lockers. A competent instructor will be in charge. The second story will contain music rooms and other much needed space, which will add very greatly to the facilities of the Institute. The building will have "dead" walls and floors so that the noise of the gymnasium will not interfere with the use of the rooms for other purposes.

Last year Science Hall was erected, a building 30 x 70, two stories high containing Chemical, Biological and Physical Laboratories, weighing, storage and recitation rooms, and now a modern, up-to-date gymnasium is to be added.

Still another great improvement is being made. A card catalogue of the books in the Library will soon be completed. This will add much to the value of the Library by enabling student or teacher to find easily and readily the book desired on any subject. Besides, several hundred dollars will be expended in making additions to the already valuable Library.

MISSISSIPPI.

The Presbytery of Chickasaw will meet at Bethany church, Burnt Mills, Miss., on Thursday, Aug. 27th, 1903, 11 a. m. A full representation of the churches is earnestly desired. All sessions are requested to notify Rev. M. L. Phillips, Inka, Miss., whether their churches will be represented or not, so arrangement can be made for taking those who go by R. R. to Inka, out to Burnt Mills which is 17 miles from Inka, and also for the entertainment of the same at Presbytery.

J. W. Allen, S. C.

WEST VIRGINIA.

KANWHBA PRESBYTERY.—Dr. E. Thompson, Chairman of Home missions and Rev. C. Preston, recently elected Evangelist, have been clothed with special evangelistic powers to reach our needy fields.

Recently they have organized churches in the Presbytery as follows:

At Leewood, W. Va., an important point near the forks of Cabin Creek; at Decotta, six miles up the left branch of Cabin Creek, and will soon organize at Kayford, on the head waters of Right branch, Cabin Creek. This Cabin Creek valley contain about 25 collieries, about 15,000 people, and as yet, only one resident minister, a Methodist. We hope to put two or three men in the field at once, so the cry for means is imperative. This is probably the most rapidly developing section of the South at the present time and so it demands the attention of our church. M. D.

Foreign Mission Receipts for June.

The receipts of the foreign mission treasury for the month of June were $14,306.51. This is a gain over the receipts of last June of $2,091.26. As there was a legacy of $1,103.06 last June and no legacy this month, the gain in regular contributions is $3,194.32.

NORTH CAROLINA.

A Revival of Interest in Sunday School Work.

It may be of interest to the readers of this paper to know that the Sunday-School work in North Carolina is taking on new life and energy. We refer especially to the work being done by the North Carolina Sunday-School Association. This is equally true, however, of the work being done by the different denominations.

There has probably never been a time in the history of the church when there was such a revival of interest along the line of better Sunday-School work. For this we would be truly grateful, for if the world is to be saved from sin it must be accomplished largely through the Sunday-School.

The North Carolina Sunday-School Association has recently opened headquarters in the city of Raleigh, and plans have been laid for the most aggressive Sunday-School work ever undertaken in North Carolina. At the State Convention held in Kinston in April, Prof. S. N. Smith of Elon College was re-elected as General Secretary on salary, and he is now devoting his entire time to the work, with an office at the Association headquarters, Andrews Building, Raleigh. He is assisted by his wife and a stenographer. The North Carolina Sunday-School Association is an inter-denominational organization, and its work should appeal to every Sunday-School worker throughout the State. It owes allegiance to no one denomination, but to all, and the only end in view is to build up the Sunday-School cause in the State. On the Executive Committee are to be found the leading Sunday-School workers of every evangelical denomination in North Carolina. Mr. N. S. Broughton of Raleigh, is Chairman of the Committee. The work of the Association does not, in any way, hinder the work done by the different denominations, but means to help in every possible way. The plan of work is to organize the counties and townships of the State into inter-denominational associations.

These associations meet annually or semi-annually, at which meetings reports are made, and it is ascertained just what per cent of the people in each county and township go to Sunday-School and how many do not. These meetings are helpful also, in that the best methods of Sunday-School work of all the denominations are there brought out and discussed. It is proposed that in September a Tour Party be sent out to hold institutes and organize counties. This party will consist of four or five of the most experienced Sunday-School workers to be found in the leading denominations in the State. They will travel first through the western part of the State, holding about a day and half or two-day's session at each county-seat, and organizing the county. The North Carolina Sunday-School Beacon is the organ of the Association, and is published regularly every month. We commend to our readers and the Sunday-School workers of our denomination a careful consideration of the plans and purposes of the Association. If there is anything in the work of the Association that will help us as a denomination, then we ought to have it.

EDUCATION.

To the Presbyteries:

I. The last Assembly instructed us to try to raise this year, as usual, $30,000 for Education for the Ministry. We ask each Presbytery to raise and send to our treasury, its proportion of this amount, including receipts from your churches for April 1903. Please have your pro rata apportioned to your churches and try to raise the whole of it, and even more if possible.

II. The maximum appropriation to each beneficiary this year is $90. But it is expected that every beneficiary who can get along on a smaller amount from our Committee will ask for less than this maximum.

III. Two sets of Blanks are to be used in applying for aid. One by the candidate in applying to Presbytery. This blank is designed to aid Presbytery in securing necessary information as to the needs of beneficiaries, and also to impress upon beneficiaries the conditions on which they may properly draw upon this fund. It is not to be sent us, but retained by the Presbytery, or its committee for its own information. The other Blank is to be used by Presbytery in applying to the Executive Committee in behalf of beneficiaries. It is believed that a faithful use of these Blanks will materially help this cause.

IV. Please forward applications to us so that we may have them in hand Oct. 1st., or 5th., at the latest, as we should know by that time what will be expected of us for the present year.

V. The increased number of candidates last year encourages us to hope we may have still more this year. Yet our beloved Church needs to be aroused to the necessity of praying the Lord of the harvest that he would send forth laborers into his harvest.

Yours in his name,

Joseph H. Lumpkin, Secretary.

An Important Matter.

The article in your issue of July 29th with the above heading was timely and important. Unfortunately it was another illustration of the old proverb, which says, "Figures never lie, but nothing can be made to lie equal to figures."

Instead of requiring one cent from each member of the Presbyterian church, it would require ten cents, and as only about one person in ten contributes to any given cause, it will require at least an average of one dollar instead of one cent in order to obtain the required three thousand dollars of the Orphanage. This is a very important matter, and one that should receive prompt attention. I venture to present the following plans as promising a better prospect of success.

There are certainly ten churches in North Carolina in each of which there is one man or woman who has sufficient money and influence to say that he and the church combined will give one hundred dollars, and that he will at once endeavor to raise the amount. In the same way there are in twenty churches a person who can influence the church to give at least fifty dollars.

The same conditions exist in at least forty churches that could each contribute twenty-five dollars. This would complete the required amount, but as there may be some failures, it is incumbent upon every man, woman and child in the Presbyterian church of the State to at once begin the work and to send as liberal a contribution as possible to Rev. R. W. Boyd, Barium Springs Orphanage, to aid in finishing the Industrial Building, and for purchasing the Laundry Outfit.

This is the first call that has been made on the church for several years, for other than support fund, and this call is to complete the Alexander Industrial Building, in which the boys and girls will be taught how to work and to become self-supporting men and women.

The writer will use every influence possible to have the Raleigh church lead the list by contributing one hundred dollars to this object. The responsibility is now upon at least one person in each and every church to aid in having that particular church meet present conditions.

DAVIDSON.—The Piedmont Summer School for teachers closed its session to-day. Those in attendance have been gracious enough to express enthusiastic satisfaction with their stay on the campus, their treatment in the village and the course that has been offered them by the various instructors. Superintendents Cochrane and Butler have seemingly had their highest expectations realized and are no doubt gratified at the initial success of the movement for grouping together a number of counties for a combined teachers' institute. The enrollment has been not far from 200. In addition to the lectures noted in this correspondence, special mention should be made of a quite interesting series delivered by Prof. E. L. Hughes, of Greenville, N. C. He was heard with much pleasure every time he spoke.

While Davidson does not believe in "co-education" proper, she is liberal enough to give a cordial welcome to all the ladies that wish to attend the summer school, and next year it is thought the college can throw open the new dormitory building, just now nearing completion, with a capacity of at least 60 (two in a room) and let that pass as a woman's building during the Piedmont session.

Dr. Graham after doing his full duty, as his friends thought, by an excellent series of sermons to the teachers, has gone for his summer vacation to Winchester, going somewhat earlier than he had expected on account of some special indisposition of his father. Rev. John Lafferty, of the Synod of Florida, is very kindly and very acceptably conducting some of the services in the pastor's absence. Dr. Shearer is strong enough to be getting some pleasure out of the rest of summer and is now visiting relatives in Va. Rev. William Black and wife are at the sea-shore at Wrightsville. He is uncertain whether he will get as far north as Northfield during his vacation or not. Dr. Smith made an address at the educational rally and teachers institute at Dallas this week. He speaks next week at Stanley Creek and Shelby.

The Davidson League is swelling in numbers and it is clear that it means a great deal for the future of the college.

The 267th session of Orange Presbytery will be held at Alvanse Church Guilford Co., N. C., on Tuesday, Sept. 1st, 1903, at 2:30 o'clock p. m.

A Sunday School Convention will be held on the morning of the second day.

Delegates may expect the usual reduced rates of travel.

D. I. Craig, Stated Clerk.

ROBBINSVILLE.—Some good friend from Mocksville sent us $5 to use in our work. The person did not give his or her name. The request was that we would acknowledge the receipt of same in the Standard, as a gift coming from a friend to the Home mission work.

T. W. DeVane.

KING'S MOUNTAIN PRESBYTERY.—To Pastors and sessions of King's Mountain Presbytery.

August is the month for Presbyterian Home Mission collection. Pastors and sessions are asked faithfully to present this cause and to make the apportionment to our churches the minimum amounts contributed to this important cause.

For the committee,

W. R. Minter,
Chairman.

MECKLENBURG PRESBYTERY met in the 1st Presbyterian church, Charlotte, on the 27th. Eight ministers and three elders were present.

Rev. W. C. Hagan was released from the pastoral charge of Amity church.

Messrs. Geo. P. Stevens, member of Matthews church, L. W. Matthews of Providence church and F. W. Gray of Williams Memorial church were received under the care of Presbytery as candidates for the gospel ministry.

T. J. Allison, S. C.

HARRISBURG.—A church was organized at Harrisburg, N. C., by a commission appointed by Concord Presbytery, consisting of Rev. Geo. H. Cornelson, Jr., Rev. W. A. Gillon, Rev. R. J. Hunter, and Elder A. N. Harris. Eighteen members were received by letter and two on examination. Ten others will join this church as soon as they can secure their letters. Four Elders and three Deacons were elected. Two Elders and one Deacon were ordained and installed. All the officers are energetic, young men and there are bright prospects for the future of this church. We hope to have the building up by the 1st. of Sept.

Respectfully,

Concord, N. C.

R. J. Hunter.

To the churches of Mecklenburg Presbytery.

There is very little money in the treasury to the credit of Home Missions. Our evangelists are in great need of the appropriation, or that part of it, which is now due them. If the treasurers of the churches have money on hand for this cause, they will confer a blessing by sending it at once to Mr. J. M. Harry, treasurer of the Presbytery. If they have no money, the churches will need to have a part of the apportionment collected and sent into the treasury immediately. Pastors and sessions will you not please give this matter your prompt attention? There is urgent need, now.

T. J. Allison,

Chairman of Home Mission.

PROVIDENCE.—Rev. Dr. J. B. Mack, passed through this city yesterday en route to Alabama, where he is evangelist of the Presbytery. Dr. Mack has accepted a call for his services as pastor from Providence and Banks churches in Mecklenburg Presbytery and in Mecklenburg county. He will continue to live at his home in Fort Mill and drive to his churches to preach and visit the congregations. These churches were last served by Rev. W. H. Davis.

Dr. Mack is a strong thinker and preacher, and is one of the best known ministers of the Southern Presbyterian Church. He has been anxious for some time to devote himself to close study than his evangelistic labors permitted and will be able to do this when he enters upon his new field.—Charlotte Observer.

MISSOURI.

CENTRAL, KANSAS CITY.—Rev. S. M. Neel, D. D., pastor of this church expects to leave the 27th of this month for Georgian Bay, Canada, where he will spend the month of Aug. Rev. W. W. Elwang, of Columbia, Mo., will supply the church in his absence.

LIBERTY.—Rev. J. J. Hill, pastor of this church left the 21st of this month for Monteagle, Tenn., where he expects to recuperate for a month.

GOWER.—Rev. Xenophon Ryland of Lexington, Mo., supplied this pulpit the fourth Sabbath of this month, with the view of taking permanent charge of the Gower, Walnut Grove field, if the necessary arrangements can be made. His address is still Lexington, Mo.

TORONTO.—Rev. Thos. H. Watkins of Tuscombina, Mo., has been holding a meeting at this place, preaching eight or ten days; the attendance was good, the attention earnest, and there were several professions of faith in Christ. Toronto is part of the field supplied for the summer by Mr. O. L. Byrns. He will continue to preach there occasionally, and later steps may be taken towards the organization of a church if the way be clear.

MINISTERS AND SESSIONS.—August is one of the months in which contributions are asked for "Local Home Missions," i. e., with us for Home Missions in Missouri. Most of the subscriptions too are payable, half in February and half in August.

Will you please see that this cause is presented to your church and an opportunity given to all to contribute: and will you remind subscribers that all unpaid subscriptions are now due?

The needs of the work were never greater, nor the prospects more encouraging, especially for substantial, lasting results; in most of the Presbyteries the H. M. churches are generally supplied, three having practically no vacant fields; two churches, Brauk Memorial and St. Genevieve, are about to be built, and when finished, will in each case put new life in the work; and in both the upper and lower Ozark fields, the outlook is very promising, more so than ever before. To meet these needs and to advance the work, all that has been subscribed and a good deal more, will be needed.

Will you then see to it, that all subscriptions are collected in August, and that this cause is commended to the interest, prayers, and liberality of your people and their free will offerings received?

Send all amounts to Presbyterial Treasurer.

In behalf of Synods' Home Mission Committee,

Geo. L. Leyburn, Secretary.

CENTRAL TEXAS.—The Presbytery of Central Texas will meet in Belton, Thursday, Sept. 3, 1903, at 8 P. M.

CLARKSVILE.—Rev. Geo. F. Robertson of Paris, Tex., has just closed a very profitable meeting of two weeks here. The meeting was held in a tabernacle, built for the purpose, very close to the square. It will never be known how much good was done. Mr. Robertson's preaching was plain and scriptural, and the people listened with interest to his sermons. Never before perhaps did a Presbyterian minister get the ear of this community so well, and much benefit will result to our cause from this meeting. Steps were taken toward securing a pastor, and it is hoped a suitable man can soon be formed. This church is grouped with Detroit, the latter claiming one fourth of the minister's time.

EDNA.—The Pastor, Rev. Brooks I. Dickey, has returned after a three weeks outing. He occupied his pulpit as usual last Sabbath. He has just completed his fourth year with this church.

WANTED—MALE TEACHERS.—Will some one put me in correspondence with several Presbyterian male teachers for mission schools, who can pray in the school, teach the shorter catechism as well as languages and mathematics, and assist in Sabbath School?

S. L. Morris, Sec'y.

A Worthy Cause.

Michael Y. Sayad was born in Urumia, Persia, about thirty years ago of Christian parents and came to America six years ago to equip himself for the Gospel Ministry among his own people.

Among the discouragements confronting him were separation for all these years from wife and child, ignorance of the English language, and the lack of all means of support save his own efforts. Undaunted, however, he undertook the mastery of language, the support of his family, and the Theological Course in Union Theo. Seminary, Va., where he made a most remarkable record and impressed all his fellow students and his professors with his earnestness, capacity and piety.

Upon leaving the Seminary in the Spring of 1901 he was Licensed as a Probationer for the Gospel Ministry by East Hanover Presbytery and set about collecting funds for his return to his home by lecturing among the Churches of the Southern Presbyterian Assembly. Sometime later his hopes were dissipated by the decision of the Executive Committee at Nashville not to open a Persian Mission as the Sister church in the North had a prosperous work already established. Having been providentially led out of the bounds of the Northern Church and being unacquainted with the Officers of the New York Board, Mr. Sayad began to despair of his long cherished hopes when a friend, who had known him well in the Southern Church took the matter up with Mr. Spcer, Sec'y. of the Board, and finally succeeded, with the help of East Hanover Presbytery and the assistance of friends in Persia, in securing an appointment and providing for his support.

The call is urgent and Mr. Sayad wishes to return as soon as possible but this he has to do at his own expense, the Board not having funds available for this purpose. The trip and necessary equipment in the way of books will cost about $500. Mr. Sayad has only about $100 and I have pledged myself to raise the remaining $400, if possible by August 15th. To do this I am appealing to my personal friends and acquaintances and to a few Churches and Societies.

I need not argue the merits of this case. A man who will do what Mr. Sayad has done will surely do a noble work for the Blessed Master. Will you not count it a privilege to help in this worthy cause?

Please send your contribution to Mr. J. Douglas Lecky American National Bank, Richmond, Va., or to Rev. J. P. Smith, Editor Central Presbyterian, Box 37, Richmond, Va.

Yours very truly, C. M. Chumbley, Pastor Lancaster Ky. Presbyterian church.

FOREIGN.

KOREA.—Within the last few minutes the sad news has come to our office of the death of Mrs. Harrison, wife of Rev. W. B. Harrison of our mission station at Chunju, Korea. The only information contained in the letter is that Mrs. Harrison was quite sick either of typhoid or typhus fever. On June 20th Mr. Harrison telegraphed to the missionaries at Mokpo "Mrs. Harrison has departed." This is a severe loss to our mission force in Korea. Mrs. Harrison was one of the most earnest, consecrated and intelligent of our lady missionaries. She went to Korea in 1892 and her work at Seoul in connection with Miss Doty of the Northern Presbyterian Mission was said to be at that time perhaps the most successful woman's work that has been done in Korea.

The resolutions express gratitude to the Southern whites for not eating and drinking with the black man because "it forces the negro to build his own resorts, teaches him business and turns a flood of money to negro vaults and bank accounts." #### Cleveland on Labor.

Former President Grover Cleveland contributes to the current number of Collier's Weekly a discussion on labor troubles. He assumes that faults have been committed by employers as well as by the employed, and points to the fact that injuries are often inflicted on persons far removed from the controversies. He says:

"Manifestly it is hardly necessary to even suggest the sad consequences visited upon the actual participants in these labor quarrels. Those who run may read these consequences in the pinching deprivation that enters the homes of our co-workingmen; in their idleness and its malevolent influence of character and habits, and in their morbid discontent and irritation, that comes from brooding over real or imaginary wrongs. Nor is the depressing story less plainly read in the dispiriting loss and perplexity of employers; in their inability to meet contract engagements and obligations; in the hardening of their sympathy with the mass of workingmen, and in their blinding resentment against those whom they accuse of guilty responsibility for afflictive conditions. As proud citizens of a great republic we have been wont to recall the fundamental and democratic theories of our government, and, in optimistic mood, to indulge in the gratifying reflection that under our beneficent institutions favorable soil is not found for the noxious growths of class contention. We have complacently believed this, because our people are not so irrevocably separated in classes that our workingmen must always remain within the limits of a changeless doom, and because American opportunity opens the door of advancement to those of every station.

"We have also fondly harbored the conceit that American generosity and fellowship prompt those already fortunate, to encourage others striving to better their prospects, and that the workingman of to-day may easily be an employer of labor to-morrow. These are pleasant thoughts, and they have so stimulated and flattered our civic sensibilities that we have found it difficult to realize how under such a happy arrangement, the relations between capital and labor can be disturbed by selfishness and indifference on one side or resentful envy on the other. On the contrary, still having in mind the character and mission of our institutions, we have failed to see why they should not develop considerate fairness on the part of employers, and a response of hopeful, contented industry on the part of the employed. As we turn from a contemplation which the theories of our government suggest, to our actual situation, the view presented is not reassuring."

Mr. Cleveland argues for a conciliatory attitude on both sides. In this vein he proceeds to say:

"While there is no way of forming a better disposition upon the disputants, they should be brought to see, as those not concerned in their quarrels already see, that human nature, when left to its own devices, can be so blinded by interest or prejudice, and so strongly led by stereotyped methods of thought, as to be unable, of its own motion, to pass a fair judgment upon the quality of its operations, or to correctly define its springs or action.

"These suggestions lead to recall the ease with which the disagreements between individuals are frequently settled, when the parties are brought to a calm review, of the differences, by a trusted intermediary. How often in such cases, when the light of intelligent and reasonable discussion is thrown upon the dispute, positions which have been held with great stubbornness are abandoned as untenable, and how often difficulties disappear that have seemed to absolutely bar the way to an adjustment. No reason can be given why such a course cannot be followed with the same good results when the dispute, instead of merely involving individuals, is between organized workmen and their employers."

Educational.

Converse College, Spartanburg, has taken on new life, with the presidency of Dr. Pell. While not a denominational institution its two presidents have both been Presbyterian ministers. It is undoubtedly one of the very best schools in the South, second to none in its high grade of scholarship and in the opportunity furnished by the splendid equipment which it possesses. Dr. Pell has an able faculty in co-operation with him and Converse is an excellent school to which to send a girl, for all that is meant by a thorough education.

We must not forget, either, the Presbyterian College for Women, now the only one of that name since the character of the college at Columbia has been changed and its name too. The outlook for the Charlotte Institution, of which we are all so justly proud is excellent indeed. There will be more students next year than ever before in its history and this despite the temporary discouragement of the raising of the standard and the determined effort to maintain it. The College is exceedingly particular in its requirements for graduation but of course that makes its diploma worth so much the more than it would be worth otherwise. The readers of the Standard are familiar with the picture of the spacious building and other equipment of this Presbyterian School.

The Catawba Male Academy of Rock Hill is a new institution in name, at least, and is under the direction of that fine scholar and prince of teachers, Dr. D. J. Brimm. We heartily commend the school to those desiring the best influences for their boys.

And everybody knows what the Standard thinks of Davidson. There is no better college in the country for the work it proposes to do. The influences surrounding the boys at Davidson are the very best, and their high standing in the different professions and at the great universities is the best proof that Davidson can get about all out of a man in the way of study and put all into him in the way of learning, that is possible.

Deaths.

"I shine in the light of God;
His image stamps my brow,
Through the shadows of death my feet have trod;
I reign in glory now!

"I have learned the song they sing
Whom Jesus hath set free,
And the glorious walls of Heaven still ring
With the new-born melody."

COLVIN.—Aaron M. Colvin was born in Caswell Township (New Hanover county) now Pender county, Sept. 22nd, 1828 and died May 22nd, 1903. Truly we as a Church and community have lost a true faithful brother and friend. Mr. Colvin was a man of sterling integrity, possessing all the acquirements that go to make up a noble Christian gentleman. He was a member of Moore's Creek Presbyterian Church, now Caswell, for more than fifty years and was elected elder about the year 1860. He was a man that ruled well as an elder, and was intelligent and consistent in all his dealings with his Church. As a husband and father he was tender and affectionate and always helpful. As a neighbor he was sociable and kind and was always ready to help those who were in distress from whatever cause, being moved to action by the very spirit of God. Surely it can be said he was a man of prayer.

During his last illness he was patient and resigned to God's will believing that all things would work together for his good, his faith bright and his stay secure, and we abide in full hope that we shall meet him in a better land where there shall be no more death neither sorrow nor crying. Now be it resolved,

1. That while we feel keenly our loss in his death, we bow in humble submission to God's will, knowing He doeth all things well.

2. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Standard for publication, a copy to the bereaved family and be recorded in the Record Book of our Church.

JUNKIN.—Hampden Dubose Junkin, infant son of Rev. W. F., and Nettie Dubose Junkin and grandson of Dr. and Mrs. H. C. Dubose was translated from the Church on earth to that in heaven on June 10th, '03. After only a short illness this precious and beautiful little one was taken by the Master; the parents' arms and home are left desolate; he was their only child. Yet even in the depths of their grief the Lord upheld and comforted them. The little one's short life of 14 months must have been a merry, bright one . . . now it will be for him an eternity of glory.

D. P. Junkin.

Huntsville, Tex., 7-25-03.

PRESNELL.—Fell asleep at Morganton, N. C. on Friday morning, July 3, 1903, Julia, the youngest child of Mr.

and Mrs. R. K. Presnell. Julia was fifteen years old last April. A few days before her death she was operated upon for appendicitis, and all that medical skill and loving attention could do was done for her. Earnest prayers of faithful and loving hearts ascended to heaven for her recovery. But the Master had use for her. A flower too pure for earth was transplanted to a holier atmosphere to bloom in all its fulness in the light of God's own presence.

She was a constant source of enjoyment to parents, sisters, brother and friends; loving all and loved by all.

Though only fifteen, she had for two years been a devoted member of the Presbyterian church. Born a child of the covenant, she gave to the world visible evidence of the blessed influence of a Christian home, and pious parents. The influence of her devotion and piety can only be known in the last day when all things are made plain.

She was Treasurer of the Juvenile Missionary society to which she was devotedly attached, and in the last moments of her life here, spoke of her love for it.

To see her and to be with her in her last moments was to rob death of its sting; to be assured again that the grave is no longer victorious. It gave one a new conception of the passing of a spirit. The veil of mystery separating us from the great unseen seemed to be drawn aside, and, to us who saw her, there must ever be a brighter outlook and clearer conception of the mysteries of God. Not now can we understand why her presence was needed in heaven, but some time we'll know. Now we can but bow in humble submission to the will of a Father, who darkens a home, and yet gives the assurance that "I am with you always;" a Father who is ever loving and tender and kind.

He has a purpose in it all. We can only thank Him for lending her to earth that we might be brightened and cheered for a time.

Pastor.

PARHAM.—Benjamin Ernest, son of Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Parham "entered into rest" Thursday, July 23, 1903, aged 19 months.

After 14 weeks of intense suffering. Little Ernest has been taken home to be with the Saviour, who has said that "he will carry the lambs in his bosom," and to join the little brother gone on before. It was hard to see him suffer so much and so long, and while we cannot understand it all, yet we know that God "doeth all things well." We know, too, that he is now at rest where there will be no pain or suffering or death.

Our hearts go out in loving sympathy to the bereaved parents. May the loving Heavenly Father comfort them and prepare them to meet their dear ones, "where God shall wipe all tears away."

"There is many a weary, footsore lamb
That our tender arms enfold;

But forever at rest

On the Shepherd's breast
Is our wee white lamb in the fold.

There are many evils lurking without,
There are dangers of which we are told;

But safe from all harm,
And free from alarm,
Is our wee white lamb in the fold.

O hearts that are mourning a little one gone,

That are longing its face to behold,
Thank God for the care

That protects them there,—
The wee white lambs in the fold."

Fruit Salads.

Nearly all kinds of fruits are used for salads, and it is not unusual to mix several. There is an infinite variety of ways in which the condiments may be changed, and in garnishing and service there is an excellent opportunity for the display of artistic ideas.

For dressing fruit salads one may use a mayonnaise. Of course, mustard and all sharp condiments are omitted, but other savory ingredients are added. For instance, in making a cherry salad, the cherries are carefully stoned and the cavities filled with hazel nuts. A mayonnaise is made in the usual manner, with the yolk of an egg, half a teaspoonful of salt, half a pint of olive oil and three tablespoonfuls of lemon juice. With the lemon juice are mixed four tablespoonfuls of currant juice, from ripe currants. This gives the mayonnaise a piquant flavor and a dainty pink color. This pink dressing is served on bananas, peaches and ripe pears and makes an artistic dish, the fruit heaped and surrounded with pale-green lettuce leaves, and over all the pink dressing.

Again, a cupful of stiffly whipped cream is added to the mayonnaise just before serving. This gives a white mayonnaise that is served with all kinds of fruit. If one wishes to have the mayonnaise a trifle stiff, so that will stand in little snowy peaks on the roddy fruits, a trifle of gelatine may be added. A teaspoonful of granulated gelatine, soaked in a tablespoonful of cold water, then melted over hot water, will be sufficient for half a pint of mayonnaise. Lettuce, celery or some other green salad plant is always served with the fruit. The fruit may be served in a border of the green plant, or it may be mixed with shredded celery or lettuce, or intermingled with little blanched lettuce hearts. Sometimes a spoonful of the fruit, mixed with the dressing, is served in a cup-shaped leaf of Boston lettuce. When the lettuce leaves are not of good form shred them and arrange in small nest-like forms, in the hollow centres of which drop a spoonful of the prepared salad.

Perhaps the prettiest method is to make little salad baskets. Crisp lettuce leaves are fastened in the shape of little baskets with nasturtium or cress stems. Two stems curved form the handle, and nasturtium blossoms are introduced here and there. Before serving place each basket on an individual plate with a lace-paper doily underneath and fill with the salad.

Grapes make a delicious salad. Skin a pint of large white grapes, mix with half a pint of shredded lettuce or celery and half a pint of mayonnaise. Serve in little paper cases or on lettuce leaves. A beautiful salad of grapes, bananas and walnut meats cut fine, covered with mayonnaise, may be served, at a luncheon, in banana skins. The bananas are cut in halves lengthwise, the pulp carefully removed, cut small and mixed with the other ingredients. The salad is then heaped in the skins, little curled lettuce leaves tucked here and there and the skins arranged on a pretty plate with garnish of nasturtium blossoms.

Apples and grapes go well together, and this salad is prettily served in the little apple cups made by cutting out the interior part of red apples, leaving only a thin wall of the skin. Orange rinds serve the same purpose.

Many fruits are served with a simple dressing; and the following is especially good. Put a tablespoonful of lemon juice in a bowl, add a teaspoonful of olive oil, then another tablespoonful of lemon juice, and so on until three tablespoonfuls of oil and five of lemon juice have been used. Sometimes a sprig of mint is chopped and added to the dressing. This is desirable with an apple, orange or grape salad. For a cantelope salad a tiny pinch of cinnamon is used. This salad is served in its shell, cut in the shape of a basket; either one large melon is used or a small one for each service. The edible part is removed, cut in cubes, then mixed with the dressing and returned to the shell.

Ripe figs peeled and quartered are excellent with the simpler form of salad dressing. Blanched and shredded almonds are frequently mixed with the figs.

Peaches are cut in quarters, then in cubes, mixed with a cream mayonnaise and served on lettuce leaves.

Celery jelly is an agreeable addition to the fruit salad. Cut up the outer green stalks of celery; to a cupful use one pint of water and a heaping teaspoonful of salt. Let simmer until soft, add one-fourth of a box of gelatine that has soaked half an hour in half a cupful of cold water, run through a jelly bag and mould in a ring mould. When hard turn out on a bed of crisp lettuce leaves and fill the hollow centre with a fruit mayonnaise.

Two oranges, two bananas and two apples, peeled, cut small and mixed with half a point of mayonnaise and a cupful of shredded lettuce is delicious served with the celery jelly. Sometimes the jelly is moulded in layers with peeled grapes, quarters of peaches or large ripe strawberries. When unmoulded it is surrounded with lettuce hearts and an iced cream mayonnaise.—The Delineator.

A North Carolina negro called at the preacher's residence the other night and asked:

"Bout how much will you charge me to marry me, s sur?"

"Well," said the preacher, "I usually get $5.00."

"Lor Boss!" exclaimed the negro, "I ain't gwine ter marry but one woman!"

"The Least of These"

By Clara E. Laughlin.

The Casey live in the Ghetto. It seems to be the duty of all self-respecting Irish to live either in the Ghetto or as near it as possible, for a perennial feud exist between the meek but grasping Hebrew and the fiery but generous son of "the ould sod." To live apart from your hereditary enemies may be discreet, but it is not valorous,—and the Irish are valorous, beginning at an incredibly early age.

But the Caseys, though they lived in the Ghetto, are partiotic,—so true to the green, indeed, that if any Casey inadvertently left his shoes on the floor over night, they would be found in the morning,—if they were found at all,—covered with a beautiful, pea-green mould. This might be inconvenient for other families, but it does not seriously discommode the Caseys who are not given to leaving things on the floor over night for the simple reason that they are not given to taking things off overnight,—not many things, at any rate.

They know it is damp in their back cellar where, after a spell of wet weather, the moisture stands in beads upon their walls. But what will you? Isn't it the cellar of a brick house? And isn't it far, far better to live in the back-most, lower-most cellar of a brick house than in the second floor front of a plebeian frame "shanty?" Caste is inexorable in the slums, for when one has'n't much that is material to maintain, one must be doubly rigorous to maintain one's dignity.

Mr. Casey is a stone-cutter by trade, but he suffers grievous things from what the slum-people charitably call "the failing," and he has a little way that may be called a habit, of mistaking the heads of Mrs. Casey and the young Caseys for stone-curbings.

It is always a relief, then, when the warm spring days roll 'round and Mr. Casey leaves home some morning, quite as usual, and does not re-appear that night, or the next, or the next, and the Caseys draw a deep breath of security, for they know they will not see him again until the frost gets too nippy, fall nights, for comfortable sleeping out of doors.

As Mr. Casey, even during the months that he is at home, contributes little but excitement to the family lot, one would think Mrs. Casey would try, during his regular absences, to disappear from his ken. But you have never heard Mr. Casey discourse, with tears in his eyes, of his "failin'" and the valiant battle he claims to wage against it; nor have you, perchance, Mrs. Casey's largeness of charity. You would, perhaps, regard Mr. Casey as a "hardened reprobate;" Mrs. Casey, in the teeth of her wrongs, can never regard him without hope. In fact, hope is one of the finest flowers of the slums; it grows, other places, but it flourishes there. Few people are satisfied; most of us must hope something, or lack the courage to live. But most of us hope but fretfully, impatiently, compared with the way they hope in the slums, where a whole family of helpless creatures can regard their prospects with brightness on account of a twelve-year-old who, in two years, will be able to earn, perhaps three dollars a week.

In much hope, therefore, and no small means the Caseys live,—thanks to the charity of sundry persons. Mickey, aged sixteen but very stunted (for he went to work when he was eleven, before the child-labor law was so vigilantly enforced) is employed in a bakery, and sometimes stale and unsaleable bread and cakes find their way to the Casey's kitchen table where they are dumped in a heap there to be sorted over and selected from, according to individual tastes,—the most toothsome, first, the least sweet last of all,—until the pile is dissipated to the last crumb.

Sometimes Johnnie, who is ten, rides all day on a peddler's wagon,—partly for company, partly to help,—and comes home at night with a donation of damaged apples or a peck measure of "soft" tomatoes. Again, it is the lady for whom Mrs. Caseys scrubs, who bestows on the Caseys an assortment of soiled neck ribbons, under waists without buttons, stockings without feet, or knees, and cracked patent leather shoes,—all of which get distributed among the Caseys, not according to "fit," but according to the urgency of the claims entered for them.

Once, when the Casey fortunes were at particularly low ebb, a lady-visitor from a far-away church came to the Caseys' neighborhood donating staple groceries in two-pound packages, and Mrs. Casey was made the bewildered recipient of two pounds of starch.

Mickey earns four dollars a week, tending the ovens at the bakery, and Angela Ann earns three-and-a-half, pasting labels on a patent medicine. But the rent of the four rooms in the back cellar is seven dollars a month, so you can see that there must be times when, if the Caseys did not have hope in abundance, they would be what might be called pretty poor.

They might even have been forgiven, one thinks, if they had not manifested much joy over the advent of Patrick, the thirteenth child. Two of Patrick's brothers lay in an unmarked grave in Canada, and three other young Caseys, a boy and two girls, slept in one grave on the poor corner of Calvary. But although Patrick positively threatened the bread of the living seven, they gave him a jubilant welcome. When he was little more than a day old he was taken to the church for baptism. He wore an elaborate christening robe trimmed with crochet lace six inches deep (an affluent cousin had lent the robe) and a bonnet which had distinguished the christening of all the Caseys; it is made of grass-green paper satin, shirred on a stiff wire frame, and Patrick's infinitesimal red face screwing and unscrewing itself behind the green frills, was a commentary on the early age at which we begin to be sacrificed to fashion.

Poor Patrick was sacrificed indeed, for the christening baked meats (contributed by his good parents) had scarce been consumed, when Patrick was smitten with "ammonia on the lungs,"—a disease which represented the top notch of fashion in the Ghetto until the rage for appendicitis extended even there; you are nobody, now, in the Ghetto, if you don't at least know somebody who has had appendicitis.

After only four weeks of life, little Patsy put off mortality and slipped away to where babies are welcomest, leaving woe upon woe in the house of his kindred.

Mrs. Casey wailed that Patrick was the smartest child she'd had and would have been a "scholar" had he lived. Mrs. Casey can neither read nor write, but she sets immense store by "learning."

Mr. Casey, who can both read and write, opined, as he wiped away a maudlin tear, that perhaps it was just as well that Patrick had died, if he was so smart, for heaven knows it's most apt to be the smart ones that suffer worse from "the failin'." In no other way can Mr. Casey account for his own liability. Almost the worst of the tragedy of Patrick's death, however, was the question of Patrick's funeral.

"Oi've nivir been wan to make mooch complaint about me poverty," said Mrs. Casey, wiping her eyes with a corner of her checked gingham apron, "but it do go agin me to have child o' mine buried b' th' county. I don't be mindin' coal off the county, come a hard winter, ner a bit vitals whin the children bes hungry, but I nivir thought whin I married wid you, Michael Casey, and you earnin' eighteen dollars a wake at yer thrade, that I'd see the day a child o' your'n an mine 'd be denied a Christian buryin'."

That a child of hers should sleep in the poor corner of Calvary was not especially a trial to Mrs. Casey. A grave's a grave, if it's in consecrated ground, and one's as good as another, or nearly so. It's the funeral that counts!

For you must know that in the slums nothing is so sure a test of a family's pretensions as the funerals it affords. It's more than a custom in the slums,—it's an article of faith,—to attend the dramatic, mysterious exit the meanest of us make, willy nilly, from life, with all possible pomp and ceremony. You see, life in the slums is not radically different from life outside the slums, in that it tends to become monotonous, and excitement is as welcome in the Ghetto as on the Lake Shore Drive. The desire to occupy the center of the stage is pretty universally implanted in the human heart. If you can hold the stage center, momentarily, by writing a remarkable book, or building a unique or costly house or purchasing an historic gem or giving an extraordinarily lavish entertainment, you probably afford yourself the pleasure of so doing. If, however, you live in the slums, the most enviable position in which you can possibly find yourself is the position in which you prepare to dazzle all beholders (and there are a great many!) with the extent of your abilities in the matter of a funeral.

To be quietly married at a justice shop as a lasting disgrace, but to be quietly buried from an undertaker's shop would entail an obloquy from which your poor family could never hope to free itself and rise again.

Therefore, it was sad to see Patrick lie, but it was agony to know that there was no likelihood of his having a funeral.

The christening robe was re-lent for the lying-in-state (with strict stipulations that it must be returned before the burying), and wee Patrick lay on a bier improvised of two wooden kitchen chairs, candles burning at his head and feet, and the littlest Caseys and a number of their small neighbors standing, with wonder and awe in their sober faces, about the Mystery.

Michael Casey reported their plight at the Parish House, and presently one of the priests came over, carrying a tiny white coffin in which he helped to lay the little creature whose fight for life had been valorous but brief. He was Irish, was the big priest, and not all his years of Jesuit training had eliminated from his makeup the County Kerry peasant boy, and he understood the anguish of the Caseys perfectly.

"I'll see what I can do," he said, and hid him to another house of mourning, a mile distant, where an only son lay dead in the home of one of the Nineteenth ward's most powerful politicians.

With a touch of Irish sympathy the priest drew the picture of the Casey's predicament, and with the quick response of Irish sympathy the parents of the young man consented to the priest's proposition that Patrick share in the funeral of their son.

When she heard what a grand fate was to be Patrick's, Mrs. Casey gathered together twenty-five cents and made an excursion to a drug store on Blue Island Avenue where she spent the considerable sum on a package of blackdye. And into a washtub, on her return home, went the dye and everything belonging to the Caseys that could by any stretch of courtesy or the imagination be called garment. All night the Casey kitchen hung full of coats and capes and skirts and pinafores, dripping, dripping, dripping, while in the "front room" (always so called whether it is in front or not) Mr. Casey forgot to wrestle with "the failing" while he dispensed quantities of liquid refreshments which Patrick's godparents (who kept a saloon) had contributed for the occasion.

Surprise, wonder, envy, admiration, all stared from the countenances of McHenry Street next morning when the Caseys started the solemn march to the church, Mr. Casey carrying Patrick's wee white coffin in his arms.

It had been many a day since there had been even in the big Jesuit church, with its parish of fifteen thousand souls, so imposing a funeral as that of the politician's son. The whole great altar was alight, for the requiem high mass, and heaps and heaps of harps and pillows and broken columns and crosses and wreathes and crowns lay about the two altars, while high-priced song filled the air and scores of carriages blocked the street outside. Far toward the front of the church and bursting with pride they felt no necessity of concealing, sat the nine Caseys, every one in sable from top to toe. It is hard to be really downcast when your lot is cast in such high places.

After the mass was over, the coffin of Patsy was reverently lifted into the hearse, close to the foot of the young man's, and wee Patsy was on the way to his last resting-place.

The politician had tendered a carriage "for the baby's parents," and very gratefully, not to say gleefully, the nine Caseys packed themselves in, and took turns, all the way to the cemetery, craning their heads out of the either window to gloat upon the length of the carriage line before and after them.

"Nineteen, twinty, twinty-wan," cried Mollie Casey, pointing with a grim finger as she counted the carriages ahead.

"And us is twinty-two, an' there's as minny more behint us," added M. Casey, clutching Mollie's skirts to keep her from going headlong out of the window, "Oi' me sure it's proud we all ought to be, whin we think o' the lingsht o' poor little Patsy's funeral."

And thus it came to pass that, though he had lived but four weeks the mourning for Patsy Casey was quite wide-spread in McHenry Street.—The Interior.

In Aunt Althea's Garden.

Celia and Winnie Hawthorne were spending part of the summer holidays with their Annt, Mrs. Forrest. This hot July morning found them seated on a rustic bench beneath a cluster of syringa's while Mrs. Forrest was busy amid her beloved flower-beds. Tall, straight and keen-eyed, equipped with broad hat and garden trowel she reminded the looker-on very forcibly of the famous Betsy Trotwood. As the three talked while they discoursed of flowers, Mrs. Forrest sat down beside some of her pots, took off her glasses and jabbed the earth with her trowel; when the chat wandered to books she straightway laid down the implement, found and replaced her glasses and then was ready to see her way into the new subject.

"Annt Althea" quoth Celia, "what do you think of 'Denominational gardens, anyway?'" "O, cried Winnie, "do you mean the kind that nice old woman had in 'Lovey Mary' where each flower had its own bed and stood for a different church; the lilies for the Episcopalians, and the Dahlias for Presbyterians and so on. Wasn't it a funny idea?"

They looked round at Aunt Althea whose silence was owing to the fact that she had but just succeeded in finding and replacing her glasses which she had hidden in a bush of boxwood.

"I don't think anything of it at all," she began in a rather dogmatic tone, "it is a very pretty idea now, mind you, but, girls, its not the least in the world correct. In the first place I seriously object to Presbyterians being compared to dahlias, stiff, prond, late-blooming things with no perfume, not a living thing but their finery to recommend them; always strung off to themselves in a prim row against a fence. Its no compliment, let me tell you, to compare anybody to them.

"But besides that, Celia," hanging her spectacles to a convenient Marshal Neil rosebush, and sliding down, trowel in hand to prod around some young pansy plants, "its not according to the facts. I might pass for a dahlia myself with my stiff makeup, and uncomprising ways, but how about your mother with her gentleness, and love of beauty and sweetness? Isn't she more like the rose, the dear old flower she's named for. Then there is Susan Harding, so like a violet, and Constance Fair, a shining lily; and George Payne and your Uncle Forrest, like grand Azaleas."

The two girls laughed at Aunt Althea's comparison, emphasized with a flourish of the trowel.

"It won't do," she went on quite engrossed with her subject. "If I were going to plant a Presbyterian bed, or any other church flowerbed, I should need every flower in this garden and many more to represent all kinds of Christians in just the people I know."

"It's true," cried Winnie, clapping her hands, "Anntie, lets play like we were setting out a bed now. The saints, they would be the lilies, wouldn't they?"

"Yes," said Aunt Althea soberly. "We should need just a few bulbs of them, but I guess you know Winnie that we mostly just cultivate roots of them here, and they only bloom and come to perfection after they're been transplanted. Yet in the center of our bed we can safely put a sheaf or two of lilies. Next come the roses, of all shades and varieties, to stand for the living, growing, working Christians and then"—

"Violets, Anntie?"

"Yes, plenty of all kinds, violets and pansies, and roses, all sweet and lovely, but too modest and low to the ground to be easily seen."

"Poppies, Aunt Thea?" suggested Celia slyly.

"Hum, yes, strew them about broadcast for the worldly Christians springing up everywhere pretty but good for little else. Then there's the honeysuckle Christian, scrambling everywhere and crowding out everything else: just like that periwinkle, fine useful plant it is, too; takes root and thrives where little else will, holding up its true blue flowers; but let it have its way, and it will choke even the tall shrubs to death, and over run every corner of this garden. There are lots of Christians whose religion is of the same gad-about kind.

And the morning glories Annt Thea, don't they remind you of Bro. Foster at a revival meeting?"

"Just so," nodded Anntie, "gushing people, throwing their arms around folks, clasping hands, loving everybody, and making a to do all the time. Yes there's just such Christians, as an offset to the dahlia's such as your old Anntie. Then there are the sunflowers, there's many a sunflower Christian, ungainly and clumsy disciples. You look at the flower and think it neither beautiful nor fragrant, not in most ways what you wish a flower to be. But it has one peculiarity, its face is always towards the sun, and so when people wonder about this or that person or a member of this or that communion whether he is really a Christian, why the sunflower gives as the answer after all. Is his face toward Jesus, is that the Sun in His firmament? If so then his Christian life maybe not the highest, it is real. Then, there are the drooping Christians like this "weeping widow," and like the "weeping willow," who go mourning all their days; and there are the cactus Christians and many more, but I guess our bed is full.

"What about a hedge around our garden, Aunt Thea?" pnt in Celia.

"I can't say I love them," answered Mrs. Forrest, "but yes they are necessary. In the first place it shews the garden really belongs to somebody exclusively and thus only can be protect it from all forms of danger. After all it doesn't really shut out any one who really wishes to enter, for there is a door, a way into our garden.

"However" said Mrs. Forrest, rising. "what I like best of all to think about is that it's all one garden. It's better laid off in beds, for many reasons, but it's all one garden, and of all its many flowers, each has its excellencies to the owner. Your dear mamma comes in here and says "Althea how can you bear that horrid stramonium?" Or my good neighbor, Moses Klutz, who always reminds me of an ear of corn he is so good, solid and matter of fact says 'Miss Forrest, why should you have all dese thorn-bushes?' meaning my roses; 'I would cut them down, and plant the apple and the peach.' Bnt I don't answer them, I only smile and shake my head and keep my flowers. Each has its beauty to him who knows and loves it. And that's the way with the Lord. It is said in the Psalms, He knoweth them that are His, not only their faults and failings, they are generally plain enough but the beauties too. There is that clump of primroses—what withered shabby looking things they are, bnt if I stand there at sunset they burst into gilded bloom, and it reminds me of the Christian whose last days are his best days."

"I have heard about the night blooming cereus," said Celia, thoughtfully. "It blooms but once, and in the night."

"Yes," said Aunt Althea, "yon may look on it as the believer in the night of sorrow or loneliness, or more beautiful a thought still, the moment when he is clothed with immortality."

Then she began to sing an old hymn beginning,

"The Lord into His garden comes, the spices yield a rich perfume,
The lilies grow and thrive."

The sisters listened and watched the skillful hands at work; training, cultivating, trimming.

At last Winnie said, "Do you plants often disappoint you, Auntie?"

"Sometimes, bnt usually through my own mistakes or neglect, Winnie, as well as through unfavorable conditions. In our other garden you remember it is very different—the owner of that will never fail us in any way, and can make 'all things work together for good to them that love God.'" dykes several yards above the surrounding country and sedate looking horses drawing old-fashioned wagons, and brisk looking dogs drawing clattering milkcarts with their cargo of burnished cans; with innumerable rows of willow trees, the twigs of which the people use to make the covering of the dykes, and the wood of which they use to make their heavy, pointed shoes, or sabots; with picturesque houses roofed with red tiles, and broad-built peasants working in the field, wearing those same wooden sabots, and clean looking market women trudging into the towns in their exceedingly picturesque head-dress of gold helmets covered with lace caps; with stiff, symmetrical gardens and trees clipped into fantastic shapes; with quaint old church steeples and gilded weather-cocks; and ever and anon a weather-beaten windmill swinging its great arms between us and the low horizon. This was Holland, beyond a doubt.

An interesting indication of the important part played by the dykes in the development of Holland is the number of towns which have been named from the dyke or dam originally built on a site, such as Rotterdam, Schiedam, Amsterdam, and so on. The first important place we passed was Rotterdam, the most active seaport of Holland, with a population of 320,000, and from the high railway bridge on which we crossed the Maas we had a good view of the boom-pies, as they call the magnificent quays which, with their graceful fringe of trees and their tangled forest of shipping, line the banks of the river for a mile and a half. We caught a glimpse also of the bronze statue of Erasmus, the Dutch scholar, who, as some say, "laid the egg which Luther hatched." On a former visit to Rotterdam I had seen the birth-place of this illustrious man, bearing on its front the inscription, Haec est parva domus, magnus qua natus Erasmus (this is the little house in which great Erasmus was born).

Leaving Rotterdam, we pass on our left Delftshaven, from which a party of the Pilgrim Fathers sailed to America in 1620; then Schiedam, noted for its "schnapps," of which there are more than two hundred distilleries; then Delft, where William the Silent, the immortal founder of Dutch independence, was assassinated by a Jesuit whom the Roman Catholic persecutors of the Netherlands had hired to rid them of their great foe, but which, I fear, is better known to some of my readers as the place where a certain blue-glazed earthenware used to be made in imitation of Chinese porcelain; and then, fifteen miles from Rotterdam, The Hague, one of the handsomest towns in Holland, with the Royal Palace, and in a lovely park outside the city the royal villa called The House in the Wood, and two miles away on the sea the fashionable watering place of Schevening-En, and in the city itself scrupulously clean and bright houses on every hand, where its 200,000 people live, and above all the picture gallery, with its two world-renowned paintings by Rembrandt and Potter, to say nothing of others scarcely inferior, if at all so, such as Vermeer's "View of Delft," with its red and blue roofs partly lit up with yellow sunlight, a simple view of which "is perhaps unmatched by any other landscape in the world for the truthfulness of its atmospheric and light effects and for the vigor and brilliance of its coloring." Paul Potter's "Young Bull" is a marvellous picture, but the one which demands and repays the longest study is Rembrandt's "School of Anatomy," which shows us the celebrated Nicolas Tulp, in black coat, lace collar and broad-brimmed soft hat, explaining the anatomy of the arm of a corpse to a body of surgeons who listen to the lecture with the most life-like expressions, and which has been happily characterized as the truest and most life-like representation of the "working of intellect" ever produced.

As we had reminded ourselves when visiting the royal residence that the young and beloved Queen Wilhelmina is the only Presbyterian Queen in the world, so we reminded ourselves when visiting the Chambers of the States General that Holland is the only country in the world which has the good fortune to have a Presbyterian preacher for its Prime minister. Of course, other countries have Presbyterian laymen for prime ministers, Mr. Balfour, of Great Britain, for example, but Holland is the only one that has placed the helm of the State in the hands of a preacher. His name is the Rev. Dr. Abraham Kuyper, and he is one of the ablest and most versatile men in the world. His recent book on The Holy Spirit is the greatest monograph on that subject that has appeared since the work of John Owen. He has rendered a great service to the cause of vital religion in checking the rationalistic views of such men as Prof. Kuenen, and strongly reasserting the evangelical doctrines to which Holland has been so deeply indebted in the past for the heroic character of her people, and the glorious position she holds in the history of human freedom. Though the Chambers were not in session when we visited the Binnehof, we took special pleasure in having even the chair of Dr. Kuyper pointed out to us.

By the way, the cathedrals and other great churches of Holland erected before the Reformation strikingly illustrate how unfit such structures are for Christian worship according to the simple, New Testament model, and especially for preaching the gospel. They are adapted only to the spectacular ceremonies of "the papists and their apists." Therefore, any Protestant community which has had the misfortune to inherit a cathedral from the unreformed period has an elephant on its hands. The Dutch people, being mostly Presbyterians, have had this experience, and, finding themselves unable to make the most effective use of these great buildings erected for Romish rites, have allowed them to assume a very unattractive, dreary, and barn-like appearance on the inside.

The question may shock our aesthetic friends, but, notwithstanding the incalculable loss to art, would it not have been better for the world if the Protestant countries at the time of the Reformation had macadamized all their cathedrals? And if any one hesitates to answer in the affirmative, let him consider carefully the connection between the modes of worship and the character of the worshipper, and let him explain to him clearly why it is that the countries which have adopted the Protestant model, with its steady appeal to the reason, and its earnest insistence upon intelligent apprehension of the truth, are the cleanest, safest, thriftiest and strongest countries in the world, while those which have adopted the Romish model, with its constant appeal to the aesthetic sensibilities, and its millinery, music, processions, incense, and "vain repetitions," are precisely the countries which have suffered the greatest material and moral deterioration, and which were not long ago contemptuously characterized by Lord Salisbury, the late Premier of Great Britain, as "decaying nations."

The Origin of the Loving Cup.

The loving cup is very common nowadays, and we see it everywhere. But many years ago there were no such things as these queer three-handled affairs, and the following story tells how they first happened to be made:

"Once upon a time, centuries before us, there lived a great and powerful king who was extremely fond of hunting. He was one day in a forest pursuing a stag, but it was so fleet and clever that it eluded him and his band of followers, and led them entirely out of the way. After wandering about in a hopeless fashion they finally came upon a little hut, and the king himself dismounted and rapped smartly upon the door.

"A young girl answered his knock and, soon showed the men the right path. The king was about to go, when he saw a well near the house, and at the sight of the clear water immediately felt thirsty, and, going back, asked the girl for a drink. Without hesitation she went into the house and came out with an earthen jug filled with the well water. But instead of offering his royal majesty the handle, as most people would do, she held that herself, and handed him the cup the wrong way.

"The king said nothing, thanked the girl, and he and his band soon found their way out of the wood. But when he reached his palace he determined to reward the girl for giving him the water and at the same time to teach her a lesson in politeness. Sending to his jeweler, he bade him make a silver cup with two handles, and deliver it to the young girl, without a word as to whence it came.

"Perhaps a month after this the king hunted in the same forest, sought the hut and asked the girl for another drink of water. This time she entered the house and came out with a beautiful silver cup, full of the sparkling water. 'Now,' thought the king, 'she has certainly learned a lesson.' But never was he more mistaken, for the poor, ignorant girl took a handle in each hand, and for the second time offered her liege lord nothing save the side of the cup.

"The king rode away deeply perplexed. He resolved to teach the girl the polite way to hand a cup without directly rebuking her, and many were the hours he spent in cudgeling his brains for some way in which to do it. At last a bright idea struck him, and he sent for his jeweler a second time. 'Make me,' said he to the man, 'a silver cup, heavily chased, and with my royal crest, and put three handles on it.' The jeweler much surprised—for, remember, no such thing had ever been heard of up to this time—did as he was told, and soon the mug was finished. As before, the king had it sent privately to the girl who lived in the little hut.

"One day not long after this for the third time he rode into that forest, and, taking the now well-known path, soon reached the cottage. Dismounting, he knocked at the door and asked humbly for a drink of clear water. The girl immediately came out with the beautiful three-handled cup, and taking two of the handles in her hands, she offered him the third. So the king rode away well pleased with his strategy, and reaching home, ordered three-handled cups to be made in every sort of ware, and they became so popular that we now have them in all our shops and stores."—The Christian Work and Evangelist.

Aunt Lucretia said that Peggy might go with James Albert. Peggy hurriedly wiped the dishes and then ran for her hat, while James Albert started to put the pumpkin into his go-cart. James Albert was waiting for her at the end of the lane when she went out. The pumpkin in the go-cart was covered with a piece of rubber blanket.

"What have you got that on it for?" demanded Peggy.

James Albert colored, and looked up at one little dark cloud in the sky. "It might rain," he said. "Anyway, we don't want everybody to know what we are carrying to the minister's."

They stopped to rest on the bridge just before they reached the minister's, and a heavy wagon came along and shook the bridge and the go-cart so that the piece of rubber blanket fell off the pumpkin.

"Why, James Albert, it's your crooked pumpkin!" cried his sister. "How could you make such a mistake? We must go back!"

The boy looked at Peggy and there was in his suddenly reddened face the strangest expression she had ever seen there. It was a guilty look. James Albert had always been a pretty good boy. He had certainly never been deceitful or dishonest.

He put the cover over the pumpkin and pushed the go cart on again. He turned his guilty face back towards Peggy, who leaned motionless against the bridge railing. "You have to do things for your country," he said, in a voice so gruff and hoarse that it scarcely sounded like James Albert's.

"You don't have to do mean and deceitful and wicked things for any thing!" cried Peggy. "I shan't go with you any way!"

"You needn't. You don't know anything about patriotism; you're only a girl" said James Albert crushingly as he pushed the go-cart on. "A crooked pumpkin is just as good to make pies of anyway; but you can't—can't serve your country with it" he added.

James Albert would have liked to convince Peggy that he was right; he thought a good deal of her opinion although he was only a girl and would not be ten until next spring. But he went resolutely on to the minister's with his crooked pumpkin instead of the one that Aunt Lucretia had told him to carry.

Peggy turned and walked homeward with her thinking cap on. Just before Grandpa went away to Cherryfield she had heard him read something to James Albert out of a newspaper and explain carefully what it meant. "Serve your country with clean hands" that was what Grandpa had read. It meant Grandpa had said that a man who served his country should never never do anything mean or dishonorable. Peggy climbed upon the old secretary in Grandpa's room and looked through a pile of Worlds to find the article. She cut out that one line when she found it and went and pasted it right across the face of the little Waterbury clock on James Albert's bureau where he couldn't help seeing it.

James Albert wouldn't speak to her all that day or the next. But then he scarcely spoke to any one. Aunt Lucretia said he must have a dose of rhubarb if he didn't feel better by another day. After school the next afternoon Peggy saw him going towards the minister's again with something in the go-cart covered with the piece of rubber blanket. James Albert would be pretty sure to be sorry and do right without that line upon his clock! thought Peggy.

She ran to meet him and she wanted to put her arms around his neck but James Albert didn't like to have her do that.

"I asked Uncle Enoch and you can take the big drum" said Peggy wise enough not to mention pumpkins. James Albert's face brightened a little; he had not dared to ask for the drum. Uncle Enoch would do almost anything for Peggy.

"And a mean little pumpkin for a Jack-o'-lantern! I think now that my crooked one would have been nice and funny, but it's made into pies," said James Albert, dismally. He had been good, but he wasn't happy yet.

Grandpa came home the next day.

Aunt Lucretia read a note from the minister's wife at the supper table. "She thanks me for the big pumpkin. What does she mean about my sending her a crooked one too?" said Aunt Lucretia in a puzzled tone. "She said it made the nicest pies she ever tasted; she thinks crooked pumpkins must be the best, like crooked pears."

James Albert laid down his gingerbread and told the whole story. He was very manly. He made no excuses for himself—but Peggy put in these! Aunt Lucretia was disposed to be severe. She said she didn't know what he didn't deserve. But Grandpa interposed, gently:

"He been sorry and done all he could to repair the wrong, Lucretia; no more is asked of us older and wiser ones," he said. "I wish I had written to you, James Albert, that it was Billy Atkins, down at Cherryfield, whose pumpkin won the prize and I had bought it of him for a Jack-o'-lantern for your procession."

James Albert turned red and then white and rushed away from the table. Peggy found him face down upon the hayloft and tried to comfort him.

"You were sorry and carried the right pumpkin, so you will serve your country with clean hands! And Grandpa says the prize pumpkin is a whacker!" she said.

James Albert sat up and a gleam of brightness appeared upon his dejected face.

"But—but a fellow wishes he hadn't done the mean thing," he said. "A soldier," Grandpa says, 'obeys orders whether he likes them or not and never does a mean thing!' It makes you feel small to do mean things—and I'd rather be big inside than to have a big Jack-o'-lantern!"—The Congregationalist.

but don't," and the latter class is largely responsible for many a nervous break down in the other. A mania for being in evidence possesses most women. They are self-induced cases of nervous prostration. The woman who "lives always at the top of her voice" will be prematurely silenced, or worse still, become discordant, "jangled, out of tune." In religious work, pre-eminently, there must be something radically wrong when a good woman is too busy and too tired to be happy herself or cheering to others. The overworked woman, however, commands our respect as does not her incumbents of Christian drones, though she may be wrong in assuming undue burdens. "As thy day thy strength shall be," runs the promise, and not "As ten woman's day thy strength shall be." But there is a much larger class to which most of us, if we are quite honest, will acknowledge that we belong, the class of "the woman who can but won't." She puts the heavy burden on her sister's shoulders and keeps it there, adding the weight of her own resigned uselessness or cultivated helplessness. A woman recently asked, in vain, twenty-one other women to help her in a certain missionary meeting, and after that remarkable experience said that she felt she would never again refuse doing anything for anybody. Here are women bound together, by love to a common Saviour, to work for His kingdom. They acknowledge the obligation of membership and gift of money, but withhold that gift of voice, time, talent, tact, personality and co-operation, so often elsewhere lavished. Gifts differ. Not all can do the same thing well; not all can speak eloquently or pray fervently in public. There is no one who cannot live eloquently her prayers. There are those who "with their lives express the holy gospel they profess."

There are women who never seek or embrace any opportunity to aid in their individual societies. "The woman who can but won't" is often critical and deplores the triteness and inadequacy of missionary meetings. The sanctified touch of her gift of criticism, having begun its work in her own heart, may be the very tonic needed in that society. Lack of time, lack of ability, lack of confidence, are the most frequent excuses given when you are asked to find somebody else. Women who never evinced any such trait before become temporarily very humble. Women the very breath of whose nostrils is "something new," decline on the ground that they "never did such a thing in all their lives."

We have no quarrel with the women's club, literary, social, philanthropic or patriotic. Many a woman, finding her voice in them, has brought it back to her Master's service. I do plead for fairness in distribution of the time and talent of our Christian women.

Our societies are full of dwarfed spiritual powers, of women not a bit more useful than they were ten, twenty, forty years ago. They have religion enough to be saved, consecration enough to give some money; many of them say with tears they would like to do more if they could. They have never had faith enough to risk a "failure." Charles Wesley used to say: "If the Lord would give me wings I would fly." John Wesley used to answer. "If the Lord bids you fly, I would trust him for wings."

Growth is not forced on any one. All beauties are based on hard things. Unto him that overcome is promised power, the strength of the pillar, the inheritance of all things. A successful architect said of the young men in his office who kept copying his designs: "Why do they do the things they can do? Why don't they do the things they can't?"

This woman who can but won't forgets, perhaps does not know, the conflict and strain of effort through which others have come, who have conquered their will in this work. Many a one whose calmness she admired has had her Gethsemanes before she took up that cross. Have you been willing to "Measure your life by loss: not gain, Not by the wine drunk, but by the wine poured forth?"

You were given a clear, sweet voice. Have you lost it's power in Christ's work? You were endowed with "a clear mind for business; it has been a blessing to you and others in domestic and secular affairs. Have you ever used it in Christ's work? Your fluent tongue and convincing manner have put through many a social and patriotic scheme. Were they given you for every use except for Christ's distinct call? Locate this possession of yours, perhaps it is not yet outlawed. Pay up appears of taxes, and begin again. . . . You think perhaps that that other woman, somebody else, has done your work. No, your work has just gone undone; the angels could not do it for you, and "inasmuch as ye did it not" will be the judgment.

Every one of us casts a shadow. There hangs about us a sort of penumbra—a strange, indefinable something—which we call personal influence, which has its effect on every other life on which it falls. It goes with us wherever we go. It is not something we can have when we will, as we lay aside a garment. It is something that always pours out from our life like light from a lamp, like heat from flame, like perfume from a flower.—J. R. Miller.

AS one looks round upon the community to-day, how clear the problem of hundreds of unhappy lives appears! Do we not all know men for whom it is just as clear as daylight that that is what they need, the sacrifice of themselves for other people? Rich men who with all their wealth are weary and wretched; learned men whose learning only makes them querulous and jealous; believing men whose faith is always souring into bigotry and envy,—every man knows what these men need; just something which shall make them let themselves go out into the open ocean of a complete self-sacrifice. They are rubbing and fretting and chafing themselves against the wooden wharves of their own interests, to which they are tied.

Event and Comment.

The people who never believe in State Prohibition when the Legislature is in session and talk long and learnedly about local option are the very ones to say, when the local option plan is about to be tried in their community, that prohibition can only be enforced when the whole State or perhaps the United States is put under the prohibitory law.

They are going to build a school in India for the training of the children of the Missionaries so as to avoid one of the greatest trials of the Missionary's life, the separation of parents and children during the period of education. It is to be situated in the mountain country where 250 missionaries already spend the summer, as it is accessible to some thirty five Protestant Missions in South India.

Neither the Bears nor the Bulls are much in favor with the masses of the people. When the Bears have their way with the cotton market for instance, the farmer is underpaid for his cotton. When the Bulls have their innings, the factories have to close and thousands are thrown out of work. Some time the hand of the law is going to be laid upon that colossal selfishness and make it as criminal as it is immoral.

In Philadelphia Church in Mecklenburg county they have the Old Church Day instead of the Old Home Week. We hope the custom will not fall into disuse. At the "spring communion" it is always the aim of all who have been brought up in the old church to attend and after the service a collection is taken for the care of the cemetery and family groups go out to the graves of their kindred and decorate the graves. It is a touching tribute to the memory of the saints that have gone before, one family in earth and Heaven.

Cardinal Moran is a name that fits a shave-pated Italian, which is a fine synonym for "accomplished liar." He started a story nearly ten years ago about a missionary ship having been laden with wine and spirits for the natives. It was proved that the cargo of the "John Williams" had been credited to a trading schooner and the schooner's to the missionary ship. But the Cardinal has continued to repeat the slander instead of correcting it. All shave-pated Italians are Cretans and we know what Paul said about the Cretans, quoting a Cretan authority.

The Catholics may prate all they please about their not worshipping the Virgin but the translation of Leo's last prayer, by Dr William Hayes Ward, is a prayer to the Virgin without a mention of Christ. Here it is;

That I may see thy face, Heaven's Queen, whose Mother love
Has brought me home above.

To thee, saved through the tangles of a perilous way,
I lift my grateful lay.

The Congregationalist comments:

It is not surprising, perhaps, that a celibate priesthood cannot get along without a feminine object of devotion, but it seems as strange to have a Christian offer a prayer in view of the end of life without the least mention of the name of Christ.

It is strange and yet natural too how much a saloon politician or paper hates to be called by its real name. A paper may advocate the saloon until it is black in the face with its raucous screaming but call it a saloon paper and it is immediately on the defensive.

We suppose that Mr. George L. Morton of Wilmington who wants to be Lieutenant-Governor would not deny the soft impeachment that he is a politician or that he is an advocate of the saloon as the best solution of the liquor problem. But call him a saloon politician and see how mad he will get. We knew once a politician to come out in an interview and proclaim his advocacy of high license and we simply referred to him as a saloon politician. The billingsgate that followed was an awful flood.

The Congregationalist unwittingly contributes to the discussion over the Presbyterian University that we are going to have at Atlanta. It shows that the expenses at Andover amount to $30,000 a year and that it graduates about three students a year. That is ten thousand apiece. It then shows that there are 112 students enrolled in the Yale Divinity School while the Divinity professors taught 490 men who wished to take one or more courses, and this is an opportunity that should not be denied those who seek theological instruction without intending to become ministers.

The Congregationalist then sums up the advantages of the University Theological School, which we commend to the thoughtful consideration of the friends of Clarksville and Columbia:

"The figures given in the two preceding paragraphs tell their own story. They show that a divinity school connected with a university can secure for its students a range of instruction quite beyond the power of other theological schools to furnish. For example, a theological student often wishes to pursue special studies in English literature, philosophy, history or other subjects not included in the curriculum of the seminary, but provided in variety in the university. On the other hand, the professors in the divinity school have opportunities to do large service in the religious training of many who are likely to be influential, educated laymen in the churches. The isolation of theological instruction is done away with by making the divinity school a true department of the university."

Among the Old Commonwealths North Carolina probably ranks first in the number of her exiles in the newer States. We could wish that the Old Home Week custom, that has been started in New England, might prevail here and throughout the South. The idea involved in this beautiful custom is admirably set forth in the following proclamation by the Governor of New Hampshire:

Congratulating the sons and daughters of New Hampshire upon their achievements at home and abroad, and desiring to strengthen the ties that bind them to each other and the state, I do with the advice and consent of the council and in the name of the State of New Hampshire, invite all former residents to visit the state during Old Home Week, Aug. 15-21 and revive memories of youthful days. The scenes of youth, although marvelously changed, will interest you. The brambly pastures where, perchance, as a barefoot boy a half century ago you went for the cows at night; the old mill pond where you fished and the streams where you swam; the bench in the old school-house where you sat; the site of the old orchard and the well with its old oaken bucket; the old church on the hill—quaint and of sacred memory; the old cemetery where hearts will be saddened and tears unbidden flow; all will recall days of yore and inspire nobler thoughts. We will welcome you with bonfires on the heights, flashing from hill to hill our great joy at your return. Those of us who remain will greet you around the hearthstone with old-time cordiality, and we will assemble in more than 100 towns in true Old Home Week spirit to give you the glad hand.

Gossip Preachers.

The fact is that we have been thinking about the remark of the Rev. Reginald Campbell, ever since he made it. If we mistake not he said something that ought to send all of us into a state of meditation for a while and most of us to the confessional. The writer of these lines makes his confession, here and now, forthwith and immediately, of having gossiped about his brethren and of having listened to more gossip than was edifying. Let us consider the matter together, then, fellow-sinners.

Not so long ago there came into the editorial sanctum a brother who was bent on an errand of mercy, if fact he felt sorry for another brother. We know this because he told us so himself. The unfortunate brother had been left high and dry, so to speak. There was danger of the degree of W. C. being bestowed upon him, which sometimes means without cash and eke without credit, especially credit among one's ministerial brethren. He had received a letter asking about the merits of the brother in question for a home mission church but on account of the trouble with the church he had just left was unable to recommend him. For that reason he was sorry and while he and others mentioned were mighty good friends of the unfortunate one, there seemed nothing left for him but school work somewhere. And to this end the services of this scribe were requested.

Thereat we grew interested and asked questions. Yes, the trouble with the church began with its getting in debt to him. Oh, yes, he was a good preacher, an excellent preacher—to which the scribe added his own opinion that he was one of the best preachers in the Presbytery, neither of the present company being expected at the moment. And yes, he was a good pastor, a most faithful pastor. No, he did not know anything about the character of the mission field concerning which he had been written. And there was more or less confusion when we pressed the point that it was hardly fair to hold a man incapable of preaching the gospel because a church had gotten into debt with him and kicked over the traces, and that when it was said that a man was a good preacher and a faithful pastor, the evidence was about all in concerning a minister. Of course personal character was not mentioned for that was irrefragable.

Now it came to pass that we met not long afterwards the brother who had been the object of such pious solicitude. In the mean time we had taken some steps to see that the brother should not be laid on a school-house shelf, seeing that good preachers and faithful pastors are not so common in the same combination after all. And after some converse this good brother who had been gossiped about began himself to gossip. It seems that the Standard's defence, recently, of the man who is until September 1, the Secretary of Publication, has stirred up things a little. And since there was no gainsaying what the Standard had said, some of the Assembly gossip was retailed, at second-hand, too. A minister's name was mentioned as having criticised the Secretary's business management in Richmond. The name provoked a smile because he was a candidate for the Secretary's place himself, on the strength of a reputation for executive ability in small things that at least exceeded his preaching ability. Then came the further gossip that the colored evangelistic work had once been sadly mismanaged and the most of the annual collection eaten up with the "expense of administration." Now the editor of the Standard is not gossiping. He is calling only one name. Perchance the other brethren will recognize themselves. If so we entreat them not to tell on themselves. But that word, "expense of administration" was an eye-opener, and for the clearing up of what we believe to be a long-lived falsehood we are taking the liberty of mentioning Dr. Phillips alone, by name.

This writer was a member of the Assembly of 1894 that met in Nashville and decided the Sadie Means Case, inaugurated the afterwards defeated License amendment and rejected an overture from the Northern Church to talk about Organic Union. Of course such high subjects attracted the giants of debate and left the little fellows to look after details of administration. That Assembly was also distinguished for its anti-secretarial spirit. One of the secretaries promised to resign if another year was given him, and did, and was triumphantly re-elected the next year. Another got a sufficient majority after a secret conclave which has been an open secret ever since. And there were two overtures requesting that the Colored Evangelistic work be discontinued as a special agency and be combined with the Home Mission work. One overture was from an Alabama Presbytery and the other from a Texas Presbytery. As the chairman of the Committee of Colored Evangelization was interested in some of the high debate aforesaid, it was left to the secretary of the committee to frame and defend the report.

We understood that the overtures were an indirect attack on the Secretary of Colored Evangelization, Dr. Phillips. So the committee heard evidence. The brother from the Texas Presbytery guilelessly explained that he knew nothing about the matter except that some of the Presbytery had been "in correspondence with the brethren from Alabama." The representative from Alabama was heard, and threatened to make full revelations in the Assembly if we did not go his way. He was what Kipling would have called a "strong, persevering man." We had Judge Lapsley before us among many others, and the unanimous opinion of the committee was that the whole trouble was a personal one, for which we are not disposed to put the blame upon any. And the committee recommended that the overtures be not granted. Upon that recommendation of the committee, the commissioner from Alabama started out to make a speech in the Assembly. His first point was as to the "expense of administration," and he named the figure and its percentage of the whole. The member of the committee who had been left in charge of the report rudely and irreverently interrupted him with the statement that he was counting in the expense of administration the salaries of the teachers at Tuscaloosa as well as the salary of the Secretary. That floored him. He honestly did not know that and when it was proved to him he had nothing more to say. The Assembly unanimously voted against the overture and unanimously re-elected Dr. Phillips Secretary.

And now brethren, look up your Minutes and consider the collections for this cause reported from year to year. We wonder that some of us did not think of that before the gossiping was well under way. If there were any who thought that the election of a Secretary for this cause would get money out of Northern pockets they proved themselves lacking in sense. Yet the average contribution for 5 years preceding his election was $7,150 and for five years preceding his resignation it was $10,350 a year. And every pastor knows the difficulty of getting a large collection for this cause in the Southern Presbyterian Church, for historical and other reasons. So with this old error as to the size of the expense account, and the human desire for a scapegoat, we laid blame at the Secretary's door, did we not, men and brethren?

If we were writing in the vein of worldly advice to young ministers, we would say, Cultivate the arts of popularity with your brethren. Toady to the high and lofty ones if need be. Identify yourself with the winning cliques, if such there be in Presbytery or Synod or Assembly. And if you give due diligence in these matters it does not make so much difference about the preparation of any sermons except the ones you may be asked to preach before Presbytery or Synod. Get the preachers on your side, and when your congregation has grown tired of you, you will find promotion. Of course you must keep things going well enough in your pastorate not to let the gossip about you get into Presbytery, for then you are done for. Yet by all means, cultivate the good will of your ministerial brethren.

But then sometimes it turns out otherwise. One of the richest rewards in the Southern Presbyterian Church was seemingly destined to a certain man who has rather eschewed these arts. Accordingly the session was duly warned by a faithful brother that the minister in question told too many jokes. To his surprise the answer was, "Well that settles it. We have been so much like a grave-yard in this church that we are positively delighted to know that he can tell a joke."

There are so many morals to this rambling screed that we dare not point them all out. But a minister's reputation with his brethren really counts more than his record in the Minutes. Churches go to ministers to ask about brother ministers. Therefore it behoves ministers to be careful of each other's good name. In short, stop gossiping.

A Silk Purse or a Sow's Ear.

Not so very long ago people were holding up Mr. Charles Schwab as the brightest example of success in American annals. The story was told and retold by orators and editors, religious editors, mayhap the editor of the Standard, among them. He had gone to work at a meager salary in a store. He was wanted in the Steel Foundry, was wanted to drive spikes and he informed his employer that he could drive anything. He was able to do it too at two dollars a week or at any other price. Then he rapidly rose to be foreman of his gang, then foreman of his shop, then manager of the Carnegie Steel Company, with the affectionate and faithful regard of Andrew Carnegie to back him. Then he was elected President of the Billion Dollar Steel Trust at a salary variously estimated from a million dollars a year to a hundred thousand. He was held up as an inspiring example to the youth of the country of what great rewards are open to the man of brains and industry. In fact we recall that he held himself up as all that in a speech that he made. Mr. Schwab had become the lion of the hour.

And the next thing we heard was that he was gambling for high stakes at Monte Carlo, and then that he had wrecked the splendid health that was his before his last promotion, and now the news comes that he has been practically forced out of the presidency and that the Shipbuilding Company in which he was a large stockholder has gone into the hands of a receiver. We suppose that Mr. Schwab is still a rich man. But poverty and wealth are altogether relative terms and in view of the prizes which were displayed before his eyes, doubtless Mr. Schwab deems himself poor indeed.

Perhaps the most important lesson of Schwab's downfall was the sudden loss of confidence in him by the business world when it found that he was squandering his time and his energy and his money at Monte Carlo. The business world distrusts the gambler in very much the same manner that it does the penitentiary convict. It knows by sad experience that the man who has no regard for his own property will have even less regard for the property of others. Confidence is the best possible capital in the business world and the loss of it means inevitable disaster. It is said that the way Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan fumed when he heard about Schwab's behaviour in the famous Casino justified his precautionary measures against having any women about him when desiring to express himself forcibly.

Well the proverbs rise to the thought. It does not seem to be a large list of exceptions to the rules. "Easy come—easy go." "Three generations from shirt-sleeves to shirt-sleeves." And then there is still another that says, "You can't make a silk purse out of a sow's ear."

Act up faithfully to your convictions; and when you have been unfaithful, bear with yourself and resume always with calm simplicity your little task. Suppress as much as you possibly can all recurrence to yourself, and you will suppress much vanity. Accustom yourself to much calmness and an indifference to events.—Madame Guyon.

Review of Contemporaries.

The Difference Between State and Denominational Education.

(From the Biblical Recorder.)

The Standard, Presbyterian, Charlotte, produces a page and a half on "State and Church in Education," assuming to answer the Recorder's editorial on "The Future of the Denominational College." The Standard concedes that our estimate of adverse conditions is to a degree accurate and also recognizes their general significance. But it relies upon the denominational support of denominational schools to save them. It offers no reason at all for this support, however, saying:

"When our State Institutions in North Carolina have at their heads and in their faculties just the same sort of Christian men that our Church Colleges have, the Standard would feel a little hypocritical in talking about State institutions as anti-Christian or even un-Christian. The Churches should support their own institutions as nobly as the Presbyterian Church in North Carolina is supporting Davidson and our five colleges for women. And then, instead of abusing the State and the State institutions, they should see that those institutions, from the public schools up, should have thrown around them all the influence of the Church and of the Church's ministry."

We cannot reproduce the entire page and a half from the Standard, but we submit the fore-going as the substance of the Standard's position.

We concede that our State institutions are manned largely by Christians. We concede that their work is largely wholesome. We disavow any intention of abusing those institutions or desire for their injury in any way whatever. But we deny that their ideal is either directly or indirectly Christian. There is religious education and there is secular education. To be sure, in certain instances the religious education presents a secular aspect and the secular presents a religious aspect. But always there will be a distinction in degree. The denominational college will promote distinctly religious education. Its emphasis will be upon the Christian content and the Christian means of education; upon Christ as the source of life and the guide of thought, and the active motive and ideal in the making of manhood. Its ideal will be avowedly Christian; not denominational, but Christian. It will seek to make men—not by learning, but by Christ. The State school may engage Christian teachers, but its emphasis will not be upon the Christian content of education. Its ideal will not be emphatically Christian. We do not say that the State school is un-Christian. We repudiate the description of State schools as "Godless schools." They are not anti-Christian. But at the same time they are not religious institutions; and religious education is the only true and the only safe education. The Church is the organization for religion and religious instruction—never the State.

We believe the Standard will recognize this distinction. If not, what inducement can it offer Presbyterians to support Davidson so loyally? If the State schools do all that Davidson does, why go to the expense of maintaining Davidson? It is not a matter of pride, surely. Nor is it a matter of getting rid of money. There is a difference. Let the Standard form for us a statement of this difference, or let it advocate the suspension of Davidson. There must be a peculiar reason for the existence of Davidson and for its support by the Presbyterians.

The most significant trend in modern education is the emphasis upon religion. Christ again is to be set up as the Great Teacher. He is the heart of education. Religion is again to be recognized as the centre of man's mind and heart and the spring of his rise. It governs his life. To a certain degree State institutions will fall in with this trend. But they cannot adequately meet the inherent demand—inherent in the nature of education and in the character of man—for instruction on a religious basis. Only the churches can do this well and truly. To this end the denominations educate. For this cause the Christian colleges exist. And, could we be persuaded that the State schools can supply this demand, we would not hesitate to advocate the retirement of the denominations from the domain of education. We know of no other reason for their existence. We utterly repudiate the suggestion that they exist for the denomination's sake. They exist for mankind's sake, as does the denomination.

The most and the best and the worst we desire for the State schools is that they shall be put ultimately upon the Voluntary basis, and that so gradually that they will gain all the advantage of the Voluntary principle and suffer no injury from the transition. The most that we contend for immediately is an adjustment of the conditions now obtaining with respect to higher education in North Carolina with a view to protecting the denominational schools. Unless some such adjustment shall be arrived at, they will suffer, but the State will suffer more than they. It is a matter of concern not only to the denominations, but to every patriotic citizen, every friend of education.

We submit that this position is reasonable and right from every point of view. What says the Standard?

What the Standard Says.

The Standard is going to claim just a little of the credit for the change of tone that must be evident to those who recall the controversies over this subject of a few years past. For instance, it is a great gain to have our contemporary entitle an article "Denominational Education," instead of "Christian Education." The title itself does what is distinctly affirmed later in the article, dismisses the contention that the State Schools are either un-Christian or anti-Christian. And this change of phrase from Christian Education to Denominational Education would itself indicate that the Recorder has seen a great light. For really the heart of the question is right here Denominational Education is not necessarily Sectarian Education. We do not believe there is a Protestant School in the State where pupils from any denomination would not be gladly received and where their denominational faith would not be respected and undisturbed. That is not Sectarianism and the unwise advocates of State Schools have sometimes played the demagogue and the fool at the same time by using that offensive phrase. On the other hand, because this is a Christian Commonwealth, because it would not tolerate in its teachers of youth infidelity or even gross heresy, because the Presidents and the Faculties of these State Institutions have been almost uniformly Christian men and women, it is equally an error to say that Christian Education must be confined to the denominational schools. A denominational school, say a Catholic University, may not be as Christian in its atmosphere or influence as a State University.

The fact should be borne in mind that Christianity itself is not imparted by education of any kind. It is the gift of God. It is the fruit of the Spirit. Conditions of education can be made favorable or unfavorable for the beginnings or the growth of the Christian life. But with the exception of certain courses in Bible Study or the old course in Christian Evidences and Christian Ethics, only the theological schools teach the science of religion, which we call theology. The Recorder admits that religious education may present a secular aspect. It does. It is difficult to imagine just how one would teach mathematics under a religious aspect. There are, on the other hand, certain branches of study, such as history, philosophy, ethics, where the Christian point of view for the teachers is very important for the pupil, and where the opportunity to inculcate Christian truth is abundant, if the teacher is so minded. After all has been said, a good deal depends upon the teacher and his point of view, in any school, whether of Church or State.

Further, we make bold to say that while the church is the "organization for religion and religious instruction" as the Recorder contends, the Church School, certainly the Protestant School, is not. Religious instruction, as a matter of sober fact, is incidental in any Church School that we know of in North Carolina. Boys go to Davidson or to Wake Forest to learn Latin and Greek and Mathematics and History and English Literature. The College is not a Sunday-School and neither is it a Theological Seminary. Compare the curriculum of either of these colleges with the same course at the University and what is the difference?

Again, the Recorder has never yet fairly faced this question, Why does it advocate the common schools and deprecate the Higher Schools, when in both we have education by the State? The Roman Catholic is consistent in deprecating both. And in fact, if any education by the State is to be deplored, then it seems to us that that which takes the child in its most impressionable period ought to be the one most earnestly condemned, for which the Church should most earnestly seek substitutes. If there is any escape from this logic we have never been able to see it.

And further, the Voluntary Principle, of which the Recorder has talked a good deal seems to us just a little far-fetched. Let us ask an honest question regarding that Voluntary Principle, which would finally make State Institutions dependent upon the gifts of private individuals rather than upon the State. Suppose some wealthy North Carolina Baptist in carrying out this doctrine which the Recorder has been preaching were to give $100,000 to the University instead of to Wake Forest, would not the first thought in the editor's mind be, What a disloyal Baptist he is? Honestly we should feel a little that way about a Presbyterian who should pass by Davidson in such fashion.

And now another question will bring us to the heart of this whole subject. Suppose Wake Forest should be destroyed by the State as the Recorder declared that the Greensboro Female College was destroyed. Would the average Baptist father, no matter how thoroughly he had been trained by the Recorder, send his boy to Davidson or to Trinity to be trained, instead of the University? Would the Recorder so advise? Why? Because we all recognize when we tell the truth that the object of the denominational school is denominational propagandism. The Recorder cannot say more than we will endorse about the importance of the Church School to the Church which fosters it. Our male colleges, especially, are necessary for training the Christian Ministry in preparatory studies. And then it is a good thing for church loyalty that we should cherish with all our fond memories of our Alma Mater the thought that our Church was back of it, that the Church's sons gave their means for its endowment and that its teachers, were, most of them at least, the noble exemplars of that Church's Christian life. All this is good and only good. Further, as the work of Christ is carried on by the churches, whatever increases the efficiency of the denomination increases the work of Christ among men. So the Recorder admits this while it repudiates it, "the suggestion that they exist for the denomination's sake." For it adds that the denominations exist for the sake of mankind. So that the schools are for mankind in being for their respective denominations.

If there were no state schools, the element of competition would be largely eliminated from education. Davidson and Wake Forest do not compete with each other. But the University makes them both hustle, and they both, through the influence of the great denominations which they represent, keep the University straight. The Presbyterian Church in Virginia, led by John Holt Rice, kept Thomas Jefferson from putting a Unitarian at the head of his University, nearly a hundred years ago. Jefferson found that he would have his professor with no students for him to teach. But to take the ground that the Church needs "an adjustment of the conditions now obtaining with respect to higher education in North Carolina with a view to protecting the denominational schools" is a confession that we should be ashamed for the Presbyterian Church to make. Whatever her members may think, as citizens, it is not her business to be calling upon the State to protect her institutions from competition, by crippling the institutions of the State. Certainly the denominational schools should be supported by the denomination. To what else can they look for support? It is a heresy from both the Baptist and the Presbyterian view that they should look to the State either for direct appropriations or indirect crippling of competition.

What all the churches ought to do in North Carolina is to see that every possible Christian influence is thrown around the University, that the best preachers of the denomination be sent there as pastors. And if this sort of jealousy which exists in all the churches more or less could be wholly eliminated, the educational forces of North Carolina might be able to accomplish something for the elevation of the University to a standard, for post-graduate courses, that would keep in North Carolina the students that now go to other Universities after leaving college.

And by the way, the Greensboro Female College, that was "struck down by the State," and which started this debate, seems to have risen up again.

At the recent General Assembly of the United Free Church of Scotland, the remarkable blessing attending the recent mission of Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander was noted as follows in the committee's report on the home work of the church:

"This general movement within the church has been greatly helped and drawn out into fuller expression by the remarkable missions carried on by Dr. Torrey and his colleague, Mr. Alexander, during February, March and April, in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen. It is generally agreed that, for both depth and width of impression upon Christian people and the unconverted, there have been no such missions since the first memorable visit to Scotland of Messrs. Moody and Sankey. —Exchange.

Will some brother editor of more experience than we have in this office, rise and explain the wonderfully precipitate, head-long, mad rush to pay up that subscribers always make when they find themselves in arrears? Or is it a mirage that we have seen, projected upon our business horizon from the pictures which, in lazy moments in these hot August days, we have been drawing of a news paperial Utopia?—Southwestern Presbyterian.

Devotional.

The Voice of Christ

When some beloved voice that was to you
Both sound and sweetness, faileth sudden,
And silence, against which you dare not cry,
Aches round you like a strange disease and new,
What hope? what help? what music will undo
That silence to your sense? Not friendship's sigh—

Not reason's subtle count, not melody
Of viols, nor pipes that Faunus blew—
Nor songs of poets, nor of nightingales,
Whose hearts leap upward through the cypress trees
To the clear moon; nor yet the spheric laws
Self-chanted, nor the angel's sweet All hails, Met in the smile of God. Nay, none of these.
Speak thou, availing Christ! and fill this pause.
—Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

Our Lord has made all the family relationships more sacred. The spirit which would dissolve them, which would dream of a holier life than that of the household, a discipline more sacred than that of a godly family, is contrary to the spirit of Christ. Through him we learn to love our kindred and friends with a nobler love. The Church is one great family,—sharer in the same parental care and heirs to a common inheritance. Jealousies may spring up between the fondest hearts, and the most passionate love may grow cool unless Christ purifies it. He teaches us how to love brothers and sisters, and even our own children, aright. He bids the Church esteem men, not for rank or fashion, but because they belong to Christ.

Our Lord's dying words showed how dearly he loved his mother, and were a reflection of the love which she bestowed on his infant days. No mother was ever more tender and thoughtful; no child ever loved a mother so perfectly. There is no love like His; and he who possesses it will love his kindred better, and seek to win them to the brotherhood of Christ.

James Gardiner Vose.

The Cure of Loneliness.

Selfishness is one great cause of loneliness. If a man builds walls around himself, so that he may keep all that he has to himself, he soon finds that he has built walls around himself which shut out all that might come into him from others. So the cure of loneliness may be the overcoming of selfishness. The medicines for this disease of loneliness are portions of generosity, of thoughtfulness for others, of self-sacrifice, taken in large doses, even when the loneliness comes from the bitterness of loss and sorrow. Forgetting self, going out of self, and doing for others, is the only cure that God has given on earth for its healing. For this reason we find Jesus speaking of the life given even unto death for others as a cure for loneliness. He said, 'Except a grain of corn die it abideth alone. And He was speaking, not of wheat, but of life. Are we ever taken with times of feeling lonely? Then let us go and do something for somebody. That is the cure.—Sunday-School Times.

Do not think of your faults, still less of others' faults; in every person who comes near you look for what is good and strong; honor that, rejoice in it, and, as you can, try to imitate it. For the rest, you will find it less easy to uproot faults than to choke them by gaining virtues. If, on looking back, your whole life should seem rugged as a palm-tree stem, never mind, so long as it has been growing and has its grand green shade of leaves and weight of honeyed fruit at top.—Ruskin.

Dr. Johnson said that a man who would make a pun would pick a pocket.

Missionary.

The Arid Wastes of America.

Travelling through New Mexico, Colorado, Nebraska, Montana and Washington, one is struck with awe at the vast extent of the sage grass plains. The altitude is so great, 3,000 to 5,000 feet, that the problem of irrigation is a difficult one. Some parts of this territory furnish grazing for twenty-five to forty head of cattle to the square mile. All it seems to need is water and a great deal of it. Beside the water courses foliage abounds, and beautiful meadows are seen. The spiritual application, it is not necessary to make. In the highly favored portions of our country, thanks should be given to God, who "sendeth rain from Heaven."

Lest We Forget.

- That our pledge to God is a sacred obligation that should be kept.
- That we ought to come in the Spirit, not simply of getting, but of giving.
- That if our Missionary Meetings are full of prayer they will be full of power.
- To spend a few moments on our knees before coming to the meeting.
- That there is no use praying for things for which we are not willing to work.
- That the woman who works for God should talk over all the details with the Master.
- That our love for God will not grow so long as we try to hide it.
- That a Society's spiritual power determines its numerical and financial strength.

"How Beautiful upon the Mountains."

Dr. Turner, of the London Missionary Society, communicates a touching little incident that recently occurred on one of their stations. A missionary visited a converted native in dying circumstances, who, before his departure, addressed him as follows: "I am going, but you are to remain a little longer. When I get to heaven I shall first of all praise and thank Jesus for having saved a poor creature like me; and then I'll tell him about you, for it was you who first told me the way to heaven. And then I'll look about and see where the door is through which the spirits go up; and if I find such a place, that will be where I will sit and wait for you. And when you come—oh, what a happy day that will be. And after our joyful meeting I'll take you by the hand and lead you to Jesus, and say to him, 'Jesus, Jesus, this is the man I told you about. This is the man whom you sent to tell me about your own love—this is the man.'—Ex.

Africa is the second largest continent on earth, and has a population of 200,000,000. The mighty Egyptian empire rose and fell there, and the ruins of its pyramids, temples, and tombs still remain. Abraham, the father of the faithful, went down into it; Joseph, the son of Jacob, rose to a power next to that of a king there. That great Hebrew leader and lawgiver, Moses, the man of God, was trained there, and Jesus, the Son of God, was carried there to escape the wrath of Herod. It contains the grandest and almost the oldest monuments of civilization. It is one of the ends of the earth from which God's sons and daughters will come forth. For many and long centuries its teeming millions have been stretching out their hands to God and us. What are we going to do about it—Exchange.

Saul Tries to Kill David.

I Sam. 18: 5-16. Aug. 16, 1903.

David's victory over Goliath and the Philistines brought him promotion in Saul's household and army and great renown among the people. The women greeted his triumphant return from the slaughter of the Philistines with peans of praise and ascribed to him greater prowess than they did to king Saul. David conducted himself in prosperity with great discretion, but his very success and wisdom aroused Saul's distrust and enmity, and led to protracted persecution. Our present lesson furnishes some impressive facts, and suggestions. The incidents mentioned in the lesson may be presented under three heads.

I. Saul's Life in David's Power. He is David's implacable enemy and has endeavored to shed his blood at different times with his own hand by the hands of his servants and with the sword of the Philistines. David has done Saul no injury, but on the contrary has rendered most important services to him and his kingdom. The King at this very time is seeking David's life in the wilderness with the force of his whole realm. David has been anointed for kingship and knows that at Saul's death, by Divine appointment he will become king of Israel. In the providence of God, Saul is placed completely in David's power. He and all his followers are asleep and defenceless and the spear for smiting the king is at hand. Abishai says to David "God hath delivered thine enemy into thine hand this day, now therefore let me smite him, I pray thee with the spear even to the earth at once and I will not smite him the second time." If David allows Saul to be slain, his persecution would end, natural resentment would be gratified, his own safety assured and the Divine will seemingly accomplished. He is moved to take Saul's life, by righteous indignation by self-defence, by personal ambition, by the counsel of his companion, and by a "providence of God, apparently fulfilling the Divine decree, that he should attain the kingdom."

II. David's Treatment of Saul. Perhaps no incident in David's career, more fully proves and illustrates his magnanimity of Saul, and Divine sonship, than his sparing Saul under the conditions mentioned. His conduct towards the king is marked by generosity and forbearance. He does not slay him nor permit it to be done by another. He said to Abishai, "Destroy him not; for who can stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed and be guiltless." He will not take vengeance into his own hands but leaves it to be executed by the Lord. He declares "As the Lord liveth, the Lord shall smite him, or his day shall come to die; or he shall descend into battle and perish." But he takes steps to prove to Saul that he had spared his life when in his power, by removing the spear and cruise of water, that were afterwards restored to Saul's messenger. He also, when at a distance, addresses the king, showing that his sparing his life proved that he bore him no ill-will, claiming that he had done no evil, and speaking of himself in most humble and loyal terms. Surely on this occasion, David manifested great self-control and showed that "He who ruleth his spirit is greater than he that taketh a city."

III. The Results of David's Kindness. By his mercy and forbearance David secured many good results. He saved himself from needless bloodshed and life-long self-reproach. He taught his followers a much needed lesson of self-mastery and generosity and forgiveness.

The atheist who visited Fenelon said, "If I stay here much longer, I will be a Christian in spite of myself." Henry M. Stanley testified that the beauty of holiness in the life of David Livingstone won him to Christ.

Lessons from Paul: Making Our Lives Count.

II Timothy 1:8; I Cor. 11:23-28. Topic for August 23.

As we think of the wonderful results attending the work of Paul, it is inclined to discourage us, at first thought, for he accomplished so much more than any of us can ever hope to accomplish. But if we will look closely into the life of the apostle we will find that these results were the necessary effects of certain causes that were working through Paul. These same causes will work the same effects now as then. The only question is, are we willing to give them a chance to work through us. Paul, in giving himself to Christ, did not hold back a part of the price." He gave himself and all that he possessed to the use of the Master. We do not know that he, like his early companion, Barnabas had any worldly goods, but he had what was far more useful to the Church and which is still far more useful to the Lord's work: He had himself with all of his talents and capacity for work. He held nothing back. Everything went into the service of Him who first revealed Himself to the "Man of Tarsus" as he went to Damascus. Having given himself to the Lord, it was natural that this man should expect the Lord to take care of him and so the apostle had no fear, no difference how near, seemingly, danger came to him. For this reason Paul never took any precautions for his own safety, save as his friends induced him to do so. This temerity on his part led him into many dangers but the Lord delivered him from them all. He gives a partial list in the eleventh chapter of Second Corinthians of these dangers which had ever taken him before his sojourn in Athens. In the first chapter of Second Timothy he tells Timothy not to be fearful but courageous.

While there are some of the followers of Jesus who are thrown into all sorts of danger, even in these days, on account of their witnessing for Him, yet in our own land there is little bodily harm comes to any who testify for Christ. However, there is still the man-fearing spirit. The reason why the lives of many of the Christ's disciples do not count like Paul's, is because they have this fear of what people will say or think. They do not want to endure ridicule; they cannot stand to be stared at. Young men often fear, they will not be considered manly if they take a bold stand for their religion. If they only realized it, there is a great deal more manliness demanded to stand up for Jesus in the presence of these who scoff at religion, than in facing the cannon. Many a young man or young woman who would not hesitate to take a decided stand on any other question of the day, is silent when the religion of the "One who sticketh closer than a brother," is derided. A young man would rather endure anything than be laughed at, and so many erroneously imagine that the world will laugh at a man who seems to have any religious scruples. But the world will not laugh. In his inmost heart, the worldling, if he has any sound sense whatever, will honor and esteem the man who is sincerely a child of God.

This leads then to the second thought in connection with the question of how we can make our lives count like Paul's. Our life and our profession must agree. The thing that the world will not endure is to see a man profess to be a follower of Christ, and then have his life conformed unto the ways of the world. Every man will esteem the person who makes a profession and then leads a life which is consistent in all of its parts with that profession. The reason many who profess to be Christians, and who seemingly are in earnest to make their lives count, do not have any good influence, is because no one has any confidence in them, and having no confidence, there will be no respect. Many have friends whom they would see brought to Christ. They have talked to them; they have prayed for them, but still they do not come. Let such a person look closely into his own life and in very many cases he will see there the stumbling block in his brother's way.

Dr. Gordon's Attitude About Women Preaching.

Several years ago in writing in the Earnest Worker a comment on Acts 21:9, Dr. Gordon made an exposition of this Scripture which seemed to favor the view that some take that women may preach. We all agree that women and all men as well as ministers of the Gospel, may preach in a general way, as they are authorized by the Scripture that says, "Let him that heareth say come." All persons may administer medicine to the sick, but our laws provide that only such as have been licensed shall be considered physicians. One of the questions before the public in our land is whether women may be recognized as duly authorized ministers of the Word, just as physicians are recognized as belonging to a duly authorized class, and different from the masses of the people who administer medicine in a general way. In due course of time Dr. Gordon writes again (in the April number of the Earnest Worker) on the same passage of Scripture. This time he is more full in his exposition, but gives forth the same uncertain sound as before—or rather seems to be astride of the fence on this disputed question, with a rather decided leaning in favor of the idea that women may be recognized as preachers. In the same manner as formerly he asserts very dogmatically that the daughters of Phillip who the Scriptures say prophesied, "preached." He speaks of their "sermons" as it were positively certain that they were recognized as preachers. He asserts (although the Scripture does not so state) that they "preached the glad tidings of salvation to the impenitent and unbelieving." He tells us on the "modern question of women preaching" that "the prophesying of these women affords no basis on which to build a practice of electing women to be presbyters either teaching or ruling." Observe how cautiously he walks on the top of the fence, carefully balancing himself lest he should lean in too pronounced a manner to the side of woman's preaching. We are not authorized to build a practice (though we might occasionally do so) of electing women to be presbyters, but he seems to imply we might admit them as public preachers before audiences of men as well as women, nevertheless, but be careful not to select them as presbyters—that would be going too far. He says this prophesying of Phillip's daughters "authorizes no woman to intrude herself into the house of God as a teacher uncalled of God, unrecognized as divinely called by the officers of the Church." Of course no woman ought to "intrude herself into the house of God uncalled of God." Our modern women preachers (such, for instance, as the noted and godly Miss Francis Willard) claim that they are not "intruders into the house of God." They claim that God has called them. Will Dr. Gordon recognize them as called of God? He implies that he would, under certain circumstances, if the officers of the Church recognize them as divinely called. It does not matter what prohibitions of the Word of God there may be, if only the officers of the Church may recognize one of these women preachers as "divinely called." In fact Dr. Gordon intimates a doubt as to whether the Word of God does prohibit these women preachers. He says: "Nor is there anything in God's Word or in the constitution of our Church, which forbids Christian women within their allotted sphere, to tell all they know about Jesus and salvation to all whom they can get to listen to them." See how he keeps on the top of the fence by using the saving clause, "Within their allotted sphere." Then he cautiously defines "their allotted sphere." He says, "It is limited by their physical and mental peculiarities." Then if their physical and mental peculiarities happen to be all right they can go ahead with their preaching. If a woman has a voice strong enough to be heard, and a body strong enough to bear the strain of preaching, and a mind strong enough to compose a good sermon, why let her go forth as a preacher. The matter of the legality of the proceeding is not in the way, if only her physical and mental peculiarities are all right. Again he says women's "allotted sphere" is limited "by considerations of modesty and decorum." Then the woman preacher who behaves herself with modesty and decorum (and they generally do) is in her allotted sphere, and let her go forth as a preacher, to preach to men and women. Again he says her "allotted sphere" is limited "by the prevalent views of intelligent Christians in the community." In other words, if she happens to preach in a community where the majority of intelligent Christians favor woman's preaching (and that often happens) it is all right. She is within her allotted sphere. Dr. Gordon is careful to tell us he does not believe in "the unauthorized rantings of women who are not called of God to be prophets, nor elected by his people to be presbyters, nor authorized by the Church courts to teach." If, however, the Church courts should authorize them to teach, and they should be elected as presbyters, as has been the case in some instances among Cumberland Presbyterians, and if they should not rant (as most of the women preachers do not), why then they ought to be received as public preachers to men as well as women.

And our good brother is careful to give us a solemn warning, "not to limit God's power and authority; for He has the right and ability to call and equip women to prophesy whenever He pleases. Who questions God's power and authority to make preachers of women as well as men? That is not the question. The question is, has God authorized women to go forth as regular preachers of the Word, like our men that we recognize as ministers of the Gospel?"

The answer to this question must come from the Word of God, and not from any "physical or mental peculiarities," or "considerations of modesty and decorum," or "prevailing views of intelligent Christians." Is it legal according to the Word of God? Why may not my son vote when he is twenty years and eleven months old? He could probably cast a vote more intelligently than thousands of men who are fifty years old. But it would be illegal. The law says he must be twenty-one years old. So it is a legal question as to whether women may preach. Does the Word of God prohibit it? When that Word says "Let your women keep silence in the Churches," and again "I suffer not a woman to teach,"—is not this the law on the subject? Dare we waive it aside by some far-fetched interpretation of the Word? Then together with these laws consider the fact that our Saviour commissioned twelve preachers,—none of them a woman,—and afterwards seventy preachers and none of them a woman,—and during his whole ministry on earth never commissioned a woman as a regular preacher, and considering the fact that there is not in the whole Word of God a single instance of a woman who was set apart as a regular preacher, and considering the description of a minister of the Gospel such as God calls as given in Paul's letter to Timothy, in view of all this, have we not something weightier against women preachers than considerations of modesty and decorum?

In the Old Testament there are six instances of women prophesying, and two instances in the New Testament, or counting the four daughters of Phillip, eleven cases in all in the whole Bible. But it does not appear that in any of these instances this prophesying was equivalent to formal public preaching of the Word as a minister of the Gospel does. Dr. Gordon seems to think that the daughters of Phillip preached. Even if he could positively prove that they did this would not authorize women to preach now, as he admits that this is an extraordinary case. The word for prophesying does mean to teach, but it does not necessarily mean to the public formal preaching of the Word. Eleven other words in the Greek are used in the New Testament to speak of preaching, and in more than a hundred places, and in not one instance do these words apply to cases of women preaching. One of the favorite words used by the Holy Spirit in the New Testament about preaching is the word from which we get our word evangelize. This word in the Greek is used about fifty times, and in every instance as applying to men and not women. Another word used in the Greek about fifty times is the word meaning to proclaim as a herald. In every instance it refers to men. These facts are significant.

But Dr. Gordon seems to intimate that we ought to be cautious. There may appear a woman who is called of God to preach. How may we know whether she is called? By the Word. God will not contradict Himself. If He says, "Let your women keep silence in the Churches," we need not expect Him to call a woman to preach in these modern days. The Mormons and Swedenborgians claim that they have other revelations from God besides the Bible. Must we be very careful lest we fight against God by not receiving these so-called added revelations? No. God Himself has warned us in His Word against additions to His revealed Word. That is enough to lead us promptly to reject the claims of Mormons.

Does this argument mean any reflection upon woman? Certainly not. It is no reflection upon her that God has made her a woman and not a man. God has given her a wide sphere where she may preach the Gospel by her example, conversation, writings, home influence, instruction of the young, teaching of her own sex, and by encouragement and assistance to God's ministering servants. God has not even called all men to preach, but only a few. Other men who are not called to this office are barred out from it the same as woman, but may preach in other ways as she may.

S. F. Tenney.

Reply

This article is a repetition in substance of one published a few years ago written in the same spirit as this. In private letters, addressed to this brother before my published reply, I then endeavored to have him see that he had misunderstood and misrepresented me and to recall his criticisms. The remarks in the Earnest Worker which he now criticises were written with the former attack in mind and were designed to forestal, if possible, unfavorable comment, while the incident commented on was correctly interpreted.

Any careful and impartial reader of the Earnest Worker will see that our brother Tenney's criticisms are hypercritical and altogether uncalled for. It is apparent to any one whose mind is not blinded by prejudice that the remarks which have excited him are designed, first, to give a correct exposition of the word "prophesying" and to interpret fairly the incident in the book of Acts where the word occurs. Then, secondly, to present any unwarranted inferences from the incident as thus interpreted.

The notes say that the incident does not afford any "basis on which to build a practice of electing women to be presbyters, either teaching or ruling." In other words, women are not eligible as presbyters. This is in harmony with the view of our Church on this subject, with God's Word, and our brother Tenney.

The notes say that the incident gives no authority to any woman, "to intrude herself into the house of God as a teacher uncalled of God, unrecognized as divinely called by the officers of the Church." In order to teach, preach or prophesy in the Church a woman must not only be called of God, but the Church must recognize and acknowledge that call. Surely among us this goes for the saying. Brother Tenney agrees to this.

The notes say that the incident "should warn us not to limit God's power and authority, for he has the right and ability to call and equip women to prophesy whenever he pleases." This ought to go for the saying among Presbyterians; and it is worth while every now and then to say it. So far there is no straddle of the fence.

But the notes go on to say, "Nor is there anything in God's Word, or in the constitution of our Church, which forbids Christian women, within their allotted sphere, to tell all they know about Jesus and salvation to all whom they can get to listen to them."

This is in accord with God's Word, and expresses exactly the opinion of our Church as that opinion is voiced in its practice. Our brother Tenney himself says that, "We all agree that women and all men, as well as ministers of the Gospel, may preach in a general way." It is notorious that ministers and Church courts authorize women to lead the service of praise, to sing the gospel in solo and in chorus, to teach both sexes in the Sunday-school and other schools; to preach "in a general way" in and out of the house of God.

My statement at this point is much more guarded than our brother Tenney's. I cut the women off from preaching in the technical sense. I cut them off from intruding uncalled into the Church as teachers or preachers even "in a general way." I show that they may not teach or preach anywhere, even "in a general way," outside of their allotted sphere. I make an attempt, perhaps a poor one, to define that sphere. It is limited by physical and mental peculiarities, by considerations of modesty, by intelligent public opinion. In the Church it is limited by the ministers and courts of the Church.

In view of these carefully guarded statements, I am at a loss to account for this endeavor to bring my notes into disrepute. I exclude, of course, all personal motives. The only reason I can imagine is that I am not one of those who say one thing and do another. I am not on the fence, nor on both sides of it. The practice of our Church is to allow women to teach and to preach "in a general way," under certain conditions, not very strictly defined. Some brethren apparently seek to condone this practice by proclaiming that God's Word forbids it. They try to be on both sides of the fence at the same time. They are, in this respect, like those who insist on holding on in form to the regulation respecting licensure, ordination and the pastorate, as if these regulations were of express divine authority, while the courts constantly violate them in fact. So, if only we say that God's Word forbids women to preach and requires them to be silent in the churches, we may allow them to preach "in a general way" and to be vocal in the churches as circumstances may demand. This is to be on the fence, or on both sides, or on neither side, as the exigencies may call for.

This appears to me to be silly and futile. I am very free to say that I do not believe that God requires women under all circumstances and conditions to be silent in the churches. I hold that to put this construction on Paul's words is exegetically erroneous. But if I did so believe I would forbid women to teach in the Sunday-school, and to sing solos in social and public worship.

I am persuaded that the view just expressed is held by our brethren generally; but I did not think the pages of the Earnest Worker was the place to express them; unless, indeed, the lesson text contained the words which some of our brethren interpret verbally in one way, and apply practically in a very different way. Among these brethren I do not include our brother Tenney. So far as I know, no woman ever uttered a word aloud in any Church service conducted by him; no woman ever taught any man in any church of which he had charge.

E. C. Gordon.

A Missionary Experience.

In your issue of July 8th, we find the following under Church News, relating to the missionary addresses made by Mrs. Moore, of our Japan Mission, before ladies' missionary societies:

"All this the writer learns from others, for only women were present at these meetings; and in reply to the question 'Can any men attend the service this afternoon,' the answer was 'I am a Southern Presbyterian and so are you.' So I durst not go."

These words stirred up a very reminiscent mood in the mind of the writer for she, too, is a foreign missionary, and since her return home has been called upon for addresses in many different places and under varying circumstances, and being a Southern Presbyterian of old orthodox stock, and having spoken only in Southern Presbyterian assemblies, she must admit of a little surprise upon reading the above words. And so she determined to write of a few of the things she has seen and heard in our fair Southland. The Presbyterian Standard always stands for an open discussion when it is for the purpose of getting at the truth of a matter and so I am sure of a hearing.

I will omit in my experience the meetings in any buildings other than the church itself and the presence of any men at these meetings other than the ruling body, which is at least supposed to know our Southern Presbyterian law, namely the men of the session and the pastorate.

In importance of place Nashville should probably be mentioned first, for it is one of our strongholds of Presbyterianism and the seat of our Executive Committee of Foreign Missions.

At the all-day meeting of prayer in January in the 1st Presbyterian Church by the L. F. M. U. of the Presbytery, there was held at the close of the session a service in memory of our lamented Dr. D. C. Rankin. Our Secretary, Dr. Chester, the pastor of the church, Dr. Anderson, and the Acting Editor, Mr. Williams, were all to take part in the service. They came into the room before the appointed time and one of the trio was early enough to hear all of the last two addresses by the ladies. They each one seemed to fit right into that meeting, and enjoy it too.

At a regular monthly meeting of the ladies, society of this same church the writer spoke. The minister who was filling the pulpit temporarily, came in, dropped into a back seat quietly and sat to the end of the address. Only a few weeks ago at the monthly meeting of the ladies, society of Moore Memorial church, a sister missionary, spoke upon her work in the far away foreign field. The Rev. Wm. Caldwell who was supplying the pulpit for the month came into the meeting and remained throughout. It was by the way, a most delightful, inspiring and helpful meeting. The same missionary in speaking in the 2nd Presbyterian church had the Rev. J. C. Cowan as one of her listeners. In the last meeting of the L. F. M. U. of this same Presbytery the Rev. H. F. Williams, editor of our missionary publication, the Rev. L. W. Curtis, the Rev. R. C. Anderson, and the Rev. T. E. P. Woods, were in and out during many of the sessions of the two days, beside two of the elders of the church in which the meetings were held.

In Raleigh, N. C., the writer addressed the girls' societies one lovely Sabbath afternoon. She was not surprised to see some young men drop in upon the back seats, as experience had taught her that our men are almost as eager for fresh missionary news as our good women, but when one of the elders whom I knew to be very conservative, came in and moved slowly down to the front so that he would not miss a word, I must admit of a little surprise, not, mind you, because he was a man nor an elder, but because he was known to be so very "orthodox" and "conservative."

In another church of the Old North State we had two elders to sit with other men throughout the whole meeting, and at still another church not only elders but two ministers.

These are but a few of the many cases that I know of. The Charlotte incident is too familiar to even chronicle, and it is a well-established fact that all the Nashville ministers flock to hear a returned missionary. This however is sufficient to show that, though Southern Presbyterians, we do have the presence of men in our woman's missionary meetings. It may not be Church law but it is the Church spirit, and it is the spirit that edifieth.

Most humbly yours,
Missionary.

Baltimore in Summer.

The city is not chilly at this season—no need of blankets, and no suffering from coal famine. It is thought to be a good time to leave the city, and hence the preachers who desire a good time, leave it at this season. "Some fly East, and some fly West, and some fly over—" the Atlantic ocean. The vagrant minister, who is called in to fill the gap, as he looks over the wide sweep of vacant pews at 11 o'clock Sunday morning, is disposed to think that the preacher must have taken his congregation with him. Many city churches are coming to be like most of the streams of Palestine—winter torrents. The current shrinks as the hot season approaches until by and by the bed is dry. It is no uncommon thing for prominent churches to close their doors during the vacation of the pastor—sometimes for the purpose of having the walls frescoed afresh, or the carpet taken up, but at other times without any apology. In other cases the door is not entirely closed, but left ajar just the least little bit—one service a week at 11 o'clock Sunday morning, no evening service, no prayer-meeting, no Sunday-school, no meeting of any societies. The object is to preserve the continuity of life with the least possible effort—the stream must continue to flow tho' it be only in trickling drops. But the question arises, what is the use? Is it worth while to keep up this mere faint semblance of life? and probably the question will soon receive a negative answer, and the rule will prevail of shutting up the church during the pastor's absence.

Baltimore does not neglect her appearance because her people and preachers desert her in summer. She is still wearing the beautiful dress of green which she donned in May, and it is none the worse for wear, not a soil on it, nor is its freshness marred in the slightest. Perhaps this season has been exceptional, as the rains have been very abundant, but certain it is that the trees and grass and flowers of Park and Square are glorious in the vivid hues of fresh and vigorous life. Harlem and Eutaw Place and Druid Hill, if not equal to Eden are at any rate good enough for sinners. As an humble member of that large family, I wish to express my gratitude for the privilege of looking, without money and without price, on such beauty as would shame the brush of Apelles. Druid Hill Park contains seven hundred acres, in much of which, the incomparable charm of nature has been left intact. How delightful to lie flat of one's back on the soft tender grass beneath the wide-spreading boughs of a great oak, and look up through the gently waving leaves at the fleecy clouds drifting slowly across the far away sky, and dream over again the happy dreams of boyhood. Ah, me, those days of boyhood, like the sky, lie far, very far away, and are receding forever and forever. However, this has nothing to do with Baltimore.

Is not Baltimore called the "Monumental City?" Anyhow it has some monuments of interest. There is the Washington monument, on which the Father of his country stands like Simon Stylites, far above the dust and turmoil of the city, with his face turned toward the Chesapeake, and his gaze fixed steadfastly on the distant horizon, as if keeping watch against a foreign enemy. Then there is the Battle Monument, commemorating certain heroes who defended Fort Mchenry in the war of 1812, and kept the flag floating so that the captive, F. S. Key could see it through the early morning mist, and get his inspiration to write The Star-spangled Banner. It was permitted me to hear this national air discoursed by a splendid band, sitting on a platform at the base of this same monument.

Baltimore might with greater propriety than any city of my acquaintance be called "The City of Churches." It seems to me, it would average almost a church to a square. Many of these are Catholic, as might be expected when it is recalled that Lord Baltimore was a Catholic, and settled many Catholics in his colony. It may be as well to say in passing that while there is no evidence that he had any disposition to persecute his Protestant subjects, he was barred from the privilege of doing so by the stipulation of the king's grant. The Catholics are not entitled to the credit, which they are ever ready to claim, of being the first advocate of religious freedom on the American continent. If you muzzle a dog so that he can't bite, it is nonsense then to praise him for being harmless.

In the midst of this very large Catholic population, it was easy to keep posted with reference to the Pope's condition. Cardinal Gibbons lives in Baltimore and is easily the most distinguished citizen of the city. The public are supposed to be much interested in all that he says and does, and he and the Pope together furnished almost as much material as the Baltimore papers had room for. It required an immense amount of space to tell how good Leo XIII was. In view of the past history of the Papacy, it is not remarkable that Leo's goodness should have been emphasized as a rare bit of news. Think of the Pope who began his reign the same year that Columbus discovered America, Rodrigo Borgia, worthy father of Caesar Borgia, the most infamous name in all history, while Roman Catholicism, as a system of religion, is still a hideous caricature of Christianity, and an enemy of truth and righteousness, yet the Papacy, with the light of Protestant civilization falling on it, is constrained to a life of decency. If the Pope had moved his seat to the Philippine Islands, where his sway has been supreme and the Catholic religion dominant since the days of Philip II of Spain, he might have continued, down to our own day, to enjoy the large liberty of Alexander VI.

Among the many objects of interest in Baltimore, perhaps the first place should be given to our Southern Presbyterian preachers. There is W. H. Woods, with more poetry in his soul than even a certain editor that we know of, and that is saying much. He is no "mute, inglorious Milton," and such exacting critics as the Century and the Atlantic Monthly have valued his product above gold. Poetry is not the only thing that Woods has in his soul. He has gifts and grace that make him a good preacher, and a capital good all-round fellow. Then there is Bryon Clark of Mt. Washington. He is set on a beautiful hill, and is not trying to be hid. He has a small church, but it is all cream, and he is fat and flourishing. He has hustle in him, however, and I shall be surprised if he is not heard from soon in a field that will give wider scope for his aggressive spirit. Again, there is F. P. Ramsay, who years ago startled his friends by showing a disposition to do his own thinking. But he has long since demonstrated the fact that he is capable of doing his own thinking and can safely be left to do it, in fact, can safely be employed to do some for other people. He has just taken a good honest Ph. D. from a reputable University, and is resting a bit till he sees where the Lord would have him thrust in his sickle. Yet again, there is Harris E. Kirk, a mere boy,—it is only a little while since I took part in his licensure, and told him that his fluency might prove a snare to him, he could talk so readily he would hardly feel the need of ideas. But he has the ideas, and keeps the hopper full. As he is across the water, and presumably wandering far from the lines of travel amid the Grampian Hills, I may take the liberty of repeating what a most capable and trustworthy citizens of Baltimore said about him—he told me confidentially that Kirk was the best preacher in the city. He was not a member of Kirk's church either. Ought I not to mention our R. P. Kerr? He is just across the line, and the line does not mark a spiritual boundary. He told me, and I believe him, that he is still one of us in spirit. It was my privilege to have him minister to me in both spiritual and carnal things. On two Sunday nights I heard him preach, and one Sunday I helped him eat his birth-day dinner. On each of these occasions we had a feast of good things. Kerr preaches the truth just as straight and square as he learned it from R. L. Dabney. He does it with dead earnestness and without apology as if he really had no apology to offer. What is more, he has a large and growing congregation who listen to him with lively appreciation. His night congregation in July perhaps numbered 400, twice as large as the combined congregations of First Church and Brown Memorial, on the night when it was my privilege to hear a fine sermon in the First Church from Dr. Cranfield Jones. Finally, there is L. A. McLean of Dickeyville, a venerable co-temporary of mine, whose gray locks are telling on us. As a college boy he was a veritable Barbarossa, but now the red beard is missing, the mustache and hair have bleached, and no trace of my old friend is visible. It was very thoughtless in him to expose himself thus to the snows of age. People will suspect that some of the rest of us have travelled far from our youth. But McLean is robust in physique and young in heart, and is well spoken of by the brethren as one who is doing the work of our Lord faithfully. Clark.

Western Correspondence.

Your Correspondent has been on the wing most of the time since the adjournment of the General Assembly which closed its session the first days of June. A trip into Kansas for a month led us through Kansas City, Mo. This was the same week of the destructive flood which inundated most of the Central West. The flood had subsided at Kansas City so far as to permit passengers to cross the river into the city although the Union Depot was not yet open nor occupied. The scenes of desolation and destruction of property on every hand were appalling. It was the same all the way up the river through Lawrence to Topeka. North Topeka was almost entirely in ruins. In company with a resident minister we drove over a good part of the city north of the river. We were in Johnstown soon after the great flood there in 1889. There was this difference in the two cases. In the Johnstown flood, the water was clear and left every thing behind it swept clean. But at North Topeka there was a heavy deposit of mud and slime left in houses and every where most offensive and filthy. This left every thing in a miserable and wretched condition where the water subsided. I was told this deposit was heavy enough in many cases to smash the floor through and the basements of business houses were worst of all. The river left the main channel and cut its way through the finest part of the city in different places. This current was so swift that the work of rescuers was rendered difficult and dangerous. This accounts for the loss of life. High water marks may be seen a foot above parlor windows of houses still standing. Great gullies and pit holes were washed out on the streets, or anywhere the current struck with greatest violence. North Topeka presented a most pitiable sight even a month after the flood. But few people had returned to their homes even when the houses remained standing. But there is lots of grit and pluck in Kansas.

The valley of the Cottonwood was overflowed from bank to bank the entire length of the river. But while the water stood over the fields a few days, there was no current and it did not wash nor damage the crops.

In beautiful contrast with these scenes of destruction were the wheat fields of Kansas. It was wheat harvest when we crossed the State from East to West. It was a magnificent sight. Stretching away as far as the eye could carry were those vast fields of ripe, golden wheat. To our eye this is one of the most attractive scenes in nature. Colorado has much in store at this season for the travelers. The Rocky Mountains command the admiration of all people fortunate enough to visit them. The cooling breezes coming down from those lofty heights are especially welcome in the hot months of summer. On the Eastern side the greatest attractions are found at Canyon City, Colorado Springs, where you visit the garden of the gods, and ascend the lofty summit of Pike's Peak. Then 54 miles west of Denver you may ride up Silver Plume to a height of 9,176 feet above sea level. This is one of the most popular trips in Colorado, and is taken by most persons who visit Denver. But Estes Park nestled in the mountains with the mountains to the Northwest is one of the finest pieces of scenery in all our country. It differs from any thing else in the mountains. Entering the Park by the Big Thompson Canyon you have a full view of Toney's Peak said to be the highest and also one of the most beautiful of the entire snowy range. The Christian Endeavor convention held in Denver July 9th—13., was attended by many thousands of endeavorers gathered from all parts of the world. The Convention this year was international. The enrollment was probably about 8,000. The program was a good one and there was but few absent. The personnel of the Convention was fine. The best of spirit prevailed. Addresses of welcome were delivered by Governor Peabody, by Dr. Robert G. Coyte, moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, and Mr. Wm. G. Sweet of Denver. The Governor's address was a fine tribute to christianity, and that of Dr. Coyte was especially strong. Five responses in all were given, representing the North, South, East, West, England, India, Japan, Asia and Africa. One of these was by Rev. Ira Landrith, of Nashville, Tenn., who was very popular with the Convention. Rev. R. J. Campbell, the London divine, was much sought after. The Convention covered five days in all, but no services were held in the tent on Sabbath day. The pulpits were all filled by strangers and the Churches for the most part crowded. The impression made by the convention was spiritual and lasting. Denver gave a cordial welcome and received in return a rich blessing. It is a fine city—one of the finest in the land, but needs the moral and spiritual. They have wealthy churches, a magnificent State House, the finest scenery and a delightful climate, a productive system of irrigation and what is most wonderful of summer, swollen rivers, cool and sparkling, rushing down and out of the mountains in great torrents. The waters of these rivers are all distributed over the country by irrigation and the wilderness is made to blossom as the rose.

Two sorrowful events occurred worthy of notice: The final day of the Convention a lady was burned to death in the street. It is supposed she stepped on a match which set fire to her skirt and in the presence of many people she was burned so that she died the day following. The last day of the Convention the great tent was blown down. It is supposed about six thousand people were under it, but there was no panic, no screaming, no one killed. A dozen or more ladies were injured, but no one seriously so far as known. All recognized the protecting hand of a kind Providence in this preservation. God was glorified even by the wind.

Hands Off.

I was talking yesterday with a gentleman about the fact that suddenly the negro question, which I thought had at least temporarily been put to rest, had come to the front again and seemed the uppermost topic of public discussion.

After reflecting a minute the gentleman to whom I addressed my remark, said:

"The negro problem is never long in the background; when you think it has been laid to sleep it is found soon to be the liveliest thing in the country, and to make the loudest noise."

"There is one phase of the question," he continued, "that seems to have escaped the attention of all who have been discussing it, that was suggested to me by two recent paragraphs in the papers.

"Here is one from the Columbia (S. C.) State:

"The races were getting on pretty well before President Roosevelt and New England undertook to meddle with the negro problem. More harm has resulted in the last year than in a preceding decade."

The editor of the State says truly that we were getting on pretty well considering everything, before Mr. Roosevelt and the New England fanatics (the old Reconstruction fellows and their sons) meddled with our negro problem. From such meddling, on their part, in the reconstruction period, came lasting ills to both races and no good.

But the Roman Church, through her head, the pope, must needs meddle, too, in our affairs, as the following paragraphs from the press dispatches show:

"Rome, June 20.—Mgr. Haid, vicar apostolic, North Carolina, and Thomas St. John Gaffney of New York, were received in private audience by the Pope. To Bishop Haid the Pope expressed his full approval of the President's attitude on the negro question. The Pope said:

"When you return to your country please tell the President that I esteem and admire him greatly. He is a true leader of men."

The Bishop of Rome, it seems from this, has appointed the vicar apostolic of North Carolina, whatever that may be—internuncio to Theodore Roosevelt with instructions to tell him that his Holiness, the Pope, said: "I esteem and admire him greatly. He is a true leader of men," and to inform the president of the United States that his attitude, as president, on the negro question, has the Pope's approval. This last is archmeddling and violation of the fundamental principles of our government."

If by meddling with the negro problem by the president and New England fanatics, more harm has resulted in the last year than for a preceding decade, this published approval of the Pope's, through his messenger, of the President's attitude of meddling in our negro question is calculated to arouse infinitely more ill feeling and result in more harm to both races than has been experienced since New England fanatics meddled in our concerns prior to the war and after, during what is known as the Reconstruction Period."

If the Pope had spoken as Gioacchino Pecci, then his utterance of esteem and admiration of Mr. Roosevelt, through Bishop Haid, has no more weight than the words of other respectable Italians, for expressions of admiration and esteem of one good man for another are always in order.

But speaking as the Bishop of Rome, the infallible head of the Roman Church, through his internuncio, Bishop Haid, expressing his full approval of the President's attitude, as President, on an internal political problem that concerns us alone, is quite another matter.

This approval of President Roosevelt's negrophilism and meddling in our problem is the approval of the infallible head of the Roman church, and her disapproval of what we of the South have done. How long before we shall hear that the Sacred College of the Propaganda has issued ecclesiastical censure of our Grandfather clause?

Some four hundred years ago our Protestant forefathers, by acts of Parliament, prohibited papal interference in any act of the English government or Crown.

They and their fathers had greatly suffered thereupon. And the Bill of Rights, declared some three centuries ago, that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state or potentate has or ought to have any jurisdiction, power, supremacy or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm; that is in Protestant England or her colonies—these United States then included. Have we, their descendants, so soon forgotten?

And our own Bill of Rights, Sec. 3., Constitution of North Carolina, also declares that "the people of this State have the inherent, sole and exclusive right of regulating the internal government and policy thereof, and of altering and abolishing their constitution and form of government whenever it may be necessary for their safety and happiness." And we, the people, not Theodore Roosevelt and the Pope, are the safe judges of the necessity.

If the Pope assumes to approve the President's attitude on the negro problem he may disapprove; and so may the Czar of Russia, as head of the Greek Church, and so may any bishop, primate, metropolitan presbyter or prophet, priest or king. If the Pope may approve or disapprove in this negro question, Rome may also approve or disapprove any other act or policy of the President or of Congress, or any act or policy of any State in the Union, for example: He may disapprove Sec. 26 of our "Bill of Rights," entitled "Religious Liberty." Also Sec. 8., Article XIV, of the constitution of North Carolina. Entitled, "Intermarriage of Whites and Negroes Prohibited."

Taking this approval of the President's attitude as a precedent—and Rome knows well the use of precedent—some of us may live to hear the thunders of the Vatican censuring the attitude of the president and condemning the acts of Congress of these United States, or any question or policy of government that does not meet approval of the Sacred "Congregatio de Propaganda Fide." Rome may do here—has done just what our forefathers said the bishop of Rome should not do—inter-meddle with the concerns and government of this people."

Bishop Haid lives or comes among us. We are glad to have him come and welcome, as we welcome any other bishop, presbyter or preacher. He ought to know, does know, that this sort of inter-meddling on the part of a foreign prince, potentate, bishop or father—no odds what his title or nationality—in matters purely our own, is unwarranted interference and should not be tolerated."

We wonder if the descendant of the New Amsterdam Dutch Protestant was greatly tickled by this full approval of his attitude as president, by the late head of the Roman Church that was so motherly tender in her treatment of his forefathers?

If he values the esteem of the descendants of the English Puritans, the Scotch Covenanters, the Protestant Cavaliers, and the French Huguenots who have not forgotten St. Bartholomew, and he seems to keep his ear near the ground, he'd better look to the manner of and the source from whence comes approval of his attitude or internal political questions.

The common people, the God-fearing, tyranny-hating—whether civil or ecclesiastical tyranny—descendants of Protestants who fled from the Old World's tyranny of both sort, to this fair land of freedom, to work out this our salvation, like not this officious interference in our concerns by the bishop of Rome, great and good man tho he was or may be.

We have, with God's help, received by no other medium than through Christ Jesus direct, so managed as to solve all our problems to the upbuilding of this country and the preservation of liberty, civil and religious.

This negro problem is ours, the black product of Reconstruction meddling on the part of fanatics, wise-aces and knaves—and by the help of our God, the God of our fathers in the ancient times of trouble, without the intervention of bishop, priest, or king, we'll solve it with Justice and equity to both races.

Hands off, Rome, Roosevelt and the Rest—including therein the highly favored Thomas St. John Gaffney, of New York, whoever and whatever he may be (he was received in private audience by the Pope, I believe). Hands off! We want none, we'll have none of your intermeddling. Protest.

Rev. Charles Read Morton.

On the 20th of May 1865 Charles Morton was born at Compostella the family home, four miles east of Bethlehem church, in Charlotte county Virginia. When but a youth he made a profession of faith in Christ and united with Bethlehem church, of which his father was for many years an active and honored elder.

His collegiate training was received at Virginia Military Institute from which he was graduated. The writer's acquaintance with Mr. Morton began in the fall of 1891, when we together entered the Junior class of Union Seminary, at Hampden-Sidney, to begin our preparation in theology for our life-work. We completed our Seminary course together in 1894, and of the sixteen men in the class of that year, six became foreign missionaries.

In June 1894, Mr. Morton, Dr. C. C. Owen of our Corea Mission, and the writer were examined and orained at a called meeting of Roanoke Presbytery, held in Union Seminary chapel. He is the first of the six and the first of the three to be taken from the earthly to the heavenly services.

In the fall of 1894, he went to Richmond, Virginia, to spend the winter in the study of medicine that he might better fit himself for usefulness in missionary work, and while there he supplied the pulpit of Hoge Memorial church of which Rev. J. E. Cook is now pastor.

Both in Richmond, and in Patrick county where he spent one of his Seminary vacations in Home Missions work, the people among whom he labored soon learned to love him, and they still remember him with tender affection. In the spring of 1895 he married Miss Thompson of Rockbridge county, Virginia, and in June of that year they sailed to take up the work at Auguany left vacant by the death of Rev. John Boyle. Within four months after he went to Brazil he had made such progress in the language that he was able to preach his first sermon in Portuguese.

I am informed that during one year of his missionary labors in the Araguany field he had the unspeakable joy of receiving seventy-eight persons into the fold of Christ and another year more than fifty came into the church under his ministry. Under his wise training and prudent leadership the Araguany church grew and prospered, erecting a new church building and settling their own native pastor to go in and out among them.

In 1898 the rapid decline of Mrs. Morton's health made it imperative that she should immediately return to the United States. Mr. Morton at once set out with his wife and their little baby girl on the homeward voyage. But only a few days after reaching the home-land Mrs. Morton's spirit gently passed into the peaceful rest of the Home-land above. She died at Braehhead, the home of Mrs. Morton's sister, near Fredricksburg, Va.

Before returning to Brazil Mr. Morton pursued a course of post-graduate study which occupied several months. Some time after his return to Brazil he was transferred, in 1900, to Casa Branca where the remainder of his life was spent. In this field he had exceedingly arduous labors to undergo, persistent persecution from Romish priests and many trying experiences, but he more and more gained the confidence and esteem of the community and was enabled to accomplish much for the cause of Christ and His Kingdom, of truth and righteousness.

In 1901 Mr. Morton married Miss Lucy Hall whose parents went to Brazil several years ago from one of our Southern States. Mrs. Morton, with her two little children, one a daughter and the other son born since Mr. Morton's death and who has been given his father's name—Charles Read—is living at Villa Americans, Estate Sao Paulo, Brazil.

On Sunday June 21 memorial services were held in Bethlehem church where Mr. Morton in his youth united with God's people and within the bounds now live many of the family. Addresses were made on the personal characteristics of the man by Rev. J. H. Davis, and on his student life and missionary work, by the pastor of the church.

The following Sunday, June 28, we laid the body of Mr. Morton's mother to rest in the family burying ground in Charlotte county, Virginia. The body of the venerable mother who came to the grave in a full age and that of the son taken away in the prime of his manhood, lie thousands of miles apart, but their spirits rejoice together with Him in whose presence is fulness of joy and in whose right hand are pleasures forevermore.

When Bro. Morton was stricken down in April with fever and God took him, our Southern Brazil mission lost one of its most useful and active members and our Southern Presbyterian Church one of its most devoted and faithful ministers.

Of the three young men who have entered the ranks of the ministry from Bethlehem church in the last few years he is the first to be called away. May this not be God's way of reminding some that remain that the harvest is plenteous but the labors are few?

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

Suddenly the Woman Question is sprung on us again, and in the dry season, too.

We have an abundance of theory in the articles by Rev. S. F. Tenney and Rev. E. C. Gordon, D. D. We are especially glad to hear from Dr. Gordon again, as we feared that Achilles might be sulking in his tent after the ingratitude of the Lexington Assembly. And after the theories a beloved and useful missionary comes to the front with a few cold facts for our digestion and assimilation.

Isn't it mainly a quarrel about words? We all agree that a woman has no business "preaching" in the technical sense. And The Standard holds that the account which a missionary, male or female, may give of the work, is not preaching, even though the male missionary generally decorates the talk at the beginning with a more or less appropriate Scripture text.

Rev. W. H. McMaster always writes interestingly of the things he sees in his travels, especially those pertaining to Presbyterianism and the Kingdom. A lawyer of North Carolina sends us the vigorous protest, Hands Off. He calls particular attention to the fact that the late Pope had to put his finger into the negro problem, which would be about as easy a way to decimate the Catholic Church in the South as any other. But these things are not taken as seriously, sometimes, by the faithful as by those outside of "Holy Church."

And that is a worthy tribute to Rev. Charles Read Morton, who laid down his life in the foreign mission work.

PERSONALS.

The address of Rev. R. L. Wharton is changed from Caibarien to Cardenas, Cuba.

Rev. C. D. Waller has received a warm welcome from his new charge at Georgetown, Ky.

Rev. T. M. Lowrie, of Knoxville, Tenn., will supply the pulpit of the First Church, Nashville, during August.

Rev. Angus McDonald, of Nashville, Tenn., has accepted the call of the First Church, Jackson, Tenn., and will enter upon his labors September 1st.

Rev. P. H. Hensley, Jr., of the Cuban Mission, changes his address from Remedios to Camajuani, Cuba, where he has opened a new mission point.

Rev. Martin D. Hardin, of Minneapolis, Minn., who was recently called to the pastorate of the Second Church, Charlotte, filled its pulpit last Sunday morning and evening.

We are glad to know that Rev. J. B. Shearer, D. D., is improving at Spout Springs, Va. He writes that he "preached on August 2d in a Methodist meeting, and was not worsted by it."

Rev. S. C. Alexander, of Pine Bluff, Ark., has completed fifty years in the ministry. He has labored in North Carolina, Texas, Missouri, Alabama and Arkansas, and in addition to his pulpit work, he has written "The Stone Kingdom" and "The Gospel in Genesis."

The following ministers are now taking their vacations: Rev. R. A. Brown, of Waycross, Ga., at Greensboro, N. C.; Rev. A. F. Carr, of Mobile, Ala., in Europe; Rev. C. E. Cunningham, of Yazoo City, Miss., at 154 LaFayette Ave., Detroit, Mich; Rev. J. Walter Cobb, of Morrilton, Ark., at Weir, Miss.; Rev. J. K. Roberts, of Carthage, N. C., at Chattanooga, Tenn.; Rev. W. E. Boggs, of Jacksonville, Fla., at Waynesville, N. C., route No. 3; Rev. R. F. Kirkpatrick, of Wapanucka, I. T., at Sherman, Texas, No. 19 Grand Ave.; Rev. D. P. Junkin, of Huntsville, Texas, at Lexington, Va.

MISSOURI.

ST. CHARLES.—The church at this place has recently given a unanimous call to Rev. B. C. Bell, of Hughesville, Mo. Mr. Bell has signified his acceptance of the call, subject to the action of Lafayette Presbytery, which meets September 1st.

CAPE GIRARDEAU.—Rev. J. L. Alsworth, pastor of this church, was drowned July 29. The report in the daily paper was that late Wednesday evening he went out bathing in the Mississippi river alone; when he did not return a search was made for him and his clothes were found on the bank of the river. At last reports his body had not been found. This is a sad blow to the church, which seemed to have greatly prospered under his ministry, and especially to his wife, who is left with two little children.

CROCKER.—A meeting of four days was held at this place including the first Sabbath of August. Mr. Byrns, who is in charge of this field, was assisted by the Superintendent of Home Missions. Communion was administered on Sunday and two young persons received into the church. And the people are much encouraged.

ST. LOUIS, GRAND AVENUE CHURCH.—At the communion the first Sunday of August two persons were received on profession of faith. During the absence of the pastor, Dr. Cannon, at Ocean Grove, the church will be supplied two Sundays by Rev. Wilson Aull, of Worthington, Minn., and two Sundays by Rev. J. J. Hill, of Liberty, Missouri.

The many friends of Dr. R. P. Farris, Stated Clerk of the General Assembly, will be sorry to hear of his continued and severe illness. He has not been well for more than a year; some serious stomach trouble. He was hardly able to attend the last meeting of the Assembly at Lexington, Va., but went and faithfully and promptly performed all his duties of clerk, though a great sufferer all the while. Since his return to St. Louis he has been confined to his house, and is now in a very critical condition. The sympathy and prayers of all his brethren will be freely given him and his family at such a time as this.

NORTH CAROLINA.

WILLIAMS MEMORIAL.—On the fourth Sunday in July we began a week's services at Williams Memorial Church. Rev. D. B. McGeachy was with us and preached most acceptably. There were five additions to the church on profession of faith in Christ and one by certificate. Bro. McGeachy took one day to present the 20th century cause and received subscriptions to the amount of $172.50.

HENDERSON.—Three new members were welcomed into the church Sunday, August 2, on confession of their faith, making five that we have received since our last communion service, two months ago. The pastor, Rev. J. H. Henderlite, is now taking his vacation in the mountains of Virginia.

STEELE CREEK.—Rev. J. H. Thornwell, D. D., assisted the pastor of the Steele Creek Church in communion services on the first Sunday of August. Preaching began on Thursday preceding the communion, and was very instructive, helpful and edifying. Eight persons were received into the communion of the church—one by letter and seven by profession of faith—and three children were baptized since our last communion season. This church recently enjoyed an excellent sermon by Rev. E. Douglass Brown, a son of an honored elder of Steele Creek. We rejoice in his successful work at Kinston, N. C., where he is the faithful pastor.

ASHPOLE.—We have recently had a very interesting and helpful Sabbath School Institute at Ashpole Church under the auspices of Fayetteville Presbytery. We had with us Revs. J. K. Roberts, the chairman of the Sabbath School Committee of the Presbytery; Dr. H. G. Hill, and D. Munroe and Mr. Wm. Laurie Hill. These brethren all rendered valuable service and made the Institute a most helpful one.

An Opportunity for Missionary Societies,

Rev. S. P. Verner, of Tuscaloosa, Ala., former missionary to Africa, will be in North Carolina during August and will be glad to lecture and exhibit his stereopticon views. Mr. Verner has been in Asheville since the 7th and may be addressed at Columbia, S. C., at once. He will lecture before the Woman's Missionary Union of Fayetteville Presbytery, August 26th, and if arranged at once, dates can be given until that time.

In an especial way Mr. Verner belongs to North Carolina. While engaged in his chosen work of helping to cure "the open sore of the world," he was wounded and so affected with malaria that he had to come home to recruit. Understanding the problems of that vast continent and possessing an intelligent sympathy, as well as a pleasing address, the coming of Mr. Verner to any church will mean an increased interest in missions and a broadened outlook.

Those whose hearts burn within them for the widening of the Kingdom are awaiting with eagerness the appearance of his book, "Pioneering in Central Africa," which is now in the hands of the printer.

No admission fee. Voluntary offerings.

An Appeal to Each Member of the Presbyterian Church.

It will be remembered that on the night of December 23, 1901, the laundry building and much of the clothing of the children were destroyed by fire. Since that date all laundry work has been done at great inconvenience and not without danger to the health of those upon whom it falls—the larger girls of the Orphans' Home.

Previous to the fire a part of the legacy of $5,000, left by the late S. P. Alexander, of Charlotte, had been set aside by the Board of Regents to erect an industrial building to perpetuate the memory of Mr. Alexander, the remainder of the legacy having been expended in the purchase of lands greatly needed by the Home and then on the market. The destruction of the laundry building before the plans for the Alexander Industrial building were adopted made it both a matter of economy and convenience to include the laundry in this building, and so a larger and more expensive building had to be erected. A good two-story brick building, covered with slate and desirably located, has been erected, but the hull of the building is all that we have. No sash in the windows, no doors, no floor; in fact, no inside work of any kind has yet been done. The building has been planned to include all the industrial features of the institution of a mechanical kind, including printing office, shoe shop, wood-working, and so forth. To finish the building and thoroughly furnish it will require about $3,000, which we hope will be speedily raised, but the immediate and urgent need is money enough to enclose the building, lay the floors and fit up the laundry part of it. With $1,000 or $1,500 we could do much, and at least arrange to protect our girls while doing the heavy laundering for our large number of children. This should be done by all means before winter sets in.

When it is remembered that almost all the buildings here have been gifts of individuals and that no call has been made upon the Church at large except for current expenses for some years, it would seem no heavy burden to meet this urgent call of a cause so dear to every Presbyterian in the Synod, and which has been so signally owned and blessed by the Father of the Fatherless. If every pastor in the Synod will present this matter from his pulpit to his people and instruct the deacons, or the suitable persons, to wait upon the people for a contribution to this cause the whole amount will be speedily raised. The Church has never failed to respond to an appeal in behalf of the fatherless, and it will not do so now if the matter shall be earnestly and fully presented. If the plan suggested by Mr. George Allen in the last issue of The Standard should be acted upon, there will be no difficulty about it. How many churches will undertake to contribute as much as $100 to this cause? How many $50, $25, $10, $5? How many individuals will not wait for a church collection, but send an individual contribution at once that work may be resumed? Summer is passing and winter is coming apace. "He gives twice who gives quickly." Double your contribution by making it at once, and may He who sat over against the treasury note your gift and bless you in it.

Yours in the care of the fatherless,

R. W. Boyd, Supt. Orphans' Home.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

SMYRNA.—We have just closed a delightful meeting at Smyrna church. The meeting lasted four days, beginning on Saturday before the first Sabbath of August, and continued until Tuesday night. The pastor did all the preaching and was faithfully aided by the eldership of the church. God's spirit was present throughout the meeting, as was shown by the good attention to the preached word, and the members that joined. There were ten accessions, all by profession and mostly from the Sabbath School. To God be all the praise.

Fraternally,

R. C. Ligon.

South Carolina Presbytery will meet at Liberty, S. C., September 2, 1903.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Little Trip up the Big Sandy.

As our Field Secretary, Mr. Murdoch, was fully occupied at our new college in the Cumberlands, I thought some one ought to visit our missions on the Big Sandy river, so I concluded to go myself.

A hundred miles brought me to Catlettsburg, at the mouth of the river. I was glad to find Bro. Boggs building a new home, more in proportion to his size and dignity and worth. I need not say it will be a big house.

The evening train on the Chattaroi road took me to its terminus at White House, fifty-four miles up the river.

The lower Sandy Valley is beautiful, with its rolling green hills and picturesque homes. A lovely little white chapel was honored with the name of Bishop Kavanaugh, my father's friend and mine, "who being dead, yet speaketh."

At the mouth of the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy, we passed Louisa, a nice town in a green valley. It was my first visit to Louisa, though once before I started to go to see her with a company of friends in 1863, but she had more company who objected, and we deferred our call until later.

About 10 o'clock the next morning, Bro. Howes, our missionary, came for me in his buggy. We crossed the river where Mr. Dollarhide and his friends lost their lives in a house boat saloon. They were killed by some other friends who drank too much of Dollarhide's whiskey, it was said. We got our dinner at a wayside hotel, and drove ten miles up the river over hills and through clouds of dust to Paintsville, on the Big Paint, the capital of Johnson county.

The prospect of the railroad had infused new life and noise into the quiet mountain village, and lots had gone up to city prices. We had time only to call on Bro. West, of the M. E. Church, and passed on up the Paint and Burnett's Fork to Oil Spring, nine miles further, over rough mountain road. I saw but one thing on the long way worthy of mention. On a mountain brow I noticed a beautiful stone mausoleum. It was so unique and unusual, I stopped to see its builder, the aged Charles Green Rule, who took five hundred hard earned dollars to honor the memory of his faithful wife. For fifty years or more, she had lovingly and patiently filled her humble station as wife and mother, and this gentle old man did all he could to show his appreciation of her worth. I honor him for it.

Night brought us to the humble three room cottage of Mr. Howes, and I needed no opiate to help me sleep that night.

Two appointments at the Camp Ground school house, in Magoffin county, gave me occupation for the next day and night. The old camp ground had been abandoned, but a large school house accommodated a good congregation of the attentive mountaineers.

I preached twice on the Sabbath to large crowds, in spite of a big "foot washing" in the neighborhood. After our services a large number confessed Christ. Sunday night I returned to the Oil Spring, where there are a few houses, but no oil spring. Names are sometimes as deceiving as some people, and that suggests that Henry Howes, the father of our missionary, a venerable and intelligent old man, told me his name was originally Howe, but how Howe became Howes, he did not know. So Napier has become Napper and Nipper up here.

On Sunday I preached morning and evening at Oil Spring to fine congregations, largely of young people. Rev. Messrs. Williams and Moore, of Salyersville, came over (8 miles) to the services, and gave us valuable assistance. They need great help in this large field. An aged native told me that Paint Creek, which is sometimes a river, fifty miles long, is almost destitute of intelligent Gospel preaching. There are two or three churches on its long course belonging to brethren who oppose Sunday Schools and missions and education, in spite of all gospel teaching and God's commandment. To escape this suicidal policy, some of the people have organized a "Come-out Society" as a protest, and the only church on upper Big Paint is "Jack's Church," with no other name or connection. Jack built it and runs it, I trust, for the glory of God and the salvation of his neighbors.

The people through all this back country are generally very poor, unable to provide educated preachers or teachers. As a general thing, they are not so lawless and violent as further back in the Cumberlands, but they are sadly in need of help.

It is next to impossible to get any one to conduct a Sabbath School or teach the scores of bright mountain boys and girls. If ever their ancestors possessed it, it is a "lost art" among their children. It is pitiful to see thousands of these strong, bright, resolute mountain children grow up with little or no training to make them valuable Christian men and women. Unless they get help from beyond their mountains, generations of them will perish in their sins. Who is responsible?

We are trying with the help of God, and some good people, to supply this crying need, and send the Bread of Life to those who are starving at our doors.

We have made arrangements to place three more consecrated workers in this field. Begging the help of your prayers and alms for these, and sixty other faithful missionaries of the Soul Winners' Society, I am Truly your fellow servant,

EDWARD O. GUERRANT, Wilmore, Ky.

A Model Sunday School Building.

The latest would-be complete Sunday School building is the one just erected by the First Presbyterian Church of Greensboro, N. C., under the pastoral leadership of Dr. Egbert W. Smith, author of "The Creed of Presbyterians," and in large part also of the interior plan of this Sunday School.

The plan seeks to combine the best attainments of modern Sunday School architecture with original features of its own.

And, by the way, the name Sunday School, to designate this familiar department of church work, Dr. Smith objects to. He says it ought to be called Bible School; that the distinctive thing about it is not the day it meets, but the Book it studies, and that not till it is known and thought of as the Bible School will it have its rightful prominence and congregational breadth of membership.

The new building reproduces the Romanesque architecture of the church. Connected by an ornate cloister-way forty feet long, the two look like twin sisters and, together, form an imposing and harmonious whole. The distance apart prevents one building from shadowing the windows of the other, while through the cloister on wet or snowy Sundays, the inmates of one at the close of its services, can pass to the succeeding services of the other without exposure to the weather.

The purpose of the new building is, therefore, to provide the most perfect possible facilities for the study of the Bible by the whole congregation, young and old; to serve as a nursery and training school of their spiritual life and activities; and to minister, as far as may advance the above chief ends, to the social and intellectual needs of the congregation. There are nearly forty apartments in the building, and its total cost, complete and furnished throughout, is about thirty thousand dollars.

The Sunday School room proper is on the semi-circle plan, the outer walls running parallel for twenty-two feet after completing a half-circle of thirty-nine feet radius. The main auditorium on the first floor seats about 250, exclusive of the large rostrum. Opening into the auditorium and shut off from it by curtains running by wheeled brass rings on a brass rod, are twelve class rooms. Of these, the primary class room on the right of the rostrum seats 180 children, the outer wall being set back eighteen feet to increase its capacity; the kindergarten room on the left of the rostrum, seats seventy-five; and the other ten class rooms seat twenty or twenty-five each.

The two departments, primary and kindergarten, are shut off from the main auditorium not only by curtains, but also by a recently invented style of folding doors running on ball bearings overhead, whose working is a marvel of ease and smoothness. Thus the singing of the little folks cannot disturb the other classes during recitation, while nevertheless all departments can worship together in the opening exercises. Moreover, the primary and kinergarten rooms are furnished each with its own independent door of entrance and exit, so that tardy or restless members of either class can come and go without entering or passing through the main auditorium.

All the partitions between the first floor rooms are on the radii of a circle whose centre is the speaker's stand on the rostrum. When, therefore, the curtains and folding doors are drawn back, the inmates of all the twelve class rooms are given equal and easy view of the superintendent. The whole first floor can thus be transformed into an admirable auditorium for mass meeting purposes with a seating capacity of nearly 700. When only the inner semi-circle of 250 capacity is to be used, for church prayer meetings or the like, a small platform one foot high, on rollers, is drawn out from the base of the rostrum.

The unique and original feature of this building is the arrangement of the upper class rooms. Looking up from the rostrum one sees a semi-circular gallery, with an overhang of nine feet, rising steeply, tier on tier, as in a theater, seated with opera chairs, every one of which commands an excellent view of the rostrum. Around the lower front part of the gallery runs a walkway three feet wide. Under and behind the gallery are fifteen class rooms, each entered from the walkway by going down four steps through an opening in the gallery tiers. The two-foot-wide doorway into each room is closed by a sliding curtain instead of a door, to prevent possible slamming of the latter. At one end of the walkway, but not under the gallery, is another room, making sixteen upper rooms in all. The two of these that are situated over the primary room, seat 65 each, and can be thrown together if desired. The fourteen other upper rooms vary in seating capacity from fifteen to thirty. When the whole school worships together, the upper room classes occupy the lower front opera chairs of the gallery, from which, at the tap of the bell, half a dozen steps take each class into its own apartment.

This arrangement of class rooms and gallery has two advantages. First, it makes the upper class rooms the best in the school, because the most completely secluded by their construction and position from all noises. Second, it doubles the value of the building as an auditorium for preaching, concerts, lectures, mass meetings of all kinds, by adding to it a gallery capacity of over 600, raising the total capacity of the building to not far from 1,400. It should be added that each end of the gallery walkway is connected by a narrow descending stairway with the rostrum, this enabling the Sunday School officers to reach the upper class rooms almost as easily as the lower.

Every class room, both above and below, even the smallest, has a large double window opening directly on the outer air, and the building is so situated that nearly every room at some hour of the day is flooded with sunshine. The larger rooms have from two to five windows each.

All rooms are equipped with cabinet maps and blackboards, and with electric bells wired to a button on the superintendent's desk. Electric arrangements are also provided for stereopticon exhibitions. All rooms have picture moulding on the wall as an encouragement to each class to adorn its class home in its own way.

The building has four entrances, one on the north, one on the south, and two on the west. It is heated by steam, lighted by gas and electricity, and ventilated according to scientific sanitary methods, the foul air being withdrawn through a large vent stack by an artificially produced air current.

Stained glass of rich and delicate design is used throughout. When the curtains and folding doors are thrown back and the room converted into one great auditorium, the light and color effect is strikingly beautiful. In addition to the seventeen Romanesque double windows below, there are sixteen circular windows of 42 inches diameter in the upper part above the gallery tiers, while from the centre overhead there falls a glory of softly tinted light through a great rose window nine feet in diameter. Except this last, all the windows in the building are hinged or pivoted to admit air as well as light when desired, and all the upper room windows have movable transoms in addition. Moreover, on hot summer days or when the house is warmly packed at night, the opening of the windows of the sixteen upper class rooms converts the doorway of each into a great fresh air inlet, whose current strikes directly upon no one in the audience.

One word as to other features of the building:

The main west entrance leads into a reception hall, to the right of which are two library and reading rooms, kept open until 10 p. m. every week day, while on the left is the ladies' parlor, for missionary and other society meetings, with seating capacity of over 100. The rooms are connected by sliding doors and can be thrown into one for receptions.

In the basement, which is one-half above ground and well lighted and ventilated, is a large room 30 by 92 feet, with complete kitchen attachment and divisible at will into two rooms, intended for class banquets, missionary and congregational societies, children's festivals, and Christmas trees, a gymnasium, and other purposes. It has three entrances, two from the halls above, and one from the outside.

The pastor's study is on the second floor, and a climb to the top of the tower brings one to a small roof garden, whence a beautiful and extended view of the city and surrounding country may be obtained.

The influence of such a building as this is incalculable.

Through coming generations it will promote in the most effective way the highest interests of the congregation and community, and above all it will serve as an impressive reminder to the Church at large, that, in this day of universal educational revival and advance, the Church of Christ, to maintain and make manifest among men the primacy of the moral and spiritual, must devise as liberal things for her Bible School as other agencies are doing for secular education.

It is a fitting tribute that this beautiful building is a memorial to Dr. J. Henry Smith, father of the present pastor, who was for nearly forty years the beloved pastor of this church.

OPEN AIR AND TENT MEETINGS IN PHILADELPHI
Philadelphia, no doubt, leads in open air and tent meetings in this country.

Through the kindness of the superintendent of the Police, Harry M. Quirk, and his loyal assistants on last Sabbath (July 26), at the request of the Presbyterian Evangelistic Committee, careful statistics were gathered from all parts of the city. It was found that within the bounds of the city of Philadelphia, 127 open air and tent meetings were conducted with an aggregate attendance of nearly 25,000 people.

A curious international exposition is to be held next fall in the Imperial Palace of St. Petersburg. The undertaking is called "The Child's World." According to the Russian consul general at New York, there will be a complete picture of child life from birth to school days—nourishment, dress, instruction, physical and moral education, and in fact all the surroundings of the early years of life.

An Odessa dispatch describes the situation in Russia as alarming. It says the striking dockers were attacking shops and throwing their contents into the sea. The rioters put the chief of police to flight, made anti-strike proclamations and threatened to set the city on fire. At the first shot at the troops the Jewish population became panic-stricken and many fled afoot, seaward, as the railroads were stopped.

The British House of Commons recently gave a banquet to the arbitration group of the French Chamber of Deputies, formed not long since by Baron d'Estournelles, to further the principles of international arbitration. Following close upon the exchange of visits by King Edward and President Loubet, this is significant of the good feeling that is growing up between these ancient enemies. Baron d'Estournelles is a member of The Hague arbitration tribunal.

The Robert Browning Settlement, in Walworth, London, is unique in having a Christian brotherhood as its purpose. The population in this part of the city is 230 to the acre. The Browning tavern has just been completed at a cost of $25,000. Cheap meals are furnished, a portion of the building is used as a library, 120 crippled children are taught, and 6,519 free medical consultations were given last year. The avowed purpose of its members is "to take up the cross and follow Christ."

An Alaska-Siberian railway is contemplated by French and Russian capitalists. If built, it will run under Behring Strait. One of the conditions made by the Russian Government is, that the United States will neutralize Behring Strait so that in the event of war no advantage would be given to the enemies of Russia. It looks improbable, in view of the fact that 5,200 miles of railway and a tunnel 60 miles in length will be needful to connect Vancouver with the present terminus of the Trans-Siberian system.

Galveston, Texas, is making an interesting experiment in municipal government. After the floods of 1900, a new charter was secured which abolished the board of aldermen and mayor and placed the government in the hands of a committee of five, three to be appointed by the Governor of the State and two to be elected by the city. The president of the commission—one of the Governor's appointees—receives $3,000, and the others $500. This charter has been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court.

Dr. George Cohen, an Allegheny inventor, has recently announced the perfection of an invention which promises to overcome the defects of the railroad block system, by electricity. A broken rail, for instance, will be the means of throwing the system into operation, and a train moving along in the vicinity of the danger will be stopped automatically. This invention was demonstrated some time ago in the presence of a number of railroad men, and at that time it was pronounced to be a remarkable device.

The latest authentic data concerning Mr. Edison's storage battery are found in the following interview published in the New York Times: "The popular impression seems to be that my new storage battery was more or less a possibility, but that it began and ended there. That is not so—one of them has been in operation for the last three weeks in one of Altman's delivery wagons, and is doing all that I expected and claimed for it. There is a great deal to be said for the new battery, and all in its favor. It will average more than a third greater mileage for half the weight than will the old lead battery. It has an additional advantage inasmuch as it can be recharged at a much faster rate than the old battery. As much electricity as will send the motor forty miles can be put in it in less than an hour. Ever since I took up this problem of the greater capacity battery, I have worked with the idea of using it for street locomotion—in automobiles and trolleys. And now the auto battery is finished. Last Monday three friends and myself took a trial run to Atlantic City."

At last the scheme for bringing water to the arid West Australian goldfields has been brought to a successful close, and thousands of gallons daily pour through the large iron pipes into the Coolgardie reservoirs. How the hearts of the prospectors in the early days would have leaped to hear the sound!

A new group of tombs is now being explored in the Forum, the date of some of which may ascend to several centuries before the foundation of Rome. The passages which extend under the Forum are also being investigated, and in them have been found some of the tools and instruments used in the great games and gladiatorial shows which used to be the joys of the Roman people.

The proposed canal between the Forth and Clyde would result in a saving or distances, according to the Scientific American, as follows: From the Clyde to ports on the east coast of Scotland, northeast of England, and northwest of Europe the distance saved would be from 529 miles to 238 miles. From the Forth to ports on the west coast of Scotland, northwest of England, Ireland, America, and the Mediterranean the distance saved would be from 487 to 141 miles; in all cases, except the American and Mediterranean route, the distance being more than halved. Tyne ports to the St. Lawrence river, the distance saved would be 150 miles. West of Britain and northeast of Ireland to middle western ports of the Continent, the distance saved would be from 377 to 98 miles. The canal will affect an enormous tonnage, estimated by the sanguine engineers at 9,500,000 tons per annum. At an average rate per ship and cargo of 1s. 6d (36 cents) per ton, this would yield a revenue of about £700,000 ($3,406,550).

Frank P. Sargent, Commissioner General of Immigration, regards the increasing tide of immigrants to this country as a national danger. In commenting on the figures made public a few days ago by the Board of Immigration, showing that during the fiscal year ending June 30 the number of foreigners admitted exceeds that of any other year in the history of this country, he declares that "immigration under present conditions presents a most serious problem," and that "unless something is done to check the unprecedented influx of an undesirable foreign element, a very grave danger threatens our country." "No one can sit at this desk," adds Mr. Sargent, "and absorb the facts that come to us in reports on every phase of the immigration question, without appreciating the peril that threatens should hard times come to this country. I am not an alarmist, but when I see hundreds of thousands of ignorant foreigners crowding in our great cities every year, I think I can realize the degree the danger that will come from their dissatisfaction when there are no wages to be had. The social papers look upon the situation with even more alarm than we do. Nearly all of them call for a better immigration law, one that will make it impossible for immigrants to gain admission unless they have property and reach a certain standard of intelligence and efficiency. The number of admissions during the past year was 857,046. This is 208,303 more than for the year previous, and 68,054 more than in 1882, which, until now, has been the record year in our foreign immigration.—Literary Digest.

Temperance.

It gives me pleasure to announce that Mr. W. M. Hinton has accepted the position of State Organizer for the North Carolina Anti-Saloon League. He is ready for work, and will visit any place where he is needed.

I will continue to do the office work of the League, and at present am engaged in the task of appointing five committeemen for each county in the State. I am glad to say that excellent committees have been appointed for fifty counties, and from one end of the State to the other there is unprecedented enthusiasm.

My plan is to organize every town and township in the Commonwealth. I hope that the religious leaders of the people will encourage them to respond to my call. This is distinctly a movement of the religious denominations in North Carolina.

For the present our expenses amount to about $200.00 a month. I hope the friends of temperance will see that this amount is raised and promptly paid. I am doing my work without salary, but I want to pay our postage bills promptly, and I want to pay our State Organizer and attorneys in full every month.

Elections have been called at Elizabeth City, Washington, Weldon, Goldsboro, Kinston, Benson, Rocky Mount, Roxboro, Raleigh, Durham, Salisbury, Wadesboro, and a number of other places.

I hope that the friends of temperance in every county in the State will call a convention at the earliest possible date.

The following gentlemen are available to make speeches: Hon. H. A. London, Pittsboro; Hon. J. A. McCall, Charlotte; Hon. T. M. Hufham, Hickory; Hon. W. C. Douglass, Raleigh; Hon. W. A. Dunn, Scotland Neck; Hon. Q. K. Nimocks, Fayetteville; Hon. D. T. Oates, Fayetteville; Hon. J. A. Oates, Fayetteville; Hon. H. A. Page, Aberdeen; Dr. J. C. Kilgo, Trinity College; Rev. A. J. McKelway, Charlotte; Rev. Braxton Craige, Rocky Mount; Rev. J. O. Atkinson, Elon College; Mr. R. B. White, Franklinton; Rev. D. H. Tuttle, Elizabeth City; Hon. A. M. Scales, Greensboro; Col. F. P. ### The Postmistress of Knockagar.

By Senmas MacManus, in The Outlook.

Of course, in formal compliance with the regulations, Nancy—our postmistress was Nancy, Nancy Kelly had a slot in the window, ostensibly for the purpose of posting the letters. But scarcely a soul at the Boch had the hardihood—'the barefaced impertience,' Nancy styled it—to make use of this convenience. Under cover of night, or taking mean advantage of Nancy's temporary absence (perhaps she had run over to Jamie Mor's to ask the time on their clock, or down to Toal-a-Gallagher's to learn if the designs of Frank Mulrinny had transpired—the outline of a quart-bottle in his coat-pocket having been seen by all the world as he went off in the direction of Dhrimore where he courted, on the evening before), unprincipled people had dropped letters in the slot in the window. But these people invariably lived to regret the insult offered to an unoffending woman. Nancy held over such a letter, till, by linking bits and scraps of circumstantial evidence and by calling in experts upon handwriting, she ran the rascal to earth, and got from him a voluntary confession and abject apology—when, however, both were too late to bespeak any mitigation of her contemptuous and scathing denunciation.

"There's a door to me house, built big enough to let in both the letter an' the letter-carrier; an' if I'm good enough to send off their letters to the other end of the wrrrl' an' further, I'm surely fit to have the letter handed into me hand." Thus Nancy expounded the ethics of letter-posting. "There's no plague in my house. An' I'm sartint there's none can cast up to me that I ever questioned them what was inside of their letter." This last statement was strictly true. Nancy never did ask any one concerning the contents of his letter; yet, strange to say, there were few brave enough to hand Nancy Kelly a letter and meet her eye unflinchingly, and then turn and walk out without volunteering information which Nancy would 'sooner pnt her fnt in the fire than ax.'

When one who knew his business went to Nancy's post-office with a letter, he first swapped salutations with Nancy, and then accepted the proffered chair and gave and got the news of their respective parts of the parish before remarking that he was thinking of posting a letter. If Nancy then nodded approbations—almost always she graciously did—Denis (say) then produced the letter, and, turning it round and over, informed her that it was to be sent to Iowa in the States, to Tibnik, to young Jimmy. Nancy, by repeated nods of her head, signified that she noted all this and would remember it. Denis then handed it to her, inquiring how much the damage would be to bring it to Iowa. And he went on to tell about Jimmy's affairs, in particular how he stood pecuniarily.

"It was Molly Magroarty, Nelly's daughter, that wrote the letter. (She's a purty han' at the pen, in throth, for her age.) I axed her to let Jimmy know that Log John Meeha's park, at our own me'rin, is to be soul'—for poor John, God help him! isn't prosperin' lately—an' to tell him that if he had twinty poun' or so to spare, he could do worse ron put it into Long John's park. That's all." Denis made sure to thank Nancy and express his sense of gratitude for the obligation she put him under, before he took his leave. There was not any use trying to equivocate concerning the contents of a letter, for Nancy could read any man 'like a ha'peny hook,' as she said herself, though he were as deep as a tailor's thimble. If a reckless one dared, once in a while, to risk an untruth, Nancy just lifted her gray eye and fixed it on him, and made him wince as if she had been sticking a pin in his heart.

Jimmy the Post brought out the mails, often a whole dozen, and sometimes as many a sixteen and even eighteen letters, to Nancy's office from Dongal once a week. No one had the impertinence to go seeking for a letter on arrival day—and, indeed, if they did, their journey would be deservedly fruitless. The right of one day's grace wherein Nancy might scrutinize the superscription and postmarks and speculate upon the probable contents of letters was a prerogative which not even the most punctilious would dream of denying the postmistress. Charlie the Nadger once, seeking his letter, walked in as Jimmy the Post walked out; Nancy withered him up with one look and dismissed him with the contemptuous query: 'A letter? Musha, who do ye think would send the laces i' you a letter?' And by way of admonition to Charlie and all the precipitate in her district, she (very properly, as I think) delivered his letter to him fourteen days after its arrival. It contained his passage money. And Charlie thanked God that he was soon to be beyond Nancy's jurisdiction.

When Nancy did graciously bestow a letter on an inquirer, common politeness, of course, not to mention Nancy's eye, required that the letter should then and there be opened and its contents discussed. Pathrick Martin, of Augherly, though, was an unprincipled man, and when he got the letter from Annie from Cincinnati which, as he anticipated, contained confidences about Annie's trials with her Dutch husband who drank, he slipped the missive into his pocket with an assumption of unconsciousness that, in an honorable cause, had done him credit and then he made a bold attempt to retire under cover of an irregular fire of remarks upon indifferent subjects. And as, despite Nancy's dry, monosyllabic replies, he still continued to edge towards the door, she brought her cold gray eye to bear upon him with such deadly precision that Pathrick, in another moment, awoke to the full extent of his meanness, dropped into a providential chair, and remembered the letter with suspicious suddenness; he drew it out and implored Nancy to do him the particular favor of reading it for him.

Dan Mac a-Nirn made a sweetheart for himself when he was hired up the Pettigo way. She was both wise and well-to-do; and so, when Dan returned home, he thought to correspond with her with matrimonial intentions. Under protest, Nancy Kelly despatched two of poor Dan's love-missives and delivered to him two replies. But she put down her foot when Dan came along with a third—an epistle upon which he had had John the Tailor working for three nights, and had fed him with whiskey all the time to give John the necessary inspiration, and which had been called by the proud author "a triumph iv jaynins." She got Dan seated in the corner and stood over him with arms akimbo. "I'll tell ye what it is, Dan Mac a-Nirn," she said, "ye're only makiu' a plaisham iv me an' me post-office. I'll neither take nor give any more blatherskiteu' letters. If every other fool in the country begun takin' afther you every time thy're in a coortiu' way, my six ponn' a year would be hard-earned money. Go away about yer business now; an' go home, an' put that letter in yer fist behind the fire; an' if ye want a wife (though, in troth, when ye have yer mother an' yer sister to look afther, ye're married enough)—but if ye must have a wife, look about in yer neighborhood an' ye'll get wan be waggin' yer finger; there's Hnghie Shan's daughter Mar'get—why don't ye take her? or Shsan Doherty iv the Roadside? Away with ye, now; an' take good advice when it's given ye for nothing." Dan, poor fellow! sighed and went home; and married Hnghie Shan's daughter Mar'get sooner than want; and a girl at Pettigo, probably for long and long, walked away heartless from her post-office—and doesn't know to this day that 'twas the tyranny of Nancy Kelly, and not the fickleness of Dan, that has left her pining.

To open and read all newspapers without the necessity of the addresses presence was a prerogative assumed by Nancy naturally. When the paper (always an American one) contained minute and graphic details of the latest spioy tragedy, Nancy detained the copy till she had treated all her cronies to the feast. And if the account was of the last great prize-fight, Nancy kindly extended the courtesy of the paper to Toal-a-Gallagher the shoemaker, who was particularly interested in those things. Micky Meehan sent home "The Rocky Mountain Lightning Streak" to his father with a regularity that was particularly gratifying to Nancy. Nancy did not usually detain the "Lightning Streak" more than two or three days after its arrival. On one week it contained an uncompleted article upon George Washington which so whetted Teddy Meehan's appetite for the remainder that he brushed his coat and put it and a clean collar on, and, taking his stick in his fist, traveled twice on the following week all the way in from Tullyfinn to inquire if the subsequent issue of the paper had arrived. On the second occasion, though Teddy observed with the corner of his eye that Nancy's whole soul was engrossed in an article in no other than the "Lightning Streak," she replied to him hurriedly that it had not come, and buried herself in the paper again. Teddy sat him down for a while, toru by an inward conflict. His anxiety for the paper, however, got the better of his discretion, and, forgoing sudden resolution, he said, "But Nancy, a character, isn't that it ye're readin'?" Nancy covered the paper and, turning, looked at him for a minute with an outraged look. "Teddy Meehan," she said; then, severely, "let me tell ye—what ye don't seem to know—that it's the height of ill-breedin' of ye to take an' look over any man's shoulder when they're readin'." As Teddy, all abashed, gathered himself away, she added, by way of parting consolation, "Small wonder ye're ashamed iv yerself." She watched after him serenely till he had slunk away round the bend, and then, with a pained and injured look on her countenance, remained perusal of "The Lightning Streak."

But the thorn in Nancy Kelly's side was Barney Meehan, the priest's boy, partly as the result of his office, but chiefly, I suppose, because it was born with him, Barney was a domineering fellow who could tolerate no tyranny except his own. Barney was the only man in the parish who dared, in broad daylight and with the full knowledge that an incensed post-mistress's eye was upon him, walk forward with exasperating nonchalance to Nancy Kelly's and drop his letters, one by one, into the slot! And when he felt in a wantonly aggravating mood, he heaped insult on insult by calling in the slot after the letters, "There's two iv them letthers for Belfast an' wan for Letter-kenny. See that ye send them off quickly, Nancy Kelly, if ye please"—the last sentence, being interpreted, signifying, "I dar' an' defy ye to delay them, Nancy." Ere matters had got very imbibbered between the postmistress and the priest's boy, she had occasionally ventured to question him regarding Father Dan's correspondence. "Barney," in her smoothest tones, "that letter I give ye for his reverence the other day was from furriu parts, an' still it wasn't an Amerviky stamp was on it?" "That letter," Barney said gravely, "was from the Imp'ror iv the Yalla Say, wantin' to know how dncks sould here be the pair, bekase that he was goin' to send his youngest son to Timbuctoo for to sail in that commodity."

This uncalled-for insult on Barney's part pnt Nancy on her dignity for months, till at length the arrival of a letter with the Rome postmark aroused her curiosity so that she deigned to stoop to Barney for intelligence. "That," Barney coolly informed her, "was a letter from no less nor our Holy Father himself, the Pope (may God bless him an' prosper his pratie-garden), informin' Father Dan that the En' of the Wnrrl' starts Chewsday (Tuesday) come eight days in the County Wacklow, an' that we may expect it to work around here within three weeks at the farthest." Nancy Kelly never after that demeaned herself by questioning Barney on such subjects; and it is to be hoped, for Barney's sake, that he realized his punishment as palpably as he should.

Barney Meehan, too, had often the cool impudence to walk in on the heels of Jimmy the Post, and stand by till he got his portion of the mails; and, if, by awkward mismanagement, Nancy allowed him to get a glimpse of the directions on other letters, he made it his business to send word to the fortunate parties "there was a letter lyin' at Nancy's for them," and so had them in upon the postmistress before she had had time to examine the letters with the leisure which she wished. He lost no opportunity of aggravating Nancy; once she handed him no less than four letters, yet Barney, representing all traces of excitement, merely remarked that he thought "this day might honl' up, an' be a gran' hay day, if the wiu' didn't work back at twelve," slipping the letters into his long blue coat with as much seeming carelessness as if he was innred to the receipt of extraordinary mails.

The fact was, Barney, who was used to dominate, could not bring his neck to bend beneath any woman's rod; but, on the contrary, considered that Nancy Kelly, far from exacting, should bring him homage. It was Greek and Greek. Nancy had the advantage in good staying powers; Barney in tact. Where Nancy gave verbal expression to her feelings of bitter animosity, Barney merely acted his under the armor of a Lord Chesterfield politeness; and this aggravated Nancy more than if he had slapped her in the face. He was a very Machiavelli, was Barney, for long enough.

Only, at length, Nancy got him to betray the man that lurked behind the skilled politician. There was a son of Johnnie Brodbin's who went to the States; and, having a taste for dabbling in water-colors, used to decorate the envelopes of his letters to Father Dan with a many-colored eagle bearing in its beak a scroll (also elaborately ariegated with colors), on which the address was elegantly penned. Altogether this decorative envelope was a work of art, to us. But Barney was often and often puzzled to know why the envelope was disfigured with dirt before it reached his hand. The problem was unexpectedly solved one day that he walked in and found Nancy's youngest sitting squat upon the floor, and amusing itself with a recently arrived one, to keep the baby quiet and out of mischief whilst Nancy went to the well. Barney forgot his Lord Chesterfield that day. Nancy related to the neighbors how Barney Meehan ferociously snatched the letter out of the innocent child's hand as if he would like to stick it to the heart; and how, towards herself, he behaved like "an onnatrual, oncultivated bear." And after that the strained relations that had hitherto existed attained a tension that was too acute to last. And, daily, thenceforward, Nancy Kelly was getting more and more provoking. She met Barney's complaints with unkind jests or cruel sneers. He threatened her with all the terrors of the Church, of which, as Priest's Boy, he was a humble representative and vowed to bring down upon her head the vengeance of Father Dan. But, to Barney's utter consternation, she, with reckless temerity, snapped her fingers—snapped her fingers!—and said, "The grass for both ye an' Father Dan!" The grass did not grow under Barney's heels whilst he went home to Father Dan with this bit of intelligence. Father Dan helped himself generously from his snuff-box when Barney had unburthened, and he said, "Barney, Nancy Kelly's past prayin' for, I see." "But," said Barney, in alarm, "aren't ye goin' to pnnish her as she deserves?" "Indeed, and I am that, Barney. Take a snuff. I mean to leave her to the torments of her own conscience." Barney quitted Father Dan in a towering wrath; for he knew right well Nancy Kelly had not got a conscience. "If ivery virago in the parish takes to snappin' t'eir fingers at both iv us, it 'ill be yer desarts," he angrily impressed on the priest.

Barney next threatened to invoke upon Nancy the powers of "The Postmaster General." But Nancy brazenly laughed this threat to scorn; Barney did not know that gentleman's address; and, besides, even if he did, if Barney Meehan had the impudence to dthrop a letter containing barefaced insinuations about herself, she would light the fire with said letter, and then she would "just like to see him," dare to darken her door with his forbiddin' countenance after.

Barney was checkmated. He tried to stir up sedition against Nancy, and talked treason, all around. Finally, when he thought he had the country ripe for it, he went to Ned Carrabin's wake of Glen Coagh to raise the standard of rebellion. With the exception of half a dozen of those old wiseacres, let-well-enough-alone creatures, who exist in every parish, Barney here found that he had the country with him. Accordingly, it was agreed that six men selected, with Barney Meehan as spokesman, should wait upon Nancy Kelly after Mass on Sunday, and respectfully and firmly state their grievances and demand redress. In case of the non-success of the embassy, or in case that—as many were pessimistic enough to conjecture—the ambassadors were repelled with assault, insult, and contempt, it was not exactly clear to them what would be the subsequent procedure; but the people were given the distinct impression that something awful would follow, possibly even (it was hinted) John the sailor, who constituted himself Barney's lieutenant on the occasion, would himself order in a large and varied assortment of postage-samps, and deprive Nancy Kelly of every vestige of her trade. Barney was elated; he had not dreamt there was so much genuine and admirable spirit in the parish; and he gave John the sailor and his fellow-conspirators to understand that they were the stuff heroes were made of.

Poor Barney had not allowed for the pot-valor which he should have known always sets in at social gatherings. Next morning, heroes, alack! were literally tripping over each other to see who would be first to divulge the conspiracy to Nancy. John the Tailor, who Barney thought should have flourished in the days of chivalry and borne a lance in brave but hopeless causes, was first. And when Barney himself, in the timid mood that will possess the greatest and most daring of men on the verge of a great crisis, called on Nancy that day for his letter, his breath was taken away when Nancy, looking him full in the eye, said, with that awful calm that precedes a tornado, "Barney Meehan I'm toul' ye wor at Ned Blake's wake las' night?" Barney could only gasp. Nancy waited long enough to let her dire meaning sink into his soul. Then she said, speaking with deep and deliberate emphasis, "Barney, ye're a swindlin' imposthor an' an interfeerin' blagnard!"—and she still followed him with her terrible eye, so he, dumfounded, slunk out of the door.

On the Sunday after, Barney, finding his nerves fairly well-strung again, descended upon the boys when they had gathered, before Mass, outside the chapel gate. He teemed upon them the bitter vials of wrath, and denounced them as 'crawlers,' rolling the word with diabolic relish on his tongue—"Yez is cr-r-rawlers," he said, "cr-r-rawlers, an' yez 'ill niver be anything but cr-r-rawlers! An' you, John the Tailor"—the pinch-faced John winced—"you're the pr-r-rince of cr-r-rawlers!"

But, storm at the people as he might, and cow them as he might—and did—he had to confess to himself in the anguish of his heart that he feared—feared—to meet Nancy Kelly's cruel eye and returned her defiant glance.

Poor Barney's spirit was broken.

STEWART.—At her father's residence in Robeson Co., July 2nd, 1903, after a lingering illness, Miss Christian Stewart, aged 22 years.

By nature she was amiable, gentle and quiet in disposition, and her lovely disposition was rendered more so by divine grace. She was in favor with all who know her; and a large circle of relatives and friends mourn her early departure. But they mourn not as those without hope. In the days of very early youth, she remembered her Creator; and by confession of faith in Christ as her personal Saviour, she was received into full communion with Smyrna Presbyterian Church, of which she was a baptized member. May the Lord comfort and sustain the bereaved family which within the last three or four years have now and again been called to pass through the deep waters of bereavement. But the loved ones have gone into the better land, where there is no more death; "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

SLOVER.—Miss Mary Catherine Slover died at her home in Newbern, N. C., at 5 o'clock a. m. July 12th, 1903. Her sickness was of brief duration, and her sudden death came with a great shock, and spread gloom and sorrow throughout the entire community.

Such was the deep feeling enforced by the sudden departure of this loved one and friend that these words fitly describe the conduct of every one in its presence: "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth; because thou didst it." Silence almost still prevails, when we would speak a word, adequately setting forth the excellence of her character, and the beauties of her sweet life.

She was the noblest type of the exemplification of modest, Christian womanliness. A sublime simplicity characterized all her life and ways, which is a greatness above the possible expression of tongue or pen. Her praises are on every lip, and will live, an abiding memorial in the hearts of all who knew and loved her.

She united with the Presbyterian church in the 60's, and was from that time effectually interested in, and identified with, all church life and progress.

For many years a teacher in the Sabbath-School, she maintained a continuous devotion to the welfare of the youth of the church and community.

In her heart there was always found a tender sympathy for the suffering and needy, and her gifts were equally ready and liberal. She bore in her person the graces of the Spirit, and expressed the principles of the gospel in her practice; now, she rests from her labors, and her works do follow her!

At the rising dawn of the Sabbath, earth's ties were severed, and her spirit was called home to God, where family ties no more are broken, and, where sabbaths have no end.

She is survived by two sisters and two brothers, and a number of near relations.

May the Heavenly Father deal very tenderly with them, and give them peace!

How the Ball Rolled.

By Mrs. M. H. Cochran.

"O Grandpa, here are your glasses."

A breathless schoolboy came running into the arbor where the old gentleman was seated.

Where did you find them, my boy?"

"Over on Ned Water's porch. You know you sat there talking with his father last night."

"Yes, I remember taking them out to look at a photograph he showed me. But I thought you started out early to have a game of ball before school?"

"I did, but Ned told me about the glasses—"

"And you gave up your game to come this way and bring them to me?"

"I knew you'd want them, grandpa. I didn't mind."

The affectionate assurance beamed in the frank eyes which met the faded ones turned on him in loving recognition of the little act of unselfishness.

"You've been setting a ball rolling this morning, I think, Harold."

"I don't know what you mean, sir. I told you I left the ball game."

"Not that kind of a ball. But you are now due at school. I'll tell you later what I mean."

"I have a little more time. Please go on."

"When I was a boy" began his grandfather, "my mother used sometimes to say to me 'Can't you set a ball rolling to-day?'"

"She didn't say it very often," went on the old gentleman, "for that would have made it seem hackneyed. When she did say it, it seemed to come fresh, and stirred me up to try how I could work it, and I always found fun in it sooner or latter. This was the kind of ball she meant—she had talked it over with me long ago and didn't need to say anything more—to make a special point of doing a kind, helpful thing to some one, and set it rolling by asking the one receiving it to pass it along in the shape of a kindness to some one else, the some one else to ask still another to have it passed on."

"That's jolly," said Harold, with a laugh. "It's like having other folks do your good things for you. Did you use to try it?"

"Yes I did."

"And did your ball ever go very far?"

"O, I cannot say as to that. You can't keep track of it very far, you know. It is like a good many other things that we do for the love of what's right—we have to leave the results with the Lord, in full faith that He will bless our efforts."

"I'm going to try it," said Harold. "I shall begin this very morning."

"Then come at night and tell me about it."

Harold sought his grandfather with a face which showed that he had a story to tell.

"I went to school after I left you, sir," he began. "I had my dinner basket with a good lunch and a bag of peanuts in it. Just as I passed the corner of the woods I heard some shouting and Jack Pierce came running along after his dog. Rover had started a chipmunk. I knew he couldn't catch it, but it's always sport to see him paw and howl when the chatting little rascal gets up a tree out of his way, so I waited to see. I put my basket behind a stump and went a few steps into the woods. Just as I came out I saw a boy stealing along towards my basket. I hid behind a tree and watched. I saw him open the basket and take out the nuts. Then I gave a whoop and jumped on him.

"You rascal!" I said. "So you want my nuts, do you?" I was just going to give him a shake when it flashed on me to think of your ball. My ball, I mean—the ball I was to set rolling. I thought this was a good chance, so I said:

"Billy. I don't believe you want to be a thief. I know you're not that kind of a boy. You just didn't think."

"He looked a great deal more astonished than he would if I'd thrashed him. He put back the nuts, saying:

"I'm sorry. I will think next time. You're real good to me."

"Well," I said, "if you think so you try to do something good yourself to-day. Now, is that a promise, Billy?" "I will," he said. Then I gave him the nuts—he didn't want to take them, but I made him. Then, it is a little strange, grandpa, but I did see a little of the passing on. When I came home from school I went 'round by a way I don't often go, and soon I was passing Billy's house and on the porch was his little lame sister—they're dreadfully poor—and, grandpa, I saw peanut shells on the steps. So you see Billy had kept his promise by giving them to her."

Grandpa smiled one of his beautiful smiles.

"I don't believe that was all that followed the starting of your ball," he said.

"It was all I know anything about," said Harold.

"You forget, perhaps, that you had already set a ball rolling this morning in bringing me my glasses."

"O, grandpa, dear, that wasn't what you call doing a kindness. That was, why—I don't call it just a duty, but just a little thing, I did because I liked to."

Grandpa patted Harold's head as he went on.

"But you see, I took it as an obligation laid on me to roll your ball on. So I had to keep it in mind."

"You, grandpa," Harold looked highly amused as he listened with a look of great interest.

"I must go back a little," said his grandfather. "As I went into town on the trolley two or three weeks ago, I saw a forlorn looking boy, evidently also on the way to the city, but not taking it as easily as I was taking it, he depending on his legs to get him there. An hour later he came to my office asking me to take him as an office boy and errand runner. He begged so hard, telling such a pitiful story, that I agreed to try him."

"As the days went on I found him active, willing and bright about comprehending his duties, but notwithstanding all this I began before long to realize that he had a fault so serious as to overbalance all his merits. He was tricky and deceitful. I had reason to know that he was dishonest in trifles and would do things behind my back that he would not do before my face.

"I knew the little rascal was very anxious to stay, so I felt sorry to think of turning him out. But just as I had made up my mind to it, he gave me a great shock of astonishment, by coming to me this morning with a confession of his misdoings made of his own accord."

"Ho!" said Harold, in great surprise.

"Yes, he did. He told me of small trickery—things I knew he had done, but he didn't know I knew. Then he said, between catches of his breath:

"I—don't want to be a thief. I aint—that kind of a boy. I—just—didn't think—"

"Grandpa!" Harold exclaimed in astonishment. "What is the name of your boy?"

"William Hart."

"Not—Billy!"

"Yes, the same Billy—whose way your ball rolled this morning. I talked with him and he told me about some one who said he knew he didn't mean to be a thief. 'And I don't,' he repeated. 'And I promised him I'd do something good, so I—had to tell you!'"

"Grandpa, what did you say to him? Did you turn him away?"

"You seem to forget," again with the loving smile, "that you had already sent a ball rolling my way. It was my bounden duty to send that ball rolling further. Poor Billy had given his honest shove in coming to me with his confession. So I forgave him and promised that he should remain on condition of his mending his ways. And with such a wise mentor as you, I have little doubt he will. It will, probably," grandfather spoke more soberly, "be a turning point in the boy's life. If so, your ball will keep on rolling, who can tell with what beneficent results? For if Billy should turn out a good boy and a good man, instead of a bad one—think of the difference it will make to all within his reach."

"O, it is so wide, so wide," said Harold—with a face of deep thought.

"Yes, we never can tell how wide our influence may be, or how far the effect of a kind action may reach."—N. Y. Observer.

How the Parsonage was Papered.

Susan Hubbard Martin.

The little parsonage stood bleak and cheerless in the wintry sunlight. A window was open, and the February wind sweeping through the empty rooms, rattled a torn shade that had been left there by the last tenants. Deacon Cummings and the Sunday-school superintendent stood viewing the cottage with speculative eyes.

"There's the salary to raise," the deacon was saying, "and the extra expense of the new furnace must be met. No, we'll have to let the parsonage go. I know it does need papering, but we've our hands more than full already."

The Sunday-school superintendent looked disappointed.

"I think we could manage it," he suggested mildly, "if—"

"No, we can't!" put in the deacon, decidedly. "The parsonage'll have to go as it is."

"But his wife's an invalid," persisted the Sunday-school superintendent, still more mildly, for, like all the rest of the church-members, he stood greatly in awe of the determined deacon.

"Yes, she is," the deacon assented, a little reluctantly. "Hasn't been able to do a thing for over a year, I understand. Lung trouble, you know. That's why they're coming West. Well, it's hard for a pastor on a small salary to have a sick wife. Hard for him and the children. I should like to see the parsonage papered, but it's quite out of the question. The sun comes in finely at the windows, that's one consolation, and soap and water is another. They'll have to put up with things as they find 'em. It's all we can do to raise the salary."

A moment later the two men walked away, leaving Lily Maude standing by her scrub pail. Lily Maude was washing the floor. She had been hired by the committee for that purpose. The last minister had been unmarried, and the parsonage had been rented. But with his departure a new order of things was being brought about. A new pastor was coming, and with him an invalid wife and three small children. And Lily Maude was to scrub and wash windows and woodwork, to make ready for the new occupants.

Lily Maude was pale and small and stoop-shouldered. Her hair was colorless, and her blue eyes, her only beauty, looked out serenely upon a world that had never been an easy one to her, for Lily Maude's mother was dead and her father a cripple. Lily Maude made the living now for both. She was only sixteen, yet her small hands were already calloused and toil-hardened.

"And the new minister's wife hasn't been able to do a thing for a year," Lily Maude had heard what the deacon had said, and she knew something of what it meant. She had been used to sickness all her life. Was not her father helpless now, and had not her mother been an invalid for three years?

She looked up at the grimy walls regretfully; then, taking her broom, she walked into the small bedroom. Here the walls looked worse than ever. There were soiled finger-marks upon them, and some one had torn from them strips of paper, laying bare the plastering.

"And she hasn't been able to do a thing for over a year, and will have to lie here in a room like this," thought Lily Maude. "It's too bad! I'm afraid it'll make her worse instead of better." She leaned on her broom-handle meditatively. "If I could only do something," she whispered, slowly. "I believe," she added, "I believe I'll try. This room has to be fixed some way."

By noon the next day Lily Maude's work was done. The floors were clean, the windows shining, the woodwork spotless. She had done her best. As she turned the key upon the house, her thin face was full of purpose. She hurried down the walk, a shabby little figure in her worn skirt and jacket. Her hands were bare, and the sharp winter wind had already made them blue. But Lily Maude was not thinking of anything so small as her own discomfort. She was used to facing cold winds; used to scanty fare and shabby clothes; used to hard work and poverty and deprivations.

She walked rapidly until she turned into the principal business street; then she slackened her pace, halting at a certain shop door. Here samples of wall-paper were displayed in the windows, together with a number of cans of paint and a few picture-frames. Lily Maude entered. In the rear of the shop some one was busily working. It was Horatio Robinson, the proprietor.

He looked up at Lily Maude. "How do you do?" he said, cordially. "What can I do for you?"

Lily Maude flushed a little. "I came to see you about papering a bedroom," she replied shyly, "but I haven't any money. It's a room at the parsonage," she added. "The minister's wife is coming there to live, and she's sick. I heard them talking about it. The church don't feel able to do anything, and I—just can't stand it to think of her going into a room like that!"

She looked up, with the flush still on her face. "I can scrub, Mr. Robinson, and I can wash," she went on, shyly, "and I thought—for I studied it all out—that perhaps you might let me work for your wife to pay for it. Will it cost very much?"

Horatio Robinson looked down into the small face.

"That depends upon the quality of the paper," he answered, kindly. "If it's cheap—"

"But it must not be cheap," broke in Lily Maude, hastily. "It must be pretty and bright; not too bright, you know, but something that will be pleasant to look at."

"How's this, then?" said Mr. Robinson, taking down a roll of paper from a shelf above him. "You'll have to wash a good many days, though, to pay for this," he added, shrewdly. "Perhaps you wouldn't like that."

But Lily Maude's hands were clasped. She was looking at the paper. "Oh, I shouldn't mind that at all!" she answered, quickly. "I'm used to washing, and that paper—it's beautiful, Mr. Robinson. Will you really paper the room and let me work for you?"

Horatio Robinson looked at her kindly. He was a sharp business man, but he had a good heart, nevertheless.

"I don't see how I can refuse you," he said, smiling. "When people show a disposition to do their part, I like to do mine. So you like the paper, do you? Well, your taste is good, for it's the handsomest thing I have."

"It's lovely," said Lily Maude, dreamily, still gazing at it. "Oh, I hope she'll be pleased!"

Mr. Robinson was touched. He looked at the slight figure, and something rose in his throat.

"I'll do the work for you to-morrow," he said. "It isn't every one I'd do it for, but you're a brave girl."

Lily Maude grew radiant. "Thank you! thank you!" she cried, gratefully. "And I'll work my very best for your wife!" she added, quickly.

"I'm not afraid of that," was the answer. "You can go up to see her this afternoon and talk it over. She won't work you hard," he added. "She's not that kind."

"I don't mind work," replied Lily Maude, blithely, "as long as I can please folks. Here's the key, Mr. Robinson. It's the bedroom off the sitting-room. That's to be her room. I heard the ladies talking about it." Lily Maude smiled again, and then hurried out.

The man looked after her thoughtfully. "Well," he said, as he turned to his work, "I like a spirit like that. There's some promise to a girl of that kind, and some Christianity. Willing to scrub and wash to pay for papering a room for somebody that's sick. That's religion. Such a frail little creature as she is, too! I think I'll go to hear that new preacher when he comes. I'm interested in his family already, and I'll do my best work on that papering, as sure as my name is Horatio Robinson!"

The room was finished, and Lily Maude stood by it in awed and admiring silence. Mr. Robinson had himself added a handsome border. The unsightly walls were hidden, and Lily Maude's heart was full of joy.

"Isn't it beautiful?" she cried, ecstatically. "And oh, I'm glad, so glad to think I could do it!"

The door opened. Lily Maude looked up and saw Deacon Cummings.

"Well, Lily," he began, pleasantly "you did your work well I see. Everything as clean as a new pin."

Just then his eyes fell on the newly papered walls. "Whose work is this?" he demanded.

Lily Maude turned pale.

"Mr. Robinson's, sir," she faltered.

"Yes, yes, but who is to pay for it?"

Lily Maude looked up bravely. "I am, sir," she answered. "I'm going to and scrub and wash for Mrs. Robinson until it's all cleared up. You see, sir," she went on, timidly, "I heard them tell about the minister's wife being so sick and not able to do anything, and all that, and these walls looked so bad I was afraid when she saw them she'd get worse. Things like that trouble sick people a good deal. I know, for I've been with them all my life. I hope you don't mind my doing it, sir?"

The deacon looked down upon Lily Maude in her worn and shabby dress. Then, like Horatio Robinson, he felt something rise in his throat.

"No, no, Lily," he said, huskily. "you did right, quite right." He went hastily out into the next room.

The whole parsonage was papered, and out of the deacon's own pocket, at that. Then somehow the story of what Lily Maude had done crept out, and others went to work. A carpet was put down that matched the bedroom walls. Rich old Mrs. Jones, hitherto not noted for her liberality, opening her heart and her purse-strings, sent over a beautiful brass bed. Some one else added the coverings, and kindly hands hung dimity curtains at the windows and spread a rug on the oor. Easy chairs and pictures completed the pretty room, an ideal resting place for an invalid, so fresh was it and so attractive.

"Tired, Margaret?"
"A little, dearest."

The minister's wife tried to smile, but the effort was a failure. The jolting of the train jarred on the tired nerves, and through the car window the prospect was not alluring. Long stretches of buffalo-grass flashed by, interspersed with white patches of alkali; and every turn of the car-wheels was taking her farther from her old home. Still, if she could only get well! And wonderful recoveries were made in the pure, invigorating climate to which they were hurrying.

Yet how she dreaded it all! New scenes, strange faces, and perhaps the new friends would not be like the old tried ones she was leaving so far behind.

"Cheer up, dear," the minister was saying. "We'll soon be there."

"Home, Margaret," he said, tremulously. "Come, children."

Deacon Cummings came forward hurriedly to meet them. He took the minister's hand, shaking it warmly. Then he turned to the woman.

"I've a carriage right here," he said, anxious at the sight of her pale, worn face. "Let me help you."

She sank upon the cushions, exhausted. The children sat quietly together, wide-eyed and wondering.

"We're in your hands," the minister said, smiling. "What will you do with us?"

"You'll see," was the genial answer.

In a few moments the carriage stopped. Deacon Cummings alighted. "This is the parsonage," he said. "We thought it would be pleasanter for you to come straight home, so we did what we could. Some time I'll tell you the story of how it was all brought about. Your wife's room is ready for her, and the ladies have spread a supper for you in the dining-room. Welcome to Gray Rock, dear friends, and may the new home bring you health and happiness."

The tears were in his eyes as he half-carried his wife across the threshold into the pretty room awaiting her. Gently, very gently, he laid her upon the soft bed, with all its snow-white draperies. She put both arms about his neck and murmured:

"He make me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters."—Youth's Companion.

the lessons privately this afternoon—to whom you are cruel. Through no fault of her own she is obliged to wear very plain clothes; and through no merit of any one here you are all able to wear nice ones. You did not buy them; you could not earn them. All that comes to you comes through the goodness of your parents and friends.

“This other little girl has only a half-sock mother, for whom she does all that she can out of school hours. The little thing begs to stay out of school because you all make her suffer so much when she comes; but her mother will not permit this. It is the one dream of her life that her little girl shall have a better education than she could have. So the small one is obliged to come. And she proves herself worthy, because, as you all know, she does better work than any of you and bids fair to win the prize of one hundred dollars which Judge Moreland has been so kind as to offer to the best scholar in American history.

“Now, in order that you may know what it is to be poorly dressed, I have borrowed some clean, everyday suits from the orphanage, which I shall ask you each to put on this morning—going one by one into your respective cloak rooms. You will wear them all day. If at the close of school you are not ready to correct your behavior toward our little fellow-pupil you shall dress each day in these suits and continue to do so until you become gentle in heart.

“There is no appeal. I visited all of your parents yesterday after school, and I have here notes from each one, giving me authority to enforce this command. Agnes Holland, as you were first to begin the unkind taunts of yesterday morning, you will come to the desk, take this suit, and go, first, into the girls' dressing room, change your clothes quickly, and come out. John Halliday, as you are the largest boy in school—one whom we have a right to expect will be manly and chivalrous to those who need and suffer, yet who, I regret to say, stood by and laughed while the heart of our little pupil was so cruelly wounded—you will take this suit and go—first among the boys—into their dressing room, change your clothes quickly, and return. Agnes! John! I give you ten minutes. For every minute thereafter you shall receive a mark for misdemeanor.”

Slowly, reluctantly, the two went forward, took the coarse blue jean suits, the heavy shoes, and went into the dressing rooms. No one laughed. It was too serious a matter. Miss Norton waited ten minutes, then tapped at the doors, and sent the unwilling victims forth.

“Emily Huntington, Harry Reynolds, you two are to go next.”
 “I am not going,” said Emily.
 “Then you leave the school,” said Miss Norton, firmly. “Your father and mother both assure me that they will either send or bring you back, and will see to it that you obey!”

Emily went sobbing into the dressing room.

After a little the change in the whole school had been effected, and the regular work of the day began. When intermission arrived no one left the desks. In fact, not one of them all was willing to risk being seen by the passers-by.

The session never seemed as long as it did that day, and both teacher and pupils were more than glad when it was over. At last the bell struck for dismissal; then John Halliday arose, came forward, and said:

"Miss Norton, I—I beg your pardon. I—don't want to be a bully; I want to be a gentleman. I—never—was so ashamed in all my life. I—promise you that—that I—won't do the like again, as long as I live. And—and I'm glad you were so good and brave as to do it!"

The others followed suit. There were a good many sobs from the girls, and solemn looks upon the boyish faces. The next day Miss Norton herself went for Amy and the two came up to the school in company, amid pleasant greetings upon all sides. No one spoke of the matter. Everyone was quite content to let it rest. Dear little Amy had not known why her mother kept her from school that day; she wondered at the kindness of her school-fellows and was very glad of heart. The days went on, but there was never another need for borrowing the trunkful of blue jean suits! —N. Y. Christian Advocate.

The Calf's Nightdress.

By Anna Burnham Bryant.

"My best hockey stick!" cried Johnny, angrily, glaring at poor little frightened Margery, who had just broken it trying to make a "teeter" with the help of that and her Aunt Harriet's ironing board. "Why didn't you take Uncle Abram's gold headed cane—or the umbrellas?" he added, flinging himself out of the door in a rage. Johnny wasn't always a pleasant boy to live with.

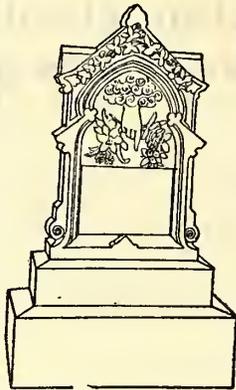

"Just you wait, Miss!" he stuck his head in again to say, revengefully. "I know a way to fix you. Just you see if you get a look at my new little bossy-calf Uncle Abram is going to give me. Yah! I guess now you wish you'd let my things alone 'stead o' breaking 'em!"

"A bossy-calf! O Johnny, please! I never saw a dear little bossy-calf—never—not anything littler than a great big hookey-cow! Say you will, Johnny!"

But Johnny was gone, and the bang of the door behind him sounded like a loud, cross No! as Margrey listened to it.

"It won't live, probably," Uncle Abram was saying out in the kitchen. It was so still in the room that Johnny had left that Margrey could hear every word as plain as could be. 'T'was a spindlin' kind of a little critter anyway, and it come on so awful cold last night the barn wasn't warm enough. If I'd had anything to wrap it up in I'd have blanketed it like a baby, but all the old stuff has been used one way an' another, or stole by tramps, and I couldn't find a thing. I'll carry something over to Johnny and Aunt Harriet and Margery—to take a ride 'round the road' and "see the little new bossy."

When they got to the barn he was not the only one that was laughing, for there was a comical little red calf, with very long legs and a very bumpy forehead, wearing a most dandyish-looking blue "swallow tail" with brass buttons, its fore legs stuck gracefully through the sleeves of the coat, while the narrow blue-tails swayed first on one side of his back and then on the other.

"That's what — she — fetched — to — wrap — him in!" gurgled Uncle Abram, holding his sides. "I made up my mind you should see it!"

"Better call him 'Dandy,'" said Aunt Harriet. "Do' know's I ever see a four-legged calf wearing a swallow tail before."

"Keep it on him, Uncle Abram!" shouted Johnny, capering about in huge delight. "I'll get all the other boys up here to see the show. Say, he'll live now fast enough, won't he?"

"Depends—on whether you're a gentleman!" said Uncle Abram, gruffly.

"Oh, he is—he will be!" said Margery, sweetly. "He knows now I tried to make up to him for breaking his hockey stick."—Congregationalist.

Sometime, Somewhere.

Robert Browning.

Unanswered yet ? The prayer your lips have pleaded
In agony of heart these many years ?
Does faith begin to fail; is hope departing,
And think you all in vain those falling tears ?
Say not the Father hath not heard your prayer ;
You shall have your desire, sometime, somewhere.

..

Unanswered yet ? Nay, do not say ungranted ;
Perhaps your part is not yet wholly done.
The work began when first your prayer was uttered,
And God will finish what He has begun.
If you will keep the incense burning there,
His glory you shall see, sometime, somewhere.

..

Unanswered yet ? Faith cannot be unanswered ;
Her feet were firmly planted on the Rock ;
Amid the wildest storms she stands undaunted,
Nor quails before the loudest thunder shock.
She knows Omnipotence has heard her prayer,
And cries, "It shall be done," sometime, somewhere.

Event and Comment.

We have felt more kindly toward the new Pope since we heard that he left Venice for the Conclave with a return ticket. He did not expect to be elected and there could have been very little pulling of the wires for him.

They have just opened in England the first Cathedral built since the Reformation, the Cathedral of Truro. From the appearance of the interior it is not the place to preach in. We have sometimes wondered what the original Apostles would have done with a cathedral.

Praying at people instead of for them is a habit to be avoided. It indicates in the first place that the prayer is addressed to the audience instead of to God. And then it degrades prayer itself, to make it the vehicle of our reproof of a brother mortal when in the very presence of God.

In leaving out the statement that the Pope is Anti-Christ from the Revised Confession there was no intention of weakening the historic protest of Protestantism against Papal claims. Says the Interior, "The Book pronounces now as emphatically as ever that the claim of the Pope to be Head of the universal church is insufferable."

The Interior is the authority for the statement that "there are more societies of Christian Endeavor in the Presbyterian Church than in any other." We suspect that the Presbyterian Church is likewise the backbone of the Y. M. C. A. Suppose we pull out of non-denominational enterprises, sometimes, because of our much advertised narrowness, and see what will become of them?

Three Congregational Seminaries in England are proposing a union of their resources and endowment into one seminary, and this is regarded as a step in the formation of "a great Free Church Theological College under the aegis of London University." We wonder if the Southern Church could not get its million dollar university to running in good order first.

One of the mistranslations of the Catholic Version of the Bible is the phrase "do penance" instead of the word "repent." A Catholic priest has recently made a new translation with the correct rendering and has received the commendation of Cardinal Gibbons. Of course it may cut off some Papal revenue but it is another evidence that the world do move.

Says the Cumberland Presbyterian:

"Pity 'tis that God is not allowed to cast the ballot that determines the result in every election." We have an idea that he does cast it, and that the idea of "allowing" Omnipotence to rule over the affairs of men reveals a low idea of God. Arminianism will crop out in unguarded moments. The only way to keep that Northern Presbyterian Committee of Union from finding out about it is to keep very still.

The Pope has given out that he intends to let Italian Catholics vote hereafter. That is good. But what a light it throws upon papal tyranny, the abject condition of Italian Catholics and the old problem, how to be a good Catholic and obey the Pope and a good patriot at the same time and obey the powers that be. Two-thirds of the Italian people sided with their country in the struggle between Italy and the Papacy and their rebellion is the opportunity of Protestantism.

John Temple Graves made a speech at Chautauqua the other day on the negro problem, especially in its relation to crime. He suggested the legalizing of the mob and a "cruel and unusual punishment" as palliatives of the present evils; and the separation of the races as the final solution. We do not think that the Atlanta editor represents Southern opinion in either. Aside from other considerations it would be a cowardly thing for the Anglo-Saxons of America to deliver the negro over to the fate of his fellows in Liberia or Hayti. And then there has hardly been given a fair chance yet for another solution, the gospel of Christ.

The case of Miller, an employe in the Government Printing Office, who was expelled from the Bookbinder's Union, is the first instance of a direct conflict between the Government and a Labor Union. The Union demanded that he be discharged and he was. Later he was re-instated by the President's order. The men at first threatened to strike and then they decided to wait until their charges against Miller could be examined. Miller says that he was expelled from the Union because of his having saved expenses for the Government instead of making more work for the members of the Union. The final decision of the case is awaited with interest.

The Interior notes the action of the Southern Assembly in petitioning the Government to remonstrate with the Belgian Government concerning the treatment of the negroes in the Congo Free State, and thinks "that one stone in the road to re-union has been moved several feet nearer the gutter." There never was any question about the right of the Church to petition the Government. It was when the Church undertook to say whether the Allegiance of Presbyterians was due to the State or to the Union, that it "hung the rags of political expediency on the cross of Jesus Christ." If the editor of the Interior cannot see the distinction, it had an editor once that saw it. No, there is no sort of justification for that old error or for the reluctance to make a frank and manly withdrawal of the old terms of "traitor" and "rebel," that still stand upon the records of the Northern Church.

The Year Book of the Young Men's Christian Association contains some interesting figures of progress and service:

Within the year the number of Associations in North America and the colonial possessions of the United States has increased from 1,575 to 1,726. Reports from 1,500 of these are tabulated, showing 350,455 members, 27,231 more than reported last year. In this number 144,279 are active members that is, members of evangelical churches. The boys' departments that are maintained now by nearly all city Associations account for 45,500 of the total. The property holdings of the Associations now are to $28,827,000, a gain of $1,726,000 in a year—perhaps the most astonishing feature of the entire exhibit. The current expense budgets aggregated three and a half millions, an enlargement nearly of half a million over the previous year. State and international committees spent nearly a quarter of a million contributed by the Associations in free-will offerings, and besides $80,000 was sent abroad for mission work. Practically 30,000 students were instructed last winter in the schools maintained by local Associations. Seventy thousand religious meetings were held during the year, with a total attendance of four millions.

Legislation and Righteousness.

We have been noting for quite a while the appearance and re-appearance in different forms of the argument that you cannot reform people by law; that you cannot legislate righteousness into people. The argument is generally used as a protest against interference with the whiskey traffic, even in its most revolting form. Of course there is a germ of truth in it. But there is also a fallacy that has been wandering around in unthinking minds long enough without correction. We mean nothing personal in using the Raleigh Post as an illustration. And a half dozen papers in this state might have been chosen, the names of which will occur to their own readers.

Says the Post:

"We quote this from the Presbyterian Standard:

"The New York Christian Advocate asserts that at least four hundred children have died from injuries received on the Fourth of July, the most of them of the horrible malady of lock-jaw. The fact ought to unlock the jaws of some of our legislators so that a stop could be put to this annual slaughter of young Americans."

"While our friend is about it, can't he insist on a law that will prevent any of us dying? Legislation is all that is needed, we must be sure, to stop death, either from injury or suicide or going to sleep near a railroad track."

Says the Greensboro Record:

"While we are passing laws that this thing and that thing shall not be sold, why not pass one that money shall not be left around in a bank where a man can get his hands on it? He might be tempted to steal. And it might also be a good idea to prevent the railways and other big corporations from allowing their employes to handle any money at all—make them fix up a kind of machine where all money must go so that it cannot be taken out except by the proper person. Of course, that 'proper person' might steal also, but this would reduce the number of stealers at least. The doctrine now is to keep temptation away from a man, not to teach him to withstand temptation."

Whereupon the Charlotte Observer comments:

"That's the stuff. Pass a law. The people are not properly coddled and hedged about! It is not enough to punish them after they have done wrong—make laws under which it will be impossible for them to do wrong. The world is not governed enough. Pass more laws."

We are of the opinion that four hundred children's lives, to say nothing of the lives of adults, and the maiming of hundreds more of both adults and children, are worth saving. In Charlotte no fire-works are permitted within the city limits. There were therefore no accidents from fireworks in Charlotte. It seems unquestionable that a similar ordinance could be enforced in every city, large or small, in the United States. Fire-works tell their own tale. Offenders are easily caught. And the evil, which is a real evil if we count four hundred children as worth anything, easily prevented.

We therefore over-rule the point made by our contemporary as not well taken.

But as all roads lead to Rome, the real objective point of this argument is a defence of the saloon. We are not questioning the sincerity of the arguers. There is in general a pessimistic feeling as to the evil of drunkenness. It seems such a hopeless thing to cure in the individual, and such a constant temptation to so many, that there is a tendency to fall back upon that atheistical law of the jungle, the survival of the fittest, and say that law can throw no protection around men against this evil. Let them alone, and thus let those who will go to the devil go their own gait.

Let it be admitted that legislation alone does not make men righteous. There is only one power that can do that and that is a Higher Power. But Christ himself declares that "it must needs be that offenses come."

As long as there is sin in the world there is going to be crime. But Christ also says, Woe to that man by whom the offence cometh. And he teaches us to pray, Lead us not into temptation. His own prayer for his disciples was, I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil.

Now in our time and in our favored land, the religion of Christ is a predominating force. The Kingdom of God is being established among men. And the instruments for the establishment of that kingdom are men, with all the human agencies that can be used to that end.

Take three of the evils which are more or less the subject of legislation in all our cities, gambling, drunkenness and the social evil. Does any one dare to say these evils cannot be remedied in any degree by proper laws properly enforced?

The saloon promotes drunkenness. It tempts men to excessive and to habitual drinking. Some reformers have laid so much stress on the evils of drinking, that they are met on their own ground with the original declaration that prohibition does not prohibit; that is, it does not prohibit drinking. It is said that men will drink at home, will drink at their clubs, and since the emphasis has been put, unwisely as we think, upon the use instead of the abuse of liquor, every instance of its use is quoted as a violation of law and the old fallacy bobs up that you cannot make people good by law.

But law, in the very provision which it makes for penalties, expects to be broken. Nevertheless, it is more dangerous and therefore more difficult to do an unlawful than a lawful thing. The saloons tempt men to drunkenness. The dispensary supplies, while it does ot create a demand, some part of which, however small it may be, is a legitimate demand. It closes at undown and this cuts off the worst part of the day for drunkenness. It forbids treating on the premises, another long step in the direction of sobriety. It denies the motive of private greed to its employes, and thus takes the pressure off the seller of the liquor. Prohibition prevents all lawful sale of liquor in the prohibited territory. Better twenty blind tigers after a boy than one with his eyes open. Drinking may not be stopped, but if drunkenness is decreased, then the real end of the law has been obtained. There are some restrictions even around the saloon. Would the Post have those laws repealed?

Gambling is another evil that can be prevented by law and its vigilant enforcement. We used to have a heap of gambling in Charlotte. This paper could tell some interesting tales of the protection of the offenders by the sworn officers of the law. Now, thanks to our vigilant police and to Judge Shaw with his heavy hand, gambling is all but gone from Charlotte. It is not the temptation that it once was.

Young men have been known to lose their employers' money in gambling dens in Charlotte. If there is no opportunity or temptation to do that, does not legislation against gambling tend to honesty and therefore to righteousness?

Men talk just as hopelessly about the social evil. Unfortunately our laws on that subject have come down from an impure period of English history. They need to be brought abreast of the enlightened sentiment of our own day. But such laws as we have, with such municipal ordinances as we have, do diminish the evil. Who would say that if every house of shame were in constant danger of a raid by the police, and the male as well as the female offenders ran the risk of exposure before the world in court the following day, with the added risk of having their names published in the papers, that harlotry would not be amazingly diminished? New York City is ten-fold more decent than it was twenty years ago. John Calvin found one-third of the city of Geneva given up to the social evil, with men and women parading naked through the streets and he made it the model city of Europe, with the help of legislation.

Once more and we are through. We trust that we have also been thorough. There is a rising generation of boys and girls that we can help to keep pure and sweet by the removal of temptation. We cannot remove it all. But that is not saying that we must acquiesce in the most open and shameless and over-powering temptation, when law can lay its heavy hand upon the evils and make them at least hide their diminished heads. The paper published at the Thornwell Orphanage, Our Monthly, said the other day, thanking God, that there was a generation of young people growing up in South Carolina who do not have the word bar-room in their vocabulary. Who shall say that that is not a gain?

No, we cannot make people good by legislation. But we can send them to the devil a heap faster and a heap more of them if we let an evil go unrestricted and unrebuked. To bring the thing down to a fine point, murder is both a crime and a sin. Legislation does not keep men from committing the sin of murder in their hearts. But it saves the victim from being murdered and the murderer from the actual shedding of blood. Not always. Law is broken, as its penalties for being broken would imply. But repeal the law against murder, or rape, or robbery, or all three, and see whether legislation would not be needed again, and soon, ere we went into a state of anarchy.

Are We Worthy of This Praise?

The editor of the Brooklyn Eagle went to hear a Southern minister preach the other day. He has had some very kind things to say about Southern preachers before this. But the Rev. Peter C. Sears, an Episcopal clergyman of Meridian, Mississippi, made a most pleasing impression. We presume that there is danger that the South will lose him to the Church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn. In speaking of the sermon the Eagle has this to say of the South:

"To a section, just passing under the leadership of the men of to-morrow and reverencing the memory, while inheriting none of the spent quarrels of the men of the past, the worth of the generation of preachers, born since the war and with their faith and their faces turned toward the future, can not readily be exaggerated. Their devotion to their states and people is as marked as their value to them. They set a contrast, which is an example and an incentive, to any Northern incumbents of Chapels of Ease, if any there be, who here find every favoring social, ethical and economic condition to their hand which they have but to stretch forth to take it. The essentially religious portion of the Union is the South. The long obscuration or dimness of other rays has made the Divine Lights alone fill all the sky. In the absence of many of the forces to which men elsewhere address competitive energy, the South has recurred to God, as an ever present help in time of trouble, a time that has there lasted long, but which is brightening with the prospects of alleviation. The name of the preachers and educators who are fulfilling the law of the Master, by bearing the burdens and heightening the hopes of their people, is legion.

Such of them as have been transplanted by Providence into Northern soil have enriched its growths and have in turn been broadened and bettered by the larger influences of which they have deepened the spirituality."

Now that is high praise, the highest praise that can be given any people, that "the Divine Lights alone fill all the sky." We know that it has been true. The South was a deeply religious section before the Civil War. Abolition, in its cruder and radical forms, did not a little to make that war a religious war, since the Biblical sanction of slavery itself was so clear to the Southern mind that the abolition characterization of it was blasphemous. And while there was a vein of recklessness among the youth of the South, the war itself, with its hardships and bereavements brought the people into an attitude of humility and reverence before God.

It has been a fortunate thing also that during the recent decades of critical study, in which the foundations of all things have been searched and the faith of many has been shipwrecked, the South has been in a measure isolated, cut off from the intellectual ferment that has been going on in Germany and in Britain and in the Northern States. That movement has all but spent its force. The inevitable reaction against extreme views has set in. But the South has never eliminated God from the universe or ceased to bow in adoration at the name of Jesus Christ.

But the times are changing—changing fast. It is unbecoming to boast of one's religion, either individually or collectively. But there is also a feeling that the boasting would be less true now. As to matters of faith, there is but little danger that the South will take up the theories that have been already laid aside. There is enough true scholarship in the South to prevent that. The tide against which religion must contend is the commercial spirit.

We rejoice as all patriots must do, in the ever increasing prosperity of this section. But our people must never begin to think that money is all. We rejoice in the quickening of the educational life of the South. But even education is not so important as religion.

May the God who was our present help in time of trouble be our Life and our Light in times of prosperity and peace! Let not ours be the fate of the nations that forget God! May our loftiest aim be to attain to the beatitude of that people whose God is the Lord!

While we are waiting to hear from the Biblical Recorder as to whether Baptists would patronize a Presbyterian institution and would be encouraged to do so by the Baptist press, if the Baptist institutions should be "struck down by the State," here is a little straw from Charity and Children that shows how the wind really blows; in fact the wind is a gale:

"Now and then we hear of some puny Baptist who is foolish enough to send his girl to one of the other Raleigh colleges, though the University has better equipment, an abler faculty and a great deal more money than either of the other schools. By what reasoning a man shall justify himself for such strange conduct we are utterly unable to see."

As an instance of the way the business world has come to regard the physical as well as the moral evil of the drink-habit, the Insurance Department of the Southern Loan and Trust Co., places a premium upon the temperate habits of those whom it insures. People of temperate habits, whether they be total abstainers or not, are a better risk than those who drink to excess and this progressive company feels that they should have the benefit in a lower rate.

Review of Contemporaries.

Future of Catholicism in America.

The Interior.

Some years ago we chanced to spend a Monday morning with a certain society of ministers who had met to hear a paper read upon "Religious Liberty." There was present a gentleman of pleasant manners but unfamiliar face, whom we supposed to be a new incumbent of one of the city pulpits. The essayist who prepared the paper went so deep into his subject as to base his conclusions upon premises which he dug up from decrees of mediaeval councils, and papal bulls hardly less ancient. At the conclusion of the reading each person present was called upon to express his views of the theme and its treatment. The stranger, upon being pressed for an opinion, said, "Gentlemen, I am a Catholic; born and brought up in the Church and familiar with all its modern teachings. I cannot deny that the things I have this morning heard read from ancient authorities must represent the Catholicism of the past; but it does not represent the Catholicism of to-day. These views are not taught from our pulpits. Were they so taught, no one of you would repudiate them more promptly than myself."

Last year an accident of travel brought us into familiar relations with an apostolic delegate, born in Rome, brought up in the Collegio Romano, but stationed for the past twenty-five years in an English colony. He was a man of intelligence, observation and charity. He was well informed upon all the questions which interest or agitate the Church. In the course of our talks he said, "It is one of the satisfactions of my life that my duties have required me to become a naturalized subject of Great Britain. There is only one other country to which I would willingly transfer my allegiance, and that is America. I have many times circumnavigated the globe in discharge of commissions from the Vatican, and I confess that there are only two countries upon earth where a man is assured the natural rights which belong to him by gift from his Maker. And they are England and the United States."

Standing one day upon the magnificent terrace of the Janiculum which overlooks St. Peter's and below which lies the whole of modern Rome, we noted with what tenderness an Italian fellow traveler regarded the busts of the soldiers which adorn the grounds, and with what pride he showed us the great bronze statue of Victor Immanuel towering over all. "I am a loyal son of the Church," he said to us as if in extenuation of his conduct, "but I am proud to have served under Garibaldi as a volunteer and under the House of Savoy as an officer in the national army. I was born a Catholic and I shall die a Catholic; but I am for free and united Italy first, last and all the time."

Whether it be politic to deny it or not, mediaeval Catholicism exists among the laity neither in Rome nor in Chicago. Bishops and archbishops and cardinals and popes may all deny that any change has taken place in the rank and file of Catholicism; but the papal states would no more to-day restore the temporal power of the papacy than would New England. It is an age not of autocracy but of democracy; and if a crisis were precipitated tomorrow, we should find not one, but a thousand Luthers stepping out from the Catholic clergy even from their innermost circles.

Nowhere would this be more true than in our country. Many a loyal son of the Church of Rome is loyal only because his priest cautiously avoids putting his loyalty to the test. The fundamental principle of Romanism is submission; the first principle of Protestantism is freedom. The Catholic, brought up in the wide air of America, cannot be forced to live again in the narrow boundaries of priestly domination. It is not necessary to change rules in order to change life. Theoretically the layman is nothing. He contributes funds; the bishop holds the title to his church. But the bishop will be careful how he exercises his theoretically unlimited trusteeship.

Nay, more than this; many of the Catholic priests are themselves like our Garibaldian soldier, as fond of liberty as they are profuse in protestations of obedience. We have a neighbor who before the council of the Vatican strenuously preached against the dogma of papal infallibility. "Did the finding of the council change your view of the doctrine?" we asked our good priest. "My friend," was his non-committal reply, "Rome has a long arm." The wise prelates know these conditions and are not going to strain the relations of their priests beyond the point of rupture, as did Leo X.

That two-thirds of the American continent once belonged to Rome while now the population of the states is overwhelmingly Protestant, is not to be forgotten. Professor O'Gorman, writing his history of Catholicism in the United States for the "American Church History Series," while anxious to reduce the confessed "losses" of Romanism in this country, puts the estimate as to their strength at only about one-half that of the present foreign-born population and its immediate descendants. Catholicism has been fighting a losing battle in this country for more than two centuries. It has lost more than in numbers. It has lost confidence in its own principles. For years to come it will doubtless profess loyalty and practice freedom. Then, when the right hour strikes, it will swing itself free from Rome, an American church filled with the American spirit, which is the spirit of that personal and individual freedom with which the gospel makes men free.

The Patriotism of General Lee.

The editorial article in The Outlook for July 11 entitled "The Loyalty of Robert E. Lee," has called forth number of letters from our readers. Of these letters we have chosen three for publication in another column, one expressing approval, the other two disapproval, of the views we have expressed. These are the strongest statements we have received on either side. Leaving them without further comment, we confine our attention here to the fundamental question involved in the discussion. This question is tersely stated in the following letter:

To the Editors of 'The Outlook':

Webster's definition of a patriot is, "One who loves his country and zealously supports its authority and interests." If this is correctly defined, how can your statement, "Robert E. Lee stands to-day among the purest of patriots," be true?

George W. Barrows.

What constitutes patriotism?

In "Harper's Magazine" for August there is an article by Mayo W. Hazeltine on "The Republic of Vermont." In this is described the plucky stand taken by the Green Mountain Boys in defense of their homes. They had settled in what is now Vermont under the authority of royal grants given to New Hampshire. Later the British Crown decided that the land belonged to New York. The controversy that resulted between New Hampshire and New York was of vital importance to these settlers; for if New York, representing the authority of the British Government, should gain possession of this territory, they would be dispossessed and their families impoverished. When the War for Independence broke out, they had, perhaps, as the author says, "stronger reasons than any other American colonists for rebellion against the British Crown," for if the Colonies should be defeated, the British troops would enforce the decision of the Crown and oust these men from their farms. Therefore "they had at stake not only the political liberties which were threatened by Parliament's assumption of a right to tax the Colonies, but also a title to the homes which they had created in the wilderness." Here is a concrete example of patriotism in its rudimentary form—the instinctive impulse to protect the family.

Sometimes this instinct has developed into loyalty to the tribe or clan, as among the Semites, or in the early history of Scotland; and when it has been perverted, it has resulted in prolonged family feuds, of which our own land has furnished examples. It is in this impulse to protect the family that may be found the source of race pride, or race patriotism.

But with the growth of civilization, with all its complex relationships, this instinct of home defense has become, as it were, organized. Instead of each man's defending his own home, men have combined for the common defense of all their homes. This union of men for the common defense has been one of the elements, perhaps the chief element, in the formation of government. Such union has taken different forms. In a monarchy the king is "the father of his country," and allegiance to the home is transferred, for the purposes of defense, to the king. In a republican government it is the co-operation of the natural defenders of the home that is the essence of the Commonwealth, and allegiance is transferred from the home to the Commonwealth. It is this allegiance to the power that guards the family that is the essential element in love of country, in that passion which, according to the Century Dictionary, "moves a person to serve his country, either in defending it from invasion, or in protecting its rights and maintaining its laws and institutions."

It is evident that under different kinds of government patriotism itself assumes different forms. In early Scotland it was fidelity to the tribe; in feudal days it was fidelity to the overlord; during the English Revolution it was, on the part of some undoubtedly sincere men, allegiance to Charles; on the part of others, equally sincere, support of Parliament. In times of transition there consequently arises a struggle between two forms of patriotism. One form may be intellectually or politically more primitive than the other; but it may at the same time be no less pure and honorable. It was a struggle between two such forms of patriotism which came to a crisis in America in 1861. Undoubtedly there were men prominent among Southern leaders, as there were undoubtedly men prominent in the North, who were swayed by other motives than those of patriotism. Very likely the struggle would not have taken the form of open war if it had not been for the men who were more concerned about the maintenance or destruction of slavery than they were about fidelity to the sovereign government. Such men are not here under discussion, but only the men who, North and South, were ready to lose all for the sake of preserving that sovereignty to which they were convinced they owed supreme allegiance.

In the North conditions largely economic had brought men to identify that sovereignty with the Federal Union; though there were Northern men, not only at the time of the Hartford Convention, but as late as the war itself, who were by no means clear in their convictions. In the South conditions, also largely economic, had brought men generally to identify that sovereignty with the State; though there were exceptions, such as George H. Thomas. In the main, then, patriotism, that is, allegiance to the Commonwealth, in the South meant allegiance to the State; in the North it meant allegiance to the Union. The fact that since the war American patriotism means fidelity to the Union does not alter the fact that before the war the question as to which form of patriotism, State or National, should be supreme was an unsettled question. It was between these two forms of patriotism that Lee had to choose; it was whether Virginia or the Union was his country, his patria. Those who find it difficult to imagine how such a question could have been seriously considered may perhaps put themselves into Lee's place by imagining their own state of mind if in the future they should be called upon to choose between America and a Federation of the World. Those, the institutions of his country which he was called upon to defend, were those of his native State. To him the Federal Constitution was of prime importance politically; but he regarded it as an external compact between his State and other States, and he believed that the State, not what he regarded as a federation of States, demanded his supreme loyalty. So he decided that his country, his patria, was not the Union, but Virginia. If a patriot is "one who loves his country and zealously supports its authority and interests," then Robert E. Lee, in following his convictions that Virginia was his country, was a patriot.

Those on the one side (we believe that their number in the South is small) who think of the Federal troops as mere invaders, and those on the other side (we believe their number in the North is diminishing) who think of the Confederate troops as mere traitors, miss the real tragedy of the Civil War. The tragedy of that war lay in the fact that there were patriots on both sides—men like Lincoln in the North, men like Lee in the South.

The Outlook, it seems hardly necessary to add, is convinced that the outcome of the conflict between the two forms was inevitable. The Outlook believes, too, that the result of the war, which determined forever that the American's country is comprised in the Union and not limited to the State, is accepted by the South as not only inevitable, but also as wise and right. It is perfectly consistent both to honor as patriots those who followed their convictions in fighting for what they counted the rights of their States and the defense of their people, as we honor those early Vermont colonists who were State patriots before they were National patriots, and at the same time to rejoice that a higher type of patriotism than theirs has prevailed. It shall be well if we of to-day see to it that we keep our higher patriotism as pure as Lee kept his.—The Outlook.

We have no more need to be afraid of the step ahead of us than we have of the one just behind us.—Francis E. Willard.

Devotional.

Principles.

It is not strength of brain that saves a man or orthodoxy of creed or connection with a church. All these have often proved to be but ropes of sand. They are not proof against the tides of temptation. There must be firm, heaven-implanted principle; for no one is safe in business or in politics or in social life or anywhere when conscience is unloosened from God. The parting of the cable may be unseen for a while, it may even be unsuspected; but it is a mere question of time how soon the backslider may strike the rocks. Jesus Christ never insures anyone who unites with His Church, and yet has no "anchor sure and steadfast which entereth within the veil," and "binds fast to Christ Himself." And if you ever reach heaven, my brother, you will come in, as I have often seen vessels come into yonder harbor of New York, with the stormtide anchor swinging proudly at the prow. "There are ships," said the eloquent Melvil, "that never go down in life's tempests. They shall be in no peril when the last hurricane shall sweep earth and sea and sky, and when the fury is overpast, and the light that knows no night breaks gloriously forth, they shall be found on tranquil and crystal waters, resting beautiful upon their shadows." These are they who have been piloted by the Holy Spirit; these are faithful ones whose inner soul was anchored to Jesus Christ.—Theodore L. Cuyler, D. D.

Mary's ointment was wasted when she broke the vase and poured it upon her Lord. Yes; but suppose she had left the ointment in the unbroken vase? What remembrance would it then have had? Would there have been any mention of it on the gospel pages? Would her deed of careful keeping have been told over the world? She broke the vase and poured it out, lost it, sacrificed it, and now the perfume fills all the earth. We may keep our life if we will, carefully preserving it from waste, but we shall have no reward, no honor from it, at the last. But if we empty it out in loving service we shall make it a lasting blessing to the world, and we shall be remembered forever.—J. R. Miller.

Never mind where your work is. Never mind whether it be visible or not. Never mind whether your name is associated with it. You may never see the issues of your toils. You are working for eternity. If you can not see results here in the hot working day, the cool evening hours are drawing near, when you may rest from your labors, and then they may follow you. So do your duty, and trust God to give the seed you sow "a body as it hath pleased him."—Alexander Maclaren.

Many and many of these men whom we see plodding on in their dusty ways are traveling with visions in their souls. Nobody knows it, but themselves and God. Once, years ago, they saw a light. They knew, if only for a moment, what companionships, what attainments, they were made for. That light has never faded. It is the soul of good things which they are doing in the world to-day. It makes them sure when other men think their faith is gone. It will be with them till the end, until they come to all its prophecies.—Phillips Brooks.

Every Cloud.

"What is it thou knowest, sweet voice?" I cried.
 "A hidden hope," the voice replied;
 So heavenly toned, that in that hour
 From out my sullen heart a power
 Broke like the rainbow from the shower,
 To feel, although no tongue can prove,
 That every cloud that spreads above,
 And veileth love, itself is love.

"Love Me, Too."

"Love me, too!"

The speaker was a little dark-haired maiden, and her big brown eyes were welling up with tears. She was one of the deserted child-wives of India's shadowed households. Lame and helpless from a diseased knee joint, and so, useless as a slave to him, her husband had turned her out upon the roadside to die. The pitiable little crouching figure drew the attention of a police officer, who brought her to the nearest Christian mission hospital, where now she was tenderly nursed back to health.

It was the hour of Evening Prayer, and the doctor had lifted upon her knee the baby of the ward, also a deserted girl. The little child-wife hungrily watched the gentle caress of the white hand on the wee brown head that nestled confidingly on the missionary's shoulder, and slipping off the hospital bed she crept up to the pair. Taking the good doctor's hand in hers, she laid it on her own bare head, and uttered the wistful cry, "Love me, too!"

"Love me, too!" It is the cry uttered or unexpressed of each little sufferer who enters our wards. Yet it must not be imagined that parental love is rarely shown by the Indian or Chinese father or mother.

Far from this being the case, intense love for and pride in their children is exhibited again and again; and an apparent want of affection and tenderness in nearly all cases may be traced not to callousness or cruelty, so much as to gross ignorance, gross superstition, and bondage to caste and custom.—Irene Barnes, in Between Life and Death.

The following is a good illustration of the value of medical missions in China: A wealthy and influential man at Swatow became interested in the work of the medical missionaries and had his wife treated during her illness. He was so much impressed by the skilled method of treatment that he gave $2,000 to start a woman's hospital. His next step was the offer of $10,000 to start a Chinese school where a western education could be secured. The final step was to destroy his idols and apply for baptism.—Exchange.

It is an interesting and suggestive fact that the native Christians at Paoting-Fu, China, have in mind the erection of a church in memory of the martyr missionaries and of the forty native martyrs of their Church, who lost their lives in the dark and terrible days of the Boxer rising. Already they have raised nearly a thousand dollars for this purpose. This is a fitting act, and shows the hold the Christian spirit has upon those who have been benefitted by the coming of the Gospel among them and their appreciation of departed worth.—Exchange.

Lowell says there is not a spot ten acres square on the globe where it is possible for a man to live peaceably, and raise a family in decency and safety, where the Bible has not gone before to cleanse and purify that spot!

If I knew what to omit I would ask no other knowledge. A man who knew what to omit would make an Iliad of a daily paper.—R. L. Stevenson.

David and Jonathan.

I Sam. 20:12-23. Aug. 23, 1903.

Jonathan, Saul's oldest son, was a man of noble qualities. He was devout and constantly sought the guidance of the God of Israel and endeavored to keep His commands. He was brave and met in Divine strength and with heroic daring the enemies of his country even when they were greatly in the majority. He was courageous to encounter even the wrath of his father when the latter was doing most flagrant injustice. He was so magnanimous that he espoused David's cause even though by so doing he surrendered all hopes of reaching the throne himself.

1. Saul is the Prey of Evil Passions.—He is surrounded by many things to give him comfort, delight and honor. He has all the appliances of royalty, has the admiration of his people, is victorious over his enemies, and has able and faithful supporters of his throne. If outward surroundings could render a man blessed Saul ought to have enjoyed felicity. But happiness depends far more upon the state of a man's moral nature than upon his possessions or circumstances. Saul yielded to sinful passions. He indulged envy, jealousy, fear, hatred, and revenge for fancied injuries. The very excellencies of David excited his malevolence and wrath, and he was ready to murder the best man in his kingdom and one who was the most capable upholder of his kingship. Saul by his wicked passions and sins had grieved away God's spirit and an evil spirit was permitted by the Lord to visit and afflict his soul. With these sources of unrest was it at all wonderful that Saul was a miserable man? The victim of sinful lusts and passions and of seducing evil spirits must be unhappy.

2. Saul's attempt to slay David.—At the very hour when Saul, tormented by an evil spirit, was being soothed by David's harp the misguided king endeavors to smite his best servant with a javelin. He made the effort twice, though David escaped. The records affirm "And Saul was afraid of David because the Lord was with him and was departed from Saul." "Therefore Saul removed him from him and made him his captain over a thousand: and he went out and came in before the people." This first effort to slay David was repeated for years and in varied ways. He sent him forth to fight the Philistines, hoping that he would perish in battle. He tried to slay him in his bed chamber, after he had married his daughter. He pursued him with the whole force of his realm so that David deemed it necessary to seek safety in the country of the Philistines. But Saul's attempts to kill David were utterly in vain. He was the Lord's anointed to reign over Israel and was under the protection of Divine providence. He could not die, until the work assigned by God upon earth had been accomplished. It was needful for him to use his faculties and best efforts to escape destruction, but the power and providence of God made his endeavors successful. Thus it is with all God's servants. On the earth they are immortal till their work is done.

3. David's Growing Popularity.—We are told, "But all Israel and Judah loved David because he went out and came in before them." Removing him from Saul's immediate presence, and making him a military captain, constantly mingling with the soldiers and the people was the means of enhancing his reputation and influence. His popularity was due not to court favor, but to personal qualities and heroic deeds. Sometimes the favorite of the prince has for a time favor with the people. But if the person is worthless in character and his popularity is due merely to the ruler's patronage, it will not abide. But it was not thus with David. His standing with the nation was not caused by the honors which Saul bestowed. His reputation and influence continued to increase after he had lost Saul's favor and incurred his enmity. His noble attributes and grand public services attracted the hearts of his countrymen with growing power.

Our Duty to the Stranger.

Deut. 7:7, 8; 2 Chron. 63:2, 33. Topic for Aug. 30.

All through the Bible the Holy Spirit makes it plain that the heirs of grace are not chosen because of any special goodness in them, nor because of any greatness that they possess. Israel was constantly reminded that there was no peculiar merit in them that had caused the Lord to choose them for His people. On the other hand they were shown that they had been a most insignificant factor in the human race when they were chosen. On account of this memory they should be humble.

It ought to make them have charity for those who had not been so favored. But instead of becoming humble they became arrogant and puffed up.

The lesson which was set for Israel is still set for us. Prosperity is no sign of character. If it were then we would have to change our estimate of many people. We see thousands of those who are the least deserving from point of character, prosperous, while we see other thousands of those who are the true followers of Christ, who endure adversity from the earliest years until old age, and whose lives go out amid sorrow and suffering. This being true we should remember never to congratulate ourselves that we are better than others if we should happen to have favorable circumstances surrounding us in this life. Rather, we should pray that we be not over proud because of these things.

These statements have special force when applied to the attitude which we occupy toward strangers, especially in our churches. We live in an age when it is harder to judge people by outward appearances than ever before. This being true, good people have been imposed on more in these latter days than at any previous time. These impositions have gone so far as to make people suspicious of strangers. But while it is well to be on one's guard, it should be remembered that there is room for less conventionality in our treatment of strangers from a religious standpoint.

Many people going to a new community, attend the services of the Church for one or two Sundays and then drop out. When asked about this, they usually remark that the people are like icebergs; that at the different times at which they attended church services, they were passed by and no one cared to speak to them or make their acquaintance.

Here is an illustration: A man was going away to work for the summer in a neighboring town. He was commended to the pastor of the church in the town. The stranger went to the church for several Sundays and was received coldly. No one spoke to him or seemed to care anything about him. Naturally he began to drift and soon stopped his attendance upon the services altogether. The next summer the same man went to another town to work. His pastor wrote to the pastor in the second town. This pastor took an interest in him, going to the place where he was laboring and speaking to him. The natural fruit of this was that the man attended the services of the Church regularly and when he returned to his home town, it was with a spiritual uplift as the result of his summer's experience. And it is just as important that the people of the congregation take notice of strangers as that the pastor should.

Then the stranger should always be remembered in our prayers. Solomon prayed when dedicating the temple, that God would bless the stranger when he should enter the temple courts to worship; that he should be blessed even as God's own people should be blessed. When we remember the stranger in our prayers, we are getting outside of self, and to get outside of self is Christ-like. He was the only being who ever lived in this world who thought of strangers, always, before thinking of Himself.

The Episcopal Church, "Protestant."

The very day The Standard of Aug. 5 came, with your editorial on "Pope Leo XIII and the Episcopalians," calling attention to the fact that both the Pope and the Episcopal Church agreed in believing and declaring that this Church was Protestant, the following article was published in one of our St. Louis dailies, The Republic. And this shows that whatever Pope Leo may have said and done—or failed to do years ago, and whatever the Protestant Episcopal Church may have more recently decided by a large majority of its dioceses, there are still some Episcopal ministers, "regularly and canonically ordained," and with "the true Apostolic succession," who are vigorously protesting against the word "Protestant" and earnestly longing to be "Catholic" in name as they are Roman in fact. And what a pity they do not all go, where they so evidently belong, to their own place, Rome! And though the paper speaks of this as the opening of "a heated controversy," I have thought that this "specimen of high-church humor" might serve as a diversion to the readers of The Standard even in hot weather.

G. L. L.

The following is the clipping:

In an article entitled "A Specimen of High-Church Humor," in this week's number of the St. Louis Christian Advocate, the Reverend Doctor James W. Lee of St. John's M. E. Church, South, takes issue with a sermon preached by the Reverend Crozier G. Adams in St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church, July 12, in which Mr. Adams advocated a change in name of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The special points in Mr. Adams' sermon which Doctor Lee attacks are the following paragraphs:

"There is no such thing as a Protestant minister, unless it be the humanly devised and humanly authorized ministries of Wesleyan preachers, Congregational pastors and Dowie evangelists.

"There is no such thing as a Protestant liturgy, unless you call the Lord's Supper, as administered by close communicants or other indiscriminate sectarians, such, bereft of all that makes it a true sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, as he gave it to us; stripped of all its holy and divine significance, reduced to the common level of your own birthday supper or mid-day meal.

In every sense of the word we are Catholic. We have the Catholic heritage of faith, the Catholic creed, the Catholic ministry, the Catholic worship, the Catholic doctrine. The creed is the same that the Church has used from the first centuries. The ministry is the succession from the first centuries. The worship, the liturgy, the Holy Eucharist, is that used by the Apostles. There is no such thing as a Protestant creed, unless you speak of the creed of Calvin, with its dreadful doctrine of infant damnation and one-sided predestination."

Doctor Lee says in reply:

"If the angels in heaven are ever amused at anything that happens on earth, this scene of a few Episcopal rectors, self-exalted and self-inflated, looking down with pity and an occasional prayer for unity upon Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist preachers, who have civilized, evangelized and educated in the New World nearly a hundred million of the most strenuous and enterprising young people known to history, must fill their shining souls with uncontrollable laughter.

"It is like a few hundred jaybirds, with flaming colors, high perched in mid-air, looking with commiseration upon the American eagles, whose birth-right and title to the firmament of this Western Hemisphere is not questioned in any representative convention of the feathered population, not because of their descent, but because of their ascent and peerless strength of wing.

"If there is such a thing as genuine succession in its outward, factual sense, every intelligent reader of history knows that the Protestant Episcopalians have not got it. They lost whatever the Roman Catholics had during the revolt in the time of Henry VIII, and so their orders are repudiated by the whole Roman Catholic world.

"The attempt to get regular succession through a so-called ancient British Church is not taken seriously by respectable scholarship in the Church of England. It is regarded as a highly colored fiction, having fascination only for such effeminate minds as have no power to grasp robust and healthy truth.

"And yet certain ministers of this Church, by some jugglery with their own minds, manage to pull themselves up by their ecclesiastical bootstraps to a dizzy height of apostolic eminence, from which they look down upon the vast army of workers in the Lord's vineyard.

"The Episcopal Church, standing on its merits and its good works, is entitled to all reverence and respect, but when it puts on airs, and claims something that belongs to no Church, and especially not to the one started by Henry VIII during the Sixteenth Century, then it deserves to be ridiculed and rebuked, and taught to know its place as a small, but well-dressed battalion in the ranks of God's million hosts."

Mr. Adams, when shown the article, said he regarded Doctor Lee's language as highly extravagant and extraordinary.

He said that the article demanded an answer, and that he would give one which would completely refute its every point, as soon as he found time to get it in shape.

The Papacy.

The recent editorial in The Standard on the Papacy and the articles by Dr. W. W. Moore on the same subject deserve high commendation. Protestant readers of the secular and even the religious press have recently been served with much weak and sickly sentimentality on the goodness and the greatness of the Pope and the Papacy. It is therefore not only proper, but actually necessary, that Christian people be reminded in season and out of season of the real character of the Roman Catholic Church.

In the choruses of praise now sung in all the world over the dead Pope have not Christian England and America forgotten the Reformation and its cost in tears and blood, the Inquisition, St. Bartholomew's Day, and the atrocities committed in Holland under Alva and Philip the Second, of Spain? While the wisdom, the tactfulness and the goodness of the head of the Roman hierarchy is being sounded abroad let Protestants remember the Church that worships the Virgin Mary as the mediator between God and man, rather than Christ, the Church that permits an immoral and adulterous priesthood to represent her throughout Brazil, and South America, the Philippines, Spain and Italy; let these well authenticated facts be recalled and let us ask if in the face of them the Pope can be all that is claimed for him? Should we not also continually remind ourselves of the attitude of the Romish Church to the Bible? One of the earliest recollections of the childhood of the writer is the return of a missionary in Brazil from a preaching tour with the charred leaves of New Testaments burned by order of the priests before the doors of the people who had attended the Protestant worship. The incident is illustrative of the hostility to the Bible manifested in all Romish countries.

The verdict of history, that the Papacy is a blight both morally and intellectually upon every people and every land where its sway is undisputed, is also in addition to the facts stated, conclusive against the claims of the Romish Church. In the words of England's gifted essayist and historian—"Throughout Christendom whatever advance has been made in knowledge, in freedom, in wealth and in the arts of life has been made in spite of her, and has everywhere been in inverse proportion to her power. The loveliest and most fertile provinces of Europe have, under her rule been sunk in poverty, in political servitude and in intellectual torpor while Protestant countries, once proverbial for sterility and barbarism, have been turned, by skill and
