4. Arminian is inconsistent with the experience of all true Christians, and with the highest duties of devotion. Every real child of God is conscious that if he is anything at all, anything different from what he once was, it is due to the grace of God alone; he is conscious that had he been left to himself, he would never have turned from serving Satan to serving God; he is daily conscious that if it were not for the constant exercise of God's power and mercy restraining him from sin and constraining him to holiness, he would fall and perish. The unmerited grace and compassion of God he gratefully acknowledges throughout the pilgrimage of life. It makes no difference how much the Arminian presumes in argument, he is invariably Calvinistic in prayer. In a revival meeting not long ago, the preacher seeing a number of Calvinists present went a long way out of his otherwise well-arranged discourse to fire some shots at the Westminster's confession of Faith. What he said not only betrayed ignorance, but was a ridiculous antithesis to the sentiment which prevailed his prayer. He was a man who had a real experience of the grace of God, and his entire prayer was a full confession and acknowledgement of every truth which thrills in the Calvinistic system.

Now for the moral. No one should preach a doctrine which contradicts the universal experience of Christians, and which one is compelled to abandon when he approaches the throne of Grace. Consistency requires that a man teach and pray alike, and tell his hearers precisely what he is constrained to unfold to the Omniscient God. It is an unchangeable truth that God "hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." 2 Tim. 1:9. When the wind strikes the cascade, the flow of its waters for a moment is interrupted, dashed into spray, tossed into foam, but below the continuity is regained and it flows on and on, a thing of beauty and splendor. In like manner the blasts of envy and slander and caricature may for the moment interrupt the current of Calvinism; but it will regain itself because it has its source in God, and the stream will flow on and on, sparkling with the brilliancy of its goodness and unimpeded by the malice of its enemies.

"Sence Freedom Broke Out."

It is a reasonable belief with us Southerners that it was an overruling Providence which took the savage Negro from centuries of horrible slavery, cannibalism and idolatry and placed him under the training of the chivalric Southern people, to the benefit of both races. We are much in debt to the toiling slave for his devotion to his master's interests. We appreciate that he has been a powerful factor in developing our Southland. The rice, sugar and cotton industries owe everything to his co-operation. The beneficent influence of the old slave was equally felt in the home life. Can we ever repay the sympathetic black mammy for her marvellous patience and gentleness? We are also grateful for the wealth of weird and beautiful African melodies in which the Negro has so wonderfully imbedded and preserved the Bible truths.

On the other hand, is not the Negro greatly in the Southern debt; and would there not be a better understanding all around if he realized it and publicly expressed occasionally a little loyalty to those who were and are his best friends? Did not our ancestors give him the language—no easy task with hordes of savages. Not only this, but they gave him the benefit of the personal contact which is always so necessary in every effort to uplift humanity. Under the old regime the slaves were taught habits of industry and many trades and the arts of agriculture. Their masters fed and clothed them well, attended them faithfully in illness and succored them in old age. Best of all, they were given, through hired white ministers, the precious Bible and regular religious teaching. That this is true is easily proved by the striking familiarity of all old ex-slaves with the Bible truths, and by their countless "spirituals" which are all founded upon Bible texts. Many of the best Southern men were abolitionists at heart, feeling slavery to be a burden of wrong, but they could not see how, in justice to both races, they could rid themselves of the incubus.

I have been taught that every true Southern woman spent much of her life in ministering to the spiritual and bodily needs of those so singularly dependent upon her, within her small empire. These women were born to a heritage of peculiar responsibility, and we, their children, should give them great honor for the noble way in which they fulfilled their difficult trust. Some day, when the heavenly accounts are all drawn up and the whole truth is known, there will be revealed the fact that the old slave days with all their abuses were the most unselfish, effective and far-reaching force for missionary good this world has ever known. There lives in Georgia an old mammy called "Aunty Walker." She once said to me: "My moster's niggers had sich a easy time we wuz called free niggers. I wuz proud o' bein' a slave and wuz larned to do eberyting well. Slaves wuz jes like chilluns is nowadays, ef yer don't keep right abine 'em, dey shirks dare wuk! Dat's de way de niggers did soon as moster's back wuz turned! Den whenever de oberseer gib 'em a little techin up, off dey'd trot and git along ober de Macy and Dixie line. Hit didn't taken 'em long ter fink up a pack o' lies and make a big, big mouf 'bout how dey wuz beated and starved down South—and chile, yo heah me? Yer knows dose Norven people is jes natully big hearted and beliebin'—hee, hee—dey didn't know nuffin 'bout how a nigger can't help lyin' like us does, and so dey b'liebe all de lyin' tales dem niggers tole 'em and de whole war comes on jes' dis heah way. Honey, hit's terrible to fink how de good mosters and us good niggers had ter suffer fer dem mazin' triflin', lyin' niggers what had de debbil hisself fer dare fadder!"

Convictions such as these are widespread among the old slaves still living. I have interviewed thousands of Negroes in various parts of the South; have through personal contact all my life fathomed their inmost thoughts, and I declare views as here expressed are representative of a large majority of former slaves.

In Florida live Aunt Susan. She is a native of Virginia, and the greater part of her life was passed in that State. She looks about fifty years old though she is really over ninety. This splendid old auntie patiently stands at the washtub all day long, rain or shine, under a rickety shed made of barrel and old shutters, held together by rope and discarded pieces of harness. She ought to be in bed, so swollen and painful are her ankles with rheumatism.

She was good enough to allow me to come many times to read to her from the Bible, and more than once her conversation naturally drifted into stories of her old plantation days. One rainy day I found her washing in the house, and after she had listened attentively to the reading of her pet story of "Nora and de flood," encouraging me with many an ejaculation of 'Dat'so honey lamb, dats the true word. Bres de Lord!' I thought to draw her out so asked her if she worked harder in old slavery days than now? This was enough to start her. She instantly let the clothes drop in the tub and wiping her shrivelled hand upon her underkirt she began fiercely, "Wuk? You say wuk to me? wuz n't no fiel' hand! I wuz a house nigger, me myself. Didn't know what wuk wuz! Didn't know I wuz a slave till dem white folks came down heah and ole us 'bout it. Gawd knows us wuz heaps mo' free dem days dan us is now. Dese heah lazy, triflin' niggers done bring all dis trouble on deyselves!" I here inquired what trouble she alluded to. She seemed to grow taller as she replied excitedly, "Trouble? Dis heah trouble ob habin' ter suppo't dere own famblies. No nigger like ter hab ter suppo't his own fambly—its entirely agin nater. Niggers, dem days, wuz jes like us sees goin' long now wid der carryin's on. I'se nebber seed a good nigger whupped in all my life, and I'se nebber seed a bad one whupped enough. Dat ain't heah nor dar, but dere ain't none ob us ole heads been rale happy sence freedom broke out!"

I ventured to ask her if her husband was living. She fairly made me gasp when she innocently replied: "Not all ob 'um, tank de Lawd! De white laides fink dey're habin' a power of trouble wid jes' one husband. Look at me! Done had four, and all mean niggers—no 'sputin dat fac'. De last one, Tobe, wuz de meanest one ob de lot, fo' jes' as soon as freedom broke out, he ups and stole jes nuff ter git in de Penetencher an' dar he is ter dis day I reckon, setting up dar eating hiself fatter dan Br'er Possum, jes ter git shet ob suppo'tin' dem chiluns. Let me ax you sumpin', chile. Look at me straight and tell me hones'—now I gwine ax yer a question."

She tiptoed to the open door and looked up and down the gallery to assure herself that no one was eavesdropping, the shut the door tight, and turned the key in the lock, and coming back to me stealthily, began in a whisper. "Now tell me de trufe, chile; dere ain't nobody er heah—only Gawd am a-lookin' straight in yer heart. So tell me now honest: Did yo ebber see any man, especially any 'ooman, what was rale, I say rale puffedly happy married? Humph?"

The poor old, simple soul looked so in earnest, and with the door shut and feeling God was looking in my heart I was afraid to tell a story, so I boldly said under my breath, "I never did, come to think about it."

This evidently satisfied the old philosopher, as she drew a long breath and exclaimed "Dat's de trufe. Yer sho' tole it dat time. Now you watch round and mind what I done tole you. Gawd nebber 'ten' no man, especially no 'ooman, to be rale happy married. Case fo' why? Case marriage am jes' a discipline. He sends from heaben ter prepare us fer de next world," pointing below. "Same way 'bout chilluns. People! Me knows, fur me done had nineteen head o' chillun in the Lawd. I followed right along ahine ma mudder, she had nineteen head afo me."

"Aunt Susan," I asked: "Did you have good luck with your children?" She drew another long breath, and replied slowly and wearily, shaking her head, and looking up above. "No, honey, I nebber had no luck at all!"

"What; did they all die?" I inquired sympathetically.

"Die?" she exclaimed fiercely. "Die? No, chile, dey all libbed—ebbery last hair and hide ob 'em libbed! I nebber had—no—luck—at—all! I fink it's dis heah way 'bout chilluns. When Gawd Almighty sends a nigger ooman a big crop o' chillun de best ting Him kin do is ter harvest 'em up in heaben, whar dare po' mudder knows dey is safe and out er harm's way. Des' look at my misery long o' chilluns. Dey all done bad sence de Yankees turn 'em loose. De oldest, Jeems, wuz hung, de next one oughter hab been, one ob de lot am in the penetencher, Sammy's in de calaboose in town now dis heah minute for bein' drunk and 'orderly. My gals ain't like de gals used ter be—dey married bad, and suppo'tin' lazy niggers and rafts o' chilluns. Dem what ain't is too stuck up ter work out at hones' libbin' sence dey larned ter read and write. Dey nebber help dere old mudder! Not eben Abe, what's a porter on a pullman train' nebber sends me a picayune. I nebber gets a Lawd's cent."

At this juncture an almost white mulatto boy about eleven years of age came running in with grinning cheeks. He rushed up to the old woman and kissed her heartily. She gave his palate lock a jerk and pulled his head, first up and then down, and said, "Whar's all yo' manners dese days nohow? Curtesy to de lady—yo' heah?" Then changing her manner and tone to a caressing one, she kissed his injured head and said, soothingly: "Patrick Henry, you is cuttinly de best chile I got. Foteh de lady some cawn pone and buttermilk I done put up on de high shelf in de cupboard whar yer couldn't find it. Dat's a good boy. He's de best chile I ebber had. Him is ma youngest baby."

I said incredulously: "Why Aunt Susan he can't be your child! What makes you tell him such —?"

Here she interrupted me as Patrick Henry made his exit in a handspring.

"Hish, child, hish!" So I hished! "Don't say nuffin fo' him for Gawd's sake!"

She wiped away a rising tear with her knuckles. "I'll tell you how it wuz he comes to be ma last baby. Mandy Jane wuz sho' 'nuff ma youngest baby, and she tuk some money fum a Yankee gentleman she wuz washin' fer and when de sheriff come fer her, her bay wuzn't but one day od. I had heahed him comin' in de front do' and had done step her off toc de old cawnfield and she dug out fer de Norf, and cose dere wuzn't no body like Mandy libbed dare. I told him I jes' had a young baby, and I tuk her leetle baby and come down heah ter Fleuridy and passed it off fur ma very own." Her tears were falling fast and she shook with emotion. "Oh, don't say nuffin fo' him for Gawd's sake; he fink I his onliest mammy—po' leetle lamb—and he b'liebe he ma youngest baby—and de neighbors don't know no better. Please don't nebber tell him de trufe," and I never told him.

This glimpse into Aunt Susan's philosophy shows the position so many of the old slaves take regarding the new responsibilities thrust upon them. I have yet to find any old Negroes who will tell me they had a cruel master. It is always "some other Negro" they knew about! Indeed, I have been told all my life by ex-masters that in the slave days any men who mistreated their selves were socially ostracized. Isolated examples of brutality only serve to bring into stronger contrast the great mass of Christian slave owners to whom cruelty or oppression was an impossibility.

If only those who talk and write the most upon the great "wrongs of the Negro race" could live South for a few years they would find their opinions quickly veering around, and before long be thoroughly "reconstructed" Yankees. They would discover that the self-respecting Nergo who is industrious is treated with consideration and esteem, and that the demand for efficient house servants and workmen far exceeds the supply. Our Southern housekeepers do not yet receive the benefits of the Nergo's education, which we so largely pay for—nor direct results so far as trained house service is concerned. As a rule the graduate of a colored college fits herself to teach or nurse or for some other profession, and usually moves North. The only outcome we see is the lamentable state of affairs that we cannot build up any more the restful, ideal homes our mothers and grandmothers did, because we cannot have the faithful nurses and cooks they had. Now every mistress of a home spends her whole life in teaching unwilling colored women to do housework, only to have them fail the first time company comes or someone is taken ill.

We Southerners are not strong enough to do our own work, nor have we the knowledge or system. So we have to submit to trials and vexations our Northern sisters would not tolerate. The chronic complaint all over the South is "No girl," and here we see thousands of sickly mistresses, whereas our mothers were robust and able to rear large, happy and healthy families and so live out their own best selves. Ask any Southerner if he does not know personally of several small towns where there are hundreds of idle colored girls, while people all about are trying in vain to induce them to work. They seem to consider themselves above menial work. How some of them live is a bad mystery. Once in a small town, after doing my own work for a little while, I became so exhausted that I felt desperate enough to offer the first sable goddess I'd meet to give her vocal lessons and to throw in the use of piano and the parlor for receiving her beaux.

At last I secured a high-stepping maid, who, after putting enough questions to me to satisfy the greedy census man, said to me loftily, 'Well I'll come try you for a week if you'll promise to only have one tablecloth in wash a week, for Dr. P. says I'm weak in my arms; and can't wash your windows, for I belongs to the Union League. This meant I was to wash the windows, which I meekly did, and at least got the corners clean, which she could never have done! I engaged her to rest my body, and after a week of her impudence and airs I discharged her in a hurry to rest my mind. Our "brother in black" is free—but as for the poor sister in white, she is yet to be liberated.

Mrs. S. lives in Massachusetts and writes a great many fine papers upon the oppression of the Negro for her missionary society, and recently she has gone to North Carolina to live. In four weeks she has tried eight cooks, and if one may read between the lines in her interesting letters to me her views are slowly changing. She once said to me, "It's the way the Southern people treated them that makes them steal so, and makes them such bad servants." I replied: "A leopard cannot change his spots." She retorted: "The spots, if there are any, were put in during the degradation of slavery," and I warmly answered: "We know they were dyed deep way back in Africa! and besides they were in worse slavery before coming to us."

But let's see her progress. In her next letter she frankly rehearses all her grievances to me as if we were the first white victim the up-to-date Negro servant had ever subjugated! I consider her very unreasonable and exacting. Why she even objects to the cooks carrying home a basketful of provisions every night. She would be a stingy colored mother who would let "de ten head o' chillun starve de Lawd done sont her! My friend is surprised that the kitchen is filled with the cook's friends at every meal time! Does she not want her cook to continue to dispense Southern hospitality? She seemed greatly shocked because her poultry, scissors and undershirts keep disappearing! Now, any Southern of good traditions expects certain Negroes to be Communists as regards chickens and food and scissors and medicine and undershirts. In fact, they like to share almost everything in common! Mrs. S. does not like it that she never can find hot water in the kitchen, and Sally Ann will boil eggs in the teakettle! She writes in disgust that two of her cooks left with no warning and one day, while dinner burning up, Melinda was off in her own room rubbing a face-bleach on her skin and applying the new preparation for removing kinks from African locks!

At last the climax is reached. Let me quote: "Do send a white girl. I'm nearly distracted, and I've a houseful of company. I take it all back—you are all martyrs since the war. How can you put up with their shiftless, lazy way, when your mothers had such faithful noble servant? These young ones who are free are too impudent and mean. If I could only get one of the old mammies so many have had around for years! Hereafter I'll call every Southern woman a misisonary, for they seem to take it all patiently as a matter of course. This last piece I thought so good is named Temperance, and she takes two hours to eat her breakfast and two others to wash the china, and insisted upon washing it with an old sock and drying it on a piece of old skirt—notwithstanding an array of clean dish-towels swinging over her head! When I remonstrated she flounced out of the kitchen and ran out in the yard screaming, 'Wash 'em yourseff! I won't be nobody's nigger.' Now she sends me word she is going to sue me for goodness knows what. These Negro servants I find it all their own way. After a while you Southern women must turn and send abroad for foreign help, or, best of all, do as we do in New England, train your daughters in thee healthful athletics of the kitchen and laundry so as to be independent of this colored new women, I'd like that nice girl you told me of at the Wetmore Home, if you can still get her."

The new Negroes are not allspoiled, thank heaven! There are some perfect cooks among them who are so obliging and well trained that everyone wants them. The Government ought to pension a negro cook after a lifetime of faithful service to her country. She can discount all the chefs in the world in her fried chicken and beaten biscuit and gumbo. Such good cooks keep off indigestion, doctor's bills and make homes happy, and contribute almost as much to a family's joy as a brand-new baby, and if they do give us more fried dishes—no Southerner ever has dypepsia.

I was so fortunate as to run across a typical old mammy the other day right here in New York. She wears a bandanna headdress and is from Tennessee, and evidently does not approve of the new order of things. Her first words of interest. She said: "How I likes de Norf?—hits a purty big city; tain't no place for nobody like you and me what's been brought up to do nuffin! Pears to me like hit ain't nuffin but wuk, wuk, no lub—no fun—no Jesus Christ nor nuffin—I washes and irons ma finger nails off and when I goes to sleep, dare sets de bundle ob washin', a mile high on ma chist! Sence freedom broke out, look at eberyting, a-changin'—eben de 'oomans is a-trying ter be big mens—I 'longs ter a club, and de 'oomans tink dey's so big; 'Hi-yi' dey say to Gawd. 'Us kin make a better 'ooman dan yo' eber fought ob maken,' and—hee hee—Gawd he answer back 'nebbber made no 'ooman could be fust-rate mudder ob 'de fambly and de man ob 'de house same time,' I 'se been a watchin' dis freedom, an' hits a-needin' chainin' up; dats what make I say what I does, case I see de debbil he got hot ob one end ob freedom and e Law he got holt ob de uder. But de Lawd he'll sho' come out on top and are won't be no more tanglement den, honey," Amen! Where dot dey get all their philosophy from? So, then, my colored mammy has solved the problem—this hated trouble of securing willing help at the South. Why have we never thought that all our difficulties are due to Satan's abuse of Freedom, which he delights in making "break out" in so many distressing ways in order to blind men's eyes to its holier and inevitable possibilities? We all know God's true freedom will triumph for all mankind in the end. We are satisfied that even now in this transition stage we should not have this difficulty in obtaining good service if the Negro race would heed and follow the teachings of Booker T. Washington, and others, who would have them understand that working with their hands is nobly serving their Maker.

One must indeed be a blind student of the development of the Afro-American who does not see what marvelous advancement, numbers of the colored race are making along many lines of learning. If the franchise be taken away it will be a great blessing in disguise, for it will result in the whole race's speedily educating itself so as to vote intelligently and honestly. Sometime I feel that if we were to give the Negroes no further help financially it would only retard, not permanently check their ultimate education, for the Negro perhaps has now sufficient brains and force within his own ranks to go on forever, lifting up and educating his own kind. Even in bondage with no learning, the race showed evidence of having remarkable talents for music, oratory, ministry and story telling! No matter where his future is to lie, he should have an all round mental, moral and physical education to prepare him for his great duties: if in this country to help him in solving the problems which he, with the South, now faces, and later the North will face; if in Africa, to build up an African nationality there and become one of the world's great Powers.—Jeanette Robinson Murphy, in Boston Transcript, October 3, 1900.

An Optimistic View.

It is a false assumption in theology, that universal happiness is the supreme goal. Omnipotence presides even now, over the created universe, and it is a reproach against God to assume that the supreme goal is by him indefinitely postponed. The truth is that the only possible optimism admits of permitted evil, and that doing good, in the highest sense, is impossible without room for its exercises; which means the presence of want or need among the creatures of God.

The Christian religion teaches us that exercise of beneficence is the noblest form of spiritual activity, and self-sacrifice for others the highest type of character among men. But it is absurd to exalt human virtue above the divine, and we are compelled to believe that the cross is an exhibition of God's unselfish love for his inexcusable enemies. But it could not have occurred if sin had not existed.

Calvinistic theology represents the truth as objectively presented to man in purposes of the divine wisdom to be accomplished in the future. These purposes do not contemplate universal happiness, but the eternal reward of righteousness in contrast with the punishment of sin. But the Creator will be adored, not only as the greatest, but the best of beings, because capable of an altruism exceeding all comprehension. In the incarnation God-head has mysteriously suffered for humanity, and exhibited an example of unselfish kindness infinitely impressive.

The optimism of the gospel is in the fulfilment of divine purposes perpetually going on, not as an ultimate consummation, but at this moment successfully conducting an endless history. The infinite goodness has created all things in the spirit of universal love, and permitted a free apostasy of some of his creatures, destined to destroy themselves by the love of sin, and punish as objects of his own compassion, as Christ endured the cross, as the object of his paternal affection.

It is thus established that the retribution of sin comes from a heart full of yearning compassion and the sinner is informed that it is "the Lord, merciful and gracious, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin who does not clear the guilty," even when the guilt is imputed to his son. The gospel thus teaches us that when God punishes sin with its eternal doom, he does so for infinite reasons, for which he makes an infinite sacrifice, whilst his bosom yearns over the sinner with immeasurable tenderness. The endlessness of the penalty is no contradiction of this view. The nature of man permanently prefers impiety, and divine justice curses the enemy of his Creator with an endless device of that course, lest sinners continue in that condition by perpetual aversion to God. We may not understand it, but all ultimate truth is beyond comprehension. Nature cannot reverse its own confirmed disposition, and its permanence is no more inconsistent with freedom in man than in God. Senex.

The Battle of King's Mountain

[Dedicated to the author's son, the sixth successive namesake of two direct ancestors, father and son, who fought in the battle at the ages of 60 and 16.]

Written for the Anniversary, Oct. 7, 1903.

The spirits of our sainted sires,
Are with us still;
Eternal as the sacred fires
Of God's Almighty will.

From Carolina's towering heights,
From old Virginia's hills,
The call goes forth, the war-torch lights,
The breast of Freedom thrills.

Tennessee obeys the call,
And Georgia shakes her mane,
The mountain men are marching all,
Toward Catawba's plain.

They shout as down the hills they go,
Hark, how the mountains ring!
"Charge on yon bloody trait'rous foe;
Down with the Tyrant King!"

The Campbells march from Shenandoah,
Ben Cleveland winds his horn ;
Hear the voice of Shelby roar,
And Sevier's trump at morn.
McDowell, Williams, Winston too,
Are gathering up their clan.
In valor great, though numbers few,
While Heaven guards the van.
From bidding by the women-kind,
From watching o'er the sheep,
With bairns and babes to God consigned,
To arms the farmers leap.
The grandsire with his locks of snow,
The stripling youth untried,
No fears or hesitation know,
Though other sons have died.
Straight to King's Mountain's sheltering rock,
False Ferguson repairs;
Around him fast the Tories flock,
Like beasts from out their lairs.
In boastful mirth and braggart pride,
The Red-coats pass the night,
But on the Patriot squadrons ride,
—Jehovah is their might.
While cup and tankard pass around,
Within the British camp,
The volunteers give forth no sound,
Except the sentry's tramp.
But silent prayers ascend to God,
And reverent heads are bowed,
"Oh Thou, thy people's staff and rod,
Be still our Fire and Cloud."
He heard; and forth at His command,
The Angel army moved,
And by the Patriots took their stand,
The morning dawns, the light descends,
The soldiers rise to arms,
Each to his leader's voice attends,
The trumpets sound alarms.
Brave Campbell sends along the line,
The word of stern command,
"Men, over yonder floats the sign,
"Of that curst Tory band.
"Before the sun goes down this day
"We mean to take that height,
"Now bear ye boldly in the fray,
"And for your country fight."
Up rush the raw militia: up,
O'er logs and stones and crags,
With eye intent to see the foe
No soldier halts or lags.
Huzza, the bullets hiss and fly,
Huzza, the bugles blow!
On Piedmontese, to win or die,
—See how they charge the foe!
'Tis hilt to hilt, and man to man
The battle rages now,
Fight, sons of Freedom as ye can,
—A laurel for each brow.
Down goes the Dragon, the ensign down,
The Britons form in vain,
Farewell, King George, to half your crown,
Farewell to oppression's reign.
They break, they flee, they seek the slope,
But Cleveland follows fast,
And soon in flight they find no hope,
The Victory's overpast.
O glorious deed achieved that day,
O mighty mountain men!
When shall your glory fade away,
Or such deeds come again?
The news the weary heart inspired
Of great Virginia's son
And with new zeal the Northmen fired,
Till Freedom's cause was won!

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

The editor talked so long this week in replying to Knox that there was no room for the answer to Dr. Ramsay on Cotton Futures and Gambling. We tender Dr. Ramsay assurances of distinguished consideration and will attend to him next week. The Country Parson writes instructively of the Three R's. L. B. J. criticizes a critic. The anniversary of King's Mountain, October 7th, is fittingly described. Do not miss the reading of the article, Can it be Possible?

"Sence Freedom Broke Out," has a good deal of sense in it. And then we must turn to two pages usually filled with the events of the day under the title, "The World" to read Dr. Leyburn's account of the committee meetings in St. Louis and Knox's second article on the Dispensary.

The committee on Presbyterial Boundaries was the second one referred to in the first paragraph of the First Page.

The Home of John Knox.

Up the narrow stairs that are visible in the cut, hundreds climb daily to see the place where lived the one who never feared the face of man or woman. On the wall of the sitting room hang autograph letters of the great people of the day from Germany, France, Switzerland and England. Around this room is a frieze on which is the inscription: "I am in the place where I am demanded of my conscience to speak the truth, therefore the truth I speak, impugn it who lists. Cursed be they who seek effusion of blood, war or dissension. Let us possess Jesus Christ, and the benefits of His evangel and none within Scotland will be more obedient subjects than we."

From the large, second-floor window, he used to preach to the throngs in the street below, when no longer able to go to his beloved St. Giles and preach "three times a day and twice on Sunday." The study is the projection from the wall on the third floor front; by the little square window one can sit at the desk of the great reformer, and turn the leaves of the first bible printed in Edinburgh. On the door of the study is a crude knocker—a bar and rings of iron. The furniture of the house proper has beautiful carvings, much of it more elaborate in design than that used by Queen Mary in Holyrood palace. The Standard is indebted to The Presbyterian Journal of Philadelphia for the cut of this most interesting building.

MISSOURI.

THE PRESBYTERY OF UPPER MISSOURI met at Mor-ton-Hardin church, Missouri, September 29, 1903.

Officers.—Rev. N. H. McCain, Moderator, and Rev. J. W. McClure, Temporary Clerk.

Present.—Eleven ministers and twelve elders.

Licentiate J. E. Flow was received from the Presbytery of Mecklenburg, and a call from Bethel church for his pastoral services placed in his hands. The executive committees on Publication, Sabbath School and Young People's work, were united, and Rev. L. E. McNair, of St. Joseph, Mo., was made chairman of the joint committee. The committee was instructed to arrange for a convention of Sunday School and Young People's workers during the year. Rev. C. P. Foreman resigned as stated clerk and treasurer, and Rev. J. J. Hill, of Liberty, Mo., was elected in his place. Popular meeting was held in the interest of foreign missions on Wednesday evening. Addresses were made by Drs. W. R. Dobyms, T. C. Barret, S. M. Neal and Rev. R. L. Kinnaird. Rev. L. E. McNair was elected permanent clerk. Rev. R. L. Kinnaird was elected Moderator for the next meeting.

Adjourned to meet at Bethel church October 15, 1903.

J. J. Hill, Stated Clerk.

THE PRESBYTERY OF POTOSI met in Caruthersville, Mo., Sept. 25, 1903, at 7:30 p. m., and was opened with a sermon by the Moderator, Rev. A. J. Cheatham, on John 4:6. Eight ministers and six elders were in attendance.

Officers.—Rev. C. W. Latham, Moderator, and Elder Thos. M. Williams, Temporary Clerk.

Presbyterial History.—Rev. W. W. Killough, in compliance with appointment, presented historical sketches of the Brazeau, first Apple Creek and Pleasant Hill Churches, of which he is the pastor, which were read and placed on file to be recorded in a book which the Stated Clerk was directed to purchase and as chairman of the Committee on Presbyterial History, he was very courteously requested to prepare historical sketches of the remaining churches and report to Presbytery.

Installation.—The commission appointed to ordain and install Rev. Allen F. Cunningham pastor of the Caruthersvill Church, reported that duty discharged on the second Sabbath of May, 1903.

Committees reported that Rev. R. E. Porterfield was installed pastor of the Kennett Church on the fourth Sabbath of May, 1903, and Rev. C. E. Hicok of the Farmington Church on the first Sabbath of June last.

Home Missions.—The report of the committee shows that progress is made in this good work, and inasmuch as an earnest effort is now being made to erect houses of worship at Ste. Genevieve and Fredericktown, all our Churches are urged to subscribe to the Church Erection Fund of Presbytery, respecting which cards have been sent out. The regrouping of our Churches is left to the committee who are to report at an adjourned meeting during Synod in October.

Foreign Missions.—Mention is made of the good work of our missionary, Miss Addie Sloan, during her late furlough in visiting a number of our churches and awakening a deeper interest in the cause of missions.

The Woman's Missionary Union is commended for its zeal in this important work, which has resulted in the increased contributions of our churches for foreign missions.

Presbyterial sermon at spring meeting by Rev. A. F. Cunningham, on "The Joy of Service."

Sabbath Schools.—One day at the fall meeting of 1904 is set apart for a Sabbath School Institute, and the committee is requested to make all necessary preparation for the same.

Education, the Home and School.—Of the sum appropriated for the payment of the debt, $19.15 remains unpaid. The churches that have not taken up collections for this object are kindly urged to do so as soon as possible.

Colored Evangelization.—The committee had leave to report at the adjourned meeting at Synod.

By a rising vote Presbytery tendered most cordial thanks for the courteous hospitality extended during our stay in Caruthersville.

After which Presbytery adjourned to meet in stated session at Perryville, Mo., Tuesday before full moon in April, 1904, at 7:30 p. m.

Geo. W. Harlan, State Clerk.

Remarks.—All the circumstances attending this meeting combined to render it one of exceeding interest.

It included the Sabbath, and with one or two exceptions, the members remained until the adjournment. The weather was propitious and hospitality munificent. While the regular business of Presbytery was conducted with due consideration, much time was given to preaching and also to exercises of a popular character, for which, according to a program previously arranged and published, the brethren were prepared and thus rendered the addresses and discussions instructive and interesting to all in attendance.

Caruthersville is the county seat of Pemiscot, the extreme southeast county of the State—the Pan-Handle of Missouri, heretofore regarded as "The step off into nowhere," and noted for its swamps and forests of cypress and other valuable timber.

Now, through drainage, the land is being reclaimed. It is exceedingly fertile and is finely adapted to the culture of cotton and alfalfa. The former is of the best quality and 30,000 acres of it are now in cultivation. The latter is just being introduced and its yield is very large.

Of this county, Caruthersville is the metropolis, a growing city of near 4,000 inhabitants, with water works and electric lights; also a public school which ranks among the best in this section of the State. Situated on the Mississippi river and the new Frisco Railroad, by which it is brought into immediate connection with St. Louis and Memphis, consequently its trade is extensive.

The Church was organized in 1895 with eleven members and one elder; now has 34 members and three elders, and three deacons, with a most comfortable and beautiful house of worship, near which is the manse recently finished, home-like and attractive, it reflects great credit upon the ladies of the congregation who took an active part in its creation and completion.

The Sabbath School has an average attendance of about 70, and is most admirably conducted.

Under the efficient labors of Rev. Allen F. Cunningham, recently ordained and installed as its pastor, the Church is prospering and its outlook is very encouraging.

G. W. H.

PLEASANT HILL.—Rev. W. K. Johnston, of Jefferson, Texas, who was recently called to this Church, has declined the call and remains in his present field, and the Church continues vacant.

ST. LOUIS PRESBYTERY met at Newport Church October 6 at 11 o'clock, and was opened, at the request of the Moderator and pastor of the church, with a sermon by Rev. W. M. Langtry from Job. 14:14. Rev. J. L. Mange was elected Moderator and Rev. B. C. Bell temporary clerk, with Rev. W. M. Langtry acting State Clerk, Dr. Gorin, the Stated Clerk, having died since the last meeting.

There were present during the meeting 8 ministers and 8 ruling elders. Rev. B. C. Bell was received by letter from the Presbytery of Lafayette, and a call from the St. Charles Church for Mr. Bell's services as pastor was presented and being found in order, was placed in his hands, and being accepted by Mr. Bell, the following order for his installation, viz., the third Sabbath in October, Dr. G. L. Leyburn (requested) to preach the sermon, Rev. J. L. Monye to charge the pastor, and Mr. L. S. McPheeters the people. Rev. W. M. Langtry was elected stated clerk.

The committee to install Rev. B. D. Kennedy as pastor of the Troy Church, reported that the work was done the last Sabbath of July.

Sabbath School Work.—By a standing rule this Presbytery devotes one afternoon, or part of it, to Sabbath Schools and their work. At this meeting two principal addresses were delivered, one on "The Model Teacher," by Rev. J. L. Mange; the other on "The Sunday School," by Rev. W. M.

Langtry, and these were followed by discussion on the part of members of Presbytery.

The free conversation on the state of religion brought out these facts: That the Churches were now very generally supplied with pastors; that the attendance is good, and the obligations of the Church met with a good degree of promptness and fulness.

Memorials and appropriate resolutions were presented and adopted respecting two of the older members of Presbytery, deceased since last meeting, Rev. Dr. R. P. Farris and Rev. M. G. Gorin, D. D.

After hearty thanks to the Newport Church and people for their kindness and hospitality, Presoytery adjourned to meet in regular session at Festus, Mo., (Joachim Church), Tuesday before the full moon in April, 1904.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

PEE DEE PRESBYTERY met in McColl, S. C., September 29, and was opened with a sermon by Rev. E. C. Bailey. Present, 12 ministers and 16 elders. Rev. D. M. Fulton was elected Moderator and Elder J. J. James temporary clerk.

Professor George Brigs, of the Presbyterian High School, in Florence, was introduced and reported the new school in a flourishing condition.

Mr. C. E. McLean, a member of the Dillon Church and a student of Davidson College, was received under the care of the Presbytery as a candidate for the ministry.

The work of the Sunday Schools, Publication and Young People's Societies was entrusted to a new committee of five members.

One hundred dollars was appropriated towards building a chapel at one of the mills in McColl.

Rev. I. S. McElroy, D. D., was present and delivered an interesting address in behalf of the cause of ministerial relief.

Reedy Creek Church was selected as the next place of meeting.

There is not a vacant church in the Presbytery, and the narratives from the churches are very encouraging.

A. H. McARN, S. C.

GAFFNEY.—Rev. R. G. McLees preached for eight days at this church. It was a gracious meeting. Eight have been added to the Church on profession. Others are expected to unite. Mr. S. F. Parrott was elected an elder last Sabbath.

W. R. POTTER.

TEXAS.

PRESBYTERY OF DALLAS.—Met at Amarillo, Texas, September 24th, and was opened with a sermon by the Moderator, Rev. J. N. Ivy. There were present seventeen ministers and eleven ruling elders. Rev. A. W. Crawford was elected moderator, Rev. E. L. Storey, Rev. W. L. Downing, Rev. A. M. McLaughlin and Rev. C. L. Hague, D. D., were elected clerks. Resolutions on the death of Rev. John S. Moore, D. D., were read and an hour spent in memorial services, during which tender and affectionate words were spoken by members of Presbytery. Presbytery adopted an overture to Synod asking Synod to establish an orphans' home in Dallas. Encouraging reports were made of our educational institutions, and earnest addresses were made by the respective representatives of two of these institutions, viz.: Prof. J. A. McLaughlin in behalf of Austin College and Rev. E. M. Munroe, D. D., in behalf of the Texas Presbyterian College for Girls. Dr. A. L. Phillips, general superintendent of Sabbath schools was present and made a strong address on Sabbath schools. Licentiate W. F. Galbraith was ordained and a commission was appointed to install him at Ennis. Rev. J. M. Shive was received from Red River Presbytery and a commission appointed to install him at Gainesville.

E. M. Munroe, Stated Clerk.

SEQUIN.—Rev. Jesse W. Siler preached twice here September 20th, his last service before going to San Angelo, to take charge of the church there. Two members received on profrssion, and one adult baptized.

NORTH CAROLINA.

ROCKY MOUNT.—The Bethlehem mission, in connection with the Rocky Mount church, has recently been encouraged and strengthened by the addition to the communion of the church of four young people who, from its organization, have been regular attendants of the Sunday School.

Rev. R. W. Hines, of Mebane, has made a second visit to these people and preached about one week with great acceptance. He is much beloved by them and rendered valuable aid to the pastor in his work.

STEELE CREEK.—Rev. A. A. Little, of Selma, Ala., recently visited his old charge, Steele Creek, N. C., and was warmly received and welcomed by the people. He preached an excellent sermon to a large congregation on the last Sabbath of September.

The session of the Steele Creek Church has given their pastor a month's vacation, a part of which he expects to spend in Monroe county, W. Va.

WINSTON.—Evangelistic services began Sunday, October 11th, at the First Presbyterian church, Winston, N. C., conducted by Rev. Dr. E. O. Guerrant, of Kentucky. Two services every day at 11:00 a. m. and 7:30 p. m.

GRAHAM.—Last Sunday was a blessed day in our church. A very large congregation assembled to partake of our quarterly communion, special preparatory services having been held for three evenings previous. During the service nine young people stood before the pulpit to take on them the public vows of church membership, and six of these to receive the sacrament of baptism. One member was also received from the Christian Church. These accessions are the result of some quiet personal work in the homes and Sunday School. The spirit's influence is very visible among our young people, and others will probably soon make profession of faith. We try to have our "Rally Day" and "Decision Day" every communion season.

Our Sunday School report for the last quarter shows 4 officers and teachers and 24 scholars on the first honor roll, for not having missed one Sunday, and 7 officers and teachers and 21 scholars on the second honor roll for not having missed more than twice. There have been this year, thus far, three perfect recitations of the Shorter Catechism, and seven of the Child's Catechism.

E. C. MURRAY.

ROCKY RIVER CHURCH.—Rev. A. L. Phillips, D. D., is truly a genius for Sunday School work. His programme for Sabbath School Day is an ideal one. The use of it, with circular letter and Bible mite boxes resulted in a collection from Rocky River Sunday School of $12.13, and this is the first observance of the day here. The children's foreign mission day in August brought a collection of $22.00.

X. X.

MECKLENBURG PRESBYTERY met in Wadesboro, N. C., on September 30th, at 11 a. m. There were present 20 ministers and 20 elders.

Organization.—Rev. H. W. Hoon was elected Moderator, Rev. J. R. McAlpine and Rev. G. H. Atkinson were chosen clerks.

Reception.—Rev. J. B. Mack, D. D., was received from North Alabama Presbytery.

Supply.—The churches of Providence and Banks obtained permission to have Dr. J. B. Mack supply them until the spring meeting.

New Church.—The commission appointed to organize a church at Seversville, reported that the church had been organized, and Seversville church was enrolled.

Conference.—A large part of the time of the first afternoon was spent in a conference on the state of religion, when many encouraging features were presented.

Dissolution.—Rev. W. C. Hagan, at his own request, with the Church concurring, was released from the pastoral charge of Newell church in order that he may accept a call from the church at Fitzgerald, Ga.

Dismission.—Rev. W. C. Hagan was dismissed to Savannah Presbytery.

Rankin Overture.—The Rankin overture was taken from the docket and the following answer was unanimously adopted, viz.: "There is no explicit Scriptural authority for such distinction. As applied to our Form of Government, the phrase jure divino covers essentials only. Touching the mere accidents of government, the Scriptures allow wide discretion; and our Church, taking advantage of such liberty, for reasons satisfactory to herself and approved by long experience, assigns the teaching elders to membership in the Presbytery, and her ruling elders to membership in the session."

Home Mission Apportionment.—The Stated Clerk was directed to write to the clerk of each session and urge that every church send to the treasurer her apportionment to Presbyterian Home Missions during October.

Place and Time of Next Meeting.—Steele Creek church was selected as the place for the next meeting, and time adopted was May 3, 1904, at 11 a. m.

Election of Trustees.—Mr. P. M. Brown was re-elected a trustee of Davidson College, and Rev. W. H. Davis was re-elected a trustee of the Charlotte Presbyterian College.

Presidential Addresses.—The Presbytery was favored by the presence of two very happy presidents. One was Rev. J. R. Bridges, D. D., president of the Charlotte Presbyterian College, who addressed the Presbytery, giving a glowing account of the greatly increased patronage and enlarged facilities of that institution. The other was Dr. H. L. Smith, president of Davidson College, who followed with an account of the improvement and changes on the campus at Davidson, and stating that everything was submerged under the incoming tide of patronage—for every accommodation had been taken by the largest number of students in the history of the college.

Response.—The following response to these addresses was adopted.

Resolved 1. That Mecklenburg Presbytery has heard with delight of the continued increase in the number of pupils attending these institutions of learning, and of the high grade of work which they are endeavoring to do.

2. That we bow in praise and thanksgiving to the great Head of the Church for the revival in education, which has come upon our beloved Church; and that we pray that this spirit may be broadened and deepened and wholly consecrated to the service of our covenant-keeping God.

3. That our ministers be diligent in instructing the people upon the importance of Christian education.

Report on Candidates.—The committee on Ministerial Education reported eighteen candidates under the care of the Presbytery, and that three of these would complete their course at the Seminary next spring.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted, viz.:

Resolved. That our Committee of Education be instructed that hereafter this Presbytery will not recommend to the General Assembly's committee for aid, except in extraordinary cases, any of its candidates who attend any theological seminary not under the control of our Church.

Action on Joint Control of Female Colleges.—A communication was received from the Joint Board of Trustees of Concord and Mecklenburg Presbyteries, and read, asking for a separation of the two Presbyteries in the management of female education in their bounds. The following answer was unanimously adopted, viz.:

1. That the Presbytery of Mecklenburg approves of such separation, Concord Presbytery concurring.

That the Presbytery of Mecklenburg release any and all rights it may have in and to the property, real and personal, in Concord Presbytery belonging to its incorporated Board of Trustees.

3. We authorize the Board of Trustees to have the charter of the corporation so amended as to embody and carry out the proposed separation. All the above action is to be conditional upon the concurrence of Concord Presbytery.

Ministerial Relief.—The committee on Ministerial Relief made a report, pending which a stirring address was made by Rev. Dr. I. S. McElroy, Assembly's Secretary of Ministerial Relief.

The following resolution was adopted, viz.:

Presbytery has heard with pleasure and profit the excellent address of Rev. I. S. McElroy, D. D., on ministerial relief, and most cordially and earnestly commends this sacred and important cause to the increased sympathy and liberality of all our churches.

Presbytery adjourned to meet in the Second Church, of Charlotte, N. C., on Tuesday, October 20, at 11 a. m.

T. J. ALLISON, S. C.

THE PRESBYTERY OF MECKLENBURG will hold an adjourned meeting in the Second Church, Charlotte, N. C., on Tuesday, the 20th of October, at 11 a. m.

STATESVILLE.—Statesville Female College has had an excellent opening, and goes forward into the work of the session with an able faculty, a large attendance of students, and a reassuring financial condition.

The friends of the college are rallying strongly to its support, and with what has been done and what is being planned for this institution, the prospects of the college are bright. Its more perfect equipment and the earnest support of its friends will give it a standing before the public, and will cause its patronage to be increased in a very gratifying manner. This college has a rare combination of attractions—healthful climate, refined, Christian community, very comfortable home life for students, able teachers in every department, and moderate charges. No wonder that, with such advantages, Statesville Female College "is coming into her own." Students are constantly coming in; a number have been "entered," who are yet coming.

CONCORD PRESBYTERY will meet in Statesville, in adjourned meeting, on October 21st, at 2 o'clock p. m.

W. R. McClelland, S. C.

MISSISSIPPI.

WILLIAMSBURG.—Rev. J. M. Rhue, of Meridian, spent three days at the school house near this place. One sermon a day and visiting in the homes gave help and strength. One infant, five adult baptisms, two of them heads of families, six in all, added to the faith. To God be all the praise.

REV. ALEX. NEWTON.

PRESBYTERY OF NORTH MISSISSIPPI.—The Presbytery of North Mississippi met at Sardis, Miss., September 29, 1903, at 8 p. m. The opening sermon was preached by Rev. W. L. Milne, the retiring Moderator, from Acts 19:2.

Officers.—Ruling Elders R. F. Kimmons and S. H. Logan were elected Moderator and Temporary Clerk, respectively.

Dismissed.—Rev. S. J. Martin was dismissed to the Presbytery of Paducah, and Rev. F. L. Banks to the Presbytery of Red River.

Candidate.—Mr. Clyde Johnson, a member of the Church at Senatobia, was received under care of Presbytery from the Presbytery of East Hanover, as a candidate for the ministry.

Bible Cause.—A permanent committee on the Bible Cause was appointed with Rev. W. L. Milne, of Byhalia, as chairman.

Committees Consolidated.—The permanent committees of Publication and Sabbath Schools were consolidated. The committee appointed as the new committee is as follows: Rev. J. E. Hobson, chairman; Prof. W. A. Anderson, R. F. Kimmons and W. B. Rosellaoregh.

Stated Supplies.—Until the next stated meeting of Presbytery, Rev. W. L. Milne was granted permission to supply the Byhalia group of churches, and Rev. J. M. Richardson that of Sand Springs. The support of the Presbyterial evangelist was discontinued, and arrangements, both as to grouping and supplying the vacant churches of Presbytery, were left in the hands of the Committee of Home Missions.

The next regular meeting of Presbytery will be held at Batesville on Wednesday night before the first Sabbath in April, 1904.

S. L. Grigsby, Stated Clerk.

THE PRESBYTERY OF MISSISSIPPI met in Bensaleen church, Lincoln county, September 29, 1903, at 11 a. m., opening sermon by Rev. C. W. Grafton, from text Psalm 23:4.

Moderator.—Rev. E. W. Ford.

Temporary Clerk.—Rev. W. T. Wadley.

Visiting Brother.—Rev. R. Bradley, of the M. E. Church, South.

Received.—Rev. Eugene M. Stewart, from Presbytery of East Alabama.

Calls from Fayette and Pine Ridge churches were placed in his hands and accepted by him.

Rev. C. W. Grafton, Rev. H. H. Brownlee and Elder J. McCaleb were appointed to install him pastor at Fayette; Rev. J. J. Chisolm, Rev. J. W. Henderson and Elder T. C. McNair were appointed to install him pastor at Pine Ridge.

Licensed.—Mr. Thos. B. Grafton, student of Kentucky Theological Seminary, after a satisfactory examination, was licensed to preach the Gospel as a probationer. He is the son of Dr. C. W. Grafton, who has been thirty years pastor of Ben Salem. It is Mr. Grafton's purpose to become a foreign missionary. Presbytery commended him to our committee of foreign Missions.

Rev. W. H. Perkins led a prayer service in behalf of our Congo mission.

Home Missions.—The committee reported inability to secure an evangelist. Presbytery overtured the Synod of Mississippi to appoint a committee of Home Missions and put one or more evangelists into the field at once.

Printed Minutes.—Presbytery approved the committee's work in publishing minutes of the spring meeting and directed the Stated Clerk to print minutes of the fall meeting.

Hospitality.—Bensalem is a delightful church for a meeting of Presbytery. The good people are well trained.

Place of next meeting, Fayette.

S. C. Caldwell, Stated Clerk.

TOMBECKBEE PRESBYTERY.—Tombeckbee Presbytery met with the Bethel Church of Lowndes county, near Crawford, Miss., October 1, 1903. Present, nine ministers and nine elders.

Officers.—Rev. Jno. W. Moseley, Jr., was chosen Moderator; Rev. C. B. McLeod, Temporary Clerk, and Rev. D. H. Ogden, Reading Clerk.

Rev. J. D. Wilson.—The pastoral relation existing between Rev. J. D. Wilson and the churches of Aberdeen and Hamilton was dissolved and he was at his own request dismissed to the Presbytery of Western Texas.

Rev. R. L. Campbell.—Presbytery, in conjunction with the West Point church, called Rev. R. L. Campbell to a work in its bounds, the West Point church to have one-half of his time as its pastor, and the Presbytery to have the other half as its evangelist.

Rev. J. F. Turner.—The pastoral relation existing between Rev. J. F. Turner and the Houston group of churches was dissolved.

Next Place of Meeting.—Houston was selected as the next place for its spring meeting.

Shuqualok.—Presbytery voted to "ask the Macon Church, in view of the opening at Shuqualok and the sustentation given by Presbytery, to permit its pastor to give one Sunday a month to said work."

Scooba Group.—Presbytery, on motion, "resolved to send Rev. J. F. Turner to the Scooba group of churches and that he be authorized to labor there until the next regular meeting of Presbytery, or until the group call a pastor, and that $75 be contributed per year, payable quarterly, to help sustain him.

College Consolidation.—Presbytery, on motion, "resolved that the Presbytery of Tombeckbee overture the Synod of Mississippi to appoint delegates to an educational conference proposed to be held in Atlanta in connection with the university proposition.

Rev. C. B. McLeod.—The call of Macon church for the pastoral services of Rev. C. B. McLeod, was accepted and a committee was appointed to install him October 21, 1903.

Jno. W. Moseley, Jr., Stated Clerk.

Committee Meetings in St. Louis.

Two important Committees, or rather three, met here last week. Much interest was excited by these meetings in the whole community, and especially in Presbyterian circles. One was a committee on Territory or Territorial Bonds, I believe, appointed by the last Gen. Assembly U. S. A., to settle for them, if it could, the vexed question of the colored brother and his status among them, which has recently sprung up to trouble our Northern brethren. The other was a joint Committee or two Committees appointed by the Northern and Cumberland General Assemblies on fraternity and union. The final action of these committees has of course not been published, and will not be until report is made to the Assemblies in May next. But some general idea of what has been done, or determined upon, has been given the public by the daily papers, and confirmed substantially by members of the committees, in terms or by their silence.

As to the first committee and its action: It will be remembered that the subject came before the Los Angeles Assembly on petition or overture that certain negro churches in Tennessee and elsewhere perhaps, be set off into separate Presbyteries, or in some such form. And this committee was appointed with Dr. S. J. Nichols as chairman to seek some solution of the question thus raised. The committee after several conferences during two days agreed upon a report to be submitted to the next Assembly. Of this report the papers agree in saying. 1. It was unanimous. They were all of one mind and heart. 2. There is to be no "negro" legislation of any kind by the Northern Assembly, no "color line" drawn, no "racial" or other distinction, separation or division formally announced or authorized; nothing of the kind. And this to be declared and emphasized. But 3 members of the committee added, this would not prevent the Assembly from allowing different classes—races, tongues, or peoples—to organize separate churches, Presbyteries, &c., if they so desired and requested. Assuming that this is in the main correct, it may be said of this proposed action, that it is significant, being astute, clever, characteristic. If adopted they will proclaim and emphasize their own theory, but "suffer" our practice; they will still say their say, but do our way. And under all the circumstances who will say that this is not "wise" also?

The meeting of the other committee or committees was a far more interesting and important matter; for it had to do with the proposed union of two great bodies, the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church; this if accomplished would be a notable event indeed, with far-reaching and mighty results.

The two committees met first separately and after full consideration and discussion, each drew up a tentative basis of union; at a joint meeting of the two, the Presbyterian committee, through its chairman, Dr. W. H. Roberts, first presented its proposed basis of union, and then the Cumberland committee, through its chairman, Dr. W. H. Black, did the same. After this they separated, and apart each considered, criticised and suggested amendments to the proposal of the other; then another joint conference was held, or perhaps several; and finally the whole matter was referred to a subcommittee of three from each side, for the Presbyterians Drs. W. H. Roberts, Chas. A. Dickey and Jno. R. Davies, and for the Cumberland Presbyterians Drs. W. H. Black and S. M. Templeton, and Judge W. E. Settle. This subcommittee to agree, if possible, upon some common basis of union, this to be submitted first to the full committees and, if approved by these, then reported to the two Assemblies next May, with recommendation of adoption. These are the facts, and I think are correctly stated. Several remarks are suggested.

1. The members of these committees are hopeful of final union between the two bodies especially those of the Cumberland body. While reticent as to details, they were open and positive in expressing themselves on this point—ultimate union. And it is at least possible that in the near future we may see the formal and complete union of these two bodies into one great Presbyterian Church spread over the whole country. With this condition our Church may have to ere long.

2. It was repeatedly asserted in the city papers that the difficulties—doctrine, polity and administrative property—that of doctrine had been the most that this had been removed, largely if not wholly, by the recent action of the Northern Church in changing its Confession. These statements seemed to come from Cumberland sources, and were I know repeatedly made by Cumberland brethren. To an outsider this looks as if those brethren were glad of an excuse to recede from a rather untenable position, and had hastened to seize this first opportunity to say, "The 'fatality' in the old Confession, against which we have been so long protesting, has at last been removed and we can now accept it," and have acted accordingly. 3. And if this means that the Cumberland church does not accept in good faith the present Confession of Faith of the Northern Church, all true Calvinists, I had almost said all Christians, will heartily rejoice if the union is accomplished. For the real changes in the Confession do not in any wise affect the Calvinistic system or touch any fundamental doctrine, barring one or two slight amendments, several explanations and two additional chapters, and these only stating officially and authoritatively what Calvinists and Presbyterians have long been claiming that the Confession really meant, and what they all have always believed and taught. And that the whole Cumberland church should become and be genuinely Calvinistic, this is "a consummation devoutly to be wished."

Temperance.

The South Carolina Dispensary.

Its beginning: It was born in political sin, child of broken faith. After an earnest campaign for prohibition in 1892, in addition to voting for officers in the State primary, the people of South Carolina voted between "license" and "no license." "No license" carried by a large majority and when the legislature met, the House in obedience to this verdict of the people, passed a Prohibition act. But during the last days of the legislature the Senate substituted the Dispensary law, which after great pressure from the Governor and others, was finally passed by the House. The enactment of the Dispensary law was withholding from the people what they had asked for and wanted, and giving them something they did not ask for or want. They asked for a fish and were given a stone.

Its Political History: Begun in violated faith, it is not to be expected that its history would be blameless and it hasn't, but it has been shameful. It has done more to debauch the officers of South Carolina than all other things combined since 1876. The victims of the corrupting touch are numbered by hundreds and belong to all classes. One of the best informed newspaper men of South Carolina told us that there had been between 100 and 150 dispensers who had defaulted. A few of these were caused by incompetency, but most of them by dishonesty. And to show how thorough the bossism of the dispensary is, according to this editor only one was punished! The State usually gets its money from the bondsmen and in refusing to prosecute the defaulter is itself corrupted by conniving at crime. In ——— county, they have had four dispensers. The first three turned up with shortages and went unpunished. The fourth has been in office only four months and needs a little more time. This is not so much a sad commentary on the honor of South Carolina men or the equity of its courts, but is rather an illustration of the universal yet oft forgotten fact, that a man can't wallow in the mire without getting soiled. But not only dispensers but many other officers, a large constabulary force, county and State boards of control, even the Governor, are forced by their offices to live in part in the atmosphere of whiskey; and many are they who fall. Take an example: The State Board of Control purchases annually from wholesale dealers nearly two million dollars worth of liquor. It is almost universally the custom of wholesale houses to grant rebates—often times as high as 5 per cent, which on the two millions would be $100,000.00.

That rebate has been the pit into which more than one has fallen. The chance at rebates is one reason why prominent men are so anxious to be on the State Board of Control which pays about $300.00 a year. So notorious is this scandal that one Governor on the stump acknowledged hav-received liquor rebates and justified himself by saying that others had done it too!

At the last meeting of the legislature a prominent member made a man of absolute truthfulness that he (the legislator) had offered all the fine liquor he wanted free, and he also said this offer was general. The saloon was never bolder than that in attempting to corrupt legislation. Not only has the dispensary been a dominant political power in the towns and cities, but also in the remote rural districts. Up to 1900 at least, every candidate from justice of the peace to governor was asked, "Aro you in favor of the dispensary?" and woe be the man who said "No."

The Law and Its Amendments: The Dispensary, in our judgment, wrong at the beginning, has been made worse by each amendment. At first the law provided that the profits should be equitably divided between all the counties. But it was seen that some counties would not permit a dispensary in their bounds and as an inducement to establish a dispensary, the prohibition counties were denied any share of the profits.

Then as it now stands, the county board of control may establish a dispensary in any town that prior to 1893 had no saloons, unless a majority petition against the dispensary is presented. Again no matter how rigidly a county may hold to prohibition, yet the law permits the dispensaries of neighboring towns to ship into this prohibition territory all the whiskey that is wanted. Some one said that the dispensary law is like a fish-trap; easy to get in but no way out. With all its minutiae the law has no provision by which a town, tired of the dispensary, may get rid of it.

The Dispensary in Theory and Practice: The dispensary as it looks on paper to some one in a far-away office is one thing. But to one reared in South Carolina and who has known and seen its workings first-hand, it is a very different thing. We are dealing today with the dispensary as it actually is. The law is violated by dispensers, county and State boards almost when they want to and nothing is said or done with them. For instance, the law requires every purchaser to fill out an application for liquor, signing his name at the end of it. We were in a dispensary a few weeks ago and saw dust on the application blanks and we asked if they were not required to be filled out, before each sale. The dispenser answered: "The law requires it, but we never do it except with a suspected person." One boast of the dispensary is that the liquor is "chemically pure," and the law requires all liquors to be tested by the State chemist. Not to speak of the cheap liquor purchased last year, $10,000 worth of "blockade" whiskey was seized. Yet a prominent citizen of Columbia told us that the chemical test was never allowed to interfere with the sale, no matter how adulterated it was.

Again in the early days of the dispensary the effort was made to establish a dispensary in ——. They estimated the votes they could command and found they lacked 45 of a majority of the free holders. Whereupon a leading dispensaryite who owned one half acre of swamp land in the edge of town, that was worthless even for pasturage, deeded this land to forty-five negroes and then marched them to the polls and voted them for the dispensary. And so it was established! This deed is on record and all the unbelieving may see it. We know this is an extreme case, but the policy from the beginning has been and is to establish as many dispensaries as possible and thus increase the sales as much as possible.

While the dispensers have no inducement to drum for business the leading officials have reason to push the sales and in every way to strengthen the dispensary's hold on the taxpayer.

Many dwell so long on the virtue of the fact that the dispensary closes at sundown that they forget that a man may go or send and buy as much as 4-7-8 gallons every day. And we think it is the United States and not the South Carolina law that puts even this limit on the purchaser. The following would be a truthful motto for a large part of the dispensary officials: "The more liquor we sell the more taxes we receive and the more votes we make, therefore sell liquor!"

Many other ways in which the letter and spirit of the law are evaded and violated might be mentioned; some of which are exceedingly clever and amusing, but we must pass on.

in 1899 $1,788,425, and in 1902 $2,406,216, besides about $300,000 for beer. More than doubled in six years. This we believe, is the largest retail liquor business on earth — surely a proud distinction. At fifty cents a "drunk," the above amount will furnish for South Carolina five and a half million "drunks" in one year. And when you deduct the women and children and the thousands of temperate or abstinent men, you have for a little State with a few over a million inhabitants, a fearful drinking record. Surely no child of God will call that a solution of the liquor question.

Its Professed and Its Real Object: Professedly the dispensary was established in the interests of temperance. It was called by many a "moral institution." The real object was to make money and votes and political power. The moral betterment of the people was not in the minds of its founders, except in so far as this was a matter of good politics. The dispensary's history plainly shows that. But does it make money? Last year the profits were $247,398. A neat sum; but when it is seen from the reports of the Comptroller General that the cost of the criminal courts, the almshouses and charitable institutions was $836,313 and when we recall that most of this expense is caused by the whiskey sold, it will be seen that instead of making the taxpayer $247,398 the dispensary with its crime-and-poverty-producing liquor has been a financial loss to the taxpayer. Can any arithmetician get a different answer to that sum?

Beer Dispensaries: A further evidence that the dispensary managers are in the business to sell all they can is the recent opening up of beer dispensaries. And to show how free a hand the State Board of Control has, we have only to state that these beer dispensaries were established without a vestige of a statute or authorization by the people of South Carolina. The Board just thought it would be the proper thing to do and then went and did it. These beer dispensaries usually have three rooms; a front room (which is considered "the premises of the dispensary") as a sale room, a middle storage room, and a rear room more or less fitted up as a drinking room. Here is a flourish-graft that strongly resembles the saloon. Another feature of the beer dispensary is that the dispenser pays the State a royalty so that the more he sells the more he makes. In the principal cities of South Carolina there may be seen on their streets fancy beer wagons loudly advertising their wares. And yet the dispensary is not a money-making but a great moral institution.

Crime Under the Dispensary: It is said that in counties where liquors are sold 75 per cent of the crime is traceable directly or indirectly to whiskey. Has the dispensary decreased or increased crime? On that point the reports of the Attorney General speak, for only they speak with authority. From 1887-1892 (six years) before the dispensary law went into effect, there were before the courts 2,494 criminal assaults of different kinds and 729 homicides. From 1895-1900 (six years under the dispensary) there were 3574 assaults and 1,420 homicides, showing an increase under the dispensary of 1,080 assaults or 43 per cent., and of 681 murders or 92 per cent! Not only so, but this increase in crime was synchronous with the increase in the sale of whiskey from $1,200,000. to $2,700,000. This increase of crime can't be charged to increase of population for that has been but normal; nor can it be charged to increased poverty or illiteracy, for in these respects the people have improved. Undeniably one reason is the dispensary. The State can't pour over two and a half millions worth of whiskey down the throats of its citizens without breeding crime. And if this be the first fruits what about the full harvest!

The Attitude of the Church and the Ministry Towards the Dispensary: Of course no one can say exactly, but we express the opinion that a large majority of the ministers are opposed to the dispensary. As is also a great and good host of the State's best people and the Churches' best members. But we believe that the dispensary has blinded and seduced so many unguarded and worldly people that prohibition would be defeated today at the polls. For instance, a cold business man, formerly opposed to the dispensary, speaking of the fact that last year the dispensary paid $20,000 into the treasury of his county, said: "It is all right." The judgment of thousands wittingly and unwittingly has been bought just that way. The prohibition party of South Carolina is well nigh a corpse and it is a South Carolina proverb that the dispensary killed it.

GOOD THINGS TO KNOW.

By E. L. F.

Cleansing Oilcloths—To freshen the oilcloth, wring a soft cloth out of clear warm water, dip one corner of it in kerosene, rub first with the wet cloth, then with the oiled corner. Use no soap.

Does the Sewing Machine Need Cleaning—Empty the oil-can, fill with gasoline, flood every oiling place on the machine, run it rapidly, repeat process if necessary; then oil with best machine oil and wonder, in your surprise at the result, why you did not do it sooner.

Shoes That Hurt—Do you find the new shoes uncomfortable? Dip a small sponge or cloth in boiling water and press it for a few moments against the exact spot where the hurt is located. Remove shoe and immediately stretch that spot from the inside by the manipulation of a tack hammer handle, tooth brush handle or any dull point.

Care of Oilcloths—For binding the edge of oilcloth, there is no more serviceable material than silesia or the heavier drilling. Cut strips about an inch and a half in width, turn under one edge, slide the remaining edge under the oilcloth, leaving the width of half an inch or less with the folded edge, which turn over on oilcloth and tack in place.

Alcohol for Windows—To clean windows expeditiously: With a cloth dipped in clear warm water wash the entire glass surface from top to bottom, wiping off quickly. Then with a tiny sponge wet in alcohol go over each pane, polishing with a dry linen towel or with tissue paper. If the sash needs washing that should be done first.

Tempting Invalids—An invalid unable to take more than a small amount of nourishment may sometimes relish a cup of coffee poured boiling hot upon the beaten yolk of an egg, or the yolk may be beaten in a cup, seasoned with salt and pepper; and boiling water added to form a broth. This, served with one or two crisp crackers or wafers, makes an agreeable relish.

Repairing Kid Gloves—To neatly repair a torn kid glove, place underneath the rent a piece of white paper, and with a sharply pointed pencil mark the outlines. From this pattern cut at the outer edge of lines, shape a piece of kid, insert by oversewing on the wrong side with thread (silk slides too easily). If the glove is delicate in shade, the piece for repairing may be cut from white kid, and after it is in place be tinted with water colors.

Worms in Plants—The white worms frequently found in the soil used for house plants may be easily gotten rid of by flooding the earth at top of crock with warm water, draining it off at once. Then dip the bottom of crock in warm water and see that the saucer is clean. The earth may be wet about once a week with water containing a little ammonia—a teaspoonful to a quart of water. If the presence of angle-worms is suspected, a teaspoonful to a pint of water will do no harm occasionally, and will usually send the worms to the surface.

Dress Facing—For the facing of dresses or skirts no material is more thoroughly satisfactory than serge or cashmere. A dress even well worn may be for such purpose utilized and will give good service. It will be found not to dampen easily; will not readily catch dust, and any chance adhering mud spots may be quickly removed when dry by brushing or rubbing with a coarse flannel, leaving it "good as new." Cut either way—straight or bias. Try it.

Model Stove Blacking—Remember to mix the stove blacking with turpentine (or part turpentine and part gasoline). If a stove is rusty wash over with kerosene, cleaning as much as possible, and let stove stand an hour or so until the oil evaporates; apply the blacking with soft cloth, polishing with brush or piece of carpeting. Rub the pipe with boiled linseed oil only. You will be pleased with the result, and it is quickly applied with a bit of soft cloth, while pipe is warm. May be slightly thinned, if desired, with kerosene.

A New Way to Sweep—There is in the doing of little things, even in housework, a right way and a wrong way—a good way and a bad way. Consider for a moment the item of sweeping with a broom. The next time you undertake it notice your broom. Do you find that you hold it or move it rather in front of you—the brush further forward than the handle—each stroke raising the brush and with it a cloud of dust into the air and the space beyond? If so, try this way: Stand with the broom rather behind you, partly facing it—the brush further back than the tip of the handle. Used in this way you will find that the dust rises no higher than the brush; that, in fact, little rises, but is gradually moved to one central point, where it may be easily swept into the dust pan. Swept in this way a dusty room may be perfectly tidied without discomfort to any person who may be obliged to remain in it during the process.

There's Health —IN— Lemon Juice

Various experiments by eminent scientists have proven the great value of lemons in destroying the germs of typhoid and other fevers. Germs of diseases are deposited in the system by the failure of the bowels to act regularly. MOZLEY'S LEMON ELIXIR is an ideal laxative, made from the juice of pure lemons, and has no equal for cleansing the system of all impurities. It acts promptly on the bowels, liver and kidneys, and does not gripe or cause any unpleasantness. 50 cents per bottle at all drug stores.

RHUBARD JELLY.

Take some fresh, red rhubarb, wash, wipe dry, but don't peel. Then cut it and put it into a preserving-pan, with a large cupful of water. Allow it to simmer gently until the juice is extracted—then strain through a jelly-bag. Measure the juice, and to each large cup—add one pound of loaf sugar. Stir until it boils. Boil for ten minutes, or longer if it does not appear firm enough. Put into small pots, and store in a dry place.—Exchange.

One of the most intelligent women I have ever known, the Christian mother of a large family of children, used to say that the education of children was essentially a work of faith. She never heard of tramping of her boy's feet as they came home from school, or listened to their noisy shouting in their play, or touched their unconscious slumbers, without an inward earnest exercise to God for wisdom to train them, and for the Holy Spirit to guide them. She neglected praying with counsel and restraint; and the counsel was the wiser, and the restraint the stronger, for this balance of the human and Divine elements in her instructions and discipline. At length when her children became men and women, accustomed to the hard life of the world, her name was the proudest one they could speak—her's who had fed them through her own spirit's power.—The Friend.

SOME OF THESE DAYS.

Some of these days all the skies will be brighter—
Some of these days all the burdens be lighter;
Some of these days all the hearts will be happier—souls will be whiter—

Some of these days!

Some of these days in the deserts upspringing,
Some of these days the mountains shall spash while joy bells are ringing,

Some of these days the world with its sweetest of birds shall go singing—

Some of these days!

Some of these days: Let us bear with our sorrow!

Some of these days: its light we may borrow—

Some of these days: there will be joy in the golden tomorrow—

Some of these days!

—Frank L. Stanton.

THY BEST.

Would thy poor best, and mind not how nor why,
Best one day, seeing all about thee spread
A mighty crowd and marvellously fed,
My heart break out into a bitter cry,
Might have furnished, I, yea, even I,
The two small fishes and the barley bread."

—Frederick Langbridge.

NOTHING TO SHOW.

"Every day has all gone"—'twas a woman who spoke,
As she turned her face to the sunset glow—

"And I have been busy the whole day long;

Yet for my work there is nothing to show."

What was she doing? Listen; I'll tell you

What was she doing in all the long day:

Beautiful deeds too many to number;
Beautiful deeds in a beautiful way.

Womanly deeds that a woman may do,
Trifles that only a woman can see,
Wielding a power unmeasured, unknown,
Wherever the light of her presence might be.

Humbly and quietly all the long day
Had her sweet service for others been done;

Yet for the labor of heart and of hand
What could she show at set of sun?

Ah, she forgot that our Father in heaven
Ever is watching the work we do,
And records he keeps of all we forget,
Then judges our work with judgment that's true;

For an angel writes down in a volume of gold

The beautiful deeds that all do below.
Though nothing she had at set of the sun,

The angel above had something to show.

—Exchange.

TOUCH YOUR LIPS WITH GLADNESS.

(Nixon Waterman.)

Are you growing weary of the long and rugged road,

Weary of the burden, oh, my brothers?

Men have found the surest way for lightening the load

Is just to try to lighten it for others.
Hearts still hold the most of love that most their love bestow

On lonely lives of those who are forlorn;

Roll the stone from out the path where tired feet must go,

And touch your lips with gladness every morning.

Touch your lips with gladness and go singing on your way,

Smiles will strangely lighten every duty;

Just a little word of cheer may span a sky of gray

With hope's own heaven-tinted bow of beauty.

Wear a pleasant face wherein shall shine a joyful heart,

As shines the sun, the happy fields adorning;

To every care-beclouded life some ray of light imparting,

And touch your lips with gladness every morning.

—Success.

A FRIENDSHIP.

"Small fellowship of daily commonplace,
We hold together, dear, constrained to go—
Diverging ways. Yet day by day I know
My life is sweeter for thy life's sweet grace;
And if we meet but for a moment's space,
Thy touch, thy word sets all the world aglow.
Faith soars serene, haunting doubts shrink low—
Abashed before the sunshine of thy face.
Nor press of crowd nor waste of distance serves
To part us. Every hush of evening brings
Some hint of thee, true-hearted friend of mine;
And as the farther planet thrills and swerves,
When toward it through the darkness Saturn swings, Even so my spirit feels the spell of thine."

—SOPHIE JEWETT.

The Home Circle.

THE IMPENDING GUEST.

(By Ellen Conway.)

Some women are born hospitable, some achieve hospitality, and some have hospitality thrust upon them. Mrs. Jones is all three kinds, especially the last. But worms will turn. And the experiences of last spring have led Mrs. Jones to wonder in her gentle soul whether a hostess has absolutely no rights that a visitor is bound to respect.

About the middle of April came a letter from Mrs. Robinson, a dear friend, and as welcome as any but a sister could be. Would it be convenient to have her spend a few days, early in May? Mrs. Jones wrote at once that it would be delightful, and that she hoped the "few days" might lengthen into a week. Then began the preparations.

Do not let Mrs. Jones fall under the ban which awaits those who try to "make an appearance," to "put their best foot forward." The preparations were simply to get necessary work out of the way, and leave leisure to enjoy the visit. The house cleaning was hurried forward, some extra expense and a good deal of extra trouble. A seamstress who had been engaged for the first week in May obligingly exchanged it for the third, and the little Joneses agreed not to mind waiting for their new gingham, since mamma was to have such a nice visit from such a dear friend. Less easily, Miss Mary Jones was persuaded to postpone the party she was to have given early in May. The reception which closed the season at Mrs. Jones's club was to be held the first week in May, and tickets must be secured in advance at a dollar each. Mrs. Jones bought an extra one. The ladies' night of Mr. Jones's club loomed up for the same week; he could take only a single guest, and must decide at once. Mrs. Jones did not feel like leaving Mrs. Robinson at home, and Mr. Jones sent word that he would forego his guest ticket.

The first of May came. The mails were eagerly watched. No word from Mrs. Robinson. A letter though, from Miss Smith—another old friend—who "is to be in the neighborhood of Boston, and if it is perfectly convenient, would so much enjoy a glimpse," etc. The Joneses have no spare room, and are in the habit of doubling up for a visitor, but cannot so easily treble up for two. Mrs. Jones is obliged to write Miss Smith that she is expecting other company, but feels, as she does it, that she may be thought inhospitable.

The days go by. The time of Miss Smith's proposed visit passes. She might perfectly well have come, as it proves. Mr. Jones goes alone to his club dinner. Mrs. Jones gives away her dollar ticket. Warm weather is early this year. Mary Jones is afraid it will be too hot for a party. The little Joneses mourn their promised gingham. The first question as they come in from school is, "Has Mamma heard from Mrs. Robinson?" The family annoyance is fast turning to indignation. Mamma tries to calm it by the suggestion that some one may be sick. "Couldn't she write?" say the children.

Suddenly at the last, a postal card preceding her by a scant half-day, in the third week of May—the seamstress's week—she comes. No one has been sick. "But it is so hard to plan ahead," she says, smilingly. "And of course I knew you wouldn't make any difference for me."

This experience is but one of many. Earlier in the season a young cousin, coming to the city for shopping, wrote to ask if a certain Sunday, two weeks ahead would be a convenient one for the Joneses to entertain her. Mrs. Jones had intended asking other friends for that Sunday, but the invitation had not been sent, and she wrote to the cousin that they should be glad to see her, but added her suggestion that the line of goods she wanted could be bought to better advantage a little later. She rather expected a letter saying the shopping would be postponed; but getting none, made the usual arrangements for converting Susie's room into a guest-chamber, which involved, besides the ordinary changes in bed and dressing-table, carrying upstairs the entire contents of a closet, bureau drawer, and sewing-table piled high with work. An extra supper was ordered, but no cousin arrived, though Susie slept upstairs on the chance that a late train might bring her. On Tuesday came a letter, saying that the cousin thought Mrs. Jones's suggestion about delay a very good one.

A year or two ago, Mary Jones, at home for the holidays, received, one Friday afternoon a telegram from a college friend in Delaware: "Will be with you Saturday night. Telegraph if not convenient." Mary was as much astonished as any one, but, on being closely questioned, admitted that she had probably told Betty—with a dozen others—to come out to Blakewood if she ever came to Boston. No doubt Betty had had some unexpected opportunity to come this way, and did not want to let the chance slip. Mary had had one visitor already, and was planning to devote the rest of her vacation to sewing; the family were all tired after their Christmas exertions; the cook's temper was showing signs of strain. But no one had the nerve to telegraph, "Not convenient."

Saturday evening, Betty came, gay and charming, and priding herself particularly on the energy and promptness with which she had arranged the visit. "I was sitting sewing with Sister Carrie, yesterday morning," she explained, "and all at once I said: 'I believe I'll start back to college early and spend the rest of the vacation with Mary.' And here I am!"

Mrs. Jones's experiences are not unusual. Other housekeepers are beginning to long for a tightening up of the conventional screws. The guests who "feel perfectly free" to come when they please are growing too numerous, and hostesses, for some mysterious reason, do not feel the same freedom in refusing to have them come. And yet there are, in every household, times of perplexity or anxiety not of the sort to be entrusted to telegram or even letter, when the presence of an outsider adds almost intolerably to the strain. The self-invited guest should be scrupulous to propose herself in a way that will make it easy for her visit to be declined, and if it is accepted, should be declined, and if it is accepted, should be extra punctilious about making it exactly the time agreed on. And general invitations given by sons and daughters in these days of large acquaintance and easy travel, should never be treated, by courteous young people, as on a par with those coming from the bona fide head of a house.—The Congregationalist.

THE JANE CLUB AND ITS MEANING

(By Helen Campbell.)

To those who watched its beginning a volume would hardly hold the experience and it would be a volume well worth reading. But the actual facts are compressible, and here they are as seen by the writer from the earliest thought of the movement that thus far is the only successful experiment in the co-operation of women in housekeeping through the whole wide world.

First then, nine years ago were several girls working at book-binding, cloak and dressmaking and like trades. Second there was Hull House, then hardly known beyond the ward that holds all its present wide-reaching and beneficent activities. And then as now, the several young women, restless and desperately uncomfortable in their seven hall bedrooms in mean houses, neither clean nor light nor by any possibility to be called home, came to Jane Addams with the will.

"We're tired of spending our money for horrid things to eat and not room enough to turn round in and nobody care whether we're alive or dead. What shall we do?"

The answer was ready. The wise woman had already thought it out, and knowing how difficult it was and is even now, for a respectable girl on moderate wages to find a comfortable home free from any slightest suggestion of charity.

"Take a small flat together and see you cannot make it something like a real home," was her counsel and it ended herself taking and furnishing such a flat and paying the first month's rent.

In a comparatively short time the debt to her was paid; the seven found themselves more comfortable than in their lives, and besieged by other several who wanted the same chance. Other flats were added, members came in too easily, and presently it settled itself that the club was too large, its bulk making it unmanageable. Weeding out had begun and experience seemed to demonstrate that thirty was the largest number that could co-operate advantageously.

At this point there came to the rescue a woman of fortune who has given much to Hull House but refuses to let her name be known. She had already given Children's Building, where the day nursery, kindergarten, etc., were beautiful and appropriately housed, and now she proposed putting up another building four-and-a-half stories high and giving to Hull House with the stipulation that should be rented at a rational rate to the Jane Club, the income thus brought in to be devoted to the day nursery.

The house was built. The thirty girls took possession, each and all absolutely independent and self-supporting, with a home far more attractive than that of the average well-to-do family. Beauty they had learned as the law of the Hull House interior, and their education went on with more beauty in their own place; fine lines, clear spaces, solid finish, restful, harmonious, plain wall colors—the background for an exceptionally good collection of casts and pictures.

Thirty rooms are in this house: four living rooms and twenty-six bed-rooms. Each is well warmed, ventilated and lighted, and simply but tastefully furnished, the owner being required to take full care of it. All the floors are hardwood. The four living rooms are very big with the wainscoting of Georgian line, effective-shaped windows and broad window-seats, high-bricked chimneys, artistic bookcases well filled, Morris furniture, a piano, and gay cushions lighting shadowy corners. The dining-room ceiling is low and raftered, and above the high paneled wainscoting is a narrow shelf where good bits of old blue china, science and pottery are lodged. The tables are heavy and polished, and the great room, with its piano and big fireplace, makes an excellent place for social gatherings.

The kitchen has every labor-saving convenience, a delight in all ways to the worker within. The basement has a bicycle room with locker for each girl, and on every floor are bath and wash-rooms. The flat roof in summer turns to roof garden, with chairs, rugs, hammocks, tables, flowers and vines. Four of the bed-rooms are double and occupied by those who prefer to room together. The rest are single, each the castle of its owner.

How is so complicated a machine run? A president, vice-president, secretary, treasurer and stewardess are chosen for terms of six months, and serve without pay. The stewardess oversees the menus and the kitchen workings, and the president and vice-president take the general housekeeping, meeting once a week to discuss house problems, complaints, etc. A cook and two maids do the work of the house and are eligible to club membership after a certain period of faithful service. Expenses, losses and benefits are equally shared, the regular assessment three dollars a week for each. In the first four years of occupation of the new home but three calls were made for slight additional amount.

Few rules exist, the club being practically self-governing and Hull House the empire when one is required. But the club is absolutely independent, and demonstrates day by day the needlessness and folly of the restrictions that hedge about all women in the usual "Home" for women workers. In that rigid day of which the hopeless bareness and cheerlessness of the old order is still a reminder, there were relatively few workers and the law for all women was repression. That day is done. It is expression of the best that is in her, and so the growth of that best, that is found in the life of a club like this.

Thus far only Chicago owns anything so simply wise and noble in plan—one more expression of the rare good sense of the beloved head of Hull House. Yet the plan is perfectly practical everywhere. A single one of Mr. Carnegie's smallest library endowments would build such a home in like connection with a Social Settlement, though this is not essential. It is not hotels on the Mills plan for working women that are needed, so much as smaller homes of just this order, where each tenant feels a personal responsibility, learns by practice the perfect care of the good things provided and has personal pride in it all. Most and best of all, she learns the meaning of the co-operative spirit and life, working out theoretically and with ever-increasing ease and happiness the thought she will carry into her own home if that in time comes to her, "Each for all and all for each."—The Congregationalist.

A WOMAN'S SCARS.

Lillie Hamilton French in her "Old Maid's Corner," now running in the Century, muses in the March number, the line of thought started by a call from her old friend the colonel, on how differently the world regards the scars of men and women, however honorably won. She says:

The Colonel always arouses my enthusiasm; yet I never see him with that black patch over his eye, and that glove with its empty fingers, without wondering why it is that the world regards so differently the scars of men and of women, even when those scars have been won in an honorable service.

I have a clever friend from the South who, as a girl, and when the war had closed, worked in her father's tobacco fields, over the horses and over the broken-down fences, until comfort reigned at home again, and she took to letters as a profession. I saw her once hold up her toil-worn hands, full of scars, with each joint out of shape, while she said to me, laughing: "It is sometimes easier to escape the consequences of our sins than to get away from the records of our virtues."

That is the trouble, I suppose. Tradition has done nothing for her, and so the records of a woman's virtues have to be explained. A man with an arm or a leg missing, especially if he be an erect man, instantly arouses a thought of heroism—unless, of course, one has lived in the neighborhood of trolleys—and a certain spontaneous enthusiasm for the man, like that which the colonel inspires, takes possession of the beholder. Such a quickening of the pulse before the signs and tokens of an unknown woman's misadventures would be an impossibility, and a silk patch over one of her eyes, like that which the colonel wears, would excite pity rather than applause.

Then there are the manners of some successful women who by their own endeavors have won a way in the world. What scars these manners are on an engaging womanliness—first a grace lost in the conflict, then a gentleness. Had a man suffered these losses, who would reckon them when the sum of his successes was told? And how convincing the very brusqueness and energy and even the lack of softness in his manners would be! We would believe in him at once. But in a woman, and perhaps wisely—who can tell?—these signs and tokens of an heroic struggle into which necessity alone may have driven her are counted as disfigurements, and the record of each of her virtues has to be explained, like the trousers of Rosa Bonheur, if their exercise has involved the sacrifice of a single feminine habit. The records of her pleasures are other concerns so long as fashion approves. Her hair may be sunburnt, but it must not be because she has chosen to deprive herself of a bonnet for the benefit of some pauper. And her hands may be large and muscular, but the muscles must be those developed by an outdoor sport, not those which any manual labor indoors has strengthened, even when that labor indoors has been undertaken because of grim poverty.—Selected.

Our Young People.

Two Brave Little Girls.

"O, dear! What are you going to do, Nell?"

"I—declare—I—don't know," came the slow answer. "For the first time in my life I'm sorry we are twins."

"Well, I like that!"

"I—I mean, Bella, that if one of us were never so little older than the other she'd have to say what to do. And the other would have to do it."

"O, I see. Let's play that you are the older, then. What would you say?"

"I'd be just as sweet and nice about it as possible; but I'd refuse to wear such toggery." She looked over at the objects upon the bed with a half-sick smile. "Think of a Christian child going out in that headgear!"

"Funny, isn't it?"

"Somehow I can't see anything funny in it." Nell's lips began to quiver.

"O, Bella, it may mean so much to us, either way. It may upset all the plans upon which we have all set our hearts. What shall we do? What should we do? What would dear mamma wish us to do?" She put her hand up and began to weep softly.

Just at that moment there came a tap at the door. "Luncheon is served," said the maid. Nell hastened to dry her eyes; the little girls made themselves tidy and went immediately down.

Everywhere about them was the sign of great wealth. They had never before imagined such splendor as possible every day living, except for kings, queens, sultans, and rajahs. But here they were, in the very center of it—breathing it, living it. Their little hearts almost stood still at times and their little hands reached out to touch each other in sympathy.

They were seated at the table and served by a cold-faced butler, who did not approve of children—particularly of little girls. Their aunt paid no attention to their entrance. She was talking with their young lady cousin. When the formal meal was nearly done she suddenly seemed to remember the children.

"O, your hats came," she said to them. "Nanette took them up to your room. How do you like them?"

The hearts of the little girls sank. Neither spoke at once. Presently Nell answered: "They are very fine, dear Aunt Louise, too fine for such plain girls as we are."

"Nonsense, child! Why, I couldn't possibly let my nieces be seen in the frowzy things you brought. The rest of your wardrobe will be attended to at once. I can't keep you shut up too long, you know. Your manners are quite perfect. It's only the clothes that are in fault."

Nell saw that she was not understood. The chicken salad nearly choked her, and Bella suddenly lost her appetite, though she managed to eat a very little, so as not to call attention to herself.

When the meal was over Nell gave a little twitch to Bella's gown and together they went to their aunt's door.

"Aunt Louise, may—may we come in for a minute, and may I—may I talk—talk to you"—she stopped and swallowed hard—"just—just a little word or two?"

"Why, to be sure. I like to be talked to after lunch. It makes me drowsy and sends me off on my nap quicker. Sit down, both of you." The lady made herself comfortable on a divan among many cushions. Nell went over and carefully spread a light afghan across her. "Thank you, dear! How thoughtful you children are! Now go on; tell me all that you want to. I'm listening."

Nell's courage sank again. How could she hurt this auntie, whom she had never seen until three days before. She opened her lips, but the words wouldn't come.

"Is it so very dreadful, then?" asked the lady, with a smile.

"I—I hope it won't seem so," answered Nell. "But—you know, dear Aunt Louise, that we are the children of a missionary. We mustn't forget that our papa is—is—he says he's trying to live the Christ-life before those who do not know what that life is."

The lady nodded. "Well, if what my husband says is true he knows how to do it. Harold almost worships that brother of his."

This little speech made the hearts of the girls much braver. "And—and mamma is an English gentlewoman, you know. She—she believes that—that little girls should be dressed very plainly, no matter what their station in life. She—" Nell paused and looked hopelessly at Bella. It suddenly came into her thought that these words were a criticism of the aunt to whom she was speaking.

"She—" Bella sprang into the breach valiantly, then paused too, scared half to death at the sound of her own voice.

"We," said Mrs. Yates, "you mustn't pause too long, or I shall be asleep."

"She—" began Bella, quickly, "mamma has taught us so that we wouldn't feel happy if we were dressed too—too—" The poor child paused and looked wildly at her sister.

"To showily and expensively," said Nell, quickly.

"Now, just what do you children mean?" asked their aunt, raising herself quickly upon one elbow and looked at them severely.

Bella was terrified. She ran forward, dropped upon her knees, and hid her face in the rich folds of the beautiful afghan.

"Dear, dear aunt, don't be angry. But if you don't like the clothes we—we brought, won't you please to have our new ones made as plain as possible? We are little girls and not young ladies." She stopped to take breath, and heard a little sob from her sister. "We must remember our papa's life and our—our mamma's wishes. We can't—can't disappoint them, don't you s-s-see? O, forgive us and—" The poor little thing broke down hopelessly.

Mrs. Yates had turned red, then white. At first she was very angry and came near sending them away and out of the house; then the sweetness of their natures, which had already won her, took hold of her anew. To be loved like that by one's own daughters! She thought of the selfishness of her only ild, and her heart ached. She pressed her lips together closely and sat still for another moment. When she spoke her voice was much lower than usual:

"I quite understand you, dear. And that is harder to do, I forgive you. It shall be as you say. I shall remember—and everyone who does for you shall be made to remember—that you are the children of a man who is living the Christ life before those who do not know it, and that your mother is a gentlewoman who believes in the simple and the true. From this moment everything shall point that way, and—" she turned her head suddenly away—"perhaps I may be able to get back into a sweeter and truer life; one that has less of fretting and of heart-break in it. When—when you pray—for I suppose that you do pray—"

Each little girl nodded; each little girl whispered "Yes."

"When you pray at night, and morning, too, ask your Saviour to—to help his aunt of yours to come back to Him. Ask Him to help her make her home into a better, happier place. I'm afraid she sha'n't be able to sleep much; but I'm glad you came and talked with me. Come, 'let's kiss and make up,' and then run into the conservatory or the library for an hour. Afterward we'll go for a drive and we'll stop at the milliner's and order the hats changed for something I think you will like to wear. Good-bye, dears. Be frank with me always, and we shall be sure to get on."

The little girls went out of the room much happier than when they entered. They had no thought that they had been brave little soldiers; but you and I know that they had.—The Christian Advocate.

The Legend of the Dipper.

There is a story which tells how the seven stars came to form the dipper.

Once in a country far away, the people were dying of thirst. There had been no rain for months. The rivers and springs and brooks had all dried up. The plants and flowers had withered and died. The birds were so hoarse they could not sing. The whole land was sad and mournful. One night after the stars had come out a little girl with a tin dipper in her hand crept quietly out of the house and went into a wood near by. Kneeling down under a tree, she folded her hands and prayed that God would send rain, if it were only enough to fill her little dipper. She prayed so long that at last she fell asleep. When she awoke she was overjoyed to find her dipper full of clear, cool water.

Remembering that her dear mother was ill and dying of thirst, she did not even wait to moisten her parched lips, but taking up her dipper, she hurried home. In her haste she stumbled, and, alas! she dropped her precious cup. Just then she felt something move in the grass beside her. It was a little dog, who, like herself, had almost fainted for want of water. She lifted her dipper, and what was her surprise to find that not a drop had been spilled. Pouring some in her hand she held it out for the dog to lick. He did so, and seemed much revived but as she poured out the water the tin dipper changed to one of the beautiful silver.

Hurrying to her home as soon as possible, she handed the water to the servant to give it to her mother.

"Oh," said her mother, "I will not take it. I shall not live, anyhow. You are younger and stronger than I."

As she gave the servant the dipper, it changed to shining gold. The servant was just about to give each person in the house a spoonful of the precious water when she saw a stranger at the door. He looked sad and weary, and she handed him the dipper of water. He took it, saying:

"Blessed is he that gives a cup of cold water in His name."

A radiance shone all about him, and immediately the golden dipper became studded with seven sparkling diamonds.

Then it burst forth into a fountain, which supplied the thirsty land with water. The seven diamonds rose higher until they reached the sky, and there changed into bright stars, forming the "Great Dipper."

And so while we recognize that this is only a parable, yet it shall give us, a sweet association with the constellation in the sky; and when we look up at the "dipper" as it points us to the north pole, this sweet story will point us to a polar star of usefulness.—Ex.

Strange Bible Facts.

The learned prince of Granada, heir to the Spanish throne, imprisoned by order of the crown for fear he should aspire to the throne, was kept in solitary confinement in the old prison at the Place of Skulls, Madrid. After thirty-three years in this living tomb, death came to his release, and the following remarkable researches, taken from the Bible and marked with an old nail on the rough walls of his cell, told how the brain sought employment through the weary years:

In the Bible the word "Lord" is found 1,853 times.

The word "Jehovah" 6,855 times.

The word "reverend" but once, and that in the ninth verse of the 111th Psalm.

The eighth verse of the 97th Psalm is the middle verse of the Bible.

The ninth verse of the eighth chapter of Esther is the longest.

The thirty-fifth verse, eleventh chapter of St. John is the shortest.

In the 107th Psalm four verses are alike—the eighth, fifteenth, twenty-first, and thirty-first.

Each verse of the 136th Psalm ends alike.

No names or words with more than six syllables are found in the Bible.

The thirty-seventh chapter of Isaiah and nineteenth chapter of Second Kings are alike.

The word 'girl' occurs but once in the Bible, and that in the third verse, third chapter of Joel.

There are found in both books of the Bible, 3,538,483 letters; 773,693 words 31,373 verses; 1,189 chapters, and 66 books.

The twenty-sixth chapter of the Acts

LIFE WAS NOT WORTH LIVING.

Shelby, N. C., April 30, 1902.

I had been a severe sufferer from nervous prostration for two years and everything I ate disagreed with me. This made me feel so wretched and bad all the time that life was a burden, and I felt that I had rather die than live. I could not eat meat or any solid food at all and everything I did eat caused me to suffer. I had terrible nervous spells when I would become cold and feel almost lifeless—then hot baths would have to be applied. I suffered from gas on the stomach all the time, and so weak I didn't do any work for twelve months. Nothing I tried did me any good.

I was in that condition when Mrs. Joe Person called to see me last July and said everything she could to persuade me to try her remedy, as she was so confident it would cure me. I bought half a dozen bottles, and felt a great deal better by the time I had taken the third. I continued it until I took eighteen bottles, which cured me. My indigestion is well, and I can eat anything I want, and it is very seldom I ever have even a touch of nervousness. My health is good and life itself seems a different thing to me and well worth living. When I commenced the remedy I weighed 105 pounds; now I weigh 140 pounds, which was my natural weight before I was taken sick.

If anyone suffers from indigestion or nervous prostration they need not hesitate to try the remedy. I would not take any amount of money for what it did for me.

The most beautiful chapter is the twenty-third Psalm.

The four most inspiring promises are John 14: 2; 7: 37; Matt. 9: 28, and Psalm 37: 4.

The first verse of the fiftieth chapter of Isaiah is the one for the new convert.

What Saved His Hand.

The time may come to us when the question of life or death will depend on our sobriety and general healthfulness. There are great puffy, portly, robust-looking men, so full of disease that the prick of a pin may kill them, and there are other men so lean and healthful that you might almost run them through a threshing-machine, and the fragments, when put together, would knit and heal.

A young laboring man was brought to a certain hospital with a badly lacerated hand. He had fallen upon an old cotton-hook, and it had gone entirely through the palm of his hand, carrying with it rust and dirt. The wound was kept open so it would suppurate freely and be readily cleansed. As time passed on the hand became very much swollen, turned black, and the surgeons watched carefully for signs of blood-poisoning, fearing that the entire hand would have to be amputated to save the life of its possessor. These signs not appearing, it then became a question whether more of the hand could be saved than the thumb and first two fingers. As the hand became no worse, the surgeons delayed operating on it, and after a time it began to mend, and finally healed entirely.

Young man," said the surgeon to the patient, as the danger was passing away, do you use alcohol in any form?"

No, sir."

Do you use tobacco?"

No, sir."

With a wave of his hand and a nod of his head, the surgeon murmured:

That is what has saved your hand."

Tissues degenerated by stimulants cannot resist the attack of accident and disease as can tissues that are formed only of wholesome and nutritious food.—Unknown.

Killed to Make Powder-Puff.

Very little is known about these almost universal adjuncts to "my lady's toilet table, though so various are they in shape, size and quality that much might be written about them.

As many as 20,000 young swans—cygnets, as they are called—are killed every year to supply this dainty fluff, to say nothing of the innumerable young birds of the eider-duck and wild goose kind. It is needless to say that the bulk of these are imported, the swans and geese from the islands of the Baltic and from Norway and Sweden, and the eiders from the northern and iced-bound seas. One cygnet will make nearly a dozen averaged-sized "puffs," which shows how many of our fair charmers must be to a greater or less extent addicted to the use of powder.

The puff trade is highly profitable, as may be judged from the fact that the down of a cygnet costs little more than a quarter, the poor creature being often plucked alive so that it may bear another crop, while the puffs are sold often at a dollar, nicely mounted in bone and blue or pink satin, which adjuncts amount to comparatively nothing.—The Masonic Chronicle.

A Bible Puzzle.

Add a vowel to a vowel, to make the second city taken by Israel after the passage of the Jordan. Add to this a consonant, and make a Gadite, chief of a family who lived in Gilead [in Bashan, in the time of King Jotham. Add a consonant to the preceding, to make a town on the boundary of Asher, named between Helkath and Beten. Add a consonant, and make the father of the prophet Micaiah. Add a consonant, and make a district through which Saul pass-

MISS ROSE OWENS,
No. 720 Seventeenth St., WASHINGTON, D. C.

Miss Rose Owens.

"If every suffering woman has the same experience with Wine of Cardui that I had, your medicine will be most popular. About a year ago I began to have a worn out tired feeling with lassitude, pains in the back and head which kept increasing every month. I felt that I needed something, but to get the right medicine was the trouble. I finally decided on your Wine of Cardui and only needed to take three bottles when I was fully recovered."

WHEN Miss Rose Owens, who has a responsible position in the Government service at Washington, D. C., decided to try Wine of Cardui, she made a wise choice. Over a million women have been relieved of female weakness by this same Wine of Cardui. It is not a strong medicine but may be taken every day in the year by any woman with benefit. It does not force results, but corrects derangements of the menstrual organs. It strengthens the nervous system, gives tone to the bodily functions, acts directly on the genital organs, and is the finest tonic for women known to the science of medicine.

If you are a suffering woman we would say to you that Wine of Cardui seldom fails to completely cure any case of female ills. We say emphatically, it never fails to benefit. Every day hundreds of sufferers are writing to our Ladies' Advisory Department. The letters are opened by persons competent to give advice. Mrs. Jones was cured by following the advice which was freely given her by the Ladies' Advisory Department. Miss Owens was cured without advice by just buying a $1.00 bottle of Wine of Cardui from her druggist and taking this great medicine in the privacy of her home. No doctor's examination, treatment or advice is necessary. You have read what these two cured women have written. Is this not enough to lead you to determine to be rid of suffering?

August 13, 1900, Mrs. W. H. Jones, of Cameron, Mo., writes:

"I suffered terribly at monthly periods for three years. I would sometimes go for seven months with no flow at all. Now I have my health back again and am expecting to be confined in January. I cannot praise your medicine enough."

WINE of CARDUI A million suffering women have found relief in Wine of Cardui.

Our Little Folks.

The Fox and the Rabbit.

Old Reynard, the red fox, was out hunting for his breakfast, and he was not particular whether he had chicken, duck, or rabbit. From the tracks in the snow, which he was intently studying, it looked very much as if the latter was to tempt his appetite. There were the unmistakable tracks of a rabbit which led straight down to the meadows.

"I see," mused the fox to himself; "the orchard has attracted some rabbit, and I will find him far from his burrow. Well, I should advise all rabbits not to venture far from their home in a snow-storm like this, or, if they must go far, they should take their tracks with them."

There was something like a sly smile on the fox's face at the thought of this joke. He was cunning and tricky in his way, and he always felt that whatever he did or thought was worthy of attention. As he trotted along now, following up the foot tracks of the rabbit, he thought how innocent rabbits were, and what delicious dinner they made.

In a short time he came to a halt, for there before him were double tracks. For a moment the fox studied these carefully, and he was nearly ready to confess to himself that the rabbit had played him a trick. "He has doubled on his track," he said to himself, "and must have gone off in this direction. Well, I'll take the freshest track."

He turned to the right then, and followed the new track, but with some misgivings as to his breakfast. Then a hundred yards further the tracks were apparently doubled on again, or at least they were so blurred that old Reynard was considerably puzzled. But foxes have the reputation for solving hard puzzles, and this one finally said that he understood it all. "I'll go straight to the orchard, and I'll find my rabbit there. He thinks to play a trick on me by running back and forth on his own tracks. What an innocent game to attempt to play on an old fox! If rabbits were not so innocent and foxes so wise I suppose there would be more rabbits in the world."

Once more that sly smile on Reynard's face and a smacking of the lips in anticipation of rabbit for breakfast. He trotted along more nimbly now, and paid less attention to the tracks and his surroundings. It was so easy to follow the path which led to the orchard that he could afford to be off his guard.

Just as he had guessed, the double row of tracks led him directly to the orchard. Only once he hesitated and looked dubiously at one of the big blotches on the snow. "What a funny footprint for a rabbit!" he said. "But I suppose it was made by several rabbits' feet, and any kind of a picture might result from it."

His fears quelled by this method of reasoning, he hurried on again. Suddenly he broke forth from the cover of the sump and saw the orchard ahead. One sweep with his eyes convinced him that his rabbit was not in sight, but hiding somewhere. He would have to stalk his breakfast after all, and creeping across the orchard, still following the tracks.

Right ahead of him, not a dozen yards away, was a big apple tree, and something suspiciously tempting was bobbing out from the opposite side every few moments. This something must be the long ears of the stalked rabbit.

"Ah, now for my breakfast!" thought the fox. "I have the foolish, innocent rabbit at last. Now here goes for a spring and a long run!"

Throwing all caution to the wind, the fox broke cover and darted like the wind straight toward the apple tree. The noise he made in running startled the animal on the other side of the tree, and the latter jumped out to meet him. The red fox caught just one glimpse of the animal, and then he felt his heart leap into his throat. Instead of a rabbit he was stalking a big rabbit-hound, which had made the funny tracks in the snow where the rabbit had been. The hound yelped with delight, the fox turned swiftly, and then the race began. For half a mile it was a close one, but old Reynard finally escaped in his burrow after the narrowest chase of his life.

Panting from his fear and exertion, the fox thought of the double tracks and the rabbit. "I was more foolish than the rabbit," he reflected, sadly. "It was over confidence that led my parents into traps and caused their death. Maybe the rabbit is not so foolish after all, and I can learn something from him yet."

He shook his head sadly, but more wisely than ever before that day, for even the humble rabbit was not so small to teach him a lesson in caution.—The Christian Advocate.

Their Mistake.

Halloo! Mama! Mother! Guess what is going to happen? Papa's just had a telegram from Mr. Granger and Phil's coming here tonight to stay a week! Isn't that snperb?"

George Trembly threw up his cap and expressed his joy by various other movements, one of which was clapping little Katy around her waist and making her dance about the room. Mrs. Trembly laughed. She was a true mother and happy in what made her children happy. Phil Granger and George had been schoolmates and close friends when the Trembly family lived in the city. Since they had moved twenty miles out the boys met but seldom. It was no wonder that George rejoiced.

After a moment Mrs. Trembly reflected that she and her husband had planned a carriage trip for the next day also that the nursery governess, who had the two little girls in her charge, was to be absent through the morning. "You children will have to take care of yourselves tomorrow," she said, speaking especially to George, who was nearly fourteen. "I want you to get the full benefit of Philip's visit, and of every hour of your vacation. I want you to have a good time, too. Don't you think you can watch over yourselves?"

"O yes, I do, mother. We'll have no en... won't we Katy? Won't we, Margaret?" And George, who was an affectionate brother, kissed his sisters as he asked the question. Margaret answered, "Yes, we'll have a good time, if you'll help us ride on our pony."

The pretty gray pony was a new possession. The girls had owned it for only a week and were not allowed to ride without assistance from some older person. George considered himself quite grown up when he helped them mount and showed them how to hold the bridle rein. Katy was nine years old and Margaret eleven. George assured them that they might ride all they pleased, when under his care, and then went off to make preparations for the reception of his friend.

The next morning Mr. and Mrs. Trembly were off bright and early, taking the coachman to drive for them. Miss Whippie, the nursery governess, also departed. Then the waitress, who never had any opinions, and Bridget, who believed in "lettin' thim darlins do just whatever they plazed," were the only grown-ups left on the place.

The boys were large-minded enough to consider that the girls' amusement should be attended to first. So they led the gray pony from the stall, put on saddle and bridle and let them take turns in riding. When the girls were satisfied, the boys took their turn. But the pony was very small and they considered him in the light of a toy.

"I'd rather ride Jack any day," George announced. Jack was in the stable but George was not allowed to ride him without his father as an escort.

So that pleasure was not to be had on that particular morning.

"Let us do something that we never did," said Margaret, who thirsted after novelty.

"Agreed. What shall it be?" responded Philip. Margaret thought for a minute and then answered, "Oh I know. I've thought of something fine! You boys harness our pony to papa's light wagon and we will take a ride."

The boys liked the idea. There was but one difficulty in the way. There was no harness to fit the pony. Margaret considered this no objection. "Why can't you take some of the big horse's harness and make it fit?"

"I believe we can," replied George, his face all aglow with the thought. "Come on Phil, let's try it. Suiting the action to the word, the boys rushed into the stable leaving the girls to play with dolls and gather flowers until such time as the pony should be harnessed.

This proved to be quite a long time after the boys entered the carriage house, for altering the harness was no easy task. Even when it was accomplished and the pony stood before the light wagon "all ready," as George announced, "for the load," the harness could not have been said to fit well. Certain straps that ought to have been tight were very loose. However, the children thought that the arrangement would "do" and they all got into the wagon, crowding together on one seat. George took the reins and gave the word of command.

The pony started but he did not like his new work and he did not like those wood-boys who could not otherwise express the joy and relief of their hearts. Then they climbed into the big wagon again, and this time each made sure that little Martha was not missing.

In after years the energy and thrift of the Harris family brought them great prosperity. Broad acres and fruitful orchards and a beautiful home became theirs, but their most prized possession was the big copper kettle in which little pioneer Martha took her after dinner ride.—Anna E. Treat, in Little Folks.

An Energetic Girl.

The Junior Christian Endeavor World tells how a Mississippi girl made a doctor of herself with five cents:

Her brother gave it to her and told her to go to college on that. She bought a yard of calico and made a sunbonnet. With the twenty-five cents she received for the bonnet she bought more material and made bonnets and aprons. When she had several dollars she planted a sweet-potato patch, from which she made forty dollars. She kept on until she was able to enter a school, from which she graduated free from debt. She paid her way through a medical college by nursing, and is now practicing medicine. The hardest things can be done if we go at them in the right way, and stick long enough.

What a Boy Can Do.

These are some of the things a boy can do:

He can shout so loud the air turns blue;
He can make all sounds of beast and bird;
And a thousand more they never heard.

He can crow or cackle, chirp or cluck,
Till he fools the rooster, hen or duck;
He can meck the dog, or lamb, or cow,
And the cat herself can't beat his "meow."

He has sounds that are ruffled, stripped or plain

He can thunder by like a railway train
Stop at the stations a breath, and then
Apply the steam and be off again.

He has all of his powers in such command,

He can turn right into a full brass band,
With all of the instruments ever played,
And march away as a street parade.

You can tell that a boy is very ill
If he's wide awake and is keeping still
But earth would be—God bless their noise!—

A dull old place if there were no boys.

A young Spaniard was sent as ambassador to the Pope. The supreme pontiff frowned on him, and asked, "Does the king of Spain lack men, that he sends a beardless boy?" The story goes that the aged Duke of Wellington having paid his sovereign a visit on a very wet day, she anxiously inquired what boots he was wearing.

"The people call them Wellingtons," said the duke.

"What nonsense!" exclaimed the queen. "Where, I should like to know, could you find a pair of Wellingtons?"—Philadelphia Ledger.

"Who," shouted the impassioned orator, "who among us has any cause to be happier than his neighbor on this glorious day of the Nation's birth?"

A man with his head bandaged and both arms in a sling arose in the rear of the hall and exclaimed, "The doctors!"—Baltimore American.

The Czar of all the Russians sneezed thrice. It was a good, resounding sneeze, and it echoed through the quiet palace for several moments. "Acschziki-stivitch—chlutchskiodinski!" Ere the last echo had died seventeen palace officials were lined up before him. "Did you call me, your Majesty?" they asked in a chorus. It is a wise Russian who takes no chances when his name is mentioned.

"How's this?" demanded the Magistrate "You have your husband arrested for assault, and yet you refuse to testify against him." CENTURY MANUF'G CO., East St. Louis, Ill.

shafts continually flying up towards eyes. However, he was quite good-natured and very strong, so he tugged for awhile, the children meantime pronouncing that they were having a glorious time.

It was the newness of the thing that they liked, for they had better drives most every way.

They did not stop to consider whether they were doing right or wrong in acting independently. At least Philip and the girls did not. If George's conscience whispered to him, "You ought not to do this" he silenced it by replying, "I'm only trying to please the little girls and that's what mother asked me to do."

So they drove slowly along, laughing at the pony's awkwardness and at his ridiculous appearance before a wagon much too large for him. They had gone perhaps half a mile when a large fly, of the sort adapted to the special irritation of horse flesh, began to torment the pony. He bore the annoyance for a moment and then attempted to turn around. In doing this he went up on a large rock imbedded by the roadside. The result was—disaster. The wagon was overturned. The pony fell down. The children were thrown out. Fortunately they were not seriously hurt though they were more or less bruised and roughly shaken up.

A blacksmiths shop was close at hand, and the smith with two or three hangers came to lend assistance.

"It's a mercy you ain't killed" he said roughly, but kindly. "Such a mess is your harness in! What did your father mean by letting you try such a trick as this?"

George stammered out something about his father being away from home.

"I'll warrant he is. Cur'ous how some folks allus seem to need some one to 'indin' over 'em an' sayin' 'you musn't do this and you musn't do that,' just as if they didn't know that they wouldn't let, if their fathers an' mothers were here."

"You children made a mistake when you did what you knew very well your father'd never give his consent to."

The blacksmith took charge of the horse and wagon, and the humiliated children made their way home afoot, both older and wiser than when they set out on their drive.—Mary Joanna Porter.

The Little Pioneer's Ride.

"Whoa, Buck! Whoa, Bright!" called out Stephen Harris, pioneer; and the glossy red oxen halted in the forest opening. "This shall be our dinner for today, boys," said he. "See what fine spot!"

The pair of stalwart lads, with rifles on their shoulders, who had been walking all the forenoon beside the big covered wagon, thought it was a truly fine spot, and began to make camp for dinner, unyoking the oxen and turning them out to graze, kindling a fire with dry twigs and moss, and fetching water from the clear brook that rippled by.

Meanwhile, children of all age, began to climb down from the wagon. There were ten of them, fine healthy children. The youngest, Martha, was a little yellow-haired girl of three, the pet and pride of them all. They were overjoyed at the prospect of running about and stretching their cramped limbs, and the forests echoed to their joyful voices. Last alighted the mother, a brisk, cheerful woman, under whose good management a dinner was soon ready. Every day the camp dinner was like a picnic to this family who had been thirty days on their way from Connecticut to "the Ohio," where they hoped to find a fine farm and a good home.

The wagon, which had been their traveling house for a month, was well fitted up for comfort. The seats were built along the sides, and so contrived as to hook back at night. Then the bedding, tightly rolled up by day, was spread out on the wagon bottom. The cooking utensils were hung up on the sides, and a roomy box nailed at the end held the other useful articles. All of the cups, plates, and spoons were of bright unbreakable tin. Under the wagon swung the large copper kettle, the most important of all things in the households of those early times.

After dinner the bright tin dishes were washed in the brook, and the fire very carefully "put out." But the travelers still lingered under the trees, restful and lovely seemed the cool green spot. At length Mr. Harris said the sun was fast traveling westward, and that they must be doing the same.

So the oxen were yoked up, and in great spirits the pioneers scrambled to their places in the wagon, and the oxen started on at a good pace; and they had gone a mile or two before the fearful discovery was made that little Martha was missing! It seems impossible that they should not have known at once that she was not with them; but so it was—not one of them had missed her!

The patient oxen were turned about, and as fast as possible the distracted family traveled back to the dinner camp, Mr. Harris and the big brothers calling, as they went, then came of the darling child. The camp was finally reached; but little Martha was not there, and no trace of her could be found.

The forest had seemed so peaceful an hour before, but now it was filled with terrors. What wild animals might not lurk in the thickets! The very brook seemed to murmur of dangers—quicksand and treacherous water-holes.

"Baby! O, baby!" called Mr. Harris, suddenly, breaking into a sharp cry; and this time in the anxious waiting pause of silence, a shrill little voice from right under the wagon piped out, "Here I is!" and over the rim of the great copper kettle popped Martha's golden head. Scrambling out "head over heels," she rushed into her mother's arms, as fresh and rosy from her sound after-dinner nap as though she had been rocked in the downiest cradle in the land.

There was praise and thanksgiving, there was laughter and tears, and the forest echoed to the glad shouts of the # Presbyterian Standard.

Established 1858.

CHARLOTTE, N. C., OCTOBER 21, 1903.

Vol. XLV.---No 42

Event and Comment.

The Presbyterian Banner argues that the colored ministers ought not to be set off into separate Presbyteries because they do want such separation. That could be the best reason for it to people who know the negro character a little better than the Banner does.

The Standard would like to say in the most disinterested spirit possible to the esteemed Southwestern Presbyterian which it fears is about to enter into a controversy with another paper, that the Standard's experience was that it was Proverbs 26:4 that is applicable in that particular case and not Proverbs 26:5. The condition is incurable.

We regret that Rev. Reginald J. Campbell has gone completely over to the Universalists. The unfruitfulness of Universalism, to say nothing of its unscripturalness, should have admonished him of the error of that teaching. One of the best things that Talmage ever said was that if there were no hell some philanthropist ought to invent one.

Dowie is at last in New York with his Elijah band. He expects to find at least the same proportion of fools here as in the Windy City. Perhaps he will, and then Dowie knows that the fool and his money are separated to his advantage when the fool gets the Second Elijah to take care of both. We are inclined to the opinion that New York is a fertile field for Dowieism.

The oath of the Typographical Union of which we recently spoke is in these words: "I hereby solemnly and sincerely swear that my fidelity to the Typographical Union and my duty to the members thereof shall in no sense be interfered with by any allegiance that I may now or hereafter owe to any other organization, social, political or religious." It is said that the form of this oath will be changed.

The death of Mrs. Dwight L. Moody, at East Northfield, Mass., occurred a few days ago. Her passing away brings afresh to mind the debt that Christian America owes to her husband, and the thought of the certainty of the blessed reunion is another thing that arises spontaneously to the mind. She was a good woman, as he was a good man; they helped each other in the earthly life, and now in death they are not divided.

Not all the Baptists are in love with that great Baptist University in Chicago with its assemblage of freaks. Says the Western Recorder: "Whereas the time was when college professors were men who could teach their scholars to think and to reason accurately, the time is when those are most in demand as professors who can say startling things, especially about sacred things, and thus get a large amount of free advertising for their university." A hit, a palpable hit.

The Philadelphia Presbyterian rings true in this plain declaration and we believe it will lead a more popular fight than the one against the moderate revision of the Confession that was accomplished: "The movement for the union of our Church with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church is assuming a tentative form, but in it there must be no compromise or sacrifice of distinctive Calvinism. We should give no authoritative recognition to semi-Arminianism. Nor should we countenance any lowering of the educational standard of our ministry. The Church must fully understand the meaning and drift of organic union along these lines. Too much must not be taken for granted, but progress must be made slowly and cautiously."

The Cumberland Presbyterian expresses its surprise at the following authority exercised by the Presbytery of Utah over its ministers: "Resolved, That the Presbytery does not see its way clear, in view of the needs of the work in the Presbytery and Synod of Utah, to grant Dr. Wishard's request for a letter of dismission to the Presbytery of Riverside." The Cumberland Presbyterian has a heap to learn about Presbyterianism.

Rev. Martin D. Hardin, whose picture we print on the cover page this week, is a son of Ex-Governor Hardin of Kentucky and was born in Harrodsburg thirty years ago. He received his collegiate training at Center College, graduating there in 1893. Having read law for a year, he decided to enter the gospel ministry and went to Danville Seminary for two years, then to Edinburgh, Scotland, for seven months, returning to America to enter the graduating class of Auburn Seminary, two months before the close of the session. He was called while at the Seminary to Green Hill Church, Philadelphia, which he served most acceptably for eighteen months, going next to Minneapolis, as pastor of the Andrew Church, which he built up into a splendid and efficient working body. He served this church for five years, and now enters, under the brightest of auspices, the work of the Second Church, Charlotte, with its membership of a thousand souls. It will be of additional interest to Southern Presbyterians to know that Mrs. Hardin is the daughter of Vice-President Stevenson, whose wife, Letitia Green, was the daughter of President Lewis Green of Hampden-Sidney College. Mrs. Stevenson was well-known to the young men and women who formed the charming circle of college and seminary life of her time, and her friendship is prized by many of them to this day. Mrs. Hardin and the four children are expected in Charlotte this week, and Charlotte gives to them all a cordial greeting and a hearty welcome into the religious and social life of the community.

From the soil of either Carolina the blood of murdered men cries unto God from the ground, unavenged by the law that says, Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed. Ludlow Skinner was shot down on the streets of Raleigh by Ernest Haywood. N. G. Gonzales was shot down on the streets of Columbia by James H. Tillman. Both men were acquitted of any crime last week. Skinner had suffered in his family a foul wrong inflicted by Haywood and was perhaps expecting a difficulty and had armed himself. Yet he did not have even the opportunity to draw his pistol before he was killed. Gonzales on the other hand was unarmed, as was his habit. He had told the truth about Tillman, as an utterly unfit man for public office, and the truth about Tillman was a pretty black indictment. But Tillman allowed months to elapse without resenting it, had even met Gonzales before in the Capitol building and there was evidence of deliberate murder without shadow of a plea of self-defense and with the threats testified to by perjured witnesses unbelieved and unbelievable. But the unanimous cry of indignation from both states has, we hope, done some good, and the murdered men may prove to have been martyrs in the cause of righteousness. Judges and juries cannot always hold out under the pressure of public opinion and public opinion is getting insistent that the tricks and subterfuges of the law that come between the guilty man and justice when that man is wealthy or prominent shall cease. If that is accomplished Skinner and Gonzales will not have died in vain.

Organic Union With the Northern Church. History and Outlook.

The question of re-union is one that has been more or less agitated ever since the days of disunion. Sometimes the two Churches, the Northern and the Southern, have seemed very near together and again very far apart. One after another, obstacles have arisen that have seemed insuperable, and as they proved otherwise different ones have appeared.

The Northern section of the Old School Church practically drove the Southern section from the house of her fathers by adopting the Spring Resolutions of 1861. The date gives significance to those resolutions. Some of the Southern States had peaceably seceded from the United States and had set up a new nation, the Confederate States. The effect of the resolution adopted by the Assembly of 1861 was to declare that the allegiance of Presbyterians in the Confederate States was still due to the United States, or in general that one's allegiance to the United States was above all claims of any of the States that had been United. This was both a partisan and an un-Presbyterian decision. It was resented at the time for the insult involved. It has been remembered, when the passions of war have long been dead, as a betrayal of a sacred principle of Presbyterianism, a principle writ large in our Confession.

After the defeat of the Confederate States the breach was widened, if that were possible, by the opprobrious language in which the Northern Presbyterian courts indulged whenever they referred to the Presbyterians of the South. No need to reprint these. Southern Presbyterians were branded as heretics, schismatics, blasphemers, rebels and traitors—pleasant terms. They were to be examined as to their repentance of the indicated sins, before being received as individuals into the Northern Church. We suppose the Southern Church as a whole would have had to wear sackcloth and ashes for a long time and spend a period in fasting and prayer, before union would have been thought of. And the bitterness became so great that the Kentucky and Missouri Presbyterians, with Southern sympathies formed Synods of their own and joined the Southern Assembly.

The Southern Church was almost unanimously Old School. There were a few New School ministers in the South, and the Converses brought their New School paper with them to the South when they came from Philadelphia. We have never understood just how the two bodies got together. It has been stated that it was found that there were no differences, really. But the probability is that the New School men, who had been just as badly treated by their New School Assembly as Old School by Old School had been, concluded to join the Southern Church as a matter of necessity, as it would have been impossible to keep up even the semblance of an organization, and they were cordially received. But the Southern Church was Old School. And the union of the Old School and the New School Churches in the North on the basis of the "Standards pure and simple," with no mention of the distinctive principles for which the two had been contending, seemed a fatal corruption of the Northern Church, to the Southern Presbyterians of that day. It has not turned out so, however. That is, the troubles that have come upon the united Church from doctrinal differences, have not been along the line of the old cleavage, and the troublers have not been confined to either school, nor have there been wanting valued defenders of the faith among the New School men, like De Witt, of Princeton.

Another obstacle was the agitation in the Northern Church on the subject of the Revision of the Standards. The agitation was a long drawn out one, the first rather thorough-going revision being voted down by the Presbyteries, in the intervals between the Briggs and Preserved Smith and McGiffert heresy trials. Then the question was sprung anew and such a moderate revision was at last effected, that the Southern Church, so far as its intelligent leadership is concerned, sees that it amounts to nothing as a bar between the two churches. And the question has been settled for a long time to come.

Perhaps the nearest approach to union was at the meeting of the two Assemblies when the Southern Church adopted its broad disclaimer of whatever might be found offensive in its records to the Northern Church, while the Northern Church, under the leadership of Dr. Herrick Johnson, made three-fifths of an apology, wiped out what had been said about heresy, schism and blasphemy, but rubbed deeper in what had been said about treason and rebellion. The Southern Church has never been so near re-union since as it was five minutes before the telegram was received from the Northern Assembly.

It is true that at the next Assembly, the Omaha Assembly, it was realized that a mistake had been made and the doctrine of the spirituality of the Church was very strongly reaffirmed. But so able a man as Dr. Joseph T. Smith made a very lame effort to reconcile the language of the Confession with the deliverances of the Assembly. In answer to a question by Dr. Strickler, chairman of the Southern Committee of Conference, Dr. Smith said:

"We do not conceive it to be any part of the duty with which we are charged, to sit in judgment upon the consistency of our Church with itself, at different periods of its history * * * * Our reunited assembly has no other doctrine on the whole subject than that quoted in the Omaha paper referred to by you, to wit: Synods and Councils are to handle and conclude nothing but that which is ecclesiastical; and are not to meddle with civil affairs which concern the commonwealth unless by way of humble petition in cases extraordinary, or by way of advice for the satisfaction of conscience, if they be thereunto required by the Civil Magistrate.

"This is the language of the Confession of Faith, which is held equally binding by your Church and ours. We hold that the rule shall not be read without the exceptions nor the exceptions without the rule; both are equally binding as essential elements of the article in question, and the exceptions justify intermeddling in civil affairs under the specified conditions.

It is in accordance with this that our General Assembly is charged, Form of Government, Chapter XII, Sec. 5, with the duty of "recommending and attempting the reformation of manners, and the promotion of charity, truth, and holiness throughout the churches under our care."—Minutes of Northern Assembly, 1888.

We submit that the "reformation of manners" cuts a good deal deeper into the principle of the spirituality of the Church, than the confessional phraseology, "humble petition in cases extraordinary" or "advice for the satisfaction of conscience," evidently meaning advice asked for by the civil authorities themselves. And certainly the virtual expulsion of all the Southern Presbyterians for the crime of holding to a certain political theory of government can hardly be said to have any close kinship to the exceptions of which Dr. Joseph T. Smith spoke. And the contention that the Southern Church has not had a distinctive principle here displays the puerility of ignorance.

Another obstacle which we have hoped would be removed by the ministrations of time and a clearer vision is the negro question. The Northern Church is pondering one phase of it now—the question of separate Presbyterian lines for white and colored Presbyterians in the same territory. Their committee on this subject answered the question by saying, as was quoted last week, that no separate denomination for the colored people would be countenanced; that no recommendation would be adopted which would "tend to drive the colored people from the Church," and that no legislation discriminating between white and black could be introduced into the Book of Government.

Now the Southern Church has never insisted upon a separate denomination, though it did agree under protest to the organization of the Independent Colored Synod, some colored Presbyteries, however, preferring to stay with the Southern Assembly where they are now. We have not even insisted upon colored Synods, or where there were not enough colored ministers and churches to form one, upon colored Presbyteries.

As to the second recommendation, it is notable mainly for the length of its ears. Since the Northern Assembly has at the present time few if any more colored Presbyterians in connection with it than it stole from the Southern churches, forty years ago, it would be in order rather to inquire into some plan tending to get the colored people into the Presbyterian Church than to resolve, with the solemnity of stupidity, that nothing must be done to drive the colored people from the Church. The very question is whether the Colored Presbyterian Church would not have thrived in some such measure as the Methodist and Baptist Colored Churches, without their abuses, if they had been taught to lean a little more upon themselves and not upon their Northern or Southern Presbyterian brethren, in such dependent fashion.

We presume that the last resolution throws the emphasis upon the words, "in the Book." We may be constrained to practice what we must not acknowledge to be constitutional. The reference in the Interior to the Presbyterians of other nationalities who might want to have separate Presbyteries and its careful guarding of the point against "race prejudice" seems to intimate that the prayer of the Tennessee brethren may be heard and the gerrymandering of Presbyteries in order to make them really separate on racial lines may be permitted to cease. We think that Dr. Leyburn grasped the situation exactly in his letter last week. So the Colored Question seems to be going the way of Revision as an obstacle to re-union. In fact if the reaction keeps on we Southern folks who have a real affection for the negro may have to be protesting against his harsh treatment by the Northerners.

A new obstacle has arisen in the proposal to unite the Northern and the Cumberland Churches.

As to this matter we think that Dr. Leyburn is more optimistic than the facts warrant. A Church does not become Calvinistic by a resolution of a Committee or of an Assembly. And unless the Southern Presbyterian ministry, wherever it comes in contact with Cumberlandism, is unanimously mistaken in its judgments, the Cumberland Church is Arminian and not Calvinistic. Judging from The Cumberland Presbyterian, their Church paper, there is a large amount of protest from the Arminian ministry of that body against the shallow contention that the Confession has been radically revised. They say it is still Calvinistic and that they are still Arminians, or at least would prefer union with an Arminian to union with a Calvinistic body. The problem is a pretty considerable one to accomplish re-union "in a manner wholly creditable to both Churches," considering past history and present principles.

And the plain truth might as well be told, that this courtship indefinitely postpones the union between the Northern and Southern Churches. The principle of the spirituality of the Church is an important one, but it has other witnesses in the South than the Southern Presbyterian Church. But Calvinism is a big enough distinctive principle for any Church. The Cumberlanders all through the South and Southwest have been representing Calvinism to the people as synonymous with Fatalism. Let that mass of undigested Arminianism into the Northern Church and it will have the worst case of ecclesiastical appendicitis on record, with the probable necessity of an excision of the appendix in the near future. The Southern Church would just as soon join the Southern Methodist as the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, spite of the names. It still believes in denominationalism and it rejoices in its Calvinism, which it likes pure and undiluted. It could ask for no better justification for separate existence for another century than the duty of dividing with the Canadian Church the honor of upholding the Calvinistic faith in America. It is not what we wish or what we hope, but what we know, that is now confronting us, and we would as well look at it with our eyes wide open. If the Northern Church sacrifices principle to bigness, the Southern must sacrifice union for principle.

Review of Contemporaries.

The Oldest Religious Newspaper.

The editor of The Standard never reads anonymous letters, though he is glad to say that he has not been blessed with many. One was read in the office the other day and promptly torn up on delivery to the editor. But it was gathered from the reading that somebody thought the editor of The Standard an "Ananias" for his claim the other day to be publishing the oldest religious newspaper. And yet we only asserted the facts that Dr. John Holt Rice, who founded the Religious Remembrancer in Richmond on September 4, 1813, was the pastor of some of our ancestors and that Dr. William Brown, another Richmond editor, was the great-uncle of the editor of our Children's Department, which made the chain of evidence complete.

But then if anybody is going to hurl the Ananias declaration against us on this account we want company. And as the Presbyterian Banner is another "oldest religious newspaper" we give it the floor to make good its claim against the Christian Observer, which is also the "oldest religious newspaper." We suggest that the more charitable supposition is not the one that our anonymous correspondent hurled at us, but the well-known fact of forgetfulness when one approaches nonagentage and dotage and lean-and-slippered-pantaloonage. Says the Banner:

The Christian Observer in its issue of September 9, 1903, announces that it is ninety years old and claims to be "The Oldest Religious Newspaper in the World." It dates its origin from "The Religious Remembrancer," which was started in Philadelphia on September 4, 1813. The Observer says that Dr. Archibald Alexander and Dr. John H. Rice, who were interested in founding the Remembrancer, thus "conceived the idea, and originated the weekly religious newspaper." But there were certainly religious newspapers earlier than 1813. "The Herald of Gospel Liberty" was published by Elias Smith in Portsmouth, N. H., on September 1, 1808, and Prince's "Christian History" was a weekly publication started in Boston in 1743. Both the idea and the fact of the religious newspaper are older than 1813, and the claim of The Christian Observer on this point is incorrect. The present question is, What existing religious newspaper is the oldest?

And then the Banner takes up the other question and indicates what the Christian Observer had forgotten to state on account of the defective memory of old age, namely, that there was a gap of eighteen months between the Religious Remembrancer and the Philadelphian, the next link in this new apostolic succession. And the Banner further avers and contends that there is absolutely no mention made in the opening numbers of the Philadelphian that it was the successor of the eighteen months dead Remembrancer. In fact there is a sort of logical chain that disproves the possibility of such ancestry for the Christian Observer as a Religiously Remembering paper would be. Says the Banner again:

There is no question that the Religious Remembrancer was started on September, 1813. Is the present Christian Observer the true successor of that paper? On this point we have had a careful scholar, with no personal interest in the matter, examine the files in the Presbyterian Historical Society in Philadelphia. The facts are as follows: The Remembrancer was published and edited by J. W. Scott for ten years and suspended publication in August, 1823. In its last issue it announced "a temporary suspension in hope of arrangement for continuance under improved conditions and with enlargement." This leads us to look for a resuscitation of the Remembrancer, but no such event seems to have taken place. On May 5, 1825, eighteen months later, the first number of "The Philadelphian" appeared. There is no doubt that The Philadelphian, after various changes in name and in place of publication, became the present Christian Observer. The vital question is, What relation, if any, did The Philadelphian have to the Remembrancer? The Philadelphian started nearly two years after the suspension of the Remembrancer, its first issue was numbered "Vol. I., No. 1," it was edited by S. B. Ludlow, and it contained no allusion to the Remembrancer or any sign that it was the successor of that paper. It did say: "We have united with us 'The Christian Gazette and Youth's Herald.'" No copy of this last paper is in the Historical Society, and we know nothing more about it. But the fact that The Philadelphian states in its first issue that it had united with itself this paper makes it evident that if it had not taken over the Remembrancer or was in any sense a revival or successor of that paper, it would have said so. It is true that in 1832 Dr. Ezra S. Ely, then the editor of The Philadelphian, stated in that paper that The Philadelphian was the successor of the Remembrancer by uninterrupted succession, but his statement is not borne out by the facts. The complete files of the Remembrancer and of The Philadelphian are in the Presbyterian Historical Society, and any one can see the facts for himself. We think they make it evident that The Philadelphian was not the revival or successor of the Remembrancer, and therefore the founding of the Christian Observer, it appears to us, occurred on May 5, 1825.

Of course after this demonstration the Christian Observer will give the correct representation of the case to its readers and acknowledge its error and the falsity of its claim and will take down its sign, "nicht"—as the Germans say at the end of a sentence, which is by interpretation, "not."

The Norwegian Free Church has just been celebrating its "semi-jubilee," the close of the first quarter century of its existence. Just a hundred years ago a Norwegian peasant named Hauge, who felt impelled to "tell the story of Jesus and his love," was arrested on the very spot where the Free Church in Christiania now stands, for having preached without authority. He had gone on foot through all Norway, north, south, east and west, and had moved the whole country. While Hauge was in prison the Anglo-Danish war broke out, the coast was blockaded by British ships, and the whole land suffered for lack of salt. Hauge offered to produce as much salt as Norway needed, and being liberated, he went from place to place along the coast establishing salt works. When he had completed his task and supplied his country with salt, he was sent back to his prison cell, and left to languish still unsentenced until 1811, when he was released with his health quite shattered; and in 1814 sentence was pronounced, fining him 110 pounds for addressing religious gatherings and exhorting others to do likewise. But the spirit of true religion had begun to assert itself in the Church; revivals sprang up everywhere, a purer religious life arose in the country, and, as the result of Hauge's labors first the Foreign and then the Home Mission enterprises of the Norwegian Church took origin. Before very long, about the middle of the century the need of reform in the church began to make itself felt. The State Church had become formal to the last degree, but the chief cause of dissatisfaction was the necessity of confirmation before any young person could obtain a situation. In 1875 the friends of reform organized a society at Arendal, in the south of Norway, for the purpose of discussing the Scriptural rights and privileges of Christian congregations and their relation to the State. Not long after several pastors resigned their churches for conscience's sake. Visiting Scotland or counsel, they were greatly sustained by sympathy and promises of help, and returning home they founded the Free Church, first in Arendal, in 1878, and later in other towns. The movement spread, Scottish Free Churchmen of note going over from time to time to give support and encouragement.

The Norwegian Free Church is Lutheran, anti-sacerdotal, anti-ritualistic, anti-Erastian, perfectly Presbyterian. Its symbols are the Apostles', Nicene, Athanasian Creeds, Augsburg Confession, and Luther's Shorter Catechism. The questions of the formula put to ministers at ordination are—with the necessary changes—taken literally from the formula of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland. Having spread rapidly during its twenty-five years of existence, the Church now has a Synod, with three Presbyteries, and forty-six congregations, having some 10,000 members in all. Pastors and elders are appointed ad vitam aut culpam; deacons for three years. Elders must be thirty years of age; deacons twenty-five; and only male members over twenty-one can vote at congregational meetings.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

The United Free Church of Scotland has inaugurated a new departure in its mission to the herring fishers of the Orkney and Shetland Isles and the Scottish coast. A large yacht with a company of Christian laymen has made a summer cruise among the haunts of these fisher folk, and great interest has attended their work. In every port crowds flocked to hear the preaching and singing. The names of the places visited are best known to Americans, perhaps, through William Black's yachting novels; it seems like a new page added to them to read the report of this missionary yachting expedition. In Storno way, the crew were able to take part in the good work going on in the town. The church services were crowded and in the open air great gatherings were brought together. In Thurso, where the yacht was storm-stayed for a few days, a splendid meeting was held in the town-hall, which, notwithstanding the very brief notice, was filled with an attentive audience. At Balta Sound there were large gatherings and much blessing. One of the best meetings of the whole series was held in a large shed, on an evening when the boats were mostly in on account of bad weather. The men were sitting perched up on tiers of wood reaching almost to the roof, wherever they could get a seat—reminding one of the sea-birds as they perch in rows along the face of the high cliffs. From Balta Sound the yacht went down to Lerwick, where the interest was marked, large crowds gathering on Sabbaths, especially at night, eager to hear the Gospel message. The meetings were continued every night, when numbers of men and women, both young and old, came forward and confessed Jesus as Lord. This yacht mission is simply one feature of a very extensive work carried on by this Church among the fisher folks of the northern seas. Thousands of Highlanders go to the voes, or islands of the Shetland group, for the fishing, and the interest manifested in the open air meetings was extreme and well sustained, notwithstanding the unusually cold, bleak weather.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

It begins to look as though a wide reunion of evangelical churches might be first accomplished in Australia, since the proposal made by the Presbyterians in that country, looking toward an amalgamation of the Presbyterian, Congregational and Methodist bodies, has been favorably received by the Methodists and "accepted for future consideration" by the Congregationalists. The Methodists announce that they find nothing in the modified Calvinism of today's Presbyterianism to oppose, and that the difference in polity is too slight to justify needless competition of churches. The Wesleyanism of England and her colonies, it should be remembered, has never been "episcopal" as Methodism is in our country. Wesleyan Methodism has also insisted upon a high education for its ministry, the conference not only passing upon its ministers but selecting its "candidates" and then educating them as officers are educated for the army at the expense of the ruling body. The joint committee of Presbyterians and Methodists in Australia has recommended that the two bodies shall "seriously and favorably" enter upon steps which may lead to organic union. Congregationalism has never been particularly strong in Australia, being chiefly confined to the cities of the colony.—The Interior.

When it was decided to close the prayer meeting in a certain village, a good woman declared she would be there if no one else was. She was true to her word, and when the next morning some one said to her rather jestingly: "Did you have a prayer meeting last night?" "Ah, that we did," she replied. "Why," he said, "I heard you were there all alone." "No," she said, "I was the only one visible, but the Father and Son and Holy Ghost were there, and we were all agreed."—Episcopal Recorder.

Book Notices.

THE VAGABOND—By Frederick Palmer. p. p. 476, price $1.50. Chas Scribner's Sons.

This is the author's first long story, and the reader who attempts to read it, will be attracted by the engravings which are fine, but will devoutly wish that it may be the last. A motherless boy, whose father afterwards commits suicide, seems possessed with a desire to climb a mountain, to search for a mine and to find a girl. The mountain he eventually finds, climbs and discovers is a mine which makes him rich—but the search for the girl is the story itself.

The girl is intensely Southern, while the Vagabond is Northern, and this difference in views and feelings gives material for the story.

We have fighting in abundance, but the Northern soldier carries off the laurels and the only time the Confederates win a victory, it is with overwhelming numbers. The eulogies of Sheridan are too much for Southern taste, though we may manage to swallow what is said about Lincoln.

This book may have a fine sale North, but for Southern readers we do not recommend it, not so much because it is not according to our view, but chiefly because it is not according to the facts of history, nor the customs of the South.

ESTHER BURR'S JOURNAL—Woodward and Lothrop, Washington, D. C., 100 pages. Price $1.00.

Now that the anniversary of the birth of President Jonathan Edwards has turned the mind of so many toward him, this little glimpse into his home life is especially attractive. Esther Edwards Burr was the wife of President Burr of Princeton, who immediately preceded President Edwards. The narrative is told in the rather stilted expressions of the times, but it is interesting. It shows a sprightly imagination and good judgment. One of the pictures that is brought out is of the illness and death (in their home) of David Brainerd. Her sister, Jerusha, to whom he was engaged to be married, lived but five months after, and Mrs. Burr died eight months after the death of President Burr. Mrs. Jonathan Edwards survived her husband but six months—these facts proving the intenseness of the emotional natures of the family. The book is printed in Old Roman type and each page has an effective border.

THE HISTORY OF PRESBYTERIANISM IN ARKANSAS—1828-1902.—The Arkansas Democrat Company, Little Rock, Ark.

This interesting volume is made up of papers which were prepared for the semi-centennial celebration of the Synod of Arkansas in October, 1902. There are biographical sketches of thirteen of the pioneers of our Church in that State and histories of twenty-nine of the Churches, as well as of the Presbyteries. The illustrations are numerous and the mechanical make-up of the book is worthy of its contents. This will be a valuable reference book for our Arkansas friends.

A Serious Neglect.

It is strange that Christian people, with any considerable knowledge of the truths of the Bible, will continue to demand new proofs of the certainty that God answers prayers. The very fact that the Bible gives numerous instances in which it is shown that a neglect to ask wisdom of God in relation to certain matters resulted disastrously to the neglecters, is sufficient evidence that God surely does answer prayer. In many instances the Bible shows the special difference between one seeking to have God's wisdom and help in his undertakings, and one's independence in such seeking and obtaining. We see an example in the days of Joshua. In the ninth chapter of the book of Joshua is an account of a shrewd scheme which the Gideonites perpetrated upon the Israelites. That people, having heard what Joshua and his men did to the inhabitants of Jericho and Ai, were in great fear lest they also would meet a like fate, hence they devised a very adroit plan by which they succeeded in so deceiving Joshua and his princes as to secure a covenant, granting the Gideonites a perpetual protection against all enemies of the Israelites. Joshua and his men soon discovered that they had been craftily caught, but it was then too late to remedy the matter. What was the reason that Joshua and his princes were thus entrapped? Here it is: "And the men took of their provision, and asked not counsel at the mouth of the Lord." Those few words mean that Joshua, instead of asking counsel of the Lord as to what should be said and done when the Gideonites made their proposition, used his own wisdom, in connection with that of his princes, and hence a bad covenant was made. If Joshua had consulted God, asking Him to guide him wisely, He would have revealed the plot to Joshua, and then he would have exterminated the Gideonites, as God wanted him to do. One wonders that Joshua, so generally true to God, should have thus neglected to pray for safe guidance. I presume that he never forgot that serious mistake. Its results long plagued him and his people. One lesson is, we are not competent to fulfill all duty without God's wisdom and power. Another lesson is, take plenty of time to get God's mind before doing business for him.

C. H. Wetherbe.

On a recent visit to America, the Rev. F. B. Meyer related an incident which deeply moved those of the small company which heard it.

One day in his pastoral visitation he called upon a washerwoman of his congregation. He found her finishing her day's work, and as the clothes hung upon the line in the little yard, they impressed him as unusually clean and white.

"An uncommonly fine wash you are hanging out," he said; and the woman modestly accepted the compliment as just, and showed some honest pride in her work.

The minister stepped inside, and talked with his parishioner while she brewed a cup of tea. Meantime there came a flurry of snow, which soon passed; but when the minister rose to go the ground was white, although the air was clear.

"Ah," said Dr. Meyer, "the clothes do not look as white as they did."

"O sir," cried the woman, "the clothes are all right; but what can stand against God Almighty's white?"

It is a comfort, and sometimes we need it, to remember that God "knoweth our frame," and "remembereth that we are dust," and that He does not expect from us an impossible goodness. Yet this thought, true though it is, may sometimes become half a falsehood, and lend itself to self-deception. To be content with too easy goodness is to grow worse and worse. The divine spotlessness is our pattern and ideal, and our lives grow whiter in its light or not at all. We may not be able to match it in degree, but we can in kind.—The Youth's Companion.

Missionary.

Conversion in Fiji.

The Fiji islands are now a part of the British Empire and they are Christian. In 1835 they were sunk in utter cannibalism and savagery. In that year two devoted missionaries, the Rev. William Cross (English) and David Cargil (Scotch) landed on one of the remotest islands of the group. From the first hour of landing they were in constant danger of death; but they were strong in the Lord and fearless because they knew God was with them. The Fijians habitually killed their enemies in war if they could get them in their power and they cooked and ate them, without any hesitation. When there was no war, there must still be meat,—human flesh—for the feast. There were no domestic animals on the island, and there were no beasts of the chase. Cannibalism was therefore an ordinary incident in the lives of the people. A serf or weaker neighbor, or a neighbor's child, or some helpless waif was caught and killed. Crews of vessels driven by tempest, or by treacherous currents, were uniformly clubbed and eaten. Crews of different islands driven ashore were also devoured. In these circumstances war was incessant.

It is related that when a missionary was killed and eaten in one of the isles, one of the native preachers volunteered to take his place. The people of the island and of Ono were converted by the report brought to them by one of themselves of what he had seen and learned among Tongan converts. The name of this man was Wai. He told the people that there was but one true God whom all must serve, and that one day in seven must be devoted to His worship. He had notched a stick to mark the even days. On the sixth day they prepared food for the seventh, and, dressed up in their best, they met at Wai's house. He told them that the Christians began by singing, but he only knew one verse, so they must sing it often. After this, he said, the Christians knelt down to pray, but, as none of them knew what to say, they sent to bring the heathen priest, and asked him to speak in their name to the unknown God. He did so, to the best of his ability, taking care to mention that he was merely spokesman for his neighbors, being himself the priest of another God.

They sent to Tonga for teachers, and before long one of themselves who had been under instruction with the Methodists came and told them more fully what God wished them to do. This young man found that 12 persons had already forsaken idols. In less than three years out of the 500 inhabitants only three were still heathen. The people shortly were all earnest and fervent Christians. Many of the five hundred went to other islands bearing the tidings of salvation. In thirty-five years the light pierced the darkest corners of the darkest isle. All were brought to the light. In 1877 the Church of Fiji as a whole resolved to send missionaries to a cannibal isle, New Britains. Nine volunteered. The British consul warned them of their great peril. Their answer was "We know it all, but we are resolved to go; if we die we die, and if we live we live." The wives with equal zeal went with them. Within five years, four of the nine were killed and eaten, but the other five joyfully took their places of peril. Fiji is now happily a British colony, civilized and Christianized.—Presbyterian Witness.

Thank God for what one good man—or one good woman, can do to promote the well-being of millions. Think of that Sabbath school boy David Livingstone, who by his life and death saved Africa, and broke the yoke and the fetters of the slave.—The Witness.

We are apt to suffer the mean things of life to overgrow the finer nature within us; therefore it is expedient that at least once a day we read a little poetry, or sing a song or look at a picture.—Goethe.

David's Joy Over Forgiveness.

Oct. 25th, 1903.

Psalms 32-11. If the 51st Psalm presents the Confessions, prayers and pleas of David, and of every penitent sinner, the 32nd Psalm describes the blessed experiences of the forgiven Psalmist and of each pardoned soul. But this Psalm expressed not only the joy of pardon, but the joys of hiding sin, and the Divine instructions given to erring transgressors and wandering saints. As human nature is the same in all ages and as the principles of God's moral government abide unchanged the teachings of this passage of Scripture are important and valuable to every generation of men. We shall endeavor to present them under three topics.

I. The Sorrows of Sin Concealed.—David after sinning for a time tried to cover his sin from himself and to hide it from God by keeping silence and refusing to confess. Many do the same and realize the like result. David says "When I kept silence my bones waxed old through my roaring all the day long." Covering his sin and refusing to confess it made him miserable and wretchedness found expression in decaying bones and constant groaning. He was rendered unhappy by conscientious guilt and a remorseful conscience. But while having internal causes producing distress, outward sources of unrest were not wanting. He declares "For day and night thy hand was heavy upon me; my moisture is turned into the drought of summer." The chastising hand of God rested upon him, rendering his soul parched and dry, like the earth subjected to the drought of summer. Numerous transgressors endeavoring to cover up their sin and declining to own it even to God are often made unhappy by a guilty conscience, and the strokes of the Divine rod.

II. The Joys of Sin Confessed and Pardoned.—David exclaims "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity and in whose spirit there is no guile." He pronounces the sincere penitent whose sin has been forgiven of God, and covered by atoning blood, a blessed man. But in order to pardon confession must be made. Hence the Psalmist affirms "I acknowledged my sin unto thee and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord, and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin." The apostle also declares "If we confess our sins He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Nor is the joy of pardoned sin the only source of gladness to the penitent confessing sinner. He realizes that a reconciled God is his hiding place, who will protect him from floods of woe, preserve him from trouble and compass him about with songs of deliverance.

III. Divine Counsels to Wrong Doers.—Several instructions given to condemned sinners and erring saints are of prime importance. One is "Pray for the forgiveness of sins in a time when God may be found," and God's time is now. If you ever expect to be godly pray now for pardon. Another counsel is "Do not make it needful for God to use coercive means as we bit and bridle refractory animals to render them submissive to their owners and to cause them to come near to them." "Be ye not as the horse or as the mule which have no understanding, whose mouth must be held with bit and bridle, that they may come near unto thee." Another assurance is "Many sorrows shall be to the wicked; but he that trusteth in the Lord, mercy shall compass him about." A man must flee wickedness if he would escape sorrow and he who trusts a gracious God to pardon, save and bless him shall be girded about by the Divine mercy. The last counsel here given is to make God Himself and not merely His works or benefits our chief source of gladness. "Be glad in the Lord and rejoice ye righteous."

Great Men of the Bible—What David Teaches Us.

I Samuel 16:11-13; Ps. 19; John 7:42. Topic for Nov. 1.

There is no more beautiful life of any purely human man recorded in the Scriptures than that of David, the shepherd, poet, king. There is probably none that can be studied with more profit. His life was many sided and exhibits to us a godly man who sometimes, yes often, was tempted into heinous sins. Yet from each downfall he arises a better and nobler man than before. From these circumstances we learn many lessons, a few of which, only, can be touched upon here.

The secret of his life is revealed to us in the sixteenth chapter of First Samuel, where we have an account given of his anointing by the prophet, to be king. There we read at the conclusion of that narrative, that "the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward." "From that day forward,"—these are the words which mark the first crisis in the life of the man. It was the Spirit of the Lord which departed from Saul and which caused his downfall in so doing. It was the Spirit of the Lord coming upon David which caused his uprising. It is a great day in any life when the Spirit of the Lord comes over that life. It is the saddest of all days when a man turns his back upon that Spirit and grieves Him so that He leaves never to return. This same Spirit comes to our lives and offers to become the constant abiding companion, the indwelling companion of each of us. Many refuse to entertain Him as their guest. He is treated with ignominy by some, others openly rebel against Him. David might often grieve this abiding Friend by lapses into sin, but he always returned with the true repentance and renewed allegiance. How are we treating the Spirit from the Lord? Are we spurning Him, or are we yielding ourselves to His guidance?

The next lesson which we would emphasize is that God was always recognized as the Supreme Sovereign of David. It is a condition which grows out of the former condition of receiving the Spirit into the life. In the nineteenth Psalm, David declares the goodness and glory of God to be written upon the heavens and the earth. He also acknowledges how perfect He is in all his ways and prays for grace to be able to do the will of the Lord, at the same time showing how very sensibly he realizes that man's dependence is only to be placed in the Lord, if he would attain to anything that is good. He sets forth God's preserving power by supplicating Him that He would keep His servant back from presumptuous sin as well as cleanse him from secret fault. When we in like manner learn that all power and dominion rest with God, and that every good thing comes from Him, we will then, if we are wise and sincere, cease to trust to ourselves and place our confidence in God only. When David trusted God he was always happy and successful. When he risked his own understanding and prowess, he was brought to confusion and grief.

With these principles as the basis of David's life, we find that other noble qualities of mind and heart grew out of them.

He was a courageous man. He might well be. He knew that the Angel of the Lord was encamping all around him; that He would deliver him. Knowing that God's Spirit was in him, he also knew that it was that he might fulfill his mission in the world. What better kind of courage can a man have than that which is the result of these facts? It did not make David take risks which might as well be avoided. It made him undertake anything in which the honor of God and the glory of His name were at stake.

He was a man who repented truly of his sins when he had time to think of them, quietly and calmly. His repentance was always sincere, and needed not to be repented of.

The Church's Right of Control.

Perhaps the most influential word that has been spoken against removing the Southwestern Presbyterian University from Clarksville, Tenn., to Atlanta, Ga. has been spoken by Dr. J. B. Shearer. Probably no more influential word will be spoken on that side of the question. Dr. Shearer's words carry weight because they are weighty; because of the high esteem in which he is held by the whole Church; and because he is supposed to be thoroughly informed touching the matter in hand. It so happens that Dr. Shearer is the one man who stands out conspicuously as the representative of the idea of Church and Christian Education. He was among the first to preach the duty of the Church to control education, and he has been the most faithful and persevering preacher of this doctrine. What Synod, what Presbytery has not heard his potent voice advocating Church schools? To him is largely due the fact that the Church has finally, through its General Assembly, definitely and avowedly committed itself to the doctrine that it is part of the Church's mission to educate.

In the light of Dr. Shearer's article on the removal of the S. W. P. University from Clarksville, we may well ask, what does he mean by Church Control of Education? What does he mean by a Church school? What is the relation of the Church to the Southwestern Presbyterian University? He tells us that the location of the University at Clarksville was secured by the joint offer of three parties, the trustees of Stewart College, the city of Clarksville, and a number of private individuals. He does not tell us to whom the offer was made, but presumably to the six Synods who appointed the Board of Directors. Did the University then become the property of the six Synods? Do the four remaining Synods who appoint the Board of Directors own it? We understand that it was given to them on condition that they locate it at Clarksville. They fulfilled the condition and now the University belongs to those four Synods. What is the precise nature of this ownership? In what does its essence consist? Does it carry with it the ownership of all the endowments that are given to the University after it becomes their property? Mr. McComb gives a hundred thousand dollars to the University. The University belongs to the Synods. Do the hundred thousand dollars belong to the Synods? Can they do with it what they please? Does it pass under the contract with Clarksville, and in doing so pass beyond the touch of the four Synods? Did Clarksville, by paying $50,000 get a perpetual and everlasting grip on all the funds that might thereafter be given to the University? Was it understood that the contract was an everlasting covenant; that it was like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unalterable? Suppose the endowment should amount to a million of dollars, must the owners of the University forfeit all that to Clarksville in case they try to modify or cancel the contract? Such is the conclusion from Dr. Shearer's argument. The Synods own the University, but its endowments are all pinned down forever to Clarksville. What advantage accrues to the four Synods from their ownership as respects the endowments? They can no more control them than can the other Synods.

It may be said that they can control them through their Board of Directors. "Ecclesiastical control is secured at the pivotal point by the election of a Board of Directors by the Synods; and ecclesiastical administration (the bane and curse of so many Church schools in the past) was guarded against by a definite provision that the sole government of the University should be in the Board of Directors." This adjustment between church courts and their schools is good Dr. Shearer's own invention, and a child of his brain for which he feels a peculiar affection. He can say of it as Lamech of Noah: "This same shall comfort us in our work and in the toil of our hands;" it shall take away "the bane and curse of so many Church schools in the past." The Church can control, but cannot administer; it can control but cannot govern. It can control "at the pivotal point by electing a Board of Trustees." That is very simple, and very beautiful. The Church is on one side of the pivot and its school and its Board of Directors are on the other. The Church can never go beyond the pivot—it would no longer be a pivot if it did not occupy a position between the Church and the Board. The Church cannot get near enough to touch its institution, its endowments, or its Board of Directors—its control is restricted to the pivotal point. "Any attempt by one or more of the Synods to alter this arrangement of the duties and responsibilities of the Board of Directors can only end in disaster." This arrangement, like the contract with the city of Clarksville, is eternal, immutable.

This it seems is what Dr. Shearer means by a Church school—a school from which the Church is forever shut off by an unalterable contract with local parties; and from the administration and government of which, it is forever debarred by a Board of Directors. If this discussion does no other good, it may prove of great value by clearing up the question of the Church's right to control its institutions of learning. Other churches have settled this question in favor of the Church. When the Baptists saw that their Seminary was not prospering at Greenville, S. C., they picked it up and set it down in Louisville, Ky., and now it is the largest Theological Seminary in the world. When the Northern Church saw that their seminary at Hanover, Ind., was not prospering, they picked it up and set it down in Chicago, Ill., and now it is the second largest Presbyterian Seminary in the world. One section of our own Church has settled the question. When it saw that its seminary was losing ground at Hampden Sidney, Va., they picked it up and set it down in Richmond, and now they have an institution that rivals in its plant and equipment the best in the land. Here are two Church institutions, each well-endowed, apparently drying up because the currents that used to feed them are turned into other channels. This state of affairs can be accounted for without reflecting in the slightest on these institutions, or their management. Providence throws open a door of opportunity. They can be reset where the currents will strike them again, and the scope of their service will be enlarged indefinitely. Shall local sentiment, and personal interests stand in the way of the Church, and prevent its seeking the good of institutions which are admittedly its own? If they are permitted to do this, had we not better quit speaking of these schools as Church institutions?

In order to make his position absolutely impregnable, Dr. Shearer tells us that "location (if anything) belongs to the Board of Directors, and removal is simply a change of location." To justify this statement he quotes from the "Plan of Union," showing that the Board of Directors shall "at their discretion locate and develop the institution as rapidly as their means will justify." Now, if the "plan of union" conferred on the Board power to locate the institution at their discretion, the Board had power to locate it elsewhere than Clarksville. Then what becomes of that undiscussably sacred, and everlasting contract into which the Synods entered when they accepted the $50,000 from the city of Clarksville? Can it be that just on the heels of that so solemn a contract the Synods created a Board of Directors and empowered them to break it? The Synods can not break this contract; cannot modify or annul it without bringing disaster; cannot even discuss it without exhibiting moral obliquity; but this irresponsible creature of theirs is freed, as soon as it is born, from the restraints of this contract. "Location (if anything) belongs to the Board of Directors, and removal is simply a change of location"—therefore if the Board of Directors can do anything they can remove the University. Does the city of Clarksville concede this? Does Mr. Kennedy, the our friend and trusted counsellor of Dr. Shearer concede this? Yet this is what Dr. Shearer asserts. Possibly the Synods may find a way after all to reach their institution effectively. They can work at the pivotal point, and gradually change the complexion of the board. We have felt all the while that if the Synods could really wish to move their institution, they could be as wise in devising a way as other Synods in our own Church and in the Northern Church have done. Controlling Synods are very likely to insist sooner or later that they have a right to control.

An Humble Inquirer.

"The Committee on the Proof Texts."

Our usually amiable, and always excellent friend, the editor and manager of The Standard, in its Western office, is in an unhappy frame of mind, and to relieve himself has said things not altogether nice of the late assembly, its principal committee and its moderator. Each of these did things that ruffled his temper, and on the issue of Sept. 30th he gives expression to his displeasure in language that could easily have been more mild and guarded, as well as more complimentary. His grievance is twofold: 1st. The composition of the committee appointed to "revise the Proof Texts of our doctrinal Standards," and especially, 2nd, the failure of the moderator to appoint Rev. E. C. Gordon, D. D., as chairman of that committee. His contention is that as Dr. Gordon was the "real originator" of the overture, in answer to which the committee was appointed, and, by parliamentary courtesy, should have been its chairman; whereas he is not on the committee at all. Against this "flagrant violation," as he calls it of "a plain, fair, common sense and righteous principle," he enters his "earnest protest;" and in the heat of his resentment allows himself to accuse the moderator and the Assembly of discourtesy to the slighted brother. Now the simple and sufficient answer to all this is:

1. That Dr. Gordon was not properly known to the Assembly in connection with the overture in response to which the action in question was taken. That overture was sent by the Presbytery of Lafayette and properly certified by the stated clerk, unaccompanied by any information as to either its parentage or history. And in the very brief discussion it received on the floor of the Assembly, the name of Dr. Gordon—so far as is now remembered—was not once mentioned, as sustaining any relation to it whatever. When an overture is received from a Presbytery, it is not the custom of the Assembly to inquire "who wrote it?"

The Presbytery itself is the only party with whom it is concerned. In the case of this particular overture, all that the Assembly knew, or had a right to know, or cared to know, was that it came from the Presbytery of Lafayette, and if courtesy required the recognition of that Presbytery in the composition of the ad interim committee, it is not easy to see how Dr. Gordon's claim to such recognition could have been greater than that of any one of the 23 ministers and 7 ruling elders who might have constituted the Presbytery when the overture was adopted.

2. But to this it will be objected that the relation of Dr. Gordon to this overture was actually, though not officially, known to the Assembly, and that therefore his appointment as head of the committee should have been made. That he was known to many members of the Assembly as the author of the overture is quite probable. But had he been known as such to the whole Assembly it would have given him no prescriptive claims to such appointment. The assertion of such a claim is in conflict with the general history of such committees. It is true that under an unwritten law of our church courts, the member who moves the appointment of a committee, whose report is to be presented at that meeting, is, in ordinary cases, appointed the chairman of the committee. But in the appointment of ad interim committees charged with matters of vital interest to the entire Church, this custom is not regarded as binding, at least not in our higher courts. The good Doctor declares that "always the movers are represented on the committees appointed," and adds the sweeping assertion, "to this I have never known an exception." The Doctor forgets, or his knowledge of the facts is very limited. If he will examine the records, he will find that, in cases similar to the one now under review, the exceptions are largely in the majority. In the case of such Committees as I now recall, and the number is not small, appointed by the Synod and Assembly, in hardly an instance was the original mover placed as the head of the Committees, or on the Committees at all. If his name was not appended to his overture, or if his special fitness for a place upon the committee was not urged, the court did not bother itself with inquiries about the mover. If the matter overtured was of sufficient importance to justify the appointment of a committee, the court felt at perfect liberty to avail itself of the best material at its command, untrammelled by individual claims. On this ground the moderator, in the case before us, had he been aware of the superior ability of Dr. Gordon in the interpretation and application of Scripture texts, might have selected him from among a hundred or two others equally competent. But his judgment as to preeminent fitness directed him to the five men whose daily business it is to do the very work the Assembly has required. And in the exercise of that judgment he has given us a committee that secured the enthusiastic endorsement of the Assembly and has commanded the general approval of the Church—before reading the protest of G. L. L. I would have said the universal approval of the Church.

3. But the article under review compels me in all candor to go a step further, and to ask if it would really have been fair, either to the Church or to Dr. Gordon, to have placed him on the committee? It is not forgotten that, before the meeting of the late Assembly an overture of which Dr. Gordon was the acknowledged author, was privately circulated asking for individual and Presbyterian endorsement. That overture fell into the hands of The Presbyterian Standard and was so roughly handled by the senior editor, that when it reached the Assembly it was found shorn of nearly all its objectionable features. But in its original, unabridged form it had been published, and by that publication and the discussion that followed the status of the author on one or more of the fundamental articles of our faith were found to be out of harmony with his Church. Now if the committee for which the overture asked had been for the revision of our Standards, there might have been some propriety in the appointment of Dr. Gordon. But the Assembly did not propose to revise the Standards, but only the proof texts that give scriptural warrant for the teachings of the Standards. To have assigned this duty to Dr. Gordon and so have required him to furnish scripture proof for doctrines which he believes are without scripture warrant, would have been what Carlyle, speaking of a similar incongruity, once called "the grimmest joke of all the ages." How e. g. could he give the scripture proof for our doctrine of human inability when he repudiates as unscriptural our Confessional statement of that doctrine? In spite, therefore, of the modest claim that there is no other man "who is so competent, so able, so ready now to do just what this committee was appointed to do," some of us cannot quite relieve ourselves of the conviction that there would have been an obvious impropriety in his appointment. It would have been unfair to the Church, and unfair to him. For though it be true that there is no other "man in the Church who, during the last ten years * * * has given so much time and thought and study to the careful, painstaking thorough examinations of the proof texts," yet if he cannot honestly furnish the proof that "No man is able, either of himself or by any grace received in this life, perfectly to keep the commandments of God" etc., he was not the man that was wanted on that committee; and the omission of his name, for which the moderator and Assembly have been so unsparingly condemned, was right.

It is not pleasant to write these things of a brother for whom I cherish a warm personal regard, and whom the Church holds in highest honor. But I am not responsible for bringing him into this discussion. The Assembly and its moderator have been recklessly and violently assailed for a flagrant act of injustice to him; and it is necessary, in their vindication that the facts which show how groundless is the charge against them, should be distinctly stated. My long and intimate acquaintance with the writer of the article under review and my admiration of his noble qualities make it easy to believe that if he had reflected a little before printing it his paper would never have seen the light.

Letter From Boston.

I have looked and hoped for a report from some of the many delegates to the National Educational Association which met here in July and which was of such great interest.

The Boston Herald in an editorial a few weeks after said, "If the late session of the National Educational Association in this city, which gave occasion for hundreds of able and instructive addresses, had been the occasion of but one, that by Edgar Gardner Murphy of Montgomery, Alabama, executive secretary of the Southern Educational Board, we are almost prepared to say that all its cost and labor would have been justified, provided his wise and eloquent words could be brought to the attention of serious minded and intelligent men and women all over the country." * * * * * The perversity of human nature is hard to be accounted for.

One of the first magazines I look for when at the public library is the Independent. I am always curious to see what it has to say about the South though afterwards I frequently have a bad quarter of an hour.

If it is possible to criticize what happens in the South, the Independent is quick to do it.

But there are such funny things in a recent number that I fancy your readers will be as much amused as I have been so I give most of the quotation.

In a review of Thomas Nelson Page's new book "Gordon Keith," the Independent says it is "a better one than 'Red Rock' where there was too much of the sentimentality of misfortune, too frequent appeals to the reader's sympathy * * * * * But the motive of the book is to prove a natural and social distinction between the thoroughbred Southerner and the Northern man supposed to belong to the same class. Thus having created a paragon of courage, virtue and energy in the person of his hero, Mr. Page thrusts him into the social life of New York where prestige depends upon wealth rather than character or good breeding; in page after page he demonstrates the eternal difference between the young Southerner and his Northern companions.

The youth's very tan and awkwardness are made to rebound to his glory and the fact that his courtesy and kindness actually bring him under suspicion is used by the author to prove that the Yankee had not at that time a conception of the gentleman which would enable him to recognize one by his manner.

But to convince the popular mind that there is an elemental degree between the Southerner of high degree and everybody else has always been Mr. Page's literary business.

He labors under the delusion peculiar to novelists of that section, that probably the only perfect gentleman in this world is the Southern man of more or less Virginia ancestry.

This is a mistake of course, and grows out of the extraordinary consciousness of superiority in all Southerners whose pedigree includes a number of Colonels and governors.

It is not so much a personal fallacy as it is an unbecoming insistence upon their precious distinction; and in the fiction of the South it is a quality that has been so accented as to become a sort of provincial absurdity.

Now this old environment, these conditions and the men resulting from them are passing away and the sooner Mr. Page, in common with other Southern writers, recognizes the fact that the romantic detail of plantation monarchies and other features of the old South are no longer interesting material, the sooner shall we have a representative literature of that section."

In an editorial on the social boycott of John S. Wise of Virginia, it says, "he is a good enough man for the best society in New York. But he is not regarded as fit to associate with by the proud representatives of those families in Virginia. They pass him with a cold stare. It is all because he differs with them in politics. And yet they claim that they allow freedom of speech."

This reminds me of a call I had from a lady (?) She wanted to know why Southern people thought themselves so much better than Northern people? I replied that I didn't know they did. "Yes, they do," she said, "and I think the reason is because they are jealous. They know we are ahead of them in education and cultivation," and yet this specimen of superior cultivation had spoken of a number of things that "hadn't ought" to be done.

Everything with reference to Rev. R. J. Campbell is of interest to one who has had the rare privilege of hearing him preach when he was in this country. I was much surprised to see in the Christian Observer September 16th that "he did not appreciate the tone of the Winona Conferences; felt them to be too spiritual."

That was the burden of his theme, more spirituality the day I heard him.

In all the years I have lived in Boston, with the exception of Philips Brooks, I have not heard a minister who impressed me so with his own spirituality, nor have I heard a sermon so uplifting. You drink in all he says not because it is especially eloquent, for there was no attempt at oratory, no effort to appear learned. He was very simple and direct. He gave you out of the fullness of his own heart, a message that made you realize how parched your own soul was, how utterly barren your own life.

Some one writing in the World's Work says: "He is folded in a personal peace which isolates him in an age of unrest * * * it is a peace like the remote quietude that sits on the Jungfrau at sunset."

Protests were received by Mr. Moody at Northfield that he be not allowed to speak on account of his Universalist views, but I should consider it a great loss not to have heard him. Yet as we came out of church a lady back of us remarked, "how theatrical he is."

Wasted Years.

Grieve not for wasted years, oh heart!
Regret nor sighs can them recall.
Stand not with tear-filled eyes apart;
For soon the evening shades will fall.

What if thy way hath sometimes been O'er dreary wastes of burning sand.
God's stars at midnight hast thou seen,
And felt the touch of His kind hand.

Then pilgrim turn with gladsome eyes,
And trustful heart, toward the Light,
Leave wasted years with One so wise,
Nothing is hidden from His sight.

As weary travelers seeking rest
'Neath waving palms, by waters clear,
Forget the sands their feet have pressed,
Thank God we did not perish there.

A Reformatory in North Carolina.

(The following forceful paper was read at the State meeting of the King's Daughters, at Salisbury, N. C. Speaking of the hoped-for Reformatory, the Charlotte Observer says:

"We are firmly of the opinion that, while the Legislature may make a small appropriation for the purpose, the major part of the work will devolve upon the women of the State. A start toward the end has been made by a citizen of Moore county in the donation of a site, with all the land necessary for the purpose. The women will have to do the greater part of what remains to be done, and if they resolve to do it it is not to be doubted that they will gain the end."

Nothing touches the mother-heart of a woman more than a straying boy, but surely our men will not stay behind and our ministers and our teachers especially will come up to the help of the noble women whose shoulders are now at the wheel.)

Yielding to a request made by our excellent Secretary and others, we have come before you today to plead for a cause that should appeal to the hearts of every King's Daughter in our land, viz: A Reformatory for our young boys, a Home for our youthful criminals. In many places, notably in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Michigan, Iowa and Ohio, the State has come to regard the reclamation of children as the highest function in the field of charity; the most intelligent of their citizens are identified with this popular work. Our sister State, Tennessee, leads all the others in her rescue work and has at the Reformatory in Nashville alone, over 1,000 children, and statistics show, greatly to her credit, that in the first ten years this Reformatory has turned out over 1,000 boys prepared for the struggle of life. This same State appropriates from $80,000 to $100,000 per annum to like institutions. Alabama has its most noble representative of this cause, Mrs. R. D. Johnson, here with us. She will tell you of the grand work done in child-saving by the women of that State, who have "coined into money and lands and buildings their personal comfort, their inherited timidity, their pride and prejudices, their pity and their love." Right proudly we mention the commendable fact that there are 100 Reform schools in our country, all working very successfully.

But our beloved Old North State lags behind in this humane movement. Shall the people of North Carolina continue to place children in jails, work houses, convict camps, the penitentiary itself? or shall they take the youthful offender from evil associations, train and discipline him, build up his character by ceaseless occupation, and the presence of noble example, and finally the power of habits, "until this vicious waif criminally inclined, instead of becoming a terror to society, returns to it as a supporter and protector of a common welfare?" As has been earnestly affirmed in the Biennial Report of the Board of Public Charities, "Whatsoever else may be set aside or postponed to a 'more convenient season,' our people have declared thro' many channels and at various times, with a unanimity that is remarkable, that we can no longer defer the effort to stop the greatest waste in our commonwealth, of the most valuable possession that we enjoy. Converting this waste from the heaviest burden that oppresses us, in pecuniary loss, family deprivations, injury to life and property, and the disgrace to individuals and communities, 'converting it into men, high minded men, for these constitute a State!' and are its greatest investment. Wives, mothers, sisters, dear Daughters of The King, do we realize that numbers of our wayward young boys are committed to prison cells with the vilest, foulest prisoners; sent for offences more or less great, to places teeming with the evil spirits, sent there to get a post-graduate course in all the wickedness possessed by the veteran professors of crime and iniquity? Yes, 'our own flesh and blood are being thrown on the waste heap!' The alternative of this sad state of things is that young criminals must either be placed with desperadoes or be allowed to escape and thus encourage and increase crime. Upon examination of the report of the Board of Directors of our State Penitentiary we find as far back as the year 1896, "Convicts received under 16 years, 80; from 16 to 20 years, 326." The total number of convicts, 1246. Appalling per cent of young criminals wasn't it? We are glad to note from same source, in 1901-1902, "convicts under 16 years, 20; from 16 to 20 years, 130."

We will only give one instance out of many that might be cited. A young boy just nine years old was sent to the Penitentiary. There was nothing else to do with this wicked little fellow, for he had lain in wait and viciously shot dead his own father. This lad remained five years as a "waiting boy" for the older criminals, a little sponge to absorb prison bacilli of all sorts, till when released, he rolled "sin as a sweet morsel under his tongue," and soon returned to his adopted home a notable "jail bird." If the Pauline injunction for the Christian was, "Come ye out from among them and be ye separate," separate from sin, from the haunts of sin, from the pleasures of sin, might it not be equally binding upon us to keep our boys from the adepts of sin? If it was necessary for the welfare of the Church to warn its members against being yoked with unbelievers, must we not shield our young boys from the contamination, the degradation of being chained to men steeped in iniquity, whose every touch is defiling?

Ah, "is the young man Absalom safe?" King's Daughters—are the King's Sons safe?

"For sadder sight than eye can know,
Than proud bark lost or seaman's woe,
Or battle fire, or tempest cloud,
Or sea bird's shriek, or ocean's shroud,
Is the shipwreck of a soul!"

Ah, scores of souls! What are we doing to prevent these human shipwrecks?

What use for the rope if it be not flung,
To our sinning boys, when they are young?

These wicked godless fellows that town magistrates do not know what to do with, that city authorities do not know how to punish? These young offenders of the law that even hardened criminals have been known to beg, "Don't send them young boys out here with us!" What are we going to do for these bad boys? Are we like the proud Pharisee passing by the stripped and wounded? or the hypocritical Levite turning indifferently away, "on the other side?" Should we not think gently of the erring ones?

"Oh let us not forget however darkly stained by sin—

He is our brother yet! Heir of the same inheritance,

Child of the same God,
He hath but stumbled in the path,
We have in weakness trod."

Hasten then to the rescue of our "brothers," for verily the time is ripe, all things are getting ready, for a Reformatory or Training School looms up to our delighted vision, not like the deceiving mirage, but a blessed reality. For fourteen years with the perseverance of the saints, Mr. C. B. Denson, and the Board of Public Charities, labored untiringly to get an appropriation from the Legislature, for this cause. In 1902 our Legislature approved and endorsed the bill for this Training School, yet made no appropriation for it. But as its value as a grand investment to the State, becomes more and more apparent, our law-makers will demand it (if the women of North Carolina have not already secured it!) Behold what the women of Alabama have done. A Judge of Birmingham recently wrote, "The Industrial School for the boys of Alabama is a magnificent monument to the love and devotion of the noble women for the wayward boys."

In order to get a distinct idea of what a Reformatory is, we will consider that the President of the Prison Association of Virginia says of the House of Refuge (Reformatory) he visited in Cincinnati: "The building is large, airy and convenient for the many purposes for which it is used. In one section set apart for large boys from 12 to 16 years of age, there are four tiers of cells, each having a window and an opening that leads into the corridor, along which moves the guard all night. These cells or rooms, are 6x9 feet and contain bed, chair, chest of drawers, together with a few ornaments. Every thing in and around the building is kept scrupulously clean." Mr. Hultzer continues, "but that which won my greatest admiration was the splendidly developed system whereby the boys were made happy, ambitious and hopeful. I refer to the Industrial Department, where handicraft is efficiently taught, and the boy is given a capacity to go forth in the world equipped to meet any reasonable demand in the struggle for existence." For instance the carpenter shop, tailoring, printing department, where beautiful work was done by the boys under the tuition of a competent instructor. The shoe and agricultural departments showed excellent work. He also found the school rooms (for the little criminals and inmates of the place must be taught) models of neatness and comfort, presided over by excellent teachers, and the classes kept in grade, as nearly as possible." The Kindergarden, would do credit to any system in the country. Little tots, 4, 5, and 6 years old are all given an equal chance with the more favored children of the land. Moral ethics are constantly being impressed upon the minds of the inmates of the Reformatory, and every effort is made to develop character, by precept and example." It might be well to mention in this connection that the prison cells, high walls, balls and chains, have been abolished in a great many Reformatories. The strict military discipline being sufficient in most cases for correction. The cottage system has proven a fine success. Forty or fifty boys have their own cottage home, with their special guardians.

Mr. P. Caldwell, of Louisville, Ky., who has spent 35 rich, fruitful years in child saving, says, "The fact is, there is not a single power within the average child, if taken at an early age, that correct and proper training will not penetrate and grasp. Let the boys have good surroundings, moral discipline and practical knowledge, and in a large majority of cases, he may be safely trusted to work out the problem of his own honor, and able maintenance and ultimate salvation. Let the care of children become the watchword of individual and State, and a new heaven and a new earth will dawn upon us." Again, "a delinquent child launched upon life with no other training than vicious and corrupt environments, its first sound an oath, its lullaby an obscene song, is more hopelessly handicapped than would be a rower, who having entered upon a test of speed, should he be required to reach the goal in a craft without oars or rudder." Then is not this Training School for our delinquent children a necessity?

But some "doubting Thomas" may ask: What is the percentage and lasting reformation? The majority quote it as fully seventy-five. In some cases of youthful criminals it is asserted that ninety per cent or more have been reclaimed." In a public address at a celebration in Nashville, Tenn., a distinguished citizen stated in presence of its Reform School, "That of 1,300 inmates of the institution, only eleven had ever been known to return to criminal courses." Now when the statistics recently given before the National Prison Association show "That the cost of criminals in these United States is $600,000,000 per annum, more than the value of the entire wheat or cotton crops in all the States of the Union," what sane or humane man or woman would not then help on this Reform movement? If they would read the records of the courts, visit the jails, examine the workhouses, look upon the chain gang as it clankingly goes by, see the small boys working on the public roads, on the oftentimes handsome, innocent looking faces of these youthful criminals, read the crying need of a Reform School for such, surely they could not withhold their hand from this duty. Ah sad indeed the refrain, "Sick and in prison, and ye visited me not."

No, nor lent a helping hand to keep me out of prison. Last June a boy was sentenced for larceny in _____ county; he had a relative who asked for him the aid of the State authorities to place him in some Reform school without the State (there was none in it). The culprit was given admission into such an Home, where he will be trained to be useful and helped to get back his lost honor. The charges for this boy in the Home amounted to $100 per annum. His ordinary jail fees would have been 30 cents a day or $109.50. The first sum to secure intelligence, an honest trade a re-entering into a happy respectable life, a good home-maker and tax payer to help bear the burdens of society. The second and larger sum, $109.50, would have been only part of the price of ruin to soul and body, a necessary initiation into the life, habits, desires of robbers, murderers and such like.

Oh give the boys a chance! Listen, listen, let the sad wail of a poor lad who was on his way to 'the scaffold for capital felony, enter our very heart of hearts. He turned to the minister present and in piteous tones exclaimed, "Mister, oh mister, tell them I ain't had no chance no how!"

King's Daughters of North Carolina, we must have this Training School for our boys. This monument to our sisterhood, more lasting than all costly structures of earth, and through a glorious eternity, those whom we have been instrumental in plucking as "brands from the burning" will call us blessed and join with us, the anthems of praise to Him who hath loved us, and washed us in His blood.

Mrs. Jno. H. Reid,
Mt. Mourne, N. C.

"Three years ago the Alabama Reformatory floated around in a tent with five little boys. Since then 125 boys have been cared for—as many as 68 in the institution at one time. The first appropriation from the Legislature was $3,000. The second, $15,000. The last Legislature voted $10,000 for an additional building and $8,000 per annum for four years. This vote was almost unanimous, only one against the appropriation in the Senate and one in the lower house; $8,000 has been raised in addition to the amount given by the State and the work is just in its infancy.

In The Soul Winner for October is the story of a mountain child arraigned for the murder of his little sister. He grew tired of nursing her and killed her. It was brought out in the trial that he knew nothing of God or the Bible; had never been to school or Church; had lived on bread and water. The jury sent him to prison for life. And this is the Twentieth century.)

Presbyterianism in Cheraw, S. C.

In the fall of 1820 Rev. N. R. Morgan, a Presbyterian Minister, visited Cheraw and found it, as he afterward described it, "one vast spiritual destitution." There was not a church member in the place, nor any one who was attached to any particular denomination. The people of the town seemed to appreciate the fact that such a condition of things was intolerable and invited Mr. Morgan to remain with them and preach for a year. On a hill overlooking the Pee Dee river stood an old church building which had been used by the British as barracks during the Revolutionary war. This they repaired at the expense of $1,000 and here Mr. Morgan preached till the fall of 1825 without an organization of any kind. During that period the town people and the country people became involved in a controversy in regard to the occupancy of the building. A Baptist minister by the name of Lewis had preached in the building some years previous to Mr. Morgan's visit and the country people, who were chiefly Baptists, claimed the right to occupy the church at least half the time. This the town people denied and a bitter controversy resulted. Early one Sabbath morning the Baptists took possession of the building and proceeded to hold their service. The town people, though organized into no church proved that they were at least a Church militant by placing a cannon on a hill near the church and firing it off as the preacher announced his text. The church was shaken to the foundations and the congregation precipitately left the church and made no further effort to occupy it. In the meantime the Episcopal Bishop in Charleston claimed the building as belonging to St. David's parish. He made good his claim and took possession of the building. It is now the church in which the Episcopalians worship and is known as St. David's church.

These controversies injured the cause of religion and Mr. Morgan, bitterly disappointed, removed to another field. In the spring of 1827 Rev. Urias Powers was sent as a missionary by the Domestic Missionary Society of the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia. After preaching about a year he organized a Presbyterian church consisting of 12 members on March 11, 1828. Mr. Powers was never installed pastor, but continued to supply the church until 1834. In the summer of 1832 the famous evangelist, Rev. Daniel Baker, visited the town on the invitation of the session and preached several weeks. As a result of his visit 35 members were added to the Presbyterian church and many to other churches and a Baptist church was organized.

The congregation continued to worship in the Academy building, near the Matheson residence, until 1832 when the present church building was erected. The church had several supplies until 1838 when Rev. J. C. Coit became the first pastor of the church. Mr. Coit had been one of the leading lawyers of Cheraw, but feeling it his duty to preach gave up a lucrative practice to become pastor of the church of which he was a member. He continued in that relation until 1857 when failing health led to his resignation. An inscription on his monument in the Cheraw cemetery informs the reader that "he went from among the sheaves to meet the Lord of the harvest in 1862." After his resignation the pulpit was supplied by Rev. Thomas English and afterwards by Rev. N. W. Edmunds. Rev. W. B. Corbett became pastor in 1859 and remained 10 years, when he removed to another field. Cheraw was right in the line of Sherman's march and the people were reduced to absolute poverty and could not give him anything like a competent support. But though urged by his friends to accept a call to a more remunerative field, he replied, "I have been with these people in their prosperity, I will not leave them in their adversity." Rev. E. H. Buist was installed pastor in 1870 and continued pastor until his death in 1882. He was much beloved by his flock and his congregation erected a monument to his memory at his grave in the Cheraw cemetery.

In 1883 Rev. Thornton Whaling who had just completed his studies in Columbia seminary was ordained and installed pastor of the church. He continued to discharge the duties of his office with remarkable efficiency and success until he accepted a call to Birmingham, Ala., in 1891. Dr. Whaling's friends in Cheraw still watch his career with great interest and pride. The present pastoral relation was established in 1893.

During Dr. Whaling's pastorate a church was organized at Orange Hill, a mission of Cheraw church, six miles north of Cheraw, where Rev. S. H. Spencer of Morven, N. C., now preaches twice a month. The Cheraw church has given many sons to the ministry.

Rev. Donald McQueen, D. D., Rev. John C. Coit, the first pastor, Rev. Aungs Johnson of Texas, Rev. S. E. Bishop of Cheraw, Rev. A. B. Coit of Miss., Rev. R. P. Pell, President of Converse College; Rev. W. B. Jennings, D. D., of Detroit, and Rev. John F. Matheson of Pocomoke City, Md., were all members of this church. Rev. J. H. Thornwell, D. D. LL. D., was for many years a member of the congregation.

The present membership of the church is 182. The Cheraw church has always been blessed with an able and consecrated bench of elders and an efficient board of deacons. The present bench of elders consists of Major A. McQueen, Major M. McR. McLauchlin, Dr. J. A. James, Hon. W. F. Stevenson, clerk; Col. T. Stobo Farrow, Mr. D. S. Matheson and Mr. R. M. McKay. The board of deacons consists of Major A. B. Horton, H. M. Tomlinson, H. D. Malloy, J. A. McCreight, W. P. Stubbs, J. T. Ladd, T. G. Matheson and E. Malloy.

He hath riches sufficient who hath enough to be charitable.—Sir Thomas Browne.

A perverse temper and a discontented, fretful disposition, wherever they prevail, render any state of life unhappy.—Cicero.

I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done, than be one of the twenty to follow mine own teachings.—Shakespeare.

Find your niche, and fill it. If it be ever so little, if it is only to be a hewer of wood and drawer of water, do something in this great battle for God and truth.—Spurgeon.

Do not take the ground that the Christian Church has nothing to do with the social problems of the day. Let not the followers of the carpenter's son of Nazareth be unmindful of the carpenters of Chicago.—Henry L. Bollwood in the Advance.

Where the Bible goes, there higher standards of living follow. The introduction of Christian literature among our foreign-speaking population would mean the introduction of a cleaner, happier and more wholesome manner of life.—Exchange.

It is astonishing how large a part of Christ's receipts is devoted solely to the inculcation of happiness. How much of his life, too, was spent simply in making people happy! There is no word more often on his lips than "blessed," and it is recognized by Him as a distinct end in life, and the end for this life, to secure the happiness of others.—Henry Drummond.

John Stuart Mill makes the following notable confession, as true as it is striking: "Who among the disciples of Jesus, or among their proselytes, was capable of inventing these sayings ascribed to Jesus, or of imaginig the life and character revealed in the Gospels? Certainly not the fishermen of Galilee; as certainly not St. Paul." "It is the God incarnate, more than the God of the Jews or of nature, who being idealized, has taken so great and salutary a hold on the modern mind."

October Days.

O rare October days! Ye leave your strange
Foreshades of things ideal everywhere:
Autumnal glory crowns the mountain range;
Autumnal rapture floods the tranced air:
Steeped in a golden languor sleeps the sky,
As sinks the drowsy sun into his rest,
Where burning clouds in crimson masses lie
Athwart the glowing portal of the West.

The waning sunshine softens over all;
Unto the music of sweet-voiced rills.
Enchanted lights and shadows rise and fall
Within the charmed circle of the hills:
The hazy world a magic vision seems;
The far-off heights a fairy glamour take;
And distant headlands, dim as Summer dreams,
Immerge their purple shadows in the lake.

From the brown stubble-fields on either side
Is heard the mellow piping of the quail;
And, from an opal sky faint-flushed and wide,
The Hunter's moon looks down, serene and pale:
On the steeps remote the parting sunbeams rest;
Illusive shapes the bosky hollows fill;
Then twilight shades the quiet glens invest,
And all is dim, and mystical, and still.
Alfred Abernethy Cowles, in Christian Work and Evangelist.

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

The Interior of last week names the Presbyterian Standard as "friendly" to Organic Union. The Standard does favor it under the right conditions and is really grieved that the flirtation with the Cumberland Assembly, even if it does not come to the marrying point, has, as we think, and try to say this week, postponed the other union indefinitely. We down this way still have some idea that Presbyterianism has a right to maintain itself unweakened by prefix and undiluted with Arminianism.

The Committee on the Proof-Texts seems to be a subject of more interest than we had thought. We hope no one will lose sight of the work while talking about the committee. Mrs. Margaret McBryde Baxtre's letters from Boston are always delightful and this one is especially interesting and suggestive. The need of a Reformatory in North Carolina is well stated by Mrs. J. H. Reid and we heartily endorse this movement that our good women are now making along this line. Presbyterianism in Cheraw will be read with much pleasure in view of the meeting of the South Carolina Synod in that town this week.

Wasted Years and October Days are two poems that add the artistic setting to this issue of The Standard.

PERSONALS.

Rev. and Mrs. J. Fairman Prestou sailed on the 6th inst. on S. S. Doric, and they hope to be at work in Korea early in November.

Tenth Avenue Presbyterian Church, Charlotte, has recently added seven, by examination, to its roll. Five of these were from the Sunday school.

To Rev. L. L. McCue is due praise for the prompt appearance of the Minutes of the Presbytery of Central Mississippi. The meeting was held October 6-8. The pamphlet was on our desk Oct. 19th.

Changed addresses:

Rev. R. L. Bell from McDonough, Ga., to Dothan, Ala.

Rev. D. M. Clagett, from Longwood, Mo., to Sedalia, Mo.

Rev. W. H. Rhoads from Couway, Mo., to Alexandria, Thayer county, Neb.

Rev. D. N. McLaughlin, from Chester, S. C., to Anniston, Ala.

Rev. R. L. Nicholson from Ackerman, Miss., to Pontotoc, Miss.

Rev. E. L. Siler, from Baton Rouge, La., to High Point, N. C.

Rev. T. M. McPhail, from Montevallo, Ala., to Birmingham, Ala. (West End.)

Rev. Herve McDowell from Irvine, Ky., to Biloxi, Miss.

Church News.

NORTH CAROLINA.

HAMLET.—Rev. E. E. Gillespie closed an interesting series of meetings at Hamlet, Oct. 7th. The services were well attended, and the sermons made a fine impression, deepening the spiritual life of God's people and awakening the impenitent. There were seven added to the Presbyterian church on profession, and several united with other churches. A cash collection of thirty dollars was taken for Synodical Home Missions.

GOLDSBORO.—After the meeting of Albemarle Presbytery Dr. Morton remained until Sunday, the 11th, and after preaching to the Goldsboro congregation presented the cause of the Forward Home Mission movement of Albemarle Presbytery. All were gratified at the result.

The sum of $124 was quickly proffered.

BETHEL.—As some visible fruit of the good meeting held in this church in August eight persons have been received on profession of their faith in Christ, five of whom were baptized. Some others are expected to join yet.

MIDWAY.—Protracted services were held in this church Sept. 12-16. As the pastor failed to secure ministerial help he did all the preaching himself. The meeting unfortunately, was held at a very busy time with the farmers which made the congregations small. Besides the refreshing of the membership, one accession was made, on profession of faith.

DAVIDSON.—The executive committee held its fall meeting this week at the College. The reports presented showed the finances of the College in a healthful condition. The income from all sources for the current year will be little short of $2,000. The present endowment is about $100,000 a figure smaller than the amount in money a few years ago but the reduction finds a partial explanation in the purchase of certain school properties and the erection of new buildings on the campus. The enrollment of students to date is 237.

The committee ordered necessary repairs for Dr. Grey's residence and also additions in the way of new rooms and conveniences. Dr. Shearer, by whose liberality the Southwestern Presbyterian University and Davidson have both profited, not to mention other schools where his generosity has been felt, has lately made a gift of $2,500 to Statesville Female College. For some years he has been sole trustee of the institution, having advanced this sum to cover an indebtedness in order thus to save the college to the Presbyterian church.

Dr. Smith as President of Davidson attended the Greensboro gathering of former North Carolinians now scattered throughout the different states of the Union, and assisted by the local association of Davidson Alumni, opened headquarters where all friends of the college had a cordial welcome and could find for examination copies of the several publications that have been issued from Davidson in recent years. Dr. W. W. Moore was one of Davidson's sons, taking a prominent part in the exercises of the week.

Dr. Smith after a visit to the South Carolina Synod goes to Macon, Ga., where he is one of the speakers in a banquet given by the North Carolina association in that state. Rev. William Black has been in a meeting at Oxford for the past week. The first match game of football on the campus for this season was played against Oak Ridge last week resulting in a score of 54 to 0 in favor of Davidson. Guilford were expected to line up against us today but missed their connection at Greensboro. Next week the Davidson team leave for Lexington, Va., where the fellows are to play both Washington and Lee and V. M. I.

A called meeting of Presbytery was held here this week and three young men were taken under its care as candidates for the ministry.

Davidson, N. C., Oct 17, 1903.

BURGAU.—Last Saturday the Woman's Missionary Union of Wilmington Presbytery, held in the Presbyterian church at Burgaw a day of prayer and a farewell meeting in view of the return of Dr. and Mrs. George C. Worth to China. There were delegates from the Presbyterian churches in New Hanover, Brunswick, Bladen, Pender, Duplin and Sampson counties. At 10:30 a. m. devotional exercises were conducted.

Rev. T. D. Johnson, pastor of the church. Several prayers were offered, and Dr. Worth delivered an address of rare excellence, clearness and helpfulness. He also conducted a question box on missions. In the afternoon at 2 o'clock the women as delegates from societies and friends of the work, held a meeting full of interest and enthusiasm.

Mrs. Jackson Johnson president of the union led the meeting.

Addresses and remarks were made by Mrs. J. C. Stewart, agent for the "Young Peoples' Societies," and others. The needs of the world were thoroughly discussed and committees were appointed to visit five or more churches at an early date and organize societies of women and young people.

At 4 o'clock the special farewell service was conducted by Rev. A. D. McClure, D. D. The emphasis was laid on the fact that Dr. and Mrs. Worth are peculiarly our missionaries, going out from our Presbytery. The desire they have for others to go from this Presbytery was taken up and prayer was made especially for more laborers.

The parting was tender and tearful and all went away resolved to do more for missions.

The singing throughout was excellent, led by the choir of the church.

The good women and friends of the Burgaw church received an abundant and elegant lunch at the noon hour and reluctantly saw the visitors off on the train. All felt a desire for more of such meetings.—Wilmington Messenger.

Davidson College and Our Southern Ministry.

Davidson College has made such a remarkable contribution to the trained ministry of the Southern Presbyterian Church that many outsiders, ignorant of its work and history, can hardly be made to believe that it has no theological department, and gives no course in theology.

During the past twelve years the average number of young men at Davidson looking forward to the Gospel ministry has been a little over 38. Of the students already enrolled this fall 44 are preparing themselves for this calling, and there are seven or eight more who have definitely decided to preach the Gospel, but who prefer not to put themselves under care of Presbytery or make open announcement of their purpose. Of this number 35 have been formally received under care of their respective Presbyteries.

Still more remarkable is the spiritual influence of the Campus atmosphere at Davidson in leading young men to devote their lives to this noblest form of Christian work. It seems, to those who know the tendencies of modern college and university life, almost incredible that within the past two years ten of the students at Davidson, not one of whom had such an intention at his matriculation, have definitely decided to study for the ministry. Yet such is the fact. The number of candidates in the whole Southern Church was 291 last year against its low-water mark of 286 the year preceding. This entire gain was made on the Davidson Campus, and was due to the spiritual effect of College life there.

This constant stream of influence which the College is exerting through the pulpits of our land can hardly be estimated. Without it the history of our Southern Presbyterian Church would have to be rewritten. Since its foundation Davidson has trained and sent out more than three hundred and seventy-five ministers of the Gospel, and nearly two hundred of our Southern pulpits are filled by her Alumni. Nor is this influence confined to her own locality. Of the fourteen ministers constituting Savannah Presbytery a year ago, eight were trained at Davidson, and last fall each Synod from Virginia to Georgia elected a Davidson Alumnus as moderator.

These are the "teaching elders" which Davidson has trained for the church. Were it possible to enumerate the influential ruling elders and the efficient deacons who were there trained and inspired for the work of the church, the number would probably be trebled.

Of late years the membership and wealth of our church has been rapidly increasing while the number of young men preparing for this blessed work has diminished from 447 in 1894 to 291 in 1903, and now our vacant pulpits call in vain for laborers.

In the light of the marvelous figures given above let every Christian recognize the remedy for this decline in our ministry, this creeping paralysis which has been affecting our church and its work. Let us rally to the support of our Christian Schools, which are struggling against great odds and sorely handicapped by poverty. Let our influence be actively exerted in their behalf; let our prayers rise for them night and day; and let our consecrated wealth double their power and efficiency.

Henry Louis Smith.

Concord Presbytery.

Concord Presbytery met at Siloam church, McDowell county, Friday, Oct. 2nd, 1903, and was opened with a sermon by Rev. J. A. Gilmer, the moderator, from Eph. 5:2.

There were enrolled 27 ministers and 25 elders. Rev. G. H. Cornelison was elected moderator, and Rev. W. C. Brown and Rev. R. J. Hunter were elected temporary clerks. Rev. R. W. Boyd addressed Presbytery in regard to the Orphans' Home. Addresses were made on the same subject by Rev. C. A. Munroe, Rev. J. Rumble, D. D., and Rev. W. W. Pharr, D. D. The recommendation of the joint Board for Female Education of Mecklenburg and Concord Presbyteries was concurred in, and the necessary action looking to the dissolution of this board was taken.

Rev. J. B. Shearer, D. D., Trustee of the Statesville Female College, tendered this institution to the Presbytery, and it was accepted with the expression of the great appreciation of the Presbytery of Dr. Shearer's work, and services. Trustees were appointed to take charge of the management of this institution.

Rev. J. A. Scott preached the Presbyterian sermon on "Woman's Position in the Church," from Matt. 26:13.

The order for the consideration of Sabbath Schools and Young People's Societies was taken up, Rev. John Wakefield presiding, and addresses were made by Rev. J. Rumble, D. D., Rev. A. T. Graham, D. D., and Rev. J. A. Gilmer and Rev. C. A. Munroe. Dr. J. B. Shearer, Rev. A. S. Caldwell and Rev. Edgar Tufts were appointed to draft a constitution for the Lees McRae Institute, and report at the stated Spring meeting. The pastoral relation of Rev. J. E. Summers and Elmwood church was dissolved, and he was dismissed to Mecklenburg Presbytery.

Mr. J. M. Gibbs, a member of the Statesville church, was taken under the care of Presbytery as a candidate for the ministry.

A call from the Marion church for all of the time of Rev. W. S. Wilson was presented to Presbytery and the church was given permission to make the change in their call as soon as arrangements can be made to supply the remainder of Mr. Wilson's field.

The organization of a church at Harrisburg was reported to Presbytery, and the church was received and enrolled.

Rev. C. A. Munroe tendered his resignation as pastor of the Lenoir church, and that church was cited to appear at an adjourned meeting in Statesville, October 21, at 2 o'clock, to show reason, if any, why the said relation should not be dissolved.

Statesville church, and Thursday before the 2nd Sabbath of April, were chosen as the place and time for the next stated Spring meeting.

Presbytery adjourned to meet at Davidson College on Oct. 13th.

W. R. McLelland, Stated Clerk.

Sabbath Conference.

The Synod at its last session appointed this conference to be held on the afternoon of the 3d day of its approaching session at Wilmington, N. C., Nov. 5, 1903. The following arrangement has been made by the Sabbath Committee:

I. The origin and necessity of the Sabbath law. Speaker, Rev. J. M. Rose, D. D., Lauriuburg, N. C.

II. Are the works of necessity and of mercy indicated in answer to our Shorter Catechism, question No. 60. (How is the Sabbath to be Sanctified?) largely modified by our present civilization? Rev. G. B. Strickler, D. D., U. T. Seminary, Richmond, Va.

III. The best means of arresting the patronage by Christians of Sabbath travel and Sabbath mails. Rev. J. R. Howerton, D. D., Charlotte, N. C.

IV. How to observe the Sabbath properly in a Christian family. Rev. J. M. Wharey, D. D., Mooresville, N. C.

W. D. Morton,

Chm'n. Com. on Sabbath, Synod of N. C.

Rocky Mt. N. C., Oct. 1903.

KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE.—The Presbyterian Theological Seminary of Kentucky had a very auspicious opening on Wednesday, Oct. 7 at 10 a. m.

Rev. Francis R. Beattie, D. D., presided and Rev. J. McClusky Blayney, D. D., of Frankfort, Ky., President of the Board, was present and made a few remarks.

As previously announced the Rev. Clarence K. Crawford, D. D. professor in the School of Old Testament Exegesis delivered the opening address on "The Nature and Extent of Old Testament Inspiration." In his preface Dr. Crawford briefly considered the question: "Is the Bible the Infallible Word of God?"

If it is, then man is a sinner and as such is under the wrath of God; if it is, then there is such a being as a personal Devil and there is such a place as hell; if it is, then Christ died as a sacrifice to satisfy divine justice; if it is, then there is no other way of salvation except through the atoning sacrifice of Christ."

It is needless to say that Dr. Crawford in this connection expressed his belief in the infallibility of the Bible.

The analysis of his address proper is as follows:

I. The Nature of Inspiration.—Before giving a definition of inspiration he pointed out the following distinction: 1. Between Inspiration and spiritual illumination.

2. Between inspiration and revelation.

Then he gave the following as his own definition of inspiration:

"Inspiration, as I understand it, was the supernatural cooperation of the Spirit of God with the Biblical writers, producing in them such subjective states of mind as to enable them infallibly to apprehend divine truth, whether presented to them through the medium of revelation or otherwise, and infallibly to communicate it to others."

II. The Extent of Inspiration.—As to the writers themselves as individuals.

Three thoughts were emphasized here:

(1). This inspiration was partial.

(2). It was limited by the personal capacities of its recipients.

(3). It was limited by their Historic Environment.

2. The extent of inspiration in the Biblical writings as finished productions.

Here the Doctor spoke of the different kinds of composition making up the Bible.

(1). The very words of God.

(2). The thoughts of the writer.

(3). The sayings of uninspired men and Satan.

Here the Doctor used this language:

"As a result of this analysis I come to the conclusion that there is no portion of the Old Testament that is not due to the influence of inspiration. I most unhesitatingly accept the theory of plenary inspiration, as there explained."

Then in conclusion the two principal questions of Verbal Inspiration and Inerrancy were touched upon.

The address was a masterpiece and was well received by faculty, students and visitors.

About forty students are on the ground, nearly half of whom are new men. The schedule of recitations has been arranged and on Thursday regular classroom work commenced. The opening is perhaps the best in the history of the institution.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Union Seminary.

The Seminary and its Richmond friends had a rare privilege on last Thursday evening—that of hearing two of the most scholarly women in the world, Mrs. Agnes Smith Lewis and Mrs. Martha Dunlop Gibson, both of Cambridge. These two ladies hold a foremost place in the world of scholarship because of their unique and untiring work as textual critics, but as many of your readers know, their fame is secured in the finding and the deciphering of "The New Syriac Gospels." In his recent travels in Europe Dr. W. W. Moore formed the acquaintance of the two sisters and it was through his efforts that they came, while guests in the city, to address the student body. It added something to the interest to know that several of the leading universities in Europe had conferred the honorary degree of LL. D. on the speakers of the evening.

Mrs. Lewis spoke first, showing in a very entertaining way how that these Syriac Gospels, by comparison with other versions, may be placed as far back as the second century and in this way are a striking witness to the early authorship of the four Gospels as we have them. One of the most striking resemblances to the best approved Greek texts, i. e., Wescott and Hart, is found in the omissions, many of which throw a flood of light on the English versions. She also gave numerous examples of readings in the Syriac version which are a manifest improvement on the Greek texts now in existence. In closing her address, Mrs. Lewis gave a thrilling account of the discovery of the valuable manuscript. In the fall of 1891 her interest was greatly aroused by an examination of Professor J. Rendel Harris' then recent discovery of the 'apology' of Aristides in the library of the convent of St. Catherine at Mt. Sinai. Mrs. Lewis reasoned that the same library might contain other valuable manuscript and possibly very ancient copies of the Gospels. But while she had mastered the Greek, Hebrew and Arabic tongue, she knew not a word of Syriac. The ambitious little woman began at once the study of this ancient language, and was soon busy securing notes of instruction to the monks of St. Catherine and others in authority. The expedition started in the spring of 1892, Mrs. Gibson accompanying her, and after many privations and hardships resulted in the finding of an old volume nearly all glued together, which proved to be palimpsest, the upper writing containing the stories of women, the under one the four Gospels. On this trip the friendship of the monks was genial and other expeditions followed with fruitful results. After Mrs. Lewis had closed her address, Mrs. Gibson with the aid of stereopticon views, described in detail the route pursued in these hazardous and painstaking expeditions.

The world of scholarship is not slow to pay homage to those who for the sake of knowledge and with the distinct purpose of doing their part in establishing the authority of the Scriptures have undergone so much.

Presbytery of Asheville.

The Presbytery of Asheville met in the Davidson River Church Tuesday, Oct. 6th, 1903, at 7:30 p. m., and was opened with a sermon by Rev. E. Mac Davis, after which it was called to order by Elder D. M. Killian and instituted with prayer by Rev. R. F. Campbell, D. D. Nine ministers and nine ruling elders were in attendance.

Organization.—Rev. T. W. DeVane, moderator and Rev. Frank D. Hunt, clerk. A letter was received from Rev. R. B. Grinnan who has been sick with Typhoid fever, giving the gratifying information of his convalescence.

Bible Cause.—Rev. T. W. DeVane Agent for this cause in his report showed that as a Presbytery we have not supported it as we should and urged that we give to it, 1st, because it is our work and therefore our duty to keep it up. 2nd, because of the needed work it does.

Doctrinal Sermon—Was preached by Rev. C. C. Brown, subject, Sanctification.

Home Missions.—The popular meeting for this cause was encouraging and helpful, addresses being made by Dr. Campbell and Revs. R. S. Eskridge, E. Mac Davis and our Presbyterian Evangelist R. P. Smith. One of the most encouraging features in the report was the growing tendency of our churches towards self-support. Waynesville church has become entirely so, Swannanoa is making rapid strides and we hope will soon reach the goal, while others are going forward each year. Rev. R. B. Grinnan, G. W. Maslin of Waynesville and Claybrook James of Asheville were added to the Home Missions Committee.

Assembly's Home Missions.—The Agent for this cause Rev. F. D. Hunt in his report made an earnest appeal in its behalf setting forth reasons why this Presbytery ought specially to be loyal in its sympathy and support of this cause. This appeal was heartily seconded by Dr. Campbell and the report was unanimously adopted.

Colored Evangelization.—Rev. E. A. Sample agent for this cause in his report called attention to the small contributions and urged a more hearty support of this important work, calling upon pastors and sessions to give more information to the people as to its needs and full opportunity to contribute to it.

The Committees on Publication and Sabbath Schools were consolidated and Rev. R. P. Smith elected chairman with authority to name the other members.

J. D. Murphy, T. S. Morrison and Claybrook James were elected trustees of Presbytery. Rev. R. P. Smith was elected trustee of Davidson College for a term of two years. Rev. E. Mac. Davis resigned and Rev. R. B. Grinnan elected as chairman of education. Rev. R. B. Grinnan, principal and Rev. R. F. Campbell alternate to preach doctrinal sermon at next Presbytery, subject, "The Lord's Supper, its Spiritual Significance and the Elements to be Used."

Foreign Missions.—The popular meeting was presided over by Rev. D. M. Douglas, agent, and interesting and inspiring addresses were made by Revs. E. Mac. Davis, E. A. Sample, R. F. Campbell and D. M. Douglas. The Stated Clerk read a letter just received from Miss E. V. Lee, our Missionary to Mexico telling of the sad conditions at Linares and Victoria on account of the prevalence of Yellow fever. Presbytery then joined in prayer led by Dr. Campbell in behalf of Miss Lee and other missionaries in Mexico.

Time and Place of Next Meeting.—Brevard, Tuesday before fourth Sabbath in April, 1904, at 8 p. m.

Frank D. Hunt,
Stated Clerk.

A Changed Name.

For some years those who have carefully observed the fine work and widely extended patronage of Red Springs Seminary have thought that its name failed to give a true idea of the broad scope of work. The brilliant opening of the school this fall has accentuated this opinion.

The Board of Trustees of the Seminary at their regular meeting, October 5th, sent by the President of the Seminary, the following overture to Fayetteville Presbytery.

To the Presbytery of Fayetteville,

Brethren: The Board of Trustees of Red Springs Seminary has directed me to lay before you the following communication: When the Presbytery of Fayetteville purposed the erection of a school for girls the plan was to make it simply a high school. As the matter took shape it became evident that the school needed was not a high school but one of more advanced grade. The plan of the school was therefore changed from a high school to a Seminary that should approximate college work.

When [the school work actually commenced, it became perfectly clear that nothing short of a college curriculum, equal in its requirements to any college for women in the South, and a faculty abundantly able to handle such a course, would satisfy our constituency. This policy was immediately adopted by the Board of Trustees and for some years Red Springs Seminary has been doing work equal to such colleges.

The above being true, it has become increasingly evident that the name "Seminary" is misleading. Again there is no recognition of any Church connection in the present name, therefore, the Board of Trustees with the concurrence of Presbytery desire that the name of the institution be changed to one more nearly approximating the scope and character of the work.

Again, the school of music has become one of the largest and best established in the South and on changing the name of the institution some note of the character of this work should be taken.

The Board of Trustees would therefore recommend and ask that Presbytery concur in changing the name of the institution from Red Springs Seminary to The Southern Presbyterian College and Conservatory of Music, all of which is respectfully submitted.

J. W. McLaughlin,
Secretary of Board.

The Presbytery concurred in this action of the Board and a petition to the Secretary of State for the necessary change in the charter was made out and forwarded to Raleigh.

We believe that the above is a deserved honor and trust that the school shall have, if such be possible, additional prosperity under its new name.

Barium Springs Industrial Building.

In response to the appeal for ten churches to raise one hundred dollars each for completing and furnishing the Industrial Building, which will contain the laundry &c., four churches have made contributions. Winston came first with a collection by Mrs. J. M. Rogers, exceeding one hundred by some thirty dollars. Salisbury was visited by the Superintendent of the Orphan's Home at the invitation of the pastor and session, and after the presentation of the cause at the morning service a collection was taken and one hundred and fifty dollars raised before the congregation left the church. In Wilmington First Church, the collection was made by Mrs. E. A. McRae, although unable to leave her couch. One hundred dollars were received last night from her with the remark that more will follow, as the work is not yet completed. So wherever the matter has been taken up, so far as known, the response has not only been prompt but the amount raised has in every case exceeded that asked. We wish to thank all these churches and the kind ladies who have taken this labor of love upon themselves and accomplished it so successfully. We owe double thanks to Mrs. McRae lying on her couch and by her pen doing this work for the Master. May the Lord make soft her bed in her sickness and comfort her richly with the consolations of His word. Raleigh Church is the fourth in this noble succession.

Are there not six other churches able and ready to give one hundred dollars to this urgent cause? Are there not seven influential ladies ready to follow the example already set? Are there not twenty churches able and willing to give fifty dollars each awaiting a judicious canvasser? Can we not have a canvasser in every church to solicit a contribution according to the ability of the congregations? A ready canvasser, a liberal church, a quick response!

R. W. Boyd,
Supt. Orphan's Home.

FOREIGN MISSION RECEIPTS FOR SEPTEMBER.

Our receipts for September were $10,016.71, a gain of $3,818.87 on those of last September. Legacies amounted to $2,261.67 this month; there were no legacies in September, 1902. We request all our church treasurers to forward the October collections at the earliest possible date, as we are much in need of funds to forward to the missions.

S. H. Chester, Sec.-Treas.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

SLABTOWN.—Our little church at Slabtown has had a most refreshing season. Dr. J. Lowrie Wilson, of Abbeville, came to our assistance and preached with his old time power—the power of a consecrated life—twice a day for one week. As a result ten united with the church. The closing scene was an inspiring one. Upon the invitation of the pastor, nearly the entire membership came forward, signifying their intention of re-consecrating themselves to the Lord, and of going forward with fresh courage in His work. To Him be all the praise.

GEORGIA

COLUMBUS.—Licentiate W. E. Phifer, a recent graduate of Union Seminary at Richmond, was ordained to the free work of the gospel ministry and installed pastor of the Rose Hill church at an adjourned meeting of Macon Presbytery held in the church on Wednesday night, Oct. 1.

CLIMAX GROUP.—We have recently held very interesting meetings in two churches of this group, first in Pleasant Grove church, where we had the assistance of Rev. Frederick Perkins of Bainbridge, Ga. The word was earnestly and faithfully presented and illustrated. The Holy Spirit was present and blessed the truth, Christians were greatly encouraged and revived and sinners were awakened. Six persons were added to the church on profession of their faith in Jesus. At Climax, Rev. C. H. Hyde the evangelist of Macon Presbytery, was with us for seven days, holding two services daily. His preaching was first to the members of the church and then to the unconverted. We had an excellent meeting; the attendance was good, Christians were very much interested and revived. The Holy Spirit blessed the work and we had the pleasure of receiving six persons into the communion of the church on profession of their faith in Christ.

Bro. Hyde left a fine impression upon our community by reason of his faithful presentation of the truth, and we trust that these churches will go forward and do greater things for the Master than ever before. We are now living in our new manse and find it so very convenient and comfortable. It is located at Climax, in easy reach of the other churches of the group. Our people have done nobly in erecting such a minister's home and adding so much to the efficiency of the work in this field.

R. D. Stimson.

PRESBYTERY OF SAVANNAH.—At a call meeting of the Presbytery of Savannah Oct. 12th, the time for the regular meeting was changed from 27th Oct. to Nov. 3rd, Tuesday.

D. F. Sheppard, Stated Clerk.

WAYCROSS.—The quarterly communion was celebrated Sunday, 4th of July by a large congregation. Seven new members, five by letter and two on profession, have been received into full communion during the quarter. A congregational meeting was held before the regular service of which Mr. James Watt and Mr. H. A. Harris were elected deacons. The pastor has been greeted with unusual kindness and love upon his return from a vacation, and the work has begun with life and vigor.

R. A. Brown.

MACON PRESBYTERY.—Macon Presbytery met at Albany, Ga., September 30, at 8:00 p. m. The opening sermon was preached by the Rev. Wm. McKay, in the church where more than fifty years ago he was ordained to the ministry.

Attendance.—Twenty ministers and sixteen ruling elders.

Officers.—Rev. H. G. Griswald was elected Moderator, and Ruling Elder J. C. Turner, Clerk.

Narratives.—The narratives from the churches revealed the fact that the churches as a whole were in a flourishing condition. The contributions to local home missions were greater than at any former time.

Consolidation of Committees.—The committees on Publication and Sunday School and Young People's Societies were consolidated.

Presbyterial Schools.—The Presbyterial High School at Rochelle was reported to be in a flourishing condition, and the Young's Female College, at Thomasville, to be opening its first session under the presidency of Rev. W. R. Owings.

Evangelistic Powers Conferred.—The Presbytery passed a resolution conferring evangelistic powers on all ministers of the Presbytery in churches where there are no sessions.

Sabbath School Institute.—A resolution was adopted endorsing the institute held in connection with this meeting of Presbytery and providing for another.

Time and place of next meeting, Bainbridge, April 14, at 8 p. m.

W. H. Frazer, Stated Clerk.

BLACKSHEAR.—The Presbyterial Institute at Blackshear, Ga., opened September 15th with a good attendance.

The number of boarding pupils is larger than at any time, and others are expected. The main dining hall is crowded and the contract let for its enlargement at once. Other necessary improvements are to be made at some time. Some students are boarding with relatives in town, and several families have moved to town in order to send their sons and daughters to school. Inquiries are still coming in. The military department will soon be in full sway under a thoroughly trained graduate of the Citadel Academy. The work in all the departments is moving along beautifully.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

DURANT PRESBYTERY.—The Presbytery of Durant convened at Ada, I. T., Friday, September 25th at 8 p. m., and in the absence of the retiring moderator was opened with a sermon by Rev. H. S. Davidson from the text, Isaiah 51:5.

Four ministers and three ruling elders were present. Rev. H. S. Davidson, was elected moderator and Rev. R. E. Telford, assistant clerk. Rev. W. T. Matthews was received from the Concord Presbytery, N. C. Presbyterial sermon, by R. E. Telford; subject, "Religion in the Family."

The report of the Home Mission committee revealed the fact that there were two fields in the Presbytery unsupplied, viz: the church at Durant, and the Cameron group of churches consisting of Cameron, Poteau, Shady Point and Spiro, for both of which pastors are earnestly desired.

On Sunday night Rev. R. F. Kirkpatrick, chairman of the Foreign Mission committee, preached a sermon on that subject.

On Saturday afternoon Presbytery had a free conversation on the State of Religion within our bounds, that revealed on the whole a hopeful condition of affairs among our churches.

Coddo was chosen as the next place of meeting and the time April 17, at 8 p. m.

Each session of Presbytery was opened with devotional exercises, and two sermons were preached each day by various members of Presbytery.

The Presbyterians at Ada have just erected a handsome church building and under the efficient leadership of their pastor, Rev. Jno. A. Williams they are rejoicing in a steady growth.

Presbytery adjourned to meet during the meeting of the Synod of Texas at the call of the moderator.

R. F. Kirkpatrick, Stated Clerk.

TENNESSEE.

Synod at Memphis—Please pay full fare and get certificate. This, properly signed, will secure reduced rate returning. The committee of enrollment will be in Lecture Room of Second church, Tuesday, Oct. 27th, at 10 o'clock, a. m.

The Situation in North Carolina.

The moral forces have won their cause in the following places this year: Statesville, prohibition; Wilson, dispensary; Nashville, prohibition; Elizabeth City, prohibition; Elm City, dispensary; Gold Hill, prohibition; Benson, prohibition; Hillsboro, prohibition; Oxford, dispensary; Rutherfordton, prohibition; Wadesboro, prohibition, Raleigh, dispensary; Goldsboro, prohibition.

Votes in the following places have been adverse: Reidsville, Morganton, Roxboro, Tarboro. At Scotland Neck the result was in question and a compromise was effected, by which the saloons will close in a year and the people take their choice between prohibition and dispensary.

In the following places elections have been called: Weldon, Kinston, Salisbury, Durham, Henderson, Newbern, Marion. May the cause win in each of these places.

The Anti Saloon League now practically covers the State. Nearly every county has an executive committee and many have township committees in every township.

The emphasis must be put on the enforcement of the law. Early in the new year there will be a State Temperance Convention.

J. W. Bailey.

The Open Court.

The Donkey and the Pullman Car.

A brother minister whom we have not named and who does not wish us to name him in the corrections which we are asked to make has several grievances against us. He introduced a resolution into the last Assembly, the last echo, let us hope of a controversy that ought never to have begun, to have the salary of the Secretary of Foreign Missions reduced five hundred dollars. His grievance is that we referred to him as an "anti-salary man." We hasten to explain that we did not mean he was against any salary at all, but that he was "anti" the particular amount of salary which he attacked, the amount that has long been paid the Secretary of Publication without a single criticism from the Church, the amount that was paid the Secretary of Foreign Missions before Dr. Chester's election to that office, the salary that he deserves for his efficient conduct of the office and that he needs (since he does not believe in "race suicide.") Twenty years ago there was a whole party in the Church that was known as the "anti-salary" party.

Another grievance is that we referred to a rejected manuscript of our correspondent, whereas the manuscript had been published in a paper (now dead) and sent to the Standard by a friend of the author with the author's consent. We regret the mistake, but must add that if we had recollected that the article was public property we should doubtless have referred to its author by name, upon the occasion of his eruption in the General Assembly.

Further we are informed that we misquoted him as to the Secretary's "riding on the trains at the church's expense," and that his exact language was "that Christ and his apostles did not deem it necessary, as some of their ministerial successors, to ride in a Pullman palace car, by day as well as by night; that the most elegant vehicle which our Lord used was the honored donkey on which he made his triumphant entry"—and after that our correspondent thinks we ought to apologize to him for the remark which we resisted making until we found that Rowland Hill had made it under similar provocation. We do apologize, but we cannot help its appeal to our risibilities even yet. Of course the argument would be as strong against riding on any train as against riding in a particular kind of car. And we still wonder that with our brother's principles there was not one Texas donkey hitched outside the walls of the Presbyterian Church at Lexington, Virginia, last May.

And as corrections are in order let this be said, that if the Secretary aforesaid sometimes seeks the privacy of a Pullman and its conveniences for doing the Church's work, at his own expense it is nobody's business but his own. And if, as we have heard on good authority, he has spent on traveling expenses as much as five hundred dollars a year for which no charge was made to the Church (as we can well believe from some experience of our own) then our correspondent's resolution to pay him twenty-five hundred dollars and his traveling expenses was a needless one. And as our Assembly correspondent remarked at the time, we hope that the church has heard the last of this salary business. The Standard knows and the Church pretty well knows now, that the matter had its origin in a little clique of spiteful sore-heads and their prejudiced dupes, and that before it was exposed it deceived the very elect and did more harm to the cause, this agitation about five hundred dollars, than its originators will live long enough to atone for.

Cotton Futures Once More. Dr. Ramsay's question as to the hazy line between legitimate speculation and gambling in cotton futures is a puzzling one. For the convenience of the reader we print again the editorial paragraph in the Standard to which exception was taken, together with the gist of the exception itself, expressing here and now our high regard for Dr. Ramsay's keen analysis and the trepidation with which we attempt the task of satisfying him.

The Standard's paragraph read:

"A cotton merchant has an order to supply a cotton factory with a thousand bales of cotton in December at a certain price. The cotton merchant in time delivers the cotton at that price. But he is merely seeking a fair commission on that purchase. He therefore protects himself, or 'hedges,' by buying through his agents on the Cotton Exchange a thousand bales of December cotton. Then if cotton goes up he is insured against loss. If it goes down he has discounted any larger profit that he might have made. But this is rather anti-speculative than otherwise. Or a cotton factory contracts for the delivery of its cloth six months from now at a certain price. It protects itself against a rise in the price of the new cotton by buying futures in cotton. It strikes us that this is a legitimate transaction."—Editorial in Presbyterian Standard, Sept. 2.

To this Dr. Ramsay responded:

"To show that the buying of futures diminishes the risk in a certain complex transaction is not to touch the question whether the buying of futures is gambling.

"In the second place, if it is right in the cases supposed to buy futures, it must be right to sell them. The question, therefore, whether the transaction is gambling cannot be determined by considering only the action of one of the parties.

"In the third place, there must be contemplated in gambling some transfer of value without compensation. Nor can we here admit as compensation the chance of gain by him who turns out the loser; for this is present in every gambling transaction.

"We propose therefore the following definition of gambling: A transaction in which one party must lose if the other gains, a contingency determining which shall lose. And the element which makes the transaction always sinful is the necessity that one loses for the other to gain, the transfer of value without compensation."

Dr. Ramsay's definition of gambling is an admirable one and we agree to it. Our own patent statement on this point is that every legitimate business transaction has stamped upon it, Value Received, that is value to both sides of the bargain. We also agree as we have stated before that a great part of the dealing in futures is gambling pure and simple, and express the hope that some time the business world will adjust itself to conditions that will forbid gambling. But it is just as important to know what is legitimate speculation as what is not. The gist of Dr. Ramsay's contention is that although the "hedging" may be all right so far as the insurance feature is concerned, yet somebody must lose on the transaction. We think an illustration will relieve the difficulty.

Our supposition was that a cotton mill, having sold its yarn, to be delivered in April, bought futures to the extent of a thousand bales of cotton. Then, if cotton goes up it has insured itself against loss from the higher price of the raw material. Now there is a legitimate transaction every day in the cotton mill business that offsets this. Here is another mill that has bought and stored away a thousand bales of cotton at the present market price. This mill has not sold its yarns that will be ready in April. If cotton goes down the price of yarns will also decrease the same amount. Now this cotton mill sells a thousand bales of April cotton on the Cotton Exchange. If cotton goes down the loss on the yarns is offset. If it goes up the additional profit on the cotton bought and stored today is offset by the loss on the futures.

And the point is that just as every illegal and immoral gambling in futures has a corresponding transaction of the same kind, so that where one loses the other wins, so, every legitimate transaction as we have described meets its corresponding legitimate deal. The two cotton mills really belong to a mutual insurance company and neither makes anything except protection on the transaction described.

Another illustration: A cotton merchant agrees to deliver a thousand bales of cotton in December to a cotton mill. He protects himself by buying a thousand bales of December cotton, in futures. One of our cotton exporters at the same time ships a thousand bales of cotton to Europe. It will take six weeks for the cotton to reach Europe. While the ship is on the water cotton may go down to a disastrous point. He sells a thousand bales of December cotton to protect himself, and the two transactions again cancel each other. It can be demonstrated that for every such transaction in which one party does not gain there is another in which the other party did not lose.

Deaths.

Instead of a stony footpath,
The Great King's smooth highway;
Instead of a weary spirit,
A soul at rest for aye.

Instead of these fleeting blossoms,
Flowers that immortal bloom;
And instead of this dark death-shadow
The glory beyond the tomb!

LEE.—At Lumberton, N. C., Oct. 6, 1903, Miriam, child of Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Lee, aged fifteen months. The early called are surely blessed.

J. P. M.

Mrs. Elizabeth White Robinson.

On Sept. 17th., 1903, at her home in Wilmington, N. C., this faithful and true follower of the Lord fell asleep in Jesus, after a weary waiting for His coming of many months.

She was born in Hoosick Falls, N. Y., and in 1855 was married to Mr. Charles H. Robinson and came to Wilmington.

They removed to Elizabethtown, N. C., in 1856 and remained for three years. In 1859 they returned to Wilmington and this remained her home (with the exception of the year 1893, which was spent in Savannah) until her death.

In 1857 she united with the Presbyterian Church in Elizabethtown. She moved her membership to the First Presbyterian Church of Wilmington in 1859, and was for 44 years one of its best members.

As we look back and view her character and life, there are certain traits notably prominent. One of these was her faithfulness to home duties. "She looked well to the ways of her household." She was a model home maker and house keeper.

For years her home was the home of the ministers who visited Wilmington to supply the First Church.

And those who once partook of her lavish hospitality, never forget the kindly welcome, and the matchless kindness received in that home. She was indeed "a lover of hospitality."

Another notable trait was her intense loyalty to Church and pastor. Having no children she took her Church into her heart. Literally its doors were never opened without her presence. She loved the doctrine of her Church. She admired its pure and simple worship. Its causes were dear to her. Every drop of blood in her body was loyal to the Church of her choice and affection. And she was equally loyal to her pastors. Dr. Wm. S. Plumer of honored memory who so long supplied her Church, knew her worth, honored and loved her, and was loyally sustained in return. Dr. H. L. Singleton, one of her first pastors writes: "My memory of her is pleasant. I remember how devoted she was to the Church, and how helpful in my ministry among you." Dr. Joseph R. Wilson knew her loyalty and worth and loved her for both. And her more recent pastors knew that in her they had a friend and well wisher, loyal to the uttermost. Another striking characteristic was her tirelessness as a Church worker. For seventeen years she was the soprano singer of a quartette choir of the Church, giving her time and talent freely and lovingly to this service of song in the sanctuary.

For more than a score of years she taught in the Sunday school, and some of the prominent men of our community and even of our country were her pupils in their boyhood.

And to the very last she was a tireless visitor for the Church, cheering the sick and seeking the stranger that she might feel at home in the church and community.

Among other virtues we love to recall her strong personal faith, her unflinching generosity, and her deep sympathy.

Full of years and good works and faith in Christ, ripe as a golden sheaf for the harvest, she entered into her rest.

We thank God that he who walked life's ways with her for so many years, has faith to feel and say:

"I cannot always see the way that leads To heights above;
I sometimes quite forget He leads me on
With hands of love;
But yet I know the path must lead me to Immortal land,
And when I reach life's summit I shall
And understand."

Fruit and Nuts as Food

The Department of Agriculture has for several years been conducting a series of experiments to determine the dietary value of different foods.

Nine dietary studies and thirty-one digestion experiments were carried on. In the majority of the dietary studies and all but one of the digestion experiments fruit and nuts constituted all or almost all of the diet. The result of the investigation emphasize the fact that both fruit and nuts should be considered as true food rather than food accessories. The subjects were two women, three children, two elderly men, and two university students. The men all did hard manual labor during a part of the time, the students working to support themselves while pursuing their studies.

The fare given in these experiments was in every case one that would appeal to any normal appetite. It embraced honey, tomatoes, apples, bananas, cantelone, grapes, verdal, cornichon, tokay, muscat, scarlet haws, pears, pomegranates, perismons, oranges, strawberries, watermelons, figs, almonds, and peanut butter. The only animal foods allowed were cottage cheese and eggs; and these in limited quantities. The cost of such a diet varied from 15 to 18 cents a day. Comparative experiments were carried along in which animal foods were employed under the usual conditions of living, and in these the daily cost ran from 26 to 30 cents. It was found that the food eaten supplied about 60 percent of the protein usually secured by the average meat diet, while health and strength continued the same, if not improved, and in two or three case there was a slight gain in flesh and weight.

One of the chief objects of the series of experiments was to furnish data as to the value of nuts as food. Fruits contain little protein, and nuts are relied on in the fruitarian plan of eating to balance the ration. Fruits are rich in carbohydrates and nuts in fat. A pound of peanuts, which costs 7 cents, furnish-

1,000 calories of energy at a cost of 1-2 cents, and protein at a cost of 36 cents a pound. A porterhouse steak costs for the same result respectively 22-2 cents and $1.31, when the steak can be bought for 25 cents a pound.

The average price per pound of the protein of nuts ranges higher than the corresponding average of meats fish eggs milk dairy products and prepared cereals. The only foods which furnish protein at a less cost than peanuts are flour and dried beans. According to Prof. Jaffa's experiments nuts are the cheapest source of energy for the fruitarian the peanut being far ahead of any other variety. Although peanuts supply protein and energy for a smaller sum than bread, they are outranked by dried beans, which at 5 cents a pound, will supply for 10 cents over 200 grammes of protein and 100 calories of energy.—Scientific American.

Beautiful Things.

Beautiful faces are those that wear, makes little if dark or fair, whole souled honesty printed there.

Beautiful souls are those that show, like crystal panes where heart-fires glow, beautiful thoughts that burn below.

Beautiful lips are those whose words leap from the heart like songs of birds, set whose utterance prudence girds.

Beautiful hands are those that do, work that is earnest, and brave and true, moment by moment, the long day through.

Beautiful feet are those that go in kindly ministries to and fro, down lowliest ways, if God wills it so.

Beautiful shoulder are those that bear, ceaseless burdens of homely care with patient grace and daily prayer.

Beautiful lives are those that bless silent rivers of happiness, whose hidden fountain but few can guess —Littell's Living Age.

Too Busy to Be Kind.

"I sometimes think we women, nowadays, are in danger of being too busy to be really," said an old lady, thoughtfully. "We hear so much about making every minute count, and always having some work or course of study for spare hours, and having our activities systematized, that there is no place left for small wayside kindnesses. We do not see the sick neighbor and relieve the poor neighbor, but for the common, everyday neighbor, who has not fallen the way, so far as we can see, we haven't a minute to spare. But everybody who needs a cup of cold water isn't getting the fact out to the world. And there are a great many little pauses by the way which are no waste of time. The old-fashioned exchange of garden seats over the back fence, and friendly chats about domestic matters, helped to lighten weary days and brought more cheer than many a sermon. We ought not to be too busy to inquire for the girl who is at school, or to be interested in the letter from the boy at sea. It is a comfort to the mother's lonely heart to feel that somebody else cares for that which means so much to her. Especially we ought not to be too busy to give and receive kindnesses in our own home." May no one be able to say of us that we are too busy to be kind.—The Young Woman.

MEETINGS OF PRESBYTERIES.

NORTH CAROLINA.

FAYETTEVILLE PRESBYTERY.—

The Presbytery of Fayetteville met at Lumber Bridge October 6, 1903, and was opened with a sermon by Rev. J. M. Rose, D. D., the retiring Moderator. Twenty-three out of the thirty-eight ministers in the Presbytery were present. Forty-three of the eighty-five churches in the Presbytery were represented.

Organization.—Rev. K. M. McIntyre, D. D., was elected moderator and Rev. W. T. Walker and Elder J. W. Currie were elected temporary clerks.

Other Ministers.—Rev. J. A. McKaughan, Rev. Jordan Cobb and Rev. J. W. Cobb of the Missionary Baptist church were invited to sit in the Presbytery as visiting brethren, and Rev. Messrs E. W. Souders and A. McFadyen to sit in the Presbytery as corresponding members. All of them were introduced by the moderator.

Licensure—Candidate I. N. Clegg was licensed to be a Probationer for the Holy Ministry and was given a certificate to the care of Orange Presbytery.

Minister Received.—Rev. E. W. Souders was admitted to membership from Crawfordville Presbytery. Calls for his pastoral services from Smithfield, Kenly and Oakland churches were placed in his hands and accepted and an order was made for his installation.

Pastoral Relation Dissolved.—The pastoral relation between Rev. T. F. Haney and Manly church was dissolved.

Name Changed.—At the request of the board of trustees of Red Springs Seminary Presbytery, concurred with it in the change of the name of the institution to "The Southern Presbyterian College and Conservatory of Music."

Commissions.—The commissions to organize churches at Benson and Elise were continued.

Change of Treasurers.—It was ordered that "Publication and Sabbath School Work" be substituted in blanks for church reports in place of "General Assembly's Colportage," with R. E. Magill, Richmond, Va., as treasurer, Rev. L. A. McLaurin, Reaford, N. C., to be retained as Treasurer of Presbyterian Colportage, and that Rev. J. B. Shearer, D. D., Davidson, N. C., be the treasurer hereafter of the Church and Christian Education Fund. Church treasurers are urged to note these changes.

Place of Next Meeting.—Ashpole church was chosen as the place for the next meeting.

Vote of Thanks.—A resolution of thanks was voted heartily to the good people of Lumber Bridge for their cordial and abounding hospitality and to the railways for reduced rates.

Adjournment.—Presbytery adjourned to meet during Synod in Wilmington at the call of the moderator.

P. R. Law, Stated Clerk.

ALBERMARLE PRESBYTERY.—Met in Goldsboro, N. C., Oct. 6, 1903, at 8 p. m. The opening sermon was by request of the moderator preached by Rev. G. W. Lawson, pastor of the Washington church.

Presbytery was constituted with prayer by Rev. E. P. Bradley, the last moderator present. There were present 11 ministers and five ruling elders.

Officers—Rev. Dr. Morton, Moderator Rev. R. G. Hartman and R. W. Alexander, clerks.

Received.—Rev. C. W. McDonald from the Presbytery of Montgomery. Mr. McDonald will have charge of the Payne Memorial group.

Church Organized.—At Washington, N. C., to be known as Payne Memorial.

The Home Mission committee made an encouraging and stirring report. It was resolved to push the Forward Movement work in Home Missions more vigorously, also to put a general evangelist in the field as soon as practicable.

Our agent of Foreign Missions was not present but sent an encouraging report on that subject.

Presbytery heartily endorsed the action of the Assembly in regard to the appropriation of $250,000 for that cause and will earnestly endeavor to raise its share.

The report on Church and Christian Education claimed much of the attention of Presbytery and it was resolved that we purchase the Crisp school in Edgecomb county. A committee was appointed to effect the purchase and act as trustees until next meeting.

The following recommendations in regard to colored evangelization were adopted and ordered published:

1. "That Presbytery urge upon pastors and sessions the necessity of securing a collection for this great cause.

2. "That the ministers of our church who can have access to schools for colored youths which have no theological department, be requested to visit such schools and lay before the students the claims of the gospel ministry and at the same time invite them to take up their studies under our care at Stillman Institute, where board and tuition can be obtained at a cost not exceeding $20 per year."

Presbytery complied with the request of the Assembly in consolidating its committees of Publication and Sabbath Schools. Presbytery's committee is as follows: Rev. F. W. Farris, Rev. F. G. Hartman and Mr. John B. Sparrow of Washington.

Missionary Supplies.—Rev. C. N. Wharton, take oversight and preach two Sundays at Young Memorial; Rev. E. P. Bradley, two Sundays at Young Memorial; Rev. J. H. Henderlite, one Sunday at Young Memorial; Rev. F. W. Farris, one Sunday at Dover; Rev. E. D. Brown, one Sunday at Dover and take oversight; Rev. Jas. Thomas, one Sunday at Strickland; Rev. W. D. Morton, one Sunday at Roanoke Rapids; Rev. C. W. McDonald, two Sundays at Scotland Neck and take oversight; Rev. F. G. Hariman, one Sunday at Scotland Neck; Rev. H. S. Bradshaw, one Sunday at Bayboro; Rev. R. L. Grier, one Sunday at discretion; Rev. R. L. Grier, one Sunday at Edenton; Rev. G. W. Lawson, one Sunday at Leachville; Rev. R. W. Alexander, one Sunday at Leachville; Rev. R. W. Alexander, one Sunday at Crisp; Rev. W. D. Morton, one Sunday at discretion; Rev. Jno. E. Wool, one Sunday at Shiloh;

Next meeting will be held in Newberry Tuesday after the third Sunday in April, 1904 at 8 p. m.

Presbytery adjourned Thursday night to meet at the call of the moderator during the Sessions of Synod.

E. D. Brown, Stated Clerk.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

CHARLESTON PRESBYTERY.—Met in Summerville, S. C., Oct. 6th., and was opened with a sermon from Rev. D. M. McIver. Rev. S. C. Caldwell was made moderator and Rev. F. D. Jones assistant clerk.

A call from New Wappetaw church was received for the services of Rev. W. W. Sadler. The Fourth Church, Charleston, was dissolved. The death of Rev. H. G. Gilland was announced. Rev. G. A. Blackburn, Rev. Alex. Martin and D. B. Henderson will prepare his memorial. A very elaborate and instructive memorial of the late Rev. G. R. Brackett, D. D., was read.

The causes of Publication and Sabbath School were considered under one committee of which Rev. D. M. McIver was made chairman.

The cause of Colored Evangelization awakened much interest and comment. Adjourned to meet in Cheraw at Synod.

ENOREE PRESBYTERY.—The fall session of Enoree Presbytery were held in the First church, Spartanburg, S. C., Oct. 6-8. Twenty-two ministers and thirty-one elders were in attendance. Rev. T. W. Sloan of Greenville was moderator, and Elder G. H. Oetzel of Union, assistant clerk.

The chief feature of the meeting was the celebration of the quarto-centennial of the Presbytery. These exercises began with the opening sermon which was a clear, scholarly and impressive discussion of Presbyterian polity by the Rev. Dr. J. T. Plunkett of Augusta, Ga. The next evening the Rev. Dr. R. C. Reed of Columbia Theological Seminary, delivered an admirable discourse on Presbyterian Doctrine, which was a remarkably compact, comprehensive and forcible presentation of the doctrinal system of Calvinism. The same evening the Stated Clerk, Rev. T. H. Law, read by order of Presbytery, a historical paper which he had prepared, recounting the organization and growth of the Presbytery, and furnishing a tabulated list of all the ministers, licentiates, candidates, and churches ever connected with the body.

The third evening had been set apart for an address from Rev. Dr. Henry Alexander White, also of Columbia Seminary; but as to this we were sadly disappointed, Dr. White being in attendance upon his own Presbytery at Summerville, S. C., unfortunately missed his train and was therefore unable to reach Spartanburg before the Presbytery adjourned.

Mr. J. W. Carpenter, of the Thornwell

Orphanage, was received as a candidate for the ministry, and has gone at once to the Seminary at Louisville. And Licentiate J. D. Hnery was dismissed to the care of Montgomery Presbytery.

Commissions were appointed to organize new churches at Saxon Mill near Spartanburg, and at old Antioch, if the way be clear.

Rev. J. F. Pharr accepted calls from Liberty Springs, Lisbon and Monntville churches, which he has been serving, and is to be installed soon.

The Presbytery complied with the Assembly's recommendation to consolidate the Permanent Committees on Publication and Sabbath School work, and the following were appointed that committee: Rev. Thornwell Jacobs, Rev. M. E. Woodworth and Elders A. E. Spencer, A. M. Copeland, and G. C. Young, all of Clinton.

Rev. G. G. Mayes was made chairman of Colored Evangelization.

Limestone church, Gaffney, and April 3th, 7:30 p. m. were selected for the next meeting. T. H. Law.

LOUISIANA.

LOUISIANA PRESBYTERY met at Lake Charles, La., Oct --, 1903. Present nine ministers and three elders. Rev. F. P. Patterson was chosen moderator, and Rev. E. L. Siler, temporary clerk. Rev. Chas. Herron, D. D., was received from the Presbytery of Dayton, Ohio (church north), and after the usual examination, was enrolled. A call for his pastoral services was presented from the Crowley church, and being placed in his hands, and accepted by him, the following order for his installation was taken: Rev. B. L. Price, to preside and preach the sermon; Rev. D. M. Hawthorne to charge the pastor, and Rev. R. T. Price is requested to assist; Rev. J. Y. Allison to charge the people, with Elder H. W. Book to assist. The date set was Oct 29th, or such time as the commission may select.

Rev. D. O. Byers and Elder I. D. Norwood were appointed a committee on the Bible Cause." The organization of the "Rose Hill Presbyterian Church" Chapel, Miss., was announced and the church enrolled. Norwood, La., was chosen as the place for the next meeting. The committee on Colored work was directed to continue the work, and to appeal to the churches for aid to carry it on. A special service in the interest of Ministerial Support was appointed for Saturday evening of the next session of Presbytery. The sum of $120 was pledged by members present for additional aid to our candidates, Rev. R. F. Patterson, Baton Rouge, La., was made chairman of Education, vice Rev. E. L. Siler, and Rev. D. F. Wilkinson and Elder I. F. Young were added to that Committee. Rev. D. E. Wilkinson was also placed upon the Stillman board, vice Rev. E. L. Siler. Presbytery expressed itself as anxious to have an evangelist either by the Synod, or in conjunction with Red River Presbytery. Presbytery adjourned to meet at the call of the Moderator during the Session of the Synod of La.

M. B. Shaw, Stated Clerk.

ALABAMA.

THE PRESBYTERY OF TUSCALOOSA met at Newbern, Ala., Oct. 6, and adjourned Oct 8th.

There were in attendance eighteen ministers and nine ruling elders. Rev. J. S. Shaw was elected moderator, and Rev. R. C. Gilmore temporary clerk. and Rev. F. L. Allen reading clerk. Calls were made for the pastoral services of Rev. D. L. Lander, of St John's Presbytery, by the Uniontown church, and of Licentiate R. F. Otts by the Valley Creek church.

Poplar meetings were held in the interest of Home Missions and of Colored Evangelization. In each interesting addresses were made and much interest manifested.

Rev. John C. Duncan was dismissed to North Alabama Presbytery, and Rev. John Woodruff to the Presbytery of Brooklyn.

The permanent committee on Sabbath Schools was directed to arrange for as many Sabbath school institutes as possible in various parts of the Presbytery. The Presbyterial sermon was preached by Rev. T. R. Best of Selma on the duties of the ruling elder.

The statistical report to Synod shows 22 ministers, 55 churches, one licentiate and four candidates.

Adjourned to meet at Greensboro, Ala., 7:30 p. m., Tuesday, April 5, 1904.

J. Y. Prniggs, Stated Clerk.

NORTH ALABAMA Presbytery met at Goodwater, Oct. 6,

Membership—Twenty-two ministers and fifteen ruling elders.

Officers—Rev. J. W. Orr, moderator, and Rev. W. W. Wolfe, temporary clerk.

New Members Received.—Rev. D. N. McLauchlin from Bethel Presbytery, and Rev. T. P. Walton from Holston Presbytery.

Ordinations.—R. D. Carmichael and Thomas Parker.

Rev. D. D. Little was dismissed to Pueblo Presbytery (Northern Presbyterian).

Calls to the pastorate were approved from Anniston First church for Rev. D. N. McLauchlin, and for Rev. Thomas Parker from Montevallo church. Rev. R. D. Carmichael takes evangelistic work in Morgan, Madison and Limestone counties.

New Presbytery.—The Synod of Alabama was overtured to set apart a new Presbytery consisting of nine counties, almost entirely in the Tennessee Valley, to be known as the Presbytery of North Alabama, the remaining portion of the Presbytery to be known as the Presbytery of Birmingham.

New Church Organized.—Olivet.

The pastoral relation between Rev. R. B. McAlpine and Gadsden was dissolved on his resignation of the pastorate.

Rev. E. M. Craig was elected Secretary-Evangelist of Home Missions.

W. I. Sinnott, Stated Clerk.

TENNESSEE.

PRESBYTERY OF MEMPHIS was in session, Bolivar, Tenn., Sept. 29, Oct. 1. Opened with sermon by Rev. H. R. Taylor, moderator. Twelve ministers and seven ruling elders were present.

Rev. W. Moore Scott, moderator, Rev. J. D. Wallace, temporary clerk. Received, Rev. T. E. P. Woods from Nashville Presbytery and installed him pastor of Bolivar church.

Commissions reported Rev. B. M. Cowan installed pastor of Colliersville church for half time, and Rev. J. D. Wallace of Covington for all his time.

Dismissed, Rev. S. T. Dekins to Mt. Vernon Presbytery, Cumberland Presbyterian church, having received him from that church a few years ago, and Rev. J. O. Shelby to Tamaulipas Presbytery, Presbyterian Church of Mexico.

Committees on Publication, Sabbath Schools and Young Peoples Societies were consolidated.

Presbytery seeks to secure contributions for Foreign Missions averaging $1.06 per member.

Assembly's Home Missions considered in popular meeting with several addresses.

Local Home Missions presented in elaborate report and more liberal and prompt support of this work urged upon our people.

Received, Benjamin Bardwell, colored, as candidate for ministry, and sent him to Tuscaloosa, Ala., Stillman Institute.

Presbytery was preceded by Sunday School Institute, which gave an entire day to considering Sunday school work in many phases. Hospitality of Bolivar was abundant and cordial. Stanton next place of meeting. Adjourned meeting at Synod.

Joseph H. Lumpkin, Stated Clerk.

Our Young People.

A First-Grade Certificate.

By Rev. John T. Faris.

Nathan Lambert was discouraged, there was no denying the fact. He succeeded fairly well in deceiving his friends as to his feelings; but in his own office he dropped his mask and faced the truth. It was not a pleasant truth, but he had to face it just the same. He was not succeeding as he had hoped; in fact, the first three months in his own law office had been a dismal failure.

His office! How proud he had been when he painted his name on the door. How he had dreamed of the clients who would seek him there, and of the fame which awaited him!

He remembered those first days so well—the days when he sat at his desk with his law books about him. As he studied, he listened for the step on the stairs which should announce the coming of his first client. How his heart thumped when he heard the tramp of approaching feet! He tried to compose himself to meet the expected caller. The steps came nearer, and yet nearer; they sounded at his door, and then, alas! beyond his door. His first client had passed on to the office of the old lawyer down the hall!

What was the use of it all? How much better it would have been if he had been content on the farm, where he had food and clothing at least. Or, having left the farm, why did he not continue in the little back district where, for twenty-five dollars a month, he was janitor and teacher combined? Twenty-five dollars was not much, but it was better than the ten dollars he had made in this, his third month of practice.

As he was thinking of these things for the hundredth time, the door knob was turned and a man entered the room. Nathan was surprised, not only because he had not heard the approach of his visitor, but because of that visitor's identity. The Honorable Robert Stallman—the leading lawyer of the country—the local boss of his own political party—this man in his office! What could it mean?

Mr. Stallman did not explain his business immediately, but cordially grasped Nathan's hand.

"Ah, Mr. Lambert! How do you do?" he began. "Hope you are not too busy for a friendly chat. Just thought I would drop in and see my young brother-at-the-bar."

For ten minutes the two lawyers talked of matters of everyday interest. Then Mr. Stallman rose to go. But, with his hand on the door, he paused, and stated the real object of his call.

"By the way, Lambert, how would you like to be our next county superintendent of schools. You know Mr. Bixby died last week. We have been looking about for some one to take his place on the ticket, and our minds have turned to you. Don't say you are too busy for the work. The duties of the office in this county are not so exacting that you cannot attend to most of your practice at the same time. But your party asks this service of you, even if it should require some sacrifice on your part. You will not need to do much electioneering; you know our nomination is equivalent to an election. What do you say?"

Nathan could hardly believe his ears. He county superintendent of schools, at twelve hundred a year—why, this was one of the plums reserved for favorites of the boss? Why was the office offered him? Evidently Mr. Stallman had seen his need, and had hit upon this as an expedient for giving him a helping hand. How delicately done it was, too! No reference whatever to the puny proportions of his practice, but merely a hint that perhaps he could find time for his work in the midst of other duties. He did not know that Mr. Stallman's overtures were in consequence of an impending revolt in the ranks of the party of which he was the absolute boss. When Bixby died, he had attempted to name his successor; but two or three prominent workers, hitherto his staunch supporters, rebelled at his choice and presented the logical candidate, a teacher of years and experience. "Your man cannot defeat the candidate of the opposition," they declared. "He has no fitness for the place. We must have some one who has the confidence of the people."

Thereupon Mr. Stallman saw the necessity of withdrawing his nominee; but to accept the name proposed by others would be fatal to his dictatorship. He must think of a compromise candidate—a man who would do his bidding under all circumstances. So he determined to offer the place to Nathan Lambert. "The very man!" he assured himself. "Poor as a church mouse, and ready, I have no doubt, to sell his soul for a fat job like this." Hence the visit of the boss to the office of the briefless barrister.

"Well, what do you say?" Mr. Stallman repeated his question as the young lawyer was turning the matter over in his mind.

Nathan smiled. "I can only accept," he said, "with hearty thanks to you and the others who have thought me worthy of the honor."

Mr. Stallman frowned at the mention of others. "As if there was anyone to be thanked but me!" he said to himself. "But he'll soon learn who runs things in this county."

"You have a teacher's certificate?" he asked. "I hear you taught somewhere several years ago."

"Oh, yes!" Nathan assured him. "It is only a second-grade, but it has two years yet to run."

"The boss frowned once more. "Second-grade—umph!" he exclaimed. "Well, that must do. Wish it had been a first-grade. But, then, we can do anything we wish in this county you know." As he passed out of the door, he added, over his shoulder, "The convention is next week, remember. Better be on hand."

Nathan was on hand, and made a speech, which was well received. When the convention adjourned, his name had been added to the ticket.

Two or three days later, when the local weekly of his own party appeared, he smiled as he read the fine words spoken of him. He was mentioned as "a rising young lawyer of brilliant attainments. He has already made a splendid record as a teacher, and we shall be fortunate to have such a man in charge of our schools," the article concluded. He was still laughing at statements which sounded so absurd, when the boss burst into the room.

"Lambert, your second-grade certificate's no good!" he shouted. "See here!" and he read out a double-headed editorial in The Palladium, the organ of the opposition.

"Our readers will notice with a smile," it began, "the name of Mr. Nathan Lambert on Boss Stallman's ticket. Whatever else Mr. Lambert may be, he is not the man for county superintendent. He has taught, it is true; but where did he teach? He has a teacher's certificate, but it is only second-grade. Does Fieldspar County want a second-grade county superintendent? We point with pride to our candidate. He has taught for many years in our leading schools, and he has a first-grade certificate."

"Lambert, you must get a first-grade certificate, or you're beaten before you go to the polls. We must nail the statement of The Palladium as a lie, and that in an extra issue of the Review tomorrow. Get ready to take an examination this afternoon."

"Why, Mr. Stallman!" Nathan answered. "I can't take an examination this afternoon. I am rusty, and ought to have a week at the least for review. You know I haven't looked at anything but a law book for the last two years. It is impossible to do what you ask."

"Don't say impossible to me, young man!" shouted the boss. "I say it must be done. I'll give you till tomorrow morning to brush up. That's every minute you can have. Get to work right away. No, don't say anything more. You have heard me."

When he had gone, Nathan turned despairingly to his neglected school-books. "Tomorrow morning!" he exclaimed. "And I ought to have a month for such an examination as that."

He was hastily reviewing arithmetic when a boy entered the room and thrust a packet in his hand. "I was told to bring this here," he explained.

Accompanying the packet was a note, undated and unsigned.

"Here are the papers used at the last examination," he read. "They may help you to size up the work to be done tomorrow morning. Probably some of the questions will be used again—that often happens. Better read them all over, for who knows what may come? Remember! don't fail to get a first-grade."

Nathan turned over the papers. What help could they be to him? He might as well study anywhere in the books as look up the answers to the questions.

So he took up his arithmetic once more, and half-heartedly set to work. In a few minutes, however, he picked out the old paper in mathematics, and mechanically began to work out the problems printed there. "Might as well do this as anything," he thought. "It' hit or miss—most likely miss."

Then he looked over his geography and history, with the papers as guides. "Rather a good idea," he thought. "Leads me right into the heart of the subjects, at any rate."

At bedtime, he found that he had gone over the whole list in this way. When he blew out his light, he thought: "I could pass last year's examination all right. But I'm in for something different; so I'm afraid my study has been in vain."

At ten o'clock next morning, he was in the county superintendent's office, stating his errand.

"Rather irregular, your request," the acting superintendent said. "I hadn't intended giving an examination today; but I guess I can accommodate you. Please take a seat."

So Nathan sat down at the desk, the history paper before him. With some anxiety he scanned it. The first question was very simple—a ten-year-old child could have answered it. The second question looked familiar—why, it was down on that last year's paper, which had been banded him the day before! So was the third and the fourth. The fifth was new, but no one could fail to answer that correctly.

When he had read the ten questions entire, he whistled to himself. "How careless!" he thought. "Seven out of the ten the very questions asked last year. Well, I'm not to blame for that!"

The arithmetic paper looked new. The first questions were new, but those which covered the more difficult portions of the book were almost exactly the same as those he had studied the night before. What could it mean?

"What business is it of mine what it means?" he asked himself. "I'm in luck, and I'll just go ahead."

It was the same story with the remaining papers. There were only a few new questions.

Before the farce examination had proceeded very far, Nathan settled himself to his work with a smile. "They have fixed these papers pretty well," he thought. Two or three times his conscience made itself heard. Was this honest? Could he lend himself to such deception? But always he answered himself by saying, "It isn't my doing. I am taking this examination in good faith."

When, at four o'clock, his last paper finished, he turned to go, the superintendent asked him to wait a few minutes. "I have been looking over your work," he explained. "It is excellent. Just let me read that Latin paper. Yes, it is good, like the rest. Here is your certificate—grade ninety-eight per cent. I congratulate you, Mr. Lambert! You are the possessor of one of the very best first-grade certificates in the county."

Nathan put the certificate in his pocket, but he found little satisfaction in doing so. He hadn't earned it. It seemed to burn his clothes. It weighed like lead. It was stolen!

"Well, if I had had a week, I could have made the same grade, or better," he argued. "The county will not be any worse off. I know as much as a superintendent needs to know."

But he was not convinced by his own argument. So he tried to dismiss the subject by looking over some mail which was waiting for him at the office.

He was hardly seated when he heard boys on the street crying, "Here's your entry Review! Lambert's all right!" He wondered what the paper could be saying about him, when a grinning archer opened the door and threw in a copy. He picked it up. It was only a half-sheet, printed on one side, in great primer type. This is what it said:

PALLADIUM'S LIE NAILED.

It gives us pleasure to announce that Mr. Nathan Lambert, conscious of his ability to pass for a first-grade certificate, has this day presented himself to the acting county superintendent. We have just learned that he has secured a certificate with a phenomenally high grade. Vote for Nathan Lambert, the people's choice for county superintendent.

As Nathan read, his face flushed. How could this announcement have been printed so soon? It was hardly ten minutes since he left the courthouse. There had not been time for the writing of the article, the setting of the type, the making up of the form, and the printing of the sheet. The work must have been done while he was still in the examination room. It was all a put-up scheme! He was merely the tool of dishonest politicians! They had counted on his willingness to give countenance to a lie!

The flush deepened. He buried his face in his hands. To think that this should have happened to him! No, not happened—to think that he had permitted this! He must do something. He could not allow this deception to go on.

"But what can I do?" he thought. "I am tied hand and foot. The time to rebel was when those papers were sent here yesterday. It is too late now!"

Just then his eyes fell on the letter he had been reading when the extra was thrown into the room. It was from his mother. He picked it up, and tried to read. But he could not fix his mind on the words until he read this:

"I am glad for you, my son. Your election will mean much to you. But I tremble to think of you in politics, if your county is like ours. I know you, though, Nathan. You are a clean, honest boy. Keep yourself clean, and you will never fear to look your fellow-men in the face."

Nathan groaned. "Keep yourself clean," she said. And he was defiled already, stained, dishonored! He could never again look his own mother in the face.

But why not? What if he should cleanse himself by confession? What if—No, there was no use talking of such things. The boss would never forgive him. He would be defeated, and the office meant so much to him.

Then he saw his mother's letter once more. That decided him. "I will be clean!" he cried, and rushed from the office.

He found Mr. Stallman rubbing his hands gleefully as he read the extra which had already filled Nathan's mind with self-loathing.

"Well, Lambert, the trick's done," was the greeting of the boss. "You said it couldn't be done. I said it must be done. Have you learned that my word goes?" And he gave the young lawyer a meaning look.

Nathan nerved himself for his cleaning. "No, sir; I have not learned that your word goes," he began. "That examination was a cheat, and I will not have it stand. I have been your tool, but I cannot consent to remain so any longer."

The boss stormed: "What are you going to do about it? It's done now.

Is that a nice way to talk to the man who is trying to smooth your way to fortune!"

"I hardly know what to do," Nathan replied. "But I can do this, and I propose to do it. I must announce in The Review my withdrawal from the race, and my reasons."

"What will you give as your reasons?" snorted the boss.

"That I have cheated in an examination for a teacher's certificate," replied Nathan, firmly.

"Oh, very well, if you want to be a fool!" was the answer. "Write out your resignation. I will see that it appears in The Review."

The withdrawal was printed in the next issue. Following the announcement was this comment:

"We regret the scandal which will be the result of Mr. Lambert's confession that he cheated in the examination. When it was discovered, the party leaders demanded his withdrawal at once. We cannot afford to present to the people the name of a man who cannot be trusted."

Perhaps the boss and the editors of The Review expected to see Nathan hang his head after this statement appeared. But Nathan held his head erect. He was conscious that, whatever men might think, he had proved himself a man.

Few were deceived by the article in The Review, however. A few days later, The Palladium contained the following paragraph:

"All fair-minded men understood the true inwardness of the withdrawal of Mr. Lambert. It is safe to assume that, instead of having been discovered in dishonest methods, he found that he was being used as a tool by men who do not hesitate to adopt dishonest methods to further their own purposes. Here's our hand, Mr. Lambert! We are proud of you. Unless we are mistaken in the citizens of Fieldspar county, Mr. Nathan Lambert will soon find himself pushed for time to attend to his increasing law business."

Less than a year has passed since that prophecy was made. And now, when Nathan hears the sound of footsteps on

How Serious Urinary Diseases are Cured

Notable systems perfected by that distinguished Southern specialist, Dr. J. Newton Hathaway, that surpasses in quickness and permanency of cure anything ever before attempted—Cures the very oldest as readily as the youngest of any form of urinary disorder or enlargement of the prostate.

INTERESTING BOOK ON THE SUBJECT SENT FREE.

Persons suffering from any kind of urinary trouble such as too frequent, painful or suppressed urination will be interested to know that Dr. Hathaway, the honored specialist, is now able to announce the perfection of a system of cure whereby any urinary disorder can be stopped in a remarkably short space of time; it has been especially successful in cases of elderly men who have to get up nights, and since it is now well known that one-half the men who suffer from sexual weakness and impotency above the age of 40 can trace their trouble directly to a urinary disease, it makes the doctor's discovery all the more important.

Some doctors still cling to the persistent use of catheters and sounds in their efforts to cure serious urinary diseases, but Dr. Hathaway's new system of cure finds an easy way out of the difficulty. His method is simple and soothing and gives the sufferer perfect control of his functions in a very short time. The Rev. Mr. Abingdon, a retired minister of 83, was one of the first to use the doctor's method.

He was forced to relieve himself as often as eight times a night, and scarcely an hour passed during the day that he did not have to wait on himself. The result was that he could no longer sleep at all, and his appetite also left him. He had dropsical puffs under the eyes and was losing flesh. Then a serious sexual and physical decline set in that threatened his very life, and it was in that serious condition that he sought the aid of Dr. Hathaway.

The doctor simply used his new method and it had a startling good effect on the reverend gentleman, for not only was the too frequent desire to urinate stopped, but he soon recovered his appetite and sleep and in the end was even better physically than he had been before the disease set in. An endless list of similar cases of both young and old men and women could be cited, as well as those of suppressed urination and enlargement of the prostate.

The reason that so few doctors are able to cure urinary diseases is because they do not understand that the origin may not lie in the bladder at all, but, on the contrary, may be due to an inflammation or enlargement of the prostate gland or of the kidneys.

Dr. Hathaway not only has a new method for the cure of all urinary diseases, but he has made a special study of the subject and is able to locate the cause and bring about a thorough cure of all organs involved, for in this way only can you expect to get back your full nerve power as well as stop the urinary disorder. Such a radical cure should not be expected of patent medicines, pills and so forth, nor for that matter of catheters and sounds and chilling steel.

Call at Dr. Hathaway's offices and let him explain his discovery in person. He will examine you and tell you all about it free of charge, and if his arguments do not appeal to you you will be under no obligations to take the treatment. The decision rests entirely with you, and all the doctor will endeavor to do is to tell you the right way from the wrong way. This will not cost you anything, so kindly call.

Sufferers from urinary diseases who live out of the city should write a personal letter to the doctor and he will send a monograph on the subject and tell you all about it, free. The correspondence comes in a plain, unmarked envelope and is sacredly confidential. Whether you call in person or write the address is

A Beautiful Tradition.

There is a tradition that the site upon which the temple of Solomon was built was owned in common by two brothers, one of whom had a family, the other none. One night after the harvest the elder brother said to his wife:

"My younger brother is unable to bear the heat and burden of the day. I will arise, take some of my shocks and place them, without his knowledge, among his shocks."

The younger brother, being actuated by similar kind motives, said within himself:

"My brother has a family and I have none. I will contribute to their needs. I will take of my shocks and place them with his without his knowledge."

Great was the astonishment of both when, on the following morning, they found their shocks undiminished.

This happened several nights in succession, when each resolved to solve the mystery. They did so, and on the following night the two brothers met half way between their respective shocks with armfuls of golden grain.

It was upon this spot, hallowed by sacred love, says the tradition, that King Solomon's temple was built.

LIFE WAS NOT WORTH LIVING.

Shelby, N. C., April 30, 1902.

I had been a severe sufferer from nervous prostration for two years and everything I ate disagreed with me. This made me feel so wretched and bad all the time that life was a burden, and I felt that I had rather die than live. I could not eat meat or any solid food at all and everything I did eat caused me to suffer. I had terrible nervous spells when I would become cold and feel almost lifeless—then hot baths would have to be applied. I suffered from gas on the stomach all the time, and so weak I didn't do any work for twelve months. Nothing I tried did me any good.

I was in that condition when Mrs. Joe Person called to see me last July and said everything she could to persuade me to try her remedy, as she was so confident it would cure me. I bought half a dozen bottles, and felt a great deal better by the time I had taken the third. I continued it until I took eighteen bottles, which cured me. My indigestion is well, and I can eat anything I want, and it is very seldom I ever have even a touch of nervousness. My health is good and life itself seems a different thing to me and well worth living. When I commenced the remedy I weighed 105 pounds; now I weigh 140 pounds, which was my natural weight before I was taken sick.

If anyone suffers from indigestion or nervous prostration they need not hesitate to try the remedy. I would not take any amount of money for what it did for me.

Our Little Folks.

Children's Letters.]

Durham, N. C., Sept. 16, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I love your paper. My mother reads me all the little letters and stories in it. I am a big boy, most five years old. I can swim with water-wings in the big ocean, and catch crabs and pig fish. How funny to hear the little pig fish grunt! I brought a kitty home with me. I feed and pet her and she loves me. I love to go to church and Sunday school. I can recite the 23rd Psalm and down to Original Sin in my catechism. My mother is going to give me a Bible when I know it all.

Dear Standard:

As I have never written to you before I will try and write you a few lines. I am a little girl eleven years old. My uncle takes the Presbyterian Standard and I enjoy reading the little folks' letters very much. I have two brothers and one sister. My sister is off at school now. I will start to school soon. My teacher will be cousin Lela Williams. I like her very much. Our pastor is Rev. R. M. Mann; we all like him fine. I will close hoping to see my letter in print. I am

A Sure Cure.

By Adelia M. Hoyt.

"No, Helen, I'll not go to your prayer-meeting. I don't mean to go to church any more, nor pray, nor read the Bible. I've lost all faith in such things. There, now, I hope you'll let me alone."

Having spoken thus plainly, Elsie Glynn shut her lips tight and opened her book as if she wished to end the conversation. The truth was she wished to avoid the look which she knew was in her friends eyes.

The room was in the third story of a poor but respectable boarding house. A few pictures on the wall, some books on the table, a small old-fashioned organ in one corner, these gave to the apartment a home look. Indeed, it was all the home that Elsie Glynn and Helen Hartwell knew. Both were alone in the world, and depended on their own efforts for support.

"Oh, Elsie, surely you do not mean it," Helen exclaimed, her voice divided by pain and reproach.

"Yes, I mean every word of it. I'm not a child," retorted Elsie. "Haven't we been members of the church ever since we've been in the city, and what good has it done us, I'd like to know. No one ever comes to see us but the minister, and little he knows of our real lives. They call themselves brethren, they are pledged to help one another, yet never a hand have they lifted to help us, when just a little influence might have secured us better and more congenial work. Of course there are some good people in the church, because some are born good and some bad, and I can't see that their religion changes them in the least. Yet the Bible says, 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' That is why I have lost faith in Christianity."

"It is only too true that our religion doesn't make the difference in us that it should; but, Elsie, if the tree seems to us unfruitful, shall we pull it up or leave it to the Lord of the vineyard? Did you ever look on the other side? Your side, I mean. While you are looking for the Christ in others, who knows but some one is looking for him in you. Because no one has given you a helping hand, is that any reason you should refuse it to those less fortunate? Forgive me Elsie, dear, but what are you, as a Christian, doing for others?"

"Now Helen, that's just too bad," exclaimed Elsie, the tears springing to her eyes. "You know if I had a better position where I could earn more, I would gladly give of my time and money to help the church and the poor. If I were rich as those Darby girls, I would do so much good, but, shut in the office all day with those brainless girls, and away from all society that might improve me, there's just nothing I can do for myself or anybody else."

"You are mistaken," answered Helen, "I am sure the girls you speak of are capable of being helped, and need it, too. Perhaps you are put there for that very purpose."

"But if I associate with them I shall be lowering instead of improving myself," said Elsie.

"He who with one hand in Christ's reaches the other out to keep some one, will never sink lower himself, for Christ will draw them both up. For me the question is, Am I doing my part? But, oh, Elsie, if your faith is wavering, do some service in his name and he will reveal himself to you."

Elsie made no reply, and presently Helen put on her bonnet and shawl and went out. She had organized a prayer-circle among the girls who sewed with her in the shop, and it was her invitation to join them which had led to the conversation just recorded. After her friend's departure Elsie tried to read, but it was no use. Helen's words kept ringing in her ears. "What are you doing for others? Perhaps some one is looking for the Christ in you. The question for me, is, Am I doing my part?" She rose and went to the organ to try and drown her thoughts. She had learned to play and sing quite young, and the organ, which was all that was left her of her childhood home, had always been her solace. But tonight even the organ kept repeating Helen's words.

As the music died away something like a deep sigh was heard. She rose quickly and flung the door wide open. A figure that had evidently been crouching there sprang up and glided down the dark hall toward the stairway. Elsie knew it was Mary Burns, one of the office girls who roomed on the floor above. Her name and face were familiar to her, but that was all. A moment she hesitated, then acting upon a sudden impulse she followed the retreating shadow up the stairs and knocked at Mary's door. There was no light in the room save what came from the street lamp without, but this was sufficient to show how bare and cheerless the apartment was.

Mary gave her visitor the one chair in the room and, seating herself on the edge of the bed, said, tremulously, "I hope you aren't offended with me, Miss Glynn; I just couldn't help listening."

"You like music, then?" Elsie asked.

"Like it? I love it!" answered Mary, almost passionately.

"Can you play or sing?" was her visitor's next question.

"Oh, I sing a very little that I picked up, that's all," Mary answered in a regretful tone.

A long pause followed, broken at last by Elsie, who asked abruptly, "Why do you live up here? These rooms are not nearly so pleasant as those on the third floor."

"No, but they are cheaper."

"But you earn the same wages I do."

"Yes, but—" and Mary hesitated. Then something in Elsie's manner, together with a longing for human sympathy, caused Mary to open her heart.

There was a crippled brother at the hospital, and all his sister's spare earnings went for his support. As Elsie listened, Mary seemed suddenly exalted by her unselfish, self-sacrificing life, while her own self-centered, fault-finding self seemed to grow smaller and smaller. Her conscience smote her for past neglect, and she longed to make amends. But by kind words and gentle questions she showed her sympathetic interest, and Mary's heart was cheered and drawn toward her.

When Elsie rose to go she put both arms around Mary and kissed her good night, saying, as she did so, "Don't stay up here by yourself. Come down and sit with us when you are lonely, and if you wish I will teach you to play and sing."

"Oh, will you?" cried Mary in rapture, "I'd just do anything for you if you would." And catching Elsie's hand she kissed it, exclaiming, "You are an angel."

It proved that Mary Burns was an apt pupil, and possessed more than ordinary power. By and by others of the office girls were invited to join them.

It is strange what a universal power there is in music. It awakens and inspires those to whom nature and literature are meaningless. Elsie soon learned that some of the girls were giving up their dances and doubtful company for the evenings spent in her room. She taught them hymns and simple songs. Sometimes they brought their work, and Elsie and Helen were able to give them much help, both by example in their own dress and by timely suggestions. Sometimes Helen would read aloud to them while they worked or rested from singing. Thus the time passed until one evening Elsie proposed that they join Helen and her friends in their prayer rice. It was a grand meeting, in which many of the visitors took an active work, some to reconsecrate themselves to the Lord's service, some to confess their faith in him for the first time, and still others asked to be prayed for. Mary Burns was among the first to speak. She said she had been a Christian for a long time, but of late it seemed as if God had forsaken her, and no one cared what became of her. She knew that Miss Glynn was a church member, and yet she seemed as indifferent as the rest until one evening she, Miss Glynn, had come to her and had been so kind to them all ever since. And now she wanted never to doubt another Christian, but to just strive to do her part and trust in the Lord.

Elsie was crying when Mary finished, and Helen guessed the reason. As the two friends walked home together, Elsie said, with tears in her eyes, "To think that Mary was looking for the Christ in me! How little I dreamed of it! And, oh, Helen, I want to take back those dreadful words I said that night. I have learned much since then." "The Holy Spirit is a great teacher, and he has been teaching you," replied her companion.—Ex.

Sidney's Adventure.

She was only a wee maiden of three summers, but it was really surprising how much she knew and how wisely she could sometimes apply her knowledge. It was when she heard them talking about summer at the sea-shore, she did not say anything, but her busy little head was in a whirl of plans. "I'll start out," she told herself, "and when they find me they will find me there." She gathered about her the dolls she loved most, and talked to them in a very grown-up fashion: "You, Dorothy, cannot go," she said. "Your dress is not clean, and one arm is loose in its socket. Now don't be grum and ugly about it, you can have a very pleasant time at home, if you will only think so." "I heard mamma tell Tom so." "Georgie is going to stay home with me," he added a moment later. "Now, dear Georgie, don't cry, little folks cannot always have their own way, it wouldn't be good for them." "Yes, Marie must go, she has been looking pale all the spring, even since she had the mumps. Poor Marie, what a dreadful looking sight she was. Dorothy, you must lend her your knit awl, and Georgie we shall need that little hat of yours. You know Marie never had as many clothes as the rest of us. I shall take May along for company, she needs change of air; since the sun melted the wax from her nose she has looked miserable. Now, don't let me hear any complaining, should I like to take you all, but how could I do that?"

It did not take this wee maiden very long to get ready. She took the little hat with blue ribbon from the closet rack, threw her golf cape about her shoulders, not because she really needed it, she told herself, but then it might be cold before she reached home.

Then she gathered up the two favored dolls and started out the front door.

Whatever cook could have been about, we do not know; she usually kept track of the tiny footsteps, a labor of love that caused her great enjoyment. And mother, busy in the sewing room, thought the household pet was below, and industriously continued her task, with no thought of what was taking place below.

"Is Sidney with you ma'am?" It was the cook calling up the back stairs.

"Why, no, Nancy, she has not been here for an hour or more."

"Nor has she been with me, ma'am, and I found the front door ajar."

It would not be an easy thing to picture the consternation which followed.

"Oh, Nancy, she has taken her cape and hat, where can she be?"

"As likely as not she's off for the seashore, ma'am, she heard you talking it over at the breakfast table."

"Nancy, how dreadful! Call Ned, we must go find her."

"It's my opinion the dog's with her, since I can't find him either."

"You can go across toward Main street, and I'll cross the railroad tracks at Nicetown. And, Nancy, tell every policeman you see; she must be found."

Little Sidney, upon starting out, took with her an additional member of the family for which she had not bargained. Ned lifted his shaggy head up seeing her don her street apparel, and if he could have spoken he probably would have said something possibly like this: "You ought not to go alone, but if you must go, I mean to go with you."

At any rate, when Sidney reached the street, Ned was there before her, and if any one had been watching the pair, they would have seen that at every crossing, or wherever there seemed to be any danger implied, Ned took a corner of Sidney's dress in his mouth, and crowded closer to her side. It was thus that he escorted her over the trolley tracks, and the network of railway tracks at Nicetown station.

It is difficult to say how the adventure might have ended, had not Sidney's mother overtaken them here, and with tears and laughter, clasped the wee maiden to her heart.

"Oh, my dearest one," she cried, "did you not know that this was very, very wrong?"

The blue eyes filled with tears.

"I was only going to get there first and surprise you, mamma," she said.

"Well, you certainly have surprised me, dear, but must never, never do it again."—Christian Intelligencer.

How Bering Died.

In the June number of Harper's Magazine Collins Shackelford tells the true story of the fatal expedition of the explorer Bering, from whom Bering Straits are named. Here is his account of the adventurer's death after the loss of his ship:

"Bering, who had been for some time totally disabled, was brought ashore on a hand-barrow in a boat and placed in a sheltering hollow, where his still faithful men—a mere handful—had cleared the snow from the sand. Even then he was dying. His great age and the hardships he had undergone on this voyage made his struggle for life hopeless.

"His slow passing away was pathetic and pitiful. In effect, he partially buried himself alive. He lay under the shelter of a tent made from an old sail. Long suffering made him childish and petulant. Each day and all day his weakening hands were constantly busied scraping down upon his body, beginning at his feet, the sand from the ridges on either side.

"He would submit to no interference with this occupation, insisting that the sand warmed him. When he died, December 8, 1714, a month after the landing, his body was already half buried, and it needed but a little work on the part of his skeleton comrades to enclose this hero of the arctic regions in a coffin of frozen sand."

There's Health
—IN—Lemon Juice.

Various experiments by eminent scientists have proven the great value of lemons in destroying the germs of typhoid and other fevers. Germs of diseases are deposited in the system by the failure of the bowels to act regularly. MOZLEY'S LEMON ELIXIR is an ideal laxative, made from the juice of pure lemons, and has no equal for cleansing the system of all impurities. It acts promptly on the bowels, liver and kidneys, and does not gripe or cause any unpleasantness. 50 cents per bottle at all drug stores.

Why Cats Wash After Eating.

You may have noticed, little friends,
That cats don't wash their faces
Before they eat, as children do
In all good Christian places.

Well, years ago a famous cat,
The pangs of hunger feeling,
Had chanced to catch a fine young mouse,
Who said, as he ceased squealing.

"All genteel folks their faces wash
Before they think of eating."
And, wishing to be thought well bred,
Puss heeded his entreating.

But when she raised her paw to wash,
Chance for escape affording,
The sly young mouse said his good-bye,
Without respect to wording.

A feline council met that day,
And passed, in solemn meeting,
A law forbidding any cat
To wash till after eating.

The Kiwi.

The kiwi is the sole remnant of the wonderful race of wingless birds that once roamed all over New Zealand, the gigantic skeletons of some of which have been found in great numbers. Boys of Our Empire describes it as being about the size of partridge, and having a rather long neck and a curious bill four inches in length. Its wings are quite undeveloped.

Wanting the means of flight, the kiwi has been almost exterminated.—Exchange.

How Primary Unions are Branching Out.

The principle of the Primary Union—a regular weekly conference of primary teacher of different Sunday-schools to study lessons and methods—is such a sensible and effective one that it is not surprising that the rest of the Sunday-school is now knocking at the Primary Union's door, and asking for a share in its privileges. This demand has become so positive and widespread that official recognition of it has been taken by the International Primary Committee. Mrs. J. W. Barnes gave the following interesting facts about this at Winona Lake last month:

"Every organization worthy of life adapts itself to changing conditions. This has been the case with the form of self-training for teachers known as the Union. They have gradually graded themselves to meet the needs of the three elementary departments, but with the introduction of the training course a new need arose. In several cases so great has been the interest of the upper-grade teachers who came to the Union for the training-course work that there union added another grade of work to the Union. Immediately came the query, 'What should they be called?' They hesitated to drop the word 'primary,' lest they be left out of the benefits of organized primary work, and yet the name did not represent their work.

"At the meeting of the Primary Committee I was authorized to extend the

I wonder how many of my readers irls who never try to do this, and prently their voices become harsh and loud the home is like a beautiful chime of ells which delights us every time they e rung, but a loud, rough, noisy voice, at snaps and snarls is like a bell that cracked and all out of tune. The kind voice we use depends a good deal upon e kind of things we say. If we say unkind, harsh or angry things, then our oices are likely to be harsh and unpleasant; but if we try to say pleasant things, then our voices are apt to become weet and pleasant to hear. The words

He was cutting an item from a newspaper. "It tells how a house was robbed and I want to show it to my wife," he explained. "What good will that do?" a friend inquired. "A whole lot," was the reply. "You see, this house was robbed while the man was at church with his wife." "Say!" exclaimed the friend, excitedly, "you haven't got a duplicate copy of that paper, have you?"

They had quarreled. A duel was in order. The seconds called and asked the weapons. "I will race him in an automobile," declared the challenged. When they informed the challenger he blanched. "Unless he chooses swords or revolvers I will refuse to fight." The duel was off.

Mother—"Willie, you must stop asking your papa questions. Don't you see they annoy him?"

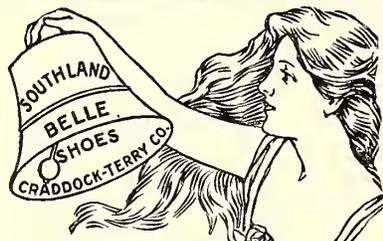

Willie: "No, ma'am; it aint' my questions that annoy him."

Mother: "Willie!"

Willie: "No, ma'am it's the answers he can't give that make him mad."—Philadelphia Press.

Our English cousins use "left off" for our "cast off" as applied to second hand garments. The following advertisement recently appeared in a London paper: "Mr. and Mrs. Hardy have left off clothing of all kinds. They can be seen any day from 3 to 6 p. m."—Julia I. Patton in Lippincott's Magazine.

Marion has reached the age when the problems of life assume interesting proportions. "I was born in Washington, D. C., grandmother. Where were you born?" she asked recently. "Way out in Kansas," answered the old lady. "Father was born in New Orleans," continued the child, "and mother in Denver. Do you know,"—reflectively,—"it seem to me people are liable to be born most any place."—Lippincott's Magazine.

Event and Comment.

The new Pope is being congratulated that his first encyclical is religious rather than political. It is somewhat of a gain that the supposed head of the Church should devote a message to religious affairs.

We extend the hand of congratulation to a Presbyterian minister who proved himself the brave man that he was by stopping the soprano in his choir as she lifted up her voice to sing Ave Maria. He lives in Racine, Wisconsin. The eternal fitness of this is not always observed by people who sing the best. We heard a fine rendition of "Calvary" once, by an imported singer in a Jewish Synagogue.

The Congregationalist notes that while Dakota stands first in the list of divorces Connecticut stands next and that the present home mission states of the West may soon be the chief sources of supply for missionary money for Puritan New England. If the Congregationalist will study the theology of Jonathan Edwards it may find out the reason for its doleful prophecy, namely, that the only hope of New England all these years, the Congregationalist Church, has a spineless theology now.

The other day in Greenbrier Presbytery some young fellows wrote out a resolution that they had some fun over until the reporters got it and sent it to the press as having actually passed that dignified body. The resolution read: "It is the solemn and painful conviction of this Presbytery that some of the brethren are departing from the time-honored custom of the fathers in wearing bob-tailed coats, and the Presbytery would hereby warn the brethren against conformity to the customs of the dudes." This gave the News-Leader of Richmond the chance to make two points, the first being that the writers of the resolution made it ambiguous, it being doubtful whether wearing bob-tailed coats was the custom of the fathers or not. The other point was that a minister with a bob-tailed salary is sometimes obliged to wear a bob-tailed coat. Both points are well taken.

The Nashville College of Law, we understand, has reduced its charge for the degree of LL. D. from ten to five dollars. It has a large job lot on sale, only slightly damaged by newspaper criticism. Come early and avoid the rush. One of the most highly esteemed ministers of Virginia, or of the Southern Church, wrote to us recently, telling us of a minister of his Synod who had received the degree, but not mentioning his name. The description was given, however, that he was probably the least likely in the Synod to have received such a degree as a real honor. We believe that we have just spotted him. And we advise our four friends who have recently been dubbed by the Indianapolis concern, not to pin that Ph. D. on the end of their names. We would like to ask them if they have any influence with the Central University of Indiana, to ask the University to pay the Standard an advertising claim that it has been unable to collect.

Speaking of a reputable newspaper and advertising, the only rule of the Standard is to avoid indecent advertisements and those known or even suspected to be fraudulent. We cut off this Indiana concern as soon as we ascertained its bogus nature. There was an advertisement not long ago in the Standard that the editor some way did not notice. It offered to give a piano away free to one of several thousand people who would come to the Ware Rooms and register or who would send in their names for registering. For the Piano Company it was a big advertisement besides procuring the names of families that did not have a piano and wanted one. But it was getting something for nothing, so far as the winner was concerned, although the amount that each one lost in the transaction was simply the time or the two cent stamp that would not otherwise have been spent. The aggregate of time and stamps may have been pretty large and so it was really a raffle for a piano, in much the same sense that it is possible to steal a pin. We know a good many people who would not have felt right in having that piano in their home.

While Dowie was planning the invasion of New York one of his deluded followers was fined $500 by a decision of the New York Court of Appeals. The man became a fanatical Dowieite, believed himself to be a "divine healer," and allowed his young daughter at White Plains to die of neglect. The Court decided moreover the principle no citizen has the constitutional right to follow his own beliefs as to the medical treatment of a child, if that belief is not in line with ordinary prudence as to summoning medical aid. It is said that Dowie himself furnished the funds for fighting this case through the courts, but Mrs Eddy might well have contributed. The same principle applies to Christian Scientists, and as the devotees of that faith have showed extraordinary precautions about becoming martyrs, it is to be hoped that there will be no more slaughter of the innocents by them. At least they should be content with practicing the "absent treatment" while the parents send for the doctor. As far as adult fool-killing goes Christian Science is still a beneficent institution and so is Dowieism.

Dr. Francis L. Patton was inaugurated President of Princeton University on Wednesday, October 14. It was a notable occasion and Princeton celebrated formally the beginning of the new life that has come to her through the presidency of one of the most intellectual men in America and the concurrent liberality of one of her friends. Princeton is now the leading Seminary of America in point of endowment and we are glad to know that it has never departed from the faith and never made any surrender to the enemies of pure Calvinism.

One of the significant things about the inauguration of Dr. Patton is the Outlook's comment upon Dr. Patton's address. It is pretty well established now, what the Standard has been contending for some time, that there has been a noted reaction from radical views toward the old truths of the Scripture and that there is a stronger faith than ever in their vital power in the lives of men. Said Dr. Patton:

"I am far from saying that apart from dogmatic Christianity there is no valid ground for theistic ethic. But the motive that will make a man fight for his hearthstone and his home in support of that theistic ethic is his abiding faith in the Incarnate Christ. . . .

In the defense of supernatural Christianity everything is at stake, and this is the reason that the crisis in which we are today is the greatest war of intellect that has ever been waged since the birthday of the Nazarene."

And the Outlook endorses:

"Dr. Patton states two points which in the humanitarian enthusiasm of modern religious activity need to be emphasized: first, that the religion without God is dead, and therefore the incarnation, that is, the entrance of God into human life, is the source of Christian life; second, that a vague belief in a Power not ourselves that makes for righteousness will not inspire men; but embodies that Power. We believe that the outcome of the present religious turmoil will be a profounder and clearer faith in a God who is in his world."

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

The Standard is so thoroughly convinced that there has got to be a radical change of sentiment in the Church toward her candidates for the ministry that it makes no apology for devoting a second editorial to this question. We challenge successful refutation of the argument from analogy between the soldiers of the State and the soldiers of the Church, which was drawn to some length in the preceding article.

One of the primary principles of Presbyterianism is the parity of the ministry. One of the fundamentals of Christianity is that no line shall be drawn against poverty. Both of these principles are violated when the distinction is made to the credit of the man who is able to pay for his own theological education and the discredit of the "beneficiary." Why should there be no dishonor attached to the education of the officers of the United States Army, trained as they are at the public expense, even paid a salary from the outset, while so many in the Church feel it not only a privilege but a duty to reflect upon the manliness of our candidates for the ministry who are supported by the Church when they have dedicated themselves to the Church's service?

We agree that the present system is at fault, but we believe that too many who have recognized that something was the matter have failed to diagnose the case correctly. It is not that help has been given, but that it has been conditioned upon the candidate's helplessness, instead of making the transaction an honorable one to both sides, with the sacrifices on both sides balancing each other. On the face of it, a system that can be abused to the point where the self-respect of the ministry is injured is a sufficient evil in itself to call for a radical reformation. And the reformation can be best begun by the people themselves, with such splendid offerings for this cause and such abundant endowment for our seminaries, that there shall be no more scrimping and cutting down of the necessary funds for the education of our candidates. And it would be just as well for it to begin this month of November.

Here are the conditions of the problem that is staring the Church in the face today. The candidates for the ministry are far too few for the work of the Church. It is urged on the other hand that it is a mistake for the Church to aid its candidates in the long and expensive course of instruction, which, mark you, the Church herself requires, for the reason that this makes mendicants of our ministers. Yet it is perfectly self-evident that the withholding of the aid that is given now would cut down the number of the candidates for the ministry almost to the vanishing point. It is said on the one hand that we ought to have more ministers, and on the other that the ministry is not attracting the very best men nowadays. As to these more or less general assaults upon the character of our candidates the Standard does not sympathize with that sentiment in the least. But taking the arguments of those who oppose the "beneficiary system," which are shopworn enough in all conscience to be taken off the show-counter, and recognizing the startling, painful fact that the Church is unable to put a single man today in a new field without withdrawing him from an established field, putting an incompetent in his place, it can be almost mathematically demonstrated that what the Church needs is not less beneficence, but more.

Perhaps a concrete case that can be vouched for in every particular will help to show the Church the candidate's point of view.

We knew a young man some years ago who after his college course decided to study for the ministry. As he left college rather young he decided to teach for awhile. The first session he made a living. The second he was employed at the rate of nine hundred dollars a year. In the summer, with the promise of an advance in salary, he wrote to the Seminary Professor, who had the charge of the candidates' fund, for distribution, and stated his case, leaving it entirely to the Professor to decide. He said that he purposed devoting his life to the gospel ministry; that he believed himself to be able, in the course of a few years, to save enough for the Seminary course, if in the meantime the care of others who might become dependent did not devolve upon him. That it was simply a question, whether the Church needed the money more or his time in her service. The Professor wrote very promptly and urged the immediate coming to the Seminary and the advice was taken.

That year was one of some self-denial and of more hardship than the young man had ever known, though it did not do him any harm in any way. There were men though who had to make greater sacrifices and he remembers taking up rather warmly once for two of his brethren who had to dress a little more shabbily than was becoming in prospective ministers of the Presbyterian Church. He gave the name of Gibeonites to the "Seminites," and it stuck, for were they not hewers of wood and drawers of water? And the fare and the hard beds! But there was youth and health and the joy of preparation for the most glorious service that has been given to men to do and there was perhaps the mistaken notion that there had been something of sacrifice for the sake of that service, for the sake of Christ. The mistake was soon pointed out.

That summer the young man had a work in a home mission field that paid him fifty dollars a month, the first twenty-five of which went to the payment of a debit for the previous session, when the borrowing of that amount saved the sale of his precious books. One of his classmates had to sell his at auction to pay the last month's board.

The wet cloth fell upon youthful enthusiasm the first time he heard one of the ablest ministers of the Church discuss in his presence the defects of the beneficiary system and how much nobler it was for a man to work his own way through and how much more self-respect he would possess as well as the respect of others. It happened that this minister, whom the young man afterwards learned to love as a father, had been able by inherited wealth to be educated without any charge to the Church, except the beneficiary education that even a candidate for the ministry may accept with self-respect, the education that every college worth going to gives as the fruit of its endowment fund, and which the seminaries all give, theological seminaries in our Church making no charge for tuition. But this minister had a hobby about beneficiary education and he rode it that time straight over a young man's feelings so that they hurt at the remembrance of it to this very hour.

The question of the return to the Seminary was bitterly fought out. There was an idea in one of Elizabeth Stuart Phelps' books, however, that was helpful, and it is passed on here for the encouragement of others, perhaps. It was the bold idea that Our Lord himself was a "beneficiary" at least during his ministry, accepting the ministrations of the women and the other disciples as a part of his humiliation.

But some "self-respect" was saved the next session, by a supplement to the Church's funds, and a corresponding lessening of the appropriation, through the chance of preaching at two churches that year; and with the proceeds of the second summer's work and the supply of three churches the third session, with preaching every Sunday, the appropriation for the last year was brought down almost to the vanishing point. And we had almost forgotten to mention that the young man was "sub-intendant," that year, for which the Seminary paid the munificent wages of twenty-five dollars per session.

At the end of the session a call to a twelve hundred dollar field was declined in favor of a call to a home-mission field that promised seven hundred and fifty dollars and has never paid it all yet, and so the young man began to think, mistakenly, perhaps, that all the sacrifices have not been made by the Church, in the relation between the Church and her candidates. And if there is any difference between his case and the majority of his brethren, he knows that his was more fortunate than that of the most.

No, the Church ought to appropriate enough and the seminaries ought to be well enough endowed to pay all the charges of the course of preparation for the candidates for the ministry, and there should be no humiliating questions asked as to the need. The simple question should be that of the desire to serve the Church in the ministry of the Gospel, and the evidence to be considered for the worthiness of the candidate.

It may very well be that under such a change of conditions, by increased beneficence from the regular channels of the Church and increased endowment of our Theological Seminaries by our rich men, the standard of the ministry itself should be greatly raised. We care not how rigid the requirements be as long as the Church assumes the financial obligation, which the requirements make necessary. Let examinations be as strict as the Presbytery pleases, but let the rigid scrutiny as to the candidate's economy and resources stop. If it shall become as honorable a thing for a man to accept the education which the Church requires as it is to accept a salary in the actual work which the Church requires, and the Church shows by its zeal in this matter her desire for more laborers, then the self-respecting men may displace by their force and merit the men who do not mind the wounding of their self-respect, if such there be, who are mendicant in spirit as well as beneficiaries. And if it is objected that this is far beyond what the Church has done, it is in order to specify and say, the Presbyterian Church. Rome has a heap more sense than we have in this matter. Whoever heard of a beneficiary priest of the Roman Catholic Church, or of any man of any promise desiring to be a priest who was not taken and educated gladly? The Methodist Church solves the problem in a different way and the wrong way, we think, by not requiring so strict a standard of scholarly attainment, but giving support through the opportunity for paid service pari passu with the work of preparation.

But it is idle, utterly idle, for the Church to be praying the Lord of the Harvest to thrust forth laborers into the harvest and then for her to say to the laborers who offer themselves, "You must spend from three to seven years, as the case may be, in sharpening your scythe. And we are very much afraid that you will lose your self-respect and become a mendicant during the process of scythe-sharpening which you must undergo. But may the Lord bless you. Be ye warmed and filled."

A Confession of Arminianism.

Whenever you can get a Cumberland Presbyterian to state the distinctive doctrines of his Church, rather than simply to claim to be a Presbyterian and a "modified Calvinist," you are apt to have him on the hip. Our esteemed contemporary, the Cumberland Presbyterian, would rather do almost anything than admit its Arminianism just at this crisis of the negotiations with a Calvinistic Church, the Northern Presbyterian. But Arminianism is like murder. It will out. And when our contemporary stated not long ago that the difference between Presbyterianism and Cumberland Presbyterianism was that Presbyterianism believed in election before faith and Cumberland Presbyterianism believed in faith before election, it showed itself to be Arminian to the core.

The Christian Observer's comment upon this, "This is a broad difference. The one recognizes our salvation as originating with God; the other recognizes it as originating in part with man," is so inadequate that we discuss the matter here for the sake of keeping the Cumberland Presbyterian to the real point and not allowing it to fight the man of straw that the Observer sets up.

Anybody that knows anything about the two systems of theology knows that the difference between Calvinism and Arminianism is not the affirmation or the denial of election, as the more ignorant Arminians sometimes contend, but the difference in the order of the decrees as we consider them in the divine mind. To the unphilosophic mind this may appear a small matter, and yet when the two systems that take their departure from this point arrive at their logical results, we have the Calvinist emphasizing and the Arminian minimizing the Sovereignty of Almighty God, with the effect of each doctrine upon the character and the life, a comparison that anybody is welcome to make, so far as the consent of Calvinists is concerned.

To state what is already well known, Calvinism conceives of the divine decrees in the following order:

Creation, Fall, Election, Redemption, Vocation.

The Arminian order is: Creation, Fall, Redemption, Vocation, Election.

That is, according to Calvinism, God purposed to create man, then to permit the fall, then to elect out of the fallen mass a people for himself, then to redeem these by the blood of his Son, then to call them by his word and Spirit. This is not only Calvinism, but common sense.

It is not only the plain teaching of Scripture, but the necessary conclusions of a sound philosophy. That election comes before the actual calling of men and the manifestation of their faith is evident in those passages that speak of that divine purpose as "before the foundation of the world." "Inherit the Kingdom prepared for you before the foundation of the world." "Who hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world."

The Arminian contention that God chooses those who choose him is not only unscriptural, but absurd. "Upon foresight of faith and repentance" is an expression that robs God of the very work of faith and repentance which he does in the soul. What God does he has determined to do from all eternity from the very necessity of the Eternal Nature. And even in the Pentecostal outpouring of the Spirit when men were being received into the Church by the thousand, it is written, "As many as were ordained to eternal life believed." The Arminian order would be, "As many as believed were ordained to eternal life." But we did not set out to argue against Arminianism. That is the faith of our Methodist brethren and they have found comfort in it, though it raises problems that are a good deal harder to solve than the problems of Calvinism. We wished merely to point out that this dictum of the recognized organ of Cumberland Presbyterianism, edited by one of the most prominent ministers of their Church, a member of the celebrated Committee on Union, has simply delivered itself over to the immemorial Arminian contention. Probably it did not mean to do so, just now; but it has. And as we said before, the Southern Church would just as willingly join the Southern Methodist Church, on the theory that Calvinism was something not worth fighting for, as join the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, unless indeed that church wants to avail itself of the sounder theological education of most Southern Presbyterians in the honest effort to become good Calvinists themselves.

Review of Contemporaries.

The Congregationalist seems in the following extract to appreciate to some degree the greatness of the greatest man that Congregationalism has produced. But its "discovery of a forgotten treasure" is a striking admission of how far modern Congregationalism has gone from the theology of Jonathan Edwards. And this editorial leaves out of consideration the great secret of Edwards' life, that he made Calvinism his life-system. If New England had not cast him and his theology out there would not be so much talk to-day about Pagan New England:

HONOR EDWARDS' MEMORY.

The observance of the bi-centenary of the birth of Jonathan Edwards has brought before the American people an almost forgotten figure, in many respects the most stately and impressive in their whole history. It is like the discovery of a forgotten treasure whose value is newly appraised. It is not only through addresses made in the institutions of learning with which his name is associated, such as Yale and Andover and Hartford, and in the places where he lived—Windsor and Northampton and Stockbridge—but through articles in the religious and secular press, through sermons and speeches, that a hero of other days comes into view, and wins a greater meed of praise than he received during his lifetime.

"Far the highest name which the new world has to boast of," said Thomas Chalmers. "He ranks with the brightest luminaries of the Christian Church, not excluding any century or any age since the apostolic," said Robert Hall. "His power of subtle argument, perhaps unmatched, certainly unsurpassed among men," said Sir James Mackintosh. "It may be questioned whether the world can furnish a more signal example of the results of solitary thought," said Pres. Mark Hopkins. "We can be sure that his name is among the kings; we cannot be sure that another name in our whole history is there," says Dr. George A. Gordon. Princeton University has written above his dust that he is "second to no mortal man." Yale bears on one of her chapel windows the testimony that he was "a philosopher of sacred things who moves the admiration of the ages." The most recent opinion of those who best know American history confirms this testimony. When the vote was taken three years ago on candidates for the Hall of Fame, Edwards stood first in the list of American theologians, and his strength was not only in New England, which was his home, but in the Southern and Western States. His admirers were more equally distributed than those of any of his competitors. Now comes the procession of orators, journalists and reviewers to celebrate his birth, and while they unanimously set aside many of his theological conclusions, they without a discordant voice, award to Edwards the highest place among American thinkers and a rank unsurpassed for nobility of character and saintliness of life.

Yet of what great American are there so few tokens to remind men even that he existed as of Edwards? Where is there any statue to his honor? Only two churches in the United States bear his name. Scarcely a trace of him is found at South Windsor, Ct., where he was born. The few relics associated with him at Northampton and Stockbridge have until recently been unknown to many of the residents of those towns. So far as obtainable we have gathered into a recent number of the Congregationalist pictures and accounts of most of the localities and articles that survive with which he is known to have had to do in his lifetime.

Jonathan Edwards had lived in Scotland or England, the towns in which he was born and had lived would be visited by tourists from every land. If he had lived in Italy or Russia these places would be marked by shrines bearing his name, and the paths to them would be worn by the feet of pilgrims, and the popular story of his life with choice selections from his writings would be in the hands of the people. It will be a great misfortune if this revived interest in Edwards shall be allowed to die with nothing further done to popularize the man and his thought and to preserve by appropriate monuments among the American people the memory of one of the greatest of her sons.

In the light of the proclamation of the Presbyterian, Philadelphia, which we quoted in our last issue, that there must be no surrender of straight Calvinism, or order to union with the Cumberland Church, the following from the Cumberland Presbyterian Church is interesting. In fact we "gallery folks," as the Interior once called the Southern Presbyterians, are looking on with unusual but very natural interest at the spectacle:

Lest unnecessary anxiety should be felt in any quarter, we desire to say very positively that the Cumberland Presbyterian Committee did not volunteer, nor was it asked to consent to, any compromise or surrender of its historic doctrinal position. If the Cumberland Presbyterian Church is ever united with the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, the union will be a real one, faithful alike to our history and to our consistent creedal contentions. Upon this point there is no difference of opinion in our committee, and none, we believe, in the committee with which we are negotiating.

And the following paragraph from the same source does not read exactly like the interpretation given by the Interior of the action of the Colored Committee. It may not be an impossibility that the Cumberland Presbyterians will settle the colored question, in the little courtship that is now going on, and the doctrinal incompatibility of temper is seen to be too great between the two flirting bodies now, one more difficulty will have been removed to the reunion of the Northern and Southern Churches:

Premature criticism and unrest might be prevented by the announcement that although the Cumberland Presbyterian Committee represents all sections of the country and if fully advised concerning those social conditions and racial problems necessarily involved in this movement, the plans already proposed for the solution of these questions, plans upon which the General Assembly and the presbyteries of the Presbyterian Church will have acted long before any union can be effected, are thought to be in such substantial accord with Cumberland Presbyterian policies and practices as to satisfy those whose associations with the colored race entitle them to an opinion about what is best for the religious progress of both white and black people. It ought not to be necessary to add what should be taken for granted, that no basis of union would be accepted by the Cumberland Presbyterian Committee if it contained any condition radically at variance with social customs prevailing in the section of country where Cumberland Presbyterians live and labor in such large numbers. It is quite gratifying to add that the members of the committee with whom negotiations are in progress are fully as eager as we could be to so adjust this vexed and delicate question of racial relations as to make Presbyterian conquest possible, even where the two races concerned are living in the same communities. This carefully chosen language need not be illiterately interpreted either for it is employed by one who has spent his entire life amid environments which should leave him in no doubt about what are the necessary social conditions of church prosperity where widely differing races dwell together at the same time that they must dwell apart.

The Temperance Congress to be held this month in Paris, as already announced here, will be followed by a Congress of the League against Public and Private Immorality, on October 28 and 29, in the splendid Y. M. C. A. building which is largely the gift of Mr. James Stokes of New York to the young men of Paris. The name of this league is "The White Star" (L'Etoile blanche); it is proposed on this occasion to perfect its organization, which has hitherto been provisional, and to seek the fusion of this society with that of "The White Cross" (La Croix blanche), an association of kindred purpose. It is farther proposed to define the attitude of the society with regard to the public regulation of prostitution and to the International Federation which has for its object the abolition of such regulation. An important feature of the occasion will be a debate, in which the well known Christian Socialist, Pastor Gounelle of Roubaix, will be a leader, concerning the practicability of forming a Christian branch of the International Federation. As is well known, associated with all moralizing movements on the Continent are many men of admirable character who are distinctly non-religious, often from conscientious and especially from patriotic motives. Therefore nearly all these movements necessarily exclude religious considerations from their motives and methods. Pastor Gounelle and others are seeking a way, not to force a religious test upon their associates in movements for public morality, but to prove to them that religion counts for much in the elevation and purification of social life.—The Christian Work and Evangelist.

Book Notices.

A New England View of the Little Book.

In this volume Dr. Stagg aims to correct the impression (which he seems to believe to be quite general) that Calvin and his followers taught, without any modification, what became popularly known, especially among adherents of other churches, as "infant damnation." Dr. Stagg says: "The great majority of people believe the Presbyterian Church teaches the doctrine of the reprobation of infants from the impression that has been made in conversation and by lectures directed to the abuse of Calvinism and have never read a line either in hostile or friendly works. * * * Mrs. Edward D. Latta, having been convinced by an article of mine that John Calvin did not hold the horrible opinions charged to him, wrote me a letter, full of the expression of the joy of a mother's heart at finding the teaching of this great and good man on the salvation of infants entirely different from what she supposed, and asked me to write something that might be used in enlightening the people." The result of this request is the volume under consideration. Dr. Stagg makes his case clear, and, in view of what he says regarding the general misconceptions of the doctrines of Calvin, the Presbyterian Church as a whole owes him a debt of gratitude. The author declares that he has found men high in Presbyterianism, as well as learned men in other denominations, who were grossly ignorant of the actual faith and teachings of Calvin and Twisse. If such be the case, this little volume, which is very neat as regards mechanics, should find its sphere of usefulness a broad one.

THE ONE WOMAN.—By Thomas Dixon, Jr., author of The Leopard's Spots. New York; Doubleday, Page & Co. vo. 350 pages. $1.50. (In its 70th thousand, Sept. 15th.)

Interesting? Yes—for the same reason that scandal is; few of us are strong enough to turn a deaf ear to it, or to refrain from repeating it. The writer, who had not read "The Leopard's Spots," opened this book at nine o'clock one evening; before it was closed the end was reached.

The evil against which it is aimed is not as yet a crying one among us, so more harm will come by way of suggestion, than good. It isn't a book to be read aloud around the fireside, and the majority of people will be better off by not reading it at all.

The long-suffering love of The One Woman is pure gold. The remainder is simply yellow.

We have all taken a sorrow or a perplexity out into the noontide or the midnight and felt its morbid bitterness drawn out of it, and a great peace descend and fill it from the depth of the majesty under whose arch we stood. . . . The sweet and solemn influence which comes to you out of the noontide or the midnight sky does not take away your pain, but it takes out of it its bitterness. It lifts it to a higher peace. It says, "Be still and wait."—Phillips Brooks.

Devotional.

Be Still.—Ps. 46:10.

Be still, oh restless heart,
 And know that I am God;
 To trust me is thy part.
 Be still and hear my word.
 In silence come and bend
 Beneath my chastening rod,
 Though conflicts fierce attend
 Thy pathway, I am God.
 Thy refuge I will be,
 And strength, be not afraid;
 Be still and thou shalt see
 My works and power displayed.
 In silence shalt thou learn
 To follow my commands,
 My will, my love discern
 For souls in heathen lands.

Hamlet, N. C.

G. C. W.

There are men who can not know of a need in all the world without its immediately taking the shape of a personal appeal to them. They must go and do this thing. There are such men who seem to have a sort of magnetic attraction for all wrongs and pains. All grievances and woes fly to them to be righted and consoled. They attract need. They can not sleep at Troas but the soul of Macedonia finds them out and comes across and begs them: "Come and help us." We must all be thankful to know that there are such men among us, however little we may feel that we are such men ourselves; nay, however little we may want to be such men.—Bishop Brooks.

Christianity stands or falls with the authority of Scripture. Whoever impairs the faith of mankind in the Word of God is an enemy of religion, however much he may claim to be its friend. If the Bible is false, Christianity is false. If the Bible is a fallible human book, the gospel is a fallible, human religion. Let us understand the magnitude of the issue. In modern discussions of the Bible more is at stake than a theory of inspiration. Calvary is at stake. Religion may be approved by reason and endorsed by the church, but this is not enough. God's voice alone commands assent. The Bible is the voice of God—nothing less.—James Vance.

A terrible fire was raging, and many attempts were being made to save a child who stood frantic at the top window. One man, braver than the rest, in making a bold venture was about to fail, when some one in the crowd cried, "Cheer him, cheer him" The people caught the words and cheered loudly, and, inspired by the shouts of encouragement raised on all sides, the man redoubled his efforts and rescued that which he sought to save from the flames. Do you know any Christian worker who is trying by all means in his power to snatch "brands from the burning," and to save immortal souls? Cheer him, and then see how your kindly sympathy helps him to work on with fresh courage and renewed energy.—Episcopal Recorder.

There is something noble about the one who is willing to wait. Simon lingering about the Temple, old and gray-headed, but waiting on. Abraham tottering upon his staff, but believing that God's word would yet come true. These were the history makers of time. They have dug the channels in which flow the current of the ages. But lives are linked together as one. Men have died with their faces toward the East. The stars arose, but they were not permitted the sight. The Patriarch longed for days that were denied him. But his life was not lived in vain. His waiting was counted for a righteousness. He was the stronger because of it. There are harvests beyond the fences of our expectations.—The Philadelphia Journal.

Missionary.

Missionary Enthusiasm.

By Rev. H. P. Lyman Wheaton, D. D.

What is enthusiasm? Enthusiasm is a Greek word. It means the fulness of divine inspiration; it implies an absorbing, a passionate devotion to some good cause. It means the state of those whom St. Paul describes as "fervent," literally, "boiling in spirit;" it describes the mean and earthly spirit of man transfigured, uplifted, dilated by the spirit of the living God. When man is an enthusiast for the good it is because a spirit greater than his own has swept over him, has flashed into his conscience the conviction of absorbing truth. It has made him magnetic to multitudes, has made him as a flame of fire which leaps up among dying embers, as the wind of God which breathes over the slain that they might live. Without enthusiasm of some noble kind a man is dead, and without enthusiasm a nation perishes. Of each man it is true that in proportion to his enthusiasm is the grandeur of his life; of each nation it is true that without enthusiasm it never has the will, and much less the power, to remove the heavy burden, to atone for the intolerable wrong.

Missionary enthusiasm! In the first centuries the world was full of missionaries. In those days every Christian looked upon it as a part of his life to be God's missionary, and for centuries the Church produced many a noble missionary—men like Boniface, men like Columban. Then for one thousand years began the age of neglect, of darkness, of priestly superstition, and there was only found here and there a man like St. Louis of France, or St. Francis of Assisi, with the mission spirit strong within him. It is to Count Zinzendorf and the Moravians and to our Dutch forefathers that we owe the revival of missionary zeal.

In the eighteenth century missionaries were regarded as foolish and rash, and I know not what, for the devil has a large vocabulary of words with which to quench the spirit which is so dangerous to his domain. When the poor cobbler, William Carey, proposed to go as a missionary to India, he was told with a sneer by his religious associates, that if God wished to convert the heathen He would doubtless do so in His own way; but how glorious an example have the great workers in the field set before us. Think of John Eliot, the lion-hearted "Apostle of the Indians," and his motto that "prayer and painstaking can accomplish anything." Think of the young and sickly David Brainerd going alone into the wild forests of the West and among their wilder denizens, with the words "Not from necessity but from choice, for it seems to me that God's dealings towards me have fitted me for a life of solitariness and hardship." Think of Judson and the tortures he bore so cheerfully in his Burmese prison. Think of Eugene Casalis, of Dr. Phillip that burning missionary herald of the Gospel in South Africa, of Rolland, of Lemne, of Bisseaux, and of Vander Kempmen who thought not their lives dear unto them. Nor do I know of any signs more helpful for the Church and for the nation than these that our college and seminary students are to be found doing heroic missionary work in the slums of our large cities and at our frontier, while others, forsaking the comforts of home life are going forth in the spirit of their Master to labor in heathen lands. What is it that can sustain them? It is an inspired enthusiasm; it is the fervency with which the spirit of Christ their Lord inspires, the fervency which scorns luxury and pours silent contempt upon gold. That it may please Thee to pour into our hearts the spirit of missionary enthusiasm. We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.—The Christian Intelligencer.

The Christianity that attempts to suffer by proxy is not the Christianity of Christ. Each individual Christian, business-man, citizen, needs to follow in His steps along the path of personal sacrifice for Him.

David and Absalom.

II Sam. 15:1-12. Nov. 1st, 1903.

Absalom was David's third son, born at Hebron. He was of royal lineage on his mother's side, and possessed many gifts and advantages. He was a comely person of rare physical attractions. He was a man of talent, of great intellectual force and of polished manners. Reared in a court he had the arts of a courtier, keen perceptions as to the best means for attaining an end and the graces of speech, which conceal thought or give it forcible expression, or win the favor of the multitude. Absalom had all the elements of character that pertain to a first-class demagogue. His treatment of his father, and his attempt to secure the throne of Israel furnish some instructive lessons to which we may profitably attend.

1st. Absalom Seeking Popularity.—To attain the throne he must win popular favor. He must keep himself before the people, and attract their admiration. He well knew their fondness for display and pageantry. Hence he affects royal state and when he appeared in public it is with chariots and horses, and "fifty men to run before him." He thus attracts attention to his handsome person and suggests that he would be fitting material for kingship. But he must not only attract public notice, but manifest an apparent sympathy with the common people if he would secure their favor. Popularity is won not by magnificent isolated state, but by familiar intercourse expressing concern for their welfare. Hence Absalom was early at the gate where the people congregated and sought judgments from the king to express his interest in their affairs, and to assure them of the rightfulness of the cause they represented. He also endeavored to undermine the authority of the king, his father, by declaring that he neglected his duty and had deputed no man to hear their cause and uphold righteousness. He also affirms "Oh, that I were made judge in the land, that every man which has any suit or cause might come unto me and I would do him justice." Thus did he endeavor to win popularity to foster discontent with the existing order of things and to direct popular choice to himself as promising beneficent changes. But a seeming regard for persons is more winning to humanity than concern for their material or secular interests. Hence Absalom gave to all who sought judgment from the king, and offered him homage, the kiss that expressed courtesy, interest and affection. Thus this cunning dissembler "stole the hearts of the men of Israel."

2nd. Absalom's Hypocrisy.—Absalom's interest in the people was not sincere. He was a hypocrite in his dealings with them. He designed to win their support, and to use them to serve his purposes, and to promote his own aggrandizement. His intense selfishness was masked under a seeming concern for the peoples' welfare.

Thus it often is with many plausible demagogues. But this ingrate son was also a hypocrite in dealing with his father. He pretended to have a regard for his father's authority in asking permission to go to Hebron, when he was plotting his destruction. He was, too, hypocritical in religion and professed a desire to honor God and to perform vows at Hebron.

3rd. Absalom's Conspiracy.—His plot against his father's throne and life, though most infamous, was well conceived, and skillfully executed for the end in view. Whatever else Absalom lacked he was not wanting in astuteness and energy. He left Jerusalem for Hebron unhindered and under cover of fulfilling pious vows. He carried with him two hundred men as helpers who were not acquainted with his designs. He sent spies throughout the land of Israel to excite the people to espouse his cause at a given signal. He secured the aid and co-operation of Ahithophel, one of David's most trusted counselors.

What Elijah Teaches Us.

II Kings 2:1-12; Matt. 11:14; James 5:17, 18.

Topic for November 8.

"And Elijah the Tishbite who was of the inhabitants of Gilead, said unto Ahab, As the Lord God of Israel liveth before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." Such is the startling introduction which we have to Elijah. From the time of the revolt of the ten tribes the history of Israel is as a dark blot upon the history of the nation. King succeeded king; dynasty succeeded dynasty, but through it all, we see not one ray of light. The darkness of idolatry and heathenish practices was settling over the deluded nation as an ever blacking night. No voice had been raised which spoke with enough power to hold back the people from their abominations, each king, and each dynasty seemed worse than its predecessor, until about the worst of them all, ascended the throne. He took for his wife the pagan Jezebel, who was to ancient times what Lady Macbeth was at a later day, a bad, cruel, blood-thirsty woman. With Ahab on the throne with Jezebel for a consort, affairs had become so bad that it didn't seem that they could get any worse. But no voice amid the throngs of Samaria was raised in protest. However, God always provides a man for the place where he is needed.

Across the Jordan, in the hill country of Gilead there was a man who had heard of the terrible state of affairs existing on the other side of the river. Probably he was a shepherd, and knew little other than to lead the flocks out to pasture, but somehow he had come to know God and he was touched to the heart to see how God's name was dishonored and His worship neglected.

He was at last seized with the irresistible thought that God needed his voice raised in protest, and leaving his old haunts, he wrapped his mantle about him and started for Jezreel. Into the presence of the wicked king he came and hurled his denunciatory and threatening message.

It sounded hard as it fell on the ears of the king. But no doubt he thought this man in his half-civilized garb, was but a harmless fanatic. He found out differently. Every word spoken by Elijah came true.

This leads us then to the secret of Elijah's life. He lived in such close communion with God that he knew God's voice when he spoke to him and he believed every word that God uttered. Elijah may have been familiar with the passage in Deuteronomy where God had said that He would shut up the heavens that they give no rain if Israel should ever do just what they had now done. If he was familiar with that threat he now had faith to believe that God would do just what He had said He would do. So firmly did he believe it that he would stand in the presence of the king and declare it.

But we find that Elijah was a man whose faith could make him wait on God, in silence and seclusion, as well as in turmoil and activities. He went at God's command to the brook Cherith and there waited patiently for God's further word to allow him to leave the place. Daily he saw the brook dwindling and drying up, yet he did not run away. God had put him beside a drying brook and he would remain there till God would tell him to go elsewhere.

Many people are sitting beside drying brooks, but too often it is because they cannot get away. Sometimes it is necessary for us to sit beside the drying brooks, and when it is, we should do so waiting cheerfully for God to take us somewhere else. Sometimes we see friends taken away; sometimes prosperity is forsaking us; sometimes we see one plan after another which we had made, being frustrated; at such times we should turn to the story of Elijah and there learn that it is not hard to sit beside even a drying brook if we have God for our companion.

Critical Political Situation of Our Congo Mission.

I feel it to be my duty to write this brief article in order to inform all those who are interested in our wonderful African Mission, that the Congo Independent State government has been for several years and is now seriously interfering with our work and progress there. It will be remembered that the Congo Independent State was organized and recognized by the Powers at the Conference of Berlin in 1834. Leopold II, king of Belgium, was made the absolute Sovereign of this great Congo Basin, having an area nearly one half as large as the United States and a population estimated at 30,000,000. Perhaps if the powers had diligently searched for a man the most unfit in every way to fill and execute properly the sacred trust committed to his hand they could not have succeeded better than in taking this man Leopold, King of Belgium. Being by nature a conscienceless, heartless and cruel fellow, it is now not surprising to learn that though he made many good promises at the time the trust was committed to him, he is now openly and defiantly violating these promises and is outraging the Christian conscience of the world by his iniquitous government there. At the time of his appointment to be the absolute ruler of these 30,000,000 of natives and the conservator of civilization and christianity in that great region, the powers thought to bind him by certain treaty obligations which he was bound to abide by. One of these was that slavery was to be put down and everything done to ameliorate the condition of the native people. I make bold to say that, owing to the new system of forced military and labor laws now in operation there by which the people are compelled to serve in the army and to labor on public works of all kinds, accompanied with innumerable instances of cruelty and the most heartless atrocities, the natives are reduced to a condition of serfdom far worse than existed under the Arab regime. I could give, if necessary, many instances of these cruelties which have come under my own personal observation. Time and again I, acting under authority of our Mission there, have called the attention of the king and his government to this situation of affairs. Nothing has ever been done, and no one has ever been punished that I know of, though the king is always pretending to wait to punish his officers and the soldiers who commit these atrocities. But it can easily be seen that the king himself and the whole system of government are to blame and not the often innocent white officers and native soldiers who can only execute the orders sent them by the central government at Brussels. Another important stipulation of the treaty was that no hindrance whatsoever was to be put in the way of Missions of every kind, in carrying on their work. I am sorry to say that so blatant and bold has the king become in his system of treaty breaking that during the past four or five years it has been utterly impossible for our Missions to buy a single square inch of land on which to open up and carry on any new work in places other than those already occupied by us. This action of the government strikes at the very root of our Mission work and progress. Already we have been injured more than we can estimate by this interference. Our General Assembly, at its meeting in Lexington, Va., last May, recognizing the crisis there is in our work, appointed a committee to lay this matter before our government at Washington, for the United States was the first great power to recognize the independence of the Congo State, and is therefore greatly responsible for the existence of the present government there. This committee, or at least two of its members, met in Washington in July. They failed to see the President and the Secretary of State, both being away from the city at the time, but they laid the matter before the State Department. Our government has not taken hold of the matter yet and perhaps will not do so unless it is earnestly and persistently pushed before the attention of those in authority.

This committee is called to meet again in Washington on Nov. 3d. This article is written chiefly with the view of asking all the friends of liberty and humanity and especially those interested in the African Missions, if they will not unite in prayer to God that he may make bare his power in delivering the down-trodden native people from under the heel of the tyrant, and also that he may take away all the barriers which the wicked government has placed in the way of the progress of the Gospel.

Calvinism and the Punishment of Crime.

The two recent Carolina verdicts have been much discussed with reasons therefor and judgments thereon. May it not be that, deep beneath all the outward and temporal reasons that have been correctly given for this prostitution of justice, there is a further reason in the fact of the decreasing knowledge and sense of justice, growing out of a comparative over-emphasis on mercy, humanitarianism, etc.? And does not this arise from a too much obscuring of the tremendous fact of justice—as it is in God, as it ought to be in man? And is not this obscuring of justice caused by the soft sloppy doctrines that are coming to be held by many people and preached from some pulpits? Doctrines that know no God of righteousness, equity and judgment but exalt a sickly sentimental humanitarianism—a grotesque burlesque of mercy.

If those judges and jurors had been the right stripe of Calvinists, both of those verdicts would have been different. Calvinism exalts to the heavens mercy, but it exalts to the same heaven justice. God forbid that we should rejoice in the death of any criminal as a fellow-mortal, but with deep pity and compassion for the poor wretch, we could not but rejoice for the sake of righteousness and justice in some dozen first-class hangings. It would wonderfully purify the tepid atmosphere and greatly exalt righteousness, law and God.

Dr. Stoddert's "Dance-Sermon."

By Rev. H. H. Hawes, D. D.

Several people have wished an account of it. Those who knew Dr. Stoddert can best appreciate this sketch. During my pastorate at Farmville, Va., Dr. Stoddert had charge of several churches in Cumberland county. Again and again rumor said that he would preach a sermon on dancing in my church. I wrote, asking him if the report was true, assuring him that he would be welcome to my pulpit at any time. His reply was: "No; I am not going to preach on dancing in your church or any other. I do not consider it a fit subject for a sermon. But I have been asked to give my views on the subject, and expect to do so next Sabbath afternoon at the Lithia Springs at 4 o'clock." The springs were just across the river, say half a mile distant. A roofed platform had been erected for dancing and other purposes. There the talk was to be given.

At the appointed time a large audience—such as always greeted that most remarkable speaker—assembled. The reverend gentleman gave out a hymn to be sung, read a chapter in the Bible (foreign to the occasion and subject); offered a prayer; called upon us to stand and sing the Long Metre Doxology, then said: "Be seated. The religious part of this service is over." He next said in substance: "I propose to present both sides of this question about dancing, and will endeavor to give to each full justice." The origin and age of the modern dance was stated, followed by the remark: "If a lot of young men and women had been found dancing together in the time of our Lord's life on earth, those old Jews would have gone into sackcloth and ashes; then proceeded solemnly to stone the lunatics." Before proceeding further I must allude to a sermon which he once preached on Zaccheus, that a remark made in the latter part of his lecture may be understood. He had represented Zaccheus as having made himself a poor man, after his interview with Jesus in Jericho, and depicted in a most vivid way, the wrathful "curtain lectures" which "Mrs Zaccheus" had given her leige ord because his sacrifices for Jesus had limited her supply of pocket money. One day Zaccheus, being down town, heard of the crucifixion of Jesus. Wishing to "break the news" as gently as possible (for his own sake) to the madam, he hastened home. After some searching he found her under the shed in the back yard, robed in sackcloth and sprinkling ashes over her person. She had heard the news, and Zaccheus was well tongue-lashed for allowing that "tramp," as she called Jesus, to fool him into impoverishing his family.

The closing of the lecture was as follows:

"Now some of you may think I am crazy, but I am going to give you a piece of history. You may not think it is Scripture, but when you go home look it up in your Bibles, which I doubt if any of you read enough to know what is recorded in them.

"Once upon a time, when James, the brother of our Lord, was Bishop at Jerusalem, he gave a great ball. Invitations were issued to all the young folks in his social circle, and that coming ball was the talk of the town. It was to be a great affair. Peter had two daughters in Jerusalem whose beauty and accomplishments made them great belles. Without them, the ball would lose much of its attractions. Miss Zaccheus was on a visit to the city, and she was a great 'catch,' as Zaccheus had retrieved his fortunes by making a 'corner in olive oil,' and his daughter was very rich. John, the beloved disciple, was living in Jerusalem—an enthusiastic dancer. But he excused himself from attending the ball because of pressure of work. He was writing his epistles, soon to be issued, and the printers were pushing him for 'copy.' But Mary, the mother of our Lord, who was living with John,—she having been left to his care,—said she would go and help them to fix up, though she was too old to dance. A few days before the time for the ball, the Apostle Paul came to Jerusalem from one of his missionary tours, accompanied by two noble young Greeks. As soon as their arrival was known invitations were sent to them, and gratefully accepted. Paul was of diminutive figure, but a most exquisite dancer. When the longed-for hour came the house of James was ablaze with light. All the elite of the city assembled and the ball promised to be a great success. Mary acted the 'wall-flower,' and delighted in seeing the young people enjoy themselves. The dance went fast and furious until the 'wee hours' of the night. The event was voted a grand success, and it wound up with a 'set-to' between Mary and Paul. Paul had introduced a new step which he had picked up abroad, and it became all the 'rage.' When all was over, Paul offered to escort Mary home, as he desired to see John, and was to leave the city the next day. John was greatly delighted to see Paul, but begged to be excused for a few moments as the 'printer's devil' was waiting for 'copy,' and the epistles were in press. While waiting, Mary and Paul discussed the splendid ball given by James, and when that new step, which Paul had introduced, was mentioned, John could work no longer, but threw down his pen and insisted that they and there Paul should teach it to him. John, being an expert dancer, soon mastered it, and when Paul went away he left Mary and John knocking it off to each other.

"Now, doubtless, some of you think I am guilty of sacrilege in taking such liberties with those holy characters of the Bible—James, the brother of our Lord! Mary, the mother of our Lord! You are horrified at the thought of their dancing! But stop! What did our Lord say? 'Whosoever doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother and sister and mother.' You believe that those holy men and women were doing the Father's will? You are shocked at the thought of their dancing! But are you not as truly brother, sister, mother, as they were, if you are doing the will of God? Our Lord said it! 'Whosoever!' Now if it was a sin for them to dance, as doers of God's will, it is as much a sin for you if you are doing God's will. Go home and think about it.' Some things only the Rev. Wm. Stoddert D. D., ever imagined or dared to say.

Response of Dr. W. W. Moore

On behalf of the North Carolina Society of Richmond to the Address of Welcome at the North Carolina Reunion, Greensboro, Oct. 12th, 1903:

According to the last census there are 53,235 natives of North Carolina now living in Virginia. If that is a correct estimate, and there is every reason to believe that the number is now larger rather than smaller than it was in 1900, it means that, besides the scores of us who have the delightful privilege of responding in person to the call of our venerated mother to gather again under the ancestral roof-tree, there are some fifty thousand other sons and daughters of hers within the bounds of the Old Dominion, who think no less tenderly and proudly than we of the good old State that gave us birth, whose hearts turn wistfully to Greensboro today, and whose memories echo the stately music of Judge Gaston's hymn:

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her;
Though the scorner may sneer at and wittings defame her,

Our hearts swell with gladness whenever we name her."

For these fifty thousand Virginia-Carolinians or Carolina-Virginians, whichever you may prefer to call them,—and I do not believe that any better brand of either Carolinians or Virginians ever drew breath—for these fifty thousand brothers and sister of ours whom North Carolina has loaned to Virginia, and who, though busy and happy in the State of their adoption, nevertheless turn longing and loving eyes toward the State of their birth, I wish to be spokesman in part this morning, and especially for that thrice happy contingent whose good fortune it is to live in the famous and beautiful city by the James which is the capital of that commonwealth, and which was and is and ever will be in history and memory the capital also of the short-lived but immortal Confederacy.

There is no city in the world whose name thrills the hearts of all true Carolinians with such tender and heroic memories. When the red wave of war rolled around her forty years ago and the troops of all the confederated States vied with each other in the defence of their beleaguered capital there were none whose blood flowed more freely in her behalf than that of the sons of North Carolina, and so to the sons of North Carolina in every succeeding generation the very soil of Richmond will be holy ground by reason of that baptism with North Carolina blood. In her peaceful cemeteries at Oakwood and Hollywood hundreds of the heroes sleep who at their country's call left these hills and plains, which they loved no less than we, to lay down their lives or the fields of Virginia.

For these reasons North Carolinians can never be indifferent to Richmond, nor can Richmond ever be indifferent to them.

In the Confederate museum, which occupies the war time residence of President Davis, there is a North Carolina room, along the side of which in large letters, runs the ringing line which summarizes our record in the war—"First at Bethel, farthest at Gettysburg, last at Appomatox" and from the walls of which, among the portraits of other men of our stock whom Virginia delights to honor, there looks down the strong and genial face of that transcendent North Carolinian, Zebulon B. Vance, the greatest governor of any State, North or South, and the man who, on a later occasion, when Virginia lacked a fit champion of her own on the floor of the Federal senate, became her defender and stood as fearlessly for the rights of her people as he had ever stood for the rights of his own. Virginia will never forget that service. Distinguished natives and residents of the State have vied with each other in expressing their enthusiastic appreciation of the character and services of our great senator and of the great people whom he represented. Only yesterday I was reading such a tribute from Gen. Bradley T. Johnson, over whose bier Virginia bowed herself weeping less than a week ago. He says that Governor Vance's purchase of steamers with the State's money during the war, and his organization of a line from Wilmington to Bermuda, kept North Carolina soldiers the best armed, best clothed, and best equipped of any in the field; and he uses the fact as an illustration of what he calls our extraordinary capacity of knowing what to do, and of doing it. For he declares that the most marked characteristic of the North Carolinian is his executive capacity—his ability to do things. And he adds, this beats to nothing the ability to talk. He has never distinguished himself much as an orator or as a writer. He was never been a Patrick Henry nor a Jefferson, but in seeing the thing to do and in doing it he surpasses all Southern men. The same gallant soldier says that in 161 the military population of North Carolina was 115,369, and she furnished 125,000 men to the Confederate army, nearly one third of whom perished during the conflict. And yet, when the end came, both at Appomattox and at Greensboro, she stacked more muskets than any other State of the Confederacy.

These generous words indicate, far more fittingly than anything which it would be proper for me to say, the hearty admiration felt by Richmond for North Carolinians, and, as I need hardly add, the North Carolinians resident there reciprocate the feeling heart and soul. One of the most honored veterans in Richmond and one of my warmest personal friends, while yielding to no man in his admiration of North Carolina's devotion and courage, thinks that perhaps the claims thus put forward by writers from Virginia and Maryland as to North Carolina's part in the war have been a trifle overdrawn, but, after every abatement in the interests of absolute accuracy, it remains a glorious record. And the Virginians rejoice to recognize it.

Another gallant gentleman and Confederate veteran, one of the staff officers of Stonewall Jackson, now my neighbor and intimate personal friend, who could have marched with Deborah's soldiers out of Zebulum according to either the Authorized Version or the Revised, since he can handle with equal ease the marshal's baton and the pen of the writer, but who now has laid aside the sword for good and is permanently engaged in the peaceful pursuit of editing a religious newspaper, says handsomely in his last issue that the reason there are so many distinguished non-resident natives of the Old North State is that they are in such great demand elsewhere, adding that if North Carolina were to withdraw from Virginia her many sons and daughters, there would be a serious disturbance if not a breakdown of some institutions.

These kindly expressions indicate well the delightful relations existing between the North Carolinians living in Richmond and the people of the fair city of their adoption.

But I hasten to turn these remarks into another channel lest we appear to be guilty of unseemly self-praise. I was told recently of a native of North Carolina and of my part of North Carolina too who had moved to one of the Gulf States and naturally enough had been made governor of the State and had given the commonwealth a strong, clean, prosperous administration, and who, on standing for re-election reviewed his services to the State with pardonable pride, describing con amore and inextenso what he had done for her, and dwelling upon it with such evident satisfaction and glowing emphasis as to call forth from an old darkey who was among his hearers and who was asked what he thought of the governor's speech, the succinct remark, "He sut'ny do recommend hisself." But, Mr. President, if we seem to do the same this morning, let it be remembered that this is our time for boasting, if ever such a time comes to such a people as ours,—this is North Carolina's day. Surely it may be permitted a solid, steady, thoroughgoing State like ours, which has ever been more renowned for doing things than for talking about them, to call attention once in a modest way on the occasion of the first reunion of her scattered sons and daughters to what the people have said about them among whom they have lived. Nay, sir, I go further. If Sir Walter Scott was correct in what he said about Roderick Dhu that then, reversing the sentiment, I should say that for three hundred and thirty thousand men of North Carolina birth, living and laboring in other States, even two blasts upon a bugle horn were not a blast too much. Moreover, my point in quoting what Virginians have said about North Carolinians was to show how happy the relations are which exist between these generous and high minded people of the Old Dominion and the North Carolinians who have gone to dwell among them.

"One blast upon his bugle horn Were worth a thousand men,"

But, besides this bond of sacred sentiment to which I have referred, growing out of their brotherhood in the days that tried men's souls, when shoulder to shoulder they marched and fought, and side by side laid down their lives,—besides the respect and confidence developed in a common experience of disaster and sorrow, when both proud commonwealths were trampled and plundered,—besides the grateful appreciation and affection kindled in the hearts of Virginians by the chivalrous services rendered their State by North Carolinians and the equally grateful appreciation and affection kindled in the hearts of North Carolinians by the no less chivalrous services rendered their State by Virginians, besides this bond of sacred sentiment, there is between us a bond of common business interests which can probably not be paralleled in the relations existing between any other two States in the Union. Not only do these States lie side by side along a boundary line of some three hundred and fifty miles, like two fair sisters in loving embrace—not only is this the longest single boundary between any two of the original thirteen States, so that more of their territory is in actual juxtaposition and contact than in the case of any other two, but the line itself is an arbitrary one, determined by no natural barrier, and is therefore invisible and easily crossed, so that the people of the two States easily mingle. As the New River flows from North Carolina into Virginia and the Dan from Virginia into North Carolina, both however crossing and recrossing the line repeatedly, as though liking both States so much that they cannot decide which they like best, so the people of the two cross and recross the border, equally at home on either side.

Another thing which has mightily promoted the commercial as well as social intimacy of the two commonwealths is the way in which the railroads have been built.

Great trunk lines, running North and South, and traversing the whole width of both, and sending lateral ramifications this way and that, have bound the two States together in bands of steel. Our North Carolina railways have sought the sea as much or more by the deep water ports of Virginia than by those of our own State, and have poured our cotton and tobacco and other products as well as our men and women, into Norfolk and Richmond in a steady and enriching stream. It is the radiating railways of Richmond which have made her so largely the disturbing centre of North Carolina as well as Virginia.

And in this day of shifting properties and more elaborate organization, with their promise of still larger prosperity, it well becomes both Richmond and North Carolina to recall the debt they owe to the men, like Col. Buford and his co-laborers, who first developed the great system which has ever since been and must continue to be the key stone of the arch so far as systems of transportation between North Carolina and Virginia are concerned.

We feel then that North Carolina has contributed no little to the upbuilding of Richmond. In short we feel that in every way our interests are largely identified. As Tar Heels born we can never be weaned from North Carolina, but we are thoroughly naturalized at Richmond. We feel perfectly at home there—they even give us water to drink and bathe in which by its color reminds us continually of the name of Tar River—and indeed when I meet them on the street I find it as difficult to tell the Richmoder who was born in Virginia from the Richmonder who was born in North Carolina as it would be to tell the Dromio of Ephesus from the Dromio of Syracuse. They are alike courteous, gentle and just, manly, straightforward and true. Richmond's interests are our interests, and, as we think of her splendid natural advantageous situation, with her swelling hills and breezy plateaus, midway between the mountains and the sea, at the head of steamboat navigation, with the falls of the James to drive her machinery, as we think of her business enterprise, historical interest, social refinement, and educational facilities, all residents of Richmond, Tar Heel and Tuckahoe alike, exclaim with affectionate pride, in the language of the great apostle, "We are citizens of no mean city."

Mr. President, it was once said by a gifted son of Maryland that one of the outstanding characteristics of the North Carolinian is that he loves his State and believes she is the best State that ever was. That is true. Your genuine Tar Heel never has any other opinion. And I have this to say for the North Carolinians in Richmond that there is not one of them who has ever harbored a disloyal or unfilial thought about the old State from which he came, not one of them who has ever tried to pillory the old mother who bore him and nourished him and to hold her up to public derision, not one of them who has spoken with scorn and bitterness of the shortcomings of the good old commonwealth, not one of them who has failed to sympathize with the enormous difficulties and disadvantages with which she has had to contend, not one of them who has ever felt for a moment any loss of love for her on account of a change in his place of residence. Judge Hall of Georgia says that when war was declared against Spain the darkies became greatly agitated, because there was talk of putting them to the front to fight the Spaniards. They offered all sorts of excuses for not enlisting. One old negro said to a gentleman who was urging him to take up arms against Spain: "Whut fur, Mars George? I ain't got nothin' agin them Spaniels. They never dun nuthin' to me. Whut's the use of us fightin'?"

"Patriotism," replied the gentleman, "you should fight for love of country."

"Heh," said the darkey, "luv er country; I dun live in town so long I ain't got no use fer de country."

If there are any North Carolinians of that stripe, who since moving to town feel that way about their native State, I don't know them, and what is more don't want to know them. I would prefer the acquaintance of Benedict Arnold.

At the same time sir, we recognize the needs of our dear old State, and we are in full sympathy with the industrial, educational and literary awakening which is the great characteristic of our time in North Carolina. As to the new era in our industries, I have no manner of doubt that we are on the threshold of a period of the greatest prosperity ever known in our history and that our State is destined to be one of the richest in the union, not only in the sense of possessing abundant wealth but in the far more important sense of having that wealth well diffused among the people instead of being congested into one or two plethoric channels.

As to the educational awakening, it is one of the greatest pleasures of this unique occasion to us homecoming Carolinians to meet here again today the men who have been your leaders in that great movement and who have done so much to roll away the reproach of our illiteracy.

As to your literary activity proper, let me say that we have welcomed with particular pleasure the appearance of the North Carolina Booklets, Mrs. McCorkle's admirable little volume of Old Time Stories of the Old North State, for the children, and similar publications. Let this good work go on till even the people of New England have learned something about the events of the Revolution in the South. Chauncey Depew says that the New England Puritan was a bigot and a sectary, fighting to preserve his own religious liberty and to destroy that of everybody else, believing conscientiously in the political freedom of himself, and the political suppression of everybody else. Whether that be true or not, it looks as if his descendants had very industriously recorded and magnified their own history and had with equal industry ignored and neglected the history of nearly everybody else in this country. They have been so busy magnifying Israel Putnam's bear-trackings and horse back rides and other matters more worthy of the process that they have had no time to read or write of decisive events like the battles of Moore's Creek, King's Mountain and Guilford Court House. At any rate, Senator Hoar, who is a pretty well informed man about some things, declared that he had never heard of Moore's Creek Bridge. Woe to the people whose history is written either by their enemies or by persons who are afflicted with the disease of big I and little U.

Mr. President, we feel today like the little boy to whom the minister said, "Well, Johnnie, I hear you are going to school now." "Yes, sir," was the reply. "And what part of it do you like best?" asked the good man. "Comin' home," was the prompt and truthful answer. That's the way we feel, sir. The best thing about going away from North Carolina is coming back again.

Governor Aycock, you have welcomed us today in words that will warm our hearts as long as we live. Let me say to you in reply that if the North Carolinians who do live in North Carolina are as glad to see the North Carolinians who don't live in North Carolina as the North Carolinians who don't live in North Carolina are to see the North Carolinians who do live in North Carolina, then, sir, this should be the happiest occasion in the history of the State. It is a positive pleasure to roll the good old name from one's tongue over and over.

My countrymen, in conclusion of these remarks upon the relations existing between North Carolinians and Virginians, I give you the sentiment formulated on the field of Appomattox in the hour of his anguish by that illustrious Virginian who had watched for years, with ever increasing admiration, the steadfast courage and unsurpassed discipline of the troops from North Carolina. As he waited heart-broken for a courier carrying some message concerning the surrender which all now knew to be inevitable, his military ear caught the firm and steady tramp of a brigade marching into action in as good order and with as dauntless courage as though they were on the eve of a sweeping victory instead of the inevitable defeat which every man foresaw. General Lee raised his head and asked sharply, "What brigade is that?"

"Cox's North Carolina," replied an officer.

The great Virginian's eyes filled with tears, and, as the men sprang past him, he lifted his hat and said,

"God Bless old North Carolina"

And because a fellow has failed once or twice, or a dozen times, you don't want to set him down as a failure—unless he takes failing too easy. No man's a failure till he's dead, or loses his courage, and that's the same thing. Sometimes a fellow that's been batted all over the ring for nineteen rounds lands on the solar plexus of the proposition he's tackling in the twentieth. But you can have a regiment of good business qualities, and still fail without courage, because he's the colonel, and he won't stand for any weakening at a critical time.—John Graham to His Son Pierepont.

To be bright and cheerful often requires an effort. There is a certain art in keeping ourselves happy. In this respect, as in others, we require to watch over and manage ourselves almost as if we were somebody else.—Sir John Lubbock.

Bi-Centennial of Jonathan Edwards.

During recent months the religious world has been called upon to celebrate two notable anniversaries—the bicentennial of Wesley's birth and that of Jonathan Edwards.

From The Outlook we extract some passages in regard to the life of the latter:

"The opening act in his role of man and brother is surely full of human warmth and credibility. 'For joy that a man is born into the world,' such must have been the sentiment that pervaded the parsonage at East Windsor, Connecticut, on the day in October two hundred years ago—it was October 5th, 1703, to be exact—when the Rev. Timothy Edwards learned that he was at last the father of a son. We fancy him, immaculate in ministerial garb, holding the baby with deportment as irreproachable as when he handled a sermon, the four little girls of the household on tiptoe by his knee, gazing with awe and delight on their wonderful new brother, while Mrs. Edwards, from her pillows, smiled faintly but beatifically at the pretty group. 'He is the gift of God; name him Jonathan,' said Timothy Edwards; and Jonathan he became, like an uncle and grand-uncle before him."

"All the rougher elements that entered into boys' lives in those days, and even those which most boys encounter today, were left out of little Jonathan Edwards' experience. He never went to school; until he entered college he had a home education, and his fellow pupils and playmates were mainly his own sisters. The picture of his home surroundings can hardly be overdrawn in point of refinement and mental stimulation. Reading and writing English must have come by nature to the boy, for he began Latin at six. As with other carefully taught children of the time, the little Edwardses were constantly practiced in the use of the pen, copying, transcribing, and composing, so that by the time he was ten years old Jonathan had command of that great instrument and means of culture, the power of expressing his thoughts on paper. He prayed out of doors when a child, and in his maturity did his best thinking and writing in the woods. Sweetness and light describe him in his early years, as they are said to have been always, the one his favorite word, and the other the characteristic of his thought."

"On the 27th of July, 1727, he married Sarah Pierpont, of New Haven, and the home was set up in which they expected to end their days. He had known Miss Pierpont while he was a theological student and had written of her, when he was twenty and she thirteen, the famous and much-quoted passage which describes her spirituality and elevation of character. Miss Pierpont was sixteen when Mr. Edwards offered himself to her, and, though he strongly urged that they be married immediately upon his ordination, she refused till she should be seventeen. She was just past seventeen, therefore, when she became the new minister's wife at Northampton, and assumed the guardianship of the temporal affairs of this man of genius. . . . That he should choose so beautiful a wife, and have discernment to find one as good and capable as she was beautiful, speaks much for Jonathan Edwards' taste and sense though the source of her attraction which he acknowledged was her religious enthusiasm and bent toward mysticism. There was an uncommon bond between them, both of mind and heart, which the years only served to strengthen and intensify. Her influence over him was very great, as his confidence and admiration regarding her were unbounded.

"At all events, young Mrs. Edwards made an uncommon success of her chosen calling. She became the mother of eleven children, and they all lived to maturity, and most of them to a good old age. When we consider that it was Mrs. Edwards' ambition that her husband spend thirteen hours a day in his study, and that he was often absent from home on a thinking excursion in the woods or away to preach, it is plain that she must herself have been largely responsible for the home life and training of this goodly flock. She had servants, I fancy a man and woman, and her servants were probably slaves. The older children also became helpers. Yet Mrs. Edwards herself must often have baked and brewed, stood at the loom and spinning wheel, and for twenty-two years there was always a baby to be cared for."

In the Interior William Hudson Harper thus speaks of his call to Princeton:

"Into the seclusion of Edwards' life in Stockbridge, a life pursued with exhausting intellectual activity, and several times depleted by illness, there came in 1757, the last year of his existence, the call of Princeton College to become its president. The nervous, delicate, overwrought creature hesitated. To the trustees he frankly unbosomed his doubts. The change would be expensive, he was not proficient in the higher mathematics and Greek classics, his studies would be interrupted, and, in his own very humble words, he was troubled by 'a low tide of spirits, often occasioning a kind of childish weakness and contemptibleness of speech and behavior, with a disargeeable dullness, much unfitting me for conversation, but more especially for the government of a college.' However, the good man accepted, departing for Princeton in January, 1758, to take the chair just vacated by the death of his son-in-law, President Burr. Princeton at this time was suffering from an epidemic of smallpox. Edwards sought the preventive of vaccination. It failed. To his distant wife he sent these words by his daughter's hand: 'Tell her that the uncommon union which has so long subsisted between us has been of such a nature as I trust is spiritual, and therefore will continue forever.' His last words uttered upon his death-bed, March 22d, 1758, were a Christian's parting, be he humble or great: 'Trust in God and ye need not fear.'"

John Fiske said of him:

"In many of his speculations his mind moves through the loftiest regions of thought with a sustained strength that comes near reminding one of the mighty Spinoza. The more one considers Edwards the more colossal and astonishing he seems. Among writers of Christian theology his place is by the side of Augustine, Aquinas and Calvin. His character was as great as his genius. . . . It was due to Edwards that the prime question to every anxious mind was not so much 'Am I one of the elect?' as this other question, 'Have surrendered my heart to Christ?' . . . The religious thought of the seventeenth century was in danger of losing its life among dry logical formulas. It needed to be touched with emotion, and that was what The Great Awakening accomplished."

"The Multitude of Words."

When Solomon said, "in the multitude of words there wanteth not sin," we do not suppose that he was commending the antithesis—that dumbness which is as culpable in its way as too much speaking. The last clause of the verse explains his meaning: "but he that refraineth his lips is wise." And there are many other passages that convey the same thought. When the wise man says: "He that keepeth his mouth keepeth his life," he does not mean keepeth his mouth always shut, but he that guards his speech, that keeps watch over his lips, as well as over the spirit behind them.

It is right and wise to lock our doors when necessity demands it, but very inhospitable to keep them locked all the time.

There are pleasant thoughts, encouraging words, wise counsels, kindly warnings that ought to pass through the lips that are no more our own than the rest of our bodies, if we are the servants of the Lord Jesus Christ.

We sometimes deceive ourselves and think we are prudent, when we are really absorbed or indifferent, or at least, appear so to some of the Master's "little ones," who are hungering and thirsty for kindly words of interest and cheer, and soon it may be too late. "Then shall He answer them, saying, verily I say unto you, inasmuch as ye did it not unto one of the least of these, ye did it not to me."

Righteous Cursing.

In the article "A Criticism of a Criticism," in last week's Standard, brother L. B. Johnson grows facetious, and finds "delicious humor" in Dr. Leyburn's objections to the Committee on Revision of Proof Texts. And like a girl that has the giggles and cannot stop but will giggle at everything and at nothing, so brother Johnson, having grown facetious, is ready to see something funny in everything and, with optics keen, thinks he has found a "delicious joke" on the Westminster Divines themselves because, in the Larger catechism, "these grave and reverend brethren of blessed memory there solemnly assert that 'sinful cursing' is forbidden by the Third Commandment!" And brother Johnson asks merrily, "What sort did they think was not sinful?"

It would do no harm perhaps to let brother Johnson keep on laughing at Dr. Leyburn and the Westminster Divines, if he can be so easily amused.

But the implication of his question needs to be corrected. The Westminster divines chose well their words. There is cursing that is not sinful. The psalmist cursed when he said, "Let them all be confounded and turned back that hate Zion," and it was not sinful cursing. When we read, or hear this psalm, and say amen to it, as we must to every word of God, you and I curse, and it is not sinful cursing.

The Westminster divines themselves, did some cursing, and taught us to do it, when in Chapter 25 of the Confession they declared that the Pope of Rome "is that anti-Christ, that man of sin, and son of perdition, that exhalteth himself in the Church against Christ and all that is called God." And these grave and reverend brethren of blessed memory did not regard this as sinful cursing.

And do you not remember how one of our dear old preceptors at the Seminary, Dr. Peck, most holy and spiritual of them all, when he described the depths of iniquity of the Romish priesthood, how he would raise his head and clear his throat and adjust his eye glasses, and then with solemn fervor of look and tone would say: "O, for more power to hate them!" Away with the mawkish sentimentalism that sends flowers to the condemned felon and that would destroy the principle of justice that demands in God and in men alike condemnation of wrong and approval of right, cursing the wicked as well as blessing the righteous.

In his comment on the imprecation, quoted above, from the one hundred and twenty-ninth psalm, Spurgeon says, "Let them all be confounded and turned back that hate Zion." And so say we right heartily, and in this case vox populi is vox Dei, for so it shall be. If this be an imprecation, let it stand; for our heart says "Amen" to it. It is but justice that those who hate, harass and hurt the good should be brought to naught. Those who confound right and wrong ought to be confounded, and those who turn back from God ought to be turned back. Loyal subjects wish ill to those who plot against their king.

"Confound their politics,

is but a proper wish, and contains within it no trace of personal ill will. We desire their welfare as men, their downfall as traitors. Let their conspiracies be confounded, their policies be turned back. How can we wish prosperity to those who would destroy that which is dearest to our hearts? This present age is so flippant that if a man loves the Savior he is styled a fanatic, and if he hates the powers of evil he is named a bigot. As for ourselves, despite all objectors, we join heartily in this combination, and would revive in our heart the old practice of Ebal and Gerizim, where those were blessed who bless God, and those were cursed who make themselves a curse to the righteous. We have heard men desire a thousand times that the gallows might be the reward of the assassins who murdered two inoffensive men in Dublin, and we could never censure the wish, for justice ought to be rendered to the evil as well as to the good. Besides, the Church of God is so useful, so beautiful, so innocent of harm, so fraught with good, that those who do her wrong are wronging all mankind and deserve to be treated as the enemies of the human race. Study a chapter from the "Book of Martyrs" and see if you do not feel inclined to read an imprecatory psalm over Bishop Bonner and Bloody Mary. It may be that some wretched nineteenth century sentimentalist will blame you; if so, read another over him. Who would not join in the imprecatory prayer, confounded and turned back be that blasphemous Dowie and all his host that hate Zion. Let them be as the grass upon the housetops, which withereth afore it groweth up. And who will not feel that this was not sinful, but righteous cursing?

C. G.

Dowieism has failed in New York, to New York's credit. But the papers have been having their fun with Dr. Parkhurst who wrote a letter of rebuke to Dowie. Dr. Parkhurst was casting pearls before swine, the scavengers of the press included. Some people have never forgiven him for that crusade against the vice of New York City, when there was no one else to do that work, that waked the city up to the enormity of its iniquity. The immediate results of that crusade was the scattering of vice with its contaminations into the tenement districts that had been free from it. But it was only a question of time to free the tenements and the fact remains that to Dr. Parkhurst, with all his eccentricities of speech and behaviour, more than to any other one man, was due the revelations of the Lewow committee, the defeat of Tammany, the formation of the fusion of the elements of decency of all parties and of none, and the driving even of Tammany to a moderate claim for respectability in the present campaign, which we hope will be another Tammany defeat. We are proud that it was a Presbyterian minister who did for New York what John Calvin did for Geneva—waked the people up.

Almighty God is On My Side

(A hymn, by Rev. J. McCarty Duckwall, D. D., LL.D., Berkley Springs, W. Va.)

For the Presbyterian Standard.

I'm poor and needy, weak and tried;
But God my Savior's on my side.
Yes, God Almighty's Friend to me:
No other friend is such as He.

Chorus.

I'm poor and needy, weak and tried;
I'm poor and needy, weak and tried;
But God Almighty's on my side.
Yes, God Almighty's on my side.

Storms may beat, from clouds that lower;
Satan strike with all his power;
Pain and sickness come to me;
Friends may forsake, and joys may flee.

And conscience too may add its sting;
My guilt and shame upon me bring;
But for my sins, my Savior died;
And God Himself is on my side.

Great strength and power, wisdom, love,
Come down to me from God above.
And kept by such a Friend as He,
Safe kept I am, as safe can be.

And when at last, dread Death shall call;
And I die must, as die must all;
No need to fear that dark, cold tomb;
For Jesus guides through all its gloom.

And when I there, all trials o'er,
Safe shall stand, on you fair shore;
Christ then will draw me to His side;
Where those He loves shall safe abide.

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

That is a most interesting account of our Congo Mission and its present critical condition by Rev. W. M. Morrison. He will be recalled as the one who stirred up the Governments of Europe by his revelations of the horrors perpetrated in the so-called Congo Free State. Knox writes a true and a needed word on Calvinism and the Punishment of Crime. There is much food for reflection here for people who think that Calvinism has no large part to play hereafter in the regeneration of society. Dr. H. H. Hawes gives some delightful reminiscences of a sermon of one of the most famous and eccentric preachers of the last generation in Virginia. Dr. W. W. Moore's eloquent response for Virginia at the Reunion is too good not to be printed for the benefit of Standard readers. The Bi-centennial of Jonathan Edwards is timely, as we have the picture of the great divine on our front page. We have before remarked that Southern Presbyterians are closer kin to him than any other American Church of this age. C. G. takes L. B. J. to task for criticising even the work of a Committee of an American Assembly since that work was put between the lids of the Confession. Not long ago our church almost went into spasms of virtue over the idea of putting a foot-note within the lids of the Confession, when, bless their hearts, there were two of them already in. Their being on the inside made them sacred, of course. So with the proof-texts, no matter how inapplicable. Dr. Duckwall contributes a hymn to this number.

So we have a feast of good things in this week's Standard.

PERSONALS.

Rev. E. E. Pressly has removed from Scotts, N. C., to Statesville, N. C.

The address of Rev. J. M. Holladay is changed from Fin-castle, Va., to Mannings, S. C.

The Presbyterian Church of St. Petersburg, Fla., has called Rev. W. S. Milne, of Micanopy, Fla., to its pastorate.

Rev. J. F. Eddins, of Clarksville, Texas, has accepted a call to the church at Comanche, Texas, and will begin work November 1st.

The correspondents of Rev. W. C. Brown will note that the name of his postoffice (Fancy Hill, N. C.) has been changed to Loray.

Rev. Dr. J. B. Stratton, of Natchez, Miss., died recently, in the eighty-eighth year of his age. He had served this church for fifty years and has been pastor emeritus for a decade longer.

Rev. J. W. Montgomery, of Giddings, Texas, has returned to his work from a vacation spent at Burlington, N. C. He has received five new members into his church since April last.

The many friends of Dr. and Mrs. Alexander Sprunt, of Charleston, S. C., will sympathize with them in the death of their young daughter, Christine Parkins, at Rock Hill, S. C., on the 16th. She had entered Winthrop College just one month before the sudden entering into the higher School.

Rev. J. K. G. Fraser, pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Charleston, S. C., was recently married to Miss J. Isabel Clark of Alberton, Prince Edward's Island. After a bridal trip through Nova Scotia, and to Boston and New York, they have been warmly welcomed by the congregation of the Second Church, Charleston.

The Presbyterian church at Louisburg, N. C., was burned on the 23rd inst. As our Church work is bravely carried on at that point by eleven communicants, under the guidance of Rev. C. N. Wharton, evangelist, it would be a graceful act if each reader of this paragraph would send at once a contribution for rebuilding. This is on the Standard's responsibility; the little band has not asked for aid.

Rev. Martin D. Hardin was installed pastor of the Second Church, Charlotte, on last Sunday evening. A large audience witnessed the impressive ceremony. Rev. Geo. W. Belk preached the sermon, Rev. J. A. Dorritee propounded the constitutional questions, Rev. A. J. McKelway, D. D., charged the pastor, Rev. J. R. Howerton, D. D., charged the people and Rev. Hugh W. Hoon made the installation prayer.

TEXAS.

KERRVILLE.—Pastor-elect Rev. Brooks I. Dickey, arrived on Friday evening, Oct. 9th, and was accorded a warm welcome by the members of the congregation. At the recent meeting of the Presbytery of Western Texas the resignation of Mr. Dickey as pastor of the church at Edna was accepted and the pastoral relation dissolved at the same time, a call having been presented from this church and accepted by him, an order was taken for his installation early in November. Although this little band has been without a pastor for nearly a year, evidences of life in the church are not wanting. The church building has been repaired inside and out and otherwise improved and beautified. The Sunday school has grown in interest and numbers. Steps are being taken to erect a manse for the pastor at once. Pastor and people hope and pray for an era of renewed usefulness for the church.

DALLAS, First Church.—In the minutes of the General Assembly, the First Presbyterian Church of Dallas is reported to have received only fifty new members last year. This is a mistake. The report of the church to the Presbytery shows that 110 members were received into her communion during the last church year. The number received by certificate should be 82 instead of 22, as it appears in the minutes.

LACY.—Lacy Church had an eight days' meeting, closing Oct. 4. Rev. R. E. Hardin of Ballinger, Texas, assisted me in these services. Four additions, four children baptized, $15 collected for Assembly's Home Missions, Children's Day exercises and $3.50 for Sunday School Missions. Bro. Hardin's sound, judicious, simple and practical sermons did much good. J. L. Glass, one of the elders and the superintendent of the Sunday school is from near Charlotte, N. C., and is one of our successful cattle men. This is a fine country for cattle and children. I never saw any other place where children suffer as little with summer complaints and teething as they do here. In schools and churches we are pushing to the front. In Stirling City the per capita school fund is $11.25 and in one school district in the county it is $20. Our large two-story stone school building will soon be completed.

Malcolm Black.

ATHENS.—The First Presbyterian Church of Athens was organized by commission of Paris Presbytery on October 8th. The church starts off with twelve members, others in county to unite soon. The three ruling elders are Messrs. J. A. Alexander, J. M. Alexander, and S. B. Boone, and one deacon, Mr. Jno. Murchison. Athens is the county seat of Henderson county, and has about 3,500 population, and growing rapidly. It is situated at the junction of St. L. & S. Western and T. & N. Q. railroads. The church, though small, has fine prospects for usefulness.

DALLAS PRESBYTERY met in Amarillo, Texas, Sept. 14th.

Present seventeen ministers and eleven ruling elders.

Rev. A. W. Crawford of Hereford was chosen moderator and Rev. E. L. Storey temporary clerk. Dr. A. L. Phillips, superintendent of Sunday school work, was present and added much to the interest of Presbytery in two addresses.

Calls.—Calls were received from the Denton street Presbyterian Church of Gainesville, Texas, for the pastoral services of Rev. J. M. Shive. Mr. Shive accepted and was received from Red River Presbytery and arrangements were made for his installation. Also a call from the First Presbyterian Church of Ennis, Texas, for the pastoral services of licentiate W. Fred Galbraith. He accepted and Presbytery ordained Mr. Galbraith and made arrangements for his installation.

The reports from the churches were unusually good.

Rev. E. H. Moseley was installed pastor of the Amarillo church.

The committees on Publication, Sabbath Schools and Young Peoples Societies were changed as recommended by the Assembly and the following were appointed a standing committee of Publication and Sabbath School work, viz: Revs. G. T. Storey, J. M. Shive, A. W. Crawford and J. N. Ivey.

A most impressive memorial service of Rev. John S. Moore, D. D., was held.

An overture looking to the establishing of a Presbyterian Orphanage in or near Dallas was sent up to Synod.

Presbytery meets next Spring in the Westminster Church, Dallas, Rev. Robert Hill, pastor.

MISSOURI.

WOMAN'S MISSIONARY UNION of St. Louis Presbytery met in the Mizpah Church, Pattonville, about fifteen miles from St. Louis, October 16. The day was an ideal autumn day, the church beautifully situated in a grove of natural trees, and the hospitality of the people unbounded: the attendance, too, was large and encouraging, and the meeting one of the very best in years. A very characteristic address of welcome was delivered by the pastor of the church, Dr. J. Addison Smith; the opening sermon, and a very excellent one, was delivered by Rev. J. L. Manze; and several admirable papers were read by members of the Union: these exercises with the usual routine business consumed the time. Altogether it was a pleasant and profitable day, and with united voice all present could say "It is good for us to be here."

CAPE GIRARDEAU.—On Oct. 18 this church gave a hearty and unanimous call to Rev. R. L. Brown of Linnville, Tenn., and it is hoped that he will accept.

MARSHALL.—The session of this church has invited Rev. John Abbott of Kentucky to supply the pulpit for six months, with a view to a call and pastorate at the end of the time, if mutually agreeable. He expects to begin his service Nov. 1.

ST. CHARLES.—Rev. B. C. Bell was installed pastor of this church on Oct. 18. Rev. J. L. Mauze presided, propounded the constitutional questions and delivered the charge to the pastor; Dr. G. L. Leyburn, by request, preached the sermon, and in the absence of Mr. Thos. S. McPheeters appointed for this service, charged the people. The day was beautiful, the congregation large, the young pastor heartily welcomed by an appreciative people, and the pastorate begins under very happy and encouraging auspices. May it prove a long, useful and happy one.

BETHEL.—On the 15th of October Rev. J. E. Flow was ordained and installed pastor of this church by a commission of Upper Missouri Presbytery, consisting of Rev. R. L. Pin-naird who presided and propounded the questions; Rev. L. E. McNair who preached the sermon, and Dr. S. M. Neel who charged the pastor and, in the absence of Rev. J. J. Hill occasioned by sickness, the people also.

ALABAMA.

MOBILE PRESBYTERY met in Citronelle, Ala., Oct. 13th 1903, at 7:30 p. m.

Present, seven ministers and nine ruling elders.

Moderator elected.—Rev. A. F. Carr; temporary clerk, Rev. W. B. Doyle.

Rev. B. R. Anderson was received from the Presbytery of Cherokee. He has been elected pastor of the Monroeville Church and a commission was appointed to install him.

Ruling Elder W. A. Lovett was taken under the care of Presbytery as a candidate for the ministry.

Home Mission Committee's report showed five groups aided in supplementing ministers' salaries, one church in completing its building, other expenses met and a fine balance in the treasury to be used in carrying on the work for next year.

Groups not supplied have favorable prospects of not being reported vacant much longer.

A movement was inaugurated towards supplying manse to churches having none.

Report on Narrative showed some improvement in the spiritual condition of the churches during present year. The committees on Sabbath Schools and Publication were combined as per action of the Assembly.

Sessions were urged to appoint committees in the interest of ministerial relief fund according to recommendation of Assembly.

In report of committee on Bible Cause, churches were urged to observe the first Sabbath in March in the interest of Bible circulation, as per Assembly's recommendation.

A cordial vote of thanks was extended to the people of Citronville for their hospitality and to the choir for excellent and appropriate music.

Monroeville was chosen as the place of next meeting.

E. A. Smith, Stated Clerk.

MONTGOMERY, Central Church.—Five new members were publicly welcomed at the Quarterly Communion service in October, making a total of fifty-three new members during the year from October to October.

On account of the improvements being made in the church building the congregation of the Central Church are worshipping in the county court house just across the street from their church. For the first two years of the church life, in 1891-3, the services of this congregation were held in this building, and it is expected that the return to the church building will be made on the anniversary of the Sabbath in which the new church was entered in 1893.

On account of the work going on in the Central Church the Woman's Presbyterian Union which is the guest of this congregation will hold its sessions in the lecture room of the First Church, which has been kindly tendered by the session of that church for these meetings.

For nearly a year the program of the Weekly Teachers' meetings have been prepared and printed by a committee appointed each month. At the request of the Highland Park and First Presbyterian Churches a joint committee of the three Presbyterian churches has been appointed to prepare a program to be used in the weekly meetings of the Presbyterian Sunday schools of the city.

ATTALLA.—Attalla church has recently received two on profession and two by letter, and two children have been baptized.

FLORIDA.

DUNEDIN.—Andrew's Memorial Church reports four additions on confession of faith; one adult and seven infant baptisms.

VIRGINIA.

LEXINGTON PRESBYTERY.—To the pastors, sessions and congregations: The Presbytery at its last meeting passed and ordered printed the following resolution:

"Resolved: That we most earnestly plead that the churches that have not paid their full apportionment to Presbytery's Home Missions for this year, put forth earnest effort to do so, as it will all be needed to pay the men that are now in the field." Holmes Ralston, chairman H. M. Committee.

NORFOLK.—The pastor, Rev. J. Ernest Thacker, welcomed eleven new members into the Second church. At the evening service Rev. Dr. Charles Ghiselin of Shepherds-town, W. Va., who is visiting his father, preached a most excellent sermon, which was greatly enjoyed by the large congregation present.

NORTH CAROLINA.

STATESVILLE, Front Street.—This congregation moved into its new building the second Sabbath in September. The main auditorium of this building is 34x51 feet. The Lecture room is 20x24 feet. There are five class rooms and a library room, all of which may be used to seat the congregation when needed.

Rev. E. E. Gillispie assisted the pastor in a six days' meeting last week, in which many precious seed were sown and Christians were made stronger in the faith.

SHELBY.—On the first Sabbath of October, Mr. Lee Kerr was elected an elder in this church and on the third Sabbath, after a sermon on the eldership, he was ordained and installed. Among those whose hands were upon him in his ordination, was the hand of his aged father. There have been six additions to this church recently, four by profession of faith and two by letter.

DAVIDSON.—Rev. Dr. Graham leaves tonight for the University of North Carolina where he goes to conduct the "Quiet Hour" service on Sunday morning and attend the meeting of the eastern division conference of the Y. M. C. A. As is shown the two Carolinas have united their State work, holding the annual convention in North and South Carolina alternate years. This fall the convention meets in South Carolina. These division conferences in both States are in the interest of more perfect organization of the work and are marks of systematized effort to keep the various associations in touch with each other in the several departments.

Work on the addition to the church progresses well; the brick work can easily be completed in from ten days to two weeks.

Dr. Martin represented the College before Wilmington Presbytery at Wallace this week.

Davidson, Oct. 28, 1903.

CHARLOTTE.—Mecklenburg Presbytery met in adjourned session in the Second Church of Charlotte on Oct. 20.

Rev. J. E. Summers was received from Concord Presbytery. He accepted a call from Mallard Creek Church, and a commission was appointed to install him on Oct. 24.

Rev. M. D. Hardin was received from the Presbytery of Minneapolis. A call from the Second Church of Charlotte was accepted by him. A commission was appointed to install him on the night of the 25th inst.

Rev. M. D. Hardin was elected a trustee of the Presbyterian Female College to fill out the unexpired term of Rev. J. W. Stagg, D. D.

"In reply to petition and commission sent from Stanly Hall school and Beulah (?) Church in opposition to appointment of Rev. A. H. Temple and wife as teachers of Stanly Hall school and Rev. Mr. Temple as S. S. of Beulah Church, Presbytery reaffirms the order taken at Wadesboro meeting, making such appointment with the understanding that this relation is to cease both as to school and Church with the close of approaching term of school."

In connection with the above the Presbytery adopted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That Presbytery, having heard the complaints from members of Beulah (?) Church, and patrons of Stanly Hall school against Mr. Temple and his wife, find nothing in those complaints reflecting upon their Christian character in the slightest degree, or upon Mr. Temple's ability as a teacher and preacher, and that Presbytery in returning him to this field for the coming year, does so with full assurance of their cordial sympathy and support, and that in consenting to the termination of his relation with that field at the close of the present term, they do so simply as a concession to dissatisfied parties for the purpose of promoting harmony in that community, and nothing in our action must be understood as in any way reflecting upon Mr. and Mrs. Temple.

Mr. A. T. Walker, an elder in Tenth Avenue Church, was received under the care of the Presbytery as a candidate for the ministry.

Rev. Messrs. J. A. Dorritee, A. J. McKelway and J. R. Bridges were added to the committee on raising a salary for an evangelist.
T. J. Allison, Stated Clerk.

GEORGIA

THE PRESBYTERY OF ATLANTA met in Carrollton, Ga., on Oct. 7th., 1903, at 7:30 p. m. The opening sermon was preached by Rev. W. Lee Harrell, the retiring moderator.

Organization.—Rev. J. G. Herndon, moderator; Rev. R. L. Bell, recording clerk; Rev. G. W. Bnll, reading clerk.

Pastoral Relations Dissolved.—Between Rev. R. L. Bell and McDonough church; between Rev. Joseph E. James and Inman Park church.

Rev. R. L. Bell was dismissed to East Alabama Presbytery in which he has been called to the pastorate of Dothan church. Rev. J. E. James is taking another year of study at Princeton Seminary. Rev. R. H. Morris, who supplied Barnesville and Forsyth churches during the last year, is also at Princeton Seminary for another year of study.

Candidate Received.—Mr. J. E. Hemphill, a member of Griffin church and a son of Rev. W. P. Hemphill, our evangelist. Mr. Hemphill has entered the Freshman class at Davidson college.

Rev. W. A. Dabney now in Virginia, was permitted to labor outside the bounds of Presbytery till next spring meeting.

Special Appointments.—Rev. L. G. Henderson to preach in McDonough church and declare the pulpit vacant; Rev. F. H. Gaines to preach in Inman Park church and declare the pulpit vacant.

Church Organized.—McTyre Chapel in Douglas county with 25 members, 19 on profession and six by letter. Messrs. J. R. Hntcheson and D. W. Eskew were ordained and installed as elders, and Messrs. J. A. Humphries, J. W. Hendrix, and Jerry McTyre, as deacons. This church is now building a house of worship, which they hope to have ready for use by the first Sabbath in December. At our Presbyterian sacramental service on Friday night $100 was contributed to assist in completing this church.

The venerable Dr. Henry Quigg tendered his resignation of the pastoral charge of Smyrna church; the Presbytery however, requested him to continue his relation as pastor, granting the church permission, if agreeable to both parties, to employ a Stated Supply as an assistant to the pastor.

Memorials were read and recorded of Rev. D. G. Armstrong and Rev. R. L. Sutton. By a rising vote the Presbytery adopted resolutions expressing its high regard for Col. George Washington Scott, an honored elder of Decatur church and the founder of Agnes Scott Institute, its sorrow and loss in his death, and its sympathy with the bereaved family.

Mr. W. W. Holland, a member of Moore Memorial church, was reinstated as a candidate for the ministry and directed to pursue his studies with Rev. G. W. Bull and the pastor of College Park church.

The Local Home Mission Committee was directed to elect a chairman at a salary of $1,000 and expenses, who is to have evangelistic power in organizing churches.

Presbytery adjourned on Friday night, Oct. 9th to meet at the call of the moderator during the next session of the Synod of Georgia at Brunswick. P. P. Winn, Stated Clerk.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Sabbath School Day.

The Presbyterian Committee of Publication reports that the order of the Assembly that October 4th be observed by the Sabbath Schools as a special day, in the interests of Sabbath School Missions, was very widely obeyed. Reports are coming in rapidly concerning the observance of the day, and the collections taken in the mite boxes sent out by the Committee will aggregate a handsome sum.

An interesting fact is that the day was observed by the schools, large and small alike, and even in mission fields, where the work is carried on by Home Mission committees, collections were taken. Many offerings have been received which represent great self-denial upon the part of the givers, and a lively interest in this great department of our Church work. Without wishing to make any invidious distinctions, the following offerings represent the interest of some of the weaker schools in helping to establish Sabbath Schools in destitute places: The Glasgow Sunday school, at Sherwood, Va., sent $24.00 collected in thirty-two mite boxes. A school at Eastman, Ga., of only eight members, sent $3.51. A mission school among the Indians, at Lenten, I. T., sent $2.98. A small mission school at Clay, W. Va., reports that they have had no preaching for nine months, but they observed the day and sent $3.00, and applied for a missionary. A school at Port Gibson, Miss., sent $12.92, and reports their collection as ten fold larger than the average weekly offerings. The Hamilton, Texas, school, with only thirteen present, sent $4.65. The colored mission school at Pisgah, S. C., observed the day, and sent $1.13 to help in the work. The list might be multiplied indefinitely, and these instances are mentioned only to show the fine spirit in which our schools responded to the Assembly's call.

Education for the Ministry.

Dear Reader: Are you not interested in the welfare of Zion? Do you not believe the Southern Presbyterian Church is an important branch of the Master's kingdom? Do you not wish to promote her progress? Do you know what most prevents her advancement at the present time? The last General Assembly said: "The lack of a sufficient number of ministers adequately equipped is perhaps the most serious impediment in the way of the progress of our Church." If you love God and long for the prosperity of Zion, there are two ways in which you can help to supply this need: First, "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that He would send forth laborers into His harvest." Second, give of your means for the education of our young men whom the Lord calls into his harvest. We have perhaps not less than 315 young men now in preparation for the ministry. They are now in our schools, colleges, and seminaries. About 60 per cent of them are unable to meet the whole of their expenses. The Church should aid them. Do you not wish to assist in this good and necessary work? If so give now as the Lord may prompt and enable you.

In calling attention to the approaching November Collection for Education for the Ministry, we would not presume to instruct ministers and sessions as to their duty. That is not in our line, even if we were able and disposed to do it. But we do wish to emphasize the belief that if this cause is properly presented to our people they will respond liberally to its needs.

We seek, therefore, your co-operation, requesting especially two things: First, that you will bring this cause fully and emphatically before your people in November, giving every one an opportunity to contribute.

Second, that you will have contributions forwarded promptly to Mr. G. W. Macrae, treasurer, Memphis, Tenn.

In the Master's name.

Joseph H. Lumpkin, Secretary.

The Mid-China Mission.

The Mid-China Mission met at the Mountain retreat, Mehkanshan, on the 27th of August and continued in session for seven days.

There were present twelve voting members of the Mission with a still larger number of lady missionaries. The presence of these members of the North Kiangsu Mission and one member of the Korea Mission added unusual interest to the meeting.

Formation of a Presbytery.—This question has during several previous years, came up for earnest discussion by members of the Mission. The plan embodied in our overture to the Jackson General Assembly is the one which, after long consideration, more nearly meets the unanimous approval of the missionaries on the field. It is the plan adopted by the majority of the Presbyterian bodies working in China and in the view of our missionaries, has less difficulties connected with it than another.

The Korea Mission having independently overtured the Lexington Assembly to allow them to do what the Assembly declined to permit the Mid-China Mission to do a year ago, and the Assembly this time having appointed an ad interim committee to examine into the whole question, the Mid-China Mission, after again considering the matter, determined to appoint a committee to communicate with the Assembly's ad interim committee giving them the reasons for their former action and requesting them, if the way be clear, to again lay these reasons before the General Assembly to meet in Mobile.

Receiving Money from Heathen.—The question as to whether missionaries should receive and use in mission work money tendered them by the heathen is one of deep and practical interest to missionaries at this time. A committee had been appointed to look into this question and report to the Mission. This committee presented both majority and minority reports, and the discussion of these reports occupied a whole day. One who has not thought especially on the subject would probably be surprised at the range such a discussion takes both in its Scriptural and its practical aspects. The Mission finally decided, by a vote of eight to four, that it is neither wise nor scriptural to receive and use in the extension of mission work money contributed from purely heathen sources.

Presbyterian Union.—Another question, the discussion of which occupied a whole day, was that of union with other Presbyterian bodies in China. The choice between organic and federal union, the doctrinal basis of union, problems of church government, divergence in practice of different Presbyterian Missions and other practical difficulties are a few phases of a very important subject. The Mid-China Mission while in general accepting the work of the general committee on Presbyterian union which met last fall, insist upon a clear, unequivocal credal basis of union and that nothing less than the whole of the Shorter Catechism.

Reports of Committees.—The reports of the Mission's various committees of which there were 25 during the past year, all with work to do, showed advance in the various departments of work which are usually reviewed by the Mission. The school work has been strengthened, there being 54 pupils in boys' and 83 in girls' boarding schools. The union theological class at Suchow reported a promising outlook, this being the first year. There has been some property extension, the most important of which is the purchase of a tract of land at the terminus of the Grand Canal in the large north suburb of the city of Hangchow. In this suburb, which is the size of an ordinary city, our Mission has the whole field, and not only that, but, being at the boat landing, it is and will more and more become an important centre of operations in the conduct of the large outlying country work, which is in that direction. Both Kashing and Sochow stations have secured needed enlargement to their property, and Kiangin and Sinchang hope to do so during the coming year.

Reports of Work.—The individual reports of work indicate unparalleled opportunity coupled with the most perplexing difficulties. Twenty-seven preaching places are reported. Four dispensaries report a total of 23,889 treatments during the year. There are 13 native preachers, seven Bible women, five medical assistants, eight Christian school teachers and six students for the ministry. Three hundred and seventy-nine patients have been treated in the hospitals. The number of communicants reported is 561, being an increase over last year of 72. This means an increase of 13 per cent added on examination. The native contributions were $918. The number of inquirers is 395.

Union Theological Seminary.—Having worked most harmoniously and satisfactorily with our Northern Presbyterian brethren in the theological class at Sochow during the year, the Mission was the more prepared to endorse the plan of a union theological seminary. A committee was appointed to consult with similar committees from other missions in regard to the matter.

Officers.—Rev. J. Mercer Blain was chairman. Rev. Geo. Hudson is elected Mission treasurer for the coming year. Station treasurers were also elected. Dr. Davis is Mission correspondent.

Location of Missionary.—Miss Florence Rodd, who is expected during the autumn, is advised to locate in Hangchow.

The social meeting for those who are separated during the remainder of the year, many of them isolated, were delightful, and the devotional services most helpful. At the communion service on the Sabbath day, when Rev. H. Maxcy Smith preached and Mr. Painter administered the Lord's Supper. A goodly company of missionaries of all denominations were present.

P. F. Price, Secretary.

Dr. Stalker to Lecture at Union Seminary.

The most interesting announcement of the year in the theological world in this country is that the Rev. Prof. James Stalker, D. D., of the United Free Church College, Aberdeen, Scotland, has accepted the position of special lecturer at Union Theological Seminary, Richmond, and will deliver a course of lectures there about the middle of April, 1904, on "The Ethical Teaching of Our Lord." In his letter to Rev. Dr. Turnbull, accepting the invitation of the Trustees and Faculty, he speaks of the keen desire he had long had to visit the South, and adds: "Naturally I am gratified at being invited to visit the principal seminary there belonging to my own denomination."

The Seminary has had exceptional good fortune in the matter of distinguished visitors and lecturers since coming to Richmond, including such men as Dr. John G. Paton, Dr. T. L. Cuyler, President Patton, and Principal Lang of Scotland, but it speaks specially well for the Trustees and Faculty and is an extraordinary triumph of their enterprise that in the same session they should have a visit from Mrs. Agnes Smith Lewis, M. R. A. S., Ph. D. (Halle and Wittenberg), LL.D. (St. Andrews and Heidelberg), the discoverer and editor of the Sinaitic Palimpsest which has upset so many of the skeptical theories about the origin of the Gospels; and also a course of lectures by the famous Aberdonian professor who has a wider hearing among thoughtful Bible students than any other writer of our day on religious subjects. As the New York Christian Advocate says, "There is a wonderful, direct, compelling force of common sense, elevated by pure spirituality, in all Dr. Stalker writes." Thousands of our people have read his books, such as Imago Christi, The Preacher and His Models, Men and Morals, The Trial and Death of Jesus Christ, The Life of Christ, and The Life of St. Paul. Of these last two The Interior says, "His lives of Christ and Paul are the best short biographies written."

The students of the seminary and the people of the community are to be heartily congratulated on the opportunity to hear this wise, earnest, and practical scholar and man of God.

Rev. Dr. C. C. Hersman left on Monday last for a ten days' trip to Missouri. He makes the historical address at the semi-centennial celebration of Westminster College, Fulton, Mo., and will visit his daughter, Mrs. McElwang, of Columbus before returning home. His friends here rejoice with Dr. Hersman in the opportunity of visiting again the institution of which he was the efficient head for so many years.

The Seminary faculty is represented at the Synod of Virginia this week by Rev. Dr. T. C. Johnson. The Synod of North Carolina which meets at Wilmington, Nov. 4th, has Rev. Dr. Strickler on its program.

The sad intelligence was received here this morning of the death of Mrs. Fries of Winston-Salem, mother of Mrs. W. W. Moore. It was owing to her serious illness that Dr. Moore and family cut short their visit in Europe, returning early in July. Mrs. Moore was at her mother's bedside during her last illness.

We have just had the pleasure of a visit from Mr. Thornton B. Penfield, traveling secretary of the Y. M. C. A. among theological seminaries. He came especially to confer with the students in regard to securing the Conference of Seminaries of the Eastern Division for this place one year hence. This body consists of delegates from all the leading theological schools in the South and Northeast and includes among its speakers such leaders as Messrs. Speer, Mott, J. Ross Stevenson and W. F. McDowell, all of whom are well known. The meetings are always marked by a strong spirituality, and every effort is being made to bring the Conference here next year.

Synod of Missouri.

The Synod of Missouri met at Fulton Oct. 20. As is generally known the people of Fulton, in view of the semi-centennial celebration of Westminster College, invited both Synods, Northern and Southern, to meet with them at the same time, so that both bodies might take part in the celebration as they now share equally the control of the college. It was arranged that both Synods should meet together in the Presbyterian Church and listen to the opening sermon. This was done and the sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. H. O. Scott, moderator of the Northern Synod. After the sermon the communion was administered under the direction of our moderator, Dr. W. R. Dobyns. After these services Synod was called to order and Rev. C. F. Richmond was elected moderator and Rev. R. L. Kinnaid temporary clerk. Arrangements had been made that the Northern Synod should meet in the Methodist Church, kindly tendered therefor, while our own occupied the Presbyterian Church, and all met together at the evening and semi-centennial services.

The usual communications, letters from General Assembly, secretaries' reports from various schools and committees, were received and referred to appropriate committees.

The complaint of Rev. W. W. Elwang against the Presbytery of Missouri for permitting a church to employ a young brother to preach for them for six months, when he was not even a candidate under Presbytery's care, was duly considered, and Synod's action was: That the complaint be sustained. This was the occasion of the introduction of a resolution really forbidding the Presbyteries ever to employ men to serve their churches unless duly licensed, and this led to an animated discussion, but because of lack of time the subject was postponed to next Synod.

The Home Mission Committee's report was in most respects the most satisfactory and encouraging made for years. The contributions were large in all the Presbyteries, the obligations all promptly met and healthy balances in all the treasuries. Most of the Presbyteries have their churches well supplied with regular preaching; during the year in the whole Synod for the work done by the Synod and the Presbyteries the contributions amounted to $8,122, for local work by individual churches in the large cities $5,571, and of the General Assembly's Home Missions $2,219, making the total gifts for the Synod to Home Missions $15,912. During the year there were 38 ministers assisted from the Home Mission funds, who served sixty-four churches, and there were added to the churches served by them 374 members, 184 on profession of faith. Work in the Ozark regions was reported in an encouraging condition and there seems an open door in the lower Ozark field for the establishment of a Christian school, sites for such a school being offered by three places in Christian and Taney counties. Synod approved this and authorized the committee to go forward and as soon as the way was clear to secure the services of a suitable man to begin this work.

Foreign Missions received due attention and excited manifest interest, first by the Presbyterial reports, then by the addresses of Messrs. Morrison and Stuart, and last by the presentation and adoption of the report of Synod's committee of Foreign Missions.

Ministerial Relief was presented to the Synod in an admirable, strong and effective address by the secretary, Dr. McElroy, and by the paper adopted in response thereto, strongly endorsing the scheme and heartily recommending it to all our people, their confidence and support.

The affairs of Westminster College received as usual careful consideration. The report adopted by Synod noted with pleasure and gratitude the present condition of the College, mentioning specially:

1. The attendance of students, already as many, lacking two, as were enrolled during the whole of last year when the number was the largest for years, and of these 105 or four-fifths are professing Christians, with 23 candidates for the ministry and a Y. M. C. A. numbering 80.
2. The excellent business and financial condition.
3. The completion of the new dormitory.
4. Expressing profound gratitude that our hopes as to the co-operation and assistance of our brethren of the Northern Synod are being fully realized.

The Synodical Female College and its interests were presented in the report of the Board of Trustees, the report of the standing committee and the address of President Spencer and this institution was again and earnestly commended to the patronage and liberality of all our people.

Other reports from various committees were received and action taken thereon, and after a most pleasant and harmonious session and with hearty thanks to the people of Fulton for their generous and abounding hospitality, Synod adjourned to meet at Cape Girardeau in October of 1904.

MISSIONARY MEETING.

On Wednesday evening a joint meeting was held in the interests of Missions, Home and Foreign. Dr. Marquess resided at this meeting. The first address was made by Rev. L. Stuart, Jr., on "The Forward Movement." This movement, what it is, the need for it, objections to it, and reasons for it, all were presented in a simple, strong, earnest and effective way, and he concluded with a stirring and touching appeal for more sympathy with Christ in His wish to save the world.

The second was by Rev. Dr. Carter of Kansas City (Northern Synod) on Home Missions. In well chosen words and with pleasing address and emphatic manner he referred to the marvelous growth of our country, to the work that had been wrought by Christian people in giving the gospel to the needy "West" for more than a century, to the needs still existing, and the encouragements in this work. And he closed with a strong appeal to all to hear and heed the Master's call to either go or give to this great work. The third was by our missionary to Africa, Rev. W. M. Morrison. His general subject was Reasons why Africa is an interesting and important mission field, the size, population, political importance, moral and spiritual needs—"the Dark Continent" indeed—and readiness to receive the gospel. He gave a number of striking, interesting and touching incidents, illustrating the power of the Gospel there. The last and crowning reason for giving the gospel to Africa was the wrongs suffered by Africans at the hands of white men, in the past and now, some of which were depicted in graphic and moving terms, which deeply touched and stirred the hearts of the great audience present.

TENNESSEE.

ZION CHURCH.—Pastor., Rev. S. P. Hawes and his people are rejoicing in the fruits of a successful meeting recently held. Rev. J. B. Green, of Columbia, Tenn., assisted them, preaching for them night and morning for a week with earnestness and force. The harvest was ready and the preaching of the Word was blessed. Members were greatly revived and twenty were added on profession of faith. The growth of this, one of the old Scotch-Irish churches, has been steady and healthy, increasing in active membership from 130 to 170 during the last ten years. A new manse has been erected during the past three years. Extensive improvements are now being made on the grounds and building of the church.

MISSISSIPPI.

CENTRAL MISSISSIPPI PRESBYTERY met in Carrollton, Miss., October 6, 1903, and was opened with a sermon by Rev. W. A. Hall.

Deaths.

"Living in the silent hours,
Where our spirits only bend;
They, unlinked with earthly trouble,
We, still hoping for its end.

How such holy memories cluster,
Like the stars when storms are past
Pointing up to that fair heaven
We may hope to gain at last."

DICKEY.—Died, of typhoid fever at her home in Edna, Texas, Saturday, Sept. 26, at 8:15 p. m., Louisa Jane, eldest daughter of Rev. W. N. Dickey, in her eighteenth year; a sweet, lovable, Christian character, early given to the Master. She was the comfort and companion of her father and mother in their declining years. May the God of Love and comfort solace their hearts.

Pastor.

CONYERS.—Called Home! One of the sweetest characters in the Presbyterian church at Rocky Mt., N. C., entered into the blessed rest prepared for the people of God on the 25th day of September. Mrs. Margaret Conyers came of that strong and virtuous Scotch ancestry which proved so great a blessing to the colonial settlements of the Cape Fear section of N. C., in its earlier history. She was reared in the old Bluff church of Fayetteville Presbytery under the ministry of that saintly man of God, Rev. D. D. McBryde. Her father Dr. H. A. McSwain, was for years a ruling elder in that church, and with the rest of his household heartily devoted her to the service of God. When quite young Maggie gave her heart to God and became a communicant in the church. She ever after led a consistent Christian life. In the month of January, 1893, she was allied in marriage with Mr. T. L. Conyers, a prosperous merchant of Rocky Mount, N. C., and spent the remainder of her life in connection with the Presbyterian congregation there. Mrs. Conyers was one of those gentle, retiring spirits which shrinks from the activity demanded by a large circle of social life. She devoted the gentle and refining influences of her pure and unselfish character to the service and happiness of a smaller circle of relatives and friends upon whom she poured the affection of her loving heart. As the end of the journey drew near she realized the comfort of walking in the path of the just which shines "more and more unto the perfect day." Her trust was reposed in her Saviour all sufficient for every day of pain and of trial and when the termination of a protracted illness approached, her faith and peace became more complete and satisfying, and at last the Lord of glory in his great love and compassion, lifted her in his arms through the gates of pearl into that blessed rest "where they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them and shall lead them into the living fountains of waters and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." A merciful God will dry the tears of her sorrowing husband and her little daughter, the venerable father and mourning sisters and friends, admonishing them not to sorrow as others who have no hope, but patiently wait on the Lord until they shall meet beyond the river.

Pastor.

ROBINSON.—Since the last regular meeting of the Ladies' Foreign Missionary Society, of the First Presbyterian Church of Wilmington, one of our most earnest and valued members, Mrs. Elizabeth White Robinson, has passed from the scenes of earth to the greater joy of the life above.

In the work of this Society, as in every other feature of our church work, she was always deeply interested. By her death we have lost one of our charter members, whose regular attendance and contributions were a constant example and inspiration to the rest of us. Even after ill health came upon her and she could no longer meet with us, she bore her work upon her heart and often spoke of it. Faithfully performing whatever she undertook, her home and her labor will be greatly missed.

Therefore be it resolved:

1st. That we give expression to our deep sorrow and great loss in her death; though our sorrow is not as that of those who have no hope, for we feel that her earthly suffering is over and that she entered into "That rest that remaineth to the people of God."

2nd. That we tender to her husband our deepest sympathy in his sore bereavement, and pray for him strength in his hour of sorrow and comfort from the great source of all comfort.

3rd. That we thus place on record our recognition of her useful life and devoted service for her Master, and testify to her faithfulness as a member in this Society.

4th. That these resolutions be spread upon our minutes, and a copy be sent to her husband, and to the Presbyterian Standard for publication.

Mrs. P. Pearsall,

Mrs. J. M. Wells,

Committee.

THE OLD RELIABLE

Absolutely Pure.
THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE

The Household.

A Wealth of Interests.

No one who has an interest is poor. And Miss Lydia had a hundred interests! A hundred? She had as many interests as there were people in the world, or joys or sorrows in Old Chester; so she was really very rich.

Of course, there are different degrees of this sort of wealth. There are folk who have to manufacture their interests; with deliberation they are philanthropic, or artistic, or intellectual, or even, if hard pnt to it, they are amused. Such persons may be said to be in fairly comfortable circumstances, although they live anxiously and rather meagerly, because they know well that when interest gives out they are practically without the means to support life.

Below this manufacturing class come the really destitute; the poor creatures who do not care vitally for anything and who are without the spiritual muscle to manufacture an interest. These pathetic folk are occasionally made self-supporting by a catastrophe—grief or even merely some uncomfortable surgery in regard to their bank account may give them a poor kind of interest; but too often they exist miserably—sometimes, with every wish gratified, helplessly poor.

Above the manufacturing class comes the aristocracy to which Miss Lydia Sampson belonged, the class which is positively rolling in wealth! Every morning these favored creatures arise with a zest for living: you hear them singing before breakfast; at the table they are full of eager questions: Is it going to rain? No; it is a fair day; delightful!—for it might have rained. And the sun will bring up the crocuses. And this was the day a neighbor was to go to town; will she go? When will she come back? How pleasant that the day is pleasant! And it will be good for the sick people, too. And the moment the eager, simple mind turns to its fellows, sick or well, the field of interest widens to the skyline of souls. To sorrow in the sorrows of Tom and Dick and Harry and their wives, to rejoice in their boys—what is better than that?

And then, all one's own affairs are so vital: the record of the range of the thermometer, the question of turning or not turning an alpaca skirt, the working out of a game of solitaire—these things are absorbing experiences. No wonder we who are poor, or even we who work hard at philanthropy, or art, or responsibility to manufacture our little interests—no wonder we envy such sky-line natures.—Margaret Deland, in Harper's.

Home-making versus Housekeeping.

Perhaps the most unfortunate result of our belated housekeeping methods is the fact that they are preventing women from preparing themselves for certain new-duties which social changes are making an important part of home-making today. These changes, by increasing the dependence of the individual and of the family upon society, are making knowledge of social conditions an indispensable qualification for good home-making. If women are to secure this knowledge, they must have more time for studying and more time for active participation in work outside of the home than it is possible for them to secure under present conditions.

Take, for example, the work of directing the education of a child—one of the most important of the home-maker's duties. This was once a comparatively simple matter, when possible careers were few and the means of preparation for lifework even fewer. Now that possible fields for activity are multiplying, and educational institutions increasing in number and variety, the woman who would satisfactorily superintend the education of her child must herself have a broader knowledge of society, of its needs and opportunities, than she can obtain within the four walls of her home.

Again, the commodities which are used in the home were formerly, also, prepared in the home, and the woman who gave her attention exclusively to her household was the woman who was most likely to know when the health of her family was being endangered. Now most of the commodities used in the home are made far away from it, and the responsibility for their good quality is widely distributed. Now it is not the woman who gives her time exclusively to her home who is most likely to know whether or not the milk that she serves to her child has been adulterated, and whether or not the coat that she buys for him was made by the bedside of a smallpox patient. Nor is it this woman who is best prepared to ward off from the home the dangers which come from impure food and unsanitary conditions of preparation of the articles in common use.

Once there was domestic service problem. Now this problem is hanging over the home and threatening its comfort and happiness. Its solution rests not with the woman who is able to see it only as it affects herself and her household, but with the woman who sees it in its broad industrial and social bearings.

Just as long as public opinion insists upon seeing in the varied activities of housekeeping ends in themselves, just so long will it run the risk of insisting upon them after they have become not only unnecessary to good home-making, but even impediments to it. Only when it sees in home the end, and in the material surroundings of home and in the work connected with it merely the means, will it have a conception of home-making adjustable to changing social conditions and favorable to the best interests of home itself.—Home Science Magazine.

A Garden for Cut Flowers.

You should have a special garden for growing flowers, for gathering or "picking." If you want many flowers for house decoration and to give away, grow them at one side in regular rows as you would potatoes or sweet corn. Cultivate them by horse or wheelhoe. Harvest them in the same spirit that you would harvest string beans or tomatoes; that is, what they are for. You do not have to consider the "looks" of your garden. The old stalk will remain, as the stumps of cabbage do. You will not be afraid to pick them. When you have harvested an armful your garden is not spoiled.—From Country Life in America.

Is It Fair?

One day in June, 1901, there came into our general office at 5 West Trade street, Dr. ———, (a name well known in North Carolina). This doctor is a resident of another town, and he had come for the purpose of obtaining a supply of Dr. King's Kidney and Liver Remedy. Said he: "About eight years ago, I had a patient suffering with every symptom of acute Bright's Disease, Headache, Fever, Albumen in urine, etc. The usual remedies gave even no palliative results. Having exhausted the practice laid down for such cases; I, having heard something of the reputation of Dr. King's Remedy for this trouble, procured a bottle, and removing Dr. King's label, gave it to my patient as my own prescription. The result was marvelous. Patient began to improve on first bottle, and, to all appearances, recovered, and is now in good health." We at once asked the doctor that we might state these facts and use his name. "Not at all, sir. Why, I made a reputation by curing that and other similar cases, and am often called in consultation on Kidney and Liver Troubles. I made $400.00 out of those few bottles of Dr. King's Kidney and Liver Remedy, and am not fool enough to give away a good thing."

Eternity.

By Carrie Primrose.

Eternity! an awful, awful thought!
But Jesus Christ our souls hath bought,
And from eternal darkness led,
To the cross where he hath bled,
He shows us his eternal love,
On Calvary.

The soul can never, never die;
Throughout the great eternity,
Shall in praise with angels vie
With love and great felicity,
The soul who turns to Jesus there
On Calvary.

Eternity, no mind can grasp
The awfulness of such a thought:
But we His loving hand may clasp,
And He will tell us how He sought
To lead us to our Father's home,
From Calvary.

O, wondrous grace, redeeming love,
When Jesus left his home above,
When Jesus suffered here below
Eternal life He might bestow,
When Jesus bowed His head in death
On Calvary!

The Indian School at Carlisle.

Some weeks ago there was an article in the Standard concerning the origination of Carlisle. I was a student of Carlisle for eight years. The institution is beautifully located in the Cumberland Valley amid the blue mountains. I wish all the readers of the Standard could visit Carlisle on a bright spring day when nature is busy unveiling her annual splendor.

The campus is shaded by many trees and more are put out each year, receiving names of honored people of the past and present. The old walnut tree is historical and is referred to as an example of strength. The ground is covered with grass traversed by stoue walks which add beauty to the place. The grass is cared for by the boys who water it during the dry seasons, for the ponderous roots of the trees surpasses the delicate grass roots and take all the moisture from the ground to send forth her buds. In the midst of the campus the flag pole extending ninety feet high heralds "Old Glory" over her Indian boys and girls.

The old buildings are made of stone, painted and calsomined steel colored with tin roofs painted red. The modern buildings are most all made of wood. The school is on the outskirts of town. A trolley line runs out to the school. The car runs from the school to various places in the vicinity.

Carlisle is an industrial school; each student must work a half day. There are well equipped shops and a printing office. The boys may have a choice of a trade. The girls have sewing, cooking and house work to do. There are over a thousand pupils, seventy-five different tribes are represented; about five hundred pupils attend public schools in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland and Delaware. They go out in families and work out of school hours for their board.

The large and small girls occupy one building. The building is three stories high. It will accommodate about two hundred and eighty girls. There are three matrons to care for these girls. The girls have a Literary Society. They have a programme each Friday evening. Orations, essays, declamations and debates must be given by each member during the year. Music and various other pleasures are also enjoyed. There are five pianos in the girl's quarters; as many girls as can get an hour's practice in each day take lessons.

There are a large and small boys' quarters, therefore the school accommodates more boys than girls. The boys have a band of fifty-one members. Without the band the school would feel lost. The boys have two societies.

There are fourteen school rooms that will each accommodate about forty-eight pupils. In the building are an art room, music room, chapel, library, office and normal room. The normal room where the little ones are taught is situated on the west end of the school building. The girls of the highest grades who are capable, help in teaching the little ones. I had the pleasure of teaching a class last spring. I learned much myself from the earnest little workers. They have one large room where all study and several small ones where they go with their teachers to recite. The sloyd room is in the basement. Some of the children are skilled in this work. The normal children enjoy so much studying nature. The teachers strive each year to teach them to love and enjoy what each season brings.

No description or explanation should be given of Carlisle without mentioning Col. Pratt. The good things he has done for the Indians are endless. Not only the school children should appreciate his kindness but all should do so. He is doing all he can for the uplifting of the Indians. He has fought the Indians' battle for them so far as possible. There are people who oppose his work at Carlisle. They say, "Indians cannot be civilized and the only good Indian is the dead one." Col. Pratt believes the only good Indian is the one who is brought out of the bondage of a reservation and given opportunities as other people have. There are people today who write untruths about the Indian and are ever ready to make their subject a Carlisle graduate. Col. Pratt has all such difficulties to contend with in his great effort to place the Indian on a level with the white race. The Indians cannot reach their goal of civilization as long as they are penned up in reservations. Schools are established that the Indians might have the opportunity of coming out of barbarism into civilization. Much is being done for the Indians by those who see their condition and hope to bring them out of bondage. The people who establish these missions deserve their credit but such work does not progress fast, as the environment prevents progress. The non-reservation schools are far better; I could not refer a young Indian to a better place than the Carlisle school situated in the midst of civilization and progress. I am glad light has been brought to my people here in York County, South Carolina. Though there were few Presbyterians here in our community yet the Bethel Presbytery has seen their need and has brought light to them. Though the good seed sown may not spring up soon and darkness often overshadow all, yet we are comforted to know that all good seed sown will some time sprig up and bear fruit. Perhaps not in our day though we hope to see its full fruition. The reason I speak in doubt of its early springing is this: People who have lived in darkness for years do not always readily accept light when brought to them. Those who are interested in my people here will be pleased to know that three of our boys have within the last few weeks gone to Carlisle, Joseph Sanders, Moroni George and little Wade Ayres, have gone to get a share of the grand opportunities given there. We hope that more will go before long; in the spring if not before.

I am a granddaughter of Allen Harris who was chief of the Catawbas. He went west to see if his people could be moved there. He died while out there.

Very truly yours,
Rosa E. Harris.

Looking Up.

By Annie A. Preston.

In a large, pleasant chamber of an old colonial two-story house far back from the umbrageous street of a fine, old New England village lay a beautiful young woman, prostrated by a spinal affection induced by a fall upon the ice when skating.

"Beautiful Belle Imlay," she was called, the only daughter of proud, ambitious, cold, haughty Esq. Imlay, and inheriting many of his traits.

"You may live for years, but you will probably be an invalid as long as you live," was the verdict of the examining surgeons which she insisted upon knowing.

"And I am doomed for life to lie here upon a couch in this room and give up all my beautiful ambitions and plans!" she said over and over.

It was the burden of her plaint and one day a poor woman from a tiny cottage on a farm back of the village, who was wiping the paint in her room, and who the invalid had never deigned to notice by a look, said very gently as she was leaving:

"Doomed to lie and look up."

"What does she mean by that?" thought the girl too surprised at the woman's presumption to be angry. "Is it some of her preaching? I will have none of it."

The thought remained with her, however. She could not see the ground anywhere, but her windows at one side looked out into a huge rock maple and, for her eyes must rest upon something, she soon became familiar with the denizens of the air who made the great tree their home. She noted the shadows cast by the sunlight, the drip, drip of the rain. She explored cloud land noted the beauty of dawn the glory of the sunsets and soon learned where to look for the first star that smiled in at her with its never-failing assuring gleam.

Those who cared for her noticed that while she did not suffer less she ceased complaining, and the next time the woman came to wipe the windows she said, simply: "Tell me something more."

"It is a great thing to look up always," said the woman. "It creates a prayerful spirit; you can't help thinking what is about it all."

"How did you learn all this?" asked the girl, and the woman replied: "I will tell you because it was such a beautiful thing that once happened to me. I was at work for a lady who was obliged to see callers one morning, when the nurse and everybody was away, and she called me to mind the baby, who was sleeping in a cradle under the trees, and she said, 'There is a hammock; you can lie in that if you like,' and, I did, for a quarter of an hour I have no doubt, and I looked up and up and up—into the blue and saw birds fly up as if they wore thoughts or prayers—and when I went back to my work I was a new and happy woman—it was as if I had a glimpse of a new and higher, purer life—and ever since I have looked up myself away from all the bother—some things that make life hard if you think of them, and I'm sure that is what the Heavenly Father wants us all to do. So when I saw you so unhappy I couldn't help saying: 'Look up,' and now I make bold to tell you this: Your life will not be spoiled; it will be changed, for God will give you something to do for Him right here."

The poor woman's words were a prophecy, for the invalid in improving the condition of this humble friend became interested in other needy ones.

Soon her father, her family and friends fell under the benign influence and the haughty ambitious pride that had characterized them was lost in the desire to mount to a higher spiritual level, and when one seeks to trace the beneficent and far-reaching influences that went out from that room to the timid words of that poor woman one is lost in wonder at the influence that may attend our smallest act and most thoughtless word.—The Christian Intelligencer.

The Value of Appreciation

Many men and women underestimate the value of expression; they take too many things for granted; they assume that their affection, or their gratitude, or their sense of obligation, is understood without words. Such people are often surrounded by those who are craving some expression of affection, some word of approval, some kind of recognition. The best work is sometimes done with shut teeth and a fixed purpose, in dead silence, so far as the world is concerned, without a murmur of applause or a word of thanks; but this is not the way in which work ought to be done among intelligent men and women, and it is not the way in which, as a rule, the best work is evoked from the greatest number of people. The majority of men and women get the best out of themselves when they are in a congenial atmosphere. This is particularly true of those finer kinds of work which express individuality, quality, and personal gift. A man may do a piece of mechanical work in arctic coldness; he may do it thoroughly in the face of distinct disapproval; but it is very difficult to do the work into which one puts his heart, and which is the expression of the finest elements in one, unless there is some warmth in the atmosphere, something which summons out of their hiding places the most delicate and beautiful possibilities of one's nature. It is true a man like Dante can do a sublime piece of work with no other approval than his own conscience, with no other reward than his own consciousness of having done his work with a man's integrity and an artist's thoroughness; but men of Dante's temperament are few; and there are a great many other kinds of work, as important as that which Dante did, which could not possibly be done under such conditions.

It is the duty of every man, not only to do his work as thoroughly as possible, but to create the atmosphere in which other men and women can do their work thoroughly and well. It is the duty of every man, not only to unfold his own character freely and completely, but to create the atmosphere in which other people are able to develop their best qualities. There are hosts of men and women who depend absolutely on others for their finest growth, who have to be drawn out, whose sweetness and charm never find expression unless they are evoked by warm affection or by generous approval. The world is full of half-starved people whose emotions are denied their legitimate expression; who are hungry for an affection which they often have but the possession of which they do not realize because it never finds expression; who have latent possibilities of achievement of a very high order, but these possibilities are undeveloped because nothing in the air about them summons them forth. Such people need a summer atmosphere, and they are often to live in a winter chill. Many of those who diffuse the chill instead of the cheer are unconscious of the influence for repression which they put forth simply from lack of thought about the delicate adjustments of life. They have never studied themselves, or those about them, and so there are thousands of homes that are without cheer, not because they are without love, but because they are without the expression of love; and there are thousands of offices, workshops, and school-rooms that are without inspiration, not because they are lacking in earnestness or in integrity, but because the habit of recognition has never been formed, and there is none of that spiritual co-operation which not only gives but evokes the best.

There is in life no more pathetic feature than the hunger for a love which exists but never expresses itself, and therefore, so far as comfort, warmth, or inspiration is concerned, it is as if it were not. There is a capital of affection and good intention in the world sufficient to warm the whole atmosphere, if it were used; but there are hundreds of capitalists of this kind who leave their means untouched, and who enrich neither themselves nor others because they do not know how to give currency to their wealth. Love is not to be hoarded, but to be spent. It is great in the exact measure in which it is given; it returns in the exact measure in which it is sent away; and society needs nothing today so much as the use of this unused capital. If men of integrity and good intentions in the world of business would manifest an interest in their employees by constant recognition of work well done, by the words spoken almost at random which show that a piece of work is valued, and that credit is rendered to the worker, a large percentage of the social unrest would disappear; for love is the only solvent of the social problems.—The Outlook.

Some people predict that as the result of the invention of the automobile the horse will gradually become extinct. At the present writing, however, it looks as if the human race, rather than the equine, would be the one to become extinct.

Our Young People.

The Fire in the Woods.

"The smoke is getting thicker," said Harry Mortou, a boy of thirteen, looking up to a threatening cloud of smoke rolling heavily across the sky.

He stood alone in the road before the house of his grandfather, Jotham Morton, whom he was visiting. He watched that threatening smoke, and reflected: "Grandfather has taken a load of valuables, as he called them, over to Aunt Nabby's, where grandmother is visiting. He thought the fire might come this way. He is coming back for me and some more things soon. I told him I wanted to stay here and help him load up next time."

Harry was one of those big-hearted, wanting-to-help boys, never too proud to carry a tin pail in the streets or fetch a bundle from the stores. He had this lovely spirit,—that to do anything for those at home was a privilege. He now wanted to help his grandfather load up the old red market-wagon at the next trip.

"In the meantime, while I am waiting, I—I will just run over to Uncle Ben's. I—I don't know but I ought to take a stand before him," thought Harry.

Uncle Ben was Grandfather Morton's brother, a shoe-maker, who seemed to take special pains, when Harry was about, to say some irreverent, unfair things about religion. Harry was a wide-awake Sunday school boy,—and what is the good of any other kind when it comes to real work for the school? Grandfather Morton's brother knew of Harry's interest, and took an unkind advantage of it.

Harry had been saying to himself often, "Now, I ought to be right plain with Uncle Ben, and take a square out-and-out stand before him."

On his way to the shop, this morning of the smoky sky, he said, resolutely:

"I'll take a stand, today."

"Tap, tap, tap!" was the sound issuing from a little coop, behind whose green door Uncle Ben made and mended shoes. For miles, people would bring him their footwear to cobble. He was Jotham Morton's only neighbor out on the "back road." Uncle Ben was alone in the world, and his brother wanted him to live under the farmhouse roof, but he had some sort of "a grudge agin Jotham," as Uncle Ben put it, and, when the sun went down, he would climb up a short stairway to a little chamber over his shop.

"Uncle Ben, the smoke is growing thicker," said Harry, entering the old shoemaker's shop. "Grandpa thinks the fire may come this way, and he has been carrying off some things to Aunt Nabby's."

"Has he lugged off yer grandma?"

"She is there already,—been making a visit. Why, Uncle Ben, it's so smoky you can hardly see down the road to the orchard."

"Yer grandfather lugged off his well in the yard?"

"Why, no!"

"I'm safe, long as that well is there."

"Tap, tap, tap," went Uncle Ben's hammer.

Then the owner of the hammer spoke again:

"Seems to me you pious folks are dreadful skittish 'bout these things like a little fire. Stay cool, I say."

"Pious folks?" asked Harry, determined to make the old shoe-shop an arena, and stand up boldly as a champion for the right, boy of thirteen though he might only be.

"Oh, I mean them a-holdin' up the Bible, and sich like."

"The Bible is a good book," said the champion, stoutly.

"Oh, I can git along without it. This readin' it every day,—what does it 'mount to? I s'pose my brother Jotham would read his Bible, though the fire was comin', and jest singe his hair off."

"You—you may get yours singed off without reading it," thought Harry, but he did not say it.

Suddeuly Uncle Ben laughed.

"Now, you may thiuk I'll get my hair singed off without readin' it. Ha-ha!"

"Well that thought did come into my head."

"You dou't say! Ha-ha-ha!" here Uncle Ben laughed again. "I've heard of sich thiugs,—one person thinkin' suthin', and another person ketchin' it like measles."

Uncle Ben was now in a good humor, and he and Harry talked freely. The champion did not come up out of the arena, but he dropped a certain kind of stiff way, like David giving up Goliath's armor, and fighting in a very simple fashion.

"Uncle Ben, I'm only a boy, and I don't b'lieve I'm pious; but I think the Bible is a good book, and it helps people when we read it, and it sort of stands by us."

"Stands by us? Harry, I'd gin more for the old trunk as a stand-by, what's down in Meader River, than for all your Bible-readin's. When we boys went in swimmin', we would hold on to it to keep us from slidin' toward "Deep Hole," jest beyond it."

"How came the trunk there?"

"Oh, Meader River is a made river. When they put a dam in, on account of the fact'ries, you see, that flowed all the fields back, and went all round this trunk left standin' in a pastur'. How my brother Jim and me would hold on to that 'stand-by!'"

"Jim? Was he the one that died, and died saying a Bible verse, and he said it because it held him up? Grandfather told me about it."

David, when he said that, uttered it without special thought. He did not know that he had put some pebbles into his sling, and then sent them against Goliath. This Goliath looked and acted very much as if he had been struck in a tender place. He nodded his head, his eyes filled with tears, and he said, in broken words:

"J-J-Jim and—me—slept—together

A Prominent Minister.

How he was Rescued Twenty-one Years ago from the Horrors of Catarrh.

Rev. J. Cal. Littrell, of Warrensburg, Mo., writes as follows: "I was a sufferer from nasal catarrh for twelve years, and it developed into the worts form, impairing my eyesight and injuring my hearing. My nervous system gave way, unfitting me for the duties of life.

"By the use of Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure I was permanently cured in the year 1881, making twenty-one years in which I have not had a return of the disease, nor have I felt the effects of it.

"I most heartily recommend Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure to all sufferers, as one that cannot be excelled."

in a—leettle trundle-bed under—the of.”

The old shoemaker wiped his eyes. He changed the subject quickly.

“You want to take dinner with me?”

“I should like to, ever so much. I’ll go over and see if grandfather has come, and wants me to help.”

How the smoke had thickened everywhere while David had been fighting that battle with Goliath!

When the farmhouse was reached, Harry found a slip of paper tacked to the back door, and it said: “Harry, I’ve taken another load of things, and will try to be back in an hour. If anything happens while I am gone, put for Meadow River.”

“‘Happens!’ ‘anything happens!’” thought Harry, with a shiver, though it was a hot subject.

It “happened” when Harry was helping Uncle Ben get dinner in a little cook-house next to the shop, Harry happened to go back of the cook-house to hunt up a wood-pile. Looking along the road, he saw a line of scarlet flame wriggling like a snake across the narrow way.

“Whar? whar?”

“Up there! See!” cried Harry, pointing up the road.

“Let’s go to Meadow River, Harry. Fire won’t burn water, and when it goes by us, we can come back easy. I’ll just pack up a few things, though I don’t believe the fire will really git here. Still, I’ll keep on the safe side.”

Off they went, Uncle Ben panting away as he lugged along a basket.

Reaching the farmhouse, Harry went to the back door. There was another message on a slip of paper: “Harry, have come back, but not to get a load so much as to tell you, if round here, to hurry off at once. The fire is after us, and I don’t go the way I came on account of the fire. I don’t know where you are. People tell me Uncle Ben went to market today, so you are not there; and my brother is safe, or I’d go after him. Run!”

“I’m obliged to him for thinkin’ of Uncle Ben. Somebody told him wrong. Come; we’ll be all right at the river, Harry,” said Uncle Ben.

A dense volume of smoke hung upon the river, reaching from the forest on one side to that on the other.

“We’ll be safe here,” said the older of the fugitives, dropping his basket by the river’s bank.

“Hark!” cried Harry. “Do you hear that crackling and roaring?”

“Boy, the fire is on us!”

Soon they were wading into the river. Big folds of smoke came out of the great forest, and stretched across the valley of Meadow River. Now and then this dense curtain lifted, and the flames could be seen darting amid the trees, their long, fiery tongues licking up everything like a leaf or a twig.

It grew hotter.

“We will go further,—out to the trunk,” said Uncle Ben, splashing through the water.

He grasped the trunk, and Harry stood by him.

“This—is—bad! ‘Wasn’t looking for this,” said Uncle Ben. “Hold on to me. Whew-w-w! This smoke jes’ fills my eyes.”

“No; but we ain’t water. That fire is savage. Wants to lick us right out of the water.”

“This where you and Jim used to hold on?”

“The very place. But ain’t this awful? The flames came ‘mazin’ quick. It jes’ ran for us.”

There was silence. Then Uncle Ben broke it.

“Harry, can’t you say suthin’?”

“Say what, sir?”

“I heard about it,—that Scriptur you got off at a Sunday-school concert the other Sunday night.”

“Oh! The forty-sixth Psalm? Well!”

Harry began to repeat those beautiful assurances:

“God is our refuge and strength,
A very present help in trouble.”

What a scene! A man clinging to an old tree trunk in Meadow River, a boy clinging to the man, the fire darting out from the woods, and shooting scarlet tongues at the two refugees.

After awhile there burst from Uncle Ben’s mouth:

“Oh, thank God! I felt a drop of rain then!”

Harry was not surprised so much at the rain as at that devout cry, “Thank God!”

Yes, the rain had come. It swept down fiercely. Finally, there crept a man and a boy to the farmhouse, which the fire had left, after all, untouched.

“My shop has gone, I know. Guess I’ll stop here, and accept Brother Jotham’s invitation. Say that psalm agin, Harry.”

Harry repeated the beautiful words once more.

“It comes to me now, Harry. My brother Jim used to say that. Guess I’ll tie up to that. It’s a good stand-by.”

He thought of the trunk in Meadow River, of the fierce, wild flames, and in his heart purposed to begin a new life of prayer. When night came, he went to sleep humbly, as in the days when two tired boys used to pull out an old trundle-bed, and gratefully crawl into it.—Rev. E. A. Rand, in Sunday School Times.

It Doesn't Take Long, if You Don't Wait Too Long.

Last year I was suffering from indigestion, and would have the feeling of a heavy load on my stomach all the time. I had a bad case of indigestion and got so I could hardly sleep at all. I was so nervous. My natural weight was 142 pounds and I got down to 118, and was so weak I could hardly get around.

I used Mrs. Joe Person’s Remedy and three bottles cured me. I have regained the flesh I lost, sleep well and am cured of indigestion.

It is a good medicine, and taken in time dose not take long to cure.

A Real Boy Wonder.

One of the most remarkable boys the world ever saw was William Pitt. He astonished folks with his learning at the age of seven. He became prime minister of England when he was twenty-four.

He was a sickly boy, but he took all the out of door exercise his delicate frame allowed and was as eager to study as most boys are to play. He would not let his weak body stop his work, and he was reading ancient history at an age when most children are reading stories written in words of one syllable.

His father was the great Earl of Chatham, and the boy was brought into contact with all the great men of the time in England. When he was thirteen years old he wrote a tragedy which he called "Laurentine, King of Clarinium."

At this age, too, he was able to read Greek and Latin almost as well as he could English. He also was well informed on the politics of the day on various subjects about which only men of learning are supposed to know anything.

At fourteen he was able to take the works of Thucydides, written in Greek, and read page after page turning it into excellent English as he read, and this off-hand translation of his is said to have been almost without a flaw.

His father spoke of him as "eager Mr. William, the counselor, the philosopher." At the age of fourteen he entered the great University of Cambridge in England and at once, in spite of his youth, took a high place among the students at that celebrated place of learning.

When he went to Cambridge, the boy was in such feeble health that he had to be accompanied by a nurse, and all through his course there he was in so poor a condition physically, that it was doubtful if he ever would be able to finish the course.

But hard study seemed to agree with him and when he was graduated, at the age of seventeen, he was very much stronger than when he entered the university.

At an age when most boys are preparing to enter college, or, if they are very clever, have just become freshmen, young Pitt won the degree of master of arts from one of the greatest universities in the world and began the study of law.

At twenty-one he was admitted to the bar, and the same year was elected a member of parliament, to become prime minister three years later.

While he was yet a law student and only eighteen years old he attracted the attention of prominent men by his clear views on the questions of government, which then were perplexing the rulers of England. The boy was invited everywhere, and men holding the most important offices listened to his advice and asked his opinions.

His friends wanted him to go into parliament when he was twenty and all predicted for him a brilliant career. It was curious to see this delicate stripling, a boy in looks and years, meeting the great and wise men of the country as an equal, and conversing on even terms with the most learned scholars of the day.

Young Pitt used to like to listen to the debate in the British parliament, and Mr. Fox, the great statesman, meeting him once after a debate, was astonished at the manner in which the boy criticized the eminent men who had spoken and pointed out where they could have made their argument stronger.

One of the hardest works to understand that ever was written is a book called "Carandra," written by a man called Mycowronis. It was written in Greek. A learned man placed the book in the hands of young Pitt when the boy was sixteen years old, and he read it at first sight, translating as he read and explaining it in a manner which made the learned man declare that had he not seen it he "would have believed it to be beyond the power of human intellect."

When Pitt was sixteen, his father declared that he would be a great statesman and the hope of the country. Other folks soon became of his father's way of thinking, and that is why they put him into parliament when he was so young and made him prime minister so soon after.

He fulfilled all that was expected of him and ruled England during thirteen of the most eventful years of her history. —Detroit Free Press.

The Boy Hero.

Till time shall be no more there can be no grander deed, in every sense, done by mortal soldier—let alone by a boy just out of school, a mere lad of seventeen, who yet was an officer in the Seventy-fourth Highlanders, now the "Highland Light Infantry."

Everybody knows the story of "The Loss of the Birkehead"—how the troopship struck upon a rock; how the soldiers were [formed in ranks to die, while the women and children were being saved; how the whole force—officers and men—stood at the salute, while "Still inch by inch the doomed ship sank low,

Yet under steadfast men."

Russell was ordered into one of the boats carrying the women and children, for the purpose of commanding it, and he sat with dimmed eyes in the stern, some way off the doomed ship, watching the forms of his beloved comrades and fellows standing upright there. He saw the ship go down, carrying with it the hundreds of brave hearts. He saw those fearful creatures of the deep seizing their prey, and heard the screams of scores of human beings torn to pieces by sharks. Then, when all for him was safe, when to him was given (with honor) life, ambition, and glory, he saw a sailor's form rise close to the boat, and a hand strive to grasp the side. There was not room in the craft for a single person more without great risk of upsetting the boat.

Alexander Cumine Russell rose in the stern of the boat. With a bold plunge he jumped clear of it, and helped that sailor into what had been his own place—and safety. Then, amid a chorus of "God bless you!" from every soul in the boat, the young officer—a lad of seventeen, mind!—turned round to meet his death. And those in the boat shut their eyes and prayed. When they opened them again Alexander Cumine Russell was nowhere to be seen!—Windsor Magazine.

MISS MAY MARKELL,

A Society Belle of London, Canada.

MISS MAY MARKELL of London, Ontario, Canada, is a beautiful girl who knows what suffering is and Wine of Cardui has brought her back to health. She is one of the social favorites of her home and her recovery to health has permitted her to enjoy the company of her many friends instead of lying on a bed of sickness and suffering. For the health she now enjoys she gives credit to Wine of Cardui. She writes:

Miss May Markell.

"I have found Wine of Cardui an excellent remedy for female trouble. I suffered for three years with terrible bearing-down pains at the menstrual period. I could hardly stand on my feet and was never real well. Wine of Cardui was the only medicine that I could depend on to do me any good, as I tried several with no success. Wine of Cardui cured me and I have now enjoyed perfect health for two years, and give you all the credit for I know you deserve it."

For a young girl Wine of Cardui is the best remedy to guide her through womanhood by starting the menstrual flow in a healthy and natural manner. Menstruation started right is very easy to keep regular through the years of mature womanhood. Then the "change of life" need not be feared. Thus Wine of Cardui is woman's best relief from youth to old age. A million women have secured blessed relief from their sufferings by taking this treatment. It relieves menstrual troubles in an incredibly short time. In a simple case of deranged menses Wine of Cardui never fails. To relieve disordered menses is to remove the cause of other female troubles. Any physician will tell you that to remove the cause of a disease renders the cure easy, in fact seldom fails to complete the cure. If you would have the same relief which Miss Markell secured try Wine of Cardui. You can take it without an examination and without any publicity whatever. You can take it in the privacy of your home and secure just as much benefit as if a doctor had prescribed it for you. Thousands of women are feeling the vigor of returning health by taking Wine of Cardui.

Our Little Folks.

Andy's Muscle.

"I do wish you were older, Andy."

The youngster who was lying, sprawled upon his stomach, in front of a long window, heels in air, elbows buried in the rug, and hands supporting his head, which was bent over that delightful book for boys, "Phaeton Rogers," looked up and answered:

"It's all right as it is. I'm having a pretty good time."

"Yes, that's it," said the elder brother, and a look of care, that was sadly out of place upon so young a face, deepened the lines in his forehead.

Andrew went on with his reading. Phaeton was just planning to get the kite down from the church spire—which was enough to make any live boy hold his breath. But as he read on there came a deep sigh from the figure near him. This was too much for Andrew.

"I say, Milton, what's the matter? Is it that—that papa is—is dead, or is there something else in it?"

"O, here you are!" said Esther, the little sister. "I've been looking all over. Why, what's the matter Milton?" She went up, sat down on the arm of the chair, and slid her arm around her elder brother's neck.

"Nothing that you can help, dear."

At this Andy closed the book—and any boy who loves to read about other boys knows how hard it was to do that. He gave a somerset, and landed, Turk fashion in front of Milton, and looked up into his face.

"I say, Milton, what's the row? I'm not as old as you, but I can do a lot if—I if I say I'll do it."

"You can't do this. There's no use talking of it." Milton was very blue, you see.

"No telling," said Andrew; and "Don't keep it to yourself," whispered Esther. "It's harder that way. I can do a lot, too."

Then Milton raised his head. "It's just this: I'd like if we could carry out every one of father's plans. Mother has been talking to me. Things are getting badly mixed. We shall have to give up this place if we can't manage better. We must keep the school and do certain improvements. Mr. Reynolds will continue as head-master, and John and his wife will run the farm. But we can't afford to hire as much help as we are doing. You know that it was the dream of father's life to establish a country school, where boys could be got ready for college and, at the same time, trained to farm, to garden, to raise stock and poultry—in fact, made to love the country so that they would want to come back into the life that some of their grandfathers lived."

He paused. Esther tightened her hold about his neck, while Andrew nodded slowly. This father, who had been swept away some months before by a shocking railway accident, was very dear to them.

"I'd like to make the Winthrop School the success that father used to picture it.

And we could do it if you two were as big and strong as I am."

"Never mind that," said Andsy, running his fingers fondly over the muscles in his arms and legs, "never you mind that."

"In the first place," said Milton, "we must do our best to make the boys who are here like the school. I'm going to be more thoughtful of Sam Johnson, and you, Andy, will need to make up that quarrel with Tommy Redington. Then we must all work."

"Work's all right," said Andy, "but Tommy Redington's the softest—"

"Yes; but Tommy has written to his mother that he wants to leave here at the Easter vacation. His mother is foolish; she'll let him do it. That means two hundred dollars less—all told—and one pupil off for next year."

"I'll—I'll—," said Andy, slowly. Then he stopped and began all over. "You needn't count Tommy off," he said.

"That's good! You're all right, Andy! That's why I wish you were older."

"Go on," said the small boy. "Pull the rest of it out of your sleeve."

"We'd all have to work—hard. It makes me feel dreadfully, but, with Hannah to scrub floors and wash windows, mother is going to take all the care of the dormitories, the study rooms, and the rest of the house. That will cut off two servants. 'Twould cut off another if Esther could—" he paused. "O, I don't want to go on. It makes me seem a brute."

But Esther proved herself to be of the same brave stuff as Andy. "Do you s'pose I want to 'play lady' when my own mamma is working?" she asked.

"Mamma said this of you, dear: that if you would attend the door and learn to wait upon table we could let Ellen go, and you'd still have time for your lessons."

"Of course I'll do it—though sometimes I am dreadfully lazy," said Esther.

"And we—you and I, Andy—must not only help with the chores; we must give certain hours to regular work on the farm. There's that field which we expected so much from in the line of vegetables—that's got to be drained," (Andy began to examine his muscles again), "and ditching is mighty hard work. Father had it begun and the plans were all made, but—you know how they were broken. John thinks if you and I work more it will make the other boys want to. That will lead on the idea. Some of the boys may stay through the summer vacation. That would help a lot in every way. We needn't work all the time. We must plan good times for the boys; but two things we would have to do—look after the work with James. Mother, Mr. Reynolds, and I have been talking. If we can get through one more year, get that great field in shape, and make the boys like the school, we're fixed. The mortgage can be paid off and—"

"You can count heavy on me," said Andy, springing up. "Just feel that eg. I'm ready for anything—though I won't say that I like to knuckle to Tommy."

"You needn't do that. Be manly, as you are now; but a little more careful not to stir him up. You seem to love to stir Tommy up."

Esther laughed. "Tommy is such aissy," she said, "and Andy's such a deal boy! I don't blame Andy."

"But I'll stop it, and maybe Tommy'll go to work and get strong too."

"There! that's the right spirit. I believe we can do it."

"I just know we can!"

"Come on, then. Get your wraps. Come out and we'll look the place over."

In a few minutes they were bundled up—except Milton, who only buttoned his coat and turned up the collar. Poor addie! he had begun to think that overcoats wear out.

They climbed the hill back of the house. "On top of this father was going to build the observatory. There is that field where a lot of hard work must be done. See how fine it is to be on the edge of the lake. That lake draws the boys whose parents want them to swim, live, row, and sail. You see the advantages we have, and the school is started. That's the biggest nail in the job—father drove that for us. You two don't remember; but ever since I was a little kid I've heard him talk about a place like this. In other countries sons are proud to carry on their father's plans. Why shouldn't we be? Our father was—O, he was such a fine pattern for us to live up to!" Milton stopped suddenly. His throat grew full. "Mother has set her heart upon it," he said, in a lower tone, "and she can't do it alone."

"We'll help her," said Andy and Esther solemnly.

Later on Milton smiled as he saw Andy feeling Tommy Redington's flabby muscle, and heard him say: "Now that is harder than when you came. You're built for a big fellow, if you'll only take a brace, and begin your exercise, and go outdoors, so's to get up an appetite. If you'd just try you could go home in a year's time and scare the life out of that fellow who bullies you."

"O, do you—do you think so?" cried Tommy.

"Why, course! You can do it. Just let me train you. Feel of my left." Here was another chance for Andy's muscle to come into play.

"O, that's what the papers call a terrible left." You could do that bully all up; I'd like to see him come up against you once."

The next morning Esther, with neat little apron and collar, began her work.

As the weeks went by it was not easy or them. Many times their young hearts sank; many times they were tired. Andy got discouraged at times over Tommy's muscle—it came so slowly. But it did come at last, and grew hard, and two prouder boys you never saw. Tommy's enthusiasm brought other boys to the school, and Tommy's mother, who was a very rich woman, built the observatory as a thank offering because her frail, fretful boy had become strong and manly.

And the Winthrop School for boys became a great success.—The Christian Advocate.

How "Tige" Saved the Broilers.

By Ernest Gilmore.

Rebecca Whitney loved animals. When—while sitting on the piazza steps—she saw Roy Settle (who lived next door) kick a kitten, she was greatly disturbed. Running to the gate, she said to Roy, "Is that your kitten you kicked?" "Nope," the boy answered indifferently with his hands in his pockets, "tisn't anybody's, it's nothing but a stray."

"Well, you ought to be ashamed of yourself," she said, her voice trembling with indignation; "how would you like to be kicked?"

Roy laughed, but he really was ashamed. Rebecca, looking around for the "stray," called persuasively:

"Kitty! kitty!" and when she found the poor creature hiding in a crevice of the stone wall, she bent down and stroked its rumpled fur softly. Presently it stopped trembling and then Rebecca coaxed it to come out. After some urging kitty responded slowly, but, alas, it was lame! It walked on three legs; the fourth had been injured.

"There," cried Rebecca to Roy, who lingered near to see what was to be done with the injured kitty, "you've hurt the poor kitty's leg with your ugly kick. Go away!"

He went on laughing to himself. "A great fuss over nobody's cat," was his thought.

Rebecca lifted the wounded creature and carried it around the house to the back yard, where she found Cyrus, the man-of-all-work.

"Cy," said she, "Roy Settle kicked this poor little kitty and hurt its leg—I guess it's broken."

Cyrus, who was a big-hearted man with ever ready sympathy, took the poor little stray into his arms as gently as if it had been a suffering child. Examining the hurt leg carefully, he said:

"Tain't broke, Miss Rebecca, but it's pretty well bruised."

He had some liniment in the stable, which he used on the stray's leg, after which he bandaged it. At this point Rebecca took the poor creature in charge.

"I'm going to keep it," she said.

"Lucky cat," was Cy's laughing comment; "no one'll dispute your claim, Miss Rebecca."

So the poor abused wanderer found a home. It was thin almost to emaciation and had the unmistakable look of a tramp. But as the days passed by he grew to be a fine example of the power of kindness. When he grew plump and his fur became smooth and thick he was a fine animal.

"He's marked like a tiger," declared Rebecca, "and he's grown too big to be called kitty—I'll call him 'Tige'."

Tige showed his devotion to Rebecca in many ways. He followed her as if he were a dog. He grew steadily until he was a magnificent fellow.

"Will he ever stop growing, Cy?" Rebecca asked, laughing.

"Some day—perhaps," was Cy's answer; "he's as big as a cheetah now."

"What's a cheetah?"

"Oh, it's a big wildcat over in Asia or Africa or somewhere. Folks use him to hunt with, and they're great at that sort of thing. Tige would make as good hunting cat as cheetah if he was trained. He's killed every rat and mouse on the premises. Before we had him the rats used to fairly riot in the stables."

There came a time when Mr. Whitney had a fine lot of young broilers in the hen house. He looked at them every morning and night with great pride. One morning, however, he came into breakfast greatly disturbed.

"Two of our fine broilers are gone," he announced.

"Weasles?" questioned Mrs. Whitney.

"No," he said, "some two-legged chicken thieves. I wish I had the handling of them."

The following morning two more broilers were gone.

"We will have to set a watch," declared Mr. Whitney.

Suddenly Rebecca thought of her cat.

"Why, there's Tige, papa; why couldn't he watch?"

Mr. Whitney laughed. "Tige would have a fine meal of broilers, he said; 'you can't trust chickens with cats.'"

"I don't believe Tige would touch one," declared Rebecca, emphatically, "he has been taught not to touch a chicken."

"Who taught him that?"

"I did."

"Well," said Mr. Whitney, after some reflection, "I've a notion to make the venture. Tige wouldn't be liable to make a meal out of more than one chicken, anyway, tonight, and—possibly—he and the broilers together might raise such a row if a thief came that we would catch him."

That night Tige was talked to as if he were a detective. Mr. Whitney told him to catch the thief "like a good fellow." So did Rebecca, so did Cyrus.

The chickens went to roost and Tige made up his mind to go to sleep in his new quarters. In his cat mind was an unsolved problem, viz., "What am I here for?"

The night wore on. The clock struck eleven when Tige was suddenly aroused by a stealthy but somewhat unsteady step. He raised up to see what it meant, and then—quickly—he sprang to a beam overhead, his velvety paws making no sound. An old colored man, with a lantern swinging in front of him from a strap fastened around his neck, was regarding the fine brood of twenty-one broilers with fervent desire. As Tige watched, his eyes became green with anger and flashed threateningly at the intruder, who was not aware of any spectators except the frightened broilers. When the old man grabbed two of the fattest chickens, Tige suddenly comprehended why he had been transferred. With one magnificent, exultant leap he lighted on the woolly head of Sambo Jinks. There was one wild, weird shriek from the latter, who thought the end of the world had come. He dropped the broilers and gave vent to his pain and terror.

"Serves you right," said a gruff voice, and there stood Mr. Whitney.

But the momentary gruffness was drowned in a burst of uncontrollable laughter. Mrs. Whitney and Rebecca, having been awakened by the noise, were looking out of the upper windows, laughing heartily.

Meanwhile, Tige clung to old Sambo's woolly head, clawing mercilessly.

"Take dat debbil offen me, massa, take him off," screamed old Sambo, in an agony of fright.

"Are you quite sure you'll leave my broilers alone hereafter?"

"Dead shuah, massa, cross mah heart! I'll neber go neah dis hen house again 's long ez I lib."

"All right, then," and going to Tige, Mr. Whitney coaxed him to release his victim, which he did reluctantly.

The next day Mr. Whitney bought a beautiful little silver-plated collar of light weight for Tige, who seemed to understand he was a hero by the unusual attention he received.

"You deserve it, you dear, plucky Tige," said Rebecca, as she buckled the collar, "for you saved papa's broilers." —Christian Work and Evangelist.

Robins and Raspberries.

Little Nellie was angry. She had the raspberry vines—her very own—and now the robins and other birds were picking the fruit as fast as it became ripe.

"If only they'd leave me just a few," she said, tearfully, to her mother, "I couldn't mind it so much. But they won't; they just watch the berries all the time, and pick 'em before they become ripe. I haven't had one, and they have been eating them two or three days."

"Oh, well, never mind," said her mother, consolingly; "father's big patch will commence to ripen soon, and then the birds will go down there. You see, yours are on the hillside, and become ripe first; that's what makes the birds catch so eagerly. As soon as father's are ripe, there will be enough for both the birds."

"But it's the first ones I want," said Nellie, plaintively. "That's what makes mine so nice. After father's ripen, there'll be so many they'll not be any fun. They'll be too common. If only the birds would scare! I frowed sticks and stones and shoo'd 'em; and they only laughed at me. I know they laughed, because a big robin said, 'Chirp, chirp, chirp!' and then picked a raspberry and flew right past. Well, it isn't any use," resignedly, "but I'll go down and try to scare 'em once more."

Half an hour or so later she returned with a radiant face.

"I think you have succeeded in scattering them away," said her mother, smilingly.

"Oh, no," eagerly and flushing a little. "I've just made friends, that's all. You see, I chased a robin 'way down to the orchard, clear to the quince bushes, where the limbs grow low down and thick. The robin flew right into 'em, and I pulled the branches aside, and—what do you think, mother?"

"I'm sure I couldn't guess."

"Well, there were the loveliest robins in it. And they opened their mouths—oh ever so wide! I s'pect they were hungry."

"Very likely. And what did you do?"

"Just slipped away, soft's I could."

She paused a moment, with a tender, wistful expression coming into her big, brown eyes, then: "Oh, mother! I'm never going to frow anything at a bird again, long's I live. Maybe the mother robin was getting raspberries for her babies!"—The Churchman.

Event and Comment.

Last week by a slip of the pen we spoke of the Inauguration of Dr. Francis L. Patton as President of Princeton University. Dr. Patton used to be the President of the University, where he presided over the teaching of all sorts of things. He has been promoted since to the Presidency of Princeton Seminary, where he is teaching men how to preach.

It may not be known to the Synod of Virginia, which once published an appendix on the woman question, that the discovery of "radium," the new substance so much talked of, was due to the scientific attainments and research of a woman, Madam Sklodowska-Curie. Her husband is also a scientist, but in this case she does not seem to have asked her husband at home about the great mystery she was about to unravel for the world. In fact it is said that her husband assisted her. All of which is respectfully submitted.

This is a pleasant week for the ministers and elders who are so fortunate as to enjoy the hospitality of the city by the sea. It has been a good while since the Synod met in Wilmington. It was there that the largest forward step was taken in the evangelistic work that has planted the blue banner of Presbyterianism in so many counties of the State where it never waved before. We up-country folk will especially enjoy the scenery of river and harbor and sea, to say nothing of those products of the sea that Wilmington hospitality spreads upon its bounteous tables. We hope that it will be the best meeting of Synod yet and the most fruitful of good results for our Church and for the kingdom of Christ.

Rev. Frank T. McFaden, D. D., our old friend and classmate, has been called and has accepted the call to the First Church, Richmond. We think that he missed the larger opportunity at the Second Church, Charlotte, but then Virginians, who have never known North Carolina, have a weakness for Virginia which should be pardoned them and their wives. Dr. McFaden will do a great work in Richmond, and now that he has the good excuse of a residence in that city he might begin the agitation of the removal of Hampden-Sidney college to the capital city and the resuming, under new auspices, of the old relations between the historic college and Union Seminary, which meant so much for both during the greater part of the Nineteenth Century.

Readers of the Presbyterian Standard will feel a personal loss in the news of the death of Colonel J. B. Rankin, a long time contributor to the columns of the North Carolina Presbyterian and until two years ago the editor of the Devotional Department of its successor, the Standard. An account will be found elsewhere of his death and of the funeral services. He was a good man, full of the Holy Ghost and of faith. After partly completing a theological education, his studies were interrupted; he entered the army and rose to the rank of Colonel, by his ability and courage and was prevented by providential circumstances from entering the calling upon which he had set his heart. But he preached many a sermon with his pen, he was peculiarly gifted in prayer, and better than all, he was an epistle known and read of all men. To his son and two daughters the Standard extends its sincerest sympathy.

The Standard takes pleasure in being the medium through which a correction is made of the substance of an interview from Dr. Coyle which has been widely quoted, to the effect that the line between Calvinism and Arminianism had been wiped out in the revised Confession. On the contrary he claims as Dr. Van Dyke has done that the revision had so modified an apparent harshness of statement in certain doctrinal truths as to make them less offensive to dissenting bodies, but that the Calvinism of the Confession is just as sound as ever. This is the substance of a conversation held with Dr. Coyle by a friend who showed him a recent copy of the Standard. The blame is laid on a Denver reporter. We could wish that the correction had been made before that historic meeting of two committees in St. Louis. But with Dr. Coyle and his sound Calvinism, and Dr. Ira Landrith of the Cumberland Church insisting that there shall be no "compromise or surrender of its historic doctrinal position," it is difficult to see how those two committees got so close together in such a short space of time.

The case then stands this way: Dr. Van Dyke and Dr. Coyle and the whole liberal party in the Northern Church insist that the Confession has not been changed so as to touch its Calvinism. Any Calvinist that has read the Confession as revised knows that to be true. Even the Philadelphia Presbyterian at last admits that. Even the Central Presbyterian affirms nothing contrary on its own responsibility, but contents itself with quoting from Arminians, as ignorant of their own creed as they are of Calvinism. The whole Cumberland Church condemns the Unrevised Confession. Its stock in trade all along the border where it has come in conflict with real Presbyterians has been the abuse of the Confession and its fatalism and other horrible doctrines. It has modified the Confession itself, radically, and tried to expunge its Calvinism, so far as their historic attitude toward ministerial education allowed them to detect its Calvinism. A part of the Cumberland Church says frankly that the Confession is not changed as to its Calvinism and that they would prefer union with an Arminian to union with a Calvinistic body. The Methodist Protestant Church has just been carrying on a flirtation with the Cumberland on the ground of a common Arminianism. The other part of the Cumberland Church declares that Calvinism has been revised out of the Confession, and that therefore they are willing to talk about union "without compromise or surrender of the historic doctrinal position" of the Cumberland Church. Manifestly, the situation is an impossible one. The Northern Committee stand a good chance of being laughed out of court when they make their report, and the keen minds of their brethren get hold of it, and the Cumberland Church will probably find before long that the agitation about union, on the ground that the Cumberland Church has now no distinctive doctrine that would separate it from the Northern Church, and therefore has no right to a separate existence, was the most suicidal agitation that a church in its senses ever began.

Another most interesting piece of news the Standard takes pleasure in publishing, from this same interview with Dr. Coyle, namely, that the Committee on the Colored Question of the Northern Church will recommend "separate Synods and Presbyteries for the colored brethren but allow them representation in the General Assembly." Well, the world do move. If there is any difference between that and the position of the Southern Church on the colored problem, we have not been able to discover it. We are not saying, "We told you so." The gallery folk will try to keep quiet until that report is made and adopted. But the audience will forgive us if we have to shut our mouths with grim determination to prevent an all pervasive smile as we look at each other.

The Religious Education Association. We promised our readers a good while ago a review of the proceedings of the first convention of the Religious Education Association. The proceedings were duly received, handsomely bound, and were carefully read at the time. Other things have intervened, however, until now, and we are reminded at the same time of the promise, of which reminder more anon.

About a year ago the Council of Seventy, a body of "seventy biblical teachers in the leading educational institutions throughout the country," issued a call for a Convention in the interests of religious education. This Council of Seventy has in its membership professors in every Northern Presbyterian Seminary, with the possible exception of Princeton, and according to its own statement "is organized on the belief that the Bible is a unique revelation from God, and strives in a constructive spirit to investigate the teachings of the Bible and to extend its influences among the people. While, therefore, a large liberty is allowed to the individual teacher, the position occupied by the Council is altogether evangelical."

But the Council of Seventy is recognized as a pretty liberal body of scholars, whatever its platform may be, and it was perhaps unfortunate for the cause of the new Association that was to be organized that the call for the organizing convention came from the Council. Enough and more than enough has been made of that, however; more than enough because more than the truth. The Convention that assembled in response to the call was an independent convention and the Association that it organized is an independent association, spite of the misgivings of prejudice and the accusations of ignorance.

The call contained the following reasons for the existence of such an organization:

1. That the religious and moral instruction of the young is at present inadequate, and imperfectly correlated with other instruction in history, literature, and the sciences.

2. That the Sunday School, as the primary institution for the religious and moral education of the young should be conformed to a higher ideal, and made efficient for its work by the gradation of pupils, and by the adaptation of its material and method of instruction to the several stages of the mental, moral and spiritual growth of the individual.

3. That the home, the day-school and all other agencies should be developed to assist in the right education of the young in religion and morals.

4. That this improvement in religion and moral instruction can best be promoted by a national organization devoted exclusively to that purpose.

Now anybody with brains in his head instead of sawdust, knows that the first fact stated is true. The amazing ignorance of the Bible under the present system of instruction, or want of instruction, is one of the wonders of the age. It has been tested so often that the proof is absolute. Nor has anybody much doubt that the ideals of our Sunday School instruction are not as high as they might be made; nor that the Bible should be studied more in the home and in the school. Whether a national organization is the best plan for promoting such ends is yet to be proved.

But immediately upon the issuance of this call, there arose no small stir. The reference to the "graduation of pupils" in the Sunday Schools stirred up some who thought their craft as the Publishers of Sunday School Literature might be in danger. The name of Dr. Harper, among those issuing the call, was another bugaboo. The Convention met, however, and after the fullest and freest discussion the Association was organized.

And there has not been a more suggestive book published for a long time than the volume of addresses and papers and prayers that the volume of the proceedings contains. The book itself confirms the impression of the Standard that with some admixture of evil and error the movement itself was good and to be encouraged. It is a pity that the hue and cry kept some of the more orthodox scholars away, but they seem to have found out the truth about it and sent in their names by the hundreds afterwards. It is almost like calling the roll of the distinguished preachers and teachers of the American Churches to look over the names. There are none from the Roman Catholic Church. That Church does not believe in any movement that looks toward the putting of the Bible in the public schools, because then its great argument for parochial schools would be gone, namely, that the schools are "godless," having no religious instruction. The list contains the names of some Unitarians, we regret to say, and this is our chief objection to the Association as now constituted. We should much rather draw the Evangelical line throughout. And yet, as the object of the Association is to promote religious and moral education, and does not interfere in the slightest degree with the matter of the teaching of the Sunday Schools or of the Public Schools, that regret is concerned rather with the reputation of the Association and the opening that this gives to the attacks of the prejudiced than to any harm that could come to the cause of the religious education itself.

There is another thought suggested by one of these papers, namely, that the different denominations are bound to unite in some consensus of opinion as to the religious education in the Public Schools. And if same plan is adopted, as to the parts of the Bible to be read and the moral precepts deduced therefrom, as this is a free country, those represented in the schools should be represented in such an Association for securing this desired end.

And we could wish again that the ministers and professors of our Southern Church, with its soundness in the faith, a witnessing Church as it believes itself to be, would disregard the hue and cry and enroll themselves with their brethren of all churches in the North and West and in other churches of the South, in order to help in keeping the Evangelicals in their present overwhelming majority and their aims and purposes foremost. The sort of protest that comes from outside an organization of this kind does mighty little good. Certainly we have not solved the problems that are presented in the reasons given for that call.

We close with the view of the Association as given in the closing discussion by a good enough Presbyterian, Richard Morse Hodge, D. D. Dr. Hodge said:

The Religious Education Association will be a spiritual force. How strange it is that no one in this land can be found to object to a religious education convention but Christians engaged in religious education! Why are any of them afraid? Some have been suspicious of this movement, conceiving it to be a concealed propagandism on the part of those who own to a partiality for the modern historical study of the Bible. The constitution of the Religious Education Association reported this morning has put that idea out of commission. Radicalism needs conservatism as partner. A friend of mine, a great business man, tells me that he believes in team work and that he employs a thorough-going pessimist as an assistant to knock out his schemes—if he can! The suspicion aroused by this movement came because we did not know each other. This Convention has disarmed that suspicion by laying bare our hearts to one another. It has been a habit of the ages to take a gloomy view of human nature; men are considered guilty until they are proved innocent; they are heretics, until they are understood. This habit slew Jesus Christ. Association promotes understanding, and unites us in advancing the kingdom of God.

The Standard has before had occasion to compliment the Zeal for Orthodoxy and Business Sense. Christian Observer upon the admirable combination of these two excellent qualifications for a religious paper. We have so much admiration for them that we are almost compelled to record the latest instance of this peculiarly happy blending of the inherited New England and acquired Southern traits of character.

The issue of September 30 contained three editorials, the first two to prepare the way, gently, for the third.

It seems that Professor George F. Moore, Professor of Theology of Harvard University, wrote an article not long ago in the Independent that the Observer does not like. In the course of this article Professor Moore used the phrase, "Biblical Studies." The excoiation of Professor Moore, for the use of the following language:

"The task of the constructive theologian today is to put in the place of the old dogmatics and apologetics a philosophy of the Christian religion, in which the facts of Scripture history and Christian experience are interpreted in conformity with the modern conceptions of the universe and God's relation to it, and of the nature and destiny of man. To this central discipline philosophy, psychology, the philosophy and history of religion are subsidiary."

is followed by this advertisement:

In view of this declaration coming from a professor in a theological seminary, our Presbyteries have need to use a prudent caution in regard to the seminary at which any of their candidates propose to study.

Then follows an editorial on the American Institute of Sacred Literature and the Council of Seventy. That council had had the imprudence to send to the Christian Observer a dangerous tract on the subject, "Why should a Pastor Take an Active Part in Promoting and Directing Bible Study in his Church." We do not hold a brief for either the Institute or the Council, but should like for the sake of ordinary decency and honesty to protest against such a mendacious description of the Council as the following:

In this "Council of Seventy" are some evangelical ministers. Associated with these are men who have been deposed from the ministry by evangelical Churches on account of their errors of doctrine. Other members of this Council are so imbued with the spirit of destructive higher criticism that they are not more safe as biblical teachers than were Thomas Paine or Robert G. Ingersoll.

The Christian Observer then pays its special respects to President Harper, in such a manner as to win undeserved sympathy for him, and then vents its spleen upon this paragraph,

The contributions of other religious literatures are sought by the Council, that through the study of these literatures, the teachings of the Scriptures may be more clearly understood, with the following characteristic comment, which itself beggars comment:

Old-fashioned Presbyterians will be slow to go to Mohammed or Zoroaster or Confucius for guidance in the interpretation of the Bible. A pure Gospel, uncontaminated from any source, is refreshing and life-giving to the soul. A delicious beefsteak is not improved by spreading arsenic over it; nor is the word of God made more valuable to the hungry soul by administering with it the superstitions of heathen nations.

When did the Old-fashioned Presbyterian get so fearful about his faith that he was afraid to study any religious literatures for fear of contamination? Out on such principles! They are as foreign to Protestantism as the Inquisition itself with its very stifling of thought. And as every tyro knows the study of comparative religions is a help to the understanding of the true religion.

Next comes editorial three, the superstructure for this carefully laid foundation. Its title is the Religious Education Association. The connection is very obvious. We will let the Observer state it:

For some weeks there has been lying on our desk the "Proceedings of the First Annual Convention" of "The Religious Education Association," an institution to which we have already called attention with a warning note. We turn to this volume and find that this Professor of Theology, Dr. Moore, whose estimation of the Bible we have just considered, holds a place along with Dr. William R. Harper on the Programme Committee of the Religious Education Association.

The argument following would be humorous except for its maliciousness. Dr. Moore as we have seen used the phrase "biblical studies." Dr. Harper in his address made use of the same dangerous phrase. It could hardly have been avoided in such a Convention. Therefore, the gifted editor argues with a plentiful sprinkling of italics to show the reader the way through the devious labyrinth, Dr. Harper must have used that phrase in the same sense in which Dr. Moore used it, or as it was said that he used it (which may be a different thing.) Here is the dreadful heresy of Dr. Harper:

Too many colleges, especially in connection with Christian denominations, and in fact under ecclesiastical control, are doing less than they ought—to say the least—for religious education and for biblical study.

As the editors of the Christian Observer read this “there flitted through the mind” (or whatever name might be given to their thinking apparatus,) “Dr. Moore’s description of what biblical study should be.” Hence the Religious Association, to which Dr. Moore and Dr. Harper both belong, is conspiring to corrupt the very fountains of orthodoxy with “biblical study.”

But we have not yet reached the colored occupant of the fuel department. It is enclosed in brackets and contains the information with regard to the membership of the Religious Education Association, as it were in a scandalized whisper, “(We are glad to say that it has secured only two names in our communion).” And the Observer might have added with that honest confession that is good for the soul that it was glad one of those names was that of the editor of the Presbyterian Standard. Thus orthodoxy can be defended and a blow administered a rival newspaper at the same time, with additional credit both at the bar of conscience and in the bank.

As a matter of fact there are four names “in our communion.” Chancellor Fulton, of Oxford, Mississippi, thought good enough a Presbyterian to be elected to the Presidency of the Southwestern Presbyterian University; President Charles W. Dabney, whose father did not always conceal his contempt for the editors of the Christian Observer, but who was thought to be a pretty good Presbyterian, even an old-fashioned one; the Rev. H. M. Sydenstricker, of Corinth, Mississippi. Our congratulations and commiserations to Mr. Sydenstricker.

The Observer closes with this pious stab:

Those ministers and churches who believe that the Bible and the Church are destitute of authority as a revelation of God to man, will want the literature of the “American Institute of Sacred Literature,” and of its child, the “Religious Education Association.” Others—God’s true children—will avoid it, and will earnestly resist its advances.

The Association expressly disavows any purpose of publishing the Sunday School Literature.

And we submit that there was a good deal more short and direct way for the Observer to express its opinion that the editor of the Standard was not a true child of God, than this circuitous route, through three column editorials.

The editor of the Standard sent in his name for membership in the Association, with the hope of accomplishing some good. He was elected a member of the Press Department, and considers it an honor to serve with such men as Howard Bridgman, of the Congregationalist, Nolan R. Best of the Interior, Thomas O. Conant of the Examiner, Ernest H. Abbott, of the Outlook, James H. Garrison of the Christian Evangelist and Ira Landrith, of the Cumberland Presbyterian. The editor of the Standard was asked to serve on account of his conservative views. Nevertheless, none of these men, as compared with the editors of the Christian Observer, are “God’s true children.” The news that they have been cast out into outer darkness by the Christian Observer, will perhaps surprise Presidents Butler of Columbia and Angel of Ann Arbor, De Witt Hyde of Bowdoin, and McPherson, the Presbyterian head of the famous Lawrenceville School, near Princeton. It will be news also to Ballantine of the Y. M. C. A. training school, to McFaden of Knox College, Toronto, to our friend Bailey of the Biblical Recorder, to Professor Day of the San Francisco Seminary, to Henry van Dyke, and Dr. Gunsaulus and Bishop McVickar and Chancellor Kirkland, to Robinson and Zenos of McCormick Seminary, to Alderman of Tulane and Tillet of Vanderbilt, to Melancton Jacobus and Sylvester Nash, to Dean Russell and Richard M. Hodge, to Howard Duffield and Josiah Strong,—we say it will be sad news to these men that they have falsely supposed all these years that they were true children of God. These names are simply samples from a list of the officers of the Association. Its membership contains the names of hundreds of godly teachers and preachers and editors whose shoes’ latchet the editors of the Observer are not worthy to unloose, to come to the point.

And we think in conclusion that even the celebration of a fake anniversary as a ninety year old religious paper, even the excuse of senility, does not warrant any such Pharisaical impudence as that statement is. We care nothing about ourselves. We have been called all sorts of things by saloon keepers, saloon politicians and the editors of the Christian Observer. But ordinary decency should have prevented such a sweeping charge against such men as we have mentioned, and their names were before the Observer as it wrote. It seems to us the Observer should be wary how it brings the charge of not being the true children of God against such men, especially if it wishes to emphasize the word “true.” Perhaps none of them has had the privilege of a certificate of truthfulness that the Presbytery of Louisville once issued by a bare majority vote, and with an array of testimony to the opposite effect that makes mighty interesting reading even at this late day.

The death of Mrs. Booth-Tucker in a railway accident last Wednesday and the wide sympathy the event has called forth from every part of the country and from all creeds and churches and classes indicate the hold which the Salvation Army itself has obtained upon the popular imagination. It is true that the organization owes much of its success to its founder who still lives to guide its destinies, General Booth, who took over into an evangelical organization the spirit and some of the spectacular methods of the military order. But that very fact made the early attempts of the Salvation Army a ceaseless fight against opposition and ridicule by those who professed to be fighting in a common cause. It was not very long, however, before it was seen that the army was reaching the neglected thousands that never go near the churches, whom the ministry seem largely unable to impress, partly from the very fact that Christianity is itself elevating and refining and that it lifts people into respectability in proportion to its success. And we recall the words of a distinguished Englishman who said that the men who opposed the Salvation Army would have opposed the Apostles themselves. There was doubtless truth in the remark. And so we have never felt inclined to make light of the wearers of the Army uniform nor to decry their peculiar and spectacular methods. If there are men that an only be reached in that way, let not our more correct canons of taste shut such men out of the Kingdom of Heaven. And then there is something inspiring in the military obedience which they render their authorities, a spirit that any Christian Church might well desire for its own.

Review of Contemporaries.

In his sermon at the re-opening of the Princeton Theological Seminary last week, President Patton declared that to deny miracles or to attempt to explain them all away by invoking purely natural causes is to give up the very foundation of Christianity as a religion and to leave it with nothing more than a basis of human philosophy and poetical imagination on which to rest. "Christianity," as he said at Princeton on Sunday, is a piece of information given supernatural-ly and miraculously," or it is no more than a mere superstition, a mythology; it may exist as a moral philosophy without a supernatural birth and mission for Jesus, but it ceases to be a religion, the religion which has built the temples of worship of Christ. If Jesus was a mere man, worship of him is idolatry. And if the essential miracle of the Incarnation is accepted, what difficulty is there in the acceptance of the rest of the miracles of the Bible, if not of other miracles dogmatically proclaimed as of subsequent occurrence? This is the close reasoning we expect from Dr. Patton, and who shall refute it? Certainly the spiritual resurrection is more than the physical, and those who attempt to explain away Christ's resurrection on Strauss' visionary hypothesis, or who attempt to account for Jesus' survival of the crucifixion by "suspended animation," whatever that may be, are simply playing with vocables and refining terms out of their meaning. It was the author of "Robert Elsmere" who discovered that "miracles do not happen" (and inferentially have not happened). The discovery, however, needless to say, was pure assertion, and was not accompanied by any evidence. But then to some natures there is a great deal in simple assertion, as unquestionably there is—of assurance.—The Christian Work and Evangelist.

Two of the largest public meetings held this year in London have testified to the indignation aroused by the latest series of Turkish atrocities. The first was at the City Temple on Thursday evening; the second at St. James's Hall on Tuesday. The speeches of Bishop Gore, Dr. Clifford and Mr. Meyer were received with demonstrations quite as remarkable as any of the scenes during the Armenian or Bulgarian agitations. When Lord Salisbury, in 1896, decided on a policy of inaction, and refused to obey the national mandate which would have bidden him send our warships to the gates of Constantinople, the people were obliged to acquiesce, but a heavy burden was left on many consciences. There is no answer to the argument that when Britain tore up the Treaty of San Stefano in 1878, and refused to allow Russia to liberate the Christian peoples of the Sultan's Empire, she assumed the responsibility for their future good government. In the characteristically weak and sophistical letter which Mr. Balfour has addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, he attempts to excuse our action in 1878 on the ground that the population of Macedonia is mixed, and that only a portion would welcome Christian dominion. The reply is that in Bulgaria and the other nationalities which have been set free from the Sultan the people are also mixed, yet they live together without serious disturbance. So it would be in Macedonia. We cannot rest satisfied with one weak and cautious diplomatic note urging the application of the promised reforms—reforms which, as Dr. Gore said, are less than the irreducible minimum, because they do not include the appointment of a Christian Governor.—Episcopal Recorder.

Andrew Carnegie, speaking recently at an entertainment at Govan, Scotland, "said he wished his countrymen would take to their hearts that the one blot upon the people of Scotland was that they often fell from true manhood through the use of intoxicating liquor. There was a saying in America that a totally abstaining Scotsman could not be beaten, and wherever a Scot has fallen it was, in ninety-nine cases out of the hundred, the result of intemperance. Every Scotsman at home or abroad had in his keeping part of the honor of Scotland, and Scotland having so much more honor per man than other lands, it followed that every Scot carried a greater load of honor than the man of other lands. He wished that every word of his to workmen in Scotland would cause them to reflect upon that, and to resolve that henceforth they would never disgrace either themselves or the land that gave them birth. The only defect of the Scot, compared with the man of other lands, was that of intemperance, which, however, he rejoiced to know, was steadily decreasing."—Presbyterian Journal.

Efforts are being made by the American missionaries, through the American and British Governments, to secure permission for the entrance of the Red Cross Society into Macedonia. The population is absolutely starving or subsisting on roots and grasses. The wounded are lying uncared for and festering to death, while the dead are unburied. If the entrance of the Red Cross is forbidden, it is hoped that Turkey will allow the distribution of relief. This at present is forbidden, and the watchword of the government seems to be extermination at all costs and irrespective of the suffering entailed. To get relief to those most in need of it, it must be transmitted through the hands of outsiders, as the Turks themselves misappropriate everything they can lay their hands upon. This appeal of the missionaries should arouse all Europe, as well as our own country, to the heinousness of the Turk's offence. He is an inhuman wretch, who not only makes war upon the defenceless, but makes war in the most savage and brutal manner. If the powers are too cynical and hard-hearted to stop this war, they might at least have decency enough to compel the Sultan to conduct his campaign according to the methods known as "civilized warfare."—Episcopal Recorder.

Misgivings exist in certain religious circles in this country with reference to the theological soundness of the native Christian Church in Japan. That there is some ground for this distrust is widely admitted. President Charles Cuthbert Hall, of the Union Theological Seminary, New York, who recently visited India and Japan in the interests of the Christian religion, admits that "there is a tendency toward radicalism in some sections of the Japanese Christian Church"; but with that statement, he says, must be coupled the compensating fact that "the native leaders are aware of that tendency, are regarding it with intelligent solicitude, are seeking to win it over to the basis of an evangelical theology."—Boston Congregationalist.

A Sabbath Program.

By William Chalmers Covert.

Let the balm of sleep do its work after the weekly toil and when the early voice of labor is still, but let it not steal the freshness of the new day. See the Sabbath while it is young and welcome it near its threshold, lest sleep overdone bind the hands in idleness and dull the heart with lethargy.

Let the cool showers that wake and stir the blood fall upon you to refresh your body and tone your nerves. Let the family, free from outside claims, unify itself at the breakfast board, and looking into each other's faces seek new tokens of reciprocation. Set the Holy Book as chief garnishment at the father's place. Let it be opened and some inspiring call to life and its best be read and with God's word echoing in each heart let God's presence be sought for the table, for the work, for the leisure of the day.

Thus begun, let the day run forward. The chord struck, complete the symphony. Let nothing lower the pitch nor mar the theme.

Bind the family in stronger bonds as the day grows. Let all meet in the church pew that their thoughts and feelings may have the incentive of hallowed surroundings. Let songs of worship separate the lips and shame away all self-consciousness. Let prayer rise and pour back into the soul a filling richness. Gravely seize the truth. Take it into your life and commit it to service. Let the gates of your better nature stand wide that the tide of your better impulses may pass outward. Meet men. Greet men. Let your fellowship with God be real and the holy house will fill and glow with his presence.

Give the afternoon in part as an offering of labor to those in need. Walk enough in God's sunshine to cleanse your soul of gloom. Drain the sweetness of some good book. Abide with men before whose eyes God has set a vision. Give the Holy Book large place in the feeding of your hungry heart. Do everything that is right. Do nothing that is wrong. And when the day's program is ended your life will have garnered the best joys and the truest peace that the Sabbath day provides.—The Interior.

What is it in Jesus that so draws men, that wins their allegiance away from every other master, that makes them willing to leave all for his sake and follow him through peril and sacrifice, even to death? Is it his wonderful teaching? "Never man spake like this man." Is it his power as revealed in his miracles? Is it his sinlessness? The most malignant scrutiny could find no fault in him. Is it the perfect beauty of his character? None nor all of these will account for the wonderful attraction of Jesus. Love is the secret. He came into the world to reveal the love of God—he was the love of God in human flesh. His life was all love. Men saw it in his face and heard it in his voice and felt it in his touch. This was the great fact which his disciples felt in his life. His friendship was unlike any friendship they had ever seen before, or even dreamed of. It was this that drew them to him and made them love him so deeply—so tenderly.

Nothing but love will kindle love. Power will not do it. Gifts will not do it. Men will take your gifts and then repay you with hatred. But love begets love; heart responds to heart. Jesus loved.—Dominion Presbyterian.

Vicarious suffering is a fact of life, and cannot be expelled from life until love is expelled. We cannot care greatly for the highest interests of another without bearing his infirmities and taking on his sickness—nay, even bowing to the burden of his sins.—Hugh Black.

There is joy in self-forgetfulness. So I try to make the light in others' eyes my sun, the music in others' ears my symphony, the smile on others' lips my happiness.—Helen Keller.

Missionary.

The Forward Movement.

What is the raison d'être of the Church? Will it suffice for her to be a mutual benefit society, or a social center, or a conservator of morals and of good citizenship, for the community where she exists? Above and beyond all this, she is to give the gospel to the whole world, and that within the present generation. If this is within her power—as undoubtedly it is—and she is failing to fulfill her trust, how can she expect blessing? Is it any wonder that the past year's returns show such infinitesimal progress in conditions to the Church at home?

Which may be expected to come first, missionary activity or a revival in the Church? Which is of the nature of cause and which of effect? It is an inviolable law of the Spiritual Kingdom that obedience brings blessing. Before the windows of heaven can be opened, the tithes must first be brought in. The result cannot reasonably be expected without first complying with the condition. "Seek FIRST the Kingdom and all things shall be added." This is the divine order, and it cannot be reversed. Only as the outlet of the life of the Church, as well as of any individual, is enlarged, can the inlet be deepened and the life greatly enriched. Before revival there must be an awakening. The initial step in any genuine evangelistic campaign should be missionary obedience. Right here lies the secret of success or of failure, according as this fundamental principle is recognized or ignored. The Church which sets about obeying the Great Commission will not suffer from the dry-rot of self-centered life. For the Church that loveth her life shall lose it, and the Church that loseth her life for Christ's sake and the gospel's, the same shall save it.—The Herald.

The Bible, translated into the language of Tibet, is now being carried even into that forbidden land, in advance of foreign commerce and travel. The Russian Government, which hitherto intolerant of missionaries, gives the Bible itself free course among the people. It is admitted free of duty, and has often been transported free of charge.

The missionaries of India appeal for more workers from Christian lands, "because India, now awakening from the sleep of centuries, is in its most plastic and formative condition, so that the impressions, good or ill, which it receives in these present fateful years are likely to affect its future for centuries to come."—Exchange.

It is no strange thing to see veteran missionaries who by arduous service have well earned their discharge, returning from furlough to the field, desiring to end their days in active service. One of these is Bishop Stuart of Persia, who has already rendered fifty-three years of service under the Church Missionary Society of England.—Exchange.

It is just one hundred years since the first Sunday school in India was established in Serampore by Felix and William Carey and John Fernandez. There are now 12,000 schools conducted in thirty-two Indian languages or dialects, with a membership of about 300,000, and 7,000 teachers.—Exchange.

The Presbyterian Church has a membership of some seventeen hundred among the Sioux Indians, and last year the proportion of contributions to missions from these Indian members was a dollar and a half apiece. Some of us who are civilized need a little of this Indian spirit of giving, for our contributions to missions fall far below the Sioux mark.

I hold what God wills above what I will. I cleave to him as his servant and follower; my impulses are one with his; my pursuit is one with his; in word, my will is one with his.—Epictetus.

David's Grief Over Absalom.

II Sam. 18:24-33.

Nov. 8, 1903.

Absalom had alienated the hearts of many in Israel, and rebelled against his father and driven him from Jerusalem. David and his followers had crossed the Jordan and gone to Mahanaim. Absalom with a large army had pursued him. David dissuaded from going forth to battle in person had sent out his forces under the command of Joab, Abishia and Ittai. He charged each of these leaders to "deal gently with Absalom." The battle was fought in the woods of Ephraim. David remained in Mahanaim to await results. His waiting and watching in suspense was more difficult than an active participation in the struggle. Our lesson describes the events succeeding the conflict and presents several topics.

I. The Messengers and their Tidings.—Two messengers are sent from the field by Joab, after the death of Absalom. Cushie starts first, but is followed and outrun by Ahimaaz the son of Zadok the priest. Ahimaaz says "All is Well. Blessed be the Lord thy God which hath delivered up the men that lifted up their hand against my lord the King." Questioned as to Absalom's fate he declared, "I saw a great tumult but I knew not what it was." When Cushie comes he exclaims "Tidings, my lord the king, for the Lord hath avenged thee this day of all them that rose up against thee." Asked concerning Absalom, Cushie answered, "The enemies of my lord the king and all that rise against thee to do thee hurt be as that young man is." Delicately but positively and in language expressive of complete loyalty to David does he announce to the bereaved father the fate of his wayward son. Both messengers were eager to bear what they deemed good tidings, and this should be the case with all entrusted with the Gospel message. Both too, endeavored to honor their king by words and deeds. Both also acknowledged the hand of God in their success and ascribed victory to him. In these things they set us an excellent example.

II. David's Anxiety for Absalom.—In several ways the king manifested his concern for the safety and salvation of rebellious Absalom. He did this in the pathetic charge that he gave to each of his commanders to "deal gently with the young man Absalom for his sake." Though this depraved son had cast off his authority and was seeking his throne, kingdom and life, yet he would not have him destroyed. He revealed the same anxiety in the question addressed to each of the messengers even while they were announcing their tidings, "Is the young man Absalom safe?" He seemed more desirous of knowing his son's condition than of being assured of victory, and its precious fruits. Nor was David's anxiety for Absalom needless. He had for years been dominated by evil passions, had displayed a depraved nature, and was walking in a perilous path of transgression against the laws of God and man. Yet he was a young man of excellent natural gifts which might bring him to honor if rightly directed. It was not wonderful, therefore, that the wronged father yearned that the ungrateful son might be spared for repentance and reformation.

III. David Mourning over Fallen Absalom.—Informed of his son's death in battle for attaining his crown and kingdom the king is much moved and retires weeping and lamenting to his chamber. Copious tears attest his grief, and his bitter lamentation finds expression in the words "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom; would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son." He might well desire to die in Absalom's stead for he would have died the death of a saved believer, while his son died in the act of committing heinous sin. David too may have mourned because he had not done all he could to save Absalom from ruin.

How We May Help Abolish the Saloon.

Eph. 6:10-13.

Topic for Nov. 15.

There are a few things about which all right thinking people are agreed; one of these is the evil of drunkenness. Even those who claim the right to get drunk, admit that it is a great evil. The question which confronts those who would do something to lessen the amount of drunkenness is, how can we help to abolish this evil thing? Many there are who say that if a man wants to drink and get drunk, he will find a way to do it, no difference what the opponents of the drink habit may do. There is just enough truth in this statement to mislead. It is a fact that a confirmed drunkard will do anything in his power to get intoxicants even to the extent of committing a crime sometimes. But it is just as patent a fact that the harder it is made to get the accursed thing the fewer there are who will get it.

The saloon is especially adapted to keep men who have already learned the habit, in its power. It is also the best means in the world to make drunkards of those who otherwise would never get into the grasp of the drink demon. Some people argue that the best way to stop the spread of the evil, is to familiarize people with its presence and they will become disgusted with it and let it alone. But there is a stanza which can be applied to this as well as to any other vice. It is that familiar verse which reads:

Vice is a monster of such frightful mein,
That to be hated needs but to be seen,
But seen too oft, familiar with its face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

For every person who has become disgusted with the sin of drunkenness of because having seen too much of it, there are thousands who have been led into the sin by having the temptation constantly before them.

Anything that is done to lessen the evil, is a better thing than nothing. If one saloon can be run and a dozen others closed, the young man who passes along our streets will have that many the fewer temptations thrown across his pathway.

But all restrictions must be made by those who are heartily in favor of such restrictions and who have an interest in seeing that the laws making these restrictions are enforced. Therefore the good people of every community should aid every effort that is made to make the places where intoxicants can be procured, fewer.

But in addition to this every friend of temperance should use his individual influence to instill into the young the hatred of the saloon. Let every boy and girl who grows up be taught that the saloon is the gateway to hell and that the first time the threshold of such a place is crossed, the soul and body are put in jeopardy.

The women of our land have a powerful weapon against the saloon in their hands and if they would use it they would be doing effective work toward the putting away of the hateful thing. If no young man were allowed in the company of our respectable young women if he was known to be a frequenter of the saloon, many of them would stop their visits to places where alcoholic beverages are sold. But our girls are too lax in this respect. Too often indeed the young man knows that many respectable young women don't object to a young man's taking a drink occasionally when in the company of his associates. Truth to tell, they too often let it be known that the young man of dissipated habits has an especial charm for them. If they would use their weapon which they hold, the patronage of the saloon would fall off enormously, and saloon keepers are in the business for the money that is in it.

Then we should all watch and pray and labor with those who are enlisted against this thing, putting on the whole armour of God, knowing that our warfare is against one of the strongest foes human beings have.

WILMINGTON, N. C.

Sketch of First Church, Wilmington, N. C.

The Presbyterians of Wilmington, N. C., were organized into a church in the spring of 1817 by Fayetteville Presbytery. The corner stone of the First Church building was laid in May 1818. This church, which stood on Front Street between Dock and Orange Streets, was destroyed by fire November 3rd, 1819; a new building was completed in 1821.

The first pastor of the church was the Rev. Artemus Boies, who was installed May 12th, 1819. No Sessional records were kept, or, if kept, they have been irrecoverably lost. But from the Presbyterian records and other authentic sources, we have a concise account of the several short pastorates until 1831, when the Sessional records, though not full, become accessible. Those years, 1817 to 1831, comprise a period of struggling existence, and at times the life of the church seemed flickering, as if about to expire. But God is faithful, and a praying band of women, organized in 1824, met steadily for many years in private houses to plead for the welfare of Zion, and who may say that the salvation of the church was not due to them.

The first pastorate was brief. Mr. Boies moved to Charleston in the following year after his installation, and was succeeded after an interval by Rev. Leonard E. Lathrop, a native of Hebron, Conn., who was ordained and installed Jan. 1823. Mr. Lathrop, on account of ill health, resigned in October 1824.

The church was then without a pastor until April 1827, when the Rev. Noel Robertson, licentiate of the Second Presbyterian Church of New York, was ordained and installed. He resigned, however, in April of the following year, and died the same year in Pennsylvania at the early age of twenty-two. After another vacancy and consequent depression of about three years, the church was greatly revived during the year 1830 by a visit from the Rev. W. S. Plummer, then a domestic missionary; and later in the same year by the coming of the Rev. Thos. P. Hunt, as stated supply. In March 1831, the first Session of which there is any record was elected, consisting of Alexander Anderson, Wm. P. Hort, Jas. Owen and Robt. W. Gibbs. On May 13th 1832, Mr. Hunt was installed pastor. Under his zealous pastorate, ladies' societies were formed, and the contributions of the church greatly increased.

Mr. Hunt was succeeded in 1834 by the Rev. James A. McNeill, as stated supply, who was subsequently called to the pastorate, but, on account of failing health, was never installed. In 1837, the church was supplied for a few months by the Rev. Robert Southgate, and in 1838 by the Rev. Henry Brown. He was succeeded by the Rev. W. W. Eels, of Harmony Presbytery, who was called to the pastorate, and served the church from 1838 to 1841. After his retirement, the church was supplied from time to time by the Rev. Thomas R. Owen, a son of the church.

The Rev. J. O. Stedman took charge in Jan. 1841 and continued with the church until 1851, as stated supply, declining to be installed as pastor. During his care of the church, 85 persons were added to the communion, of these thirty white and five colored were received on examination. This pastorate laid the foundations deep and builded well; classes for catechetical instruction and studies in the Confession of Faith were instituted and maintained; a Sabbath school for colored persons was organized; a monthly concert of prayer for missions was regularly observed; a juvenile missionary society was formed, also a domestic missionary society and the contributions of the church were largely increased. In the interim between the pastorate of Mr. Stedman, which closed in 1851, and the coming of the Rev. M. B. Grier, as stated supply, in July, 1852, the piety and zeal of the church would seem to have declined. Mr. Grier, on entering upon his work, found the outlook unpromising but was greatly encouraged on learning that the ladies' prayer-meeting, previously referred to, had been maintained throughout the church's trials, and was still in existence. He was elected pastor and installed May 18th, 1854. His pastorate was singularly blessed. The sweeping revival of 1858 took Wilmington in its scope, and 42 white and 20 colored persons united with the church. Many of these were prominent and influential men in the prime of life. The Session was enlarged by the addition of Dr. Jas. H. Dixon, Jno. M. Andrews, Barzillai G. Worth, Geo. Chadbourn and Jas. C. Smith. At the same time a board of Deacons was elected, consisting of Capt. Gilbert Potter, Jno. W. K. Dick, Thos. C. Worth, Malcomb McInnis, Jos. C. Russell, Samuel Northrop and Jas. D. Cumming.

Heretofore, the financial affairs of the church had been efficiently conducted by the trustees. Consequently upon this revival, and as a thank offering, a mission chapel was erected on Chestnut street in the Eastern part of the town. In a few months, it was transferred to a colony, and became the Second Presbyterian Church. After the war, the first building was sold to the colored Presbyterian congregation, and the Second church congregation erected a new building on Campbell Street, near the corner of Fourth. The rapid growth of the church called for a larger building, which was erected in 1888 on the corner adjoining the old church, which then became the Sunday school and lecture room; the name was changed to St. Andrews Presbyterian Church, and this vigorous colony now rivals its mother in prosperity and zeal in the service of the Master.

Another fruit of the revival was the organization of a young men's prayer meeting, whose members educated a young man for the ministry, and subsequently founded a mission Sunday school in the southern part of the town. This enterprise inspired and promoted the establishment of the mission chapel on Front Street, which was organized as Immanuel church in 1895, [and is now under the efficient charge of the Rev. C. W. Trawick.

In 1859, the church building on Front street, valued at $10,000, and uninsured, was destroyed by fire. Within a few hours, the officers of the church met, and resolved to rebuild at once, and at the next meeting subscriptions to the amount of $14,000 to the building fund were reported. During the time the congregation was without a building, the city hall was used as a place of worship. The new building on the present site, corner Third and Orange streets, was completed about the beginning of the Civil war, and was dedicated April 18th, 1861, the pastor preaching the dedication sermon. In this building, since improved and enlarged, the Synod will be welcomed at its coming session.

Mr. Grier returned North about the first of June, 1861, and the pastoral relation was dissolved by Presbytery in the following October. The Rev. Martin McQueen served faithfully as supply part of the time during the Civil war, and towards the close (1864-1865), the Rev. A. D. Hepburn had charge. In 1862, the yellow fever epidemic carried off some of the officers and members of the church, among them Dr. Jos. H. Dickson, ruling elder J. W. K. Dick and Thos. C. Worth, deacons, and Silas Van Amringe. In the death of these the church suffered a great loss.

At the close of the war, the church was deeply in debt, and the people were greatly impoverished and sorely distressed, but God had not forsaken them. The Rev. Horace L. Singleton of the Presbytery of Baltimore was called to the pastorate in Nov. 1865. He entered heartily and energetically upon his work in January 1866, and was installed May 6th of the same year. The church took on new life and grew in zeal and liberality. The debt of about $10,000 was cancelled, and Mr. Groves, the young man previously referred to, was aided in his preparation for the ministry by the members of the young men's prayer meeting. Besides this, large additions and improvements were made to the church building during the pastorate of Mr. Singleton. Steps were taken for a more thorough organization of the congregation. The following persons were elected elders: Samuel Northrop, A. A. Willard, John McLaurin, Jas. D. Cumming, and C. H. Robinson; and the following were elected deacons: Thos. W. Player, G. W. Williams, David G. Worth, W. Whitehead, E. P. George and C. P. Mebane.

Mr. Singleton served the church until Oct. 1871. After his removal to Brooklyn, N. Y., the Rev. A. F. Dixon, a man of deep piety and humble Christian deportment was pastor for a few months. After his resignation in May 1873, the Rev. W. S. Plumer, D. D., who forty-three years before had visited the church as missionary, came over weekly from Columbia Seminary, and preached for the congregation until March 1874.

In Nov. 1874, the Rev. Jos R. Wilson, D. D., of Columbia Seminary, became pastor of the church. In this pastorate of over ten years, pastor and people became greatly attached to each other. There were two gracious revivals, and during Dr. Wilson's ministrations, 187 persons were added to the communion, 121 on examination and 66 on certificate. The church debt of $14,500, created by the purchase of the eastern portion of the church lot, including the manse, was extinguished; an annex was built to the lecture room; the system of pew rents was abolished; the present system of weekly contributions was inaugurated, and the Assembly's plan of stated collections for the beneficent causes of the church was adopted. On December 21st, 1879, B. F. Hall was elected ruling elder, and Jas. Alderman, Jno. D. Taylor, H. H. Munson, and W. R. Kenan, deacons.

After a service of more than ten years, Dr. Wilson accepted a professorship in the Southwestern Presbyterian University, and retired from the Pastorate on the 1st of April, 1885. He was succeeded by the Rev. Peyton H. Hoge of Richmond, Va., who entered upon his labors on December 15 and was installed as pastor on Jan. 24th 1886. This pastorate proved to be the longest and most fruitful in the history of the church. During the first year, 39 persons were received into the communion of the church on profession of faith, and 15 on certificate.

Frequent accessions were subsequently made, especially after the visit of the Rev. R. G. Pearson to the city in the spring of 1888. During this year, 69 were added to the church on profession of faith; the contributions to all benevolent causes were greatly increased, and the church aided many good works beyond its own special sphere of labor.

The Young Men's Christian Association owes its existence and maintenance largely to the liberality of this congregation. During the term of nearly 14 years in which Dr. Hoge served the church, there were added to the communion 40 persons on examination and 167 by certificate: the old Sunday school room was replaced by the present commodious and well-appointed building for Sunday school, lecture room and social gatherings; and the contributions of the church for all causes, including its own expenses, aggregated nearly $200,000.

At different dates during this pastorate, which closed August 31st, 1899, by the resignation of Dr. Hoge, the following officers were elected and installed:

Ruling Elders—Jno. D. Taylor, David G. Worth, H. H. Munson, James Sprunt, W. R. Kenan, W. S. Warrock.

Deacons—Henry C. McQueen, Jas. H. Chadbourn, W. M. Cumming, Chas. W. Worth, Philander Pearsall, Geo. D. Parsley, Jno. H. Currie, W. A. Riach, E. S. Tennent, Walker Taylor, A. J. Howell, Jr., R. W. Hicks.

Dr. Hoge was succeeded by the Rev. J. M. Wells, Ph. D., who entered upon his labors in Feb. 1901. Under his care the church has been greatly blessed; the congregation is united; the societies are faithfully performing their duties, and the benevolence of the church revived, as shown in the increased contributions during the past two years. The two last reports to Presbytery show additions to the membership of 30 on examination and 67 on certificate. But in no other sphere of church work has the beneficent influence of this pastorate been more felt than in the Sabbath school, which has exceeded all past records in numbers and efficiency. During the past two years, two elders, Jas. H. Chadbourn and Philander Pearsall, and two deacons, A. M. Hall and Marsden Bellamy, have been elected and installed in office.

This church has during its history given to the ministry the following persons: Thos. R. Owen, Sidney G. Law, W. H. Groves, Geo. W. McMillan, Alexander Sprunt and Wm. E. Hill (the last named now in the last year of his preparation in Union Theological Seminary); and to the foreign mission field Dr. and Mrs. Geo. C. Worth, who are now on their return voyage to resume their work in China. The congregation has also at different times supported missionaries in the foreign field, the Rev. R. A. and Mrs. Hayden, of Kiang-Yin, being the special charge of the church.

The years under review in this sketch have witnessed many changes by removals and deaths in the congregation, as well as in the official boards of the church. The Session and Board of Deacons, as now constituted, consist of the following elders and deacons named in order of service:

Ruling Elders—B. G. Worth, Jno. McLaurin, C. H. Robinson, Samuel Northrop, B. F. Hall, Jno. D. Taylor, Jas. Sprunt, Jas. H. Chadbourn, Philander Pearsall.

Deacons—H. C. McQueen, W. M. Cumming, C. W. Worth, Walker Taylor, A. J. Howell, Jr., George D. Parsley, R. W. Hicks, A. M. Hall, Marsden Bellamy.

The report to last Presbytery showed 422 communicants, 10 non-communicants, and total contributions during the year for all causes of $12,217.26.

This sketch will serve to introduce to the Synod of North Carolina the church whose pastor and people now look forward with pleasure to the privilege of entertaining that venerable body, and stand ready to extend a cordial welcome to all its members.

The Parting.

The farewell kiss, the hurried embrace,
The lingering look on the well-loved face;
The bustle and noise of the fretful train,
The thought—will ever we meet again?

And that is the pang of parting.

The last "God-bless-you," the smothered sigh,
The promise to meet in the by-and-by;
The smile that is clearly of sorrow's brand,
The tear, and the touch of the lingering hand,
And that is the pathos of parting.

The lump in the throat as the coach pulls out,
The promise brave, but the cruel doubt;
The empty track whence the train has flown,
The standing there in our grief—alone!

Yes, that is the pain of parting.

Semi-Centennial Celebration of Westminster College.

First Day.—The beginning of the celebration was on Thursday afternoon. The first speaker, Mr. McPheeters, specially welcomed the two Synods, and congratulated them upon being here in person, that they might see for themselves the location of the institution, the people of Fulton and the college itself, its buildings, equipment, its faculty and its body of students. He concluded by reminding all the friends of the college that on this the Golden Jubilee the only appropriate gift was gold.

On behalf of the faculty Prof. Rice gave a word of cordial greeting and welcome. After referring in appreciative and felicitous terms to the faithful care and large expenditure of the Southern Synod, he then specially welcomed the presence and assistance of the elder brother who, after 40 years of absence, had come back to share the control and support of the College. He also made happy reference to the work of Dr. S. S. Laws, the first President of Westminster, who was present and to whom he gave a special welcome. To the presidents of other institutions present and to the alumni he also gave cordial greetings and welcome.

Mr. M. O. Scobee, one of the students, in a few well chosen words and graceful manner presented the welcome of the body of students to all who had come to attend this celebration.

And last, the welcome of the city of Fulton was given by Mr. Ovid Bell, editor of one of the town papers, who spoke of the mutual interest and helpfulness of College and Town in the past; then expressed the hope of yet better days and better times for both Fulton and Westminster.

The responses to these addresses were as follows:

Dr. Dobyns for the alumni expressed their gratification at returning to the scenes of College life, and at receiving such cordial welcomes as they had just heard. After referring very pleasantly to incidents of former days he concluded with assurances not only of gratitude and good wishes, but also of deeper interest and larger help than in days gone by.

Dr. Cannon in behalf of the Southern Synod reminded the people of Fulton that the Synod he represented had often tested if not taxed the hospitality, but added that that which most attracted the Synod was not their generous kindness, but the presence of the college here. Then he spoke of the need and vital importance of Christian education especially at such a time as this, for we are more concerned that our youth should learn to use than to make money, we need men rather than money changers. And here we have a Christian college where the Bible is honored and taught, and whence come forth upright, honest, God-fearing, Christian men and citizens, and from which also come very largely the ministers of the Presbyterian churches of the State. He also referred very pleasantly, as did all the speakers, to the presence and co-operation of the other Synod.

For the Northern Synod Dr. McKitrick expressed his gratification that both the Synods were now united in this good work of supporting the college, and his conviction that this union was made in heaven and was prophetic of other and yet greater blessings in the future. Under the "blue banner," beneath which the "white feather" has never been seen, may Westminster reach its Centennial in the fullness of a strong manhood and with many years of growth and usefulness still before it.

Rev. Dr. Black, president of Missouri Valley College (Cumberland) responded for Sister Institutions of Learning. In the name of the great host engaged in training young men and women he brought greetings, well-wishes and Godspeed; he also brought congratulations from all the institutions of the State, including all schools for young ladies, "for all know that none are more fond of boys than are the girls." He referred too to the happy and significant fact that a Christian college had survived for fifty years and was now strong and vigorous, with bright prospects of larger growth and increased usefulness; he impressively re-mindful all that the future of Christian schools, because a question so complex and complicated, was yet unsolved if not in actual peril; though there was never a time when the need was greater or more urgent for Christian instruction in all our schools. And he concluded, "I hail Westminster because she takes this Text—the Bible—to her heart, and then pours it forth in the characters and lives of young manhood to bless the nation and the world."

The last address, in behalf of the State, was by Gen. Geo. H. Shields, who reminded his hearers that while he had heard no special welcome to the State, he assured all that the State was glad to be here in him. He then recalled the fact that the public school system of the United States was the natural result of Protestant and Calvinistic principles, issuing first in civil and religious freedom, then leading to and requiring general intelligence and universal education. This great fact should not be forgotten, and due credit should be given by all, both to the principles and to the men who taught them and fought for them in the past.

The Alumni Celebration.—This was held in the college Chapel. The first speaker was Mr. C. Orrick Bishop, a lawyer of St. Louis, whose subject was 'The Relation of the Alumni to the College.' "He suggested, and admirably enforced the thoughts, that the Alumni stood to the College in the relation of Duty, Affection, Pride, Enthusiasm, Prayers, and Means. And closed with an earnest exhortation that the Alumni fulfil these duties. Rev. F. W. Hinnett, President of Fairfield College, Iowa, spoke on "The Value of the Denominational College." It stands for all that is highest and best in education; it gives intellectual discipline and moral training; its product is the best type of the American citizen, a Christian man or woman. But the special value of the Denominational College is that it is essential to the life of any church; without it "Ichabod" may be written over every denomination in the land, the Presbyterian as well as others.

The third address was by Rev. Dr. Marquess of Louisville, Ky., an ex-president of the college, who spoke on "The Crises of Westminster College." Of these he mentioned, first, The Founding of the college; second, The Period of Dismantlement, the time of the civil war; third, the Period of Reorganization and Reconstruction or Resuscitation; and now another crisis, the period of Equipment and Development—the last but not the least in the history of the college.

The last speaker of the evening was Hon. Wm. Wallace of Kansas City, his subject 'Memoires of the Old Chapel.' His divisions were Incidents, persons, principles. Under the first, he related a number of very interesting and amusing incidents of his college days, which were greatly enjoyed by all, both young and old. Under the second, he mentioned a number of the men who had presided in that chapel and taught in those halls, and spoke feelingly and beautifully of the mighty influence for good they had exerted over his own and other lives, and under the third, he mentioned two principles for which, and in which, Westminster had always stood, viz: The Old Curriculum, including and emphasizing Greek and Latin, and The Old Religion, Bible, Calvinistic, Protestant, Presbyterian. It was an admirable and powerful address, certainly the most telling and "taking," because perhaps the most humorous of the occasion.

After the speaking there were fireworks, processions, bonfires and a good time generally by the college boys, and the first day's proceedings were closed by a Reception to all the visitors in the new and elegant dormitory building.

Second Day.—In the morning two addresses were delivered in the Presbyterian church, and honorary degrees conferred. The first address on "Westminster's Fifty Years" was by Dr. Charles C. Hersman, formerly professor and president of Westminster. It was not an historical review of the whole fifty years, but only of the early history of the college, from its origin to the civil war. He spoke first of the origin of the college; the subject of founding a college was discussed and decided by the Synod in 1852; the charter was granted in Feb. 1853, and the cornerstone laid July 4th of the same year, and in that stone were placed copies of the Bible and of the Confession of Faith. "These the real foundation on which Westminster rests." Next, The Formative Period—the endowment, the chairs filled and the men who filled them, the character of the instruction, etc.; lastly of the Alumni, these, 294 in number, are found in all honorable walks of life, especially in the "learned professions," an honor to the college, a bulwark to the State, and a blessing to the Church and to the world, 74 of her graduates, one-fourth, having entered the ministry. The address, which was greatly enjoyed by an appreciative audience, was full of most valuable information, expressed in clear, chaste language, and delivered with all the love and fervor of a loving, loyal son for his loved and honored Alma Mater. Then followed the conferring of honorary degrees.

This was done in behalf of the board of trustees by Rev. Dr. S. J. Nichols, on the following persons, viz:

The degree of A. M. on Prof. W. D. Christian of Paris, Mo.; that of B. S. on Drs. G. W. Carson of St. Louis and C. H. Wallace of St. Joseph; that of D. D. on Rev. F. W. Hinitt, Fairfield, Ia., Rev. C. F. Richmond, Paris, Mo., Rev. J. H. Gauss, St. Louis, Rev. J. B. Hill, Kansas City, and Rev. R. A. Davidson, Falls Church, Va.; that of L. H. D. on Drs. C. C. Hersman and W. H. Marquess, and Prof. E. H. Marquess of Fulton, Mo., and that of LL.D. on Prof. J. N. Tate, Fairbault, Minn., Prof. J. R. Dobyns, Jackson, Miss.; Gen. D. H. McIntyre, Mexico, Mo.; Hons. W. H. Wallace, Kansas City, C. O. Bishop and Thos. S. McPheeters, St. Louis, Rev. Drs. R. F. Coyle, Denver, Col., and W. H. Black, Marshall, Mo., and Pres. John Henry McCracken, New York. Truly a "Jubilee" of honorary degrees! but such an occasion comes but once in 50 years.

The third and last address was by Rev. Dr. R. F. Coyle of Denver, Col., and moderator of Gen. Assembly (U. S. A.), on "The Christian College" The first point made and emphasized was the value and need of conscience in life for all true character and real success, and next that conscience can only be properly cultivated, informed, exercised and strengthened by Christian education, and this he enforced and illustrated in strong and striking words, then he applied the principles and truths announced, showing the necessity for this kind of education, by reference to the tendencies downward and earthward, to things seen and temporal, everywhere prevalent, and by the fact that Presbyterians had lost the first place as Christian educators and had fallen to the fourth, and that they practically had no Christian college west of a line drawn North and South through Omaha, Neb. The whole address was a strong, vigorous, timely and powerful plea for the Christian college as a necessity among the educational forces of our age; it was well received and made a profound impression.

After the public exercises there followed a banquet, largely in honor of the five ex-presidents who were present and who did most of the "speechifying," as I learned, Drs. Laws, Hersman, Marquess, Gordon and McCracken.

Altogether Westminster's Semi-Centennial was a great success. May the good results that follow be all that the most enthusiastic friends of the College anticipate and pray for!

So-Called Churches.

By Jeanette Robinson Murphy.

"And ye have not his word abiding in you; for whom he hath sent, him ye believe not."

"Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me."

Some of us attempt to prove our church creeds and practices to be right by the prayer book, and others by questionable traditions; some by the early Fathers, and others by the late fathers, as it were. There are churches supposed to be holding up the lamp of God which have not cleaned their chimneys for so many centuries that the poor world finds it difficult to see the light.

It is sad to watch the trend of a large portion of the Episcopal church claiming Romish dogmas as its own; it seems so like pouring good new wine into worthless old bottles. It matters not if the bottle perish, but it does matter considerably for so much good rich wine to run over and be lost.

Surely it is not right, and it is a daring thing to saddle upon those poor, inoffensive, innocent apostles the doctrines and formal practices obtaining among two or three sects today. In the letter, however, that Christ sent back to the church at Ephesus (Rev. 2-2), he does speak of some wily people claiming that they were apostles and as they were liars doubtless they could father a great deal of unscriptural corruption, which has crept into so-called churches.

Can we imagine St. Paul in a costly palace, wearing a clerical coat and having a big "D. D." to his name, and two men holding his priestly robe, and a bell ringing to call the faithful to devotion, while incense is swinging in his face to waft his prayers to God? The root of the evil must lie in the fact that we do not study Christ's and the Apostles' words sufficiently to get at the heart of the truth. How can anyone read the gospels and the epistles studiously each day, letting all useless traditions and Church history (?) go, and not find in them a pure, simple faith supplying all his earthly and heavenly needs? But have we not all sinned in this respect, for does any Church stick as closely as it should to the pure Gospel?

Is not much of the religion today like the old-fashioned game of "Scandal?" The aim in this child's play is to tell a story all around a circle and try to keep to the original tale. The first child, for instance, tells the second that a good lady took a lovely little girl to drive, and that the child fell out and was hurt badly. At the end of the game the last child solemnly announces that she has just heard from her neighbor that a rich king fell desperately in love with a poor princess, and as she mounted the ivory throne beside him she disappeared, for fifty spirits came and bore her away to a fairy land, and that he is waiting disconsolately for his bride, and will give a million dollars to anyone who will bring her back. Or, as the negro once put it, "Ef de Bible had de small-pox de church would nebber hab cotched it!"

If to hide Christ's simple faith, and keep us from going straight to that well of living water, the New Testament, is all that some "churches" are good for (or bad for), then they have ceased to have any excuse for living, and should no longer be permitted to exist.

It is a wonder that we are not afraid to take any man's say-so about the road to heaven. We have only one short life to lead on earth, so why cannot we all be honest and downright and come out and take the Bible as our only guide, and let all this love of money and seeking for temporal power go? Why do we not spend more time on our knees begging Christ to return and show us again the truth which some "churches" have ignorantly, and others purposely misunderstood?

If I went to call on a loved friend and told her that I was coming again to see her I certainly would not renew my visit until she urged me to come, or at least until I felt sure that I should be royally welcome. How do we know but that Christ is grieved and only waits for a hearty invitation to return? What a glorious thing it would be if all our churches would begin, after being purged of the burdensome traditions of men, to beg Him daily to come to us, robed not in the human garments this time, but in all his majesty and glory and power?

The New York Christian Advocate gave a six column editorial to the refutation of Dowieism in a late issue. It must have thought some of its readers had a very slack hold on Methodism.

The Atlanta University.

By Rev. J. G. Anderson, D. D.

May I be permitted a word at this late day in behalf of the Conference of the Synods for the proposed University at Atlanta? There are certain matters that are agreed upon by all parties interested, and have been already pretty fully discussed. One of them is the desirability of such an institution. I would only add this word, that we should have an institution of learning whose grade is as high as the highest, so that no one need go outside of our bounds for the very highest education.

And yet this institution should be under an influence that would preserve it from error. The highest truths may be taught without teaching error.

If I may be pardoned for saying so, I will say that I do not think that there is any organization of any kind in our country that supplies these conditions so fully as the Southern Presbyterian Church. I believe that such an institution under our control would be an object lesson to America.

Give us the university, and in a few years its distinction as an institution, where the highest education with least error may be obtained, will draw to its class rooms hundreds of students now in attendance on northern and State universities. Let the Southern Presbyterian Church have a chance at running the great university. The whole environment is prophetic of glorious success.

LOCATION.

With wonderful unanimity all who are interested in this movement turn to Atlanta as the most desirable location. Atlanta is the most progressive, growing city in the South. Her commercial and industrial supremacy is being rapidly established. She has the largest Presbyterian constituency of any Southern city; and is not far from being the geographical centre of Southern Presbyterianism. Added to all this her splendid contribution of a quarter of a million of dollars toward beginning its endowment (an amount which is probably double that that any other location would offer) and it may be readily seen that if we are to have such a university that Atlanta is the place for it.

FUNDS.

But such an institution would require a large endowment. As desirable as it is to have it, is it possible to raise such an endowment? It is not possible to raise it all at once? This is true of nearly all of our institutions of learning. They have grown to what they are.

I believe it is possible to start our Atlanta University under circumstances that prophesy its speedy growth.

The plan of bringing all the available endowments of Clarksville and Columbia to Atlanta, and calling upon the Synods interested to raise a quarter of a million of dollars, gives the university a million dollars to begin with. There are very few that begin with that amount.

I believe, however, that it would begin with more. If the $750,000 could be realized from Atlanta, Columbia and Clarksville, that very fact would give to the whole movement an impetus and an inspiration that would yield not less than half a million.

As a great Presbyterian university it would appeal strongly to Presbyterians, not only in those synods considering it, but to wealthy men in our other synods, and to some of our wealthy brethren in the North.

It might start with an endowment of a million and a half. When we consider the interest that has been aroused of late in the cause of higher education in the South, that an enterprise of this kind is sure to move in a congenial atmosphere, that it will find heartiest encouragements and endorsement in the spirit of the times, we have abundant reason to be hopeful. When we consider that enterprises of this nature are receiving more generous consideration at the hands of the wealthy than any other cause, and that millionaires are multiplying at the South, there can be no doubt that this enterprise will attract the attention of men of this class. Under these circumstances it is reasonable to expect that in less than five years it will have an endowment of two and a half or three million dollars.

Agnes Scott Institute should be placed under the same management, and its standard brought up to that of Vassar or any other Northern school for women. It would be of great benefit to Agnes Scott. There are institutions now in Atlanta, such as Dental and Medical schools, that belong to the university curriculum, that would readily come under its management, bringing it at the start a good number of students in their departments. Given the institution with grade equal to the highest, and there are many students now at the North who would attend for climatic reasons.

I believe in five years there would be an attendance of one thousand students. The fact of the Seminary being in connection with the University would tend to bring into our ministry many more men who had taken a university course. This, I believe, would be a distinct and material gain to the body ecclesiastical.

MOVING THE ENDOWMENTS.

Ought the endowments of Columbia and Clarksville to be moved if they can, and can they be moved if they ought? There are some who think it not wise to have the University at the expense of these two institutions. There are others, and they are a great many, who have very decided convictions that it ought to be done. They consider the numbers now at these schools, the prospects and surroundings. They compare them with what may be reasonably expected from the University, and feel that it is the part of wisdom to combine them in the university.

The question as to whether the endowments of these institutions can be moved is the one about which opinion differs more materially. Many contend that the legal and moral obstacles are practically insurmountable. Dr. Shearer contends, for instance, that when the nucleus given for a school was local in its motive, and not broadly educational, that all that gathers around that nucleus partakes of that local coloring, and must be subject to the same regulations as the nucleus. This is not conclusive to the minds of many. It does not appear why money given simply for sake of Clarksville should give character to money given to cause of Presbyterian Education any more than money given to cause of Presbyterian Education should give character to money given for the sake of Clarksville. It would seem a juster view to take of the matter that each should retain its original character as imparted by the motive of the giver, and be regulated accordingly.

As the Southwestern Presbyterian University was not built and endowed for the sake of Clarksville it does not appear why the locality as such should have the entire say in its regulation. Whenever it is clear that money was given for the sake of the location, faith should be kept with the giver; but, unless it is expressly mentioned that the locality was the inducement, it is but just to infer that the giver had in mind, not a location, but a cause. Or if the location, only the location in so far as it ministered to the cause. The statement that the $300,000 endowment of Southwestern Presbyterian University was given to Clarksville needs a little investigation. Dr. Shearer's analogy of a tree and its branches is a little rickety. It might be of advantage to some trees to be transplanted to a more moist and fertile soil. Some schools have been removed and profited by it. The Doctor thinks that the "Plan of Union" was a kind of spring lock affair, and when the Synods adopted it they shut the door. The Synods, however, do not accept that interpretation; for they actually voted to change the plan of union, and the board of directors did not forbid them, or intimate that they thought that the personal integrity and uprightness of the board had been impeached.

Dr. Lacy says, in no uncertain language, that the Georgia Synod, in its University enterprise, was meddling with that which was in no way its business; and that the committee, in carrying out these meddling plans, is guilty of sharp practices and dishonest methods. These are things that Dr. Lacy should not have said. He should have tried some other plan of conducting his argument than that of impeaching character that is unimpeachable.

The brethren at the head of this movement are honored brethren in the church, nor are they the tricksters that he would have it believed that they are. So far as the statement of the board of directors is concerned that they refuse to consider any proposition from any source, contemplating the removal of the university, etc., they might have saved themselves the trouble, or they might have added that they wouldn't consider the Alaskan boundry or the Manchurian evacuation. There was no proposition coming from any source to them to consider any of these propositions. If the controlling Synods should decide to move the school, or grant part of the endowment to the University, I suppose they will do it even if they have to "send to the board of directors their resignation."

Dr. Lacy thinks that the Atlanta contribution was raised as a bribe to induce the controlling Synods to do wrong. He should remember that the proposition of removal was initiated by the brethren of the controlling Synods.

The Georgia brethren did not think that it was wise to approach the controlling Synods until they could demonstrate that they, themselves, were willing to take such hold of the matter as to make it a success.

Had they gone to the Synods before they attempted to do anything themselves, they would promptly and wisely have been met with the answer, "Go and see what you can do before you come to us to consider the matter. You cannot expect us to agree to consider a proposition that would tend to unsettle us when you have nothing tangible to offer us." And so they raised their contribution before speaking to the Synods, and now they are accused of dishonesty because they ask for a committee of conference.

The Atlanta brethren knew that in the minds of some, legal and moral obstacles lay in the way of this enterprise; and what more natural plan than the appointment of this committee from their own bodies to investigate and report to them on this matter so that they could act intelligently about it. When it is remembered that the Synods meet in Oct. and Nov. and that the committee is asked to meet in December, and to make report; and to call meeting of Synod in January, it is evident that no harm can be done to the schools this session by the appointment of the committee. The schools have already begun, and the committee's report will be made and acted upon before the session closes. Any harm that may be done to schools by this movement has already been done, and should be laid at the door of the past, and not to this committee. Dr. Lacy asks, "How long will this instigation last?" The Synods can settle it in January. If the Board of Directors choke off the brethren in the controlling Synods who differ from them, the only result will be to agitate the matter in those Synods as long as there is any hope of the Atlanta University. The opportunity of securing such an institution is too important a matter for those who differ from the board to let pass without investigation.

If the matter stands as Drs. Lacy and Alexander contend, let them demonstrate it.

The brethren of the controlling Synods are intelligent enough to see, and honest enough to do right. Why are those brethren and that Board of Directors so violently opposed to the consideration of this matter by the brethren of the controlling Synods? Is everybody tricky and dishonest but themselves? This is rather an anomalous condition of things. The Georgia brethren are willing to trust the controlling Synods, and the board of directors are not. It seems to me that the board of directors would feel a little delicacy in saying to the bodies that appointed them, "We don't care to hear anything you may have to say in the matters vital to the interests of the institution you have entrusted to us, and for the prosperity and success of which we are absolutely dependent upon you." If this is accepted as right, the effect must be to beget indifference in the Synods toward the institution. If not accepted it would beget an indignation and wonderment, "On what meat doth this our Caesar feed." By a'l means, let this conference be held, and let the whole truth come out. It is to be hoped that this magnificent opportunity will not be lost by us.

The spirit that would kill it, would, in all probability, mean death to every effort in this line for the next half century. During that time all other denominations will no doubt have built up magnificent institutions, and the Southern Presbyterian Church will have all her men of highest standing, educationally, trained without her fold and out of sympathy with her traditions. How unlike this would be to Presbyterians in all the past. How strange a page of ecclesiastical history for us to write. Shall the blue banner which has waved in the forefront in the field of education in all ages be lowered now? Every memory of the past, every exigency of the present, every hope of the future calls upon us to arise and build, so that those who come after us may have no more reason to be ashamed of us than we are of our sires.

"Heimgang."

"Heimgang! some one is going home, the German peasant whispers when he hears the tolling bell."

Call her not "dead," she has gone home. At last
The long, long journey of the years is o'er,
And through the narrow gateway she has passed
To the home-gathering on the other shore.

Though guarded by a love both true and strong
That sought with tender care the path to smooth,
Still her steps faltered, and the way seemed long,
And earthly love could not her craving soothe.

Upward and heavenward her gaze was turned,
And dying now for her meant going home,
Before her spirit's eyes afar there burned
The welcome lights, and loved ones called: "Come home!"

O, tender heart of love thou seest our tears,
Thou knowest our grief, and yet we dared not say
She must not go! Grant that when on our ears
Or soon or late thy summons falls, we may Like her find death but "going home!"

A Mountain-Day.

Thralls to a necromancy fair
All things had deliquesced.
Spirit and matter, earth and sky and air
In Beauty coalesced.

Heaven's iridescent light had thrown
A fluent chrysm on meadow, wood and hill.
And harmonies in color's passion-tone
Flowed from Sierras still.

Time seemed emerging in eternity,
And life sublimed to noble stage.
And Beauty was a holy mystery
Of the glad Golden Age.

Earth prophesied of Beauty's endless dower,
And her ideal, eternal date.
Nature, in glory-garb foretold, that hour,
Perfection ultimate!

Church News.

MISSOURI.

FULTON.—The Presbytery of Potosi met in adjourned session during the meeting of Synod at Fulton, Mo. Oct. 21, 1903. Five ministers and two ruling elders were present.

In compliance with the unanimous request of the congregation of First Church, Jackson, the salary of their pastor, Rev. C. W. Latham, was increased from $750 to $900, and the use of the manse. At their mutual request the pastoral relations between Rev. A. J. Cheatham and the Potosi Church was dissolved and he was dismissed to the Presbytery of Pine Bluff in order that he might assume charge of the church at Fordyce, Ark., to the pastorate of which he had received a unanimous call.

Colored Evangelization.—Rev. A. F. Cunningham, chairman of the executive committee presented a report which was received and adopted and is in part as follows: Only two colored churches, Emmaus at Jackson and Second Cape Girardeau are now under our care. Emmaus has a house of worship on which is a debt of $184, with accumulated interest from March 1902. Both are now vacant.

Recommendations.—1. That the Sessions of the Jackson and Cape Girardeau Churches respectively take a careful oversight of the colored churches in this vicinity. 2. That the pastors of the Jackson and Cape Girardeau churches respectively preach at least once a month from now until April, 1904. in these colored churches. 3. That the members of Emmaus church pledge themselves to pay so much a month until April 1904 towards the liquidation of the interest on the church debt, also to help repair the church. 4. That in order to pay off this debt of $184, also to repair the church, the chairman of your committee be permitted in the name of the Presbytery to make a special appeal to the Jackson and Cape Girardeau churches. Also for the same purpose to make a call on the special church erection fund of Presbytery, and on the General Assembly's Committee of Colored Evangelization. 5. That these calls and appropriations be made only on condition that the church building be deeded to the Presbytery. 6. That if there is anything left over from these appropriations after paying the debt and interest on the same, and after repairing the church, this remainder be converted into a sinking fund for the purpose of building a church at Cape Girardeau next year, provided the conditions and p respects justify the same. 7. That the gifts of the members of the Second Cape Girardeau Church from now until April 1904 be put into a sinking fund for the same purpose.

8. That an effort be made to secure a colored minister for this important field by April 1904. 9. That the attention of all our ministers be called to this most important branch of our work for which we ask their sympathy, help and prayers, and that they remember that December is the month set apart by the General Assembly for the offerings of our people for this worthy cause.

Presbytery adjourned to meet in stated session at Perreville, Mo., April 1904. Geo. W. Harlan, Stated Clerk.

LEXINGTON.—This church has recently entered the Forward Movement, pledging, besides a sum of $400 which for some time past has been devoted to the support of the Rev. R. E. McAlpine, Nagoya, Japan, $1,000 to the support of some department of the work in the foreign field to be chosen by the congregation.

CAPE GIRARDEAU.—Rev. Robt. S. Brown of Lynville, Tenn. has signified his acceptance of the call recently given by this church, subject to the action of his Presbytery, and his church has given a reluctant consent.

CALHOUN.—The pastor, Rev. W. T. Howison, reports recent meeting of two weeks conducted by himself, resulting in fourteen additions, three on profession of faith. Also that a Westminster League of twenty members has recently been organized among the young people.

COLUMBIA.—Fourteen members were recently added to this church of which Rev. W. W. Elwang is pastor.

LIBERTY.—The Presbytery of Upper Missouri met in adjourned session with Bethel Church Oct. 15, 1903.

Licentiate J. E. Flow was ordained to the full work of the ministry, and installed pastor of Bethel church. The moderator, Rev. R. L. Kinnaird, presided and propounded the constitutional questions. Rev. L. E. McNair preached the sermon. Rev. S. M. Neel, D. D., delivered the charges to pastor and congregation.

The next stated meeting will be held with Central church, Kansas City, the second Tuesday in April, 1904, at 7:30 p. m. J. J. Hill, Stated Clerk.

VIRGINIA.

NEWPORT NEWS.—On the fourteenth anniversary of the organization of the Sunday school at the First Church, Sunday, October 25th, the officers and teachers, (forty-eight in number) for the coming year were installed with appropriate and impressive ceremony. Twelve of these teachers conduct a Chinese department.

Norfolk Presbytery.

The Presbytery of Norfolk met at the Ghent Church, Norfolk, Va., Oct. 13th, 1903.

There were present sixteen ministers and eight ruling elders.

The opening sermon was preached by the retiring moderator, Rev. Arnold Hall, subject, "The One Pearl of Great Price."

Rev. R. E. Steele was elected moderator and Rev. J. B. Waller, temporary clerk.

Rev. H. B. Pratt of the Presbytery of Newark (Northern Assembly) and Rev. H. T. Darnall of the Presbytery of Macon were welcomed as corresponding members.

The Sunday School and Publication committees were consolidated, as requested by the Assembly, with Rev. J. E. Thacker as chairman.

Encouraging reports were presented on the state of religion in the churches.

Work on the twentieth century innud was postponed.

Sessions were given the authority of Presbytery to send out ruling elders to conduct meetings in vacant churches and missions. It was ordered that special services be held in all the churches in the interest of Home Missions and liberal collection was taken for that cause.

The Womans Foreign Mission Union was addressed impressively by Rev. Lacy Moffet who is appointed to the Central China Mission.

Rev. J. Ernest Thacker preached the Presbyterian sermon on "Christian Giving."

Permanent committees were appointed on Presbyterial appointments, revision of manual and nominations.

The report on education was presented by chairman E. T. Wellford. Two candidates are under care of Presbytery.

All permanent and executive committees were revised.

Rev. R. E. Steele addressed Presbytery in behalf of the Seaman's Friend Society, and resolutions commending the work were adopted.

Rev. C. W. Maxwell, superintendent of the Synod's orphanage, addressed Presbytery in the interest of our new orphan's home. The home was warmly commended by Presbytery to the favor of our people.

A report from the Assembly's Home and School was received and the churches were directed to raise their apportionments for paying the remaining debt.

The Foreign Missions report was presented by Rev. A. R. Shaw, chairman, and public exercises were held in the interest of this great cause. The remaining debt on the Onancock church was provided for at this meeting.

Resolutions of sympathy and affection were extended to Dr. C. E. Bishop who has been ill for several months. Presbytery rejoices in Dr. Bishop's returning health.

Rev. A. R. Shaw was nominated as moderator of the next regular meeting.

Rev. A. C. Hopkins, Jr., was appointed to preach the Presbyterial sermon at the Spring meeting.

Onancock was chosen as the next place of meeting, the time to be the Tuesday after the third Sunday of April.

Resolutions of thanks were extended to Rev. J. N. H. Summerell, pastor of the Ghent church, and to his congregation, for a warm welcome to their homes during the session of Presbytery.

E. B. McClure, Stated Clerk.

NORTH CAROLINA.

HENDERSON.—The Henderson church has just enjoyed a rare season of privilege in the presence and preaching of the Rev. R. G. McLees of the Synod of South Carolina. Mr. McLees was with us from Oct. 11th to Oct. 18th, preaching twice a day. His sermons were full of beauty and power, and greatly refreshing to the church and community. The interest was deep and far-reaching and there were a goodly number of confessions. Six young people have been added to our church and there will probably be others. We are sincerely grateful for this season of refreshing and feel that spiritual life of the church has received a distinct and permanent uplift.

SUNNYSIDE.—This is the the new name of a church near Fayetteville. Bethlehem, the name of a church on the left and Green Hill, an old mission point on the right, has been dropped and a new house of worship has been built between and so Bethlehem disappears from the roll and Sunnyside appears, five miles east of Fayetteville. The work has been done under the leadership of Rev. V. G. Smith. He is a great worker and success has crowned his labors. The new building was dedicated last Sunday. The work of the day was characteristic of the man. The session was convened in the presence of the congregation and several members received, eight in all, on confession and part of them baptized. The sermon was then preached by a co-presbyter to a packed house. There were at least 900 people present. At 3 p. m. a congregational meeting was held and two elders and a deacon were elected, then another sermon was preached and the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered. It is a neat house of worship and is paid for. It is a great work that is going on there.

WALLACE.—The Presbytery of Wilmington met at Wallace, N. C., and the opening sermon was preached by Rev. R. M. Mann.

Rev. V. H. Starbuck was chosen moderator and Rev. J. C. Story and Mr. J. H. Moore temporary clerks.

Arrangements were made for the installation of Rev. T. D. Johnston as pastor of the churches of Burgaw, Hopewell, Mt. Williams, and Pike.

Rev. D. P. Geachey was granted permission to labor outside of our bounds for the next six months. He is canvassing the Synod in the interest of the 20th Century Fund.

Publication, Sabbath Schools and Young Peoples' Societies were consolidated into one committee with Rev. R. M. Williams chairman.

Two churches were organized, Hallsville and Goshen Grove. One whole day was spent in the discussion of Sabbath School work. Interesting addresses were made by Drs. Martin, McClure, Wells, and Rev. P. McIntyre.

Dr. W. J. Martin was heard with a great deal of pleasure, giving an account of the good work Davidson College is doing.

A popular meeting was held in behalf of Ministerial Relief. Revs. Dr. McClure, Trawick and Winecoff made well prepared addresses in relation to the same.

Presbytery resolved to establish a missionary Library for the benefit of our ministers and ruling elders.

The subject of Church and Christian Education judging by their acts is uppermost in the minds of our people.

The hospitality of Wallace was up to its usual high standard and it was appreciated by Presbytery. Wallace as a town is forging to the front and the Presbyterian church will not be left behind with such an active pastor as Rev. R. M. Williams.

Presbytery will hold its next spring meeting in Whiteville, the 13th day of April, 1904, beginning at 7:30 p. m.

A. McFadyen, Stated Clerk.

LOUISBURG.—I am happy to say that the report, (which appeared in the Louisburg correspondence of the daily papers,) stating that our church was burned, is an error. The colored Presbyterian church was burned.

C. N. Wharton.

NORTH WILKESBORO—Rev. C. W. Robinson has lately been assisted in a series of meetings at this point by Rev. M. C. Arrowood of Burlington, N. C., at Wilkesboro by Rev. Jno. Grey and at Elkin by Rev. C. E. Hodgkin. All of these sermons were forcible and attractive and the churches have been greatly revived.

WINSTON-SALEM, First Church.—We have just closed a most delightful and helpful series of special services. Dr. Guerrant who made us a visit eight years ago, came to the assistance of the pastor and preached twice a day for two weeks. The church is greatly strengthened and refreshed. Forty-four persons made a public profession of faith, most of these will shortly be admitted to the communion of this church. Other churches in the city will receive additions. Dr. Guerrant seems stronger and more majestic than ever in his preaching. The Lord has richly endowed him for his work as a winner of souls.

R. E. C.

OXFORD.—This church has recently been blessed by a gracious revival. It was conducted by the Rev. Wm. Black, our evangelist. He was with us from Oct. 11th to the 19th, preaching twice each day. At night the church including the Sunday school room was crowded and during the morning services the main body of the church was well filled. God's blessing attended the preaching, which was forceful and earnest. The churches have been revived, Christians have grown in grace, and many of the unconverted have been brought to Christ. It has been a precious season. One hundred and eighty made profession of faith in their Saviour. Some of these were children, but the most part were from twelve to twenty years old. The pastors of the other churches and their people joined with us in the services.

LOUISIANA

BATON ROUGE—In dissolving the pastoral relation between Rev. E. L. Siler and the First Church, Baton Rouge, and dismissing him to the Presbytery of Orange, N. C., that he might accept the call to High Point, Louisiana Presbytery adopted the following resolution:

"We realize the fact that we are losing a very useful man. His ability as a Presbyter, preacher and pastor, reveals the fact that behind his usefulness, we find a consecrated man. God has been with him to bless his work, in his own field as well as in others to whom he has ministered from time to time.

"We cheerfully and heartily commend Brother Siler to the new and larger field of usefulness to which in the Providence of God he has been called."

TENNESSEE.

FRANKLIN.—A series of special services have just been concluded in this church. The pastor, Rev. W. J. McMillan, was assisted by Rev. William Thome of McKenzie, Tenn. The visible results so far are eighteen additions to the church on profession of faith. The work in this church is in an encouraging condition.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Colored Evangelization.

The enforced resignation of Dr. Lilly was generally regretted; but the work, being the Lord's, must go on. As his successor, and as one who has put his whole heart into the cause, I hope to receive the sympathy and encouragement of the Church.

I am glad to report that Stillman Institute has opened unusually well. Indeed, we need money at once to finish up the Dormitory begun last year. It is yet without interior partitions and chimneys. The lower floor is used as a workshop, and also as a recitation room by Mr. Verner. As it is poorly heated, we desire at once to build chimneys and put in a good heater. The work Mr. Verner does in teaching five hours a day is hard enough, and he ought to have comfortable surroundings. I believe the Christian people of our Church will speedily send in the money to make these improvements, and to provide room for the additional students we expect after Christmas.

I am happy to state that Dr. Lewis J. Coppedge of North Carolina has joined our forces at Tuscaloosa as a teacher, while preparing to go to Africa under the auspices of the Foreign Mission Committee. He is a young man of intelligence and consecration. He has specially in training two of the students who expect to go out with him. We desire to make Stillman Institute the base of supply for our Mission at Luebo, in the Congo Free State. Dr. Coppedge, at the same time he himself is acquiring French and the native languages of Luebo, is teaching the English classes at the Institute, and is giving some simple medical training to the prospective missionaries.

This is an important forward step at the Stillman Institute, and we are looking for increased gifts to support and extend it. Some people may not believe in the general education of the negro race in the South; but surely every Christian believes in giving them the benefits of the Gospel. To do that, we must educate their preachers.

I am spending no time studying the so-called race problem; but am going on energetically to prosecute the work of our Church as outlined by the General Assembly. I am expecting prompt and liberal offerings from God's people. The regular annual collection is appointed for the first Sunday in December; but no one need wait for that.

J. G. Snedecor, Secretary.
Tuscaloosa, Ala.

Synod of South Carolina.

This body held its annual session in the beautiful old town of Cheraw, whose refined and cultured people of all denominations threw open their elegant homes and received with warm cordiality the members and visitors of Synod, whom they entertained with a hospitality which was most generous on their part, and most delightful to their guests.

The meeting was opened at noon on Tuesday the 20th of October, with an appropriate sermon from the venerable Dr. James Woodrow, the last moderator present, Rev. D. N. McLanchlin, the moderator of last year, having moved to Alabama. Rev. Robert Adams of Laurens was unanimously chosen moderator and fully justified the choice of his brethren by the thorough accuracy, skill, efficiency and good humor with which he presided over the body. This meeting of Synod which continued with three sessions a day until 11 o'clock Thursday night, the 22nd, was a most excellent and delightful one every way. The members, 106 in number, attended upon the sessions with punctuality and interest. The spirit which prevailed throughout the business was brotherly and patient. The discussions were high-toned and able. The formal addresses by visiting brethren were instructive and impressive and all the business was dispatched with dignity and decorum.

Among the matters which attracted special attention may be mentioned: 1. Foreign Missions, presented primarily by the clear and comprehensive report of the permanent committee; which was followed by a most entertaining and stimulating address from Dr. J. R. Wilkinson, in regard specially to his medical work as the physician in charge of the Elizabeth Blake Hospital in Soochow, China, whither he is now returning after a short furlough at home. And later Synod heard with pleasure an address on the same general subject from Rev. Dr. W. M. Anderson, representing the committee at Nashville. The report shows encouraging increase in the contributions from all our Presbyteries and noteworthy with special gratification the results of the Forward Movement as conducted largely in our bounds by the Rev. J. F. Preston, one of our own young ministers, who has now gone to Korea.

2. Home Missions, which were first set forth in the elaborate report of the Synod's executive committee. But the feature of this discussion was the admirable address of the Rev. E. E. Gillespie, superintendent of Home Missions for the North Carolina Synod, who came on the invitation of our Synod's committee and who, with wonderful clearness and practical force, presented the plan as worked with such great success in his own Synod. It would be difficult to express the pleasure and profit which Brother Gillespie's address and explanations, in answer to numerous questions, gave to our Synod. Under the example and stimulus of our North Carolina brethren, this Synod elected Rev. F. H. Wardlaw of Piedmont, superintendent of our Home Missions, and Rev. R. G. McLees of Greenwood, General Evangelist, and resolved to raise if practicable $5,000 for the work the coming year.

3. Ministerial Relief was discussed at length after hearing the report of the permanent committee, which shows gifts to this object as distressingly small for so deserving a cause.

4. Publication and Sabbath school Work had an unusual ventilation, considering the absence of the Assembly's secretary and general superintendent, through the vigorous report of the permanent committee and the discussion which followed.

5. Colored Evangelization came in the last day, when Rev. J. G. Snedecor, the new secretary, appeared and made an excellent address, and the report of the permanent committee also was heard and discussed. The showing for this cause is not encouraging and the churches of Synod are behind hand in paying its share of the purchase money of the Ferguson-Williams College at Abbeville, S. C.

Besides the subjects named, education for the ministry and the Bible Cause had their consideration through the reports of the permanent committees and the discussion of them. Both reported some advance in this Synod the last year, but much better things are desired and sought after.

The matter which excited the warmest interest and called forth the warmest discussion during this meeting was the overture from the Synod of Georgia, asking for a committee from this Synod to confer with others in Atlanta concerning the scheme for establishing a university in that city. As the plan involves the removal of the Theological Seminary from Columbia, the keenest interest was felt and most decided opinions on one side and the other were expressed. Rev. Drs. J. W. Walden and T. H. Rice representing the movement, addressed the Synod and their excellent addresses made in admirable spirit and good taste, were heard with profound attention and genuine pleasure. And the matter was subsequently discussed with much patience, energy and zeal. The discussion centered on the question of removing the Seminary which many of its friends would greatly deplore. And the debate continued through many hours, resulting in the adoption of the following:

Resolved: That Synod appoint the committee requested in the overture.

At the same time, in order to be clearly understood in the premises, the Synod wishes to put formally on record the fact that this action is not to be construed as in any sense a committal, either pro or con, to the proposition.

And the committee was instructed to report at the next stated meeting of Synod.

Rev. W. G. Neville, Rev. Dr. W. J. McKay and Elder W. F. Stevenson were elected the committee, with Rev. W. L. Leigh, Rev. Dr. J. W. Flinn and Elder W. A. Clark as alternates.

The next meeting of Synod is to be at Clinton, Oct. 18, '04

Notes of the Synod of Texas.

One of the most delightful meetings of this Synod has just been held in Milford, Texas. This is the site of the Synod's Female College, known as the Texas Presbyterian College for Girls. A year ago the Synod decided to hold its next meeting in Milford, that the members might see what the Lord is doing for us in this institution. At that time Mr. W. T. M.

Diokson, the representative of Milford church, and a member of the board of trustees of the T. P. C. G., extended a most cordial invitation to all to attend this meeting—not omitting to give a special invitation to the ladies, especially the wives of the ministers and ruling elders. It seemed impossible for a village of something less than 1,000 inhabitants to redeem such a liberal promise. But somehow the promise to entertain these was not only fully redeemed, but, being taken literally, as was designed, Milford was simply alive with members of Synod—141 representatives, and some 60 or 75 ladies from different parts of the Synod. Each guest seemed to regard his or her home as the best. The hospitality of this noble people was simply unbounded; and if they had any regret it seemed to be that every section of the Synod was not represented. I was reminded of the sea that is constantly receiving the waters, and yet room all the while for more. This meeting of Synod may well be known in history as the Ladies' Synod. In a few places lady visitors are not welcomed to these meetings, but in Milford they were not only provided for, but received with open arms and hearts. The Lord ever bless this noble people—not only the Presbyterians, but all the denominations, for all took part in this hospitality.

The college was at its best. President and Mrs. Evans extended a cordial invitation to the Synod and the visitors to a Reception to be given on Thursday evening, in the college building. It was here that the college appeared in its bridal dress. It is impossible for me to describe this reception, save to say that it was perfect in every particular. The young lady students would take charge of about four and conduct them to a fine fruit punch bowl, where each was refreshed, and where a badge—a miniature picture of the main building, as a souvenir—was pinned on the lapel of the coat, and then conducted over the building; every part of which was thoroughly lighted with the most beautiful gas lights. There was served in the dining hall, attended by the teachers, ice cream and cake. I will not undertake to describe the beautiful decorations which adorned this department. In the chapel all who could, entered and were entertained by recitations and music, while furnishing, themselves, short crisp speeches suited to the occasion. In the Assembly room was the orchestra pouring forth the sweet strains of music.

But the best is yet to come. It was the memorable Friday morning in the Presbyterian Church, where the sessions of Synod were held; the 23rd of Oct., will ever be known in the history of the college as their "red letter" day. Speeches were made by the representative of the standing committee on the T. P. C. G., Judge Rousseau, and then by a member of the board of trustees, next by President Evans, and finally Dr. R. K. Smoot crowned the occasion with the speech of his life. The urgent needs of the college were stressed, when Rev. John V. McCall led the Synod in an earnest prayer for the Divine blessing. Dr. W. H. Richardson, our excellent evangelist, was then called to the platform, and calls were made for material help towards erecting the second building. Prayers were going up all over the house while "Heaven came down our souls to greet, And glory crowned the mercy seat." Subscriptions or cash came in at the rate of from $5.00 to $500, until over $7,000 had been entered, to say nothing of the united moral support all over the Synod, which was secured. There were several incidents worth mentioning, but only a few can in this article be presented. Brother Dobbs, a most consecrated man of God, who is perfectly blind, arose and said while he had nothing in hand, he would give the first $5.00 the Lord would give him. No sooner did he resume his seat, than a friend handed him the money, and he arose and handed it in. Father Johnson, ninety-five years of age, arose and made a similar contribution, and added another of equal amount for his wife. It was pronounced by many as the most glorious occasion of the kind ever witnessed. Subscriptions would go down to $5.00, and then spring up to $250.

It was asked what it cost to furnish a room in the dormitory, and the reply was $50; then rooms began to be taken until, out of forty rooms, the capacity of the second building, all were taken but three or four. Each institution in the Synod took a room; Austin Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Austin College, Daniel Baker College and Durant (Indian Territory) College. Nothing could tend more to unify these than this liberal act.

In this connection let it be said that requests are already coming in to the President to engage these rooms in the second building, all others being already filled, for the second term of this session.

One prominent elder, a business man of Dallas, told the writer that he had been examining into the advantages offered by this school, and he felt like the Queen of Sheba, that the half had not been told him. It may be said that this expression voiced the general sentiment of the members of Synod and the many visitors. President Evans has nothing now to fear in regard to the college unless it is that he may be troubled with too many corresponding members, if not visiting brothers.

The Synod adopted by a hearty and unanimous vote a paper looking towards the unifying of our several institutions of learning, especially as to the collecting and disbursing of the money for these. This, it is hoped, will be fully consummated at the next meeting of Synod. At present, Rev. J. J. Grier will continue to represent the Texas Presbyterian College for Girls as their Financial Secretary; and it is hoped that he will receive liberal contributions. His work, however, is not to interfere in any way with the promises made at the Synod. This note is given for the instruction of those who made these promises.

Alabama Presbytery.

The Presbytery of East Alabama met at Lebanon Church October 27, 1903, at 7:30 p. m., and opened with a sermon by the retiring moderator, Rev. G. W. Patteson, D. D., on John 17:21, after which it was constituted with prayer.

Organization.—Rev. J. A. Hall was elected moderator and Rev. E. L. Hill and Rev. J. W. Roseborough, temporary clerks.

Courtesies.—Rev. G. A. Hough, of the Presbytery of Macon was invited to sit as a corresponding member, and Rev. Thomas G. Slaughter of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, as a visiting brother.

Committees.—Permanent committees on Home and Foreign Missions, Education for the Ministry, Sabbath Schools, Publication, Colored Evangelistic Work Church and Christian Education and Orphans' Home reported that the interests committed to them were in good condition. Their reports in full will be published in the minutes at an early day.

Commissions.—The commission appointed at the last meeting of Presbytery to organize a church at Highland Park, a suburb of Montgomery, reported that it had discharged that duty. A commission was appointed to organize a church of our faith and order at Enterprise, if the way be clear.

Presbyterial Sermon.—Rev. R. B. Morrow preached the Presbyterial sermon on the subject of "Family Religion," and Rev. E. P. Davis was appointed to preach the sermon at the Spring meeting on "Ministerial Support."

Call.—A call for the pastoral services of Rev. R. B. Morrow from the West Point Church, for half his time was presented and placed in his hands. At his request, the Presbytery granted him permission to hold the call until the next stated meeting.

Next Regular Meeting.—Clayton was selected as the place and Tuesday before the third Sabbath in April, 1904, at 10 a. m., as the time.

Commissioners to the General Assembly.—Rev. R. J. McIlwain and Rev. R. B. Morrow were nominated principal and alternate commissioners, respectively; and Messrs. F. P. Glass and W. M. Stakely, principal and alternate respectively from the eldership.

Adjourned Meeting.—The Presbytery decided to have an adjourned meeting at Synod at the call of the moderator.

Consolidation.—The Presbytery consolidated its committees on Publication and Young Peoples' Societies.

Thanks.—The Presbytery by a unanimous and rising vote tendered its thanks to the people of Lebanon and community for their abundant hospitality.

CHINA.

On Sabbath, Sept. 20, two men and two children received baptism at Bingwong, thirty miles south of Scochow. One of these men formerly opened a shop for the sale of articles used in heathen worship. He now opens a rice shop. Both close their places of business on the Lord's day.

Funeral of Colonel J. B. Rankin.

The funeral services of the late Colonel J. B. Rankin of this city were attended by a large number of friends and neighbors at the Second Presbyterian Church, at 10 o'clock Friday morning. The elders of the church served as the pall bearers and the services were conducted by the pastor, Rev. Martin D. Hardin, assisted by Dr. McKelway. The opening hymn was the appropriate one, "Servant of Christ, Well Done," after which Dr. McKelway led in prayer. Mr. Hardin read the Twenty-Third Psalm, a part of the fourteenth chapter of John and the words of mortality and immortality from the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians. Brief tributes of respect and affection were paid by Dr. McKelway and the pastor.

Dr. McKelway said:

"When the Apostle Paul was nearing the bound of life, just a little while before he bowed his head, that good, gray head, to the executioner's sword, he wrote to his dear young son in the faith, Timothy, 'I am now ready to be offered up and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth, there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the Righteous Judge, shall give me in that day.'

"The course that was finished yesterday, the fight that has been fought these three score years and ten and three, was one in which the same faith was kept, and we may today, in the midst of grief, rejoice that from the hands of the same Master, the crown of righteousness has been received, for it was promised, 'not to me only' says Paul, but also unto all those who love His appearing.

"The life of Colonel Rankin was a benediction to this community, in which we live. The very sight of him on our streets, with his tall, commanding figure, his clear eye, his intellectual brow, his genial, benevolent countenance, was a blessing. And certainly these last years in which it has been my privilege to know him, a visit from him was always spiritually refreshing, for he brought with him, into the busiest day's work, something of the atmosphere of the heavenly world. He was attractive to his friends in many ways. He was a man of wide and varied culture, of much reading of long and careful observation of times and of men. He was gifted in conversation, his vocabulary was as rich as it was chaste, and his faculty for expressing his views was one to be envied by the most intellectual. He was a man of high ideals of life and duty, and he seemed so perpetually lifted above what was mean and base, that the thought of such things was banished from his presence.

"And yet that which really appealed to men about this man, whether they could understand it or not, was a sort of magnetism of holiness. There were few ministers of the gospel that inspired as much reverence and respect even in the minds of the thoughtless.

"It may not have been known to this community that he had been himself set apart for the ministry, as he told me once, with the story of the providences that shut up the way to that calling for him, after his theological studies had begun. We cannot help thinking what a great preacher he would have been, what a man to shepherd a flock. Those of us who have been privileged with the experience of being lifted to the very Throne of Grace, and as it were into the very presence of the Heavenly Father, on the wings of his matchless prayers, we who have read his words of eloquence from the printed page, can perhaps imagine what a power he would have been in the pulpit with his gifts of mind and of expression and his graces of expression and his graces of heart and of soul. And yet the Lord ordered it otherwise, and the Lord knew best. And Colonel Rankin wore in this city the white flower of a blameless life, that men might know that the world of business has its saints just as truly as the profession of the holy ministry, and that the man who lives near to God, and holds constant communion with him, needs no sacred office in order to magnify the office of a Christian. And he was a Christian, a Christian something like Christ. When that is said, all is said. No need to add the word, gentleman, for it includes that as the greater includes the less. He was one who lived and walked among us, holding fellowship with the skies and with his citizenship in Heaven.

"And so we do not sorrow today, as those having no hope. He sleeps, but he sleeps in Jesus, and those that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. The soldier, brave in his country's defense, valiant always for the truth in the battles of his Lord, has not fallen. He has been promoted into a sphere of glory that is beyond our vision as yet. This tireless laborer in the Master's vineyard, doing with the utmost faithfulness and the most loving care, even the smallest duties that fell to his hand has not ceased from service in ceasing from earthly labor. For it is written, His servants shall serve him. It is for us here to catch the inspiration of his life, and not to be thinking merely of these last rites nor of the tomb in which his dust may lie. We know not on what high mission of joyous service his soul may be already winging its way in that land of light and of reunion and of eternal joy.

"This church does well to cherish his memory as a heritage. One of the first elders to be ordained in this church, he has as it were set the standard of Christian consistency for those that have come after and shall come after him. And his devotion to the interests of this church, his honest pride in it and zeal for it, were worthy of imitation and of emulation.

"The memory of the just is blessed. Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors and their works do follow them. Soldier, Scholar, Business man, Author, Elder, Man of God—we shall not soon look upon his like again. But the true immortality is that of usefulness. And the life that he lived in this community, as it grew from a country village into a city, has left its impression upon this generation and upon those to come, down to the last syllable of recorded time. God's servant is immortal in a higher sense, in the influences started here on earth, but continuing all through the endless ages."

Mr. Hardin said:

"We cannot believe that the good Father who has given us life and made it beautiful and full of significance will permit us to go out into darkness like snuffed candles just at the time when we are prepared to know and love most. Such a life as this one, so full of gentleness and spiritual beauty makes it easier for us all to believe in immortality. We cannot think of one incarnating as he did the mind and spirit of Jesus as dead. He lives with God in that larger, fuller life which awaits the souls of all God's faithful children. May his spirit abide with this church to which he gave so many years of faithful service. May we all be made more gentle and Christ-like in character by having seen the gentleness of his spirit.

We do not mourn for him, for even now he has entered into that life for which his whole earthly career was but a preparation."

After a touching prayer by Mr. Hardin, petitioning for the comfort and consolation of the gospel to be applied to the bereaved ones, the congregation sang, Asleep in Jesus, while the funeral procession wended its way towards beautiful Elmwood, where all that was mortal of Colonel J. B. Rankin awaits the coming of the Lord he loved and served on earth.

The World.

The Canadians are so wrought up over the Alaskan boundary decision that they are talking seriously of independence or annexation.

If we pay $40,000,000 to the French Canal Company for their rights, tools, work, etc., on the isthmus, it is to be divided between two gangs of thieves, "$20,000,000 to the thieves in France and $20,000,000 to the thieves in America!" That is the charge made by Col. Henry Watter-son in a striking editorial in the Louisville Courier-Journal.

The decline of British consols to 87, a low level not reached even during the Franco-Prussian war, and exceeded only in the panic of 1866; the decline in other values on the London market, and the persistent depreciation in security values on the New York market, combine to form a situation that arrests attention. "At no time in the history of speculation in this country," says the New York Financial Age, "has there been such a persistent depreciation of values as has been going on for the past year."

Rome, Nov. 1.—Fire broke out at 3:30 o'clock this evening in that portion of the Vatican containing the hall of inscriptions, where the Pope gives his audiences, and which is adjacent to the famous pinacoteca, or gallery of pictures. The alarm caused much confusion and excitement in the Vatican. Strenuous efforts were made to control the flames, and the firemen of Rome were called to lend their help. At a quarter past 11 o'clock the fire was under control. No lives were lost.

According to the press dispatches, certain developments are assumed in Europe to indicate that Russia and Japan have at last reached some understanding which will remove all immediate causes of friction and render war remote. Just what has happened to bring about this better feeling remains to be seen, and it may even be that no agreement has been actually reached. The fact that negotiations have been resumed, and the general belief is current that the crisis has become less acute, indicate that some sort of modus vivendi at least has been arrived at.—Picayune.

The statistics quoted in Ware's report show that the total cost of pensions to the Government for the past thirty-eight years has been $2,942,178,145 in pensions paid, and $95,647,984 expended in maintaining the pension service. He estimates that the Revolutionary War cost the Government $7,000,000 in pensions; War of 1812, $6,234,414; War with Mexico, $33,483,309; War of the Rebellion, $2,878,240,400, and the War with Spain, $5,479,268. Last year 113,794 applicants for a pension or an increase were rejected; the total number of applications exceeded lightly 370,000.

Hitherto no one has thought of Argentina in connection with Arctic enterprise. Its comparatively close propinquity to the South Pole has induced the Argentine Government to endeavor to relieve the Nordenskjöld party. The equipment provided is very complete, and, so far as bedding, clothing, and boots are concerned, has entrusted to the Jaeger Company, who have already fitted out so many similar expeditions. Commander Irizar, Naval Attache to the Argentine Legation in London, has started for Buenos Ayres to take over the command of the expedition.—Travel.

That was a fine story which the Associated Press gave us the other day from the capital—an account of the trip made by a young man in the employ of the Treasury Department from Washington to New York. He was just "a common clerk" upon a $1,800 salary. And to save cost of expressage he carried $3,000,000 in signed bills from one city to the other, unbonded and unattended. If, as the ungodly assert, "Every man his price," that young fellow's price must be pretty high. Fine as such an example is, it does not detract from his just honor to say that we know plenty like him. That the papers gave him half a dozen lines and some embezzler of a thousand or two half a column, shows that not honesty but dishonesty is "news."—The Interior.

It is not probable that the bill which was introduced in the Bogota Senate authorizing the President of Colombia to negotiate a new canal treaty with the United States means much. Recent utterances and actions of Representatives and Senators in the little republic reflect intense hostility to this measure, and it will probably fail. Moreover, it is now asserted at Bogota that the extension granted to the new Panama Canal Company three years ago is not valid without the sanction of the Colombian Senate. Should this body disapprove "Colombia will next year take possession of the canal works and negotiate a new treaty." This of course would mean further delay. There can hardly be a question that sinister influences are at work to defeat the building of the canal, or at least to postpone its construction as long as possible. It is to our own Congress rather than to Colombia, it would seem that the country must turn if we are to have a waterway from ocean to ocean without much further delay.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

Between France and Britain for five or six years there was much ill feeling. The abrupt termination of Major Marchand's expedition to Fashoda by Lord Kitchener provoked French animosity. While this hostile sentiment was at its height the South African war afforded the Parisian journals the opportunity to get back at Britain. The cartoonists were exasperating and English resentment was keen. King Edward visited Paris and was well received. A return visit was made by President Loubet, and Frenchman and Englishman began to say nice things about each other. Baron Etourelles de Constant, a member of the Chamber of Deputies and a prominent leader of the peace movement, together with a number of fellow deputies came to London and conferred with members of Parliament, and now as a result of these friendly interchanges an arbitration treaty between France and England is about completed. It is said to have been drawn on the same lines as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which failed to receive the sanction of the Senate. Should the present Anglo-French treaty be adopted, it will mark a distinct advance in the methods of adjusting international differences.—The Interior.

In various directions there are indications of contractions in loans, enterprises, and investments. As usual the farmer stands as the one solid, reliable business factor in the business situation. His crops are good; he neither strikes nor boycotts; he is the genuine wealth producer. Railroads are narrowing their improvements; no new lines are likely to be opened. Oct. 17, it was announced from Philadelphia that improvements amounting to from $5,000,000 to $8,000,000 on the Pennsylvania railroad have been stopped. "Owing to the many labor troubles that have existed" traffic on the Pennsylvania and other roads has begun to fall off. "The demands of all kinds of labor have grown to such proportions" that many mills have preferred closing up. Further orders may be issued for stopping improvements. The effect of many strikes that have held up millions of dollars in the building trades is felt in the steel mills, and a number have shut down. Quarrels between unions, even in the same business, restriction of production, shortening hours, strikes over trivial matters and the like have had a serious effect in depressing and curtailing business. And then the stock gambling, the blowing of financial bubbles, the astounding revelations made of and by some of the promoters of large enterprises—all these have tended to destroy confidence and create distrust. The prospectus of the Shipbuilding Company is now acknowledged to have been false and misleading. One large bank in Pittsburgh, the Federal National, and one in Allegheny, the First National, have gone into the hands of receivers. Both are believed to be solvent. A group of bankers pledge a fund of $2,000,000 for emergencies. The suspension of these banks had no marked effect on the markets. Sentiment among the bankers in San Francisco, where the American Banker's Association has been in session, is reported as hopeful.—The Banner.

The upper portion of the Louisiana Purchase was known as the Territory of Louisiana; it comprised all that territory north of the thirty-third degree of latitude, eastward to the Mississippi and westward and northward as far as the undetermined boundaries of the newly acquired possessions might extend. South of this was the District of Orleans with its seat of Government fixed at New Orleans. The cession of the upper part of the purchase did not take place until March 10th, 1804, when, having received the cession from the Spanish, the French representative handed it over to the agent of the United States with a very brief and simple ceremony.

By these unimpressive proceedings the Government of the United States was put in possession of territory within whose boundaries now flourish the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Wyoming, Idaho, Montana, the Indian Territory, and parts of the States of Minnesota and Colorado. The men who were the active agents in the transfer of this mighty land from one national jurisdiction to another, are well-nigh forgotten in the crowd and rush of later, but not less important, events. By this historic purchase the seat of a mighty empire was forever established. By this purchase the possibilities of developing from the republic a world-power were strengthened. Under our benignant rule, comfort, luxury, prosperity, and every variety of material activity fill the wide spaces in which our fathers found only a trackless wilderness. Common gratitude bids us recall with acclaim the names of Jefferson, Livingston and Monroe, who, building better than they knew, made this magnificent transformation possible.—From "How We Bought the Great West." by Noah Brooks, in the November Scribner's.

MARRIAGES.

M'BRAYER-BRICE.—In the Presbyterian church, Shelby, N. C., August 19th, 1903, Mr. Jas. C. McBrayer and Miss Nanza Brice, Rev. W. R. Minter, officiating.

PAGE-HAMBRIGHT.—At the residence of the bride's parents Mr. and Mrs. D. R. Hambright, Groves, N. C., October 15th, 1903, Mr. J. A. Page and Miss Ethel Hambright, Rev. W. R. Minter officiating.

Deaths.

SHARP.—At Aberdeen, N. C., on July 17, 1903, Jesse Alton Sharp, son of Mr. and Mrs. T. M. Sharp, aged fourteen months, passed from earth to Heaven. He was the youngest grandson of the late Rev. A. M. Watson and lies sleeping beside his grandfather in the old historic graveyard at Bethesda church, Moore county, N. C. His life was short, but his death makes a vacancy in the home that is hard to be reconciled to, but we will strive to teach our hearts to say with the poet, Take thou our child; onrs for a day,

Thine while the Ages blossom,
His little shining head we lay
In the Redeemer's bosom.

M'MASTER.—In loving remembrance of my dear mother, Mrs. Martha McMaster, daughter of John and Margaret Seignions, French Huguenots, that settled in Charletson, S. C. It was in the latter place she met Mr. M. McMaster who she married in the year 1846. She was the sister of Chas. W. Seignions of Charleston, S. C., and aunt to the late congressman W. T. Stones of Orangeburg, S. C. :

You have left ns, dearest mother,
For that bright and happy shore,
And our hearts are breaking, mother,
Cau it be you'll come no more.

Time has plauted twelve months, mother,
On your far and quiet grave,
But the love we bear thee, mother,
In our hearts we'll cherish, save.

Ah! the world seems dreary, mother,
Since you've left ns all alone,
And thy spirit wafted npward
Took its flight to worlds unknown.

Round the home is lonely, mother
And that chair is empty now,
We will hold it sacred mother,
For in prayer you'd daily bow.

You have left sweet memories, mother,
That our hearts will ever hold,
Sacred till we join the angels
And thy arms around us fold.

We are coming, coming, mother,
Meet ns at the "Gates Ajar,"
Yes, you promised there you'd meet us
And you'll see us from afar.

Yes, we're coming, coming, mother,
Soon our trials all will end,
Home with Jesus there we'll gather Blessed cternity there we'll spend.

The Household.

Care of the Hands.

Few people attach enough importance to the care of the hands. When it is remembered that the hand is offered in salutation to our friends, that it performs numbers of the most delicate offices at every moment of the day, that it touches many objects through which it may convey the germs of infection—when all these are considered, some idea of the importance that should attach to the care of them is realized.

A correspondent desires to know a method of caring for her hands. She says she has worked faithfully with them, but all to no purpose; that they are rough, hard, and dry, and that she really suffers with them. She cannot do fancy work, and they annoy her all the time.

I have studied along this line, have had the best of manicures in New York City and other cities, so as to be able to help my sister women if possible in the care of them at home. In this case I would advise if possible that the young girl go to a first-class manicure. One treatment would work wonders in her case, I think. Perfect cleanliness is the greatest adjunct to beauty and health of hands, but for all that, do not wash your hands too often. Washed seldom but thoroughly, they will keep in a far nicer condition.

First of all, hard water is fatal to good skin; if you cannot get cistern water, or rain-water, get 5 or 10 cents worth of Pacific Coast borax, keep on your wash-stand, and put a pinch in the water every time you wash your hands or face. It will not hurt a particle, is perfectly safe, and it whitens and softens the skin, as well as the water. Try not to wash your hands but once or twice a day. Wear loose gloves at night, but be very careful that they are clean inside and outside; otherwise the grease and dirt are absorbed by the heated glands.

Sarah Bernhardt's great beautifier for hands is equal parts of lemon and glycerine and a small quantity of borax;

The hands should be thoroughly washed at night before going to bed. The pores are thus left free and unclogged, and the health of the hand is preserved; but above all, the ends of the fingers should be so well washed and cared for that the skin is entirely unbroken. Then the contamination of the day will be powerless to effect harm, as these dangers only come through the breaking of the skin about the nails.

Polishing the nails may serve for the occupation of idle people, but the busy woman will find these simple rules of washing the finger ends will result in nails that will bear comparison with the much-manicured hand of the woman of leisure. At night, after washing them, use whatever oil or cream that agrees with your skin.—Sara H. Henton, in The Living Church.

"I suppose," he said, "it would be useless for me to ask you to be my wife."
"It would," she replied, "if that's your style of going about it."—Chicago Record-Herald.

THE OLD RELIABLE

Absolutely Pure.

THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE

Table Manners for Young Folks.

In talking at the table, if the company is large, you will usually converse more with your neighbor than with the circle as a whole. But at home and in the family, or at the house of an intimate friend, you must do your share of the entertainment. Save up the bright little story and the witty speech, the funny sayings of a child, the scrap of news in your Aunt Mary's last letter, and when a good opportunity offers add your mite to the general fund of amusement.

There are dear old gentlemen—and old ladies too—who have favorite stories which they are rather fond of telling. People in their own families, or among their very intimate acquaintances hear these stories more than once; indeed, they sometimes hear them until they become very familiar. Good manners forbid any showing of this—any look of impatience or appearance of boredom on the part of the listener. The really well-bred woman or girl listens to the thrice-told tale, the well-worn anecdote, says a pleasant word, smiles, forgets that she has heard it before, and does not allow the recounter to fancy that the story is being brought out too often. Good manners at the table are inflexible on this point. You must appear pleased. You must give pleasure to others. You must make up your mind to receive gratification by imparting it.

Once in a while an accident happens at a meal—a cup is overturned; some unhappy person swallows "the wrong way;" somebody makes a mistake. Look at your plate at such a moment, and nowhere else, unless you can sufficiently control your face and appear entirely unconscious that anything has occurred out of the usual routine. Take no notice, and go on with the conversation, and in a second the incident will have been forgotten by every one.—Harper's Round Table.

BARLEY WITH CHEESE.

Cook three-fourths cup of flaked barley in two cups of rapidly boiling water, with one level teaspoon of salt, in the top of the double boiler directly over the stove, until it is well swollen and the steam leaves pencil holes in the mush.

Then place it over the boiling water and let it cook half an hour, or longer if not soft, and do not stir it until done. Add one rounded tablespoon of butter, a dash of cayenne, and one-half cup of thinly shaved cheese. Stir until well mixed, and let it cook ten minutes longer that the cheese may be thoroughly melted. Serve hot for supper some chilly night when you crave something out of the usual course, and, perchance, have not milk or cream to serve with the barley as a mush. The cheese will take the place of meat, and is with most people more easily digested if cooked than when eaten raw. Some will find it an improvement to add a bit of soda the size of a pea at the same time the cheese is stirred in. It may be molded in small forms if desired.—Exchange.

LIFE'S PICNIC.

O, the folly of it. We pack our hamper for life's picnic with such pains. We spend so much, we work so hard. We make choice pies; we cook prime joints; we prepare so carefully the mayonnaise; we mix with loving hands the salad; we cram the basket to the lid with every delicacy we can think of. Everything to make the picnic a success is there—except the salt. Ah, woe is me, we forget the salt. We slave at our desks, in our workshops, to make a home for those we love; we give up pleasures; we give up our rest. We toil in our kitchen from morning till night, and we render the whole feast tasteless for want of a ha'porth of salt, for want of a soupcon of amiability, for want of a handful of kind words, a touch of caress, a pinch of courtesy.—Jerome K. Jerome.

TOO MUCH SYMPATHY.

Many a mother makes the mistake of sympathizing too much with her little one over the small accidents that keep happening. They magnify every little bump into a tragedy, with the result that the baby grows up prone to self-pity and to expect pity from others. Children have a strong sense of the dramatic. They love to find themselves the central figure, with mother, father, grandmother and the other children all admiring or bewailing. Unconsciously they will magnify an unimportant hurt in order to attract to themselves the attention they crave. To teach a child to laugh at disaster is one of the best lessons he can learn.—Selected.

A number of women of Havre, France, have formed themselves into a society of "good Samaritans," whose duty it is to lend manual assistance with spiritual counsel in homes where the mother is laid aside by illness. They propose to give no money, whatever the financial condition they may find in these homes, but simply to sweep, clean rooms, mend clothes, prepare meals, as may be needed, and at the same time to instruct such members of the family as may be able to receive instruction in principles of neatness, hygiene and domestic economy, exerting at the same time a distinctly religious influence. The editor of Le Christianisme suggests that such a "broom mission" might become an adjunct of every parish, and asks why it should not be one of the functions of the local Christian Endeavor Society.

WHEN SCHOOL IS OUT.

"When school is out, I shall go home," she said, "And all my heartache will be comforted."

"When school is out," she said, "once more I'll rest My tired head upon my mother's breast, And feel her tender cheek against it pressed, And there, at last, I shall find perfect rest."

"When school is out," she said, "I know I'll meet— Dancing for joy along the golden street— My little child, my babe so stainless sweet, Who went to heaven before his dimpled feet Had ever learned in earthly paths to go. Nor pressed the violets, nor trod the snow! Oh, I will clasp him close, and I shall know Those kisses that I taught him long ago!" "Life's weary lessons are all learned," she said, "And school is out." We bent—and she was dead. —British Weekly.

For Grandma.

Gone from the hearts that are bleeding,
Gone from the tears that are shed,
Gone to the quiet churchyard,
To sleep with the silent dead.

Then cease ye fond hearts your sighing
No longer let tears be shed,
The spirit we loved is in Heaven,
'Tis only the body that's dead.
Annita McMaster Honour.

Cure Catarrh at Home

A Practical Remedy so Simple and Pleasant that even a Child can Use it.

A neglected cold lays the foundation for catarrh; neglected catarrh lays the foundation for consumption. Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure will break up the cold, or cure the catarrh and prevent consumption.

The symptoms of catarrh are a discharge, which is either blown from the nose or runs back and drops into the throat; a dull headache; a stopped-up feeling in the nose and head; extreme liability to take cold, etc. These conditions often lead to noises in the head, deafness, sore throat, bronchitis, asthma, indigestion and consumption.

If you suffer from any of the above troubles you should begin the proper treatment at once.

Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure is the best remedy known to medical science for these diseases. It cures 95 out of every 100 cases.

SAMPLES MAILED FREE.

In order to demonstrate its virtues, a three days' trial treatment will be mailed absolutely free to any interested sufferer. The price of the remedy is $1.00 per box (one month's treatment), sent post-paid. Address, Dr. Blosser Company, 355 Walton St., Atlanta, Ga.

"I have to talk about women," said Mr. Dooley. "Do ye know anything about them?" "Nawthin'," said Mr. Hennessy. "I've been livin' with wan so long that she looks like me, but she's as much iv a gamble to me as she iver was. I know what she'll do. She'll do what I tell her to do if she plazes. But I can niver more than guess what she's thinkin' about.—Collier's Weekly.

The Three Loyal Comrades.

By Carmen Sylva.

(Translated by Anna Knight for The Outlook.)

Sorrow was a slender, beautiful child with a mass of rich black hair framing her pale face. Her delicate lips were usually pressed together, her dark eyes so appealing that no one could look into them without tears. The poor child had no home and wandered from place to place, now entering the cottages of the poor, now taking up her abode in the mansions of the rich. She was so quiet, so unassuming, that no one turned her aside; but, strange to say, to all who befriended her there came some deep affliction. One was bereft of his only child, another lost his rank, another was despoiled of house and land, another was unjustly persecuted by his enemies, still another was cruelly ill-treated by his family. The people marvelled why so much suffering should come to them, and knew not that they themselves had opened the door for pale, quiet Sorrow, and taken her to their hearts.

Sometimes the poor child revisited places where she had once been, and learned of all the misery that had followed in her footsteps. After that she avoided for a long time the homes that had suffered most. And yet she learned to love some families very dearly, and could not forbear returning to them. But grief upon grief would come to them until the poor, lonely child took up her wanderings again with sad eyes and a heavy heart. Quietly she went her way, without haste, without commotion, yet swifter than the mountain torrent, swifter than the west wind, and not one home escaped her. The greatest catastrophe befell when she mingled with the children, for then they were orphaned, or were stricken with an incurable malady, so that their little faces became as pale as that of Sorrow herself, and their and their eyes held the same pleading, pathetic look. When Sorrow saw this, she wept bitterly, and for a long time shunned the society of children, yea, even turned aside her head when she passed them in their play.

One morning, while resting under an apple-tree, she noticed what bright, rosy cheeks the apples had, and how it did the heart good just to look at them.

"Oh, dear Apple-Tree," cried Sorrow, "give me nice rosy cheeks like your apples, then all will love to behold me."

"Not so," answered the Apple-Tree. "Hadst thou bright, rosy cheeks thou wouldst no longer be so kindly welcomed and cared for."

Sorrow arose saddened, and went on her way. Soon she came to a brook rippling through a garden. From its banks burst forth a chorus of bird music, so gladsome that the heart laughed of itself to hear.

"Oh, dear little birds," cried Sorrow, "teach me your sweet songs, that I may gladden the hearts of all people!"

"No, no, dear child," chirped the birds, "for didst thou not come and go so quietly thou wouldst not be so soon forgotten, and all would know thee as Sorrow, the bearer of grief and woe."

So on and on went poor little Sorrow until she reached a great forest. The fragrance of the pine trees filled the air, and her weary feet sank softly in the thick moss that carpeted the ground. Here and there the golden sunbeams found their way through the whispering foliage, and, gleaming, danced on the green moss, turning the fallen leaves to gold. It was so quiet, so beautiful! Sorrow leaned wearily against a tree and whispered, "Here I may rest and bring no woe; here no one will grieve because of me." Just then a frolicsome sunbeam, more venturesome than the rest, slipped through the quivering foliage overhead, looked into the wonderful dark eyes, so sad, so lonely, and pierced straight to the very heart of Sorrow. The whole forest saw the wonderful glow that transfigured the delicate face of the maiden, and whispered and rustled with joy and admiration. But Sorrow knew not how beautiful she had become; she felt only the sunbeam pulsating warm in her heart.

"Oh, beloved forest," she cried, "from all your sunbeams give me a tiny one for my own; it would make me happy, so happy!"

But at her words a stillness as of death fell on the forest; sadly the trees looked at one another, not a leaf quivered; and the Sunbeam swiftly withdrew from Sorrow's heart, touched the back of a creeping wood-lizard at her feet, and tremblingly concealed himself behind a spreading fern on the edge of a pool.

"Poor, poor child!" at last said an old oak tree, "knowest thou not that one tiny sunbeam in thy heart would make thee so beautiful that all would run to welcome thee, and then they would suffer more than now—far beyond their endurance. Nay, my child, thou must ever be without light in thy eyes, without warmth in thy heart."

A tear fell from Sorrow's eyes on the wild flower at her feet. Fragrance filled the air as the flower gave thanks for the welcome dew.

Deeper into the forest went the lonely maid until she reached the shore of a wide, still lake. Here nothing stirred. Only Evening walked upon the water, always in shadow, but trailing rosy streaks of light. Now and then a star fell from above and rested bright and motionless on the quiet surface. Sorrow dipped her slender hand in the water and laid it on her brow. Evening came to her, and whispered softly:

"Good-night! Sleep sweetly; forget thy woe."

Long gazed she after him, and sighed:

"Once I found peace in the forest; once I forgot my woe when Sunbeam touched my heart; all that is past."

Lost in thought, she gazed dreamily over the lake. A cool wind arose and rippled the water; in the gathering mists danced the shadowy forms of the water-nymphs.

Presently Sorrow perceived a light reflected in the water, larger and redder than the stars, and glimmering through the night. She raised her eyes and saw that the light came from a small house on the shore of the lake. It was overgrown with ivy, and through a gable window which stood open streamed the beam of light.

"Strange!" thought Sorrow; "in that house have I never been, and yet some one keeps watch."

She crept up to the window. There sat a beautiful lady with snow-white hair, in soft white draperies, writing industriously, and with a firm hand, in a big book. Her brow was furrowed, but the sweet, mobile mouth showed noble womanliness and wide sympathy with mankind. While Sorrow gazed, lost in contemplation, she saw two wonderful gray eyes fixed on her, and a rich, melodious voice said:

"Come in child. I have waited long for thee."

Astonished, Sorrow obeyed; such a greeting she had never heard before; and then a pair of motherly arms gathered her up, she felt kisses on brow and cheek, and the wonderful voice said:

"Dear little Sorrow, it was decreed that thou shouldst find me; I could not seek thee, for I never come uncalled. I am Mother Patience, and here must I stay and listen and wait. The lake brings me every whisper of those that call on me. Sometimes I have caught thy voice faintly, but always lost thee again."

The furrow deepened in her brow Sorrow buried her head on the motherly breast and whispered:

"Oh, stay always with me!"

"My child, when thou callest I will answer; when thou art weary, come to me and rest a while. My task is to write in the Book of Life; I have much work to do."

All night Sorrow nestled in the arms of Mother Patience, and in the morning took up her wanderings again, strengthened and refreshed. The whole earth bloomed rich under the yellow morning sunshine, for it was harvest time. Sorrow looked over the corn fields dotted with bright blue flowers, and thought:

"Poor flowers! ye bloom so happily and look so joyously into the light, and yet by evening you will be cut down."

And then she looked further and saw a glorious maiden in the corn-field, all alone, cutting the grain with a mighty sweep of the scythe as with the strength of three men.

"Good morning, my pale little one," she called roguishly on seeing Sorrow; "come and help me," and as she spoke she danced up to Sorrow, her yellow braids flying and her blue eyes laughing in the morning sun. "Who art thou?" she cried, as she looked into Sorrow's sad, dark eyes.

I am Sorrow, and must ever wander. And who art thou, and why art thou so happy?"

I am Work, seest thou not? See how well and strong I am!" and lifting Sorrow in her arms as though she were a feather, she ran up and down the field, laughing and singing. A slight rosy flush touched Sorrow's cheek, and she said almost gayly:

Oh, dear, dear Work, come thou with me; thou art so strong. I must always wander, and I am often weary."

Nay, dear little Sister, that may not be," answered Work. For I must sleep at night that I may be ready for my task at daybreak. I am needed every where and always. It is my lot to be strong and merry, and were I always to look into thy sad eyes the laughter would die out of my heart. But when thou callest me, little Sister, I will come and remain after thee to brighten the hearts that thou strikest."

So out into the glowing morning light went Sorrow alone, on and on through the wide, wide world. But Patience and Work kept faith, and were ever her loyal comrades; and often all three would gather at evening in the little house by the lake, to read the tidings in the Book of Life and write a message there.

Good Intentions.

Our minister did not take any vacation this summer," said Brown, with a smile, as he began a conversation which the Detroit Free Press report.

Why not?" asked the other man.

Circumstances over which he had no control forced him to stay at home. He intended to go away and had made his arrangements, when several enthusiastic members of his congregation—my wife was among them, and the others were all women too—took the matter out of his hands and told his wife confidentially not to pinch and save for his outing, because the members of the church had hit up on the happy idea of raising a sum especially for his vacation.

As the minister has a large family, and his wife finds it hard to make both ends meet, she was only too glad to spend the vacation money in other ways.

Well, the women held several affairs, and managed to get something over $50 together. Then they decided to make the presentation a gala event, and give all the members of the church a chance to speed the parson on his way with good wishes.

It occurred to them that a little music would add to the occasion, and so they engaged some musicians. One member of the committee thought that if there was music, light refreshments would be in order, and she took it upon herself to see that they were provided. A third hit on the plan of having the church decorated for the occasion, and hired a man to do the work.

Early in the evening when they met to compare notes they discovered that their expenses had not only eaten up the amount they had raised for the minister, but left them a matter of two or three dollars in debt.

"Oh, yes, the evening was a pleasant one to some, but there wasn't any presentation. On the way home I asked my wife who as going to square the debt.

"Why, Joseph," she said, 'what a question. The minister, of course. It was all done in his interest.'"—Exchange.

Waking Francois.

The name of Millet, the painter, has been made familiar to many besides art students by his "Angelus." How the genius of the artist was roused and encouraged is told in his recent biography.

The most original person of the family and the one who had the most influence upon Millet was his grandmother. She was an old countrywoman of intense religious faith, living in God, seeing everything in God, and mingling God in every scene of nature and every act of life.

One of Millet's earliest recollections was of his grandmother waking him when he was quite a little child and saying to him:

"Up, my little Francois! If you only knew what a long time the birds have been singing the glory of God!"

When he had to leave home to go to Paris, his grandmother said, "I would rather see you dead than unfaithful to God's commands."

At a later time, when he had begun to make his way in Paris, she reminded him again:

"Remember, my Francois, that you were a Christian before you were a painter. Paint for eternity, and think that the trump, which will call to judgment, is on the eve of sounding." —The Lutheran.

Johnny's Stamp Act.

The old soiled stamp book had been "kicking around the house" for years from one resting place to another, until at last it had found ownership and a safe place among Johnny's treasures.

The strange bits of colored paper had a fascination for Johnny. They were pasted in straight lines up and down the page. The name of the country, the stamps of which had the page to themselves, was written in round, boyish writing, not by Johnny Kirtland, but by his uncle, Jim Caspar.

"Is the stamp book Uncle Jim's or mine?" That question would not "down" in Johnny's troubled soul.

At every annual housecleaning, when secretaries, bookcase and bureau drawers were ransacked in the Kirtland household, the cry had been:

"This old book is no good! What's the use of saving it? Toss it into the waste paper box."

Johnny had regularly interfered and saved it, until his sister Mabel said:

"Well, well take it clear out of sight and keep it if you want it."

So among arrow-heads, broken flutes, fishing-lines, boxes of discarded paints, bags of marbles, watches that would not go, and a host of things too numerous to mention, Uncle Jim's old stamp book had honorable place for two years, until at last the stamp-collecting craze reached Kimpton again. Then Johnny brought the book to light and studied it eagerly and often.

The more he studied it, the surer he become of its value, and the more distinctly did the crowned heads and helmeted faces seem to be requiring Johnny's answer to the question, "Do we belong to you or your Uncle Jim?"

"I'll give you my nickel case watch for that stamp on the page marked Greece," said Alec Norton, as the boys looked the book over. Alec pointed to a buff and brown stamp whereon a winged helmeted head was surmounted by a Greek inscription. I'll soak it off. The old stamp book is no good. Look at mine!"

Alec displayed a beautiful leather bound, gilt-edged book, where rows of neatly kept stamps added beauty to the tinted pages.

"I hardly like to cut it out if it is old," said Johnny, slowly. "And that's not all. No, I guess we'll not trade today."

"Well, remember, the nickel-case watch for the stamp of Greece, and 'most anything I have," Alec added eagerly, "for the Papal States stamp, the one with crossed keys. Johnny, you could sell the watch, and it would help out the bicycle fund."

Johnny groaned in spirit as he descended from the attic, and walked absently out to the gate with Alec. "Well, I'll think about it, Alec," said he, as they parted.

The result of the thinking was that he went to his mother with the troublesome question.

"Is that old stamp book mine, or is it Uncle Jim's? Because, if it is mine, I can do as I like with it, and if it isn't I suppose I can't touch it."

"Well, really, Johnny, that is a question that could be settled by asking uncle Jim right out about it. Let me see, it was left here ten years ago among his cast-off treasures when the ranch fever struck him."

"Yes, and the stuffed birds and his boys annuals, skates, guns and fishing rods, and the striped trousers," broke in Mabel. "They're all gone except that old stamp book, and Johnny saved that."

"Well," said the mother, "Uncle Jim has never written and asked about them. Johnny fell heir to the other things, but he wished to make possession of the stamp book with greater formality. Is that how the matter stands?"

"That's about it, ma," said Johnny, "but do you think he'd care? Where is Uncle Jim now? He never writes."

"He's somewhere in the West. I have his last address, but have heard nothing from him for five years. Uncle Jim is a strange fellow. What is the new craze, Johnny's stamps, eh?"

"It's Alec Norton's craze. He's been reading in the papers about stamp auction sales. He's sure I've got some valuable ones, and he'll trade or buy of anyone. If I could sell him some of those stamps I could get a bicycle sooner."

Johnny Kirtland wanted a bicycle so badly that the family called his desire "Johnny's bicycle fever." It raged so fiercely at times that he could not sleep nine or ten hours, as a growing boy should, without waking up once or twice. Every morning found him as full as ever of plans for procuring a "wheel."

As money was scarce in the household, Johnny could not hope for help from the family exchequer, and his fertile brain was weary of painfully planning ways and means.

Once when he was staying at Grandpa Gillet's farm the craving worried him so that he tried to make an "ordinary" for himself. Grandpa Gillet looked upon the work of Johnny's hands and said it was more than "ordinary."

"You ought to call it extra-ordinary, Johnny," said grandpa.

It was made up of one discarded corn-plow wheel, one small wagon wheel, and part of a cornstalk cutter wheel for a circle, but it was not successful as a bicycle. Grandpa kept and cherished Johnny's "ordinary," and chuckled over it long after Johnny left the farm.

The boy's plans for earning money for a machine seemed as futile as his plucky effort to make one, and he almost despaired of coming into possession, till Alec Norton's stamp craze seemed to give some prospect of success.

"Say, Johnny," said Alec, soon after his first vain attempt at purchase, "you don't suppose your Uncle Jim's old stamp book has one of the Scinde District stamps or a Mauritius one-penny for 1847, do you? If it has, your fortune is made," and Alec unrolled a newspaper cutting, with the startling statement

It Doesn't Take Long, if You Don't Wait Too Long.

Last year I was suffering from indigestion, and would have the feeling of a heavy load on my stomach all the time. I had a bad case of indigestion and got so I could hardly sleep at all. I was so nervous. My natural weight was 142 pounds and I got down to 118, and was so weak I could hardly get around.

I used Mrs. Joe Person's Remedy and three bottles cured me. I have regained the flesh I lost, sleep well and am cured of indigestion.

It is a good medicine, and taken in time dose not take long to cure.

that one Mauritius penny stamp was valued at one thousand dollars.

"One thousand dollars!" cried Johnny, staring.

"Yes, and in my Philatelic Journal a Scinde District stamp—half-anna—is all the rage now. Have you any East Indies at all?"

"Yes," said Johnny. "There are both East Indies and Mauritius stamps, East Indies, four annas, two and one anna, and two Mauritius—"

"Let me see them, will you?" and the boys again ascended the attic to Johnny's den.

"Ma," said Mabel, as she heard the two upstairs, "Johnny wants that book awfully, and if possession is nine points of the law, I do think the book is really his. He has saved it from destruction a dozen times to my knowledge. I'd give it to him in a minute if it was mine. What shall you advise him to do?"

"I shall not advise him to do anything," said Mrs. Kirtland, quietly. "I am watching Johnny as I never did before. It's going to be pretty hard, but Johnny Kirtland's got the grip, Mabel, and—"

"What?" said Mabel. "The grip?"

"The honor grip. Have you forgotten?"

"But where ye feel yer honor grip, Let that aye be your border."

"Johnny's come to the border and has the grip, God bless him!" and Mrs. Kirtland bustled out into the kitchen to make some of Johnny's favorite tea cakes, she hardly knew why.

"You'll stay to tea, Alec, won't you?" she said, as the two boys descended. "Here are some of Johnny's favorite cakes. He'll eat more if he has company."

And Mrs. Kirtland beamed in true motherly fashion on the two boys, for Alec Norton was motherless, and although he was rich 'Squire Norton's son, Mrs. Kirtland often caught herself asking "that poor Alec Norton" to supper. No one took a heartier interest in his boyish fads than Johnny's mother.

"Alec's as smart as a whip, but easily influenced for good or bad, and he needs mothering," Mrs. Kirtland said to Mabel.

"Both boys ate heartily, and Alec talked stamps that evening to his heart's content. At nine o'clock he started for home, and Johnny went to sleep and dream. But his dreams were more confused and fantastic than ever. First he was tearing down Kimpton's streets on a new bicycle that he could not guide, because that head of Greece, coldly stern, was perched on the handle-bar, and the winged helmet caused uncontrollable swiftness in the wheel. On they sped. Kimpton lay far behind, darkness and horror shrouded him like a mantle, but through it all the helmeted head was plainly visible. A rushing sound of water falling, foaming, roaring, a cold wave of air, and Johnny awoke with a start.

"Well, I declare!" was his sleepy exclamation, as he turned over on the pillow. "What a horrid dream!"

The next one was no better. This time, as he was examining a new "ordinary" and preparing to mount, down from somewhere came the Emperor of France. Johnny knew him at once by his pointed goatee, but he looked strange with a pope's mitre on his head.

After talking calmly with George Washington, he proceeded to lock the wheels of Johnny's bicycle with the two huge papal keys Johnny so well remembered. Then Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin appeared and, bowing to Johnny, carried the bicycle away.

The dreams got worse and worse. Johnny found himself out at sea, seated firmly on his beloved bicycle, but it was attached to a blue ship that looked strangely familiar to Johnny, and he read New Brunswick painted in staring white on her sides. When, fearfully grasping the handle-bar, he dared to look up, all the deck was crowded with Victorias—red, yellow, green, black—all with huge crowns and big earrings. Faster and faster the schooner towed him out to sea, and the crowned heads seemed regardless of his misery.

"Such dreams!" he groaned, turning over again. No wonder that daylight found Johnny more willing to rise than he remembered ever having been before, except on the Fourth of July. At breakfast he astonished Mabel by cheerfully asking his mother for Uncle Jim's address.

"I can ask him and tell him just why I want it," he said, briskly "I'll tell Alec today, and write to night," he added.

So this letter was written:

Dear Uncle Jim. Do you want your old stamp book, because if you don't, I do, very badly. Of all the things you left here years ago when I was a kid, all are gone but this book. My mother cut up the striped trousers for me years ago, and the moths and worms finished the birds. But I've saved the stamp book. I want a bicycle, and there is a boy that reads the papers and knows lots that says I could sell some of the stamps. But I don't want to till you say I may. We are all well. Write soon to yours truly,

John J. Kirtland.

Mrs. Kirtland nodded approvingly as Johnny pushed the letter across the table for her inspection.

"Better write on the envelope, 'If not called for in ten days return to John Kirtland, Kimpton,'" she said.

"All right, ma," said Johnny, and he mailed the letter with a lighter heart than he had carried for many a day.

A week later a very strange missive came to Kimpton postoffice. It was a square folded sheet of brown paper tied with a bit of string and addressed to John J. Kirtland. Johnny cut the string eagerly, unfolded the paper, and read with eyes that seemed not to see, but to transfer in hot lines to his brain:

Dear Nephew. I write in haste. Glad to hear from you. Send the book at once by registered package. I have walked twelve miles and borrowed the stamp to mail this letter. Send the book at once. Will write again.

Your affectionate Uncle Jim.

Johnny laid the letter down and crept quietly up to his den in the attic. Mabel watched him turn slowly away; then she snatched up the letter and read it aloud.

"Well, mother," she said, indignantly, "I wouldn't have thought it of Uncle Jim. He's just as mean as he can be!"

I don't see what he could want with that old book. I am just going right up to comfort Johnny."

"No, Mabel," said her mother, "let Johnny be. I'll go—after a while.

And go she did, to find Johnny crouched on the attic floor, with both arms on the old, flat trunk, and a blank, miserable face resting bowed upon them.

"Johnny," she said, quietly, as she seated herself on the old trunk and drew the boy's head and shoulders into her lap, "there is something you have gained this week—a greater, grander, better thing than all the bicycles in the world; yes, of more value than a whole bookful of Mauritius stamps at a thousand dollars apiece. Does my boy know what it is?"

"No," he whispered, with such a hopeless tone that Mrs. Kirtland felt all his pent-up disappointment.

"Bring me your Bible, dear, and let me show you." She turned to a marked passage, and Johnny read slowly as she pointed:

"Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the house of my God; and he shall go no more out," and pointing still farther, "'And I will write upon him my new name.'"

"Johnny, did you think you were overcoming this week, overcoming a desire to keep what you did not feel belonged rightfully to you? You could have sold the book, but you never would have been quite satisfied. Now it will go tomorrow, and leave an honest-hearted boy behind. Johnny, dear, when pillars are used for king's palaces, or God's workmanship, they are hewn and polished until God and man can see their beauty and service. The hewing process is necessary. And then there is this best of all—the new name. I am so glad to know my boy has earned that."

Johnny Kirtland whistled as he returned from mailing the book—whistled so cheerfully that Alec Norton asked at once as he joined him on the street:

"Heard from your Uncle Jim?"

"Yes," said Johnny, "he wants the book, and I started it today. No trade in stamps now."

"Well, weren't you silly to tell him!

And the bicycle fund—the bottom's knocked out of that again, I suppose. You told him they were valuable, eh? Why didn't you run them down or call them trash?"

"Because I—I couldn't," said Johnny, soberly.

A few weeks later Johnny showed Alec a letter that his Uncle Jim had written from Five Forks Rauch, Nebraska:

My Dear Nephew. God bless you, Johnny Kirtland for what you have done for us—my wife Annie, baby Cora and myself. We were at our worst, proximity, half starving out here on the ranch, doing without almost all our necessities, living on a little meal mush and just what few rabbits I could trap—no money to get away with, and on the point of throwing up one of the best claims ever trod on, because I couldn't find money enough to prove upon and settle.

When your letter came I remembered instantly what that stamp book contained, and started off on foot to my nearest post-office. On the strength of my book I borrowed from the banker there, who is a stamp collector, enough to stave off my worst creditors until I got my hands on those stamps again.

Johnny, you were right when you thought they were valuable. The sale of the book has given me back life, land, hope, happiness. Five Forks Ranch is mine forever now. As soon as I get fairly settled, I shall pay you a flying visit. Now, Johnny, which shall it be, a pair of Texas ponies, or a bicycle or both? Annie says both, and adds, "For Jim, you had clear forgotten all about the book until Johnny wrote you of it, and kept it for you." So give my love to your mother and Mabel, and kindly remember me to that "boy who knows lots and reads the papers." As for you, I can only close as I began—God bless you from the crown of your honest head to the soles of your feet.

Your grateful

Uncle Jim.

Alec Norton gasped. "Well, I declare! Say, Johnny, if I were you and couldn't have both, I would choose the ponies." —Youth's Companion.

Two Bits of Fun.

By May E. Q. Brush.

'Manda was perched up on the stone wall, a piece of Johnny-cake in one hand and a raw turnip in the other.

The yellow leaves of the big elm tree came fluttering down around her. There was a sweet smell of ripened grapes from the wild vine near her. The air was warm and mellow and full of September haze. It was very still, only now and then one heard ripples of laughter and the sharp click of balls and mallets.

"Do you see 'em?" said 'Manda's twin sister, 'Melia, reaching up so that her freckled forehead was on a level with the stone wall. Poor 'Melia couldn't climb up because she had a stone bruise on her foot, and it hurt her to put her toe in the crevices of the wall.

"Yes," replied 'Manda, peering through the yellow leaves, "'Lizabeth Edwards has got a croquet party. Mor'n a dozen there! The girls have got on white dresses, and the boys have velvet jackets and ruffles on their shirtwaists." "I don't see why she didn't invite us!" said 'Melia, pettishly.

"'Cause we're poor and our mother takes in washing and our best dresses are only gingham," soberly.

"We can play croquet real well, though! My, don't I wish we had a set?"

'Manda took another bite of her turnip, crunched it between her even white teeth, and then said, earnestly, as she scrambled down from the wall.

"I say, 'Melia! Let's make one."

"How?"

CURED TO STAY CURED.

Mrs. S. T. Roberts, Clinton, La., sent a postal card request for a trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine to Drake Formula Company, Drake Block, Chicago, Ill., and received it promptly by return mail without expense to her. Mrs. Roberts writes that the trial bottle of this wonderful Palmetto Medicine proved quite sufficient to completely cure her. She says: "One trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine has cured me after months of intense suffering. My trouble was inflammation of B'adder and serious condition of Urinary organs. Drake's Palmetto Wine gave me quick and entire relief and I have had no trouble since using the one trial bottle."

Drake's Palmetto Wine cures every such case to stay cured. It is a true unfailing specific for Liver, Kidney, Bladder and Prostate Troubles caused by Inflammation, Congestion or Catarrh. When there is Constipation, Drake's Palmetto Wine produces a gentle and natural action of the bowels and cures Constipation immediately, to stay cured. One small dose a day does all this splendid work and any reader of Presbyterian Standard may prove it by writing to Drake Formula Company, Drake Block, Lake and Dearborn Streets, Chicago, Ill., for a trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine. It is free, and cures. A letter or postal card is your only expense.

"Oh, you'll see!"

And pretty soon slower-witted 'Melia "saw."

Stout, yellow willow stems, with leaves stripped off, were bent hoop-like for the arches; for mallets 'Manda begged two large spools from mother, and long sticks made handles for them. Two sticks with stripes of red, green, blue, black, orange, purple and white wound around them served nicely for stakes; while as for balls, what was better than the little hard apples, the windfalls dropped on the orchard grass? Manda took a red Spitzenburg and Melia a bright Rhode Island greening. And whenever the "balls were smashed with lusty blows," it was easy enough to get more.

Such a jolly game they had! It was so funny that the girls never quarreled a bit—and I'm afraid I can't say that of the young folks over in Judge Edwards yard.

"I'll tell you what, mother, said Manda, as she went into the house for a new spool, "home-made games are the nicest after all. One has two bits of fun with them! The first is making them and the second is playing with them.—Youth's Companion.

Our Little Folks.

Children's Letters.

Teachers, N. C., Oct. 23, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little boy nine years old. Mother takes your paper. I go to school to Prof. Tom Sloan. We have a pretty Shepherd dog named "Ben." We have had him so long we would not know how to do without him. I have to milk the cow before I go to school. I want a cow that gives nothing but butter. I go to the Presbyterian Sunday school. I want you to be sure and print this letter because I want to surprise father and grandmother.

I have two brothers and two sisters. I must close because you might think it too long and put it in the waste basket.

Your little friend,
Wyatt Fennell Dobson.

Little Seth.

By Mrs. Annie Hamilton Donnell.

"'Wanted a Bisiccle that go jee'—how d' you spell whiz, mother?"

"Whiz Why, Sethie, what in the world! Whiz?—why, I suppose you stell it w-h-i-z."

"W-H-I-Z," spelled the boy, painfully, in the big, uncertain printing of a child. He read over what he had printed: "Wanted a Bisiccle that go jee WHIZ," then with spluttering pen he added, "The Sooner The better, yours Truly seth Morris."

Mrs. Morris went round behind his chair. She rested her thin, work-worn hand very lovingly on the rough brown head while she read the contorted little notice. Its absurdity, oddly enough, brought tears to her eyes and a quiver into her firm chin. But when she spoke it was cheerily.

"Why, how nice you've wrote it, Sethie! You're improvin' yours's right along. An' that capital B is a real beauty!"

On the table was spread out a newspaper, and Seth Morris's big forefinger still rested on the "Wanted" column in it. He looked up into the face above him with open anxiety.

"Does it sound good, mother?" he queried, wistfully. "I thought I'd put in the 'yours truly' to make it politer—it didn't sound right without. And I put my name in so's they'd know where to send it."

"Yes, I know, Sethie," the mother said, hurriedly. "Now you ruu build me a fire for supper—a big one, for I'm goin' to cook you some beefsteak. You think o' that!"

How tall and strong the boy was when he got to his feet! Yet—the pity of it!—how childish the face that topped the big, little frame! The secret of the ridiculous little advertisement on the table was plain enough now. Just one of Sethie's "notions;" he had so many and forgot them all so easily.

"He'll forget it by tomorrow morning, sure," the mother sighed, gently, "'an' I hate so to make him feel bad, poor dear! Let him advertise, if he's a mind to, it won't do any harm as long's nobody ain't ever likely to know it!" But Seth's mother had no idea how deeply rooted was the boy's longing for a wheel. She could not know that the advertisement was the result of many a long and sleepless hour in the night. He had worded it over and over with slow patience—there were so many things to think about you see. You had to pay 'em for putting it in the paper, Dickie Trafton said—and Dickie always knew. So you musn't say but a few words—when you wanted to say such a lot!

"But somebody'll understand," the boy had reasoned in his blundering, wistful way; "somebody'll know how I want a bisiccle, an' he'll send me one—O, I guess he will!"

Now as he built the fire for his mother he was dwelling still on the same absorbing topic—still trusting "somebody." The child's mind in his tall, shapely body was full of artless faith in humanity.

Across the street the city high school stood, in its pretty environment of lawn and shrubbery. Seth looked at it often with reverent awe, so much it symbolized to him what was wonderful and beautiful—and unattainable. But of late the row of tilted wheels along the fence and leaning against the trees and steps had engrossed most of his worship. They were so sleek and splendid and shiny in the sun. They would carry you along "jee whiz!"

He watched eagerly every day to see the released boys burst, shouting, out of the great doors, single out their own machines, vault into the saddles, and away. He could almost feel the whirl of the wind in his face, as if he, too, were spinning out into the splendid, free distances.

Once Seth had crossed over and touched with his gentle, stroking finger one of the shining wheels. He had felt of the polished nickel and prodded the rubber tires softly. His courage had even carried him to the cautious un-tilting of it, but he had hastily put it back and hurried home, left he be tempted to mount it. For never for an instant did Sethie doubt that he could ride away on one of those beautiful wheels, if the chance ever came to him. There were never any tumbles or accidents in his dreams.

The supper fire snapping cheerily, he went out on the side-walk to wait for his supper. A few high school boys, unusually belated, were just starting away on their wheels. Vance Fassett, as usual, was the center of the group. He caught sight of Seth at once.

"Say, boys, watch me!" he cried; "I'm going to scoot across and scare Little Seth out of his wits—what he's got of em. You watch out!"

He rode down to the corner, crossed the street, and, gliding noiselessly up behind unconscious Seth, rang his bell and shot by him. With the startled cry of a frightened child Seth jumped aside. Before he could recover himself Vance was behind him again repeating the thoughtless joke. This time Seth ran hurriedly home. A bit of white paper dropped from his hand as he ran, and Vance stooped and swooped it up in his onward rush. It was the poor little advertisement for a "Bisiccle." Unconsciously Vance's sharp eyes took in the pitiful import of the lumbering lines. He read them then, again and again. Sudden shame for his prank overwhelmed him.

So the poor chap wanted a bicycle. And as much as that? The "socner the beter!" Little Seth was getting ambitious, wasn't he? Next he'd be advertising for the world! Vance went back to the boys again, but he winced when they applauded him for scaring Little Seth. He had lost the zest of it.

"Let up, will you?" he said. "I guess you'd have been scared yourself. Come now, let's cut for home."

Late that evening Vance Fassett had Seth's little advertisement still in his mind. It haunted him like the pleading, coaxing of a little child. He could not forget it. He wished he hadn't read it; he wished his evil genius hadn't put it into his mind to go scaring poor half-wits, anyway.

Vance was sixteen, tall and fearless, and good to look at. The only child of old Squire Fassett, he had been as nearly spoiled as his healthy nature would allow. Every luxury a boy could covet was his for the wishing. The newest thing in bicycle lamps, that was to be the winner's-prize in the race that was soon to come off at the fair grounds, Vance might have owned long ago, but he chose to win it in fair contest. That would be worth while! And why shouldn't he go in and win it? Wasn't he the swiftest scorcher among the boys? And wasn't his wheel the best one in the lot? Did it lack any device to make it fly? Did it lack anything in the world but the beautiful silver lamp he meant to give it after the race? Vance had set his whole boy's heart on that victory.

A few days after the scaring episode Vance ran across Little Seth at a street corner. With a sudden impulse he sprang from his wheel and called out to him cheerily.

"Say, want to try her? She's a regular stunner! Get on, I'll steady you."

For one breathless, unbelieving instant Sethie hesitated. Then he leaped into the saddle and, to the other boy's astonishment, rode bravely down the block. Only at first did the machine waver unsteadily; halfway to the next corner it was gliding along with confident aim.

"Good for you! Hurrah!" cheered Vance, lustily. "Where'd you learn to ride like that, anyway?"

"I never but I always knew I could do it—I always knew." Seth's face was excited and radiant. "All you gotter do is hang on an' go jee whiz. O, it's easy enough when you get a chance!"

That was the beginning of a good many such rides for the boy, for Vance made a generous resolve. He would leave his wheel at Seth's instead of at the high school fence during school hours, and Little Seth should be welcome to ride it as much as he liked during school hours.

It was such a grand arrangement! Little Seth's eyes shone at the mention of it. Such good fortune for him, Sethie Morris—how could he believe it, that he was to be permitted to mount this beautiful steed at will and glide away with the gentle thrum of the wind's fingers on his cheeks?

But it came true. Day after day Little Seth rode the wheel about the streets, getting constantly more expert. His mother watched him with admiring eyes. Poor Sethie, he looked straight and fine, and like other mother's boys, then. The eager, childish triumph in his face, distance-softened, hurt her less keenly, and she could watch him and wave her hand to him as other mothers waved their hands to other boys, almost forgettingly—and how Sethie waved back! The boy was supremely happy on the beautiful wheel. He grew to feel a sense of intimate comradeship with it, and got into the way of talking to it on his splendid spins. The people he met nodded significantly—the kindest ones pityingly.

The time for the race was drawing very near. In the downtown window of a jeweler's shop the dainty prize—the silver lamp—was on exhibition. Vance lingered often before it. By a little sleight of imagination it was so easy to see it on his wheel! One day he took Little Seth down to see it and explained its working and the way it was fastened to the wheel.

"To my wheel," he laughed. "You wait and see, Sethie!"—The Christian Advocate.

Pearls.

One day last summer a lady, with her two small daughters, sat on a park bench, in a secluded place, eating a dainty lunch. Just as they were finishing their repast they noticed two barefooted children strolling slowly along. The latter looked tired and hungry. They were both boys, the elder one about ten, the younger about seven. Their grimy faces were pallid and pinched, and the younger one limped.

"Come, my dears," said the lady on the bench to her daughters, "it is time to move on. Leave the lunch box on the bench; we'll not want it again."

The barefooted boys heard what the lady said and, looking at each other, smiled.

"Mebbe there's something in it, Sammy," whispered the older boy.

"Oh! Oh!" with joyous expectancy; "mebbe there is."

Before the lady and children were out of sight the boys had taken possession of the seat and lunch box. In the latter they found a small chicken sandwich and a patty-pan sponge cake.

"Take your choice, Sammy," said the older boy, cheerfully.

"That's what you allus say when there's anythin' ter divide. Now, yer choose this time, Milly."

"No, siree," from Billy. "You'se de littlest, and you'se goin' ter choose. W'ch is it, Sammy, chicken sandwich er sponge cake?"

It was hard to choose, but Sammy, being very hungry, wasted no time.

"I'll take de sandwich; I just love chicken sandwiches," wistfully.

The sandwich disappeared in a twinkling, but the patty-pan cake remained undisturbed.

"Why don't yer eat your cake?" demanded Sammy, wonderingly.

Billy laughed as gleefully as if he had just finished a good square meal.

"Dat's yer second cou'se," he said, "yer wants to be stylish we'en yer eating in de park."

"I won't hev no second cou'se," declared Sammy. "I've had my choice, and I've eaten it; the cake's yours, and you've got ter eat it."

"S'posin' I don't want de cake," said Billy.

"But yer do."

"No, I don't, and dat's a fact," Billy said, emphatically.

"Truly and bluely?" questioned Sammy.

"Truly and bluely," was the answer.

Consequently Sammy ate the cake as eagerly and hungrily as he had eaten the sandwich.

The lady and little girls having again seated themselves, this time in the shade of some shrubbery, had overheard every word of the conversation.

"That boy, Billy, is a hero," the lady whispered, softly, her eyes becoming misty. "Now, children, wait here quietly while I leave you a few minutes. If those little fellows should start to leave, detain them until I come."

"What are you going to do, mamma?" they asked together.

"Hush!" she said. "Wait and see."

She went off hastily, returning again in a little while, with a smile on her face.

"Where have you been, mamma?" questioned one of the girls.

"What makes you smile so?" asked the other.

"Look," said she, "and then you can guess."

What they saw was a colored waiter from the dairy kitchen in the grove. He was just handing a tray to Billy.

"Wid de compliments of a friend," he said, showing his white teeth in a broad grin.

"Taint for us, was Billy's answer. "Its some mistake."

But although he declined the tray, he looked at it longingly.

"Is yo' name Billy?"

"Yes, sir."

"And," nodding his head toward the small boy, "Is he Sammy?"

"Yes, sir."

"It's fo' you, I knew it."

Now, when you're through eatin' bring de tray and dishes to the dairy kitchen in the grove. You know where that is, don't you?"

"Yes, sir."

"All right." And he hurried off.

The boys looked at each other and laughed. It was a mystery to them, but a beautiful one. The food was abundant now—no need for the big-hearted Billy to go without, and the tears rushed to the watching lady's eyes as she noticed the eagerness with which he grabbed a biscuit and ate it. There were two glasses of cool, creamy milk. Sammy was already drinking from one. There was a plate of ham sandwiches and buttered biscuit, a smaller one of sponge cake squares, and molasses cookies, and still another one of cold, sliced chicken.

Besides, there were two oranges. After Billy had eaten one biscuit, he said: "Let's divide the things into four parts."

"What fer?"

"Why, there's mommie and Sallie, you know. "Won't mommie be glad? Won't Sallie?" chuckling with delight.

Then, counting the biscuit he had already eaten as part of his share, he carefully packed "mommie's and Sallie's shares" in the lunch-box on the seat. Putting an orange in Sammy's hand, he slipped the other in the box. Sammy saw him and called out:

"That's your orange, Billy."

"I don't want no orange," said Billy.

"This is for mommie and Sallie, half and half."

His face shown with delight; this was a red-letter day for him.

Sammy shoved his orange along the seat slowly.

"Put this in the box, too, Billy, an' then mommie and Sallie can each hev one," he said.

"No, siree," Billy cried out; "none o' that. You're little and lame, and you haven't had an orange since—oh, I can't remember when."

"An' I'm not goin' ter hev any now," asserted Sammy.

"You jess love oranges, Sammy," declared Billy.

"So do you."

"I'm bigger than you."

"I'm goin' to save my orange for Sallie an' yours is for mommie," said Sammy; and he did.

"Oh, the poor little fellow!" exclaimed the lady.

"He's a hero, hoo, isn't he, mamma?" said one of the girls.

"Indeed, he is."

After the lunch box was packed and tied up with a cord the repast began in earnest, and was enjoyed to the full. The boys ate like the starved creatures they were, talking meanwhile with their moutns full, about how good everything was and what a wonderful "friend" that was who had remembered them "wid sech a load of good things."

"I guess it's God," was Billy's conclusion, looking up through the branches of the trees to the blue sky, as if to solve the delightful problem.

"He must care a lot for us," said Sammy, joyously.

"He does," and over Billy's plain face there came a radiance that was lovely to see.

"Come, children," said the lady, rising, "let us pass on. We have learned our lesson. Those little fellows belong to the slums, but they are pearls.—Ernest Gilmore, in Christian Work and Evangelist.

in creation. On the map, Laysan, o Moller Island, will be found among a number of small isles, rocks, and reefs that stretch away in a southwesterly direction from the Sandwich group.—Nekcer, France Frigate Shoals, Gardner, Maio Reef, and Lisiansky.

Laysan is three miles in length, and two and a half miles in breadth. It is sprinkled with vegetation in the form of strong, bushy grass, and some low shrubs, between which a few pigmy palms struggle for existence. A long lagoon stretches across, filled with remarkably salt water—no fresh water exists on the island, a curious fact, considering the number of land birds that make it their nesting-place. And everywhere there are birds—thousands upon thousands of albatrosses, white and brown, in great distinct colonies; great rookeries of terns, and petrels, and frigate birds; countless rail run everywhere in the long grass; bright red tropical honey birds, bright yellow finches flutter in the shrubs; curlews scream; ducks quack; crane chirp all the day.

Bird-lovers, hearing of these wonders had cast longing eyes on the little mid-Pacific Laysan long before the Hon. Walter Rothschild—most ardent of naturalists—sent his collector, William Palmer, on a voyage of scientific exploration in these regions. The fame of Laysan had spread abroad from various sources—notably from an interesting general description given by the great German ornithologist, Herr Von Kittlitz, who visited the island in 1834. But it remained for Mr. Rothschild's emissary to make a complete survey of Laysan's feathered world. When Palmer reached Laysan—sailing from Honolulu by way of Bird Island, or Niihau, and visiting the rocky islets to Laysan's north—he was astounded, bewildered—the place was alive with birds. His foot sank in birds' burrows at every step. He had been told that rail were "tolerably plentiful"—wherever he walked these little creatures hurried out of his way.

The albatrosses on Laysan are absolutely fearless. They take not the slightest notice of the raiders who come to despoil them of their eggs, and all the other birds are as tame as pet canaries, with the exception of the curlews and ducks—these alone cannot be caught in a hand-net.—Pearsons.

If you don't want to grow old prematurely, if you would keep the teeth in your mouth, the lustre in your eyes; if you would give a wide berth to Bright's Disease, which is making so many bite the dust; then don't wait, but give your system a thorough course of treatment with Dr. King's Liver and Kidney Remedy in time. First bottle will set you straight, but take two or three (according to case) and keep straight. You can't take chances on Kidney Troubles.

DR. KING'S KIDNEY AND LIVER REMEDY

Is compounded of Buchu, Mandrake, Uva Ursi, Cubebs, and Pure Holland Gin. This is the best remedy now in use for all diseases of the Kidneys and Liver. Being entirely vegetable, it surpasses all other remedies. $1.00 per bottle; three bottles, $2.50.

A Wise Woman.

I once knew a jolly maiden lady of uncertain age, and no idler was she in the world's vineyards, but a sturdy supporter of herself and her widowed mother and family of younger children. This feminine family pillar was wont to give a certain reply when the ancient question, "Why do you not marry?" was put to her by elderly busy bodies. There are always people obtuse and stupid enough to propound this silly conundrum. The answer of my heroine invariably was, "I am determined not to marry until I can support a husband in the style to which he has been accustomed."—August Woman's Home Companion.

One very cold day last winter a richly dressed woman paused in her morning walk along a Philadelphia street and gazed sternly at an ice wagon that was drawn up beside the curb. She stood there for some time. Apparently a reporter for "The Press" stood also, and watched and listened, moved of course not by curiosity, but by a sentiment of duty, and of obligation to let the people of the city know what was going on. At all events, he reports that the iceman came out of one of the houses, and she said: "Driver, why don't you blanket your horses?" "Because, lady, the company don't furnish me no blankets," returned the driver. "Then you should cover them with your coat!" said the woman, severely. "All right, ma'am," replied the driver, with a smile. 'Y'ou gimme your sealskin coat for the nigh hoss, and I'll put my overcoat on the off one.'—Youth's Companion.

Once upon a time Professor Wilson, of Edinburgh, wrote on the blackboard in his laboratory: "Professor Wilson informs his students that he has this day been appointed honorary physician to the Queen." In the course of the morning he had occasion to leave the room, and found on his return that a student had added to the announcement the words: "God save the Queen."

Strawberry Cream—Mix half a cup of sugar, a cup of strawberry pulp, a pint of double cream. Beat with a Dover egg-beater until solid to the bottom of the bowl, or use a "whip churn," and take off the froth as it rises. Serve, thoroughly chilled, in glasses or in meringue shells.

College Ices—Serve a plain vanilla cream ice in frappe cups with cold fruit, coffee or chocolate syrup poured over.

Strawberry syrup for Ice Cream—Boil three-fourths of a cup of sugar and a half a cup of water ten minutes. Let cool and add to a cup of fresh strawberry juice and pulp. To prepare the berries crush part of a basket of berries and press them through a fine sieve.

Strawberries a la Louis Sherry—For each quart of strawberries take the juice of one lemon and about a cup of powdered sugar. Mix thoroughly. Let stand about ten minutes and serve.

Currant and Raspberry Sherbet—Boil a quart of water and a pint of sugar twenty minutes. Add a teaspoonful of gelatine, softened in cold water, and strain. When cold add a cup and a half of currant juice and half a cup of red raspberry juice, and freeze as usual.

THE BETHABARA CHURCH.

ONE HUNDRED and fifty years ago (November 17, 1753,) twelve men arrived in North Carolina, having journeyed from Pennsylvania, to take possession of a tract of land purchased by the Moravian Church from Lord Granville at ten cents per acre. Among the twelve were representatives of the "indispensable trades," and from the first the village was independent. The next year two families from Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, joined them, and the colony was cheered by women and children. A church was built of logs, but in 1785 the present building was erected of rocks and boulders set into a wall two feet thick, which served as church and school and fort. Later an annex was joined to the main building as a rectory, and the walls were plastered.

The Moravians now living in Forsyth county, remembering the faith and courage of those earlier days, have outlined a series of services, beginning November 13, when a granite monument to the twelve pioneers will be unveiled at Bethabara. On Friday, the 14, the Wachovia Historical Society will hold its annual meeting. On Saturday a service will be held at the Salem Home Church and the archives will be opened.

In the same church a memorial sermon will be preached on Sunday. For the actual anniversary day no single gathering is planned. Throughout the Southern Province the pastors will gather their congregations at three o'clock to hold a quiet hour of prayer, so that there may ascend to heaven a thanksgiving for mercies of the past and a prayer for the future.

Event and Comment.

The new life that has been infused into our Sunday-schools in the last year is evident from the fact that there are now 662 Sunday-school scholars to every thousand communicants, instead of 648, as was the case last year.

Some Jews in Chicago who wanted a Hungarian preacher and wanted a trial sermon from him first, sent him a phonograph and then passed judgment upon him from the phonographic report. That is a good idea and would put our ministerial Apollos on a level with the man who has only brains.

A good deal has been made lately of a decent daily in London that has made a good thing out of its exclusion of liquor advertisements and other disreputable stuff from its pages. We know of at least one daily that does that in America, and we refrain from mentioning its name only for fear that this might be considered an advertisement.

A writer in the Cumberland Presbyterian objects to the trend toward Calvinism that he observes in his own people, and says: "There seem to be some of our writers who are very much inclined to place regeneration before faith. That way of putting it neither corresponds with my experience of the subject, not with my understanding of the teaching of the Bible." There isn't any "semi-Calvinism" about that. If we may be pardoned the quotation from Ian McLaren, it is "fair stinking with Arminianism."

We are glad to note the praise that has been won by Dr. Ira Landrith, of the Cumberland Presbyterian, in the fight for a decent city government in Nashville. As chairman of the Committee of One Hundred, a committee of the best citizens of the city, a reign of terror to evil-doers has been established. A reform ticket has just been elected, and Mayor Williams and City Judge Baker are now in a position to finish the good work that has begun in driving the gambling dens and the gamblers out of the city and forcing the saloons to obey the law. Of course, as long as the saloons remain they will be the fomenters of rebellion against good order and decency. But it is something to shut them up on Sunday.

There met last week in Washington an important conference in which the Southern Presbyterian Church plays a conspicuous part through its honored missionary to the Congo, Dr. W. M. Morrison. It is said that that old reprobate, King Leopold, of Belgium, the absolute ruler of the Congo Free State, made a sort of bargain with the Baptist Missionary Society in London, that if they would not tell what he was doing on the Congo, in the way of promoting the slave trade, they could have special privileges. Dr. Morrison, for the sake of the Southern Presbyterian Mission, kept quiet about the atrocities and iniquities of the government until he could do so no longer. And he has succeeded in calling the attention of the civilized world to the conditions there. We do not know whether, in the interview with the State authorities in Washington, Dr. Morrison went beyond the bounds of "humble remonstrance and petition," but there is no doubt that this was one of the "cases extraordinary."

Several marked copies of the Christian Observer of week before last have come to us, and the contention is with the Presbyterian Banner that the Observer is the oldest religious paper. The Observer now claims that the gap between the Religious Remembrancer and the Philadelphian was filled by a paper which was the successor of the Remembrancer. Maybe so. If upon investigation we find this claim to be true we shall acknowledge our contemporary's claim, even if it does not recognize our own succession through Dr. John Holt Rice and Dr. William Brown. Characteristically the Observer omits to mention the clear refutation of the claim that the Religious Remembrancer was the first religious newspaper ever published. But then the age of miracles has passed.

Dr. D. J. Sanders is writing in the Interior against the threatened "color line" as it is thought that it will be drawn in the Northern Church. Dr. Sanders virtually admits the existence of separate Presbyteries and Synods now but thinks that to have a white Presbytery and a colored one in the same territory would be worse than giving up that territory to the Southern Church. The Southern Church would have no objection to the prevalence of that view. Incidentally Dr. Sanders pays his respects to the Colored Cumberland Church, as an argument against separation and says that while they have grown numerically to 65,000 their "ministry is comparatively more ignorant than any body of negro ministers in the country." But perhaps it was not their separation from the Cumberland Church, but their determination to practice the oldest distinctive principle of their white mother that brought them to that estate.

A friend who is not a minister and is moreover very far from being stingy, but who holds to the view that the Standard has vigorously objected to, with regard to the Church and her soldiers, thinks that the language was too sweeping as to the origin of that view—namely, that it was born of Pharisaism and stinginess. We did not mean to say that all who held that view were either Pharisees or stingy, though we regard Pharisaism as one of the most insidious of sins, and we know it is easy to encourage non-giving. We know some ministers who take special pains to show their separateness from their beneficiary brethren. We are sorry if we have hurt the feelings of any one who was not actuated by unworthy motives in imputing unworthy motives to our candidates for the ministry, and not sorry if they now know how that feels.

One of the important steps forward which Union Seminary is considering is the election of a president of the Seminary. Dr. Patton's election to the presidency of Princeton Seminary has been followed by the election of Dr. David D. Gregg, of Brooklyn, to the presidency of the Western Theological Seminary of Allegheny, Pennsylvania. Union needs additional endowment. While it has a half a million dollars in its "plant," including the endowment, the part that is tied up in scholarship funds and its magnificent equipment is so large, proportionately, that the income from it does not meet expenses. It would be a great thing for the Seminary if Dr. W. W. Moore could be induced to become the first president and still be able to give some of his invaluable teaching gifts to the service of the Seminary. He might be spared the drill work that could be performed by a tutor and be allowed to lecture to the students as opportunity gave.

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

The Interior is doing the best it can, with the best editorials. The Question of Denominationalism. that can be written on that side, to vindicate the righteousness and the expediency of a union with the Cumberland Church.

In the issue of October 22, it has this to say about the Presbyterian Standard:

We regret to be compelled to modify the opinion expressed last week that The Presbyterian Standard, of Charlotte, N. C., could be counted on as a friendly promoter of ultimate union between the Southern and Northern Presbyterian Churches. The rabid look of the front page of its latest issue is much against that pleasant proposition. The editor's absurd and unfair contempt for the Cumberland Presbyterian Church seems to set him quite in frenzy toward our Church as soon as he learns that a committee of ours has been treating a Cumberland Presbyterian committee with decent respect. It is too bad that prejudice can get so much the better of brotherly love in the pages of a Christian newspaper, but we still trust that in the long run the brotherly love will prove the more vital and will outlive the prejudice.

We know just how it feels, confrere. And we are glad you let off steam. Mrs. Wiggs used to advise her lamented husband, in his lifetime, to go down to the wood shed and let the bad words out. It relieved him and did not hurt the woodshed. We know that the editor of the Interior was mighty mad when he penned that paragraph, and the funny part is that when he comes to himself he will find out that he was really angry with the truth we told. We are not contemptuous of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, but only of its attitude toward the Confession heretofore and its inconsistency in this matter of union. If it would honestly say that it had been mistaken, either in its doctrine or in its understanding of real Presbyterianism, we should feel more respect; that we cannot deny. Nor is this a question of brotherly love. Abraham insisted on separation from Lot for the reason of brotherly love—"for we be brethren." And the Interior slightly exaggerates when it says that our objection has been to the decent respect shown a Cumberland committee on union.

Over against this accusation of the Interior we set the following letter from one of the brainiest ministers of the Presbyterian Church, North:

Oct. 27, 1903.

My dear Dr. McKelway:

I desire to express to you my great appreciation of the stand which you have taken on the proposed union of our church with the Cumberland Church and my hope that you will take none too seriously the jeers with which your article has been greeted in the Interior. I see that The Presbyterian of last week has uncovered the secret of the present policy of the Interior on this question and also that The Herald and Presbyter has an article which calls for some statement from the committee. It is a matter incredible to me that any one familiar with the doctrinal position of the two bodies should describe the differences between them as "slight," as the document signed by Dr. Roberts and by Dr. Black does, and an examination of the symbols of the two bodies does not relieve one's surprise. It is a curious fact which has just come to my attention that in 1886 when Dr. Black was representing his church on a proposed union with the Protestant Methodist body, he reported back to their assembly that there was no doctrinal difference sufficient to keep the two bodies apart.

Dr. Black now signs a report that the doctrinal differences between his body and ours are "slight." From this I suppose the inference should be drawn that in Dr. Black's opinion the differences between our church and the Protestant Methodist church are either slight or do not exist at all, and that we should all be merged in one great evangelical union.

I desire to say to you that our church will not go much farther in the consideration of this question without having the facts in the case brought clearly to light. You possibly noticed what The Cumberland Presbyterian has said during the last two weeks, first that they had not been asked in the consideration of this question to surrender any of their "historic contentions;" and, second, that the action of our church on revision has simply "supplanted" the Confession and brought us around to their basis. I understand that the effort is being made to suppress the utterances of The Cumberland Presbyterian, but I cannot think that it will succeed. I believe that our church while favorable to union with any body that cordially accepts our standards will not shut its eyes to the great points of difference between the Cumberland Church and ours. I sincerely trust that the discussion of this question will result in making it perfectly clear that the differences between the Southern Church and us are as nothing compared to those which exist between us and the Cumberland Church. The two questions are really at opposite poles. Union with you would mean the strengthening of our distinctive testimony as a Calvinistic body. union with them would mean the relaxing of that testimony to our distinctive truth and putting us on a comprehensive basis.

With very kind regards and best wishes for your work, I am, Faithfully yours,

It seems to us that this just about hits the nail on the head. The question is really whether it is worth while to continue further the denominational life of the Church. Whether the different churches shall continue to stand for their respective principles or shall surrender them and merge them together now. And the Interior unwittingly gives its assent to the logic of its own position by the suicidal paragraph following:

When a man argues that denominationalism has been a benefit to the general Church because it has brought out emphasis on so many different phases and doctrines of grace, why should he deny that his own denomination will be benefitted in like manner by including within its membership different types of thought? If it has kept the Christian world in better balance for some Christians to be Calvinists and others Arminians rather than for all to be either the one or the other, why does it not follow that the Presbyterian Church is surer of its balance when its people are part ultra-Calvinists and part moderate or semi-Calvinists, instead of being all rigid predestinarians? These questions are respectfully dedicated to The Presbyterian, which has of late been trying to show that denominations are such a good thing that it would be a pity to reduce their number by letting the Cumberland Presbyterians come back into the mother Church. If our good contemporary would just go round and look at the other side of its logic, it would find a hole in the fence big enough for the entrance of the Cumberland Presbyterians and a whole lot of other folks besides.

Now this is enough to provoke the classic exclamation: "Here's richness!" A whole lot of other folks are to be let in besides the Cumberland Church! And then it would provoke a smile at its crudity if the ignorance were not so sad, that talk about rigid predestinarians and semi-Calvinists. There is just about as much difference doctrinally between a semi-Calvinist and a Calvinist as there is between a turkey and a turkey-buzzard, as to species. The semi-Calvinist belongs to the Calvinistic class as much as the turkey-buzzard belongs to the genus turkey.

And then that "rigid predestination" is an expression that has heretofore been in the mouth of the enemies of Calvinism and their excuse was ignorance. Granted predestination at all, and exceptional predestination is an absurdity. If the very hairs of our head are all numbered; if not a sparrow falls to the ground without the Father's knowledge; if the destiny of an immortal soul is of more value than many sparrows, how shall God concern himself with the number of the hairs that cover our head and not with the thought of the brain; with the fall of a sparrow and not with the fall of a soul? The trouble is that the union ought to be between those who think with the Interior as to rigid predestination and the Cumberland Church, and they ought to go over to that church without trying to take their Calvinistic brethren with them.

And then just see how it will work in practice when that lot of other folks get into the Northern Presbyterian Church. If the folks can get in by churches of course they must bring their ministry just as it is. And the Presbytery, if we shall call it a Presbytery then and not an Association or a Conference, will say to the young minister whom it examines for work in a particular field: "My brother, we understand from your statement to us that you believe in immersion and not in infant baptism; that you deny in toto the theory of predestination and accept Wesley as your doctrinal father; that you have a partiality for praying to the Virgin Mary and for worship with incense, while you also prefer giving but one service on Sunday and putting the afternoon in a golf game. Our principles forbid our objecting to any of these things. We believe in comprehension. Still it might be profitable for us to point out some trouble that you might have in serving this Church. Elder Dabney has the old-fashioned Presbyterian idea of the Sabbath and will probably protest against your golf games to the extent of withdrawing the half of your salary that he pays. Mrs. Paido has three children which she is expecting to have baptized as soon as you come and she has been brought up in the faith that children are included with their parents in the covenant of grace. It will go mighty hard with her to learn your views, but you must deal gently with her. Old Professor Hodge is a Calvinist and he has shown considerable ability in debate, with those who accept your Arminian faith. We fear that he may make you ridiculous in the community, the first time he criticises your sermon. And then there are still some people in that community who believe that the Virgin mother is not to be prayed to and that worship with incense is an abomination, "a rag of Popery," they will call it. And as for the confessional that you hope to establish in Knoxtown, well, perhaps the less we say about it the better. And may the Lord have mercy upon your pastorate."

What there may be in the changes of the far future, in the way of bringing men into a closer harmony in matters of doctrine and practice we do not know. But we suspect that after the "comprehension" of the Cumberland Church, the first time the Cumberland minister in the Presbyterian Church falls back upon his old stock-in-trade, the abuse of Calvinism, and announces his adherence to Arminianism, there will be some trouble, especially if the Presbyterian congregation is one of Scotch descent, with some memories of the Covenanters still lingering in the traditions of the people. But this is not our funeral, and we simply desire to instruct the esteemed Interior as to why it got so angry. It had just waked up out of a pleasant dream.

My article, "The Committee on The Proof Texts Committee Again," has called forth two replies or criticisms. One by Rev. L. B. Johnson in The Standard of Oct. 14; the other in last week's paper by "J. R.," whose initials I do not recognize. I am glad of this discussion and hope that good will come of it; at any rate it shows, as The Standard remarks, that it "seems to be a subject of more interest than we had thought."

As to the first of these, "A Criticism of a Criticism," my article seems to have filled good Bro. Johnson with merriment, to make him fairly run over with hilarity and humor, and as a jolly good fellow he can but laugh and be glad, and—for it's all so funny—he would have others share his jollity and joy. To all this I have only three things to say: First. It is always a pleasant and good thing to make others happy. This pleasure is mine, though unexpected and unintended, but "the most delicious humor is the unconscious variety." Second. Our brother puts me in good company, even that of "the Westminster divines themselves," those "grave and reverend brethren of blessed memory." For he finds, and it takes a full third of his article, in something they wrote, "a delicious joke." And I thank him for the honor, even though this too be of "the unconscious variety." And third. Even fun and jollity do not justify this positive assertion, viz: "And it is news to everybody, I think, that unless he is a rider of hobbies and a teacher of vagaries he is not fit to revise the proof texts of our Standards, but so read Dr.

Leyburn's first and second replies." I submit to every sensible reader that he has read into my "first and second replies" what was never in the mind of the writer and I am equally sure not in the words written.

P. S.—I think L. B. J. is not a success when he appears in the role of the "Phunny Phellow." "Let the shoemaker stick to his last."

As to J. G.'s article: This is written in a more serious vein; it deserves and shall receive more serious consideration, for he falls into far more and more serious errors. First, He imagines and positively declares that I was "in an unhappy frame of mind," with "ruffled temper," and to "relieve myself said things not altogether nice of the late Assembly, its principal committee, and its moderator." And he illustrates and describes this "frame of mind," this "temper" and these "things not altogether nice" by such additional phrases as the following: "He gives expression to his displeasure in language," &c., "in the heat of his resentment he allows himself to accuse the moderator and the Assembly of discourtesy," &c "for which the moderator and Assembly have been so unsparingly condemned," and "the Assembly and its moderator have been recklessly and violently assailed for a flagrant act of injustice." Again and confidently I submit to the good sense of the readers of The Standard whether there was anything in my article that calls for, justifies, or even excuses such epithets and adjectives as are found above. The moderator himself, gentleman that he is, does not think so, for in a personal letter he says, "I thank you for the kindness of the spirit you show to me personally." Without offense, I hope, and, did I know him, fully reciprocating I doubt not all the kind things my brother, J. R. G., says of me, may I not quote as appropriate, "Physician, heal thyself;" "Thou therefore that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself;" "First cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye?"

Second, and far more important: J. R. G. misunderstands and misrepresents, unintentionally, no doubt, what I said and what are the facts in a number of instances; e. g., taken in their order. He says that I "said things not altogether nice about the Assembly, its principal committee and its moderator." I did criticize the action of the Assembly and its moderator, but not one word is there directly about its principal committee or any other committee of the Assembly. Let any one look and see for himself. He also declares: "His grievance is twofold: 1st. The composition of the committee, . . . ; and especially, 2nd, the failure of the moderator to appoint Dr. E. C. Gordon," &c. But my two objections to the committee appointed were: 1st. That no friends of the movement were put on it, not even Dr. Gordon, and 2nd, that all the committee were taken from the Seminaries, and from the same chair in the Seminaries. A different thing from his "twofold grievance."

He asserts, and three times, that my chief complaint was that Dr. Gordon was not made chairman of the ad interim committee. But in fact I did not even hint that I thought or desired that Dr. Gordon should have been "chairman of that committee." My words were: "I think it goes without saying that this brother, Dr. G., should have had a place on this committee," and gave reasons therefor. It was against this omission of any place on the committee—not because he was not chairman—that I uttered my "respectful protest." Again he says: "The good Doctor declares that 'always the movers are represented on the committees appointed' and adds the sweeping assertion 'to this I have never known an exception.' He forgets of his knowledge of the facts is very limited." Perhaps it would have been better to have said originators rather than "movers" in this place, for I had no reference to the man or men making the motion, none whatever; but in order to prevent just the mistake J. R. G. has made I said, "and always the movers, the real friends of any movement, are represented on any committee appointed &c." Why does J. R. G. omit the most important words, and print the quotations as if they were not there? Further I recall no instance in which, when a movement was proposed about which there was a difference of views in the Church, some for and some against it, and when at length the Assembly agreed to take the first step in favor by the appointment of an ad interim committee to consider and report, and when the committee was actually appointed, it had no real, avowed friend of the movement on it, not one. (If there be an exception, I will be glad to have my memory refreshed.) And this is the gravamen of my criticism, not the failure to put Dr. Gordon on the committee, or as its chairman, but this, that none of the originators, no avowed friend of the movement is found on the committee, not one; while in fact it was composed of one or more avowed opponents of even the revision of the proof-texts, and a majority, if not all the rest, supposed to be of much the same mind. Now this plain, common-sense, righteous principle, that the friends of a movement should have some voice and hand in the direction and character given the movement, was in my judgment flagrantly violated. (Or if "flagrantly" has in any ears a harsh sound I willingly omit it.) And it was against this that I specially and chiefly protested, and so still protest. For it is, I believe, unusual, unwise, and unjust. Then may I ask, when and how did the committee appointed "secure the enthusiastic endorsement of the Assembly?" Nothing of the kind is found in the records or in any of the reports. And how has it "commanded the general" and, until I croaked, "the universal approval of the Church?" Did J. R. G. hear ten men, or even five, speak of it at all before the first article was published? I only ask for information, simply remarking that "one swallow does not make a summer" nor one man's observation justify the terms "general" and "universal."

He makes also several misstatements touching Dr. Gordon, e. g. There was no "private circulation" by him of any overture, at least in the sense of secret or covered; for he sent it first to one of our papers for publication, but it was declined, and he asked for it "Presbyterial endorsement" which meant open, public discussion. Again, Nothing that the Presbyterian Standard, or any one else, said about it had anything in the world to do with the form of the overture when it went to the Assembly. That form was given it by Lafayette Presbytery and by none other. And lastly, Dr. G. does not repudiate the Confessional doctrine of "human inability;" no man holds and teaches the utter and absolute inability of man more strongly than he; what he does question is the correctness of a single phrase in the Confession, which seems to limit God's ability, the power of His grace, and for which limitation he can find no Scripture warrant. And is here any one of us who accept every phrase of Confession and Catechism as Scriptural and true? "He that is without sin, let him cast the first stone." There are yet a few other minor inaccuracies that might be corrected. But let this suffice. Surely there is enough to justify my saying of my friend and brother, J. R. G., it is easy to believe that if he had reflected a little before printing it, his paper would never have seen the light.

Third. J. R. G. "in all candor goes a step further" and frankly declares of Dr. Gordon, "that there would have been an obvious impropriety in his appointment." For the reason that by the original overture proposed by him and the discussion that followed, "the status of the author on one or more of the fundamental articles of our faith was found to be out of harmony with his church." This is plain and candid, if not worse; but is it true—the reason assigned? Is Dr. Gordon out of harmony with his Church on one or more fundamental articles of our faith? This is a broad, weeping and serious charge, which he brings against a brother minister. If true, it is the duty of J. R. G. or one like minded to call the attention of the proper Presbytery to this and have the erring brother dealt with as he deserves. But I venture to assert that he would find it difficult, yea impossible, to prove in court what he so recklessly charges in print. (He seems to understand as little of what Dr. Gordon believes of what G. L. L. wrote.)

The simple truth is, there are three short phrases, just three I think, for which as understood and interpreted by him, Dr. Gordon can find no Scripture warrant; therefore as a loyal Presbyterian he questions whether they should find a place in the Confession, where belong only those things "either expressly set down in Scripture, or by good and necessary consequence may be deduced therefrom;" and as a free citizen of both the spiritual and civil commonwealth he gives free expression to his views, and suggests the remedy. Moreover, not one of the three phrases in question really touches Christ's "system of doctrine, government, discipline and worship" which He has ordained in His Church; indeed all three might be modified or omitted altogether without affecting that great "system of doctrine taught in the Holy Scriptures," or any "fundamental article" of our Calvinistic faith. Only let J. R. inform himself thoroughly, and I am sure he will agree with me in this. He has, without intending it, borne false witness against his neighbor.

Finally. There are phrases scattered through the Confession and Catechism, which none of us accept as exactly Scriptural and entirely true. I think every minister can find at least three of these. Now if to suggest that these be changed, to advocate a slight revision that would bring the Confession, even in its minor phrases, into more complete harmony with God's word, if this is to cause a man to be sharply and unjustly criticised, to lose standing and be shut out of desirable positions, to be called "a fool" (as was done last May) or "a rider of hobbies and a teacher of vagaries," and to become a sort of "speckled bird," almost an ecclesiastical outcast, then indeed are we fallen upon sad and evil days in our Zion. Yet there are signs that seem to point in this direction, of which part of) J. R. G.'s article is one. G. L. L.

Review of Contemporaries.

The practical morality is entirely clear. Our attitude must be love to our enemies, prayer for those that despitefully use us and persecute us, and desire for their eternal salvation. It must be the attitude of Christ as exhibited in his doctrine spoken in quiet discourse to his attentive disciples, and as shown by his conduct on the cross in the midst of suffering and surrounded by malignant foes. It must be the conduct of Stephen as he prayed for his murderer. But suppose that men prove incorrigibly hostile to God and to his kingdom, must we wish them success or failure? Must we wish the kingdom of Satan victory or defeat? To ask these questions is to answer them. In other words, we must not be actuated by feelings of revenge, but of love for individuals; but we must hope and pray for the overthrow of all the enemies of God and his kingdom and for the triumph of righteousness.—The Bible Student.

Our readers will recall the shock of distress they felt when, some months ago, the cable flashed the message that the dashing British General, Sir Hector Macdonald, had died by his own hand in Paris while resting under accusation of a crime which could not be mentioned. His death in this way many took as a confession of guilt. His friends, however, stood by him, and in honor to his memory demanded the strictest investigation. This the government accorded, and after the fullest examination has rendered a verdict to the effect that there was not so much as a shadow of truth in the charges preferred, and that Sir Hector Macdonald was absolutely above suspicion. The commission declares that "the late Sir Hector Macdonald was cruelly assassinated by vile and slandering tongues." We do not now speak of that strength of character which lifted a man from the ranks to the proud position Sir Hector held, and yet, which, conscious of his innocence, could not await the verdict of the commission, but we hold up to execration the foul tongues that hounded a sensitive nature to death. Sad and sinful as was the suicide, it is as nothing compared to the slanderous tongues that stabbed an honest man in the dark. The guilt of murder rests upon all such hearts. Well did the inspired writer declare that "the tongue may be set on fire of hell."—The Episcopal Recorder.

A MODEL CHRISTIAN.—Theo. L. Cuyler, D. D., LL. D. Price 75c. Postage 8 cents.
OUR NEW EDENS.—J. R. Miller, D. D. Price 75c. Postage 8 cents. Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia.

These two books are a continuation of the series, The Presbyterian Pulpit, each containing eight sermons, issued from time to time. Among the devotional writers of the period none are more loved and read than Dr. Cuyler and Dr. Miller. Theirs are household names in Presbyterianism and these books are specially adapted for reading aloud. There is in them the charm that comes from chaste expression and the spiritual glow that comes from a nearness to the Master.

TEXAS.—George P. Garrison; Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston. $1.00 net. 320 Pages.

Twenty-two stories of American Commonwealths have been published by Houghton, Mifflin & Company, and no single one of these stories of beginnings is more thrillingly interesting than "Texas." This is not a history, but rather a study from the pre-colonial explorations, the Spanish settlements, Mexican misrule, and the struggle for independence. There be many whose hearts thrill at the mention of "Texas," and to the library of such an one this book will be a welcome addition.

Devotional.

Hindrances to Devotional Bible Study.

Let us clear the ground, first of all, of that supposed hindrance—lack of time. In each country that we visit the students and Christian workers claim that they are busier than those of any other country. We have had to admit this point in at least fifteen countries within the past fifteen months. There are many persons who conscientiously think they do not have half an hour a day to spend in Bible study. Let us suggest two ways of meeting this hindrance. There is time to do the will of God. Is it the will of God that I grow spiritually? Yes; for He does not wish me to become unspiritual or to stand still. Has a man ever grown spiritually apart from devotional Bible study? We have not found that man. Have you? Therefore, there is time to study the Bible daily for our own spiritual growth. This, you say, is logical but theoretical. Well, then, will you for one month try the plan of spending the first half hour of the day in Bible study, and at the end of the time let us know whether it has interfered with your regular work or standing or efficiency? Hundreds of persons in different parts of the world have accepted this challenge. Thus far not one has reported that his work or standing has suffered in the least. On the other hand, many of them report that such study has enabled them to do more and better work. Is it fair, therefore, for any of us, without trying it, to say that this cannot be done?

Some people are kept from this kind of Bible study by the fact that they are studying the Bible for other purposes. Some students have said: "We are studying the Bible in the college curriculum; will not that take the place of this form of Bible study?" It certainly will not, for the simple reason that each student has his own needs and temptations which may not be known to the teacher; and, even if they were, they could not be taken up and met in public. Each student needs to have God speak to him personally each day. On the other hand, some say, "We are teaching Bible classes. Will not the preparation for teaching take the place of such special devotional Bible study?" The answer is much the same as before. Each teacher has his personal and peculiar needs, which may not be those of his pupils. He likewise needs to hear the voice of God speaking to his own soul each day.

Many conscientious Christians raise the question whether the reading of devotional books will not take the place of Bible study. We firmly believe that much of the lack of spiritual fibre among Christians today is due to a second-hand knowledge of the books of God. We would not be misunderstood for we have derived too much benefit from such books as The Confessions of St. Augustine, The Imitation of Christ by Thomas Kempis, The Spiritual Letters of Fenelon, Baxter's Saints' Everlasting Rest, Jeremy Taylor's two spiritual classics Law's Serious Call and the more recent writings of Murray, Meyer, Moule and Miss Havergal. The point is why not go to first sources? One in speaking of some of these writings has said that in their most appealing tones they echo the voices of the Bible. After all, these things ought we to have done and not to have left the other undone.

Some people are hindered from studying the Bible devotionally because they are afraid to do so. One day while in India two young men said to us: "If we study the Bible in this way we are afraid it will compel us to abandon our plan of entering government service, and to devote ourselves to Christian work." A Mohammedan student in Egypt told us that, if he studied the Bible in this way, he would have to become a Christian. In another college a young man said it would make it necessary for him to give up a certain bad habit. Afraid of the light! How unscientific and unscholarly and cowardly!—John R. Mott.

Missionary.

The Gospel Postal Mission

This is one of the latest agencies for the extension of the kingdom of God. Its object is to send by post a free copy of the Gospels to every household in the United Kingdom, America, Australia, Europe and ultimately throughout the world. Mr. H. Musgrave Reade, the founder and director, contends that this is the quickest, surest and most economical method of obeying our Lord's command to spread the gospel to "every creature" and to "all nations," thus utilizing the machinery of the various States, and turning every postman into an involuntary missionary for the evangelization of the world. By this means millions of the people who are inaccessible to the ordinary evangelistic efforts can be reached, and thus the way made clear for the future work of the evangelist to a somewhat prepared people.

The mission is not associated with any sect or denomination, nor does it circulate anything of a controversial character, but relies upon the gospel itself as "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth;" as the Lord God saith, "My word shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I send it."

No direct appeal or collections are made for the support of the mission, but reliance upon the providence of the Living God through believing prayer for means and workers to carry out his work.

For further information, apply to Mr. H. Musgrave Reade, at the office of the Gospel Postal Mission, 5 Wally Street, Higher Broughton, Manchester, England.—Missionary Review of the World.

Rev. Dr. Anderson of Nashville, Tenn., gives the following, among other interesting facts, respecting Presbyterian missions in Japan: "In 1885, steps were taken to establish a mission of the Southern Presbyterian Church in Japan. That fall, Messrs. Grinnan and McAlpine sailed, and arrived in Japan at the beginning of 1886. They soon established a church at Kochi, the capital of Tosa. This church was somewhat remarkable. The foundation for it had been laid by an American minister and a Japanese. After a hard day's work in a town near Kochi, they went down to the beach to rest. Here they knelt in the bright moonlight with the breakers of the great Pacific rolling at their feet, and prayed that God would speed the day when his Church would be planted among the mountains of Tosa, that it might bear the news of the Gospel of peace to that sunny land. Our little mission seemed to be God's answer to that prayer. It was organized with twenty-two members and numbered 101 at its first birthday." The point is also noted that one thing which makes Japan an important field for missions is her already established reputation as an educational center. China and Korea are sending their young men to her to be educated.

When James Chalmers, the famous New Guinea missionary, was a boy of fifteen, he heard a minister read a letter from a missionary to the Fijis. The clergyman looked over his spectacles with wet eyes, and said: "I wonder if there is a boy here this afternoon who will yet become a missionary, and by and by bring the gospel to the cannibals?" "And the response of my heart," wrote Chalmers afterwards, "was, 'Yes, God helping me, I will!'" The heart of the boy had hearkened unto the voice of God, and through this obedience he became what Robert Louis Stevenson called him, "The Great-Heart of New Guinea."—Selected.

"Where you find a person a little better than his word, a little more liberal than his promise, a little more than borne out in his statement by his facts, a little larger in deed than in speech, you recognize a kind of eloquence in that person's utterance not laid down in Blair or Campbell."—O. ### David's Trust In God.

Psalms 23-1-5.

Nov. 15, 1903.

This Psalm was probably composed by David in his early manhood and its imagery is furnished by his own experience as a keeper of sheep. The shepherd performs for his helpless, dependent flock many offices, essential to their safety, and welfare. Upon his ability and fidelity depend their protection from danger, their guidance in right paths and the adequate supply of their multiplied wants. All this is true of the Lord and his people, and whoever can affirm "The Lord is My Shepherd" can also add "I shall not want." Whoever has Jehovah for his shepherd or guardian and provider shall never lack anything that infinite wisdom, love and power can supply. In enforcing the teachings of this Psalm several things may claim attention.

I. How Does God Become Our Shepherd?—What is our warrant for claiming Him as such, and how shall we show that we belong to his flock? His own invitations and promises justify us in seeking Him and in placing ourselves under His care. But left to ourselves we would never do this. Hence we become God's people by Divine choice. The flock never chooses the shepherd, but the shepherd the flock. We are also made God's people by a Divine call which changes the nature and controls the conduct. The shepherd familiarizes the sheep with his voice until they come at his call. We are rendered God's people by faith which is the bond of union between Christ and His disciples. The sheep prove their connection with the shepherd by trusting him. We belong to Christ's flock when we manifest genuine love for Him. The sheep demonstrate their connection with the shepherd not only by trust but by warm affection. We prove our Christian discipleship by the obedience which springs from faith and love. Our Saviour says "If ye love me keep my commandments, he that loveth me not keepeth not my sayings." Again He declares "My sheep hear my voice and they follow me." This following involves not only obedience but imitation.

II. The Wants Supplied By the Shepherd.—The needs of God's people are as numerous as those of the sheep constituting the flock and they are fully met by the Divine shepherd. The flock needs food and drink and the Lord's people require what will satisfy spiritual hunger and thirst. So the shepherd leads them in the green pastures of inspired truth and beside the still waters of Divine grace. The sheep are often wearied by the evils of the way, and the shepherd "maketh them to lie down in the green pastures," where murmuring waters lull to repose. The flock sometimes are weakened by disease or wander from the safe path and their kind guardian restores to health or the ways of righteousness. Hence the Psalmist declares "He restoreth my soul." The sheep are at times perplexed or in doubt as to the way in which they should go. Therefore the Shepherd grants them necessary guidance. "He leadeth them in paths of righteousness for his own name's sake." The flock is sometimes exposed to difficulty and danger, climbing rugged heights, passing yawning gulfs and "walking through the valley and shadow of death." Then they need and receive the comforting presence of the shepherd and the upholding of his rod and staff. Food for hunger, drink for thirst, rest for weariness, restoration for disease or wandering, guidance for perplexity or doubt and strength for difficulty or danger, such are the spiritual wants of believers fully met by the divine shepherd.

III. The Final Results of Shepherd's Care.—Turning from the imagery of the flock and recognizing the enemies to which the believer is exposed the Psalmist affirms "Thou preparest a table before in the presence of my enemies, thou annointest my head with oil, my cup runneth over." Having such a guardian, his wants would be supplied despite the efforts of all foes.

What Are You Thankful For?

Psalms 33:1-22.

Topic for Nov. 22.

The Thanksgiving season is upon us once more. It is a time when our hearts should go out to our heavenly Father for His goodness in dealing with us during these past twelve months. But are we really thankful? or are we murmuring and complaining that our good lot has not been better than it is? There is an inherent weakness in man that makes him always long for something which he doesn't possess and some people have the knack of making themselves totally miserable because of their discontentment, and what is worse, they make every person with whom they come in contact as miserable as they are themselves. Let us not be among this number.

Instead let us in the quietude of our hearts go over the many blessings which are ours and which our good Father has given. In this thirty-third Psalm, David pours out his full heart for the many excellences which he had learned to know that God possesses. He thanked God for His goodness. God is good. All His works are done in love. He cares more for us than our earthly parents ever could care for us. All His dealings with us are for our good if we but realize it. He is constantly seeking means to help us. Can we doubt His love? He who gave us His Son to die for our sins shall he deny us any good thing? If He would not withhold this best of all gifts, will He deny us the smaller things? When He who loves us so lets sorrow come into our lives; when He lets us pass through many trials, we may rest assured that He has some wise purpose in it all and our hearts should go out to Him in thanksgiving that He thinks so much of us that He is willing to let us undergo even hardships in order to make us attain to the very best that is possible for us. When we once reach the point where we fully realize this truth, we will be made to pour our hearts out in thanksgiving to God for every one of His chastening providences.

Another blessing for which we should return our hearty thanks to God, is that His power is always being exercised in our behalf. "If ye will ask anything in My name I will do it," said Christ. This means that the whole power of Omnipotence is at our disposal. Have we some great work to perform? God stands at our side constantly and through Christ says, "Ask and I will do." Have we some heavy burden to bear? God says, "Cast your burden on Me and I will sustain you." Not only is God's power ours for the asking, but His wisdom is available for us. "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God who giveth liberally and upbraideth not." How wonderful are the resources of the child of God! Unmeasured power, unstinted wisdom, just for the asking! Shall we not thank God for these things?

Besides all this, He is supplying our daily wants along every line. He makes the harvest to feed man. He blesses our efforts so that we are enabled thereby to provide for our daily needs. He gives us the fresh air and the blessed sunshine and preserves us in health and vigor of body. We are apt to think that our daily creature comforts are the result of our own unaided efforts, but not so. God is the author of them all.

Then above all these things we should ever be thankful to God that He has so ordered our lives that we live where we can hear God's way of saving a sinful race, made known. This is the greatest of all blessings. To hear the word and to be given a receptive heart that it may make us wise unto salvation. Shall we not, then, at this Thanksgiving season pour out our very souls to God in gratitude for all His mercies? If there is a spark of gratitude in us, we surely will.

Centre all your thoughts on self and you will have abundance of misery.—Kingsley.

Those Who Fall Away.

Heb. 10:31. "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."

This statement, if it were not qualified in some way, would contradict the conscious experience of many of us, and would strike at the foundation of our only hope for the future. Some of us know that we have been in the hands of God all our days; but instead of finding it a fearful thing, we exclaim with the Psalmist, from grateful hearts, "The goodness of God endureth continually." And, instead of being a thing to be feared for the future, it is the very fact that we shall ever be in the hands of God that casts out fear, and enables us to face without dread the unknown things that shall be.

It is evident, then, that the application of the statement cannot be general; and we find, in fact, that it is limited to a class designated in the context—and described with even greater fulness in the sixth chapter of this same Epistle. So, instead of dwelling directly upon the words of our text, I shall try to bring out its meaning and force by exposition of the context.

In entering upon this discussion, I am perfectly well aware of the difficulties in connection with these much debated passages. They constitute one of the storm-centers around which have raged the controversies of two rival systems of theology; and not even the ablest champions of that system to which we adhere have been able to agree in their interpretations. For the sake of Christian charity, let us keep our discussion free from a spirit of controversy. In view of the varying opinions of able and scholarly men, any proper sense of humility will keep us free from a spirit of dogmatism.

Our only—and, I believe, sufficient—excuse for dealing with the matter at all is the conviction that when the Bible utters such solemn and terrible warnings it is our duty to try as best we may to understand—for warnings are meant to be understood that they may be heeded. I do not ask you to accept as correct any interpretation that I may make; but, like the men of Berea, to "search the Scriptures whether these things are so." And if our study together shall prove an incentive and an inspiration to further study on your part, I shall count my work accomplished.

Let us now get the matter fully and clearly before us. The inspired writer (I take the statement from both the sixth and the tenth chapters) asserts of "those who were once enlightened," who "have received the knowledge of the truth," who "have tasted of the heavenly gift," who "were made partakers of the Holy Spirit," who "tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the age to come." 1st, that they may "fall away"; 2nd, that it is impossible to renew them again unto repentance, and 3d, that "there remaineth (for them) no more a sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful expectation of judgment, and a fierceness of fire which shall devour the adversaries." And the whole case is concluded in the statement of our text that, for them, "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."

You will find, I think, that this statement covers all the essential features, with none of the difficulties left out or obscured. You will also find, I believe, that the fifteenth chapter of John's Gospel and the second chapter of the second Epistle of Peter introduce no new features into the problem—though our limits forbid our going into a discussion of those passages.

Now some tell us that the matter presents no difficulties of interpretation at all. According to them, it means that people may become the true children of God, and then fall away and be finally lost. I am willing to admit that—taken alone, without reference to the other passages of Scripture bearing on the same subject—this is what it would seem on the face of it to mean. But I would call your attention in passing to the fact that the passages, so interpreted, give no sanction to that popular doctrine of "falling from grace" under which the same individual frequently falls and is as frequently recon-verted and restored; for if there is one fact in this whole connection that stands out with perfect clearness, it is that when people have once come into the condition here described "it is impossible to renew them again unto repentance." Their fate is forever sealed.

But I am glad that we have other passages of Scripture which more clearly than these refer to the condition of those who are the children of God through faith in Christ; and it is not only our privilege to take them into consideration, but we are encouraged in the Bible itself to compare Scripture with Scripture in trying to arrive at the true meaning of God's message to us.

Turning to Jno. 3:36, we find that Christ himself makes this statement: "He that believeth on the Son hath eternal life."

Notice the present tense of the verb. He that believes has this life as a present possession. And the life that he now has is described by the word eternal. This same word—sometimes translated eternal, sometimes everlasting—is used more than forty times in the New Testament to describe the life which believers now have through faith in Christ. Now eternal means unending, and it is the very word used to describe the existence of God himself. When God, therefore, before whom all the future stands revealed, describes the life which He gives to believers by applying to it the very word which is used to describe His own unending existence, we are not only encouraged, but—it would seem—compelled, to believe that the spiritual life of the true child of God is co-extensive in its duration with the life of God himself.

In Jo. 10:2 and 29 we have—also from the lips of Christ himself—the statement that He gives (present tense) eternal life to his sheep, with the added assurance that they shall never perish. This is not a prediction of what will be, but a statement of what shall be; for He bases the assertion not upon the foreseen perseverance of the sheep, but upon the fact that they are to be kept by the power of the Father who is greater than all.

Again the Apostle Paul, in the fifth chapter of Romans, argues with unanswerable logic that since Christ died for men when they were enemies to reconcile them to God, those who are reconciled shall be saved by his life—by the power of Him who ever liveth to make intercession for us. It is utterly inconceivable, he argues, that Christ would die to save men who are utterly lost; and then, after they have been saved, permit them, through outward temptation or the remnant of sin within, to fall away again and be finally destroyed. Would a man, after risking his own life to save his child as it was falling over a precipice, then stand by and permit it—even though it wished to do so—to walk over the edge again, when he could restrain it much more easily than he had saved it? The performance of the more difficult work in carrying out a plan contains in itself the pledge that all minor obstacles will be removed.

The Apostle evidently believed as he reasoned, too, for in II. Tim. 1:12 he says, "I know him whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that he is able to guard that which I have committed unto him against that day." He had given his life to Christ, and he believed that it would be kept by Him until that day when the eternal seal would be placed upon all things—when the Tempter would be banished forever to tempt the sons of men no more, and the last trace of sin would be left behind as the redeemed ones entered the sinless city of God.

With such an array of evidence before us—and I have given only a few specimens of what can be brought forward—we may well be permitted to question whether this terrible statement has any reference to the true children of God at all. It certainly makes it necessary for us to subject it to a very rigid examination before concluding that one part of our Bible contradicts the clear teaching of other parts.

Let us examine, then, more carefully the particular gifts and experiences attributed to the class upon whom this awful doom is pronounced.

1. They are said to "have been enlightened"—to "have received the knowledge of the truth." To one not strongly influenced by theological controversy or sectarian bias, this would seem merely to describe those who have come to an intellectual knowledge of truth—without any indication as to whether their lives have been conformed to the truth or not. And he must be a reckless partisan indeed who will assert, in the face of what the Scriptures teach on this subject, that a man's "enlightenment," or his "knowledge of the truth" is co-ordinate with his spiritual life. We are all aware that those "who know the truth and do it not" are the ones who "receive the greater condemnation."

2. The people of this class are also said to have "tasted of the heavenly gift." This statement is perhaps more obscure than the first. I confess that I have seen no explanation advanced which seems satisfactory to me. Some writers, with sacramentarian tendencies, make it refer to the partaking of the Lord's Supper. The others—so far as I have examined—make the "heavenly gift" refer to eternal life. To the mind of a plain man, it seems strange that these particular limitations should have been placed upon these words. All the blessings that we have are the gifts of God—"heavenly gifts;" but the one gift which stands out pre-eminently as the gift from God to man—from heaven to earth—is not the Lord's Supper, or even eternal life, but Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

When we understand that the word here translated "taste" also means "to try, or perceive the flavor of," "to make trial of," "to experience," we are prepared to appreciate the force of the expression. When used in connection with an object which cannot literally be tasted, it has practically the meaning of testing—i. e., determining by appropriate means the qualities of the object under investigation, as a man determines the quality and flavor of food by tasting. These people, then, having received the knowledge of the truth, and hence having been brought face to face with the Son of God as he is revealed in the Scriptures, "tasted"—or tested—him. As a result, they know who He is and what He is—both as to his mission and his character. But food may be refused after it is tasted, and persons may be rejected after they are known—and even for the very reason that they are known. "I am the light of the world," says Christ. "And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil."

3. The third statement made about the people of this class is that they "were made partakers of the Holy Spirit."

It is evident that the Spirit could not become a part of them as food that is eaten becomes a part of the body. The only sense in which the expression can be taken is that the Spirit came into touch with them and made them, in some manner and to some extent, the objects of his influence. Neither the nature nor the extent of that influence is either expressed or implied; and it is the clear teaching of the Scriptures that the Spirit both instructs and pleads with those who never become the children of God at all.

4. It is further stated of the members of this class that they "tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the age to come."

It is not necessary to dwell again upon the significance of the word taste. These people have tasted the good word of God—the divine revelation, especially as it relates to God's benevolent purpose in the plan of redemption. Their attitude is not that of the man who eats familiar and grateful food, but of one who tastes a new dish set before him that he may learn its quality and flavor. They have tasted the good word of God so that they know perfectly well what it is; but it is not said of them that they fed upon it.

They are said also to have "tasted the powers of the age to come," i. e., the age in which the kingdom of God will be completely triumphant. Now no age, or period, can exert any powers, but is itself the product of certain forces which shape it and give it its distinctive character. It is a loose and inaccurate use of language to speak of a person or a thing as being the product of an age. A man may, in a certain sense, be the product of the prevailing conditions and dominant principles of the age in which he lives; but those conditions and principles were themselves the products of the intellectual and moral activities of intelligent beings. "The powers of the age to come," then, are not powers produced by that age and projected backward into the life of a man here on earth, but are rather the controlling principles in the kingdom of God. And since the same principles are operative in the kingdom of God on earth—though not yet fully triumphant—a man may be said to taste them, to make an investigation of them, compare them with the dominant principles of the kingdom of darkness, and then he may make them the rule of his life, or he may reject them. These people learned that the dominant principles in God's kingdom are truth and righteousness and love; but it is not said that they did not prefer for themselves the principles of falsehood, unrighteousness, and selfishness.

5. Finally, it is implied of these persons that they have experienced some sort of repentance, for we are told that "it is impossible to renew them again unto repentance." The broad meaning of repentance is a change of mind—a frequent experience in the lives of saints and sinners alike. It is easy to see how any man who has come to some knowledge of the truth about God and about himself may, under the teaching and pleading of the Holy Spirit, experience a form of repentance. Who has not at some time, when face to face in some solemn moment with the great facts of the divine law and a judgment to come, made a resolve to forsake sin and escape the wrath of God?

Our system of theology rightly makes the distinction between repentance unto life and simple repentance. The one is the product of the impulse of the moment, and may with the moment pass away; the other is a revolution in the very nature of the man, and affects his life for all time to come.

It has perhaps already occurred to you, even before we finished this list of the gifts and experiences attributed to those who fall away and cannot be restored again that they all have to do with intellect rather than with what we call heart—and it is a significant fact. They denote intelligence, opportunity, enlightenment, perhaps a temporary change of mind brought about by love of life rather than love of God—and there the list ends.

There is significance also in the things omitted, as well as in what is written. You will observe, in the first place, that the expression, eternal life, is not used, though the passage gives an excellent opportunity for the use of such an unambiguous term, if the reference is to the true children of God.

And again, in this list of the characteristics of those whom some would have us believe to have been born into the kingdom of God, no mention is made of love—and yet love is the supreme characteristic of spiritual life. Christ himself emphasizes it again and again, and makes love to God and man a cardinal principle in his kingdom. The Apostle Paul, in the thirteenth chapter of I Corinthians, goes so far as to say that "if he has the gift of prophecy, and knows all mysteries and all knowledge, and though he has all faith so as to remove mountains, but has not love, he is nothing." John makes love the supreme test by which we are to know whether or not we have eternal life. And yet in the characterization of this class against which this terrible doom is pronounced no mention is made of love.

But to settle the matter, let us turn to Heb. 6:9 and 10. "But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, though we thus speak; for God is not unrighteous to forget your work and the love which ye showed toward his name, in that ye ministered to the saints, and still do minister." Here the writer, recognizing love—the distinguishing mark of spiritual life—in those to whom he was writing, expressly distinguishes them from the class which he has just been describing, and almost apologizes for writing to them about the terrible matter at all. And again in the tenth chapter, after recognizing in the 34th verse the mark of love in those to whom he was writing, he says in the 39th verse, "But we (i. e., himself and those children of God to whom he was writing) are not of them that shrink back unto perdition, but of them that have faith unto the saving of the soul." Thus again a distinction is made between the true children of God and this class which falls away, and the distinction is made not only for the present, but for all the future as well.

It seems to me that we are justified now, on the strength of the evidence considered, in putting aside as untenable the theory that these passages teach the possibility of the falling away and final destruction of those who have been born into the kingdom of God.

I trust that you will pardon me for spending so much time in the consideration of a negative aspect of our subject. Its vital importance, I am sure, is sufficient justification; but we have, in the meantime, been incidentally preparing the way for considering the subject in its positive aspects.

Running back over our analysis of the passages, we find that they can be reduced to this proposition, That it is possible for men to arrive at such a knowledge of the truth, and to come into such a relation to the kingdom of God, that for them to reject Christ is to seal their doom forever.

And no people, in any age or country of the world, have ever had such opportunities for gaining this knowledge and coming into this relation as we who live in this age of enlightenment, in this land of Christian liberty. This is what makes the subject an intensely practical one for us. It sounds a note of fearful warning for every one who here and now turns his back upon Christ and his kingdom.

Men come into this terrible condition not so much because the love and patience of God are exhausted as because—be it reverently spoken—the divine resources for their salvation are exhausted.

1. One of the means employed in the salvation of men is the truth. So long as a man is ignorant—provided he does not keep himself in ignorance in a foolish effort to avoid responsibility—there is some hope for him; for when he comes to a knowledge of the truth, "the truth may make him free." But these men know the truth; and knowing it, they wilfully reject it.

2. It is through faith in Christ, and acceptance of his atonement, that men are saved. The man who has not heard of Christ may accept him when he hears. But these men know him as the Son of God and the Savior of men. They know both his character and his mission—and they reject him because they know him. "There remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins." They have, with open eyes, rejected the crucified Son of God; and there is no other being in Heaven, or earth, or hell who could or would make atonement for them.

3. The Holy Spirit is the active divine agent in applying the plan of redemption. He is the only person of the Godhead who is in direct communication with man. He is the Advocate—the divine representative in the human soul, as Christ is now the Advocate of his people at the right hand of the Father. But to these men the Spirit has delivered his message. He has presented the claims of the Father—based alike upon his sovereignty and his love. He has plead the cause of a true crucified Savior, and presented the beauties of his kingdom of love. And He and his message have been wilfully rejected—not because they failed to understand either the messenger or the message, but for the very reason that they did understand, and were radically opposed to Him and to all that He represents.

They have tasted of the good word of God—and rejected it. They understand the controlling principle of the spiritual kingdom—and they deliberately prefer the principles of the kingdom of Satan. They have themselves severed the last tie that unites them with Heaven. The truth of God has for them no saving power, they have rejected the only possible Savior of men, and now the voice of God is heard no more in their souls. In the midst of the awful silence, there is only "a certain fearful expectation of judgment, and a fierceness of fire which shall devour the adversaries."

They have "trodden under foot the Son of God." The Father gave them his only-begotten and well-beloved Son—and they have trampled his gift under their feet with scorn.

They have "counted the blood of the covenant . . . an unholy thing." They have taken their place with those who crucified the Son of God, and reviled him even in the supreme sacrifice of his love. "They crucify to themselves the Lord afresh"—with fuller knowledge and deeper guilt.

They have "done despite unto the Spirit of Grace"—have insulted him, and have finally thrust him completely out of their lives. And now, with the blackest of crimes against the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit resting upon their guilty souls, they wait in the awful stillness of a Godless and a hopeless life for the coming day of doom.

Truly for them "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." W. A. Gillon.

Japanese Rescue Work in San Francisco.

A quiet but effective work has been organized in San Francisco for the rescue of Japanese women who have been enticed from their native country by procurers under promise of good positions and homes in America. Some surprising revelations have been made respecting the extent to which this nefarious business is being carried on. The better class of Japanese merchants and citizens are co-operating with the local Christian workers in the effort to bring offenders to justice. The case of Y. Yokoto, a Japanese merchant who was ordered deported by Commissioner of Immigration North, has attracted attention by reason of the appeal made to the authorities at Washington and the petition of several hundred Japanese citizens, urging his deportation. Yokoto's guilt was established and his appeal denied. Exchange.

No Room.

Upon my heart's closed door I heard a knock;
The touch was that of one to whom full oft
With gladness I had flung the portal wide,
Whose presence always brought me peace and joy,
But now, alas, there was no room for Him!
With guests such as were there I scarce had dared
To say unto that holy visitor:
"Come in, my Lord, and sup with me tonight,"
For Hate was there and Envy, Levity
And Pride. Self-will was master of the feast,
And Evil-speaking served.

I could not move,
Though still the Master stood without and knocked.
But courage rose. "Go forth!" I sternly cried,
"It is the blessed Master stands without.
"Ye must depart. He will not enter while You are within." I drove them hastily
Away, and then I turned, and open wide
I flung the door, and cried: "Come in, my Lord,
Most joyfully I welcome thee." Alas!
His holy anger like a cloud obscured
The sunlight of His face. He moved Away, but moving turned and looked at me,
As He had looked at Peter. Then I knew,
Without a spoken word, what 'twas He meant;
There is no room for Jesus in the heart
Where Hate and Envy, Levity and Pride
Are even transient guests!

The Ministry, Financially Speaking.

Preachers ought to be so spiritually minded, so other-worldly, as never to entertain a thought that bears on food and raiment, wives and babies. But they are not; young preachers just out of Seminary, are proposing as soon as they are settled, to take a wife; while those of us who have been out some 25 or 30 years "know how it is."

Many years ago I heard an old minister that had been out some 30 years, and was past 50, and had as yet a family dependant on him, say that he was in favor of "the celibacy of the clergy." But that was just after the war and things did look gloomy. Three of the sons he was worried about are now in the ministry, two are ruling elders, and his daughter is a pastor's wife.

I have recently read in the Literary Digest an article on "The Low Salaries of the Clergy," and I quote from that article freely.

An English paper says: "More than 7,000 incumbents are bringing up their families on less than 180 pounds ($900) a year. Their lives are one perpetual struggle to keep themselves alive and to avoid debt."

Dr. W. H. Roberts, stated clerk of the Northern Presbyterian Church, shows that 86 per cent of the ministers of his church are paid less than $2,000 a year. The Church Standard (Episcopal) of Philadelphia, (who I opine is one of those very pious fellows who deem it a man's duty to bear a cross if he has to make it himself) "trusts that for a long time ministers will be poorly paid, . . . . Let us keep secularism out of the pulpit."

On the other hand Dr. A. J. P. McClure of the same church whose business is about poorly paid clergymen, for he is Financial Agent of the Clergy Relief Fund, says: "Surely the laborer is worthy of his hire. But his hire is pitably small and becoming smaller. . . . . If it takes $1,100 today to do what $700 did four years ago, as actual statistics prove, then why help perpetuate such conditions? . . . . The salaries of a very large number are under $700 a year, while hundreds approximate $400 more nearly, and this explains in no small degree why men of worth . . . . are sometimes slow to enter the ministry."

Leslie's Weekly: "Probably no class of workers has shared less in the great material prosperity of the country during the past few years than clergymen." Such statements suggested to the writer an examination of our Assembly's minutes just to see how we were getting along on this line. Our Presbyteries report as a whole 1517 ministers. To support whom the Church contributes a total amount of $1,014,800, which is the sum of "Pastor's Salaries," and "Local Home Missions." Were this equally divided among all the ministers it would give to each a salary of $669! But 250 of the number are marked W. C., Tea., Prof., F. M., etc., and shall not be counted now. So then 1267 ministers should the whole sum be divided among them, would get, say, $800 each. But 45 pastors average $2600 each, and 40 average $1500 each, and 100 average $1000 or more, while 50 average about $850; that leaves an average of $650 for the rest, amply sufficient for a celibate if he bought no books, and stayed close at home—but wives and children!

Per contra, the church contributes on an average $4.35 a member annually, or nine and a fraction cents a week, a little more than a cent a day, I open the minutes and on the page that first presents itself I find that a pastor serving two churches with a membership of 142 receives $314, which means an average monthly contribution of say 19 cents a member. Another brother on another page who is S. S. for five churches received from his churches a sum total of $110, an average per member of 63 cents a year. Let any one take the ministers, scan them closely, and he must wonder how on earth a very large proportion of our ministers make buckle and tongue meet.

"They that preach the Gospel must live of the Gospel."

Just to think $650 a year, and living is at least 35 per cent higher than it was four years ago! Wages have gone up, but salaries? This is not a complaint, it is only a statement that should give us pause.

The "Expiatory Monument" to Servetus.

It has been proposed by brethren of the highest standing in the Reformed Churches of Switzerland and of France, that the 350th anniversary of the death of Michael Servetus, burnt in Geneva in 1553, should witness the erection in that city and on the place of the execution, of an expiatory monument.

Such is not to be in honour of his memory or of his views, nor condemnation of Calvin, but as a notification to the world that Calvinists of the Twentieth century separate themselves from that event and deploring Calvin's share in the transaction, make a public apology for the religious intolerance which led to that execution. By doing this, it is said, we will relieve our Churches and our faith from the odium resulting, alike in the popular mind and in reality, from that judicial tragedy, and stand in the presence of our enemies in a better position than we have done hitherto. So far as we are aware, none of the churches outside the countries named have been asked to take any part in this act of humiliation, and all such therefore, may be held to have no right to criticize. But as there will be nothing in the inscription on the stone to indicate that it was erected solely by a number of brethren in Switzerland and France, it is desirable that our readers should know, that not all Calvinists agree in this action of a section of their number.

The call for this monument does not seem so clear to us, as it does to our brethren. From the standpoint of the Twentieth century we unite most sincerely in deploring and condemning the death of Servetus, but from that of the Sixteenth, it is difficult to see what else the Genevan Council could have done. The men of that time had convictions as well as those of today, and believing in the binding obligation of the Old Testament law proclaiming death against the blasphemer, were bound in conscience to act as they did. To have done otherwise would have been to disregard what they held to be a law of God, and to have been false to their own consciences. So long therefore, as we believe in the supreme authority of conscience, we have no apology to offer on their behalf. Neither have we ever been able to see the blame-worthiness of Calvin in the matter. That death resulted not from any intrigue of his but from the civil law of Geneva, a law in force long before Calvin entered the city, and which was the common law of Christendom. We hold Calvin to be no more responsible for the death of Servetus, than is a witness who testifies to seeing a murder committed, or the State Prosecuting Counsel who secures the conviction of the prisoner, for the subsequent execution. What these do, they do in the way of their duty; what Calvin did, he did in the way of his.

But suppose Calvin's blameworthiness were proved up to the hilt, what have our Reformed Churches of the Twentieth century to do with that? Hitherto, these have refused to hold that they are morally responsible for the sins,—crimes, if you like, of any of their members. Such actions our Churches condemn, but the blame rests on the individuals involved. We do not see, therefore, why we should clothe ourselves in sackcloth and ashes, because of an occurrence that took place in the very infancy of the Reformation, with which Calvin was connected, though not the authoritative actor, and which the proposed inscription says, was "the error of his time." We fail to see why the Reformed Church should erect an expiatory monument to the memory of any one or of every one, who may have suffered punishment through the law of the land in order to free herself from alleged complicity therein. In the case before us, Servetus had been already condemned by a Roman Catholic tribunal in Lyons. This had sent a messenger to Geneva asking the Council to surrender the prisoner to it, that he might be put to death. His death in Geneva was thus purely accidental, and as it was, he was burnt in effigy in Lyons for his blasphemy, before he actually died in Geneva. In one aspect it is to be regretted that he was not surrendered, but not so in another. Had he been given up, the cry would never have ceased that Geneva had joined hands with Rome in putting to death a man that was an advocate of freedom of enquiry—the governing principle of the Reformation.

Belief in the rightfulness of civil punishment for heresy was universal at the date of that execution. It had been current among men in every land and from the earliest ages. Heathenism, Judaism, Christianity, Atheism all believed in it. That doctrine was part of the inheritance of error the Reformed Churches received from Rome. In thus believing, the Reformers did as they had been trained to do, and not for many a year were they able to free themselves from its accursed influence. Even yet, the duty of punishing heretics by civil law, is held in many a European State. What is the amount of religious freedom today in Russia, in Austria, in Spain, in Luxemburgh, compared with that in those countries in which the Reformed Church has either presence or influence? We refuse therefore to admit that Calvin when singled out from all individuals, or the Reformed Churches when singled out from all communities, civil or religious, are rightfully dealt with when they are accused of religious intolerance. We claim that the Churches of the Reformation and these alone, stand for the inviolability of the human conscience, and for the right of every man to inquire and judge for himself in the matter of his religious belief. It is from the Reformers and from that open Bible which these have placed in the hand of every individual, that the world for the first time heard the phrase,—“Religious Toleration” and has had its life enriched by the declaration, that God alone is Lord of the conscience.

But will this expiatory monument have the slightest weight with those who now condemn us so freely, or lead them to cease from that cuckoo cry? We do not believe it. Who are they that demand this monument and by what warrant do they speak for others than themselves? The godly men and women of the present or of the past do not ask for it. The Roman Catholic Church does not ask for it, for she herself had previously condemned Servetus to death and sought to carry out her sentence, and when she taunts us with it, our suitable response is to return her taunt, while the Atheistic objectors to all and every religion, who have done the same things themselves and would do the same tomorrow, will only have a new grievance in being deprived of an old one.

It is not easy to justify morally a voluntary assumption of blame by those who are innocent. Our doing so on the present occasion will furnish a new plausibility to the charges against Calvin and the Reformed Churches in particular, and against Christianity and all religion in general. On that monument, Romanist and Free Thinker will read—not the inscription with its disclaimer, but an admission that one great reformer approved of actions that we regard as intolerant and persecuting. For one who will understand that inscription or even regard it as a protest against the civil laws of the Sixteenth century, millions will hear only—“The Reformed Churches have put up in Geneva a monument to Servetus,” and regarding it as a protest against Calvin, accept it as evidence that the Reformed Churches of this century stand doctrinally exactly where Servetus stood when before the Genevan Council.

If, however, we are to have an expiatory monument, let us have a series. Let the Free Thinkers begin with one in Paris, as their protest against the goddess of reason and their own persecutions of the Christians, Protestant and Catholic alike, in France. Let the Roman Catholic Church follow with one in Madrid, in London, in Paris, as her protest against the Inquisition, and the Massacre of St. Bartholomew. Where these have been officially erected by the parties named then—but not till then, will it be in order for the Churches of the Twentieth century to erect one to Servetus in Geneva, and let that say,—that the tragedy of his death aided in delivering the Reformed Churches forever from their inherited erroneous belief in the duty of visiting religious dissent with civil penalties and pains.—Quarterly Register.

The Weakness of Many.

The fatal weakness of very many people is their pride. Pride assumes numerous forms. Very many people, who would not be persuaded to be proud of their fine clothes, are very proud of their virtues. They have great satisfaction in thinking and speaking of their achievements. In some other respects they are remarkably humble. I have just reviewed the Bible record of the reign of King Amaziah, of whom it is said “He did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, yet not like David, his father.” He showed much zeal in executing God’s judgments against the wicked Edomites. That success occasioned the exhibition of a good deal of pride from Amaziah. It is evident that it led him to think that he could do anything which he set out to perform, for he soon proposed to wage war against Jehoash, the king of Israel, presuming that he could readily win a signal victory. Notice what Jehoash said to Amaziah: “Thou hast indeed smitten Edom, and thine heart hath lifted thee up; glory thereof and abide at home, for why shouldst thou meddle to thy hurt, that thou shouldest fall, even thou, and Judah with thee?” Then it is said: “But Amaziah would not hear.” So full of the weakness of pride was he that he would not listen in a heedful way, to the word of warning. And what was the result? God withdrew his support from Amaziah and he suffered a humiliating defeat. It was a severe lesson, but it was required by the case. Amaziah had been taking to himself the credit which belonged to his Lord. In the boldness of his conceit he assumed that he did not need any special help from God. And today there are too many Christians who are so proud that they do not think it is necessary for them to depend upon God for the pardon of their sins. They say that years ago they were cleansed from all sin, and ever since then they have not been under the necessity of asking God to forgive them of any evil deed, because they have not committed any. This is their great weakness. They believe that they are spiritually very strong, yet they are vastly weaker than are those Christians who confess their sins and keep humble.

It is a striking fact that many of the most dangerous temptations which assail Christian people are those that relate to good things. Many a Christian, who would not yield to a temptation to commit a distinctly evil or wicked deed, will yield to a temptation to do a good work in an unrighteous way. Many Christians fall into the snare of so pursuing a certain line of good work as to make it a reproach to Christianity, and hence a harm to unconverted ones. One of the most subtle and dangerous temptations is that which seeks to induce a Christian to believe that he has reached a degree of spirituality which is far in excess of that of the most of his brethren and sisters. He has come to honestly believe that the vast majority of Christians are in a low spiritual condition, while he himself is standing on the very highest plane of spiritual excellence. He groans over the lowness of his brethren, and rejoices over his high living. He feels sorry for those who realize the necessity of their confessing their sins and asking God to pardon them. As for himself he is spared such an unpleasant duty. The simple truth is, such a Christian has yielded to the temptation to value his goodness far beyond its merits. He has yielded to the persuasion that if his faith accepts the proposition that he does nothing which requires him to repent and confess any wrong-doing, he certainly is quite free from such doing. And this reminds one of the fact that one of the most mischievous temptations that can come to a Christian is that of exorcising faith in an entirely unwarranted manner. And it was this very temptation which Satan brought to bear upon Christ in the wilderness. He was asked to go upon a pinnacle of the temple and cast himself down from it, in the faith that God would save him from all harm; but what Christ would not do, there are many Christians in these days who will do. And note the truth that all of Satan's temptations to Christ were in relation to good things, even the very highest. Satan did not tempt Christ to do anything which was directly and purely bad, but he did tempt Christ to go to excesses in good directions, and such temptation is very cunning and full of peril. Beware of turning your good faculties into bad channels!

It is a favorite habit with many who hold to false doctrines to repeatedly assert that their views have become so generally accepted by Christian peoples as well as by others, that scarcely anyone believes otherwise. As an example of this kind I quote from an editorial in a religious paper which is published on the Pacific coast as follows: "Already it is difficult to find, any more, a believer in eternal torment. Preachers have given it up as utterly unreasonable and impossible and their congregations will not longer allow it to be preached to them. The average church member would feel insulted if you charged him with believing in literal torment, or even in extreme mental anguish forever." I characterize this as being a reckless assertion. It is evident that this editor seeks to convey the notion to his readers that nearly all people in the country positively reject the statement that those who die unsaved will experience eternal torment, even though it may be "mental anguish." I affirm that this is untrue. Of course, people who belong to the same class of religionists that he does, do not accept that truth. They reject all in the Bible which declares the eternal suffering of the finally impenitent. And when that editor says that "preachers have given it up," the statement is doubtless true of those who advocate annihilation, Unitarianism and Universalism, either directly or indirectly; but it is false, if applied to genuinely orthodox ministers, for thousands of them fully believe that truth. Undoubtedly many of these ministers do not believe that the suffering of the finally lost ones will be caused by any literal or material fire. I do not accept that view, because I do not think that the Bible really teaches it; but I do know that it teaches the fact of endless suffering, though not necessarily a ceaseless mental anguish without any abatement.

But I now call attention to the fact that religious liberals are habitually saying that the most of people no longer believe the Bible statement that Jonah was swallowed by a fish, or sea monster, nor that even such a man ever lived. They also say that scarcely anyone now believes that Balaam's ass ever spoke as a man speaks. They say, as that editor does, that all such statements are "utterly unreasonable and impossible." Well, so they are, from the standpoint of blind human reason and skeptical brains. Such ones will make the most reckless assertions when they talk about Bible truths which contradict their own conceited opinions. But remember the fact that puny man cannot annihilate the statements of God. C. H. Wetherbe.

On a tombstone marking the resting place of the remains of the late Miss Delia A. Fuller, erected at Sironcha, India, there is inscribed by native hands the touching epitaph: "What a wondrous love that the citizen of the United States should come to Sironcha to die here; is it not the love which is indicated in II Cor. v:14, "For the love of Christ constraineth us?" Who shall say, in view of a fact like this, that missionary work is not appreciated by the natives themselves?—N. Y. Observer.

The Stranger Guest.

'Twas in the gloaming of a weary day,
Soft breezes stirred the leaves of shrub and flow'r,
The birds, home-driven, sought by starlit way
To find sweet rest in fig or olive bow'r.

Out from the city gates along the way,
Two travelers to Emmaus, homeward bound,
Were sadly speaking of some fateful day,
Their hearts bow'd down with sorrow most profound.

A stranger draweth nigh, and all unknown,
He listens as they tell a gruesome tale,
Of men with cruel hands and hearts of stone
Whose deeds of blood might turn bright angels pale.

He questions them, "Why are your hearts agloom?
Why speak ye thus; what has thou heard and seen?
Cleopas saith: "Has thou not heard the doom,
Of him by many called the Nazarene?"

"Between two thieves they nailed him to a cross
'Mid taunts and gibes, the spearman thrust his side;
We trusted we should never mourn such loss,
That He, Immanuel, should here abide.

"This was three days ago, and we did hear
That certain women of our faith this morn,
Unto the tomb whence they had borne his bier
Came eagerly, but found the Master gone.

"Beside his tomb stood angel forms aglow,
Their garments glistening with heavenly light,
And of the Galilean women they would know
'Why seek the living 'mid Death's silent night?"

"He is not here, but he the risen son
Hath conquered death and ye again shall see
The nail prints, marks of vic'try he hath won,
Remember how he spake in Galilee.' "

In tender tones the stranger guest now spake
"Oh fools and slow of heart, why not believe
All that our prophets spake? awake! awake;
Nor longer let unfaith your hearts deceive.

"Ought not the Christ these bitter ills to bear?
The taunts and jibes of Jew and Gentile men,
That he the crown of victory may wear
When his redeemed his glory see again."

And as he spake, how rich in sacred love
Seemed every word from ancient prophets giv'n,
Nor had their hearts so warmly throbb'd before
As now they heard this message fresh from Heav'n.

The trav'lers reach their home, the unknown guest
Essays to journey onward in the night,
But urged to bide and seek refreshing rest,
Tarry awhile, accepting food and light.

Accepting food! aye! He "the bread of life,"
Took crumbs to him from earthly tables giv'n,
Bore all the ills that brood from sin and strife
While "King of Kings" and royal heir of Heav'n.

Accepting light! aye! twere a feebler ray,
Shining upon the all-creating one,
Author of life, of light, of glorious day,
Ere morning stars their anthems first begun.

And as he breaks the bread a bright light
Shines forth, eclipsing now a lamp's pale ray,
These travellers to Emmaus in the night
Had seen and talk'd with Jesus on the way.

The plain and strenuous way in which our North Carolina newspapers have rebuked the recent outrages against the law in this State and South Carolina by the courts of justice (?) gives good hope for the future. A few papers were either silent or attempted to straddle the fence, but the great majority of them we saw called things by their right names and entered their indignant protest against the big burlesque. North Carolina journalists may not all be able, but the majority of them are brave and true.—Charity and Children.

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

The Standard wishes it understood that it is giving editorial space to its Western editor but merely standing aside to see fair play on the proof-text matter.

Rev. W. A. Gillon handles a difficult theme with theological skill. The passage is really more difficult from the Arminian than from the Calvinistic point of view since the Arminian does not admit that it is impossible to renew those whom it deems have fallen away. O. H.'s poems are always welcome and besides being good they do good. William Laurie Hill has also a very tender poem this week. The other articles are commended to our Standard constituency.

The Standard always hates to but in the position of unwillingness to acknowledge an error. But the paragraph on the First Page with regard to the Christian Observer and its Oldest Religious Newspaper Claim is not of that sort. The Banner has already demonstrated that the latter claim cannot be made out and we have no space to quote this week.

The Wilmington Synod.
(Editorial.)

The western part of the State where most of the good-looking preachers live was not fairly represented in the organization of the Synod, though one of them was elected moderator. The Synod met at eleven o'clock in the morning. The Seaboard train got to Wilmington at 12:45 p. m. We do not know what little bird whispered a flattering message in the ear of Dr. A. T. Graham that he should have started for Wilmington the morning before. Several of the western brethren stopped for the night at Hamlet. Some of them tried to go farther on the freight, we know not with what fond ambitions of the reward that might follow promptness. But the freight train broke down; no one wondered when it was recalled that Rev. T. J. Allison and Rev. Billy Wilson were two of the passengers. Wilson is the wag still that he was in college. He was the lucky recipient not long ago of a "box" containing some nice things for himself and his family. Walking down the street in his finery the next day some one noticed his new suit and "Billy" retorted, "Oh that's only an ordinary forty-five dollar suit."

By the time the train picked up the folks that came by Hamlet and those that broke down the freight and waited for us at Lumberton, the train was pretty full. And to add to the crush, Federal Court was in session in Wilmington and the presence of several gentlemen was urgently requested by Uncle Sam in connection with the illicit manufacture of ardent spirits, these gentlemen and the lawyers for the defense. And when we reached the city we learned that President Vardell, D. D., of the Southern Presbyterian College and Conservatory of Music had preached his sermon and the new moderator had been elected without the aid or consent of Mecklenburg and some other Presbyteries.

The aforesaid college must be making its impression upon the people of Robeson county. On the return from Synod on that freight train that had been repaired, we found a fellow-traveller who was much disturbed that the ticket office was closed. We told him that he could pay the conductor who would not charge him anything more as the office was closed. He then became confidential and asked, "What is the tuition from here to Maxton?"

One of the younger brethren, Mr. Starbuck, had an excellent and carefully prepared report on the Bible Cause and Dr. Law followed in one of the best addresses he has delivered since the time he was sandwiched in between the speech of the editor of the Presbyterian Standard and the Presbyterian Sermon of Asheville Presbytery. Some little discussion arose for want of anything better to do as to whether the churches should be requested or enjoined to take up the collection for the Bible Cause. Then after the appointment of the committees the Synod adjourned and went a little later to the elegant reception given by the people of the First Church in the hall set apart for such purposes. There was a warm and witty address of welcome from Dr. Wells, and a like response from Dr. Graham and then sweet music and other refreshments. In fact the only thing about the hospitality of the Wilmington people with which any one could find fault was that there was too much of it with too short intervals between.

The editor was mightily obliged to the Synod for its kindness in hearing him and then talking about the paper he represented. He enjoys that annual patting on the back with the accompanying pin-sticking just as much as anybody. And there is no opportunity to add a few lines in brackets at the end of their remarks.

And sure enough, men and brethren, we need that thousand new subscribers by January first from North Carolina. The case stands this way, to correct an imperfect report in one of the papers. While our subscription list is more than three times what it was when the new management began and the advertising patronage has increased in equal proportion, it is an expensive paper, this thirty-six page paper that we are publishing now. Papers of the same size in the Northern Church sell for three dollars a year. And while the property has become more valuable we have had to pledge the credit of the property to some extent, adding interest charges to our other expenses, and we have had to purchase our equipment. We do not like the idea of going backwards and reducing the size or diminishing the excellence of the paper in any way. And so we asked the brethren "if they conscientiously could" to recommend the paper next Sunday by a concerted effort and endeavor to raise the subscription list to the figure indicated, when its future would seem to be fully assured. Can we not have a long pull and a strong pull altogether? And will not our friends among our subscribers and the sessions of our churches see to it that at least ten new subscribers are sent to us from each pastorate in the North Carolina Synod. Nor will we object to a like effort from without the bounds of the Synod.

We were glad that the brethren had that glimpse of the ocean at Wrightsville Beach and the luck to see the seine full of mullet drawn in. It was really a sight for a landsman to see.

Among the best things of the Synod was the address of Dr. W. M. Morrison on Africa.

Dr. Morrison is a full-blooded, full-throated, full-bearded man, with a clear eye and a ringing voice. He made a powerful plea for missionary work in Africa, told of the fearful slave-trade that is now carried on through the connivance of that old reprobate, Leopold of Belgium, whom the Emperor of Austria recently snubbed for his sins. Dr. Morrison was on his way to Washington to present the cause of the helpless blacks of the Congo Free State to the authorities in Washington and we have since seen the account of the conference with the President. Another very effective speech was that of Dr. Egbert W. Smith for the University minister. The Presbyterians of the State are all interested in having the best possible preacher at Chapel Hill, for the six hundred students gathered there, many of them from Presbyterian homes. We are glad to say that about twelve hundred dollars was pledged, which, with what can be done through the church itself will make an eighteen hundred dollar salary for one of the most efficient and important positions in the Church. We trust that no mistake will be made. He must be a true man who can reach those boys, or any college boys. The Campus is infallible and when it passes an unfavorable judgment once it is handed down from generation to generation of college students.

The Synod was glad to see and to hear the new Charlotte preacher, Rev. M. D. Hardin and the preaching generally was excellent. The communion service was not followed this year by the roll-call of the dead soldiers of the cross and the usual memorial service. God has mercifully spared the lives of us all. We did not hear the discussion of the Sabbath question, nor the addresses of the Secretaries, which came toward the last. But altogether it was a most successful Synod, and we trust will send forth waves of usefulness into the coming years.

CHINA.

Report of the Committee on Presbyterian Union.

Shanghai, October 29th, 1902.

To the Missions and Mission Councils of the Presbyterian Churches in China:

Dear Brethren: The members of Committee present in Shanghai, having conferred upon the subjects referred to us, would present the following report of our discussions and resolutions:

Inasmuch, then, as it is found possible and desirable to unite on the ground of our ascertained harmony in faith and practice, we advise the Missions and Mission Councils which we represent, to make the following recommendations:

A. To the Mission Boards, Committees, and Supreme Courts of those Presbyterian Churches which have established mission work in China, that they recognize the complete independence of the Chinese Churches which by the blessing of God have been planted under their care; and that they authorize their missionaries to take all such steps as may be necessary to complete the formation and to secure the independence of the proposed united Chinese Church.

B. To all Chinese Presbyterian churches:

1. That they take the necessary steps in their respective ecclesiastical courts to unite in one organized church, with such arrangements for government and administration under the Presbyterian order, with needful adaptation to local conditions, as may best subserve the interests of the kingdom of God among the Chinese.

2. That while the documents enumerated under finding 2 (referring to the symbols of the various home churches) are binding on the churches which have adopted them, and while they are here referred to simply for the purpose of showing that in all essentials there is a consensus of faith and practice among these several churches; in entering upon the proposed union the distinctive subordinate standards of any one church be not necessarily adopted by the others.

3. That while the proposed Presbyterian Church of China must necessarily be autonomous and will therefore have the prerogative of formulating its own standards, which will, we believe, in the providence of God and under the teaching of His Spirit, be in essential harmony with the creeds of the parent churches; until such standards be adopted, the distinctive standards of each contracting party entering the union shall be adhered to by that party.

4. That until such time as the proposed united church shall formulate its own creed, possible cases of appeal in matters of doctrine be decided by the consensus of the various subordinate standards of the churches entering the Union.

5. For the information and consideration of the Chinese Churches we refer to the Westminster Shorter Catechism, especially answers 1-40 and 82-99 as being a brief digest of the leading doctrines contained in the symbols of the parent churches.

The committee further unite in making the following recommendation regarding Union:

Resolved, 1. That organic union (rather than federal) is desired.

2. That we recommend the formation of one General Assembly for all China, to meet once every three years.

3. That five Synods be formed, to meet annually if convenient, to be constituted as follows:

For the present each presbytery shall determine the composition of sessions within its bounds.

For the present the basis of membership in each presbytery may remain as before.

The Synod shall consist of all ministers within its bounds, with one ruling elder from each organized church; but any Synod shall have the right to become a delegated body, upon its principle of representation being ratified by the General Assembly.

The General Assembly shall be composed of representatives appointed by the presbyteries in the ratio of one minister and one ruling elder for every seven organized churches, or fraction thereof, within the bounds of the presbytery. An organized church is understood as a congregation having a session. Groups of organized churches not yet organized into a presbytery shall, at the first meeting of the General Assembly, be entitled to representation on the same basis. At the first meeting, of the General Assembly all ministers and elders within China who can do so are expected to attend, all having advisory power, but only authorized delegates having the power of voting."

The Mid-China Mission in meeting September 2nd, 1903, adopted the following recommendations:

Resolved, That we instruct the delegate of this Mission to say to the Committee on Union when it meets in November, 1903,

1. That we approve of recommendation A on page 5 of the Report; also B 1.

2. That until the contracting parties shall have agreed upon a standard of doctrine to be used in deciding cases of appeal their union cannot be organic but only federal.

3. It is our earnest desire that the Westminster Confession of Faith be the standard of doctrine. If a more condensed statement of doctrine be desired we should not be satisfied with anything less than the entire Westminster Short Catechism.

4. While fully recognizing the autonomy of the proposed united church we object to the intimations found in 2, 3, 4, 5 of recommendation B, which seem to suggest to this independent church that it manifest its independence by at once preceeding to cast aside standards formulated after ages of each for the truth.

5. That the first General Assembly shall consist of all ministers in China and one elder from each organized church.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Mebane, N. C., Nov. 2nd, 1903.

This is the eighth call upon our subscribers and it is for the purpose of helping Brother W. S. Wilson, of Marion, to pay the mortgage on manse. This call was heartily endorsed by the Committee of Synodical Home Missions. Brother W. S. Wilson writes as follows: "I hereby make application to your committee for one hundred dollars to aid in paying for a manse at Marion. This manse was built three years ago at a cost, including interest, of about $1,100. Of this amount $718.69 has been paid, leaving a balance due of $381.31. When it is taken into consideration that this is a weak church and that during the past two years, in addition to what has been paid on this manse the church has become self-supporting and has increased over fifty per cent its contributions to benevolent causes, has been called upon to make some necessary repairs to its church property, it will be seen that our people have been liberal and have made a noble effort to come up to the measure of their duty. But the reasons for our making this request are these: We believe that with this assistance our people can be stimulated to raise enough to cancel the entire indebtedness by the time the mortgage on the property falls due. And we believe that to thus encourage this church means a great deal for the future of Presbyterianism in McDowell county. To cancel this debt means to put this church on its feet and to make way for an increased evangelistic effort in this county.

Please send us promptly one dollar, or more if you can, to aid in this noble work. Address

Rev. R. W. Hines,
Mebane, N. C.

GEORGIA

"NACOOCHEE INSTITUTE" a high grade preparatory school under control of Athens Presbytery was opened Nov. 2nd. Addresses were made by Judge E. C. Kontz of Atlanta, Rev. D. J. Blackwell chairman board of trustees, and Rev. J. T. Wade, the principal of the school.

This school is destined to do great things for the mountain region of Northeast Georgia. Board, light, fuel $10 at the hotels. Further information will be cheerfully furnished by the principal, Rev. J. T. Wade, Santee, White County, Ga.

WEST VIRGINIA.

PARSONS.—The Parsons Church is building a handsome and commodious manse, well situated. Members are uniting with the church steadily.

KENTUCKY.

CYNTHIANA.—We just closed, Sunday Nov. 1, a meeting at Mt. Pleasant Church in which God's people were revived and sinners converted. "Uncle Joe" Hopper came to us from Synod and, beginning Oct. 18th, preached for us twice a day until the 30th, the "old old story" in his plain earnest way, and God honored his own word. Twenty were received into this church on examination, eight of whom were baptized. One was received by letter. There are others whom we expect soon. Dr. S. A. McElroy preached for us Saturday night and the fall communion was administered Sunday. Our hearts are greatly cheered. We thank God and take courage.

ARKANSAS.

FOREST CITY.—At an adjourned meeting of the Presbytery of Arkansas, Oct. 14th., Mr. H. M. McLain was ordained and installed Pastor of this church. He enters upon his work with much promise. He serves the Brinkley church also.

TENNESSEE.

NASHVILLE —Rev. G. W. Bull, D. D., of Atlanta has accepted the call to become pastor of the Moore Memorial Church. This welcome news was announced at the Prayer meeting Wednesday night and was received with much gratification.

SWEETWATER.—Rev. J. L. Bachman has been tendered the office of Synodical Evangelist for Tennessee, but has not yet signified his acceptance.

NASHVILLE.—The West Nashville Church has secured the services of Mr. F. H. Daniel as stated supply.

MURFREESBORO.—The week of prayer for young men, Nov. 8 to 14 will be observed by a union meeting lasting one week.

The Columbia Presbytery convened at 10 o'clock this morning at the First Presbyterian Church in this city.

The purpose of the meeting was to dismiss Rev. R. S. Brown, pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Lynnville, who goes to the Presbytery of Potosi, of Missonri, where he goes to take charge of the important pastorate of the city, Cape Girardeau, Mo. The dismissal was formally made, with great regret on the part of the members of Columbia Presbytery. During his pastorate at Lynnville, Mr. Brown was eminently successful, and he left the church there in the most prosperous condition it has ever known. As a preacher of the gospel, he was recognized as one of the very ablest in the Presbytery.

"In dismissing the Rev. R. S. Brown to the Presbytery of Potosi, the Presbytery of Columbia enters upon its record the following testimony and resolutions:

"The Presbytery desires to bear a grateful witness to the long, faithful and distinguished service which this, our beloved brother, has ever cheerfully rendered this body. Long after this minute of the Court shall have been forgotten, 'Hay Long' College at Mt. Pleasant and the 'Robt. B Jones' High School at Lynnville—the splendid Presbyterian institutions which R. S. Brown was largely instrumental in founding and fostering—will remain as monuments to his energy and devoted loyalty to his Church and Presbytery.

"In every aggressive work, in abundant and fruitful labors wherever called by this Presbytery, in the high standard of his pulpit ability, in his devotion as a pastor, he was ever foremost among us and ever an example and inspiration to all his brethren.

"Therefore be it resolved:

"1. That we extend to the church at Lynnville, so greatly distressed by this action which Brother Brown feels compelled to take, the Presbytery's heartfelt sympathy.

"2. That we commend the Rev. R. S. Brown to his new charge at Cape Girardeau and to the Presbytery of Potosi as a brother worthy of all honor and love and as a man with a record for efficient service equalled by few.

"3. That it is with a deep sense of personal loss and with every assurance of our abiding affection that only at his urgent request do we now dissolve the union between us and the church that loves him so tenderly.

"4. That we do invoke upon him and his dear family the richest blessings of the Great Head of the Church in this new field of labor.

"Also be it resolved:

"That copies of this paper shall be furnished and published as Presbytery may hereafter direct."

Rev. J. B. Gordon, recently from Kentucky was received into the Presbytery and arrangements were made for his early installation as pastor of the church at Lewisburg.—Exchange.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Winston-Salem, Nov. 2.—Yesterday was a red-letter day for the Presbyterians of this city. Before the administration of the Sacrament at the morning service, twenty persons were added to the membership of the church, eight of whom were baptized. There was a large attendance of communicants and the service was in every respect both delightful and inspiring. At the close of the service, Dr. Caldwell, the pastor, read the following letter, signed by eight of Winston-Salem's prominent young business men, viz.: Messrs. Thomas Maslin, George S. Norfleet, E. L. Anderson, R. C. Norfleet, R. W. Gorrell, James Sloan, George T. Brown, E. W. O'Hanlon:

"We, the undersigned, do respectfully offer our services voluntarily for the purpose of organizing a movement for the erection of a new building for the Sabbath school and general congregational uses, and for the improvement of the entire church property.

"Should the management of this enterprise be intrusted to our hands, we shall endeavor to carry it out successfully, and at the earliest time practicable. We desire to enlist the interest and cooperation of the entire congregation, especially the young men. We shall of course expect the ladies to meet together as soon as convenient to organize bands among themselves and among the children for the raising of money in any way approved by the officers of the church.

"We shall gladly receive the counsel and assistance of the older men, and shall expect them to take part with us in the work.

"At present we are unable to state definitely anything regarding the style and cost of the building, except to say that we desire something in keeping with the position and standing of our Church in this community and in the State.

"If our services are accepted in this matter, we shall ask for a meeting of the people at an early day to consider our definite plans."

Dr. Caldwell made the letter, which was a pleasant surprise to the entire congregation, the basis for a stirring appeal. At the close of the night service the elders of the church met and decided to call a meeting of the congregation at an early date to act upon the generous offer made by the young men.—Charlotte Observer.

HAWFIELDS AND CROSS ROADS.—Last Sunday, Nov. 1st, we closed a meeting of unusual interest at Hawfields church. Rev. Wm. Black was with us for eight days, preaching with much acceptance and power. God's Spirit also was with us manifestly, and the Church was greatly revived. Large and growing congregations hung upon the preaching of the Word, prevailing dissensions were healed, many Christians were moved to reconsecrate themselves, and about 50 persons professed faith in Christ. Of these 46 joined Hawfields church and a few others are expected to join later.

It was a most precious season of grace, for which we thank God and take courage.

During the latter part of August Rev. J. H. Grey assisted in a meeting at Cross Roads, in which the church was edified and refreshed, and some souls were led to the Saviour. Bro. Grey won the warmest sort of place in the hearts of this people. Beginning Oct. 12th, the pastor preached for five nights at Woodlawn school house, on the outskirts of Cross Roads congregation, in which meeting seven souls obtained a hope in Christ.

The 2nd Sunday in October Messrs J. W. Stainback, Jas. Anderson and W. B. Sellers were ordained and installed as Ruling Elders in Cross Roads Church.

The three churches of this charge, Hawfields, Cross Roads and Bethany, have given their pastor a two months' vacation, with such cheerfulness and unanimity that he scarcely knows whether to feel flattered or not.

GASTONIA.—The Session has received 42 members since April 1st. Four additional elders and four new deacons have been elected by the congregation. These will be ordained and installed at an early date. This gives a Session of twelve and a Diaconate of ten.

FIRST CHURCH, ASHEVILLE.—On Sunday, October 25, six elders and four deacons were installed. The new elders are James F. Johnston, T. C. H. Dukes, Frank Cross, S. D. Holt, James P. Kerr, and Herman Meader.

The new deacons are D. S. Watson, J. H. McConnell, D. L. Jackson and W. S. Cain. It is an interesting fact, illustrating the cosmopolitan character of the membership of this church and of the population of Asheville, that these ten officers represent seven States of the Union and one foreign country. Six other States are represented in the Session and board of deacons, making in all thirteen States and one country beyond the sea.

The States represented are Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama and Louisiana.

Mr. Herman Meader was born in Saxony, now a part of the German Empire. The Confederate army and the United States navy are represented, also the following twenty-three lines of business: Educator, physician, dentist, blacksmith, engineer, undertaker, lawyer, capitalist, insurance agent, grocer, hotel keeper, restaurateur, confectioner, baker, fruiterer, real estate agent, hardware dealer, fowl breeder, ice and coal dealer, furniture dealer, dealer in carriages and machinery, lumberman and electric service.

DAVIDSON.—Our congregation was singularly fortunate in having with us recently Rev. Dr. E. O. Gnerrant, of Wilmore, Ky. He was returning home from a successful meeting in Winston-Salem, and stopped over at Davidson on a short visit to his sons who entered the college this fall. Dr. Gnerrant conducted two services, in the morning telling of the work of the "Soul Winners" in the mountains of Kentucky, Tennessee and North Carolina, and an interesting, heart-moving story it was. At night he preached with fine effect on the reasons for being a Christian.

Among the entertainments of the fall, mention should have been made of a lecture some days ago by Prof. Wyche on the folk-lore stories of the South. The lecture in addition to affording entertainment is of real value, as giving instruction in a line of study that is not without its importance.

MISSOURI.

Woman's Missionary Union.

The ninth annual meeting of the Woman's Missionary Union of Potosi Presbytery was held in the Presbyterian Church, Farmington, Mo., on Tuesday, October 13th, 1903, at 7:30 p. m. Rev. C. E. Hickok preached the opening sermon from Jonah 3:2. This was accompanied by a tabulated report of sums contributed to Foreign Missions by the Woman's Missionary Unions of the Synod of Missouri as compared with the amount given by the churches of the Synod for the same cause; presented on a canvas at the side of the preacher so as to be easily read by the congregation. A showing very creditable to the ladies as their offerings were in excess of the sums given by the churches.

On Wednesday morning after devotional exercises conducted by Rev. Geo. W. Harlan the exercises of the Union occurred as arranged in an excellent program previously prepared and published.

Of the eighteen societies connected with the Union seven were represented by fourteen delegates.

Of these eighteen societies six are strictly Missionary, four are Missionary and Aid and eight are Aid Societies. Reports from sixteen were presented, from which we learn that the six Missionary Societies have an average membership of twenty-two. The meetings occur monthly with average attendance of ten. The sum of their contributions during the year amounted to $330. This would be largely increased by the offerings of the Aid Societies, the majority of which contribute to the important cause of Foreign Missions.

Papers were read on the following topics: Join Faith and Works, The Responsibility of Being God's Stewards and The Prominence of Missions in the Bible; all of which were well prepared and of great excellence. The subjects: The Needs of Our Missions, and Plans for the Coming Year, elicited a free and full discussion of great interest. Although the weather was somewhat inclement the attendance was large and all the proceedings from beginning to end were happily conducted with great enthusiasm as evinced by the thank offering for Foreign Missions of $204.37, the largest ever given on a similar occasion.

By invitation of President F. T. Appleby of Elmwood Seminary on Wednesday night the ladies of the Union attended a recital in the chapel of the Seminary given by Misses Rose E. Routh and Elmo Hammet, teachers of vocal music and elocution, whose exercises were exceedingly interesting, giving ample evidence of their talent and efficiency as teachers. This rare entertainment formed a fitting close of this meeting of the Union which from first to last was one of great delight. Officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows: President, Mrs. G. W. Harlan, Farmington, Mo.; vice presidents, 1st, Mrs. W. W. Killough, Perryville, Mo.; 2nd, Mrs. C. W. Latham, Jackson, Mo.; 3rd, Mrs. C. E. Hickok, Farmington, Mo.; 4th, Mrs. Otto Kochtitzky, Cape Girardeau, Mo.; secretary and treasurer, Miss Elsie Cayce, Farmington, Mo. The next annual meeting, the 10th, will be held in Potosi, Mo., October, 1904.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Notes From South Carolina Presbytery.

Rev. Jas. L. McLin has been granted a letter of dismissal to Euoree Presbytery where he goes to take a group of churches with the Todd Memorial Church in Laurens as the center. Bro. McLin has worked several years in this Presbytery and leaves many warm friends behind. His work at Belton will be taken up by Rev. J. G. Law under the Home Mission Committee. Bro. McLin had just gotten up the money and was negotiating with contractors to build a $1,500 church at this place at the cotton mills.

The pastoral relation between Rev. J. T. Wade and the Easley church was dissolved and he has been granted permission to accept a Mission school in the renowned Nacoochee valley in Athens Presbytery. Rev. R. G. McLees was permitted to accept the call from Synod to become its General Evangelist. The fruits of Bro. McLees' labors are becoming more and more conspicuous. The blessing of our Lord is surely upon his work.

Brother Wardlaw has not yet accepted the call to the Superintendentcy of Synodical Missions.

Rev. J. C. Shive who was so recently installed over the large country churches of Upper Long Cane and Little Mountain has again been called to the bedside of his suffering wife at Hot Springs, Ark., where she has been for more than a year seeking restoration to health. The trials of this zealous brother for the past few years have been many-fold and call forth the tenderest sympathy of his brethren.

It is interesting to note that there are 148 Presbyterian boys at Clemson College. The need of a resident pastor at that point becomes more evident each year.

N. B.—If any one can inform the Stated Clerk of the early records of South Carolina Presbytery they will confer a great favor upon him by doing so at once. He recently began a diligent search for them and is unable to locate those of an early date. These records are priceless and I trust every one interested will lend me a helping hand in this search.

Hugh R. Murchison, Stated Clerk.

The World.

Wireless communication has been established between Japan and Formosa.

A statement from the Vatican says that there will be no cardinal appointed in the United States in the near future.

Baron Sternberg, German Ambassador to the United States, after an audience with the Emperor, will return to Washington.

President Loubet has received the invitation to attend the New Orleans centennial celebration and will send a French warship.

The annual report of Commissioner Richards, of the United States Land Office, deals with the great frauds in the West.

The American anthem and flag were hissed at a minstrel performance in Vancouver to such an extent that the curtain had to be rung down.

The Empress Dowager is preparing to leave Peking for Kai Fong, capital of the Province of Honan, in view of possible trouble in Russia.

William O'Brien, the Irish Nationalist leader, has retired, and suspended his paper, because of lack of support and continued persecution.

The Czar and Kaiser and their Ministers of Foreign Affairs met at the Castle of Darmstadt. There are rumors of an arbitration entente between them.

An effort will be made at the coming session of Congress to create a Colonial Department, with a Secretary, who shall be a member of the President's Cabinet.

An important commission of German technical experts is now en route to America to study American systems of finance, commercialism and the technique of its manufacturing enterprises.

Sleeping car service has been inaugurated on the electric lines between Columbus, Ohio, and Indianapolis, Ind. The cars are complete sleepers and are equipped with 600-horse power motors.

Laredo, Texas, Nov. 8.—The yellow fever scourge continues with little abatement. The official bulletin tonight shows the following: New cases 12; deaths none; total cases to date 723; total deaths 66.

Edward L. Wentz, the young Philadelphia millionaire, who disappeared, is in the hands of his abductors in the mountains of southwest Virginia, and a ransom of $100,000 is demanded for his release.

The Academy of Sciences, which awards the Nobel prize, has decided that the recipients for this year shall be as follows: Literature, Henrik Ibsen and Bjornstjerne Bjornson; physics, Signor Marconi; and medicine, Dr. Finsen.

Amid the intense excitement of a vast crowd, consisting of experts, the Siemens electric train on October 23 achieved the record speed of 207 kilometers, or about 129 3-4 miles per hour, beating the record of the last previous trial by six kilometers.

The birthplace of Charles Dickens in Landport, near the Portsmouth dockyard, was sold at auction on September 29. The mayor of Portsmouth, representing the people of his city, bought the house for 1,125 pounds, and announces that it will probably be converted into a Dickens museum.

At a recent session of the International Congress of Actuaries, held in New York, the comforting fact was brought out that the improved conditions of modern life, as shown by statistics of the insurance companies extending over half a century, have resulted in a decided increase of the length of life of the average individual.

Russia has reiterated its demands for execution of the Chinese official in Mukden, Prince Yuan, who was sent to Mukden by the Dowager to investigate, and die. The Chinese are greatly wrought up over Russia's operations in Manchuria, but show a disposition to give Japan threats to sever friendly relations with China.

In Germany it is intended to make the restored Saalsburg in the Rhine country a museum for antiquities from the Roman occupation and earlier times. To decorate the museum various statues of Roman emperors are in preparation. The sculptor Goetz, of Berlin, has completed his models of Adrian and Alexander Servetus and submitted them to the German Emperor.

Official advices received fully confirm the massacre at Warmbad, Damarland, German West Africa, by Bondelz war tribes. The Germans fought gallantly to the end but were overwhelmed. It is believed that none of them escaped. Warmbad was burned. Reports of isolated murders of German traders are also coming in. The rebellion in Damarland is officially attributed to distress caused by drought.

Of recent years the annual catch of salmon in the Pacific States and Alaska (which latter supplies half the pack of the world) has been over 100,000,000 pounds. In 1899 the quantity of salmon packed was 2,450,000 cases of 48-pound cans. The weight of the fish represented by this pack, together with the large quantities sold fresh, salted, and smoked, was about 175,000,000 pounds, in market value, $9,000,000.

Minister Powell, at San Domingo, defied the government there, and caused the United States steamer to sail without her clearance papers, which were refused. She had cargo for Puerto Plata, and the Government wanted it discharged at San Domingo City. This Minister Powell refused, claiming that no notice of blockade had been given. Minister appealed again for a warship, and it is expected that the Baltimore will reach there today.

Dispatches from Europe state that the second Ziegler North Pole expedition has failed to reach Franz Josef Land. Mr. Ziegler does not credit the report. A letter was received not so very long ago from Mr. Fiala, who stated that it was probable that his ship would reach Franz Josef Land and winter there. Otherwise it would have been necessary to return to Norway before this. The ship had not coal enough to keep under steam all this time. Had she failed, Mr. Ziegler believes he would certainly have heard from Mr. Fiala by this time.

George B. McClellan (Democrat) will be the next mayor of Greater New York, having defeated Mayor Seth Low for re-election by a plurality of 63,617, complete unofficial returns having been received from every election district in the city. By the same returns Comptroller Edward M. Grout and Charles W. Fornes, president of the board of aldermen, running for re-election on the Democratic ticket, though elected two years ago as Fusionists, defeated their Fusion opponents by 66,790 and 64,973 plurality, respectively, Comptroller Grout leading the city ticket.

Two negro men, three women and four children, gaunt, hollow-eyed and ragged have arrived at New York from Europe, en route to their home in Acilla, Ga., from Monrovia. They constituted part of the survivors of a party of 56 Southern negroes who about a year ago were sent by a number of Southern Philanthropists as an experiment in colonizing American negroes in Liberia. Financial aid in the colonization scheme was furnished by planters. It was hoped the growing of cotton would mark the success of the venture as reports had shown the soil of Monrovia adaptable to its growth. Disaster after disaster followed the experiment. The natives were hostile and finally the jungle fever broke out and wrought havoc among the colonists. Their provisions were depleted and they lived partly on native roots. The party which came back did so on funds furnished by former employers in Georgia.

Whether or not this country is gravitating into hard times is a question that arouses serious discussion. On the one side we see steel mills closing, cotton mills closed, railroads laying off thousands of men, trusts involved in debt and scandal, buyers hesitating, and a few banks closing their doors. On the other side are to be seen splendid crops of wheat, corn and cotton selling at favorable figures, an easy money market, and an inflow of gold that would ordinarily cheer the heart of a pessimist. The direction to be taken by the country as a resultant of these two sets of forces is still uncertain. Meantime the papers prefer for the most part to look on the bright side of the picture. Some of them almost perform the feat of extracting sunshine from cucumbers. The failures are regarded as an encouraging indications because they "eliminate the weak spots" in the situation; the falling off in bank clearings "is chiefly due to the decline in speculation"; and the closing of mills and factories "makes the outlook much brighter than it would be if yards and storehouses were being filled with products seeking a market at any sacrifice."—Literary Digest.

Now that the Government has taken up the work of irrigating the arid lands, it is proposed that this should be accompanied by a policy looking to the protection of the Mississippi valley from floods. To this end, a convention of the Interstate Mississippi River Valley Improvement and Levee Association was held in New Orleans last week, to which delegates were sent from various States. Commercial bodies and several railroads were also represented. Resolutions were adopted urging that the Government build and maintain a permanent and adequate system of embankments from Cairo, Ill., to the Gulf. It is estimated that the work of construction will cost from twelve to fifteen million dollars. To begin with, $2,000,000 will be asked for to be expended during the coming two years, in accordance with the recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission, which has now an annual appropriation of $1,000,000 for levee work. The balance is to be given in separate appropriations from time to time as the improvements proceed. President Roosevelt, in a letter to the convention, emphatically favors the protection of the Mississippi lowlands by levees, and it is presumed that he also favors the undertaking of that work by the Government. He said that the movement is "one of importance to the whole country, no less than to the people immediately adjoining the great river."—Literary Digest.

The following telegram was sent Nov. 6 by the State Department to Mr. Ehrman, the acting Consul General of the United States at Panama:

"The people of Panama have, by an apparently unanimous movement, dissolved their political relations with the Republic of Colombia and assumed their independence. When you are satisfied that a de facto government, republican in form and without substantial opposition from its own people, has been established in the State of Panama, you will enter into relations with it as the responsible government of the territory and look to it for all due action to protect the persons and property of citizens of the United States and to keep open the Isthmian transit in accordance with the obligations of existing treaties governing the relations of the United States to that territory."

Immediately afterward an instruction was sent by telegraph to Mr. Beauper, the United States Minister at Bogota, in the following terms:

"The people of Panama, having by an apparently unanimous movement dissolved their political connections with the Republic of Colombia and assumed their independence, and having adopted a government of their own, republican in form, with which the Government of the United States of America has entered into negotiations, the President of the United States, in accordance with the ties of friendship which have so long and so happily existed between the respective nations, most earnestly commends to the Governments of Colombia and of Panama the peaceful and equitable settlement of all questions at issue between them. He holds that he is bound not merely by treaty obligations but by the interests of civilization to see that the peaceful traffic of the world across the Isthmus of Panama shall not be longer disturbed by a constant succession of unnecessary and wasteful civil wars."

The first week of the extra session will be devoted to the usual preliminaries of a new session of Congress. The programme for the week is to have four brief sessions and an adjournment on Thursday until the following Monday. Tomorrow the proclamation calling the Congress in extraordinary session will be read. This will be followed by the appointment of a committee to notify the President that the Senate is ready to receive any communication he has to make. On Tuesday the President's message will be received and read. Adjournment will follow its reading as a caucus of Republican Senators is to be held in the afternoon.

Wednesday will be devoted largely to the introduction of bills and Thursday will be a short executive session, unless discussion of the Panama situation is precipitated by the introduction of resolutions asking for information. It is the intention of Senator Morgan to introduce resolutions on the subject, and these may be discussed under the rules on the day following their presentation. The Republican members of the Senate will interpose no objection to a discussion of the Panama and canal questions, but it is not likely that any action will be taken until after the committees are organized.

The principal topic of discussion in Canada since our last issue has been the Alaskan boundary discussion. It is likely to remain a principal topic of discussion for a considerable time to come.

The situation may be briefly recapitulated. Alaska formerly belonged to Russia, from which country it was in the time of W. H. Seward, then U. S. Secretary of State, purchased by the United States. It is said to have been purchased by Seward, while the United States was smarting under a sense of British unfriendliness during the Civil War, with the view that it might some day be a thorn in the side of Britain. Better relations between the British Empire and the United States have grown up; and since Britain's friendliness to the great English speaking Republic during the recent Spanish-American war, these relations have even developed into cordiality. But the Alaskan boundary had long been a matter of controversy; Britain desired its settlement; Canada desired its settlement; the United States also desired its settlement, though less anxiously, perhaps, as being already in possession of most of what it desired. Earnestly wishing all differences adjusted, Great Britain promoted a sort of arbitration, or adjudication, it makes little difference what it is called, with three persons on each side. When the United States named its three representatives, Canada objected to them on the ground that they were not unprejudiced men, having strongly, openly and frequently prejudged the case against Canada, on the principle of "my own country right or wrong." One of Canada's grievances is that before Canada's protest had been taken into consideration, the treaty was ratified by the British authorities. To make a long story short, Lord Alvertone, one of the three representatives on the Canadian side, has concurred for the most part in the United States contentions, with the result that a considerable portion of important Alaskan frontier and sea-front held by Canadians to belong to Canada, has now been adjudged, by four out of the six jurors to belong to the United States. The two Canadians on the board of adjudicators, Mr. Aylesworth, K C, and Sir Louis Jette, declined to sign the award, refusing to make the finding unanimous, and leaving the result to be accomplished by majority vote. The result has been received with dissatisfaction in Canada, the careful Montreal Witness, for example, asserting that "in the evolution of Canadian nationality this award may have deeper significance than anything that has ever occurred in the relations of the Dominion to the empire and the republic." The Toronto News begins an editorial article as follows: "The lesson for Canada in the Alaskan award cannot be understood. We have nothing to gain from British diplomacy, and less from American friendship."

It is only right to remember Great Britain "counts the friendship of the United States as her chief security in case she should become involved in war in Europe and one of the great ends of her diplomacy is to maintain good relations with Washington;" especially as she knows other European powers, notably Russia, earnestly desire to have Britain and the United States estranged.

Meantime, as the Dominion Premier has wisely advised, it is important we should be calm in regard to this matter, keep our mental balance, and not think because we have lost something we have lost everything. Who knows Providence may not bring much ultimate good out of the Alaskan boundary settlement, distasteful to Canada for the moment as it is? An accentric but sagacious banker has this carved on his mantel-piece:

"I am an old man now; I've had lots of Trouble, and most of it never happened."

Deaths.

Gain to part from all my grief;
Gain to bid my sins farewell;
Gain, of all my gains the chief,
Ever with the Lord to dwell;
This Thy people's portion, Lord,
Peace on earth and bliss on high;
This their ever sure reward,
"Christ to live, and gain to die."
Ralph Wardlaw.

CLEMENTS.—Sunday morning, October 18th John Bunyan Clements, an esteemed member of the Henderson Presbyterian Church, fell asleep in Jesus, aged 72. A faithful husband and father, a loyal friend, a good citizen and a conscientious Christian, he leaves a large circle of relatives and friends truly bereaved. He is survived by a widow, four married daughters and a son.

"At even time it shall be light."

Pastor.

PORTER.—Resolutions of respect passed by the Ladies' Aid Society of Sharon Church:

Since it has pleased Almighty God to remove from our midst Mrs. Zenos Porter, one of the oldest and best beloved of our members, therefore, be it resolved:

I. While we grieve over our loss and sorrow that she will no longer meet and work with us in the service of our Lord, we humbly bow to the will of Him who "doeth all things well," and rejoice in the hope that our loss is her gain.

II. We extend our deep sympathy to her Husband and family and pray God to comfort and sustain them.

III. That the Presbyterian Standard and the Charlotte Observer be requested to print these resolutions, that a copy be sent to the family and that they be recorded in our book of minutes.

Mrs. Ed. Kirkpatrick,
Mrs. Thos. Alexander,
Mrs. W. H. Davis,
Committee.

Nov. 1st, 1903.

SHARPE.—Jessie Alton Sharp, grandson of Rev. A. M. Watson, and son of Mr. and Mrs. T. M. Sharp, died in Aberdeen, N. C., July 17, 1903. He was a child of the covenant. Age thirteen months and twenty-nine days.

Safe in the arms of Jesus,
Safe on his gentle breast;
There by his love o'er shaded,
Sweetly my soul shall rest.

The Household.

Priceless Idleness.

Mrs Dexter was swaying gently in the hammock under two great maple trees. An underlying current of "duty call" kept tugging at some inner consciousness; but the lady simply could not give it hearing. Vacation days were waning.

There were stitches to be taken and letters to be written that called for immediate attention. Harry's French flannel blouse and Mira's shirtwaists absolutely must be finished before the near return to the city. Careful directions must be prepared and sent to the "assistant" who soon would have the homestead in readiness for the family's return. Mrs. Dexter fully realized on going to the country that the needed change could not mean days of idleness for the mother and usually busy house-keeper. No, indeed!

The lower layer of articles in her closely packed trunk consisted of wearing apparel partly made and to be finished "by hand." So when the young people and some of the older ones went off on various picnics and alluring summer junketings, she dutifully stationed herself on piazza or lawn and stitched away, meantime rejoicing in pure air, clear sunshine, and the robin's ecstatic song. She took one entire day for the beach excursion embracing all the boarders in the house, and despite the weariness involved, enjoyed it. Then for several days she again dutifully stitched and matched, made buttonholes, ran, felled, gathered and whipped, all for the needs of the autumn, O.

Then, besides all this, vacation jaunts and rambles necessitate plenty of mending and darning, for where, pray, is the loving, indulgent mother that is going to forbid Harry to leap stone walls, climb hedges or trees, or Mira to tear through stubb fields beset with horns and briars in quest of berries and such, all on a summer's holiday? But one sweet, fragrant morning off went nearly the entire mixed family, for a long tramp to some fort or other where tradition had done its work in making the spot famous, and a place "to be sure to go to" during the vacation sojourn. Mrs. Dexter had secretly planned to accomplish wonders with pen and needle on this beautifully quiet day. The troop tramped away soon after breakfast, so she would recline in the broad hammock under the sweetly overshadowing maples just for a moment or two. And here it was that we first saw her, with the "duty call" tugging away but listened to as it were from afar off. For O, the glory of the day! The sky was one splendid, shimmering panorama, the mother o' pearl stretches so soft and beautifully bent that a little study began of how some celestial brush must have touched these broken wave of silvery white, so like a long faint feather sweeping the pale blue canopy, or left in dots and half circles meandering off into transparent sheets of whitey blue and blueish white. It was so unspeakably restful, just watching the half-described figures in that heavenly sky! Then, lower down, a more billowy set of clouds rose majestically below the mother o' pearl, showing fantastic shapes and setting imagination dreamily at work on fancies galore. The duty call gave an unwelcome tug just as a robin, a late one, broke into its cheerful yet memory haunting carol. Some influence stronger than the duty call made Mrs. Dexter think that a voice of the air cried to her: "Oh, let your soul talk to your eyes, stay where you are, drink in the unspeakable help and lullaby of this soothing scene: give yourself up to its inspiration; it was not chance that brought you to the hammock, and no man wielded the delicate and skillful brush that spread this wide encircling canvas for your very heart's delight." Then it seemed as though a lion, head and mane and tail, reared its gigantic body from midst a very wonder of a cloud. It came on and on. Suddenly the white billow parted. The lion was gone. Next the enormous head and receding shape of a whale loomed clearly from midst another sailing mass of foam. It rose high, as it were, from its bed of surf, opened its great mouth as if to devour; something resembling a bunch of thistle down floated across its forbidding head. The whale had suddenly dissolved. The next figure was ominous, fear-inspiring, but nameless. There was the semblance of a great hideous head, sharp teeth, disheveled hair; a fierce countenance. Its shape was forbidding, but uncertain. Ah! and following in its train were a succession of little myths, spooks, goblins, creatures but imperfectly outlined yet full of dark suggestion, all the more dreaded and dreadful because of their undefined and mysterious appearance. Behold! Hovering above the gruesome procession came a perfect shape, that of a dove. It nestled in the very heart of the nameless beast, built a nest there, fluttered its snowy wings, and, lo, a miracle! The beast and its goblin minions formed other doves.; A great glorious couch of sea caps apparently bore them toward some throne, an altar sprang out from the throne, and all over were white, transparent arches, and the air seemed laden with a kind of white, clear, yet voiceless chorus of "Peace, peace, peace.!"

"Oh, how like my life!" said Mrs. Dexter, in soft, outspoken speech. "How like the phantoms that rise out of what should be a clear and hopeful sky. I see lions in my way, and whales; cares, anxieties, unadjusted and dispelled. A kindly, Fatherly ordering lets them not come too near. Worst of all, indeed, are the host of nameless dreads, fears, ominous suggestions, wife and mother anxieties, household perplexities that oft arise and stare at me, actually stare at me in the night watches, sometimes in the early morn, each uncanny shape taking to itself another, until almost perforce I cry: 'Our Father!' Then Peace like a white dove gently broods and settles. Under the more wholesome influence the phantoms disappear. The quiet yet dispelling presence gives me fresh nerve and strength. Then behold a miracle indeed! As Fear and Dread recede, dear doves of Peace and Progress take their place. Can't the clouds, with their illusive form and imaginary pursuers, teach me faith, teach me courage, give me rest?"

Mrs. Dexter was asleep, fast asleep. The duty call had been effectually silenced. The murmuring maples conspired with the whispering breeze and the robin's lulling note, and the next sound that roused her was the dinner bell. Somehow she ignored the faint tug of the duty call for all day. She walked across the flowery meadow in the afternoon; then sought the hammock again. Sleep came a second time, as if to woo into entire forgetfulness each phantom of care or unnecessary allegiance to the work god.

But what she accomplished the next day! Enough to entirely satisfy her. "It shall each me a lesson for all winter long," she said. "When the goblins of care assail and distress me, I will defy them by taking a day off."

And Peace is a dove that oft comes for the asking.—Cristian Work and Evangelist.

A Sweet, Low Voice.

"If the rising generation of American girls is not taught to use the speaking voice properly we shall develop into a race of unconscious, unintentional shrews. If some rich woman wished to bring upon her head the blessings of posterity, she should endow a chair of voice development which would not necessarily include singing lessons." So says Miss Helen Lord, one of the fine singers of the day.

"Listen to the penetrating feminine voices all around us, shrilling, almost shrieking in head tones. And I am sure that not one of those women realize that her remarks are being heard all over the room. If she did, she would talk less of personal matters. Ride on the elevated trains or on open surface cars, and your head will ache more from the piercing voices of the women around you than from the combined din of train and street. Have you ever had a telephone ring in your ear because the woman at the other end of the wire was using head tones in talking? It is frightful.

"The true root of evil is that the American woman either cannot or will not use her speaking voice properly. Hundreds of dollars to cultivate a singing voice, but not one cent nor a jot of her time to improve her speaking voice! Massages and lessons in physical culture to develop a plump throat, but not five minutes a day to enlarge her chest. And yet a gentle voice is woman's most effective weapon. "If a woman will stand squarely before her glass, with her shoulders back, her head high, while she slowly inflates and empties her lungs, she will secure excellent chest development. Then let her give the sound of double O (oo) as the lungs are emptied, but in rich, low tones, which she feels come straight from the chest, or, as one woman expressed to me, from the pit of her stomach, and she will have taken the first step in developing a pleasing speaking voice.

"Next let her take the same position and count up to ten as slowly as possible while emitting one long breath, steadily increasing her chest expansion. Then let her practice her new speaking tone on her family, seeing how deep she can place her voice and yet be heard distinctly by members of the home circle. When on trains or walking on the street let her aim to strike a voice tone below the din, and not above it, so low, in fact, that it rings like a second or alto part in singing. She can then be heard as distinctly as if she tried to shout above the roar of street traffic, and her voice will lose that penetrating, shrill quality which is the hall-mark of the ill-bred woman."—New York Tribune.

The Heart Song.

I awoke to hear a man's voice,
Attuned to friendship's rhythm,
And I remembered that on yesterday,
I shared a sorrow with him,
Nor ever once imagining
It would be a song today.

I struck a string on yesterday,
And for once 'twas strangely dumb,
I wondered why no music woke
From the heart of the mystic lyre,
That to the touch of other men,
Poured forth such melody.

But the vibrant trills awoke today,
As if from a master's hand,
And the string that I struck on yesterday,
So dumb and dead as it seemed,
Fills all my heart with melody,
With its waking strains today.

The strings that we strike in the passing,
Though our ears hear not the strains,
Shall awake in reverberation,
The symphony of future aeons;
The shape and the sound of our action
here,
Give the tout ensemble of our being there.

Henry Drummond.

"I suppose there are hundreds of men and women who are sure that his was the most Christ-like life they ever knew." Thus writes George Adam Smith of Henry Drummond; and adds: "He was one of the purest, most unselfish, most reverent souls you ever knew, but you would not have called him a saint. The name he went by among younger men was 'The Prince'; there was a distinction and a radiance upon him that compelled the title."

Henry Drummond was born in 1831.

At fifteen he matriculated at Edinburgh University, and at nineteen began preparation for the ministry, but continued to cultivate the study of natural science. In his experience the development of Christian faith was not so much a matter of struggle as of growth. He began his work as a missionary in the Riego Street Mission, where his aim was "to draw souls one by one."

Just as Drummond began his missionary work the wonderful Moody meetings were held in Edinburgh. Drummond was soon in the inquiry room working man to man with anxious souls. For months he was in the thick of this work. His gifts were quickly recognized by Mr. Moody who turned Drummond's energies into the conducting of special meetings for young men. At Sunderland a Young Men's Association rapidly grew to four hundred, and a thousand persons professed conversion. He went with Moody to Ireland where the mighty power of God continued to be manifest. Then the work was carried back to England and found its climax in London. It was an experience of two years of service in which Drummond was wonderfully used of God in winning thousands of Jesus Christ.

Thus the supreme service of his life was discovered to him. It was an unusually full life, much of it being given to literary activity, and much to travel in many parts of the globe. But always and everywhere his marvelous power with young men led to the continuous demand for his services. In Great Britain he brought Christ to young men who crowded the halls and churches to sit at his feet. The colleges of America and Australia were thrilled by his magnetic personality, and profoundly impressed by his complete consecration. He gathered the boys about him, and was active in organizing the first Boys' Brigades. Read 1 Cor. xiii.

His personal work for men has been supplemented by his religious writings. His "Natural Law in the Spiritual World" must be included in this category, but his monograph on "The Greatest Thing in the World" and other practical themes, together with his printed addresses, have been spiritual bread to many hungry souls. He had the faculty of making every one feel that Christianity was right and natural and blessed. He met the demand of many to satisfy the rational man, by setting forth truth in so self-evident a way as to carry conviction. He dealt with the nature of things, and men realized that he touched the heart of truth as he emphasized the plain facts of law and life, revealing man's relation to God and men.

Drummond's greatest victory was in the end of his life. Fame, prosperity, popularity were his, and he bore himself in it all with unassuming naturalness. In the last two years he was to prove equally serene through the painful sufferings of lingering illness. Whether to live or to die, it was for him to glorify Christ in his life, faithful unto death. There was a certain joyousness about this man which was felt by all who knew him. He led men to feel that a true Christian must be joyous. Joy is something deeper than happiness. The "haps" of life are sometimes mishaps, but joy is the stream of loving trust which runs deeper than the surface of life. There will be sorrow, but joy smiles through the tears in hope. There will be trials, but joy is faith catching gleams of the coming triumphs.—Daily Bible.

On The Use of Good English

The Spectator is of the opinion, if he may modestly express his views from a layman's standpoint, that teachers of young children do not sufficiently appreciate the importance of training the ear of the pupil to detect the difference in sound between pure and impure English. If, as a daily exercise, a scholar who speaks carelessly is forced to repeat phrases over and over, first correctly and then incorrectly, for comparison, the ear catches the tune—if it may be so termed—of the pure speech and learns to mark the difference. In this way a better speech may be acquired—if not the perfect language.

But the Spectator has no idea of meddling with pedagogics. Far be it from his path! He is thinking rather of those who wish to teach themselves than of those to be taught of others. To those unfortunates who have education in plenty, and are conscious that they speak without that stamp of education given by pure English, the Spectator would like to hold out the examples of some he has known who have suffered likewise—and conquered. What man has done man can do—when his heart is in the effort. But this introducing pure English under the epidermis of an adult is a serious operation, and one not to be performed under anaesthetics either, for the patient must not only be conscious but must be the operator himself. How is an adult to be almost born again—as he must be—to become receptive to a new, pure language? He must be born again of the spirit, of course, and be willing to labor earnestly for his own redemption. Then his redemption is possible, if difficult. Time, effort, and constant watchfulness is the price. But is not the gain worth the expenditure?

The Spectator is not speaking of what is called cultivated English. We all know that that is an elusive quality, and granted only to the elect. It has no grammar, no law. It is learned by long and intimate fellowship with the great English speakers of the earth—dead and alive—and cannot be learned at all save by one who has been born with the most sensitive ear. The Spectator is speaking of something much less ideal than this—namely, a mere grammatical English. This seems a slender ambition, and yet we have to face the fact that not even a college education, with all its fitting school requirements back of it, can insure grammatical English. It is a depressing outlook for those who have learned so much and still lack that essential stamp of education. Many feel that it should have come to them somehow as a right after the years and the money spent on education. And it does seem that there is something wrong when this deficit can occur—but that is not for the Spectator to settle. He is only humanly interested in the disappointed ones, not in the defects of the process. Depressing their case is, but by no means desperate. Poor English we know is as catching as the measles, but so is good English contagious. The question, then, for the patient to consider is how to protect himself from the first disease, and how to catch the contrary contagion. The charm of an English grammar worn, camphor-bag fashion, about the neck is no true protector. Indeed, the Spectator knows but one sure charm against the infection of bad English, and that is the training of the ear by good English. As a matter of course, this is not so easily won by the adult as by the child. An instinctive shrinking from the wrong word is the imperative need, and this instinctive shrinking is to be acquired only by the constant hearing of the right sound. A painstaking use of pure English, a patient listening with open ears for correct English, are the only charms the Spectator knows of against the contagion of poor English.

The Spectator once read a very interesting prescription for the acquisition of style. This plan suggested a wide reading and the marking by the student of every sentence which by captivating quality lifted the phrase above the ordinary level. The Spectator believes that a somewhat similar course is the road to pure spoken English. One reason why drill in English grammar does not correct defects of speech is because this training is for the brain and the eye, not the ear. Speaking pure English is a question of ear-training. The ear that does not detect the error in a spoken phrase before the brain has time to phrase the sentence is a tardy ear, tone-deaf to pure English. The error should hurt as a false note, before the brain can express what is amiss. All that was ever bound between pasteboards on the subject of English grammar may, in the Spectator's opinion, be crammed comfortably into a lock-closet in the brain—and stay there, useless to the possessor so far as his speech is concerned, if his ear is not sensitive. There are hundreds of men and women who have the sensitive ear, but no lock-closet of grammar. These could not parse the simplest phrase, but for them to slip in speech is as unlikely as it is for the learned ones who are grammar-deaf to speak correctly. The ear that is once attuned hears each false note, as sung by himself or others. The ear not attuned hears the most distressing discord with placidity. Some sing only by ear, some only by note, but either can be taught, or teach themselves, something of the other's art.

To the grammar-deaf ear the Spectator would like to suggest one or two little plans which he has known of as helpful to others on the quest for pure English.

Reading aloud from the masters of the tongue is a wonderful aid to the ear, and as a daily exercise is invaluable. But it is in colloquial English where the Waterloo is most frequently met, and that is where the work must center. It is not easy to guard the speech constantly, to speak a considered English always, nor is it easy to watch the speech of others for defects and mark them mentally when defects occur; but when these things have been done, they have been found the practical road to actual achievement and amazing success. One such adventurer in the road of progress went to a friend whose English he trusted with this request: "I want to ask a favor of you. I can't cure myself of two or three bad habits of speech. Now, will you hit me whenever you hear me say any of these things?" Whether the favor was granted the Spectator knows not, but that this man who would be cured was cured he firmly believes, for the right spirit was there.

One word of warning to such laborers the Spectator would like to drop. If your neighbor says, "Was you to home today?" be not led away by false gods of kindness and reply, "I were!" The Spectator is confident that civility of this kind is at the root of half of the bad English the world holds. And there is yet one other fruitful source of bad English. A certain genial seduction lies in atrocious grammar. There is a pleasing ease, a kind of good-company feeling in the dishabille of language. "Take off your coat—y'r collar, too, and be to hum.' Isn't that alluring? A laudable desire to be easy and friendly, and no better than our neighbor perchance may be, is, the Spectator is convinced, the root cause of more grammatical wickedness than any other one thing.

As a matter of stern fact, the world in the long tale demands clean, pure mother-tongue of its citizens. To speak that tongue impurely is as positive a handicap as a limp in a gait. Force of will, of character, may lift a man (limp and all) where he wishes to be in the race; but the output of force must be great to overcome the handicap—greater than the average man commands. One of the undeniable shibboleths of life is good English, and the man who has that password may often slip in where his brother, worthier perhaps, it may even be better educated, has yet to climb the gate which was clapped shut in his face because he chanced to ask, "Is my fortune to home?" Labor, then, for the obvious advantage, you who have it not. Never despair. Soak in pure English. Listen for it, and listen for poor English, and mentally mark each spoken phrase as good, bad or indifferent. The Spectator wishes you good luck in your effort and tenderness to your ear!—"The Spectator," in The Outlook.

Our Young People.

The Mark of the Cross.

By Alfreda Post.

From a Bedouin encampment on the edge of the Syrian desert, a large-eyed, wistful child drove her tiny donkey, with his load of goatskin water-bottles, to a slingshot rill. Following him into the ooze with her bare feet, she filled the bottles with the muddy water and started him up the bank with a loud "Hanghh!"

Here her energy left her and she gave way to the melancholy which had become her deepest feeling. Crouching upon the bank, her chin upon her knees, she groaned, "O Allah! why have you cursed me?" She drew back her loose sleeve and moodily studied the tattooing on her arm. It was the usual indigo stain of the Bedouins, but the figures were strange, to Najla unintelligible; only one stood out distinctly, the figure of a cross. She dipped her left hand in the water and mechanically rubbed the marking.

"If they would only wash out I might be free from the curse."

Suddenly she was startled by a noise behind her almost painful in its eagerness.

"How did you get those marks?"

Najla crumbled to her feet in confusion, too abashed to answer.

"Is your name Najla?" asked the young man again, trembling with earnestness.

"How did you know?" exclaimed Najla amazed.

"Look!" he cried, and pulling up his sleeve, he revealed to Najla's astonished gaze an arm marked with the same figures as her own.

"Don't you remember your brother Faris? Think, when you were a little child!"

"When my mother was alive? Yes, I had forgotten all about it; he used to carry me on his back."

"Yes, and you wore silver anklets with tinkling bells," and Faris pulled out from his bosom a child's anklet such as he had described.

Najla grasped it eagerly. "O how wonderful! I remember it perfectly, and they took the other away and beat me for losing this."

"Poor little Najla!" said Faris, taking both her hands. "It was cruel of me to run away from you after our parents died. But I meant even then to come back for you, and took the anklet to prove you were mine."

"Where did you go?" asked Najla.

"I wandered about almost perishing for food and water," he replied, "until I was picked up by some cameleers and taken to a town. They left me at a mission school, where they took me in with kindness that I had never dreamed of; and do you know why they did it?" Faris again eagerly caught his sister's hand. "It was because of the story on your arm!"

Najla looked aghast. "You are mad, my brother, what do you mean?"

"It's a beautiful story," Faris answered. "My teacher's wife would seat me beside her, with her soft hand on my arm, pointing out the figures and telling me about them."

"Have these marks a meaning?" exclaimed Najla.

"Look!" Faris took her wrist. "This cross is the center of all; the long figure beside it is a ladder; here is a hammer with three nails, and a sponge on the end of a staff, and this above is a crown—O Najla, it was a crown of thorns!"

"I don't understand," said Najla.

"Poor little Najla, of course not, but I will tell you about it until you love it better than anything in the world; don't you remember when our mother used to tell it?"

"No," said Najla, "did she know it?"

"Why, Najla," said Faris, "our mother was a Christian girl and our father carried her away from her village home and made her his wife; you can't remember how often she used to weep for her own people. She was so afraid that we children would grow up without knowing about the cross that she tattooed the story upon our arms, believing that sometime, some one would tell us what it meant."

"But a Christian is a base, mean thing," said Najla, still perplexed. "I suppose this is why all the tribe curse me."

"Little sister," said Faris, "I am going to take you away from all that, away over the Black River to the land of the Christians."

"The Black River!" gasped Najla in terror, "the jinn would catch us!"

"What are you talking about?" asked Faris.

Najla lowered her voice, her black eyes dilated with horror. "Don't you know about the jinn that our first Sheikh Sleiman exorcised from his wife's heart and imprisoned in the Black River? Ever since he has waited to catch some member of our tribe and take vengeance, and none of our people dare cross that river."

Faris laughed gayly. "Najla, there are no such things as jinns. Look at me! I have crossed that river twice!"

Najla gazed at him stupefied. "Perhaps you have a charm."

A sudden bright smile lighted Faris' face. "Yes, I have; it is a beautiful promise of God: 'When thou passeth through the waters I will be with thee.' How shall I make you understand? You are God's child; you have his marks upon your arm; no jinn, if there were such things, would have power over you."

Najla's eyes blazed with a new light. "Do you mean that when the jinn saw the holy marks on my arm he would be afraid?"

"Yes," said Faris gently, "if you like to think of it that way, you will understand better by and by."

Najla clasped her trembling hands and her eyes glistened with mingled fear and trust. "My brother, I will go with you, if it is to life or death." Faris took her hand solemnly in his. "Let us go now; my horse is here."

Najla's serious face broke into a smile of amused compassion. "We might as well hang to the ropes of the wind! The Bedouins would track us at once."

"Then what can we do?" asked Faris. Najla thought awhile. "In the first place, we must start separately. You might go to the Suleib camp beyond those knolls, four hours away. I shall return to our camp and in the night escape over the rocks to an ancient cistern an hour away, over there. I will hide three days till the tribe are tired of hunting for me; then you can meet me."

"You could beat the Sheitan!" exclaimed Faris admiringly; then with a new thought, "what will you eat those three days?"

She looked at him meaningly. "We Bedouins keep alive because even death is so scarce."

They kissed each other solemnly and parted.

Najla drove her donkey into camp under a fire of imprecations at her delay.

"Your life be cut off!"

"Your light be put out!"

And as a climax, "Allah send you a husband to beat you twice a day!"

But she went stolidly on with her work, and that night fled with noiseless footsteps over the rocks. The ancient cistern which she had chosen was overgrown with bushes at the narrow mouth. She pulled these aside to peer into the inky blackness below, shuddering, knowing she could never climb out alone. It took all her courage to let herself down over the edge. She dropped upon the dry, stony bottom unhurt but terrified. The darkness closed upon her, unbroken save by the glimmer of the stars through the bushes overhead. She cowered upon the floor, fearing to touch the unseen walls of her chamber, which her overwrought mind filled with venomous creatures. Alone! alone! the world hopelessly out of reach! What if Faris should never come!

Daylight came at last, showing the cistern walls to be harmless rock and plaster, and she gladly crouched against them now to avoid being seen from above. All day her ears were straining for the sound of footsteps. She used her scant supply of food and water frugally, but soon nothing remained but frantic thirst and feverish visions of Bedouins pursuing and jinns starting up in the river before her.

In the meantime Faris had reached the group of goat-hair shelters forming the Suleib camp. He knew they were the poorest of all the tribes, hence at war with none and so more ready to protect him. Faris was greeted kindly by the people in their gazelle tunics and taken to a tent where a supper of dried gazelle meat was served.

"We give you the trophies of our hunters," said the Sheikh; "Allah, who has deprived us of flocks, has thus given us a recompense."

"His name be exalted," answered Faris.

"Tell me," said the Sheikh, as Faris reached out his hand, "is this a charm on your wrist?"

Faris flushed; he had not meant to reveal himself. "My secrets are in your hands," he said.

"Wallah!" said the Sheikh, "never would a Suleib reveal the secrets of his guest."

"Then I will tell you about it; it belongs to you as much as to me."

The dusky group listened in rapt attention while Faris told them the story of the cross.

"That sounds like the cursed religion of the Nazarenes," said one.

"Call no man's religion cursed," said Faris, "until you know it, and least of all curse the Holy One who died upon the cross."

"The lad is right," said the Sheikh; "none but a holy man would give himself for others."

Before sunrise the next morning, Faris heard angry voices outside his tent. "You are sheltering a vagabond townsman, a tiller of the ground—fry his heart in his blood!"

"But what proof have you that he stole the maid?" asked Faris' host. "Proof enough," with an oath. "We found her cursed footsteps on the bank mingled with his; the print of his shoes shows he is a townsman, and the firmness of his tread tells that he is young, and his horse's footprints testify he is now with you! And of course he has brought her with him!"

"At what hour did the girl disappear?" asked the Suleib Sheikh.

"She was with us till midnight, she must have escaped before dawn."

"But our guest arrived at sunset alone, hours before she escaped; I can prove it. And he has been with us ever since. Come see his horse, feel his muscles, you can see he has rested all night; that mud on his feet is twelve hours old! See the hoofprints, blown over with dust, those are not fresh!"

The Bedouin examined the marks, then tent down and smelt them. "Yes, the odor is gone, you are right," and the pursuers left disappointed.

On the third day Faris left them, and taking a roundabout course, reached the cistern by nightfall. Eagerly pulling aside the bushes, he called, "Najla! little sister! are you there?"

"Faris!" answered a choking voice from the darkness.

Faris unwound his girdle, and letting down one end gently drew Najla up. The exhausted child threw herself upon his neck in tears.

"Drink this leban," he said, holding a small leather bottle to her lips. "There! you can do anything now."

He swung her upon the saddle behind him and they were off. The journey was one of many days in a burning wilderness, often without food or water, but at last Faris pointed out a line of green in the distance: "There is the Black River!"

Najla grasped his arm tightly. "The jinn is there!"

Just then a gunshot sounded behind them, and they looked back in terror to see the Bedouins in hot pursuit.

"They have tracked us!" gasped Najla.

"God must decide it," breathed Faris, bending forward and putting his spurs into his horse. The creature bounded forward to the utmost of his jaded strength, while the shots continued from behind. They were now close upon the stream. Najla doubly terrified, clung to her brother.

"Remember you are God's child," he said.

Burying her face upon her brother's shoulder, she lifted her bare right arm with the cross upon it above her head.

The stream was passed. "We are safe!" cried Faris.

They hurried up the further bank as the baffled pursuers reached the stream and stopped.

"They will not ride into it," cried Najla; "they have no cross to protect them."

The Bedouins turned back in rage, and Faris and Najla rode on to the new life.—Congregationalist and Christian Work.

Mystery of Bird Migration.

I wish that every boy and girl could read an article on the mystery of the migration of birds, by Harold Bolce, in the Saturday Evening Post. I should think that the information in this article would lead to so much interest in and respect for the inhabitants of the bird kingdom that no man or boy who roams the woods and fields with a gun, in search of some innocent thing to destroy, would ever wish to take the life of such a wonderful creature as a bird is here described to be.

For more than twenty-five years scientists have been trying to discover something of the mystery of bird migration, and the present international study of the subject is by far the greatest concerted scientific inquiry ever instituted, and, scientists say, the most baffling.

The common belief is that birds migrate to warmer climates through fear of cold and hunger, but learned ornithologists do not accept that belief, from the fact that birds migrate from regions where warm weather prevails and food is always plenty, and after years of study of this subject Prof. Alfred Newton, of Cambridge, stated that without doubt bird migration was one of the greatest mysteries of the entire animal kingdom. Prof. Cooke, who in the interest of the United States is superintending the present study of bird migration, is now at work on a report which it is believed will clear up many perplexing mysteries, but certain it is that birds are obeying some natural instinct when they migrate. Russia, Germany and England are all engaged in investigating bird migration and these investigations have resulted in some surprising facts in regard to the migration of birds.

It has been discovered that just before embarking on their perilous journeys birds prepare themselves for flying with great velocity at very high altitudes by abstaining from taking food and allowing all the food in their stomachs to digest before starting out in flight. The bird's body is filled with air. These sacs make it possible for the birds to rise to immense heights and remain aloft without any exertion, and thus it may employ all its power in forward flight.

Astronomers studying the stars by night have been at an altitude of three miles

Preacher's Discovery.

A Prominent Minister of Atlanta, Ga., is the Discoverer of a Wonderful Cure for all Catarrhal Diseases.

Rev. J. W. Blosser, M. D., Atlanta, Ga., is the discoverer of a successful remedy for the cure of Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness, Bronchitis, and Asthma. It consists of a combination of medicinal herbs, roots and leaves, which are moked in a common clean pipe—the fume being inhaled into the throat and lung and exhaled through the nose. While the manner of its use is simple, yet no other means can so easily reach and cure the disease in all its forms.

Dr. Blosser offers to mail a three days' sample to any sufferer who will write to him for it. If your case is a stubborn one and you desire special advice, he makes no extra charge. This remedy has met with wonderful success, curing cases of 15, 20 and 25 years' standing.

If you wish a box containing a month's treatment, send $1.00, and it will be forwarded, postpaid. Address Dr. Blosser Company, 355 Walton St., Atlanta, Ga.

Improvement in Train Service on the Southern Railway.

The Southern Railway announces that effective Sunday, November 1st, 1903, in addition to the excellent train service now in operation over its main line, that new trains Nos. 33 and 34 will be inaugurated between Washington, D. C., and Charlotte, N. C. No. 33 will leave Washington daily, at 9:00 p. m., arriving Charlotte 9:00 a. m. No. 34 will leave Charlotte daily, at 9:00 p. m., and arrive Washington 10:15 a. m. These trains will make direct connection at Charlotte with trains to and from Columbia, Savannah, Augusta, and points South. Stops will be made at Manassas, Culpeper, Orange, Charlottesville, Lynchburg, Chatham, Danville, Ruidsville, Greensboro, High Point, Thomasville, Lexington, Salisbury, Concord. A local sleeping car between Washington and Charlotte will also be inaugurated on these trains.

No. 39 will be changed to leave Washington, D. C., at 7:10 p. m., arriving Charlottesville 10:45 p. m., Lynchburg, 12:39 a. m., Danville 2:47 a. m., Greensboro 4:05 p. m., Greensboro 4:05 a. m., Salisbury 5:30 a. m., Charlotte 6:55 a. m., Leave Charlotte 7:15 a. m., arrive Atlanta 4:35 p. m. In addition to the stops now being made by this train, the following points will also be regular stops for No. 39: Fairfax, Calverton, Remington, Amherst, Reidsville, High Point, Thomasville, and Lexington, while Lawyers Road will be flag stop for this train.

This information will no doubt be received very favorably by the traveling public as it will afford very much better services between the East and points South, as well as between local stations.

Connection will also be afforded at Danville, with trains to and from Norfolk and Richmond, Va.

myriads of birds migrating with incredible speed. What other scientists have hesitated to make known regarding the rapid flight of birds Dr. Gatke has boldly announced. He declares that the ruby-throated humming bird passes, like a speck from a rainbow, over 2,000 miles twice a year, but that this is very ordinary compared with the achievement of some other birds. Ornithologists who have not shared in this observation are amazed at his revelations.

It is now asserted that the hooded crow, usually a sluggish bird, hurls itself, by some unaccountable law, through space at the time of its spring migration at the enormous rate of one hundred and eight miles an hour. But more incredible than this is his assertion that the northern bluethroat in one unbroken flight at night passes from Central Africa to the German Sea, a distance of 1,600 miles in nine hours. He also states that the Virginia plover, which leaves its haunts in North America, and taking a course down the Atlantic, reaches the coast of Brazil in an unbroken flight of fifteen hours, covering a distance of 3,200 miles at the rate of four miles a minute. And when the migratory flight is at its greatest speed, 240 miles an hour is nothing extraordinary. This study of bird migration is conducted under great difficulties, as in their long flights, mostly at night, they are far beyond the vision of the men who have attempted to study them. And, too, it is very difficult to study the migration of the different species from the fact that in their migratory flight they omit cries never heard at any other time. For a quarter of a century Prof. Cooke has devoted his life to the study of birds, and as a naturalist he is acquainted with the language of every species. A bird cry in the woods at once proclaims its family to this ornithologist. Yet in all the fifty seasons that he has listened from housetops to the cry of migrating birds he says that he has been able to recognize only seven different kinds. A fascinating thing regarding these bird notes is that flocks of birds from widely separated localities, meeting perhaps for the first time far above the earth's surface, seem to understand the universal language of migration, and at these lofty heights seem to exchange greetings. It is the opinion of some modern naturalists that these migrating notes are a part of a universal bird language, reserved for use only in their world-wide journeyings.

The highest altitude to which human beings can rise with safety is 26,000 feet, and yet there are birds that easily fly over the topmost peaks of the Deodkunga mountain, which rises to an elevation of 29,000 feet. What enables these little creatures, which are warm-blooded animals, supplied with lungs and a complete respiratory system, to remain above these altitudes and even to display vastly increased powers of activity, is a mystery which is still unsolved.

It is a wonderful and fascinating study, this of the bird kingdom, and is considered worthy of a lifetime's devotion by the learned men of all nations. There are ornithological societies and naturalists' associations in nearly every country in the world, and yet the mysteries of these little feathered folk of our woods and fields have baffled the investigations of the most learned. But even we, who are not versed in bird-lore, if we would take note of the busy, happy, intelligent little friends that come to seek our companionship during the summer months, and those other ones who are willing to brave the cold and snows of our winter months to remain with us, would find the study of the habits and personality of the birds a never ending source of wonder and interest.—Mrs. Clarke Hardy, in Farmer's Voice.

"I am pleased to give my experience with Wine of Cardui as I am very grateful for its help. After my first baby was born I could not seem to regain my strength, although the doctor gave me a tonic which he considered very superior, but instead of getting better I grew weaker every day. My husband came home one evening with some Wine of Cardui and insisted that I take it for a week and see what it would do for me. As he seemed to have so much faith in it I did take the medicine and was very grateful to find my strength slowly returning. In two weeks I was out of bed and in a month I was able to take up my usual duties. I am very enthusiastic in its praise."

Why Tumblers are So Called.

How many times a day do we use words without stopping to think what they mean! Every day at luncheon and at dinner we drink out of a tumbler. But I, for one, never thought why the large glass that holds our milk or water was so called, until once upon a time I happened to have luncheon at All Souls' College, Oxford, where the curiosity of all the strangers present was excited by a set of most attractive little round bowls of ancient silver, about the size of a large orange. These we were told, were "tumblers;" and we were speedily shown how they came by their name.

When one of these little bowls was empty, it was placed upon the table, mouth downward. Instantly, so perfect was its balance, it flew back into its proper position, as if asking to be filled again. No matter how it was treated—trundled along the floor, balanced carefully on its side—up it rolled again, and settled itself, with a few gentle shakings and swayings, into its place.—Selected.

A Summer Tragedy.

I saw a tragedy today. It was enacted before my horrified eyes. Murder was committed, and the victim, perfectly unoffending, perfectly innocent, was suddenly and shamelessly dashed from his home into a gulf of death. Three assassins laughed with fiendish glee as they marked the success of their crime.

The victim was a robin redbreast. He was singing his heart out in ecstasy from the top of a maple tree, as the air gun held in the hands of a small boy sent its missile straight to its destination. No more songs from that bonny bird. A mourning nestful looking for him in vain. And the boy and his companions will go home, eat their suppers, say their prayers, and kill more birds when they can. They are little monsters did they but know it!—Exchange.

Our Little Folks.

Children's Letters.

Magnolia, N. C., Oct. 24, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I have never written a letter to the Standard I will try and write one. I hope the little boys and girls will enjoy reading my letter. I don't see but two letters this week. I went to the Presbytery one day this week at Wallace. Our school will begin Monday. Miss Minnie Williams will be our teacher. Mamma and we boys have a time with our hogs. They have the cholera. I have two sisters and one brother. Where is the word girl found in the Bible, and what did they do with her? I hope to see my letter in print. Age 10 years.

Your little friend,
Lindon Southerland.

The Little Terrier Did It

"Uncle Hammond, won't you let Barney go, too? He hasn't been out today."

"Aren't you going out, laddie?"

"Not off the veranda, nurse says. And Barney loves to get into the street. I think he'll follow you."

"Think he'll follow me! Well, well, 'twill be great condescension on the dog's part, I must say. Come on, you small aristocrat!"

"Go on, Barney!" said the sick boy, "go with Uncle Hammond." He waved his thin hands toward the door. "How funny you two will look in the streets—so big a man and so teeny a dog!"

"Now you are trying to make me ridiculous," said the uncle. His heart was set upon the small boy, whom he had brought home from the South Sea Islands, after the fever had carried off the dear child's parents and left the little fellow, himself, in danger of becoming crippled.

"Come along, Barney! It seems that we are expected to give your young master a chance to make fun of us. Anything wanted, nurse? Can't you think of something the laddie will eat?"

"He's eating pretty well, Mr. Graham. There's enough of every delicacy for half a dozen boys. Really, I shall have to open a hospital in order to get rid of the supplies, if they continue to come in at the present rate."

"That might be a good idea. Maybe the child needs the cheer of other children. I'm such an old codger that it's poor company I make for a wee laddie like this one of ours."

"Don't talk that way, Uncle Hammond. You're jolly company. Come, go on, please. I want to see you two on the street."

With the air of a drum major Mr. Graham started off, small Barney at his heels, and was rewarded for his strut upon the street by hearing the clapping of two small hands from the window and a plaintive little laugh.

"What a childish old cock I'm getting to be!" said Uncle Hammond, after they had rounded the corner in fine style.

"If I feel this way after having the child with me for two months, what world I become if, instead of being a crusty old bachelor, I had a wife and children of my own?"

"Hi, tha', mister! I say, whah d'ge git th' pup?"

Uncle Hammond's thoughts were further broken in upon by a series of joyful barks. Turning, he saw a ragged newsboy squatting upon the walk, his papers thrown to the winds, and himself reaching to caress the little creature, who seemed mad with joy.

"Bless me!" said Mr. Graham. "Why, what does this mean?"

"It means that yer stole my pup. That's wot it means!" said the boy, angrily.

"I—stole—your—br—r—r! Boy, what do you mean? I bought that dog at a fanciers'—paid one hundred dollars for him, just a month ago."

"O, yer did!" exclaimed the boy. Meanwhile he eyed the big man as one might look at a dog-catcher.

"Of course I did, young Impudence! Barney, come on; come on, I say!" and Mr. Graham struck his umbrella upon the pavement.

At this the newsboy sprang up, set the little Yorkshire terrier on the ground, tucked his hands into his pockets, and calling, "Come on, Mr. Dooley!" strode across the street. The small dog followed closely at his unkempt heels, without so much as a look behind or a "By your leave sir."

Mr. Graham was thunderstruck. He felt his helplessness. The dog plainly belonged to the small boy. But Uncle Hammond's heart remembered another boy, across whose dear face he could not think of bringing a shadow. As he stood thus the distance widened between them. There was not a minute to be lost. Uncle Hammond waved his umbrella. "Boy, boy, come back! I want to talk with you."

"Nough's been said," the boy called, over his shoulder, as he stooped to gather up his unsold papers "Here's a five—a ten!

"Come and get it!"

"Yoh keep yer dough; I keep's my pup," said the boy, with a grin on his grimy face.

"Br-r-r!" said Mr. Graham. "What can I do? Officer-r-r!" But there was no policeman in sight. "Boy, I say. Keep your dog; but come back and talk with me. Maybe I can do something for you."

The boy paused. "I'm all right, now," he said. "Nobody needn't do nothin' fer me, now!"

"Come near enough to let me tell you. Back in a house in that last block is a boy about your size. He's too ill to walk, or even step. When the pain in his leg is very severe he finds comfort in the sympathy of the dog you are taking away with you. I'm a chicken-hearted old chap, though I was in the war. I don't want to go back and face that boy without his dog. Go with me. Let him see how it is, for himself."

"Trick?" asked the boy, slowly. His heart, also, was touched.

"Come around the corner and see for yourself. If he isn't at the window you may have the dog."

Slowly the two turned to go back.

The small dog trotted upon the outer side, close to the heels of the newsboy, into whose face he looked often and then jumped and barked with all his might.

"There's the window," said Mr. Graham. "See him?"

Sure enough, there was a boy's face against a pillow, and a nurse in snowy white standing near. A smile came upon the face against the pillow and a white hand waved to them.

Mr. Graham waved back but he quite forgot the steps of the drum major.

"Nurse," said the boy at the window, "I don't like the way Barney sticks to that boy."

"It's only a newsboy," said nurse. "Dogs are fond of boys."

Still, the child's heart, sore with other losses, was not comforted. The three came on up the street. The sick child heard the key click and steps upon the stairs.

"They are both coming. Why does Uncle Hammond bring the newsboy upstairs?"

The nurse was silent. Another moment and Uncle Hammond entered, his usually kind face greatly troubled.

"Well, Hammond," he said, "you got me into a pretty mess when you sent me out to give your dog an airing. Here's a youngster who called me a thief." By this time the newsboy had reached the doorway. He stopped. Never before had he seen such comfort and beauty. His heart was filled with awe at sight of the luxury and the little sufferer, whose face, turned upon him, was sad, almost to tears.

The two boys looked at each other. There was dead stillness. The small boy stood behind the roughly shod stranger.

The sick boy broke the stillness. "Barney," he called, piteously, "Barney! and he held out his thin hands.

The dog came slowly into the room, then stopped. The pale hands began to tremble. The newsboy pressed his lips together and drew his breath hard through his nostrils. He clenched the papers with hot hands. Uncle Hammond and the nurse, looking at him, saw that he suffered.

"Barney!" pleaded the thin voice.

Mr. Graham looked down. "Do you see?" he asked of the newsboy. "How could I come here alone?"

"I don't want to take anybody's dog away," said the sick boy, "but—O—I thought so much of Barney!" He buried his face in his hands and began to sob.

The newsboy's throat grew full and choking. He swallowed hard two or three times before he could speak. Then, taking a step forward, he said in a husky voice: "Go on, Mr. Dooley! Go to th' other nni!"

The dog hesitated. He was drawn both ways. He ran to the invalid's chair, then back to the boy in the doorway. Back and forth, half crying, half yelping, he ran, as if he would bring the two together.

Uncle Hammond drew his hand across his eyes. "Boy," he asked, "have you a home?"

"Hnmph! not much."

"Parents?"

"Nope; nobody."

"How do you get on?"

"Shift fer m'elf."

"Would you like to try living here for awhile, and see if you can cheer up my little sick laddie? You shall have a suit of clothes, your board, lodging, and five dollars a week. How does that strike you?"

"I don't ant yer money," the boy answered slowly, "but I does want ter stay." He looked at himself—his arms and legs. "Mebbe ye might give me th' clothes, so's I'll be decent. I'll rnn down an' take a free bath. Yer see, I aint' fit ter be with th'—th' white nn this way." So it was fixed. During the weeks that followed the newsboy seemed to give of his strength to the other, who grew stronger daily. The two became great friends. The little Yorkshire terrier answered to the call of Barney or Mr. Dooley, either one, while Mr. Graham, instead of losing the affection of his little nephew, became the center of the world to two boyish hearts.

"Queer fix for an old bachelor to be in," he said to himself one day. "Here I am, with two laddies and a pup on my hands. Well, God helping me, the boys shall never be sorry!"—The Christian Advocate.

Ethelinda's Hard Lesson.

By Angelina M. Tuttle.

One pleasant evening Ethelinda had been having a perfect gale of fun with the two yellow puppies. She had found an old accordion in the attic and its wheezy notes excited the two little dogs. They tried to sing like it. Then they ran madly about the yard and when Ethelinda would spring out at them from behind the syringa bush by the south door, both would yodel and yelp and run till their short, fat bodies seemed scarcely to clear the ground and their little toes fairly dug up the green turf trying to go faster.

Ethelinda laughed till the tears ran down her cheeks, and when the puppies stopped for breath, their pink tongues hung out and their fat sides puffed very fast. But they made little dashes forward and stamped their fore feet, seeming to beg for more of the fun. So Ethelinda squawked the accordion and away they would scamper round and round, faster and faster, till suddenly—aeongh! That new tooth of Ethelinda's seemed to fairly jump into the air and seize her whole body in one big ache. Down went the accordion and both hands went to comfort her cheek.

Grandpa stopped laughing and said, "Why! poor child!"

Grandma just held open those warm, comforting arms of hers. All three were well acquainted with the ways of that nughty tooth.

No more fun that night. Ethelinda rolled back and forth in her big bed in the big south chamber, and the big moon looked in through the big maple tree; but that big, big toothache monopolized everything for the little girl. Grandma came with all sort of remedies—camphor, peppermint, liniment and a bag of hops hot from the kitchen oven. All the time they knew it was not much use, for had not the dentist said it would probably ache some till fairly through?

"O, that horrid old tooth!" moaned Ethelinda, and she rolled to and fro and sometimes sobbed and sometimes held her cheek hard.

Grandpa came up to comfort her. He patted her head with his large hand and called her by all her pet names and said how sorry he was.

"Shall I sing to help you to go to sleep?" he asked; and Ethelinda, holding her hot cheek very hard, mumbled something like "Yes, please."

So he began with "While shepherds watched their flocks by night," and "Hail the blest morn." He sang in a clear, pleasant tenor voice that lent a charm to the peaceful old hymns. He knew merry darkey songs as well, but tonight he sang only quiet hymns.

Usually it made Ethelinda happy to hear him, but now that tooth spoiled even the hymns and the moonlight. She began to long to cry hard and loud but she tried to lie still and listen. Finally in the middle of "On Jordan's stormy banks," her body gave a great fionce across the bed, her hand tore itself from Grandpa's sympathetic clasp and a tempest of moans and sobs blotted out the music.

Grandpa sat silent and helpless a while, then he arose to go and send Grandma up with some fresh remedy he laid a hand on Ethelinda's forehead and said sadly, "My little girl hasn't yet learned to bear pain."

Ethelinda doesn't remember now which conquered that night—sleep or the toothache, but she will never forget what Grandpa said about bearing pain. She knew she must learn arithmetic and history and geography, but to bear pain? Was that another lesson, and harder than any of the others? From that night she began to try to learn it.

The tooth came through in good time and the puppies continued the gayest of play-fellows. Ethelinda was happy all day long and forgot all about that hardest lesson till the day she fell from the great beam in the barn and sprained her wrist. Then as she lay white and subdued on the sitting-room lounge and the arnica and camphor made a drowsy mingling of smells, she asked Grandpa,

"Must everybody, even if they try to always be good, learn that hardest lesson?"

Grandma continued to bathe her forehead with the cool camphor. "What lesson, my pet?"

So Ethelinda told her what Grandpa had said the night she could not lie still and bear the ache n her toot'.

Grandma got out another handkerchief and wiped her own eyes. "Yes, Lambkin," she said, "We must all learn it sooner or later. I suspect. I've seen grown women who had never learned it, yes, and even men too, and that was sadder than any of their hnrts."

"Is it more necessary than history and geography?" asked Ethelinda, and Grandma nodded her head.

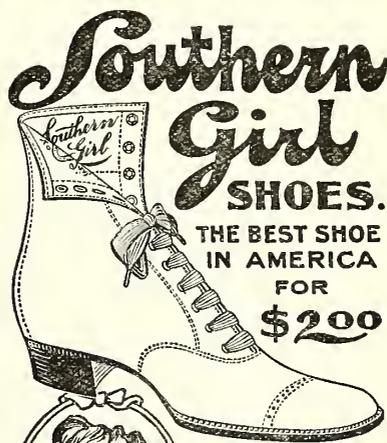

"Is not learning it worse than old

WILMINGTON N. C.

Mrs Hurley not knowing how to read and write?"

"Much sadder," Grandma admitted. "To learn it is a great victory, child. The woman who has it well in her heart is greater than if without it she were a queen and led armies to battle. Greater, than he who taketh a city darling."

So Ethelinda lay very still and thought about Boadicea and Joan of Arc and Zenobia. She prayed God to help her not think how her arm hurt, and presently either it ached less or she felt stronger to bear it. One of the puppies came and lapped her fingers with his soft tongue and poked a cold nose inquiringly under her hand. Then he jumped up on the lounge and curled snugly down beside her feet, and Grandma let him stay though he wasn't allowed in the sitting room and never on a lounge. Grandma fauned her gently and Grandpa sat very still in the south door. Ethelinda could see his gray head and knew he was not reading as usual. She wondered why till she fell asleep.

It was a comforting sleep. She dreamed she was the Queen of Sheba, and the sphinx lay at her feet, but one of the pyramids had toppled over and its sharp edge lay across her wrist.—The Congregationalist.

A New Game.

Percy Saunders had come up to Perryville to spend a week. He had been there just twelve hours, having come the night before, and he had already been classified and pigeonholed by the Goodrich twius, his country cousins, whom he was visiting. He couldn't climb a tree; he couldn't swim; he threw a ball like a girl; the delights of using a sling were unknown to him; and—he had to go to bed at half-past seven. As he was a year older than the twius, who were eight, this last stamped him as a molly-coddle.

After breakfast the three boys went out to the barn, where the twius ran up ladders and walked the narrow crossbeams thirty feet above the floor as unconcernedly as if they were on the ground.

Percy caught his breath. "Oh, I wish I could do that! I'd love to do all those things, but mamma don't let me because it makes me dizzy."

"Oh, it's easy as pie. See me fly." And Albert took a flying leap of fifteen feet into the hay followed by his brother.

Then they compared muscles, and found that Percy's were "awfully flabby." Their own were like iron. But showing off soon palled on all three boys, and they began to wonder what they could play.

"I made up a game the other day," said Percy in the low, sober tones that had struck the twius as so curious. They chattered as fast and is shrilly as monkeys themselves, in spite of their mother's hourly protests.

"Did you?" said Albert.

"Out of your own head?" said Herbert.

"Oh, it's easy. I often make 'em up." said Percy, delighted to have made an impression on these athletic boys, who could do so many things which he could not, although he was so much older.

"Tell us how you play it," said the twins together, eager for some novelty.

"Well, it's a kind of tag. I'll be it, and I'll start to run after you just the same as I would in tag." As he spoke the twins, who had been lying in the hay, jumped to their feet and ran out of the barn. "Hold on," said Percy; "I must tell you something about it first. As I run after you I holler out a letter of the alphabet, like C, and then if you think of an animal whose name begins with C, and shout it, I can't tag you; but if you don't shout then I tag you and you're it, and must run after the others and holler out a letter. It must be some animal, or if you choose you can call out flowers. But it must be either animals or flowers or countries or fruits; you mustn't mix 'em up in the same game. Now you start and I'll follow."

"I hope he says the same letter again, because I've got a bully animal all ready," said Herbert to Albert.

The boys had not run fifty feet before they found that, whatever else Percy could not do, he certainly could run. He was almost upon Herbert before he shouted, and then he yelled, "C!" as before.

Herbert waited until Percy reached out his hand to tag, and then he shouted, "Seal!"

"Tag!" said Percy, with a burst of laughter.

"That's not fair," said Herbert, "I said 'seal' before you touched me."

"But seal doesn't begin with a C; it begins with an S," said Percy, soberly.

"How about sealing? Isn't that ceiling?"

"The plaster one is, but hunting the animal isn't," said Percy, with authority.

"He's right, Bert," said Al, who had run up. "You're it fast enough."

"Very well," said Bert, Ready! And the two fled before him. He pursued Percy, who ran fleetly out into the road.

After a long chase Percy stubbed his toe and Herbert gained enough on him to call out "G!"

"Gnu," yelled Percy. But with a derisive laugh, Herbert closed on him and tagged him.

"I didn't say N; I said G."

"And I said gnu—g-n-u," said Percy, simply.

"Say, a fellow needn't ever get caught if he spells that way," said Bert, angrily. "G-p-o-n-y, pony. That's dead easy." But again Al came up and declared Percy was right.

They played the game for over an hour. Sometimes even Percy did not think fast enough or run fast enough to avoid being it, and after a while they gave a variety to the game by changing to flowers; and there they rather got the best of Percy, who was not familiar with as many varieties as the country boys were. Bert made many laughable mistakes in spelling and Al gave "phlox" as an F flower.

At last, when they grew tired of the sport, they all went in the hayloft to gether. The twins helped Percy up the ladder. They tumbled into the hay.

"You're all right," said Al. "You can run fine, and that's a bully game."

"And you can spell 'out of sight,'" said Bert.

"I'd rather be able to climb a tree, like you fellows, than spell any word I ever saw," said Percy modestly.

"Come on out then, and we'll teach you," said the twins in unison.—Charles Battell Loomis in the September St. Nicholas.

Constipation.

Its Cause and Cure.

A person in order to be healthy must get rid of the waste products (or poisons) of the body. Nature has provided four ways to get rid of them: The Bowels, the Kidneys, the Bladder and the pores of the Skin.

If the bowels become inactive, that portion of the food which should be thrown off lies in the intestines and decomposes, causing blood, nerve, liver and kidney trouble, and closes the pores of the skin, thus creating disease in the entire system.

You can immediately relieve and permanently cure yourself of stubborn constipation or distressing stomach trouble and perfectly regulate your kidneys and liver by taking one dose a day of Drake's Palmetto Wine. Any reader of The Presbyterian Standard can secure absolutely free a bottle by writing to Drake Formna Co., 300 Drake Bldg., 100 Lake St., Chicago.

A FREE trial bottle alone has brought health and vigor to many, so you owe it to your self to prove what it will do in your case.

Write the company this very day.

Brings Sweet Sleep.

"I have used your Concentrated Water and am delighted with it. I have had considerable trouble in getting a good night's rest; frequently I was as tired in the morning as when I first lay down; was troubled with bad dreams, etc; but now I sleep soundly, and am greatly refreshed in the mornings; ready for the day's work. It is indeed a good medicine, and I thank you for calling my attention to it."

"Ah," she sighed, "the great men are all dead." "But the beautiful women are not," he answered. Then she looked soulfully up into his eyes and told him she had said it just to be contrary, and not because she thought it for a moment.—Chicago Record-Herald.

When President Edwin T. Alderman, of Tulane University, was called upon at a dinner he made a speech that suggested the oratory of the late Henry W. Grady, and its effect on the audience was electrical. By way of introduction he told of an old colored man named Pompey down in Louisiana who was stopped on the road by a white man with the question: "Say, Pomp, where are you going?" "Ain't gwine nowhere," said Pompey, promptly. "I'se been where I'se gwine, I has."—New York Sun.

Sufferer: "Do you pull teeth without pain?" Dentist: "Well, not always. I sprained my wrist last time I pulled a tooth, and it hurts me yet occasionally."

Willie: "What did you see abroad, Archie?" Archie: "I don't remember exactly; but I did three countries more than Reggie did in the same time."—Harvard Lampoon.

De Style: "Why does Bimms wear that medal?" Gunbusta: "For saving lives." De Style: "In what way?" Gunbusta: "He never ran an automobile."

"Faith and Oi've got a fine, healthy boy, and the neighbors say he is the very picture of me." O'Grady looked at Pat, who wasn't built on the lines of a prize beauty. "Och, well, what's the harrum, so long as the child's healthy?"—Selected.

A lecturer in Australia told a story of a Scotchman in a hospital, who, sick and apparently nigh unto death, longed for the pibroch of his native hills. The doctors saw a gleam of hope for the poor man, and a piper was hired to play on the bagpipes. At the end of the first day there was a slight improvement in the Scotch patient. The second day's music resulted in his being able to rise from his bed, and by the third day the weird strains had completely restored him to health. "But," said the lecturer, with excellent dramatic effect, "every other patient in the ward died."

The Combination Oil Cure for Cancer

Has the indorsement of the highest medical authority in the world. It would seem strange indeed if persons afflicted with cancers and tumors, after knowing the facts, would resort to the dreaded knife and burning plaster, which have hitherto been attended with such fatal results. The fact that in the last ten years over one hundred doctors have put themselves under this mild treatment shows their confidence in the new method of treating those horrible diseases. Persons afflicted will do well to send for free book giving particulars and prices of Oils. Address the home office, Dr. D. M. Bye Co., Drawer 505, Indianapolis, Ind.

Card from Mrs. Person

Can it be that Most of the ills of Life can be cured through the Blood?

I have confined the recommendation of my Remedy to troubles that had their origin in impure blood, or a "rundown" system, and yet I know it can do more.

Five years ago my Remedy cured Mrs. J. S. Thompson, of Hasty, N. C., of ladies' trouble, and since then she has used it as a family medicine, and now I have her testimonial where it carried two of her children safely through an attack of typhoid fever.

My Remedy cured a case of kidney trouble in my own family, of six months standing, after all medical treatment had failed, and the party was regarded as a doomed man. Finding that he was rapidly declining, we tried the Remedy, and in two weeks a great change was apparent, and in two months he was well, and the cure was permanent.

I have known it tried in a well-known family in this State (whose name I am at liberty to give) for puerperal fever, when four doctors in consultation said that the patient could not live many hours, and it cured her. The reaction was immediate.

I saw Mr. Fred Howell, of Goldsboro, N. C., when he was down with consumption. I saw him again recently, a well man, after using the Remedy two years.

I have seen two ladies suffering with cancer of the womb (and knew of a third) and I have seen them perfectly cured, after having used my Remedy and Wash for about a year.

I have known it to cure a great many cases of stomach trouble that had failed to yield to any other treatment.

I have known it to cure four cases of nurse's sore mouth, after all medical treatment had failed.

I have known the Wash to cure a case of bladder trouble, when the physician said an operation alone could reach it.

In the beginning of my business career, twenty-one years ago, realizing what a powerful agency for relief of the afflicted was in my hands, I went to the medical fraternity of Raleigh and invited them to investigate my claim that I had a specific for troubles that came from blood impurity. I invited examination to the end that it might be generally used by the profession, if I could substantiate my claim. I offered to accept any number of test cases that would satisfy them in regard to the merit of my Remedy and I would cure them free. I only asked them to agree to watch the result of my Remedy and if I cured every one, for them to agree to acknowledge it publicly. But this, they said, would be "unprofessional" and an "irregular proceeding," and they therefore declined, although I offered to give them officially my full formula.

This goes to prove the unbounded confidence I had in my Remedy in the beginning of my work and it is now established on a pinnacle none can shake.

IN COMMON HONESTY, the man who does not feel constrained to spread the knowledge of Christ among mankind should surrender Christ wholly. What right has he to Christ? If Christ is not able to save the world He is not able to save a single soul. If He can save a soul it is awful to withhold Him from any, even from the lowest. And no soul can honorably claim His power in his behalf who proposes, when he has secured it, to let the rest of mankind struggle on without the Saviour whom he believes to be unique and indispensable, but whom he is content to have obtained for himself alone. . . . We shall come to the endowment of power through Foreign Missions. We shall come to Foreign Missions through common honesty. A revival of simple, square-footed integrity is the real missionary need of our time and of all times. It is the only need. God adds all the rest.

Event and Comment.

President Cleveland says that he would rather his son should be the builder of a bridge like the Brooklyn bridge than be President. Just see how the family is degenerating. Cleveland's father was a Presbyterian minister, Cleveland was only a President, and now his son is to be a bridge-builder.

The First Baptist Church of Syracuse, New York, after having a Methodist University President supply its pulpit with great acceptance, decided that he was good enough to administer the communion to them and he did. Thus the barriers of the unchurching churches gradually crumble before the tolerance of a larger charity.

The proposed union of the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Synod and the United Presbyterian Church is one with which the Standard is in hearty accord, as long as the Associate Reformed brethren think that a hymn-book is too big an obstacle to their coming over to the Southern Presbyterian Church. As we understand it, there are practically no doctrinal differences, and both churches rightly consider that the sectional differences have been cultivated long enough. All we have to say at present is that the United Presbyterian Church is about to get some mighty good Presbyterian members into its fold.

It is a great help sometimes to see the picture of a man who is talked about. The Rev. W. Montague Geer, an Episcopal vicar of New York, made a savage attack upon the Public School system the other day, and he has been abundantly endorsed by the Catholic press. From his picture we would pigeon-hole him "Sensationalist." Father McMillan let the cat out of the bag in hoping that some legal way would be found for appropriating public money to denominational schools. And then a Catholic authority shows that the preponderance of Catholic criminals is 90 per cent, where it should be 14 per cent, and concludes that Catholic education is not such a safe-guard of the morals after all. We think the Catholic press overestimated the influence of their Episcopal ally in this instance.

Lyman Abbott is writing a letter, perhaps a series of them, in the Outlook, to a young minister. The title of the first one is, Fundamental Doctrines. That sounds solid and substantial enough. He admits that in the reaction against creeds the truth that certain intellectual convictions are necessary is lost sight of. But when we get to the end of the letter we read: "I do not say that you must believe in the divinity of Christ or in the atonement." We await with some impatience what Lyman Abbott does consider fundamental doctrines and he sums them up in one, "that God is in his world . . . working out a Kingdom of God which is righteousness and peace and joy in holiness of spirit"—as he mistranslates, for Holy Ghost. So the fundamental doctrine for the minister of Christ to receive is one that any Deist could accept. Not only is it not necessary to believe in the divinity of Christ, but not even in Christ at all, unless the phrase, the Kingdom of God, has some reference to Him. Not only is it not a fundamental doctrine that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, but it is not necessary to believe in the historic Christ at all. We have reason to believe that Lyman Abbott accepts both that divinity and some sort of belief in the atonement. But why it is necessary for a Christian minister, in a presumably religious periodical, to make every admission that an Ingersoll could claim is beyond us. Surely if there is anything fundamental, it is the doctrine of the divinity of Christ. Said Christ himself, "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." But we suppose Dr. Abbott would say that this is from the Fourth Gospel.

The saloon has made an exhibition of itself in North Carolina in the sphere of practical politics that ought to convince any one that there is no depth of degradation to which the saloon party will not go, in its fight to preserve the saloon. In Reidsville a new registration was ordered by the aldermen and the registrar appointed was a man who owned a large part of the saloon property and received an income of several hundred dollars from the rent of the buildings. Of course the saloon won, though enough votes were challenged as fraudulent to have changed the result. In Raleigh, negroes were registered, with no reference to the constitutional amendment, one of the registrars confessing that he did not have a copy of the constitution with which to make the test of the ability of the would-be voter to read. In Raleigh the saloon was defeated by the dispensary, but the saloon Board of Aldermen have put the management of the dispensary into the worst possible hands in defiance of the press, of the people and of decency. In Salisbury the saloon Board of Aldermen ordered an illegal election, and voters were registered illegally with no opportunity for challenge, as is provided by law. Nobody is surprised, because this is a way the saloon has. But people seem slow to understand that the men who ally themselves with the saloon and count upon the saloon vote may be counted upon to go the full limit of fraud and perjury and violence; they doubtless would not stop at murder. If there is any more debauching influence in American civilization the Standard does not know it. Some day we will look back at the system and wonder that we endured it so long.

Calvinism, Presbyterianism, and Foreign Missions.

Calvinism is a system of doctrine. Presbyterianism is a system of government. The doctrine is a doctrine of the Christian religion. The government is that of the Christian Church. There are other doctrines concerning that religion and other governments of that Church. Foreign Missions is the promulgation of the Christian religion and the establishment of the Christian Church in heathen lands, a work in which all Christian Churches are concerned. No Christian can but rejoice at the successful work of any Christian Church in turning men from heathen darkness unto light and from the power of Satan unto God. But the intelligent Calvinistic Presbyterian has a double incentive to the duty of giving that doctrine of the gospel and that form of Church government in which he believes to heathen lands.

The Calvinistic point of view is the most inspiring to missionary effort. It unites the obligation of duty with the stimulus of success. It crowns the loyalty of obedience with victory. When Paul was discouraged with the wickedness of heathen Corinth, "Then spake the Lord to Paul in the night by a vision. Be not afraid, but speak and hold not thy peace; for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee; for I have much people in this city." It is to be noted that the Lord speaks of his present possession of the people of wicked Corinth; they were his by right of the eternal covenant, by right of redemption, though not yet called unto himself. They were heathen philosophers, "Corinthian women," slaves, but they were also Christ's people. And they were not few, but many. Christ had much people even in wicked Corinth, who would manifest themselves as such in the Lord's own time. And Paul's duty was vastly simplified when it was cut down to the simple, fearless preaching of the gospel. All the rest was the Lord's work. We suppose after that vision that a new light must have dawned upon the great missionary apostle, and that he never saw the face of a man or a woman or a child that his soul did not whisper "This may be one of the people of whom the Lord spoke to me."

Just so, Christ has much people in the heathen world today. They are being gathered in by the thousands and can already be numbered by the million, but they are growing more and more in multiplying ratio as the years pass. Every invention and appliance of modern civilization that promotes the inter-communication of men contributes to the circulation of the agencies of the gospel. And the word comes to us, Go, Preach, and the duty is clear and the victory is sure.

It is not strange therefore that the Calvinistic Churches are foremost in the work of Foreign Missions; that they are doing the greater part of the missionary work of the world today. The motive of humanity is a powerful one, but it is not the supreme motive. The Calvinistic conception of duty, glorified by the love of Christ, has led men of whom the world was not worthy to deeds of heroism and of sacrifice that have thrilled the world. And in the habitations of cruelty, under the barbarities of heathen governments, it is needful that this same inspiring motive of the Calvinist should be imparted to those who become Christians, the daring to speak the truth and to do the right, because the Lord stands by, and, whether in life or in death, none shall set on his servants to hurt them till their work is done, and then, even the killing of the body is the coronation of the soul.

The older men grow, the more they feel how much government has to do with the progress of Christ's Kingdom in the world. A tyrannical and unjust government is a fearful obstacle in the way of the gospel. There are countries upon earth today—Spain, notably—which have almost driven the gospel from their borders by the tyranny of their governments. Even in this twentieth century the gospel has a hard time of it in France. In our own land, a corrupt and corrupting city government by its pandering to vice and its encouragement to temptation can undo much that the churches are trying to accomplish. Now Presbyterianism is a form of Church government in which tyranny is at a discount. Its exercise is almost impossible. And Presbyterianism in the Church corresponds to Republicanism in the sphere of the State. The Presbyterian Church, when in full operation in a heathen land, is training its members in the exercise of a Republican form of Government. In the sphere of the State it is universally admitted that this is the best form of Government. The King is doomed, is already an anachronism. A government by the people without representatives is practical for a community, if it be small enough, or for a church. But it is impossible to bind communities or churches together by that system. The government of the United States is Presbyterianism in the sphere of the State. In North Carolina even the name of the Legislative body is, the General Assembly, a name that is scriptural in origin, but Presbyterian in application. And so much does the genius of our government cling to joint power, the power of representatives, and abhor one-man rule, that it gives its President or its Governor only the veto power. Neither can make or pass the smallest bit of legislation.

Now of course the great example of State Presbyterianism being our own Republic, it may be said that there is not so much need of that example as if the United States did not exist. But Republicanism must be practiced as well as observed as an example. In China, today, about the only Chinese citizens who are being trained in Republicanism are the Chinese Presbyterians. So in Japan. So in India. We know not what the future may bring forth. But it is almost certain that as in the Nineteenth Century the countries of South America threw off the yokes of royalty and organized themselves into Republics; so, in this Twentieth Century, the peoples of the Old World, of Asia and even of Africa, may set up governments for themselves upon the ruins of the old monarchies and tyrannies. And the influence of the Presbyterian Church in this direction, the establishment of free governments in the earth, may be altogether out of proportion to its numbers in the foreign field.

So we end as we began, that we have a double incentive to the work of foreign missions. We are a part of the great Church of Christ that is marching on to victory as certainly as through the ages one increasing purpose runs. And we are that part of the Church of Christ that believes in those high doctrines of Christian faith that inspire the missionary to his noblest efforts, the Church of Christ to her most heroic sacrifices and the convert from heathenism to martyrdom itself. And we believe in that system of government, outlined for men in Jewish and Scripture history, which knows neither the tyranny of the king nor the rule of the mob, which is the model for the greatest republic of earth, and for others that are and that are to be. We know not what humble and unknown missionary of this faith may even now be doing in kindling the flame of liberty that shall sweep over an empire, in inspiring men to do and to dare and to be free. Let us help in the cause.

The Truth About Christian Science. The invasion of New York by Alexander Dowie and his disastrous defeat have called attention anew to the hold which Dowieism has over minds of a certain type and the kinship between Dowieism and Christian Science. Both base their claims upon a religious revelation. Both claim to heal the ills of the body through appeals to religious emotion. Dowie claims to be the third Elijah, having more scriptural knowledge than some of his newspaper critics who forgot that John the Baptist was the Second Elijah. Mrs. Eddy's claims are even more extravagant.

She is as really worshipped as ever the Virgin Mary was by the most ignorantly devout Catholic. And by the way, the Catholic Church, through its relics and miraculous fountains, makes the same claim that Dowieism and Christian Science make as to the healing of the sick.

It has been epigrammatically asserted that Christian Science is neither Christian nor Science. It is Christian, not at all. It is scientific, in the sense that it has recognized, however little its votaries understand it, a great law of the mind, one of the basic principles of psychology, namely, the power of the mind over the body. And while the Science is a very travesty of Christianity, a denial of its most vital truths and the setter up of a false Christ in the person of its founder, it is religious, in the broad sense. It recognizes the force of the religious appeal to the mind. It aims to control the mind through this appeal to its strongest emotions and through the mind to control the body and the body's ills. It is because the ills of the mind are so much worse than the ills of the body, because the vitiation of character through superstition and idolatry is worse even than death, that Christian people have set their faces against Christian Science as a delusion and a snare.

A very cheap and easy way to combat Christian Science is to deny the evidences of healing power that it offers. Of course there are many spurious claims. Yet it is an endless task to question the fact of each successive miracle as it is worked. And it is undoubtedly true that there are some of these "miracles" that are rather hard to explain. A woman who has been bedridden for years leaves her community on a stretcher and goes to a "healer" and comes back well and with all the missionary zeal of a new convert.

But psychology teaches that it is possible to admit every one of these facts, spurious and all, and explain them on true scientific principles.

We are all familiar with this control of the functions of the body by the mind. We speak of the blush of shame, the pallor of fear, in which expressions there is a physical evidence of a mental emotion. To go a step farther, we know that cheerfulness is a good medicine and that when a man's friends conspire to play a practical joke upon him and tell him how ill he is looking, he immediately begins to feel ill. Now this is not all in the mind, imaginary. The mind acts upon the body. One of the very functions of the mind is to control the functions of the body.

There are certain emotions of the mind that correspond to and aggravate the ills of the body. The Christian Science "healer" tells the patient that there is no such thing as sickness. Certain formulas are repeated over and over again until the patient is hypnotized or self-hypnotized into the belief that the sickness was all imaginary. In some cases it was, and the mind being delivered from the idea of sickness or of bodily incapacity, the body resumes its normal powers. But the power of the fixed idea that there is no such thing as sickness acts upon the physical system through the power of the mind upon the brain and the whole nervous organization. The curative process begins just as really as if the correct medicine had been taken for the specific disease and the patient becomes another convert to Christian Science.

If this were all, no one could object to the practice of the Science. We doubt not that the principle of which we have spoken will be more and more put into operation by our physicians as the knowledge of them becomes more general. But the sad part about it is that the weak-minded folk who are carried away with this delusion make shipwreck of their faith. Some of them, let us hope, are already grounded in the principles of Christianity and simply add the superstructure of this superstition upon their faith. It should be understood that Christianity is for the saving of the soul and that it has nothing to do with the practice of medicine, save in the general way of faith in him who healeth all our diseases. It is just as possible for the vilest sort of man or woman, with hypnotic power and a knowledge of the effect of religious emotion, to work these cures, as it is for one who may be a Christian as well as a Christian Scientist. It is one of the "lying wonders," doubtless, of which Paul speaks.

While we did not have the book in mind when we began writing, it is in order to say that the best book on the subject is the new edition of Christian Science, by Rev. W. P. McCorkle, which can be had of our Presbyterian Committee of Publication. The whole question is well worth renewed study and investigation.

Review of Contemporaries.

The Oldest Religious Newspaper—Again.

In our last issue we intimated that there might be more light thrown on the question as to whether the Christian Observer or the Presbyterian Banner were the oldest religious newspaper. The Christian Observer made two claims, that the Religious Remembrancer, from which it claims descent, was the first religious newspaper ever published. This claim the Banner knocked sky-high and the Observer is discreetly silent about it. But the Observer of October 28, 1903, contained the following:

A few weeks ago we spoke of the Christian Observer as the oldest religious paper in the world, beginning with the Christian Remembrancer, September 4, 1813. It has been our intention, at our early convenience, to trace, somewhat further, the history of this paper. Meanwhile the Presbyterian Banner has challenged our claim, with the assertion that the Remembrancer was suspended in August, 1823, and that the Philadelphian (of which the Christian Observer is the unquestioned successor) was not started till May 5, 1825; and that there is a gap fatal to the succession from August, 1823, to May, 1825. At this time, we simply furnish the fact, which the Banner overlooked, that the Remembrancer was continued during this interval under the name of the Christian Gazette and Youth's Herald. This was merged in 1825, into the Philadelphian, and thus the line of succession of the Christian Observer is complete from 1813 to the present.

The Banner bases its argument on the fact that its correspondent in Philadelphia was unable to find in the Historical Society any copies of the Christian Gazette. But according to the Philadelphian of January 19, 1832, there appeared in the New York Observer of January 23, 1828, an article by Rev. John Welwood Scott, the founder of the Remembrancer. He writes:

"The Remembrancer was edited by me and published every Saturday, unremittingly from September 4, 1813, until August 16, 1823 (full ten years), when it was relinquished in favor of the proprietor of the Christian Gazette, which paper was subsequently blended in the Philadelphian, now published in this city."

And in that number of the Philadelphian Rev. Ezra Stiles Ely, after citing this letter, adds the following:

"In confirmation of the above, we might extract from the Christian Gazette and Youth's Herald of December 13, 1823, the advertisement of Mr. Scott to his subscribers informing them of the continuance of his Remembrancer in union with that paper."

But the Observer forgot to mention that the Religious Remembrancer died a natural death, and that four months afterwards its subscription list was turned over to the Christian Gazette and Youth's Herald. The Banner supplies this information in the paragraph below:

In setting forth the facts on this subject as far as they were known to us in our issue of September 24, we stated that The Christian Observer, of Louisville, encounters a gap of nearly two years, in its claimed succession from The Religious Remembrancer, from August 16, 1823, when the Remembrancer suspended, to May 5, 1825, when The Philadelphian first appeared. We could not trace any connection between the Remembrancer and the Philadelphian. The Christian Observer now states that The Christian Gazette and Youth's Herald was the link between these two papers. The Philadelphian announced in its first issue that it had united with itself The Christian Gazette and Youth's Herald. Our correspondent in Philadelphia could find no copy of this latter paper and could learn nothing of its history. The Christian Observer says that John W. Scott, the founder of the Remembrancer, had an article in the New York Observer of January 23, 1828, in which he states that "The Remembrancer was edited and published by me from September 4, 1813, until August 16, 1823, when it was relinquished in favor of the proprietor of the Christian Gazette, which paper was subsequently blended in the Philadelphian, now published in this city." When Mr. Scott suspended the Remembrancer he expected to revive it, enlarged and improved, as he announced in its last issue. He did not do this, and the above quotation from his article in the New York Observer shows that he transferred his subscription list to the Christian Gazette and Youth's Herald, which was afterward united with the Philadelphian. This transference took place, not immediately on the suspension of the Remembrancer in August, 1823, but in December following. Thus some connection is supplied between the Remembrancer and the Philadelphian, but this connection is nothing but the transference of the subscription list of a suspended paper to an existing paper.

We really think that if a gap be admitted in publication, then the Standard should renew its claim through the line of succession from Dr. John Holt Rice, who preached in the same county in which we were "raised," and through Dr. William Brown, the great-uncle of the editor of our Children's Department.

North Carolina and New England

Says the Congregationalist, Boston:

The Presbyterian Standard thinks that the reason for the doleful outlook for religion in New England is that it rejects the theology of Jonathan Edwards and that "the Congregationalist Church has a spineless theology now." Secretary Bliss of the American Tract Society thinks the reason is that the majority of the population of New England are of foreign stock which, because of their traditions and training, are almost unreachable by Protestant churches. We think that this difference of opinion is largely because Dr. Bliss lives in New England and the Presbyterian Standard is published in North Carolina. If its editor, whom we should like to meet and entertain, would visit this section, he would come to know the proper title to give to our churches, and perhaps would better understand their theology.

Congregationalist for Congregational was a slip of the pen. As to laying the blame on the foreigner, there are two things to say. First, that the missionary zeal that comes from clear conviction would not rest content with saying that a population is unreachable by Protestant influences. The other thing is, if we are not misinformed, that rural New England, inhabited by the old American stock, is the real pagan New England. But then we have had only a brief personal acquaintance with New England and there is much truth in the philosophy that the want of knowledge at first hand has led to a display of ignorance. But then, come to think of it, suppose all the books and magazines and papers could be destroyed, containing New England articles written about the South, with no more personal knowledge than the Standard has of New England, what an emptying of the New England book-shelves there would be, to be sure.

The Need of the Non-Christian World for Christ.

Robert E. Speer.*

Escape for a moment from the common and unexamined notions of our Christian faith and view them with fresh and candid scrutiny. How instantly startling these two questions become, Why should God have sent His Son out of His presence?

What would my life be, stripped of Christ? Let us not accept at once and with only casual thought, the natural replies. Let us think of God as withholding His Son from the world and the life of man, and of the possibility of a Christless life for ourselves. Perhaps no one of us can do this. The mental strength, the frank intellectual honesty necessary for it are so rare. But if any man can do it, and justly conceive where and what his own life would be without the Son of God as the light and the Lord of it, and the light and Lord of its preparation for eighteen centuries, I have already spoken my message to that man. As he shudders at the thought of such a gloom and poverty for himself, he will remember that the vast majority of his fellow-creatures are thus dark and poor.

Staking the chance of missionary sympathy on this cast is hazarding much. I am aware of this. If Christ means little to a man, it is natural that He should be judged of little value to the world, and that the world's ignorance of Him should be deemed of light account. But if Christ means much, as to true men of His Church, He must mean all, then He must be held to mean as much to the world, which He came not to condemn but to save. That God thought the world's need so great that He sent His Son to be its Saviour; that Jesus Christ our Lord so felt that need that it lay like a woe upon His soul and won His sacrifice; and that the passing of Christ from our life would be as the fall of doom—may not one rest on these grounds, in speaking to true men, the appeal for Missions? Our loyalty to the mission is the measure of our judgment of the Son of God.

The world needs the mission now. A thousand millions of men sinning, suffering, struggling, need a Saviour, helpful, tender, sufficient. He came for them, but they have never heard of Him. It is not a matter of speculation as to eternal destiny. There is a righteous judge. It is a matter of present want, ignorance and death, and I speak not of the Bible's teaching as to men's condition, but of actual fact and experience. When Jesus said: "No man cometh unto the Father but by Me," He was not setting arbitrary limits. He was simply saying what all history has shown and is proving today all over the world, that only by Christ do men come to the Father. In all the non-Christian world, Christ's is the only force preaching righteousness, teaching purity, creating love, drawing men Father-ward. In studying the non-Christian religions one wants to think well of them—to see the best that is in them. They force the inevitable conclusion that there is no best. Their elements of truth have been counteracted and distorted by their error. Their original simplicity and fervor have died away into gross superstition and fanaticism. Their own prophets condemn them. Swami Vivekananda has recently told the people of Madras what Buddhism became in India, "The most hideous ceremonies, the most horrible, the most obscene books that human hands ever wrote or the human brain ever conceived, the most bestial forms that ever passed under the name of religion, have all been the creation of degraded Buddhism." While of Islam, one who was not a missionary, but who lived long among Mohammadaus, has said, with fullest charity, "There are to be found in Mohammedan history all the elements of greatness in faith, courage, endurance, self-sacrifice. But enclosed within the narrow walls of a rude theology and a barbarous polity, from which the capacity to grow and the liberty to modify has been sternly cut off, they work no deliverance upon the earth. They are strong only for destruction. When that work is over they either prey upon each other or beat themselves to death against the bars of their own prison-house. No permanent dwelling-place can be erected on a foundation of sand, and no durable or humanizing polity upon a foundation of fatalism, despotism, polygamy and slavery." Even at their best, their highest appraisal, what are the religions of the world? If they be lights at all, they are but broken. Yea,

"They are but broken lights of Thee,
And Thou, O Lord, art more than they."

The spiritual insufficiency of the non-Christian religions fills the heathen world with dreariness and pathos. The memory of it tinges one's life with sadness. And that sadness is quickened into indignation and pity at the recollection of the awful suffering and wrongs which are the products of these religions. There is a superficial contentment, and the suffering of centuries has schooled the people of the East into a quiet unresisting endurance of what they have come to regard as part of their unavoidable lot. And the men of the East, if they are not masters of their own suffering, are at least masters of the suffering of others, and so it bears not so heavily on them. But the women and children of the East are the ones who wait for the mission, and who need its coming. The judgment of their need, which one of Mr. Kipling's creations expresses of India, is not too severe: "What's the matter with this country is not in the least political, social and moral evils and corruptions, all more or less due to the unnatural treatment of women. You can't gather figs from thistles; and so long as the system of infant marriage, the prohibition of the re-marriage of widows, the life-long imprisonment of woes in a worse than penal imprisonment and the withholding from them any kind of education or treatment as rational beings continues, the country can not advance a step. Half of it is morally dead and worse than dead, and that is just the half from which we have a right to look for the best impulses. It is right here where the trouble is, and not in any political considerations whatever. The foundations of their life are rotten—utterly, bestially rotten. The men talk of their rights and privileges. I have seen the women who bore these very men, and again—may God forgive the men."

The mission now depends upon men. Christ committed it to them. He launched it and went away, saying as He went, not to the Apostles only, but to all His disciples, "Bear it to the uttermost parts of the earth." We have not borne it. Saints, martyrs and heroes have given their lives to it, but we have not borne it. To what extent are our lives now committed to it? Four hundred millions of our fellow creatures in China, three hundred millions in India, one hundred and forty millions outside of India, and millions of men in other lands are ignorant that the mission has come—the mission of the Father's revelations in the Son to all. They wait for it.

"The restless millions wait

The light whose dawning maketh all things new:
Christ also waits.

But men are slow and late,
Have we done what we could?
Have I? Have you?

Vermont is trying the license system again after some years of prohibition, and the cold, hard fact is that in the towns where the saloons have been opened, drunkenness has greatly increased. The saloon is the only solution of the liquor problem that seems entirely satisfactory to his Satanic majesty. He is never satisfied until he gets it.

His Lamps.

His lamps are we,
 To shine where He shall say,
 And lamps are not for sunny rooms
 Nor for the light of day.
 But for dark places of the earth,
 Where shame and wrong and crime have birth;
 Or for the musky twilight gray,
 Where wandering sheep have gone astray;
 Or where the light of faith grows dim,
 And souls are groping after him;
 And as sometimes a flame we find,
 Clear shining through the night
 So bright, we do not see the lamp,
 But only see the light,
 So may we shine—his light the flame—
 That men may glorify his name!

The Sower,

Frances Ridley Havergal.

"I had much seed to sow," said one; "I planned
 To fill broad furrows and to watch it spring,
 And water it with care. But now the hand
 Of Him to whom I sought great sheaves to bring
 Is laid upon His laborer, and I wait,
 Weak, helpless, at His palace gate.
 "Now I have nothing only day by day
 Grace to sustain me till the day is done;
 And some sweet passing glimpse by the way
 Of Him, the altogether lovely one,
 And some strange things to learn, unlearned before,
 That make the suffering light, if it but teach me more."
 Yet, from the hush of that secluded room,
 Forth floated winged steeds of thought and prayer—
 Those, reaching many a desert place to bloom,
 And pleasant fruit an hundred fold to bear,
 Those, wafted heavenward with song and sigh,
 To fall again with showers of blessings from on high.

I Shall Not Pass This Way Again.

The bread that giveth strength I want to give;
 The water pure, that bids the thirsty live.
 I want to help the fainting day by day,
 I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give the oil of joy for tears,
 The faith to conquer crowding doubts and fears;
 Beauty for ashes may I give away,
 I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give good measure running o'er,
 And into angry hearts I want to pour
 The answer soft that turneth wrath away,
 I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give to others hope and faith;
 I want to do all that the Master saith;
 I want to do aright from day to day,
 I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

A missionary in India had been earnestly preaching in the bazaar or market place of the town where he labored, and was going out of the city when a heathen asked him in mockery: "How many Christians have you made today?" The missionary pointed to a field and said: "What would happen tomorrow if we were to sow corn there today?" The answer was "Nothing." "What would happen the day after?" "Nothing," was again the reply. "What would it in a few days after that?" "Little blades would sprout up." "Well," said the missionary, "I have sown the good seed today, and this, too, will come up after some time."

The Curse of Strong Drink.

Prov. 20-1; 23:20, 29-35

Nov. 22, 1903.

Intemperance is a wide-spread evil and has existed in all ages and in all lands. It is not only a grievous curse in itself, but is the fruitful parent of many diseases, losses and crimes that afflict humanity. Human beings have attempted to combat it by pledges, societies and legislation, and though still very prevalent some check has been placed upon it by these agencies. It is not surprising that the Scriptures should give frequent and emphatic warnings is to this appalling social vice. The present lesson makes intoxicating liquors responsible for numerous evils, and gives solemn divine counsels respecting the drink habit.

I. The Ills of Drunkenness.—"Wine is a mocker." It promises delight and leads to misery. "Strong drink is raging." It incites to evil passions and produces brawling or quarrelling. "Whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise," as destitute of wisdom. The drunkard hath woe, hath sorrow, hath contentions, hath babbling or foolish talking and complaining, hath wounds without cause or bodily injuries needlessly inflicted by accident or assault, hath redness of eyes, or inflamed face and bleared vision. The drunkard must have woe in his own person and in his household, in his earthly life and in his eternal abode. He has multiplied sources of sorrow in his soul, in his home, in his business and in his community. He has contentions in his family, and with his friends and neighbors. His speech is foolish, his mind and senses are stupified, his bodily organs are weakened and impaired and his whole nature becomes gradually a sad and hopeless wreck.

II. The Final Results of Drunkenness.—One consequence is Poverty. "The Drunkard and the Glutton shall come to poverty." Intemperance in eating or drinking leads to the same end. They foster waste which leads to want. They impair the physical and mental powers and disqualify for industry. They cause lack of confidence on the part of our fellows and indisposition to give employment. Drunkenness produces stupefaction and indolent inaction. "Drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags." The drink habit whatever of pleasure it may promise at first at last "Biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." This habit too, long-indulged, causes its victim "to see strange things," and "his heart to utter perverse things." Horrid visions come to him in his delirium, and his lips utter obscene expressions and profane oaths. The drunkard places himself in situations of extreme peril for his body and soul. He is like one "that lieth down in the midst of the sea or that "lieth upon the top of a mast." He indurates his nature and reduces himself to a state of insensibility and bondage. He says "They have stricken me, and I was not sick; they have beaten me and I felt it not; when shall I awake? I will seek it yet again."

III. Divine Counsels Respecting this Habit.—Do not associate with drunkards, for a man usually adopts the habits of his intimate companions. "Be not among wine-bibbers, among riotous eaters of flesh." Avoid the society of those guilty of excess, lest you be contaminated by their example, and contract their habits. This is not only divine counsel, but it accords with the dictates of common sense. If a man would shun leprosy or small pox, he does not seek intimate relations with those afflicted with these maladies. So a man must not habitually keep company with wine bibbers, if he does not wish to become a drunkard.

Another counsel given is "absent yourself from the wine itself and the places where it is used." To look at the wine, to taste or smell it often arouses the latent deadly appetite. Hence God says "Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright."

Missionary.

Growth of Foreign Missions.

1800—The foreign missionary societies numbered seven.

1800—The income of the seven societies amounted to about fifty thousand dollars.

1900—The income is over fifteen million dollars.

1800—The number of native communicants enrolled in Protestant mission churches was seven thousand.

1900—There are one million five hundred thousand native communicants.

1800—The adherents of Protestant churches in heathen lands were estimated at fifteen thousand.

1900—They number three million five hundred thousand.

1800—There were no patients treated by Christian physicians.

1900—There are over two hundred thousand patients under treatment in hospitals and dispensaries established by foreign missionary societies.

1800—Medical missions were unknown.

1900—There are more than five hundred medical missionaries, one-fourth of this number being women.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

Improved Missionary Giving.

The tide of missionary giving in the American churches shows on the whole a steady rise. The Southern Presbyterian Church promises to make a magnificent advance in the current year. That denomination contributed last year to foreign missions a little over $150,000; in only one previous year had it ever exceeded $140,000. In view however, of pressing needs the Executive Committee of Foreign Missions—corresponding to the Board in the Northern Church—went to the Assembly last spring asking for $225,000 for the year coming. The Assembly heard their statement, thought their request inadequate, and made the appeal for a full quarter of a million. The committee has been encouraged greatly by a special gift of $25,000 made by one of its own members in the midst of the summer when collections are always lowest. The Southern Committee desires to add forty-five workers to its foreign staff before next Assembly. The Episcopalian Board of Missions has just cast up its books for the fiscal year ending August 31, and reports a gain of $66,000 over the previous year, carrying the grand total of receipts close to $1,100,000. This sum is to be divided between domestic and foreign missions. The most encouraging feature noted in the report is the large increase in the number of contributing parishes. Two years ago the number of congregations co-operating with the Board was 2,226; now it is 4,183,—showing the effect of one of the most strenuous missionary campaigns ever carried on within any American denomination. At the same time it is announced that the great American Board has closed its year free of debt. The year has been marked with a steady increase of contributions from the so-called "live sources," but the income from legacies fell off so extraordinarily that it seemed impossible to avoid a deficit. In the last month, however, the stream of gifts from moderate givers rose so finely that without any of the big emergency donations which have often heretofore saved a similar situation, the balance came out on the right side after all. But over against these encouraging facts from other bodies, the members of our own Church should understand that the receipts of our Board have fallen off surprisingly during the past summer. The Board is now about $150, behind its record to the same time last year, and last year, it must be remembered, great embarrassment was caused by the paucity of gifts in the earlier months and the crowding of contributions into the last months. Now the embarrassment is even worse.—The Interior.

Korea needs two physicians and at least two ordained male missionaries. The time has also come when they need to begin a girls' boarding school in that mission.

Comparative Outlook.

April 1, 1902.—166 missionaries enrolled; $164,883 contributed for work during year ending March, 1902;

54 missionaries individually supported by 37 churches and individuals at a total cost of $28,350, leaving a balance of $171,650 to be provided from the general fund to meet the proposed budget of $200,000 for the work of the year.

April 1, 1903.—176 missionaries enrolled;

$180,448 contributed for work during the year ending March, 1903: 129 missionaries individually supported by 127 churches and individuals at a total cost of

$78,775, and, in addition, 102 churches have assumed the support of 431 shares in the work of

39 mission stations, amounting to $21,565, making in all a total of 229 churches promising an aggregate of $100,340, leaving a balance of

$99,660 to be provided from the general fund to meet the proposed budget of $200,000 for the work of the present year.

Madam Wu, wife of the Chinese minister recently recalled to China, went back with unbound feet. Her residence in this country so convinced her of the superiority of natural feet that she willingly endured the pain necessary to regain their normal shape. The toes that had been pressed back to the heels, and kept tightly bandaged all the time, were gradually allowed to assume the natural position, until finally the bandages were removed entirely, and she could walk with ease. She said, in speaking of her feet: "my feet are quite big now. But I do not care, for I am not in sympathy with the little-foot practice in my country. It is unnatural, and deprives a woman of so much that is beautiful and useful in life." She also said: "There are many American customs which I like and shall introduce in China. The Chinese women are eager to take their places in life along with the women of other nations, and I hope it will not be long before they will be given a reasonable amount of freedom"—Missionary Review of the World.

The American Bible Society in its eighty-seventh annual report announces that its publications last year comprised nearly 2,000,000 Bibles, Testaments and portions, the largest output of its history. About half of this issue was in English; the rest in practically all the languages of the globe. In Porto Rico the circulation of the Scriptures leaped from 3,000 the year before to 10,000 last year. In two years the demand in the Philippines rose from 11,000 to 91,000 copies. In Syria the sales of Arabic Bibles keep the presses crowded to the limit, while in China the request for God's word has grown so extraordinary in the past year that it is useless to think of keeping pace with it without new and faster presses. Altogether the Society had 447 persons in its employ distributing the Bible.

In view of the loneliness to which the vast majority of missionaries are subject, a missionary association has been formed in England which has put itself into communication with every known member of the 10,000 missionaries abroad, by sending them the numbers of an occasional paper, entitled: The Missionary Association Letter. For this thankful kindness the association has received warm thanks from more than 1,000 missionaries for the interest shown in their spiritual welfare and the sympathy expressed in the many difficulties and trials of their position.

Among the new missionaries sent to the field last year by the English Church Missionary Society, are the eldest son of the martyr Bishop Hannington, and a daughter of David Livingstone, with her husband, the Rev. Mr. Wilson.

The Influence of Christianity on the Heathen Africans.

"On Him they laid the cross that he might bear it after Jesus."

Up the lonely heights of Golgotha that eventful day a solemn procession was slowly toiling its painful way. There every land and nation had sent its quota to the immortal event soon to take place. Jew and Gentile, Mede and Persian, Greek and Roman, all were gathered there to see Jesus die. The bright robes of them of Sidon and Tyre mingled with the white toga of the haughty Roman; dwellers in far Mesopotamia and they from Indus and from Orme, proud savants from Euphrates and from the Nile passed along the stony crags and pressed forward to catch a glimpse of Him whom they had called the King of the Jews. The victors bore the faces, and the spears of the legionaries of the Caesars compelled a silence ominous and profound. Toward the front a lone figure bent with the weight of a heavy wooden Cross marched forward, and Jesus' tottering steps revealed a weariness of the frame no word of his would proclaim.

In the ranks was a dark man of Cyrenaea, come from the country, some simple Ethiopian from far off beyond the North West coast of Egypt, the representative there of Ham the accursed. Him the Roman soldiers saw, and on Simon they laid the cross that he might bear it after Jesus.

There was the scene which ages have never changed; on the African, from the midst of all that throng of every race and kindred, the white men laid the burden of the Man of Galilee; and that cross has been on the African's shoulder from that day to this.

The White Man's burden has been borne from Calvary through all the ages since, and Simon, the black burden bearer of the cross will stand for Simon's people while eternal ages roll.

Nearly a half century ago, David Livingstone, after having marched across swamp, jungle, desert, plain and mountain, among fearful beasts and more fearful men, took his stand beside the waters of the yellow Kasai and gazed on the vast wilderness stretching for thousands of miles around him. For three thousand miles to the north lay a terra incognita, wholly unknown to civilized mankind; for two thousand miles eastward the step of the white man had never trod; for two thousand southward his own had been the first voice to preach Jesus to the denizens of the dark land behind since the time when the morning stars first sang together, and the sons of God shouted for joy. In all that immense region, larger than Europe, more populous than America, not a white man dwelt; not a church was found; not a civilized city existed; no steamboat, no railroad, no telegraph, no school house, no books, no plough, no Bible. Men ate each other and instead of cemeteries had bone-yards; they sacrificed their families to appease their Gods; they killed slaves when the master died to serve him in the other world; lived at perpetual warfare among themselves; exchanged slaves for goats, and often valued a man by the weight of meat upon him; lived in the direst fear of innumerable evil spirits, and living feared to die, and dying went to a nameless doom. No light, no liberty, no truth, no trust, no Gospel, no God.

Forty years afterwards, I stood on the same Kasai, near the same spot. Over the land where Livingstone's eyes had prophetically rested there were now a hundred thousand men of his own race dwelling in safety. Government posts, commercial establishments, missionary stations, were scattered over it all from one end to the other. A hundred steamboats plied its waters. Eight great railways penetrated the inner recesses of the wilderness, churches reared their heads above the hill-tops, school houses dotted the plains, factories hummed in the valleys, the music of Gospel hymns waked the echoes of the silent forests, and Jesus was being proclaimed in a hundred tongues and lived in tens of thousands of African souls. The Nations of Europe had planted their flags over every foot of the territory; the stock exchanges of the world were kept in ferment over the riches of the once neglected continent; nations were going to war over the possession of a lately despised country, the slave trade was fast disappearing; cannibalism was almost gone, and all Christendom rang with the story of Africa and her dawning redemption. Surely the word of God which Livingstone believed had had free course and been glorified, and Africa had shown that she too was to partake of the Salvation of our God. Ethiopia was stretching out her hands unto God. In the light of this marvelous contrast, no question of the extension of Christianity in Africa can be raised. The inquiry, however, often arises, "But what of the Christianity of these Africans? Is it real? What proofs can be given that these savages, for ages lying in such degradation and ignorance, become really sincere and honest converts of the high ethical and moral religion of Jesus Christ?"

The proofs here are as abundant as the outward extension of Christianity has been rapid. It is true that here in the South of America we have some reason for scepticism about the negro's religion. We know how often they shout on Sunday and visit our hen roosts on Monday. We can appreciate the incident when the famous Senator, John Randolph of Roanoke, was once riding along a road in Virginia, a lady presented him with a petition in favor of the independence of the Greeks. Some little negro pickannies were playing on a fence beside the road, clad in their short cotton garments; said the Senator, as he politely raised his hat to the lady, waving his hand toward the little darkies: "Behold, Madam, the Greeks are at your doors!"

Truly many of us agree with Mr. Randolph from our knowledge of the negroes about us, that the Greeks are at our doors. Nevertheless, be it said what may about the negro and his religion, it is still true that many a Southern man, as Henry Grady so beautifully said, will yet choose to believe that some day a pair of black arms, which nursed him in infancy, will be stretched out to greet him, when he has crossed the shining River and moored his bark on the golden shore. Twelve years ago a young gentleman from a cultured and refined Alabama family, in company with a colored man from the valley of Virginia set up the standard of the cross on the banks of the Lulua in Central Africa. Not a soul in all that immense valley then knew the story of that cross. Now there are seventeen hundred Christians and a hundred thousand adherents there. When young Lapsley landed at the foot of the cataracts of the Lula in 1891, an immense primeval forest, stretching in unbroken density from the water's edge to the distant plains, welcomed him to its dark depths; a native village on its outer fringe, a centre of the slave traffic for four hundred years, wholly given over to all the superstitions and barbarous practices of its aboriginal life, offered him its reluctant hospitality, and there he and Sheppard made a clearing in the forest and planted the cross beside the American flag. From that planting the Mission grew and the Gospel spread. In time fourteen more laborers in the vineyard came, some of whom had to return in broken health, and three of whom were laid to rest in the dark land of their adoption. The language of the natives was mastered, vocabularies compiled, grammars written, a hundred hymns composed or translated into the Bantu language, portions of the Bible rendered into the native tongue, schools conducted, the natives taught to read and to write for the first time, and the arts and industries of Western civilizations introduced. A church was built of mud and poles, covered with leaves, which had to be enlarged every year until now the demands of the situation have decided the construction of a large brick building with a capacity of five thousand. The houses of the missionaries were built of the same material as the church, and the forest cleared for fields and gardens, and later for the extensive native settlements which began to be made as a consequence of the peace and safety in the neighborhood of the Town of God, as the Africans called it. The natives began to flock to Luebo by thousands; some to escape the tribal wars of the interior, some fleeing from the terrors of the slave trade, some coming to work for the white traders who had begun to arrive in search of the riches of the country, principally rubber and ivory.

These traders established large stations on the river, and so Luebo assumed the proportions of a large city, with a white population of about twenty-five, with ten thousand natives in their huts and houses built after the fashion set by the white men. Natives came and went to and from all parts of the adjacent country, sometime hundreds of miles away, and were instrumental in spreading the Gospel with marvelous rapidity. In 1896 two new mission stations were opened one at Ibanj, founded by Mr. Morrison of Virginia, a large market place in the kingdom, of Lukengu, King of the Bakuba, between the Sankuru and Kasai rivers, and the other by myself at the Capital of Ndombe, King of the Baschilange of the great plateau of Lunda. Thus the spread of Christianity in this upper Kasai country proceeded with a rapidity unparalleled in the history of Missions, and with a lack of opposition or persecution absolutely the most remarkable in all history of the Christian Church. It seemed as though these heathen Africans, two thousand miles in the heart of the dark continent, rejoiced to find the light. A noteworthy feature of this work is the fact that it has employed colored men and women from the South along with the white people from the same section, and this, too, when the social traditions and customs of the best people of the South are preserved unchanged, and with no friction or unpleasantness resulting from it. Among these colored people are Sheppard and his wife from Virginia, Maria Fearing and Lillian Thomas, of Alabama, Joseph Phipps from the West Indies and Henry Hawkins from Vicksburg, Mississippi; and all of them are faithful and capable laborers, and deserve high commendation. A steamboat for the use of the Mission was built at Richmond, Va., and is now plying the waters of the Congo Valley, a gift from the children of the Church, and it has contributed materially to the progress of the work, and facilitated the evangelistic journeys of the missionaries, as these trips had previously to be made in canoes, with much danger and great difficulty. It has been found that the medical work of the missionaries gains influence for them among the natives as almost nothing else; and often crowds throng daily to the medical dispensary which was kept on the Mission. A competent medical man would be a great blessing in that work, and could do much original and valuable investigation, besides the greatest possible good for suffering humanity. Thus the situation in that far off country lies, awaiting our response to its mute but powerful appeal. Though the heroic founder of the work left his mortal remains to moulder in old Africa's soil, the harvest of souls from the seed of his planting will cease only when Gabriel's trumpet shall sound the harvest home.

But what of the vital reality of this professed Christianity? For example, do these African converts show evidence of genuine conviction of sin and true repentance? Among those who had gathered about us in our home on the Lulu was a man of a fierce cannibal tribe. His natural force and energy had made him a leader among some workmen we had hired to clear a forest for our gardens. His name was Tambu, meaning lion, and his character justified his name. Once we commenced a special series of services designed to arouse the community on the subject of sincere religion. We preached Christ and the ten commandments, and a great awakening began to ensue. One day Tambu suddenly arose from his seat in the audience, saying that he had a very great matter on his heart and wished to declare his case before all the people. Said Tambu, the lion, "My heart is much troubled and I have no peace day or night. For the word of God has said to me, 'Tambu, your heart is black in my sight, you know that you have been doing evil against my word.' The word of God is true. White man, when you gave me some goods last week to buy provisions for you with, I kept some for myself, and now I am a thief in the eyes of God. What shall I do now to have my heart white, and that the word of God may trouble me no more?"

In order fully to show his repentance, Tambu then resigned his superintendency over the others, took his hatchet and freely entered the ranks of the common laborers, until he felt that he had brought forth the undeniable fruits of repentance.

The effect of conversion there does not stop with repentance. One of the commonest tests of religion is honesty. The question is asked "Do those who once stole, when they profess Christianity steal no more?"

In the employ of a rubber merchant there were a number of native Zappo-Zap slave traders. Among those whom they held in bondage was a man of enormous physical strength and great courage, whose name was Wembo. Once when I was at the place where the master of Wembo lived, he came to me stating his grievances against his master and the Zappo-Zaps. He said he had been born a freeman, of the great Batetela tribe of the Lualaba. The Arabs had made war against his people and he had been stolen when a child from his village and sold into slavery to the Zappo-Zaps; and that he had done all he could to secure his freedom but in vain. He had worked for the white man, and had earned cloth enough to redeem his wife from her master; then he had paid his own master three times the value of an ordinary slave, in cloth he had earned by cleaning crude rubber for the white man; but his master claimed the cloth anyhow, and still refused to let him go. Wembo had appealed to the white merchant, who dared not interfere. Then he came to me, and I informed him that under the laws of the Government he was already a freeman, and that if he succeeded in reaching my station, a hundred and fifty miles distant, I would secure protection for him. Two months afterwards, one afternoon some of the boys came running up to my house, crying out "Wembo has come, Wembo has come." Surely enough, up came the refugee, who had escaped from his master and forced his way across the country to freedom and safety. He said that his master had sold his wife away to the Bakuba, and had threatened to kill him when he remonstrated. Then he had beaten his master and ran away. Wembo entered my service and I never had a more devoted and faithful henchman. He was of enormous physical power, the strongest man I ever saw; his face was furrowed and ridged, stern, savage and determined; his eyes twinkled, deep set under beetling brows, and his tout ensemble was one of amiable ferocity. He was of extraordinary natural sagacity, and learned the lesson of his new life with wonderful rapidity. So attached to my person did he become that rarely would he leave me by day, and never when any danger threatened. Once when some murderous slave-traders were threatening me in a language I did not understand, Wembo came leaping to the charge, and before I could restrain him, struck the principal offender like a cannon ball, and knocked him bodily through one fence and wrecked a wall behind. Once when I was badly wounded he carried me five miles in his arms like a child, and allowed no one to relieve him. One day Wembo came and asked to be allowed to rescue his wife from the Bakuba. I warned him to be exceedingly cautious, but could not withstand his plea. The place where his wife was kept was seventy miles away, and the people dangerous in the extreme. But Wembo was not to be daunted, and set out alone on the hazardous attempt, Saturday at noon. All day Sunday many were the prayers from Wembo's friends for his safety and success. Monday morning a great shout arose from all over the station. "Wembo's come, Hurrah," echoed from hundreds of throats, as the triumphant husband marched down the road, with his wife demurely and wearily trotting along behind him.

Not long after this, Wembo asked to be admitted to the Church. He had been a cannibal, a murderer, a fierce intractable savage, and this step was not to be lightly taken. I examined him with great care, and as the result decided to admit him. Wembo partook of the Communion in the little church at Luebo where his people had fought many a battle, and committed many an atrocity only a few years before.

Not long after, I heard one evening a great commotion down in the quarters, and the sound of a man's angry tones mingled with a woman's sobs. Going down to investigate I found Wembo standing wrathfully beside his door, and his wife sitting down in tears, "Why Wembo," I said, "what does this mean?" You and your wife have always seemed like two doves. What does all this mean?" Wembo answered: "Master this woman is a heathen. When I said my prayers to-night she laughed at me!"

When it came necessary for me to leave my station once, in order to go on a long journey, I was obliged to leave all my property in Wembo's hands. It consisted of various articles of merchandise and barter, necessary to our manner of life out there. On my return, Wembo insisted on my counting everything, and not so much as a pin was found missing, according to my written inventory. Such was the fruit of the conversion of this wild and ferocious cannibal to the religion of Jesus Christ.

Now what of the effect of religion on the social elevation of the people?

Among the chieftains to whom I preached was a redoubtable man of war, Chimbundu, chief of the Bena Biomba, whose Capital contained a thousand fierce and warlike people. After hearing the Gospel for about a year, one day Chimbundu sent me an invitation to visit him from my station at the adjacent town of King Ndombe. Imagine at my astonishment when I arrived at the site of this town to find it utterly deserted, the houses all gone, the inhabitants all vanished. A man in the fields near by informed me that Chimbundu had moved his town to a hill two miles distant. Going thither my surprise was great at the change. The town had been metamorphosed; the streets were laid out in regular squares, planted with young trees, the houses at regular intervals, the whole place clean and neat, presenting a marvelous contrast to the filthy helter-skelter aggregation of huts, goats, pigs, babies and idols which had constituted the old town. Chimbundu met me all radiant with smiles, and with great pride and self-satisfaction, and showed me over his new place. Said he:

"Fuela, you know you have been telling me about the word of God for many months, and at last I said to myself, surely we must begin to worship this God, but we can not do so in a dirty ill-smelling town, which had been inhabited by the Devil for so long that the very earth had become bad. So I tore down my old town, burnt up the old idols, and moved over here, where we can now follow the word of God in a new clean town." I have often thought that if the Gospel would produce such an effect on the denizens of the negro quarters in many of our Southern towns, surely we would preach with redoubled energy to the "heathen at our doors."

Chimbundu had become a most enthusiastic adherent of Christianity. So thorough-going was he, indeed, that his proselyting tendencies became quite embarrassing on one occasion. He had been at war with a refractory adjacent town for several months and had at last sallied forth and burnt down the obstreperous enemy's stronghold. When I asked him the cause of the war, he averred that the obstinate people of Bena Lumbo, as his enemies were styled, had refused to follow his example in revolutionizing the old conditions and in accepting the word of God. So he had to punish them. This was the church militant with a vengeance! When the Lumbonians called in the services of my friend King Ndombe as arbitrator, the latter sent his prime minister, Joka, and asked me to accompany him. When Chimbundu, as the victor, was asked to name the terms of peace, he laid down these conditions:

First—Bena Lumbo must recognize Chimbundu as their suzerain Lord (you see some others besides England and the United States are occasionally exercised over the subject of suzerainty.)

Second—Bena Lumbo must carry on all trade through Chimbundu's town.

Third—Bena Lumbo's men must salute Chimbundu's men on meeting.

Fourth, and chief of all—Bena Lumbo must at once accept the word of God, and be baptized, men, women and children.

To my strong demurral to this last demand, Chimbundu replied quite warmly, "Why, Fuela, you might talk, talk, talk to those hard-headed heathen Bena Lumbo for years and years, and get only a few believers, while with a word of mine the whole town must believe."

Chimbundu was a veritable Charlemagne among the African princes, and it was only with the aid of old Joka's shrewd counsels that I finally dissuaded him from his last proposal.

My visit to Lumbo gave an illustration of the innate and aboriginal knowledge of God on the part of the heathen, which points another side to this question. After I had arrived at the town and preached to them, laying special emphasis on the commandments of God, I was about to retire for the night, when the chief of the town followed me and said that he wished to say something before I went to sleep. Said Lumbo: "Fuela, you can rest in peace tonight. You have been telling us about what your God says, and I want to tell you that our God says the same thing, we must not steal, kill, lie or do any other evil things. We know this in our hearts. You need not fear any such things from my people tonight." In truth here was an illustration of what Paul said—that the heathen have the law written in their hearts.

"For the invisible things of Him, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made even His eternal power and Godhead." But though they have an innate knowledge of God, the Gospel is a sealed book to them, and Jesus Christ an unknown name.

What effect has Christianity on the morality and virtue of the people? It is to be said here that although virtue is rare among those heathen, they are not altogether devoid of moral perception. They often punish adultery with death, and the rich men among them protect the virtue of the women with resolute determination. Nevertheless the lack of the high moral influence of Christianity is nowhere more apparent than in this connection. Most of the natives live like wild beasts. But the new religion changes all of this, and although it does not make mortal men perfect its immense power as a moral agent is illustrated again.

There was a woman living near out station at Luebo who was a large slave-owner, and among these slaves were a number of young girls. When the woman, whose name was Kapinga, became converted, she freed her slaves, but they still lived about her and worked for her. A trader once made a demand on Kapinga for one of her girls, accompanying his request with numerous costly presents. The gifts were sent back and the demand refused. Thereupon the trader raided Kapinga's estate and beat her and some of her people unmercifully and carried off the girl by force. The girl ran away at the first opportunity, and the whole country side became enraged and the trader had to desist for the sake of his life.

The simple implicit faith of many of these raw recruits to Christianity sometimes puts our own religion to shame.

Woman's Work.

(For the Foreign Missionary Union of Fayetteville Presbytery:)

Dear Friends: Some few months ago when our honored President asked me to write a paper for this happy occasion I agreed with alacrity and repented at leisure. There seemed to be nothing for me to say. Information as to the work of our Church at home and abroad is just as accessible to you as to me; our Church papers never fail to report all events in the different fields; returned missionaries are always eager to tell their experiences and emphasize the needs of the work; pulpit and press reiterate our marching orders to "Go" or "Send," and encourage our flagging souls with the great promises from God's Word. All this is as familiar and commonplace as sunshine. We do not need any "new methods." What we do need is the consecrated energy to work and do what we already know. We have rung the changes on bazaars and banks, fairs and fancy work, suppers and sociables, until we have become part of the stock-in-trade of the comic papers along with mothers-in-law and butting goats.

A clear definition is always a good starting point. What do we mean by "Church work?" I think we will all agree that it is any effort to express our love to God by serving our fellow men. Suppose we obey the command of our Lord and "search the Scriptures" to find out what kind of "Church work" by women is chronicled in those sacred pages for our example. Not much, you think? There was not one line of action open to the women of that day that was not used by them in the service of Jehovah. Miriam led her people in music and poetry to the praise of their Deliverer. When the Hebrew hordes were awaiting at Sinai the building of their house of worship, we read: "The women who were wise hearted did spin with their hands and brought that which they spun, both of blue and of purple and of scarlet and of fine linen." The special command was given: "Thou shalt embroider the coat of fine linen * * and thou shalt make the girdle of fine needle work." The mighty God who thundered from the Mount not only accepted but demanded good sewing from the women who were to worship Him. Deborah sat out of doors under a palm tree and "judged Israel," ruling so well that even Barak would not go into battle without she went with him. We also learn that the "Princes of Issachar" were with Deborah, which clearly proves that Deborah was not a Presbyterian, or she would not have been allowed to "judge Israel," as long as there was a Prince of any kind within sight. I will not mention the beautiful Esther, who served her God, and saved her people by pampering the appetite and flattering the vanity of her whimsical husband. Mary Magdalene, Joanna and Susanna ministered to our Savior "of their substance." Rich women there were who could and did give of their means for His service. Mary and Martha, two single women, living with their brother, served Him by their gracious and cheering hospitality. Lydia made and sold the celebrated Nyrian purple dye. Priscilla made tents with her husband and Saint Paul. In no case do we find that any woman asked for the means to serve her God; she simply used the power He had given her. There is only one mention of any one "serving tables" in working for the Church, and they were the twelve Apostles, who objected to the job. But where did the idea originate that "Church work" meant only raising money?

Was not Dorcas doing "Church work" when she made garments for the poor? Did not Jochebed honor God and serve her fellow-men as no other woman, save one, has ever done, when she gave to the world Moses, the lawgiver? What greater service could Lois and Eunice have done than train Timothy for his life work? Of all these women not one was idly indifferent, not one said, "I can't," not even "I wish I could;" they simply arose and did for the Master what their willing minds and hands found to do. In that terrible picture of the Judgment (Mathew 25th chapter), have you never noticed that those who are sent into "outer darkness" are condemned for the things they did not do? The poor, surprised, protesting souls went into everlasting punishment because they had never found out that serving their fellow-men was "knowing" God. Idleness is the root of as much evil as even the love of money. "To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin."

I know one sweet saint, 80 years old, who will not offer to God any money that she has not earned, so she knits baby socks, knits them by the hundreds, until her dear aged hands are drawn to the position for grasping her needles. A younger woman makes pickles, another beats biscuit for her neighbors' tea parties; still another "does up" baby caps, fine laces and embroideries. Only yesterday I passed an acre planted in onions, whose perfume will penetrate into many a poor home in North Carolina and reach to distant isles. A widow of my acquaintance does mending for college boys, and patience knows they need it! A society near me made $72.00 last spring making sunbonnets; why the very horses wore them!

Self-denial is an ideal way of making an offering to the Lord, but it is open to one objection. Nine-tenths of the women of Fayetteville Presbytery are already up to their necks in self-denial. A few years ago I received an exhortation myself along this line from a most excellent man. He talked as well as he could with his mouth full of tobacco. I might say, he talked fluidly for some time, with three cigars peeping out of his pocket and a bag of peanuts in his hand. He said he thought the ladies ought to deny themselves in the matter of dress. His wife had not had a new hat in three years and the one I wore cost 75 cents. There is, as there never has been, but one "method" of doing church work, whether it be raising money to send our substitutes into the byways and hedges of God's world, or clothing the orphans, or teaching Sunday school, or leading the choir, and that is to say with Paul, "This one thing I do," and then to take needle or pen, paint brush or book, baking-pan or music, and really do the thing God has given you power to do, feeling sure that the just Judge who condemns for the sins of omission will not fail to reward the slightest service done in His name. Then having done all in the power of hand and brain—

"Give, as the morning that flows out of heaven;
Give as the heart gives whose fetters are riven,
Life, love, and hope, all thy dreams and thy waking;
Soon, Heaven's river thy soul-fever slaking,
Thou shalt know God and the gift that He gave."

Mrs. M. H. Russell.

Missionary Evangelists.

Our Standards (Book Church Order Pa. 40) authorizes the appointment of ministers "to preach the Word and administer the sacraments in foreign countries," and to him may be entrusted power to organize churches and ordain elders and deacons therein. These words furnish the basis for the so-called extraordinary powers of the missionary evangelist, but when it comes to admonishing, suspending, excommunicating and deposing, the constitution is silent so far as the foreign field is concerned, because such acts are functions of church courts. But experience has proved that these very acts must be done even in the early stages of mission work. Now if the individual missionary's powers are enlarged by his Presbytery at home to accomplish such acts, by the constitution it is not Presbyterian? and in equity it is anomalous as it provides for no practical appeal on the part of the natives. If the home church cares little for Presbyterianism and less for equity then matters may be allowed to drift on indefinitely. Obviously Presbytery is needed, but what sort? Mixed, Cooperative or Autonomous? The missionaries in China and Korea who are doing the work who probably understand the character of the people and feel most intensely the needs of the situation, have asked for the co-operative Presbytery.

Is Sufficient Time Given to Missions?

At this critical time in the history of the Church, it behoves all who are interested in its work and the extension of Christ's Kingdom, to study carefully those things that bear unmistakably the stamp of Divine approval and guidance. Whatever may have been the lethargy that has characterized the Church in the past in regard to obedience to Christ's last commission, there is no doubt but that He is speaking to His people today to go forward. Never before has the Church had such signal blessing upon its Mission work, as now, and the person who doubts this statement is either a sceptic or knows nothing about the marvelous development along Mission lines in the past decade.

The Churches that are devoting the most time and energy to this great cause, are the ones that are experiencing God's richest blessing in their home work as well as the Foreign, and a notable example of this, is the Northern Presbyterian Church, whose zeal and consecrated endeavor in the home work, is equalled only by their Missions in some part of every nation on the globe.

The Southern Church devotes a great deal less time and discussion to Missions than many of its sister denominations. This is apparent to any one who has gained anything from study or observation, and the writer being interested personally in the work of this Church, has noticed it often.

The growth of Presbyterianism in the Southern States is not at all commensurate with its worth, or possibilities; it is not in keeping with its glorious record of the past. It is perhaps difficult to name the cause, but if we are to judge from the experience of other churches, the luke-warmness of its attitude toward the command: "Go ye into all the world," might offer at least a partial explanation. Of course the Church is doing a great work, but are we doing what we should do, are we manifesting the zeal that we should in this matter? The writer in reading over a report of a State Convention of another denomination, some days ago, noticed that the Clerk of the meeting had the following to say:

"The subject of Missions seemed to be the ruling thought of the Convention, though the other branches of religious work, were closely looked after."

A few days later he read the minutes of the Synod of Arkansas and noticed the following:

"Dr Chester seemed to be hampered and embarrassed by the brief time allotted him, but his address though short, was pointed and interesting and made a deep impression upon the Synod."

The contrast speaks for itself. The same state of affairs is substantially true in most of the Southern States. The writer attended a meeting of the Georgia Synod a few years ago, and there was one night set apart to the discussion of Foreign Missions. During the day preceding, a discussion arose as to the legality of a phrase in a certain resolution, which consumed the entire day, and was actually allowed to crowd out the night discussion of the Foreign Mission work, and the latter was not called up at all during the entire meeting. This is startling and reveals a state of affairs that should cause reflection. It is an awful thing to think about the Church wasting its time on trivial matters to the detriment and hindrance of the work for which Christ has ordained it, and for which it exists.

The Mission churches of the world are the ones that the Holy Spirit is leading so manifestly and in such a significant way. Undoubtedly the Southern Church is doing a great work along many lines, and the premonitions are that God is calling it to deeper consecration in the active propagation of the gospel. One proof of this is the commendable and encouraging interest in Missions at the meeting of the last General Assembly.

There must of necessity be an awakening in pulpit and pew. We can not neglect or minimize the Mission work without reaping the natural and logical result, and that is a coldness and stagnation generally along all lines of Church work. L. E. Morgan.

The Relation of Evangelization to Church Life.

Prov. 24:11-12.

Certainly no one will say that our church is doing what it ought or can do at home. Its progress in our own country is altogether out of proportion to the greatness of its message, and its proclaiming the glad tidings in Christ. We must see that there is a great lack of prevailing prayer, of earnest consecration, of zeal, of successful work. Most pastors feel deeply a lack of spiritual force in their congregation and until such force is found, the work must drag.

There may be many causes why these things are true, but a great cause is a failure on the part of many of our members to realize the real nature of the gospel message.

Our church can do its work at home as it ought to be done, only when it begins to realize that the church is "God's ordained Missionary Society." In other words, when our Church has been baptized with the spirit of Missions, when the imperative duty of sending the gospel to all the world, is the main theme of preachers and teachers; when world-wide evangelization is the first thought of ministers, then at home and abroad all will be done under the hand of God. No Church can do the work at home fully in quantity and in quality, until the duty of sending the gospel to those who have it not is fully recognized. Pastors often hear Home Missions emphasized to the exclusion of Foreign Missions. So often members of the Church have told me that they are ready to give to Home Missions, but not to Foreign Missions. But I have found that Home work receives its support from those who believe most firmly in work abroad.

That work at home and work in the foreign field must go hand in hand. That one cannot go on without the other is proven by,

1. That world wide evangelization is part of the message as we have it. Essentially the gospel is a message of glad tidings. Its teachings can be explained in a single sentence. "For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting Life." The universality of his message is so plain that he who ponders it must see its meaning. If "Whosoever" includes one, then it excludes none. Any man can feel and believe this message until he sees in it the whole of all men. God the one and only Hope.

Because the gospel is universal it is vital and essentially intolerant. If men are saved by faith in Christ, they can be saved in no other way, and all who will trust Him, shall be saved. For this reason, we have the Church Militant and the Church Triumphant. There is no room for the Church at Rest. Surely if it exists at all, save in name, the Church must be fighting for victory or it must have finished the fight and entered on its rest, as a Church Triumphant. The Great Commission has well been called the "Church's Marching Orders." In the nature of the case the Church Militant is the Church fighting for conquest. Christ came to bring a sword, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, has been entrusted to the Church. A sword is for use and this sword must not be sheathed until its work is done and the world conquered for the King. Captain Mahan, the great war expert, says that no war was ever won by acting merely on the defensive, and a Church cannot win on defensive tactics. He also says that if a Church ever lose its hold it will be because of its failure to preach Jesus Christ to men.

2. The gospel must be for all men if it is for you and me. If it can save us it can save any man in all the world. For the gospel teaches the solidarity of the human race. According to the words of Paul, the great Missionary to the Gentiles, there is no distinction of race or nation in Christ, for in Him is neither Jew nor Greek, circumcision nor uncircumcision, bond nor free. All are one in Christ, if one in Christ, then one in the scope of the Gospel, one in the Life of His Church. There is and can be no being and nation clause in the Commission of the Church. When one fully realizes that salvation has fully come, the impulse to pass on the good news to others is irresistible. If all nations are one in the gospel Christ came to bring then the greatest need must determine the sphere of teaching, and surely the greatest need is found where the gospel light has never shined, the most urgent call comes from those who sit in darkness and the shadow of death.

3. How many a Christian can live his life calmly, not moved by the sin and misery and need around him is utterly incomprehensible, for unselfishness lies at the basis of a Christian mind. All sin is selfishness in one or more of its countless forms and the life that is "Hid with Christ in God" must conquer sin. In order to live a Christian life, selfishness must be conquered, for the life in Christ is a new life and a life free from the old dominion of self, a life given for the love of others, unselfishness is the living our lives and giving ourselves so that we shall accomplish most for the regeneration of the world. It follows then that every Christian must give himself for others, must refuse to count the cost in carrying the gospel to those who have it not. This is equally true of each congregation made up of individuals; true of the Church made up of congregations. The individual believer or the Church living only for itself or himself is living a life contrary to the fundamental teachings of the faith by which alone life is based. The Church's faith is the church's life. If any church is not at work save at home we have a church living by faith that is utterly opposed to the only faith that can give life. What is this but utter absurdity as to logic, with but spiritual death as to results. No church or no Christian can live in the service of self alone, for the essence of Christianity is unselfishness and the service of others. The Great Head of the church came, "Not to be ministered unto, but to minister," if we will not take up our cross and follow Him, we cannot be His disciples. If we are not disciples we can never disciple our neighbors.

4. Not only is it true from the character and condition of the gospel itself that the church cannot flourish at home, unless it sends the gospel to those who have it not, but is true in the church's experience.

Historically, the church has been filled with power at home, in proportion to the prominence given to world wide evangelization. 1. The Apostolic church was Missionary and it flourished. Three thousand souls were the result of the first Missionary sermon. Not all the inhabitants of Jerusalem had been brought to Christ when Peter, called by a miracle, went to Ceasarea to found a Gentile church. (Acts, 10:47-48.) From Jerusalem to Antioch through Derbe and Listra on to where the apostolic Church sparkled as stars in the hand of Christ, on and on went the gospel through the cities of the Gentiles, until Paul's work was finished at Rome. The Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles, were "But the bound volumes of the Missionary Magazine of that Age." So great was the expansion of those first glorious centuries that Augustine really believed the whole world evangelized in his day, a mistake far reaching in its consequences. 2. For his mistake infected all the church and for eight centuries missionary enterprise lapsed into a delusion and Christianity became demi-paganism. Almost the only light of that time was the work of winning the conquered Northmen to Christ. We were heathen then, dependent on Columbia or Aiden. The most interesting news of the 7th century was that England had been evangelized. 3. The Reformation was a glorious time, a time when the Bible was rediscovered, rescued from the hand of priests and given to the people. The Reformation was general in its beginning; why was it partial in its results, reaching only a little way? The one great characteristic of the Reformation was its failure to send the gospel to the outside world. The reformers instead of being busy preaching the gospel to all the world sat down in camp, and with them all the protestant army, the result was inevitable. They quarrelled among themselves, when they ought to have been marching on to the uttermost ends of the earth. Loyola, a Romanist, gathered a little band of priests and they set out to carry the gospel to the ends of the earth. They wrought so well that at the end of a generation, they could ask the question, "What land is not filled with our labors?" The Reformation spread no further and history tells us that the chief cause of reaction was this little band of Jesuits. 5. At the time of the birth of Modern Missions, the church was struggling for existence in England. Cary spoke once more the life-giving words: "Go ye into all the world," and a great revival began.

Let us look at our own beloved church and its wondrous history. In 1796, (Horton) the proposal was brought before the Scottish General Assembly to send the gospel to the heathen and the proposition was met with a resolution to the effect that it was highly impossible and absurd to send out missionaries as long as a man remained at home without the Gospel. When this resolution was passed, Dr. Erskine arose and said to the Moderator, "Rax me that Bible." Then he read the Great Commission, "Go ye into all the world." The words waked Scotland up. Two Missionary Societies were formed and in less than 100 years, they lost their separate organizations and the Church in Scotland became a Missionary Society.

But look at the condition of the Church up to the time of the awakening. Dr. Robertson Nicholl, himself a son of the manse, said that honest, hard, consistent work on the part of the ministers was unknown. He tells a story that might well be true.

A minister who was to be absent arranged to have his pulpit filled on three Sabbaths by three of his brethren. The first one went to the manse in search of a sermon. The supply was pointed out to him and he made a selection. In the pulpit he unfolded the MS. and began to read. His text was: "Jacob was a plain man, dwelling in tents."

The next one came on the following Sabbath, selected his sermon from the supply at the manse and began to read his text: "Jacob was a plain man dwelling in tents." He too finished his sermon and went his way.

On the third Sabbath, a young man came, procured his sermon from the same supply and began to read. "Jacob was a plain man dwelling in tents." As he read a voice from the rear growled: "The devil dwell him, when is he going to move?"

Enough has been said, I trust, to prove that there can be no real progress at home without the spirit of missions. When the love of God has filled our hearts to fullness, and overflows to all the world then and not until then, can we hope to reach the highest efficiency at home. The power of the Church is the gospel gladly received, fully believed, and constantly lived. When the church shall have put missions in the front, when her energies are fully bent on world-wide evangelization, then shall knowledge of God cover our own land as the waters cover the sea.

May God help us to believe and understand the Scriptures: "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved, but he that believeth not, shall be damned."

W. F. T.

Lo, I Am With You Always.

"All the days," it is the promise
Of our risen Lord and King;
"I am with you," words of blessing,
Peace and joy to all they bring.

Days of trial, when our spirits
Fail and falter in the fight,
And unnumbered foes surround us
While we battle for the right.

There are souls who "would see Jesus,"
Must they vainly call to you?
"All the days," with Him to help us
We may prove this promise true.

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

Two of the best things in this week's issue are not mentioned in the table of contents but are to be found, the first in the World Department, and the other in Household. The Growing Victory is to be found in the space usually devoted to The World and the other is a Sermon to Young Girls by Mrs. L. McDonald. We especially commend this article to girls and their sisters and their mothers. The associate editor is not content with the missionary column every week and so arranged for this fine missionary number, the credit of which is due to her. The editor only wishes that his contribution to the missionary number ranked with those by Rev. S. P. Verner and Mrs. Russell, and Rev. W. H. Hudson, and L. E. Morgan, and J. C. T. and G. C. W. After reading them all it would be just as well to send a special contribution to the cause. We never make a mistake in confining our attention to nine-tenths of the population of the globe.

PERSONALS.

Rev. R. W. Jopling of Glen Wilton, Va., has removed to Clifton Forge, Va.

Rev. A. J. Cheatham has resigned his work at Potosi, Mo., and accepted the call of the Church at Fordyce, Ark.

A note from Rev. W. H. Hudson, written at Honolulu, October 14th, states that there are twenty missionaries on board the S. S. Doric, and "all well and glad to be on the way to the work that is waiting."

The address of Rev. J. T. Wade is changed from Easley, S. C., to Sautee, Ga., where, as has been stated in our news columns, he has gone to take charge of Nachoochee Institute, a joint enterprise of the General Assembly and Athens Presbytery.

Dr. J. W. Davis, in connection with Rev. D. U. Lyon and Rev. J. C. Garritt, of the Northern Presbyterian mission, is conducting a very successful theological class in Soochow. One of the street chapels has been turned into a dormitory and Dr. Davis has thrown open his home to the teachers. The eighteen students in attendance are gathered from Kiangyin, Kashing, Hangchow, Ningpo and Soochow.

Rev. P. H. Hensley, Jr., says the Missionary, who had recently taken charge of our new work at Camajuani, Cuba, has broken down from overwork and study, and the several physicians he consulted all advised absolute rest from mental work for some time. Mr. and Mrs. Hensley left their work with great regret, especially as it is the beginning in Camajuani. It is hoped that a season of rest will result in restoration of health and strength. The address of Mr. and Mrs. Hensley is Alden Bridge, La.

Mrs. J. W. Bradley's Death.

Seven days after it occurred a messenger reached us telling the shocking news. Dr Bradley and family were returning from Mohkanshan to Suchien when Mrs. Bradley was suddenly smitten with Asiatic cholera. There has been comparatively little cholera this summer, and no one suspected danger. On the evening of September 9th, near Kaoyin, on the Grand Canal, she became suddenly ill, and died early the next morning. Providentially Mr. Grier and Mrs. Grier, M. D., with Mr. Alexander Waite, of the Northern Presbyterian Mission, were in neighboring boats, and rendered all the assistance possible. A quick run was made over the sixty miles, back to Chinkiang, where she, who was so recently full of young life and its prospects, was laid to rest in the foreign cemetery.

Mrs. Bradley manifested great patience and trust during the troublous times that followed the "Boxer" outbreak, when more experienced hearts than hers quailed. She was a woman of unusually kind and pleasant disposition, and lived her message of love to the people.

Dr. Bradley, with his little baby just one year old, has returned, and begun work in the loneliness and sorrow. That God will comfort and bless them, with the bereaved in South Carolina, is the prayer of all who know them.

Suchien, China, Sept. 22, 1903.

MISSOURI.

JACKSON AND CAPE GIRARDEAU.—Rev. J. L. Stuart, Jr., visited these churches on a recent Sabbath, Nov. 8, in the interests of the Forward Movement of our Foreign Mission work, speaking at Jackson in the morning and at the Cape in the evening. The results were most happy, deepened interest in the cause, and largely increased contributions. Rev. Mr. Brown of Lynnville, Tenn., who has recently accepted a call to Cape Girardeau, expects to begin his labors there on the third Sunday of November.

HIGGINSVILLE.—This church has recently given a hearty and unanimous call to Rev. Xenophon Kyland to become their pastor. They very much hope, as do many others, for a favorable response.

INDEPENDENCE.—Our church at this place has just made out, with great unanimity and earnestness, a call for the pastoral services of Rev. A. A. Wallace, D. D., of Mexico, Mo., and many friends unite with this people also in the sincere desire that he may see his way clear to accept.

ST. JOSEPH, First Church.—This church on a recent Sunday morning, by a rising vote unanimously granted their pastor, Rev. Dr. Wm. R. Dobyms a six months' vacation for a trip through Bible lands, returning in June via the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance at Liverpool, of which he will be a member. With their usual generosity this good people ordered that all expenses of the trip should be borne by themselves—a free gift to their pastor. Dr. Dobyms hopes to sail the latter part of January.

PRESBYTERY OF ST. JOHNS.—The Presbytery of St. Johns met at Wildwood on 12th current at 7:30 p. m. The opening sermon by the moderator was from Heb. 2:1, after which Presbytery was constituted with prayer. The attendance was small and very little done outside of the routine business of the fall meeting.

Rev. C. O. Groves was received from West Lexington Presbytery, and a call from the Braidentown church placed in his hands, which he accepted and order was taken for his installation by a commission of Presbytery at an early date to be fixed by the commission.

Rev. J. S. Axtell, D. D., Presbytery of Muncie (U. S. A.) was invited to sit as a corresponding member and permission was granted to the Deland church to employ him till the next stated meeting of Presbytery. The Publication and Sabbath School committees were consolidated under the name suggested by the General Assembly's committee, and Rev. C. O. Groves was made chairman of the new committee.

A committee was appointed to revise the standing rules and manual and make report at the spring meeting.

Rev. D. L. Lander was dismissed to the Presbytery of Tuscaloosa.

Rev. C. O. Groves was elected Stated Clerk and Treasurer of Presbytery.

Ruling Elder R. K. Minehead was elected moderator and Rev. A. W. Pierce, temporary clerk.

Brother Leonard, whose bow still abides in strength after over fifty years of service in the ministry, has charge of a group of small churches, Wildwood being one of them. He calls this a preaching Presbytery. Divine service was held both morning and evening to good and attentive congregations. The church at Wildwood is small in numbers, but is composed of a devoted band of Christian men and women and Brother Leonard is held in high esteem among them, as he is also by the entire community. At considerable expense, involving a good deal of self-sacrifice, the church has been repaired and adorned, and Brother Leonard is justly proud of his flock at Wildwood.

VIRGINIA.

PORTSMOUTH.—There were seven additions to the First Church on last Sunday.

NORTH CAROLINA.

LENOIR.—The Rev. J. A. McMurry of Mint Hill, N. C., assisted Rev. C. A. Munroe in the fall communion services embracing several days' preaching and including the 3rd Sabbath of October. His preaching was of a high order and very acceptable to our people. There were two accessions to the communion of our church, both children of the covenant and members of the Sabbath school.

RED SPRINGS.—The Presbyterians here were pleased to have in their midst last Sunday so many eminent divines. Doctors Strickler, Rumble and R. S. Arowood, besides the resident ministers, Drs. Vardell, Rankin and Pace. Dr. Strickler preached a forceful sermon to a large congregation in the morning, and Dr. Rumble preached an interesting sermon at night. We believe a Synodical quorum was present here and if the place continues its growth in a few years hence we expect to see the whole body of Synod assembled here for business. If not why not, Mr. Editor?

CONCORD, McKinnon Church.—Rev. W. L. Lingle, of the Rock Hill First Church, preached from Nov. 2 to Nov. 7. The sermons were clear, strong presentations of the gospel truth. At the close of the series of meetings, seven new members were received into the church—five on profession and two on certificate. This made a total of twenty-two since the last quarterly communion—twelve on profession and ten on certificate. Forty-five members have been received since April 1st of this year.

Two elders and two deacons were ordained and installed Nov. 1st.

CHAPEL HILL.—The pulpit of our church was filled during September by Rev. F. P. Ramsey, Ph. D. Dr. Ramsey impressed himself upon his hearers as a student and thinker, his treatment of the most well-worn texts being marked by originality and suggestiveness. Since November 1, Dr. E. H. Harding has been with us and has been heard with pleasure not only by the Presbyterian contingent, but by all who have attended his services. Dr. Harding's wide reading and ready fund of allusion and illustration give to his sermons an interest of style as rare as it is refreshing.

The members of our church are gratified and encouraged at the Synod's recent action with regard to securing a permanent pastor here. With the aid now promised we look forward with confidence to a renaissance of interest in the Presbyterian cause on the part both of the University and of the community at large.

The last University Bulletin shows that sixty-four per cent of the students are communicants of some churches, against sixty per cent for last year; and one hundred and ten Presbyterians, against one hundred and twenty-one for last year. The total enrollment to date is 592, a decided increase over the enrollment at this time last year.

S. A. C.

DAVIDSON.—Much pleasure and profit is expected from the visit of Rev. Dr. W. M. Morrison, our missionary to the Congo Free State, who is to be here on the coming Sabbath and conduct the public services. He will also hold special conferences with the students.

Rev. William Black begins a protracted meeting on the 14th inst., at Thomasville, assisting Rev. I. N. Clegg. Dr. N. L. Smith is attending the Synod of Georgia at its meeting in Brunswick.

The college was fortunate in having here a few days ago Dr. Frederick Moore, Professor of History in Vanderbilt University, who delivered an unusually interesting and instructive address on the study of history, especially with reference to the methods to be employed. Rev. M. E. Sentelle, the new associate professor in the Bible department, preached at both services on last Sabbath, the subject, morning and evening, being the First Commandment. The opinion was unanimous that the young preacher and teacher has intellectual gifts of a very high order, and that at the same time he impresses his hearers with the rich spirituality of his sermons.

The slate for roofing the addition to the church building has come after an annoying delay and will be put on next week. With this work finished it would appear that nothing stands in the way of the rapid completion of the interior of the building.

His many friends will be delighted to know that Mr. James Irwin, the aged father of Mrs. Graham, who has been ill of pneumonia, appears now to be convalescent from the attack, though greatly enfeebled by his sickness.

It is a great satisfaction to our community in general to learn that Rev. Colin A. Munroe whom it was thought we were going to lose from our Presbytery and Synod has decided to accept the call extended to him by Concord Presbytery for evangelistic work. Mr. Munroe conducted most acceptably the mid-week prayer meeting on the 11th inst, stopping over here on a visit to his brother.

RED SPRINGS.—Rev. G. B. Strickler, D. D., LL. D., of Union Theological Seminary, preached to a large and interested audience in the auditorium of the Southern Presbyterian College (Red Springs Seminary) Sunday morning, Nov. 8th.

Taking for his text Isaiah 1:18, "Come now and let us reason together saith the lord; though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson they shall be as wool," Dr. Strickler presented in a most forcible way, first, the reasonableness of Christianity as shown by the reasonableness of its claims, of its promises, by the solution it gives of life's problems, together with the certainty of happiness if the result which honest consideration determines is accepted.

Second. Men do not seek happiness in the way which reason points out. They see it elsewhere and failure awaits them. To disregard reason is always fatal.

Third. If men accept God's invitation "though their sins be as scarlet they shall be as snow." Are our sins as scarlet? What makes sins as scarlet? Sinning against clear light, long mercy, continually for a long time. We have sinned against God all our lives, while possessing the clearest light and enjoying the greatest mercy.

Fourth. God has given men reasons able to discern the best things. He certainly intends that these reasons be employed to enable them to understand and accept the highest revealed product of the infinite mind. The Plan of Salvation.

Rev. Father Rumble, D. D., of Salisbury, N. C, spoke on Sabbath evening in the same hall. His sermon as indicated by his text "And lead us not into temptation but deliver us from evil" was a full and solemn exposition of the reasons why men should always include this petition in their prayers.

This is the sixth and last petition of the model prayer. Christ here teaches us distinctly to pray for deliverance from temptation. Temptation and testing are often confused. God tries men, he does not tempt them to sin. "God is not tempted of evil. Neither tempteth he any man." But he allows men to be placed in positions where they will meet temptation. Although this is true we should not seek places of temptation ourselves. Why? Because first of the object, second of the power, third the malignity, fourth of the activity, fifth the character, sixth of the success of the tempter, and seventh of the weakness of the unaided human heart.

We feel that we have been benefited by the clear and logical presentation of the truth in the two sermons and hope that it will be our great privilege to have Dr. Strickler and Dr. Rumble with us again in the near future.

NEWELL.—I wish to express through your column the deep feeling which exists for our late pastor, Rev. W. C. Hagan, now the pastor of the Presbyterian church at Fitzgerald, Ga. He has been pastor of our church nearly two and a half years, yet within that time has endeared himself to many of us who sincerely regret his departure from us. He carries with him the best wishes and prayers of many of our people for the health and happiness of himself and family. We earnestly trust that he and his genial family who will always be kindly remembered by us may find [warm-hearted friends who will appreciate them as we do and may the Lord prosper his hands. Our loss we trust will be the gain of those to whom he goes.

The Size of the North Carolina Synod.

At the recent meeting of our Synod in Wilmington one of our General Assembly secretaries made the statement on the floor of the Synod that the Synod of North Carolina is the largest Synod in our Southern Presbyterian Church. On the return a number of the brethren on same train discussed the correctness of the secretary's statement. Some affirmed, some denied, while others doubted. Lest any of our leaders become puffed up with the idea of our superior magnitude among the tribes of Israel, I herewith submit the figures given in minutes of last General Assembly:

Synods.	Presbyteries	Churches	Ministers	Total Communicants	Total Contributions
Virginia	12	467	297	44,149	480,680
N. Carolina	8	396	174	36,762	266,900
Texas	10	408	184	21,213	215,485

According to these figures if the size of a Synod is determined by the number of Presbyteries, churches and ministers, our Synod is smaller than either Virginia or Texas. If determined by the number of communicants and amount of contributions we are still smaller than Virginia Synod but larger than Texas. In one respect, however, and that a very important one, viz: accessions to the communion, the Synod of North Carolina surpasses both Texas and Virginia and every other Synod in our General Assembly.

GEORGIA

ELBERTON.—Rev. F. D. Thomas tendered his resignation as pastor of the Elberton Presbyterian church last Sunday afternoon. He did this to accept the call to the pastorate of the church at Easley, S. C. The resignation, according to the church government of Presbyterian denomination, will have to be acted on by the Presbytery before it becomes effective, and a called meeting will be held on the 17th for that purpose. There is no doubt, however, but that the resignation will receive favorable action. Mr. Thomas has preached here and at Toccoa for a number of years, and is a preacher of pronounced ability. His pastorate has been a successful one, and pleasant, and he and his family will leave many loving friends, representing every denomination, who regret to have them move away from us.

MOULTRIE.—The Sabbath of July 26th, was a memorable one in the history of the little Presbyterian church of Moultrie, Ga. A few years ago, itself being one of the Mission churches of the Presbytery, with a membership of twenty-five or thirty, God has so signally blessed its work, that the congregation sat in the church on the above Sabbath and listened to two addresses, one from its regular pastor, Rev. J. C. Tims, and the other from the missionary they were sending out to Africa, Rev. Mott Martin. It was a time of thankfulness and gratitude to the Gracious Lord who had made these things possible. A few years ago, the little church straggling to have preaching once a month, now with its regular pastor at home, and one just starting out as its representative to carry the glad tidings to the Dark Continent. Mr. Martin's visit though short, was beneficial in many ways. He endeared himself to the church by his consecration and pleasing personality, and many were the prayers that he would be spared many years in the great work to which he had consecrated himself.

Mr. Martin had been assigned to the Moultrie church, and was going out as the successor to Rev. W. M. Morrison at Luebo; and as he stood in the pulpit that night and gave us his last message before starting to far away Africa, we did not know that we would ever see him again. Following his address, the regular pastor arose and delivered an impressive address. The beginning of the service was opened by singing: "From Greenland's Icy Mountains." It was closed with "God be With You Till we Meet Again."

ATLANTA.—The following resolutions were recently prepared:

To the West End Presbyterian Church, Atlanta, Ga:

Brethren: Your committee appointed to prepare resolutions of regret at parting with our pastor, have attended to this duty and make the following report, a copy of which has been transmitted to Presbytery.

Whereas, our pastor, G. W. Bull, has made the request that the pastoral relations between himself and this Church be severed in order that he may accept the pastorate of Moore Memorial Church, of Nashville, Tenn., which has been tendered to him. Therefore be it Resolved: That in joining with our pastor in a request to Presbytery to dissolve the pastoral relations, we do so only at his earnest request and out of the great love and esteem we have for him, and with the keenest regrets at parting. The loss to our Church is shared in by all denominations and creeds, as well as the community as a whole, who, like ourselves, feel the great loss sustained in his departure from our midst.

Resolved: That we lose in him an able minister, a faithful and loving pastor, whose Godly walk and conversation have tended to strengthen the weak, comfort the sorrowing, and uplift the feeble, and whose labors have been blessed in the upbuilding of our Church, and under whose administration, the causes of the Church have been liberally subscribed to and greatly advanced.

Resolved further: That while we sincerely regret his departure, we feel that the field to which he has been called offers opportunities for which he is peculiarly fitted and for which he is in every way qualified, both intellectually and spiritually, and our petition to God is, that He may use him in his new relations and field of endeavors, to the upbuilding of Zion, to the edification of the flock, and all to the honor and glory of His Holy Name.

And be it further Resolved: That our prayers, love, and continued interest, will follow Mr. Bull, and that we commend him and his family to the loving care and sympathetic confidence of those to whom he shall in future minister. Singed on behalf of the Church, at Atlanta, Ga., this ninth day of November, 1903.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Children's Mission School.

Dear Children and Sabbath-school Workers:

Oliver Wendell Holmes being asked when the training of a child should begin answered: "A hundred years before he is born." Upon which Dr. Strong remarks: "Communities and commonwealths, like men, have their childhood, which is the formative period. It is the first permanent settlers who impress themselves and their character on the future."

For this reason the Presbyterian Church has established mission schools among the poor of the Indian Territory. The way to influence the future religious life of that country, which will soon be one of the great States of the Union, is to teach the children who will soon be the citizens of the country.

The work of supporting these mission schools has been assigned by the General Assembly to the Sabbath-school children as their special work for Christ and the church. The fifth Sabbath collection in the Sabbath schools are sustaining eleven schools and over twelve hundred scholars. Who can calculate the results of such benevolent work?

The next fifth Sabbath will occur November 29th. Will not every superintendent give the children an opportunity of taking part in this noble charity? The children will always respond.

Forward offerings promptly to W. A. Powell, Atlanta, Ga.
S. L. Morris, Sec'y Home Miss., Pres'n Ch., U. S.

The Sunday School Work.

At the last meeting of the Executive Committee of Publication, Rev. A. O. Browne, pastor of our Church at Coleman, Texas, was unanimously elected Sunday School Missionary for District No. 3, which embraces the Synods of Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas. He was strongly recommended by some of the leading men in the church. He is in the prime of life, and has developed strong ability in the organization and conduct of Sunday School work in its various phases. He will begin his work at once. His particular service will be to work under the direction of the Presbyterial Chairman in the organization and conduct of Sunday School Institutes and Young People's Conventions, the exploration of unoccupied territory, with reference to its occupation with Sunday Schools; the establishment of Home and Normal Departments in the Schools; the visitation of existing schools for conference as to bettering their equipment; and the visitation of the Church Courts in the interests of Publication and Sabbath School Work.

It is believed that his work means greater progress in all that region, and the Committee bespeaks for him the sympathy and co-operation of the pastors and Sunday School superintendents throughout the District.

Kondola's First Public Appearance.

When I returned from the North Carolina trip, Kondola brought me a good sum of money which he had saved out of his wages for two months this summer, when he had been at work in the Agricultural Department of the great Alabama-Bryce Hospital. He had not lost an hour from his work during that time, and he walked the two miles from the Institute to the Hospital daily before six o'clock. I placed the money in bank for him.

This fidelity caused me to decide to give him a little excursion, and took him with me on this trip into Mississippi. Our first appointment was at West Point, where the Stereopticon exhibition was to be given Monday night. (Let it be said here, by the way, that I have no such things as those scenes which created a disturbance at the Assembly—nothing but African photographs.) Kondola was given the part to describe the uses of the curiosities. I had not given him any "coaching," for I wished him to be entirely spontaneous.

Kondola performed his part with such simplicity spoke in such comparatively good English, and showed a manner at once so free from affectation and from fear as to win the sympathy and interest of every one. He concluded by reciting the prayer in the Baluba tongue which Mrs. Snyder had taught him ten years ago. At the conclusion of the service, the people came forward and he received quite an ovation.

Twelve years ago this boy was a cannibal two thousand miles in the heart of Africa. He is now a triumph of grace.
S. P. Verner.

Atlanta Presbytery.

Atlanta Presbytery met during the sessions of the Synod of Georgia at Brunswick, Ga., in adjourned meeting at the call of the moderator. Fourteen ministers and six ruling elders were present. Rev. W. Lee Harrell, the last moderator present, presided. The pastoral relation between Rev. G. W. Bull and the West End church was dissolved, and Brother Bull was dismissed to the Presbytery of Nashville, having been called to the pastorate of the Moore Memorial church.

Rev. C. W. Humphreys accepted calls to the pastoral care of Jackson and Fellowship churches. The committee of installation at Jackson church consists of Rev. C. P. Bridewell, to preside and preach the sermon; Rev. Samuel Young, to charge the pastor; Rev. N. B. Mather, to charge the people, and Ruling Elder Foster of Fellowship church.

The committee of installation at Fellowship church consists of Rev. C. P. Bridewell, to preside and charge the pastor, Rev. N. B. Mather to preach the sermon, Rev. Samuel Young to charge the people, and Ruling Elder J. A. Plunkett.

Rev. J. W. Atwood tendered his resignation of the pastoral care of Georgia Avenue church, requesting the dissolution of the pastoral relation, the church concurring in this request. Action on this important matter was deferred to an adjourned meeting next week.

Rev. W. Lee Harrell was elected chairman of the committee of local Home Missions instead of Rev. G. W. Bull just dismissed to Nashville Presbytery.

The Presbytery adjourned to meet in the First Church, Atlanta, on Nov. 20th, 1903, at 10 a. m.

The Twentieth Century Fund.

We have now a subscription list of $51,658.29, raised in 58 churches, many of them weak country churches.

Of this amount $15,480.84 was raised without cost to the committee, mostly by Drs. H. L. Smith and A. T. Graham. The remaining $36,177.45 was collected by our salaried canvassers.

During the past year our canvassers, working for four and eight months respectively, collected subscriptions amounting to $26,677.75, at a total cost of $1,652.25, or a little more than six per cent of the amount raised. This is probably the most economical canvass ever made in our Synod by salaried agents.

Of these subscriptions $13,619.19 has been paid, nearly $8,000.00, during the past year. As a very large proportion of the funds collected on these subscription lists and from other sources for this educational endowment movement do not pass through the hands of the treasurer of the Fund, he has sought to learn, by correspondence with the treasurers of our various institutions, what amount they have received directly from churches and individuals in our Synod that may properly be credited to this Fund. Although the information is as yet very incomplete, no report having been received from the colleges for women in Charlotte and Red Springs and other institutions, contributions have been reported amounting to $31,782.57.

The only discouraging feature of the work is the very small amount of the subscriptions to the general fund (i. e., not for special institutions), that have been collected by church treasurers and forwarded to the treasurer of the committee. We wish it to be well understood that every dollar contributed to the general fund is duly credited to the Presbytery from which it comes, and that each Presbytery will receive its full proportion in the final distribution of this fund, after the expenses of the canvass have been deducted, a special effort will be made this year to collect all subscriptions due, and church treasurers are again urged to co-operate with the committee in this work.

E. C. Murray, Treasurer.

Graham, N. C.

The Assembly's Home and School

There are 47 children in the Home and School. All are children of deceased ministers and of missionaries. It takes about $500 per month to sustain them. The institution has, for the past seven years, been run on the cost system. Not one dollar of debt. We have no visible means of support. We do what we can and leave the rest to God and He has never failed us and we do not believe He ever will. Sometimes the clouds look dark and we do not know what to do. I write to tell you that the amount in our treasury is growing very small and we need your help very much. Winter is upon us and fuel and provisions are high. We need help now and now is a good time to give it to us. Reader, if you wish to experience sweet joy and much peace, help us in this great work. When you make your Thanksgiving offering, remember the Home and School. Money or provisions will be acceptable and we will be grateful to you for your assistance.

Faternally yours,

S. W. Somerville, Supt.

Fredericksburg Va.

Rev. P. H. Hensley, Jr., of the Cuban Mission, has been compelled by threatened sickness to return to the United States for a time. He is at present at Raleigh, Tennessee.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan recently said to a London audience that a large proportion of the American people manifested an appalling indifference to religion. "Their prosperity made them snug and comfortable, and then they neglected religion."

The Growing Victory.

[By Rev. Jndson Smith, D. D.]

Presented at the Annual Meeting of the American Board at Manchester, N. H., October 14, 1903:

It is a characteristic of Christianity to attempt the seemingly impossible, and gloriously to achieve what it attempts.

The scope and the explanation of this striking fact are found in the circumstances and words of the great commission. The crucified and risen Lord ere he ascended into heaven spoke his final message to his disciples: "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, and teaching them to observe whatsoever things I have commanded you. And lo, I am with you always even unto the end of the world." This is the program of the church to the end of time, not self-prescribed but appointed by the Lord. Divine power forever resides in the church and gives it assurance of victory. In the line of this movement omniscience leads and omnipotence re-enforces the church, and nothing is impossible. Men are not infallible; men are not invincible; but the deeper forces that work in this movement are not of man, but flow from the heart and throne of God.

All Christian history is one varied and voluminous illustration of the fact with which we set out—the achievement of what beforehand seemed impossible. For the sake of vividness we note a few of the more salient instances:

1. The first great problem which confronted the church was the conversion of the Roman empire. When our Lord was born in Bethlehem of Judea, the Roman empire stood at the summit of its grandeur and power. The heir of the ancient classical world, the learning and art and civilization of all the former ages were gathered into its possession. The career of conquest which had extended the sway of the city of Romulus over all adjacent lands and peoples, the most striking the world has ever seen, has run its full course, and the world was subject to Rome. The ambitions of statesmen, the dreams of poets, the largest visions of seers and oracles had been realized. Dominion, wealth, power, numbers, culture, prestige,—these all were with Rome, and Caesar's throne stood glorions and impregnable. It was into this world that our Lord sent forth the twelve, and this was the first of the nations which they were to disciple. Insignificant in numbers, without wealth, or powerful friends, or name, or learning, or power, living in a remote corner of the empire, identified with a despised race and religion—for these men to undertake the Christianization of the Roman world was surely attempting the impossible. The question might be raised, "Was their Master's summons the sublimity of courage and divine foresight, or was it the folly of an enthusiast"?

We know the course of events. The few score whom our Lord left in Jerusalem become five thousand in a day, are scattered abroad only to multiply their numbers, presently are found in every province and city of the empire; they are in the Roman armies, and even in the imperial household at Rome. At first they are too few and obscure to attract observation, and when they become known they are treated for a time with scorn and ridicule. But as they still increase, and their true character and faith become better known, the fagot and the sword take the place of wit and logic; and as they refuse to disappear or diminish, the arm of force is fully drawn and blood flows freely from east to west, and the pagan faith, wielding the full power of the invincible empire, pits itself against the Christian faith in a life and death struggle not sought by the Christians, but also not to be evaded. Men and women, young and old, laymen and clergy, presbyters and bishops, by the score, by the hundred, they went to their death as Christian martyrs, with a heroism that outrivalled the greatest deeds of Roman valor, till the sword was dulled, till the very lions fainted, and the enginery of destruction failed. And in the end the pagan faith of the ancient world lay prostrate and breathless; the Christian faith stood above undismayed, elate, triumphant. The Roman world had become Christian and the impossible had been accomplished. This was the first achievement of our faith, the most signal, perhaps the most complete success which the gospel has ever won. We are not likely to overestimate its significance. It is a presage of the final and universal triumph of the faith to which all prophecy looks forward, toward which all the ages struggle, and all Christian hearts aspire. It was not the end of Christian history, but only the beginning. The church was not immaculate; its knowledge was imperfect; much was yet to be gained in the compass and depth and purity of the Christian life. But despite all discounts and all imperfections it was a splendid and glorious achievement, a proof that the gospel is from God and that at length it shall win the world.

II. Equally significant, though wholly unlike this in its main features, was the second great problem that greeted the church—namely, the Christianization of the tribes that overthrew the Western empire. Here were peoples, rude and uncivilized, but fresh and vigorous, with no deep-seated faith, no strongly centralized rule, no wealth, no great history—the elements of great states rather than the heirs of a great civilization. Some of them had lived on the borders of Rome and felt its majesty; some knew it only by distant report; but all soon came under the spell of the great name that had filled the world so long. Christianity belonged to the empire, was the only organization that survived its fall, and in the churches and bishops, the monasteries and monks, was naturally a center of the order in times of confusion and violence, a source of counsel and reverence and stable organization. The religion of the invaders, slight in its elements, loosened in its hold by migration from their original seats, easily gave way to the older faith; and presently Christianity arose afresh as the leader, inspirer, and molding power in all the life of the new peoples, and became the tutor of the nations of Europe. This was a new office for the church to assume; these were unwonted materials for it to work upon. And the issue, to the eye of human reason and forecast, must have seemed incalculable and uncertain. The seemingly impossible once more was attempted, with only divine providence as a guide.

Here, also, the course of events is familiar. Slowly these new peoples yield to the charm of the Roman faith and worship, and their life comes under its sway. Manners soften, sentiments refine, culture appears, and in the rich soil of rude but plastic and ingenious peoples the nobler virtues and graces take root, and a slow but most fascinating and glorious growth begins. One by one these tribes—Goths, Lombards, Franks, Germans, English, Scandinavian, Slavonian—now settled in place and consolidating into national life, become truly, imperfectly, but permanently Christian, and are united into one great Christian confederation by their common debt and obedience to Rome. The Middle Ages, often called the Dark Ages, are dark in some ways, often marked by violence and bloodshed, imperfect in knowledge and attainment; but it is an imperfect view that does not find in them also great virtues, splendid purposes, the thoughts and desires and worship that greaten heart and life, deeds that shine with a heavenly radiance, and a movement that steadily rises in range and leads to glorious ends. The days of Alfred, of Charlemagne, of Bernard, of the Crusades, the Cathedrals, the Universities—these are days of glory and of hope, even if clouds and storms at times sweep across the sky, and the goal shines like the evening star on the far horizon line. Christian Europe, the mother of us all, is the proof that in this second great problem of our faith the seemingly impossible was gloriously achieved and the sufficiency of the gospel for all its work was demonstrated anew.

III. A third illustration of the truth we consider is afforded by the great Reformation of the sixteenth century. Europe, with the exception of Russia, grew into one ecclesiastical organization, firmly knit together and presided over by the bishop of Rome. The development was natural; out of a primacy of leadership in suffering and service had grown a primacy of privilege and power and absolute authority. This power was too great for human nature to wield without abuse; the temptations to tyranny and selfishness became overwhelming; the freer spirit in the church at large, and in the advancing nations, found itself checked and fettered, and the cry at length arose and deepened and became imperative for a reform of the church in head and members. Doctrine and government and life were corrupted, and the evil was widely felt; but so intimately was it joined to the very framework of society and the idea of the mediæval church that the remedy, even if clearly discerned, was extremely difficult to apply. Reform must come or the church will fail and the gospel perish in the earth. A few high-minded bishops attempted reform, but in vain. The universities called for it, but could not effect it. Councils were summoned, with the aid of princes and the emperor, and toiled upon the problem, but without success. And as the fact of disorder and the necessity of reform deepened, the sense of the difficulties in the way of effecting it grew more intense, and a profound unrest fell on the minds and hearts of all the more elevated men of all orders throughout the European world. Here, once more, on quite a new arena, and in quite a new order of facts, Christianity must attempt the seemingly impossible.

The story that tells how this new problem was solved is familiar to us all, and full of glorious meaning. A German monk of peasant origin comes step by step into a personal experience of the great central facts of the gospel, and into a simple life of faith in Jesus Christ as the divine redeemer of men, and into a rock-like assurance of the truth and authority of the Holy Scriptures which bring these facts to view. He is full of joy and hope; he deems himself in absolute harmony with the church and its authorities, and he fills his professorship in theology at Wittenberg with abundant and varied teachings drawn from Scripture and verified by experience. The abuses of the times in the sale of indulgences come to his knowledge, and he assails them as an enemy of the truth, and presently learns with astonishment that they are justified and defended by papal authority. And little by little, as his vision grows more acute, he finds himself opposed to the doctrines and practices of the church, and is compelled by conscience to cry out and to "open his mouth wider and wider," till at Wittenburg he challenges the authority of the church, and at Worms, in 1512, breaks with pope and emperor, and sounds the call for reform so as to be heard in every land in Europe. Souls like his own are drawn to him; his courage wins new adherents; the nations awake and other leaders appear; the triple crown is toppled; the papacy is divided; and the reform that seemed impossible is achieved.

IV. In the modern age of missions, as must be obvious to all, we have in hand a problem in all main features like those we have been considering. The great issue is still in the future, but the movement has begun. That the attempt seems audacious even to the degree of impossibility will be plain in a brief review, and that the outcome will be a glorious success the story of the epochs we have surveyed makes probable even to full certainty. Certainly until the obstacles are greater than any we yet know or than have been met in former days, no delays, no disasters, no seeming defeats can warrant despair or even justify a doubt of the issue.

It was not a day of aggressive Christian life in Great Britain when William Carey surveyed the heathen world and pleaded its claim on Christian hearts and gave himself to the conversion of India after he had drawn his own church into the enterprise. Neither was it a day of abounding religious zeal in America when Judson and his comrades devoted themselves to foreign missions and called the American Board into existence.

Mark the course of events in the century that lies behind us, and note their meaning and the direction in which they move. Three years since, as the nineteenth century was nearing its end, the Protestant Christian world gathered by the representatives of the foreign missionary work of the age, in Carnegie Hall, in New York, to review the past and to forecast the future. To the Board was accorded a leading part in convening this Ecumenical Conference, and it is most pertinent for us to study its facts and conclusions. Note first the conference itself. It was held in America; it represented Protestant Christendom; nay, the world was there; every land which missions have visited—America, North and South, Europe, Asia, Africa, Oceania—no such ecumenical gathering had the sun ever looked upon before. And they were gathered exclusively in the name and interest of foreign missions; it is doubtful whether any other object could have commanded such attendance. The interest of the general public in the sessions of these eleven days was something grand and quite phenomenal. It grew as the days went by, as the discussion widened, and the sense of the greatness of the work considered became more clear. No political conclave could command such interest for eleven days. It was striking to note who they were that felt this interest. The members of the conference of course; the Christian people of the vicinity naturally; but also the body of active citizens and business men in the great city.

The work itself which was under review revealed a sublime unity and power through all these mighty years. There was growth in experience, in knowledge of the world and of the peoples to be won, in the methods of work which are most effective. This belongs to everything human, and will to the end of time. But the problem was the same at the end of the century as it was at the beginning; the motives and great aims of the men who spoke at New York the same that animated Carey and Judson, nay, the same that led Paul and the other apostles to their wide travels and mighty work. These men were fulfilling the great commission—discipling the nations, invoking upon them the triune name, and setting them in the order and power of an endless life, under the leadership of the divine Redeemer, just as their predecessors had done since Christ ascended to the Father.

The progress of this great enterprise was as clear as the sun, and inspiring beyond the power of expression. We did not celebrate the final victory, but we beheld a march, as steady and victorious as that of Alexander, or Caesar, not without checks and grave disasters, but resistless, and ever on and on with the certainty of the glorious issue lighting every path, inspiring every heart, and rousing every virtue as with the trumpet call of heaven. A glance at the salient facts here brought to view must suffice to show how reasonable was the expectation of final victory that deepened as we sat together in those heavenly places in Christ Jesus.

For the half-score foreign missionary societies in Protestant Christendom in 1800 we counted 249 societies exclusively devoted to this work, and two hundred more auxiliary thereto, representing substantially every Protestant denomination in the world. The missionary host, in place of the few score a century earlier, numbered 15,600, and by their side stood five times as many native laborers, working to the same end. The living communicants in mission churches were nearly a million and a half and the adherents five millions, practically all of this the measure of growth in the century. The educational work of missions had a like happy growth and noble proportions, and assured us of the permanency of all other gains.

Even this is but an imperfect measure. The rate of growth has been constantly accelerating; the last twenty years equal in gains all the eighty years that precede. The century has been marked by all the features of a pioneer work. The lands and the people have been for the first time visited and surveyed; the languages mastered; in many cases reduced to written forms for the first time; the Bible has been translated into more than 350 different tongues or dialects and school books prepared in the same; schools have been gathered, developed, classified, and made popular; Churches have been organized, trained, and brought forward toward self-support and self-direction. This necessary, but slow and difficult preliminary task has hitherto absorbed a great part of the available force and energy; but it is now substantially done. An able and experienced missionary force is in place and at a point of unprecedented power and productiveness; a native force five times as numerous, well trained, and sympathetic and capable is ready to co-operate in some places to take the leading part. The time has come for a swift, concerted, vigorous, and determined advance; and we may expect to see the product of the work doubling in seven years, soon in five years, and soon with increasing rapidity. As these facts come clearly to view, and their meaning grows plain, and their tendency is studied, confidence, courage, enthusiasm, rise to commanding strength. It is no wonder that when the great conference closed the tone of feeling and speech became solemn and triumphant, as if we saw our Leader lifted up and drawing all men unto him.

Ours is a kingdom great and strong. In its service there are burdens to bear, losses to encounter, delays to endure; but never defeat, and never despair. Dangers do not dismay; checks and disasters do not overwhelm; "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." It has won in every great encounter; it will win everywhere and forever. It is the Eternal City, of which Horace vainly sung and the Romans dreamed, with which the Scriptures are filled and the Christian centuries resound, and on which the ages wait.—The Assembly Herald.

M'LEAN.—God in His wisdom has removed from our society, by death, our friend and member, Mrs. P. C. McLean.

Resolved 1st. That while we mourn deeply the loss we have sustained in her death, we bow in humble submission to God's will.

Resolved, 2nd. That we hereby bear testimony of her high Christian character and her interest in the cause of missions.

Resolved, 3rd. That we tender to the members of her family our heartfelt sympathy and that a copy of these resolutions be spread upon our minutes and a copy be sent to the Presbyterian Standard.

Pauline Stamps,
Nelia Shaw,
Committee.

M'DONALD.—Miss Elizabeth McDonald departed this life, August 31, 1903, age 60, and was interred at the family burial ground, Crane's Creek. She was a faithful and consistent member of Union Presbyterian Church.

MAY.—Mr. William May, an earnest and loyal member of the Carthage Presbyterian Church, was "gathered to his fathers" in Winfield, La., Oct. 12th, 1903. Mr. May was in his 52nd year, and leaves a loving wife and daughter to mourn their loss. "How blessed is the righteous when he dies."

FIELDS.—Julia Blake, the five-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Fields, fell on sleep Oct. 22nd. "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of God."

TOWLES.—Mrs. Mary H. Towles, widow of the late Rev. D. T. Towles, died at her home, Crab Tree, Haywood county N. C., on Nov. 4th. She was buried by the side of her husband near the little church, to build which they gave the land a short while before death. The funeral services were conducted by Revs. S. W. Newell and Frank D. Hnnt. A large crowd of friends and neighbors gathered to testify their respect for her

A Sermon to Young Ladies.

(Read before the Fayetteville Presbyterian Union.)

When Pharaoh, after many broken promises, again consented to let the children of Israel go, with the provision that they should leave their flocks and herds behind, Moses refused this condition saying: "There shall not a hoof be left behind," giving as his reason, "We know not with what we must serve the Lord until we come thither." (Exodus 10:26).

It is these words of Moses, spoken on behalf of God's chosen people, that I wish us to consider together and apply to ourselves, for are we not God's chosen people, "chosen in Him before the foundation of the world?"

These Israelites, after years of cruel bondage, were now to come into a glorious liberty. The God to whom their great ancestors had testified as "the God which fed me all my life-long" would now lead them to "a land flowing with milk and honey." Deliverance from a service of rigor demanded a service of love. Love expresses itself in service. Service requires or includes a sacrifice at least until we have reached the high plane where we "count not our lives nor our ease dear unto ourselves."

I need not speak of the analogy between the bondage and redemption of the Israelites and of ourselves as sinners. Also I shall take it for granted that we are all willing to admit that gratitude and love require as much from us under the gospel as from them under the law.

The demonstrations of these subjects are the firstly and secondly of my discourse, and really constitute the sermon which you have heard preached often, and possibly at length by much better sermonizers than I. So, woman-like, we will jump at once to the application, as so far I have heard no objection to a woman making an application; and the minds of any who have been scared by the title of this paper will be relieved to find that after all the sermon was preached by one duly ordained.

"We know not with what we must serve the Lord until we come thither." Our text pre-supposes that something will be required of service or sacrifice or both. It does not remotely hint that what is required may be withheld. Though what I may say is equally true of any Christians, I am addressing myself especially to the members of our beloved Union, who are young in the work or in the Christian life.

When you first put your name on the roll of this society what was your intention? Was it to do everything you could for the cause? To give just as much as you were able, or was it to give a sum which you scarcely miss and do nothing, or to give as much as possible and do nothing? How familiar to us all is the reply. "Yes I will join if you don't ask me to do anything." If we join in the spirit of the text we come with means, talent, tact and time so consecrated that we are willing to do anything that it appears we should do. We are all agreed on one thing—that we must give something, else we would not have joined. Are we all agreed that we must give as much as we are able—not all to this cause, but its proper proportion? The text seems to teach a new way of measuring our contributions. We must be ready with whatever may be required. Each form of work makes its own calls for support. So it seems that we should give not only in proportion to our own means, but in accordance with the demands of the work. Not merely must we give more that the work may increase, but is the work increasing? We must give the more. The work demands it.

Then I am sure that we are all agreed that we must pray, but I am just as sure that none, or very few of us, pray enough. This is sacred ground, this holy of holies of our lives. So I will not ask you, but we will all ask ourselves, "Do I pray enough for this work?"

Now, at last I have come to the part on which we are not all sweetly agreed, the doing. How many of us, though we give and pray, are doing anything for the Master? Doing the many things that can be done for the furtherance of this and other good causes? Doing anything around us that may uplift and help, after nearer duties have been attended to? When we decide to enter the Christian life, "We know not with what we must serve the Lord until we come thither." After that, circumstances will largely determine for us. God evidently intends us all to do the work which He places within reach of us and calls some to go "far off."

Need I say that there are some to whom God shows just as plainly that He asks no public or semi public work—not from lack of ability, for everybody can do something, but because He has already filled their hands. I scarcely think it is necessary to mention this. That dreadful spectre which haunts the minds of the brethren when they write on the woman question in the solemn column—the woman who neglects her home and husband and children to attend missionary and other meetings, and who disproves the article that appeared in the pretty column of the previous issue on "A Wife's Devotion," and that in the following number on "A Mother's Deathless Love"—that dreadful spectre, I say, never haunts these meetings. Neither have I ever seen her at any other. I have worked in home and foreign missionary societies in more than one Church and in more than one State, and if she ever worked in the same it was in such an obscure corner that she was not recognized. I am very sure she was never given any honor or service, since she is not the kind of woman her sisters admire or delight to honor. But I think she was not there. I think her tastes lead her in a different direction.

So if there is any tired little woman present who has worked two or three weeks getting things at home in smooth running order that she might slip away for a day or two of inspiration at this meeting let her not ask despairingly, "What more can I do?" For we say, nothing more. We wish you to bear an easy mind on that point and get as rested as you can. Your part is to give and pray. "But there are others." And these are they for whom this application is intended.

We have three of our talents yet to be disposed of—tact and talent and time—and the greatest of these is time. How many of those who have leisure are willing to give some of it to this work? Most requests for help meet with the answer, "I haven't time." When "I hadn't time" was offered as an excuse to my old teacher he invariably replied "You had all the time there was." So have we all the time there is. The only question is, what shall we do with it? "My hands are so full!" What are they full of? Full of embroidery, books, music, pictures, flowers, frills and what not? These all imply leisure unless they are the means of livelihood. And some of the Christian's leisure should be consecrated. Then the tact and the talent will come into use. Otherwise they lie fallow.

We all love beauty, and there is nothing wrong in beautifying everything we can. But don't let us forget that proportion is one of the first elements of beauty. Too much embellishment, and the effect is lost. If all our time or all our leisure is spent in selfish pursuits, however elevating, then the highest beauty of all, beauty of character, is sacrificed. For we are shutting our hearts to our neighbors' needs—pinned tight with a crochet needle, perhaps, or letting a little doiley eclipse the view of the whole heathen world. "Simplify! simplify! simplify!" the women's magazines are telling us. But is anybody doing it? The wrong is not in beautifying, but in forgetting one of the fundamental principles of true art, that whatever is beautiful in itself is always beautiful. O! if we would remember that, how much time it would save! How many stitches! How many beautiful articles of household and personal adornment might remain till they wear out instead of being discarded because of a mere change in style! Three continents of women waiting breathlessly every spring and fall to learn whether puffs shall be at the top or bottom or the middle of the sleeve! Whether skirt braids forsooth shall show an eighth of inch or not at all! And then we say wearily, "Fashion is such a tyrant!" Why, no, she isn't. She does not have to be. At the sound of her coming we all bow down and say: "Walk right over please." And the puppet does; and the men who pull the wires smile with satisfaction on the performance and pocket the money. These things account for the small amount of leisure which most women have to spare for Christian work. But is it not just as wrong to spend all of our leisure for our own purposes as to spend all of our money on ourselves? "So little done, so much to do!" And so few willing to do it!

To return to our own society, besides the duties of the officers, there are many things that every member can do: The locking up of old members, the securing of new, the helping to collect dues or other money, the making of clubs for the periodicals, distributing of literature and sample copies, the wooing of the unwilling to read in many artful ways which tact will suggest, the helping to prepare programs or gleanings suitable articles for such in your own reading. These and many other things will suggest themselves to you, and every other cause in which you are engaged will have its own details.

To accomplish this, some of the prized, or alas! unprized, leisure must be sacrificed. But "We know not with what we must serve the Lord until we come thither." It may mean to you that you must sacrifice the gratification of your tastes to some extent; that you must cultivate the head and the hand and the voice less in order that you may cultivate your heart more, and also that portion of His vineyard which He intends you to till. It may be that you are one of those whose leisure is so little that to give it is the greatest sacrifice you can make. With many of us that must be so. But "We know not with what we must serve the Lord until we come thither."

We all know that God's people do not give enough of their means for His work. But outside of the pastorate I believe they give more largely of their means than of their time. How few give any time at all! How few follow in the footsteps of Him who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." How manifold the ministries! the common ministries! the commonest! These must not be neglected for missionary or other societies, or we cannot believe that such work will be acceptable in His sight. "These ought ye to have done and not to leave the other undone."

We have all believed that we must give us our means and our prayers to God's work, and if we can so apply this text to ourselves as to see that we must also give of our time and our endowments of heart and mind, the preacher's sermon and our application will have had the desired effect.

The Home Circle.

Shosaburo Aoyama, a Japanese Christian Gentleman.

I was born January 4, 1843, at Okazaki, a city in the province of Mikawa. My father's name was Mokuemon Yamaji, and my mother's Tayo Yamaji. From generation to generation our family served the feudal lord (of Okazaki), and my father for a long time acted as his deputy. I was the youngest of seven sons. When I was eleven years of age a relative named Aoyama, who had no son of his own, adopted me, and I took his name. According to the custom of that time, I devoted myself diligently, day and night, to the study of literature (Chinese and Japanese), and military art. Being naturally dull, however, my progress was very slow. Every night my mother, while occupied with her household duties, required me to read primary history, and herself told me about the heroes of ancient and modern Japan, and taught me the duties of a warrior (samurai), and endeavored to cultivate in me strength of will. Although adopted by the Aoyama family, and often visiting them, I continued to reside with my father and mother until I was sixteen or seventeen years of age.

When Commodore Perry came to Japan I was about ten years of age. His coming awakened the country as from sleep. For more than two hundred years there had been a period of peace but now the weapons, which had long laid hidden away in boxes, were brought forth, and there was a revival in the study of military art. There was likewise a revival in letters, and Chinese literature became very popular; but my inclinations were not toward literature, for I wished to serve my lord as a soldier. I became proficient, excelling especially in the use of the spear and in artillery practice. At the age of twenty, however, the new methods of foreign gunnery were introduced, much to my dissatisfaction (for I held to the old), and I remonstrated with my superiors. They, however, explained the shortcomings of our own and the merits of the new, and told me also about the real condition of foreign countries. I was greatly interested, and from that time became a zealous student of foreign gunnery. I also devoted myself to the study of foreign science, and, among other books Natural History and Elementary Physiology, written by Mr. Howson, a missionary to China, were of great benefit to me. At the end of these books there was an account given of Jesus Christ, and the wisdom and power of the Creator was described. This I read repeatedly. It was easy to understand about the Creator, but I couldn't understand the least bit about Jesus Christ. At this time the feeling against foreigners was intense, and the principal subject of discussion was the driving of them away, and the closing against them of our harbors; and hence even those who read such books as I did were persecuted. But the current of events was too strong for the conservatives. Civil war was breaking out. I was then twenty-three or twenty four years old. The ancient weapons of Japan quickly proved inferior to the better foreign weapons, and wonderful changes began to work in everything. At that time I was sent to Kyoto, as a military officer, to arrange for sending forward artillery in the war with Choshu (Yamaguchi). While I was staying there I was promoted to the position of diplomatic officer (in dealing with other feudal lords). I thus had an opportunity to increase my knowledge greatly, for I met many famous military leaders, and visited the domains of other feudal lords. Heretofore I had spent my whole life in Okazaki, and my knowledge of other parts of Japan was quite limited; but now I came to understand the condition of the country as a whole. At that time the situation changed rapidly, and battles being fought at Kyoto and Fushimi, the shotgun was overthrown, and the mikado was restored to power. Meantime I had been cast into prison for opposing the government, and there I remained until the war of the restoration was ended. While I was staying in prison I pondered deeply over the question as to whether it was possible to harmonize Confucianism with foreign science, so that both could dwell together in the land. But the course of events was so rapid that it seemed that not one old thing was going to be left, and I searched in vain for some foundation principle that might serve as a guide for the mind of the new Japan. I thought that possibly, in the systems of foreign countries, there might be something similar to Confucianism, but I couldn't find anything.

In August, 1867, I was released from prison, but my troubles were not over. I had had much trouble from my childhood; trouble in connection with being adopted into another family; trouble inherited from the new house into which I had entered. Then, when I was cast into prison I was in great poverty. In 1868, however, the old officials were all dismissed, and those who, like myself, had been in prison, came into power; so the despised theorists became the high officials. The government in my feudal lord's domain was now exactly to my fancy, and I considered that the time had come when I could put into practice the new knowledge which I had gathered. But much disappointment was the result for the most part. Just at this time there was published the translation of a book called Self Help, by Smiles. In this book there was written much about missionaries, and the deeds of heroes, which I greatly admired. I read it several times, searching especially for the fundamentally different point of view which evidently distinguished the West from the East. At this time I was commanded to lead back to Okazaki the samurai who were gathered [at the residence of my lord in Yeddo. This gave me my first opportunity to visit Yokohama, meet foreigners, and utter freely my inmost feelings. Then it was that I was told that Christianity is the foundation of Western civilization. With that began my desire to study Christianity. The national law, however, still prohibited, under the severest penalties, any such study, and as there were no books, I could not do anything. Nevertheless, I fairly hungered and thirsted with my desire. It happened, then, that one of my friends, who had been to America and Europe, returned. He had with him a Chinese translation of the New Testament, and he showed it to me. Then I told him what I wished to do, and my desire to possess the book, whereupon he gave it to me with pleasure. I, as delighted, and read it many times, day and night. But the principle of it as entirely beyond my understanding, and I felt very foolish because I could not understand it, and many times I cast it aside; but always took it up again. As I think of it now it seems like a dream. The cross of Christ was a special stumbling-block to me, and as a soldier I was greatly dissatisfied with the timidity of the disciples. I continued to read the book over and over again for four years, and gained no light. I wanted to read the Old Testament also, but could not get one.

In 1871 the Daimyates were abolished, and the present system of Prefectures was established. Most of my friends got government positions, and went away, and it was necessary for me to find something to do, so I decided to go to Tokyo with my family. It was now the summer of 1874. It was at this time that I tried to pray to God secretly. I read books on the evidences of Christianity, and the like, and I began to venerate God. My main purpose in going to Tokyo was to obtain a chance of studying the Bible, and, as I already had three children, to give them an opportunity of being educated in the new knowledge, and to bring my whole family under the influence of the new religion. When I first came to Tokyo I was introduced to Dr. Thompson by the same friend who first gave me the New Testament. I told him my hopes, and expressed the desire to become his pupil. He treated me with great kindness. After that, every day, in company with four or five friends, I studied the Old Testament at his house. On Sunday I went to Church with my family, and studied the Gospels of Luke and John with Dr. Verbeck. I felt I was beginning to understand their meaning, which is that Christ, with a nature that is both human and divine, is our great Saviour. I soon asked to be baptized and was baptized by Dr. Thompson. My old friend sought to persuade me to get employment with the government, but Dr. Thompson told me it would be a difficult thing for me to keep the Sabbath holy, and, if possible, it would be better to seek some other livelihood. As my allowance as a samurai was still coming to me as before, I was able to get on without trouble. I taught Japanese to Miss Schoolmaker, and afterwards to Dr. Imbrie and Miss Youngman. While doing this I studied the Bible, and began to tell others about the way to believe in Christ. In 1876 the theological school was established, and I studied there for over two years, greatly to my benefit. I was shamefully slow in my spiritual development; I found it hard to believe in miracles; I thought that God was not above the reason, and, indeed, that God and reason were almost the same thing. But I did not wholly reject miracles—I looked upon them as historical events, and waited for clear evidence that would allow me to believe wholly. But in the unknown time the Holy Spirit was sent. I had a great struggle, too, with my old habits. We began family prayers. The children grew in knowledge. My own weakness, and the power of old habits, were revealed to me continuously, night and day; nor had I any power to overcome them—any power of my own. I was in great distress, and could only exclaim, "O, wretched man that I am!" As I look back to that period I feel it to have been the period of my greatest suffering. Though I believed in Christ, I did not receive His full light, I saw the dim light in the far distance; though I was reformed, I sometimes felt hypocritical, yet I believed that God would surely help me.

For five years after I was baptized I preached the gospel within and without the city of Tokyo. In the spring of 1878 I was told that Simonoseki was to be made an open port. It was, therefore, my desire to begin to preach the gospel in that place, and with my friend, Mr. S. Hattori, I pledged myself to that work, and in April of that year we proceeded to that place. As soon as we began to preach there arose a bitter persecution, and we had no place in which even to stay. But in the midst of the persecution, and in a short time, many became Christians; and at various places around there were inquiries, so that, on Christmas, 1879, we were able to organize a church. Mr. Hattori then went to Yamaguchi, and Mr. Nakashima coming to the field, the gospel was preached in Hiroshima, Yanagawa, and Kokura. As I had been ordained before leaving Tokyo, went about from place to place baptizing the converts. In the spring of 1881 there was a revival in Tokyo and Yokohama, and some Christians coming from there, we held meetings night and day.

In the spring of 1883 my wife, who had been bedridden for five years, died, leaving six children, so that both within and without my household I was made to suffer; but the Lord made it all work out for my spiritual good; and led me in the true way. Afterward I became the pastor of the Yamaguchi church, and at that time there was an attack of the new theology, and it seemed as though the churches in this region, and myself as well, would be overwhelmed; but we withstood it, and made firm the foundations. It was a great benefit to my faith, but there were many among the Christians who never recovered.

I have spent nineteen years working in this region—eleven years at Simonoseki and at Chofu, three years at Yamaguchi, one year at Yanagawa (Kynshu), and four years in Usuki (Kyushu). During that time I have enjoyed the sympathy of Dr. Alexander, and he has done many favors to my family. I have had twelve children—by my first wife, seven, and by my second, five. By the grace of God ten are still living. The eldest son was graduated at McCormick Theological Seminary, and is devoting his life to the gospel minister. I rejoice in this. Dr. Alexander was at great help to him. I rejoice, too, in the fact that my eldest daughter is the wife of a pastor.

It is plain that wonderful changes have taken place in Japan since the introduction of Christianity, but the changes are so various, and the causes so mixed, that it is hard to say that Christianity is the sole cause. Nevertheless, that it was a most important cause, all must admit. Of course for the most part, Eastern customs are sprung from Confucianism and Buddhism; such for example as the honouring of men and despising of women, and the division of society into ranks. But evil customs in Japan are being gradually rooted out. If it is asked why Japanese break with old customs so readily, the answer is, that they realize that this must be done if Japan wishes to rival civilized countries of the West. Feudal government has been abolished, and constitutional government established in its place with good effect. In the homes of the people the rank of women and the relations of man and woman are improving. It is impossible that educated women should be treated with contempt. There are two things, however, which are not yet established—first, the destruction of the customs characteristic of people of high rank; and second, higher education among the women generally. But it is clear that these will gradually improve. Thus the people are coming to look upon these various changes as evidence that Confucianism and Buddhism are losing their power. The new wine will not be put into the old bottles. The old house has to be broken up in order to build a new one. If we wish to associate with foreign peoples on terms of equality, our customs must be made to conform to theirs. Now, if the many changes be examined carefully, and traced to their source, it will be seen that they all sprang from ideas revealed in the Bible. So the people in our country must come to Christianity in the end. Many among the learned men, the statesmen, and the business men, often confess this. These people, however, are in no haste or anxiety for their own salvation; they favor their wives and children becoming Christians, and the country as a whole becoming Christian. Thus Christianity has been preached among the Gentiles, and they believed. One is surprised, therefore, at the smallness of the Church; but there are reasons, both within and without, for this state. Within the Church they still depend too much on the reason and knowledge of men, and not on the power of God; and the poison of the new theology is still at work. There are other causes, which I will not mention, but I believe in the final victory of the cross. Pray especially for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the churches of this land.

Please pardon the confusion of ideas, and the brevity of this sketch of my life. Shosaburo Aoyama.

Pauline's Silk Dress.

When Pauline first united with the little church, she had meant to do great things. Of her own accord she had given up the large one with its beautiful music, its stained windows, its soft carpet, because she thought the smaller one needed her more, as indeed it did.

It was a sacrifice, and she meant to work hard. Her father was well situated, she was an only child, and her time was all her own. But gradually the things of the world crept in, obscuring her spiritual vision. There were the Saturday night parties that left her too tired for Sunday school next morning. There were the social events and functions that often came Wednesday evening, excluding her from the prayer meetings. There was the young people's society that she did not often attend because it took too much time to prepare and read up on the topics. There were the calls among the old people and the children, and the little attentions she had been in the habit of paying the minister and his family.

Young, beautiful, gay, and pleasant-loving, she had a large circle of friends, of course. No one could help loving Pauline if they tried. She was too lovable herself.

So the new life shut out the old, and Pauline stifled her conscience with the promise of doing better by and by. But "by and by" did not come. Each succeeding season found her more fully engrossed with the whirl of gayety and engagements into which she had plunged herself, and gradually her ear became less sensitive to the whispering of the still small voice. And this was not all. The new life took her money as well as her time. Her father gave her a generous sum each month, but after her ribbons and finery were paid for, together with her millinery and dressmaking bills, there was nothing left for charity or for the doing of good. Before the month was up, her money was gone and she was in debt besides.

When she had first put her name on the church book of the little church, she had pledged herself to give each month a certain amount toward keeping up the salary. At first this had been easy, then lapses with irregular contributions came, and lately she had fallen into the habit of not paying at all.

About this time Aunt Anna came to visit her. Aunt Anna was quiet and gentle with a sweet, lovely face over which the storms of life had swept without marring its serene and tranquil beauty. Somehow she carried in her atmosphere the outward sign of an inward grace. With so much love and thought for others in her heart, it shone forth upon her features, making her a benediction to those about her. Pauline's own mother being dead, she turned to this beloved mother's sister with open arms and a full heart.

"It's perfectly lovely to have you, Aunt Anna," she would often declare, in her sweet, impulsive way. "I feel better already. I'm never going to give you up, never."

It was at the breakfast table one morning. Father had just given her her money for the month. An alluring little heap of silver with a shining gold piece in between. As he left for the office, Pauline picked up the paper. On one of the pages, in bold black lettering, was the following:

"Great Clearance Sale.

Annual Sacrifice of Silks. For this morning only.

All our $3.00 and $4.00 silks will be sold at one-half price.

Come early and secure a prize."

Pauline turned to Aunt Anna. Her eyes were sparkling. "Listen, auntie," she cried, and then she read it. "Isn't that lovely?" she added. "Just when I was needing a dress, too. Come, now, put on your bonnet, and we'll go down and select a pattern. I think I'll get one of blue. Blue always was my color, and father likes to see me in it, next to white. There's that party at the Neals'. I must look my best for that."

Aunt Anna was sitting by the window.

The dining room was pleasant and sunny, and very often they spent an hour or two there after breakfast.

"Come here, dear," she said, fondly.

Pauline went over, seating herself on Aunt Anna's lap. "Well," she began smilingly, kissing Aunt Anna's soft crown of hair, "what is it?"

Aunt Anna stroked thoughtfully the plump, white little hand. "Have you seen the minister lately," she asked, suddenly, "or his wife?"

Pauline looked a little surprised. "Only at church once in a while on Sunday mornings," she answered. "Why, Aunt Anna?"

"Nothing, I only was down there yesterday," she replied, "and it struck me that they were being neglected. And that reminds me, Pauline, my dear. You must pardon your old aunt for the question, but have you been keeping up your church dues?"

Pauline flushed, soberly, "I haven't.

I'm ashamed to acknowledge it, but I'm behind several months. I meant to keep up my dues, but you know how money goes, and"— Aunt Anna put an arm about her. "Let me tell you of my visit," she said, gently. "I went down to the parsonage yesterday afternoon. You had gone to Miss Preston's reception. I need not tell you of the house. You have seen it for yourself and know how plain it is. Hardly chairs enough to go round, and the carpet faded and worn. But it is not of that wish to speak. I found the minister's wife sick with a cold and high fever. Her eyes were large and bright, her cheeks crimson. She ought to have been in bed with some one to care for her, yet instead of that, she was sitting up in a chair, trying, with her poor, trembling fingers, to mend the children's flannels. There are five of them, you know. The baby had had the croup the night before and lay on her lap. Some one had sent for the minister and he had been obliged to go. In the kitchen, Esther, who is only twelve years old, was washing the dinner dishes. Such a little mite of a

Card from Mrs. Person

Can it be that Most of the ills of Life can be cured through the Blood?

I have confined the recommendation of my Remedy to troubles that had their origin in impure blood, or a "rundown" system, and yet I know it can do more.

Five years ago my Remedy cured Mrs. J. S. Thompson, of Hasty, N. C., of ladies' trouble, and since then she has used it as a family medicine, and now I have her testimonial where it carried two of her children safely through an attack of typhoid fever.

My Remedy cured a case of kidney trouble in my own family, of six months standing, after all medical treatment had failed, and the party was regarded as a doomed man. Finding that he was rapidly declining, we tried the Remedy, and in two weeks a great change was apparent, and in two months he was well, and the cure was permanent.

I have known it tried in a well-known family in this State (whose name I am at liberty to give) for puerperal fever, when four doctors in consultation said that the patient could not live many hours, and it cured her. The reaction was immediate.

I saw Mr. Fred Howell, of Goldsboro, N. C., when he was down with consumption. I saw him again recently, a well man, after using the Remedy two years.

I have seen two ladies suffering with cancer of the womb (and knew of a third) and I have seen them perfectly cured, after having used my Remedy and Wash for about a year.

I have known it to cure a great many cases of stomach trouble that had failed to yield to any other treatment.

I have known it to cure four cases of nurse's sore mouth, after all medical treatment had failed.

I have known the Wash to cure a case of bladder trouble, when the physician said an operation alone could reach it.

In the beginning of my business career, twenty-one years ago, realizing what a powerful agency for relief of the afflicted was in my hands, I went to the medical fraternity of Raleigh and invited them to investigate my claim that I had a specific for troubles that came from blood impurity. I invited examination to the end that it might be generally used by the profession, if I could substantiate my claim. I offered to accept any number of test cases that would satisfy them in regard to the merit of my Remedy and I would cure them free. I only asked them to agree to watch the result of my Remedy and if I cured every one, for them to agree to acknowledge it publicly. But this, they said, would be "unprofessional" and an "irregular proceeding," and they therefore declined, although I offered to give them officially my full formula.

This goes to prove the unbounded confidence I had in my Remedy in the beginning of my work and it is now established on a pinnacle none can shake.

household, and yet, in looking at her, I felt instinctively the merging of the child into the woman too early."

Pauline's face was still flushed, but she was listening.

"I sat down by the minister's wife," continued Aunt Ana, still gently, "took the flannels out of her hands, and mended them myself. Such poor, thin, worn underwear, it made my heart ache to see them; and then, Pauline, before long it all came out. Such a sad, sad story, and you must forgive me, dear, but all caused by the selfishness and thoughtlessness of those who should have been pillars, but who have proven themselves reeds. Broken promises made, too, before the Lord. I'm telling you this, my dear, because I want you to realize the importance of always keeping your word, of paying your church dues. Because you, and other members of the church, have failed to do this, you have given these dear, consecrated people heartaches innumerable, and plunged them—I am not exaggerating dear—into positive want."

Pauline stated. "Is it so bad as that, Aunt Anna?" she cried. "Oh, I'm sorry!"

"I knew you would be dear, and because of this I am telling you these facts.

A great many people think that their obligations to the Lord can be paid any time; I don't. I always object to this haphazard way of giving. It is dangerous, and between times the pastor and his family, unless the church is large and flourishing, and can carry these delinquent ones, may be really suffering. The minister's wife told me herself that if they hadn't had credit, they would actually have gone hungry. Think of that, Pauline. Already they are three hundred dollars behind on the salary, and there are other debts, and yet every cent of this has been pledged. I can't tell you how it grieves me to see people so dishonoring their Master. My dear, I want to see you a useful, earnest, consecrated, working Christian. You have the ability, the charm of manner, the pleasing personality that could make you a power for God if you don't let the world spoil you. Don't permit it, Pauline. Say to yourself: 'Lord, here am I, Pauline Williams. Take and use me.' Keep nothing back. Give yourself freely, unreservedly, fully, and I need not tell you of the joy that will be yours. That is all, dear. Forgive my little sermon, but my heart has been in this. Now, shall we go and look at the silk?"

Pauline rose slowly. "No," she answered, quietly; then she stooped and kissed Aunt Anna again. "Thank you for telling me," she said, a trifle unsteadily. "I didn't know, and I'm ashamed of myself—bitterly ashamed. I never really meant not to pay the sum I'd pledged, and yet there is no excuse. I've bought things I didn't need, and I've neglected my Bible, the Church, everything. You needn't look at any silk for me, Aunt Anna, for I'm not going to buy any." She took up the heap of money decisively. "I'm going straight to the treasurer," she added, "and pay my dues, and after that—well, I have an idea what I will do."

Aunt Anna looked after the erect young figure with tearful eyes. "I thought I could reach her," she whispered. "She's a dear child, warm of heart, lovable in every way—only thoughtless. God grant that I have shown her in time."

Pauline found the treasurer in his office. A tall man with a kind, worn face.

"I've come to pay my dues, Mr. Barlowe," she began. "I am ashamed to think how careless I have been. You must forgive me."

The treasurer grasped her hand; his face had brightened. "Never mind about the past," he answered. "I can tell by your looks you'll not do it again, and this money—Miss Pauline, I can't tell you how we need it! Three hundred dollars behind on the salary, and yet every cent of this is covered by pledges that people will not pay."

"And I—I've been one of the number," she cried, remorsefully; "but I want to atone for it, Mr. Barlowe. Let me be one of a certain number to visit these people. I believe I can help raise the salary."

Mr. Barlowe started a little. It was all so unexpected. "I believe you can, Miss Pauline," he cried. "When can you go?"

"Tomorrow," was the prompt answer.

The treasurer looked into the bright, beautiful face aglow with its new consecrated purpose. "God go with you," he said, solemnly.

It took some hard work, of course, and some discouragements, but Pauline would not give up, and before she knew it, she, with the band of helpers she had chosen, did what the older members of the Church had failed to do.

The money was raised, the salary paid, the parsonage filled with rejoicing, and the little church set free from its fetters of debt, darkness and obscurity.

It was the evening of the seventh—the party at the Neals'. Pauline came into the library where father sat reading. She wore a pretty soft dress of white wool, fashioned exquisitely by Aunt Anna's own deft fingers. She had no ornaments; only a single spray of holly laden with its crimson berries nestled in the lace at her throat.

Her father looked up. "Bless my heart," he cried, fondly, "how sweet my tall girl looks! What is that dress, silk?"

Pauline's pretty face sobered for just an instant. "No," she answered, stooping to kiss his cheek, "not silk, father. I don't think I'll ever wear silk again," she added, "not unless I can wear it with a clear conscience. I've turned over a new leaf, father. No more debts,

A silence fell between them. Father broke it gently. "Like Mary, you have chosen the good part. The part that cannot be taken away," he said, earnestly.—Forward.

WILMINGTON N. C.

How Stanley Found God in Africa.

Generally we send Americans to convert the natives of Africa, but the following letter by the most well-renowned explorer of the present day, Henry M. Stanley, will show how God caused the trials and misfortunes of an American in Africa to bring this intrepid discoverer to realize that the Bible is true, and that God always answers prayer.

In writing an account to the Emin Pasha Relief Expedition, Stanley said: "You, who throughout your long and varied life, have steadfastly believed in the Christian's God, and before men who have professed your devout thankfulness for many mercies vouchsafed to you, will better understand, than many others, the feelings which animate me when I find myself back in civilization, uninjured in life or health, after passing through so many stormy and distressful periods.

"Constrained at the darkest hour to humbly confess that, without God's help, I was helpless, I vowed a vow in the forest solitudes that I would confess his aid before men. Silence, as of death, was round about me; it was midnight. I was weakened by illness, prostrated by fatigue, and wan with anxiety for my white and black companions, whose fate was a mystery.

"In this physical and mental distress I besought God to give me back my people. Nine hours later we were exulting with a rapturous joy. In full view of all was the crimson flag with the crescent, and beneath its waving folds was the long-lost rear column."

In another instance he says:

"Each officer had economized his rations of bananas. Two were the utmost that I could spare for myself. My comrades were also as rigidly strict and close in their diet, and a cup of sugarless tea closed the repast. We were sitting conversing about our prospects, discussing the probabilities of our couriers reaching some settlement on this day or the next, and the time that it would take them to return, and they desired to know whether in my previous African experience I had encountered anything so grievous as this.

"'No, not quite so bad as this,' I replied. 'We have suffered, but not to such an extremity as this. Those nine days on the way into Ituru were wretched. On our flight from Bumbire we certainly suffered much hunger, and while floating down the Congo to trace its course our condition was much to be pitied. We have had a little of something, and at least large hopes, and if they die where are we?'

"'The age of miracles is past, it is said, but why should they be? Moses drew water from the rock at Horeb for the thirsty Israelites. Of water we have enough and to spare. Elijah was fed by ravens at the brook Cherith, but there is not a raven in all this forest. Christ was ministered unto by angels. I wonder if any one will minister unto us?'

"Just then there was a sound as of a large bird whirring through the air. Little Randy, my fox-terrier, lifted up a foot and gazed inquiringly; we turned our heads to see, and that second the bird dropped beneath the jaws of Randy, who snapped at the prize, and held it fast as in a vice of iron.

"'There, boys,' I said, 'truly the age of miracles is not past,' and my comrades were seen gazing in delighted surprise at the bird, which was a fine, fat guinea fowl. It was not long before the guinea fowl was divided, and Randy, its captor, had his lawful share; and the little doggie seemed to know that he had grown in esteem with all men, and we enjoyed our prize each with her own feelings."—Scribner's Magazine.

Mistakes of Women.

One of the mistakes of women is not knowing how to eat. If a man is not to be fed when she is, she thinks a cup of tea and anything handy is good enough. If she needs to save money, she does it at the butcher's cost. If she is busy she will not waste time in eating. If she is unhappy, she goes without food. A man eats if the sheriff is at the door, if his work drives, if the undertaker interrupts; and he is right. A woman will choose ice cream instead of beefsteak, and a man will not.

Another of her mistakes is in not knowing when to rest. If she is tired, she may sit down, but she will darn stockings, crochet shawls, embroider doilies. Doesn't she know that hard work tires? If she is exhausted, she will write letters or figure her accounts. She would laugh at you if you hinted that reading or writing could fail to rest her. All over the country women's hospitals flourish because women do not know how to rest.

Another mistake on the list is their constant worrying. Worry and hurry are their enemies, and yet they lug them to their bosoms. Women cross bridges before they come to them, and even build bridges to cross. They imagine misfortune, and run out to meet it.

Women are not jolly enough. They make too serious business of life, and laugh at its little humor; too seldom. Men can stop in the middle of perplexities and have a hearty laugh. It keeps them young. Women cannot, and that is one reason why they fade so early—there are other reasons, but we will pass them now. Worry not only wrinkles the face, but it wrinkles and withers the mind. Have a hearty laugh once in awhile; it is a good antiseptic, and will purify the mental atmosphere, drive away evil imaginings, bad temper and other ills.—Buffalo Times.

A learned clergyman was accosted by an illiterate preacher who despised education and prided himself on his want of it. "Sir," said the latter, "you have been to college, I suppose?" "Yes, sir," was the reply. "I am thankful," replied the illiterate, "that the Lord opened my mouth without learning." "A similar event," retorted the clergyman, "took place in Balaam's time, but such things are of rare occurrence in the present day."—Scottish Guardian.

Uncle Ben and Missions.

I went to hear a misisonary tell about the way
The heathen folks in lands afar are strugg-lin' today
To hear the gospel message—how for miles around they come
And listen to the story of the blest eternal home.

He told about a man that walked a hundred miles or more,
And then fell down exhausted at the mission chapel door;
That man was simply starvin' for the precious livin' bread,
I wish we were as anxious that our spirits might be fed.

I've never loved the heathen, but the Lord has helped me see,
That tho' his skin be darker, he is fellow man to me;
And he who brought my soul from outer darkness into light,
Expects of me an effort to dispel my brother's night.

I have no wealth to offer, but I'll do the best I can,
Now let me see—that's it! I'll try a sacrificing plan;
I'll give up my tobacco, and the savin' that I hoard
Shall be my contribution to the missionary board.

Our Little Folks.

An Apple Mission.

One day, upon answering a gentlering at my door bell, I found a sweet little girl, five or six years old, waiting to see me. A tiny white handkerchief was folded across her shoulders and down to a point at the waist. On her arm hung a red and black calico stocking-bag. A quaint, curious little figure she was. Her errand was as singular as her appearance.

"Will you let me mend stockings for you this morning, ma'am, or mittens? I will mend for five cents an hour, and I can mend tolerably well, dranma says.

I drew her into the sitting-room, gave her a small chair by the fire, and said, "Now, my dear, why do you want to mend stockings for me?"

Without appearing to heed my question, she gravely drew from her bag a gray stocking with a nicely mended heel.

"Here," said she "is a hole I mended for dranma yesterday. Probably you would like a zample."

I praised the neatly darned "hole" and repeated my question. She smiled, and said brightly, "Oh, yes, dranma said I should have to 'splain to you 'bout my 'siety because you might not know all about it. You see there's ten of them, and they're very tired at night, an' apples rest hem. You know horses like apples dre'tful much. Every horse has to have an apple and sometimes they're so tired they have to have two, and that's manyer than dranma's dot, and so I have to mend things and det some money. Dranma says, I must tell people all about it. Do you un'stant' now?"

I assured her that I was sorry for the tired horses, and that she should mend for me an hour a day for a long time. At this the demure little mouth broke into lively smiles as she said, "Oh, dood, dood!" and began at once to open her bag and hunt for a thimble and needle, while I went to find her some work.

She said little as she worked, but gave such attentiou as would bring great skill to many a grown mender. Once she stopped her work a moment, and said, speaking slowly, "Oh, one day I didn't know what I sood do, I didn't have one apple left, not one for dranma. I save a soft one for her. You see one of the men whipped his horses and I had to give him an apple, too; I gave him dranma's apple, and then he didn't whip his horse no more. I was sorry for dranma; but she didn't care any when I 'splain'd to her; she dest dive me a love pat."

"A love pat! What's that?" I inquired.

"Oh, don't you know? It's dest a soft, dentle, little pat on your cheek. I like love pats. Hain't you dot any little girl?"

"Not now, my dear. God took my little girl away to heaven when she was about as old as you are."

"Did He? Then perhaps He gave her to my mamma. Dod's dot my mamma, too."

Something made me bend down and kiss her sweet cheek. She looked up quickly and said, "If my mamma's dot your little girl, then I must tome and mend for you, mustn't I?" I could bring my things and stay, but I tan't leave dranma, tourse."

She looked at me with sweet blue-gray eyes, clear and pure as the sky, eyes whose light shone in upon and brightened the deep shadow of my own loss.

"And what will you do in summer, little one, when there are no apples? Will you give each horse a lump of sugar?"

"Tan I? Oh, of tourse, horses would like that. Yes, that's dest what I'll do."

"How came you to have your 'siety, as you call it?"

"Well, you know, the minister said I must be a little 'deavorer and help people; and so I found the horses. Some of them draw toal all day, and then they're est dre'tful tired; and I know I ought to help them, tause they touldnt' talk and tell anybody."

When the mending was finished—very neatly, too, for the work of such small hands—she put away the needle and thimble very seriously, and went home "to see 'bout dranma."

After a few days I hunted up my little friend's home, which proved to be scarcely a square away. For a few rods the road approached the house by a steep incline. I was fortunate in the time of my visit. "Dranma" was going to have a load of coal, a little too heavy a load evidently, for the horse. About midway up the hill, the heavy wheels seemed to settle down to stay, and the horse after some patient tugging seemed to become discouraged. At length, in the midst of whipping and scolding, the tiny figure of my stocking mender appeared by the roadside. She seemed to have the tact of an accomplished strategist and the kindness of an angel. Soon she said with a smile, "It's pretty hard work to drive a toal team, ain't it?"

The driver glanced down annoyed, but the sight of her small figure and sweet face made his features relax a little at once.

Perceiving her slight advantage, she said immediately, "I think I sood try a love pat."

The man broke into a laugh. "Hand him this apple, then he'll proberbly pull better," she replied, and stepped at once in front of the horse, and reached up to him a fine red apple. The driver doubled up with laughter for a moment, and then actually patted the neck of the horse gently and lovingly, while the poor beast munched his apple.

"Now I dess if the load ain't too big he tan pull it," said the child. Surely he could and did.

"Maybe you're tired too, and would like an apple," I heard the child's voice say as they reached the last step of the incline, and she offered the man a small apple, not so fine a one as she had to the horse.

"I b'lieve I would, my beauty. Thank ye; ye're a trump. I won't hit the old hoss again today, blamed if I will."

I rose from my seat under a tree, where I had retired to be out of the way, and to witness the proceedings. Below me was a long shed connected with a railway station. Here, no doubt, my little "deavor" found tired horses at evening waiting for what ever business the last train might bring them.

As one would suppose I found my call at the little home very pleasant. "Dranma" was an unusual old lady, most kind, simple and sagacious. The child, always called "Dolly, dear," showed me treasures of dolls of varied colors, materials and names. With all her sweet graces of kindness and wonderful wisdom, she was full of the simple gayety of a child, perhaps fuller of it because of those graces. I congratulated myself on having found such a little friend, and all Christian endeavor workers on having such a co-laborer. When we can, in so child-like and trusting a spirit, work together with God, men will bear and forbear.—Selected.

Nannie's Gold Chain.

A True Story.

Yes, it was a real gold chain, and, oh! how she loved it? More, perhaps, than you could possibly imagine. Nannie always took good care of everything that was given her, but this chain was kept as something specially sacred, because it was the gift of an aunt that she loved better than almost any one else on earth, and now that the aunt was dead, the chain was prized more than ever. But Nannie loved her Savior better than any of her earthly treasures, and she was striving to serve him and follow in his footsteps.

During self-denial week she had been more than usually thoughtful, her mind dwelling constantly upon her many mercies and the great debt she owed her Savior for his gifts to her, especially the priceless gift of his love. But one thing distressed her; she longed to show her love by some special offerings this week, and she had not one penny she could call her own. She had prayed to God to show her how to make some money for this occasion, but as yet no way seemed opened for the answer of her prayers. She was still perplexed over the subject when Sunday came, and taking her accustomed seat in church, her pastor read for his text, Cor. 2. 8:9, "For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich." This verse was very familiar to Nannie, but it had never before impressed her so deeply as now, and she thought she had never listened to a more searching sermon.

The minister, with the greatest earnestness and tenderness dwelt upon what was meant by the grace or love of Christ spoken of in the text, what that love had led him to do for us, what riches he had left, how he did not give that for which he cared but little, or a small part of what he could easily spare, but how he gave his very best, and so freely and fully as to become poor for our sakes. Then the searching question was asked, "What do we know of this grace or love of Christ? It is only as we have a real and personal knowledge of this love that we are brought to feel how much we owe him, and are moved to give freely and lovingly of what costs us something."

Every word burned deep into Nannie's heart, and she breathed an earnest prayer to God for his Holy Spirit to teach her to know more of this love of Christ, that she might be constrained by it to consecrate her heart and life more entirely to his service. Was it in answer to this prayer that the thought of her gold chain rushed into her mind? Nannie thought it must have been. She had read of persons who did not have money to give, selling their jewelry and giving the proceeds to missions. But that chain, how could she give that, she loved it so much! "I gave my life for thee," she heard the minister say, while conscience whispered that if the love of Christ constrained her, she would not be satisfied to give what cost her nothing. But wouldn't something else do just as well, she urged to herself? "He gave his very best for you, his well-beloved, only Son." It was a hard struggle, for Nannie was not an imaginary character, and she still had within her much of that "old nature," which is sadly selfish. But, by the grace of God, the "new nature" conquered, and she was enabled to say—

"Take my silver and my gold,
Not a mite would I withhold."

"Yes, dear Lord, I lovingly, cheerfully, give to thee even my most valued treasure."

It was with a happy heart that she left the church that day, and as soon as possible the following week she carried out the good resolution made there. She took her chain to a large jewelry establishment where money was given in exchange for jewelry, and though the big tears would come, and her heart beat so violently at the thought of seeing her treasure no more, that she felt almost choked; she had put her hand to the plow and did not look back. Nor has she ever regretted this act of self-denial, for it drew her nearer to the loving, unselfish heart of her Savior, and caused her to feel a deeper, more real interest in his great work among the heathen. She prayed more earnestly for a blessing upon that money than upon any other she had ever given; and when she reaches the "better land" I believe she will find among the blessed around the throne some who were helped there by means of that gold chain. Which would she enjoy more, wearing a necklace here, or having the star in her crown in heaven? Are there not others who will try this plan of Nannie's?—The Children's Missionary.

The Turtle Woman.

A strange story comes to us from Japan. We hear sometimes of the wonderful things done by persons who have lost hands and arms, and use their feet instead; or, who, with only one or two of the natural senses left, are able to do as well or better than most of us who have all of our senses. The Turtle Woman is one of these, and the activity of her mind and heart is in strange contrast to her deformed and helpless body.

by the "Fujin Jozenkai," or Japanese Women's Benevolent Society. The physicians in charge are two Japanese ladies who studied and graduated in medicine in this country a few years ago. Among the patients at his hospital is the Turtle Woman. If she were in this country she might be supporting herself as a "show" in a dime museum. But that is one way of making money that is not known in Japan; and, instead, the woman is kindly cared for, and happy in her surroundings.

Her name is Ishimoto O Ume San, or Miss May Eesheemoto we would call her. She is well known, however, as the "Turtle Woman," because of a most peculiar and distressing deformity which causes her body to resemble somewhat that of a turtle. She was born this way. Her lower extremities wind around toward the front. Her hands are crossed just underneath her chin. She has always been completely paralyzed except her head, which she can move upon her neck. Her hair is cut short for greater ease in caring for her. Her head is finely shaped; she has a bright, intelligent, sensitive face. Until four years ago she was very unhappy. Her father deserted his family, and her mother was most unkind to her, abused her, and finally left her and a little brother when she was eight years old. They were cared for by a kind step-father who had married the mother out of pity for the child. He had to be at work all day, but when he came home at night he felt so sorry for her that he would take her on his back, after their simple meal of rice and fish was eaten, and carry her out to see something of the beauties of nature and the shops in the world outside. She loved her step-father very much, and he did all he could to make her life more endurable, until she was thirteen years old, the year that cholera was epidemic in Japan. One day he came home and O Ume saw him suffering, almost beside herself with anxiety as she could not move even one little finger to help him. She could only move her head and what pertained to it. She could use her tongue, and she was very thankful for that. Her little brother was there, and she told him to run for a kind man who lived not far away. There was a terrible thunder storm going on; it was very dark and the little boy was rather afraid; but under her encouragement he braved the storm, and without umbrella or rain cloak he ran to the man's house and brought him. But nothing could save her step-father; he died of cholera in a few hours, and O Ume was left sad beyond words to express. After this she was put in a hospital, where she suffered agonies. She was afraid to speak, and they thought she could not talk. She was left in a room with dead men, alone. She had to stay and suffer until a Christian Japanese found her, took her to his own home and cared for her. Four years ago she saw Jesus as her Savior, and since then her life has been one of joyful thanksgiving, and sunshine to all around her. Until then she had been terrified by the earthquakes we have here; but since she became Christ's disciple she fears no more.

After she became a Christian she had a new awakening to life. She longed to do something to be of some use. After lying awake all of one night in prayer for this, that the Lord would reveal to her what she could do, the word came to her like a revelation from heaven. The only member of her body that she could use was her mouth. In the morning she began to use her tongue, teeth and lips to master the use of little instruments such as Japanese scissors, a long, slender, straight metal hairpin, which she pinches together with her teeth, a Japanese pen, and a little weight to hold her work down. In this way she makes little paper storks, bookmarks, and dresses little dolls. More than this, she has learned to read and write, and has open to her a world of thought and feeling beyond that which she sees and hears.

This is the story told in the words of Miss Kaku Sudo, the resident physician, in her report of the work at the hospital.

Nannie Fletcher Basore, in The Children's Missionary.

"Take Her."

Miss Sharp, an American missionary working in West Africa, [has told the following story about her little scholars:

"A few days ago I said to them, 'A poor Congo woman wants me to take her little girl.'"

"'Take her! Take her!' exclaimed the children in chorus.

"'But I do not feel as if I could feed more than I have now,' I said.

"They thought awhile, and then the eldest said: 'If we could work and earn something we could help her buy her chop,' (food.)

"'Yes; but I know of no one who has any work that you could do,' I said.

"Another pause and some talk in Kroo, and then one said:

"'Mamma, take her, and we will give her a part off each one's place. Cook same as now, and we take some—some from all we plate till she have plenty.'"

"'Are you all willing to do this?' I asked.

"'Yes,' was the answer. 'And,' continued the one who led off, 'now take her and teach book, and teach her about God.'"

"What made it touching to me was that they all had their meals measured out, and no more than they wanted for themselves—never as much meat any one time in their lives as they could eat!" — Good Tidings.

Whatever the drawbacks of New York in other respects, it has beaten the record in the matter of letter-delivery.

A letter was recently sent from Paris to New York with the following address upon the envelope written in French.

"To a gentleman, now living in New York, formerly a general in the Mexican Army, he was traveling in France three months ago. He has a very dark face and green eyes. He speaks French fluently and is very polite."

Was this vaguely addressed missive packed off at once to the Dead Letter Office? Not at all. It passed through the hands of one carrier after another, until it fell into the hands of one who knew that a gentleman answering to the description lived upon his route. The "green eyes" item was a pointer. He remembered that the gentleman's eyes were, to say the least, "peculiar." He delivered the letter within three weeks after its arrival, and earned a proud distinction among his mates.—Exchange.

The missionaries have, practically unaided, created modern India. I am now, of course, regarding their work from a purely political and educational point of view, leaving its religious aspect to be dealt with by those better qualified to review it than myself. If we carefully consider the careers of Warren Hastings and Alexander Duff, and mark their effect upon history, which, weighing everything, shall we say did more for India—the English adventurer or the Scottish missionary? And, looking to Warren Hastings' successors, may it not be truthfully asserted that the glittering procession of titled persons who have held high office in India during a century and a half have left it very much as they found it; while every missionary teacher throughout the same period has been the center of influences which are now transforming the whole Eastern world?—A. Clippings.

A Tennessean went to a certain section of Texas and after a stay of twenty-two months went back to visit his old home. "What did you do out there?" asked one of his friends. "I worked eleven months," he replied. "What were you doing the other eleven?" "Rnning after my hat."

Wendell Phillips was in a hotel at Charleston, had breakfast in his room, and was served by a slave. Mr. Phillips spoke to him as an abolitionist, but the oth r seemed to be more concerned about the breakfast than about himself. Finally Mr. Phillips told him to go away, saying that he could not bear to be waited upon by a slave. The other remonstrated: "'Scuse me, massa, but I'se 'bliged to stay here, 'cause I'se 'sponsible fo' de silverware."—Children's Visitor.

The Rev. Dr. Bnck, of the Barony Church, Glasgow, and another minister once spent a vacation in Cumberland, and on the Sabbath attended a little Scotch kirk, sitting in a remote corner, so that the minister should not notice them. But the eagle eye of the minister detected them, and in the intercessory prayer he so expressed himself as to make quite snre of some aid from them. The good man's words were these: "Lord, have mercy on thy ministering servants who have popped in upon us so unexpectedly; one of them will preach in the afternoon and the other in the evening."—The Christian Work and Evangelist.

The tourist had called to pay his respects to the president of South American republic. "I am addressing the president, believe," he said. "I think so," was the reply, "but I am not sure. I was the president, but have been asleep for the last hour, and can't tell what has happened."

Event and Comment.

It is reported that the Cuban government has put such a high tax on liquor as to drive the liquor dealers out of business.

Geronimo, once the dreaded Apache chieftain, is now an humble and consistent member of a Reformed Church mission in Florida. And yet there are still people who doubt the power of God unto salvation.

It was rather disappointing to the believers in the influence of the press that a majority of sixty thousand people in New York voted for the candidates that every paper in New York except one opposed. But then what becomes of the influence of the pulpit? For the pulpits were unanimously on the losing side.

Who said anything about the ministerial deadline? The minister who is alive never crosses it. Too many cross it while they are yet very young. Here is the great Tremont Temple, Boston, after trying almost every young and middle-aged man in the Church, settling on Dr. P. S. Henson, of Brooklyn, who is seventy-three years young.

We cannot forbear mentioning, as a faithful chronicler of the news of the churches, that the Rev. M. A. Matthews, D. D., formerly of Gordon University, "maintains eighteen actively working committees in his large and vigorous church, one of which is a sea committee." It supplies "all ships leaving the port with literature." The Matthewsian style is still evident and unmistakable.

The Synod of Ohio is agitating the question of the frequency of divorce and calls the attention of its ministers to the rule of the last Northern General Assembly, forbidding Northern Presbyterian ministers to perform the marriage ceremony for a divorced person, unless it be the innocent party, and urges the revision of the divorce laws of the State, so that divorce itself, except for adultery and abandonment, should be forbidden.

Dr. Torrey continues his successful evangelistic work in England. In Liverpool, a hall seating 3,500 people was filled to overflowing every night, and it is announced that some 40,000 people have made a decision for Christ. It is interesting to note that this is quite a contradiction to Rev. John Watson's recent article in the British Weekly, that the coming revival would not be the reaching of individuals, but a sort of social uplifting.

According to The World Today, Governor Garvin, who has twice performed the miracle of being elected Governor of Rhode Island on a Democratic platform, is a graduate of "a Friend's School in Greensboro, N. C." That explains everything. The number of Tar Heels who leave their native State because competition is too strong for them there and win fame where they have not so many rivals to contend with is legion.

The Interior tells a story of a Southern man who burnt up his magnificent mansion for fear it would fall into the hands of the Yankees, and that the Yankees showed no disposition to disturb the property and did not even cross the river that bounded his plantation. And the Interior never saw that the reason they did not was that the place had been burned. Any other theory would be unanimously contradicted by the experience of Virginia, Georgia and the Carolinas, to say the least.

The Church Standard of Philadelphia speaks of former Mayor Van Wyck of New York as being as honorable a gentleman as any of his abusers. We knew that he was a Southern man and suppose now that he had the additional advantage from the point of view of decency of being an Episcopalian. But all the same his administration was a woeful failure.

As long as Dr. Parkhurst is an example of the Presbyterian pulpit of New York we suppose we can hardly make for that pulpit the claim that the Church Standard does for its own denomination: "The behavior of the Episcopal clergy in New York in the late election seems to have been generally exemplary. They impressed on citizens the duty of voting; some of them referred with great earnestness to the moral issues which they believed to be at stake; but, so far as we have been able to learn, there was no violence, no frenzied rhetoric, and none of the factitious hysteria which overflowed from many other pulpits, and, as we firmly believe, turned thousands of voters away from the support of the fusion party."

When a man has Calvin anywhere in his name it at least bespeaks an ancestry that had some appreciation of religion with a backbone in it. The Rev. Calvin A. Duncan, of the Synod of Tennessee, has written a letter to the Interior entitled, "A Plea for Racedivided Presbyteries," that does not leave anything for the other side to say, because it is the truth and the whole truth. Briefly, he makes the points that the color line is already practically drawn in the local churches; tells how seldom he saw a negro in the white Presbyterian churches of the North; that the Presbyteries in the two Synods of Catawba and Atlantic are almost solid black, and that Presbyterian separation has been proved to be best for both white and black. He declares that there is no enthusiasm for colored evangelization in the border states of Missouri and Kentucky and for the reason that the Northern Church has heretofore forbidden the formation of white and colored Presbyteries on the same territory. We may take it for granted that the Northern Church has come over to Southern ground on this question.

"It was said of old," says the Congregationalist, "that many an orthodox Calvinist preached like a Calvinist and prayed like an Arminian." Our esteemed contemporary has got the old proverb exactly backwards. It said that an Arminian might preach Arminianism, but when he got on his knees he became a Calvinist. It is rather difficult to enter the Divine Presence as a petitioner for grace, for one's self or for others, and magnify the theory of free-will to the exclusion of the Divine sovereignty. We recall once a Methodist minister by the name of Bray. The name was fixed by the circumstance, that by an unfortunate twist of the tongue we said to him, at the close of a theologian's Calvinistic disquisition, "Brother Pray, will you Bray?" Well, he had been a little restless under the crude statement of the doctrine that he had heard, and he tried to correct it in his prayer. There are a great many expository prayers, that tell the Lord just what a man's theology and metaphysics is. Brother Bray prayed that the Lord would enable those sinners to "work out their own salvation." But you see he gave his case away as soon as he went to the Lord about it and asked for a Divine interference with the freedom of the will. The Congregationalist doubtless sees its error. It is right hard to pray Arminianism except in the strictly expository manner, when one merely thanks the Lord that he believes so and so, and leaves the congregation wondering why he is so grateful for that particular form of faith.

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

The South's Misrepresentatives. There is a curious state of mind in the other sections of the country concerning the South, owing doubtless to a regrettable ignorance not un-mixed with a more regrettable prejudice. This habit of mind comprehends the whole South in an accusation that sometimes should be brought against an infinitesimal minority or even against one man. When a crime is committed in the North or West, well-informed people in the South, whether their information comes from travel or from reading the papers, do not classify the whole people as criminal. When some nine days' wonder of a sensation-alist explodes with his little theory, we do not suppose that this represents the mental or moral attainments of a whole section. We can poke a little fun at those ill-bred fashionable women that disgraced themselves by their curiosity at the Goelet wedding the other day in New York. Yet we do not suppose that the decent people of that city were in that mob. But if such a thing could have happened in Atlanta or New Orleans it would have been instantly taken as representative of the South and numerous would have been the editorial homilies upon the state of civilization among us. We are at a loss how to account for this, unless there be still some uneasiness of conscience about the treatment of the South before, during and after the civil war, for which any evidence of Southern barbarism or ignorance afforded the salve of partial justification. And all this is suggested by the fact that the Literary Digest has seen fit to exploit Dr. J. B. Mack and John Temple Graves in their unique views of the origin and destiny of the negro race.

As long as the discussion was confined to the columns of the Atlanta Evening News nobody cared. The author had found a publisher, the publisher had discovered an author. That was cause at least for mutual congratulation. The subject to be debated was the "Unity of the Human Race," with special reference to the question whether the negro race is descended from Adam or not, with incidental inquiry as to the nationality of Cain's wife.

But when the views of this "well-known Presbyterian clergyman of South Carolina" are published in the Literary Digest with the comment from another Northern periodical that it is a "curious revelation of the mental and moral progress of the South, that it would be necessary to go back to the days of Cotton Mather and of witchcraft in the North to find anything to match it"—we think it is time to protest against such misrepresentation of the South.

In the first place not every one understands that the religious department of the Literary Digest is very largely occupied with the exploitation of freaks. The editor of the Standard figured there once as a defender of John Calvin. If any one announces a novel and untenable view, or one that appears so to the editor, it is pretty apt to find a place in those columns. The number in which the above mentioned discussion is imbedded begins the religious department with the question whether or not Christ were indeed a carpenter. It is almost necessary for an article on a religious theme to be undigested and generally for it to be indigestible to find a place in the columns of the Literary Digest. Dr. I. K. Funk, the editor, is the kind of Christian that staggers at the miraculous in the New Testament, but is pretty well persuaded that the spirit of Henry Ward Beecher revealed to him where a borrowed scarabaeus, or something of that kind, was to be found.

And we desire to take issue with Dr. Mack when he asserts that "many and an increasing number of our people believe that the negro is a separate and inferior creation." We doubt very much that there are many who believe that, and doubt that their number is very much increased by reason of the recent discussion.

Dr. Mack's arguments in behalf of these numerous folks who think this way, though not avowedly in his own behalf, are based upon the accuracy of Archbishop Ussher's chronology. For example these mythical Southerners "assert that Babylon had an organized government and system of religion 7,000, B. C.; while Adam was created only 4,000, B. C. If this Babylon thing is true, then we must give up either our Scripture chronology or the unity of mankind."

Fortunately we have to give up only the Ussher chronology which we honestly believe is not accepted by a single scholar in the world today. Dr. Mack has gotten rather liberal, as compared with his reputation as a heresy-hunter, in a certain historic controversy of the Southern Church, some years ago, but his holding on to Archbishop Ussher belongs to the palaeozoic period.

And the thing is mischievous in its tendency. Whatever John Temple Graves or Dr. Mack may have discovered in the text that says that God has made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, the command of Christ is plain enough, to preach the gospel to every creature, to make disciples of all nations. There are a few fools in the South and many in the North who want to elevate the negro beyond his capacity. There are many more in both sections who have not a sufficient regard for the fact that he has an immortal soul, and that God requires his blood at our hands if we are unfaithful in our duty to him. There is too much tendency now to degrade the negro to the level of the brute in the reaction from the other extreme. What we need, and what we especially need from ministers of the gospel, is the appeal to the white race to give the gospel to the negro race. Whatever men may believe about Adam, it is just as hard to prove the descent of the Germanic peoples from him as that of the Ethiopians, according to Dr. Mack's premises. And Jesus Christ died for the sins of men, whether men be Greeks or barbarians, bond or free.

We are not able, of course in this protest to repair all the damage that has been done, but we should like for our Northern exchanges to note the fact that John Temple Graves represents only himself among Southern editors, that Dr. Mack represents only himself among the Southern Presbyterian ministry, and that we herewith make this challenge, which will reach nearly all of the latter, that if any of them believe with Dr. Mack that the negro is an inferior creation, he may telegraph the news to us at our expense.

Dr. Mack's other argument is an a priori one. He says:

Our Duty to the Negro. "If a man, is he (the negro) descended from Adam and thus our unfortunate brother, or is he of an inferior creation?"

"If our unfortunate brother, then every instinct of nature and grace demands that we raise him to an equality with ourselves. We should so educate him that he can properly vote with and hold office over us."

The instincts of nature and the principles of grace are sometimes contrary, the one to the other, that is among the sons of Adam. (Dr. Mack intimates that the negro may not have that disadvantage). But the principles of grace work by principle and not by rule. They teach us to do the kindest thing and the wisest thing for our "unfortunate brother." If by an "equality with ourselves" Dr. Mack means that we should try to elevate the negro race, mentally, morally, spiritually, to the highest possible plane, the answer is that we should, and by all means in our power. If he can be educated to the point of using the suffrage wisely, certainly no one but a fool would hesitate to give him that education. As to his holding office over us as we do now over him, that question can be settled when the other question of whether the negro race will ever learn to use wisely the first privilege of self-government, the right of the suffrage. Apparently now, the kindest thing that we can do our unfortunate brother is to deny him both, for his good as well as our own.

But the idea of excusing our own neglect of the negro's mental and moral and spiritual development on the ground that he may be of a different creation and that therefore it is wrong to educate him as ourselves, seems to us to be a mighty poor salve to the conscience. The point in the story of the Good Samaritan was that the rescued and the rescuer belonged to alien races.

As to permitting him to enter our homes, most of us in the South do. But entering our families means a crossing of the races that is abhorrent to the instincts of nature. When we talk of social equality we mean social separation. Such an entrance into our homes as means an entrance into our families, would be wrong. God has drawn a line in black and white between the two races. Our refusal to cross that line does not mean that our brother in black is not our brother. On the same ground we can excuse ourselves concerning the salvation of the Yellow race and the Brown race and cut the nerve of Foreign Mission work everywhere. Any new theory of Old Testament genealogy might upset New Testament commands to preach the gospel.

And we herewith press the point that we are bound to the negro race by the ties of a common origin and a common destiny. We have traveled so far from the common origin that we have developed our own peculiar race characteristics. But we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ. There are thousands of negroes whom the gospel of Christ has made earnest, sincere Christians. In this favored land they ought to be numbered by the millions instead of by the thousands. And while we are theorizing as to their position as an inferior creation, the millions here and in Africa are without the saving gospel of Christ. That gospel has solved many a problem. Suppose we make a real, honest effort to give the negro race the gospel and see what will become of the problem. After the white man and the black man are become the faithful followers of the Lord Jesus, we have an idea that when they get together to study the "problem," it will not be there

Eucharistical.

Thou crownest the year with thy goodness. Thou visitest the earth and waterest it with showers; Thou blessest the springing thereof.

O my soul, forget not all his benefits, who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases, who redeemeth thy life from destruction, who crowneth thee with loving kindness and tender mercies.

For the life that thou hast spared unto this day of praise; for health that courses through our veins; even for the sickness and the pain that brought thee near to us; for breath of heaven's free air, for water, satisfying thirst as living water doth the thirsting soul; for food and covering; for shelter from the heat and from the cold and from the rain; for simple comforts of this earthly life—we thank thee, Lord.

For love that is the joy and crown of life; for homes of purity and happiness and peace; for loved ones spared yet to our love and care; for loved ones safe with thee and waiting us—we give thee thanks, O Lord.

For work that may be done to thee and service that is helpful to the world; for rest restoring tired limbs and brain, and changing weariness to energy; for hope of that high service to which thou shalt call thy people at the last, and of that rest that evermore remaineth unto them—we praise and biess thy name.

For thy loving favor, for thy guarding care; for shielding us and giving us the victory; for patience and forgiveness when we fell; for consciousness of thine inspiring presence; for comforting assurance of thy love; for chastening that was lighter than our fault; for light afflictions that work out for us far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory—we bow our knees before the Father of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

For hope of life eternal; of being evermore with thee, the Lord; of greeting loved ones at the gate of heaven; of joining in that hallelujah song that beateth like the ocean at the base of Jesus' throne—we worship and adore thee evermore.

May we, thy children, not forget the helpless and the needy at our gate. For inasmuch as we do minister to those whom thou commendest to our care we do it unto thee. May we not wound thee by our selfishness, but as thou hast bestowed thy bounty and thy love, may we, with loving hearts and grateful praise, bring joy to the bereaved and desolate.

The Time of Thanksgiving.

There's a purple light on the rugged hills,
 There's a song of winds in the leaf-flown trees,
 And sweet, ah, sweet, through the country-side,
 The wild winds croon of Thanksgiving-tide.
 Speed on, O winds, to the busy town,
 Speed on, again, to the farthest sea,
 And flow into song waves—chanting clear,
 "The time of Thanksgiving draweth near."

There's a light of stars in the purple skies,
 There's a song of waves on the sandy shores,
 And soft and sweet where the foam flecks ride,
 The lithe waves sing of Thanksgiving-tide.
 Shine out, kind stars, on our absent ones,
 And murmur, waves, to the listening shores,
 And flow into song-tides, chanting clear,
 "The time of Thanksgiving draweth near."

There's a spirit-song in the tranquil air,
 There's an anthem's ring in the passing breeze,
 And e'en where our loved lie, side by side,
 The late flowers sing of Thanksgiving-tide.
 "They are ris'n," say the flow'rs, "from their haunts of clay,
 In that far, sweet land, by the crystal sea,
 Their Thanksgiving keep they, grand and free."
 —Selected.

This pathetic little story of a blind girl is told by Jan Maclaren in an American magazine: "If I dinna see"—and she spoke as if this were a matter of doubt and she were making a concession for argument's sake—"there's naeboddy in the Glen can hear like me. There's no a footstep of a Drumtochty man comes to the door but I ken his name, and there's no voice out on the road that I canna tell. The birds sing sweeter to me than to anybody else, and I can hear them cheeping to one another in the bushes before they go to sleep. And the flowers smell sweeter to me—the roses and the carnations and the bonny moss-rose—and I judge that the oat-cake and milk taste the richer because I dinna see them. Na, na, ye're no to think that I've been ill-treated by my God, for if he didna give me ae thing, he gave me mony things instead. And mind ye, it's no as if I'd seen once and lost my sight; that might ha' been a trial, and my faith might ha' failed. I've lost naething; my life has been all getting."

The only way to get thanksgiving into its true place in our lives is to have it become a habit. A habit is a well-worn path. There was a first step over the course, breaking the way. Then a second person, finding the prints of feet, walked in them. A third followed, then a fourth, until at length there was a beaten path, and now thousands go upon it. One who has been lacking in gratitude gets a new impulse, and one day is really grateful for a few moments. The impulse continues, and again he lets his life flow toward gratitude. Persisting in the disposition, his heart returns again and again to its gladness, until by and by it has been lured altogether away from the old beaten paths of discontent, discouragement, and unhappiness, and runs always in the ways of gladness.—J. R. Miller.

To fail to attain our ideals is not a wicked or shameful thing. Our highest ideals are still far in advance of our attainment, and will always be in this present life. It is only wicked and shameful to accept our failures as final, and to cease from all further effort to attain. Indeed, our failures are meant to teach us much which otherwise we could not learn. And they are the best guarantee of ultimate success.

"What I essayed to be
 And was not, comforts me."

It comforts us because it shows us that we are meant for more than we have realized. And it assures us that we have something yet to live for. This sort of failure is good for us.—Speer.

David's Charge to Solomon

I Chron. 28-1-10.

Nov. 29, 1903

Towards the close of his life David was greatly interested in building the temple at Jerusalem. Forbidden to build it himself and informed that it should be built by Solomon his son, he prepared abundant material for the structure. But it was necessary not only to provide material for the temple but to enlist the co-operation of the nation in this important enterprise. Hence David assembles the representatives of the tribes, that he may instruct them as to the Divine will, and their own duty. He gathers the princes of Israel, the officers of the army and the stewards of substance, that he may urge their cordial and vigorous co-operation in this important work.

I. Mark the Divine Choice.—David first directs attention to the Divine will manifested in their national affairs. He tells them that God had forbidden him to build the temple because he had been "a man of war and had shed blood." He affirms that "God had chosen Judah to be ruler" and himself to make him king over Israel. He also declares that God had chosen Solomon from among his sons to sit on the throne of Israel, and that He had appointed this son to erect the temple. He furthermore assures them that God purposes to establish Solomon's kingdom forever "if he be constant to do my commandments and judgments." By thus showing the Divine will as illustrated in their national history, David encourages Israel's leaders to be zealous in aiding Solomon in this appointed work.

II. David's Charge to Israel's Leaders.—In view of their being the Lord's servants and the executors of His will David enjoins upon the representatives of the people, their solemn obligations. He urges them to "seek the commandments of the Lord." They were to strive to know the revealed will of God and this is the duty of all his professed servants. We are to use all known means for learning what God requires of us, and any indifference in this direction is criminal. Hence we are commanded to "Search the Scriptures" and if wilfully ignorant we are guilty before God. David also directs the leaders not only "to seek but to keep the commandments of Jehovah." They must not only know, but obey the revealed will of God. The same is true of ourselves. The king furthermore intimated that obedience to God or "seeking and keeping the commandments of the Lord" brings its own reward. He tells his people that their possession of that good land and transmitting it as an inheritance to their children, depended upon their obedience. In like manner, our retention of blessings and leaving them as a heritage to our children, are contingent upon our complying with Divine requirements.

III. David's Charge to Solomon.—Having acquainted his officers with their duty and enforced its performance the king gives a public charge to his son. He urges him "to know the God of his father." A knowledge of Jehovah's nature, perfection and will is essential to all acceptable worship and service. He exhorts Solomon to "serve the Lord with a perfect heart and with a willing mind." God requires a loving and willing service. David incites to the proper knowledge and service of God, by asserting His heart-searching character and affirming His perfect understanding of all man's thoughts. He also tells his son "If thou seek Him He will be found of thee, but if thou forsake Him He will cast thee off forever." He finally reminds Solomon that the Lord had chosen him to build the temple and had thus conferred on him a greater honor than wearing an earthly crown. His last injunction is "Be strong and do it."

A Mission Study of India.

[This reached us too late for our last issue.]

Zech. 8:1-8.

Topic for Nov. 29.

Mission workers have always had a hard time in India. They have had so many things to work against which the missionaries in other lands have not had to contend with. It is generally supposed that because English rule obtains in India, the Christian missionaries would have more protection, and because of the large number of British living in the country, we naturally think that our missionaries are not cut off so much socially from friends as in the other lands; but in both these matters we make a serious mistake. The following is an abstract from the letter of an official in India to a friend in this country who gives the true facts in the case:

"I dare say you would like to have a description from an official standpoint of India society more or less with regard to missions. I do not think that you or any of the people at home can have any idea of the difficulties and disadvantages under which missionaries labor through the action of their fellow countrymen in India. A missionary, as such, is outside the pale of European society in India (society being spelled with a big S.) The result is that he has, as a rule, to make up his mind to be looked down upon by the majority of Europeans he meets. This is curious and may seem unlikely, but it is a fact, and the thing of all others which I admire about missionaries is the way in which they accept that fact, and give up all things literally, for the sake of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The longing after European society must sometimes be terrible—placed as I am I can realize that; and to have so many Europeans round about who will not associate with, and have absolutely no sympathy for, missionaries, must be to the missionary a very severe trial. This is looking at it from the point of the missionary as it affects himself. Looked at from the point of his work it is even more distressing. How can we expect the natives to respect and admire missionaries when they see them treated thus by Europeans in office? They naturally argue that the Christian is a low-caste man who is disregarded by his own countrymen, and whom therefore they are also at liberty to treat as they like, and missionaries have, I know, to undergo treatment from natives which the natives would never dare to use to any of us officials.

"Another great stumbling-block in the way of missions which I see as an outsider, is the action of Government. Government sets up to be impartial—not to favor any religion. The result of this is that it actually handicaps Christianity terribly in its combats with heathenism. The natives argue and very naturally, too, that if our religion were the true one, Government would teach the Bible in the schools and aid missions—in fact, one native asked me why it was, if England really believed in Christianity, the Government did not send out missionaries. The native therefore argues that the English people do not believe in Christianity, and I must say that the action of many English in India gives strength to the view. However, we can all rest on one grand truth, a fact that we can never doubt—namely, that God reigns, that Jesus Christ died for the world and is bound to win it to Himself. What a grand thing it is to know we are bound to win! No matter what mistakes may be made by His feeble followers here He is directing all; He knows exactly the best time and the best methods. The question for us is, shall we share the glory or let others reap it? The missionary undoubtedly has a hard time. He is like his Master, 'despised and rejected of men,' and 'acquainted with grief.' The missionary gives up friends, home, country, everything for Christ, but he will have his reward.

"There is not a single feeling on earth more pleasure-able than to know that God has used one to point some poor wretch lost in worship of devils, to the true Savior."

What the Heroes of Faith Teach Us.

Heb. 11:1-40.

Topic for Dec. 6.

The one great underlying fact about the lives of those who have been the children of God who have done most in the world, is that they have all had great faith. It is not strange that faith should be the agent in accomplishing so much. It was its opposite which lost Eden to our first parents and entailed sin upon the human race. It is therefore natural that the exercise of great faith should be that which pleases God, and altogether logical that it should be the connecting link between humanity and God in the divine plan of salvation. In the Old Testament we are sometimes astonished to read long narratives of men who did not attract such great attention to themselves in any other line, but who exercised great faith. The writer to the Hebrews gathers together in this eleventh chapter a great catalogue of names of people who in many cases are as unlike each other as it is possible to imagine and yet who exhibited a sameness in that they were all people whose faith rose high in the midst of their fellowmen who were often groping in the darkness of unbelief.

We notice then as we study the accounts of these heroes of the faith which are recorded for us in the Sacred Writings that their faith made them dare a great many very hard, and from man's standpoint, impossible things. For instance, it was a tower in faith that made Noah attempt to build an ark for the saving of life upon the earth. It was hard to go ahead day by day building that great unwieldy craft, while as yet the sun was shining and no cloud flecked the sky, and yet Noah's faith made him not only undertake this gigantic task, but kept him at it day after day for long years. How, when the ark was finished, could the animals be gotten in, must have often been the question in Noah's mind, and yet he had faith to believe that impossible as it seemed, God would provide the way. Then Abram's faith made him dare a great deal through his long, eventful life, and Jacob, and Joseph and Moses and the others in their turns attempted many things, relying on God's word. Then these heroes of the faith sacrificed much for their belief. Faith in God always makes one willing to sacrifice great things for the sake of God and His glory. A man or woman who trusts God just as far as the way is plain and short of the point of sacrifice, has not exhibited a faith that has any right to be mentioned along with those of whom we read in this eleventh chapter of Hebrews. Faith says, "Though He slay me yet will I trust Him." It is when we endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ that we have the most faith. It is not hard to trust God when everything is favorable, but when it leads to trial, suffering and real sacrifice for His sake, then it takes real faith. Then faith led these old patriarchs up to great triumphs. Had they not exercised trust in God they would never have accomplished the great deeds which are associated with their names. If we would learn of them how to accomplish great things and have great triumphs in life, we must like them have a faith that is stronger than any conditions or set of conditions that may arise in our pathway. When one is overcome because of the obstacles in the way, it is a sure proof that the obstacle is stronger than the faith in God. The faith of the heroes of this eleventh chapter of Hebrews had a faith that could not be measured by any counterforce that earth could supply. When obstacles arose their faith was like the stream which has been stopped up for a little while in its course; the stoppage only backs the water up and thus gives it greater force to sweep the obstruction away later. So also faith of the right sort grows amid difficulties and the very thing that for a time hinders it, but gathers up a power to sweep itself away. This is the faith that does great things.

Thanksgiving and the Orphans' Home

Some of the Buildings and Some of the Needs of an Institution Which Strongly Speaks for Itself.

THE THANK OFFERING. In making a thank offering three things are to be considered. First, the purpose to which it should be devoted; second, of what the offering should consist; and third, the amount of the offering.

In selecting the purpose to which your offering should be devoted, you are asked to consider the Orphans' Home at Barium Springs, N. C. Here one hundred and thirty-five fatherless children are provided for, and in a few weeks this number will be increased to one hundred and fifty. They are boarded, clothed, educated, exercised in manual labors, and carefully instructed in Bible truths—given that instruction and training best calculated to prepare for life's duties.

The best offering, if devoted to the care of the fatherless, is money, for here money answereth for all things and can be made to purchase a greater amount of such things as may be needed than can be bought for the same amount of money in retail trade, and freight will be saved. But when any article of food or material for clothing is in the hand of the donor and can be more conveniently sent than turned into money to be sent, it will be thankfully received and can be conveniently and advantageously used. The amount of the offering can be determined by a contemplation of the blessings received during the year from the hand of the Father of the fatherless. The thank offerings made on the day of the national thanksgiving are assigned especially for the current expenses in the support of the orphans, but if any wish to devote an offering to something of a more permanent and enduring character, attention is called to the need of money to complete the Alexander Industrial Building, which is to also contain the laundry. The building is to be finished and the machinery bought, requiring in all some $2,000.00. A furnace for the Howard Building is needed, and will cost $125.00. A steel tower and tank to supply water for cooking, bathing, sewerage and fire protection is needed; cost about $300.00. A house for our farmer, costing about $500.00, is also needed. And lastly a cottage for thirty needy and homeless boys pleading for a place in the Orphans' Home is greatly needed; cost $4,000.00. An opportunity to erect to the memory of a loved one a cenotaph more enduring than marble. I am happy to say that the furnishings for the rooms in the Anna Stamps Howard Memorial have already been promised.

Praying the richest blessings of the Father of the fatherless upon all who contribute to the relief of His wards,

R. W. BOYD, Superintendent Orphans' Home.

THE CARRIE BURROUGHS DULA MEMORIAL LIBRARY was erected by Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Burroughs, of the First Presbyterian Church, Charlotte, in memory of their only daughter. In this building are the Art Room, the Library and Reading Room and the Superintendent's office.

A Visit to Our Orphans' Home,

Having, at the late meeting of Synod at Wilmington, been elected a regent of our orphanage, at Barium Springs, I determined to put myself into sympathy with the work at the earliest possible moment. While in Charlotte a few weeks ago, I determined to give a morning to Barium Springs, and the two hours which I spent with our genial Superintendent were well repaid.

I said to him on arriving: "Brother Boyd, my time is short, put me in touch with the urgent needs of this institution," which I knew was what each Presbyterian in our Synod would wish to know.

He told me that the first thing one must see on coming to Barium Springs, was the children, which this lover of children said was the best sight they had for visitors, and that they and the teachers were in the chapel in Rumble Hall waiting for me. Here I found all the children and teachers assembled to see the young regent.

In this picture we have a view of the Art Room. It contains the paintings of the only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Burroughs.

The order of the children impressed me immediately and during my short stay I could see that the discipline was of the highest order. The marching to the class rooms was beautifully executed, and for the maintenance of such a splendid discipline over one hundred and thirty-five boys and girls, with such little friction, our superintendent and his able corps of assistants deserve the greatest praise.

A magnificent plant have we at Barium Springs; two hundred acres of orchard, garden, and farming land with nine elegant buildings, the total value of which is not less than $50,000. There is a fine opportunity, from every point of view, to make the grounds and buildings a magnificent and enduring monument to our Church.

The beautiful new memorial to a sainted wife, "The Anna Stamps Howard Home," which is a home for girls erected by the generosity of Judge Howard of Tarboro, is rapidly nearing completion and is a great addition to the campus. It meets a great need in providing an attractive home for thirty girls.

The Carrie Burroughs Dula library, which is a loving memorial to a daughter by devoted parents, is another one of the latest buildings, and will add much to the culture of the intellectual and aesthetic nature of God's children in our care.

As the writer walked over the campus and saw this building and that building, the gift of some generous and magnanimous spirit, he could not keep from thinking what a noble way to express one's love to a loved one, living or dead. And if we are going to erect any memorial to a dear one, is it not best to do it in such a manner as to benefit the living, (especially the orphans,) and through the great causes of the Church? In visiting Mt. Auburn cemetery at Cambridge, Mass., two summers ago, the writer reached the entrance just about forty-five minutes before the gates closed, a guide rushed up and offered to show the writer the most important graves of the noted dead; he was especially anxious to see the graves of Phillips Brooks, Longfellow, Lowell, and Agassiz, but asking, as he passed, to whom was this or that pretentious monument erected, the guide, a boy of fifteen, remarked rather significantly: "People who didn't do much have the finest monuments in this cemetery, but the great men have the modest tomb stones, sir," and it was as he said.

THE PRESENT URGENT NEEDS.

As to these, there are three that stand out pre-eminently.

First. The Alexander Industrial building, (where carpentry, shoemaking, printing will be taught, and the laundry will be done) simply has the roof on and not a particle of the work inside completed. On account of exposure last winter, because there was not sufficient funds with which to place the roof, the walls suffered, and crumbling bricks were seen in a few places. This building is much needed, especially the laundry part, for the girls are doing the work largely in the open air. It will take $2,000 to thoroughly equip this building for its purpose.

The second need is a home for the intermediate boys corresponding to the "Anna Stamps Howard Home" for girls. This is a pressing need as there are several applications for boys and no place to put them. We do not wish them to have to be sent to other orphanages when we are able and should provide for them ourselves: $4,000 will meet this need.

Our third need is for a reservoir. Unfortunately a few weeks ago the reservoir in rear of Rumble Hall tumbled down with a great crash, on account of decayed supports. The preservation of our property in case of fire demands this reservoir immediately.

I can not close this article without speaking of the consecration and devotion of our superintendent, the efficient teachers and matrons to these fatherless children, as we call them; but they are not fatherless for the Great God is their Father, and are not the cattle upon a thousand hills His? Does He not hold the seas in the palm of His hand? No, there are no children more truly His.

Our teachers at Barium Springs are serving the Home more for love and noble consecration to the work, than for money. They are all college-bred women, well qualified to teach in any school and demand good salaries.

At this season of the year when families are looking forward to reunion at Thanksgiving and Christmas, and thanksgiving is in the average heart more than at any other time, let us heed the words of the great apostle "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others."

ANNIE LOUISE COTTAGE.

Erected in 1892 by Mr. George W. Watts, Durham, N. C. This is the home of the baby girls.

There are in the great Synod of North Carolina something like 36,762 members of our Church. What a grand thing it would be if we could average $1 per member for the systematic support of this great work of our Synod which lies so near the heart of any man that has in it any sympathy at all!

We can reach this goal if each individual will do his or her part.

George H. Atkinson.

The Orphans' Home and the Training it Gives.

In nature the little bud which is to develop into a full-blown flower is seldom unprotected. It is usually covered with scales, thick and firm, which shield it from the cold winds and frosts of early spring. Like this is the protection which the Father of all throws around childhood in the family relation. But when the family relation no longer exists the very helplessness of childhood appeals for protection and care. The obligation of the Church to give to her youth loving care and Christian training is increased as the greater need arises. This is the basis of the Church's obligation to provide and maintain a "Home" for her homeless children.

The common argument with which is enforced the duty of popular education is this: The State cannot afford, for her own safety and future progress, to allow her children to grow up in ignorance and vice. The good citizen is the educated citizen. Patriotism, policy dictates popular education. Much more is the Church interested in the well-being of her children. Her future depends upon what they prove to be. Her homeless ones, above all others, need her special care and protection, her oversight and training. She must make for them a home, environ them with home influences, discipline and restraints, and train their minds and hearts and hands for her own safety and progress. In their behalf we have pledged to God our loving care, watchful oversight and faithful Christian training.

It is gratifying to know that this pledge is so faithfully kept at our Orphans' Home at Barium Springs.

During the past summer it was the privilege of my people in Laurinburg to entertain for a day or two a class of girls and boys from our Orphans' Home.

Their good manners, their gentlemanly and lady-like behaviour, the evidence they gave of loving, faithful training received, reflected great credit upon our Home and excited our pride in the institution we all love to help in maintaining. The duty of giving thanks is but half performed if it is forgotten to give occasion to others to be thankful also.

Our people should not and will not forget the cause of the fatherless.

John M. Rose.

Laurinburg, N. C., Nov. 18th, 1903.

Some of the First Fruits.

Having spent seven years of my life at the Presbyterian Orphans' Home I want to tell the Presbyterians of the State how much those years have meant to me. As each Thanksgiving season comes I feel that I want to offer special thanksgiving for having had the privilege of being at this Home. The influence for good that the Home has had on my life cannot be over-estimated. I feel this more each day of my life and honor and love the Home for it.

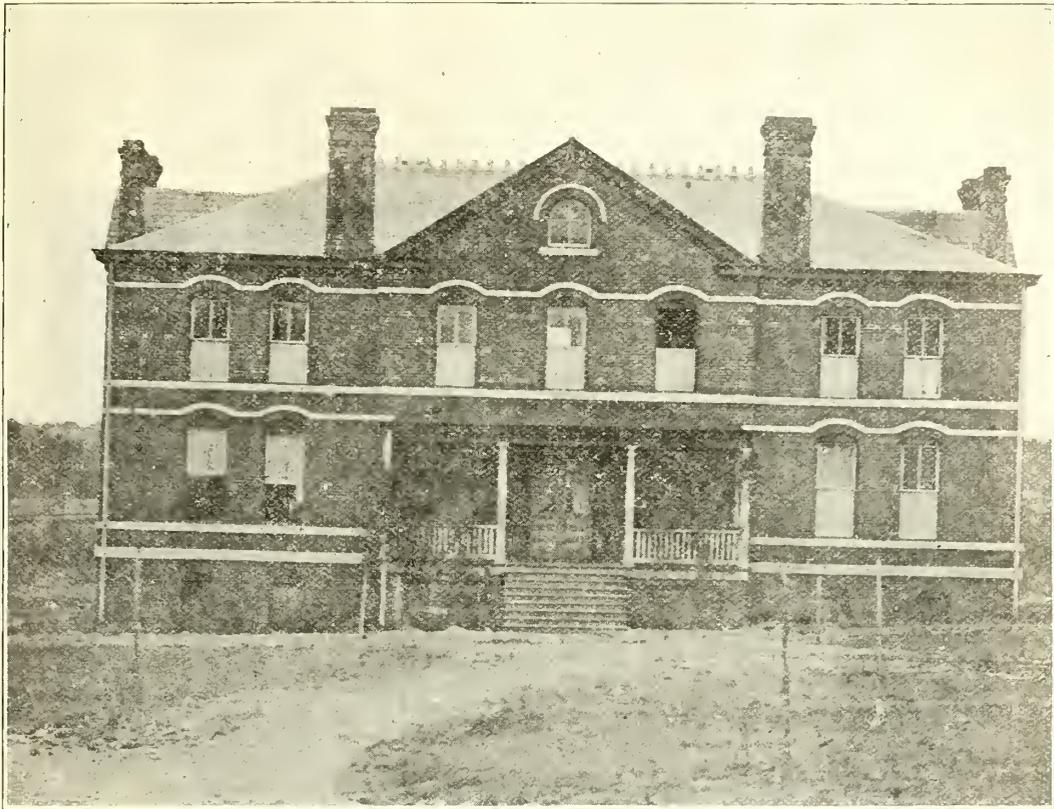

The educational advantages of the Home are as good as those of any graded school and I believe the religious training received at the Home surpasses that received by the majority of the children in our State. Morning and evening all are assembled for family worship, and the lessons learned there will never be forgotten. The Home life is beautiful. It is just like a large family and we all love our home and nothing gives us greater pleasure than to return for a visit.

Work for the Orphans' Home.

The Orphans' Aid Association is the name of a new organization formed last May among the men of our church. Its object is to strengthen the support fund of our Orphans' Home by regular and systematic giving, and the getting of this financial assistance from sources heretofore not reached. In most of our churches but one collection is taken, during the whole year, at the regular services, for the benefit of the Orphans' Home. A collection is taken once every month in

LEES COTTAGE is a gift from that generous friend of the orphan, Mrs. S. P. Lees, who lived in New York City. This cottage is occupied by the larger boys. It contains dormitory room for thirty boys. Temporarily the printing office is in this building many of our Sabbath schools for this cause, and while these collections are of inestimable value to the Home, they are not adequate. Conditions being thus, Mr. Boyd is compelled to constitute himself a standing committee on "Ways and Means" when he ought to be left free to devote his whole time to the perfecting of the Home and training of the children. Our system of collections does not bring this important cause before the men of our churches very often, and therefore they do not give to it as freely as they would if their attention was called to it more often. This defect our Association overcomes to a great extent. Our Association was the outcome of an agreement between two of our young men to give 25c a month each to Barium Springs Orphanage. It occurred to these young men that, if they were willing to give regularly to this cause, others would do the same. They began to ask other men to join them and in a few days the membership of the Association had grown from two to forty.

Every man approached readily consented to join the Association and several voluntarily asked that their names be put upon the roll, thus showing how near the heart of every man is the cause of our fatherless ones.

We have two collectors for the Association, the collections are made monthly and a check sent to Mr. Boyd about the 10th of each month. No member is asked to pay more than one month's dues at a time, nor is any member allowed to get in arrears. Thus the payments are made easy for our members and Dr. Boyd can depend upon a certain amount from us each month.

Several of our members have spoken of raising the dues from 25c to 50c a month. This has not been done yet, but it is likely that next year our members will be divided into two sections, viz: those who wish to pay 50c a month and those who feel that 25c a month is what they can afford to pay.

We consider this an admirable method of affording the men, especially those who do not attend Sabbath school, an opportunity for contributing to a cause that should stand near the head of the list of those needing financial assistance from our churches, but which is almost forgotten by many.

The formation of like associations in other churches would very materially strengthen the support fund of our Orphans' Home, and would remedy, to a great extent, the defects arising from spasmodic and unsystematic giving.

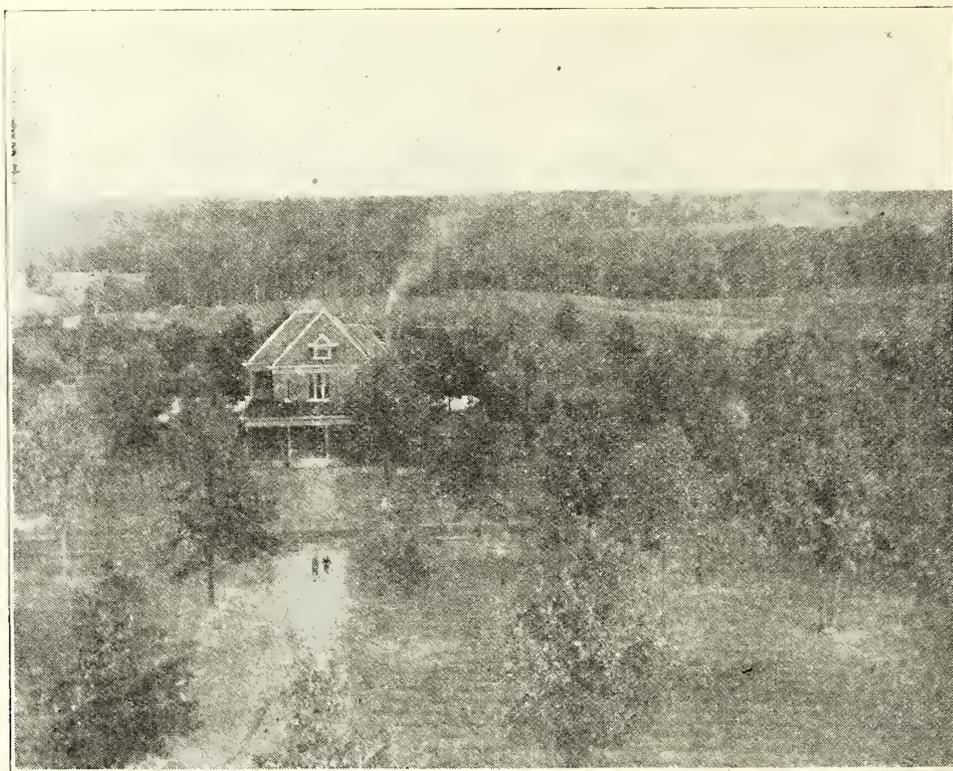

We will be glad to furnish any information in regard to our Association others may wish.

What the Work Does For the Workers,

For a number of years the Ladies' Aid Society of the Presbyterian Church at Goldsboro has been clothing one of the children of our orphanage at Barium Springs, and the benefit which this society has derived therefrom, cannot be reckoned, not counting the good to its dear charge. Those societies which have not yet undertaken this labor of benevolence, which will in due time grow into that of love, have only to begin this responsibility to realize its beneficence to themselves, which is more than two-fold. As members of the Church, as professing Christians, and kind, sympathizing fellow creatures, this orphanage should most strongly appeal to every one of us, impelling us to lend our aid to its support; this is surely a duty, outside of the joy of doing a kindly, noble deed. Let each church society select some child, and let each member of that society take some special interest in its charge; learn the child's name, its disposition, (a photo of the little one might stimulate the interest, and bring him or her nearer); remember the birthday, the Christmas tide, each mother thinking of her own dear one who may be away from home; let this little orphaned one feel that it has real, loving friends who care for it, who are interested in its pleasures, in its studies and progress, in the formation of its character, and of its future welfare, and ere long there will grow into each heart, with that of your precious charge, a union of trust and affection which shall be thrice blessed. The straightened exchequer of our orphanage will have somewhat been relieved, one of the little ones of the church made comfortable and happier, and each contributor towards this end enriched by the broadening of affection, and the addition of a lofty interest. Last Christmas some members of our Society sent our little orphan a box, filling a stocking with "goodies" (putting in its mate for future use), then adding various little gifts, toys, etc., left over, perhaps, from the abundant supply of their own little ones, and which cost so little money to send, so little of time or labor, and yet carrying so much pleasure to the recipient; who shall say how much happiness was reflected upon the senders! "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these . . . ye have done it unto me."

Giving to the Poor.

Rev. H. G. Hill, D. D.

Orphaned children may be classed as pre-eminently poor. They have lost their natural guardians. They have been deprived of all those home influences that mould character, and develop a ripe maturity. Their faculties are immature and utterly incapable of providing for their pressing wants, or securing their needful training. Those that give them relief and aid in their proper nurture discharge a sacred duty and perform an important work for society. Institutions, furnishing them homes and rearing them for good citizenship in Church and State, are among the most important known to a Christian civilization. Hospitals and asylums caring for the insane, the diseased, the maimed and the unfortunate, may mitigate suffering and possibly repair to some extent physical or moral wrecks. But Orphans' Homes, conducted on wise Christian principles deal with the young and the vigorous who may be rendered most valuable members of society. Such institutions should be liberally sustained, not only as safeguards against pauperism and crime, but as needful training schools for noble manhood and womanhood. Many motives prompt contributions to the poor. Some give from love for display, and some from love of human praise. Others succor the poor to promote temporal interests, or to secure, as they fancy, the pardon of sin and eternal salvation. But there are other and far more worthy incentives. We should give to the Orphans from pity for their exposed and needy condition. What class should excite in us a warmer compassion? We should aid them generously from gratitude to God for unnumbered blessings. This is a motive peculiarly appropriate to thanksgiving day. When we recall our own personal domestic, social, civil and religious benefits it is fitting that our grateful hearts should find expression in abundant gifts to the widow and the orphan. A wise regard for self-culture too should prompt gifts to the orphaned poor. Pity, benevolence, sympathy and mercy are among the most excellent qualities of our nature and he who will not cultivate these by exercise will never vanquish selfishness, nor reach the loftier heights of moral manhood. But the highest and most potent motive for helping the orphan is found in a supreme deference for the Divine will and in a sincere love for those whom Jehovah claims as peculiarly His own, when He proclaims Himself "The Father of the fatherless."

Remember the Orphans.

Of all the work done by the Church at the present time none is telling more for good, or indeed half so much, as the various Orphanages. Helpless little children left to struggle alone in this wicked world, how they appeal to our tenderest sympathy! What is Barium Springs doing for the Orphans under its sheltering care? It is giving a home in its truest sense; it is giving training, superior in all that tends to build up character and make useful citizens, to that which is given in most of our private homes; it is giving love and tenderness to each child, that makes them devoted to the home and its managers, and in addition to all this it is giving a fairly good education to every child. Let me tell you what it has done for our church. About ten years ago a widow was left in our midst with nine children, no one of them old enough to be self-supporting. The very weight of the burden seemed to paralyze her energies. Six of those children were sent to Barium. With the lightening of the burden the mother's energies revived and she was able to support, and by the help of friends, to educate the older ones, and in a few years they were able to help her. Those at Barium have all done well. Two of the girls are now making their own way in two of the best schools of the land, and one of the boys is in a good position as a machinist in a large establishment, North.

As to the training, I have yet to meet the person who has visited the home and not been delighted with the excellent management and have yet to meet the child reared at Barium who has failed to show the effect of that careful training.

THE PRINTING FORCE that gets out "Our Fatherless Ones" on a hand press.

What pretty table manners those little visitors had who went around among us last summer! Who of you, mothers, would not feel a little uneasy if you had sent your little boys and girls to visit among strangers under no restraint but their own sense of propriety? And how many home raised children would have come out with a prettier record than those children carried from every home they visited? And the prettiest thing about it was to see the genuine love that those little ones manifested for the sweet lady that had them in charge. A young man from Barium, now at college, was working this summer to pay his way next session. When explaining why he stopped his work and went away a week sooner than was necessary he said: "I am going to the Home and help Miss B— at the opening. She will have so much to do, and though she did not ask me to do it she said she would like to have me, and I know I could step right in and help her so much that I want to do it though I am sorry to lose a week's wages." I would like to say a word for those patient, hard working matrons. Just to think what it is to "mother" 30 children! Sundays and Mondays, dry days and rainy days, by night as well as by day. You mothers who are "nearly distracted" at the close of some rainy day with the noise and confusion that your own 5 or 6 children made, attending to their endless wants, answering their numerous questions. And then what a miserable pittance these good women get! I am not going to tell how little. It came to me incidentally. An efficient woman with experience gained in the Thornwell Orphanage was asked if she would go to Barium. On hearing what salary they gave she exclaimed, "Why, my dear child, that would hardly more than buy my shoe leather." Now whose fault is this? Not the regents. They fix these salaries, but according to the money sent in. But it is the fault of those Presbyterians who scarcely know that we have a Home for the fatherless, and of all of us who do not open our hearts and hands in this noble work. And it would be so easy to raise all the money needed to carry on the Orphan Home effectually, if all the 36,000 Presbyterians in our Synod would take a part in it. So again I say,

Remember the Orphans.

What Effort Will Accomplish.

My dear Standard:

Will you spare some small space to a Sabbath school superintendent who desires to "speak out in meeting," hoping thereby to induce other superintendents to make trial of the Synod's plan for Orphanage support?

My brethren, like some of you, I, too, was once a "doubting Thomas" and feared that if I devoted one Sabbath collection each month to the Orphan cause I would badly and unfairly cripple the other important causes we desired to help. The thing kept forcing itself on my mind, however, and appealed to me as so peculiarly children's work that, finally, with many misgivings, I determined to give it a faithful trial and so at least satisfy my conscience. I do not know how I can better show you the result than to give you a single comparative statement of "before and after taking." Figures are at times more eloquent than words. We have been contributing once each month to the Orphanage at Barium for three years now and I will compare these years with the three preceding years during all of which time I have been superintendent. The average yearly contribution to the Orphanage for the three years 1897-98-99—during which time we did not give monthly to this cause—was $17.33. The average yearly contribution to all other causes during these same years was $56.27.

The average yearly contribution to the Orphanage for the three years 1900-01-02—during which time we did give monthly to this cause—was $77.72. The average yearly contribution to all other causes during these three years was $87.32.

I can add nothing, I think, to the force of these figures. Suffice it to say we expect to stick to the monthly plan. God has blessed it to our good as well as to the good of the Orphanage. I make it a rule to keep the school informed of the causes to which they contribute and to give special notice of each Orphanage collection the Sabbath before and to the parents at the preaching service preceding the teaching (or school) service during which the Orphanage collection is taken. This adds to the interest and, I think, causes increased contributions.

Let me make a little calculation. Mr. Boyd reports a net shortage of $381.30 in the support fund for the past year. He also reports 104 churches (and certainly therefore, fully as many Sabbath schools) which gave nothing to this cause. Suppose these 104 Sabbath schools, averaging say, 20 scholars each, give monthly collections to the Orphanage of 30 cents per school per year (less than half we have averaged per scholar during the past three years). The Orphanage will receive $624 and the shortage will vanish.

Or suppose the 200 Sabbath schools which now contribute to this cause—but not monthly—will adopt the monthly plan and thereby increase their gifts to our Orphans more than four-fold. Or suppose—well suppose, my brother superintendents, you try this plan and let us hear from you. May be you will have more cause for thanksgiving next year.

Possibilities of the Orphan at Barium Springs

A thoughtful Christian cannot reflect upon the great possibilities offered a poor neglected orphan who finds an asylum at our beneficent Orphans' Home without having his heart stirred to enthusiasm. A father dies and leaves a poor struggling widow with a helpless brood of half-fed children. The mother perhaps soon sinks under her burden; bereft of both parents the cold charities of a selfish world have almost frozen the little flock out. They struggle on, the feeblest, maybe, sink into early graves. As the survivors continue the unequal struggle with cold, hunger and the depraving influences of evil associates, the sympathy of Christian friends is stirred. They seek and secure for them homes within the sheltering arms of our Christian Orphanage, and all is changed. The little brood comes in ill-clad, pale and pinched with poverty, cowed and timid under neglect, exposure and perhaps abuse. They find the warm hand of a gentle, sympathetic minister of Christ extended to grasp theirs and to draw them within his fold. Here refined, cultivated and pious teachers receive them into a delightful home. They are supplied good clothing, clean beds, wholesome food, salutary discipline and noble Christian training. They are blessed with exalted privileges under the divine blessing calculated to ensure their future usefulness and salvation from sin. They probably become well bred, high toned, men and women and for future generations not only transmit to their posterity the blessings which they have received, but they add their tribute to the measure of praise and adoration due the name of that blessed Savior of sinners who has redeemed us with his own precious blood.

Then shall not all of us, the disciples of Christ in the Synod of North Carolina, remember this great work and when we celebrate the day of Thanksgiving give liberally to perpetuate its beneficence and to widen its usefulness?

W. D. Morton.

Another Kind of Thanksgiving Gratefulness.

Again there comes with the Thanksgiving and Christmas seasons the thought of the lonely inmates of our own county almshouse whose hearts are positively hungry for some little word from your lips and mine, of interest and sympathy and love; for some "gude work for Jesus Christ." Shall it this year be left unspoken?

Again comes the thought of the prisoners in jail and in convict camp, needing Him so. Forgotten, it may be, in your own county! Reaching out to us through the bars and calling "come over and help us!"

Shall we heed their call or shall we "pass by on the other side?" Another voice speaks the voice of the dear Christ who cares for them. We must heed that voice. Through the stillness He is saying to you and to me in this work, not only at these seasons, but all the time, "Behold, I have set before thee an open door." Shall we enter, or shall we wait till it is forever shut?

The Year's Thanksgivings.

Psalm 71:14.

Lord of the changing year we come today
Within thy courts to praise and pray.
Nor word of ours, nor song can fitly tell
All that we owe, but they may swell
The tide of gratitude that flows to thee—
Accept them, Lord, and let them be
Our sacrifice continually.

We thank thee for the beauty thou hast spread
On every side and overhead;
For winter's frost and ice and sun-lit snow,
And the bold splendor that doth glow
In winter evening skies, while writing there
The truth that thou art everywhere!
For this we praise continually!

For greenth of springtime lavished on the fields,
For hope of future good it yields;
For the fair summer's wealth of fruits and flowers,
For song of birds, for restful hours;
For autumn's harvest and for hopes fulfilled
And e'en for idle wishes stilled—
We praise thee, Lord, continually!

For tender light of love in human eyes,
For hearts whose faithfulness we prize;
For full supply of grace; for answered prayers;
For promises that quell our fears;
For little chances to be kind and show
Thy weakest ones the love we owe—
We praise thee, Lord, continually!

And if some gifts thy wisdom hath withheld,
If at thy word we were compelled
To yield some treasure, or some joy forego,
Because we love thee, Lord, we know
'Twas for the best we were denied, and still
We gladly strive to do thy will
And praise thee, Lord, continually!

O. H.

A Thanksgiving.

For the wealth of pathless forests,
Whereon no ax may fall;
For the winds that haunt the branches;
For the young bird's timid call;
For the red leaves dropped like rubies
Upon the dark green sod;
For the waving of the forest,
I thank Thee, O my God!

For the sound of water gushing
In bubbling beads of light;
For the fleets of snow-white lilies
Firm anchored out of sight;
For the reeds among the eddies;
The crystal on the clod;
For the flowing of the rivers,
I thank Thee, O my God!

For the rosebud's break of beauty
Along the toiler's way;
For the violet's eye that opens
To bless the new-born day;
For the bare twigs that in summer
Bloom like the prophet's rod;
For the blossoming of flowers,
I thank Thee, O my God!

For the lifting up of mountains,
In brightness and in dread;
For the peaks where snow and sunshine
Alone have dared to tread;
For the dark and silent gorges,
Whence mighty cedars nod;
For the majesty of mountains,
I thank Thee, O my God!

Clarksville-Atlanta Question.

My only apology for this, my first written line upon the Clarksville-Atlanta Question, is self-defence, which is nature's first law, and the defence of those who have been unnecessarily abused for their position on this matter as stated by myself upon the floor of the Synod of Tennessee. I do not propose to discuss the legal side of the question—good and honest men and lawyers are on both sides. Nor do I propose to discuss the moral side—I give every one the right I claim for myself, to wit: the right to decide moral questions for himself in the light of his own conscience and the guidance of God's spirit without being stigmatized as "Airing his arrogance," without being condemned for entering voluntarily "a league with death and a covenant with hell," without setting myself up over him as his priest to dictate to him in matters of conscience. I shall not discuss the rights and powers of the Board of Directors and the controlling Synods, as I believe in the integrity and capability of both. But as to "the charge brought by the friends of the Atlanta movement that the professors are disloyal to the institution" I wish to enter a most positive denial of the fact. This charge has been brought only by those opposed to removal. I did state on the floor of Synod of Tennessee in Memphis that "only one of the professors in Clarksville is opposed to removal" and also that "nine out of ten of the faculty at Clarksville are in favor of the conference," but be it far from me to accuse my brother of being "disloyal" because he does not see through my glasses and speak through my mouth. We are willing to "witness the scene on the floor of the Synod at Memphis when such a charge was brought, and what was the 'scene?'" Simply interruptions from the opposing side which had been frequent already and which continued till the vote was taken. The pastor was there from Clarksville, his elder was there, and three of the faculty were there, and no denial was made of their position and no denial has till this day been made except of the misquotation made of the above statement by the press of Nashville. The authority of the statement was demanded and given. But Dr Alexander brands this exercise of free thought and expression of personal opinion as "disloyal" on their part and says: "If this is true, no wonder the pupils decrease." Can it be that he has been on the Board and did not know that the rapid decrease in pupils started at least three full years before this movement and more than as long before the professors were "disloyal?" What constitutes disloyalty to the institution—being on the other side from me? What constitutes disloyalty to the institution—holding conscientious convictions and expressing personal opinions concerning its future interests? What constitutes disloyalty to the institution—giving the very best service in their power, and supplementing their meager salaries by private teaching outside school hours? What constitutes disloyalty to the institution—supplying the Chancellor's chair by dividing its work up among them and doing it for about one-seventh or one-tenth the amount paid him for the same service? What constitutes disloyalty—supporting the unprovided Alumni chair by each one contributing every year to it from their petty amounts ranging as high as $43? What constitutes disloyalty to the institution—spending so-called vacations in travelling for students or sending out hundreds and hundreds of personal letters following up this canvass? Has our brother who is accusing these men made one tenth the sacrifice for this institution these men have? Some of them have declined other positions and one has three times larger salaries to stand by the S. W. P. U. Does he think it Christ-like to profess to read their hearts and judge them and brand them as "disloyal?" Will he join in the cry of the little paper issued occasionally over there in or around Clarksville somewhere that calls them "traitors?" And what will he call the noble faculty at Columbia? What will he call the great Synods of South Carolina and Alabama? What will he call the large minority in the Synod of Tennessee who voted for the conference, and the many others who voted on the other side and those who did not vote at all because they feared lawsuits but felt that the conference ought to be held? Is every man who regards the interests of our Southern Church as superior to the interests of Clarksville disloyal? Is every one who thinks that the Synods that created the Board greater than the Board they created in a "league with death and a covenant with hell?" Men and brethren, stop and think—can it be that all these elders and preachers whom God has called by his spirit into the sacred offices, and whom you so recently held in such high esteem have suddenly become "disloyal," "traitors," and these few alone of all the prophets have not bowed the knee to Baal?

Appeal for Re-enforcement for Mid-China Mission.

Hangchow, China, September 26th, 1903.

Rev. S. H. Chester, D. D.,

Secretary of Executive Committee of Foreign Missions.

Dear Brother: At the annual meetings of our Mission, it is our custom to take under consideration the condition of the field and the demands of the work, and to make an appeal for new missionaries according to our needs. At our recent meeting, it appeared that two full years have passed since the last ordained missionary joined our number, and nearly seven years since one previous to him arrived. The last single lady arrived nearly four years ago. So that recruits have been coming to us very slowly for a number of years. During this time, however, the work has been growing, and the demands on our time and strength have been constantly increasing. New and wide doors have been opened before us, but we have not had the force to press forward and enter in and take possession of them. We have found it hard simply to hold our ground and maintain the work already begun in most of our stations, while in some we have been compelled to take a retrograde step and give up, for the present at least, positions of advantage already occupied.

This is especially true of Hangchow. In last April, we had to give up Mr. Caldwell to go to Kiangyin, where only one man was left in charge of an immense work. Then since our last mission meeting, two physicians have pronounced Mr. Painter utterly unable to continue work and ordered him to leave the field immediately. This leaves only two men in charge of the extensive field of this station, embracing about three hundred communicants, nine preaching places, and four native preachers. These two men feel utterly unable to take proper care of the work now thrust upon them. The younger one has been in feeble health for several years, and there are grave fears that any increase of work may prove disastrous to him. The older one has reached an age when ordinary prudence suggests that some one ought to be in readiness to take the place which in the nature of things may be made vacant before long.

In view of these circumstances, our absolute and immediate needs demand at least one ordained missionary for Hangchow, and at least one more for the enlargement of the work. We appeal to our executive committee, and, through them, to our beloved church to come to our help, and to send forward the men absolutely needed to enable us to hold the positions we have already occupied and to keep the work going which has already been begun.

We write to you, young men, because you are strong, and we urge you by the stress of our need to come out and help us. We offer you a field for work where all your powers and talents can find scope for exercise without limit; and we give you a share in reaping a harvest which promises to be the richest and the grandest that ever has been or ever can be gathered in by the Christian Church to the end of time.

May the Lord of the harvest thrust many laborers forth into His harvest.

Yours fraternally,

J. L. Stuart,

On behalf of the Mid-China Mission.

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

If the definition that James gives is correct, that pure religion may be known by its remembrance of the orphans, this is a religious number of the Standard. In spite of the number of the articles on the Orphan Question there is so much variety in the themes discussed, and the illustrations break the monotony of the pages so handsomely that we are sure the readers will not find any objection to the Thanksgiving Issue on that account.

The Clarksville Atlanta Question is ably argued and Dr. Stuart's Appeal for Re-Inforcements is an inspiring one, coming from the field of battle and from the very thickest of the fight.

And we wish to call attention, lest any should by any chance pass over it, to that beautiful psalm of thanksgiving by O. H.

PERSONALS.

Rev. D. Clay Lilly is now in Edinburgh, Scotland, where he has gone for a year's study.

Rev. W. D. Morton has been assisting Rev. R. W. Hines in a series of meetings at Mebane, N. C.

Dr. and Mrs. Len. Moore, of Mecklenburg County, N. C., have been granted a furlough and will shortly leave China for a visit to North Carolina.

Friends of Dr. David McBryde, a prominent officer in the Maxton, N. C. Presbyterian Church, will be grieved to hear of his death on the 19th inst.

Rev. W. A. Murray, of Lincolnton, N. C., was married to Miss Rebecca Bridges, of Hancock, Md., on the 11th inst., and Rev. Donald McIver, of Wadesboro, N. C., to Miss Pauline Russell, of Gulf, N. C., on the 18th inst., both thereby adding to their fitness (according to the Apostolic idea,) as bishops.

Rev. H. F. Williams, editor of the Missionary periodicals at Nashville, will leave on Thanksgiving evening for Cuba, for the two-fold purpose of visiting our mission there and recuperating. He is enabled to take this trip through the kindness of a friend and his many other friends hope that great benefit will come to him from this outing.

GEORGIA.

SYNOD OF GEORGIA

When you attend the Synod of Georgia at Brunswick, go a day in advance. You will find Brother Walden, Sydnor and Searight, have done the same. After a substantial and palatable breakfast in the Oglethorpe Hotel, at the expense of other parties, you will put on your old clothes, if you have been thoughtful enough to bring them with you, if not you will borrow an old overcoat from Brother Hollingsworth, and then go down to the wharf where you engage a venerable colored uncle to take you in his boat, to furnish bait and fishing-tackle, and away to where the fish are hungry and waiting for you. Brother Walden will tell you the name and habits of all the fish, whose acquaintance you are liable to form, and just where and how you are to catch them, interspersing history, after the manner of fishermen from the days of Jonah, of remarkable catches in which he has figured as principal hero. While he is giving out this valuable information you are watching your cork with eager interest. By and by it begins to bob, you tighten your grip on the pole, under it goes, a quick jerk, you give a tremendous pull, and there it is, dangling about your ears, a flip-jack about two by four inches! You repeat this performance thrice or four times, during which Dr. Walden is dragging his cork about and splashing the water with his pole, to fool the fish into thinking that he has something peculiarly nice for them. About this time, Brother Sydnor pulls in a flounder, and supposes he has landed only half of a fish that by some mischance has fallen to pieces. Then comes the crowning sensation, Brother Searight lands the very first fish that it has ever been his pleasure to take. The little boy with his first red-top boots is not a circumstance. One, two, three, four hours glide swiftly by, the gentle rays of the southern sun falling on the smooth expanse of water, the beautiful city in the distance, quiet and lazy, as if dreaming, a line of tall, tapering masts stretching along the harbor, an open space to the south, inviting the imagination out to the ocean that rolls away to kiss the far-off shores of Spain—a picture to stir the most sluggish soul. Dr. Walden falls under its fascinating spell, permits his cork to remain in one place long enough for the fish to find his bait, and now joins in the sport. Uncle Tom has not heard it thunder for many years. Dr. Walden is the only one of the party who can converse with him, and the result is that he soon thinks that Dr. Walden is the proprietor of the whole country, or at any rate, that he ought to be. You give the whole catch of fish to Uncle Tom, and as you do not wish to burden his old back too heavily, you stop short off about the middle of the afternoon. This, in brief, is the way to go to Synod at Brunswick, Ga. The pastor of the Brunswick church is a good fellow—not much gush, but plenty of gray matter. He will help you to get the best results out of any surplus time that you have dangling to your hands.

The Synod met on the 10th inst., at 7.45 p. m., and waited with marvellous patience a long half an hour for the delayed moderator. What was the cause of delay I failed to learn; but Bro. Fair is still young and fair, and no doubt the detention was unavoidable. Taking for his text, Ps. 87:3, he preached a characteristic sermon. With plaintive voice and rythmical cadences, and poetic imagery, and beautiful diction, and graceful delivery, he held the closest attention of the audience, and produced a very decided warmth of feeling about the heart. There were several brethren whose friends thought they would make good moderators. Probably their friends were right, but the Synod needed only one moderator, and at a venture took the oldest of the lot. It is safe to say that it will not elect him again soon. It is customary to do nothing at the first session, but organize, and adopt the schedule of hours for future meetings. But Drs. Walden and Rice wished to get away, to visit the Alabama Synod which met at the same hour, and so Dr. Walden asked and obtained permission to present the report of the Synod's Board of Trustees for founding a male college. It was simply a recital of what the Board had done in the way of carrying out the scheme to combine the S. W. P. University and Columbia Seminary at Atlanta, with recommendations, 1st that the Synod appoint two ministers and one elder to attend the Conference in Atlanta in Dec., and 2nd, that in case the scheme for combination should fail, the Board be authorized to go forward, and devise, if possible, some other way to promote the desired end. The report was made the first order of the day for the next morning session. When it was called up next morning. Dr. J. H. Patton moved a substitute to the effect that the Synod decline to appoint members to the Conference, and instruct its Board of Trustees to withdraw the overture to the other Synod on the subject of combination. Dr. Patton supported his substitute with a strong speech, made in good spirit. Dr. Walden replied with a perfect cyclone of a speech, sweeping everything away on the wide, swift and powerful current of his argument. A vote was taken on the substitute; the moderator heard three distinct "ayes." There may have been more, but if so they were spoken sub rosa. When the motion was put to adopt the report made by Dr. Walden, it was carried with loud voice, nemine contradicente. That the Synod of Georgia is very profoundly interested in the establishment of a University in Atlanta was made very manifest more than once. Near the close of the session on Thursday, a telegram was read by the moderator, announcing the vote on the subject in the Synod of Alabama. It produced an electric thrill of sympathy throughout the whole body. Of course, there are a few who think the scheme of combination is not feasible, and who believe that the continued agitation is hurtful to the institutions concerned. These favor a University, but would leave the college at Clarksville untouched, and try by other means to secure an academic department for the Atlanta Institution. Most of these few, perhaps all, would favor the transfer of the Divinity Department of Clarksville to Atlanta to unite with the Seminary from Columbia, provided this could be done without hurt to the other Clarksville interests.

It is superfluous to report the usual routine of Synod. It may be worth while, however, to state that the secretaries and other visiting speakers outdid themselves. Everybody knows Morris is going to make a clear cut, sensible and forcible speech. The Synods have learned to expect a good speech from McIlroy, and they are not likely to be disappointed. Both these brethren tried themselves, and the latter threw some word pictures before us that were so vivid and realistic that we hardly knew "where we were at." We are grateful that the Lord has given us two such men to plead our great causes. Dr. Snedecor made a good strong plea for our poor neglected brother in black. Dr. Smith, with one of his sharp, crackling, telling speeches, made everybody feel like hallowing, "Hurrah for Davidson"! Thornwell Jacobs brought the love of the orphans to the Synod, and received in return a contribution of $105.95. The Synod assured him that this was but an earnest of the $5,000, for which he asked, with which to build a "Georgia Home" to house the Georgia orphans. The Thornwell orphanage has a strong hold on the hearts of the Georgia Synod, and its management has its unbounded confidence. It is coming to be believed that the special design of the Lord in raising up Thornwell Jacobs is that he may ultimately take the place of his father.

The Synod had three invitations for its next meeting. One was from the Presbyterian Church at Dublin; another was from the mayor of the town of Dublin; and the other was from the Board of Trade of Dublin. These invitations were all quite cordial, and as they were all from the same place the Synod had no difficulty in accepting them all, especially as there was no invitation from elsewhere. The Synod, after a most delightful season of Christian intercourse, adjourned Friday night.

ATLANTA PRESBYTERY.—All matters relating to the local home missions of the Presbytery of Atlanta should be addressed to Rev. W. Lee Harrell, Chairman, Buford, Ga.

Yours etc.,

W. Lee Harrell.

NEWTON.—Our meeting began Nov. 1st and closed on the 6th. Rev. W. H. Zeigler, of the Albany Church, came Monday and preached twice each day until the close. His sermons were practical and intensely scriptural, and were greatly enjoyed by the Church and community.

Three young ladies united with the Church and we trust others will be added in due time. Bro. Zeigler made a splendid impression by his earnest and faithful representation of the "Old, Old Story."

The blessings are ours, but to God belongs the praise and glory.

CAMILLA.—Thus far we have had no protracted services, but our little church has done nobly in other ways. Since the present pastorate began, a neat and comfortable manse has been built on the Church lot and when we have made the improvements in the Church which we hope to do soon, the property will be a monument to the earnest efforts of our little band.

The Ladies' Missionary Society has been re-organized. We have preaching two Sabbaths per month besides the weekly prayer service and Sabbath school. We hope to have a series of services in near future and pray that God will manifest his power to edify believers and convince and convert unbelievers.

NORTH CAROLINA.

CHARLOTTE—Tenth Avenue Church: There will be special Thanksgiving services at Tenth Avenue Church on next Thursday at 11 a. m., and at night a reception will be given in the church parlor to all the members and friends who worship at this church. A delightful time is anticipated.

FIRST CHURCH—On last Sunday four deacons, Messrs. Jno. M. Scott, J. A. Fore, M. B. Speir and J. W. Zimmerman, were ordained and installed. Thanksgiving services will be held Thursday morning at 11 o'clock.

DAVIDSON.—The addresses of Rev. Dr. W. M. Morrison on last Sabbath were among the very finest ever heard in this community and made a profound impression. In the morning he gave a very vivid and interesting account of his life and labors in Africa, testifying to the wonderful word of grace among those benighted peoples and showing that the field was full of promise for those who were willing to go and reap the harvest. His description of many and varied experience awakens an intense interest in every hearer, abounding as it does in both pathos and humor. At night the topic was the choice of life's work, with special reference to the claims of the foreign field. For nearly an hour the solemn and weighty subject was pressed home upon the hearts and conscience of the young, and throughout the whole time almost breathless stillness pervaded the hall. It was one of the most powerful and soul-searching appeals to young Christians we have ever heard, and these addresses and conferences must, under God's blessing, tell mightily for the cause of missions among the students gathered here in the two institutions.

The annual Thanksgiving game of football will be played in Roanoke this season instead of in Charlotte, thereby preventing the students from having their usual afternoon trip to Charlotte to witness a contest on the gridiron. The quiet of the holiday will be interrupted in the evening here by a reception in the lower rooms of Shearer Hall, given by the faculty and their wives, to the students and their invited guests.

November 20, 1903.

IONA AND BETH-CAR—Rev. Dr. H. G. Hill and Rev. Wm. Black are to hold meetings at Iona and Beth-Car Churches beginning the 5th Sabbath in this month. We will hold services twice a day at each church.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Proceedings of North Carolina Synod.

The nineteenth session of the Synod of North Carolina met in the First Presbyterian Church, Wilmington, on Tuesday, November 3rd, 1903, at 11 o'clock a. m. The opening sermon was preached by the retiring moderator, Rev. C. G. Vardell, D. D., on the text "Thy Kingdom Come," Matt. 6:10.

The Rev. A. T. Graham, D. D., was elected moderator, and Revs. W. R. McLelland and E. D. Brown were elected temporary clerks.

The roll shows the attendance of 95 ministers and 58 ruling elders, a total of 153, besides visiting brethren.

The following corresponding ministers were present: Rev. S. H. Chester, D. D., Rev. S. L. Morris, D. D., Rev. G. B. Strickler, D. D., Rev. J. H. Lumpkin, D. D., Rev. W. M. Morrison, D. D., Rev. I. S. M. Elroy, Rev. T. H. Law, D. D., and Rev. J. D. Snedecor.

The hospitality of the Wilmington people was unbounded and everything possible was done for the comfort and pleasure of the Synod. An elegant reception was given by the Church in the Chadborn Memorial Hall, and a delightful trip was taken to Wrightsville Beach, all of which was greatly enjoyed.

The next meeting of Synod will be held in the First Presbyterian Church, Durham, N. C., November 14, 1904.

The moderator appointed the following standing committees:

Bills and Overtures—Rev. C. G. Vardell, D. D., J. McL. Seabrook, A. D. McClure, D. D., C. N. Wharton, R. Z. Johnson, W. D. Wharton, H. G. Tyson.

Judicial—Rev. W. D. Morton, D. D., J. Ruple, D. D., Joseph Evans, Colin Shaw, J. R. McAlpine, J. E. Wool, S. H. Isler, J. H. McBryde, John McLean, J. M. McIver.

Address to the Churches—Rev. J. M. Rose, D. D., J. P. McMillan, D. D., C. A. Munroe, E. C. Murray, J. S. Black, S. M. Rankin, M. D. Hardin, W. O. Sample, H. S. Bradshaw, Shepperd Stradwick, M. R. Adams.

Statistical Reports of the Presbyteries—D. P. McGeachey, R. M. Mann, R. C. Freeman, J. B. Ross.

On the Report of the Trustees of Synod—E. R. Leyburn, J. A. Dorritee, Dr. G. A. Graham.

On the Treasurer's Report and Books—R. A. Dunn, J. E. Haithcock, J. M. McIver, S. K. Fountain.

On the Records of Synod—Rev. J. M. Wharey, D. D., W. R. Coppedge, J. M. McLain, E. B. Kerr.

On Leave of Absence—W. T. Walker, T. D. Johnson, H. E. Shoaf.

Devotional Exercises—Rev. J. M. Wells, Ph. D., A. D. McClure, D. D., C. W. Trawick and Ruling Elder Chas. H. Robison.

On the Records of Presbyteries—

Orange—W. S. Wilson, J. P. Hall, E. S. Elsiehour.

Concord—G. W. Lawson, L. Smith, D. J. Campbell.

Fayetteville—V. H. Starbuck, J. C. Story, Jackson Johnson.

Mecklenburg—L. A. McLaurin, E. W. Sanders, J. C. McDuffie.

Albemarle—R. J. Hunter, G. A. Griffith, E. F. McRae.

Asheville—R. M. Williams, G. H. Atkinson, W. A. Lane.

Kings Mountain—J. H. Henderlite, D. M. Iver, W. W. Alexander.

Wilmington—W. H. Wilson, T. J. Knox.

The usual Synodical communion was observed, and it was a delightful service. A sermon was preached by Rev. E. W. Smith, D. D., on Ps. 51:7, and the Rev. Drs. J. M. Wharey and H. G. Hill presided at the table. It was a matter of devout thankfulness to God that there was no occasion for a memorial service for deceased ministers, none having died during the past year.

A special effort, led by the Rev. Dr. E. W. Smith was made to secure the support of a pastor for Chapel Hill church. The matter was strongly presented by Dr. Smith, and a subscription of about $1200 was pledged for one year. The Synodical Home Missions committee was entrusted with the collection of the subscriptions, and authorized to act as an advisory board with the church in securing a pastor.

All the great causes of the Church were fully represented and had a hearing. The report of the Synod's Home Mission committee was presented by Rev. E. E. Gillespie, Superintendent. The report shows a more prosperous year's work than ever before. We have had 43 workers in the various fields and the year is closed without debt. The General Evangelist, Rev. Wm. Black, preached 378 times in 25 different counties, and some of the results of his meetings have been: more than 1,000 professions, 376 added to the Presbyterian Church, three churches and three Sunday Schools organized, 125 heads of families pledged to hold family worship, and nearly $2,000 raised for Synodical missions and other purposes.

Stirring addresses were made by Dr. Morton, Rev. E. Tufts and Dr. Cambell.

And the following recommendations were adopted:

1. The Synod recognizes with profound gratitude God's signal blessing attending the work of Synodical Home Missions during the year that has just closed, reaffirms its purpose to prosecute with greater zeal the work already inaugurated and to occupy and develop new fields of labor as rapidly as the liberality of God's people will permit.

2. That all the sessions, pastors and evangelists of the Synod heartily support the superintendent by giving him appointments with their congregations and by earnestly co-operating with him in his efforts to secure liberal contributions from their people, each session to determine the method of co-operation.

3. That all the churches of the Synod devote the collections during the month of June to the cause of Synodical home missions. That the Sunday schools devote one collection to be taken the second Sunday of June in connection with appropriate exercises bearing on home mission work.

4. That our present work may be sustained and enlarged, and new fields occupied, Synod undertakes to raise the sum of $12,000 for the cause of Synodical Home Missions and apportion this amount among the Presbyteries as follows:

Asheville, $300; Albemarle, $700; Concord, $2,000; Fayetteville, $2,500; King's Mountain, $500; Mecklenburg, $2,500; Orange, $2,500; Wilmington, $1,500. Total, $12,500. That the several Presbyteries be requested to apportion among their churches the full amount apportioned to them, and furnish the superintendent with a list of said apportionments.

5. That Synod does hereby express its sincere and hearty appreciation of the valuable services rendered our evangelists by the faithful men and women who have labored without compensation in the various departments of the mission work during the summer.

6. That the Synod appoint a committee of five, whose duty it shall be, at its discretion, to arrange for and hold at such time and place during the coming year as it shall seem best, a "Presbyterian evangelistic and Biblical Institute," a conference for evangelists, teachers, pastors and all others interested in evangelistic and mission work.

Rev. William Black was appointed chairman of the committee to hold the institute.

Rev. Mr. Gillespie was re-elected superintendent of synodical home missions. Rev. William Black was re-elected general evangelist.

The report of the Regents of the Orphans' Home was presented by the president of the Board, Dr. J. Ruple. In connection with the report, the Rev. Dr. Hill preached a sermon on "God's Wards." Ps. 68:5. The report shows that the plant has nine comfortable buildings and 200 acres of land, worth at least $50,000. During the past year 148 children have had the privilege of the Home. The Alexander building is still incomplete, and $2,000 are wanted to finish and furnish it. The Howard Memorial building is complete, and subscriptions were pledged at Synod sufficient to furnish about 15 rooms at $25 per room. The total amount of receipts for the year has been $14,990.40; disbursements $14,227.80. The receipts in donations of clothing, provisions etc, is estimated at $1,570.95. The cost per child of maintaining the Home is estimated at $72.11 a year or a about $6 per month.

The Rev. Dr. Rumble and Rev. D. I. Craig, whose term of office as Regents expired at this meeting, were re-elected for another term, and the Rev. Geo. H. Atkinson was elected to fill out the unexpired term of the Rev. Dr. Stagg removed from our bounds. The report on Church and Christian Education was presented by Dr. Shearer. The report shows a steadily growing interest in this cause, and our recommendation of the committee the apportionments to the Churches was doubled.

In this connection Davidson College was ably represented by President Henry Louis Smith, Red Springs Seminary by Dr. Vardell, Peace Institute by Prof. Dinwindie, and the Lees-McRae Institute by Rev. Mr. Tufts. All these institutions were reported to be in a flourishing condition. Union Theological Seminary was represented by the Rev. Dr. Strickler, and the Synod adopted the recommendation of the Board of Trustees to elect a President of the Seminary, if the way be clear.

The report of the Twentieth Century Fund committee was presented by the Rev. Dr. Smith. The report shows encouraging progress.—See minutes. The same committee and management was re-elected for another year.

The report on the Sabbath was presented by the Rev. Dr. Morton, and a Conference was held. Addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. Rose on "The origin and necessity of the Sabbath Law." By the Rev. Dr. Strickler on "Are the works of necessity and mercy, as indicated in the answer of our Catechism, largely modified by our present civilization?" And by the Rev. Dr. Murray on "The best means of arresting the patronage by Christians of Sunday travel and Sunday mails." The executive committee of Publication at Richmond, Va., was requested to publish the address of Dr. Strickler. The name of the Permanent Committee on "The Sabbath" was changed to "The Sabbath and Family Religion," and an overture to the Assembly was adopted asking that body to adopt the change.

In connection with the reports of the committees, the Rev. Drs. Lumpkin, Morris, McElroy and Snedecor were all heard in the interest of the various causes they represent. The Rev. Dr. Law spoke in the interest of the Bible Cause, and the following recommendations of the committee were adopted:

1. That the churches, in some manner, observe the centennial of the British Foreign Bible Society, which was organized on March 7th, 1804, recognizing that there was born the spirit of the dissemination of God's Word, which has grown to such proportions and has resulted in great good.

2. That the chairman of the Bible committee notify the Presbyterian agents, who in turn notify the pastors about one month in advance of October 1st, that the collection for the Bible committee occurs on the latter date—this notification being made to remind the churches of the importance of the work and the need of funds.

3. That each church be urged to take an annual collection for the Bible Cause and make effort to raise at least five cents from each member.

The Rev. Dr. W. M. Morrison, Missionary of Africa, made a stirring address in behalf of Foreign Missions, and especially of the work in Africa. The committee in response to the address offered the following resolution which was adopted:

"Be it resolved, That this Synod, in view of its manifest right of petition, hereby memorializes the government of the United States to take action looking to the protection of our work and the preservation of our treaty rights in the Congo-Free State."

In connection with the report on Colored Evangelization, an address was delivered on that subject by the Rev. Dr. Howerton, which was ordered to be printed for general distribution.

The Synod appointed a permanent committee on the General Assembly's Home Missions, consisting of Rev. Dr. Howerton, chairman; Rev. G. H. Cornelison, Rev. A. T. Graham, D. D., Dr. J. M. Belk and William Anderson.

The Records of Synod and the Records of all the Presbyteries were approved.

The Presbyterian Standard was represented by the and strongly endorsed by the Synod. The following recommendations were adopted:

1. We would take occasion to certify our high estimation of the ability and fitness for his position as editor of our synodical Church organ, The Presbyterian Standard, which Dr. McKelway possesses, as a fresh, vigorous and attractive religious paper, and beyond this as an honest exponent of evangelical truth, and a peerless champion of the distinctive doctrines of the Presbyterian Church. We continue to regard The Standard as invaluable to our Synod, and deserving the favor and confidence of all our people.

2. That we should deem it our duty to seek earnestly to anticipate or avert any embarrassments, pecuniary or otherwise, which might encumber the commendable efforts of the editor in the promotion of his great work.

3. That we urge our ministers, elders and people not only to support the paper by their personal subscriptions, but to use their best efforts to increase the subscription list of the paper by at least 1,000 names before January 1st, which may be more readily effected through a specially liberal offer which is now made by the editor.

The Historical committee recommended that each Presbytery have prepared and read at one of their meetings during the year, a historical sketch of one or more of their churches, and safely filed away. This was adopted.

A hearty and richly deserved vote of thanks was tendered to the pastor and good people of Wilmington and the Synod adjourned.

Faithful Unto Death.

Asnehoufu, China, Oct. 10, 1903.

Rev. Jas. E. Bear fell at the post of duty yesterday morning. In spite of weakness that he knew at any time might prove fatal, he made the long, hard journey to this place to attend the annual mission meeting; with wonderful devotion, though malarial fever had attacked him on the road, he attended the meetings as long as he could stand up, and this last duty done, was called home as soon as the meeting closed. During these last few days we were impressed with a peculiar sanctity of manner and a sublime faith in God that evidenced the blessing of the spirit in an especial degree. Our sympathy is extended to the wife who so bravely allowed him to go, knowing that he might not return to her alive. The remains will be interred at Chinkiang.

Hugh W. White.

Through a personal letter from Rev. James R. Graham, of the North China Mission to his brother, Rev. A. T. Graham, of Davidson, N. C., we get these additional facts:

"Brother Bear had been in very bad health for some years but undertook to go to the Mission meeting. He expected to join us at our station but when he reached there found that we had already started north. So he took a cart, made a forced march and overtook the party that night. He was pretty well exhausted and the trip still before us was a very hard one for a strong man, so it simply broke him down, taken in connection with the unhealthy places in which we had to sleep. At the end of the journey he went down with malarial fever and could not leave when the mission meeting was over. Dr. Woods remained behind with him, hoping to bring him down when he was stronger. His strength failed very rapidly and he died suddenly, after all, within two days. The body had to be brought over land in a cart for several days before my boat could be caught. Tidings of his death having reached me I held the boat until the body of the beloved missionary could be brought and as I write we are drifting slowly homeward keeping watch over the coffin of our dead friend."

He adds that it is very sad that he should have to carry the body of his fellow worker back to his wife, who until she knew of the death of her husband had no intimation that he was more unwell than usual.

These missionaries have had a sad time in this Northern Mission. The Junkin baby died last summer, Mrs. Bradley has just died, leaving Mr. Bradley with the care of a fifteen months-old child in that dark land. Surely the Church ought to pray for these lonely missionaries and these grief-families.

I been urged to take a furlough. He refused saying that he wanted to die and be buried here.

FRED. B. SMITH.

Some fifteen hundred men, old and young, were gathered in the Academy of Music Sunday afternoon. And it is a high tribute to Mr. Smith's power as a speaker that the most of them remained for two hours and half, in spite of the disagreeably cold temperature of the Academy and the other fact that the electric lights went out for a good interval, leaving the audience in total darkness.

Mr. Smith is a man of culture and education, who has yet not been cultivated beyond the use of homely speech, or educated above a knowledge of human nature. He had many good-natured sallies that put the audience in full sympathy with him, as when he said, in asking for dollar contributions to the cause, that he recalled having paid three dollars for a seat in the theater, or when, noticing the advantage that the lower animals have in the care of their physical natures, he said that it had been a long time since he had seen a horse drinking whiskey or a hog chewing tobacco or a pointer dog smoking cigarettes.

Mr. Smith denied the efficacy of the physical standard, or the mental standard, or the intellectual standard, in measuring the strong man. He exhorted to the care of the body and its development, to the proper pursuit of money as a means to an end, and was especially earnest in his plea that every young man should have the advantage of college education. Nevertheless his conclusion was that the strong man is the Christian man, and when he had finished his description of the man who was too weak to take a stand for Christ and the man who was strong to resist temptation in Christ's name, there was little doubt among his auditors where the true manhood lay.

Mr. Smith's power is simply that of the strong, natural, since man. He does not even cultivate what has been called, the Y. M. C. A. smile. He makes a direct, straightforward appeal and his words have the ring of conviction. He has mastered the art of public speaking and does not weary one. And then there is a fine religious fervor which glows and burns while he speaks.

At the close of the talk there was a remarkable scene. Those who felt themselves to be Christians were asked to stand, and about half of the audience arose. Then those who wished to be prayed for were asked to stand and practically the other half of the audience stood upon their feet. At the close of the meeting there were at least fifty who had made up their minds to accept Christ and to follow Him.

Although there has been an unusually heavy drain upon the great financial centers of the East, especially New York, for money to move the crops of the West and South during the present fall, there has still been less monetary disturbance than there was last season. It is true that money rates have ruled firm, and, speculators in stocks and bonds found it more difficult to secure money than they would have liked, but at no time did the New York banks find their reserves drawn down to a dangerous figure by reason of the heavy movement of currency to Chicago and New Orleans for crop-moving purposes.

It seems difficult for the anti-clerical press of Europe to credit the announcement that the youthful King of Spain may visit Rome in the course of his coming tour through Europe. Alfonso XIII. will go to Berlin, to Paris, to London, but to go to Rome would, it is argued, revive in a tortuous form the long and sullen feud between the Vatican and the Quirinal. However, positive statements are made that his Catholic Majesty will make the visit to Rome, where his former tutor is the Pope's secretary of State.—Digest.

It has been estimated that nine novels had a total sale of 1,600,000 copies. This means 2,000,000 pounds of paper. We are assured by a manufacturer of paper that the average spruce tree yields a little less than half a cord of wood, which is equivalent to 500 pounds of paper. In other words, these nine novels swept away 4,000 trees. Is it any wonder that those interested in forestry look with anxiety upon the paper mill?—The Scientific American.

The expedition organized by Dr. William Hunter Workman to the Northwest Himalayas has returned after attaining a record altitude of 23,394 feet. The party comprised Dr. Workman, his wife, two guides, Mr. B. Hewett, of London, who accompanied them in the capacity of topographer, and a number of coolies. The expedition was highly successful, and the fruits of the work have added to our present knowledge of glacier phenomena and topographical, geological and scientific features of this extensive range of mountains.

Prof. Bassett, occupying the chair of English at Trinity College, at Durham, has tendered his resignation and the trustees will act on it Tuesday night. Prof. Bassett's resignation is due to the fierce criticism of the press on his article in The Atlantic Quarterly on the negro question, in which he stated that Booker Washington is the greatest man, except General Lee, born in the South in a hundred years. College patrons were threatening to withdraw pupils and Methodist churches were demanding Prof. Bassett's dismissal.

Prof. Munsterberg's mission to Germany to secure the attendance of German scholars for the congress in connection with the St. Louis Exposition has been most successful. Two-thirds of all those invited have accepted. The attendance of scholars from Germany will be larger than from either France or Great Britain. The German government is heartily co-operating in the efforts to secure a good attendance from that country, and Emperor William has expressed the keenest interest in the congress.

Tesla's neighbors on Long Island are awe-struck by the flashing emanations from a tall pole which is the vehicle of the inventor's new experiments with wireless telegraphy. Blinding streaks of light come and go from this pole, electrical pyrotechnics such as have made Tesla the Pain of inventors. The townspeople are both amazed and mystified. In all these experiments there are intimations of marvelous effects to be produced before the century is over from the familiar elements of light and air and electricity. If we are tempted to suppose that some of these men of science are hugging delusions we have the wonderful reality of the Marconi wireless telegraph to restrain our scoffing. The Campania reaches port with the proofs of daily communication with the land and with other vessels during her voyage across.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

From the course pursued by the French ministry on the education question it is evident that an exciting public agitation will sweep over the land. In the application of the associations law there have been many collisions. In several localities public sentiment was with the teachers belonging to the religious orders, and scenes calculated to inflame popular prejudice were witnessed. The government never faltered in carrying out the law, nor is there any hint of compromise. Premier Combes does not recoil before opposition; the more determined it is the more resolute does he become. In the French Senate last week he intimated that the government intended to introduce a bill forbidding all members of religious congregations to teach in the government schools. Members of the secular clergy are not included in proposed prohibition for the present, their case being dependent on the decision of the question of whether church and state are to be separated. That question evidently is coming within the sphere of practical French politics.—The Interior.

The discovery of radium has brought to the scientist of today dreams that exceed in fantasy those of the alchemists of old. The possibilities of this wonderful element, of which at present we know so little, are almost beyond conception. Leaving the scientific and physical problems that are at present agitating the scientific world out of the question, let us consider briefly, and in plain language, the conceivable possibilities of radium in the industrial world, and its probable effect on man. Judging from the results of the most recent investigations, we have in radium a body that is continually giving off heat, and that constantly maintains a temperature of five or six degrees Fahrenheit higher than its surroundings. Here we have a concentrated energy in the smallest possible bulk that is both lasting and constant. The practical uses of such a body in the industrial world would be illimitable, and would revolutionize all known methods of locomotion and mechanics. It is probable that a few grains might provide energy to drive our locomotives, motor cars, and mechanical engines and carriages of every description. With a minute quantity of the element properly employed we may in future be able to heat our houses throughout, and keep them at an equable temperature. The domestic cooking would be done on radium stoves, while electric generating stations for lighting and purposes of locomotion would be driven by the same energizing force. The application of radium to motors would solve one of the chief difficulties of the present time: whether it can be so applied or not time will show.

Deaths.

Loving friends, be wise and dry
Straightway every weeping eye;
What ye lift upon the bier
Is not worth a wistful tear.
'Tis an empty seashell, one
Out of which the pearl is gone;
Yet ye wail, my foolish friends,
While the man whom ye call "died"
In unspoken bliss instead
Lives, and loves you; lost, 'tis true,
To the light which shines for you;
But in light ye cannot see
Of unfulfilled felicity,
And enlarging paradise,
Lives the life that never dies.
When ye come where I have stepped
Ye will marvel why ye wept,
Ye will know, by true love taught,
That here is all, and there is naught.
— Sir Edwin Arnold, from the Arabic.

YOUNG.—On Oct. 25, 1903, at the home of her son, John A. Young, Greensboro, N. C., in her eighty-first year, Mrs. Carolina A. Young quietly passed to her eternal rest. She was a loyal and beloved member of Alamance Presbyterian church.

CLAPP.—On Sept. 27, 1903, in his 33rd year, Allison G. Clapp was killed in a fearful wreck on the Southern railway at Danville, Va. He was an especially good and exemplary Christian, and enjoyed his religion; a faithful member of Springwood Presbyterian church. It was extremely sad for his parents and sisters and brother, and friends to have one so congenial and helpful thus taken from us.

AMIS.—Entered into rest on the evening of Nov. 4th., from the home of his daughter, Mrs. Jas. A. Fishburne of Waynesboro, Va., Col. Jas. S. Amis, formerly of Oxford, N. C., aged 78 years.

Truly it may be said of him as David said of Abner of old, "Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?" Graduating with distinction from the University of North Carolina, Col. Amis was first made Professor in one of the most prominent schools of his native State. Then after studying law he filled with ability and acceptance the positions of Commonwealth's Attorney, Judge, and for a number of terms sat as a legislator in the council halls at Raleigh.

During the dark and trying days which preceded the war his voice was often heard and his influence ever exerted for the highest and best interests of the people. At one time when defeat and disaster seemed inevitable to the Southern cause, he with others took the field, only to be summoned back by Gov. Vance with the explanation that he could not spare him from his counsellors.

He was for many years a Ruling Elder and superintendent of the Sabbath school, taking a most active interest and part in all the work of the Church. It can be said of him also that he was the comfort and loyal supporter of every minister who had the privilege of being his pastor. Truly may it be said of him, "He has fought the good fight, he has finished his course, he has kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for him the crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge shall give him at that day." Pastor.

Cooking and Serving Our Thanksgiving Dinner.

By Elizabeth W. Morrison.

It's a poor Thanksgiving which gives us not a turkey; in fact, it's simply "Hamlet with Hamlet left out."

It has been said that "one swallow doesn't make summer," but one turkey certainly would make a Thanksgiving all by itself if correctly dressed for the serving.

Never buy a fowl weighing less than ten pounds, as below this weight you get bones instead of flesh. A fowl weighing anything over eight pounds does not have any larger frame than one at that figure. But it commences to lay on flesh, and this is what counts.

A twelve-pound turkey is none too large for a family of four or six. See that the legs are black and smooth, not grayish, with heavy scales. The skin should be white and easily broken.

After a turkey is trussed wet all over, dust with pepper, salt, and cover with a thick coat of flour. This will give a crisp skin. After placing fowl in "dripping" pan, fill as full as possible with boiling water, place the giblets, liver, heart, gizzard in, and commence to cook. This is the manner in which our ancestors roasted their Thanksgiving bird, and I can guarantee that it is beyond improvement. At the end of allowed time, this liquid should have been absorbed by the fowl, leaving a rich brown sediment in the pan to form the basis of the gravy. The giblets should be minced fine and added to the latter.

A delicious dressing is made of the inside crumb of two 10-cent loaves of bread a day old. Crumble fine; add to this one cup of butter melted, one tablespoonful salt, two teaspoonfuls pepper (one of black and one of paprika), one medium onion, bunch celery, twelve stalks parsley, if fresh, or one tablespoonful of dried, all minced very fine, and two eggs. Whip together, fill your bird and sew up the rents.

Place the fowl breast downward in the pan, as this allows the juices to run into the white flesh, making this usually dry meat juicy and delicious. Turn the turkey breast up about one hour before removing from oven, so as to brown it.

In roasting allow fifteen minutes to each pound for young fowls; older ones require at least twenty minutes. Cook slowly until half an hour before it is done, then start up the fire briskly to brown and crisp the skin. Baste with juices in pan every ten minutes, as herein lies the secret of a juicy, well-flavored turkey.

Garnish the roasted turkey with stuffed onions, fried oysters or stuffed olives.

A boiled ham offsets the turkey on some Thanksgiving tables, and where a large family is gathered around the festive board it will be easily disposed of. Cut off all blackened parts, place in kettle of cold water and boil fifteen minutes, drain off water and add clear, cold water. Then set where it will boil slowly for two hours; remove from kettle, take off part of the rind, leaving a little on the small end, and cut into points. Cover the upper side with thick flour-and-water and bake until tender. Remove from pan; take off crust; spread with fine cracker crumbs mixed with a little brown sugar; set in hot oven to brown, and garnish with frill on small end, cloves and parsley.

The newest individual jelly dishes are of crystal, having a loop handle at one side. So beautifully pressed are these they reflect as many colors as the genuine cut-glass, and they are so low in price that every woman who entertains at all can own them. They serve many, many purposes, and can be used for salted nuts, bon-bons, etc.

For this festal day they are heaped with cranberry jelly, which has been molded in a shallow cake tin, and when firm cut into cubes. The effect is tempting.

Try mashed sweet potatoes for a change. Boil, then pare, mash very smoothly, adding sweet cream, butter and salt. Of course, the white potato must also be served, and these could also be mashed. The two kinds served side by side and formed by a tablespoon into egg shape as they are dipped from the dish, present an appetizing effect.

Relishes should form one of the attractions in the shape of crisp celery, tiny sour pickles and olives. Salted peanuts (the red skin removed before salting) and almonds are always appreciated; but the latest is pecan meats salted. Do not blanch the latter, but toss them in a little olive oil, then sprinkle with salt and brown in a moderate oven.

Ices and creams can form one of the deserts, but as a rule, the family are willing to dispense with this if pumpkin pie and Indian meal pudding are forthcoming.

An old recipe for pumpkin pie, guaranteed, is here appended: For one large pie allow one coffee cupful stewed pumpkin, which has been slightly scorched in stewing; three eggs, one pint milk, one teaspoonful pulverized ginger, one-half cupful Porto Rico molasses, one-quarter cup sugar, one generous pinch salt. Mix all together, adding milk last. Fill pastry lined dish and bake in moderate oven until a knife thrust in the centre comes out clean.

For the pudding this recipe will be found deliciously toothsome: Mix together one cupful each of molasses and yellow cornmeal; pour over one quart of boiling milk; add one-half cupful butter, one level teaspoonful each of salt, cinnamon and ginger; let batter become quite cold; then turn into a buttered dish, pour over the top one pint of cold milk and set in the oven. Do not stir the milk into the pudding. Bake slowly three hours. When ready to serve place spoonfuls of whipped cream, dusted with grated maple sugar, on top. If a silver pudding dish in your possession, place the dish inside, otherwise wrap a neatly folded napkin about it and fasten with a pin.

An appropriate centerpiece is of fruit. Polish the apples, dust peaches, and wipe bananas, oranges and lemons with damp cloth. Dip grapes in cold water and drain thoroughly. Set all where they will be chilled. Nuts should be also polished. Arrange a mat of grains and seasonable flowers, or tie small sheaves of grain with a yellow or crimson ribbon and lay at base of dish.

A bit of parsley, the foliage of celery or watercress laid at one side of any meat dish adds wonderfully to its appearance.—The Household Ledger.

An Old Thanksgiving Dinner.

How well I remember that old Thanksgiving dinner! Father at one end, mother at the other end, the children between wondering if father will ever get done carving the turkey. Oh, that proud, strutting hero of the barnyard, upside down, his plumes gone, and minus the gobbler! Stuffed with that which he can never digest! The day before, at school, we had learned that Greece was south of Turkey, but on the table we found that turkey was bounded by grease. The brown surface waited for the fork to plunge astride the breastbone, and with knife sharpened on the jambs of the fire place, lay bare the folds of white meat. Give to the boy disposed to be sentimental, the heart. Give to the one disposed to music, the drumstick. Give to the one disposed to theological discussion, the "parson's nose." Then the pies! For the most part a lost art. What mince pies, in which you had all confidence, fashioned from all rich ingredients, instead of miscellaneous leavings which are only a sort of glorified hash! Not mince pies with profound mysteries of origin; but mother made them, sweetened them, flavored them, and laid the lower crust and upper crust, with here and there a puncture by the fork to let you look through the light and flaky surface into the substance beneath.—Doctor Talmage.

The Invalid's Thanksgiving.

For the sweet peace Thou givest day by day

For the calm faith with which I kneel and pray,

For Thy blest presence leading me alway,
I thank Thee, Lord.

For the void filled by Thee within my heart,

For the sweet peace Thy promises impart,

For the strong will to follow where Thou art,
I thank Thee, Lord!

Up the steep hill I climb at Thy command,

Through the lone vale I feel Thy guiding hand,

In the hot desert 'neath Thy shade I stand,
I thank Thee, Lord.

Soon the deep water I shall cross to Thee;
Then, the long journey o'er, Thy face I'll see,

And the sweet voices join eternally
To thank Thee, Lord!

Child Life in the Submerged Tenth.

By Percy Alden.

But these others—children small,
Spilt like blots about the city,
Quay and street, and palace wall—
Take them up into your pity!
—Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

Every contact with nature," says Froebel, "elevates, strengthens, purifies." What are we to say, then, of the chances of those who, from one year's end to another, have no more accurate knowledge of nature than can be obtained from an observation of the city sparrow? There are hundreds of thousands of children in London, who, so far from understanding the glory of the country in spring time or summer, have not even seen a small recreation-ground or park, have not played upon one of those blotches of worn-out yellow grass which constitute London's play-grounds. London is far from being destitute of greenery, but unfortunately the best and most glorious public parks are not by any means the nearest to the very poor, and a distance of anything over a mile in a crowded city seems almost like the illimitable void to the little child or the worn-out woman.

An archbishop of Canterbury in a moment of grim truthfulness, once described the submerged tenth as "a suffering population which can hardly exist, hanging on the sharp edge of illness and hunger, and in full sight of abundance, luxury and waste." But the hunger and the illness tell far more upon the child than upon the adult. A stress of sickness or a spell of severe weather will carry off thousands of little victims, while a fever epidemic will decimate the ranks of the children throughout an entire district. The infant mortality of a slum neighborhood during a spell of hot weather reminds one of the Egyptian plague. Almost every house furnishes its quota of dead. Insurance societies become increasingly busy, while the undertaker does an enormous trade in children's funerals at $5 each. The cry of this great multitude of suffering children rises to the heavens in one piteous wail of agony, but the heavens seem to be of brass, and the ears of the people of England are hardened that they cannot hear. Another Mrs. Browning is needed to make us listen to the children weeping "in the country of the free!"

We can not ignore the fact that the whole question of child suffering is a part of the deeper problem of poverty, that eternal nightmare of the social reformer. It has been decided in England that "parental affection, in face of competition and the wolf, 'Hunger,' is not sufficient protection against premature child labor and the evil conditions of factory life. The child has still to be protected against the father and the mother, who, partly through ignorance and partly through carelessness, are willing to condemn their children to an early grave or to life-long suffering for the sake of the paltry wage which such children can earn.

Both in England and the United States this question of child labor is exciting at the present moment the greatest interest, but the efforts of social reformers on behalf of the children must be sustained by an enlightened public opinion, if selfishness and ignorance are not to triumph. I do not blame the parents of the children so much as I do the thoughtless or avaricious employer. To the former, life is a frenzied rush for bare existence; they have no time to examine very closely into the rights and wrongs of any particular line of conduct. They work ceaselessly for the necessities of life, or at least many of them do. The one essential to them seems to be a sufficiency of food. There is no time to allow the children to "see their fairies and dream their dreams." Accordingly, Tommy has to work in a shop at night after school hours and on Saturdays, or he gets up at five in the morning to assist some milkman, or together with his mother he makes match boxes at less than a nickel a gross. Mary Ann has to help in the making of cheap shirts or cheap clothing, or candle boxes, or horse bands, and the excuse of the parents (and it is a very natural excuse) is that even the simplest food can not be found for the children unless their work is forthcoming.

Even here, however, there are touches of brightness. I well remember seeing an old coster, who made his living by selling flowers in pots from house to house, going his rounds in a very poor district with his little grandchild in the midst of the flowers. She was a golden-haired, sunny-faced child, and though her clothing was of the poorest description, it was neat and clean. The gray-haired old man was evidently passionately devoted to the child, and as she sat there, surrounded by banks of flowers, she made the sweetest possible picture. Street trading may have its dark side, but here at any rate was a bright path of sunlight. Even where the people were too poor to purchase flowers, they nevertheless came out to see and to smell them, not forgetting to pay homage to the youthful queen who sat enthroned therein. The man, if I remember aright, had been a prize-fighter, but all his mighty power had been subdued to gentler arts and ways. The metamorphosis "into something rich and strange" was complete. As an old lady, who had overheard his terms of endearment, remarked in language worthy of Mrs. Malaprop, "'E do wusship 'er, 'e do, 'e simply 'analyses' that chld.'" Too seldom, alas! do these glimpses of the ideal come to us. As a general rule the hardness of the life promotes carelessness on the part of the parents, and the pity of it is, the children have to bear the brunt and grow hard in turn. No wonder that a little boy when asked, "What is our duty to our neighbor?" should answer, "To keep your eye on 'im."

It is not always the fault of the parents that the children suffer. The poor widow who has perforce to earn a scanty livelihood by washing or charring, is unable to give much attention to her children. My wife, on one occasion, called at a house in a very poor district of the Docks to see a patient. She was told of a child ill in the next room. She found it in a very serious state; it was tied into a chair to prevent it falling about, and for hour after hour it was left in this condition, while the mother was at work some distance off in the fields and market gardens. How many of us hear the "child's sob in the silence?" How many of us are willing to make any effort to change the conditions which imply so much suffering for the child?

Let us examine some of these conditions under which the children of the poor live, or attempt to live. We will take a typical mean street, or rather a typical slum. It consists of thirty-nine houses, each house with six rooms. The houses are let off in tenements of one, two or three rooms. It is a blind alley, and therefore less cared for from a sanitary point of view than a thoroughfare. A good deal of refuse and garbage is lying about. A channel down the center of the alley conveys a stream of liquid houses badly built in the first place, are now tottering with age, and leaning against one another as if for support. The woodwork, where the drains are defective, several inches of sewage render disease almost a certainty. The staircases are without rails, the walls without paper and full of holes, the doors hang dejectedly on their hinges. The children in this lane, numbering 352, seem to resemble nothing so much as plants that have been kept in a cellar. Their faces are blanched and etiolated, with a wizened old-world look upon them. Very early in their lives they feel the weight of care and of sorrow, and many of them go to school every morning breakfastless. How can we expect from such children the quick intellectual response, the mental capacity, or the bodily strength which school life demands? When we reflect that children who are suffering from similar disadvantageous circumstances are to be numbered not by fifties, but by hundreds and thousands in London, we may well be surprised that the evils are not even greater than they are.

It is generally supposed that children delight to be dirty, and are not particularly fond of the water. In so far as this is true, I think it is due for the most part to lack of training. Up to quite recently no opportunities were offered them of cultivating their sense of cleanliness. When I first went to the Dock district in East London, I found children, both boys and girls, on hot summer days bathing in the tidal ditches, which, though at some previous time in their history may have been filled with clean, brackish water, were nothing but evil-smelling reservoirs of diluted sewerage. The fetid odors of these ditches were enough almost to kill an adult, and it is not to be wondered that typhoid was common in their immediate vicinity, especially when we remember that the children bathed in them. I wrote a plea for the Water-babies to the daily papers, calling the attention of the public to this state of things and it finally led in the construction of public baths by the local authorities.

The desire of children to be clean finally becomes a habit. A little girl whose brother had been to the boys' camp for a fortnight, once gave this report of his strange and unaccustomed conduct. "He washes himself every morning, and talks to some one in the country every night;" this latter clause being her definition of prayer. A mother once complained that her little girl could not very well go to the Settlement, because [she always insisted upon having a bath before going.

It may possibly have been an error on the child's part, but it was certainly an error in the right direction.

As a member of the London School Board, I have been very glad to note the increased interest taken in the question of baths and swimming by educational authorities. The London School Board itself has given swimming lessons to many thousands of children every season, and during the short summer, something like fifteen thousand boys and girls are taught to swim, while considerably over half a million baths are provided. This is, of course, a comparatively small number, compared with the enormous number of children under the London Board, but instructors are rapidly being appointed, and in addition to the five swimming baths belonging to the board, the public baths belonging to the Borough Councils are called into requisition. It is scarcely possible to exaggerate the value of this branch of education.

The various societies, both in England and America, who make it their business to give a summer holiday to poor children, have already done a magnificent work. They have "built better than they knew," for the impression made upon the plastic mind of the child can never be altogether wiped out. For a few short weeks the gates of fairyland are opened to them. They look upon sights and they hear sounds that seem to awake memories of some past existence, when life was not all smoke, and grime, and hunger. For aught we know, Wordsworth and Plato may both be right, our birth may be "but a sleep and a forgetting" and we may enter this world "trailing clouds of glory," but the glory is all too soon to fade away, and if the song of birds, the babbling of the brook and the sight of green fields can restore the dream, we have not labored in vain. Question a child on its return from the country, and you will find how great is the impact of the new idea, how tremendous the contrast between the old and the new. I remember once asking a little girl what she liked best in the country. She lived opposite a piece of wasteland, upon which were plentifully strewn tin pots and pans, dead cats and garbage. Her answer was brief and to the point. "Seeing no dead cats," she replied, and I confess, that knowing where she lived, I sympathized with her.

In the country it is perhaps possible to teach children lessons that they could never learn in the town. To the poor children of the submerged tenth, love and beauty and God are meaningless terms. They can not be asked to say the Lord's Prayer, if the father is a drunken brute. Or what can we expect from the child of a mother who hisses through her teeth, "I'd kill yer, yas, I'd kill yer, if I only knowed 'ow." They can not be asked to reverence anything that is worthy of reverence, if they have never known it or seen it in life. Even a short stay in the country alters their whole attitude. A child, one evening just before bedtime, when she was eating her supper on the doorstep of a cottage, said, "Do yer see that sky, sister? I often looks at it like this when I'm at 'ome, just when its gitting dark, yer know, and I allns cries; it makes me fink of being 'ere, and makes me want ter be good."

I have a very vivid recollection of a story told me by a member of the local school board, who was also my colleague, with reference to a little girl who never attended school on Monday morning for a long while. She was called up by my friend and asked the reason, and her answer was, "If yon please, sir, father always makes me drnk on Sundays." It seemed almost incredible that such should have been the case, but on further inquiry the story was found to be true.

Town-bred children, especially children of the poor, are particularly lacking in any true conception of play. I do not mean that they are not always ready to find some amusement in the streets, but their games are unfortunately of a somewhat morbid description. The make-believe games that appeal to the children of the poor seem to be rent-collecting and funerals. These are everyday events of their life. A part of the former game is almost invariably the entry of the brokers and distraint upon goods. This leads to a scene of wild excitement, and sometimes to a sort of free fight between the actors and actresses in the drama. In order to remedy this dearth of healthy amusement, Guilds of Play have been started, and at Mansfield House we have found such guilds one of the most useful methods of interesting and helping the children.—The World of Today.

A Thanksgivings Treatment.

By Mabel Nelson Thurston.

The calendar was a foolish beribboned affair with holidays marked in scarlet. Esther Campbell crossed the room—it was only two steps—and turned its face to the wall.

"It's bad enough to have had to endure the thing for nearly a year without having it shout Thanksgiving at me every time I come in," she said, resentfully. "I don't know why I should be compelled to remember that Thursday is Thanksgiving day—it isn't to me. Perhaps I ought to be grateful for this room!" She looked round her with fine scorn—a tall, unsmiling figure in the immaculate hospital blue.

The room, in fact, revealed a clash of temperaments that could hardly escape the least critical observer—a state of affairs, however, easily explicable by what one of the girls called the "Mede and Persic law of the collocation of the most unfit." There was an oak bookcase filled with books upon medicine, nursing, and chemistry, and a fancy rosewood desk whose top was covered with the lightest popular literature. There was a reading lamp with a green shade upon the small table, and a brass chafing dish and teakettle under a chair in the corner; over the bookcase was a fine copy of Millet's Sower; over the bed a cabinet filled with showy china—the whole representing the unsuccessful attempt of the two uncongenial characters, whom the hospital ruling had thrown together, to create a sympathetic environment.

At present the roommate, Sue Merriam, was on night duty, so there was truce in the camp. Esther reluctantly acknowledged that that might be cause for gratitude.

"But not enough for a special day of thanks!" she declared gloomily.

She threw open the window and stood looking out into the black November morning. Her thoughts still ran upon Thanksgiving. She thought of her loneliness—an orphan with no near relatives, of the past year and a half of hard work and severe training, of the year and a half to follow; and then—what? To spend one's days going from stranger to stranger, touching a life for a few days or weeks and then passing on to the next one, "belonging" nowhere—to nobody.

Somewhere down below a bell rang and straightway the corridor outside was full of merry voices—the nurses were trooping down to breakfast. It was wonderful how easily, in the between-times, they threw off the atmosphere of wards and lecture rooms. They were chatting like schoolgirls. Esther followed slowly, alone. None of the girls ever waited for her. Sue Merriam, who was a Washington girl, declared that you might as well try to be intimate with the Washington Monument.

Down in the big dining room was a cheerful clatter of dishes. There were three long tables of nurses in blue, and one of nurses in white; at the end of the room, at a table by herself, sat the superintendent. Some of the girls admired the superintendent, most of them feared her, but all were unanimous in pitying her.

"If I thought I should ever be a superintendent, and have to live in a little superior world all by myself, [I'd lie down and die tomorrow," she said frequently, a statement which always brought the comforting response that she was in no danger of such splendid isolation. Indeed, the marvel that the pretty, ease-loving creature had ever passed her probation was only equaled by the second marvel that she "got along" from week to week. Esther, thinking of Sue, wondered what it would seem like to be able to make friends with two words and a smile. "Things aren't fair," she thought. "I'd like friends, wouldn't I? Sue can't make a bed properly to this day, and yet"—Something in this girl could not be contented with poor work. "If I can't make friends, I can make beds," she acknowledged. Perhaps, underneath, things were not so unequal after all.

Esther's next neighbor exchanged a few sentences with her about one of the cases, and then she was left to herself for the rest of the meal. She was glad when breakfast was over and it was time to report; Esther was always at her best on duty. For the next few hours she was too busy to think of anything except her immediate tasks; when, however, the ward was in its morning order and the doctors had made their rounds, there came a few minutes of comparative leisure. It was then that she noticed the little woman in Number 6.

She was a tiny, frail creature with a child's blue eyes under her thin white hair. She had come from the operating room three days before; it was still doubtful whether her slender strength could rally from the shock. Now, as she lay there, Esther saw a slow tear roll down her thin cheek. She hurried across, her trained fingers seeking the feeble pulse.

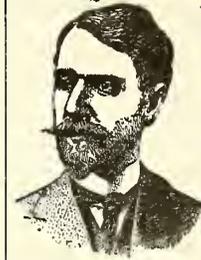

"Is it the pain?" she asked, gently. "You mustn't do this way, you know, or else you can't go home so soon."

The thin, pain-sharpened face looked up at her humbly. "It's real bad of me," the weak voice confessed. "You see, it just came over me that tomorrow is Thanksgivin', and he'd be all alone. He ain't never been alone Thanksgivin' since we was married, and that's forty year come January, and seems 'sif I couldn't bear to think of it—me a lyn' here and he settin' alone all the evenin'. He allns made so much of Thanksgivin'—bnyin' a turkey and all, though here was only two of us. The year baby died it didn't seem 'sif I had any heart for it, but he insisted. He said he'd got me, and that was enough for anybody. An' now he'll be settin' there all alone"—

Esther's steady voice supplanted the faltering one. "Yes, he has you," she said. "Don't you suppose he'll be more thankful this year than he ever has been—since the time the baby died?" She tried to be very matter-of-fact; she didn't believe in humming patients, but she could not resist a tender touch—she was so little and old and weak and home-sick! In a dim way the girl could comprehend all the terrible loneliness of the great bare ward to one whose heart was hungry for the dear welcoming of familiar rooms and the companionship of forty years. Vaguely from the procession that passed through at visitors' hours, Esther recalled the figure of a bent old man with dim eyes, and a timid, appealing manner; once, she remembered, he had said, "Yes, ma'am," to her when she made some remark to him. She smiled at the memory, but her voice was full of encouragement.

"You will see him Thanksgiving day, you know. I don't believe he'll care about the dinner so long as he can see you. You'll have to be very well and bright to help him keep Thanksgiving."

The tiny woman caught the words eagerly. "That's just what I was a telling myself," she agreed; "'twas real wicked of me to be grievin'. So I began countin' up the things I had to be thankful for—him first of all, and home and the flowers—he says they're real flourishin' even if I ain't there to take care of them—and that it is over and I'm gettin' well, and for you"—

Esther looked down in astonishment. "For me!" she repeated.

The little woman explained timidly. "You're so strong an' still an' restin'. When I get tired I allus look at you. I've told him about you, an' he feels the way I do. We won't neither one of us forget the way you've done for me. You wouldn't guess what I was thinkin' as I lay here."

"I'm sure I couldn't," Esther replied. She felt bewildered; she could not realize this beautiful thing which had blossomed from the hard, faithful, discouraged work of her year and a half.

"I was thinkin'," the weak voice ran on, "that I was wishin' he could have you 'stead of me Thanksgivin' day. It was real foolish, wasn't it? It was only that I got to thinkin' of him all alone there. We ain't got many neighbors we care for. There's one, a young thing in the next house that goes out sewin', that I was takin' notice of before I was sick. I thought mebbe I'd have her in at Thanksgivin'. I thought—but I hadn't orter run on so had I?"

"I'm afraid not if you are going to be rested tomorrow," Esther answered. She smoothed the pillow and tucked in the clothes more comfortably. "I'm going to leave you now to get a nap," she said. "If you do, and are feeling well this afternoon, perhaps I'll let you talk a little more. It all depends upon you, you see."

The blue eyes smiled back at her trustingly. "I'll be real good, dearie," the little woman promised.

The rest of the morning and half of the afternoon, Esther soothed weary patients, and gave medicine, and took temperatures, and went through all the usual careful routine, but her thoughts were journeying in a strange country. She wondered if she would dare. She felt almost as timid as the little woman herself, and yet—if it would help the feeble strength. She thought of "him" if the tiny creature in Number 6 should never go home again. Sometimes there was medicine that no physician could give. If she could help, wasn't it her duty just as much as giving baths and tonics? When the matter took that form, the question was settled. Besides, the idea of being shy with a little, meek old man who said "ma'am" to her! Esther laughed at the thought, and the laugh did her good.

At four o'clock she found her patient a wake and eager. "I did sleep," she said, "and I feel real rested—most as if I could sit up. Don't you suppose I could—a little mite?"

"I think you'd better not try that quite yet," Esther answered. "But you look so bright that I'm going to ask you something. Do you suppose, if I let you help in a secret, you could keep very quiet and sleep at night? Because if you couldn't—if you would lie awake over it, I'd just have to give it up."

"I lie awake some anyways," the little woman argued, anxiously. "I guess you don't know how good it would be to have something to think about. But I'd try, dearie, I'd try real hard."

"I'm sure you will," Esther replied. "You'd have to, you see, or else I'd get into trouble. If the doctor should find you tired and somebody should say that Miss Campbell talked her to death"

The little woman laughed back at her. "I guess there ain't a mite of danger about the doctor," she said.

"Well, then, suppose there was a little woman in a certain hospital trying to get well as fast as she could; and suppose it worried her to think of her husband all alone on Thanksgiving day; and suppose there was a nurse who would have a half holiday and no place in the world to go and that the nurse knew how to cook turkey and cranberry sauce—not the way that the little woman did, of course, but so that people could eat them, at least. And suppose that little woman's husband bought all the things tonight just as if she were home, and that tomorrow the nurse who didn't know what to do with herself should go over and cook the dinner, and put flowers on the table, and have it all just as nearly as possible like what his wife would if she were home—if this should happen, do you think it would help anybody to get well?"

She stopped, almost frightened, for tears were running down the white face on the bed. The little woman put up a weak hand to wipe them away.

"It's just because I'm so happy!" she cried. "I can't ever tell you, dearie. Here I've been worryin' so about him tomorrow, and all the time the Lord had this a-comin'! It's a lesson to me, that's what 'tis. I guess the Lord will not have so much trouble with me after this!"

At a little after seven that evening, Esther stood waiting the answer to her knock at 147 Vine street. The house was dark, but in a moment there came slow, shuffling footsteps from an old man opened the door, peering blindly over the lamp in his hand.

"It's Miss Campbell, one of the nurses at the hospital," Esther began. "I don't suppose you remem"—The word broke in alarm. The old man was staring np at her in sudden terror.

"She—ain't"—he began, huskily.

But Esther interrupted him.

"She is not a bit worse," she said. "I can't forgive myself for alarming you so, Mr. Baker. It was so stupid—it never occurred to me that I might. Nurses don't come on such errands you know. It was a message about tomorrow that brought me."

The old man turned and led the way into the house. He was still trembling and confused

"'Twas real foolish of me," he acknowledged with humiliation, "but when you said hospital, it give me a start. Of course I'd orter known better. an' I'll have to ask you to excuse the looks of things. I do my best, but 'taint the way she keeps 'em. She'd feel real mortified to have you set down in such a lookin' room—she would, indeed."

He wandered about, feebly trying to straighten the disorder, but Esther laughed cheerfully.

"Don't bother about things, Mr. Baker," she said. "I'm not sure that I don't rather like it—everything is so terribly precise in a hospital, you know. But I came to tell you your wife's plan, and I'll have to talk fast, because I've only a moment. It's about tomorrow and your Thanksgiving dinner." She hurriedly explained the plan. "I am free at noon tomorrow," she ended, "and you are to have all the things here—your wife made our the list—and to invite the little girl who does sewing, then, as soon as I come, I'll get to work."

The old man reached out a trembling hand for the list. His wrinkled face was all alight. "I'll get 'em. I'll get every one," he promised, eagerly. "I guess you don't know what 'twill be to me, Miss Campbell. I never was no hand at cookin', and things ain't tasted anyhow since Mary went away. I make out to her they have, but they haven't. I'd been jest shuttin' my mind on tomorrow. Mary, she allus made so much of Thanksgivin', it seemed as if I couldn't stand it without her. 'Twas real ungrateful when she's gettin' better so fast, but that was the way I felt."

Esther rose quickly; she pretended that she wanted to look at the geraniums in the window. She couldn't bear the confident hopefulness in the dim eyes, when she knew so well that "she" was not getting better fast—that even yet the issue was so uncertain. In a moment she turned and held out her hand.

"I must go now," she said. "Good-by until tomorrow. If you think of anything that isn't on the list, perhaps you'd better get it, for she will be sure to ask." "I'll get 'em," he responded. "I'll get 'em every one. I guess there ain't any danger of my forgettin' when she wants it." He opened the door for Esther, his shrill, excited voice still following her through the darkness. "I'll get 'em. I'll not forget."

The next morning came crisp and blue-skied. The little woman in Number 6 greeted Esther eagerly. "I dunno when I've had such a good sleep," she said. "I was afraid I was most too happy to, but I dropped right off."

"Why, that's splendid," Esther replied cordially. "I'm getting prond of you. I shall have to look out or you will talk so much you will tire 'him.'"

The little woman laughed feebly. "I guess there aint' no danger," she replied, in her favorite phrase.

It was somehow an unusually busy morning in ward 8 that day, and it was nearly one before Esther was finally free. She stopped a moment at Number 6 for good-by, and then hurried down to Vine street. As soon as she turned the corner, she saw the old man's anxious face at the window. It cleared amazingly when he caught sight of her. He hurried to the door to meet her.

"I've got every single thing," he announced. "I didn't forget one. And I've got a real good fire started. I guess you'll find everything all right."

"I'm sure I shall," Esther replied.

She threw off her wraps and then looked about. The old man had evidently been having a desperate encounter with "things"; the room wore an air of envious and constrained neatness belied by sundry collections behind the doors and under the lounge. Esther's lips were grave, but her eyes dancing. She praised the fire, and set the old man at work paring apples. He eyed the preparations with increasing delight. "Not pies?" he asked, incredulously. "You ain't goin' to make pies, too?"

"Of course I am," Esther returned. "What would Thanksgiving be without pie? Didn't you see mince-meat on your list? Of course they'll not taste like the ones your wife makes, but you'll have to be polite and pretend that they do." Esther's lips as well as her eyes were dancing now. For a Jefferson Hospital nurse to be making mince pies!

The merry preparations went on till half past two, when the old man was to start for the hospital. Esther went to the door and waved a floury hand after him; then she began to "fly round" in good earnest. The dinner was well under way, to be sure, but those corners behind the doors! The little woman could never have enjoyed a Thanksgiving with such corners!

With pinned-up skirts and rolled-up sleeves, Esther was making valiant attacks upon them, when a timid knock made her stop in dismay.

"It must be the girl who sews," she thought. "How could she come so early?"

It was the girl who sewed—a pale, meager little creature whose head scarcely came above Esther's shoulders; but her thin face was flushed with shy excitement.

"If I am in the way," she said, "I'll go right back, but Mr. Baker told me what you are going to do, and I thought maybe—if you'd let me—I could help a little. If you only would!"

Esther threw open the door. She did not understand herself this Thanksgiving day; she heard her voice, warm and cordial as if it were a stranger's.

GASTRITIS

So Pronounced by Physicians, cured by Mrs. Joe Person's Remedy.

Huntersville, N. C., May 15, 1902.

Two years ago I was completely run down. I suffered from indigestion all the time, with gas on the stomach, and the trouble was pronounced gastritis. I had no appetite for anything, and felt no inclination to eat. This brought on nervous prostration, and the least excitement brought on a nervous spell and I could hardly control myself. I could not get any natural sleep as a result of this nervousness. I was under medical treatment for four years, and was not even benefited.

I then determined to try Mrs. Joe Person's Remedy, bought one-half dozen bottles and commenced to improve when on the fourth bottle. I was much stronger, slept much better, did not have those nervous spells nearly so often, and knew that my general health was building up. My appetite was improved and I began to enjoy eating and what I ate argeed with me. With all my ailments I had neuralgia of the bowels, which caused me intense suffering. After I took six bottles of the Remedy I found I was certainly mending, and bought six more.

Before I had finished the dozen bottles the neuralgia of the bowels was completely cured. I took in all a dozen and a half bottles, which restored me to good health. I feel that I owe my life to Mrs. Joe Person's Remedy. I was not able even to keep house, but had to employ help for everything; I was run down so that I felt that life was no pleasure in a certain sense. Now I am able to attend to all my household duties, and feel that I am some good, once more, to my family.

If any one has indigestion or nervous prostration, my advice is take Mrs. Joe Person's Remedy, and if one will only take enough to build up the system, it will surely cure.

Mrs. W. S. CALDWELL.

Special Land Buyers' Excursions.

Will run to the new lands of Greer county, Oklahoma, and other sections of the great Southwest in December, via the Frisco System.

Are you looking for rich and fertile farming lands in the Southwest which you can buy from one-fourth to one-tenth the cost of lands of the East or North? They produce as much acre for acre. Here is a chance to better your condition and add a liberal amount to your pocket book.

For full particulars and special railroad rates apply at once to R. S. Lemon, Secretary Frisco System Immigration Bureau, St. Louis, Mo.

"Come right in," she said; "I am working over corners at present. I've cleared out two, but there's still one for each of us."

At half past four the old man came back, and then such a dinner as it was! "He" had to tell all the questions his wife had asked, and what he had answered, and how she had laughed, and then he had to hear about and wonder over, all that the girls had done; and when dinner was finally over, they had just as good a time clearing things away; and when that was over, there were endless directions to leave for "him," and a basket to pack for the girl who sewed. She did not want to take it, but when Esther said that it was the little woman's order, she relented. Then she had her last inspiration—to send the geraniums to the hospital.

"And tell her," she added, "that she isn't to worry another second about Mr. Baker. I can cook, and I'll run in every day or two and see that he gets on all right."

The two girls had said good-by then, and were separating at the gate. Suddenly the girl who sewed turned back and ran after Esther.

"I—I haven't thanked you," she said, speaking hurriedly. "I was so tired out and discouraged, and you've done me so much good today!"

Esther could only look at her, speechless. The girl touched her timidly.

"You are so big and strong and trustable," she said. "I shall think of you when I'm tired. I can't ever be like you, but I'm going to try to do things for people the way you do."

"But I don't," Esther cried, condemned. "I— She stopped abruptly. Speech was never easy to her, but the day had been teaching her; it seemed as if she understood even Sue Merriam better. She looked down into the other girls wistful face. "Will you come and see me at the hospital some time?" she asked. "I think—perhaps—we may have things to give each other."

When Esther went on duty the next morning, the little woman was waiting eagerly. There was only time to give her the geraniums and a happy word then, but that was enough. When the doctor stopped at Number 6, his face brightened with pleasure.

"Why, this is fine, Mrs. Baker!" he exclaimed. "We'll have you up in no time at this rate. I had great confidence in that new treatment, but I didn't dare hope for anything like this."

But as the doctor passed on, patient and nurse exchanged smiles, for there is medicine for the soul as well as the body, and who shall say which is more potent.—Forward.

Our Little Folks.

Dear Little Folks:

In printing this bunch of interesting letters from our Home at Barium Springs, we wish we could give them to you just as they came to us—so carefully and beautifully written, but our printer men have to change them into every-day type and spoil them.

After reading them you will know more of the Home and then when you ask our Father to "Bless Mamma and Papa and little baby-sister" you will ask Him to bless these other sisters and brothers—yours and ours, and then we will help Him to do it, won't we?

The Presbyterian Standard.

Children's Letters.

Barium Springs, N. C., Nov. 16, 1903.
Dear Standard:

As I have never written you before I am glad to have the opportunity to write you. Let me tell you about the boxes coming. The children's measures are taken and a list made of the things they need. They are then sent to the society or person who clothes them. A few days afterward the same question is on every girl's lips, "I wonder when my box will come?" The home is in a state of excitement in the season when the boxes come. When they come they are opened by the office girl, and valued by the Lady Manager. Sometimes she is busy and it may be two or three days before she can value them. The children are so anxious to get their boxes. After they are valued they are given to the children. Some of the clothes come already made, others are not. These have to be made in the sewing room. But we are glad to get the clothes made or unmade. It is so kind in the people to send them. Each child thinks his or her clothes are the very prettiest of all and their clothing people the best to be had anywhere. We love them as though they were kin people, and sometimes better. If the children were clothed by the Home we would have to wear more more uniform clothing and not near so nice. As it is the clothing people are doubly appreciated, and we feel like we can never thank or love them enough for their love, and kindness to us.

Your new friend,
Margaret Martin.
Fifth grade.

Barium Springs, N. C., Nov. 16, 1903.
Dear Standard:

I have never written to you but once. I am glad of having the chance of writing to you once more. In Rumble Hall, the house in which I live, are thirty-six girls. I want to tell you how we girls appreciate a holiday. Our matron planned a day to take us to the woods and let us stay all day long. This matron kept the secret to herself until Friday evening. Then she asked who of the Rumble Hall girls would like to throw in money and buy some chickens and cook lunch and go to the woods to spend the day. Every girl was everjoyed at this plan. Money which we girls had made at different times was collected and six chickens were bought. Two of us dressed the chickens, while two others prepared the other lunch. Everybody was busy in the kitchen. Every girl was to get her a partner with whom to eat lunch. One of these partners was to get a shoe box and write her name and her partner's on it. All of these boxes were placed on the table and filled.

This expedition was to be on Saturday. Morning came and it looked like it was going to rain. But finally it cleared off. Every one took her lunch and started off for the woods. We walked about three miles and came to St. Martin's Church. We found a nice place beyond the church to eat our lunches. It was almost twelve o'clock when we got there so some of us ate most of our lunch. Most of us carried sacks in which to gather hickory nuts. Every girl had in her lunch a piece of raw chicken which was to be broiled over the fire in the woods. A fire was made of oak wood and every body was busy broiling her chicken. One girl let her piece of chicken smoke in the flames. Then she asked, "Is it supposed to be black?" When she was told no she said "I don't see how you can help it."

About half past three o'clock we started back. We got a lot of hickory nuts. It was a long walk and a good many of us were very tired before we got home. After supper was over and the dishes were washed we went to bed early to dream of our happy day that we had spent in the woods. We can not get off from our work for even a short walk except occasionally. This is the first day we have spent in the woods since our Easter picnic. It is not often that we get such an outing as this. Maybe that is why we enjoy them so very much when they do come and feel like wishing every body could have as good time as we girls do.

Your sincere friend,
Nyda Cooke.

Barium Springs, N. C., Nov. 16, 1903.
My dear Standard:

I have never written to you before. I stay in Rumble Hall and will tell you how we do when we are in the cooking department.

We get up in the morning at half past three o'clock, and go down to the kitchen. We have an alarm to wake us up, for if we did not have anything to wake us, I am afraid we would never get any breakfast. We generally have grits and hash for breakfast. We cook it in boilers which hold about eight gallons apiece. We stir the grits with a large paddle, and sometimes it pops out and leaves its scar with us for awhile. As soon as breakfast is over, we begin to prepare for dinner. Five girls cook dinner while the rest are in school. After dinner we go back to the school room and stay one hour. After that each one of us knows what her work is and then comes the hurry to get supper ready. When we get our caps and aprons on, we start the fire and put the huge boilers on the stove full of potatoes and other things for supper.

Sometimes when we are rushed with our work, the little Annie-Louise girls come over to the kitchen to help us. They all sit down on the porch around a large tin tub, each with pan in her lap and knife in hand to help us peel potatoes or something, for dinner. They are sure to make ever so much trash, but we see to it that they clean it all up before we let them go. After supper comes the glad hour for the kitchen girls to go to bed. This we are glad to do when we get up at half past three. We say good night, and it seems as if we have been asleep only an hour before we are aroused by the alarm for the next day's work.

Such is our life during our week in the kitchen work, but there is certain kind of satisfaction and ever so much fun to be had in it, too.

Yours sincerely,
Emma Sossamon.

Dear Standard:

It has been some time since last I wrote to you. I used to write real often and am glad to have the pleasure of writing again. I live in the largest house here, which is called Rumble Hall. It was named for the president of the Board of Regents, Dr. Rumble of Salisbury. The inmates of our house are the larger girls of the home and one known to all the children as the "Big Girls." We do the cooking, ironing and other work which is too hard for the little children. Most of the big folk call us the back-bone of the orphanage. I have forgotten to tell you how many buildings we have here. We have seven buildings and two that are not yet finished. One of those buildings is our laundry which we have been needing so long. That building is just back of our house and looks so dismal with only the frame work. We are still hoping to see our laundry completed some day though. I will give you a description of a day in our house. We all, thirty-six girls, sleep on the third hall, usually three in a room. The ones who are to cook breakfast get up at three o'clock, quietly as possible, although they do make a great noise for they are so sleepy. There are four girls in a group and we have five groups. We change our work every week, so every girl has her turn at getting up to cook breakfast. We change every week from the kitchen to the cleaning up, laundry, dining room and sewing room. You can imagine what we have to do in each one of these. I was telling you that the kitchen girls were getting breakfast, well, by this time they have finished and a great big bell is rung to awaken the sleepy children. It is rather cold these mornings and it is mighty hard to dress in the dark, so a few of the girls prefer counting a hundred before getting up. It takes a good while to count one hundred and as we only have a short time to prepare for breakfast, those that are in that habit have to hurry. Presently the bell rings again and we all, girls and boys, assemble in the dining room. The dining room is in our house and it is a great big room. We have nineteen tables and eight children sit at a table. Before eating we all say a verse from the Bible. After breakfast we girls wash dishes, which takes a long while when the water won't run. Then we all assemble in the chapel and Mr. Boyd has prayers. After prayers we march to our different school rooms. The school rooms and chapel are in our house too. We stay in school until 12 o'clock and are excused to eat our dinner. We start to school again at one o'clock and stay until two. Then again we start to our work, some to the kitchen to cook something for supper, some to the laundry to iron a change of clothes for Saturday and others to wash the dishes clean for supper and still others to patch and mend. At half past five o'clock the big bell rings again and we all go to our school rooms and prepare our lessons for the next day. We stay there until supper time and after supper those of us who do not have to wash dishes, sit around and talk and laugh and enjoy music until the nine o'clock bell rings, then we retire and extinguish all our lights. By reading this letter you may think we have no fun or play. Of course among so many happy children we cannot help but have a good time. I wish you could be here with us sometime.

Your sincere friend,
Zula Turner.

My dear Standard:

As so many of the children are writing to the Standard I thought I would write too. I am in the upper first grade. We are going to have a little entertainment Thanksgiving. I have a recitation to recite. The name of it is The Walnut. As we don't have to go to school Saturday we boys all go and look for nuts. Sometimes we bring back whole sacks full. We certainly do enjoy eating them. The boys all like to play ball. The little boys saw wood in the evening and after we have finished it we play.

Your little friend,
Jim Gray.

Barium Springs, N. C., Nov. 16, 1903.
Dear Standard:

We are glad to have the opportunity of writing to you and telling you about our farm work. Our farmer, Mr. Parks is a splendid one. We raised a great many sweet potatoes this year but a great many of them are spoiling. We have seven cows, two mules, a horse, some poultry and some pigs. We milking boys get up at half past four o'clock every morning to milk the cows. We have to shuck our corn and feed the stock at that time. Our dairy is on the branch near the barn. We strain our milk and make our own butter. By the time we finish our work at the dairy, the bell rings for the other children to rise and we have to get ready for breakfast. After breakfast we clean up our bed rooms and hulk. All the children then assemble in the chapel for prayers. We go from prayers to our school rooms. We go to school until twelve o'clock, and then have dinner. We go back to school at twelve forty-five and stay in school until two o'clock and then go to work on the farm. Some of us chop and saw wood in the new ground, others do the churning while others do the ploughing and get the vegetables. When we kill a beef some of the larger boys do that work. At half past five o'clock the first study hour bell rings and we only have ten minutes to get ready for study hour and supper. We study from half past five until seven and then go from the school rooms to supper. After supper we go to our own houses where we play flinch and other games until nine o'clock and then have prayers and go to bed. Although we have plenty of hard work we have lots of fun together.

Yours truly,
"A Farm Boy."

Dear Standard:

I have just been told that you wanted some of the children of the Barium Home to write to you. I am so glad that I am one of those who may write. Let me tell you about the nice new house we have here, which I may be allowed to live in after Christmas. It is called the Howard Cottage. When we move into our new house we would be glad to have you come to see us. It will be for the little girls to live in. It is worth four thousand dollars. Judge Howard of Tarboro gave it because his wife loved little children and because he wanted to glorify God. He gave it last spring. It was built last summer. The house was dedicated the twenty-second of October. It stands between the Infirmary and the road. It is seventy-two feet long and thirty-two feet wide. It will accommodate thirty children. It is two stories high besides the basement. It is made of brick and has a slate roof. There are many windows so it has plenty of light and air. The woodwork is pretty and white. There is ceiling overhead so there will be no plastering to fall on the little girls' heads. In the center of the house down stairs is a large play room. It has two fireplaces in it. There is also a nice sitting room. After a while there will be a furnace in the basement.

There is no furniture in the cottage yet, and we don't know how we will get any. Some of the girls who are to live in it will come from the Rumble Hall, some from the Annie-Louise and some from other places away from here. We will be glad to have them. We are so thankful to Judge Howard for giving such a nice home for some more little girls.

I thought I would write and tell how boys and girls can help the Orphan's at Barium Springs by a little work after school. By canvassing your church for "The Fatherless Ones." I got a list of names from Dr. Rumble and I canvassed our church and I got a good many subscribers. It is not hard work and any of us can do this. I hope some boy or girl will see this and will send in a list of subscribers for Thanksgiving.

Yours truly,

Save Your Daughter

No. 185 West 88th Street,
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y., April 3, 1903.

Wine of Cardui has been a blessing to my home. I have often found that it was a great relief when I was weary or in pain, but I am especially grateful for what it did for our daughter and only child. I noticed that her menses were tardy and she suffered with headaches and giddiness, heaviness in the abdomen and about the loins. This seriously interfered with her studies and she had to discontinue several of them.

A visitor calling on me and discussing the matter suggested that I give her a course of your Wine of Cardui as it had relieved her daughter of a similar trouble. After my daughter had used it for five weeks I found a great improvement in her looks, health and behavior, in fact she was a different girl. The flow became regular and we have not had any difficulty since.

WINE of CARDUI

Here the menstrual function had not been properly started and the unnatural condition was making the young girl an invalid. The headaches and giddiness, indicated something more than a mere temporary ailment. They were symptoms of a functional weakness which would become more and more aggravated as years went by. But Mrs. Thompson was ready to take advice for her daughter's welfare and she gave the little sufferer Wine of Cardui and now she is a well young woman.

If your daughter is sickly and frequently ailing the letter of this good mother contains the best advice you can follow.

Wine of Cardui is the menstrual regulator that cures nine cases out of every ten. Young girls, mothers and aged women find this tonic indispensable.

have to wake up at fifteen after five o'clock so they can make fires in the playroom and sitting room and parlor. The rising bell rings at half past five. The boys have to get up and put on their clothes in the dark, then go down to the fire in the play room.

We have to clean up our rooms after breakfast and we manage to have fun as we work. The older girl who lives with us comes around to see if we clean up our rooms right. Then Mr. Boyd has prayers in the chapel and then we go to school. Then we have dinner.

If we eat fast enough we get some time to play during dinner recess. Then we go to school again. After school we go to the woodpile and saw wood. Some saw and some hold the wood. The smallest boys carry it to the different houses. When we finish we get to play a little, and then we go to study hour.

We hardly ever play any game more than a few weeks at time. Some of the games we have been playing this fall are rolling hoops, making whistles, spinning tops, fighting battles with weeds for lances, and I don't know what all. There is a piece of bicycle here that we spend a lot of time in trying to fix. After supper we play till eight o'clock, when we have prayers, and go to bed. We little boys have a hard time keeping our hands clean, and all that, but our matrons are very good to us, and so is everybody. The older folks seem to like to have us to go on errands for them a great deal.

My dear Standard:

While I see some of the girls are writing to you about our work during the week I want to tell you how we spend our quiet Sabbaths. Four of the girls get up at half past four on Sunday mornings to cook breakfast. All the rest of us sleep until half past six on Sunday and you may know we enjoy that after working all the week. As soon as we finish eating breakfast Mr. Boyd has prayers right in the dining room. After prayers the large girls wash dishes. The boys and little girls put their rooms in order. Just think of boys doing work like this! But they do it with pleasure and right well too for boys.

When the work is all finished we retire to our rooms and get ready for service, then we read and study the Shorter Catechism. At eleven o'clock the big bell rings and the children form in line to march to the chapel. Mr. Boyd always preaches a good sermon, such as we can understand. Some times Mr. Caldwell preaches in his place, and we are glad to have him you know. Sometimes the singing class gives us some nice extra music. After service comes dinner. As soon as the dishes are washed we all prepare our Sunday school lessons. We have Sunday school at four o'clock in the afternoon, and supper about six. Then after every thing is finished we have prayers and sing until time to retire. So you see we have a busy day on Sunday as well as any other day. But

Dear Standard:

My dear teacher just told me that I might write to you if I would tell you something interesting about our home here.

The nicest thing I know to tell is about the holiday we Annie Louise girls had not long ago. Mr. Geo. Watts gave the Annie Louise to us several years ago. He named it for his daughter, Miss Annie Louise Watts. Now she is Mrs. Hill, and has a little boy two years old. His name is George Watts Hill. His birthday is the twenty-seventh of October. Last year on his birthday he wrote us a letter and Mr. Boyd gave us a holiday. Mr. Boyd promised to give the Annie Louise girls a holiday the twenty-seventh of every October if they would remind him of it. This year we were so afraid he would forget it, so we reminded him of it, and that morning Mr. Boyd read a letter in chapel—a fine letter from "Little George." Then Mr. Boyd said we might have holiday. We went straight to our play room and wrote a long letter to "Little George." As soon as we got through with our letters we went hickory nut hunting. Our lady principal and one of the boys took us in a wagon. There was not room for all in the wagon, so we took time about riding and walking. We went to the house of a friend who lived near by. We played and roasted sweet potatoes, and hunted for chestnuts and hickory nuts. Some yellow jackets found us and stung some of us. We spread our dinner on the grass. When we came back we had our wagon full of hickory nuts. As soon as we got home we got ready and had a nice supper. After that we had a candy stew and played. Then we went to bed feeling very happy. We had such a good time. We were glad "Little George" had a birthday and hoped that "Little George" had even a better time than we did. I wonder if you like birthdays and holidays and picnics as much as we do?

Dear Standard:

I want to tell our Presbyterians something about their Home and children. Our Home is situated on the railroad about five miles south of Statesville. It now occupies nine buildings, counting our unfinished laundry and the Howard Building which has not yet been furnished. We have one hundred and thirty-five children, but when this new cottage is furnished, several more may be admitted. Many of the children who have left here are doing well and are showing by their lives their appreciation of the training received while here. These children are very widely scattered, but they still like to know what is going on in their old Home and to visit it as often as possible. They have an Alumni Association which meets at Barium Springs each Christmas and which holds them still closer together.

Two of our girls are at the State Normal, two boys at Davidson, several boys in the locomotive shops of Richmond and many others in different places, who are doing equally as well. A noble work is being done here. One that will have its influence in after years on our State. We older children know what is being done for us and appreciate it,—oh so highly! We know that many sacrifices are made by the good people of this State for us, and we do try to show our appreciation by the way we apply ourselves in the work here, and by what we do when we leave the Home. Words are utterly insufficient for the expression of our gratitude to our Church.

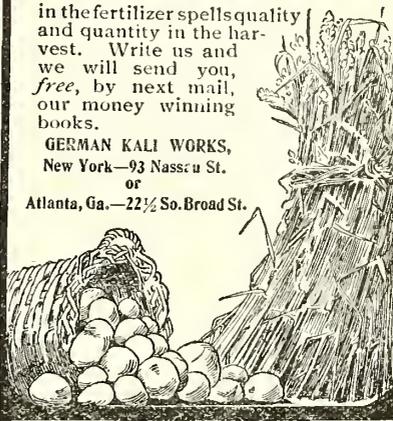

Yours heartily,
Carrie Powell.

A local preacher, at the conclusion of one of his sermons, said: "Let all in the house who are paying their debts stand up." Instantly every man, woman and child, with one exception, rose to their feet. The preacher seated them and said: "Now, every man not paying his debts stand up." "Peace, perfect peace, in this dark world of sin?
The blood of Jesus whispers peace within.

"Peace, perfect peace, by thronging duties pressed?
To do the will of Jesus, this is rest.

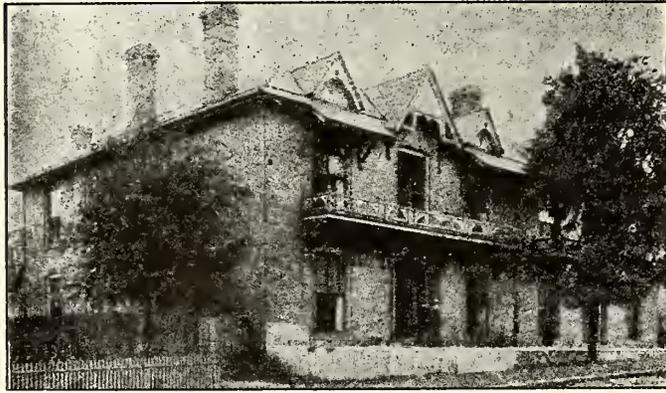

"Peace, perfect peace, with loved ones far away?
In Jesus' keeping we are safe, and they.

"Peace, perfect peace, our future all unknown?
Jesus we know, and he is on the throne.

"Peace, perfect peace, death shadowing us and ours?
Jesus has vanished death and all its powers.

"It is enough; earth's struggles soon shall cease,
And Jesus call us to heaven's perfect peace."

Event and Comment.

We like to keep tab on the colleges who sell the honorary degrees and are pained to announce that the President of the Nashville College of Laws has been arrested on a charge of fraudulently using the United States mails. We hope that the Central University of Indiana will not go into voluntary liquidation before our friends have persuaded it to pay for that advertisement in the Standard which may have gotten them their Ph. D's.

Dr. Josiah Strong was inaugurated President of the Institute of Social Service in New York City the other day. President Roosevelt sent this letter of endorsement: "This institute is fitted to render a great and peculiar service not merely to this country, but to all countries. Apparently it is proving to be the beginning of a world movement and is being recognized by the best men of many different countries as a necessity in each and all of these countries in order to facilitate the readjustment of social relations to the new conditions created by the modern industrial revolution."

The Congregationalist quotes Dr. Dabney of the University of Tennessee who says that "no people can be found in any profession with higher Christian character, more accurate knowledge of children or a more devoted spirit of self-sacrifice than the teachers in our Southern schools," and we believe that this testimony is true. And no one who has not been a teacher in the public school can estimate its value in the development of character, of the discipline of school life. Many a child who would never have been taught to obey either God or man has found that he had to obey his teacher, and has learned through that discipline to become a law-abiding, God-fearing citizen.

We are not surprised to note that the Rev. B. Fay Mills is out again as an evangelist. Mr. Mills was at the same time a member of a Presbytery and of a Congregational Association. While refusing to withdraw from either he announced that he held views which were clearly Unitarian and afterwards became pastor of a Unitarian Church in Oakland, California. Of course he was dropped from the rolls of the Presbyterian and Congregational ministry without the formality or the advertisement of a heresy trial. And now it is said that he has been too extreme for the Unitarians in his own charge. We cannot help wondering what the Rev. B. F. Mills is going to preach and why he calls himself an evangelist. An evangelist or a preacher of the gospel. Though the name has been slightly abused.

As an answer to Cardinal Gibbons who thinks that the public schools are vicious and godless and the Rev. W. M. Geer of the Episcopal Church of New York who says that the schools are bringing up a set of lusty young pagans, the Outlook asked the opinion of nineteen college presidents as to the difference in moral character between children trained in the public and in the denominational schools for college. The answers were unanimous that those who come from the public schools are of as high character as those from the denominational schools, including the Catholic, of course. We suppose that most Protestant parents would rather send their children to the public schools than to the Catholic, but then the real lesson of these striking testimonies is that the home is the real training place for Christianity for the child, and that the difference comes from the difference in the homes, and not from the difference in the schools.

The Biblical Recorder contends that [North Carolina is not Anglo-Saxon and in proof mentions the fact that it was settled by the Dutch, the Scotch and the Scotch-Irish as well as by the English. But the Scotch-Irish are Anglo-Saxon, though the Scotch of North Carolina, being from the Highlands, are Celts. As for the Dutch they are close enough kin to the English to be called Anglo-Saxon in the general sense of the term, even considering that they are not directly descended from the Angles and the Saxons. The distinction is frequently overlooked that the Scotch-Irish went to Ireland from the lowlands mainly, and are therefore Saxon, while the Scotch of the Cape Fear section are Highlanders and Celts.

The Standard thinks sometimes that the Christian ministry might preach more on the need of education, of the primary education of our public schools. They might lead the way in many communities for educational advancement and improvement. We honestly believe that the common school, taught as it nearly always is, by an educated, Christian woman, is far better than the Sunday school, for developing the character. Those who have seen how the unwashed, unkempt, wild and barbarous little tots, from unfortunate homes, are licked into shape, first by the primary teacher, who has to be a saint or a failure, and then carried on up through the grades until not only the child, but oftentimes the household from which he comes is transformed, those alone can appreciate what the school does for the child. And whatever other things he may learn in the Sunday school, discipline is not one of them, except in rare instances.

One thing about the Presbyterian system is that it puts no premium on ecclesiastical ambition. Of course it is something to be elected moderator of a church court, but who would lie awake nights for the honor of being the servant of a more or less deliberative body for the space of one week? Zion's Herald of the Northern Methodist Church is evidently disturbed at the thought, that at the coming General Conference those who have been trying to be elected Bishops for a long time, and who are therefore unworthy of the high honor, are going to be elected by some successful church politics. The South Carolina Methodist, the organ of the Colored Methodists of that State, is furnishing some right interesting reading on the question of the fitness of the negro for self-government in the Church. But then few white people can stand the temptations of monarchy.

We note with interest that in the last number of The Bible Student, Dr. Warfield, of Princeton, takes the same view of the unwarrantableness of Ussher's inferences from the Biblical genealogies and hence the untrustworthiness of Ussher's pre-Abrahamic chronology that was expressed a year or so ago by Dr. W. W. Moore in the Union Seminary Magazine, and still earlier by Dr. Wm. Henry Green in the Bibliotheca Sacra. It is the same view that was held by the late Dr. Thomas E. Peck, viz., that the occurrence of just ten names in Gen. V., from Adam to Noah, and just ten names in Gen. XI., from Shem to Abram, indicates a selection for tabular arrangement rather than an attempt to give all the links in the genealogical chain. The view is confirmed by the fact that the other genealogical lists in Scripture do unquestionably omit links and that these in Genesis are never used by any Biblical writer for chronological purposes. In fact, as the writers above mentioned have shown, and still more recently Prof. Vinson, in the Presbyterian Quarterly for October, the genealogies in Genesis cannot be safely used as the basis of a Chronology.

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

Right Thinking and Right Doing. The Congregationalist delivers itself as follows and the Central Presbyterian comments upon the deliverance:

North Carolina, so far as we can make out, has more free speech on vexed problems of State and Church than any Southern State. The last number of the South Atlantic Quarterly, published at Trinity College, Durham, has several remarkably frank articles by Professors Bassett and Mims and President Kilgo on the Negro question and the South's provincialisms in literary and political matters. Governor Aycock of that State is the most progressive and fearless of Southern governors. Editor Bailey of the Biblical Recorder (Baptist) never hesitates to expose sectional shortcomings, and Editor McKelway of the Presbyterian Standard is staunchly defending the Religious Education Association from the attacks of other Presbyterian journals and most of the religious weeklies of the South. A landed aristocracy never got so firm a grip on North Carolina as it did on South Carolina; and mountaineers are never as servile as dwellers in the lowlands. Whatever the reason for the contrast between North Carolina and some other Southern States may be, we are delighted to see her progressive educators and journalists doing something to break the depressing and debilitating unanimity of a section too long unanimous. The leading Presbyterian church of Charlotte, N. C., recently secured a pastor from a Minneapolis Presbyterian church, only after it was expressly stipulated by him that he was to be free to preach what he believed. High orthodoxy and low ethics—sexual and racial—have had their day in the South, we hope.

Says the Central:

Our friends at Trinity College, Durham, and at Charlotte will scarcely know themselves as "mountaineers," any more than educators and editors elsewhere in the South know themselves as "servile dwellers in the lowlands." But what about this sentence from the same article:

"The leading Presbyterian church of Charlotte, N. C., recently secured a pastor from a Minneapolis Presbyterian church, only after it was expressly stipulated by him that he was to be free to preach what he believed."

That does not sound like a correct report from old Mecklenburg Presbytery.

We think there is some truth in the statement that there is more freedom of expression in North Carolina than in some other Southern States, though our Boston contemporary is wide of the mark in assigning the cause. It is hard to get it into the heads of the little two-by-four commonwealths of New England how big our Southern States are. It would probably surprise the Congregationalist to know that Boston is much nearer the eastern corner of this State than the eastern corner is to the western. North Carolina is more plains than it is mountains, though like other North Carolina things, our mountains are higher than any in the East. Of course our secular and religious papers are better than those anywhere else, but that includes the North as well as the South. As to that Minneapolis preacher and Mecklenburg Presbytery, we do not know whether the Congregationalist and the Central would rather have a man preach what he does not believe or not preach what he does believe. We have a better preacher than any in Virginia or Massachusetts, at the Second Presbyterian Church, Charlotte, perhaps excepting Dr. W. W. Moore, Dr. A. C. Dixon, and other North Carolina exiles. But the Minneapolis pastor was a Southern man and he believes what he and everybody else ought to believe and this rumor is a piece of nonsense. As to Professor Bassett, his colleagues had been deploring the want of liberty in the South so long and so vigorously, that he was tempted to see whether he might say just what he pleased about the South and now he is sorry that his liberty was not controlled by his ordinarily good common sense. While Editor Bailey is a living exemplar of the liberty of expression which he denies that anybody in the South can possess.

As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he. Thought is the main spring of character. And that is true of a nation or of a distinct section of a nation, just as it is true of the individual.

One of the distinguished men who has been coming South with the Ogden Educational party, who had just been enjoying the first real experience of Southern hospitality and Southern unobtrusive piety, remarked with some emphasis, after portraying a scene that had touched him, the old-fashioned custom of family prayers, "Well, you have not abolished God from the Universe." The inference was, that in his own section, God has been too much abolished from the Universe. That is what too much liberty of thought may lead to. And it is better that thought itself be restrained, along the lines of reverence, respect for the moralities and regard for the decencies of life, than that liberty should transcend those limits.

The more any rightly constituted person will explore this theme, the more he will see that the distinctive life of the South, its old-world beauty and fragrance, its other world aspirations, are largely due to that enforced restraint of liberty, that is the inevitable result of the fear of the Lord and the keeping of his commandments.

And now we should like to ask our contemporary what it means by that last ungenerous remark, about the high orthodoxy and low ethics, racial and social,

of the South. We used to read that sort of thing in the Independent before we learned that it was impossible to read the Independent and retain one's self-respect. It is all right to condemn the vile person who slandereth upon his tongue, as the Psalmist has it. But for a Southern man to read the Independent regularly is to remain in a state of contemnation, as it were. We have also seen a remark or two of similar kind by a correspondent in the Congregationalist, but we had supposed that every one connected with the editorial department would know better. The words of Burke as to the man who brings an indictment against a whole people are in order. But taking the more charitable view of ignorance, we desire to correct and to instruct our contemporary.

The motive for such accusations against the South is not far to seek. The agitation for the abolition of slavery had to justify itself by a picture of the Southern master as a cruel and lustful tyrant. Barring the passion for reforming people at a distance, if New England had known the Southern master and the Southern negro as they each were, the Civil War would have been an impossibility and the abolition of slavery would have been a Southern problem wholly. The North is generally willing now for the South to deal with the negro problem. The willingness came fifty years too late.

After the war, the war itself had to be justified and the anti-Southern legislation following the war. If the Southern people were now what they were supposed to be, then a fearful mistake would have to be acknowledged. A generation had to pass before it began to be acknowledged. Who besides the Independent has a good word for reconstruction now? And yet it was once thought to be a necessary system on account of the dreadful character of the Southern people.

We suppose that it is a useless task to defend our ethics. And yet there are some things even known to the Congregationalist, we suppose, that should prevent its throwing stones. What about the number of divorces in New England as compared with those of the South? In Georgia there are 600,000 people less than in Massachusetts. In Massachusetts there are 400,000 fewer children of school age. Is race suicide good social ethics? There are 3,000 more saloons in New York City than in all the Southern States.

And then, if that is what you are thinking of, ask Professor Shaler to send you his monograph about the distinct races among the negroes of the South, from the light colored Arab to the ebon Guinea negro, and study that question a little. Study it, too, in the country, in the black belt, instead of in our cities. And then ask yourself, "Suppose every bastard born in Massachusetts in two hundred and fifty years were marked indelibly, and all his descendants to the tenth generation, whether inter-marrying with themselves or not, how many would one meet in the streets of Boston?"

And then, if the editor of the Congregationalist will just come South and study the home life of the South, its peace and purity, will consider how inviolate is held the marriage vow and the obloquy that is heaped upon any man who is unfaithful to those vows, the editor will take up a good part of the rest of his remaining editorial space in trying to correct the errors of his section concerning the Southern people. The Outlook, today, is a pretty fair example of what a little acquaintance with the South will do for men like Hamilton Mabie and Lyman Abbott.

As the readers of the Standard know, we have frequently objected to the Outlook's lack of clearness in discussing that fundamental of fundamentals, the Divinity of Jesus Christ. We know some people who have refused it admission into their homes, on that account. We know a Southern Superintendent of schools who refused it a place in the school library, on the same principle that he would have declined to allow a book of Robert Ingersoll's to circulate among his pupils. But we think that the Outlook is sharing in that return to the principles of evangelical religion which is becoming more apparent in the North. It was with some disappointment, therefore, that we chronicled, the other day, the fact that Dr. Abbott did not regard even the divinity of Christ as an essential for the minister of the gospel to believe. Dr. Abbott's mental processes are somewhat beyond us, sometimes, yet we as cheerfully record the following quotation from the second letter to a young minister: "In Christ, God manifest in the flesh, God has made the needed connection, and all we have to do is to take the forgiveness and the life he offers us, and taking them, go out freed from the past, to live the life of love and joy and peace in the future." It would seem that he believes in God manifest in the flesh. And again: "Various are his specific messages, but all these various messages grow out of this basic faith in Emmanuel and are applications or illustrations or deductions from it. It is the possession of this faith that constitutes the secret of the power of the evangelical ministry. It is the lack of this message that explains the weakness of any ministry which is weak. In so far as the so-called New Theology makes this faith clearer, it is stronger than the old theology. In so far as Unitarianism fails to make it clear, it is weaker than either the old or the new form of evangelical faith."

There now! Even Dr. Abbott, notwithstanding the Outlook's environment and the too frequent sympathy of Congregationalism, Unitarianism admits that Unitarianism does not make clear the message that gives the evangelical ministry its power, and that it is even weaker than the Old Theology. There could be no broader admission from Dr. Abbott.

And while we were wondering what had converted Dr. Abbott we turned the page and read this quotation from James Martineau, the great English Unitarian. It is worth filing away when one may wish to prove the barrenness of Unitarianism. If, as Martineau declares, the feeling of reverence, the habits of piety, the aspirations of faith, the hopes of immortality and the devoutness of duty, have lost their hold upon those of his unfaith, while remaining real powers among the orthodox; if the secret of carrying an appeal home to the hearts of men has been lost to Unitarianism; then why, in the name of common sense, should any one consider Unitarianism as religious at all? It would seem that these things would be the ends of a religion, even of an imperfect or a false one. And if Unitarianism has failed here, what is it good for?

The quotation is from a letter of Martineau:

January 3, 1902.

Your experience confirms my growing surmise that the mission which had been consigned to us by our history is likely to pass to the Congregationalists in England and the Presbyterians in Scotland. Their escape from the old orthodox scheme is by a better path than ours. With us, insistence upon the simple humanity of Christ has come to mean the limitation of all Divineness to the Father, leaving Man a mere item of creaturely existence under laws of Natural Necessity. With them the transfer of emphasis from the Atonement to the Incarnation means the retention of a divine essence in Christ, as the Head and Type of Humanity in its realized Idea; so that Man and Life are lifted into kinship with God, instead of what had been God being reduced to the scale of mere Nature. The union of the two Natures in Christ resolves itself into their union in Man, and links Heaven and Earth in relations of a common spirituality. It is easy to see how the Divineness of existence, instead of being driven off into the heights beyond life, is thus brought down into the deeps within it, and diffuses there a multitude of sanctities that would else have been secularized. Hence, the feeling of reverence, the habits of piety, the aspirations of faith, the hopes of immortality, the devoutness of duty, which have so much lost their hold on our people, remain real powers among the liberalized orthodox, and enable them to carry their appeal home to the hearts of men in a way the secret of which has escaped from us. I hardly think we shall recover it now. There is plenty of scope, however, for any young prophet who can bring into his mission the faith and fervor of more spiritual churches, in combination with the rationality and veracity of ours.

It is true that Lyman Abbott takes the last line and emphasizes it and applies it to any minister, whether he be Unitarian or not, but we can pass that by. The fact is that Unitarianism is irrational and untrue. The veracity of Unitarianism is a contradiction in terms, unless by that is meant the truth that is in Agnosticism, that the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them.

No, the faith and the fervor come from the truth of the Christian religion, Old Theology or New. And the barrenness of Unitarianism comes from its essential falseness. If Jesus Christ is not divine, why call one's self Christian? Why pretend to the forms of Christian worship? The position of Saul of Tarsus was far more honest than that of Gamaliel. Saul verily thought that he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth. There is no half-way ground. The Jew is more sincere and more logical than the Unitarian. Jesus Christ is either God, as he claimed to be, or he was so much less than the true man as the impostor or the self-deluded man always is. The world does need a combination of the faith and the fervor, the rationality and the veracity of Christ's religion. But it does not need the veracity of Unitarianism, and there was never yet such a prophet as Martineau imagined, a prophet of unbelief.

Review of Contemporaries.

Says our friend of the Biblical Recorder:

Our friend of the Presbyterian Standard once doubted a statement of ours with regard to the position of the Presbyterians on the State-aid question. In the report of the Synod of last week, we find the following paragraph: "Dr. H. L. Smith addressed the meeting in the interest of the cause, calling attention to changing conditions in the South and the relation of denominational to State schools; home discipline and training was emphasized; State schools are desirable, but with their limitless resources they are an annihilating competitor of Church schools. The strategic point for the denominational school is in the rising generation.

They alone are alterable and hence in the post of danger. They must be reached with proper religious ideals and substantial morality. Dr. C. G. Vardell spoke with great effect along the same lines. Of 1,915 students for the ministry only 110 are from State schools. The report of the committee was adopted." As Dr. Smith is President of Davidson and Dr. Vardell of the Red Springs Seminary, their utterances are representative. No Baptist has used stronger terms than "annihilating competitor." It is in order for the Standard to explain; and we look for not less than three columns and no explanation at that!

Now we can answer that in three lines. In fact, the Recorder itself has answered it. Dr. Smith is president of Davidson College and Dr. Vardell is president of Red Springs Seminary.

But the Recorder brings up old memories that tempt one to a slight enlargement on the general theme. The Recorder's proposition was that the State institutions were inimical to the Christian churches and to Christian institutions, and presumed to say that this was the view of many Presbyterians. We challenged the proof of the latter proposition. He mentioned the name of Dr. Shearer, then president of Davidson College. We called Dr. Shearer up on the telephone and got an emphatic negative to that proposition. Then the editor spoke of the endorsement he had received in the heart of the Presbyterian country at Red Springs, in a speech delivered there, and a Presbyterian elder of Red Springs wrote that if those views were held by anybody within some miles of Red Springs, he was very much mistaken, and he knew them all.

But at that time there was some need to devote a few columns to the discussion of the question, for it had even been injected into politics and certain party managers had promised not to allow the needed increase in the appropriation to the State institutions if the Recorder would keep the issue out of the campaign. We think the Standard's record is all right on that question, as it was fought out then, especially as the Recorder afterwards confessed that it practically had no following, and, while not changing its opinions, was going to quit discussing the matter.

We heard Dr. Smith's speech, and so far as we recall, endorsed it all. But he was appealing to the Church to support its own. He was not laboring with the Legislature to cut down the competition, annihilating or otherwise, of the University. And there is a difference. Moreover, when we last heard from Davidson it was very far from being annihilated by competition or by anything else.

And then we believe in the parity of the eldership in Presbyterianism and President Venable is just as much an elder as President Smith, and one represents the Church just as much as the other. We might even quote Smith against Smith, Dr. C. Alphonso against Dr. Henry Lewis.

And then, while we are mindful that we approach the three-column limit, just because the Standard hates to see a fallacy go unpunctured, we desire to notice the argument from the figures given by President Vardell. The argument is, that as out of 1,915 students for the ministry, only 110 are from the State schools, therefore the influences of the State schools must be hostile to that calling. Now, the fact is that the great majority of students for the ministry decide to study for the ministry before they enter college, and naturally they go or their Presbyteries send them to the Church schools, in preference to the State schools.

And finally, as long as our State schools are manned by Christian teachers, we have everything to be thankful for. When they begin to teach infidelity, the Standard will go as far or farther than the Recorder in exposing them to the wrath of a people who fear God. And we cannot close without asking why it is, if we, 35,000 Presbyterians can support Davidson and five colleges for women, then 175,000 Baptists should be so anxious for the wholesome competition of the State schools to be cut off, by having their appropriations cut off? That is what we fail to understand, if the Recorder represents the Baptists.

MISSIONARY PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

—I noticed in the Missionary issue of the Standard the extract from Mr. Speer's recent book, "Missionary Principles and Practice," and the words of praise spoken regarding it.

I consider this book one of the strongest on this subject yet published. I wish a copy could be in every Christian home.

The price of the book net is $1.50; but I wrote to a friend who is a salesman for Revell, as I was anxious for the ministers of our Synod to have this book, and he said if 50 copies would be taken he would let them have the book at $1.12, or if 100 copies at $1.00; of course postage is extra. I have had some eight copies taken and if any one else would like to have this book, and will send me his name and address to Monroe, N. C., I will take pleasure in ordering the book. I write this as I believe in increasing all interest possible in the great Cause of Missions, and this book will do it.

Very sincerely,

Geo. H. Atkinson.

THE BETTER WAY.—Charles Wagner. McClure, Philips & Co. $1.25, 12mo., 265 pages.

This is a message, calm, simple, peaceful, from a busy Parisian pastor that hurried Americans will receive gladly. It is a plea for a sane, contented, faithful life—that came from a heart wrung with grief over the death of his first born—"In the very depths of yourself" he says, "dig a grave. Let it be like some forgotten spot to which no path leads; and there in the eternal silence bury the wrongs you have suffered. . . . A divine peace will come to abide with you—" His style is trenchant and simple. The book is an antidote to restless influences.

HEROES AND SPIES OF THE CIVIL WAR.

—By David Humphreys, of the original Stonewall Brigade, and, later Captain in Ashby's Calvary. 223 pages. The Neale Publishing Company New York and Washington.

These sketches are both biographical and interesting. Major Humphreys of Norfolk a ruling elder in a Presbyterian Church and a subscriber to the Standard, tells some of his experiences in the Civil War. His book has the unique feature of preserving accounts of famous Federal spies and to those who know Major Humphreys there can be no question raised as to the authenticity of these thrilling war stories.

Many incidents are told of the two—Lee and Jackson—who will live forever in Southern memory and love.

MODERN METHODS IN SUNDAY SCHOOL WORK.—Rev. George Whitefield Mead. Dodd, Mead and Company, 372 Fifth Avenue, New York. Price $1.50 net. 307 pages.

This book grew—as most real books do—out of the need of a pastor for help in the line which it covers. It is designed to be an aid to those, thoroughly trained, maybe, in theology and "Catechetics," yet who are face to face with a Sunday School that is missing its mark. It has been gathered bit by bit from the methods of modern Sunday Schools and has in it much valuable information for workers in the many Bible Schools in our country.

THE ROAD TO HEAVEN.—Rev. C. M. Howard, a Presbyterian minister, who has labored long and acceptably as an Evangelist in the South, is now here distributing an excellent little book which he wishes to put into every family in Charlotte.

It is very carefully prepared and the result of 30 years study. He has tried to condense into small compass the essential things of the Christian life from its beginning to the end.

It is commended in the very highest terms by a great number of evangelical ministers as the best book of the kind they have seen; and claiming to have derived spiritual benefit from its perusal, they have urged their people to study it and aid in its circulation.

It will aid in the study of the Bible and lead to its examination, help Christians to answer their doubts, strengthen their faith, guide them in doubtful cases, show them how to win souls, guide their families, make the prayer meeting interesting, etc. It should, also, persuade the unconverted, young and old, to begin this blessed life. One chapter is devoted to the small child-Christian.

Mr. Howard is offering the book of 100 pages, nicely bound, at the low price of 5 cents and giving a beautiful stereopticon exhibition and a very instructive lecture free to all who buy the book—doing this work entirely at his own expense.

The book can be seen at Houston & Dixon's book store.

THE STORY OF THE NAZARENE.—Noah K. Davis. Fleming H. Revell Co. $1.75 net. A Layman's Life of Christ.

Dr. Davis has for twenty-five years lectured to a voluntary student Bible class on Sunday afternoon. The long study given, his scholarship and his sympathy with men, have specially fitted him to make a popular presentation of this greatest of all themes—the story of which men will never tire. The gospel narrative as told by the four evangelists has been arranged in historical order and great care has been taken to enable the reader to get a clear notion of their orderly occurrence.

Jewish and Roman history is interwoven and the outline sketch of the evangelists has been filled in with imaginary details, to make more vivid and distinct "the love story of the wooing of humanity to become the bride of the princely heir to the throne of the universe."

Dr. Davis is a native of Alabama, and has written books on Psychology and Ethics. Since 1873 he has occupied the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University of Virginia.

THE NEW ERA IN THE PHILIPPINES.—Rev. Arthur J. Brown. Fleming H. Revell Company. $1.25 net.

This bristling statement of the conditions of the Philippines was gathered first-hand in the islands by Dr. Brown who is Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Northern Presbyterian Church, and it will help toward a clearer understanding of the state of transition through which the possessions which came to us so suddenly, are passing. The population is supposed to be 8,000,000, among whom are scattered what Dr. Pentecost calls the worst lot of apostate American "bums" and blackguards to be found in any part of the world. There is a chapter on "The Beginnings of Protestant Missions," and one on the "Remarkable Progress of Protestantism." In the Presbyterian Station at Manila 410 were converted during the third year. The conflict of moral forces is beginning. What the New Era is to be can not yet be told, but it can not be worse than the old.

Getting Ready to Live.

A good many of us are just "getting through the days." We are not living. We all know the difference between conscious, abundant life, and the feverish waste of vitality in ceaseless effort to get ready to live.

We are spending days, and, too often, nights in pushing our way through a forest where the tangled undergrowth of dangers and duties and difficulties has to be fought step by step. We say, "Just let me surmount this obstacle, execute this piece of work, trample down these stinging brambles and thorns of opposition, gather up these fragments of things undone that ought to be done, and I shall stand out in the open—in a large free place. Then I can truly live. Then shall I be able to put all my best powers of will and heart and hand upon objects worthy of their best. Then shall mere existence become abundant life."

So long as the soul can beguile itself with the hope of getting through with the hampering obstructions, it is well. If we can keep even a distant glimpse of the open, see the sky shining through the forest gloom, feel the warmth filtering down through the shade, get a sight of the stars now and then, the courage lasts and we can struggle on.

For too many of us, however, neither the sunlight nor the stars are in sight. The difficulties close around us. There is no life till we reach the light, and no light till we get through and out into the broad spaces under the blessed sky. So we struggle on, living "at a poor dying rate," or dying in the effort to get ready to live truly.

If only here and there a sufferer was writhing in this struggle, we might leave them to find the way to life by themselves. But their name is Legion. Indeed, the exception is the man or the woman who is not simply "getting ready to live." The thing to be enjoyed is in the future. The thing to be endured, or overcome, is here today.

No, the fact is that that future is a mirage, a dream, creation of our own hopes and aspirations. It does not exist except as a possibility, an uncertainty. This wearisome today, with its forest glooms, its rocky paths, its thorny ways, its cruel drive and rush and strain; this is not a battlefield beyond which is life. This is life, the material to be transmuted by divine processes wrought by God and the soul into life real, abundant, eternal. Life is not to come to us after, but in the daily stress. Nothing is to be gained by seeking "a way of escape." The honest and true soul is not seeking such a way, but a way of life, and it lies always just in the present hour, the present burden, the present joy, or care.—Exchange.

Why is it that we are so busy with the future? It is not our province; and is there not a criminal interference with Him to whom it belongs, in our feverish, anxious attempts to dispose of it, and in filling it up with shadows of good and evil shaped by our own wild imaginations? To do God's will as fast as it is made known to us, to inquire hourly—I had almost said, each moment—what he requires of us, and to leave ourselves, our friends, and every interest at his control, with a cheerful trust that the path which he marks out leads to our perfection and to himself,—this is at once our duty and happiness; and why will we not walk in the plain, simple way?—William E. Channing.

You have your cross, my friend. . . . There is pain in the duty which you do. But if in all your pain you know that God's love is becoming a dearer and plainer truth to you and the vision of the world's redemption is growing more certain and bright, then you can be more than brave; you can triumph in every task, in every sacrifice. Your cross has won something of the beauty and glory of your Lord's. Rejoice and be glad, for you are crucified with Christ.—Phillips Brooks.

To the Church's Advance Guard.

In the North waters, off this beautiful coast of Cuba, we see, and feel the influence of one of those mysterious currents in the great ocean that tell so signally on climate and life wherever they move. The wonderful Gulf Stream, flowing out of the heart of tropical waters, so full and strong as to pass its leagues of distance, through colder waters, unmixed and unchilled.

But a greater current has reached us, akin, yea even of that great river that Ezekiel saw promised to go down into the desert. Waters of the Spirit, waters of sympathy, of prayer, of interest, of consecration, of life. Flowing out of your hearts, dear friends, and we are feeling their blessed influence.

Its waters are coming about our efforts and they grow with renewed life. "For everything liveth whither the river cometh." A growing current—"And it shall come to pass that the fishes shall stand upon it,—a place to spread forth nets. And their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many."

Last Monday I saw a fair sight. Caibarien bay at high noon, full of white winged fishing smacks. At early morning they had gone out their several ways.

Now, so far apart, they were sprinkled like thistle down over the great sea—motionless, patient, intent. Only a white sail wing, as wide as prayer, as brave as hope, showing where their anchors held. Think of us as such, oh friends. Keep the sea calm and still for fishers and fish. And then at evening our nets will be breaking for the multitude of fishes, ours, and yours, and His.

Ever since this advance at home I have felt afresh my duty to send in reports. But the actual circumstance of work has been more engrossing than ever. So I will begin today and send in my first report to you—churches, societies and individuals of the Forward Movement.

In the first days of June we had our orders for Caibarien. By we, I mean my niece, Miss Edith Houston, and myself who form a species of missionary partnership.

As we had both just come through a rather hard school year, we felt the wheels had to be gone over first or no good work could be done. At this juncture the "special providing" came from a dear friend in Cuba, Mrs. Richard Pattin, of Tinguaro Central, one of the great sugar plantations of the island, to come to them and rest two weeks. We gladly accepted one half of this generous invitation.

Our week there was delightful. The gigantic engine that is the beating heart of an ingenio, (sugar plantation) had just stopped. The cane fields were empty and the colonias full of chattering resting people, enjoying what is called "the dead time," the cessation of the fearful grind under that acre of grey roof, where, during the season, it resembles Heaven in two points at least—no night nor sleep there. Electric lights flash from sill to coping, and the army of workers are alert and sleepless night and day, with few off hours. Some of the head men working 18 hours of the 24. A hot bed for diseases in all their varieties.

But we were there in its Sabbath time, when the great chimney lifted itself more like a monument than a belching volcanic outlet.

Due to this rest we arrived at Caibarien with an excess of missionary enthusiasm. Another source of stimulus to us was the cordial welcome of our old friends in and out of the church. Formerly we occupied several rooms in the same building of the mission chapel. Beside producing a species of monastic feeling we do not cherish, we felt the chapel should be used solely as a church, to exert the best influence. So when we found a nice new little house for rent near the chapel we arranged to take it at once.

Sunday School Lesson.

BY REV. H. G. HILL, D. D.

Solomon's Wise Choice.

(Owing to an accident to the Sunday School Lesson prepared by Dr. Hill just when ready to set it up we have had to substitute Dr. McLaren's Suggestions, taken bodily from the Sunday School Times.)

1 Kings 1:15. Dec. 6th.

The story of Solomon's choice has parallels in the literature of many lands, and it is in essence repeated in every life. We have all to make our selection as to what our chief aim shall be. But the misery is that the alternatives are not put before us so sharply as in his case, and that many of us do not so much choose our paths by a conscious exercise of will as drift into them, and so settle our destiny without knowing it. Solomon calls himself "a little child," but that must be taken as a strong expression of his conscious inexperience, for he was already married and had a son, and was probably over twenty years of age. Still, the story holds up an example to all young people.

The first point to be noted is Solomon's thought of himself and his office. The natural buoyant confidence of youth, largely due to inexperience, is a merciful provision, and without a portion of it a young man will not go far. But it needs to be tempered with other thoughts or it ferments into rashness, want of reverence, and presumption, which is sure to come to grief. If a young man carries his head high he will soon hit it against some lintel that will give a shrewd knock. So Solomon should be a pattern of how to tone down the excess of self-confidence. Note his reverence for his father and his rule. To underestimate their predecessors and their work is characteristic of young beginners. Depreciation of them is a veiled praise of ourselves. "Now we are going to show these antiquated fumlbers how to do it." But it is more wholesome to recognize the predecessors' work, even though we may see its limitations.

Solomon thought of his rule as a responsibility, not as an opportunity for self-indulgence. Life opens before the young as a garden of pleasures, and sweet voices whisper: Come and "gather ye roses while ye may." Sense is strong and the blood runs fast, experience is limited, and the thorns round the roses have not yet pricked. But the young man or woman who ignores the serious aspect of life, and forgets that it is not a place for self-indulgence and "having a good time," but a field for stern battle and for self-denying service, begin with an ignoble and false ideal, and can end only in wrecking his or her ship. If we rightly saw the tremendous possibilities in our lives, however humble, we should be, like Solomon, appalled at their greatness, and conscious of our utter inability to rise to the height of the demands made on us. To think loftily of our duties and lowly of our capacities does not paralyze, but stimulates, and, what is better, it drives us to God for help.

Again we may note the pitfalls of youth which Solomon avoided. He had, as we have said, a lofty ideal of his office, and that lifted his "clear spirit" to set before himself a noble aim and to cherish chiefly a worthy desire. He did not ask for himself any of the good things that an ardent young soul, set in so high a place, might have wished for. Long life, riches, victory, are all legitimate objects of desire, but if a young man sets out in life with the belief that any of these, or any other transient and material good, is the best thing, then whatever success in attaining his chosen good may attend him, he has wasted the years, and his epitaph will be "Thou fool." No aim but one, the possession of God in the spirit, is adequate to our capacities or our needs; and whoever pursues others, to the exclusion or weakening of that supreme and only worthy object, shoots wide of the mark at which he should aim, and will probably not hit the low one at which he does aim, or, if he hits it, will find out its worthlessness.

An Anti-Worry Meeting.

John 11:1.

Topic for Dec. 1.

I was sojourning a few days last month in a Texas town. I entered the office of a firm of real estate dealers. The head of the firm was a Presbyterian elder who had passed three score and ten. During my visit I had occasion to do some writing, and the aged member of the firm invited me to a seat at his private desk. As the roll-top of his desk was pushed back, I noticed a strip of paper posted along the lower edge which stood out plainly when the desk was open. On it were written these words: "Don't worry. Put your trust in Providence and do the best you can." I read the words and then looked at the face of the man who had put them there. His attention was attracted for the time to another part of the room, and I had an opportunity to study his countenance without his noticing me. He was past seventy, and yet the years had dealt kindly with him. Time had drawn few lines across his face. His eyes were bright and his step light for a man of his years. His voice was cherry and it was good to hear him speak. Others in the office brought questions to him which troubled them, but he always answered them quietly and without drawing his face into a frown. Cheerfulness with him was a habit and it seemed that nothing could disturb the calm of his life. As I became better acquainted with him I found that he had troubles, but he didn't worry about them. He was putting his trust in the Lord and all would be well. I asked others about him and learned that he was loved in the community. Young business men would consult him about their affairs because he always was wise in his words of counsel and encouraged them and enabled them to take a hopeful view of things that had seemed unpromising. What an object lesson such a one is in any community? By placing his trust in God and not worrying, he was not only happier himself, but made everyone happy with whom he came in contact.

Another aged man said very truthfully, "I am an old man and have had lots of trouble, but the most of it never happened." The majority of the troubles, which have worried the most of us never happened. That is a wise old saying which runs, "Don't cross the bridge until you come to it," or as in Robinson Crusoe, "Never trouble trouble until trouble troubles you," or even more aptly put by Mrs. Wiggs of "Cabbage Patch" fame, "Don't hist your umbrellar till it rains." Cheerfulness is a life power. Then, while we dislike to own it as such, the habit of always worrying is but one way of expressing the skepticism that is in us. "Cast thy burden on the Lord and He will sustain thee," are the words of Scripture, and it is comforting to get the sense of these words as given in the margin of the revised version. There the word is not burden, but gift. We are taught that our burdens are gifts. They are God's gifts by which we are to gain strength, but the strength comes by our falling back on God. The trouble is we prefer to carry these burdens ourselves and they crush us down to the earth. There is an old legend which tells us that when the birds were first created they were not given wings, but were placed up in the bushes and some burdens were laid on the ground which they were told to bear. They hopped down from branch to branch and on reaching the ground they took the burdens on their backs, when behold, the burdens grew fast and became wings on which they soared aloft. So the teaching is that our burdens, when borne cheerfully, become pinions on which we soar heavenward. "Don't worry. Put your trust in Providence and do the best you can."

Gordon's Reminiscencies of the Civil War.

By Rev. J. R. Bridges, D. D.

Some time ago I wrote a review of Forrest's Life, and the Standard received a scoring for publishing such reviews in a religious paper.

I therefore preface this review by giving notice that it must be read on week-days along with the advertisements and certain editorials.

The War has been over for thirty-eight years and more, and many books have been written about it, from the point of view of the North and of the South, but nothing has ever been published that can be compared with this book, not only because distance from such stirring events enables one to look at them more dispassionately, but also because the writer approaches his subject in a spirit worthy of imitation by writers everywhere.

The book is not a dry account of the battles and marches, but it is just what its title says—"Reminiscences," a connected story, such as an old soldier would tell around the fire-fightings in abundance, blood enough and to spare, but varied with anecdotes and character sketches.

The following incidents illustrate the different characters of the two great figures on the Confederate side, in one of which we see that General Lee, although Commander-in-Chief, was willing to change his plans at Jackson's suggestion, whereas the other incident shows that Jackson having once made up his mind, could not be moved to re-consideration.

As the fight at Chancellorsville was about to begin Jackson rode up to the Confederate commander, and said to him: "Gen. Lee, this is not the best way to move on Hooker." "Well, Gen. Jackson," was the reply, "you must remember that I am compelled to depend to some extent upon information furnished me by others, especially by the engineers, as to the topography, the obstructions, etc., and these engineers are of the opinion that this is a very good way of approach." "Your engineers are mistaken, sir," said Jackson. "What do you know about it, Gen. Jackson? You have not had time to examine the situation." "But I have, sir," was the rejoinder. "I have ridden over the whole field." It seems that he had "Then, what is to be done, Gen. Jackson?" "Take the route you yourself at first suggested; move on the flank—move on the flank." "Then you will at once make the movement, sir!" said Lee.

Jackson, on the other hand, had entire faith in his own judgment when once made up. He would formulate a judgment, risk his last man on its correctness and deliver the blow while others were hesitating and debating as to its wisdom and safety. This trait was strikingly exhibited in our author's presence at Malvern Hill. Our author was sitting on his horse facing Gen. Jackson, and receiving instructions from him, when Major-Gen. Whiting, himself an officer of high capacity, rode up in great haste and interrupted Jackson as he was giving Gordon a message to Hill. With some agitation Whiting said: "Gen. Jackson, I find, sir, that I cannot accomplish what you have directed unless you send me some additional infantry and another battery;" and he then proceeded to give the reasons why the order could not be executed with the forces at his disposal. All this time, while Whiting explained and argued, Jackson sat on his horse like a stone statue. He looked neither to the right nor the left. He made no comment and asked no questions; but when Whiting had finished Jackson turned his flashing eyes upon him and used these words, and only these: "I have told you what I wanted done, Gen. Whiting." Thereupon planting his spurs in his horse's sides he dashed away at a furious speed to another part of the field. Whiting gazed at Jackson's disappearing figure in amazement if not in anger and then rode back to his command. Gen. Gordon points out that the result attested the accuracy of Jackson's judgement, for Whiting did accomplish precisely what Jackson intended, and he did it with the force which Jackson had placed in his hands.

One of the most interesting features of the book is the pen pictures of prominent actors in the Civil War.

As illustrating the narrowness of Andrew Johnson, he relates the following: "A few months after the War was over, I was passing through Washington, and called to pay my respects to General Grant, who had shown me personally, at the close of hostilities, marked consideration and kindness. General Grant offered to introduce me to President Johnson whom I had never met. Arriving at the Executive Mansion, General Grant sent in his card on which was written, 'General Grant with General Gordon, of Georgia.'"

When we met the President I was introduced by General Grant as "General Gordon" with some complimentary reference to my rank and service in General Lee's army. The President met this introduction with these words, pronounced with peculiar emphasis, "How are you, Mr. Gordon?" especially accenting the word, "Mister."

The author contrasts with this behavior that of General Hancock who was Chief Marshal at General Grant's funeral.

He had invited several ex-Confederate officers to participate in the honors to be paid to the dead soldier, playfully saying to his staff, that each should take his place according to his rank. "Of course," says Gordon, "I had no thought of claiming my rank, and I took my place in the rear of the regular staff. General Hancock sent one after another of his immediate staff to request me to ride up to the front, with the message that I must obey orders and report to him at once at the head of the column.

When I reached the head of the column, General Hancock directed the staff to compare dates and ascertain the ranking officers who should ride on his right. My rank as a Confederate General was higher than that of any other member of his staff, and he ordered that I should take the place of honor."

The author's impressions of Sheridan are decidedly unpleasant. He gives him full credit for military genius and for hard fighting, but he regards him as lacking in delicacy of feeling. The following describes his meeting with Sheridan at the surrender, when circumstances were such as to call forth the best in the victors: "I had never seen General Sheridan before, nor received from those who knew him any definite impressions of him as man or soldier. I had seen something of his work in the latter capacity in the valley of Virginia. His destruction of farms and mills and farming implements impressed me in conflict with the laws of war and inconsistent with the enlightened Christian sentiment of the age, and had prepared me in a measure for his somewhat brusque manners.

Truth demands that I say of General Sheridan that his style of conversation and general bearing, while never discourteous, were far less agreeable and pleasing than those of any other officers of the Union army whom it was my fortune to meet."

At a banquet to General Meade which Gordon attended, some one objected to Gordon's health being drunk on the ground that it was "too soon after the war to be drinking the health of a man who had been fighting for four years in the Rebel army." Says Gordon, "the moment the objection to drinking my health was suggested General Meade sprang to his feet, and with a compliment to myself which I shall not be expected to repeat, and a rebuke to the objector he held high his glass and said with significant emphasis: "I propose to drink, and drink now, to my former foe, but now my friend, General Gordon, of Georgia."

Speaking of presentiments among soldiers he thus describes the death of General Ramseur, of North Carolina: "General Ramseur was an officer whose record was equalled by few in the Confederate army. He had won his Major-general's stars and wreath by his notable efficiency on the march and in the camp as well as in battle. Of the men of high rank in the army with whom I was intimately associated, none were further removed from superstitions or vain and unreal fancies. He had been married since the war began, and there had been born to him at his home in North Carolina a son whom he had never seen.

On the night preceding the great battle of Cedar Creek, the corps which I commanded, and in which he commanded a division, was filing slowly and cautiously in the darkness along the dim and almost impassable trail around the point and just over the dangerous precipices of Massanutton Mountain. General Ramseur and I sat on the bluff overlooking the field on which he was soon to lay down his life. He talked most tenderly and beautifully of his wife and baby boy whom he so longed to see.

Finally, a little before dawn, the last soldier of the last division had passed the narrow defile, and the hour for the advance upon the Union forces had arrived. As General Ramseur was ready to ride into battle at the head of his splendid division, he said to me, "Well, General, I shall get my furlough today." I did not know what he meant. I did not ask what he meant. It was not a time for questions. But speedily the message came, and his furlough was granted. It came not by mail or wire from the War Department at Richmond, but from the blue lines in his front, flying on the bullet's wing. The chivalric soldier, the noble-hearted gentleman, the loving husband, had been furloughed—forever furloughed from earth's battles and cares.

Speaking of Beauregard and the love of the Creoles for him, he relates this incident: After the War a Virginian, an ardent admirer of General Lee, was extolling the great commander-in-chief in a conversation with one of Beauregard's devoted Creole adherents. The Louisianian listened for a moment to the Virginian's praise of Lee, and then replied, "Lee—Lee! Yes, seems to me I did hear Beauregard speak very well of Lee."

We wish that we had the space to give some of the stories as well as character sketches, but we only say to all Southerners, young and old, that if you wish to feel better and broader and prouder of your history, read this book.

It ought to be in every home, and it ought to be read around the fire at night, so that your children may not forget the great struggle and the great soldiers.

Then when you have finished the book, you will understand the greatness and power of the writer, because he was one of them.

The book is published by Scribner Sons, New York.

History at the University.

No institution on earth has a more tender hold upon the affections of the individual alumnus than this University. The love of the old Chapel Hillian for his Alma Mater revokes all the poetry that lies hidden in his innermost heart. Locate him where you will, in New York, Chicago, Galveston, his love for this hallowed place follows him on and on. It is a part of his life. He is like the vase in which the roses have been instilled,

"You may break, you may shatter the vase if you will, But the scent of the roses will hang around it still."

And yet with all this individual attachment and individual enthusiasm, all attempts to organize the Alumni into a strong working body have signally failed. Why? Because sweet reminiscence will occasionally bring men together to laugh, to speak and to weep, and maybe in an outburst of spasmodic enthusiasm some important business will be transacted. But in order to secure the steady pressure, the powerful force of organized enthusiasm, year in and year out, you must have organized business of larger importance constantly engaging their attentions and calling for responsible action. What makes men of affairs come from Chicago and Cincinnati to New Haven, Connecticut, every year? It is because the Alumni have some official standing in the affairs of Yale University, and there is an election of a number of their body as "Members of the Corporation."

It is believed by many of us that if the Legislature will pass an act empowering the Alumni Association of the University of North Carolina to elect twenty-six members or one-third of the Board of Trustees in its own way, it will that moment breathe new life into the dead bones of the Alumni Association, and a thoroughly organized body of men will quickly spring into existence that will every day in the year render powerful assistance in carrying the burdens of the University and in supplying equipment for its greater progress and its higher development. The plan of giving to the Alumni a business standing in the management and support of higher institutions of learning is not a new one. It has already been adopted in many localities and has invariably proven productive of splendid results. Such an innovation, while in no manner destroying the safety of the multitude will, in the light of experience in other States, shake off the shackles of inertia, bring to the Board new blood, new educational enthusiasm, and new capacity for expansion and progress.

The State Constitution, Section 6, provides that "The General Assembly shall have power to provide for the election of Trustees of the University, and Judge Pearson, in passing upon the meaning of this section in Trustees, etc., vs. McIver (1875), says, "By conferring an unrestricted power upon the General Assembly, that body could adopt the old mode (election of Trustees by Board of Education) or some other, and if the mode adopted in the first instance proved unsuccessful, set aside and substitute another by ordinary legislation; for instance, if the General Assembly adopted the old mode and that under the new conditions, resulting from the war, did not prove a success—then another mode, an election by the Alumni of the University could be tried, or any other, which on account of the circumstances, in the wisdom of the General Assembly, might be deemed expedient. It is evident, therefore, that the change can be accomplished very easily by a simple Act of the Legislature.

May we not learn with profit the lesson of many other institutions, and expect through the organized body of a strong alumni association to reach the volunteer, the philanthropist, the man who gives aid to education for the preservation of learning, for the cause of benevolence, for the purpose of establishing grand and everlasting memorials to families. Our forefathers believed in uniting the system of supporting education for the sake of benevolence with the system of supporting it as a means of preserving their liberties. Is there any valid reason why we should turn our backs upon the happy marriage? Because the whole people contribute fifty thousand dollars a year to the support of an institution for higher education as a permanent investment in good citizenship is not likely to drive away from its support the believer in benevolence and philanthropy. On the contrary, world-hearted men and women will be attracted to its support by the knowledge that the "University is as permanent as the government," that "it stands on higher grounds than other aggregate corporations, that the "trusteeship is of the whole people" binding themselves through their corporate agents "in special trust and confidence to apply" each of their benefactions "to the exact purpose of which it was created and exists." They will be all the more inclined to give, by the knowledge of the people's guarantee of permanent support, permitting and securing a broader and higher field of usefulness, imposing a binding and lasting obligation in public service, and breathing the fire of the love of country into the beauty of the love of God.

But there is much force in the old maxim, "We hate only those we do not know." Its truth is painfully illustrated these days by the ever-widening breach between labor and the far off managing owners and officials of great corporations. So it is with the University and with a large body of our most substantial citizens, residents right here in North Carolina, as well as with many who have gone to make and increase their fortunes elsewhere. I have no hesitation in saying that the first duty of an organized Alumni Association is to devise means of sending home to the minds of our own home people, as well as abroad a clear knowledge of the relation of this University to the whole people, its public service, its record of achievements, its pressing needs, its momentous possibilities, and most of all its glorious opportunities for making benefactions a thousand times effective. The December report of the President is a great step in this direction. But in my humble opinion much more will have to be done before we may expect to uproot the prejudice, overcome the inertia, awaken the interest and draw to our support the sympathy of many men in this State whose aid the University needs and so richly deserves.

The story of the Deems Fund is in many respects a happy illustration, not only of the channels through which great philanthropists can be reached, but especially of the wonderful fruitfulness of gifts to this institution. Some twenty years ago, as a memorial to the young son of Dr. Charles F. Deems, Mr. William H. Vanderbilt, of New York, supplanted the small gift of $300 from Dr. Deems with the gift of $10,000, to the University to be loaned, principal and interest, to such young men as need help in order to secure an education. Up to the first of July, 1902, this fund had not only aided three hundred and eighty-two faithful, active Anglo-Saxon youths to get a college education, but had increased by repayment of loans and interest until the whole fund amounted to $21,733.79, or more than 100 per cent. A splendid tribute to the industry and honor of the kind of men we raise down here in old North Carolina! There is pressing need for more money of this kind. Three-fourths of the six hundred students here today are the sons of poor men, or are here as the result of money borrowed or earned. "During the fall of 1900," says President Venable, in reporting yearly expenses, "about two-thirds of the students handed in accounts of their expenses, and from these accounts it was seen that those students who paid no tuition (holding scholarships) and also received their board as waiters, averaged $63.60 for all expenses, exclusive of clothing and travel. Those paying no tuition but board (about $8.00 per month), averaged $144.61, and lastly the average expenses of the student paying tuition and board were $265.25." Well may the University be proud of this record. Can there be any more fruitful philanthropy than the aiding of worthy young men to get an education at such an institution?

During the last few years there has grown up throughout the length and breadth of North Carolina a great number of small libraries in connection with the public schools and the graded schools. The number is now over five hundred, I believe. Such libraries are indicative of the birth of a greatly increased demand for reading and knowledge. Unless an infant library can receive constant direction and support from capable and intelligent sources, it is not likely to get much further than its swaddling clothes. Very few people have any knowledge of the ways and means of running libraries. Such information is not picked up at country cross-roads and in village factories. Library economy is a special branch of human knowledge, acquired by a few intelligent people after years of persistent study and extensive experience. Already in some parts of the country the force and value of these truths have been quickly grasped and complete State library systems established whereby the independence of the local library is preserved, but opportunity is given its management to acquire a practical knowledge of books and of methods of conducting a library from a great central source of expert information of library economy. Today there is no great library in North Carolina, no general knowledge of library economy, no great source of library inspiration. The library at the University is probably the best equipped in the State, but a feeling of sadness must needs come over the heart of every loyal son of our beloved State when his eyes fall upon our University library equipment. The building shelters 40,000 volumes and 20,000 pamphlets, but many of them are necessarily packed and jammed away in such a fashion as to largely destroy their usefulness. What is a library without research rooms, consultation rooms, seminar compartments, with but little room for the general reader, and less for the real scholar and none for the specialist, the man who digs down to the bottom of research and brings out the pure gold of human learning from the treasure houses of the world? Will not some philanthropist come to our aid and erect a memorial library building on this beautiful campus, with sufficient funds for equipment? Will not some great-hearted son or daughter of the "Old North State" give our people a great library, the head of the library system of the State, a great Beacon Light of Letters, lifting its head far above the horizon and sending its light into the uttermost parts of the State, to illumine the homes of all the people of every creed and of every station, and show them to hidden paths, to the kindly fruits of earth and to the eternal blessings of Heaven? Pearls and palaces and diamonds and dinners will vanish with the tolling of a bell, great fortunes will be made and lost in a century in a whirlpool of luxury and extravagance, princes will follow princes in the lengthening cycles of debauchery and corruption, but the rich fruits from this, the most beautiful flower of philanthropy in the garden of your nativity will give ever increasing hope and happiness to your people and prove immortal and divine!

We stand here today in Gerrard Hall, built half a century ago from proceeds of the sale of lands of Major Charles Gerrard, bought with his blood in a war for civil and religious liberty. Students and professors are called to worship here, and yet one-third of the persons summoned are unable to find seats. Within five years more two-thirds of the students and professors will be unable to find seats at these morning prayers. The religious life of the University is largely in the care of the Young Men's Christian Association. Over sixty per cent of the students and all the professors are church members, and about two hundred are members of the Association. Twice a week evening prayers are held by the Association. Four Sunday schools in the nearby country are supported by the Association, and it maintains also a weekly service in a near by cotton mill. Morning classes in Sunday school with an attendance of from one to two hundred are taught by the professors. Says President Venable in his report, "They have no suitable rooms for their Bible class meetings. No general assembly hall, no reading room and no library." Let us go back for a moment and recall that the Scotch-Irish Presbyterians of the Central and Piedmont sections of North Carolina were the first persons to raise their voices for this University as a means of preserving religious liberty for all the people of every sect, and of every station. Let us call to mind the story of yonder tablets to commemorate the names and the deeds of that host of our country's leading men sent out from the halls of this hallowed place. Not only is every epoch in the history of the State recorded here, but many of the great events of the history of America can be studied from these tablets. All of these and thousands and thousands more of lesser prominence received their formative influences in the great departments of society from this University. Church people of North Carolina, let me ask you if this is not the greatest strategic point in the entire State for those religious operations that seek to touch the heart of higher life and quicken its beats with the universal love of the Father? As an illustration of the strategic importance of this institution from a religious standpoint, permit me to recall the sublime work of Joseph Caldwell, who for thirty years was the "Atlas on whose shoulders our University world rested," and who during a large part of the time was the controlling spirit of the Presbyterian Church in North Carolina and Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Union Theological Seminary in Virginia. It was the voice of Joseph Caldwell standing in the pulpits of this University that, more than any other man, with the thunderbolts of his giant intellect, hurled back the furious thralldom of infidelity that swept over our State and threatened to encompass it forever in the darkness of life without hope, of mind without God. Is it not time to fling away Lilliputian ideas and let Heaven born Benevolence join hands with Self-Protection in the erection of a splendid Temple of Evangel upon this campus, commensurate with the needs of the religious life of this University?

This is no place for sectarian mediocrity. It is the true home of the Young Men's Christian Association, and a grand field for the great Evangelist of every denomination. I remember that during my senior year all but three students joined in the work of a great evangelist and evening prayers were held on many of the floors of these buildings. It may be observed that several of the leading Christian men of the State today received their religious awakening at Chapel Hill in the Spring meetings of 1889. I was one of the three black sheep that took no part in the work. In subsequent years I have many times regretted my course.

So much for volunteer givers of large amounts for great single objects. Before closing, allow me to call the attention of this body, and so far as I may be able that of the whole State to another department of this University, which from necessity has been sadly neglected, but which in the course of time will prove its crowning glory. I refer to the graduate department of which President Venable in painful candor says, "No special effort has been made to develop this department, as the strength of the faculty is taxed by the large number of undergraduate students." It is in this direction that the individual with moderate means can wisely and with great profit to the University and to its work in upbuilding the State, give the smaller contributions in keeping with the state of his exchequer and along the lines in which he may be strongly interested.

Fellow Alumni and especially you young men, we owe to this University a thousand times more than we can ever repay. We owe to the State and to the noble men and women who have given their hearts and their treasures to this institution a debt of great public service. Moved by the love in our own hearts that sends its warmth down into our very souls, and that lifts its beauty up to the face of high Heaven, let us make a great common effort to take up the burdens that our fathers have so faithfully carried, and lift up to a higher plane of strength and usefulness this grand old guardian of the civil and religious liberties of the people of North Carolina.

Can we not start here today and appoint a committee from this body to make, during the coming year, a thorough study of the problems of education in North Carolina with a view to uniting our loyal sons and daughters in the common hope and upon the common purpose of upbuilding this institution for the higher education of the whole people? We can have this committee report the results of its labors to this body one year from today, at which time a further committee can be appointed to memorialize the General Assembly at its next regular session for the purpose of securing its active co-operation in this grand labor of love which we have undertaken.

To these ends, Mr. President, I now desire to contribute permanently the yearly income derived from four thousand dollars. And it is my wish that during the coming year, this income be given to the fund for the erection of a building for the religious needs of this institution and thereafter to go toward the establishment of a fellowship in North Carolina History in connection with the University, but open to all students of all institutions for higher education in the State. That the selection of the holder and the scope of his work shall be under the control and direction of the professor of History of the University, of Dr. John S. Bassett, during his professorship at Trinity College and of the donor or a person to be hereafter designated by the donor.

(From address of Jno. Sprunt Hill at the University of North Carolina.)

A Pertinent Suggestion.

I wonder if people who are about to get married read the Standard. If they do I wonder if they are in a frame of mind to receive a simple suggestion? I will take the risk of making one anyway with the hope that their mothers will see it. The suggestion is one in which ministers are interested and that is my only excuse for making it.

Let me suggest with all modesty and yet with all earnestness, that you do not wait until the day or even the week of your wedding to ask the minister to perform the ceremony. My experience is that very few young people give the minister more than two or three days' notice at most. Often they do not give that much. This frequently causes the minister no end of inconvenience and makes it necessary for him to break engagements and completely readjust his plans. The other day one of our most useful ministers was absent from our Synod of South Carolina. We inquired as to the cause and found that as he was just on the eve of starting to Synod, a young man in his church came with a request that he marry him about the time the Synod would be in the middle of its sessions. There was nothing for the good brother to do but unplug his valise and stay at home. I remember very distinctly having a similar experience two or three years ago. I imagine many ministers could duplicate it. A few years ago when the great Ecumenical Missionary Conference met in New York a friend of mine in Georgia had his railroad fare paid and all his entertainment provided for to attend that conference and had to give up the trip at the last moment because a young couple in his church wanted to get married. They never knew what a sacrifice he made. That friend was the moderator of the General Assembly that met in Charlotte in 1897. I know of many pastors who have had experiences very much like these. Every busy pastor has plans and engagements for days and sometimes weeks ahead. If you give him only a few days' notice the probabilities are that he will have to change some plan or break some engagement. In the face of these facts would it not be wise and considerate to speak to your pastor before you definitely fix the day and hour of your marriage and see whether he has any other engagement for that day and hour?

While I am writing I will take the liberty of making another suggestion. Do not fix the date of your marriage on the minister's prayer meeting night. It means that he will have to dispense with his prayer meeting service and that is always demoralizing. It seems to me that more people get married on prayer meeting night than all other nights put together. They seem to think that Wednesday night is especially lucky. After some years of experience and no little observation let me assure you that Tuesday night or Thursday night would do just as well. They are just as lucky.

The truth of the matter is that after it is all over and you get down to the bread and meat question you will come to the conclusion that the luck of the wedding day has nothing to do with it but rather the pluck of the young couple who have entered into this holy union. Now I know that people who are on the point of getting married do not always attend prayer-meeting with a great deal of regularity, and it may escape their minds that there is such a thing as a prayer-meeting, but they might do well to step in and ask their pastor if the prayer meetings are still going on before they definitely fix the date of their marriage. I assure you that what I have said above is not intended to be personal and has no reference to the marriage question in my present charge. Thus far there has not been a great deal doing along that particular line. Therefore I can speak all the more plainly.

Walter L. Lingle.

P. S. Since writing the above I have been away preaching a week for Rev. W. A. Gillon. As I was about to board the train for Concord a member of my church in whom I feel a deep interest asked me to perform a ceremony for her right in the middle of that week. I had to ask to be excused as it would have broken into the very midst of our meeting. It was a matter of great regret to me, and as for the young couple I do not suppose they ever will understand. I give this little incident as an illustration of what I have been talking about.

Did Christ Go to Hell?

The passage of Scripture in 1 Peter 3:19, 20 has been interpreted by some men to teach that Jesus Christ went to hell between his death and resurrection. Some of the early Christian fathers held the view that Christ went to hell, as stated by Bishop Burnett in a quotation by Dr. Shedd, as follows: "Many of the fathers thought that Christ's soul went locally into hell, and preached to some of the spirits there in prison; that there he triumphed over Satan, and spoiled him, and carried some souls with him into glory." The Romish Church teaches that Christ went to purgatory and preached to the saints and others confined in that prison. The teaching of the Presbyterian Church is that Christ never went to hell. It is true that in the creed the statement occurs, "he descended into hell." This, however, is interpreted to mean that he "continued in the state of the dead, and under the power of death, until the third day," as the reader will learn from the 50th question of the Larger Catechism, which is, "Wherein consisted Christ's humiliation after his death? Answer: "Christ's humiliation after his death consisted in his being buried, and continuing in the state of the dead, and under the power of death till the third day, which hath been otherwise expressed in these words. He descended into hell." The passage of Scripture referred to in 1 Peter, 3:19, 20, it is claimed by the writer, does not teach that Christ went to hell. And it seems to me that the reasons given show conclusively that this position is a correct one. The 18 v. states that Christ was raised from the dead, or "quickened by the spirit; By which (19 v) also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison; which (20 v.) sometime [formerly R. V.] were disobedient, when once the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing." Now it is evident that there was some preaching done by some one, somewhere.

1. It is here contended that it was not Christ's preaching in hell. Because the nineteenth verse says that the preaching was done, not by Christ, but by the Holy Spirit. "Quickened by the Spirit. By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison." And again the Scriptures teach that the Spirit, or soul, of Christ went to heaven between his death and resurrection. For instance see Luke 42 and 43 when the penitent thief said unto Jesus, "Lord remember me when thou cometh into thy kingdom." And Jesus said unto him, "Verily I say unto thee, today shalt thou be with me in paradise." And then in the 46th v. of the same chapter we read, "And when Jesus had cried with a loud voice, he said, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit; and having said thus, he gave up the ghost." From these passages it is inferred that Christ, between his death and resurrection, was about as far from purgatory and hell, as he will ever be.

2. It is contended that this preaching was done by Noah under the power of the Spirit of Christ. In the mind of the writer this contention holds by reason of the following considerations:

(a.) It can be Noah's preaching and at the same time be properly spoken of as Christ's preaching, because the Scriptures speak of Christ preaching, when it was done by some one of his ministers. In Ephesians 2:16, 17, this passage occurs, "And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby. And came and preached peace to you which were afar off, and to them that were nigh."

This is called Christ's preaching, but it was done by Peter, Paul and others in the name and power of Christ.

(b.) Furthermore it was no strange thing for Noah to have been under the power of the Holy Spirit, because all the Old Testament prophets were under the power and guidance of the Spirit. "But holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," 2 Peter 1:21. "Of which salvation the prophets have enquired and searched diligently . . . searching what, or what manner of time the spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified before hand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow. But unto us they did minister the things which are now reported unto you saith the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven." Noah was one of those holy men, and one of those prophets, and indeed he is spoken of by Peter in his second Epistle 2:5, as a "Preacher of righteousness."

(c.) The spirit of God strove with those people before the flood, and doubtless much of it was done through the faithful testimony of Noah, for God said then, "My spirit shall not always strive with man, . . . yet his day shall be a hundred and twenty years." Gen. 6:3. It is clear that this work of the spirit was done by Noah while he was preparing the ark.

(d.) Again these spirits were disobedient to this preaching. The clearly expressed statement of the 20th verse is that this disobedience occurred at the time when Noah was preparing the ark. There can hardly be any dispute over a statement of the fact that the preaching was previous to the disobedience. Else how could they have disobeyed? Note the expression in the passage, which is that they were in prison, not for sin generally, but for a specific act of disobedience in Noah's time. That was disobedience to the requirement put upon them by God through the preaching of Noah. This preaching was done by the power of the spirit of Christ which may be reasonably expressed as the preaching of Christ "to the spirits in prisons," without giving any sort of cast to the view that Christ went to hell.

Why was he (the man cured of the palsy) to take up the bed? Because, as some one has beautifully said, there is to be no provision made for a relapse. Oh, how many of us have made that provision in the past! Yea, we will get up, but we will have the bed ready for a relapse. So far as you are able, make it impossible, by the absoluteness of your surrender and consecration, ever to get back. Step clean out upon God.—G. Campbell Morgan.

"What Shall I Do Then With Jesus?"

What shall I do with Jesus which is called the Christ? Upon this question hangs no fixing of His fame Nor limit of His glory's highest reach, For in the great eternal plan of God, Most High Christ's glory shines from age to age undimmed Unchanged by rage of man's rejected mind.

Nor hereby doth depend His place among the names That shine upon the envied lists of Earth's renowned. Mounting through splendid realms of gracious loving deeds, Sweet words and a forgiveness that is infinite, He calmly walks apart from all renowned of Earth, His memory revered; His name extolled by great, by small.

What shall I do with Jesus which is called the Christ? The lasting weal or woe of my immortal soul Doth on this very matter surely lie enwrapped, That bids me make it sure that answer wise be given. If answer wrong be given, my soul will, Pilate-like Commit mad suicide and drop to awful depths Of darkness full of fierce remorse and wild despair.

What shall I do with Jesus which is called the Christ? With answer right evoked I mount with Him who is My blessed Saviour, faith-accepted and confessed, To that high throne by Him possessed; and thenceforth through

The endless ages of unmixed, supernal joy Share with Him Heaven's brightness, glory, love, and life.

A Correction.

Editor Standard:

In your issue of Nov. 18, I notice that a certain writer, in an article on the subject, "Is sufficient Time Given to Missions?" takes the Synod of Arkansas as an example to show how short a time is given by our Church courts to the cause of Foreign Missions, quoting the following from my account of the proceedings of that body: "Dr. Chester seemed to be hampered and embarrassed by the brief time allotted him, but his address, though short, was pointed and interesting, and made a deep impression upon the Synod. The writer failed to notice that the Synod listened an hour and a half to Dr. Morrison, and gave the usual time to the consideration of the report of the Synods committee on Foreign Missions. Altogether, nearly three hours were devoted to this cause—more than twice as much time as was given to any other benevolent cause of the Assembly. There having been only two nights that could be devoted to popular meetings, and one of them having been allotted to Dr. Morrison before it was known that Dr. Chester would be present, and as it was desired that the people generally might have the opportunity of hearing him, the best thing that could be done was to divide the time of one night session between Dr. Chester and Dr. Phillips, which was done, the latter being given the bulk of the time.

If the truth were known, I doubt not that it would be found that all the Synods give as much time to the work of Foreign Missions as to any other subject connected with the benevolent work of the Church.

Dear Standard:

An amendment to an amendment is allowed by parliamentary law, both written and unwritten, and as my "criticism of a criticism" (as you named it) was of the nature of an amendment to Dr. Leyburn's article—though not to his liking—I wish to amend my criticism by striking out and withdrawing the words "a rider of hobbies and a teacher of vagaries" and substituting "out of sympathy with the great majority of our Church."

The words as first written do injustice to a dear friend of mine and a noble man, and I have found this out through a heart to heart exchange of views by personal correspondence.

But I wish to say distinctly that I was not converted by any or all of the words of "C. G." or of Dr. Leyburn. I have settled with them both by the same medium—private correspondence—and I do not withdraw a single word or line to which they objected (because of their objections.)

Cordially yours,
L. B. Johnston.

To the Editor of the Presbyterian Standard:

Sir: In your issue of last week you had a contributed article on the Salaries paid to Ministers of the Gospel, and, as well as I can remember, the average paid is something over $500 per annum. Now, it is said the average wages paid in the United States is less than $500; if that is the case, the ministers are paid more than the people whom they serve. It is also likely, that most ministers receive more than the average salaries received by the male members of their congregations and that average to be taken only of those over 21 years of age.

Are the Ministers entitled to more than an average?
Deacon.

[A minister should be willing to share any privation with his people. A people should not be willing for their minister to suffer any privation they can help him avoid. As to the average of salaries paid for professional men, that of those who have a prescribed course of education preparatory to service is much higher than $500. The question is, should the ministers be lower than the average of such salaries.—Ed.]

A question occurs to me as I read the article, "Can it be Possible?" which appears in the Standard of Oct. 14. The writer asserts that the Arminian theology, because of the absolute freedom of will which it attributes to man, makes the Almighty "powerless and dependent," "a mere puppet conditioned by the volitions and actions of men." As Calvinists, we believe that Adam, until his fall, was absolutely free to choose good or ill—that, though created in the image of God in righteousness and holiness, he yet had a freedom of choice, in the exercise of which he lost his original perfection, and became free, unless aided by God's grace, to sin only and sin always. Now the query arises, and I would be glad to have Brother Benn answer it, does our theology make God limited and conditioned and dependent, so long as Adam was free to choose between good and ill? and did God become free only when Adam by his sin had put a limitation upon his power to will and to do? There is one thing more pitiable, almost worse, than even cold, black, miserable atheism. To kneel down and say, "Our Father," and then to get up and live an orphaned life. To stand and say, "I believe in God the Father Almighty," and then go fretting and fearing, saying with a thousand tongues: "I believe in the love of God, but it is only in heaven. I believe in the power of God, but it stoppeth short at the stars. I believe in the providence of God, but it is limited to the saints in Scripture."—Mark Guy Pearse.

Keep the sunshine of living faith in the heart. Do not let the shadow of discouragement and despondency fall upon your path. However weary you may be, the promises of God will, like the stars at night, never cease to shine to cheer and to strengthen. The best harvests are the longest in ripening. It is not pleasant to work in the earth plucking the ugly tares and weeds, but it is as necessary as sowing the seed. The harder the task the more need of singing.—"Royal Path of Life."

The future destiny of this nation must depend largely upon the moral platform which young women occupy, and the height to which they elevate the standards of purity, temperance and Christianity.—Susannah E. Peck.

Everyone feels instinctively that all the beautiful sentiments in the world weigh less than a single lovely action.—Rousseau.

The sin that now rises to memory as your bosom sin, let this first of all be withstood and mastered. Oppose it instantly by a detestation of it, by a firm will to conquer it, by reflection, by reason and by prayer.—Channing.

Germany has for years facilitated the internal transfers of funds by a network of related banks, of which there is one in every city, town, or even village large enough for any banking, any one of which will receive money to be paid over to any designated persons anywhere in the empire. Instead of the cost of express company transfers or the routine of postal money orders, this system of transferable bank credits carries payments from one person to another with the least possible expense and routine. The payer deposits the money in one bank and the payee is notified by another bank at his residence that the sum is at his order and credit on calling for it.—Exchange

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

We wish to add editorial endorsement to the commendation given to General Gordon's book. It should be in every Southern home because it is written by a Southern hero. It should be in every Northern home because it tells what the Northern people do not know. The article on History at the University is from an address delivered there by Mr. John Sprunt Hill, and recently sent to us in pamphlet form. Rev. Walter Lingle is always pertinent and never impertinent in his suggestions. Mr. Allison discusses the theme of the preaching to the spirits in prison, under a rather startling head-line. The Open Court allows some of the brethren to express their brief and pointed views, with an occasional editorial contribution to the opinions there given. The reader will find other profitable matter in the various departments.

Church News.

NORTH CAROLINA.

BUFFALO, Orange Presbytery.—Protracted services were held in this church Oct. 17-22, in which the pastor, Rev. J. McL. Seabrook, was assisted by Rev. C. N. Wharton, of Warrenton, N. C., and a son of Buffalo. He did all the preaching, and his sermons were eminently scriptural, and very helpful to all who heard him. Three persons have since been received into the church, one by certificate, and two by profession of faith in Christ. Much needed repairs have been made on the outside of the house of worship. Work is about to be begun in the way of improving and beautifying the interior.

JONESBORO.—It was my privilege and pleasure to preach at Caldwell Academy on Thanksgiving Day. After the services were over and as I was bidding friends good bye Miss Mattie Caldwell, the principal of the school, handed me a letter saying, "You can read that after you get home." The letter being rather a suspicious looking one, and it being so seldom that I get letters from young ladies, I hadn't gone very far before the letter was opened and I was happy and thankful as most preachers are on Thanksgiving day.

Soon after I had opened my letter, I found myself sitting at a sumptuous table, partaking of Mrs. Dougald Shaw's Thanksgiving dinner. As I left Mrs. Shaw's a nice box of good things for Mrs. McLeod and the children was placed in my buggy.

As I reached home, Mrs. McLeod came to the door and said, "Mr. McLeod, hitch your horse and come in quickly, the ladies of Jonesboro church have completely taken possession of our home." And as I quickly obeyed, I soon learned that in my absence and while I was peaceably and lawfully trying to discharge my duty, we had been not only pounded but carpeted, coffeed, curranted, floured, hamed, jellied, mealed, peached, pickled, preserved, pruned, riced, raisined, sodaed, ruged, sugared, soaped and toweled. Mrs. McLeod's room was completely torn up. I greatly fear I shall have to bring the whole matter up at the Spring meeting of Fayetteville Presbytery.

Moral—If any of our friends desire to make us a visit now is the time. I have one of the best little housekeepers Virginia ever raised, and she knows where the things are.

But seriously, we now freely forgive. If the good people of our church have any faults, as we look today in our closets, on our table, and on our doors we cannot see them. Our hearts, desire and prayer to God is that He may richly bless them all on earth and finally give them a home with us in heaven.

K. A. McLeod.

DAVIDSON.—Thanksgiving services were conducted in the Biblical Hall by Dr. Shearer. He had received notice only a few hours before that this duty would fall to him and so had prepared no formal address, but his remarks were well chosen and suited the occasion admirably.

Our entire community and a large circle of friends in Charlotte sympathize deeply with Mrs. A. T. Graham and her sister, Miss Anna Irwin, in the loss of their father, Mr. Jas. P. Irwin, who died here last Tuesday evening after a long sickness, beginning with an attack of pneumonia. Mr. Irwin was in his eighty-fourth year, being in point of age one of the landmarks of this county, with whose history and topography he was intimately acquainted. His general knowledge of history and literature gained by a wide course of reading, made the old gentleman a very interesting conversationalist, though the increasing infirmities of age and difficulty in hearing caused him to be more reserved in later years. Of him it may be truly said he was a good man, liberal in his gifts to the Church and an unwearying attendant on its services till within a short time of his death. His body was carried to Charlotte on Wednesday 25th., for burial, the funeral exercises being conducted by Dr. Howerton at the home of Mrs. Osborne, Mr. Irwin's sister, and his elder by four years.

Rev. William Black reports gratifying results from the meeting at Thomasville, where the attendance was large and there was an ingathering of twenty or more, some of these heads of families and people of influence in the town. A church will be organized there with a most promising beginning.

On last evening a general reception was given in the lower rooms of the Shearer building to the students, the young ladies of the village, and a number of visitors. Quite a body of students from both colleges went to Statesville at the same time to attend a handsome reception given in their honor by the young ladies of the Female College.

HILLSIDE—Rev. D. Munroe, of Big Rockfish church helped us in a pleasant and profitable meeting at Hillside Church, beginning the 8th November, and closing the 13th. We enjoyed having Bro. Munroe with us.

ASHEPOLE.—Rev. A. D. McClure, of Wilmington, will assist the pastor, Rev. W. T. Walker in a series of meetings to begin the first Sabbath in December.

MISSOURI.

Rev. Xenophon Ryland, who has been serving very acceptably for some months the churches of Gower and Walnut Grove, in Upper Missouri Presbytery, and who has recently received and accepted a call to the church at Higginsville, Mo., expects to conclude his work with the former churches this month and begin his pastorate the first Sabbath of next month, Dec. 6. This call, coming as it does so heavily, from life-long friends, and with increase of salary, is very gratifying to our Brother and his many friends. And if the Lord will, may this pastorate thus auspiciously begun, be long, useful and happy!

HIGGINSVILLE.—Rev. X. Ryland has accepted the call recently given by this church, and expects to begin his labors there the first Sabbath of December.

HYDE PARK ST. JOSEPH.—Protracted services in this church are reported in which the pastor, Rev. I. F. Swallow, was assisted by Rev. E. F. Abbott, of Boonville. Partly as the result of these, twenty additions have been made since the last communion.

Rev. W. Beale and family have recently been the recipients of many kind and valuable remembrances, from both his churches, Bethel and Laddonia. These were all highly appreciated, especially the interest and affection that prompted the gifts.

FARMINGTON.—Rev. J. L. Stuart spent last Sabbath with us, and as a result of his earnest appeal in the interest of Foreign Missions, the sum of $316 was subscribed in a short time. When all the subscription cards are returned and the ladies of the Missionary Society have taken action we expect that the sum total for this cause the current year will reach $500. Add to this the $250 pledged by the Jackson church and we have $750 from only two churches, a much larger amount than was ever given for Foreign Missions by all the churches of Presbytery during any former year of its history.

POTOSI PRESBYTERY.—The Constitutional requirements having been complied with, I hereby call Potosi Presbytery to convene in the Cape Girardeau Presbyterian Church December 5th, 4 p. m., to receive Rev. Robt. S. Brown from the Presbytery of Columbia and to take all necessary steps to install him pastor of the Cape Girardeau Presbyterian Church.
C. W. Latham, Moderator.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

PRESBYTERY OF HARMONY.—The Presbytery of Harmony met in the Manning Presbyterian Church, Manning, S. C., on Nov. 19, 1903. Rev. J. M. Holladay was received from the Presbytery of Montgomery and installed pastor of the Manning church. Rev. W. S. Porter, Rev. James McDowell, Rev. J. E. Stephenson, and Dr. N. W. Edmunds took part in this service. Mr. McDowell was a former beloved pastor of this church.

McCONNELLSVILLE.—A most interesting meeting has just closed at Bethesda Church, Bethel Presbytery, conducted by Rev. R. G. McLees. Thirteen have already connected themselves with the church on profession of faith. This makes twenty nine additions on profession of faith to this church since the first of May.
J. K. Hall.

TEXAS.

COLEMAN.—The following resolutions were adopted by the Coleman Church on the resignation of its pastor, Rev. Dr. A. Oscar Browne, who has accepted the work as District Superintendent of Sunday Schools and Organizer of Young People's Societies of 3rd. District, viz: Texas, Missouri, Louisiana, Arkansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma and Indian Territory.

Resolved, 1st. That in the dissolution of the pastoral relations between Dr. Browne and the Coleman Church we lose a most able minister, a faithful and devoted pastor.

2nd. That we hereby express our love for and great confidence in Dr. Browne, as well as our profound regret that in God's providence we are called upon to give him up to this great Sunday school work.

3rd. That we commend him to this work for which we think him peculiarly fitted, and in giving up his estimable family we congratulate the community or people with whom they may reside, upon having such lovable people in their midst.

4th. That our prayers will go with Dr. Browne, into his new work, trusting that the most gracious God will give him great success.

Coleman, Tex. Nov. 15, 1903.

VIRGINIA.

FREDERICKSBURG.—Rev. R. E. McAlpine and family arrived here last week. They come to this place from Japan. Mr. McAlpine will make Fredericksburg his headquarters during his sojourn in the United States and contemplates leaving several of his children in the Home and School upon his return to Japan. He preached two earnest, practical and stirring sermons last Sabbath. The widow and children of Rev. J. E. Bear who recently died in China are expected here in January. She brings her children to the Home and School.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Four Ministers Wanted.

We would like to correspond with some ministers who are open to the consideration of great fields of usefulness in home mission work. Earnest, consecrated men, who are not afraid of hard work, are the kind desired. For further information address,

Report of Committee on Church and Christian Education.

Your committee begs to report that the year 1903 marks an epoch in the history of the educational work in Texas.

As evidence of this, attention is called to the following facts:

1. The work in all of its institutions proceeded with satisfaction during the past session, with a large increase in the number of students in several of them.

2. The present session has opened, in each, under most gratifying circumstances, again with an increase of students, amounting to 100 per cent in two of them.

3. There is a growing interest in these institutions, on the part of our people, and they are all contemplating enlargement and perfecting of equipment, from the increased patronage and interest.

4. But over and above all, there has been most marked, and an almost unlooked for, development in the spirit of mutual respect and recognized interdependence.

The slogan "United we stand, divided we fall" has been tacked up all along the line, by representatives of every institution.

5. There has been an urgent demand for some visible expression of this growing sentiment.

6. In two of our Presbyteries, Dallas and Western Texas, there is evident an increasing feeling of the need of a good secondary school under Presbyterian auspices.

In response to a call from the chairman of your committee, a conference has been held by representatives from all five of the institutions, within the bounds of Synod, and after careful deliberation and with substantial unanimity, the following conclusions have been arrived at which are most respectfully submitted by your Committee, as its recommendations:

1. That Synod authorizes the formation of a committee of five, composed of one representative from each of its educational institutions, to be elected one by each board, to be known as the Committee on the 20th Century Fund.

2. That it shall be the duty of this committee, in co-operation with the Committee on Church and Christian Education, to formulate and present to Synod, measures by which the work of the Synod for education may be unified, so far as possible, and the best interests of the several institutions conserved and promoted.

3. That this body, to be known as the Joint Committee on the 20th Century Fund, shall fix upon a sum which it shall endeavor to raise, for the benefit of these institutions, within two years, as well as the proportion of it to be enjoyed by each.

4. That it shall be empowered to select and employ one or more representatives of this cause before the churches.

5. That a collection shall be taken in all of our churches for this object once a year on one Sabbath in November.

6. That the money raised by this collection, and all general contributions, shall be distributed among the institutions on the basis agreed upon.

7. That special contributions shall also be solicited, which shall follow the course indicated by the donors.

T. R. Sampson, Chairman.

This Report was adopted by a rising vote.

N. B.—1. A meeting of this joint committee will be held as soon as practicable.

2. It is hoped that as many as possible of the churches will take the collection ordered in paragraph five of the recommendations.

3. Captain C. N. Roberts, Sherman, Texas, will receipt for all money sent to him in the name of the committee.

Austin, Texas.

T. R. Sampson.

Educational Conference of the Synods.

All the Synods concerned have appointed committees for the Educational Conference of Synods to be held in Atlanta, in answer to the overture from Georgia touching the consolidation of South Western Presbyterian University and Columbia Theological Seminary. The Synod of Tennessee appointed a committee, not to enter the Conference formally, but to attend and give reason for declining to do so.

Inasmuch as the Synods will not have called meetings in January, the date of the Conference has been changed from Dec. 8, to Jan. 19, 1904. I attach list of the committees.

Yours truly,

J. W. Walden,

Chmn. Board of Trustees.

Rev. W. G. Neville, Yorkville, S. C.; Rev. W. J. McKay, D. D., Mayesville S. C.; Hon. W. F. Stephenson, Cheraw, S. C.

Rev. J. H. Lacy, D. D., Clarksville, Tenn.; Rev. W. M. Anderson, D. D., Nashville, Tenn.; Maj. G. W. McRae, Memphis, Tenn.

Rev. T. H. Rice, D. D., Atlanta, Ga.; Rev. J. W. Walden, D. D., Athens, Ga.; Mr. I. M. Irwin, Atlanta, Ga.

Rev. G. W. Patterson, D. D., Montgomery, Ala.; Rev. A. A. Little, Selma, Ala.; Judge J. H. Miller, Birmingham, Ala.

Rev. J. J. Chisholm, D. D., Natchez, Miss.; Rev. W. D. Hedleston, D. D., Oxford, Miss.; Hon. Calvin Wells, Jackson, Miss.

Rev. J. G. Anderson, D. D., Tampa, Fla.; Rev. H. S. Yerger, D. D., Fernandina, Fla.; Hon. Chris. Matheson, Gainesville, Fla.

Rev. W. M. F. Alexander, D. D., New Orleans, La.; Rev. Edward Mack, D. D., Shreveport, La.; Hon. D. W. Pipes, Clinton, La.

Union Seminary Notes.

The friends of the Korean Mission are at present much interested in the translation of the New Testament into the Korean language now being done by a committee consisting of Rev. H. G. Underwood, D. D., Rev. J. S. Gale, Rev. George Heber Jones, Ph. D., and Rev. W. D. Reynolds, Jr. It is to the last named of these as an honored alumnus of Union Seminary that we would call attention. He graduated from Hampden-Sidney College with the highest honors, following up his studies by a special course at Johns Hopkins in Hebrew, Greek and Sanskrit. His appointment to the Board of Translators was due to his exceptional attainments in the Korean language during the first three years on the field, and his work in this country two years ago at the Seminary was by way of fuller equipment for the work in which he is now engaged.

For the past few years a good percentage of the out-going classes have chosen the great Southwest as their field of labor, and Union feels a peculiar pride in her representatives there. The pleasing news comes from Grandview, Tex., that in the recent installation service of Rev. Robt. McInturff, all who took part were members of the same class, 1900. Rev. R. F. Kirkpatrick of Wapanucka, Indian Territory, preached the sermon; Rev. Mr. M. McFerrin presided and charged the pastor, while Rev. W. M. Fairley, formerly of North Carolina, charged the people.

On last Sunday, Nov. 15th, quite a number of pulpits among the Baptist and Methodist churches were supplied by the students and professors of the Seminary, in the absence of the ministers attendant upon Conference and association. So far as is known the preaching of that day has had no part in calling out any discussion of the mode of baptism or of a limited atonement. On that day Dr. W. W. Moore preached at the dedication of the new Presbyterian church at Cape Charles, at the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay. Dr. Moore has been appointed to deliver an address at the eighth General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance at Liverpool, England, next June, but says it is not likely that he can attend this meeting.

Visitors to the Seminary from Princeton last week gratified our people by their enthusiastic remarks about our Seminary buildings and especially their frank statement that the Watts Chapel here is much handsomer and more conveniently arranged than the Miller Chapel at Princeton.

Beginning Nov. 19th, the Theological section of the Y. M.

C. A. will hold a triennial convention of all the seminaries in the United States and Canada, lasting through Sunday, Nov. 22nd. On the program are the usual strong convention speakers such as Mott, Speer, McDonald, Stevenson and others, who will discuss problems peculiar to the life and work of theological students and ministers of the Gospel. A strong missionary spirit pervades these meetings and open conferences are held on this and other themes. Union Seminary is represented at Rochester by Messrs. Munroe, Chas. H. Pratt, and Robt MacCaslin. An important feature is the exhibit from the various seminaries, showing views, periodicals and giving statistics.

Dr. A. L. Phillips' second course of lectures in the Seminary on Sunday School will be given during the second week in January.

The survey for the new electric car line from Richmond to Ashland has been made. This line is to pass directly in front of the Seminary on Brooke Avenue and will thus give us a still quicker communication with other parts of the city.

By invitation of the Trustees of the Valentine Museum a large number of the students accompanied by one of the professors made a visit to that institution a few days ago and enjoyed a pleasant hour or two among its casts of various ancient monuments connected with Biblical History. The museum contains a very fine cast of the celebrated recumbent statue of General Lee. It is particularly rich in autograph letters of famous historical personages and in American antiquities.

The Territories.

Oklahoma and Indian Territories furnish for the Church a great field. The work here should keep pace with the rapid development of this rich and productive country. With the men and the means it will do it. But a few years—yea a few months—delay will put the Church hopelessly behind. "Time and tide wait for no man." The flood of population and wealth is pouring in and it waits for no demonstration. Towns are springing up like magic, with their banks and hotels and public buildings. Railroads now stretch their lines across these extended plains in all directions. Now is the golden opportunity for our Church. "There is a time in the affairs of men which if taken in time leads on to victory." True in the affairs of the Church. The tide is on. Shall we take it? Our present force here is wholly inadequate. "The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light." Business men are investing their money here. Often within twenty-four hours after a town is surveyed a bank is on the ground with its doors open doing business right along. The Church should now make her investments, and I think that wherever a bank can flourish we can safely put down a church. But don't imagine that we can make converts as easily as the business man can make coins. The work is by no means easy. It requires even more push than that which characterizes the man of the world. Our work is not yet inceptive. It is initiatory. It is foundation laying. It is seed sowing. And this should be done all over this great growing country. We have just organized a church at Coolgate with twenty-eight members to begin with. Since the organization one lady has been received. Three elders and two deacons were elected, a committee appointed to secure a church lot and to solicit subscriptions for a church building. Brother R. F. Kirkpatrick of Wapanucka, I. T., came up and was with me a few days and preached one night. He will give that church one Sabbath each month till they can secure a pastor. Coolgate is a town of 6,000 people and we need a man for all of his time there. It is an ideal place for a young man, and a single man and an enthusiastic man. It is located in the mining section of the Territory, and is one of the wealthy towns. Already ten mines are being worked and something like three thousand tons of coal are being shipped from there daily. Each day of the ten that I spent there, preaching and visiting, only deepened the conviction that the place offers a great opportunity to a man of push and pluck. Faithful work will tell in Coolgate. We want the right man, right now.

Benington and Bochita, I. T., were organized some time ago, but are yet without houses of worship. The congregation at Benington has purchased a lot and will soon begin the erection of a building. And just as soon as the "Land Commission" sell the lots in Bokchita, our people will move toward securing a house of worship.

The church at Durant, I. T., has been without a pastor for some time. Efforts are now being made to secure one and at an early day the pulpit will be filled. The field there is large and promising.

The Presbyterian College there is a nice building and is having a successful year under the management of President Hotchkins. He has associated with him a fine set of teachers.

On last Sabbath the writer dropped in at Cods and preached at 11 a. m., for his old friend Rev. R. E. Telford and baptized Martha Charlotte, the beautiful little girl that God has given Brother Telford and his most excellent helpmeet. The Codd people can't say too much in the way of praise for their pastor and his wife.

I am now in the midst of a meeting at Caney, and will continue till next Sabbath night. Those out east having friends in the Territories will please write me their names and addresses and I will take pleasure in looking them up.

W. T. Matthews,

Supt. Gen'l. Assembly's Home Missions.

Durant, I. T.

Old Good Land School.

To our many friends in the east who have been interested in the progress of Old Good Land School, among the Choctaw Indians, we are glad to be able to say that the present term of the school has opened with the most encouraging prospects. The Choctaw enrollment has already reached eighty, while there are at least fifty applications on file, which will have to be refused as our boarding house and school buildings are all crowded to their utmost capacity.

The land for our farm is being filed on, and we hope to begin to put out our orchard real soon. The Indian Presbytery has elected a board of trustees, composed of twelve of the leading Presbyterians in the Presbytery, Rev. S. L. Bacon being president and Rev. J. P. Gibbons treasurer. A charter has been applied for and it is our earnest hope to be enabled by the opening of our next term to start the industrial feature in new buildings.

These are trying times for all kinds of Christian work out here. The lands are being allotted and many changes taking place, so many people pouring in from all over the country, so few either caring or working for the Master's cause.

It will not be long now until all these government boarding schools will suspend, not more than two years at the longest. After that there will be an interval of two or three years in which none but the city schools and those supported by some religious order will be kept open. We are striving hard to get ours on a solid foundation before that time comes, before the government withdraws its aid, and it is our prayer that God will open the hearts of some of His children who are blessed with a surplus of this world's goods to aid us in our undertaking. We know if our Christian friends in the States could see these people in their ignorance, their superstition, their simplicity and poverty, there would be many more workers here, many more Christian schools, and we believe our industrial school building would soon be completed. We as a race have taught the Indians all they know of Christianity, and have also taught them much that is not Christianity, but we have never tried very hard to teach them to work.

Among our students we have some noble characters, some bright minds, some aspiring boys and girls who only need proper training to fit them for work in the Master's vineyard, to enable them to be self-sustaining men and women in after years.

Presbyterianism has been the leading religion among the Indian people for generations past, but the time is here now that if we even expect to hold our own we must be up and doing, for other denominations are forging to the front here in earnest. The Methodists have a large school at Anadasko, supported entirely by the Missionary societies of that church. The Baptists have an industrial orphanage at Atoko, while only sixteen miles north of us the Catholics collect all the children they can board, clothe and school just in order to educate them as Catholics. They realize full well that early impressions, early habits fix character for life, and if we can gather these little Indian waifs into our school, teach them of God, teach them their text books, teach them habits of industry, we will be sowing seed from which the harvest will come by and by. But we need help, all the help we can get for our building, and should you, kind reader, have aught that you wish to invest in a needy field for the Master, will you remember us in our efforts to establish an industrial school for these poor children of the forest, who have in the minds of most of our Christian workers out here been "more sinned against than sinning?"

Sincerely, in His Name,

Bella McCallum Gibbons.

The December Collection.

The General Assembly at Lexington, Va., last spring adopted these items in regard to Colored Evangelization:

1. We would emphasize the supreme importance of Stillman Institute as the key to our whole success. The training of a godly and intelligent ministry out of their own race is our hope of the negro's evangelization. We express our hearty approbation of the character of the work done at the Institute. By requiring the students to work several hours each day on the Institute farm their health and happiness has been improved, a spirit of self-help and manly self-respect has been nurtured and the cost of educating reduced considerably.

2. We recognize the need of a better equipment of our plant at Tuscaloosa and we recommend that $5,000 be raised for the purchase of additional land, etc.

3. We call upon the Church to give for the support of the work at least $15,000, and we remind all pastors to lay this cause faithfully before their congregations prior to taking the collection for its benefit.

I have quoted the deliverances of the highest court of the Presbyterians, in order to base upon them an appeal to our loyal preachers and people. There seems to be a general conviction that we owe at least the same duty to our colored population that we do to all neglected classes or to the heathen abroad. We may not be at all responsible for their presence in our land, but we are responsible for their spiritual welfare. We are responsible for the preaching of the Gospel to them. There is no race problem for Christians. The problem is to evangelize and thus make good citizens of an alien race, whose home is in our land. For this God will call us into account. It is no excuse to say they do not desire our help. The Lord sent salvation when there were none to desire him. As a matter of fact they do appreciate every agency we use for their instruction in righteousness.

There are so many opportunities now open to us, it is sad indeed that we have no means in hand with which to take advantage of them.

I recently sent out an appeal for help to finish the dormitories at Stillman Institute. Few responses have come, but I have faith in the Christian spirit of our people, and faith in our people's God.

Brethren of the ministry, give heed unto the request of our General Assembly, and for the sake of the great cause, lay the matter candidly before your people. See that collections are taken, and then please see that they are forwarded promptly to our Treasurer, Dr. John Little, Tuscaloosa, Ala.

Never before in the history of the Assembly's committee were there so many opportunities of extending the work.

J. G. Snedecor, Secretary.

The Strongest Synod.

The article of "C. A. M.," raising the question, Which is the Strongest Synod, is interesting. The more correct way of stating the matter would be to say that North Carolina is the strongest Presbyterian State in the South and that was what the Secretary intended. Virginia shows a little larger aggregate in numbers, but Virginia Synod comprises three States: Virginia, West Virginia and Maryland. North Carolina contains 36,000 members, and one Presbyterian for every thirty of white population, which is true of no other State in the South. Texas contains twelve churches in excess of North Carolina, but many of the churches in Texas are small new organizations as shown by the fact that North Carolina contains nearly twice the membership of Texas. Let North Carolina have the honor of being the strongest Presbyterian State at present, but the scepter will doubtless pass to Texas in the near future.

Secretary.

GEORGIA.

PRESBYTERY OF ATLANTA.—The Presbytery of Atlanta met in Adjourned session in Atlanta on Nov. 20th at 10 a. m. The pastoral relation between Rev. J. W. Atwood and Georgia Avenue Church was dissolved, and he was dismissed to Macon Presbytery, where he takes the pastorate of Cuthbert and Fort Gaines Churches.

Rev. R. H. Morris, now at Princeton Seminary, was dismissed to the Presbytery of New Brunswick.

Rev. H. S. Allyn of Rio Janerio Presbytery, Brazil, was granted leave to labor in our bounds, and was appointed to preach in Georgia Avenue Church and declare the pulpit vacant.

P. P. Winn, Stated Clerk.

AMERICUS—This church has recently concluded a very interesting series of services lasting one week.

The pastor, Rev. J. T. Irwin had the able assistance of Rev. Ferey G. Henderson, former pastor, now at Griffin. Church and pastor greatly enjoyed the visit of Brother Henderson to his old field of labor. There was great evidence of the Spirit's presence in the meetings with the result that the church was revived and eight members were added to its communion upon profession of faith and it is expected that others will come in soon as a result of the meeting.

FLORIDA.

MICANOPY.—The pastoral relation which has existed for so long between the Rev. W. C. Milne and the church here was finally brought to a close on Thursday, Nov. 19th, when Mr. and Mrs. Milne were entertained at a farewell party, given by the Ladies' Aid Society held at the home of Mrs. J. A. Edwards. All branches of the church met together manifesting their esteem and appreciation with valuable tokens, which spoke of love and sacrifice. Jew and Gentile alike joined in expressions of regret, and all pray for a blessing on the work to which they have been called.

SYNOD OF FLORIDA.—The Synod of Florida met in the Presbyterian Church, Madison, Fla., on 17th Nov. at 7:30 p. m. The opening sermon was preached by the Rev. T. P. Hay, who called Synod to order and constituted it with prayer. The Rev. Wm. B. Y. Wilkie was elected moderator, Rev. J. I. Norris, D. D., Stated Clerk pro tem, and Rev. J. W. Lafferty Temporary Clerk.

Rev. T. H. Law of the Synod of South Carolina and Rev. C. H. Ferran of the Synod of Atlantic (U. S. A.) and Rev. C. C. Carson of the Synod of Georgia were invited to sit as corresponding members.

Reports from the various standing committees were read, approve, and adopted

A committee on fraternal relations with the Synod of Atlantic as appointed, viz: Rev. T. P. Hay, W. C. Lindsay, D. D., and Elder Chris. Matheson.

Dr. Law was heard in the behalf of the American Bible Society and resolutions were passed commending this important cause to all our churches.

Popular meetings in the interest of the Foreign and Home Missionary work were held. Drs. Boggs, Law and Norris spoke on Foreign Missions, and Rev. T. P. Hay, Drs. Morris and Anderson on Home Missions.

Dr. Boggs presented the cause of ministerial relief, and addresses were also made by Drs. Yerger and Anderson.

In response to the overture from the Synod of Georgia on the Atlanta University matter the following committee was appointed, viz: Revs. Dr. Anderson and Yerger and Elder Chris. Matheson.

The following recommendation of the committee on Home Missions was adopted: We recommend that the Synod appoint the following special committee on Evangelistic work: Rev. Jno. G. Anderson, D. D., Rev. Thos. P. Hay and Rev. Lynn R. Walker; that said committee be instructed to secure an evangelist if the way be clear, to endeavor to raise the necessary funds for this purpose, to direct the work of said evangelist with the co-operation of the Home Mission committee of the several Presbyteries.

Synod adjourned on Thursday night after cordial vote of thanks to the people of Madison, to meet at Ocala on 1st Nov. 1904 at 7:30 p. m.

The State Department has advices by cable from Minister Beaupre at Bogota dated November 25th, in which he states that considerable excitement still prevails at the Colombian capital. There's much talk of raising an army, but no troops have yet been enlisted and there are rumors in the city of revolution in the State of Cauca directed against Marroquin government. Rumors have reached the State Department from another source that General Reyes' mission to Washington is primarily to try to array the opposition senators against the ratification of Varilla Hay canal treaty.

Thus spoke General Reyes, the special envoy of the Colombian government while in Charlotte en route to Washington where he goes to confer with President Roosevelt in regard to the recognition of his Government by the American Government.

The women of England are to have a daily newspaper all their own. It is to bear the somewhat suggestive title, "The Daily Mirror." Large orders are being placed with the newsdealers. Great attention will be given to dress and fashion, and the services of the best artists have been retained. Paris has, and has long had, its daily religious newspaper; London is now to have its daily woman's paper; is it not time that New York should take the initiative with a daily newspaper of small size and reliable contents by which the busy man and woman can be kept well informed as to current events without the necessity of reading a vast quantity of padding, and news of things that "aren't so?"—Christian Work.

Mr. Hugh Stowell Scott, the English novelist, known as Henry Seton Merriman, died in London last week. There have been few if any cases where the pseudonym of an author who had attained so wide a reading as Mr. Scott has been so very generally taken for the author's real name. Above all things, Henry Seton Merriman was a skillful constructor of plausible plot; he had in an unusual degree the gift of the born story-teller. His study of character never went very deeply below the surface, but he imparted to the personalities he created life and individual movement. He was also unusually successful in the choice of new ideas for use in fiction. This was shown notably in "The Sowers," by which story his reputation and popularity were first established. —Exchange.

In 1890 J. B. Watkins built the St. Louis, Watkin and Gulf Railway from Lake Charles to Alexandria, Louisiana, one hundred miles. He bought and incorporated all the town sites along the line. The deeds for all lots sold contained an anti-liquor clause, which clause has been upheld by the Appellate Court. Only one violation of the anti-liquor clause has occurred in the thirteen years, and there will not be another. This is real prohibition. Mr. Watkins who has manfully stood up for his temperance principles, claims that the railroad above mentioned is the only railway in the world along which liquor cannot be sold. It would be well if there were more practical temperance workers of the Watkins type. —New York Observer.

Not only is the production of the magnificent long staple cotton of Egypt soon to be greatly increased by irrigation from the new Nile reservoirs, but, if we are to believe the reports given out by persons interested in establishing the cotton-growing industry elsewhere in Africa, arrangements for the production of that commodity on a large scale are well under way in various quarters. It is to be remembered, however, that the labor problem in connection with the industry is a big one and not to be solved merely by the issuing of a glowing prospectus. The annual report of the executive committee of the British Cotton Growers' Association, just issued, expresses satisfaction over the outlook for an early and marked widening of the basis of supply for British cotton mills. —Exchange.

London, Nov. 28.—Sir Thomas Lipton today received a telegram from Lord Lonsdale notifying him that as illness had prevented Emperor William from meeting his yachting representative it would now be too late to build boats in Europe and make the suggested 1904 race successful, so Emperor William decided to postpone offering his cup for Trans-Atlantic race until 1905. Lord Lonsdale added the Emperor therefore would not take advantage of Sir Thomas Lipton's withdrawal. Sir Thomas replied, agreeing with Lord Lonsdale that it is now too late to make the proposed race a success and pointing out that, therefore, it was quite useless for him to renew his offer of withdrawal which had already been accepted. Sir Thomas Lipton hopes to enter a boat in the race for the Emperor's cup in 1905.

Texas grows one-third of all the cotton produced in the United States. The cotton-growing districts of that great commonwealth, however, have been invaded by the Mexican boll weevil, to the great injury of the crop. Secretary Wilson of the Department of Agriculture, went to Texas last month to familiarize himself with the details of the work carried on at the government experiment stations for the purpose of finding a way to combat the destructive pest. Efforts to breed a hybrid variety of the cotton plant which the weevil will not injure, thus far have been unsuccessful. It has been found, however, that early planting, thorough cultivation, and the use of seed brought from districts where the weevil is not known, materially aid in protecting the crop from injury. As a result of his investigations in Texas, Secretary Wilson asserts that it is possible to produce cotton at a profit in spite of the boll weevil. That it is a grave menace to the South, however, is not to be doubted. At one experiment station the secretary found that twenty-five acres of early cotton raised twenty-three bales, while later cotton in a field of the same size yielded twelve bales, and cotton in a third field of twenty-five acres was entirely destroyed by weevil. —The World of Today.

According to the critics of Brigadier-General Leonard Wood, who are trying to prevent the Senate from confirming his nomination to be a major-general, he is an army doctor with very little military experience, who came to the front during the Spanish war through his acquaintance with President McKinley; who led his regiment of "Rough Riders" into an ambush at Santiago, from which they were rescued by the colored troops; who did what any other sanitary expert might have done in cleaning up Santiago; who inspired a magazine criticism of his superior, General Brooke, and then supplanted him as governor of Cuba; who administered the affairs of the island so extravagantly as to leave the treasury well-nigh bankrupt; who fastened the game of jai alai upon Havana by a ten-years' franchise, and received valuable gifts of silver and jewels from the gambling concern; who sent Major Rathborne to jail after an unfair trial, and who is now using his personal "pull" with the President to reach the highest rank in the army over the heads of a hundred or more of his seniors in service. —Literary Digest.

Now that the United States has won practically all that it has claimed at the hands of the Alaskan Boundary Commission, is it not time for the United States to put itself in Canada's place, and to do the generous thing by Canada? Anybody who looks at a map of southeastern Alaska and the Klondike region will see why the Canadians were so eager for a seaport on Lynn Canal or Glacier Bay. That they have tried to get such a port by asserting a claim which seems to Americans wholly without historical foundation, should no longer blind us to the fact that it is very hard for them to be shut out from the sea by so narrow a strip of American territory. What the United States was prepared to grant as the basis of a friendly international agreement years ago, it can now afford to offer without sacrifice of dignity as soon as Canadian sentiment is ready for it—the cession of a port for a Canadian outlet. No important American interest would be sacrificed by such a transfer if proper treaty provisions were made safeguarding American rights in the ceded strip of territory. There are the best reasons why the United States and Canada should be good friends. There is much to unite and little to divide the two countries. Annexation, it is true, does not enter practically into the present situation, but a close reciprocal alliance, with liberal tariff concessions, is greatly to be desired. Americans are flocking into the Canadian Northwest and Canadians by the thousand are useful and respected citizens of the American cities along our northern border. —The World of Today.

DAVIS—In Fayetteville, N. C., Sunday morning, November 15th, 1903. Mrs. Mary A. Davis, in her 48th year. Early in life she professed faith in her Lord and joined the Presbyterian church at this place. She was a kind and devoted sister, a faithful loving and true stepmother, caring for those who had been intrusted to her care in such a loving way as to cause them to have for her that love, that only a child can have for its mother. A great portion of her life was given to Sunday school work to which work she was very devoted, and in which work she was very efficient. It was the privilege of the writer to know her well, and especially in her work in Sunday school. Well does he remember seeing the faces of the little boys and girls of her class brighten when she was seen by them coming in Sunday school. She was a faithful and good woman, ever ready to do her duty in whatever place she was called. She loved others more than self. A good woman gone but her works will follow her. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

CHAMBERS.—The following resolutions were adopted by the officers of the First Presbyterian Church of Ennis, Texas, November 2, 1903, on the death of William Chambers, one of the most constant, worthy and devoted members of this church.

Whereas, Mr. William Chambers having finished the work God called him to do, having fought the good fight, having kept the faith, has now been called to his reward; and

Whereas, His humble, consecrated life, his noble deeds, like his Master, "who went about doing good," will always commend the gospel of our Lord to those who knew him. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, By the officers of the First Presbyterian Church, Ennis, Texas:

1. That we graciously bow to our Father's sovereign will and thank him for this consecrated life and the memory of such an exalted character.

2. That all our associations with this devoted brother, faithful officer, wise counsellor and cultured Christian gentleman were always of the most pleasant nature, and we hereby express our deep sense of loss in such an aggressive worker.

3. That we honor and keep his memory, imitate his virtues and dedicate ourselves more unreservedly to the cause of his Master whom he loved and worshipped.

4. That we commend his aged mother, his devoted sisters and brother to Him who is the source of all true comfort and pray that His grace may be sufficient for each one.

5. That a page in our session record book be given to his memory; that copies of these resolutions be furnished the family of the deceased, the local papers and church papers with the request for publication.

PERRY.—Nov. 8, 1903, at her home, three miles south of Newbern, Mrs. Sara Becton Perry, after a brief illness. She had a large circle of acquaintances and friends, and was loved by all who knew her. She was a bright and cheerful companion, full of affection for her relations, generous toward her friends, deeply sympathetic with those in suffering and wise in counsel among those in sorrow. Never giving way to despondency, she fought adversity with a strong determination to rise again. Bearing trouble with fortitude, she comforted those around her with the assurance that "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose."

She was a devoted, self-sacrificing Christian, exemplifying those graces which enoble and beautify life. Since June 7, 1888, she was a consistent member of the Newbern Presbyterian church. Her funeral was held at the old Perry

The Household.

Manners for Boys.

Poor fellows! How they get hectored and scolded and snubbed, and how continual is the rubbing and polishing and drilling which every member of the family feels at liberty to administer. No wonder their opposition is aroused, and they begin to feel that every man's hand is against them, when, after all, if they only in a quiet way were informed what was expected of them, and their maunliness appealed to, they would readily enough fall into line. So thought Aunt Mary, as she wrote out the following rules for a little twelve-year-old nephew, who was the light of her eyes, "if not always the joy of her heart, for though a good-natured, amiable boy in the main, he would offend against the "proprieties" frequently:

Keep step with any one you walk with.

Hat lifted in saying "Good-bye," or "How do you do?"

Hat lifted when offering a seat in a car, or in acknowledging a favor.

Always precede a lady upstairs, and ask her whether you may precede her in passing through a crowd or public place.

Let ladies pass through a door first, standing aside for them.

Let a lady pass first always, unless she asks you to precede her.

Look people straight in the face when speaking or being spoken to.

In the parlor, stand till every lady in the room is seated, also older people.

Rise if a lady comes in after you are seated, and stand till she takes a seat.

Hat off the moment you enter a street door, and when you step into a private hall or office.

Never play with knife fork or spoon.
Use your handkerchief unobtrusively always.

In the dining room take your seat after ladies and elders.

Rise when ladies leave the room, and stand till they are out.

Eat as fast or as slowly as others, and finish the course when they do.

In passing out of a room, let the ladies pass first.

Do not look toward a bedroom door when passing. Always knock at any private room door.

Special rules for the mouth are that all noise in eating and smacking of the lips should be avoided.—Selected.

The Dressing Sack Woman.

By Myrtle Reed.

There is a popular delusion to the effect that household tasks require slipshod garments and unkempt hair. Let the frowsy ones contemplate the trained nurse, and in her spotless uniform with her snowy cap and apron, and her shining hair. Let the doubting ones go to a cooking school, and see a neat young woman in a blue gingham gown and a white apron, prepare an eight-course dinner, and emerge spotless from the ordeal.

The woman who puts on an apron, over her dressing sack, by that act openly proclaims that the thing would be better if it was belted in. Then why not a shirt waist? Does one ever see a trained nurse in a dressing sack, even when she does heavier work than any other woman is ever called upon to do? If a woman in the uniform of a trained nurse can do the manifold things assigned to her calling, surely the laundress and the cook do not need a dressing sack.

There is a cynical adage which runs thus: "Strangers for help, friends for advice and relatives for nothing." Few of us will be bold enough to say there is no truth in it, and the reason is not far to seek. Who should help us if not those who always see our best side? Strangers think us charming, friends admit, but pardon our fault, and relatives fight with us.

We make our houses spotless for a stranger, but friends can take us as we are. For the new acquaintance, there is purple and fine linen, while we offer our friends cold potatoes and remnants of pie. The solid silver and dainty embroideries are put away for the stranger, while one's husband, who, in a way, is a relative by marriage, eats left-overs out of nickel dishes, and contemplates a dressing sack between mouthfuls.—The Pilgrim.

My Tramp and His Prescription.

By Mrs. Helen M. Richardson

It is against my principles to feed tramps. But this one happened along just as we had left the dinner table; and, moreover, it was Sunday, an unusual day for a tramp to call. But then, poor fellow, I don't imagine he knows one day from another, I thought.

I glanced at the table. I certainly couldn't say I hadn't anything to give him, for there was plenty of food left, and John hated "warmed overs." There was a generous piece of steak, and a quarter of a pie, to say nothing of bread and vegetables. Should I say "no" to the evidently hungry man at my door, and throw the remainder of my nicely cooked dinner into the swill pail? or, like a flash the morning text settled the knotty problem, "Clothe the naked, feed the hungry, and the stranger within thy gate turn not away."

"Come in," I nodded. He was an intelligent looking fellow, and as he began his repast I noticed that his table manners had not been neglected. I hoped, rather nervously, that John's errand at a neighbor's would delay him until my self-invited guest had departed.

"Tramps are an abomination upon the face of the earth," he had asserted more than once, lately. And here was one of these "abominations" seated at his table, and partaking ravenously of the good things thereon.

How the man did eat! The steak and vegetables had vanished, the pie, well nigh, when I suddenly discovered that I had given him nothing to drink. I started quickly for the coffee pot, which was gently simmering on the back of the stove—John and I eat in the kitchen when we are alone, it's so much handier.

I had got so used to limping during the past year, that at first I was puzzled to account for the man's abrupt question: "What is the cause of your lameness, lady?"

"My—oh, rheumatism," I replied, carelessly, as I poured a cup of coffee and passed it to my guest. My oftentimes vivid imagination was fast stripping off rags and tatters, and getting at the man beneath them; and as a guest, from this time on, I addressed him.

"I have been afflicted with rheumatism, more or less, for several years," I explained, as I returned from the pantry with another pie. "The man may as well have a good square meal for once," I thought. And really, I was beginning to enjoy this novel experience: a tete-a-tete dinner with a tramp, and John—oh goodness! What if John should return in the midst of it!

I grew nervous. But my guest, now that his hunger was in a measure appeased, seemed quite composed, and, between his sips of coffee, informed me that he thought he could suggest a cure for my rheumatism.

I assured him that after being pulled into electric cars, crawling up stairs and backing down, for a year, anything that promised relief, even, was worth a trial.

"It isn't everyone I'd tell of this cure," he went on, with an odd catch in his voice. "But you've given me the first dinner I've eaten for three days, and without asking any questions. It is an old Hungarian remedy and I have never known it to fail."

Two soles, one of copper and one of zinc, worn inside my shoes. It sounded like a fairy tale. But I promised to try it; mentally resolving to have the magic soles in my possession before another night.

There was something about the man despite his ragged, ill-fitting garments, that bespoke better days. The wings of my imagination were fluttering again, when he rose abruptly, and thanking me for his dinner, started to go. I, in turn, thanked him for his advice, and then the door closed between us. John turned in at the gate as the tramp passed out. Neither spoke, but John scowled as he entered the kitchen.

"I hope you didn't give that fellow anything, Mary?" His voice invited an answer. I never had told John an untruth.

"I should have thrown it away, John," I pleaded. "And, besides, how could I refuse after listening to the sermon this morning?" There was a note of triumph in my voice. John grumbled something about "tramps being outside the pale of Christianity."

"Well, John," I answered, with a laugh, "at any rate, I've got my pay in medical advice." He looked at me inquiringly.

"My day of hitching up and down stairs, and being pulled into electric cars are almost over, if the medicine works well."

This had the desired effect. John glanced out the window at the figure fast disappearing from view, and remarked that "enigmas might amuse some people, but plain English suited him well enough."

When John grows sarcastic I know that he is boiling over with curiosity, and consequently amenable to any course I may choose to pursue, which in this case, was a simple statement of the strange remedy suggested by the man to whom I had just given a dinner.

"And now," I continued, "I want you to go to Kirwin's tomorrow morning, and order a pair of soles made, one of zinc and one of copper; I'm going to give them a trial."

When John came home Monday night he brought the soles with him, and before we sat down to supper, I had them in my shoes.

"Your tramp met with an accident in the village last night," he remarked, as he drew his chair up to the table, "fell and broke his leg. Perhaps you'd like to have him brought here to be taken care of." There was satire in John's voice, and in the blue depths of his eye.

"I'll see how the rheumatism cure works first," I replied, ignoring his ridicule.

The next day I clattered round the house in high spirits. Before night I had broken the zinc sole, and the next day the copper one snapped as I hurried down stairs to answer the door bell! At this rate, I promised to be a profitable customer at the hardware store. After purchasing a second pair, with the same result, I conceived the idea of wearing the pieces, which seemed to answer the purpose as well.

In a few days I found myself going up and down stairs nearly as well as ever I had. Magic soles they had indeed proved to me. And I also felt much better in other ways. I began to look upon that tramp as my benefactor. John's sarcastic remarks grew less frequent, and at the end of a week I think he, too, would have been willing to give the man a vote of thanks, to say nothing of a dinner, for I was skipping about with the freedom of a colt released from harness.

"Considerable faith mixed up with it!" were the words that reached my ears as I was passing along the street one day, soon after my somewhat miraculous cure, which had now become the talk of the village. But I flitted round the corner, and found myself unexpectedly confronting the man to whom I had so much reason to be grateful. I recognized him instantly, although the change in his appearance was very marked. The crutches upon which he was swinging along, came to a quick halt, and I knew that the recognition was mutual.

"I am so glad of a chance to thank you," I hastened to say. "So glad to—"

Something in the man's face caused me to leave the sentence unfinished. His dark eyes met mine for an instant and then fell, and I saw a tear roll slowly down his cheek. In a voice broken with emotion, he told me that the dinner I had given him had been his salvation.

"I had walked many miles that day," he said. "I was discouraged, hungry, desperate. Your kindness stirred memories buried long ago. I have not seen my mother for ten long years. When I left your house, it was with a firm resolve to mend my ways. Providence intervened, and rendered me helpless. I have had much time to think.

Most earnestly I have longed for a chance to unburden my heart to you, to let you know that it was your kindness that has saved me."

His face worked strangely, and I felt the tears starting to my own eyes. I tried again to express my thanks for what he in return had done for me; but he left me as abruptly as he had left my table that Sunday afternoon.

"John," I said, as we were eating supper, "I met my tramp in the village today."

"Did you invite him to dine with us Sunday?" John's voice was pleasantly quizzical. I inwardly compared it with the tone in which he had discussed those "abominations," a few weeks before.

"John, if I had refused to give that man a dinner when he stopped here a month ago, I should have committed a crime." And then I went on to relate our interview on the street that afternoon.

"I am convinced that there is, after all, a certain amount of Christianity mixed up with the tramp question," I concluded. "Hereafter, when a hungry man asks me for food, I never shall refuse him, especially—”

“Especially if there is any possibility of his being a specialist in rheumatic troubles,” broke in John, with a laugh. —N. Y. Observer.

Never say about people what you will not say to them. Apply this rule before you say anything harsh or condemnatory. Perhaps you will still feel it to be your duty to speak, but you will probably change your phraseology. If writing letters about people, it is a good thing to stop and ask, “Would I be willing to have this letter read by the person of whom I am writing?”

Never say evil of anyone of whom you can say something good. “You can’t be caught, can you?” said a friend to another who was obeying this rule. “You will persist in seeing some good in everyone.” There is some good in everyone, and if we have to talk about persons rather than about principles or events, let us discover the good and speak about it.

Be generous and large-hearted in your soul, and you will speak generously and nobly about others. If we simply try to reform our speech, we shall not succeed. We must first purify the fountain, and then the stream will be pure. When we are filled with love and charity, we shall talk honorably of all men.

Speak in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, that is, in his spirit, as one would speak who stands in his character and represents him. Ambassadors speak in the name of their sovereign, and they strive to say only what would be worthy of him. We do or ought to do the same. Would Christ say this? No? Then we must not say it. “He was reviled, and he reviled not again.” Even provocation did not tempt him to unkindness or bitter words. We are to talk as he talked.—Forward.

Two-thirds of a century ago a young man and woman set up housekeeping in the town of Portsmouth, Ohio. Ten children were born to them. All but one lived to grow up, and most of them married.

Ten years ago the descendants of the original pair held a reunion and perfected the plan of a “family letter.” That letter starts, let us say, with a descendant who still lives in Portsmouth. He writes the news of his own household and whatever else he thinks may interest the family at large, and sends it to the relative living in the town nearest him. She reads it, puts in a letter of her own, and sends along the two.

Thus the package goes, continually growing, to Boston, New York, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, and a score of other places—so many that it takes two months to complete the circuit. Then the man who wrote the first letter withdraws it, puts in a new one, and starts the envelope off again.

By this means all the members of a large and widely-separated family are enabled to keep in touch with each other, as members of a family should, and it costs nothing but a little time and a few postage stamps.—Youth’s Companion.

Our Young People.

Gibbie—A Hero.

By Lizzie C. Reid.

A grey sky hung low over the little village on the southern slopes of the Lowhters, and masses of snow-laden clouds rose on the crest of the hill. A girl came tripping over a wooden bridge spanning a linn, and stood looking along the mountain road. She was watching for something or someone, and presently a flock of sheep came in sight round the bend of the hill, the sharp bark king of a dog caught the echoes, and the shepherd's voice rang out to his too fussy collie.

"Come tae ma fit, Jock! Come in ahint!"

The girl's anxious expression lightened into a smile as the shepherd appeared at the rear of his flock—a strongly-built young man, with a dark set face, a plaid across his broad breast, and a staff in his hand. He left his flock a moment to the care of his dog, and joined the girl. It was plain they were lovers, though only an ordinary greeting passed between them. Her eyes, deep and clear as a brown sunlit pool met his questioningly, and the warmth of a strong man's love in his seemed to reassure her.

"I was weary in' for your comin', Rob. There's a wecht on my heart some way. I feel kind o' dowie and sad, as if somethin' was comin' to them I lo'e. What think you?"

"Hoots, Grizel! it's just a lassie's fancies, but I'll no' deny these are fearsome times for us Covenanted folk. I wadna mind for myself. I hae laid oot my accoonts tae leeve or dee by the cause, but when I think o' you an' your like in these days my heart gangs oot in a bitter cry—'O, Lord, how long? Will it no' repent Thee concernin' thy servants?'"

His dark handsome face took a sterner cast, and his glance swept the dark moorland, where the men of the Covenant fled from the fury of the oppressors. The girl's eyes followed his.

"The dragoons are come to the Mossans, dy'e ken, Rob?" she whispered. "They cam' yestereen. It's no' safe wi' them sae near, but the meenister is to hae the readin' i' the Buik in spite o' them."

"Ay will he, Grizel, an' we'll be there tae hear it. There's naething' like the guid Word o' oor God tae hearten up sair forfochen folk. It's true eneuch, the dragoons are near, but it's no' verra likely, wi' the snowstorm gatherin', that they'll fin' oot the Corbie Cleuch wantin' a guide; it's for nane but mountain folk. Ye'll meet me on the moor at the gloaming' the morn's nicht, an' we'll gang the gither."

"I will," she said steadily. "Our lives are in His hands, an' them that takes yours may take mine too."

He held her hand a moment in a close grip under his plaid, and then took his way up the hill after his sheep.

From a knowl behind the village a man stood watching the meeting. His hands were thrust deep into the pockets of his corduroy jacket, his shoulders slonched, and his bonnet was low over his scowling brows. He muttered some words between his clenched teeth. He had set his heart on winning Grizel Grier to be mistress of his farm at Mossend, but she eluded all his attempts to woo her, and he was beginning to guess why. It was for love of that big black-browed chiel, Rob Scott, the laird's shepherd, with nothing but a shieling on the moor to offer her. And Walter Grier, her father, would look with more favor on her marriage with him than with an uncovenanted man like Mackay of Mossend, sung farmer though he was. But Mossend had sworn to compass his purpose, and bring Grizel home if it should be over the dead bodies of her father and her lover. A scheme was shaping in his mind, which the troubled times in which they lived made eay of accomplishment.

There was another watcher on the haugh that morning, an apparently insignificant one. Among the red berries of a gnarled old thorn sat a small boy, his bare, brown ankles twisted round its trunk. His sharp grey eyes shifted from the man on the hill to the lovers down below. Grizel's father had found him one snowy night left by some tramps at the barn door, and had brought him up in a stern path of duty, sorely against Gibbie's grain, but he found alleviations in scampering over the moor after the sheep, and keeping an eye on the doings of the village generally. He loved Grizel Grier with all the intensity of his lonely, wild nature, and the intuition of love led him straight to the key of the situation. He guessed the darger threatening her.

As soon as Mackay took his way over the hill homeward Gibbie slipped down, and turning a few somersaults to relax his stiffened limbs, skipped away to Grier's farm of Gardenbraes. At the door of the long white cottage, with the overhanging thatch of ling, brightened by vivid clumps of moss, stood the master of the farm. The glow of a peat fire within showed his uncommon height and broad build. Gibbie slunk round the shelter of a rail dyke and into the byre. He had no mind to meet the stern eye of his benefactor just yet. A question in the Carritch and a psalm for that evening lay heavy on his soul. He squatted down in a corner of the byre to catch the light from a grating, and, with the steamy breath of the cows around him, and their mild eyes gazing at him, he set himself to his task. From a niche where he left his scanty property—a whistle, a coil of rope, some fishing bait—he took a Bible and a Catechism and spread them open on his knee. "What are the decrees of God?" he asked, snapping his fingers at a black heifer that lowed dubiously in answer. "The decrees of God are His eternal purpose, whereby for His own glory, he hath foreordained whatsoever cometh to pass. What are ye glowerin' at ye muckel sump? D'e ye no' ken what's the meaning o't? I'm no' richt shair myself' but I'm thinkin' it's a wey o' sayin' that im that's aboon has it a' laid oot for us. Eh, peety mel I canna get it intil my heid ava. I'll hae a try at the Psawm. my Shepherd I shall not want.' I ken fine what that means," he went on in a toneless chant. " 'Yea though I walk through the valley.' Eh, that's a fearsome bit!"

"Gibbie, whaur are ye? Come ben to the Buik," said a soft voice, and Gibbie relaxed his studies and started up.

The farmer sat at a table in the single nook, with Grizel beside him and the household around. He read in deep, reverent tones the psalm of the hill folk—"I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help." When the long prayer was over, Gibbie got through his question, with the help of an encouraging smile and surreptitious word from Grizel

"He's a sair, witless chiel; he'll ne'er be worth his saut," said Walter Grier, shaking his head.

"Give him time, father," said Grizel gently. "There's mair in him than ye think. He'll get wit wi' the New Year.

"Maybe so," her father answered dubiously. Gibbie overheard the colloquy, and slunk up to his bed in the loft with a downcast heart. He had a disconcerting conviction that Gardenbraes was in the right.

Next evening there was a change—silence and absence of busy life round the farm of Gardenbaes. Snowflakes fell silently though the leaden gloom, and the December wind curled the surface of a lonely mountain tarn beneath the hill.

No sound broke the silence except the bleating of the sheep, the woeop of the moor fowl or the gurgle of a burn in the depths of the ravine, till, presently on the breeze came a strain of soft wailing music. In a gorge, shut in by rocks with a narrow opening, shrouded by furze and tall bracken, stood an old man, with long white hair streaming from under a skull-cap. He was reading the lines of a psalm, and the notes of a quaint old tune rose and fell, its shakes and quavers catching the echoes of the hill.

"God is our refuge and our strength," they sang softly, but with the fervor and intensity of men and women who have counted the cost of their faith.

Grizel and Rob Scott stood side by side. Her sweet flower-like face was framed in a tartan plaid. The snow flakes resting on it gave her the effect of a Christmas picture. Curls strayed, wind-blown, over her fair brow, uplifted to the darkening sky. As the psalm ended her eyes and her lover's met in a gaze of mutual hope and trust. They knelt, hand in hand, through the minister's prayer. A lad posted on a height overlooking the heath was taking Gibbie's place as sentinel. It was usually his welcome task, but he had been missing that night. Some instinct of love kept him on the alert. He scented danger, and he was thinking out a plan for circumventing the enemy.

He strolled up the hill in search of events. An owl hooted, a wild cat screamed from the snow-wreathed pines, and the grey, ghostly scour loomed out of the gloom, but Gibbie feared nothing; the hill and moorland were his home. As he reached the kowl above Mossend he caught sight of two figures apparently deep in colloquy. Creeping stealthily

Why use and why sell Johnson's Tonic?

WHY?

BECAUSE It is a Life Saver.

No man can die of any type of fever who uses the Tonic half way right.

BECAUSE It is a Quick Cure.

It places the fever victim beyond the point of danger in a day.

BECAUSE It is a Bitter Dose,

And in its bitter taste there is an absolute pledge of health and life.

BECAUSE It Strikes at the Root.

It drives out every trace and taint of Malarial Poison from the blood, and does its work quickly.

BECAUSE Its Record is Known.

In eighteen years no shroud has been made nor grave dug for a fever victim whose faith was pinned to Johnson's Tonic.

BECAUSE It is 100 times Better than Quinine.

And does in a single day what slow and uncertain Quinine cannot do in ten days.

It is not simply good—but supremely good.
Not good as anything—but better than everything.
Not mere merchandise—but a genuine life saver.
Not made to tickle a palate—but to save a human life.
Those who believe in it are safe.
Those who doubt are in danger.
Those who refuse to use it place their lives in jeopardy.
To sum it all up—

Johnson's Chill and Fever Tonic

Is the very best Fever Medicine obtainable on this earth. This is the sober, serious, earnest truth. I can prove it to any sane man, and haven't the time to talk to any other kind.

It's worth your time to believe in it.

to the shelter of a clump of gorse, he crouched down near them. A beam from a window glinted on the handle of a sheathed sword by the side of one, and Gibbie knew him as one of the dragoons that had come to harry the men of the Covenant. By the slouched shoulders and down-bent head of the other he recognized Mackay of Mossend. Gibbie's heart was in his mouth. He listened eagerly.

"I canna say that I bear them ill-will in the main," Mossend was saying in a surly tone. "They're my neebors, ye ken, an' it disna become me to hairm them, but I hae a corbie to pluck wi' yin o' them, an' to be even wi' him I'd stop at naethin'."

"We shall make it worth your while, said a soft Southern tongue. "Lead to this nest of moor birds, and let us get away from these forsaken wiids. You will be no loser, and none need be the wiser. The king knows how to reward his faithful subjects."

There was a long silence. Mossend dug his staff savagely into the turf, raising it in divots. Gibbie strained eyes and ears.

"There's one condection I would make," he said at last. "Ye ken it's a maitter o' a lass—her faither's o' the hill folk an' her sweetheart tae. Noo, it's him I hae the grudge against, but the lassie, if I'm no' mista'en, will be at the gatherin' tae, and I'd be sweir tae hairm a hair o' her bonnieheid. I want her mysel', ye ken."

"And you shall have her," said the other easily. "Guide us to the spot, and when we have them hemmed in we'll see that the girl comes to no hurt. You shall have both her and the reward."

Another silence. The soldier shifted his feet impatiently. Then Mackay spoke again.

"So be it," he said. "I'll meet ye within the hoor at the edge o' the pine wood, an' guide ye there. Their prayers are gey lang an' dreich. We'll hae time tae win in on them before they're by wi't."

Gibbie balled his brown fists and clenched his teeth as the soldier strolled away, and Mossend went back to the farm. The work of the day was over, and there were no more signs of life than at Gardenbraes, though for a different reason. Gibbie knew every farmstead in the district, and was a privileged visitor.

He glided round by the back yard. A sudden inspiration had come to him, and there was no time to lose. At the rear was a disused well, now dry, and covered with a plank. Gibbie dragged the plank aside, and rushed back to the house. His black thatch of hair stood on end with excitement and his eyes sparkled.

Mossend, equipped in stout leggings, his gun on his shoulder, was at the door.

"Eh, maister, maister, haste ye, haste ye!" cried Gibbie. "There's a wullcat an' a whutterit gaed down the gither by the auld well. Come awa' wi' yir gun an shoot them!"

The instinct of sport was strong in Mossend. He ran after Gibbie's beckoning finger. The snow drifted blindingly in his eyes, he stumbled on the edge of the gaping well, uttered a cry, and flopped in. Gibbie drew the plank across, leaving a breathing space. He put his mouth to it, and shouted down, "It's a gey graun' ploy, Mossen'. Ye're Joseph the noo. Ye can bide till the Meedianites come by." Which showed that Gardenbraes had not quite wasted his pains over Gibbie's Scriptural training.

A smothered growl answered him. He fled, whistling, down the brae to the pine wood. When he reached the dark trees he caught sight of moving figures, and with a beating but brave heart he stepped forward.

"Mackay o' Mossend has had a sair doon-come in his ain yaird, but gin ye'll lippen yersels tae me, I ken the road fine, an' I'll guide ye."

The soldier looked suspiciously at him.

"If I thought Mackay was playing us false— But, if he has met with an accident, you're sure you know the way, lad?"

"Shair as daith," Gibbie answered.

He led them in a contrary direction from the conventicle, trotting ahead with swift-footed confidence through the snow that dazzled them. They followed undoubtingly to the edge of a morass.

"Haste ye, haste ye! They'll win awa' gin ye dinna gang faster, ye muckle loons!" he cried, waving his arms wildly and skipping over the hags. The dragoons hastened after him. The treacherous bog yielded at their heavy tread, they slipped and floundered, clutching at tufts of heather, and struggling for a footing, but Gibbie led them deeper and deeper in, with peals of eldritch laughter in answer to their vengeful curses. When he had got them well into the morass he fled across to the dry ground, and snapped his fingers at the dim, floundering figures.

"Fare ye weel, ye murderin' crew," he houted. "He can bide there till the corbies pick yer banes. I'm no' scar't for ye, were ye the diel or Clavers himsel'."

A shot sped over the moss in answer.

Next morning Gibbie did not appear, and when Grizel went to the loft to seek him she found him spent from loss of blood, and moaning in pain. The shot had penetrated his left lung, and, like the wild creature of the woods that he was, he had crept to his lair.

He told the story, mustering enough strength to chuckle at the recollection.

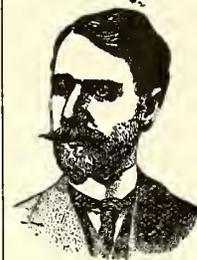

"Ma word! Ye shud ha' seen them sprauchlin' an' sweirin' an' gruppinn' the heather. Gin they're yince oot they'll no' be in haste to come back. Dinna greet, Grizel. I'm a witless chiel—I wad ne'er be worth ma saut, the maister kens that. But ye said I'd get wit wi' the New Year."

Grizel went for her father, and he knelt in prayer by Gibbie's bed. It was plain he was beyond the leech's skill, even if there had been one at hand. The gentle touch of Death was on his young brow.

"It's jist yin o' the decrees, maister, ye ken," he murmured. "Whereby for His ain glory." It was sweir tae get, but I ken it fine the noo, an' the meanin' o't an' a'. 'The valley o' the shadow.' I'm near haun' at, Gardenbraes, but I'm no' feart. Ye tell't me He was near by."

Tears streamed down Walter Grier's weather-beaten face, and Grizel shook with sobs.

"Lad, lad," said the old man, "forgi'e my hasty words. Whae am I tae leemit the Lord? He has made ye the means o' savin' the lives o' his folk. Gaid look on us! We're sinners a'! Ye're wiunnin in the dew o' yer youth, Gibbie."

And, with a well-pleased smile, Gibbie lay back in Grizel's arms and—won in.

A Field-Mouse and Her Babies.

Last week, as I was walking through a piece of woodland, I found a family of white-footed mice in an old cat-bird's nest in a tangle of greenbriers. The nest was roofed over with cedar bark, and I suspected that it might have a tenant, so I shook the bushes gently, and out of a small round hole in the side a little, sharp-pointed, whiskered head was poked, and a pair of large black eyes seemed to inquire what all the disturbance was about. I answered by shaking the briers a little more, and now the head was followed by the whole body of a very graceful mouse, who took a seat among the twigs near the nest, and calmly washed her face with her front paws. Her upper parts were yellowish brown, being brightest along the sides, but underneath, even to the tips of her delicate toes, she was pure white. Her tail, which was long and silky, hung straight down. She seemed in no hurry to leave the place, but when I attempted to advance, she ran lightly down, and disappeared among the dead leaves. I put the tip of my finger into the round hole in the nest, and I felt something jump. I made the opening a little larger, and took out four small blind mice, whose upper parts were lead gray, and whose under parts were white like their mother's. Very often, however, a white-footed mouse will not let one get so close a view of her babies. I have often known the mother to dash out of the nest with all her young ones clinging to her nipples, and disappear before I had time to count them.—November Woman's Home Companion.

Our Little Folks.

Children's Letters.

Nantahala, N. C., Nov. 7th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

This is my first letter. I live in North Carolina where the great western mountains are packed together some higher than others, standing in all their sublimity and grandeur, seemingly trying to make beautiful everything awful and dreadful that lies almost under their feet. I have been to the tops of many peaks where it seems I get farther away from the earth and nearer heaven and standing on these peaks with no one near except my companion it is the sweetest place for meditation in all the world, a place where one can get away from all the cares of earth and look upwards seemingly piercing through the either blue on and on until the mind of a little girl like me reaches the doors of the great city, the eternal abode of some of my dearest friends. I love the mountains although I have only been removed from the city to this place for three years, yet there is something fascinating and charming in mountain life. Here you find the purest people, physically, on the face of the whole earth. Their hearts are tender, their highest ambition being to alleviate the sufferings of mankind, to soothe his troubles, heal his wounds and make them happier.

While I read the Presbyterian Standard I belong to the Missionary Baptist Church, but I don't think belonging to churches (though I will admit that it is the duty of every Christian to be a devoted church member) will save any one unless they are truly Christians. I love to read the Standard, especially the short stories. I read a beautiful letter recently from Miss Mable Horton. I know her and she is not only a member of the Church but oh, so good! so pure. Her letter was so interesting, too. I have only had the advantage of a few years at school in a city and it does my heart good to read letters written by those who have had the fortune to attend school. I suppose as this is my first letter I had better close. Thanking Miss Sally Kelly and Miss Bell for their kindness in favoring me every week with the Presbyterian Standard.

Your Friend,
Effie May Ingle.

Maxton, N. C., Nov. 12, 1903.

Dear Mrs. McKelway:

I hope you are well. I have been wanting to write you a letter ever since Suck-my-Thumb put on the wrong trousers. Little girls like new clothes as well as little boys, but never get on the wrong clothes. I was eight years old Sunday. I think I'm kept right busy going to school and nursing three doll babies. I have two little kittens to feed, and jumping the rope. Sometimes I play school teacher and stand them up in a chair. They are very quiet, they never give me any trouble. I do all the talking. I love to walk in the woods these days, the trees are so pretty with their red and yellow leaves. A crowd of us little girls went out one afternoon to gather hickory nuts. It was fine fun. We found some hog apples and wee found a turtle. The boys climbed the trees and shook the hickory nuts down. I have read fairy tales and Uncle Remus and Lord Fauntleroy and have just read Children's Shakespeare.

Your little friend,
Maud F. McRae.

Charlotte, N. C., Nov. 18th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

We are two little friends. We go to the same school. We are deskmates and love to go to school. We study third and second reader and are in the same arithmetic class. We play hide and seek and lots of other things. Our school teacher's name is Miss Laura Pegram. Thanksgiving is nearly here and Christmas is coming and we expect to have a jolly time. We want to go to see each other Christmas. One of us is eight years old today and the other will be eight the second day of December. We will close by asking a Bible question. Where is darling found in the Bible.

Your little friends,
Bennie Hill Garrison,
Laura Ida Price.

The Cake That Prissy Made.

"I am going to make a cape and take it over to the new minister's wife today," said Mrs. Wood. "I am sure she won't have had time to cook much until she's settled down. And it's likely she'll have a strange minister or two to tea tomorrow, since that Convention is being held over at Exbridge."

"May I help make the cake, mother?" asked Prissy.

"Of course you may, girlie. If it wasn't for the minister's wife I'd let you make it all by yourself."

For ten-year-old Prissy was a famous little cook and very proud of the fact.

But just after dinner that day word came that Aunt Janetta Wood, over at Exbridge, had had another "spell." Mr. and Mrs. Wood hastily got ready and drove away, leaving Prissy in charge, with many directions and warnings.

When Prissy was left alone she remembered about the cake that was to have been made for the new minister's wife. Mrs. Wood had forgotten all about it.

"But I'll make it," said Prissy, resolutely. "I know I can make it good, and I'll take such pains."

So Prissy went to work in a housewifely fashion, tying a big frilled apron about her and looking as wise as a baker's dozen of little cooks. Very carefully indeed did she mix and measure and stir. Then came the baking, and Prissy hovered over the range until her jolly little round face was as red as one of the big peonies in the garden outside. But she felt repaid for all her trouble and worry when the cake came out of the oven light and puffy as golden foam.

"Now for the icing," said Prissy triumphantly, "and after tea I'll put it in the long basket and take it up to the manse."

By this time Prissy was a little tired, so she rather hurriedly beat up the confectioner's sugar for the icing and didn't even scrape out the bowl for her own sweet tooth, as she usually did.

After tea, when the icing on the cake was beautifully smooth and firm, Prissy dressed herself in her second-best blue-plaid gingham and started out to carry her gift to the manse, leaving Brother Ted in charge of home affairs.

She was not sure just where the manse was. The Wood family had been living in River Valley only two months themselves, and Prissy had never been up to the Exbridge road before and had not yet seen the new minister's wife. When she had walked about a mile she met the little boy who sat at the desk next to hers in school, and Prissy very politely asked him to direct her on to the manse. And the little boy who sat at the next desk answered, just as politely, that she must take the next turn to the right, and the third house from the corner on the left hand side was the manse.

Prissy followed these directions and her nose, and soon found herself on the manse veranda. She rang the bell, asked the trim maid for Mrs. Stanley, and was whisked into the sitting-room, where a very pretty lady with brown eyes was arranging some books.

"Please'm," said Prissy, feeling horribly shy all at once, "please'm, I've brought you a cake—mother thought you might like it—because you've been so busy moving in."

The lady's eyes twinkled pleasantly.

"Sit down, dear," she said. "And so your mother has sent me a cake. It is very sweet and thoughtful of her. I haven't a bit in the house and I have been very much rushed. Now, which of my kind neighbors is this nice mother of yours? And you'll tell me your own name, too, won't you?"

"Mother is Mrs. Chester Wood," said Prissy, "and my name is Priscilla Marian Wood. But everybody calls me Prissy. Mother meant to make this cake for you herself. But she had to go to see Aunt Janetta after dinner. Aunt Janetta takes spells, you know—and so I made it by myself. I hope you'll like it, although, of course, it isn't as good as mother could make."

Prissy had not noticed the surprised expression which came over her hearer's face when she told her name. When the latter spoke there was a queer little tremor in her voice.

"It was very kind of your mother and very sweet of you. I—I—didn't expect it. Your cake looks so tempting that I am sure it is good, and I'm going to get a knife and sample it right away. I haven't had any for over a week, you see."

She got a knife and cut a generous slice of the cake. She offered it to Prissy, but Prissy declined politely. She was not sure whether it would be good manners to bring a cake to the minister's wife and then help to eat it. So her hostess took a big, brave bite of the slice herself. Then a queer look came over her face and she got up and whisked out of the room without a word. When she came back her face was very red, but she ate up the rest of the slice and told Prissy that it was delicious. She did not eat the icing. She left that lying on her plate.

She asked Prissy a great many questions about her mother and herself, and when Prissy went away she told her that she would come over the very next day and see her mother. Of course Prissy said politely that they would be very glad to see her, but in her secret heart she did think it odd that the minister's wife should go visiting on Sunday.

She was at Sunday school the next day when the visitor came.

"Marian!" said Mrs. Wood in amazement.

"You expected me, didn't you?" said her caller. "I told Prissy I would come today. I couldn't wait until Monday. It was so good of you to think of me and of send me that cake, Julia. I understood it to mean that you wished to be friends again and were willing to forget that foolish quarrel of ours which I have so deeply repented."

Mrs. Wood knew there was a mistake somewhere, but it didn't matter. She held out her hands warmly to Marian and they kissed each other tenderly.

When Prissy came home her mother told her that the new minister's wife had never received the cake which had been so painstakingly made for her. Whether it was Prissy's mistake or the mistake of the little boy who sat at the next desk, I don't know, and nobody else knows. The manse was the third house on the right hand side. The house on the left hand side had just been rented for the summer by Mr. and Mrs. Stanleigh. And Mrs. Stanleigh had been Priscilla Marian Gray before her marriage.

"We were very dear friends, Prissy," said Mrs. Wood. "You were named for her. But we had a foolish, bitter quarrel some years ago, and have been estranged ever since. I missed her greatly, but our pride has kept us from seeking a reconciliation. We have forgiven each other now, and all is well again, thanks to you, you blessed little blunderer."

But there are three things about this story that three people never knew:

Mrs. Stanley, the new minister's wife, never knew how narrowly she missed having a cake for her first Sunday tea.

Mrs. Stanleigh, of the third house on the left hand side, never knew that the cake she received was meant for somebody else.

And Prissy never knew that she had iced that cake with saleratus!—L. M. Montgomery in Exchange.

The Children of a King.

One cold, wet day our city missionary climbed the steps of a house he had not visited before. He had heard of some little ones up in the garret-room and his visit was for them. The steps were very steep and very dark, and the missionary had to fumble about for the handle of the door. He knocked, but there was no answer, so he opened the creaking door and walked in.

"Oh, please don't make such a noise, sir," said a sweet little voice, "you'll wake the prince."

You may imagine how astonished the visitor was to hear of a prince in that half-lighted, bare room. Presently he saw through the dim light a little wooden cradle, with a poor skin-and-bones baby in it, and at the foot of it a girl about six years old anxiously rocking it to and fro.

"You see, the prince is very hungry," she said, "an' ef he wakes up he'll holler orful."

"Are you hungry, too my child?" asked the missionary.

"Yes, of course; but I'm big, you see, an' kin wait. The prince don't know 'bout mammy comin' home 'fore dark an' bringin' a loaf."

The gentleman brought out of his overcoat pocket a couple of sandwiches intended for his own lunch, and gave them to the brave little sister; and while she devoured one he asked her why she called the baby by such a strange name.

"Oh, that's a little play mamma taught me," said the child, with a smile, "to keep me from thinkin about being cold and hungry. She tells me stories at night 'bout kings and queens, and then I play the queen's out drivin', an, me an' baby are livin' in a big, warm house an' havin' sausage every day for breakfast. It helps a lot."

"Well, my dear little princess," said the missionary, "you and baby are in truth children of the heavenly King, and he has sent me today to see about you. There is a nice, warm house not very far from here, just opened today, where you and the prince can stay all the day while your mother is at work. You'll get bread and milk there every day, and sausages, too, sometimes."

"Is it the palace?" asked the little girl, her eyes shining.

"They call it 'The Nursery,'" answered the gentleman, "but it belongs to our heavenly Father, and he has sent me to tell you about it."

Just try to think what it was to those cold and hungry children to be taken to this warm, comfortable place every day, to be clothed and fed and taken care of! The baby got fat and merry, and was always called "The Prince," but the brave little sister never forgot that the King had sent them all these beautiful things.—Our Young Folks.

Patty Temple's Sweetning.

It was Saturday morning and raining. Did you ever hear of anything so dreadful? Patty Temple thought that she never had; for her cousin Grace had promised to spend the day with her if it did not rain, and they had planned so many things to play. Patty's mamma had promised them a tea party out in the grape arbor, and now the naughty rain had spoiled it all. Patty drummed on the window, kicked at the footstool, and was so cross and ugly that at last mamma said:

"Patty, you may take your chair and sit out in the woodshed until you think you can bring in a sweeter temper. We are tired of such a sour little girl."

Patty went out in the woodshed, where she and Grace had planned to arrange two houses and play "come to see." It made her temper worse just to think about it. So she sat down, determined to pout all day long. There were barrels and boxes all along one side of the wood house, and Patty had been told that she must never climb on them; but, after she had pouted awhile, something seemed to whisper to her: "Patty, why don't you climb on that barrel in the center and play that you are a queen on her throne? It will be such a nice play; and you have been so disappointed and mistreated, poor child!"

Patty sprang up willfully, and climbed up on the barrel. She was soon playing gayly, making believe that she was a queen and that all the barrels and boxes were her subjects, when all at once it went the floor of her throue, and down; down went Patty right into the barrel of molasses. The barrel was almost full, and, when Patty's feet touched the bottom the molasses came up under her plump chin.

Her mamma came running when she heard the pitiful cries, and lifted a very sticky, tearful little girl out of the barrel. The pretty blue dress was ruined and there was a great scratch across one of her cheeks.

All of the family joined in pitying and petting her, never once asking how she happened to be on the barrel; but at night, when mamma was tucking her up in bed, Patty threw both arms around her neck, and said penitently: "Mamma, if I had not disobeyed you, I would not have fallen into the barrel. I'm so sorry I disobeyed you; but mamma, I b'lieve I've surely sweetened my temper for a whole year."—Household.

He was a proud little fellow as he strutted around in a new pair of trousers that his mother had made for him, and very important he looked as he squared himself in front of his best friend, the corner groceryman, and said: "I bet you can't guess what my trousers are made of?"

"Of broadcloth?" asked the groceryman.

"Nope," replied the little fellow.

"Of corduroy, then?" ventured the groceryman.

"Nope."

"Of jeans?"

"Nope."

"Well, what are they made of, then?"

"Of papa's old ones," triumphantly replied the happy little fellow.—Epworth Herald.

Autumn in the Garden

By Henry van Dyke

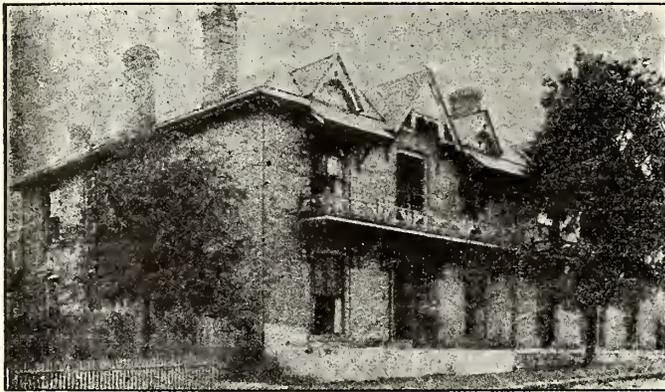

When the frosty kiss of Autumn in the dark
Makes its mark
On the flowers, and the misty morning grieves
Over fallen leaves,
Then my olden garden, where the golden soil
Through the toil
Of a hundred years is mellow, rich and deep,
Whispers in its sleep.

'Mid the crumpled beds of marigold and phlox,
Where the box
Borders with its glossy green the ancient walks,
There's a voice that talks
Of the human hopes that bloomed and withered here,
Year by year,—
Dreams of joy, that brightened all the laboring hours,
Fading as the flowers.

Yet the whispered story does not deepen grief:
But relief
For the loneliness of sorrow seems to flow
From the Long-Ago,
When I think of other lives that learned, like mine,
To resign,
And remember that the sadness of the Fall
Comes alike to all.

Faint and far away their ancient griefs appear;
Yet how near
Is the tender voice, the care-worn, kindly face,
Of the human race!
Let us walk together in the garden, dearest heart,
Not apart!
They who know the sorrows other lives have known
Never walk alone.

Event and Comment.

The Protestant Episcopal Cathedral in New York is languishing for want of funds. If Brother J. Pierpont Morgan recoups himself by financing that Panama scheme all right, the Cathedral fund may get a lift.

The second annual meeting of the Religious Education Association will be held in Philadelphia, March 2, 3 and 4, 1904. The programme as published thus far is one of great interest and attractiveness. We hope there will be a larger representation from the Southern Church than "two members of our communion," whose connection with the Association was so sincerely deplored.

We have not expressed in the Standard our opinion about the encouragement of the Secession of Panama from the United States of Colombia by the United States of America, but in brief, we think it was a peculiarly shameless "steal," of which the nation will repent if we have a Boer war on our hands in the tropics and the yellow fever begins on our soldiers.

The Congregationalist suggestively puts together the two facts that Senator Dietrich, of Nebraska, is under a cloud for making merchandise of his postoffice appointments and that the Nebraska Supreme Court has just forbidden the use of the Bible in the Public Schools. We presume that the reading of the eighth commandment might have been considered the introduction of partisan politics into the schools.

The British Weekly is making a valiant fight for the rights of the Non-conformists, not only in the matter of having their children taught in the schools that are not controlled by the Anglican Church, but also for their social equality with the Anglicans themselves. A recent issue describes Mr. Balfour as speaking to Dr. Clifford, "with his chin in the air as if all the smells of Constantinople were under his nose."

President Gompers had this to say to the Socialists in the Federation of Labor the other day: "I have studied your philosophy. I have read your economics in English and German. I have heard your leaders. I have watched the procedure of your movement the world over, and I have watched your tactics for more than thirty years. I have been closely associated with many of you, and know how you think and what you propose. I know what you have up your sleeve. I am entirely at variance with your philosophy and your tactics. Economically, you are unsound. Socially, you are wrong. Industrially, you are an impossibility." If the Socialists would all resign, the world might adopt the Socialistic scheme of things in part, at least. But its advocates are its enemies.

W. P. Fife preached on Sunday in a Presbyterian Church in Charlotte and the same week put an advertisement in the Charlotte papers, urging everybody to buy mining stock at ten cents a share that would be raised to a dollar a share in a month. Which suggests that a thousand per cent a month is a larger dividend than one would be likely to get from his preaching, so that for the sake of his investors it might be better for him to devote himself to the gold brick—we mean the gold mine business. And this is the man about whose great meetings some of our Texas friends used to write us, who got even a little wrathful when we suggested that if they were of the same mind about those meetings a year afterwards they might telegraph us at our expense. But we have never gotten an unpaid telegram from Texas yet.

We commend the action of the trustees of Trinity College in refusing to accept the resignation of Professor Bassett, for his insulting flouting of some of the cherished convictions of the Southern people. But we must think that in emphasizing "academic liberty" the trustees are laying up trouble for themselves and are aggravating the trouble from which Trinity has been suffering. There is a good deal of humbug about the claim of especial and peculiar liberty of thought and of speech at Trinity. It has the limitations of any other Christian and denominational college and if it had not it ought to have. It should be remembered also that on these lines the denominational college is freer than the State Universities, for while the denominational schools can teach the doctrines of one Church, the State schools cannot teach the distinct doctrines of any. And the hanging in effigy of the editor of a leading North Carolina paper, by the students, was an apt commentary on the fine periods in a paper adopted by the faculty on following the ideals of Jefferson as to the "illimitable freedom of the human mind."

Says the editor of Charity and Children:

"The organization of a Presbyterian church in Thomasville, N. C., to be accomplished next week, developed surprising strength. Heretofore it was supposed the Presbyterians had hardly any strength at all there, but the town has grown greatly of late and has an excellent bank."

Does the editor mean that Baptists are bankrupt or that Methodists are mendicants or that Episcopalians are impecunious, in this connection of Presbyterianism with plutocracy? Our brother should not have been surprised at the strength of the Presbyterians. They just distributed themselves among the other churches and worked where they thought they could do the most good until the time came for them to return to their first love. That is a way Presbyterians have. The opening of the bank was an auspicious time, because Presbyterians of North Carolina have discovered that one great mission of theirs is to stimulate the other good people to give more for the Church. It takes a bank account for the 36,000 Presbyterians of North Carolina to give more for foreign missions than 175,000 Baptists and 150,000 Methodists. And yet that is our record, unless there has been a recent catching up on the part of the other folks.

That old joke about the Presbyterians waiting for a bank before building a church has more truth than joking in it. We once attended an Episcopal Convocation in which an Episcopal layman gave some statistics as to the comparative liberality of the North Carolina churches. We do not recall whether he called them churches, but that does not matter. He said in substance, "The Episcopal Church has given more for home missions this year than any Church in North Carolina," and then his voice fell, and he added, "with one exception." He then continued to his climax, "The Baptists gave nine and a half cents per member for home and foreign missions. The Methodist Church gave eleven and three-quarter cents per member for home and foreign missions. The Episcopal Church gave twenty-eight cents per member"—and here followed the anti-climax—"and the Presbyterian Church gave one dollar and twenty-nine cents per member." The editor of Charity and Children can go on with his bank joke. If the Baptists had more Presbyterian Charity he would have more Children in his orphanage.

New University. Alabama, controlling the Semnary at Columbia have voted for the conference of the committee suggested. They had a big debate over it at the South Carolina Synod and as usual politics made some strange bedfellows. Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana, controlling the Southwestern Presbyterian University have also voted for the Conference, while Tennessee voted not to send conferrees, but to send to the conference some brethren who would tell the conference why they could not confer. We suppose that these will be invited to sit as visiting brethren. A bomb-shell was thrown into the Tennessee Synod by the statement that all of the professors at Clarksville, save one, was in favor of the removal of the University to Atlanta. Nobody that understands the situation and is looking at it with unprejudiced eyes can blame the professors. They have seen the students decreasing in number, year by year, under the competition that has sprung up in the Trans-Mississippi Synods, while Louisville and Texas Seminaries have practically closed the Divinity department. These professors, much as they love Clarksville, doubtless labor under the impression that the endowment left for the University was intended for the cause of Presbyterian education and for training the ministers of the Presbyterian Church, rather than for the exploitation of Clarksville, the town. And they know also that to a large and an increasing extent this endowment is failing in the purpose for which it was left to the Church. They are to be commended for their patriotism, as well as for their good sense.

But we are really afraid that they are in danger of being burned at the stake for their rashness in daring to think such things. If the proposed Presbyterian University needs martyrs to the cause before it can triumph, we are afraid that the Clarksville faculty are going to furnish them. The excitement at Hampden-Sidney over the removal of Union Seminary was nothing, the objections at Richmond, Kentucky, to the removal of Central University was mild, compared to the whirlwind of passion and hysteria that is sweeping through Clarksville. It seems that Clarksville has two daily papers, such as they are. In one of them that has come our way Dr. Price is pleading with the people of Clarksville to be "just and fair to a body of men who are incapable of anything treacherous, either to their Church or to the institution or to the community." In the other paper the language is lurid. The heading of the editorial is "Little Benedict Arnolds." The crime of these traitors was that they had written letters to a minister of the Synod of Mississippi, advocating the removal of the University from Clarksville to Atlanta. The editorial proceeds in this fashion, making mighty interesting reading:

Who are these two contumacious and Machiavellian professors who persist in their traitorous designs to Clarksville?

An anxious public would like much to know who they are.

Let the persons connected with the S. P. U. who are guilty of such treacherous conduct to their home town stand forth in the broad glare of publicity and boldly proclaim their views here, in order that all may know their designs.

Let them not, serpent-wise, carry on their nefarious schemes under cover of the mails, to take the S. P. U. away from here, but stand boldly forth and let us see them.

Away with such little Judases with false, sanctimonious smiles and oily tongues!

They are not half as anxious to get away from here as Clarksville is to have them go.

A clean sweep, with perhaps one or two exceptions, of the whole crew, is needed to purify the University, and until this is done it will continually and gradually slide down the hill to wreck and ruin.

We think, ourselves, that the professors have failed in one thing, that the influence of a Presbyterian University has not been as pervasive as one might hope. If this sheet represents the people, and Dr. Price's letter would indicate that it does, then we should not like to see our Presbyterian boys subjected to the local influences that seem to be dominant. If the University, in the hey-day of its success, has done no more for the manners, not to say morals, of the community, then there might be danger of the corrupting influence of evil communications for the boys.

And then this Clarksville paper with a hyphenated name, the Times-Journal, quotes a statement that we had overlooked, from the Southwestern Presbyterian. It is from the Rev. W. McF. Alexander, D. D., from whom we have not heard since his article in the Standard opposing the removal of the University. We are personally very fond of Dr. Alexander, but we are bound to tell him that he has done his cause as much injury by this paragraph as he could well have done. Presbyterians will not stand bull-doing of that kind. Dr. Alexander is a member of the Board of Directors and he writes:

"One of the most deplorable things about the agitation is the charge brought by friends of the Atlanta movement that the Professors are disloyal to the Institution. If this be true, no wonder that pupils decrease. No institution can stand unless the faculty are loyal. Witness the scene on the floor of the Synod at Memphis when such a charge was brought!"

Certainly that was not well. Of course there never was a failing cause, with the argument against it, that did not "deprecate the agitation" that exposes the weakness of argument and cause. And the worst thing about this accusation against the professors is that it is not true, and Dr. Alexander was bound to know that it was not true. As a director he is bound to know why the students have been decreasing at Clarksville. We have not told the whole story when we mention the competition. This agitation did not begin until the number of students had already reached the lowest mark for years. The idea of laying the blame for the continued decline of several years on the agitation of one year is ridiculous.

And then Dr. Alexander' charge of disloyalty to the institution, which these professors have served so splendidly, because they want the institution removed to a better locality and joined to a larger endowment, is as ridiculous as it is false. Is the town of Clarksville the institution? The retort courteous might be easily made that the unanimity of the Board of Directors, in the face of the overwhelming conviction to the contrary of the ministers of the controlling Synods, especially the S. W. P. U. alumni, would indicate that the directors were more loyal to Clarksville than to the institution. Doubtless it would take pretty stiff-backed men to put their legs under the Clarksville mahogany at Commencement and then vote to remove the University to Atlanta!

But the bull-dozing ought to stop. The threat of one of the directors to bring a civil suit if the Atlanta side of the controversy won, set the hair on some good Presbyterians. This sort of senseless persecution of the faculty for its honesty and common sense will do more than anything else to remove the University to a larger place.

Forty years ago this country was in the throes of civil war. The long course of Confederate victories had been broken by one Federal victory, that at Gettysburg, in July, and by the capture of Vicksburg and the subsequent opening of the Mississippi. But these events had been followed by the disastrous defeat of the Federals at Chicamauga. Amid these circumstances Abraham Lincoln inaugurated the annual series of national thanksgiving days which are nowhere observed now with more depth of religious feeling than they are in the South. Lincoln's Thanksgiving Proclamation was as follows:

The year that is drawing toward its close has been filled with the blessings of fruitful fields and healthful skies. To those bounties, which are so constantly enjoyed that we are prone to forget the source from which they come, others have been added, which are of so extraordinary a nature that they cannot fail to penetrate and soften even the heart which is habitually insensible to the ever watchful providence of Almighty God.

In the midst of a civil war of unequalled magnitude and severity, which has sometimes seemed to invite and provoke the aggressions of foreign states, peace has been preserved with all nations, order has been maintained, the laws have been respected and obeyed, and harmony has prevailed everywhere except in the theatre of military conflict; while that theater has been greatly contracted by the advancing armies and navies of the union.

The needful diversions of wealth and strength from the fields of peaceful industry to the national defense have not arrested the plow, the shuttle, or the ship. The axe has enlarged the borders of our settlements, and the mines, as well of iron and coal as of the precious metals, have yielded even more abundantly than heretofore. Population has steadily increased, notwithstanding the waste that has been made in the camp, the siege and the battlefield, and the country, rejoicing in the consciousness of augmented strength and vigor, is permitted to expect continuance of years with large increase of freedom.

No human counsel hath devised, nor hath any mortal hand worked out these great things. They are the gracious gifts of the Most High God, who, while dealing with us in anger for our sins, hath nevertheless remembered mercy.

It has seemed to me fit and proper that they should be solemnly, reverently, and gratefully acknowledged as with one heart and voice by the whole American people. I do therefore invite my fellow-citizens in every part of the United States, and also those who are at sea and those who are sojourning in foreign lands, to set apart and observe the last THURSDAY OF NOVEMBER AS A DAY OF THANKSGIVING AND PRAYER to our beneficent Father, who dwelleth in the heavens. And I recommend to them that while offering up the ascriptions justly due Him for singular deliverances and blessings they do also, with humble penitence for our national perverseness and disobedience, commend to His tender care all those who have become widows, orphans, mourners, or sufferers in the lamentable civil strife in which we are unavoidably engaged, and fervently implore the interposition of the Almighty hand to heal the wounds of the nation and to restore it, as soon as may be consistent with the Divine purposes, to the full enjoyment of peace, harmony, tranquility and union.

There are several things in this proclamation to which we should like to call the attention of Southern readers, forty years afterward. There is not a line that is offensive to the warmest advocate of the Confederate cause. The war is called "the lamentable civil strife in which we are unavoidably engaged." Those are words of charity and of wisdom. While there is always fault somewhere, when such a catastrophe as civil war occurs, the war may be inevitable nevertheless. It became inevitable when the founders of this government, in order to secure the adhesion of the independent states to the original union, left it an open question as to whether it was to be an indissoluble union. That question was debated in the halls of legislation, first the New England States and then the Southern States taking the negative until the Southern States acted on their conviction and actually dissolved the Union. And even if the nationality of the Confederate States had been acknowledged in Washington, it would have only meant the postponing of the war. No man can read those debates in Congress for the decade that preceded the Civil War without feeling that the only cure for that fever was the old-time remedy of blood-letting. The deification of the first invader of Southern soil, John Brown, opened the eye of the Southern people to the Northern attitude and perhaps awakened the Northern consciousness to the fact that war was what was really wanted.

And Lincoln was furnishing an example to posterity in thus interpreting this lamentable civil strife as inevitable. And he was not as uncivil as some who bore less of the burden of that strife than he did, for he calls it the civil war, and not a rebellion. In fact the taste was always execrable that used the latter phrase and it would have been unpardonable in a proclamation of thanksgiving to Almighty God.

A second noteworthy thing is the fact to which Lincoln calls attention, that the ordinary industries of the nation were proceeding with almost as much regularity as if there had been no war. "The plow, the shuttle, and the ship" were not arrested. "The axe has enlarged the borders of our settlements and the mines, as well of iron and of coal as of the precious metals, have yielded even more abundantly than before. Population has steadily increased, notwithstanding the waste that has been made in the camp, the siege and the battlefield." How different it was in the South! Grant, a little afterwards, declared that the South had robbed the cradle and the grave to fill the armies of Lee. Not only was every able-bodied man at the front, but the boys and the old men shouldered their muskets, too. It is doubtful if there was ever such unanimity of feeling and such a concert of voluntary action as the Civil War brought out. Neither wealth nor population were increasing in the South. And while in a Northern city, here and there a man might be missed from the street, in the South it was the man who remained at home that was conspicuous and it was a bad eminence that he occupied, unless indeed there was a good excuse for his absence from the front. The North put its purse into the conflict, but the South put its heart.

And another thing that strikes one in reading this proclamation is the use of Bible English. There have been a good many controversies over Lincoln's religious views. But this certainly breathes the spirit of faith and of reverence. "The Most High God" is one of the rare expressions of Scripture, used more frequently in the book of Daniel than anywhere else. "Remembered mercy" is another Hebraism. And then there is a touch of Calvinism in that clause, "as soon as may be consistent with the divine purposes." And another is the "ever-watchful Providence of Almighty God."

We say again, that this is a remarkable document and we are obliged to the Interior for re-publishing it at this time. It is getting to be a far cry to the strife and contention of those evil days. And the more we can gather from them that is not sectional and divisive, the better. If that generation of men, with their hardships and sufferings, could be grateful to God, how much more we who have entered into their labors and profited by their sacrifices!

The Gallinger Liquor Bill. One of the great obstacles to the carrying out of local temperance legislation in the past has been the attitude of the Federal authorities to the State and local laws. The collectors of Internal Revenue have issued their licenses, regardless of State laws or local regulations, to anybody who would pay the price. At the same time the Federal pursuit of the unlicensed vender of liquors has generally been more ardent than that of the local or State authorities.

Senator Gallinger's bill, in brief, requires that no collector of Internal Revenue shall deliver any tax receipt to any retail or wholesale liquor dealer until the dealer can show him a license to sell according to the laws of the State and the locality.

It has often happened that the liquor dealers who are willing to defy the local laws have made their peace with Uncle Sam by paying the Internal Revenue tax for selling the liquor that the local laws forbade them to sell. The Gallinger Bill, if it becomes a law, will make the United States a partner with the localities involved in the suppression of the illegal sale of liquor.

The liquor men are raising a corruption fund to defeat the bill. It would be well for every friend of temperance who reads these lines to write to his Senators and Representatives at Washington, urging the passage of the Gallinger Bill. The Presbyterian ministers of the South who read this suggestion might bring about the desired end by their own united action and their enlistment of the interest of others. It is too good a bill for the liquor men to defeat.

A Negro's View of Disfranchisement.

When the immortal Abraham Lincoln struck the shackles from several millions of his fellow countrymen, he accomplished that which will shine resplendent in the annals of humanity and gather lustre with the leap of ages. The death of this great man at a time when his guiding hand was most needed, was a calamity beyond computation to the colored race and country at large. The hands of the assassin has beyond doubt been the means of preserving and promoting many of the problems which today perplex and vex. Looking at the matter dispassionately over the lapse of forty years, it is plain to be seen that in the turmoil and heat of the moment, grave errors were committed and much undesirable seed sown in the Virginia soil of negro aspiration.

Fresh from the bonds of serfdom with all of the impulsiveness of an untrained child, the negro imagined that the promised land was within sight and that a few bounds would place him in a Utopia from whence there was no dislodgment.

By those who understood him least, he was suddenly set upon a pedestal which only by a miracle of Heaven could be maintained. The sudden gift of the suffrage to a people all unprepared for its use must stand as one of the greatest blunders of America's history. It should have been bestowed and only to the extent of its reception. It is hard to conceive of what a blessing such a measure would have been to the negro. Held ever before his eyes as a reward of merit, he would have striven and worked for the prize. He would have been spared the demoralizing buffetings of political masters and would by this time, have found his political salvation along the legitimate road of honest endeavor and high purpose. In the whole range of human activity there is but one way to accomplish a right result, and that is to go about it in the right way, but unfortunately the right way in the case of the negro has been discovered in these late days.

Considering the conditions that have prevailed in this country since the close of that mighty conflict, the wonderful harmony existed between the races, can be accounted for only by the natural inoffensive qualities of the negro, the tolerance of the white man, and the almost affectionate regard with which the Southerners of both races viewed each; for when all is said and done, it must not be forgotten that the South is the true home of the American negro, and that the Southern white is his nearest neighbor and pattern, and this is said with no desparagement to our host of excellent Northern people who have and are devoting their time, talents and means to the uplifting of the colored people. Had these good samaritans with the help of Booker T. Washington, put into execution their great ideas directly after the Emancipation of the colored race, there would today have been no necessity for a new state constitution, disfranchising a large proportion of the negro population. The News and Advertiser has been in some quarters, commended, and others condemned for the stand it takes on the new Virginia Constitution. We feel honestly that we are neither deserving of praise nor blame, in the matter. Our purpose and aim is the uplifting and advancement of the negro people by every legitimate means in our power. We feel and have no hesitation in saying that misdirected political aspiration to the exclusion of all else has been a blight and not a blessing to the race.

What the negro has today, he can never lose. Slavery, thank God, is forever a thing of the past, and not alone in America, but over this broad land. It can find no living place under the broad folds of America's flag. With this assured, the negro has nothing to fear. If the powers that be said to him, "If you want to vote, you must be educated," he will get an education and our position is that the chap who does not want the education is unfit to have a voice in the making of laws under which his more progressive fellow must live. The right to procure an education is not denied the colored man. On the contrary, schools are opened on every side, and institutes, homes and temples of every description, are being provided for his advancement, and that he is advancing a look around will be vividly demonstrated.—Norfolk News and Advertiser.

King Leopold, of Belgium, like other monarchs, has been on his travels. He was in Vienna, but somehow there was no popular enthusiasm over his advent in the Austrian capital. He has been greatly perturbed over the accusations brought against the management of affairs in the Congo Free State. He has been endeavoring to enlist opinion and sympathy in favor of his side of the case as against British criticism. It is said that in Paris he was measurably successful, though French opinion on the question has not been very pronounced. According to reports the Belgian monarch was not so successful in Vienna. The Austrian emperor was cold and unsympathetic, and his foreign minister, Count Golochowski advised Leopold to submit his case to The Hague Tribunal. While the Belgian king was at the Austrian capital it is said he had a conference with United States Minister Storer, to whom he proposed to place the Belgian concessions in China, Korea and Japan under the protection of the United States, for which he would grant to this country important commercial privileges.—Interior.

A beautiful white marble tablet in memory of Dr. Parker has been placed near the door of the deacons' vestry of the City Temple. The following is the inscription: "To the glory of God and in beloved memory of the Rev. Joseph Parker, D. D., this tablet is erected by his sorrowing church and congregation. This herald of the cross was for thirty-three years the minister of this church. He was called from Cavendish Chapel, Manchester, to the Poultry Chapel, London, in 1869. From there, under his leadership, the church removed to this spot in 1873. It was by God's blessing on his indomitable energy that the City Temple was reared. Endowed with wonderful natural gifts, he placed them unreservedly at the foot of the cross, and it was the supreme purpose of his life to be 'a minister of Jesus Christ, ministering the Gospel of God.' While preaching was his delight, he was the author of many works of perennial value. Thus his influence was felt in every quarter of the globe. He labored with untiring zeal until within a few months of his death—months of great weakness, borne with rare patience and Christian fortitude. When on the 28th of November, 1902, the call came to him, 'Come up higher,' he gladly obeyed the summons, in the 73rd year of his age. 'To live in Christ, and for Christ, is to defy all time and change and even death itself.'—Joseph Parker. Si monumentum quaeris circumspice."—Episcopal Recorder.

A report from Paris states that General Andre, the War Minister, has examined the Dreyfus dossier for the purpose of verifying accusations against certain officers who were involved in the Dreyfus case, and has investigated the declaration that two documents which greatly influenced the court at Rennes before which Dreyfus was tried in 1899 were forgeries. It is stated further that a number of documents of great value to the Dreyfus side of the case were not introduced at the Rennes trial. The French Prime Minister Combes has announced that, as the result of General Andre's investigation, the Dreyfus case will probably be reopened, and all the essential documents have been transmitted to M. Durand, Counselor of the Court of Cassation. Dreyfus is cautious about making any public statement concerning the reopening of his case, except to say that he is overjoyed at the prospect, and at the success of his application for a reconsideration.—The Christian Advocate.

The Education Bill in England has been a failure conspicuous enough to ruin any government, save one positively overloaded with a large majority. The attempt to coerce the Free Churchmen to support schools upon whose board of management they have inadequate representations, has proved a signal failure. The "passive resisters" have grown not only in numbers, but also in strength, and have taken joyfully, not only the seizure of their goods, but in some instances terms of imprisonment. There seems only one issue, however long it may be delayed, and that is the introduction of some system modelled in a measure after our own. It is a somewhat difficult thing to know who are the real "dissenters" in England, for the Free Churchmen outnumber the Anglicans, and yet the government played entirely into the hands of the Church party. To us it seems that if any denomination desires to control and give instruction in its schools, it certainly should have the privilege of paying for it. Otherwise schools should be strictly unsectarian, supported by the people and controlled by the popular vote. We trust this will be the issue of the present controversy, for none other seems to even border on justice. Meanwhile, the Archbishop of Canterbury is proposing another "round table" conference, with a view to effecting a compromise. In minor details a compromise may be effected, and is often wise, but in principles of liberty and religious equality no compromise is possible. There can be no compromise between truth and error, right and wrong, justice and injustice. The present situation is grossly unjust.—Episcopal Recorder.

Book Notices.

Any book mentioned here can be obtained from the Presbyterian Committee of Publication, Richmond, Va.

GEORGE WASHINGTON JONES, by Ruth McEnery Stuart. Price $1.50. Publishers, Henry Altemus Company, Philadelphia.

Some of the admirers of Ruth McEnery Stuart have been looking for a long time for another of her inimitable dialect stories. There will be a large reading audience for this—this poem one might call it—for there is no truer portrayer of the old-time Southern negro than Mrs. Stuart. George Washington Jones, "ten years old, little, black, sensitive," tries to give himself away, after his grandfather's death, to some beautiful young lady who would play on a harp and make him her page, as in the days "befo' the wah."

HALF A DOZEN HOUSEKEEPERS, by Kate Douglas Wiggin, Illustrated by Mills Thompson. Price 75 cents. Publishers, Henry Altemus Company, Philadelphia.

This is purely and simply a girls' story. It is wholesome and amusing as are all of Kate Douglas Wiggins' books. It will make an attractive Christmas gift to any healthy-minded young girl. It is not intended to be in the same class with the books of foreign experiences in which Mrs. Wiggin has pleased so many readers, but it is a natural story and, that, in these days, is praise.

THE BATTLE OF ALAMANCE, by Mrs. L. A. McCorkle, Savannah, Ga. Volume 3, Number 7 of the North Carolina Booklets. Of this Dr. W. W. Moore writes: "I have read with much satisfaction your conclusive argument in regard to the Battle of Alamance. You have rendered a valuable service to the truth of history." Tom Watson, in his life of Jefferson, shows that thirty men were killed at Alamance four years before the little skirmish at Lexington in which three men lost their lives.

Our Great Landmark.

Some years ago a party of travelers were passing over the Swiss mountains. After they had gone a considerable way, it began to snow heavily, and the oldest of the guides gravely shook his head and said: "If the wind rises we are lost." Scarcely had he spoken, when a gale arose, the snow was whirled into multitudinous drifts, and all marks were obliterated. Cautiously they moved on, not knowing where they were, and almost giving themselves up for lost. At length one of the guides, who had gone a short way before them to search out the path, was heard shouting, "The Cross! The Cross! We are all right."

And what had the cross to do with it? It was one of these religious memorials which one so frequently meets in Roman Catholic countries, and this one, set up at first by some private individual for a personal reason, had become at length a well-known and easily recognized landmark for the traveler. Hence, the moment the guide saw it, he knew where he was, and what direction to take. But what was true of that symbol in their case, is true in all instances of the thing which it signifies: for we may always know where we are when, with our eye of faith we can see Christ crucified.—Western Christian Union.

Loftier destinies compel some present darkness, just as mountains cast a shadow. If life were never to go to a higher stage, always to stay on the present level, we might be able to see everything clearly, and understand everything even now. A boy complained to Thomas Arnold because certain lessons were so difficult, and, so far as he could see, useless. Arnold said: "I cannot make you understand now of what use these things are going to be to you, but you know I am your friend. Well, as your friend, who knows what you are going to need, I want you to study these lessons." Can we not believe that divine love is always saying the same to us: "As your friend, who knows what you are going to need, I want you to go through this darkness?" Trouble and labor and weariness are simply ways up the mountain of loftier destinies. Tears may be given to wash our eyes that we may see these loftier destinies more clearly.

"The grave itself is but a covered bridge Leading from light to light through a brief darkness."

Rejoice then even in the difficult and darkened ways; the reason in them is just larger, loftier lift.—Selected.

I want to say to the young men who are thinking what noble things they can do in this world, what thing that is worth while, that will live and make the world better—that something to honor God among men is the very best thing they can do. It is a noble thing to start, or help to start, a mission school in a godless neighborhood. It is a great thing to teach a Sunday school class and put the thought of God into some young hearts. It is a great thing to find the way into a prayerless, loveless home, and tell the story of the love of Christ there. It is a great thing to take a child and put on its life the image of Christ. It is a great thing to be active and earnest in a church, helping to hold up the burning light of God's love in a community. There are countless ways in which we may start divine blessing in the world.—Dr. J. R. Miller.

No worse fate can befall a man in this world than to live and grow old alone, unloving and unloved. To be lost is to live in an unregenerate condition, loveless and unloved; and to be saved is to love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth already in God, for God is love.—Henry Drummond.

"There is a great need for a boarding school for the sons of our Protestant believers in Southern Brazil. At Campinas we have a building and grounds for such a school, and a competent teacher should be sent at the earliest possible day to reopen that work."

Beirut College.

The Syrian Protestant College at Beirut is one of the prominent objects of interest to travelers in the East. It stands as a great light sending its rays far around. It has a corps of forty instructors, twenty-five of whom are Americans or Europeans. Its patronage comes from all parts of the Turkish Empire, from Egypt and Armenia. It has gained such a standing that its students belong to all races and religions. Greeks and Mohammedans, Jews and Roman Catholics, Copts, Druzes and Maronites, meet in the class rooms, listen to the same instructors, and are under the same unifying as well as enlightening influences. On Sabbath evenings five or six hundred students are gathered at evening prayers. The college is not under denominational control, but is thoroughly missionary in its spirit and methods. They who live in this Christian atmosphere carry home with them something of the new spirit, and exert an uplifting influence.—Exchange.

A clear realization of the terrible cost of our salvation to our brother man Jesus, who is at the same time the Son of God, must fill our hearts with a burning zeal to do something for him. We feel that we must compensate him in some way for the awful sufferings—physical, mental, and spiritual—which he endured in working out our salvation. To give him ourselves, to devote our lives to his service in a general way, is not satisfying to the soul yearning with love for the Saviour, for that is his simple right; he has purchased that, and paid a tremendous price for it. The only way we can reward him is by bringing souls to him. For that he died. When we bring him souls then we bring him the reward of his sufferings. That is the compensation for the travail of his soul. Then shall he be satisfied when he sees this spoil of his dearly bought victory on the cross.—Rev. Paul 'de Schweinitz.

Every once in a while I hear some one growl against Foreign Missions, because the money and the strength put into them are needed at home. I did it myself when I did not know better, God forgive me. I know better now; and I will tell you how I found out. I became interested in a strong religious awakening in my own old city of Copenhagen, and I set about investigating it. It was then that I learned what others had learned before me, and what was the fact there, that for every dollar you give away to convert the heathen abroad, God gives you ten dollars' worth of purpose to deal with your heathen at home. Riss.

It has taken a hundred years, says the Interior, to produce a Bible in classical Chinese, one which can be read in all parts of the empire with equal facility. This is the life work of Bishop Schereschewsky, of the American Episcopal Church. Born of Jewish parents and educated for the office of a rabbi, he has been familiar with Hebrew from his childhood. He became well versed in all the literature of his people. But embracing Christianity, he devoted himself to the study of New Testament Greek. Then offering himself as a missionary, he was sent to China, where, after a prolonged residence in Peking, he put forth a translation of the New Testament in the court dialect. This work was so manifestly of value to all missionary enterprise in China that he set himself next to rendering the whole Bible into the language of the empire. . . . Of the finished product printed in Japan for the American Bible Society, Dr. W. W. P. Martin, certainly one of the greatest scholars America has ever sent to China, says it is the consummation of a century's hopes and one of the most perfect works ever put forth by one man.—Record of Christian Work.

Darwin defined a fool as a man who never had made an experiment. There is another definition of a fool: one who learns everything from experience. And the last fool is worse than the first.

Sunday School Lesson.

BY REV. H. G. HILL, D. D.

The Dedication of the Temple.

I Kings, 8, 1-11, 62, 63. Dec. 13, 1903.

The Temple was completed in seven years from the beginning of the work. It was erected according to the Divine plan, and furnished with appliances for service according to the Lord's directions. It was built of the costliest materials and adorned in a manner befitting the habitations of Jehovah. Those who reared it were endued with Divine wisdom, for performing their several functions. When it had been finished it was needful that it should be solemnly dedicated to the worship of Jehovah and that it should be publicly recognized as the Lord's. Our lesson relates to this dedication and several aspects of it claim attention.

I. The Preparation for the Dedication.—The civil and ecclesiastical representatives of the nation are assembled. The elders of Israel, the heads of the tribes, the chief of the fathers, the priests and Levites are all gathered at Jerusalem. This was essential if all Israel was to commit themselves to the worship of Jehovah at this temple and were to have convincing proof that this was indeed the house of God. In solemn procession they carry the ark containing the tables of the laws from the tabernacle on mount Zion to the temple upon Mount Moriah. They place it, shadowed by the Cherubin, in the most holy place. They also bring all the furniture and holy vessels to the temple and give them their assigned location. In order to Divine worship the law must be honored a mercy seat provided and all the agencies for rendering homage must be furnished. This is just as true of the modern sanctuary as of the ancient temple.

II. The Human Acts Dedicating the Temple.—When the proper preparations had been made, human beings had something to do in order to consecrate this temple. It was dedicated with costly offerings. Thousands of sheep and oxen were brought to the altar to express the faith of the worshipper in the Divine word of promise, and in the sacrifice that should take away sin. So we may dedicate a sanctuary to God, with valuable offerings, expressive of our faith and love as to the incarnate Word. The Temple was consecrated with praise. The priests and Levites and organized choirs chanted in jubilant strains, the praises of Jehovah, and thus voiced their gratitude and thanksgiving for precious blessings. Praise should be employed in dedicating every sanctuary to the worship of the Most High. The Temple was also dedicated with prayer. If offerings expressed faith and praise gave utterance to gratitude prayer manifested desire for the Lord's presence and manifold blessings. Therefore from his knees on the brazen platform, Solomon uttered that fervent prayer, which concluded man's efforts for dedicating the first temple.

II. The Temple Consecrated by the Divine Presence.—When fire came from heaven and consumed the accepted sacrifices and when the Shekinah, the bright symbol of Jehovah's presence with His people, took possession of the building, "the glory of the Lord filled the house," and the temple was truly dedicated. It was this Divine glory which consecrated the temple, rendered it holy and made it a Bethel for Israel. Without this the ceremonies and pageantry of human origin would have been in vain. The same is true now. The most imposing ritual ever conducted by man fails to consecrate a sanctuary to Jehovah unless the Lord's stately steppings are witnessed within its walls, and His glory there appears to the sons of men. The glory which rendered Solomon's temple holy was veiled. It was partially concealed by the cloud. So every manifestation of God is more or less mysterious or hidden from human beings. This glory too was luminous. It was bright and gladsome, as is every gracious revelation of the Almighty's presence. This glory which hallowed the first earthly temple like that which consecrates each true sanctuary now was granted in answer to prayer.

A Vision of World-Wide Peace.

Isa. 11:6-9; 9:6. Topic for Dec. 20.

A great deal of light has been made of the various peace parliaments that have been held during the past few years. Men have scoffed at the idea of the disarmament of the nations. They have noted that while disarmament has been talked so loudly, the building of navies and the better equipping of armies have been going on just the same; that the nations saying the most about putting away the sword and settling differences by arbitration, have been the very nations most aggressive in reaching out and absorbing the land of other peoples, weaker than they. It has been said that instead of the great powers protecting the smaller ones, they have been dictating hard terms of peace to these.

These sneers may be well founded. The great powers may be dealing harshly with the weaker in one aspect and yet we find that the ultimate outcome of such treatment has been favorable to the weaker country. We do not propose to say that the end justifies the means in such cases, but these very actions on the part of the stronger nations give promise of a day when there will be no more war.

The world is largely given to commercialism these days and we see how the money power has been able to keep down wars or to settle them quickly because of moneyed interests being at stake. Of course this is selfishness, but God has always had the power to overrule selfish plans to the furtherance of His glory, and this will be no exception. The prophecy in the eleventh chapter of Isaiah was made long before the money power was strong enough to control international relations. It was made at a time when international treaties were not of much consequence, but it clearly foretold a time when nations should no more take up the sword against nations.

The present international treaty relations have in large measure been brought about by the gospel of the "Prince of Peace." The missionaries have in almost every instance been the most influential persons in greeting these treaties made, and through them directly or indirectly the good results have come.

It is only the peace which the gospel brings that can be lasting. Some day commercial interests will clash and if there is not a solid basis for good feeling, the peace which commercialism brings will be destroyed. But the peace which the gospel brings will last, because it is a peace which has first come to the individuals composing the nation. The peace which results from the principles and precepts of Jesus getting into a people depends upon a regenerating of human character through the indwelling Spirit. There is nothing that is transient in the altruism of Jesus. It does not depend for its life upon the way it is received by those toward whom it is displayed. Its life is dependent altogether upon a vital principle which has taken hold of the heart of the follower of Jesus. A peace therefore that is world-wide, must have for its animating principle, the kingdom of God in the hearts of the people.

This being true we see how important it is that we as individuals study the way of peace. For one to strive for one's own way will never bring peace. They who are doing for the peace of the family, are they who know how to give up readily to the wishes of others. Often the world laughs at such a one and says there is a lack of pluck and self-assertion. But after all it is easier to be thus derided than to have that spirit which makes others always submit to our domination. There is little enjoyment for that one who as a condition of happiness, demands that others shall always give way. If we are to become a nation of peace-makers and peace-keepers, we as individuals, must learn of Christ the lesson of thinking of others first.

The Evil of Vacancies and a Remedy Suggested.

Rev. Chas. D. Gilkeson.

In an article in the Oct.-Nov. 1902 number of the Union Seminary Magazine, Dr. M. L. Lacy of West Virginia discusses "Vacancies in the Presbyterian Church." In the December 1902, Jan. 1903 number of the same magazine, under the caption of "Our Call System," signed Layman, Mr. M. M. Caldwell directs attention to a serious evil growing out of our system as administered at present. In the New York Observer of May 14th, 1903, Dr. Lewis M. Mudge of New Jersey discusses "Pulpit Vacancy and Supply." These three articles bear on the same subject, but treat different phases of it. Each writer seems to be ignorant of the articles of the others, yet each one, while dealing with a different evil growing out of the system as administered, points out the defect in the administration of the system, the abuses of the great historical and unquestionably scriptural principle upon which the system is based, and emphasizes as the remedy, the need of the exercise of more Presbyterial authority. One says that "this principle as now used, is working great damage." Another declares that "there is something radically wrong in the administration of the system," while the other speaks of our "happy-go-lucky methods," and says "As to the common method of seeking churches and obtaining pastors, they are as uncertain and unsatisfactory as they well could be."

Dr. Lacy concludes his article with this suggestion: "Let the next General Assembly appoint a committee that shall take the whole matter into consideration, formulate a plan, and put an end to this enormous evil that is wasting the best strength of our Church, and shaking the faith of some in the divine wisdom of its system."

On the initiative of another than Dr. Lacy, Greenbrier Presbytery overtured the Lexington Assembly to appoint such a committee. This overture was granted (see Minutes of 1903 p. 494)

It is not the writer's purpose to discuss an evil which is so painfully patent, but to suggest a remedy, with the hope of stirring up other minds to work, that some plan may be devised to end this evil.

To the writer it seems that any plan adequate to meet the evil should cover the following points: 1. It should provide a definite plan to aid by Presbyterial oversight, vacant churches in finding suitable men for their pulpits without long delay. 2. It should eliminate the "W. C." and thereby remove from our church the reproach of carrying upon its rolls the names of unemployed ministers when, at the same time almost one fourth of our churches are vacant. 3. It should introduce more flexibility into our system. When a pastor feels that he ought to make a change, the only way now open to him is to write to churches or to brother ministers, which is sometimes unpleasant and embarrassing and often fruitless, or to resign (which prejudices him at once in the eyes of the church) not knowing when he may obtain work or how support his family.

No minister ought to be subjected to the alternative of either holding on to a work which he feels that he ought to give up, or resigning with no work in view and no means of supporting his family. Such a state of things ought not to exist, and Presbyteries, Synods and Assembly owe it to churches and ministers under their charge that they should not exist.

Any relief that may be attained through any action of Church courts, must come in the exercise of the episcopal authority vested in Presbytery and the ready consent of congregations thereto. No change in the constitution in Book of Church Order, paragraph 77. But the Presbytery is too small a body, the field over which its jurisdiction extends covers too small an area to work successfully any scheme of interchange. There must be the co-operation of Synod and Assembly and therefore in the plan suggested below, while Presbytery retains all the authority given it in our constitution, the Synod is suggested as the unit.

The Plan.—There shall be in each Synod a Committee on "Vacancies and Supplies," composed of one member from each Presbytery elected annually by the Presbytery (or this work may be assigned to Synod's Committee on Evangelization or Home Missions, if formed as suggested above.) This committee shall elect its own chairman and clerk, and minutes of all its proceedings shall be subject to the review of the Synod. It shall hold at least two stated meetings annually, one before the meeting of the Presbyteries in the spring, and one before the fall meetings of Presbyteries. It shall be the duty of this committee: 1. To keep a list of ministers and licentiates available for appointment as special evangelists. 2. Also a list of vacant churches. 3. From the "available list" it shall nominate, for appointment by the Presbyteries, supplies for the vacant churches to be known as special evangelists; the nomination of the committee shall be considered equivalent to an appointment unless rejected by the vote of the Presbytery in which the vacancy exists. The Presbyteries, acting on nominations for churches in their bounds, shall make all appointments to expire either on the 31st of March or the 30th of September. Appointments shall be made, ordinarily, for one year and never for more than eighteen months. In cases where the special evangelist is continued for the same church, the appointment shall be for six months at a time only.

List of Availables.—1. All ministers without charge, able for work, shall be placed on this "List"—those unable for work to be designated in Minutes of Assembly Inf. or H. R. (honorably retired.)

2. All students for the ministry, who have received aid from the church in their preparation, upon their licensure shall be placed on this "List" and serve under the appointment of this committee for a term of years, say three. This is the suggestion of M. M. Caldwell in the article referred to above where many good and sufficient reasons are given (for the good of the young ministers as well as that of the Church) why this may be wisely adopted as the policy of our Church.

3. Any minister or licentiate, may at his own request, be placed on this "List," but in doing so it is to be understood that he agrees to be subject to the appointment of the committee and Presbytery.

Ministers engaged in this work shall be known as special evangelists.

Vacant Church List.—1. Any church, when it becomes vacant, may, by a vote of the congregation, go at once on this list.

2. When a church has been vacant six months, Presbytery may advise or direct that it be placed on this list.

3. A church, or group of churches, dependent upon the Home Mission Fund of Presbytery, Synod or Assembly may, by order of Presbytery, be placed on this list.

4. Any church in which there is dissension that makes it improbable that it can agree with any unanimity upon a pastor may, by order of the Presbytery, be placed on this list.

When the committee has appointed a special evangelist for a church, and the Presbytery has confirmed the same, that church shall receive the appointee for the time specified by the Presbytery, and as true Presbyterians and loyal members of the body of Christ, uphold him in his work and provide for his support as though a regularly elected and installed pastor.

It shall be competent for a church supplied by a special evangelist to call a pastor at any time, and it shall be encouraged and expected to do so within the time of the service of the special evangelist, it being understood however that under ordinary circumstances, the pastoral relation can not be formed until the expiration of the services of the special evangelist.

Likewise a special evangelist may accept a call at any time, it being understood however that under ordinary circumstances, he can enter on a pastorate in another field only upon the expiration of his time as supply.

Any church desiring to continue the services of the special evangelist for another six months, shall make application to the Presbytery in the usual way, and notify the Synod's committee of its purpose to take this action at least thirty days before a stated meeting of that committee.

Stated Clerks of Presbyteries shall promptly notify the chairman of their Synod's committee of all calls, vacancies, etc., in their Presbyteries.

Chairmen of Synod's committees should keep in close touch with each other so that transfers may be readily made from one Synod to another.

Vacant Churches Not On Vacant Church List.—When a church, upon becoming vacant does not go, or is not placed, on the vacant list, Presbytery at the same time it dissolves the pastoral relation, shall appoint a committee of one or more—it may be the representative of the Presbytery on the Synod's committee, or better another member of the Presbytery who shall act with the member of the Synod's committee—to advise with the church and assist it in securing a pastor. Very helpful suggestions for this committee may be found in Dr. Mudge's article referred to above. If, at the end of six months, it be shown that the church has not exercised due diligence to secure a pastor, it shall be competent for the Presbytery to place the church on the "vacant list."

Some advantages of such a plan are: 1. It will provide work for all that are able and willing to work, and if paragraph 77 be enforced, will remove all "dead-wood" from our roll. 2. Give churches time to look up the man suited to their pulpit while at the same time the pulpit is filled and the church work goes steadily on. 3. It will help to answer the question "What shall be done with the old minister?" Many of our ministers, incapacitated by ill health or the infirmities of age from doing full pastoral work, are nevertheless able to fill most acceptably any of our pulpits for a year at a time and to do the more urgent pastoral work. By some plan as this the church could use them to bridge over the gaps between pastorates and the same time give them the opportunity, which I know some of them crave, of preaching the blessed gospel. 4. It will help many an anxious pastor to decide the question as to whether he will hold on to his work because nothing else offers, or place himself at the command of the church to be used where she deems best. 5. It will enable Home Missions Committees to man the picket lines with young men, and at the same time give our young men excellent training and the opportunity for making "a loving sacrifice for the Master's cause." 6. Sometimes it is necessary, for reasons of health, for a minister to move from a higher to a lower, from a warmer to a cooler climate. Some plan like this would make the transfer easy and thereby prolong possibly the life and usefulness of many a minister.

There are no doubt objections to this plan. Ministers may be slow to place themselves at the disposal of such a committee. Churches may be wary of accepting, even for a year, a man sent to them. But a wise committee could do much to allay such fears, while what may seem a hard and fast rule may be much modified by the committee taking heed, as far as consistent with an adherence to the spirit of the law, to the suggestions and preferences of ministers and churches. If a plan be seen to conserve the best interests of the Church at large, in time ministers and churches will willingly submit. There are no doubt objections to this plan but there are also existing evils. A study of the minutes of 1903 reveals the fact that 21 per cent of our churches are vacant; that 6 per cent of our ministers are marked "W. C." (without charge); that of the churches that are supplied 35 per cent are supplied by Stated Supplies, and 6 per cent more by Domestic Missionaries and Evangelists, leaving only 59 per cent of the churches that are supplied with the gospel, supplied by elected and installed pastors. These figures call loudly for some relief, some reform. But there are other evils, and more serious ones, which this paper aims to alleviate, which no figures can tell. There are, I know, objections to this plan, but a malady which has taken such hold requires heroic treatment, and time and patience will be necessary before a cure can be effected. Shall we sit with folded hands and see this "wasting" and "loss" go on and not even make the effort to correct the evil?

As stated above, this article is not written to defend this plan against the field, but to elicit discussion. Let it be discussed. Let the committee, charged by the Assembly to devise some plan to meet the evil, have all the light it can get from all over the Church. Criticise this plan, amend it, suggest a substitute for it, through the press or by correspondence with the committee. By all means let us keep agitating and discussing until some feasible plan is found to meet this evil.

"Presbyterian Dance Factories."

Under this heading "A Long-Suffering Pastor," in a recent issue of our church papers, affirms that "but few girls graduate from certain of our Presbyterian schools who are not proficient in the art of dancing. These schools do not actually teach dancing, but under their fostering care many girls acquire the art and then go home to become a source of worry to their parents, church and pastor."

I am glad that the brother has called attention to this matter, and I only regret that he did not specify by name and location the "Presbyterian schools" where such practices are permitted. It is due to parents, guardians and pastors, who have conscientious scruples on this subject, that they be informed of those institutions where girls will acquire such "accomplishments." I have been instrumental in sending more than one bright girl to college, and I am often asked to recommend a suitable school by parents who have daughters to educate. In the future I shall be very careful not to commend any of our "Presbyterian schools" until I am satisfied that the students are not exposed to the debasing influences of the modern dance.

Since this charge has been made in a general way, and indirectly reflects upon all our girls' schools the authorities of those schools where this evil is not permitted should clearly state this fact in their circulars and catalogues in order to clear their own skirts and safeguard their patrons. I have secured the names of three of our prominent institutions (there are doubtless others) where the girls learn to dance, and will furnish this information to anyone who will send me, care of this paper, a stamped and self-addressed envelope.

This statement regarding "certain of our Presbyterian schools" is a surprise to me, and again it is not a surprise. It is a surprise because the principals of these schools, especially if they are Presbyterian ministers or elders, ought to know that seven of our General Assemblies have condemned in most positive terms all forms of the round dance, together with stage plays and card playing. This highest court of our Church calls upon all its members to abstain from these worldly amusements which are of the earth earthy and which are certain to affect the spiritual life disastrously.

In the face of this explicit and official prohibition, how can any member of the Southern Presbyterian Church, or of any other Church which forbids such things, engage in them without violating his vow of discipleship? Every one who is received into our denomination on profession of faith, promises, among other things to obey them that have the rule over him in the Lord. When, therefore, the Church rulers warn their members against these things and forbid them, the church member who disregards such prohibition, by that act deliberately breaks the solemn vow by which he was received into the visible Church of Christ on earth and which was made in the presence of God and the congregation. Are these school authorities willing to thus encourage the breaking of church vows, and do the card-playing, theatre-going and dancing professors of religion realize what a living lie they are practicing?

Furthermore, I am surprised that any professing Christian, or any merely moral man, should countenance a pastime that leads more souls into perdition than any other agency of Satan, not even excepting the lust-provoking theatre. Don't the principals of these "Presbyterian schools" know that fully three-fourths of the girls and women who are leading lives of shame have been dragged down by means of the round dance? If they don't know it, as guardians and teachers of youth, they ought to know it, and instead of allowing innocent and unsuspecting girls committed to their care to acquire a knowledge of and relish for that which may prove to be their sad undoing, these mentors should warn their charges of the perils of the dance and shield them in every way from its disgusting liberties.

That the round dance is the most prolific source of prostitution is proven by the testimony of matrons of Rescue Homes for fallen women, missionary workers in the slums, converted dancing masters, chiefs of police of our large cities, and Roman Catholic priests who hear the secrets of the confessional. I need not specify on this subject. Any one who so desires can secure abundant evidence of the truth of this statement from competent authority. Not only is the danger imminent for young girls, but it is for young men as well. The president of a famous university says: "The foot ball field is a safer place for a young man than the ball room!"

On the other hand, when I look around at the condition of the Church at large, as comprised in all evangelical denominations, I am not surprised that "certain of our Presbyterian schools" should have joined the crowd which is thus catering to "the world, the flesh, and the devil." It is only in keeping with the general flood of worldliness which is the bane of all the churches. These schools must be "in the swim," and their graduates must be able to maintain the reputation of their alma mater for turning out finished products for "fashionable society." Such institutions do not regard it amiss to educate the legs, as well as the brains, of their students, and some of our churches, indeed, judging from the antics of the members, might properly be styled "The Church of the Limber Legs," or, to sanctify the performance, "The Church of the Holy Heels!"

Bah! What a stench in the nostrils of the Almighty must be the religion of these card-playing, theatre-going, and dancing church members. Just observe how devoted they are to church work (especially to the soul-winning church fairs and vaudeville entertainments)! How faithful their attendance upon all the services of the sanctuary in all kinds of weather, and how fervent their piety! How eagerly the conscience-stricken sinner asks their advice when he is seeking the Lord! How tender and profitable are their ministrations to the sick and dying, comforting the one with precious promises from God's Holy Word, and pointing the other to the mansions of the blest! What an advantage they are to any church! How greatly they encourage their pastor, and how they long and pray for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Truly "Mr. Worldly-Minded" is in large evidence in the Church of Christ today, and these "Presbyterian Dance Factories" are adding to the output.

But the Southern Presbyterian Church is not the only one which is cursed with this tide of ungodliness. As a consequence church members anywhere are very rarely disciplined for offences which are flagrant and clearly prohibited by church rules. In the Northern Methodist Church discipline is practically abolished, according to the statement of Rev. Dr. Buckley. A minister of the Southern Methodist Church, speaking to me on this subject and excusing the non-enforcement of the rules of that Church against indulgence in worldly amusements, said that if the members were disciplined for such offences they would go over to the Episcopalians.

Among the Baptists in certain quarters it is very similar, for I have personal knowledge of an old established and prominent Baptist college in Virginia where the girls have their weekly dances among themselves. They learn how to dance with their schoolmates at college, and then when they go out into "society" they are properly qualified to give their embraces by the score to every Tom, Dick and Harry who may claim such privileges after a mere formal introduction!

What is needed in the churches today is more ministers with the fearlessness of John the Baptist who did not hesitate to point out the besetting sins of his hearers and call them to repentance and amendment of life. Paul did not mince matters, or talk with honeyed words to those licentious Corinthians. He told them plainly of the heinous nature of their offences and then uttered a trumpet call for separation from ungodly men and their deeds, which should be heard and heeded by all the churches today: "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty. Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."—I Cor. vi. 17-vii. 1. Abdi.

"Futures" Again.

Referring to the editorial on "Cotton Futures Once More" in the Standard for October 21, I wish here to reprint correctly a paragraph from my article of Oct. 7. The printer thought the price of the horse incredible or from some cause made the paragraph unintelligible.

"For suppose that a horse merchant has agreed to deliver a certain horse to a party for $2,100, knowing that the horse is to be sold, and calculating that he can effect the purchase at $2,000. He thus expects to make $100 commission. But when he approaches the present owner to sound him concerning the price, he is told that the horse is to run in a race; he can have the horse for $1,000 if the horse is beaten, or for $3,000 if he wins the race. Then our horse merchant, meeting a man who is willing to bet $1,000 that the horse will be beaten, accepts the bet. If now the horse is beaten, the horse merchant pays $1,000 on the bet and $1,000 for the horse, in all $2,000; or if the horse wins, he makes $1,000 on the bet, and then pays $3,000 for the horse. Thus by making the bet he removes the risk.

Is the transaction in which he bets $1,000 on the horse race gambling? If so, the fact that he has so related his bet with another transaction as to keep himself from losing or gaining on the two transactions, does not take away the gambling nature of the betting transaction."

The argument of this illustration is that, although risk was eliminated from the two transactions taken together, yet that on the one transaction, that between the two betters, one must lose that the other may gain.

The editorial answer is most forcibly stated in the following paragraph: "A cotton merchant agrees to deliver a thousand bales of cotton in December to a cotton mill. He protects himself by buying a thousand bales of December cotton in futures. One of our cotton exporters at the same time ships a thousand bales of cotton to Europe. It will take six weeks for the cotton to reach Europe. While the ship is on the water cotton may go down to a disastrous point. He sells a thousand bales of December cotton to protect himself, and the two transactions again cancel each other. It can be demonstrated that for every such transaction in which one party does not gain there is another in which the other did not lose."

To make the argument more easily discussible, let us suppose that December cotton (futures) is now selling at 10 cents, that is $50 a bale, and that the cotton merchant has agreed to deliver at this price. If cotton goes up to 11 cents he will lose $5,000 on his trade with the mill and gain $5,000 on his deal in futures; or if cotton goes down to 9 cents he will gain this amount on his trade with the mill and lose it on his deal in futures. And the cotton exporter, if cotton goes up will gain by the increase in price of his exported cotton and lose on his deal in futures or if cotton goes down, he will lose by the decrease in price of his exported cotton and gain on his deal in futures. If the cotton merchant buys futures from the cotton exporter neither party would gain or lose, but each would insure the other against loss.

Such is the argument. But the cotton merchant does not buy futures from the cotton exporter, but from any one through the exchange, say A., and the transaction between him and A. is simple gambling, a bet between him and A. on the price of December cotton. And the cotton exporter does not sell futures to the cotton merchant, but to any one through the exchange, say B., and the transaction between him and B. is simple gambling, a bet between them on the price of December cotton.

But let us go back to the supposition that the cotton merchant buys futures from the cotton exporter, (indirectly if not directly,) and see the real nature of this transaction. After the futures have been sold by the exporter to the merchant, that is, after they have agreed that the exporter shall pay to the merchant $5,000, if cotton goes up one cent, and that the merchant shall pay to the exporter this sum if cotton goes down one cent; let us suppose that the exporter's cotton is lost at sea, and that cotton goes up or down, then it is plain that on the deal in futures, the exporter loses or gains. Suppose that the mill is destroyed and cannot take the cotton; then it is plain that, on the deal in futures, the merchant will gain or lose. Suppose that both disasters happen then it is plain that, on the deal in futures one will gain and the other lose. That is when we take the transaction in futures by itself we see that this transaction is a bet between the parties to it on the future price of cotton, a transaction in which one party must lose that the other may gain.

In legitimate insurance it is different. If my house is insured, in no way will the insurance company gain at my loss, or I gain at its loss. For if my house does not burn I do not lose, the increased value of the house compensating me for the premium; and if it burns, I certainly gain nothing, receiving less than the value of the house. But in the transaction in futures, the buyer as such always loses when the seller as such gains, and vice versa.

Moreover it is not demonstrable "that for every such transaction in which one party does not gain there is another in which the other party did not lose?"

Realizing that the question between us is one of difficulty, and hoping only to help in the study and solution of it I submit this further contribution to the editor's able criticism.

How They Came Together.

"We have never understood just how the two bodies got together." So you say, Mr. Editor, in a recent editorial, referring to the Union of the New School Synod with the Southern Presbyterian Church. The history of that union is interesting. Will you let one who lived in those times and had a personal knowledge of the whole affair tell you something about it?

In 1857, twenty years after the division of the Church into Old and New School bodies, the New School Church was divided by the withdrawal of the Southern churches and ministers, owing to the deliverance of their General Assembly that year on the subject of slavery. These Southern New School churches organized under the name of The United Synod of the Presbyterian Church, and contained about 11,000 members and some 120 ministers and 200 churches. They at once sought union with the Old School Church and made overtures to the General Assembly which met in New Orleans in 1858. But under the lead of Dr. Robert J. Breckinridge that Assembly declined to entertain the proposition.

In 1861 The Old School Church divided and the Southern branch organized under the name of The Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America. The United Synod sought union with the body and overtures to this end were made at the third meeting of the General Assembly, which was held in 1863 at Columbia, S. C. These overtures were favorably received and a committee was appointed to confer with a similar committee of that Church. The committee of the Southern Presbyterian Church was composed of the following members, viz: R. L. Dabney, D. D., J. N. Waddell, D. D., William Brown, D. D., J. B. Ramsey, D. D., E. T. Baird, D. D., Col. J. T. L. Preston, and F. N. Watkins, Esq. That of the United Synod were Joseph C. Stiles, D. D., Charles H. Read, D. D., J. D. Mitchell, D. D., J. J. Robinson, D. D., and J. F. Johnson. Opposition to this movement centered in Columbia and was led by Rev. A. A. Porter, D. D., who was then editor of the Southern Presbyterian and who in a series of very able editorials strongly opposed the union mainly on doctrinal grounds. He was ably assisted by Dr. Adger, Dr. Leighton Wilson and other ministers of that locality, especially Dr. Palmer, who on the death of Dr. Thornwell in 1862 succeeded temporarily to his chair in the Theological Seminary, having been forced by the war to leave his church in New Orleans.

In due time the two committees met and held a very satisfactory conference. The committee of the Southern Presbyterian Church drew up a statement of doctrine in a series of articles "touching doctrines that had been formerly grounds of debate," making them as strong and clear as possible with a view of testing the orthodoxy of the other body. Without hesitation the committee of the United Synod expressed their readiness to subscribe to this statement (pledging their Church to do the same) as accurately expressing their doctrinal views and beliefs.

Further conference developed a perfect uniformity of belief, the committee of the Synod distinctly repudiating all New School errors.

The way being clear the two committees agreed upon a report, recommending to the respective bodies which they represented, a plan of union between the two churches. This report came before the Southern General Assembly which met in Charlotte, N. C., in 1864.

Meanwhile the Columbia men were preparing to resist the proposed union on the floor of the Assembly and it was arranged that Dr. Porter, thoroughly distrusting as he did the soundness of the New School body, should lead by attacking the proposition from the doctrinal side, to be followed by Dr. Adger and Dr. Palmer and perhaps others, to each of whom was assigned by agreement a certain part in the debate. But these brethren soon discovered when they reached Charlotte that they represented an unpopular cause and would have little following in the Assembly, the whole tide of sentiment and feeling being in favor of the union. Dr. Dabney presented his report and sustained it with an unanswerable argument. Dr. Porter refused to speak and Dr. Adger and Dr. Palmer made but little resistance. By a vote of 53 to 7 the Assembly agreed to the plan of union. The statement of doctrine "having served a valuable purpose by presenting satisfactory evidence of harmony and soundness of doctrinal views," the union was effected, not by subscription to it, as at first proposed, but "on the basis of our existing standards only."

This, in brief, is the history of the union between the two Southern wings of the Old and New School bodies. Now a word as to the union of the two Northern wings—the Old and the New School Churches North. After the war a wave of "patriotism" swept over the North; secession had been wiped out, "rebellion" had been crushed, and "reunion was in the air." Under the influence of this popular feeling the two bodies, which were of equal size, were drawn together. At first the Old School men insisted on a doctrinal statement similar to that which the Southern Old School men had drawn up as a test of orthodoxy. This the New School side would not submit to. They contended for liberty to interpret the standards as they understood them—a liberty, they argued, which each side should enjoy. "If we come back," they said, "we will bring with us Albert Barnes and his books, and the books of our Board of Publication must stand on the same shelves with those of your Board." The Old School side first made a feeble protest, and then under the pressure of an outside "patriotic" sentiment, yielded, and the New School Church came back on its own terms.

The union culminated in 1870, and immediately Dr. van Dyke, Dr. Bacchus and Mr. Dodge were dispatched to the Southern General Assembly in session at Louisville bearing their famous "olive branch." Dr. van Dyke was on terms of warm personal friendship with many of his Southern brethren whom he met at that Assembly and in private he talked with them freely and unreservedly. Dr. Dabney asked him how it was that with his views and feelings he could consent to the union which had just taken place between his Church and the New School body, involving as it did the sacrifice of truth and principle. His reply was that the union could not be prevented—the public sentiment of the country demanded it, and seeing that it was inevitable, he thought it best to fling himself into the forefront of the movement and if possible direct and control it, for, said he, "if I must take passage on the Old Ship I mean to walk the quarterdeck." Then in a tone of bitterness he added that he had no confidence in the permanence of this great union that they were all glorying over. The body, he said, is not a homogeneous one and cannot hold together. Dissolution must come sooner or later—he thought it would come soon, and he wanted his Southern brethren to come in now so that when that division took place he would have with him in the fight a body of sound men on whom he could depend.

Dr. Dabney's reply was: van Dyke, that division which you predict will not take place. The union you have formed will last. You have lost your opportunity. You and those like minded with you have compromised yourselves and your moral power is gone. Having sacrificed your convictions and principles you will never be able to assert them effectively at another time. No matter what may be done you will all acquiesce and the Church will not be disrupted. We do not propose to go in with you to help in any of your fights; we have enough fighting of our own to do. We will remain as we are and stand for the doctrines and principles you have failed to maintain."

To all of which I said at the time, and say still, Amen; and by the help of God we will stand by our testimony.

Mr. Verner's New Expedition to Africa.

I write this for the Church papers, to which I have been a contributor for the last ten years, in order to make clear certain matters about which articles in the secular press may possibly convey erroneous impressions. I have tried to keep the affair out of the secular papers for the present, because of the sensational reports which often emanate from them. Already some of them have published articles of this kind unauthorized by me in any way.

This expedition is under the auspices of some eminent scientific men, for the purpose of making investigations into certain matters of extreme scientific interest and involved in considerable controversy for many years. My personal connection with it arose without any specific application on my part, and as a consequence of contributions on African affairs in current periodicals for the last four years, which have attracted international attention. I am to make a thorough investigation of the problems in question and to secure desirable anthropological specimens and artifacts. I am accompanied by the African lad, Kondola, whose history has been referred to in the religious press already, and by a colored man, Alonzo Edmiston of Petersburg, Tenn., a graduate of the Stillman Institute, and a man of good mental and spiritual qualifications, besides of powerful physique and considerable mechanical training.

I was constrained to accept this undertaking because of the opportunity to renew my acquaintance with my great friend, Ndombe, and his people, to stir up their minds by way of remembrance of what I taught them before, and possibly ultimately to arrange for a large mission station there to be conducted by graduates of the Stillman Institute under the direction of capable white men. My official designation will not deter me from any of these privileges, while it will give me unusual opportunities to put the great work I have long hoped to do widely before the public. Then, too, I am greatly interested in these scientific questions, as I believe that much benefit to the great cause of Truth will finally emerge from the investigations. That the eminent scientists connected with this enterprise are sympathetic with the true interests of my work, I will state that the most distinguished man of science in America said to me in a discussion of the future of African civilization, "Christianity is the keynote of all true civilization." Other advantages in this enterprise appear in the fact that I can make a comparatively short trip, without being separated from my wife and children for a long time. The fact of my marriage made it impracticable for me to resume my direct missionary work in Africa, because I could not take my family there with safety; but I have been extremely reluctant to give up all hope of ever doing any work for the people I learned to love during my first three years in Africa, and now this opportunity comes as a veritable God-send to my cherished desires.

Then the relation sustained by the Stillman Institute to this expedition, the most important one of a scientific character ever sent to Africa from America, ought to reflect credit on that Institution and bring prominently before the public the work that we are doing for the American colored people at Tuscaloosa. The personnel of the expedition is drawn entirely from the Institute and its success will certainly attract favorable notice to the work we are doing there.

In addition to the work on the field, I shall do a great deal of literary work, making detailed reports to the American Anthropological Association, to the National Geographic Society, and to the various Geological, Archaeological and other scientific bodies, with which I am in connection. I have also been engaged to write regularly for Harper's Weekly, besides being a special correspondent for the London Times, and I shall send letters to my friends through the columns of this paper, which has so kindly been at my disposal in the past.

There is another good reason for my acceptance of this temporary work, which I believe I will be pardoned for alluding to here, since I wish all of my friends to know why I have thus taken up secular work for a time, and since I would deplore any lack of full understanding of my reasons on their part. The work of the Church in which I have been engaged for the past ten years, has not been able to afford me much financial support, because of the great needs of the work and the comparative scantiness of the funds available for all purposes. I had to contract some obligations during my long illness and subsequent enforced suspension of productive labor. This undertaking may enable me to discharge these and subsequently to live on the limited income in the Church. I by no means intend to give up my regular work, to which I have given so many years, and in which I have gained special experience and expert skill, and which I love above any other work I could possibly do. I hope to resume my post at Tuscaloosa duly, and to go to Africa only at intervals when I shall alternate with Dr. Coppedge who is now at Tuscaloosa, and who will take my place in Africa when I return, if God wills.

In this connection let me refer to the appearance of my book "Pioneering in Central Africa," which is just from the press as I go to the field. This book, is the result of many years' labor, and presents the varied spiritual, missionary, scientific, commercial and political aspects of my observations and experiences in Africa. It is a large volume, well illustrated, with full maps and complete descriptions of many new lands and rare peoples, besides giving an account of life and travels. The charge of the work of securing subscriptions to this book is left in the hands of Mrs. Verner, at Tuscaloosa, Ala., and I trust that those interested will communicate with her. The price at present is $1.90 postpaid. It will form a splendid Christmas gift, I believe, and my friends may thus travel with me to Central Africa.

I spent my twenty-second birthday in Westminster Abbey, on the way to Africa for the first time. I spent my thirtieth leaving my wife and children for the Dark Continent, and a part of that day was spent in Anniston, Ala., at the home of Mrs. Lapsley, the saintly mother of the young hero of the Congo. England's Mausoleum was no more inspiring than the influence of that lovely Christian home, and of that sweet "mother in Israel," whose parting benediction sends me once more on my way rejoicing that "Hitherto hath God helped us."

Correspondents may address me for a month care the American Legation, Brussels, Belgium; and then, care of the American Mission, Luebo, Congo Free State, Africa, for three months.

"God be with you till we met again."

Nov. 16, 1903. S. P. Verner.

A Question.

Editor Standard:

Dear Sir: May I ask if you ever knew a protest as to the salaries of ministers to come from a poor man, or from a man who was really in sympathy with the demands made upon a minister's purse?

Respectfully yours,
W. S.

"The Strongest Synod" Once More.

"Secretary" and "C. A. M." are not altogether straight yet. In the Standard of Dec. 2nd "Secretary" says:

"The more correct way of stating the matter would be to say that North Carolina is the strongest Presbyterian State in the South and that was what the secretary intended. * * * North Carolina contains 36,000 members and one Presbyterian for every thirty of white population, which is true of no other State in the South."

Which may be the more correct way of stating the matter, but it is not the most correct, inasmuch as South Carolina comes very close to having one Presbyterian to every twenty of white population. This is perhaps no very vital criterion of greatness, but it is just as well to have the record straight when dealing with figures.
S. M. S.

When God speaks, he likes no other voice to break the stillness but his own, and hence the place that has always been given to solitude in all true religious life; it can not be overdone, but it can be grossly underdone. And there is no lesson more worth insisting on in days like ours than this, when God wants to speak with a man, he wants that man to be alone.—H. Drummond.

Little children loved Jesus for the pure luxury of loving Him. Their love was its own reward. They loved the lovable and were happy. But are not older people prone to think that devotion to Jesus ought to be returned in the shape of temporal prosperity? Do we not half expect material payment for spiritual service?—J. H. Jowett.

The idea, so common in the ancient writers, is not all a poetic conceit, that the soul of a man is only a fragment of a larger whole, and goes out in search of other souls in which it will find its true completion. We walk among worlds unrealized, until we have learned the secret of love. We know this, and in our sincerest moments admit this, even though we are seeking to fill up our lives with other ambitions and other hopes.—Hugh Black.

Suffer and Forbid Them Not.

They are going—only going,
Jesus called them long ago:
All the wintry time they are passing
Softly as the falling snow,
When the violets in the spring-time
Catch the azure of the sky,
They are carried out to slumber
Sweetly where the violets lie.

They are going—only going,
When with summer earth is dressed,
In their cold hands holding roses
Folded to each silent breast;
When the autumn hangs red banners
Cut above the harvest sheaves,
They are going—ever going,
Thick and fast like falling leaves.

All along the mighty ages,
All adown the solemn time,
They've taken up their homeward march
To that serener clime;
Where the watching, waiting angels
Lead them from the shadows dim
To the brightness of His presence
Who has called them unto Him.

They are going—only going
Out of pain and into bliss,
Out of sad and sinful weakness
Into perfect holiness,
Snowy brows—no care shall shade them,
Bright eyes tears shall never dim,
Rosy lips, no time shall fade them,
Jesus called them unto Him.

Little hearts forever stainless,
Little hands as pure as they,
Little feet by angels guided Never a forbidden way.
They are going—ever going,
Leaving many a lonely spot,
But 'tis Jesus who has called them;
Suffer and forbid them not.

Life.

Life, what is it? you say and sigh.
'Tis the gift of the Lord, as His glory swept by.
We saw the light, caught a glimpse of morn,
And then as mortals we were born.

"Is it worth living?" you ask and sigh,
It is worth living, when He is nigh?
And as He is everywhere present, then here,
He makes life worth living, whatever the sphere.

"There's a constant turning from things we would,
To do the things that we must and should."
Ah, yes, you are right, my friend, my friend,
But 'tis only to give life its highest trend.

The soul would be pulpy, and soft, unworth,
If we could do just what we would on earth.
We need a turning from things of sin,
That the wonderful light of Truth shine in.

Yes, life is wrth living, here you may rest
The gifts of the Infinite One are best.
"The duty that's nearest," and done with your might;
This is the thing that makes life bright.

Never grieve, for the turning, and turning aside,
From the pleasant path, although broad and wide,
And you will find right now, and here,
That life is worth living, the way will clear.

Life! Life! 'tis a word so broad and grand,
That mortal mind cannot understand,
But by and by the part that's divine,
Shall drink and freely of Life's real wine.

Rev Henry C. Slaymaker.

Not since the death of Rev. Samuel N. Lapsley, eleven years ago, has the heart of the Church been more stirred than on the 1st inst., when a cablegram, received at the Nashville offices, told of the death of this young missionary, while on his way to Lnebo, Congo Free State. The message stated the bare fact that our steamer, The Samuel N. Lapsley, capsized and that Mr. Slaymaker and twenty-three of the crew were drowned.

Mr. Slaymaker's home is in Alexandria, Virginia, where his mother now lives. He had served the Second Presbyterian Church as an elder for six years, and was ordained, after careful preparation, as an extraordinary case, to carry his consecrated life and business experience into that great land, "hard in sins and old in sorrows." A good soldier he was, and "faithful unto life," who would have liked to carry his shield.

Dr. Chester writes:

The committee had been working and praying for over two years for some one who had had suitable experience to go out to Africa and take charge especially of the business affairs of the mission. When Mr. Slaymaker offered himself, we felt that he was the answer of God to our prayers. Of course we cannot understand this strange dispensation that calls him away before he was able even to enter upon his work. But our African Mission has so manifestly enjoyed the favor of God that we may hope that He will in due time make His dealings plain to us and show us the way in which this great calamity may be made to work for the advancement of His cause in Africa.

A later cablegram states that "Santhone", mentioned in Committee Notes, is St. Thomas, which is evidence of the safety of Mr. Vass and Mr. Martin.

MISSOURI.

ODESSA.—This church has recently given a very hearty and unanimous call to Rev. N. H. Mc Cain, of Kansas City, to become its pastor. His decision has not yet been announced, but all hope that he will see his way clear to accept this call.

ST. LOUIS.—The Grand Avenue Presbyterian Church of this city, on Sabbath, Nov. 29, 1903, celebrated its Jubilee or Fiftieth Anniversary with appropriate exercises. It was really a most interesting and beautiful affair. The decorations of the church were in palms and yellow chrysanthemums, above the pulpit at each side were the dates, 1853-1903, and in the centre "Fiftieth Anniversary," each letter imbedded in green and yellow and each letter an electric light. All was in admirable taste and the effect very beautiful and pleasing.

On Sabbath morning, besides the usual devotional exercises and appropriate music, an address, "A Historical Sketch of the Church," was delivered by Dr. Wm. M. McPheeters the oldest Elder and one of the first members of the church. This address will doubtless be published and will prove an interesting and valuable bit of history, for this church has a history, a noble and noteworthy history, especially during the civil war, in times that tried some men's souls and when not a few were found "wanting;" then the Pine Street Church, which was its name at that day, its Pastor and Session, almost alone in this city, stood for the Crown Rights of the King, the independence of the Church, and the separation of the things of Caesar from those of God. This was followed by another most admirable and appropriate address by the Pastor on "The Past and Future of our Church." At night Dr. Cannon preached an able and instructive sermon on "Presbyterianism."

On Monday evening a grand reception was tendered the whole congregation. The first part consisted of short addresses and beautiful music in the auditorium; Dr. H. N. Spencer presided and gave an admirable address of welcome. He was followed by Mr. Thomas S. McPheeters, son of Dr. S. B. McPheeters, the pastor during the war, on "The Home and the Church," by Mr. Charles C. Nichols, superintendent of the Sunday School, on "The Sunday School," and by Judge Given Campbell on "The Women and the Church." The addresses were all brief, appropriate, interesting. Then, though this was not on the programme, there was taken a flashlight photo, first of the pastor, elders and deacons, sitting and standing on the rostrum, and afterwards of the whole audience in the seats looking their sweetest and best! Part Second was the reception proper by the pastor and his wife and the Ruling elders and their wives in the Lecture room, which was very handsomely decorated. And finally elaborate and elegant refreshments in the Sabbath School room above. Thus ended the "Jubilee."

Taken all in all it was a notable occasion, well worthy of a noble church with a noble history. May the future of the Grand Avenue Church be all that could be expected of a church and people with such a history and such a past!

MISSISSIPPI.

PRESBYTERY OF CHICKASAW—The Presbytery of Chickasaw met in called session at Laurel, Miss., Nov. 18th, during the meeting of the Synod of Mississippi. Rev. Messrs. R. L. Nicholson and R. W. Mecklin were received from the Presbytery of Central Mississippi.

Calls from Providence and Unity churches for the services of Rev. R. W. Mecklin for one-half of his time at Providence church and for one-fourth at Unity church were placed in his hands and were accepted by him. The following order for his installation was taken. At Unity church, on the second Sabbath of December, 1903. Rev. C. N. Van Honten was appointed to preside, preach the sermon, propound the constitutional questions and charge the pastor, and Ruling Elder J. M. Boone to charge the people. At Providence church on the third Sabbath of December. Rev. R. L. Nicholson was appointed to preside, preach the sermon, propound the constitutional questions and charge the pastor, and Ruling Elder W. M. Cox to charge the people. He was granted permission to labor without the bounds of Presbytery for one-fourth of his time till spring meeting of Presbytery.

Rev. R. L. Nicholson, in charge of the Pontotoc group, was granted permission to labor within the bounds until the spring meeting of Presbytery and Rev. Newton Smith of the Ripley group was granted leave to labor without the bounds of Presbytery after Jan. 1st, 1904.

J. W. Allen, Stated Clerk.

MERIDIAN PRESBYTERY.—At an adjourned meeting of Meridian Presbytery Rev. F. L. McFadden was received in from Cherokee Presbytery and will labor in Meridian, Miss.

Rev. Henry McDowell was received from Transylvania Presbytery and will preach at Biloxi. In October licentiate E. S. Brainard was ordained as evangelist and his post office will be Poplarville, Miss.

Presbytery met at Laurel during sessions of Synod, in Rev. R. L. Campbell's new church, built on the ashes of the old one. It is a beautiful church, handsomely furnished and reflects credit upon Mr. Campbell and his congregation. The principal object of interest at this large gathering of Synod was the Atlanta conference and the Holly Springs Synodical college. The side of removal was most ably presented by Dr. Hutton of Jackson, who had thoroughly informed himself and spoke the things which he knew. Rev. Dunbar Ogden of Columbus presented the same side of the question. Against the conference Dr. S. C. Cardwell spoke and was ably seconded by Dr. T. Raymond and Judge Johnson. To give the arguments used would be but a repetition of the arguments by this time generally known. Dr. Rice of Atlanta ably represented the views of the Atlanta people.

A. B. Coit.

VIRGINIA.

BURNSVILLE.—The Rev. C. L. Altfather was duly installed at this place Nov. 10th and at Sutton Nov. 11th by a commission of Lexington Presbytery.

HOT SPRINGS.—Rev. Robert Russell Booth of New York who has been spending some time at this famous watering place, preached very acceptably for them on a recent Sabbath.

Rev. Emmet W. MacCorkle of Clifton Forge, Va., also preached here and his preaching was very much enjoyed. This church has a very desirable manse property recently completed and now paid for through the liberality of friends.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

SPARTANBURG.—At a congregational meeting held at the Second Presbyterian Church the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

First, That we the congregation of the Second Presbyterian Church in parting with our beloved pastor, Rev. Jno. T. McBryde, D. D., hereby express our appreciation of him as an able minister of the Gospel, and extend to him our sympathy and prayers in the long continued illness of his devoted wife and we most earnestly commend him to any people among whom his lot may be cast.

Second, That in the severance of this relation we commend Dr. McBryde and his devoted wife to the good providence of God and to the loving loyal hearts of any church whose privilege it may be to secure him as Pastor.

W. G. S. O'Shields,
Clerk of Session.

GEORGIA.

AUGUSTA.—On the fourth Sabbath in November Messrs. S. C. Adams and W. P. Egbert were ordained and installed as Elders to serve in the Second Presbyterian Church, Augusta, Georgia. On the following Sabbath the fifth, two new members were received by profession of their faith in Christ.

JAPAN.

KOCHI.—We learn, through a note from Rev. R. B. Grinnan, of the death of Mr. K. Katoaka, an elder in the Presbyterian Church at Kochi, and the great Christian Speaker of the House of Representatives. He was a good man who wielded an influence for the Church that can not be estimated.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Twentieth Century Fund.

The 20th Century canvass has just been completed in the Pender County field. The subscriptions and cash collected amount to $999.25, a very encouraging result when we recall that this field was considered mission territory but a few years ago. Rev. T. D. Johnston is pastor of this group of churches.

GASTONIA.—The following newly elected elders have been installed at the Presbyterian church: J. F. Thompson, J. F. Jackson, J. R. Baber and J. A. Hunter; also the following newly elected deacons: J. N. Bell, T. N. Kendrick, S. A. Robinson and J. E. Rankin.

STEELE CREEK.—The fifth Sabbath of November was communion day at Steele Creek, the pastor being very acceptably assisted by Rev. A. J. Crane of Glass, N. C. The services began with the Thanksgiving sermon and continued till Sunday night. The pastor announced the names of five persons added to the roll of communicants since the preceding communion, and of one infant baptized. The good people of Steele Creek are having the manse papered, making it all beautiful within.

ORANGE PRESBYTERY.—At recent adjourned meetings of Orange Presbytery, held in Wilmington and Greensboro, N. C., the following business was transacted: The church known as "Holloways" was dissolved and its three members transferred to the Roxboro church. The Rev. J. C. Story was received from Wilmington Presbytery, and elected as Evangelist of the Alleghany county field.

The special apportionments made last year for the indebtedness of the Assembly's Home and School, were renewed for this year.

The Rev. E. L. Siler received from Louisiana Presbytery, and will be installed pastor of the High Point Church, Dec. 20th by J. H. Grey, Rev. C. E. Hodgkin and J. C. Wharton.

Licentiate I. N. Clegg was received from Fayetteville Presbytery and has been ordained as an evangelist to labor at Thomasville and High Point. The Rev. E. L. Siler and Rev. I. N. Clegg were authorized to give, between them, one service a month to the church at Jamestown.

A commission consisting of Rev. E. C. Murray, D. D., Rev. E. W. Smith, D. D., Rev. E. E. Gillespie, Rev. J. H. Grey, Rev. E. L. Siler and Elders W. C. Herndon and W. C. Denny was appointed to organize a Presbyterian Church at Thomasville N. C., on Dec. 3d, if the way be clear.

The Presbytery's Home Mission Committee was authorized to borrow $250 to meet present needs and to be disbursed, pro rata, among the workers in the various fields.

D. I. Craig Stated Clerk.

Reidsville, N. C., Dec. 3, 1903.

MOCKSVILLE.—This church enjoyed recently six days of special evangelical services conducted by Rev. E. E. Gillespie, Greensboro, N. C.

The services were well attended notwithstanding the cold weather. Brother Gillespie made the gospel of Jesus plain and presented faithfully the appeals of God to man to accept this Gospel. All who heard him were instructed and helped. There were three professions of faith in the Saviour while Mr. Gillespie was with us, and we look for more visible results soon. At the close of these services a collection of $47 was received for Synodical missions.

CHARLOTTE.—There were five additions to Tenth Avenue Church on last Sunday. The Sunday-school is in a flourishing condition.

WEST VIRGINIA.

MORGAN COUNTY.—On November 29th, the recently elected Elders and Deacons of the Berkley Springs Church were publicly ordained and installed, in a most impressive manner; by a commission of Winchester Presbytery, consisting of Rev. J. H. Moore, Rev. Drs. Charles Ghiselin and J. McCarty Duckwall, and Ruling Elder J. W. Harlan.

There was no Session to act, because of the death or removal of all the Elders. Upon petition of members of the church, Presbytery therefore called and conducted the meeting of the congregation, when the officers were elected, and afterwards installed them by its commission.

At the night service, two young girls, received by the new Session, were publicly welcomed as new Church members, in a short but very interesting address by Dr. Ghiselin. They were Miss Virginia C. Duckwall and Miss Helen Brady, a daughter and a cousin of Doctor Duckwall.

The new Elders are Mr. T. P. Jeffrey and Doctor J. E. Herbert. The Deacons are Mr. P. R. Lawyer and Mr. W. G. Catlett. Dr. Herbert is a young dentist, who joined by certificate from the church at Gerrardstown, West Va., which is the same church to which Rev. H. C. V. Campbell belonged as a youth, and Mr. Campbell was the first Deacon of the Berkley Springs Church, and one of two men and four ladies who organized that church thirty years ago. Later he was made an Elder, and afterwards pastor of the church that he helped to organize. Many other members of the Gerrardstown church have become useful ministers of both the Northern and Southern Presbyterian Churches. Gerrardstown is a little village, settled by Scotch-Irish, where also ministers of other denominations were raised, and many useful church officers and members.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Wanted—A Cooking Stove.

The widow of one of the most useful men that has ever been employed by the Mission has charge of the boarding department of the Seminary in Garanhuns, Brazil.

The principal article of food for supper and breakfast is bread. Buying it from the bakers, the bill is about $12.00 a month. But with a stove that has an oven for baking, she can buy for about $9.00 a barrel of flour that will last three months. In view of these economic facts who is it in the Southern Presbyterian Church that is willing to say: I shall not permit any longer such an extravagance, but shall give a $20.00 stove if some one else will pay the shipping to Pernambuco, Brazil? Who is the some one else who is willing to say: I will pay the expenses on the stove from the hardware store to Pernambuco, Brazil?

When the two above mentioned friends do their part, I am willing to pay the duties of the Custom House in Pernambuco, and also pay the freight from Pernambuco to Garanhuns, in order that the work of the Lord may not be retarded for the lack of a little bread. I am the more willing to do my part because I have tried the stove experiment in my own family and found that it is money in my pocket and infinitely better bread on my table.

Geo. E. Henderlite.

Assembly's Home and School.

Dear Brethren: We wish to remind you that the General Assembly has named the last Sabbath in December as the day for a collection to be taken in all our churches and Sabbath Schools for the support of the Assembly's Home and School. Let us remind you of the following facts:

1. The Home and School is distinctively for the education and maintenance of the children of deceased ministers and of missionaries.
2. It takes about $500 per month to sustain the work. We offer board and tuition free to the children of deceased ministers and of missionaries.
3. There are now 51 young people in the Home and more are expected to enter by the first of January.
4. The institution is run on a cash basis, no debts.
5. Not one dollar has been added to the old debt within the past seven years.
6. We have no resources but the gifts of God's people.
7. Only about one per cent of our churches have been carrying out the recommendations of the Assembly and taking up this collection.
8. There is no class of people in the world that needs help more and is more deserving than the widows of our deceased ministers with children to educate and support.

9. The Home and School is solving a problem for our missionaries. If we do not sustain it, many of them will be forced to return home in order to educate their children.

Now, brethren, this is an urgent matter. Please talk to your people about it and urge them to give liberally and please do not confound this collection for our support with the apportionment of your church for the old debt. If you have not paid that apportionment, we hope you will do so, but this collection is for our support. You have no idea what a blessing this work is to the widows of our deceased ministers. God pity the poor, frail widow with children looking to her for support and for education and friends, looking upon it as a God-given privilege to help us relieve them of this burden. Please remember the date, the 27th of December. Envelopes will be sent you. Send your contributions to S. W. Somerville, Treasurer, Fredericksburg, Va.

Faternally yours,

J. W. Rosebro, Vice President.

S. W. Somerville, Superintendent.

An Appeal for Comfort Bags.

Christmas is again approaching and some of the sailors are already inquiring about "Comfort Bags." Last year, in response to our appeal, more than seven hundred bags were donated by ladies and Ladies' societies all over the country. Four hundred of these were distributed at the Christmas dinner given by the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Bethel, and the remainder were given to sailors who arrived too late for that festival.

There is nothing that a seaman seems to appreciate more than a "Comfort Bag," and many of them will walk from the most distant parts of the wharf, five or six miles, in order to be present when bags are distributed.

The good that may be accomplished by these much-prized souvenirs cannot well be estimated. Each of the seven hundred bags distributed last year contained a copy of the Scriptures in the language best understood by the person receiving it. Sixteen different nations were represented at the dinner.

Some of the sailors who have families carry the Testaments home and give them to their children, and we have heard of instances where their American Testaments were shown around with considerable pride by those who thus received them. Besides, many of these contained earnest appeals written by Christian women accompanied by earnest prayers for the conversion and spiritual growth of these men who are so much isolated from home influences and Christian privileges. One lady wrote us: "Each stitch was a prayer for the unknown to be a child of God."

We hope that the ladies who have in this way co-operated with us in the past will not be "weary in well-doing," and that many others will be added to the number this season.

Description of a Comfort Bag.—They are usually made of cretonne, denim, duck, or other stout and ornamental goods, are about 10 by 12 inches in size and finished at top with draw strings. They usually contain large needles, coarse white and black thread, scissors, pants and shirt buttons, and any other sewing articles, such as a sailor would need in repairing his wardrobe. Writing material and other articles may be added, as the donor fancies. A Testament or Bible, in the language of the seaman receiving it, is put in each bag. It is supplied by the Superintendent if not furnished by the sender. A good Christian letter from the donor is very much appreciated, and often proves a means of grace to the sailor receiving it.

Those who have to use the mails for sending the packages can lessen the expense by forwarding the letters intended for the bags in a separate envelope, and by sending the money to us to purchase Testament, scissors and spool thread, twenty-five cents for each bag. When the amount is small, postage stamps will answer. It is desirable that the bags should be as uniform as possible in regard to contents so that none of the men may feel disappointed at receiving a bag not so well filled as his shipmates.

The name and address of the sender should be written on the package, so that its receipt may be acknowledged. Address,
James Sherrard,
Seamen's Bethel, 2219 St. Thomas St., New Orleans, La.

A Timely Reminder.

The season of gladness and good will is at hand when all good people feel a quickened interest in the happiness and well fare of others.

This, therefore, is a fitting time to remind those who need the reminder, that the appropriations due this month to our aged and infirm ministers and the widows and orphans of our deceased ministers cannot be paid in full unless four thousand dollars be sent without delay to our treasurer, Mr. S. H. Hawes, Richmond, Va.

If the delinquent churches, including some of our large city congregations, that have forgotten or otherwise failed to send their offerings for this sacred cause, will act promptly these beloved and most worthy and needy servants of our Lord will not be left uncared for and uncheered by tokens that they are not forgotten by the Church they love so well, and have served so faithfully.

What kind of a "New Year" shall we give our dear old ministers and the dependent families of our deceased ministers who are looking to the ministerial relief cause of our beloved Church for the aid so necessary to their comfort?

The wants of winter are upon them, the promise of the church has been made to them, and this aid is expected and greatly needed by them and needed now.

The Executive Committee feel assured that our people will appreciate this gentle reminder and will do that which will be to the praise and the pleasing of our Lord in this matter.

I. S. McElroy, Secretary.

Committee Notes.

The Executive Committee of Foreign Missions met in the Mission rooms on Tuesday, December 1st. After the opening exercises, the first business was the reading of a cablegram from Mr. Robt. Whyte, of London, England, announcing that the steamer Lapsley had capsized on its last trip up the river; that Mr. Slaymaker and twenty-three of the crew were drowned, and that Mr. Martin and Mr. Vass had been saved.

Mr. Vass's cablegram to Mr. Whyte was sent from Santhone, a place which we have not been able to locate on the map. We, therefore, cannot tell whether or not it was too far up the river to admit of being reached by facilities for raising the steamer. The disaster is made all the more terrible by the ignorance in which we are left of the condition of the survivors. We infer from the fact that Santhone was a place from which a cable message could be sent that there are European residents there, with whom Mr. Vass and Mr. Martin could take refuge until means could be found for bringing them down the river to Leopoldville. As soon as we learn whether the boat can be raised, or whether a new one will have to be built, the information will be given to the Church.

Miss Agnes Junkin, of Huntsville, Texas, was appointed as a foreign missionary, to be sent out when the way is clear. Miss Junkin is a sister of Rev. W. F. Junkin and of Miss Jeanie DeF. Junkin, who was appointed last spring and who is now pursuing a special course of Bible study at home.

Miss M. J. Atkinson, who went to Japan several years ago with the family of Rev. W. B. McIlwaine and who has for some time been doing regular missionary work in the school at Nagoya, was appointed a missionary.

Rev. R. E. McAlpine, of the Japan Mission, was present and gave a very interesting account of the work and of the general condition of affairs in Japan. He laid before the committee an earnest appeal from the Mission of the Reformed Church in America that we join them in opening up work in the Island of Kyushu. Mr. McAlpine was instructed by the committee to lay this matter before the Church through the public press.

The treasurer reported receipts for November of $17,210.10, a gain of $2,291.32 over the receipts of November 1902.

After transacting the usual routine business, the committee adjourned.

S. H. Chester, Secretary.

Lexington Presbytery.

Lexington Presbytery met at Buena Vista, Va., Oct. 13th, 1903, and was opened with a sermon by Rev. J. E. Booker on I Cor. 1:23.

Present 34 ministers and 25 elders. Full roll 56 ministers and 71 churches, and 14 candidates.

Moderator Rev. Henry Miller. Clerks Dr. A. F. Kerr and Mr. J. A. Shaw.

Received—Candidates—Mr. T. Littleton Harnsbarger of Waynesboro Church; Mr. W. A. Reverley of Lexington Church; Mr. Paul L. Lyons of the Davis Memorial Church.

Ministers—Rev. C. L. Altfather of the Presbytery of Fort Worth.

Ordained—Mr. R. G. See as Foreign Evangelist. Mr. See will work in Brazil.

Installed.—Rev. J. A. Thomas at Millboro; Rev. W. S. Trimble at Monterey, and Crab Bottom and Pisgah; Rev. J. E. Booker at Timber Ridge.

Calls.—Sutton and Burnsville for Rev. C. L. Altfather. Commission to install.

Dismissed.—Rev. W. W. Carson to the Presbytery of Winchester.

Death.—Rev. J. H. H. Winfree, May 26th, 1903. Memorials were read of Rev. M. W. Woodworth, by Rev. Geo. W. Finley, D. D.; Rev. C. S. M. See, D. D., by the Rev. C. J. Boppell; Rev. J. H. H. Winfree by Rev. Wm. C. White for Rev. J. M. Plowden.

Letters of sympathy were directed to be sent to Rev. R. M. Tuttle and Rev. R. A. Lapsley.

Permission to labor in our bounds was granted to Rev. H. H. Hawes, D. D., at Hot Springs, Va., and without our bounds to Rev. R. M. Latimer, D. D.

Presbyterial Sermon.—By Rev. Wm. N. Scott, D. D., on "The Inspiration and Authority of the Scriptures." For next meeting, subject: Christian Assurance." Rev. L. B. Turnbull, D. D., Principal and Rev. W. S. Trimble as alternate.

The Davis and Elkins College.—Report of agent showed pledged since last meeting over $1,400. Collected $950.

Home Missions.—Rev. Holmes Rolston, chairman, made the report on this cause and Rev. O. S. Lingamfelter, the Evangelist, made his report of work done. Both reports were full and interesting and showed good work. The evangelist as usual has kept busy and accomplished much.

Report of Home Missionaries to cover, in the spring, April 1st to April 1st. In the fall, April 1st to fall meeting. All delinquent churches earnestly urged to bring their contributions up to the apportionments for this cause. The sum of $4,000 named for coming year. Elkton and Broadway grouped under the Rev. S. T. Ruffner, D. D. Woodland was grouped with Cook's Creek under the Rev. John Ruff. A commission was appointed to visit Woodland church with reference to certain matters, consisting of Rev. G. A. Wilson, D. D., Rev. A. M. Fraser, D. D., Rev. G. L. Brown, and Elders G. G. Grattan and S. Forrer.

A petition for the organization of a church at Coalton—formerly called Womelsdorf—was granted.

The Rocky Spring church voluntarily relinquished all aid from the Home Mission committee and the hearty appreciation of the Presbytery for this action was expressed. The church was allowed to increase its salary (change its call) by the sum of $100, thus becoming self-sustaining.

The Synod's committee on Evangelization was requested to employ Rev. C. S. Lingamfelter as evangelist (he is now employed by the Presbytery) and assign him to this Presbytery for his whole time. This Presbytery however to provide part of the support from the Home Mission Funds. Should this fail, the Home Mission Committee is to continue his services and provide for his support as may appear best to them.

Rev. A. M. Fraser, D. D., was appointed moderator of the session of the Basic City church.

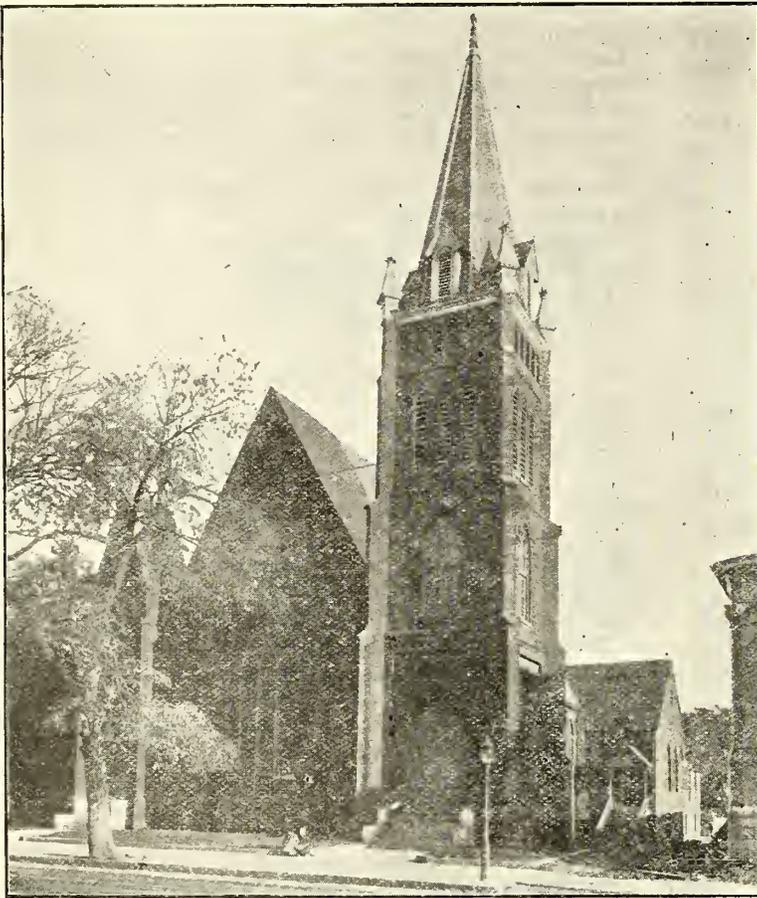

The Rev. F. H. Barron was added to the Home Mission committee.

Ministerial Relief.—$1,000 was apportioned among the churches. Sessions are urged to appoint a permanent committee on this cause. All sessions are urged to assist in raising a permanent endowment fund.

Publication, Sunday Schools, Young Peoples' Societies. These three causes were consolidated. The sum of $638 was apportioned. New committee, from the old ones, Rev. C. S. Lingamfelter, Rev. Carr Moore, Rev. C. R. Stribling and Elders J. S. Craig and J. A. Fishburne.

Place and Time of Next Meeting.—Davis Memorial Church, Elkins, W. Va., May 4th, 1904, at 2:30 p. m.

Wm. C. White, Stated Clerk.

TRYON STREET BAPTIST CHURCH, in which the Baptist State Convention meets to-day.

Baptist Host in Charlotte. The two denominations have much in common. Both have suffered martyrdom for the sake of religious liberty, both are Calvinistic in their theology, both emphasize the necessity of regeneration to salvation. There is even a harmonious interchange of names. Inasmuch as it takes a Baptist Presbytery to ordain, with the laying on of hands, they are Presbyterian. And we think we are as good if not a little better Baptists than they are as we let the children in. We both believe in the communion of saints, in spite of the temporary doctrine of close communion which shows signs of giving way under the melting power of a larger charity. But then a Baptist is about as hard to change as a Scotch-Irish Presbyterian and that is saying all that could be said. We respect each other's convictions and we be brethren.

And again we are glad to have you in Charlotte and Charlotte is proud of the beloved pastor who presides over the church in which you meet.

REV. A. C. BARRON D. D.,
Pastor Tryon Street Baptist Church.

A Welcome to the Convention.

The first part of the paper went to press before we thought of the fact that the Baptist State Convention meets in Charlotte this week. This to excuse the apparent ungraciousness, under that circumstance, of the two last paragraphs on the first page. But there was provocation. Moreover we desire to correct the statistics of our Episcopal brother to date, as regards the Baptists of North Carolina. The following report was made by the Baptist Board of Missions in Raleigh on Saturday: The churches raised, for State Missions $26,300, for Foreign Missions, $17,000; for Home Missions (outside the State) $762. This is very nearly the Presbyterian aggregates and we shall have to fall back on the average per member.

But then the Standard does wish to say that it is glad to have the representatives of the great

Those who are looking forward with trepidation to the time when the world's coal supply shall be exhausted will find solace in some rough calculations by John Clarke Hawshaw, a prominent civil engineer, concerning the water power now going to waste. Then the water from the whole surface falling through the mean height would give 10,340,000,000 horse power in perpetuity. Boston, Dec 4.—That a widespread curtailment of production by cotton mills in the United States will be found necessary during the next few months, on account of the great cost of the raw material, is the opinion of leading mill men in this city, from which the policy of many cotton mills in the North is directed. The market for finished material has been unsatisfactory for months, and prices have not risen correspondingly with those of cotton. The cotton mills in New England employ fully 175,000 hands, 65,000 of whom have had their wages reduced 10 per cent. this fall and 15,000 additional will suffer a cut within the next two weeks. A matter of great interest in New England is the project now on foot in the Southern States to bring about a general curtailment. A meeting of the Southern manufacturers has been called for next Tuesday and if a policy of widespread curtailment is adopted, it will have much influence on the future action in large New England mill centres.

2. The Cronstadt and St. Petersburg Canal, begun in 1877 and completed in 1890.
3. The Corinth Canal, begun in 1884 and completed in 1893.
4. The Manchester Ship Canal, completed in 1894.
5. The Kaiser Wilhelm Canal, connecting the Baltic and North seas, completed in 1895.
6. The Elbe and Trave Canal, connecting the North Sea and Baltic, opened in 1900.
7. The Welland Canal, connecting Lake Erie with Lake Ontario.
- 8 and 9. The two canals, United States and Canadian, respectively, connecting Lake Superior with Lake Huron.

Unquestionably the worst blow that fell on Mr. Balfour and his Cabinet when Mr. Chamberlain retired to enter upon a food-tax campaign was the resignation by the Duke of Devonshire of the office of Lord President of the Council, and his acceptance of the headship of the newly established Free-food League, composed wholly of Unionists. That this was no mere perfunctory or sensational act is shown by the Duke's participation in a meeting held in London for the express purpose of opposing Mr. Chamberlain's policy, at which meeting the Duke not only presided, but was the chief, and, indeed, the only speaker. The meeting was marked by the utmost courtesy; it had met, as it said, by resolution "to consider in a friendly spirit any measures the Government might submit to Parliament;" nevertheless the whole tenor of all the utterances of the Duke were those of pronounced opposition to Mr. Chamberlain's position. He declared amidst "prolonged cheering" that the members of the League were "all untied and prepared to resist to the utmost the imposition of any protective taxation on food or protective duties generally. He himself claimed the right to oppose anything in the nature of a return to protection." Further, the tenor of the resolution adopted at the close was of unqualified opposition to Mr. Chamberlain's policy. "This meeting," declared the resolution which Lord Goschen offered, and which was unanimously adopted, "is of the opinion that strenuous opposition should be offered to any fiscal policy involving the protective taxation of food and the establishment of general preferential or protective system."—Exchange.

Doubtless the liquor trade will find some cause for uneasiness in the bill introduced in the Senate by Senator Gallinger of New Hampshire, designed to place a further obstacle in the way of the sale of liquor at places unlicensed by the local authorities. The bill provides that no collector of internal revenue shall deliver any special tax receipt to any wholesale or retail liquor dealer who at the time of making application to pay such tax does not exhibit a license issued in accordance with the laws of the State or Territory in which his trade is to be carried on, authorizing him to sell liquors at the place where he designs to carry on his business. Liquor dealers carrying on their trade in no-license or prohibition communities in violation of the local law are in the habit of taking out a Federal license in order thus to protect themselves from the internal revenue collectors and the United States Courts; it is these men the bill is designed to reach, and its object is further designed to prevent collusion between the liquor dealers and the State authorities in New England, who often convert a fine into a license by accepting the fine and then doing nothing until the expiration of a year. Should Senator Gallinger's bill become a law it would deprive the Government of some revenue, but it would result in uniting the Federal and State authorities in an effort to prevent the sale of liquors in violation of local laws. It would, therefore, prove a temperance measure of no little damage to the retail liquor trade, which will undoubtedly oppose the measure, and may attempt to compass its defeat by the use of a fund which it always has on hand for that purpose. The bill is in the interest of the observance of law, and it is to be hoped Congress will enact it into a statute.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

But when we lose them, these dearly beloved ones, it is a comfort to have enjoyed them well. Have you thought of the choice offered you in these grave moments—either to let your grief vanquish you or to stand firm and become for others a sure refuge, a good and calm hiding place always near?—Charles Wagner.

ROBERTS.—On July 17, 1903, from his home in Red Springs, N. C., William MoRee, son of Mr. and Mr. Wm. M. Roberts, was called to Heaven, aged a little more than four years.

The death of this precious child has cast a gloom of sorrow over all who knew him and has stricken with sorest grief the hearts of his devoted parents.

Yet, dear friends, there is comfort, unspeakable, in the thought that he is safe—safe from the sin and temptation of this world, safe from the pain and sorrow that might here have been his lot, forever safe in Heaven.

Grieve not for him, but think of your darling as a jewel pure and bright, lent to you for a little while, now sparkling in the Saviour's diadem above.

WARE.—Died, Nov. 28, 1903, at Washington, D. C., Mrs. Amanda Ware, aged 62 years. She had long been a worthy member of the Presbyterian Church at Starkville, Miss., where she was brought for burial beside her husband, Capt. John M. Ware.

The Household.

Christmas Thoughts.

By Dora May Morrell.

Each year as we see the beauty and the harmony of the Christmas time marred by our delay in preparing for it, and by our ignorance of what to choose for the gifts we are so happy to make, do we not say to ourselves, "This is the last year I will be caught in this way," and do we ever begin again in season to have Christmas nothing but joy, and joy unalloyed by worry and rushing through the stores in a vain effort to supply in a moment the lack that should not have been known? It is not at all an idle sentiment—the feeling that Christmas is a blessed day; how can it be when its lesson is wholly that of love and of unselfishness? Then does it not behoove us this year so to plan our ways that from the Christmas of 1903 we may gather all its possible sweetness and know nothing but happiness and peace in our giving?

One woman who enjoys Christmas thoroughly, who gives to many, and who has to consider expense, says she can do it because she begins one Christmas as soon as the other is over. She has what she calls her Christmas book, and in this she devotes a page to a friend. It is now three or more years old. At the top of the page is the name. Under is the name of the gift she has given each year, and that she has received, for says this wise giver, "You can always tell something of what any one wants by noticing what one gives," and is it not true that ordinarily one gives what it seems to her she herself would like? On this page from time to time there is written what the friend has said in the other's presence, "I wish I had." The science in giving acceptably is to satisfy a longing, whatever that may be and however foolish it may seem to the giver, and he or she who has learned to do this never is of those who give amiss, nor of those who find Christmas a bore or a tax.

There are many gifts which cost almost nothing in money, but which take time and thought and are worth to the recipient more because of the intangibilities of which they speak. An Entertainment Book which was presented to a young lady this year was one of these. This girl just now is interested in concerts. During the year she had brought to her friend her programme for every entertainment to which she had been, whether theatrical, amateur, musical or an art exhibit. These had been arranged in a strong scrap book. First the programme, and on it the name or names of those accompanying the girl. Each page was devoted to a performance. Thanks to the papers it is now possible to get pictures of all the good plays that is of all the best parts in them. These were saved, neatly trimmed and mounted with pictures of the leading actors and actresses in costume so far as possible. Added to these were criticisms of the performances by critics of confessed ability.

The scheme for the concerts and art exhibits was the same in kind, differing in its carrying out only. For such concerts as the Boston Symphony it is always possible to get the story of the principal features of the programme, and with the pictures of the performers one may often find a well written biographical sketch, or one may write it. The book may be made beautiful by line decoration if one has artistic training enough to compass this, but nothing of this kind is necessary in order to give value to the book, and though one cannot buy a book such as this, it is not without value to the most impersonal observer, and it is a value which increases as time goes on. This is given as an example of what thought and time may be made to do for one who wants to give and cannot spend freely. It is not necessary to buy a book even, for each page may be made separately on sheets of wrapping paper—the effect is very good, even prettier than on the ordinary scrap book—and these sheets may be joined by eyelet holes and protected by cardboard covers under denim. The same idea could be carried out for the books one reads, and would have the good results of keeping one from reading trash. Such records of the year may safely be given, and one may have the surety that ten years hence they will be even more delightful than on the day when they were first seen.

Another way to make Christmas happy for the giver is to do one's buying during the summer. All the things one really wants will be found to be the things which last from year to year. Seldom are the novelists anything of real value in themselves, and as we all know, there is never a period when prices are so high as after November comes in. She who consults a gift book will know what her friends want, and if it is to be the work of her fingers, she will have made it during some of the odd minutes which we all have, though it is to be hoped that she has not taken from it those which she should have spent in resting. Each gift as finished, may be wrapped in tissue paper, tied with ribbon and laid away in the drawer devoted to giving, and there it will remain in perfect safety until the time comes for it to pass to the one for whom it is intended, and when, as once happened, she who loved so truly and dearly that all her days carried a thought for her friends, was taken from them to the Life Triumphant months before Christmas day, can you not realize all that it meant to those friends to receive the gifts which her love had prepared? No one whose tenderness tinctures all her days ever knows what repining at Christmas means.

Even in the matter of what one may call perfunctory gifts, those which one gives to the janitor, et cetera, into which one rarely puts the spirit which should go with a gift, one may manage so that they do not come as a strain upon one, and may even get some delight out of them. Try saving your dimes through a year or for six months for such cases. You do not miss a dime at a time, and they have a way of amounting to a sum that is sufficient for all such needs and a little more. In such saving there is not even the element of self-denial, for it is very rare indeed that one feels any pinching from putting away a ten-cent piece.

The whole spirit of Christmas giving and Christmas tide is changed by so small a means as this which I have indicated. It is not new but it is not practiced as much as it should be, and to some the idea will be novel, but can you find anything against it? Try it once and you will feel that it has been worth the thought you gave it. Nor need the gift book be limited to ideas for Christmas time. It will serve also for other times when one wants to send a friend something. The friend who is ill, or she who is to be married, she who is going away, for them all there is an idea, and she who gives of herself in her offerings will find the reply to her thought in the little book to which she turns with increasing frequency as weeks go on. Once begun, the gift book will never cease to be, for it holds the reply to many questions asked by every person. It is, indeed, a record of individual tastes with love to enrich them, and she who has the will to keep it has always with her a Christmas in her heart.

"Not that which we give, but what we share,
For the gift without the giver is bare."

Will Surely Interest Many Readers of the Presbyterian Standard.

James G. Gray, Gibson, Mo., writes about Drake's Palmetto Wine as follows: I live in the Missouri swamps in Dunklin County and have been sick with Malarial fever and for fifteen months a walking skeleton. One bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine has done me more good than all the medicine I have taken in that fifteen months. I am buying two more bottles to stay cured. Drake's Palmetto Wine is the best medicine and tonic for Malarial, Kidney and Liver ailments I ever used or heard of. I feel well now after using one bottle. A. A. Felding, Knoxville, Tenn., writes: I had a bad case of sour Stomach and Indigestion. I could eat so little that I was "falling to bones" and could not sleep nor attend to my business. I used the trial bottle and two large seventy-five cent bottles and can truthfully say I am entirely cured. I have advised many to write for a free trial bottle.

J. W. Moore, Monticello, Mo., makes the following statement about himself and a neighbor. He says: Four bottles of Drake's Palmetto Wine has cured me of catarrh of Bladder and Kidney trouble. I suffered ten years and spent hundreds of dollars with best doctors and specialists without benefit. Drake's Palmetto Wine has made me a well man. A young woman here was given up to die by a Minneapolis specialist and he and our local doctors said they could do no more for her. She has been taking Drake's Palmetto Wine one week and is rapidly recovering.

The Drake Formula Company, Drake Bldg., Chicago Ill., will send a trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine free and prepaid to any reader of the Presbyterian Standard. A letter or postal card is the only expense to get this free bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine.

The Carpet in the Pulpit.

By Susan Hubbard Martin.

Miss Ann, warm and perspiring, rose stiffly to her feet. In her hand she held a small hammer, a saucer half full of tacks lay at her feet.

"There," she announced triumphantly, "there, Ann Crocker, you can't say now you never accomplished anything. You've got your new carpet at last."

She laughed a little. When she smiled it was wonderful to see the sweetness of the expression in the wrinkled face. It betokened plainly a soul in which there was no guile.

She stood silent a moment. "I ought to be a happy woman," she added reverently. "Here I've been savin' and a scrapin' to get a carpet for this room for nearly seven years. It's lucky it ain't a big one and now—(her faded eyes brightened into happiness) I've got it."

She stooped and patted it as one might the head of a little child, tenderly and appreciatively. Her hands were withered and toil-worn. "You pretty thing," she whispered; then she lifted herself again. "Yes," she went on, "I've always said to myself, Ann Crocker, some of these days you're goin' to get rid of that ugly red carpet. You're a goin' to have a new one, do you hear? A beautiful fresh new one with a little green vines and leaves and things on it." She smiled again. "I never really believed it would come true," she whispered, "but it did, it did."

Her faded eyes roved over the little room with infinite content. "Don't it look nice?" she added. "Now that I've got it, I hope the Lord'll let me live to enjoy it. Sixty-four next birthday and this is the first new carpet I ever had. The others were just handed down, and had to take 'em and be thankful whether I felt it or not. But I always had in mind the kind of a carpet I wanted. Not too bright or too gaudy, but modest and pretty and restful. I don't know yet who I'll give the old one to. I'll think about it. Now I must set the plants back and get the furniture in. I won't get any supper tonight. I won't need any. I'll just sit and look at this carpet and think how rich I am. Things that come easy ain't half appreciated. You have to struggle and pray for 'em. Wrestle for 'em like Jacob did for the blessing. I rather guess this was why I was so long gettin' the carpet. But land sakes, I'll soon forget all about that. Why this winter I can just imagine I'm in a beautiful garden full of green things growin' when I look down at the leaves and vines and things. The wind may blow and the snow fly but for me, I'll have a summer here in doors."

Perhaps there was nothing in the manner of small things that annoyed the minister quite so much as that frayed and torn carpet up in the pulpit. It had been darned and mended so many times it could be darned and mended no more. At least the ladies had given it up. Just now an unsightly rent stretched from side to side right where the minister had to see and step over it every time he preached a sermon. He did not speak of it to his wife. With a fine courtesy and feeling, he never added a feather's weight to her already burdened shoulders. Perhaps too, he had a reluctance to speak of this little thorn in the flesh even to his own, so he tried to forget it.

The aid society had met at the church today to finish up some special work.

"That carpet up in the pulpit is really quite disgraceful," said Mrs. Deacon Grant to young Mrs. Shepherd who sat by her. "I'd be in favor of buying another if we didn't have so many expenses. I really don't see how we can better things this year. It would take almost as much carpet to cover it as it would a whole room; quite as much I believe." Mrs. Shepherd nodded. "Yes, it would," she answered. Mrs. Shepherd was small and plump with beautiful soft white hands. "I'm sure we do more than we're able to," she added plaintively. "Ah, Miss Ann, thank you for that thread. I was just looking for it. What, are you going to inspect the ruins too?" she added laughingly.

Over Miss Ann's happy old face had crept a queer look. "If the minister wasn't such a good man," she answered slowly, "it wouldn't be so bad to have it there, but as it is it must humiliate him. I know what it is to be afflicted with poor carpets."

"But you've got a new one now," cried Mrs. Deacon Grant merrily.

"So I have," replied Miss Ann in a strange voice.

The ladies said no more, and Miss Ann, having inspected the carpet, came back to her stitching again. When she went home that afternoon she went very slowly. She unlocked the door and went in, then she sat down in the old rocker. The little green vines and leaves in the new carpet had never seemed to her so beautiful, or dear.

"Well, Ann Crocker," she began with a pathetic little smile, "I guess your good times over this new carpet ain't begun yet quite. You'll have to wait a little while longer."

Two large tears rolled down her wrinkled cheeks. She untied her bonnet strings fiercely.

"Cryin', Ann Crocker," she added, "cryin' at your age just because you can't have your way? Wouldn't you be willin' to make one little sacrifice for the Lord? It's Ephriam and his idols over again. You, you ain't a goin' to fall short. You've got to live up to your standard, Ann Crocker. It won't kill you to put that old red carpet down for a while again, if it ain't as fresh and pretty as the new one. You've got to give up your beautiful new carpet with its little leaves and vines to the Lord. You're goin' to take it up tomorrow and put it down in the minister's pulpit yourself. You needn't go to cryin' over it either, it's got to be done. The idea of a minister like the one you have been obliged to stumble over a ragged carpet every Sunday of his life. It's a wonder it don't creep into his sermons and spoil 'em."

After she had planned everything in her mind, she rose and began to put away her things. Her wrinkled face bore the stamp upon it of sacrifice, renunciation and victory.

It did not occasion much surprise when she asked for the key of the church two days afterward. She was in the habit of going there occasionally and seeing after things. Neither did it surprise the sexton when little Jimmy Baes accompanied her with his red express wagon piled high with something very heavy and cumbersome.

They entered the church together.

"Now Jimmy," began Miss Ann briskly, "you go to work and take up that old carpet in the pulpit as fast as you can. I'll get the water and we'll soon be ready to scrub. Then—you'll see."

When the minister entered the pulpit on Sunday morning, he started in surprise. There at his feet stretched a new carpet with little tender leaves and graceful vines. The old one with its unsightly rents had disappeared. The minister smiled as he saw it. One burden had rolled off.

He looked over the congregation with pleased eyes. His worn face had brightened.

"This is a very happy surprise," he began. "I wish you'd tell me whom I am to thank for it."

Mrs. Deacon Grant, sitting in her pew, pricked up her ears. What was the minister talking about?

"Last Sunday," went on the pleased voice, "I tripped over an old carpet in this same pulpit. Today I must have wandered into fairyland, for presto change I step to greet you over a beautiful new one with trailing vines and tender green leaves. A regular May-day carpet, to make summer for me fifty-two Sundays in the year."

His face grew serious. "For this gracious and thankful act, I thank you dear friends," he said.

Mrs. Deacon Grant looked across at Mrs. Shepherd with interrogative eyes.

"What does he mean?" she whispered.

"I'm sure I don't know," was the mystified answer.

When the sermon was over it wasn't very long till Mrs. Deacon Grant made her way to the minister. Two or three of the ladies accompanied her. Her keen eyes ranged past him, up the pulpit steps to the platform beyond. The carpet, yes there it was stretching before her in all its freshness and beauty.

Mrs. Deacon Grant gasped. She knew it. "Well, I never," she exclaimed, "if Ann Crocker hasn't gone and given her new carpet to the church."

A number of the members called on Miss Ann the next day. They found her tranquilly stitching in her old rocker. The room was neat as ever. Flowers bloomed in the windows. On the floor was the ugly old worn carpet.

"Ann Crocker," began Mrs. Deacon Grant solemnly, "how could you—how could you give up that beautiful new carpet you worked so hard for?"

Miss Ann's faded eyes filled with sudden tears. "I won't deny but that it was a wrench at first," she admitted, "but after that the Lord made it easy."

The humble room, the old pilgrim in the rocker was too much for Mrs. Deacon Graut. She looked away through a mist of tears.

"Miss Ann," she said gently, "do you know you've shown us all what selfish Christians we are? To think of you're giving up the carpet you worked so hard for, without a word. Do you know it has given us all an awakening; every one of us wants to be up and doing and you—well the church is going to tender you a vote of thanks, and the ladies, well the ladies are going to give you a little reward. That ain't the only pretty carpet in Pine Valley," she added.

Miss Ann looked at her with a tremulous look of joy.

"You don't need to mind about the reward," she answered gently. "I've had that already."—The Interior.

"As One Having Authority."

The minister was writing the last pages of his sermon at ten o'clock Saturday night, when the door-bell rang. In a moment his wife came into his study and said, "I think you ought to see Mr. McLean. He needs help."

Instantly the minister was standing with outstretched hands and a look of joyful sympathy. "McLean? Why, of course I'll see him! McLean, my dear old friend—" But one glance at the man who entered took all the joy out of the minister's voice. It sank to a tenderer note as he slipped one arm round the shoulders of the drooping man.

"You're in trouble. I'm so glad you came to me! You can tell me all about it after you have had a cup of coffee with me. I was just going to ask for it."

With quiet, easy comprehension the minister helped the shattered man through the first painful moments, and brought him to the time when he could tell his story.

It was a tragic one. McLean was the loved and honored head of a great school for boys. He had been overworked for a year, and he might have made much, as he told his story, of the weakened will-power consequent upon fatigue. But he did not excuse himself. The bitter fact was that in spite of his traditions, his position, his principles, he had just been on a fortnight's debauch in the depths of the great city. He spared himself no disgraceful detail of confession. What should he do? That was the momentous question he had come to ask.

When he had asked it a long silence fell between the two men. They were friends of years. Now they stood in the relation of priest and penitent. When the minister spoke it was "as one having authority."

"McLean, you must go away from me tonight, and you must hide yourself in some safe place in this city for a day or a week or a month—until you can come to me and say that you have made this thing right with God. Your sin isn't against your school, or your wife, or your little children, or even yourself. It is against God. It is to Him you must go before you can see the next step."

Slowly the broken man grasped the minister's thought. As the clocks were striking two he went out again into the night with his strange task before him, scarcely knowing whither he went or why.

Eight days passed before the minister saw him again. He came early on Monday morning. His eyes were clear and his figure erect, but the deep-lined face told its tale of struggle. He was able to look into the minister's eyes and say, "I found out what you meant. I believe that God has forgiven me. What shall I do next?"

"I want answers to two questions before I reply to yours," said the minister. "What can you do best in the world?"

"There is only one thing that I know how to do, and that is to teach boys. I suppose I can never do that again."

"You have not yet heard my other question. Would you be less able to teach boys because of this terrible experience?"

"Surely not," came the quick answer. "I have seen deep into the human heart as I have never seen it before. But—"

"Wait! There must be no 'buts.' You have followed my orders once. You must follow them again. You are to go back to your work tomorrow. I have taken some simple steps to protect you from vulgar curiosity. Now hear your penalty: You are to tell no human being except your wife what has passed during these three weeks. Whether or not you tell her I leave for you to decide. But the burden of the secret—the inviolable, inescapable secret—is a part of your punishment. It will be no light one. It would be easier for you to drop your head and go forth an outcast. Instead, you must wear for years the outcast's rags under the clothes of respectability. They will burn like a shirt of fire. No matter. The one essential is that you shall not dare—even in your degradation—to rob God of a skilful workman in that most difficult of trades—the making of men out of boys. Go back to your work as you would go to prison for your misdeeds, if need were, like a man!"

The minister waited for no excuse or argument. Before McLean grasped the far-reaching consequences of the decision he was well on the way toward carrying it out. Again the minister's voice had come to him as that of "one having authority."

The school welcomed back its master. Only a few guessed that he was a different man. For years he carried his burden, and he did his work better than ever before. He kept his secret. When he died, after thousands of boys had learned from him the great lessons of life, they wrote over his grave not "His warfare is accomplished" but, "Blessed are the pure in heart."—Youth's Companion.

Loretta's Journey.

Loretta was very proud of her grandfather, although she had not seen him for nearly three years, when she was a wee bit of a maiden and wore embroidered white frocks and blue shoulder knots. He had been sent by the President to the other side of the world. Then, after several months, grandmamma had joined him; and almost a year went by before she came back to America. Even then he did not come with her, and six months more passed before his work abroad was entirely finished to his satisfaction.

It was true that Loretta was very proud as I say, to read the praises of her grandfather in the papers and to see his pictures in the magazines and to know that he was much respected and loved in the country; but she often wished that he were "living next door," just like Dorothy Maynard's grandfather, and could take her to walk and drive in the same grandfatherly way. So, when she knew he was on the way home and would arrive about the middle of March she began at once to make plans for welcoming him.

Loretta's father and mother lived about a hundred miles from her grandparents, and she had seldom taken the journey to their home. It was settled now that her father should go to New York to meet the steamer on which her grandfather intended to come, while she and her mother should wait for them at Norwell.

About two weeks before grandfather was to sail grandmamma was taken ill; and Mr. and Mrs. Loring hastened to her, leaving Loretta behind.

"If grandmamma is better, Loretta," said her mother, "you shall come right on with Cousin Jennie."

"I must surely be there when grandfather comes," Loretta said, rather dolefully.

"Yes, dear, you surely shall," promised her mother, "at least if things go as we hope." With that Loretta had to be content.

A few days later a welcome letter came for Loretta from her mother, saying that she might pack up her little suitcase and start for Norwell as soon as it would be convenient for Cousin Jennie to take her. Grandmamma was much better, and the doctor felt sure she would be well as ever by the time of grandpapa's arrival.

That announcement pleased everybody except Cousin Jennie. She was glad that grandmamma was better, but she was not glad at all to be expected to take Loretta to Norwell. She had engagements for everyday that week and next; for young Miss Jennie was a very busy lady, and she really didn't see what she could do about it.

"I don't see why you cannot go alone by yourself, Loretta," said Cousin Jennie, reflectively. "I went all the way to Chicago alone when I wasn't much older than you are. I could put you on board the car here, and your mother can meet you there; and you would be looked out for all right by the conductor."

"Why, of course I could," shouted Loretta, gleefully. "I know mamma will not care, because she said I must learn self-reliance. Don't you remember, Cousin Jennie, how she said I must learn self-reliance?"

So it was settled. Cousin Jennie wrote Mrs. Loring that Loretta would start on the ten o'clock train. Loretta packed her new, clean suitcase, put on her new gray dress and jacket, and made herself all ready for the journey. Cousin Jennie asked the conductor to look out for her, and the three-hours' journey was soon well begun.

Loretta did more things in the next hour than you would have thought a little girl could possibly find to do in the cars. She sat still and shy for perhaps five minutes, then she bought chocolate of the train boy, made friends with the little girl across the aisle, held the baby brother for a full minute by special favor, and waved good-bye to the entire party as they left the cars at Mumford. Then she took what might be called, by courtesy, a kitten's nap, counted her money six times, walked down to the end of the car for a drink of water three times, watched the landscape race by the car windows, and finally decided she was tired of traveling and wished she could arrive. Yet there were two hours more of it.

Then she made pigs out of her pocket handkerchief, but there was nobody to laugh at them. She dusted the car window sill with her handkerchief, and wished she hadn't. Just as things were beginning to be tiresome again the cars stopped at the junction, and several passengers entered the car.

At all, dignified gentleman walked toward her, looking for a seat. She glanced up to him shyly, and something about him made her think of her grandfather, and she half smiled. Perhaps that was why he took the seat beside her, asking courteously first if he might. She was glad enough to have a companion, and made room for him eagerly.

She hoped he would talk to her, but he did not at first. As he sat beside her, reading his paper, he caught her eyes fixed wistfully on him, and took compassion on her loneliness.

"Do you like dogs?" he asked abruptly; and he took out photographs of two splendid St. Bernard puppies that were enough to make any dog-lover envious.

"Oh, I always wanted a dog just like that," she exclaimed in a sudden burst of confidence. "Are they your dogs?"

"Yes, they are my dogs," replied the gentleman, folding up his paper. "I am going to give one of them to my little granddaughter, but I think she will be afraid of it."

"I shouldn't be afraid," murmured Loretta.

"She is a nice little girl," the gentleman went on. "She isn't a big girl like you, but a little girl with fair hair; and, when she laughs, she shows the whitest, evenest teeth imaginable. I am thinking just how she will laugh when I give her Major."

Loretta hastily shut her mouth very tight. She knew her teeth were neither even nor pretty. Four were twice too big for their companions, and there were two gaps where perhaps new teeth would come some day.

She changed the subject. "Does she like dolls, too?" she inquired.

"Yes, she likes dolls very much. She always has half a dozen trailing round with her."

"Oh, dear," thought Loretta. "She cannot be much like me; for I don't care for dolls at all." Then she spoke out loud, "I suppose she is a very good little girl?"

The gentleman smiled. "Oh, yes; she is a very, very good little girl, except when she is horrid"

Then Loretta smiled, too. She had known of little girls like that before. She thought, however, the dogs were more interesting than the little girl, and asked no more questions about her. The gentleman told her much about the puppies and about their mother, a brave dog which had done many notable acts, and wore proudly a medal of honor.

While they were talking, the train suddenly stopped with a bump and a jerk backward. Loretta was nearly thrown off the seat, and she started up in alarm. After waiting a few minutes, the gentleman went to the door, and then outside to see what was the trouble; but he bade Loretta stay quietly in her seat. Soon he returned, looking grave.

"I am afraid there is likely to be a long delay," he said, speaking so that the other passengers could hear him; and he explained how a freight train had broken down not far ahead of them, leaving the engine overturned on their track. It was a long train, and the cars were derailed.

That was the beginning of a long, dreary afternoon. The gentleman told Loretta not to be frightened, and she was not; but she was hungry and tired and anxious. A lady in the car gave her some biscuits and cake, which comforted her for a while. The gentleman went off with some of the other men to help as much as they could, and it was almost five o'clock before he came back to Loretta and settled down next to her with a sigh of relief.

"I think we shall get started now," he explained. "Have you sat here all the time?"

Loretta explained that a lady had given her something to eat. Then the tears came up in her eyes, for she felt lonely and unhappy as never before.

"Why, you don't mean that you are traveling all alone, are you?" asked the gentleman, in surprise "I supposed, of course, you belonged to some of the passengers in the car."

Loretta explained as well as she could for her tears, and just then the cars started. Her new friend put his arm around her, and cuddled her up so comfortably that she fell asleep. He let her rest until they were only a few miles from Norwell. Then he awakened her gently, and asked her about her friends and what she was to do when they reached the city.

"Mamma will meet me at the station," she said, confidently; "but I'm afraid she has had to wait a long time."

They left the cars hand in hand, the gentleman carrying Loretta's suit case.

They went to the waiting room and to both ends of the long station, looking for Mrs. Loring; but Loretta could see nobody she had ever seen before. She was ready to cry.

"If you knew the street and number, I could send you in a carriage," he said at last, despairingly.

"I don't think there is any," said Loretta, timidly. "They live in a park where there are trees, but I can't think of the name of it."

Then the gentleman called a carriage, bundled Loretta into it, and got in himself. "You must come home with me for tonight," he said. "Probably your mother did not get the letter saying you were coming. Tomorrow we can hunt her up."

With a sudden flash of memory, Loretta remembered seeing a tiny blue envelope sticking out of Cousin Jennie's jacket pocket that morning. "I do believe that was the letter to mamma," she said, with conviction; and she felt that she could do nothing but go with the gentleman.

Somehow, the unusual events of the day had tired her, and the motion of the carriage made her sleepy again. She was only half awake when she felt herself lifted out of the carriage and carried in somebody's strong arms up the steps and into the house.

"Why, how did they know where grandmamma lives?" was her first conscious thought. But what was this? Her grandmother, her mother, and her father came eagerly forward to greet—not her, but the strange gentleman. She caught her breath as he set her down in the hall, and went hurriedly before her to throw his arms around grandmamma, and then turn eagerly to Papa and Mamma Loring.

Then she laughed aloud. Everybody turned toward her, and her father and mother exclaimed in astonishment. Everybody talked at once.

"Why, did you go to our house first?" asked papa.

"How did Loretta come?" exclaimed grandma.

"This is a little girl I found"—began grandpa.

But Loretta's mother said not a word. She just ran and put her arms around Loretta and kissed her.

Everybody was surprised, but grandpa the most of all; and again everybody tried to talk at once.

Mamma had not received the letter and had no idea that Loretta was coming alone. Grandpa was not expected to arrive for another week yet; but he had just managed to catch an earlier steamer, with no time to send word across.

"It would have been surprise enough to see either one of you," grandma said at last, when they grew quiet again; "but we never dreamed you would come together.

"And the funny part is, grandmamma that we never dreamed it, either," said Loretta, wisely. And then she had to have a bowl of bread and milk and go straight to bed.—Christian Register.

An Officer's Adventure in India.

One sultry afternoon I was lying in my hammock in the veranda, eating fruits and biscuits (for it was too hot to do anything else), when, all at once, I saw a little, sharp-nosed, bright-eyed creature covered with smooth hair—like a sort of cross between a bandicoot rat and a squirrel—come creeping along the floor.

I threw a bit of banana, and at first it seemed startled, and made as if it would run away; but presently it turned back again and snapped up the fruit, which it seemed to approve of highly. I gave it another bit, and then a piece of biscuit; and by degrees it began to get more familiar, and appeared quite inclined to make friends. But just then one of my men came running across the court yard and the sound of his footsteps scared it away.

The next day, however, it came back again; and by this time it seemed to have quite gotten over its first shyness, and took readily enough whatever I gave it. After we had been on visiting terms for two or three days, "Tommy," (as I had named my four-footed chum) got to be so friendly that he would climb upon my hammock or chair, and let me stroke him and hold him in my hand, just as if he had been a kitten. I got to be quite fond of him at last.

Just about that time I managed somehow or other to catch a low fever, which, though it wasn't what you'd call dangerous, left me as weak as water. In fact, for three or four days I couldn't even raise myself in bed without help.

Well, one day—it'll be long, long enough before I forget it—I had sent away the native boy who used to sit beside me, telling him I was going to have a nap. It was the very hottest time of the day, and every one was either smoking, lounging, or fast asleep, and it wasn't long before I fell asleep, too.

How long I slept I have no idea, but when I awoke it was still so hot and I was so drowsy, that I was going to doze off again, when I caught sight of something that woke me up in good earnest.

Creeping into the room from the veranda, coil after coil, was a huge "hooded cobra" the deadliest snake in all India, more than seven feet long, and as thick as a man's arm. It was evidently meaning to attack me; and there I lay, too weak to lift my hand, all alone, and with no one anywhere within hearing.

For a moment I was fairly dumb with horror; and then, although I knew it was no use, I instinctively called for help; but my voice was so weak that it couldn't even have been heard in the next room.

On came the snake, rearing up its horrid spotted head angrily, and blowing out its hood, as it does when it means mischief. It had already got to the foot of the bed, and was just preparing to crawl up, when I heard a skirr of tiny feet across the floor and I saw my squirrel-rat friend, little Tommy.

The brave little fellow never hesitated for a moment, but went right at the cobra like a tiger, and gave it a bite that drew blood like the cut of a knife.

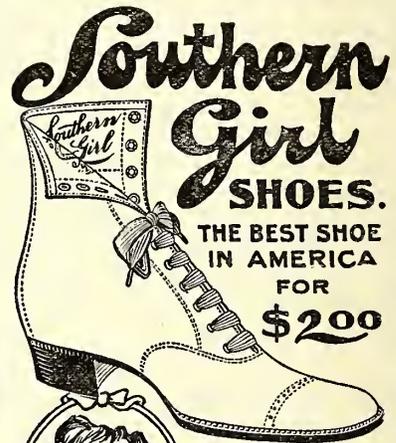

For a moment the snake drew back, and a quiver went all through it, which showed that it was hard hit; but it pulled itself together at once, threw back its head viciously, and struck at poor Tommy with all its force. But Tommy dodged the stroke cleverly, and fastening on the cobra, tooth and nail, gave him a second bite worse than the first, wounding him so severely that he was evidently weakened, and began to show signs of giving way.

From the bed where I lay I could see the whole battle quite plainly; and you may think how trying it was for me to have to lie there helplessly while a duel was being fought out upon which my life depended.

But it didn't take me long to find out how the fight was going to end, for the cobra had the worst of it from the very beginning. Do what he might, let him try as hard as he pleased to strike his enemy or to coil around him, the snake might as well have tried to hurt a shadow. Brave little Tommy escaped him every time, and repaid each new attack with a fresh bite, making old scaly-back twist and wiggle like a speared eel.

At last the cobra, in its writhing and flopping about, knocked over a small table with a lot of glasses on it, which came down with a crash that might have awakened a country policeman on duty. The next moment there was a shout and a scurry outside, and my chum, Harry Templeton, came bursting headlong into the room, just as the valiant Tommy got hold of the snake by the head and fairly bit it off.

"Hello!" cried Harry; "what on earth has been going on here? Why, my poor old fellow! to think of your being left to face that horrid brute all alone, and you not able to stir, too! If I had only known I would have been in to help you like a shot. Well, thank God! it's all right now. But where on earth did you pick up that mongoose?"

"What sort of goose do you call him?" asked I, in surprise. "I never knew before that a goose had four feet!"

"Pooh!" said Harry, "you are not going to pretend that you don't know what a mongoose is! Why man, they are the greatest serpent-killers alive; and if it hadn't been for that one, you'd have been as dead as a door nail by this time. I only wish we had a dozen more of 'em here in the cantonment to clear off these confounded snakes!"

Thus it was that I found out that my little friend Tommy was a specimen of the snake-killing mongooses of India, and that my friendship with him had actually saved my life. You may be sure that I made a greater pet of him than ever after that.—Harper's Young People.

No. 11 Cedar Terrace,
HOT SPRINGS, ARK., April 28, 1903.

When I was first married I found that my strength and health were gradually diminishing. I became nervous and irritable, and was in bed a week and sometimes ten days of every month, and had intense bearing down pains.

My husband had the best physician for me and I used his medicine for nearly four months, but I gradually grew worse, had less strength, and finally, I was unable to leave my bed at all.

A friend who was calling on me brought me a bottle of Wine of Cardui and was so loud in its praise that I told her that I would take it to please her.

I was surprised and pleased that before I had used the bottle I really felt better, so I kept on using it. Eight bottles brought back my lost health and strength, and I have not had a sick day in six months.

Our Little Folks.

Children's Letters.

Washington, N. C., Nov. 24, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I was reading your paper and saw a little letter which asked where was the word girl found in the Bible and what was done with her. It is found in Joel, third chapter, third verse. She was sold for wine that they might drink.

Your friend,
Kathleen Bogart.

Mooreville, N. C., Nov. 27, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I haven't written to you but once I thought I would write again. I am still going to school. My teacher is Miss Laura Kee. I like her very much. I study arithmetic, grammar, geography, Thirteen Colonies, history, and spelling.

I have two lessons in the morning, the rest in the afternoon. I hope to see this letter in print for I want to surprise my mamma and papa.

Yours truly,
Clara Mills.

Bishopville, S. C., Nov. 26, 1903.

Dear Standard:

Today is Thanksgiving. I was real sick when I woke up this morning but when I got my breakfast I felt some better. I could not go to church. My sister and I are invited to a party tonight and as I feel so much better this afternoon I think that I can go. I have just finished reading the little children's letters. They were all so interesting. I am 10 years old and in the fourth grade.

My teacher is Miss Daisy Pierce and my Sunday school teacher is my aunt, Mrs. Des Champs. Our minister is Rev. Mr. W. A. Gregg. I hope that I will soon see my little letter in print.

Sincerely,
Anna Bradley.

Madison, Fla., Nov. 26, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I have written to you once before and you published it and I was so proud of it I thought I would write you again. I am just getting rid of a spell of fever and do not feel very good. Our school began October 5th, and I am so glad. My teacher's name is Miss Whittie Dickinson and I like her fine. She is a fine teacher. I am in the fourth reader and I like to go to school very much. I go to Sunday school every time I can. I go to the Presbyterian Sunday school. Out class is called Little Workers.

I am ten years of age. I enjoy reading the stories and letters in your good paper. I will ask the little folks a question. What is the shortest verse in the Old Testament? I will close my letter for this time, hoping to see it in print. I remain, Sincerely your friend,

Mary Mickel.

Burlington, N. C., Nov. 29, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As papa is sick I had to stay at home with him. Today is my birthday and I am ten years old. Our pastor is Rev. Arrowood. I like him very much. Mrs. Jessie Holt is my Sunday school teacher. My school teacher is Miss Ella Robertson. What has got the matter with the little folks? They have almost quit writing. I am so sorry because I certainly enjoy their letters. Hope they will all awake again. My next letter if nothing prevents, will be written from my dear old home at Elon College, as papa is thinking of moving back within the next few weeks. I will close by asking one question: Where is the word, "ravens" found in the Bible and how often?

Your little friend,
Hattie Belle Smith.

Age, 10 years.

The Lady Susan.

The Lady Susan lay on a cellar door. There was a smile on her face, but she was lonely, nevertheless. No voice had called her name the whole long morning; and, except a venturesome white chicken who pecked at the buttons on her shoes, she had had no company. She was quite neglected, and the reason was not far to seek.

The little girl in whose arms she had been petted and scolded and cuddled through so many happy hours had a new doll—a doll with a china head and black china shoes and a soft place in her body that squeaked when you pressed it. The Lady Susan had only a cloth head with blue buttons for eyes and cloth feet—though she wore real shoes—and could make no noise at all except a thump when she was dropped on the floor. So for many days she had been left on the cellar door, quite forgotten. If her disposition had been less sweet and her features painted on with poorer paint, she would have lost her smile entirely. As it was, she still looked cheerful, and that was why something happened as it did.

When the chicken, succeeding at last in swallowing one of the loose buttons, had gone away, wondering why things that looked good didn't always taste good, the Lady Susan heard a welcome sound.

The little girl, whose name was Pauline, was coming. She had the other doll on her arm, and was talking to it.

"Yes," she said, "I am going to take you a long journey, way past the barn and the pasture to a big wood. You needn't be afraid. I know the way, and I'll take care of you."

By this time she had got quite round the house; and, when she saw the Lady Susan stretched out on the cellar door, she looked quickly in another direction.

"Let's pretend we don't see her," she whispered, and hurried past.

But she only went a little way, and then turned back.

"I think I'll just say goodbye to her."

She stood still, and called out loud: "Lady Susan, mother's got company, and I'm going to take the Princess on a journey. She's a stranger, and besides—well—besides I want to. Maybe, if you're good, next time I'll take you."

The Lady Susan smiled on, and Pauline, watching her, felt uneasy.

"Dear me," she said to the Princess, "I s'pose she thinks she ought to go, and I don't want to take her a' bit. She's dreadfully heavy! What would you do?"

But the Princess seemed to have no opinion in the matter. She looked quite indifferent.

"Well," concluded Pauline, slowly, "I can take her; but it's a great bother, and I shouldn't think she'd want to come where she isn't wanted."

She put the Princess more carefully on one arm, and impatiently tucked the Lady Susan under the other, and started again down the path.

It took a long time to reach the big wood; for the way lay through a garden where currants were all ready to pick; and by an old orchard where apples were ripening, and past a corn field where a funny scarecrow danced on a pole.

The Princess was always carried carefully; but sometimes the Lady Susan was held by one arm, sometimes by one foot, and often had her head bumped on the stubby ground; and, when they had crawled under the pasture bars, it was to the Princess that everything was pointed out.

The red pigeon plums were made into a necklace for her to wear, the crinkly gray moss was piled up for her to sit on, and it was she who was held over the brook to look at herself.

After awhile Pauline began to feel hungry, and decided it was time to go home; but, when she tried to think which way was home, she couldn't tell. There was no path, and the woods looked the same all round her.

Her forehead began to wrinkle, and her mouth began to quiver.

"Princess," she said, "I can't think just this minnte how to go home."

The Princess looked at Pauline as if it was no affair of hers, and she didn't care.

"But Princess, I believe I'm going to be afraid."

Still the Princess looked untouched.

Pauline was ready to cry, and in her distress she turned to the other doll.

"Lady Susan, I'm most sure we're lost."

And now the Lady Susan had her chance. The smile on her face was so cheerful and the blue button eye looked so comforting that Pauline hugged the big body to her, and decided not to cry yet.

"You aren't afraid, are you, Lady Susan?" she asked, sitting down on a fallen tree. "I won't be either. The Princess is a stranger, and don't know these woods, but you and I aren't a bit afraid. We won't go any farther, for we might get more lost. We'll just sit here, and somebody will come and find us snrely."

It seemed hours and hours before any one came; but always, when Pauline began to feel like crying, she looked at the Lady Susan, and the tears didn't come.

At last there was the sound of voices; and, in another minute, Pauline's father and mother and the hired man and the company came hurrying into the woods. They hugged her and kissed her and scolded her all in a breath, and then

The Snow Flake Family.

By Effie Heywood.

"Let me come in—let me come in," shouted the North Wind as he knocked on the window pane. He was a good fellow, but he was boisterous tonight.

The Snow Flake family were huddled together on the window ledge, for they had moved there one day when the North Wind blew up a storm, and they had a pretty home, overlooking the wintry garden, with its ice crested pond.

"It's very cold my dear," whispered Mrs. Snow Flake to her daughter Crystal, "and that noisy fellow, the North Wind, has blown away half of our house."

"Yes, it's very cold," answered little Crystal, "O mother, I wish we could get inside the window, if it were open, even a little we could. The fire in there is so bright, I'd like to go in by it."

"When the North Wind comes again I'll ask him to knock louder," replied her mother. "He wants to get in himself, I am sure, and we could go with him."

The North Wind came galloping by just then and he stopped and called: "Let me come in—let me come in," and he rattled the pane so loudly that little Crystal trembled for fear it would break.

After a while a very Tall Person came and opened the window a tiny crack. "I will leave it a moment," she said, "for the room is getting too warm."

"Now is our chance," whispered Mrs. Snow Flake excitedly, "let us start."

So they crept stealthily along, while their friend the North Wind, helped them across the hard places. He was a very obliging fellow when he chose to be. And quick as a thrice he lifted them over the sill and sent them in a soft little flutter to the hearth rug.

"How delightful it is," sighed Mrs. Snow Flake contentedly, "we can stay here for the night."

"But supposing the Tall Person comes in," said timid little Crystal. "I should be frightened, for she might not like to have us here."

"We are quite safe," replied her mother, and began to talk to her other children. But by and by little Crystal spoke again.

"O, mother dear," she cried. "I want to go back. The fire is nice, but it makes me feel so queer—please let's go back."

She pleaded so earnestly, that when the North Wind next rushed by, Mrs. Snow Flake called to him. "I don't like to trouble you," she said, "but will you be so good as to show us the way out."

Parker-Gardner Company.

CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA.

But the North wind did not hear as he hurried past. In vain she called and called, but each time he swept by so blusteringly that her voice was lost in the gale.

"O! O!" cried poor little Crystal, "what shall we do? O, why did we ever come—dear! dear!"

"We must wait a while," replied her mother, trying to be cheerful, "perhaps the North Wind will stop the next time he goes by."

"O, I feel so queer," said little Crystal, "and you look so queer, mother, and so do all of us—what is the matter?"

Then she began to cry, and so did all the other little Snow Flakes, and when the North Wind passed once more without offering to help them out, poor mother Snow Flake began to cry too. After awhile little Miss Marjory came to rock her doll to sleep before the fire, and the Tall Person closed the window. On the hearth rug was one clear crystal drop, like a tear and Miss Marjory little dreamed, as she sat there softly singing, of the sad fate that had befallen the Snow Flake family, and that the shining tear was all that was left of them.—The Congregationalist.

The Road to Grumbletown.

'Tis quite a straight and easy road
That leads to Grumbletown,
And those who wish can always find
A chance to journey down.

'Tis customary for the trip
To choose a rainy day—
When weather's fine one's not so apt
To care to go that way.

Jus keep down Fretful Lane until
You come to Sulky Stile,
Where travelers often like to rest
In silence for a while.

And then cross over Pouting Bridge,
Where Don't Care Brook flows down,
And just a little way beyond
You come to Grumbletown.

From what I learn, this Grumbletown
Is not a pleasant place;
One never hears a cheerful word,
Or sees a smiling face;

The weather rarely is just right
In this peculiar spot;
'Tis either raining all the time,
Or else too cold or hot.

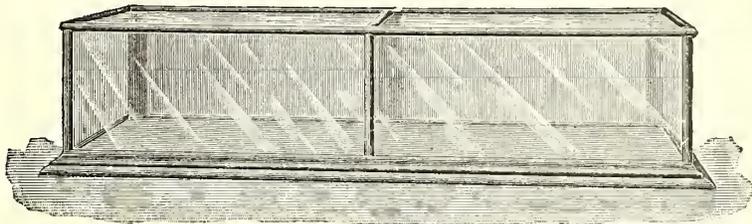

The brooks are stupid as can be;
The games are dull and old;
There's nothing new and nothing nice
In Grumbletown, I'm told.

And so I've taken pains, my dears,
The easiest road to show,
That you may all be very sure
You never, never go!

—Ellen Manly in November St. Nicholas.

Clippings.

The story is told of a Scotch preacher who gave his people long, strong sermons, and delivered them in a remarkably deliberate manner. One Sunday he asked a friend who was visiting him to occupy his pulpit in the morning. "An' were you satisfied wi' my preaching?" asked his friend, as they walked home from the kirk. "Weel," said his host, slowly, "it was a fair discoorse, Will'm, a fair discoorse; but it pained me at the last to see the folk looking sae fresh and wide awake. I mistrust 'twas na sae long nor sae sound as it should hae been." —Youth's Companion.

Pat—Hov ye made a will? Mike—Yis. Oi lift everything to the doctor that saves me loife.—New York Times.

Casey—"O'Flaherty is in throuble." Murphy—"Is he so? Phat ails him?" Casey—"He is dead and he dunno whin he will be burried. The grave diggers are all out on sahtrike."—Kansas City Journal.

He stood in ther doorway, hat in hand, and the stuttering young lady was invitin him to call again. "Come around S-s-s-s-s"—she began, trying to say Sunday, but the sentence was never finished. The dog thought she meant "sic 'em," and he did.—Kansas City Independent.

An Irishman and a Frenchman were parting at the steamer. The Irishman, standing on the wharf waving his hand to his friend, shouted, "Oreservoir!" The Frenchman, politely saluting, replied, "Tanks!"—Boston Christian Register.

For Me

Author Unknown

Under an Eastern sky,
Amid a rabble cry,
A man went forth to die
For me.

ee

Thorn-crowned his blessed head,
Blood-stained his weary tread,
Cross-laden he was led
For me.

ee

Pierced were his hands and feet,
Three hours upon him beat
Fierce rays of noontide heat
For me.

ee

Thus wert thou made all mine ;
Lord, make me wholly thine,
Grant grace and strength divine
To me.

Event and Comment.

There are twenty-five Young Men's Christian Associations among the Waldensians of the Piedmontese Valleys. That seems almost as much an anachronism as the railroad from Joppa to Jerusalem.

Dr. Coyle is not only a Presbyterian Moderator and the chairman of the committee on Union with the Cumberland Church, but he is also the author of a serial story, as we see from the Interior. It is difficult for such versatility to see anything important in theological distinctions.

And now the latest gossip about the Education Act in England is that Mr. Chamberlain, who is a Unitarian and not much in sympathy with the Established Church, may throw the Act over-board in return for the votes of the Non-Conformists for his Protection platform. Politics, even ecclesiastical politics, make strange bedfellows, sometimes.

The Congregationalist calls attention to the fact that Dr. Briggs was cast out as a heretic for saying that there were three sources of authority, the Bible, the Church and the Reason, and that Dr. Patton has just said in his inaugural address that the materials from which theological science is derived are to be found in three sources, the Bible, the Church and the Reason. If the editor of the Congregationalist had Dr. Patton's theological acumen he would see that there is a difference between the material for a science and the source of authority. And then, Dr. Briggs might say the same thing that Dr. Patton does and mean a heap worse.

There is something about Dr. Briggs, however, that we always like to remember to his credit. Apparently he can be as warm a friend as enemy. He was a classmate of one now a North Carolina elder at the University of Virginia. During the war, the Southern man's sister, we think it was, was in great distress on the other side of the line in Missouri. One man in the North was thought of by her absent brother in the Southern army, and the appeal was made to him for help. Time and money and influence were freely given and the distress relieved. The man who heeded that appeal was Charles Augustus Briggs. So that there is one Southern Presbyterian that never has believed that Dr. Briggs was a "heretic."

The ignorance of Christian people is one of the things that religious newspapers are here to correct. Rev. B. Fay Mills delivered some lectures the other day on Twentieth Century Christianity, in San Diego, California. Members of the evangelical churches praised his lectures highly, but so did the Theosophists, Spiritualists and other cranks, while the chairman of the meeting grew so enthusiastic that he declared, "At the beginning of these meetings I was not a member of any church, but tonight I feel as though I belonged to them all, Jew and Gentile, Catholic and Protestant, Hindu, Buddhist and Mohammedan." But religion always was the subject which thoughts that know least about it feel most competent to discuss.

In the midst of sentiments that we feel like applauding in the High Church Episcopal papers, we come across sentences that betray the most incredible narrowness of view and seem to indicate that there is really no principle at all underlying the discussion. The Living Church, in commenting upon the sin of divorce and re-marriage, says: "The marriage of a divorced person, having a divorced husband or wife still living, meaning thereby the man or woman to whom a baptized person has once been legally married and afterwards legally separated from by divorce proceedings, at least where not the "innocent party in a divorce for the cause of adultery," is contrary to the law of God. But why in the name of common sense does the fact that a person is not baptized make it any less adultery?

They are discussing plagiarism and unconscious cerebration in the religious press. Some preacher stole a sermon of Newell Dwight Hillis. It has not yet been stated where Hillis got it, though there have been a few rumors of the influence of Beecher upon his thought and even the verbiage in which the thoughts were clothed. Dr. Burrell tells a case in which he unconsciously cerebrated, as it were, an old sermon of his own. The editor of the Standard wrote a sermon not long ago and found out after it was preached that he had written one on the same text some ten years before. It was startling to see how, in the introduction and in the first half of the sermon, the ideas and the language were the same. The mind unconsciously traveled the path of least resistance. But the editor was at last gratified to see the branching out of a new idea that he had gotten since the old sermon had been prepared. It would have been too humiliating to think that there had not been a little widening of the horizon in a decade.

The death of Henry Clay Trumbull, editor of the Sunday School Times, removes from earthly labor one of the best known scholars of the world. His name was a household word in the great Sunday school world of America and he perhaps preached to more people every week, through his paper, than it was ever given to any man to preach. He was an archaeologist of some distinction, having among other things discovered and verified the site of Kadesh-Barnea. He was a scholar of an open mind, too, as is evidenced by his giving up of the "two wine" theory, once so common among those who wanted the Bible to teach total abstinence as a rule of life. Dr. Trumbull's study of Eastern life convinced him of the folly of that view and he had the manhood to acknowledge his error and change the course of his paper, in that respect. Of late years, the Sunday School Times has been guilty of some very erratic opinions, but in the main it has been a power for righteousness and a wonderful stimulus to the study of the Bible. There are literally millions who will feel the loss of Dr. Trumbull as that of a personal friend.

A Sumptuous Book.

In case the opportunity is not found for a thorough review of the Life of Robert Lewis Dabney in this issue, we call attention to it here. It is indeed a sumptuous book. The Publication Committee has done its part of the work excellently well. The volume is handsomely bound and finely printed and illustrated.

The author, Dr. Thomas C. Johnson, is eminently fitted for the task he has undertaken. In his zeal for truth and his intensity of conviction he is not unlike his great predecessor in the chair of Church History in Union Seminary. And Dr. Johnson was intimately associated with Dr. Dabney in the old Austin Seminary. It was on Dr. Dabney's strong recommendation that he was selected for a chair in Union Seminary and he was a devoted and loyal friend until death.

From the preface and from a cursory reading of the book it is evident that Dr. Johnson has really allowed Dr. Dabney to write his own biography, through the letters of himself and his friends, and the expression of his views on church and public questions from Dr. Dabney's prolific pen. More anon.

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

Dr. Coyle, Moderator of the Ecclesiastical Fusion Northern General Assembly and Confusion. its recent session, made an address at the annual dinner of the Presbyterian Union last week. We have understood that Dr. Coyle was a very useful pastor and a very vigorous preacher of the far west. A recent statement attributed to him, that the revision of the Confession had wiped out the line between Calvinism and Arminianism was denied by him in an interview with a correspondent in Missouri. But now it seems that Dr. Coyle would like to have that line wiped out in the Presbyterian Church. He is quoted, and the lines were sent out as a direct quotation: "The wrangling whether faith precedes election or election faith is all wrong and it keeps a divided Church, in refusing to admit the great army of the Cumberland." It is true the reporter's comment on this was that Coyle meant the Southern Presbyterian Church, to which we respectfully demur. But the dispatch went on to say that this was all that kept the Cumberland Church from union with the Northern.

Would it be improper to suggest that the sympathy between Dr. Coyle and the Cumberland Church might be traced to traditions of that Church concerning an uneducated ministry?

Another startling thing about that address of Dr. Coyle's was his opinion that preachers should preach Bible sermons. Possibly the wrangling of which Dr. Coyle speaks is wrong. But surely the matter at issue is not considered a matter of indifference. Dr. Coyle's reference to the Bible suggests one or two plain texts, that seem to settle that question apart from the fact that it is a fundamental principle of Calvinism. Luke tells us that as many as were ordained to eternal life believed. Dr. Coyle's quarrel should be with Luke for ever stating that election preceded faith. And when the Lord stood by Paul in a vision, in the wicked city of Corinth and said, "I have much people in this city," we wonder how many of them were believing on him of whom they had not even heard? We have learned to grow suspicious when people prate about Bible doctrines as distinguished from those which are inconvenient for a while and therefore are unscriptural. The trouble generally is that the Bible itself is overlooked in making the appeal to the Bible.

And then to think that anybody elected to the Moderatorship of a Presbyterian Assembly should be hooting at the doctrine that election must precede faith. Election is a part of the eternal purpose of the eternal God. Faith is an operation of the soul of man. Who existed first, God or man? And then every theologian will see at once that this is a giving away of the whole case to our Arminian friends. In the order of the divine decrees they put election last, as we noticed in an editorial some weeks ago. Maybe there isn't any use in wrangling over it, but that is no reason for a complete surrender of Calvinism itself.

However, we think Dr. Coyle has done a public service. Our Northern brethren, especially in the East, know very little about the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. They have been rather inclined to take it for granted that they were all right, doctrinally, as they are called Presbyterians, and that they had some little crotchets which they were now willing to give up. Dr. Coyle, certainly with the intelligent Presbyterians of New York and of the East in general, has labelled the Cumberlanders Arminians, perhaps without knowing it himself. There have been too many protestations lately about the unchanged Calvinism of the Northern Church and from the Liberal Party, too, for them to advocate all at once union with an Arminian body. The fact that a good many Cumberland ministers frankly acknowledge that they are Arminians, because they know that they are, is one evidence that the Church is departing from the old principle of an ignorant ministry.

And then the other question will present itself, Do these brethren really know what they are doing in thus cutting the ground beneath their own feet? Is the Presbyterian Church so convinced that its own faith and order are matters of indifference that it is ready to lead the way in surrendering its heritage for the sake of breaking up denominational lines? Are a Methodist and a Baptist and a Presbyterian Church in one town, respecting each other, working in harmony wherever there is inter-denominational work to do and each homogeneous as to doctrine, so much worse than a First and a Second and a Third Presbyterian Church rivals themselves, and having no distinctive doctrines but just a jumble of all three?

We do not know what Dr. Coyle would have done in the Council of Nice. But we should suppose that he would have argued that the little iota in the word homoiousion was a mighty small thing to be wrangling about. And yet the decision of that question was really the decision of the greater question, whether Jesus Christ was Divine or simply god-like.

And why should any Calvinist forget how nobly John Calvin stood for the doctrine of unconditional election, against all compromisers? And how that stern stand for truth put the heart into the struggles of the Reformed Churches in Switzerland and Holland and Scotland and England and made America free!

And what is to be gained by it, by this ecclesiastical fusion of churches with contrary principles on a mixed platform? The Church might sometimes learn a lesson from the chapters of recent political history, that fusion has always resulted in confusion. Nor do we think much of the motive that is now and then apparent, that the union of the Cumberland and the Northern Churches will drive the Southern Church to the wall. Maybe so. But it would be a rather embarrassing question why the Northern Church was willing to retract the doctrinal testimony of three centuries and was unwilling to retract the unchristian accusation that the Southern Church was composed of a disloyal and traitorous people. But then the Southern Church is doing very well, just now, thank you. And is just as much in love with pure and undiluted Calvinism as it ever was.

A Brave Preacher and His Opportunity. Rev. Martin D. Hardin, of the Second Presbyterian Church, Charlotte, was asked to preach the sermon, the other day, at the memorial service to the Elks. He could have done as many another preacher has done, gotten off a few platitudes about death and preached everybody who ever died into heaven. Mr. Hardin took the opportunity, while commending the dead to the care of the merciful All-Father, to say some plain words to the living. For these words he was severely criticised and the fame of that sermon has gone abroad. In justice to him we are giving a good part of our editorial space this week to what he did say.

And as an introduction to that sermon, we should like to add our endorsement of every line. The Elks is a comparatively new organization in Charlotte. And yet of the eight men who have died since its organization, three committed suicide. Undoubtedly, in spite of the many excellent young men connected with the order, it has made a bad reputation in Charlotte, which we could but will not enlarge upon. It should take the words of the preacher to heart and try to redeem that reputation or go out of business.

And this is also a matter of common knowledge, that while it is a much more decent order in the South than in the North and West, it is a stench in the nostrils of decent society in a great part of the country. Anybody, Elks included, who has traveled in the North and West, knows that to be true. Mr. Hardin was clearly within the truth. Better than quarreling with the truth or with the truth-teller is the mending of one's ways. The sermon will do good. It has already cleared the air.

If it be objected that the sermon, under the circumstances, was not in the best taste, it should be remembered that the canons of good taste are never in conflict with the words of truth as they come from the lips of a man of God. Perhaps John the Baptist had no business telling Herod that it was not lawful for him to have his brother's wife. He was at Herod's court by invitation. The answer is that the principles of righteousness are in a different sphere from the principles of taste, as those principles are defined. It was not good taste for Herod to marry his brother's wife, his brother being still alive. Will the Elks pardon the suggestion that some of the things of which they are accused in this community are not in accord with good taste? And will they read the sermon and put their finger upon what hurts?

THE SERMON.

It is with a sense of embarrassment that I find myself called upon to make an address at this time. I am not a member of this order and, in fact, know from personal experience very little about it. But I am told by those who know its aims and its history, that it stands for true brotherhood and for loyalty to the principle of good fellowship among its members. I am told that the members of this order are good Samaritans to any one of the brothers who falls by the wayside under the trials of life. That no Elk asks a brother for a helping hand when help is needed, and asks in vain.

Such an organization, if its ideals be kept high, is capable of doing a great deal of good. The fact that you are gathered together today for these memorial services in which you are to do honor to the memory of brothers who have been called to their eternal reward, shows that as a body you believe in the life of the spirit, and in the ever blessed God from whom life comes, and to whom it returns.

This meeting is sacred to many of you, for you are here to pay a last tribute of love to brothers who only a little while ago were as full of the joy of living as you are today. One by one they have been called to lay down their unfinished work in this world to appear before God and receive their rewards for the deeds done in the body. There is something so awful in death, that in its presence all hearts are softened and love rejoices to remember only that which was good in the life of the departed. So let it be here today. In the loving care of an all-wise, all merciful Father, let us hope that each one of these brothers is now a sharer in the blessed life offered to humanity through Jesus Christ.

I feel that we shall honor their memory best by using this solemn occasion as a time for coming face to face with higher ideals of life, as a time for thinking seriously upon the trend of our own destiny. Surely that man is wanting in reverence and in wisdom, who, standing beside the symbol of death, does not ask himself the question, How soon shall my summons come? And how shall I be prepared when it does come? Every life going out from our immediate circle ought to bring home to our consciousness that with us the time is short, ought to be a new reminder to us that the glory of the world passeth away, and that therefore it profits us nothing if we gain the whole world and lose our own souls, which do not pass away, but live forever.

When a representative of your order approached me a few days ago and asked me to come and talk to you here today, I told him that I would do so upon the condition that I might be perfectly honest with you and speak to you the thoughts which were most deeply upon my heart in regard to such a fraternal organization as you represent. He gave to me that freedom, and so I want to say a few things about a danger which I think besets you, and ask you to do all in your power to see that it does not prove the death of your lodge. Perhaps I can best give you my idea in simply quoting to you the remarks of a good woman in this community. Whether she was right or not I am not well enough acquainted with the young men of this city to know. I am going to give it to you because I think it will do you good to know a little about what some people think of you. She said:

"Do you know, Mr. Hardin, they have done more to ruin the young men of our city than any other thing in it? They have taken so many of them away from our churches."

Now I have no doubt that that good woman saw only one side of your club. She does not know of the strength which some of you have been able to give to brothers who were heavy hearted, of the right hand of genuine brotherhood which you have often extended when it was needed and when it meant much to a struggling friend. Of the visits you have made to the sick, of the lonely night you have sat by the side of the sufferer's cot. She was blind to all save some of the most glaring social features of your fraternity and I have no doubt she said that the Elks had done what they were not always directly responsible for. I have seen some members of the church do wrong and most deplorably fall from grace, and I would not feel that a critic was just who should hold the church responsible for this fall. Some men will go wrong in spite of church membership and some Elks will doubtless do the same thing in spite of the better teachings of their order. So you see I am willing to be fair with you, but is it not a fact that too often you do not take the proper steps to see that the moral side of your members is properly developed?

In traveling in a sleeper with a large party of Elks who were returning from one of the National Conventions there were such scenes enacted that it would be embarrassing to describe them in this order.

I was a citizen of Minneapolis about two or three years ago when the Elks met there, and to be perfectly honest with you the moral element of that city had a better opinion of the order before than after their visit. Now I say that the sooner that steps are taken to see that the convivial tendencies of your members are put under severe restraint the better it will be for your reputation abroad and for the spiritual life of your members at home.

And now as to that statement that this club had taken many young men away from our churches. In such an organization as this which is founded upon the principles of true brotherhood, there should be no inherent conflict between that and the Church of God. The teachings of the church have lifted the world to such a place of enlightenment, have been so explicitly in favor of the fraternal spirit that in one sense we may claim that the Church is the mother of every organization which stand for true brotherhood. The heathen world, in which the temples of Jesus Christ are unknown, knows nothing of such a monument as you represent, because the foundations of society are laid upon the principles of love.

Now if it is true that many of you have let your fraternal life occupy so much of your time and thought and energies that you have lost interest in the church of Jesus Christ, and in the great cause of religion, you have made a fatal blunder. The world can move along and grow better and all men can become truly instructed in the principles of brotherhood without the Elks, but if you could make every man an Elk and succeed in abolishing the Church, civilization is doomed, and moral and spiritual progress is at an end. In other words the Church of Jesus Christ fills a far larger place in the world and is doing infinitely more for the real cause of fraternity than one or ten thousands such organizations as you represent, and the Church is a divine institution ordained of God and set into the world to live and wield a power until the kingdoms of this world are taken for God and eternal righteousness. Your organization may have a part in that work if you keep the spirit of Christ in it, but if your members turn away from the Church and put Elkdom before Christ you have chosen a stone for bread, a serpent for fish. Because the Church has a larger, diviner mission in the world than any other organization in the world among men, I claim that upon the heart of every right-spirited man, its interests should hold the first place. I don't know what goes on in the Elk lodge, but I will say that if you are letting your fraternal life shut you away from an active personal interest in religion, you are allowing your lodge to do for you just the opposite from what it is to do if your fraternal organization is to have a true and lasting meaning. What is the real object to be served by this band of brothers? Is it simply to offer to its members a means of having a social hour? Is it nothing more than a club for recreation? Has your fraternity life no higher meaning than to fit you for friendship among a chosen few?

When you stop to think about it I believe that you ought to see in your brotherhood something more worthy and abiding than that. If fraternal organizations are not mocking their very names, they are bands of brothers whose association is for fitting each individual to realize in the highest sense the bond and tie of universal brotherhood.

They ought to be training schools where men are helped to realize what Paul meant when he said, God hath made of one blood all nations of the earth. Schools where men are helped to comprehend Christ when, looking out over a multitude of listeners wherein were all manners of lives—he said: Behold my mother and my brethren. It is not more than the publicans did when we love those who are lovable, those who are of our own kind and character, but when we use an inner band of heart fellowship so as to help us to love all God's children as our brothers, then fraternal life, such as your organization represents, is full of dignity and worth. It becomes something in which a true man can put his heart. I feel that it is only as fraternal bodies are looking to some such ideal as this, that they are worthy of the time and energy, and enthusiasm that men put into them now. I want to point you to this historical fact. It is only men who have believed in Jesus Christ and taken Him into their lives as a personal guide and Saviour who have actually protected the spirit of true brotherhood in the larger sense of the word.

The stoics of Rome in the most emphatic way taught fraternity among all mankind, but they did not practice it. It remained for Jesus Christ and his disciples to practice that love which has been a realization of this beautiful ideal. See his early followers so imbued with the spirit of love that they sold what they had and held all their property in common, and no man called any thing his own, and no man was left in want. True, since that time, many calling themselves Christians, have been devoid of this love, but the fact remains true that those forces which have wrought for brotherhood and love and justice have all been inside the sphere of life influenced by Jesus Christ and his Church.

These words from one of the greatest thinkers of our age. Principal Fairbank, are worthy of thought: "The most cultivated and high-blooded people on earth recognize their kinship and the obligations of their kinship to the most savage and debased. The Christian religion has made civilized man feel that he and the savage are of one blood—that the savage is as dear to God as he is, has as vast capabilities—as boundless a promise of being as his own nature can boast. The religion that has created this sense of kinship and duty is the true mother of man's faith in human fraternity. The Christian religion has done more than all other forces combined to prepare the way for a time when there shall be realized in humanity the principles and practice of universal brotherhood, and therefore I say no man who in any sense believes in brotherhood, can afford to neglect that religion. We cannot afford to give it a secondary place in our lives, for its claims are imperious and must be first or they touch us not at all.

I beg of you, therefore, that as a body of earnest minded seekers, after the best that life holds, you all take Christ with you into your fraternal life. That you do not neglect the divine claims of his religion, for anything else in this world, no matter if it call itself by so beautiful a name as that of brotherhood. Fraternal life, if it is to have a reality in it, and be permanent, must be Christian. Do not neglect the higher for the lower of these interests. Put the higher into the lower and glorify it.

The ancient city of Pompeii has been but partly unearthed. Some of the finest parts of this ancient city are still buried. Over this district I was one day walking when I saw a little dog busily scratching the earth away that he might catch a mole. Of the buried city with its treasures of art and priceless revelations of ancient life, this dog knew nothing and cared nothing and the thought came to me that if he could only be turned into a man how much more meaning would straightway be put into his digging. How the object of his search would have been enlarged. But alas, many men even are content to dig for the more, and forget the buried city. They will devote their energies, time and talents to the attainment of trifles which with a new spirit could have led them to the treasures of the eternal God. That you all believe in the fraternal idea is attested by your membership in the Elks today. Will you not take and keep Christ into your souls, that he may transform you into the image of divine manhood and initiate you into that larger fraternity whose object is to conquer the man's selfishness and make the whole earth a home for brothers?

The crest and crowning of all good,
 Life's final star, is brotherhood,
 For it will bring again to earth
 Their long-lost poesy and mirth;
 Will send new light on every face,
 A kingly power upon the race,
 And till it come, we men are slaves,
 And travel downward to the dust of graves.
 Come, clear the way, then, clear the way.
 Blind creeds and kings have had their day.
 Break the dead branches from the path;
 Our hope is in the aftermath,
 Our hope is in heroic men,
 Star-led to herald the world again,
 To this event the ages ran,
 Make way for brotherhood, make way for man.

Review of Contemporaries.

The question of temperance has become drastic in England by reason of Mr. Balfour's project of recompensing those publicans whose licenses are, for reason of public policy, to be revoked. A striking manifesto has been issued over two hundred men of such weight and prominence, in social and ecclesiastical, no less than in political, life, that it will be impossible for the Government to pass it by unheeded. The signers stand for all the great interests of the country. Religion is represented by eighteen Anglican bishops, a Catholic archbishop, and the most prominent men of all sections of the Free Churches. Politics offer such names as Sir John Gcrst. Mr. John Burns, Viscount Peel, Mr. T. W. Russell and Mr. Keir Hardie. The Master of Baliol, Dr. Chiene, Dr. Alfred Wallace and men of like standing in science: such literary men and journalists as Richard Whiteing, Dr. Nicoll, and Sir John Leng; many men high in the walks of commerce and industry, and Mr. Mitchell, Secretary of the General Federation of Trade Unions, are among the signers. It would be difficult to find anywhere a collection of signatures of such weight and standing for so many interests.—The Christian Work and Evangelist.

Alabama has come to the front in passing the most drastic labor law in the Union. This law recently passed by the Legislature of the State and signed by the Executive, forbids "boycotting, unfair lists, picketing or other interference with the lawful business or occupation of others," and provides heavy penalties for its violation. The initiative in the matter was taken by the Citizens' Alliance of Birmingham, with a view to "promoting the stability of business and the steady employment of labor, organized or unorganized." The work of the Alabama Legislature has been well and promptly done in this regard. The employment of the boycott against workmen or employers of labor is an outrageous iniquity, and antagonistic to the fundamental liberties of a free people. Every man has a right to live, and as work is a necessity of life, a right to work, and any interference with that right is a blow struck at a free people. We sincerely hope that other States will follow the lead of Alabama in this matter. The sooner the days of the boycott are ended the better. Let any man who would attempt to prevent another man working should he desire to do so, be promptly dealt with and receive the full penalty of the law, that he may learn to respect the rights of his fellow-man.—Episcopal Recorder.

Gambling and everything which truns on chance are now pursued all over the civilized world, perhaps with more absorption and by a greater number than ever before. It pervades the churches, and women in "the smart set" and in the oldest and staidest circles. Bridge whist is common in Christian families (we hope not among those who read this paper) and money is bet upon it, and often wines and liquors are served during the entertainment. Guessing schemes are also common, with prizes to the one who comes nearest to guessing the number of cigars sold in the United States in a given time.

All these things demoralize the people, especially the young. France is not noted for rigid morality, but the people are so unstrung, weakened, and corrupted by the guessing competitions and treasure-seeking contests started by various Paris newspapers, as to neglect work, and it has been found necessary to prohibit them. Last week Bulo, Procurator General, called all the newspaper proprietors together and told them that the Minister of Justice had determined hereafter to suppress them as an infringement of the Lottery law. The Paris "Parisien," which organized the first newspaper competition—that of counting the numbers of grains of corn in a bottle—has received two million solutions. To classify the guesses three hundred men were employed, and to reach the conclusions the competitors taken all together have counted some "sixty-seven billion four hundred and forty-eight million grains, representing three hundred and fifty tons of wheat." The ordinary circulation of the paper is one million three hundred thousand, but in those last twenty days it reached two millions daily. The owners of the newspaper made sixty-five thousand dollars by the scheme. People who give themselves up to such things are worth less and less, judged by the standard of true manhood and womanhood.—N. Y. Christian Advocate.

RECOLLECTIONS AND IMPRESSIONS OF JAMES A. M'NEILL WHISTLER. Arthur Jerome Eddy. J. B. Lippincott & Company, Philadelphia.

Since the artist's mother was a native of Wilmington, N. C., southerners feel a special interest in this erratic man. The book is one to delight an artistic soul. We can almost feel a regret that Whistler himself can not turn its beautiful pages. To be a real biographer one must first be a friend, for it is only through a fellowship of mind and heart that one gets such an insight into the motive of a life that justifies the attempt to open it to the public. Here the reminiscences are personal. The stories came from his lips while his hands were busy. The book grew as he worked. When the brush was laid down the friend took up the pen to paint the "profoundly earnest, serious, loving and lovable man."

Dr. Vance takes for his text "The Simplicity that is in Christ" in this little "preachment" and since it is Dr. Vance, it is clear and striking. He makes the steps from complexity to simplicity, naturalness, and a faith in the dignity of life—in something beyond and above.

The Way to Learn Faithfulness.

How can a faithless man become faithful and live so? This has been the great question of all ages and of all races. Every sacrifice and every shrine expresses it. Forms and rituals may have obscured their significance, and gross ignorance and abuse may surround them. They may mean little to those who bow before them, but once, somewhere, an earnest man used them in the hope of discovering the way to peace, the path from the faithless to the faithful life. And this is the great question for our day, too, and for each one of us. How can we move over from the untrustworthy to the wholly dependable life? We have lived in different degrees of failure. How can we succeed? Is there a way to rise up out of the fickle and unreliable life into the life unmarred and true?

Let each one who would make this change believe that it is possible. No failure can prevent success. However faithless our lives may have been, they can be made faithful. The Four Feathers is a story of a young English officer whose regiment was detailed for perilous work in Africa. He was engaged to be married, and he was not anxious for danger. So he threw up his commission and withdrew. Shortly after, he received in the mail four white feathers, one from the girl to whom he was engaged, and three from brother officers. He knew what they meant—the white symbol of cowardice. The faithless man was getting his judgment, but as he thought it over, he resolved that he would live it down, and have these four feathers recalled. To that new purpose he gave his life, and won his end at last when all of the persons took their feathers back. Some say that this happens only in stories, that character sets and cannot redeem itself. This would be true were it not for God. He who made men out of nothing can remake them out of ruins.

Then let us clearly define to ourselves the unworthiness and meanness of the life we want to leave behind. Let us do this mercilessly, laying bare to our own minds the repulsiveness of that which we have now determined to have done with forever. One reason why we so easily continue a careless and unworthy life is because we have never relentlessly exposed to ourselves the depth and extent of its unworthiness.

Then let us leave this faithless life and the pitiless exposure of it behind. At first it will not be very far behind. Only time will separate us from it. And even then it will remain as the background against which the new life will stand out; but the new life will stand out against it all the more clearly and more gloriously.

Then let us begin with some obscure faithlessness and be faithful in that. Many a faithless boy, who has been living carelessly and ungoverned, who now wants to begin the solid and dependable life, will find his first test, and therefore his first opportunity for great strengthening and development, presented to him in the chance to conquer some private infidelity. Let him blow the dust off his Bible, and each morning and evening kneel down and pray to the God whom he has been forgetting.

But let us not shirk the duty of publicly showing we have changed our wills and enlisted on a new side.

Soon the chance for some heroic and testing fidelity will come. Seize it. The will that has been strengthening by unseen fidelities and by quiet, open commitment to the right, will be given its opportunity; when the time comes, let us strike hard and fearlessly. We may be trembling under the test, and hardly knowing whether to stand or fall, but if we are true now we shall leap upward as by a year's growth. The great instances of glorious faithfulness in crises which history records were prepared for in the main by the struggle after faithfulness in obscurity. Here and there, doubtless, it was not so, the emergency suddenly striking loose some deep, unused forces which had not been given play in life before. But the law of faithfulness in the great thing is the law of faithfulness in the small.—J. R. Miller.

A Promising Outlook.

By Hampden C. DuBose, D. D., Soochow.

On Oct. 17 two men were baptized at Bingwong. At this place five adults and three children have been received into the Church. It is hoped that others may join at an early day. The applicants are numerous. The Christians are very zealous in this the day of their "first love" in teaching the catechism and Sunday School lessons to the inquirers from the country. New benches have been placed in the commodious chapel, and the congregations, composed of those who come specially for worship, are large and devout. The services differ little, save in length, from those in the home land. In many of the villages around, there are from one to a dozen probationers in each place, and these are on the increase. Bingwong is at the intersection of the tug lines from Soochow to Hangchow, and from Huchow to Shanghai and has a brisk trade.

At Leebee, an unwalled city four miles distant, the chapel, formerly a nunnery, is a beautiful hall and the attendance is large. On Saturday they spoke of a collection at the close of the Sabbath service, and as no "basket" was at hand, a hat was found on the pulpit shelf, and handing it to a man, a shilling was dropped in. He said, "We do not want your dimes; we desire to take up a subscription to purchase a chapel." In twenty minutes it amounted to $56, which might be rated to the West as 1 to 16. They said it would take about four weeks to complete the subscription. This has to be watched very closely so that money is received from only those who are interested in the gospel, and not from those who may give under the misapprehension that by the payment of a sum they can be enrolled among the faithful.

At the first of this movement in the country, three or four years ago, we had many applications to assist in litigations, or to help the oppressed and unfortunate. As the spiritual nature of our mission is more fully understood, these fortunately are almost a thing of the past.

One striking fact is the ease with which the people cast away their idols when they have a mind to do it. Quite a number are said to have ceased from idol worship who have not yet connected themselves with us.

When we were at home, by faithful brethren, the prayer was frequently offered that God would care for the work left behind. These prayers have been answered. While in the upper part of the field there has been a falling off in the Southern portion, with a blessing resting upon those in charge, there has been a marked increase. As for eight and twenty years we had known what it was "to toil all the night," it is now a joy to behold the net "enclosing a great multitude of fishes."

A great loss has befallen the North Koiyso mission in the death of Rev. James E. Bear, who fell asleep at mission meeting, a week's journey from home. For seventeen years he has been a faithful preacher, an active itinerant, and a successful laborer. His humility of character was beautiful to behold. He was a holy man of God, a gentle and loving friend, and a delightful companion. Great sympathy is felt for the widow, so suddenly bereft, and for the children. There is a great breach in the work.

From 1891 to 1895 our force in China was nearly doubled, and we fondly hoped that this was the sign that our Zion was to enlarge her borders, but the last eight years has beheld a loss in our ministerial contingent on the field of nearly twenty per cent, and as new men, if sent, must learn the language, a further decrease by furlough or failure in health, might prove disastrous.

The Queen of Sheba Visits Solomon.

I Kings, 10:1-10. Dec. 20, 1903.

The fame of Solomon for wisdom and Divine knowledge extended into surrounding kingdoms. It reached Sheba in southwestern Arabia. Desirous of verifying by personal experience the reports she had heard respecting Israel's king, the Queen of Sheba makes a journey to Jerusalem. Wisdom and piety shine like the light and often penetrate remote regions. They even attract and win earnest inquirers after truth. Our present lesson relates to the queen of Sheba's interview with Solomon, and may be considered under several aspects.

I. The Queen's Visit.—She makes a long overland journey. She is moved to do this not merely by curiosity, but by a desire to know the truth. She proposes to test Solomon's reported wisdom by difficult questions, and to satisfy the doubts of her own mind. She comes with a state becoming a princess with a great train and much varied treasure. She communes with Solomon of all that was in her heart. Solomon answers all her questions and there was nothing "hidden from him, that he told her not." She not only listened to his practical wisdom, but examined the buildings that he had erected, and attended to the magnificence of his court and the sumptuousness of his living.

II. The Queen's Impressions.—Her first impression was one of overwhelming astonishment, producing humbleness of mind. It is affirmed "There was no more spirit in her." Contact with such marvelous wisdom and wonderful achievements caused her to feel awe and humility of soul. So when we approach Christ, of whom Solomon was a type, and contemplate His Divine wisdom and unequalled deeds our hearts should be emptied of self and filled with reverence. But the queen also testifies that she had heard a true report of Solomon's acts and wisdom and that "half had not been told her, and that his wisdom and prosperity exceeded the fame that she had heard." She had not believed the reports that she had heard in her own land, but personal knowledge had convinced her that the facts exceeded the rumors that had gone abroad. Thus every one who seeks Christ finds from direct contact that His excellence and royalty far exceeds all reports concerning them. Let those who doubt Christ's claims "Come and See."

III. The Queen's Tribute.—The result of her visit appears in the tribute she pays in words and deeds to Solomon, Israel and Jehovah. She affirms "Happy are thy men, happy are these thy servants, which stand continually before thee and that hear thy wisdom." She exclaims "Blessed be the Lord thy God which delighted in thee, to set thee on the throne of Israel; because the Lord loved Israel forever, therefore made he thee king to do judgment and justice." She attributes Solomon's wisdom and prosperity to the God of Israel and recognizes the Lord's goodness to his people in giving them such a wise and capable ruler, nor does she content herself with words of commendation and thanksgiving. She offers costly gifts according to her means. She tenders to Solomon gold and gems and costly spices. The 120 talents of gold reckoning the talent at $26,000, amounted to more than three millions of dollars. The spices were very valuable and had never been seen in such variety and abundance in the land before. But Solomon with princely generosity returned the queen her gifts and added to them whatsoever she desired. In like manner Christ, greater than Solomon, treats those who honor Him.

An empty pew, according to our old friend, Dr. Cuyler, is a place in which it is impossible to do good. Sometimes, though, the empty pew may have done good when it tells the preacher by its emptiness that he is cutting pigeon wings in the pulpit instead of preaching a living Gospel.—Ex.

An Optimist's Missionary Meeting.

Isaiah 60:1-5. Topic for Dec. 27.

"Arise, shine; for thy light has come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. For behold, darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people; but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and His glory shall be seen upon thee." Such is the prophecy which is made as to the world-covering destiny of the gospel of Christ. We have not yet reached the place where the glory of the Lord is seen upon the peoples of all nations, but we have reached the time when the opportunity of giving the gospel to all nations and kindreds is more favorable than ever before.

When we consider the wonderful progress which has been made in the last hundred years toward opening the gates of the whole world to the missionaries of the religion of Jesus, there are two things which ought to make a most forcible impression upon us.

In the first place we ought to be rebuked at our lack of faith. The Church in the Western world has not been as wide awake or as optimistic as to the outcome of missions among the heathen, always, as it is at the present day. We were not as willing to go by faith as we ought to have been. We waited until God worked through those who had more faith than we had, to prove that world-wide evangelization is not an idle dream, but is not only a possibility but a probability.

In the second place we cannot help but marvel at the way God has worked in throwing open the world to the missionaries. It ought to impress us with the fact that the same God is working today who was working in the centuries long ago when He made men stand in awe of His mighty power.

So forcibly have some of God's children been impressed with these facts that they have said, "What is to hinder the evangelization of the world in this generation?" They have good grounds for their optimism. God has done wondrous things with not a half-hearted effort on the part of the Church, but in the face of an actual coldness and apathy.

As we consider these things we are impressed with the thought that all that is necessary in order to accomplish this seemingly impossible thing, from the standpoint of those of us who have not evinced the faith of the "Student Volunteers," is that the Church of God awake.

If the Spirit of the Lord is straightened in this matter, the House of Jacob, the Church, is responsible. No man can stay the arm of God or say, "What doest thou?" And yet the Spirit works through human instrumentalities and when the Church fails to co-operate with the Spirit of God, we straighten Him.

Our share in this great enterprise is not in giving alone, of our substance, but it reaches much further. We fail to do our part when we are not impressed with the responsibility which we have in the matter. Our prayers go further than our gifts, if we pray in the right spirit. Then we must have faith that God is going to work. In our unbelief we keep the Spirit of God from doing His greatest work. In Nazareth, Christ could not do many mighty works because of their unbelief. Then we straighten the Spirit of God by a lack of preparation for His coming. How many there are who think they are in earnest in their praying for God to bring the world to Himself in this generation, who would be the most astonished people in the world if God were to answer their prayers, and do as He can do, in the matter? We want Christ to come into the hearts of all men and yet we would be astonished to see great numbers born into the Kingdom.

Let the Church awaken to the possibilities that are presented to her and let the members claim the promises of God and this old world will present a sight which will make a continuous shout resound throughout the corridors of heaven because not one sinner, but millions of sinners, have repented.

Southern Thoughts for Northern Thinkers.

Jeannette Robinson Murphy.

Generous northerners seek in vain to catch our southern viewpoint of the vexed negro question.

The whole trouble and difficulty lies in just one thing and nothing else. We are willing to give the negro an all-round mental, moral, physical and spiritual education, but we insist upon the utter segregation and social isolation of the colored man. No proposed standing army can ever change the attitude of the whole South upon this question. No qualification or highest education of the negro could ever make the true Southern man welcome that negro into his family or hold out to him the tiniest finger tip of social recognition, for he believes that the mingling of a higher race with a lower one to be an abomination unto the Lord. Around this pitiful point future wars and causes of wars must lie.

Were not our southern fathers far-sighted when they used to declare that they were fighting, not only for the Constitution, but for the future purity of the American white race?

We do not mean to be cruel or inhuman, as visionary outsiders often think us, when we place the colored people in separate restaurants, cars and waiting rooms.

What often appears as cruelty to human beings is simply an outward expression of an instinctive racial gulf, which we think God fixed unalterably when He Himself first wisely segregated the negro race far off in Africa.

If it were only possible to instill into the negroes themselves a race pride which would give them an equal horror of that miscegenation which works such havoc with its innocent but wretched, sickly victims.

As matters stand today the feelings of the negroes are continually lacerated because, forsooth, we will not call them "Mr." and "Mrs." and colored "ladies" and "gentlemen."

Now, southern people are credited with having very kindly hearts as a usual thing, but in this respect they see things in a way that from the colored man's present standpoint may be unbearable and goading to a degree. So long as the colored man is willing to take a so-called inferior position, and, as we say, "know his place and keep it," there is smooth sailing, but let him dare to show any familiarity, and the most intense feeling of antagonism arises toward him. One's brain sickens and faints at the thought of America's future. There is one righteous solution, and that God alone knows.

For all the bitter feeling of today on the part of the young southern negroes toward their true best friends, their southern white neighbors, and for all the blood to be shed in the future, we, in our narrow vision, can only thank two sources, that is, the misguided, interfering outsiders since the days before '60, as focused by Harriet Beecher Stowe, who gave to the world a false impression of the treatment of slaves by the majority of generous, religious, true-bred gentlemen, their southern masters, and a few tactless missionaries sent south since the war to lift up (?) the negro.

I have interviewed in of my life great numbers of ex-slaves, and I have yet to find one old slave who will say that he or she was cruelly treated.

Would it not be a good thing, in order to secure to posterity a true knowledge of the situation in these blessed old missionary slave days, to take down, ere it be too late forever, in the presence of just northern witnesses, the sworn testimony of every old slave still living? My! what an everlasting exoneration our ancestors would have, even at this late day!

Every southern slave holder was an abolitionist at heart, but he did not see how he could disentangle himself from the rank growth of that tropical weed, slavery, which he had so disastrously secured from a sickly northern graft. The southern masters who did abuse their slaves were always instantly and most justly socially ostracized by their fellow planters. A slave trader was in the eyes of all southern men the lowest, most loathsome human being, and there exist a number of remniscent old men dwelling below the Mason and Dixon line who love to tell their little interested grandchildren how the majority of slave ships captured by naval officers were usually found to be manned by "Yankee" traders.

Slaves were spoken of always as "our people," and were kept when possible under the same ownership. When colored parents must needs be separated there were not such heart-breaking scenes as those blood curdling tales (to be found in the books and tracts distributed throughout the North) would have us believe. Negro mothers are often unkind and cruel to their own children, though devoted as a rule to their white charges, whom they respect. Many a slave mother has said to her master, "Ef yer don' sell dat triflin' Jim o' mine 'way fum heah, I'se gwine kill 'im," and the master never lived who did not often have to protect children from their savage mothers' race, and forcibly separate certain dangerous families for the safety of the lives of some of their members.

Had the South been let alone and trusted it would have required but a few more years for the unnatural system of human bondage to have died of itself a natural death, for it was no longer profitable, except in two or three States where the larger plantations could be successfully worked.

In one of the most interesting and truthful, though unknown, books which was ever written on the South, entitled "A Southern Planter," and to which Mr. Gladstone himself wrote the preface, we read, on pages 312 and 313, that before the war wise southern leaders were constantly introducing measures in their legislatures looking to the peaceful abolition of slavery.

Just at the time when there seemed every probability that our southern men would be able to solve their own problem satisfactorily there came on the scene a new leader, a stranger to those fair parts. He chanced one glorious summer day to be walking up and down a lovely shaded lane beside a grand ancestral estate in far-famed old Virginia. He looked about him and saw countless broad fair acres, all gladly yielding their increase. He heard the merry shouts of laughter from hundreds of happy negroes at work, broken occasionally by bursts of joyous religious song. On every hand he discerned peace and plenty. He saw the courtliest, bravest race of knightly, stalwart men, growing up like their fathers before them, tall and straight and handsome; courteous men who set women up on their righteous pedestals and kept them there. He saw the fairest, tenderest women gladly dependent upon their natural protectors; he traveled all over the lovely Southland, and everywhere as far as his eye could reach were homes which were ruled by love alone, each home a perfect heaven in itself. And Oh! the happy childhood he found there! Nothing like it had he ever seen before. Enviously he exclaimed, "This will never do, these people love God and are perfectly happy. My power is threatened, and I must change all this, and quickly, too, for I see these mothers are proud to possess large families of children to train for God's kingdom, and soon the hosts of good will outnumber my followers, and then I shall be hopelessly lost. I can scarcely credit my senses. If these southerners have not taken these black savages, whom I thought were forever mine, and even gone to Christianizing them, and they in turn are teaching the white babies here to love and memorize God's Holy Word. I have never yet seen such noble men and women—I have never before found such stern sense of duty and principle as actuates their every motive. I have not come a moment too soon, for directly my kingdom would have been gone forever." So spake his political majesty, Satan, as he hurried away to execute his plans. Before leaving the South, however, he had promised large rewards to a few treacherous slaves who would do his bidding.

Arriving at the cold frozen North he knocked gently at the hearts of a few receptive, sympathetic, credulous souls, and calling himself "The Voice of the Lord," he gained a royal entrance therein, and straightway those same misguided agents of his were filled with a burning zeal to abolish slavery and carry out, as they now believed, the Lord's will.

Ever a fine Bible scholar, Satan was quite ready at this juncture with a convincing text, and hunting up some weak minds whom he knew were naturally jealous of the South's prosperity he whispered to them insidiously, "Remember Paul's words, and act upon them, 'let no man seek his own but every man another's wealth.'"

History shows us that they straightway sought it most assiduously, and successfully, and there be some southern people today who are not learned in up-to-date business methods, who think that they discern in the grasping greed of the commercial world some evidences still of the influence of this once potent motto.

These energetic abolitionists did not let the grass grow under their zealous feet, but began to sow the seeds of discontent among the very slaves in whose hearts Satan had already left his poison. They listened with itching ears to the lies of his run-away slaves, how they were beaten mercilessly, started inhumanly and brutally overworked, (as if anyone ever yet got any hard work out of an old-fashioned, free-from-care "nigger,") and worst of all how they were tracked and torn to death by the fiercest of blood hounds! Poor little northern children! How they must have been terrified by these same grewsome stories along with their bedside prayers!

Yes, these emissaries of Satan took the South's wealth, but had that great apostle of God, Abraham Lincoln, lived, this wrong would have been righted, for slavery must have been lawful under the Constitution, else it would not have been necessary to add that controversial amendment, and so we feel deep down in our inmost hearts that the government of the United States still lawfully owes to the South millions of dollars.

All over the North, particularly in so-called "abolition" New England, the best, most cultured and broadest-minded people tell me personally that they have no false sentiment regarding the negro, and when it comes actually to the point of having him near them, they want none of him. On every hand there exists a peculiar state of affairs, namely, they declare that they have always sympathized with the South, and maintained that it was only bad politicians during the sixties who made all the trouble, so of course we of the South must not be unjust enough to hold these representative, hospitable, generous people responsible for the impulsive talk and actions of certain misguided, bungling leaders of '60, '65 and 1903.

The North does not understand nor love the sure-enough African in his present illiterate, irresponsible, thievish, shiftless state, and we of the South do not understand or care for the educated negro.

As the uneducated, as well as the educated, colored people, are moving North, (thank heaven!) to secure the social and political equality which we will never give them, it may not be many years before the northern section of the United States is overrun by them, and then, since they will not be properly appreciated, the ruptures will be sure to come, and if I were to turn prophet I should say, "In that event it will be God pity the negro and God pity the North, for a great race war will take place and the few negroes who do escape alive will fly back down home to their only true friends, when they will long for the blessed old days when their jolly, easy-going fathers held the patient southern whites in bondage."

When a man who stands high in the literary world has written in a northern magazine such sentiments as these, "I have gone all over the South and have talked to the negroes about the wrongs of their race," we have patiently borne it, though we mentally scorned him for deliberately stirring up bitterness.

Nor when injudicious editors and irreligious, pharisaical ministers have seen fit to wound our scarred feelings without mercy for many years by harping upon every just or unjust lynching, have we been so ungenerous as to retort when similar horrors at the North have given us frequent opportunities to do so?

We lay it also to the doors of unwise politicians exclusively for calling the Confederates "traitors" in the text books which our southern children living up North must now read.

We are not foolish enough to gauge the attitude of the whole North by a few rabid ones as represented by a minister who, when recently visiting a southern town, went defiantly sailing up the aisle of a Presbyterian church with his wife on one arm and his negro cook on the other, nor are we so stupid as to condemn all eastern children because a certain beautiful New York child came south and told us that her two dearest girl friends at home are two colored girls whom she kissed good-by at parting, and that among her sister's many beaux the two most talented admirers were two negro men!

We know when a college professor in the heat of an argument and to justify his unnatural and un-Godly position, declares that if his daughter wishes to marry a negro of superior educational and social qualifications he will interpose no barrier to their union—that his mind is simply wavering—that he does not in the least represent the real best brains of the North.

The children here in New York are allowed at the tenderest ages to go to school arm in arm with black children, many of whom are not clean, mentally or bodily. Possibly attachments are formed—at least those innate, God-given prejudices are broken down, and I hear, but cannot believe it to be true, that marriages are now legalized between the races in some of the Northern States. Ugh!

A negro writer, Charles W. Chestnutt, openly predicts the final amalgamation of all the races under American skies.

Occasionally people say, "But look at England—there the negro is received socially. They have not the prejudices of you hot-headed rebels," to which a fiery rebel might answer, "We have lived with him and understand his racial traits, faults and all, as does no other people on the globe. Our forefathers took him as a savage and have trained him—domesticated him, as it were. They taught him to talk, have fed and clothed him, and made him warm and consequently happy." Had I a savage monkey I could train him easily, and he would love me and I him, in spite of his natural treachery. I certainly should understand that monkey's nature better than any outsider who would take him away from me, and that alien could not ever make that monkey hate me, either, but he could, if he chose, entice away his children for a time by holding out quantities of nuts and bright, glittering objects, and if he held them far enough away the poor deluded young monkeys would travel far to procure them, but when they finally secured a few of the tid-bits they would taste bitter and not at all like the good things their fathers had told them they enjoyed in the fine old days "befo' de wah."

Anthropologists and particularly evolutionists will rejoice in the extreme view which a southern doctor takes of the negro's origin. He declares that he has read in his Bible something about the cleft nose, and he says that all human beings have a cleft in the gristle at the end of the nose, and that no animal has this depression, and he has discovered also that in the pure African it is strangely lacking. He also looks at the African's kinky wool and says he thinks it is not hair at all, but fur like there is on an animal's head. He detects a peculiarly characteristic odor on the person of many of the black race, in some instances as persistent after bathing as before. He notes that the negro skull is generally thicker than that of a white man, and that the hollow is sadly lacking in the sole of his foot. Accordingly he argues that no full-blooded negro can ever attain of the white man's intellectual development, and that Darwin might claim him as the "missing link." This of course does not shock our "evolution" friends who think that all of us came up from apes. This southern extremist finds it hard to believe that the veracious George Washington came from the same source as the romancing negro, and only the Creator himself, he reasons, knows exactly how the pure negro came by his color, his peculiar eyes, his protruding lips and other inherent racial characteristics and traits of mind.

If we are to be trusted at all in this matter of solving the negro problem, why not turn over to us exclusively the training of the negro children, and let us continue the slower industrial training of the slavery days, which was exactly suited to his lazy nature? We would make the next generation of colored people once more the "past masters" that they used to be in cooking and nursing and all house service.

We have good common sense, and if there could only be arranged a peace congress where North and South could dispassionately discuss this subject, great good would result therefrom, providing, of course, the South could keep its temper, and the North would generously humble itself for once and confess that through over-zeal and misdirected kindness it had blundered, and ask the advice of its southern brother, who, it will not be denied, has had centuries more of experience in training the peculiar negro, and should be supposed to know a little more about him than any stranger.

Instead of the South wasting any more of its hard-earned money upon the impossible higher education of the great mass of negroes, let us give them as a whole domestic training and sound Bible teaching, employing white ministers to lead them, as in the old regime, and then later on expend all our surplus money and energy in colonizing the race somewhere as Abraham Lincoln suggested, and give it a chance to show if it be really capable of self-government and higher culture. As a temporary place of colonization we might try New England, since the historic "underground railroad" has already given the negro a taste for travel, and the best and most acceptable charity that could be extended him by the South would be a free ticket one way to such a colony at the welcoming North.

I have interviewed quite recently an old ex-slave named "Uncle Gary." When I asked him his opinion of educating the negro he answered earnestly as follows: "Why, honey, hit's gwine do er lot ob good. I'se been studyin' 'bout dis heah edicatin' de nigger, an' I tells yer how de Lawd tole me to wuk hit in my mine. Once on er time de gov'ment put all de money hit had layin' by inter penitenchures and calaboooses, den arter hit done spent all hit's money day was n't nobody in de jails, so de gov'ment said ter hitself, 'I gotter fill dem penitenchures somehow, an' I knows how I gwine do hit! I gwine ter edicate de nigger! P. S.—Since writing the above article last January, I have been enquiring into the attitude which Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe assumed towards the negro race after she removed to her southern home at Mauderlin, Florida.

It is said that she gave orders that no negro was ever to enter her yard. Rumor also avers that shortly before her death, she declared that if she had fully understood the negro nature that she would never have written "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and moreover that she keenly regretted her part in bringing on the war.

The American Edition of the Revised Bible.

By Rev. David G. Wylie, Ph. D., D. D.

Many eminent men, throughout the centuries, have engaged in making versions of Holy Scripture. Seventy scholars of Alexandria, beginning B. C. 280, prepared the Septuagint version, which was the Bible of Jesus Christ and His apostles.

Two or three centuries after the apostolic age, several versions were prepared for use among the people—the Syriac, the Latin, the Egyptian, the Gothic and the Armenian. Jerome, the first great Bible reviser, made a version from the old Latin, which was a great improvement in style and in faithfulness to the original. He completed this great work in 385 A. D., and his version is known as the Vulgate.

In the Anglo-Saxon period several versions were prepared. Bishops Eadhelm and Egbert made a version of the Gospels; Baeda the Venerable translated the whole of the New Testament, while King Alfred's version contained the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Psalms and the Gospels.

In the next period, Wycliffe gave to his nation a complete Bible, based on the Latin version of Jerome. He was succeeded by Tyndale, a learned Oxford scholar, who compiled his version from the original languages. He was able to do this, because Erasmus, the ablest Greek scholar of his age, had just completed his Greek New Testament.

Next follow the versions by Miles Coverdale and Matthews, and the version known as the "Great Bible." The Geneva Version, made by English refugees, under the eyes of Beza and Calvin, became the most popular version in England up to the time of the Authorized Version, begun in 1604 and completed in 1611.

The influence of the authorized, or King James' Version, upon the English-speaking peoples of the world is well known.

Faber speaks of the English Bible in eloquent terms:

"It lives on the ear like music that can never be forgotten, like the sound of church bells which the convert hardly knows how he can forego. Its felicities often seem to be almost things rather than mere words. It is a part of the national mind, and the anchor of national seriousness—the memory of the dead passes into it. The potent traditions of childhood are stereotyped in its phrases. The power of all the griefs and trials of a man is hidden beneath its words. It is the representative of his best moments; and all that there has been about him of soft, and gentle, and pure, and penitent, and good, speaks to him forever out of his English Bible."

Froude, in his History of England, adds his tribute of praise to the Authorized Version in these words:

"The peculiar genius, if such a word may be permitted, which breathes through it, the mingled tenderness and majesty, the Saxon simplicity, the preternatural grandeur, unequalled, unapproached,—all are here, and bear the impress of the mind of one man, and that man, William Tyndale."

If these words be true, why was another version necessary? There were several reasons. Since the time of King James, many valuable manuscripts had come to light,—the Alexandrian, in 1628; the Vatican, in facsimile, was given to the world in 1868; the Sinaitic, discovered by Tischendorf in 1859, was not really in the hands of scholars until 1862, when it was published as "A fitting Memorial of the one thousandth Anniversary of the Russian Empire."

In addition to this, since the time of the Authorized Version in 1611, the whole science of textual criticism, which teaches how to deal with ancient manuscripts, had grown up.

Then again, scholars had become better acquainted with the ancient languages and were able to bring out more exactly the finer shades of meaning, and to arrive at the exact thought of the original writers.

The Anglo-American Version was begun in 1870 and completed in 1885, the ablest British and American scholars of many religious denominations and educational institutions having engaged in its preparation. The version itself was a vast improvement on all preceding English versions.

Unfortunately, however, the full worth of the work done by American scholars was not recognized, since the British revisers did not incorporate the result of these labors into the text, but an appendix, rather hastily prepared with the references of the American Committee, was printed with the version.

When their work was completed, the British revisers disbanded, while the American Committee kept up their organization and continued revising the appendix, and indeed the whole of the Bible. They agreed, however, not to issue any American version until after fourteen years had elapsed, and further pledged themselves to use their influence in securing a wide circulation, in America, for the Anglo-American Version. Both of these pledges were faithfully kept.

During these fourteen years and more British and American scholars gradually came to the conclusion that the American revisers were nearer the meaning of the original languages than their British co-laborers. It was determined, therefore, to issue an American Revised Version. This was done. We are to consider today the claims of this version to become the accepted version in the pulpit and pew throughout the English-speaking world. What claims can be put forward in favor of this latest, and as we confidently believe, the best, the queen, of all the versions I venture to suggest six considerations:

I. Its freedom from error.

1. Nearly every other version was marred by mistakes—and mistakes should not occur in translations of the Word of God. If a perfect standard of excellency is to exist anywhere, it ought to be in the Book of Books.

2. In Coverdale's Version we find glaring mistakes. It was known as the "Trece Bible," because it translated Jeremiah 8:22, "Is there no balm in Gilead?"—"Is there no treacle in Gilead?" Joshua 11:11 was rendered, "Our heart had fayled us, neither is there good stomach in any man." Acts 11:8 was rendered, "Their widowes were not looked upon in the daylie hand reaching."

3. In Matthew's Bible, Solomon's Song was entitled "Solomon's Balades."

4. The "Bug Bible" is so called from its rendering of Psalm 91, verse 5: "Afraid of bugs by night." It was issued in 1551.

5. The "Place Makers'" Bible translates Matthew 5, as follows: "Blessed are the Place Makers." It was printed in 1562.

6. The "Printers'" Bible is so called because in Psalm 119 the word "printer" was used instead of the word "princes."

7. The great Geneva Bible was marred by one word and was known as the "Breeches Bible," because it translated Genesis 3:7, "Adam and Eve sewed fig leaves together and made themselves breeches."

The marginal notes of the Geneva Bible contained an exegesis which would be objected to today were it found in the American Revised Version. Its explanation of Revelation 9:3—the locusts that came out of the bottomless pit, was that the locusts were "false teachers, heretics, and worldly subtle prelates, with Monks, Friars, Cardinals, Patriarchs, Archbishops, Doctors, Bachelors and Masters of Artes, which forsake Christ to maintain false doctrines." Notwithstanding these defects, however, the Geneva Bible became the most popular version in Great Britain, up to the time of the Authorized Version.

8. Tyndale's Version contained words which would today set our young people smiling: "And the Lord was with Ioseph and he was a luckie fellowe;" "He sent forth a hangman;" "The day that followeth Good Fridaye;" "I will tarry at Ephesus till Whitsontyde." Turning to the American Revised Version, it is a matter for profound gratification that no ill use of words or phrases, such as we have just noticed in other versions, anywhere occur. On the other hand, it is singularly free from such defects.

II. There are several particulars which may be grouped together, which make the American Revised Version superior to the Authorized and the British Version of 1885.

1. The spelling is better—more in harmony with the existing orthography.

2. The punctuation is improved; superfluous commas have been removed, and the "overworked colon" has been replaced often by the semi-colon. In this respect, the Old Testament Company worked even more cautiously and consistently than the New Testament Company.

3. The running headings of chapters attract the eye and interest the mind. These are made in excellent taste, are free from dogmatic implications, and generally characteristic enough to indicate the meaning of the chapters.

4. The grammar is in closer conformity with present usage. "Shall" is used for "will"; "are" and "is" are used for "be" in indicatives; "for" is omitted before the infinitive; "who" is used for "which" referring to persons; "its" for "his" with reference to things; "a" for "an"; "my" for "mine", and "thy" for "thine." As a correspondent writes,—"There is here a removal of the trace of Cockney English."

5. The make-up of the book is an improvement over the British Version. The paragraphs are more numerous; the references in the middle column are better; while the outer margin contains the alternate readings and renderings of manuscripts and versions.

6. The titles of books are in harmony with the most ancient manuscripts. The term "Saint", not in the most ancient manuscripts, has been dropped and accordingly we read, The Gospel:—according to Matthew, or Mark, or Luke, or John. In this version we have The Acts, The Epistle of Jude, The Revelation of John, The New Covenant, commonly called the New Testament.

III. The American Revised Version is an improvement over all existing versions in its use of the English language.

1. It takes into consideration the "linguistic development" to which all speech is subject and does not insist upon using archaic forms which, in ordinary literature, would be counted incorrect.

Trench, in his "Study of Words," shows that marvelous changes, in language, take place in a few centuries. The English revisers understood this quite well, but when they issued their work they acted only partially upon the fact. Their conservatism and love of the old and familiar language caused them to hesitate in adopting new words.

2. The American revisers sought to make the Bible, —a book for learned and unlearned people,—intelligible. Accordingly they omitted archaic and unintelligible words. The following are examples:

"Chiel, grissled, lien, marish, minish, sith, strake, strowed, collops, chapiter, hozen, feller, clouts, houge, reins, seethe, holpen, bewray, astonied, usury, prevent."

3. Words misunderstood are replaced by others newer and better, so that the meaning of the Scriptures is more clearly brought out. "Daysman" becomes in the American Version "umpire"; "couches" "sittings"; "chargers" "platters"; "occupiers" "trades men"; "seethe" "boil"; "chapiters" "capitals"; "fan" "winnow"; "wist" "know"; "demons" "devils"; "hungered" "hungry"; "quick" "living".

To continue with illustrations, in the American Revised Version, "trod" is used for "trode"; "two" for "twain"; "knew" for "wist"; "know" for "wot"; "covenant" for "testament"; "teacher" for "master"; "grain" for "corn"; "grain fields" for "corn fields"; "poured out" for "shed"; "provisions" for "victuals"; "reasonings" for "questionings"; "try" for "tempt"; "drove" for "drave"; "drag" for "hale"; "load" for "lade"; "show" for "shew"; "guard" for "ward"; "self-control" for "temperance"; "food" for "meat";

“factious” for “heretical”; “bodies” for “carcasses”; “gift” for “boon”.

4. Not only have the American reviser done good work by modernizing words which make the Bible a more intelligible book, but expressions as well are changed for the better. We give a few illustrations, the first being the British Version followed by the American Revised Version:

“And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creatures that hath life, and let fowl fly above the earth.”

“And God said, Let the waters swarm with swarms of living creatures, and let birds fly above the earth.”—Gen. 1:20.

“The Lord, the God of your fathers, make you a thousand times so many more as ye are.”

“Jehovah, the God of your fathers, make you a thousand times as many as ye are.”—Deut. 1:11.

“I said in my haste, All men are a lie.”

“I said in my haste, All men are liars.”—Ps. 116:11.

“Girded with girdles upon their loins, exceeding in dyed attire upon their heads, all of them princes to look upon.”

“Girded with girdles upon their loins, with flowing turbans upon their heads, all of them princes to look upon.”—Ez. 23:15.

These Old Testament quotations are followed by New Testament quotations, the British Version standing first, the American Revised Version second:

“Which of you by being anxious can add one cubit unto his stature?”

“Which of you by being anxious can add one cubit unto the measure of his life?”—Mat. 6:27.

“Thy speech bewrayeth thee.”

“Thy speech maketh thee known.”—Mat. 26:73.

Ye men of Athens, in all things I perceive that ye are somewhat superstitious.

Ye men of Athens, in all things I perceive that ye are very religious.—Acts 17:22.

Evil company doth corrupt good manners.

Evil companionships corrupt good morals.—I Cor. 15:33.

I have been crucified with Christ; yet I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me.

I have been crucified with Christ; and it is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me.—Gal. 2:20.

Now faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the proving of things not seen.

Now faith is assurance of things hoped for, a conviction of things not seen.—Heb. 11:1.

IV. The American Revised Version deals carefully with what may be called technical words and in this is more consistent than the English revision.

1. One important word, Jehovah, is used for Lord, and God, wherever the word occurs in the original. It is a well known fact that it was a superstitious veneration for the memorial name that kept the Hebrews from pronouncing this word.

2. Sheol is used for hell, pit and grave when the abode of the dead is intended. In this the English revisers were inconsistent, since they began to introduce the term, but used it in only twenty-nine out of sixty-five times. The American Committee makes use of the term throughout.

3. In the American Revised Version Holy Spirit is always used for Holy Ghost; a vast improvement.

V. There is another matter which, though of a delicate nature, demands careful attention, since it is one of the things which makes the present version superior to all others.

1. We refer to euphemisms,—the use of words of good omen. Rhetorically speaking, a euphemism is a figure in which a harsh or indelicate word or expression is softened; a way of describing an offensive thing by inoffensive expression; a mild name for something disagreeable.

Genesis 43:30,—His bowels did yearn upon his brother,—becomes,—His heart yearned over his brother.

Jeremiah 4:19,—My bowels, my bowels! I am pained at my very heart,—in changed to, My anguish, my anguish! I am pained at my very heart.

John 11:39,—Lord, by this time he stinketh; for he hath been dead four days,—becomes,—Lord, by this time the body decayeth; for he hath been dead four days.

Says the Pilgrim Teacher: Such passages can now be read in public without a snicker on the part of the coarser members of the audience, and a feeling of disgust on the part of the more refined. Still more startling expressions may be found in I Sam. 25:22; 2 Kings 18:27; Isaiah 36:12.

There is no reason why we should offend good taste; and, in making the changes referred to, the American Revisers have rendered a very great service to the public.

VI. Finally, the American Revised Version is the best, because it gives us the meaning of the original better than any other version.

1. This version is in closer conformity of the original languages. It removes words that puzzle the ordinary reader and even the scholar,—such as dragon, arrow-snake of the British Version. It gives us the meaning of the original authors and of the Holy Spirit.

2. Indeed, this is of the greatest importance. It is of momentous concern to the whole human race that we should know both what God has said, and, so far as we may, how He has said it.

3. This was clearly the aim of the American Revisers.

They commend it to the considerate judgment of all students of the Sacred Scriptures, and send it forth with the prayer, that it may “contribute to the better understanding of the Scriptures.”

This version makes the Bible a living book because it translates it into the living language of the hour.

How Our Church Was Named.

When the first General Assembly met in the city of Augusta in 1861, Dr. Thornwell offered the following resolution: That the style and title of this Church shall be the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America. The resolution was unanimously adopted. But when the Assembly met in Macon December 1865, the Confederate States had ceased to be, and the name had to be changed to adapt it to changed conditions. The matter was referred to the committee on Bills and Overtures and they recommended that the name should be The Presbyterian Church in the United States. This was not satisfactory to all, some regarding it as not sufficiently distinctive, and others as too nearly identical with that of the Northern Church. Seven votes were cast for the name, The Presbyterian Church in the South; two for The American Presbyterian Church, and two for The Protestant Presbyterian Church in the United States. But forty-two votes were cast for the name proposed by the committee and so the matter was settled.

What influenced the committee to propose the name that was adopted was not then and is not now generally known, but it was in part at least, this: During the summer which followed the close of the war and preceded the meeting of the Assembly, the Rev. A. F. Dickson of Orangeburg, S. C., afterwards of New Orleans, visited the North and had a long and friendly conference with Dr. Henry A. Boardman of Philadelphia and others who had opposed the Spring resolutions and other radical measures of the Northern Church. They said frankly to him that they did not feel at home in their church since it had gone so far astray from the fundamental principles and conservative position it had always held, and they believed they could never again have the Church home feeling except in connection and fellowship with their Southern brethren with whose views and principles they were in hearty accord. They suggested to him that in giving the Church a new and permanent name, as would be done soon, it would be wise to avoid any name that was local or sectional, or that might operate as a bar to its extending Northward. They believed that there would be a desire and demand on the part of many in the North who agreed with the principles of the Southern Church, for it to reach out in that direction, and that it would probably extend widely over the country.

This statement had its influence in determining the committee to recommend the name which was adopted.

These expectations, as we all know, were never realized. There was too much prejudice against the South and against a "Secession" Church, as it was regarded, to tolerate its extension beyond the line which marked the boundary of the Confederate States.

Our brethren who sympathized with us found themselves borne helplessly on the mighty wave of "patriotism" which swept over the land and which demanded a great National Church. The idea of Union swallowed up all else. Doctrinal differences were discounted, an heroic stand for principles, of convictions, of truth, was not in accordance with the spirit of the times.

Nevertheless, there were and are sound and true men in the North, not a few in thorough sympathy with the principles of which the Southern Church stands, and while it would be agreeable to them to have us with them in their great reunited Church, they see that our separate position emphasizes our testimony, and they believe that we can do more for the truth by remaining as we are, than by being merged into a great body in which we could not make our influence felt.

Improvements in Sunday Schools.

J. R. Murphy in New York Observer.

Do we not make a grave mistake in Sunday schools, to call the beautiful Bible story by the name of "Lesson"? Any normal fun-loving child loves to hear a story, but shrinks from the very sound of the word "lesson." The poor little tots, are not, as a rule, overfond of week-day school and its duties; yet they must hear every Sunday the words, "school," "lessons," and "study." All little children sit entranced while we read the fascinating Bible stories to them, but many of them look upon having to study their Sunday school lesson, as simply another hard task—a continuance of the week's drudgery.

Would not that Sunday school do the most efficient, far-reaching work, which caused its members to memorize each Sabbath, besides the story, even a small amount of Scripture, so that by the time the children reached manhood and womanhood, they would be armed against life's ills no matter in what guise their misfortunes presented themselves; great riches, poverty, disease or sickness? Are we not losing the habit of memorizing the Bible, as our precious grandmothers memorized it in the long ago time?

Shall we ever have again the great masters in painting, in music, in literature, in oratory until we fill our children's minds with more lasting Bible food than golden and motto texts? We can learn a lesson from our neighbors, the Episcopalians, who memorize large portions of Scripture. Then again, do we not unthinkingly place our God-lent children under a large number of inexperienced young Sunday school teachers, instead of placing them under our really Bible-filled, consecrated teachers?

I should like to see the following plan tried throughout: Have all the infants, as is sometimes done, under a fine kindergarten teacher, one who would emphasize the repeating of Scripture until it was unconsciously assimilated by the children. Let the pastor or some Bible-filled layman, teach all the men and women and young adults in a large Bible class, in a separate audience room, as is sometimes done. The rest of the school, comprising the great body of children, ranging in ages from seven to fourteen years, should all be taught together by an efficient, well paid, consecrated Sunday school minister, if the church is able to afford it, who might be the superintendent also. At regular intervals those especially spiritual and gifted in teaching, who are found in every school, should be asked, in turn, to take the Sunday school minister's place, and teach the Bible story from the platform.

In thus opening up this entirely new field for our young ministers, perhaps, there would be a corresponding increase in the number of students in our theological seminaries. There are many young men who have a special gift in reaching the young, and the greatest ministers and scholars have ever preached and taught in the simplest forms of speech; so that this unique minister to the young should be so highly trained a thinker and speaker, that the smallest child could understand his exposition of the Bible. He should see to it that each scholar brings regularly his or her own Bible and teach his school how to search and know the Word of God.

This plan would obviate irregularities arising from indolent, careless teachers, who, under the present system, so often discourage our faithful children by this want of punctuality. It would also prevent the dangerous possibility of our dear little ones being underfed with God's Word by incompetent young teachers and mothers.

Necessarily this great body of children, who are taught by the Sunday school minister, should be grouped in small classes under the care of young and old men and women, whose sole duties should be to keep order and visit their classes. Occasionally one of them should be honored by being asked to lead, if he or she were deemed worthy of so high a privilege.

There should also be a trained musician who would regularly drill the children upon the proper interpretation of the highest music, and insist upon them learning "by heart" all of the words of the very finest hymns. Happy is the child who has been taught in his infancy to sing softly, to enunciate distinctly, and to appreciate the best music. Blessed is he who has been led to make part of himself such soul-satisfying hymns as "Lead Kindly Light," "Nearer, my God, to Thee," "Abide with Me," etc.

Are there many Sunday schools whose pupils commit to memory, each Sabbath morning, the words of some glorious Psalm, and a standard hymn like the good old "How Firm a Foundation," or "There is a land of Pure Delight?" Is it not time that a great deal of the so-called music and rapid literature in the Sunday school songs of today—which even the children themselves are learning to despise—were taken from our service by some mighty God-fearing hand? Many of the Sunday school songs are simply adaptations of worldly music. I suspect, if the truth were known, few of them ever brought a soul lastingly to its Saviour; they are irreverent, and simply destroy the child's precious brain structure, where classic music and inspiring words would build up and create a better quality of mind.

All of this means that our Sunday schools would be more effective nurseries for our churches, if we had in each school four efficient, well trained leaders, viz: the pastor of a church, or a consecrated substitute, the minister of the Sunday school, the kindergartner, and the singing master. Better results might be secured by also paying well the two last named. More beneficial and permanent work could certainly be secured if some at least of the above suggestions were carried out.

It is a noble sight to see an honest man cleave his own heart in twain and fling away the baser part of it.—Charles Reade.

Blue-Bells in the Alps.

God's little flowers, they are!
Yet mean they much to me.
These fragile blue bells springing free,
Upon wild heights so far.

Types of the care He gives
To tenderest, frailest things.
The brooding of the Eternal wings
Is over all that lives.

The Editor's Chat with the Reader.

Mr. Hardin's sermon to the Elks is the main feature of our paper this week, we think, and we hope it will lead the ministerial readers of the Standard to worthy emulation on suitable occasions.

Dr. DuBose adds interest to the Missionary column this week with his contribution. E. M. G. gives another one of his historical reminiscences that is most valuable. The one on the New School union with the Southern Church in a previous issue was very timely. We had always understood that the Christian Observer was the powerful influence in securing that union. Some Southern Thoughts for Northern Thinkers is suggestive and edifying. That is also an excellent article on the American Revised Version, the only one except the French version that gives to God the name by which he has chosen to be called, Jehovah. And there are other good things which we hardly have space to mention. We shall publish next week an article on the Baptist Convention which came to a close on Sunday night after a most successful and harmonious meeting. The editor would like to add his endorsement of the statement made by the business manager below.

A Word from the Business Manager.

We earnestly ask all who have received a circular letter enclosing a bill for subscription due, to give this matter their immediate attention. The amount due, in the aggregate, is fully $8,000, but every subscription sent in will help. We are anxious to close up these accounts before the first of the year, but the money is due and we need it. Please send it at once.

PERSONALS.

Rev. W. D. Morton, of Rocky Mount, N. C., preached in the Maxton Church on Monday night.

Rev. Wm. Black, on the 6th inst., closed a most successful meeting at Ashpole. There were sixteen accessions to the church as the result of his work there.

Rev. R. E. McAlpine of Nagoya, Japan, who is visiting in North Carolina, preached at Pineville on last Sunday. Mr. McAlpine is a brother of Rev. J. R. McAlpine, pastor of this church.

Rev. R. W. Hiness, of Mebane, N. C., is at Richmond, Va., for a few weeks' hospital treatment. He may be addressed at 101 W. Grace Street. The Standard hopes for his early and complete recovery.

Rev. J. C. Grow died at Gainsville, Texas, on December 5th. Rev. John Shive, assisted by Rev. J. S. Nisbet, conducted the funeral services Sunday morning. Mr. Grow was in his 60th year, was licensed in 1871 and was a faithful and loveable man.

Changed addresses—Rev. W. L. Bedinger from West Apomattox, Va., to Frankford, West Va; Rev. J. L. D. Houston, from Dodd City, Ark., to Prairie Grove, Washington county, Ark.; Rev. F. D. Thomas, from Elberton, Ga., to Easley, S. C.

Church News.

MISSOURI.

PLEASANT HILL.—At a congregational meeting held Nov. 29, this church gave a very hearty call to Rev. Dr. H. B. Boude, now of California, Mo., to become their pastor. It is understood that he will accept, Presbytery consenting, and the church is now rejoicing in the prospect of having a pastor once more and regular services, after a long vacancy of more than a year.

CAPE GIRARDEAU.—At a called meeting of Potosi Presbytery held Saturday evening, Dec. 5, Rev. Robert S. Brown was received from the Presbytery of Columbia, and arrangements made for his installation next day. Accordingly on Sabbath, Dec. 6, he was installed as pastor of Cape Girardeau Church, Rev. C. W. Latham presiding and propounding the constitutional questions, Rev. C. E. Hickok preaching the sermon, and Rev. A. F. Cunningham charging both the pastor and people. This pastorate begins under very happy auspices, and a brother writes, "there is a magnificent outlook for this church, pastor and people."

MARSHALL.—On the first Sabbath, Dec. 6, this church gave a most hearty and unanimous call to the young brother who has served them only a month, Rev. John E. Abbott, to become their pastor, and appointed commissioners to prosecute the call before Presbytery at its next meeting, which will be held in the near future.

At a called meeting of Potosi Presbytery in Cape Girardeau, Mo., on Dec. 5th, 1903, Rev. Robt. S. Brown was received from the Presbytery of Columbia and installed pastor of the Cape Girardeau church. The services occurred on Sabbath morning, the 6th inst.

WESTMINSTER CHURCH (near Walker, Mo.) I closed a sixteen days' meeting at this church last night. This was the first series of meetings the church had enjoyed for a number of years. The congregations were good all the way through. The meeting was rather remarkable in this particular, that men attended the services who had not been to church or heard a sermon for three, five, and one for twelve years. Children were there five and seven years old who had never heard a sermon. The results were nine additions to the church and five new families brought into connection with the church. A congregational meeting was called for the third Sabbath of this month to elect two deacons. The church seems to have taken on new life and zeal.

W. T. Howison.

FULTON.—Rev. A. A. McGeachy recently offered his resignation as pastor of this church, and on Sabbath, December 6th, the congregation agreed to unite with him in asking Presbytery to dissolve the relation.

LAFAYETTE PRESBYTERY is called to meet at Lexington, Mo. Dec. 22, 7 p. m., to consider calls from Higginville church for pastoral services of Rev. X. Ryland, of Independence to Rev. A. A. Wallace, D. D., of Marshall to Rev. Jno. E. Abbott, and of Pleasant Hill to Rev. H. B. Boude, D. D.; also all matters pertaining to these and similar requests, and any recommendations from the Home Mission Committee touching this work. The call has been formally issued and signed by the moderator, Rev. W. E. Beattie.

VIRGINIA.

NORFOLK, Second Church.—Eight new members received into this church Sunday, Dec. 6th, 1903.

MARYLAND.

HIGHLAND CHURCH (Northern)--In a meeting just closed the pastor was greatly assisted by Rev. Messrs. K. J. Stewart and W. M. Hyde. On last Sunday there were six additions. During the past year repairs have been made on the church building and on the manse, including a very satisfactory new furnace for the church. Our church is young and growing, and there is mission territory adjacent, and we believe the prospect for continued growth is bright. In closing permit me to rejoice with you in God's manifest blessing on the Home Mission work for this year in the dear old North State.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

CLIO.—One year ago Rev. H. M. Dixon came to this Clio, McColl and Carolina group of Presbyterian churches from Mecklenburg Presbytery, and though a stranger, he at once took a place among the able ministers of this Pee Dee Presbytery. By eminent work and faithful devotion to the cause thirty-one new members have been added to the group with one additional elder and two deacons to the Clio church. On the 6th inst, Rev. B. P. Reed closed a week's service at Carolina church with an addition of twelve members and communion at the Monday service. During the last week in November Rev. D. M. Fulton of the Darlington church, with Mr. Dixon of this church, preached a series of sermons, closing at the end of the week with five professions of faith in Christ, and in parting with the congregation of this church he received many handshakes and farewells. Rev. B. P. Reed served the congregation here on the night of the 6th inst. with a fine sermon, after which communion was served by Rev. H. M. Dixon and eight communicants were added to the roll of the church. This Presbytery is certainly blessed with an able, devoted, faithful ministry.

FLORIDA.

MIKESVILLE.—The members of this church and congregation have recently enjoyed the meetings conducted by Rev. N. Keff Smith of Darien, Ga. Dr. Smith held his first service on Wednesday, Nov. 18, and closed the following Tuesday night. Services were held daily at 11 a. m., and 6:30 p. m. The meetings, despite the inclement weather, were well attended, and the church was much benefitted by the earnest exposition of the Word, from this zealous worker in the Master's vineyard.

The song services conducted by Dr. Smith himself were an attractive and edifying feature of the meeting. There were two additions to the church on profession of faith.

After closing the meeting in Mikesville, Dr. Smith proceeded to High Springs, where a week's meeting was held.

The people of the above congregation feel gratified not only to Dr. Smith, but to the church at Darien for permitting him to leave his charge there to labor in this field, and profoundly thankful to Almighty God for his goodness to them.

The Presbytery of St. Johns, by a Commission appointed for the purpose, installed the Rev. Coleman O. Groves as pastor over the church at Braidenton, on the 9th inst., and a like commission installed the Rev. W. S. Milne as pastor at St. Petersburg. Both fields are very promising, and there is every reason to hope for good results from the faithful work of these two brethren.

The church at Tallahassee has extended a unanimous call to the Rev. Wm. B. Y. Wilkie to become its pastor. He has not yet signified his intentions in regard to it.

ALABAMA.

UNION SPRINGS.—The 68th meeting of the Synod of Alabama convened at Union Springs, Ala., Nov. 10-13.

Membership—Seventy-nine; fifty-three ministers and twenty-six elders.

Officers—Ruling Elder, Thad Harrison of Government Street church, Mobile, Moderator, and Ruling Elder J. W. Durr, Jr., of the First Church of Montgomery; Temporary Clerk Rev. A. A. Little and J. H. Miller were elected Directors of Columbia Theological Seminary and Rev. G. W. Patterson was elected a Director of the S. W. P. U.

Rev. W. E. McIlwain, Rev. A. A. Little, Rev. J. W. Stagg, Rev. N. L. Anderson and D. C. Carmichael were elected trustees of the Alabama College for Men.

The following overture to the General Assembly was adopted:

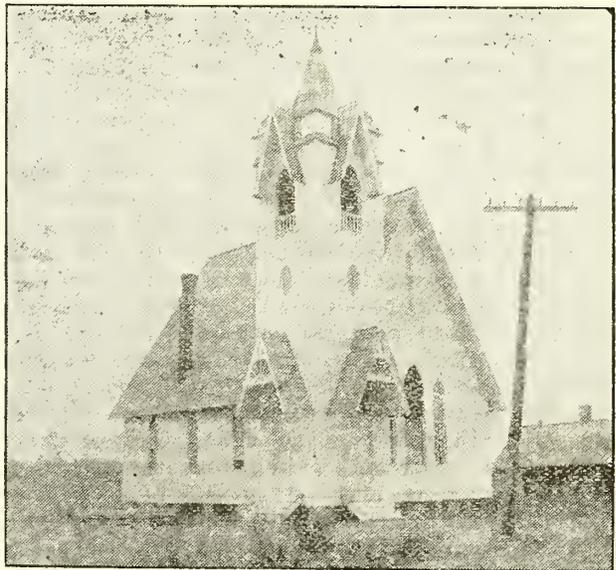

The Synod of Alabama overtures the General Assembly to appoint a committee to receive and consider any proposals from any other Presbyterian body holding the Calvinistic system looking to closer relations.

The popular meeting in the interest of Synod's Orphans' Home secured a collection in subscriptions and cash for the support of the Home for 1903-'04 of $4,485.48

The cause of education was presented by Mr. G. W. MacRae, that of Foreign Missions by Rev. G. W. Patterson, D. D., that of Assembly's Home Missions by Rev. S. L. Morris, D. D., that of Ministerial Relief by Rev. I. S. McElroy, D. D., that of Bible cause by Rev. T. H. Law, D. D., and that of Colored Evangelization by Rev. J. G. Snedecor. Education was probably the most prominent subject before Synod at this meeting. Synod has its college for women at Talladega, for whose help money is asked from its churches, its prospective college for men, for which already more than $310,00 has been subscribed, and its portion of responsibility for Columbia Theological Seminary and the Southwestern Presbyterian University. The proposed conference in Atlanta, Ga., to investigate the feasibility of the consolidation of these two institutions aroused the deepest interest. Visiting brethren, Revs. J. W. Walden, D. D., and T. H. Rice, D. D., plead earnestly for the conference which was opposed vigorously by Mr. G. W. MacRae and Rev. A. B. Curry, D. D. Synod decided to send representatives to this conference and appointed as representatives Rev. A. A. Little, Rev. G. W. Patterson and J. H. Miller, with Rev. J. W. Stagg, Rev. F. B. Webb and R. T. Simpson as alternates. Next place of meeting, Anniston.

W. I. Sinnott, Stated Clerk.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Church at Yadkinville, N. C.

Rev. P. C. Irwin writes us that this is the only Presbyterian church in Yadkin county, and it is the outcome of a series of meetings held by Rev. William Black, evangelist for the Synod. We are glad to show our readers that a beginning has been made in this field.

RED SPRINGS.—The friends of the Southern Presbyterian College and Conservatory of Music, formerly Red Springs Seminary, will be glad to know that Mrs. M. M. McKinnon, of McColl, S. C., has given $1,000 to the college to endow a scholarship, to be known as the D. P. McKinnon Scholarship.

This is done in memory of her husband, the late D. P. McKinnon, and the purpose of this scholarship is to aid orphans from our Orphans' Home at Barium Springs or any other orphan the donor may elect, who may wish to attend the college.

This is the second scholarship given to the college, the first having been one of $1,000 given by the class of 1900.

YANCEYVILLE FIELD.—At Bethesda we have been greatly blessed in our meeting, having with us Brother Gillespie, our very efficient chairman of Synodical Home Missions. Not only were we blessed in seeing people turn their backs on the world, but the membership, in fact all Christians, were revived and strengthened.

Brother Gillespie told of the sweet old story of the Christ with much simplicity, power and pathos.

At Stony Creek, whilst we were disappointed in not having help, the meeting was enjoyed by all, and the results as far as seen, have been four additions, two of whom were heads of families. Others will be added later.

At a school house about four miles from Yanceyville Rev. S. H. Williamson assisted by Mr. G. L. Walker, an elder of Greens church, the superintendent of a Sunday school taught at this point, conducted a meeting for ten days. Twenty-five professed faith in Christ, fifteen of whom have expressed the determination to unite with the Presbyterian church. Brother Walker's Sunday school has been of great good to these people and God has used it to his glory. These people are anxious for a building and are determined to have it, however humble it may be.

SUGAR CREEK.—Messrs. C. L. Abernathy, David F. Hunter and Robert W. McConnell were ordained and installed elders in Sugar Creek church on Sabbath, Dec. 6, 1903.

GREENSBORO.—Services at the Formal Opening of the Smith Memorial building, Greensboro, N. C., December 6th, 1903.

It is needless to say much concerning the building itself as a description thereof furnished by a lady correspondent has already appeared in the Standard. The programme for the occasion, which was literally carried out, was an address to the Sabbath school by Dr. H. S. Smith of Davidson College. A lecture on the Westminster Assembly's Catechisms at 11 a. m., by Dr. B. G. Strickler of Union Theological Seminary and in the evening three addresses, the subject being Our Church, its Past, Present and Future, these three heads being handled in the order named by three of its members, Jas. T. Morehead, Dr. Chas. D. McIver and A. M. Scales.

The writer did not hear the address to the Sabbath School, but it is safe to say that it was practical and full of interest, as Dr. Smith never addresses an audience but to instruct and edify those who hear him. It will however be no disparagement of other speakers on this occasion to say that the event of the day was Dr. Strickler's lecture. As the lecture had been delivered at least on one occasion and has been published, so that those who desire can procure and read it, no description or synopsis will now be given. Suffice it to say that if any one who heard it had previous doubts as to the necessity and efficacy of catechetical instruction, the convincing arguments and array of facts contained in the lecture must have dispelled all such doubts, and further, if there was one in the audience (of course there were many) be he Methodist, Baptist or what not, who had not committed the Shorter Catechism to memory, I wonder if he did not wish that he had.

Throughout the services of the day, the spacious building intended to accommodate throngs on extraordinary occasions, was filled with deeply interested listeners, the Westminster and the West Market Street Methodist churches throughout the day and the West Washington Street Baptist Church at night, having suspended their own services in order to participate in the enjoyment which the occasion afforded, being one of delightful remembrances that will not soon fade away.

In conclusion the writer claims the privilege of adding that of the vast number present on this occasion, he is the only one now living who was a member of this church prior to the pastorate of Rev. John A. Gretter, which had its beginning A. D. 1844. Only five of those received into membership during his pastorate are now living, and not one of those was present, the only two who are still members being unable to attend. J. C. W.

BRUNSWICK COUNTY.—We have recently experienced a rich revival of religion at one of the churches, New Hope, of this group. Rev. M. McG. Shields of Gastonia, N. C., came to our assistance on Nov. 7th, and for one week he preached twice each day with great power and demonstration of the Holy Spirit. Rarely has it been our privilege to hear the gospel of Christ so powerfully and so clearly presented to the sinsick and dying sinner. The members of the Church were greatly encouraged and strengthened and built up in the faith. We will all remember with gratitude to God that the brother was sent to us. There were nine additions to the Church as the visible fruits of this meeting. The New Presbyterian Church at Southport has been completed, except the pews, at a cost of nearly $1,000. By many of the citizens it is pronounced the prettiest church in town.

The congregation at Phoenix is ready to erect their new church. A lot has been purchased and about $250 cash is in hand to carry on the work. The work here is very encouraging. The field is now without a pastor, and unless some one is soon sent to this field the work must suffer.

GREENSBORO.—An adjourned meeting of Orange Presbytery met on Dec. 1st in Westminster Church, Greensboro, N. C. Licentiate I. N. Clegg was ordained as an evangelist to labor in Orange Presbytery.

Licentiate I. N. Clegg has been preaching at Thomasville one Sabbath in the month since June. Rev. Wm. Black, Synodical Evangelist, assisted him in a meeting there from Nov. 15th till the 23rd. They had a splendid meeting, Bro. Black doing some most excellent preaching.

There was a petition to organize a church at Thomasville December 3rd, 1903. Presbytery appointed the following commission: Revs. E. C. Murray, D. D., E. W. Smith, D. D., E. E. Gillespie, E. L. Siler, J. H. Gray and I. N. Clegg; Elders W. C. Herndon and W. C. Denney. The commission met on Thursday night, Dec. 3rd, 1903. Dr. Murray being absent, Dr. Smith acted as chairman. He preached a most excellent doctrinal sermon from the Life of Joseph. After the sermon the church was organized by receiving eleven letters and four on profession of faith.

The congregation then elected two ruling elders and one deacon. The elders were ordained and installed by the commission. Rev. E. L. Siler delivered a splendid charge to the elders and the congregation. The deacon was then installed and Rev. J. H. Gray delivered a splendid charge to the deacon and congregation.

On Sunday Rev. I. N. Clegg preached at Thomasville. At a meeting of the Session Mrs. George Anna White was received and baptized. She was 55 years old.

The new organization now has sixteen members with prospects of ten more before long. They have a bright prospect and the members say they must have a handsome brick church. Before this church was organized there was only one Presbyterian church in Davidson county.

TEXAS.

COLEMAN.—The Presbytery of Brownwood met in called meeting in the church at Brownwood December 5th. The following items of business were transacted:

1. The pastoral relation existing between the Coleman church and the Rev. A. Oscar Browne was dissolved.

2. On account of the acceptance by Mr. Browne of work requiring him to be outside the bounds of the Presbytery, Rev. J. P. Robertson was made chairman of the Presbyterian Home Missions committee, instead of Mr. Browne.

3. Licentiate Gains Hall was examined and ordained to the full work of the Gospel ministry and a call from the church at Dublin was put in his hands and having been accepted by him, an order was made for his installation on the third Sabbath of December.

Brownwood Presbytery is not a large body, but it has a very large field to work in. To a man who has spent all his pastoral days in Mecklenburg Presbytery, it seems right peculiar to get into a Presbyterian Church court with a small handful of members, but it he was most delighted to note the spirit with which this body is working, and very highly pleased with the cordial welcome which was extended to him.

Rev. Jesse W. Siler who is located at San Angelo is doing a splendid work. He has organized his young people and is getting some fine assistance from them. The writer spent ten days at San Angelo and was glad to see the spirit with which Brother Siler's people are rallying to his help. He has recently raised nearly, or altogether, $500 in his congregation, to be supplemented by five hundred more from the Presbytery, with which to employ an evangelist, or pastor-at-large, for the counties west of San Angelo. In presenting the matter from his pulpit, Brother Siler showed that he had lived in Mecklenburg county. He dwelt on the fact that the people who lived in those western counties were the people who would be moving to San Angelo in a few years, and urged the importance of their having Presbyterian training while yet in the country. Otherwise they would be lost to the Presbyterian Church when they move to town.

There is a great work to be done out here. It is great anywhere, but it is especially so in this new country. This country is not "wild and woolly" as some people in the East imagine it to be, but there is a great deal more worldly conformity out here than in North Carolina. All new country is that way.

But there are people in our churches here who would put to shame some of our eastern people when it comes to zeal in the Lord's work. I think I have never seen more consecrated Christians than many of our people are in these churches in the West.

Hugh W. Hoon.

Topics for Week of Prayer,

The following is the list of topics for the coming Week of Prayer, as suggested by the Evangelical Alliance for the United States:

Sunday, January 3.—The Kingdom of God and the conditions of its Triumphant Advance.

Monday, January 4.—The Warrant, the Privilege, the Power of Prayer and the Present Need of World-wide Intercession.

Tuesday, January 5.—The Church of Christ, the One Body of Believers, called of God to win the world to Christ.

Wednesday, January 6.—All Nations and Peoples, the one Human Family, loved of God.

Thursday, January 7.—Missions, Home and Foreign, Departments of the one Evangelizing Effort, under the one great Commission.

Friday, January 8.—The Family, a Divinely Prepared Foundation of Society's Existence and Well-being.

The School, called of God as a Prime Agency of Moral and Intellectual Training.

Saturday, January 9.—The Enthronement of Christ on Earth, the only Hope of Humanity's Highest Welfare.

Sunday, January 10.—The Holy Spirit, God's Free Gift.

The Central University of Kentucky.

On the afternoon of the day upon which the funeral services of the late president, Dr. W. C. Roberts, were held at Danville, the Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees met, and several other members of the Board who were present sat with them in conference.

The President of the Board was requested to write a letter of sympathy to Mrs. Roberts and family, and a committee was appointed to prepare a suitable set of resolutions, to be acted on by the Board at its next regular meeting.

Provision was made for carrying on the work of the president during the present session. Dr. Blanton, the vice-president of the institution, was asked to assume all the duties of the president pertaining to the general welfare of the University, in addition to his regular duties as vice-president. Dr. Fales, dean of Centre College, was asked to assume, in addition to his ordinary duties as dean, the oversight of the internal management of Centre College. In matters of common interest it was also provided that the vice-president and dean should confer together. This is simply giving formal effect to what has been done by Dr. Blanton and Dr. Fales thus far this session, as Dr. Roberts was never able to discharge any active duty since the session began. These two tried men are invaluable in their respective places, and there is every reason to expect that the work of the session will proceed in a satisfactory way under their oversight.

The Executive Committee also conferred together regarding what steps should be taken to secure a worthy successor to Dr. Roberts. It was the consensus of opinion that there is no need for haste, as this session is well provided for now, and nicely under way. It was also felt that much care should be taken in making the selection of a new president. A committee, consisting of Dr. J. McC. Blayney, Dr. L. H. Blanton and Dr. J. Kinsey Smith, was appointed to canvass the matter, and present a report to the next meeting of the Board. May they and the Board be wisely guided in this important matter.

Dr. Lilly in Good Health

I imagine, from the tenor of some personal letters, and news items which I have seen, that the impression as to the state of my health is not altogether correct. I am by no means in poor health. It was because I was unable longer to do two men's work, viz: that of Secretary of Colored Evangelization, and teacher of all the Theological Department in Stillman Institute, that I was compelled to lay down that work.

I was very much worn, and the work had become an intolerable burden, and I saw that if I did not give it up, I would break down. I think that I quit in time to prevent any bad results whatever. After two months' rest I feel the greatest relief.

I am here at the great Edinburgh University, pursuing some favorite studies in the department of the philosophies, and finding much pleasure in it.

I shall be ready for the regular work of the ministry at any time after the Christmas holidays.

Fraternally,

D. Clay Lilly,

12 A. Meadow Place, Edinburgh, Scotland.

The Alabama Presbyterian College.

Our subscription list is still growing. Early in October I visited our church at Tuscaloosa, of which Rev. John Van Lear is pastor. This, as you may know, is the seat of our State University, and on this account I feared that our people there would feel no special interest in a Presbyterian college destined to become more or less a rival of the University, but my fears were entirely removed when the ladies headed the subscription with $375. The Sabbath school followed with $100 and the entire subscription amounted to $1,800.

Later on in October I visited our church at Prattville, of which Rev. T. J. Ponder is pastor. Our church here is not large nor strong, but to date has given $579.25.

In November I visited the Marion church, of which Rev. E. D. Patton is pastor. This church is credited with 159 members and is not rich in this world's goods. Generally when I visit a church I am expected to do all the speech-making in reference to the college, but at Marion this order was decidedly changed. The representative of the college spoke first on Sabbath morning, then the pastor followed saying, among other things, that he hoped his people would not give less than $1,000 that day to the college. The closing speech was made by Elder J. A. Moore, and this was the best speech of all. Brother Moore expressed his most hearty approval of the college movement in Alabama and demonstrated his faith in the same by offering to give $500 to make the college a great success. There was no difficulty in securing a subscription in Marion of $1,500. From Marion I went to the Synod at Union Springs, Ala. Here the college received every consideration. Amid an unusual pressure of business the reports of the president, the treasurer and the board of trustees were fully heard, patiently considered and unanimously approved. We were privileged to report to the Synod that about $32,500 had been subscribed for the college and that there were good prospects that the whole amount, $100,000, would be raised. After the adjournment of Synod I remained with the people of Union Springs and preached for a week. At the close of this meeting I presented our cause and received a subscription which surprised the pastor, Rev. J. W. Roseborough, and all his people. The church had before it a debt of $1,000 incurred in building their new Sabbath school room, but this did not prevent them from giving $1,500 to the college. My next meeting was at Bethel church, ten miles in the country from Union Springs. This old Scotch church came originally from North Carolina and has an interesting history. But I reserve any account of my visit here until my next letter.

The Cry From Macedonia.

What Paul saw in the spirit, the man of Macedonia, who called to him for help for his country, we have before us in the flesh. The suffering and destitution, resulting from insurrection in Macedonia, are extreme. Twenty-five thousand Macedonians have managed to cross the border into Bulgaria. Several times that number remain in Macedonia, homeless, their herds and crops destroyed, perishing of cold and starvation. Everyone is familiar to some extent with the conditions which have prevailed in that unhappy country for the last two years and more, the active agitation of the Macedonian revolutionists, the rising in rebellion of a portion of the Macedonian people, the attempt of the Turkish authorities to suppress the revolution with the utmost severity by overwhelming force. With the rights and wrongs of the Macedonians we are not now concerned, but we cannot help being concerned with the relief of fellow beings and fellow Christians, of innocent women and children, who are perishing by the hundred and will perish by the thousand, most cruelly, unless Christian Europe and Christian America come to the rescue. At this Christmas season, with its thought of peace and good will, of joy and merrymaking, tens of thousands of villagers, stripped of everything but the clothes on their backs, are facing the winter cold without food. We appeal to you for contributions to aid the destitute and suffering Macedonians in Bulgaria and Macedonia. For some months, not less, certainly than $1,000 a day are required to relieve the most pressing wants—clothing, food, fuel. Ten times that sum could be used to advantage. All contributions sent to the Trust Company of America as treasurer, 149 Broadway, New York, or Kidder, Peabody & Co., Boston, will be forwarded without expense. American missionaries in the field will superintend wisely and economically the distribution of all sums thus forwarded for purposes of relief to all sufferers without regard to race or religion.

Washington, D. C., Dec. 12.—The State Department has been informed that final steps have been taken for the formation of a permanent republican form of government in Panama. The news came in a dispatch from Consul General Gudger, dated Panama, today, as follows: "Election for constitutional convention called for January 4. The convention meets January 20th." This action is taken, it is believed, to meet suggestions from Panamaitians here that criticisms of the new republic would be largely disarmed and the status of the new treaty improved if the final ratifications could be exchanged by the United States with a permanent and regular form of government on the isthmus. The territory of Panama is so small that, according to the belief here, the elections can be completed within a week after the date named—January 4th. The convention is expected to follow generally the outlines of the Cuban constitution, which is regarded as the most modern and the complete model of such documents. The President has selected W. I. Buchanan, of New York, to be the first United States minister to Panama.

Herbert Spencer has closed his long life on earth. Take him all in all, he was perhaps the profoundest philosopher of the Nineteenth Century. He was born in 1820, the son of a school-master who was himself an author. The young Herbert began his career as a railway engineer. At the age of twenty-two he was writing a series of papers on political economy for The Economist, the most noted publication of its class in the world. Two years later he published his book on Social Statics. He early announced his theory of individualism, one of the primary principles of his philosophy, Liberty of action, the first essential to the exercise of the faculties and therefore the first essential to happiness, the liberty of each limited only by the liberty of all. In 1860 he announced the prospectus of his "System of Philosophy," upon which he may really be said to have been laboring up to the very close of his life. Under the head of the Unknowable he declared "the consciousness of an Inscrutable Power." Under the head of the Knowable he treated Space, Time, Matter and so forth. It was his attitude to the Inscrutable Power that classified him as an agnostic and that made his relations to the religious world hostile in the main. Still he has left some noble tributes to the value of the religious life.

The first Australian Parliament has come to an end, and with it the first three years in the life of the Commonwealth of Australia. Neither the Parliament nor the Commonwealth can be congratulated upon the result of the Commonwealth's first essay in Government. Dominated by a socialistic or semi-socialistic Labor party, the Parliament has done its best to put a ring-fence round Australia. It has excluded not only colored people, whether British subjects or otherwise, but also all persons, white or colored, who attempt to come out under contract to Australian employers. It has gone so far as to refuse a part in any mail contract which allows steamers to employ colored seamen—even in the unenviable tasks of the stoke-hole. It has, after infinite labor, created an Australian High Court. It has tried and failed to establish an Interstate Commission to regulate traffic between the states. It introduced a tariff which was a flagrant violation of the premier's pledge to frame a revenue tariff. It has exasperated the mother-state (New South Wales) by an open attempt to evade the provision of the constitution which locates the capital in that state. In fine, by the provincialism of its spirit and the whole trend of its legislative acts, it has done its utmost to make federation odious to the federated states; and it is a singular comment on its proceedings that this unquestionable fact stands out at the end of its career—a feeling of antagonism between the constituent parts of the commonwealth far exceeding in intensity anything existing before federation.—The Congregationalist.

From all sources, exclusive of the postal service, the receipts of the Government for the last fiscal year aggregated $560,396,674. The expenditures for the same period were $506,099,007, the surplus for the fiscal year being $54,297,667. The indications are that the surplus for the present fiscal year will be very small, if indeed there be any surplus. From July to November the receipts from customs were, approximately, nine million dollars less than the receipts from the same source for a corresponding portion of last year. Should this decrease continue at the same ratio throughout the fiscal year, the surplus would be reduced by, approximately, thirty million dollars. Should the revenue from customs suffer much further decrease during the fiscal year, the surplus would vanish.—From the President's Message.

A number of representative men met last week at the residence in Washington of General John W. Foster to discuss the propriety of an arbitration treaty between the United States and Great Britain. It will probably be similar in form and scope to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which failed of ratification in the Senate. The obstacles in the way then were the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, relating to the isthmian canal, and the Alaskan boundary dispute. Now that both these causes of difference have been removed, to the satisfaction of Americans, they cannot be used any longer for purposes of obstruction. The gentlemen who met with General Foster have been constituted a local committee to prepare for a general conference on the subject to meet at Washington, January 12. It is planned that similar committees be appointed in the principal cities to co-operate in making the proposed conference a success. Considering the fact that the United States has taken the initiative in the cause of international arbitration it is probable that the results of the forthcoming conference will be an effective aid in the promotion of a cause that aims at peace and good will toward men. It is claimed that President Roosevelt favors the purpose of the conference.—The Interior.

MARTIN.—Mrs. Elizabeth W. Martin, a saint in Christ, departed from this life on the 28th of Nov. 1903, at her home in Washington, N. C., in the 77th year of her age. She was born May 9, 1827. In the prime of young womanhood she united with the Presbyterian Church in this city and for 45 years lived a modest, sincere, devoted Christian life. In her quiet way she shared in all good works and with a liberal heart gave freely to the cause of Christ.

In her home life Mrs. Martin was devotedly loved. Children and grandchildren, entering on the life which is in Christ, testify to her training. In the circle of her friends she was affectionately admired. In all relations she served faithfully.

She fell asleep serenely in Jesus and awoke at Home. The emptiness of her accustomed place will be hard to fill, but the Christians who knew her anticipate that place “Where the saints of all ages in harmony meet,

Their Saviour and brethren transported to greet,

While the anthems of rapture unceasingly roll

And the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul.”

Hands Off the Negro.

As so many of the negro servants spend their lazily and easily earned money on the ever ubiquitous excursion, which we poor oppressed white folks cannot afford to take, we mistresses, in consequence, thoroughly and frequently clean our houses and discover how much dirt has been overlooked.

This very frequent exodus of the negroes all over the South is not without its beneficial sanitary effect, in getting our homes thoroughly renovated during the absence of our “fable goddesses,” for we all know the natural affinity between a darkey and the original ingredients of Adam.

Perhaps some day these salutary excursions will be so on the increase (if that were possible) that we Southerners will learn how to work as well as our Northern sisters, and thus become independent of this colored “new woman.”

The poor South is crying out for its old time, finely trained cooks and nurses and butlers—patterns of patience, docility, skill and politeness—it is sick unto death of the present generation of trifling, unstable, ignorant negroes, the expected result of freedom with the restraint and discipline of former days removed.

There are fine characters among them whom we all respect, but there are precious few among the race, of the younger generation, who know how to cook a palatable meal, sew neatly or properly attend to a baby's wants.

Every sane person feels that the Negroes need less of “ologies” and more knowledge of manual training and hygiene.

One hates to see zealous Northerners, who do not understand the real conditions at the South or truly care for the negro as we Southerners do, come down here to do the work which it is certainly “up to us” to perform more intelligently and satisfactorily ourselves.

Why cannot we women (since we, one and all, vainly exhaust our daily lives doing the hardest kind of missionary work, viz.: trying to instruct the ever vanishing servant) unite for self-defence and form clubs to improve our wretched house service and engage skilful teachers to teach the children in the colored public schools how to work efficiently and conscientiously? Surely we women could not serve each other better, and life without constant service to others is no life at all, than by carefully training these children, who are destined afterwards to destroy the digestion, the temper and the religion of our dearest friends (their future mistresses) unless we unselfishly come to the rescue now. The teachers engaged should also give lessons in morality and deportment. It is most unfortunate that big-hearted Northern missionaries have found it necessary to come South to lift up the Negro.

Southern people might in turn, with equal reason, find urgent work awaiting them, if they cared to extend their surplus energies and enthusiasm thus in ameliorating the horrible conditions under which the Northern white slaves do toil and languish.

But still we deserve this (I was about to say saline instruction, since Northern ideas on the Negro question are utterly foreign to ours, so long as we sit idly down and allow generous strangers to do our God-given work for us, which we could, if we only would, do so much more effectually than they.

Are we Southern women making any united effort to give every Negro child in the town in which we live, a determination to be clean (morally and physically) to be honest, to love the truth, to be obliging, and to be the best and most skilled colored worker in his or her line?

Deep down in the hearts of many conservative Southerners is the conviction that up to the present time it is the outside influence and teaching which have utterly ruined the black race.

If this work is left hereafter, even in part, to be carried on by Northern zeal, can we not see that the future Negroes, like the present generation, will view all Southerners from a very different standpoint from that which we would give them?

Had the South realized her responsibility and duty to the Negro "since freedom broke out," and given him the necessary industrial training as she did before the war, the colored people would not so soon have forgotten the everlasting debt of gratitude they owe the South for all her kindness, wonderful forbearance, and patient training which their parents had received in the old slavery days; for the faithful Masters were surely the greatest missionaries who ever lived, and every Negro child would think so too, if he were to read "A Southern Planter."

Let us say to the generous North: "You could not take them from us, they still belong to us exclusively, and you, by your lack of knowledge of the Negro character and needs, are not in our eyes the wisest teachers of this peculiar race. Hereafter if you will trust your Southern brothers' judgment, as he has had longer experience, in this delicate matter of training the Negro, we will prove to you, that we really do understand and appreciate the Negro race far better than you ever did or ever will."—Louisville Courier Journal.

The Mother and the Consul.

"A great mother!" Could there be finer praise than this given the late Consul Emma Booth-Tucker by a life-long companion? With it comes that other from her husband, "She was the greatest burden-bearer I ever knew." Gracious tributes these to any woman.

But when we consider that from childhood this most gifted and best loved General Booth's children lived in the blinding and too often withering light of publicity, when we reflect how easily the adulation yielded her by three continents might have become her meat and drink, we begin to realize the depth and strength of her womanhood. She kept always the purity and child-like humbleness of heart which characterized her girlhood. Her life was one long sacrifice of her own desires and sweet womanly pleasures to what she deemed her duty. The mother of nine children, her chief joy lay in her home life. "I shall never, as long as I live," she said at one time, "get used to the agony of being a show. My ideal of earthly happiness is a little home where I could hide myself with my husband and children and never come out again."—Congregationalist.

A Laos Cremation *

The sun was merciless as it fell upon us that April morning, and though it was but the fourth hour of the day, the heat was so intense that our eyes and faces were hurt by the dry hot air hurled back from the road beneath. We dropped our large pith hats, and held high our double umbrellas, all the time urging our ponies to keep them in a pace instead of the creeping gate which they would have chosen.

As far up and down the road as we could see were men women and children all going in the same direction as ourselves, and we could well guess with the same destination in view. The natives were all walking. Some carried foreign umbrellas above their heads, others held aloft the more artistic oil-paper umbrella of China, and still others had but a piece of cloth thrown about the head to protect it from the sun's rays. There was but little talking and laughing for the Laos people are ever mindful of decorum, and even a child could tell you that it is not becoming to raise the voice in laughter or conversation.

As we pressed on the crowd ever swelled, as lanes and paths and streets of the town converged toward the great highway. Finally we swung around a bend which was hedged with feathery bamboo, shutting out what lay beyond, and came out upon a large common. To one side were temporary booths, made of bamboo wood and raised so as to command a view of the common. All about the immense place were thousands of people standing or squatting in groups, chatting in a subdued way, and all with expectation unmistakably written upon their faces.

And what forsooth had drawn all this multitude of people to the common? A mixed people, for there could be seen the long cue of the Chinaman, the high head dress of the Indian in his spotless white, the short picturesque jacket of the Burmese, the coiled hair of the Kmu men, the small delicate forms of the Siamese, all dotted about the plain amid the bright costumes of the Laos. A great event we would say, and so it was, for nothing less than the cremation of the late High Prince of the province was to take place that day. For several days the ceremonies had been in progress at the palace but this was to be the greatest of all the days.

For over a year the body of the prince had lain in state within the palace, and all the time preparations were being made for the final cremation. The native process of embalming is simple but effective. The body is then laid in a coffin with a tiny stove pipe arrangement at one end, which passes up through the roof of the house, thus allowing all gases to escape. At the opposite end is a drain tube which carries away what little fluid substance the body may still retain. Frequent visits are made by the shaved head, yellow clad, priests while the body lies thus, at which times they chant in wierd monotone selections from the sacred writings of Gnatama.

There is to the American mind which has for long generations felt the life-giving, virile sap of Christianity, uplifting above self-seeking and superstition, something incomprehensible in the attitude of the Easterner towards such ceremonies as this one described. The idea of merit is the fundamental principle, merit or reward at death. The greater the display, the more merit reaped, and so the family of the dead spends all the money that they can possibly afford, and often more, upon a cremation and all the attendant and varied forms of amusements, and this, to buy salvation for themselves against their own death and reincarnation. It is necessary to understand this underlying principle else the foreigner will not grasp the significance of the occasion.

This was our first opportunity of witnessing the cremation of one of the autocrat class and so we were eager to see all that we could. From the vantage point of observation which our ponies, backs afforded, we saw to one side of the common a vigorous boxing match in progress, and across from this a sword dance held several hundred spectators in delight. Before we had time to cool ourselves in the welcome shade of a bamboo clump, we saw that the booths were beginning to fill with the families of the princes of the province, and we knew that in a short while the catafalque would draw in sight.

A slave came running towards us and falling upon her knees she presented a bunch of fragrant flowers laid upon an exquisitely wrought silver tray, with the invitation from her mistress the Princess B—, to come to her booth to witness the ceremonies. We gladly availed ourselves of her hospitality, and as we were seated upon the newly woven mat spread for us, the procession appeared across the common. There was not the stately, solemn march to funeral dirge which would characterize such a national occurrence in our land, but instead there was the irregular movement of a motled procession to the clashing and beating of gongs. The catafalque was drawn by a rope long enough to allow many hundred to hold it and thus share in the merit accruing therefrom. The end of it dwindled down to a mere silken thread held by the wife of the deceased. The actual pulling power came from some fifty men immediately in front of the funeral car.

As the catafalque came in view, I instinctively held my breath, so dazzling and imposing was its appearance. A later and nearer view revealed the temporary and gaudy reality, but the passing effect was inspiring. Built of light combustible woods in pyramidal shape to the height of some fifty or sixty feet, with many turrets and towers, overlaid with tinsel, colored papers, and much pure gold leaf where the sunlight would be best caught and reflected, it moved slowly along, filling the hearts of all with delight. The multitude of peasants because dear to them is a display of the kind with all its attending forms of entertainments which costs them nothing and possibly gives them a share in the general merit of the occasion, for is it not meritorious to some that the princes make merit upon them? The autocrats, because they will reap for themselves this day a full scythe of merit, besides displaying their wealth and power before the eyes of their slaves and peasants.

In the center of the common the catafalque rested and cords attached to the turrets were stretched out and made firm to the ground many yards away. Then followed a series of fireworks which baffles description. Images of roses, cows, elephants and animals of various kinds were loaded with powder and sent off whizzing about the common while others were made to run up the cords to the catafalque. There was nothing funeral about the wild race of the grotesque objects, the merry peals of soft laughter from the spectators, and the popping and banging of the images as they exploded. I glanced cautiously towards the bereaved wife, to see how all this impressed her, and though she was sitting modestly and quietly with an air of solemnity, the merry twinkle of her rich brown eyes, and the upturned corners of her lips, betrayed but too plainly her enjoyment and satisfaction in the scene. But think not that she never grieved for her dead lord! When the breath left his body she felt that the light of her life was departed, and as she wailed aloud with the women of the palace, she tore her long black hair in anguish and hid her face for days beneath its kindly shelter, and would not be comforted. But that was long, long ago, over a year, and her sorrow has worn itself away, after the manner of her race, and she has ceased to mourn for the departed.

While the fire works were being sent off, I saw many Buddhist priests about the catafalque in their flowing robes reciting chapters for such occasions from their sacred books. They were constantly changing, relieving each other, as the hours passed by, and when released from duty joining in the general festivities. By this time music was heard from several directions and we could see that dancing, boxing, and theatricals were going on. At intervals limes were thrown by the hands of the princes into the throng about, which were eagerly scrambled for, as into each lime a coin had been inserted.

About the third hour of the afternoon sun there was an unusual beating of gongs which announced that the "meritorious gifts" were to be bestowed upon the priests. These gifts consisted in newly woven yellow robes, mats, lounging pillows, water jars, cigars, matches, and other things which would fit into the priest's needs if not into the monastic laws that bound them. I was especially interested in a clever piece of handiwork whereby coins were suspended from a bunch of finely split bamboo, forming a shower bouquet with coins for blooms. Aside from the uniqueness I noticed the gift as it was accepted in disobedience to the Buddhist law which says that no priest shall handle money.

Soon after the distribution of the gifts the sacred fire was placed about the base of the beautiful, tapering funeral pyre, which, spreading, soon enveloped the whole in flames. The crowd began to disperse immediately and before the frame had fallen in the common was almost bare, save for a few chanting priests and a score of slaves whose business it was to remain and see that not a vestige of the catafalque remained.

Mrs. L. W. Curtis.

Some Wise Words.

This seems a fitting time to offer a few suggestions to girls and women newly entering business life. Don't fancy that your employer is always thinking about you and your special line of work. He hasn't time. He wants women who can seize his ideas and follow them out without asking him a thousand and one questions. If you fail to give satisfaction you will speedily hear of it. Laborers in any field are rapidly "sized up" in this age of breathless competition.

Don't thirst for continual praise. If you know that you are doing your very best, even in the smallest details, you will have the reward of a quiet conscience, and a kindly employer will not forget to give you a word of encouragement voluntarily from time to time.

Don't be "firtatious," whether you are old or young. The writer once knew a typewriter in a magazine office who flirted with every male employe, married or single, about the establishment, from the office boy up to manager—even with the proprietor himself; but that girl was the laughing stock of the office.

Don't "dawdle" about the store or office after your work is done.

Don't be afraid, however, to work "overtime," or to take work home when occasion demands it. You will lose nothing by it in the long run. Too many women are "penny wise and pound foolish," forgetting that whatever furthers the interests of the house that employs them will eventually further their own, provided they are faithful, energetic and industrious.

Don't fail to put your best and most conscientious effort into whatever you do, if it is only the addressing of an envelope or magazine wrapper. Promotion is swiftest from the ranks, and your overseer is on the lookout for the best recruits.

Don't hesitate an instant at any order. A well-organized business must be run by military discipline to achieve and maintain success. If you are a reporter go without a murmur to an assignment at the Antipodes; if a stenographer, take down implicitly every word dictated, even if it sounds like a plot to poison or assassinate your bosom friend. There is, no doubt, a satisfactory explanation awaiting you.

Be cheerful, courteous and patient. Be watchful for everything that will benefit your employers. Let them learn that the only difference in the work of a woman and of a man is that the woman is rather more to be depended upon.—Elizabeth Stuart Phelps Ward.

Don't Lose Your Grip.

A woman said the other day, in the course of her comments concerning another woman: "She's losing her grip."

The speaker meant that the other woman was becoming discouraged—and was verging toward despair. That the other woman's mental disturbance was obvious, meant the gradual and ultimate loss to her of the confidence of others in her ability to carry responsibilities.

This is a pity, isn't it—but as the world goes, it's so. No matter how discouraged you are—don't seem to be losing your grip. If you feel one hand loosening on your efforts and duties, take an overgrasp with the other hand, and if you can not climb, just hang on to the situation. No matter how doubts scorch your brain—don't seem to be losing your grip.

Make it apparent that you have confidence in yourself—and then you assure to yourself the trust of others in your capacities. It is very hard to carry this preaching into effect—but you'll have to do it in order to achieve.

There are lots of hard things to do in sustaining a business or social or artistic success—and one of the hardest is not to seem discouraged when the tide of adversity is sweeping you off your feet. Just the same the direct calamity in your darkest hour is to seem to be losing your grip.

So hang on tenaciously when everybody can clearly read that only obstacles are coming your way—don't forget that the world casually pities, but never sympathizes, and soon forgets the lost grip.

All this is cold comfort for the day of need—but it's simple and straight telling of one way of the world—so don't seem to be losing your grip. Hold on, although you fail today, and make a new beginning tomorrow. Keep right on beginning until you succeed. There's no disgrace or shame in failure when it is honestly done. There's credit and a compelling deservance in building a beginning on a failure. A man did this a while back when actually he was so beset with anxieties and difficulties that he didn't know which way to turn for a clear retrospect. He held on and began again, and his contemporaries said:

"What splendid energy and perseverance!"

The man won the confidence of the world because he held on and began again—had he lost his grip, the world would have called him weak and foolish, and even the memory of him would have become a puerile shadow.—Chicago Journal.

Our Young People.

What the Gift Service Did for Us.

By Rev. C. W. Corey.

The pastor sat in his study reading the Times' suggestions on the Christmas gift service. "Capital!" he thought, "and a splendid opportunity for our school."

When laid before the church, the novelty of the idea was apparent. One thought gifts in the church inappropriate, but it was suggested that a loaf of bread for the hungry might be quite as clean as a dollar bill, and enough of them quite as acceptable unto the Lord. Another thought the conveyance of the gifts to the church needless; but the gifts before the congregation would be a very effective object lesson. Another thought a week night preferable to Sunday for the service; but the nights of Christmas week are very full, and we wanted all the congregation present. Besides, the program was to be sacred, and gifts—"gold and frankincense and myrrh"—accompanied the worship on the first Christmas occasion. Some feared the gifts would engender an unseemly curiosity and wish to snare in the distribution of Christmas bounties. The church, however, gave its sanction to the idea, but asked the committee to present fuller details.

Had this meeting been discouraging? To some it may have seemed so. There was a complimentary interpretation of this close scrutiny, however, and the pastor so regarded it, and out of the criticisms and suggestions was gathering ideas. The details for the gift part of the service were prepared. Gift making outside the family, rather than gift receiving, was the plan. The gifts were to be food, fuel, clothing, toys, etc., for the needy, or remembrances for aged, sick, or "shut-in." The committee to receive and distribute the gifts would place them in the church at their discretion, and deliver them before Christmas,—no distribution Sunday night. Each gift was to be delivered with the best wishes of the school. These plans proved satisfactory to the church.

The Times' blanks for gifts arrived, and were presented to the teachers. They looked curiously at them for a moment, then soberly, and one said, "I wish we had secured these earlier." So all thought. They were beginning to see how practical the service was to be. Another of our teachers, a worthy, comfortable deacon, said: "This is great! Do you know, I have thought I had need that these things should be presented to me at Christmas, but I am beginning to think I have need to share what I have."

The gift-making spirit was fully on.

We had sought to make every member of our school a look-out committee. The boys and girls were so happy and so enterprising! Some little girls discovered children who would not have any dolls for Christmas. They would make them some. One of the boys was skating on one of those cold days before Christmas.

He entered a little house near by to warm himself. As he warmed his feet, he saw the children were bare-footed, and they had no picture books. His pathetic appeal to his mother brought a way for him to remember these children at the gift service. A class of boys thought of two old ladies in the nineties, cared for by a daughter, formerly a valued teacher of the school, but now a "shut-in" with the aged aunt and mother. The boys arranged a Christmas tree for these, and their preparation of it was a veritable fountain of joy to them.

A class of young ladies in the Sunday-school turned their thought to one of their number who had been invalidated for several years. The primary class, among other things, determined to remember the little baby boy of their former teacher, who had introduced the Cradle Roll. They sent a remembrance, and arranged to place the name of the little new comer on the roll. The father of five children had died recently. The mother found it hard to provide for her little ones by washing, to which her hands were unaccustomed. Comfortable winter garments had not yet been provided for them. Here was another opportunity. The former sexton, a veteran, was growing aged and feeble; he must be cheered. A member of the Bible class had been absent for three months of illness. He was an honored deacon, but was much depressed. The class would send him a suitable book. There were children whom the "cold snap" had cut off from school, their garments were thin and their boots worn. These were being looked after. Teachers thought of their scholars, and scholars of their teachers. In fact, all were surprised that they had so many opportunities.

But the congregation would be present at the service. Where could they have a part? Rally Day had, with other good things, brought the school a new class,—fourteen young men,—but there was no suitable room for them. We needed a parlor for this and other purposes. Here was an opportunity for the congregation. Fifty dollars would be required for this and the choir needs. Accordingly a circular was prepared and sent to every family in the congregation. It was an announcement, and an invitation to come with a gift.

Sunday arrived, and the gifts began to arrive also. At the hour of service a table in a conspicuous place was overflowing with parcels. Before the bell began to ring people began to come. An eager congregation filled the church. It was a happy congregation too. Those gifts and those givers in that program could not disappoint any Xmas congregation. And when the pastor asked for the offering he pointed to the gifts of the school, and the congregation were ready for their part. They could do nothing else but give, and they gave heartily.

We scarcely need to detail results. Some—perhaps the largest—cannot be tabulated, but some can. We were able to fill forty-five different blanks on the Times lists, one hundred and fifty articles in all, contributed by a school of one hundred and eighteen enrollment. The collection amounted to $25. The next Sunday the superintendent saw returned to the school six children comfortably clad and happy; gift-service clothing had

Also a valuable book on nearly every disease of the human body, telling how to cure yourself of chronic ailments at home.

Men and women who are continually ailing and know not what is the matter with them, as well as those who do know what disease they have but can't find a permanent cure, are advised to write at once to Dr. J. Newton Hathaway, 16 Inman Building, 22 1-2 S. Broad St., Atlanta, Ga., who is in possession of a most wonderful home method that quickly cures any chronic disease forever. He sends you the treatment and you can cure yourself at home.

The doctor wants to get into immediate correspondence with all who suffer from any disease of the heart, liver, lungs, stomach, throat, bladder, blood, dropsy, kidneys, rheumatism, nervous debility, sexual weakness, emaciation of parts, stricture, impotency, weak back, prostrate trouble, and ladies who suffer at the monthly period and have womb, ovarian, uterine or nervous troubles. This great scientist's treatment is marvelously simple, safe and quick, instantly steadying the nervous system, toning the blood, fortifying the heart and creating manly energy and womanly warmth.

Write Dr. Hathaway how you suffer and he will tell you what your disease is and the quickest way to be cured. He has medical books on all of the above diseases which he will gladly send free of charge to any sick person whose name and address he can get. Write him this very day and it will surprise you how easy it is to be cured in your own home when the right means are used.

made this possible. Some clothing remains for others who will come in later; our choir had their wants supplied, and we have a good beginning on our parlor fund.

One gift was followed by the pastor. It was a neat envelope, carefully sealed and addressed. The superintendent had feared for the "sensitive," and this envelope was addressed to the person he had in mind. On a former occasion, offerings taken for the poor had been returned by his sister. How would it be now? When the pastor presented this envelope it was declined. "I am poor, I am in need, but, as long as I can work, I will not take things gathered for the poor!" she said. The pastor explained that an officer of the church, teachers and scholars, the pastor's wife and others, had been remembered, but it was in vain. "Then we must open it, and return to the giver," he said. She agreed, the letter was opened, and it read, "Dear sister, I have long thought I would like to remember you with a gift. I enclose one dollar, which I trust you will accept, wishing you a merry Christmas." As the pastor read the name attached, the victory was won. A hard-working woman was sharing her limited means with her needy sister. "You cannot return that." "No," she said, "I never thought of its coming that way. I thought it was taken from the collection for the poor," and the tears began to flow. The church had long feared to proffer assistance to this needy one. They misunderstood her. Another struggling sister had opened the way. Now we understand: The "sensitive" had not been wounded, and gift service had won the day.

A peculiar happiness pervades our whole congregation. Members of our committees who worked hardest are saying they never were so happy in preparing for a service. Christmas had had a place in our school and church, as well as in our homes and community. The school has scored a rare success, and sympathy with the gift service is universal in our congregation.—Sunday School Times.

"Peanuts! fresh peanuts!"

Ben tried to call out as cheerfully as usual but somehow his voice would falter as he stood there beside the peanut roaster on the street corner and watched the grout of merry boys passing. It was a great disappointment that he would have to stand there all day when he had been expecting that Teddy and he would have such a good time. It didn't matter so much for himself, but Teddy was so little; and then he would try to say something to cheer up the little fellow who sat on a box watching the people passing.

"Give me ten cents worth," Tom Strong said, as he came running across the street from a group of boys. "Why 'Ben' is this you!" he exclaimed, "I didn't know that you sold peanuts."

"I don't only when Uncle Jim's sick," he answered sullenly.

"Ain't you going on the excursion?"

"No." Ben tried to speak naturally but his voice suddenly choked.

"I'm sorry. We expect to have a fine time. There's going to be a band and lots of people; but that little ragamuffin you were talking to?" Ned Allen asked as Tom joined him.

"Why, don't you know him? It's that boy who was in our class at school for the last few weeks," Tom answered. "I pity him, he wanted to go today. Say, Ned, you go on with the others, I am going back a little."

"What's up now, do you want to miss the boat? You do take the queerest streaks."

But Tom was already half way across the street. He paused a moment, his face unusually grave.

"I want to go bad as ever can be," he said half aloud, "but perhaps it's what Miss Milton meant when she told us to try and make some one happy during this vacation, even if we had to deny ourselves some pleasure. Then he was beside the peanut roaster. "Say, Ben," he began. "I'm sorry that you can't go along."

The boy suddenly brushed aside a tear with his ragged sleeve. "Well, it can't be helped now. I don't care so much for myself as for Teddy. He's never been no place, and he's been wantin' to go ever since I told him about it; and every night when he says his prayers, he's said, Dear Lord, let us go on the 'Scursion,' and I've worked to get money enough, but Uncle Jim got sick and I had to give it to him for medicine. Don't think that I didn't want to give it," he said suddenly, "I was glad I had it, for Uncle Jim is awful good to us; but we did want to go today. Folks like us never get nowheres."

"Well, you are going to go now," Tom exclaimed; "I'll sell your peanuts until you get back. I don't care so much, seeing that I have gone so often."

Ben looked at him in surprise.

"I'll have a good time here. You can take my ticket, and I've plenty of money to get one for Teddy." Tom hoped that he did not look disappointed.

"Oh, I couldn't do that," Ben said hesitatingly.

"Of course you can. You want to go, don't you, Teddy?" Tom said. "Won't he enjoy it though?"

"But, Tom—" Ben began.

"Here, don't waste any time talking. You can take my lunch, I guess there's enough for both if you make up with ice cream and such like. You put on my coat, it's warm enough here without. I know how to roast nuts. I used to help old Billy sometimes," and before Ben realized it, he had on Tom's coat and cap, and his lunch box in one hand and holding Teddy with the other, he was hurrying down to the wharf, while Tom stood on the corner and looked after them.

"That's another of your 'queer streaks,' as Ned calls them," he said to himself, "you've never talked a hundred words to that boy before in your life, and you would have such a good time. You've got yourself not a snap, and you will have to stand here all day." Then he suddenly gave his shoulders a shrug.

"Tom Stroug, I'm ashamed of you, being sorry for one minute that you are staying home to let those two boys have a good time, when you have gone dozens of times and can go lots more, and they never get any place, and have to work and wear old clothes and—I am ashamed of you, Tom Stroug—get to work and see how many peanuts you can sell until they come home." Then he went to roasting peanuts with a will, but how warm it was and what fun Ned and the rest would be having. Then—when he thought of Ben and Teddy, he didn't feel near so tired.

It was noon when two dignified looking men suddenly stopped, "Judge, why, ain't that your boy?" the one suddenly exclaimed in an undertone.

"Guess I'll have to claim him," the other replied with a grim smile. "Why, Tom, what does this mean?" he asked in surprise.

Tom looked around half frightened for he stood in awe of his father.

"Why, I didn't go to the excursion. I gave my ticket and lunch to a poor boy and his little brother who had to sell peanuts all day, and never get anywhere, and I'm selling them for them until they get back. I really didn't want to go so bad when I found that Ben wanted to go so badly and take Teddy," he said earnestly.

Judge Strong smiled.

"I don't believe that this is the boy who was so anxious to get off he could scarcely eat his breakfast this morning. You must come with me and have luncheon."

Tom hesitated a moment.

"I can't leave here, and, besides, Ben left his lunch and he'd think it wasn't good enough if I wouldn't eat any of it."

"Have it your own way, my boy. Here, Drummond, I know you like peanuts; we ought to patronize the boy a little."

Tom almost regretted that he had not gone with his father, when he opened the little package of lunch that Ben had left—dry bread and a few cold potatoes—but he tried to eat it bravely.

"I'll know how it is to be poor," he thought.

That afternoon business became quite brisk, and when Ben and Teddy came back, all happy and excited over the day's pleasure, Tom was entirely sold out and waiting for them.

"Well, my boy, are you tired?" Judge Strong asked, butting his hand on Tom's curly head as he lay on the sofa in the library, that evening.

Tom looked up with a bright smile.

"A little—but what a good time Ben and Teddy must have had."

"Do you think so?" and Judge Strong pushed the hair from Tom's face and stooped and kissed him, and Tom felt that he was repaid.—N. Y. Observer.

Dear Standard:

Today I will write to you to let you know how we appreciated our Thanksgiving dinner and all the nice things you put in your paper about our Home.

We had two days holiday Thanksgiving. We had an entertainment here Wednesday night. Thursday and Friday nights we had a play in our dining room. We are so thankful for the turkeys and the cakes we got Thanksgiving. Here is a program of our entertainment we had for Thanksgiving.

Now I will tell you about the girls and boys in the grade I am in. There are fifteen children in my grade besides myself. We do not have furnace head running into our school room, but we have a nice fire-place.

Our post office has been moved and they are going to tear down the old one.

I will end my letter by giving my thanks to all who gave something for our Thanksgiving dinner. And hoping you had as good a time as I did Thanksgiving. I am Your sincere friend,

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl thirteen year old. I thought I would write to you as I had not seen any letters from our neighborhood. I go to Sunday school at McLean's chapel every Sunday. Miss Lida Love is my Sunday school teacher. We all love her very much. Our pastor is Mr. V. Y. Smith. Brother Tom, my little cousin, and myself, three years ago recited the Westminster Shorter Catechism and received our diploma certificate and Bible. I am going to school; Miss Roberta Ray is my teacher. I will close.

Your friend,
Hazel Piner.

A Twilight Story.

Translated from Danish by A. M. Diaz.

You must have heard that in the long, long ago there were little underground people called Trolls, not much taller than a pipe-stem, who lived in hills, and who came out at night all dressed in green, to frolic by moonlight. It is said that they are vanished and gone now, still it is well to speak softly of them, for if any are left alive, dusk is the likeliest time for them to be about and listening.

Long ago the king of the Trolls had an only son whom he loved with all his heart. This little Troll prince, having had always everything he cried for, began at last to cry for a mortal child to play with. So one night when the moon was at the full, the king sent out his chief musicians with their fiddles to sit upon the hillside and play fine tunes, hoping some mortal child might listen and be made to dance to this music. For whoever danced to the music of the Trolls was obliged to dance after them wherever they might lead.

The prince hid among the ferns to watch while the music played. And it happened that a little maiden passed that way, a very tiny maiden, who was so lovely that the musicians nearly stopped playing to gaze upon her. Hearing the music, she smiled joyfully and moved her little feet in time to it, swinging her gypsy hat. Just at that moment the cock crew and the musicians vanished instantly, according to the orders of the king. The little prince, however, could not leave the little maiden so. Oh, no, he remained; and presently, stepping out from among the ferns, he said: "Good morning, pretty maiden. I am a Troll prince. How sweetly you smile. What is your name? Where do you stay?"

"Good morning, Troll prince," she answered. "What a pretty green snit you have! My name is Katy. I stay at the mill."

"Will you play with me?" asked the Troll prince.

A Prominent Minister.

How he was Rescued Twenty-one Years ago the Horrors of Catarrh.

Rev. J. Cal. Littrell, of Warrensburg, Mo., writes as follows: "I was a sufferer from nasal catarrh for twelve years, and it developed into the worst form, impairing my hearing. My nervous system gave way, unfitting me for the duties of life.

"By the use of Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure I was permanently cured in the year 1881, making twenty-one years in which I have not had a return of the disease, nor have I felt the effects of it

"I most heartily recommend Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure to all sufferers, as one that cannot be excelled."

SAMPLES MAILED FREE.

If you are a sufferer from Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma or Catarrhal Deafness, write to Dr. Blosser Company, 355 Walton Street, Atlanta, Ga., for a free sample of the remedy that cured Mr. Littrell, and has cured thousands of others.

If you wish a box containing a month's treatment, send $1.00, and it will be forwarded, postage paid.

$25 in Gold

"With all my heart," said she.

But just as they were joining hands to skip along the wood path together, they heard a strange laugh. Not "Ha! ha! ha!" nor "He! he! he!" but "Haw! haw! haw!" deep and grum.

It was the laugh of an ogre.

The prince and the little maiden were frightened and tried to hide themselves among the ferns. But the ogre very soon discovered them and reached out his long arms to clutch the pretty child. The prince, however, being the son of a king, was brave and bold. He stepped gallantly forward, holding a dandelion by its long stem to protect her, which so amused the ogre that he laughed again, "Haw! haw! haw!" deep and grum.

"Come with me!" he said, and he placed them in his dinner-basket very tenderly. For having been born on a Sunday, he was quite soft-hearted, and commonly went by the name of the Gentle Ogre. He was so delighted by the charming little maiden that by the time he arrived at his den he had determined to adopt her as his daughter. The spry little Troll, he thought, would do very well for a servant. Stopping at the entrance, he called out to his wife: "Wife, I have here a beautiful child."

"Tender, I hope," said the Ogress.

"Very well. I will hang the pot over the fire."

The Ogress was very ugly to look at, and was bent nearly double from stooping to gather herbs for making her witch-powders.

"Oh no! no! none of that," said the Ogre. "I am going to adopt her. She speaks softly, smiles sweetly, and even stroked my beard. This is pleasant."

"Bah!" cried his wife, who being a witch, was born on Friday and had an ugly temper. "Bah! and what bunch of bones is this?"

"That is the prince of the Trolls. He can polish stones and hunt for jewels under ground."

"Bah!" cried the witch, "and what can the girl do? She must work!"

"Why must she work?" asked the Ogre.

"Because she shall. That's why."

"What can she do?"

"Scour the trenchers, mind the geese, card the wool, feed the cosset lamb, fetch the water, milk the goat and dip the rushes in candle-grease. It will be for her good."

"Ah, well!" sighed the Gentle Ogre "no doubt it will be for her good." For his wife, being a witch, could easily persuade him.

Now every morning the Ogre took his club and dinner-basket and walked off to attend to his affairs and the old witch also went off to gather bitter herbs, leaving the children heavy tasks to perform.

The Troll had a heap of stones piled before him to polish diamond-bright. If the witch was not satisfied with the number he had polished or their brightness, she made his bed of prickles. And upon the little maiden she laid tasks hard to be borne, hoping to make her cross and fretful, that she might have an excuse to punish her. But the child took the bad treatment without complaint and was so good that the old witch hated her more and more every day. But as for the Gentle Ogre, he liked her better than ever. Every night upon arriving home he would say to the Troll, "Well, you fellow in green, where is my Katy? Has she done her task today? Has she scoured the trenchers, minded the geese, and carded the wool? Has she fed the cosset lamb, fetched the water, milked the goat, and dipped the rushes in candle-grease?"

And the Troll would lift his cap and say, "Yes, your Highness." Then Katy would run from the goat shed and the Ogre would take her in his hand and smile a very big smile upon her. But the old witch would shake her fist at the little maid behind the Ogre's back, and would have bewitched her if she could have.

One night she sat up in bed and said to her husband: "My dear, children should be punished. It is good for them. It will be good for our little maiden."

"Time enough when she deserves it!" growled the Ogre, turning over. After that the witch lay awake and planned a secret plan. The next afternoon she said to the Troll prince: "My fine fellow, do you like plum dumpling?"

"Yes, indeed!" he cried, his mouth fairly watering.

"I thought as much," said she. "Now, when my husband comes home, if you will answer his questions the way I am going to tell you, you shall have a whole plum dumpling." And, taking him aside, she whispered the answers.

"No," cried the Troll, "never! I will not wrong my Katy so!"

The old witch said no more, but very soon set the dumpling a boiling.

The hungry little Troll smelled the dumpling boiling afar off. It was delicious. "It is only for once," he said to himself, "and the Ogre loves her so that he won't allow her to be punished."

When the Ogre returned home, he asked his usual questions: "Where is my Katy? Has she done her task? Has she scoured the trenchers, minded the geese, and carded the wool? Has she fed the cosset lamb? Has she fetched the water and milked the goat and dipped the rushes in candle-grease?"

Then the Troll hung his head and gave the answers that were to get him the plum dumpling.

"She must be punished," cried the Ogress. "She deserves it, and you said when she deserved it she should get it."

"Ah, well!" sighed the Ogre, "but I have not the heart to do it."

"Bah!" cried his wife, "I have, and will."

She went immediately out to the goat shed and punished the little maiden cruelly and shut her up in a cave.

The little Troll was in despair. Ah, what had he done? He ran far away from the spot and throwing himself on the ground wept bitterly. After a while he cried himself to sleep. When he awoke, the moon was shining, and he looked up, to see his father standing over him. Very sad and solemn music was filling the air.

"My son," said the Troll king, "the music is a dirge over your lost truth."

"Oh, father!" cried the prince, "my Katy has been beaten cruelly, and it is my fault."

"Alas!" said his father, "a few more days and the whole race of Elves and Trolls and Fairies would have joined to set you free. Your sufferings were permitted for a time, because we wished to try you. You may not now ever succeed me and be king of the Trolls. Though a merry race, we are true, and my people would never consent to be governed by one who has sold his honor for a plum dumpling. Your little Katy is not suffering now; but you will never see her again. The Elf mother has charmed her away into fairyland."

At this the Troll prince sprang to his feet and ran quickly to the cave. It was empty and the Gentle Ogre was weeping at the entrance. His wife sought to comfort him, saying:

"Don't regret! don't regret! We are well rid of her. She was lazy. She never did her tasks."

The little Troll burst out in a fury. "The old witch lied! I say Katy did! she did! she did!" The Ogress turned black with rage and seized the poor Troll before the words were out of his mouth, throwing a witch-powder over him, and after repeating the words of a charm backwards, cried out: "Become a mean grasshopper and live in the dirt!" Now, in her haste and wrath she had left one word out of the charm, so that the Troll prince did not turn into a grasshopper, but a pretty little green creature; and instead of hopping in the dirt, he flew into a tree. Every night when the Ogre came home the bewitched little Troll prince would ceaselessly cry, "Katy did! Katy did!" until at last people called him by that name. After long days—which were a long years to him—he wooed a little green grasshopper for a bride, and they became in time the parents of a numerous family. The Katydids of the present time still relate to their children the story of the Troll, their ancestor, who sold his honor for a dumpling; and that is why on summer nights we hear them still crying from the trees, "Katy did! she did! she did!"—From Our Young Folks, 1872.

A Voyage at Night.

The hands of the sitting room clock were moving rapidly towards half-past seven. Carl watched them from out of the corner of his eye. Sometimes he glanced cautiously at mother. She seemed to see nothing except the little coat she was sewing, but Carl knew from long experience that she never failed to notice the minute hand touch the half-after. He kept on playing with his soldiers, but he played very quietly.

The hand moved nearer, nearer; it touched. Mother laid down her sewing, and went to the closet for Carl's night-gown.

"O, mother! it is as cold as Greenland up there," he complained. "Must I go now?"

"It is Greenland," responded mother in a matter of fact tone.

"What?" demanded Carl, dropping his soldiers in astonishment.

"Captain Peary and his crew are just staring on a voyage there," she continued.

Carl knew all about Captain Peary, how he sailed away for the frozen north, and stayed there years, searching for the north pole, which wasn't a pole at all, but just a place that no one had been able to reach because of the snow and ice,—the northernmost place in the world.

"I choose to be Capain Peary," he said "and you're the crew. Now let's get ready."

Captain Peary came over to the fireplace and sat on the crew's knee, while she got him out of his everyday clothes and into his arctic suit.

"Hadn't I better take some provisions for the voyage?" he inquired.

The crew said that was a wise thought, and got him an oyster cracker out of the pantry. Then Captain Peary was wrapped up in a large grey shawl that trailed behind, and holding the crew's hand, started out for New York Harbor.

First they sailed up the Atlantic—which stupid people called the front hall—till they came to Climbup Mountain.

Captain Peary's legs were short and the shawl was bothersome, but he puffed up to the landing. There the crew said, "If I may be so bold, sir, I'll carry you; I've often carried young men up this mountain." And Captain Peary accepted this kind offer.

After the mountain climb came a dash across the plain to the big iceberg for which they were aiming. Captain Peary scaled this, and slid right into the middle of it.

The crew saluted respectfully. "I'll be ready to go back to New York with you at seven tomorrow morning, sir," said the crew.

Captain Peary cuddled warmly in the middle of the iceberg, and clasping the oyster cracker in one moist little hand, giggled comfortably.—Mary Allen Hopkins, in Youth's Companion.

Another monkey has been admitted to the highest social circles. Mrs. Bull, the wife of a distinguished oculist in Paris, gave a reception to "Consul," a pet chimpanzee. The monkey appeared before the company in the regulation evening dress. His manners left nothing to be desired. He ate ice cream and flirted with the women like a "vieux marcheur." In fact he did everything but sing. Mrs. Bull has demonstrated that a monkey, with a little training, will make a first-class dude.—Exchange.

Christmas Presents.

Fountain Pens.

What is better for a present than "Parker's Lucky Curve" Fountain Pen? This pen is kept in order 13 months and sold at prices to suit all, from 1.00 to 10.00 each, and sold by us only, as we have the sole agency for Wilmington.

In thinking over your list of presents you may want things for every member of the family, and some times the minister and some times the school teacher. We have estimated your wants and purchased our line of Christmas goods accordingly. In toys we have bought largely for the wholesale as well as the retail trade. Our dolls we import direct. They are made in Germany and we can sell them to you for less than others. We have them in almost every grade, from 5c apiece to 6.00. Our dressed dolls at 50c and 1.00 are better than any we have ever shown, and our 1.00 Bisque doll is the same doll we have been selling at 1.25 each. They are hand-made, with sleeping eyes and natural hair.

Men's Clothing.

In the Clothing Department we are working hard for business. Our stock is complete in every detail. We can fit you up with suits that are nobby, pretty and stylish. To save money on your clothing bill, buy of us, or at least give us a chance to compare prices and goods with other merchants. We have suits at 2.00 that is good goods. For a 5.00 bill you can get strictly all wool Cheviot that is well made and stylishly cut and will give good service. Our 7.50, 10.00 and 12.50 suits are equal to the best and we think are 2.50 less than others ask for the same suit.

Men's Overcoats.

We are showing several different lines and prices. A good, long coat, warm and nice, at 2.98. A heavy coat at 4.50. A better coat at 5.00. An extra good coat at 6.50 and a beauty for 10.00.

Ladies' Cloaks.

These we have in all styles and prices. Some of them are beauties. In cut and style we have them in Military Tight-fitting and loose. We have a variety of colors and in prices to suit all. Our Military Cloaks are especially attractive and are made up in Zibelines and Broadcloths, and range in prices from 6.50 to 9.80 and up to 15.00.

Ladies' Tailored Suits

This is a new venture, but we expect to win, for we can show Ladies' Suits in Zibelines, Broadcloths and Novelty Goods for prices lower than others sell them. They are beautifully made and a splendid fit. We have them for 9.98, 12.50 and 15.00. These, too, we can show in Military Style, the new fad.

Skirts are on our tables in large numbers, and a good selection, from 1.00 to 7.50. They are much cheaper than to buy the goods and the making, and have a style that only tailors can give.

We also have handsome Waists in Silk, Worsteds and Mercerized goods. There are Sweaters, too, for ladies and girls, men and boy's.

Remember our Christmas goods. We have sold toys for the last fifteen years and expect to sell more this year than ever before, for our stock is complete in every department.

Remember, we are headquarters for Christmas Goods.

CHRISTMAS MCMIII.

And there was in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping a watch over their flock by night.

And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them, and they were sore afraid.

And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.

For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.

And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men.

* * * * *
Behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem,

Saying, Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east and are come to worship him.

* * * * *
When they saw the star they rejoiced with exceeding great joy.

And when they were come into the house, they saw the young Child with Mary his mother, and fell down, and worshipped him; and when they had opened their treasures they presented unto him gifts, gold and frankincense and myrrh.

The parable of the sower.

AND <sup>rv</sup> he began again to teach by the seaside; and there <sup>rv</sup> was gathered unto him a <sup>rv</sup> great multitude, so that he entered into a <sup>rv</sup> ship, and sat in the sea; and <sup>rv</sup> the whole multitude was by the sea on the land.

2 And he taught them many things <sup>rv</sup> by parables, and said unto them in his <sup>rv</sup> doctrine,

3 Hearken; Behold, <sup>rv</sup> there went out a sower to sow:

4 And it came to pass, as he sowed, some <sup>rv</sup> fell by the way side, and the <sup>rv</sup> fowls <sup>rv</sup> of the air came and devoured it <sup>rv</sup> up.

5 And <sup>rv</sup> some fell on stony ground, where it had not much earth; and <sup>rv</sup> im-

13 And he <sup>rv</sup> said unto them, Know ye not this parable? and how <sup>rv</sup> then <sup>rv</sup> will ye know all parables?

14 ¶ The sower soweth the word.

15 And these are they by the way side, where the word is sown; <sup>rv</sup> but when they have heard, <sup>rv</sup> Sa'tan cometh immediately, and taketh away the word <sup>rv</sup> that was sown in their hearts.

16 And these <sup>rv</sup> are they likewise which are sown on stony ground; who, when they have heard the word, <sup>rv</sup> immediately receive it with <sup>rv</sup> gladness;

17 And <sup>rv</sup> have no root in themselves, <sup>rv</sup> and so endure but for a time: afterward, when affliction or persecution ariseth for the word's sake, immediately they are offended.

Event and Comment.

THE STANDARD will follow its usual custom and omit the number following this. We feel under obligation to give our faithful employees a holiday, and it is more than difficult to duplicate our force, especially at the Christmas season. So this number will have to serve until the New Year. * * * * *

Happy Christmas to all. God bless us every one. God bless everybody.

There is a new form of insurance in England where they insure everything, from the King's health to the weather. The barkeeper is now so much afraid that his license will be taken from him by law under the increasing pressure of public opinion, that when he pays for a license he pays a premium to the insurance company to reimburse him if his license is taken away. American agencies of these English companies would be popular now in North Carolina.

The Congregationalist asserts that it has been a long time since the majority of Congregational ministers have been trained in the Congregational schools, and mentions the fact that of six ministers recently called, three had their training in Presbyterian seminaries and one in a Methodist. Is it that the other seminaries are better, or that the more people know about Congregationalism the less they are inclined to preach in its pulpits?

It is right hard on our esteemed contemporary, the Presbyterian, of Philadelphia, following its disastrous defeat on the Revision question, for the Religious Education question to go and plan a big meeting right in the heart of its Philadelphia constituency. But Philadelphia will wake up some time. After all it was not much of a feat for Charlotte to get a year or more ahead of Philadelphia in its Declaration of Independence.

It is a sad fact that one of the greatest obstacles to missionary success are the people who go from Christian to heathen lands and there give themselves up to every form of license. The Presbyterian minister at Kobe, Japan, calls attention to this fact and begs newcomers to Japan to raise rather than lower the standard of morality as observed in America. And another strange thing is that these are the people who come home and abuse the missionaries for their failure to convert the heathen.

Over against England with its public schools all controlled by the Church and the United States with its public school and its denominational school, each on its proper basis, France has taken recently the radical step of saying that all the denominational schools shall stop and only the public schools exist. Of course this step was taken on account of the fact that the Catholic schools were hot-beds of Monarchism and revolution generally, Rome being a steadfast foe of Republican government. But the action is a radical one, and if those were Protestant schools there would be a protest from the people that would be heard around the world.

We have come to the conclusion that just about the funniest reading in comic literature is the output of the Northern religious press when it tries to say complimentary things about the South and succeeds only in displaying its ignorance. The Congregationalist, since the termination of the Bassett incident, congratulates Editor Bailey and Presidents Kilgo, Dabney and Alderman, that they can now breathe a little ozone. And on reading the peremptory notice served anonymously upon a United States Marshal in Louisiana, it shakes its head and says: "Not so think and act such progressive Southerners as Professors Mims and Bassett of Trinity College, North Carolina. May their tribe increase!"

We think that some protest ought to be made against the selection of Edward Everett Hale as Chaplain of the United States Senate. Dr. Hale is a Unitarian, and therefore represents an insignificant number of the nominal adherents of the Christian religion. A Jewish Rabbi or even a Mormon Apostle would represent more people. And if the selection of either of these would be an affront to the great majority of the people of the United States, the Senate should know that a sect that denies the divinity of Jesus Christ is also obnoxious to Christian people. Personally, we are told, Dr. Hale is a very lovable man, and he is, of course, one of the distinguished literateurs of this country. But he has been as bitter a denouncer of the hypocrisy of the Christian Churches and their intellectual honesty as one could well find.

The Synod of Alabama has overtured the General Assembly to appoint a committee on co-operation and union, such as has been already appointed in the Northern Presbyterian, the Cumberland Presbyterian and the German and Dutch Reformed Churches. It would be a good thing to have such a committee appointed with reference to the general cause of getting together. The invitation from the Cumberland Church's last Assembly was not a reassuring one. But we can do it now on our own motion. And that committee might get an answer from the Northern Committee, which The Standard has been trying in vain to get for the last six years from its Northern contemporaries, why that Church persists in keeping in its records those unchristian and ungentlemanly slanders of the Southern Church and the Southern Presbyterian people.

The Archbishop of Canterbury and Dr. Horton of the Congregational Union have had a little correspondence recently that has drawn the line clearly in the Educational Movement in England. Dr. Horton laid down two propositions, that the schools supported by public money should be under public control, and that the teachers in such schools should be appointed without regard to denominational distinctions. The archbishop replied that the Church must control the schools and appoint the teachers. The American answer to that would be, "Then let the Church pay for the teachers and the schools." It seems difficult to conceive that such fair propositions as those of Dr. Horton should be declined, especially since the Church, that is, the Established Church, claims but half of the population now. A revolution on this subject is due in England.

Impressions of the Baptist Convention. The best thing about Baptists, individually or collectively, is that they improve on acquaintance. They are such an independent folk that the first side they present is the rough side. One feels little offish with a brother minister who, theoretically, does not consider you even a member of the church and excludes you from the Lord's table with the frank statement that you have not been baptized, whatever you may think about that yourself. You think, but he knows, and there is the end of it. But practically, not theoretically, we are sure it has been the experience of Presbyterian pastors generally that there are no people who are more willing to "tote fair" when it comes to union effort, than our Baptist brethren. They do not practice their exclusive doctrines any more than our Methodist brethren generally practice falling from grace. And the more you know of them the better you like them until you are ready, if you be the right sort of Presbyterian yourself, to claim close kin. It would be a shame upon our common Calvinism were it otherwise. People that think as much of the Shorter Catechism as the Baptists do can not go far wrong.

The first impression of the Convention is its huge size. And this also is representative of the size of the denomination. The basis of representation strikes one as strange, for an ecclesiastical democracy. It is a financial basis. A church contributing so much is entitled to so many "messengers." But it seems to work pretty well in practice. The messengers do not all come, but then the Presbyterian Synod is not apt to have an elder delegate from a church that does not give anything to the cause of the gospel.

And the fact that the Convention represents 175,000 Baptists ought to be a humiliating thought for Presbyterians to consider. There is nothing that we can claim that can atone for the comparative fewness of our numbers in North Carolina. At one time the Presbyterian Church might almost have had its own way had it done its duty as well in the evangelistic as in the educational field. With the Piedmont section and the Cape Fear section both predominantly Presbyterian, with a nucleus for future growth in the eastern towns, with Methodism almost unknown and the Baptists but a few, we might have had the 175,000 instead of the 35,000 had we chosen to preach the gospel to the poor. For a hundred years Presbyterianism suffered the curse of not adapting itself to the conditions of the new country and modeling itself after the settled conditions of Scotland. While the effective force of the Baptists in North Carolina may be comparatively smaller than ours, yet we cannot say that the ineffectives have not been won for the Kingdom. More than this, while we fall back upon our averages in contributions to show our greater zeal in giving, there is another side even to that as we have before reminded our readers. Perhaps our average is too high, in that while those who give ought not to give less we ought to have a multitude more of those who can not give as much. Another generation may tell another tale with the cultivation of our evangelistic work. But there ought to be more than thirty-five thousand of us, for all our glorious history and our prominence in education and in government and our boasted influence today in the life of the State. Lincoln said that the Lord must love the common people because he made so many of them. On that count He must not love the Presbyterians of North Carolina very much.

We felt very much at home in the Convention, from the first. The Moderator is called a President and the Convention found a good moderator and have kept on electing him for thirteen years. We heard it intimated that there had formerly been a sort of steering committee that put forward the speakers with something to say and kept the cranks in the background. But at this meeting it was determined to let the cranks have their say if it broke up the convention and several of them eased their minds and went their ways rejoicing that there was still freedom of speech in a Baptist Convention. Our Synod has its "popular meetings" in which set speakers are heard and the members on the floor do not interrupt until these get through. But in the Convention it was difficult to secure the carrying out of the programme as smoothly sometimes. Nor was the Convention free from the man who bores with no ordinary sized auger, and whose opportunities for boring seemed to be endless. We have had his mate upon occasion ourselves.

In the great enterprises of the Church the Convention and the Synod seemed to be doing about the same kind of work. Their superintendent of Home Missions, as we would call him, made an excellent report and the contributions for State Missions are getting up to the amount that we contribute for home missions in North Carolina. Foreign Missions is another cause that is advancing. The address of Dr. Willingham, the foreign mission Secretary, so to speak, was on a high plane. And Bryan of China, one of the returned missionaries who is soon going back "home," was a general favorite with the convention. In the Publication work, they have just put up a sixty thousand dollar building in Nashville, and we would judge are doing about the same amount of work as our Publication Committee. But when it came to Sunday school work there was an intelligent connection between the work and the Convention that our Synod and our Assembly have never had as yet, though the appointment of the Sunday School Secretary was a long step in the right direction. And when the editor of the Standard was asked if he did not think that the Baptists of North Carolina were doing more Sunday school work than all the other denominations combined, we were constrained to reply in the affirmative. We believe that possibly a larger proportion of Sunday schools to the churches are conducted by the Presbyterians. But then what are thirty-five thousand people among so many?

And we could not help thinking that one reason for this most prosperous year in the history of the denomination in this State is the fact that its religious papers, notably the Biblical Recorder, the organ of the Convention, has increased its circulation so largely during the past year or more. Every reader of a religious paper becomes a more intelligent contributor to all the causes of the Church, and every home into which that paper is put becomes a new power in the Kingdom. We have sometimes thought that our own people in North Carolina did not appreciate this fact, the importance of the denominational organ to the Church, as might be done. And while we are on this subject we should like to make this point, that if the recent Orphans' Number had gone into a thousand more homes in North Carolina, for that cause alone more than a thousand dollars additional would doubtless have been received from the Synod. Verbum sat sap.

The farewell exercises were most touching. Dr. Huffham, whom everybody in North Carolina ought to know, preached a great sermon, "Ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away." It was just the message for the humblest home missionary "out in the woods" to carry home with him. In the speeches that followed the resolution of thanks, two of the brethren mentioned the fact that Baptist beginnings in Charlotte and in Salisbury were through the courtesy of Presbyterians, in lending a place of worship. One of them told a good story on Salisbury, that he had denied the proposition that a Baptist church could not be built in that city by quoting the text, "Ye therefore do greatly err, not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God." During the singing of the last hymn, "Blest be the tie that binds," there was an informal shaking of hands all over the house, on the platform and below. And then with the benediction, the Convention passed into history, and we could not help but feel for how many of "same things" the Baptists and the Presbyterians stand.

P. S.—Dr. Huffham is one Baptist that does not improve on acquaintance. One falls in love with him at first sight.

Peace on Earth, Good-Will to Men, was the way the Old Version made the Angels sing at the Nativity. It is a beautiful sentiment. But truth is better than sentiment, and the truth here is that the message of peace is and has been and will be to men of good-will.

The glory of the Christmas season is that it cultivates good-will among men. It is the time for the forgetting of differences and the mending of breaches and the healing of old sores. It is the time of forgiveness and the renewal of friendships and the forming again of the ties that have been sundered. The very air breathes good-will, the shouts and laughter of the children bring the reminiscent smile and the thoughts of childhood's days and the memory of friends and loved ones of youth, and the sight of the old homestead. Who can have ill-will at such a time?

Yet there are such. There are those to whom the day means nothing except selfish and often the lowest animal pleasure. The amount of drunkenness on Christmas Day and during Christmas week is a blot upon Christian civilization. That anybody should so degrade the day! For it is not only the day of the Christ, but of the Christ-child. All the sweet influences of childhood blend here with the influences of our holy religion. It is the time when God came down to earth and was made in the likeness of helpless infancy. He that is so hardened as not to be moved by the spirit of Christmas is hard indeed.

Good-will then be among men this day and peace to men of good-will.

We quoted two weeks ago from the statement of Rev. W. McF. Alexander, D. D., about the removal of the S. W. P. U. to Atlanta:

"One of the most deplorable things about the agitation is the charge brought by friends of the Atlanta movement that the Professors are disloyal to the Institution. If this be true, no wonder that pupils decrease. No institution can stand unless the faculty are loyal. Witness the scene on the floor of the Synod at Memphis when such a charge was brought!"

We learn from a private letter from Dr. Alexander that he is aggrieved at the tone of our remarks about that paragraph. On reading them over we see that we seemed to charge intentional dishonesty. We most gladly withdraw that charge. A man may say in the heat of debate what in his soberer moments he is bound to know is beside the mark. So may an editor write.

But we still think that Dr. Alexander knows that it is unfair to call the alleged attitude of the S. W. P. U. faculty, or nearly all of them, with regard to the removal of the institution, disloyalty. The charge that the friends of the Atlanta movement made was, that all the professors with the exception of Dr. Price are in favor of the removal of the University. We have seen that stated, have never seen it denied. Dr. Alexander characterizes this as disloyalty. We think it the highest kind of loyalty to the real interests of the institution, and deplore the tendency to pillory the professors for what they think about this subject. Further, we repeat, that as a director of the institution, and not as a debater on the floor of Synod, Dr. Alexander is bound to know that this alleged disloyalty of the faculty could have had nothing to do with the decrease of the students that had been going on for some time before the removal plan was broached. Is it not so?

Fairbrothers' Everything makes a scurilous attack upon Rev. Martin Hardin of this city for his sermon to the Elks, published in last week's Standard. He accuses Mr. Hardin of ignorance in basing his statements upon what one woman told him. Mr. Hardin could have quoted from twenty witnesses in Charlotte. And then this unfair brother bases his whole mass of billingsgate upon one or two extracts not literally quoted from the sermon, which he had not read. On looking over this last number, however, we find that the attack on Mr. Hardin should really be considered a decoration. The number contains attacks upon prohibitionists and dispensaryites, impartially; a defence of the Rev. J. Cleveland Hall of Danville, noted as the anti-prohibitionist of that city and noted before as the man who left the Presbyterian Church because it required something more than a little elocution to preach; an attack on Dr. Strange for his sermon against gambling; a defence of the drunken criminal; a defence of Senator Smoot; the endorsement of the Nebraska Supreme Court for ousting the Bible from the Public Schools and so on and so on. The Elks may well pray to be spared such a defender. And the North Carolina State Liquor Dealers' Association might well afford to see to it that Fairbrothers' Everything does not die.

We wish we could impress upon The Presbyterian Opportunity that conference committee, soon to meet in Atlanta, the greatness of the opportunity that is given them for advancing the cause of Presbyterianism for all the generations to come in our beloved South. A great city, destined to be greater still, stands in the attitude of welcoming a denominational institution, a Presbyterian University. Presbyterians have earned the reputation with educated people of being able to conduct such an institution along other than partisan religious lines. They do not exalt the non-essentials. While our denomination was weak in Georgia, a Presbyterian was made head of the State University as a compromise between the conflicting claims of the Methodist and Baptist Churches.

The editor of the Atlanta Journal told us, in a recent conversation we had with him, about the enthusiasm with which the subscription to the University was filled up by all classes of people, of all faiths and of none. Of course we know that such an institution could be only for the benefit of the city. But it is refreshing to know that others think so, too. And a subscription of a quarter of a million dollars is not to be despised. In Columbia and in Clarksville are two Presbyterian institutions, of which it might be truly said that as far as human eye can see, their chief glory is in the past. The endowments of them both united and coupled with the Atlanta offer would make a million dollar university for the Southern Presbyterian Church, fortunately situated, and with the most ample promise for the future as to means and patronage. If that conference committee can only rise above local considerations and look to the good of the whole Church, it will be a blessed day that saw them meet.

Our Christmas Anniversary.

Another Christmas anniversary approaches. In a few days the joyous and memorable season will be entered upon with relish and delight by old and young. Tokens of affection and interest will be exchanged. Homes will be the scenes of rejoicing. Heart and purse will be open to the calls of love, friendship, fellowship and helpfulness. The poor will be remembered by the kindly disposed, and Christendom will be fragrant with the memories of the best of all God's gifts to man. The angel's song, "Peace on earth and good will to man," will find an echoing chant from myriads. Pious and grateful sentiment will receive a varied and prolonged expression around Christian altars and in church gatherings. Millions will cease from daily work and spend the day in festivity.

Christmas loses its meaning apart from its religious significance. It requires the nativity and what it stands for to bring out its living beauty and sublime glory. A Saviour-King born is its true interpretation and its perpetuating power. God in human form lights it up with a celestial radiance and benediction. The introduction of Christ into human interests and relationships started a new era of uplift and welfare to humanity. He brought into the world a transforming, elevating and redeeming force. He started an influence as undying as it is beneficent. He has become light to the blind, rest to the weary, solace to the afflicted, Redeemer to the sinful, hope to the despairing, inspirer to the worker, quickener to the dead, and Lord over all to his Church.

We cannot be too grateful for this greatest of all gifts, nor do too much to testify our appreciation of his person, character and work. As Christian we know him in relation and experiences that the world does not, and cannot. We have come into a personal fellowship and consecration that open up to us the richest of joys, the most blessed of hopes, and the most stirring and impelling of motives. It becomes us to put into our Christmas observance a peculiarly sacred and devoted remembrance; to turn it to practical account by helping the needy as well as gladdening friends and family; to resolve to make our lives more Christ-like, and to do more to extend the kingdom of him who gave himself for us and for all who will accept his Gospel offer from time to time with the advancing ages. Read in the light of his advent, life to the recipients of his spiritual and saving benefits assumes a tremendous import and means an enlarged personal interest in, and consecration to, human welfare, the advancement of his cause and the glory of God. Thus considered and utilized, we get out of the greatest, noblest and most unique of birthday anniversaries the most quickening of sacred memories and the greatest of possible benefits to the piously inclined. Christians look upon it with a different eye and a holier regard than those who view it as merely a gala day.—The Presbyterian.

The Little Children.

Christmas is pre-eminently the season of childhood. He must have a heart of stone who can pass through the streets of our towns and cities and not be stirred to the very depths of his heart by the sights that greet him everywhere. There is a holiday feeling in the very air, and a joyous buoyancy and eager expectation are everywhere. And everywhere also are the eager faces of the children. Their restless expectations are excited and their eager voices lifted in glad wonder as their childish imaginations play around the generous wealth of the season of giving.

Who has not wished at this season to be a child again? Who that has grown to manhood? or womanhood has not longed at this season to have children to love and care for? Who that names the name of Jesus, has not longed to gather the little ones round him and tell them once again the story of the child Jesus? Who that has realized, ever so faintly, the heart-longings of the little ones, has not felt the tear start and the lump rise in his throat for sheer love of the little children? If to feel so is weakness, then we plead guilty, and gladly forego the strength that can pass unmoved among the crowd of eager children.

It is a cause of profound gratitude to us that Jesus came as a little child, and that the silence of those thirty years is broken to tell of the child Jesus. How empty would be the pages of the Bible without the stories of the children. We recall how our own childhood was blessed by them, and with what wonder we heard of the manger-cradle, the little ones of Bethlehem so cruelly murdered, and followed with amazement the young child and His mother as Joseph took them into Egypt. These stories haunt our hearts still and awaken sacred longings too deep for tears.

"One of these little ones," said the Lord of the children, and if the season of Christmas means so much to them, what do they not mean to us? Let the mind try to imagine some Piper of Hamelin drawing from our midst by his alluring music the prattle and hasty tramping of the eager children, and life would indeed be emptied of its delights, and gloom, darker than Egyptian night, would settle down upon our hearts and homes. Myriads owe all the tenderness of heart they possess and all the incentives of life by which they are urged upward, to the coming of the children; and many a hardened heart has been softened into penitence and led to the Friend of the children, by the going home of the little ones.

If our debt, in the providence of God, is so great to the children, our responsibility towards them is commensurate. Had we a trumpet voice, we would gather the children around us and tell them "all about Jesus;" of the wondrous night of His birth, of the meaning of His coming, and His dying love for them, of which the bounties of this season are but the lingering memories that cannot die.

As we write these words, there rise before us the myriads of children in our own and other lands that are uncared for and alone. "The little street urchin," in whose heart Christmas awakens longings that are unsatisfied, and his dark-skinned little brother beyond the seas who has no Christmas because no one has ever told him of Jesus. Oh, the crying of the children! It comes from the garret home of poverty and the fetid home of crime. It rises from the huts of the far-off millions whose baby-faces have never rounded into happiness and whose hearts have never broken into the rippling laughter of delight. Would God it were possible to gather all the cries of the children in one great wail, that it might be sound in the dull ears of those who profess to follow Him who laid His hands upon them and blessed them.

"One of these little ones," with every possibility of good within its tiny breast, loved and redeemed by the Saviour, and committed to His servants for their keeping—oh! the pity of it, the shame of it, that "one of these little ones" should go hungry and feel the pinch of cold and rise to manhood or womanhood and never be told of the love of the "Little One" of Bethlehem.

No greater work could the Christians of our land undertake, and no greater delight could enter our cup of joy, than to consecrate our all to the saving of the children, both body and soul, for "of such is the kingdom of heaven."—The Episcopal Recorder.

Book Notices.

Any book mentioned here can be obtained from the Presbyterian Committee of Publication, Richmond, Va.

A BOY AND HIS BIBLE, by the Rev. Dr. A. L. Philips. "Covenanter Leaflet," No. 1, Young People's Department of the Presbyterian Committee of Publication, Richmond, Va., 5 cents. It is a reasonable talk about boys, and what can be done to bring them to study the Bible. Parents, teachers and workers ought by all means to read this booklet.

CHINA'S BOOK OF MARTYRS, Luella Miner. Net $1.50. Postage 15 cents. Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia, Pa.

As one would judge from its title this book is a story of sacrifices. For the past few years, China has been a fruitful field of martyrdom. No better illustration of the eleventh chapter of Hebrews can be found in modern or current history. To know is to be interested and stimulated,—to study is a duty we owe. This book is largely filled with narratives heard during the siege of Peking and in it is great encouragement to the workers at home as well as to those on the outposts.

A NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY, Life and Times of Thomas Jefferson. By Thomas E. Watson. Cloth. Price, $2.50 net. D. Appleton & Co., New York.

In his preface Mr. Watson states explicitly that he is trying to hold the balances between the sectional views of the North and the South—instead of writing "back at" the North for the multitudinous volumes that have been hurled at us within the past decade. It is almost needless to say that this author compels attention from cover to cover. While it is the story of "the life and times" of a character about which so many of our national associations cluster, a character in which is combined the philosopher, the scholar, the statesman, the friend, still so much of Tom Watson is written in the book that one can but feel that it is also a faint autobiography. The aside remarks are piquant, epigrammatic, and defiant of time-moulded opinions. So many of us only know that Jefferson was the author of our Declaration, the third president of the United States, and sometime minister to France. Back of the public life is the real man most forcefully portrayed here; the man who kept an account of every penny spent and yet who spent nearly $20,000 in the hospitality lavished at stately and beautiful Monticello. Here the husband, the father, the master, the friend was at his best in those days when the war cloud was no larger than a man's hand. Mr. Watson pays his respects to Dr. Woodrow Wilson, President Roosevelt, Henry Cabot Lodge, Prof. Channing and many other "alleged" historians and unconsciously does "write back" in spite of the preface. But the South will chuckle and not condemn and the North will read and be wiser, maybe. In the leisure that the holidays bring to many busy men this book will give a stimulating interest in our past and a greater admiration for the makers of our country.

LITTLE RIVERS—by Henry van Dyke. BAR SINISTER—by Richard Harding Davis. Scribner Sons, New York.

In these two books we have just what one desires in a present. The bindings are attractive and rich, the illustrations are beautifully colored, and each one tells its own story, and the type is large and clear.

Merely viewed as ornaments for our book shelves or centre tables, they cannot be excelled, but it is when we examine their contents that we realize the agreement between the inside and the outside.

Dr. Van Dyke is always at his best when he takes to the woods. We may not agree with him when he loses himself in theology, but when he writes about the woods, the flowers, the streams and above all the fish, we recognize the hand of a master of the art.

It is said that if you scratch a Russian you find a Tartar, which may be taken in the real or metaphorical sense, but it is certain that if you scratch off the surface of the generality of men, you will find a savage, as far as love of the woods and nature is concerned.

But beyond this love is that of the man who has been there who has tramped the woods slept under the trees, breathed the pure air and counted the stars at night. He enters fully into the spirit of the writer, and lives over again his past experience, and is ready to match the best fish stories of the book with those of his own.

To all such we recommend this book of Dr. Van Dyke.

"The Bar Sinister" by Richard Harding Davis is of a different kind, yet in its class it is equally as attractive.

Seton Thompson has brought us all nearer to the dumb animals, and Mr. Davis in this little story has followed in his steps. "Kid," the name of his hero, is a bull dog of sweet disposition and of much discernment, whose rise from a street dog following the steps of a drunken brute to being the prize winner in innumerable dog shows, we follow with breathless attentions.

The reading of either of these books will make one better, which is something we can say of few books in these days.

Keeping Christmas in the Heart.

Christmas fills a large place in the world's life. The day is almost universally observed in Christian lands.

With each recurrence it brings a wave of good feeling which makes the air softer and warmer and puts new tenderness into all hearts. Christmas is all-children's day. Long before it comes every home is full of quiet and mysterious preparations. Parcels large and small are smuggled in and hidden away under lock and key, to be brought out Christmas eve. Christmas also has made a vast commerce of its own. All countries are ransacked by the merchants in quest of rare and beautiful things for the Christmas trade. In countless shops and factories all over the world thousands of workmen are engaged all the year in making every sort of product, ornamental or useful, for the holiday market. Millions of dollars are spent annually in the purchase of gifts to be presented Christmas morning.

Thus Christmas touches the world's life—at almost every point. It is a bright day in the calendar. But is there not danger that in its vast commercial and social importance the more sacred meaning of the day is being overlooked? Christmas is first of all a religious anniversary. It means nothing if we leave out of it the truth of the divine love and the coming of the Son of God to this world to reveal that love.

If we would keep Christmas fittingly it must bring to us a remembrance of Christ. Every true vision of the day must show us the holy Child, with the light of divine love shining in his face. We should worship again with the shepherds beside the manger. Christmas with no worship in its observance, no remembering of God, no thought of the love of Christ, is empty of all sacred meaning. While we give and receive gifts it should be easy for us to remember God's unspeakable gift. As we enter into the gladness of this happiest day of the year we may think of the joy with which the angels celebrated the birth of Christ. As we yield our hearts to the spirit of tenderness which pervades the Christmas air, we may think of the heavenly love which came into this world the night that Christ was born.

We keep Christmas truly only when we let the love of Christ into our own hearts and lives. We write Anno Domini in our dates, but are we really making our years years of our Lord? It may mean very little to us that Christ was born in Bethlehem a great many Christmases ago; but if we keep Christmas as we may it is not merely another anniversary—it is a real birth of Christ in our hearts.

If we keep Christmas in our hearts we will have love for each other and for everyone. Christmas means love—good will to men. It means forgiveness to any who may have wronged us. It is a time for universal amnesty. If we have been holding a grudge against any we should now put it out of our heart. It is a time for forgetting ourselves and thinking of others. The truest joy of Christmas is not found in receiving, but in giving. The happiest people are those who make others happier. There is more of heaven in pleasing than in being pleased.

If we keep Christmas in our hearts it will not only sweeten our lives, but will make us sweeteners of the lives of others. A lady tells of gathering a handful of sweetbrier when on an excursion in the woods, and putting it into her bosom. She soon forgot it, but all day as she rambled here and there she smelled everywhere a spicy fragrance. On every woodland path she found the same odor. On barren cliffs and in deep gorges the air was laden with the same perfume. As the party went home on the boat, she said: "Someone must have a bouquet of sweetbrier."

All day she had carried hidden on her own person the perfume which she had supposed came from others. "How good it would be," she said, as she closed her eyes, "if I could carry such a spirit in my breast that everyone I meet should seem lovely!"—J. R. Miller.

Missionary.

The Triumph of Love.

Mary Stark, in The Missionary.

A star and a song, a mother and child,
And man to his God is reconciled;
Heaven's King, as a babe is born today,
And His sceptre of love all hearts shall sway.

A garden, a prayer, a cross on a hill;
Darkness, a cry; and a form is still;
And nations have made that cross their shrine,
For written there is a love divine.

A flash of brightness, an open tomb,
And death is forever robbed of its gloom;
For love gives life to the spirit for aye,
But death touches only the earth-born clay.

The Holy Spirit, the tongues of fire—
In souls is kindled a new desire,
And the Gospel of Christ, His love and grace,
Are preached to men of every race.

A fervent prayer for Zion's weal,
A love renewed, a growing zeal,
And the Church of God shall extend its sway,
For the love of Christ brings triumph today.

As the Christmas season is approaching, the feeling of longing is awakening in the minds and hearts of all in a degree peculiar to this season of the year. Every man, woman and child is busy counting up the number and selecting the kind of things which they desire to possess. As people differ, so these wants differ, and it may be confidently expected that when the season of giving is reached, no one will be fully satisfied, for it may be certainly predicted that those who get all they think they want will find that they are not all they thought them.

Contrasted with this element of dissatisfaction, even in the presence of the most lavish bounty, is the satisfaction that belongs to the receipt of all spiritual blessings. In the realm of the spirit there is no shortage. It is impossible to ask for too much, and equally impossible to be disappointed when one gets it. "My God shall supply all your need," and having supplied them, there is no possibility of disappointment. For every hunger of the heart there is bread enough and to spare, and such bread is heavenly manna, angel's food.

In choosing gifts, it is usual to choose those "within the means of the giver," and the soul has a King for a giver in whose hands are all things, and whose bounty is royal. Those coming to a king can well bring large petitions, for the kingly One is not only able, but willing, and not only willing, but waiting to supply all the longings of the heart.

And the pledge of this ability and willingness is to be found in the event the season commemorates.

"He that spared not His own Son, shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" The greater always includes the less, and the unspeakable gift is a proof of the willing ability of the Giver to give more than we can either ask or think.—Episcopal Recorder.

Now the argument is this: Christianity is an Evangel, it is the announcement of certain tidings, and the message is essentially directed to all the world: "The grace of God appeared, bringing salvation to all men." The Church exists simply and solely to deliver the message—to deliver it to all men. The expansive movement, therefore, is not accidental or occasional, but permanent and essential. Only as the banners move forward does the army remain in discipline. It can know nothing of barracks or of winter quarters, for its purpose is to move on, and always on, until the message is delivered to all nations, and the Evangel is the common property of humanity.—The Missionary.

Sunday School Lesson.

BY REV. H. G. HILL, D. D.

Review, Dec. 27th, 1903

II Sam. 6:1-2.

I Kings 10:1-10.

The lessons of the Quarter cover a period of more than 50 years and relate to events and experiences during the memorable reign of David and Solomon.

Some principles illustrated in Quarter's lessons:

We should worship God as He directs.

God's Gracious Covenant the source of all blessings.

Sin, hidden causes unrest. Confessed, leads to pardon and joy. God warns against obstinate persistence in sin.

The arts of the demagogue though prospered for a time end in disaster.

Parental and filial sins bring sore grief.

Divine trust secures manifold blessings.

Strong drink curses all man's interests.

We should be faithful to every Divine charge.

God's presence alone will consecrate a temple.

Westminster League.

Mr. Cornelson Takes Charge.

Mr. Hoon, who has had charge of this column for a year or more, has resigned, because his regular field of labor is no longer in this Synod. "The Powers that be" in the Standard office have asked me to manage this department. Were I right sure that I could be of any real help to the readers of this column, and that they would really accept the aid thus proffered, I know of but few opportunities for service of which I would more gladly avail myself.

That there is a want which this column should seek to meet there can be no doubt. Every Westminster League in our bounds, I am bold enough to state, evidences that want. Is that want felt by those for whom the column is intended? Is it felt so decidedly that there is an actual demand for help by the members of the several leagues of our Synod? Or, must that demand be created before we attempt a supply? Then how create that demand? And how best supply the demand once created?

As I take up the work of this column I confess these, and such like questions crowd upon me too thick for my own comfort or assurance. I feel that I must seek help, and that this help must come from all interested in the league work—leaders and members. Suggestions from any quarter will be most heartily received. Questions indicating what is needed by any league or any member of a league will indicate a demand, knowing which we can strive to supply.

The plan in common use of giving an exposition of the particular topic for the week is a good one—so many are practicing it. There may be, moreover, some question as to its being the best plan, even though all the editors of this department of our religious papers follow it. I shall gladly accept from any one criticism which prompts to a better plan.

Let all the members of every league feel that this column belongs to them, and if it is not what they think it ought to be, why let us make it just that thing, so far as we can agree on it. Use me simply as your medium through which to express your wants and to supply those wants, that our Westminster League column may be an inspiring help in every phase of our work, to every ounce of it. As far as I know I have no hobbies, pet theories or favorite methods in regards to the work and its prosecution.

If any reader of this column desires to introduce some new idea or feature comfortable with the general view of our Societies' work I urge him or her to try it with the coming new year.

Address all communications for the editor of this column to me at Concord, N. C.

Geo. H. Cornelson, Jr.

Now is the time to acquire the good habits of a true and earnest Christian life. If we are ever to love and study the Bible, now is the time to begin. If it has no place in our life today, it will scarcely have a place tomorrow. These are the days also to learn to speak to others about Christ. Hearts are open now as never again, and wills are malleable. The dear friendships of these days are to be used in the noblest way, and made eternal friendships in the love of the great Friend. Now also we are to form right tastes in reading, and get set in the automatic instincts of a holy life, so that we shall always turn naturally away from sin, and naturally serve what is high and godly.—Exchange.

A young peoples' society has work to do of value in itself irrespective of its value in results afterwards. Young people are to be reached and won to the Saviour, that they may love him and have his help, and that they may now have the privilege of working for him. What we call the Church—that is, the older people—exists as much for the young peoples' society as the young people for the Church. God wants all people won to him now for their own present good.—Ex.

Unwritten Church History.

The writer thanks Dr. Green for that most interesting article in the Standard on the above line. He held an interview of two hours in Dec. 1892 with a distinguished man in a large Northern Presbytery. The latter said should Dr. Briggs be condemned there would be an immediate Reunion with the Southern Church. Let our friend of the Southern Presbyterian take warning, if he does not want to be classed with mistaken prophets. There are four points that must be guarded by the Southern Presbyterian Church: 1. Sound theology. 2. The spirituality of the Church. We do not want any Roosevelt resolutions in a church court. 3. Committees versus Boards, and last The Negro question. XXX.

An Acknowledgement and an Appeal.

I desire to express my appreciation of the amendment offered, in the Standard for Dec. 2nd, to his own criticism by my highly esteemed brother, the Rev. L. B. Johnston. His "withdrawal" is as gracious and grateful as it is rare, and marks at once the enlightened Christian and the courteous gentleman.

I now ask that the brethren drop me out entirely from this controversy respecting the proof-texts and their revision, respecting the Assembly, its moderator and its committee. Personally I have no complaints to make, no favors to ask. The chairman of that committee and one of its members have done me the honor to write to me on the subject confided to them; and my views are as likely to be as much considered as they would have been had I been appointed on the committee. These views have been given to the Church, and may be seen in the Presbyterian Quarterly for July, 1903.

It is a small matter what any one person thinks or feels on the subjects now under consideration, which at bottom is the expression of our loyalty to God's word. Our Church has a great opportunity. It is orthodox and loyal, but to meet its great opportunity it is essential that the utmost liberty of exegetical discussion should be encouraged. It is one of the fundamental principles of our Protestant faith that we are not to be bound by the "tradition of the elders," by the creed of our fathers. To hold on to old and antiquated versions of the Scriptures as if they were inspired, to accept blindly credal statements formulated hundreds of years ago, to reject as worthless the splendid results of modern scholarships, is to apostatize from our own formulative credal principles, Confession of Faith, Chapter I, paragraphs, viii, ix, x, and to go back to the platform of the Roman Church which our fathers abandoned at the utmost cost of treasure and of blood. Every generation is not only authorized to interpret God's word for itself, it is bound to do so, if it remains loyal to itself and to God. The recital of creeds which we have not studied, nor understood, nor really accepted, is "vain babbling."

As for our Calvinistic and Presbyterian orthodoxy, no one need have any fear. That orthodoxy will stand because it is in harmony with God's word and God's world. But fear of investigation, of discussion, by the orthodox will be detrimental to the progress of orthodoxy. The best way to uphold our doctrine is to invite the widest discussion and to proclaim our utmost readiness to change any credal statement when it can be shown to be unsustained by God's word interpreted according to well-ascertained grammatical and theoretical rules.

When we come to reflect on the situation it is amazing to observe how many words have been wasted on the discussion of a trivial question respecting the presence or absence of a single man on a committee, and not a syllable uttered, within my observation, respecting the important questions raised as to the harmony of our Standards with themselves and with the word of God.

Union of Two Churches.

The Centennial of the A. R. P. Synod of the South held at Winnsboro, S. C., was full of interest to the church at large. It was the Centennial year of that Synod's history. But that which gives special importance to their late meeting at Winnsboro, was the action of Synod on union with the United Presbyterian Church. These two bodies are about identical in everything except the name. They have been co-operating of late years in Mission work in Louisville, Atlanta and perhaps in other parts of the South. Earnest effort and many prayers have been made during the past twenty years looking toward organic union. Such a union was almost the unanimous wish and prayer of both bodies. As a result, the two have been drawing nearer each other all the time in interests, love and co-operation. For a period of nearly fifteen years the young people of each body have met in joint convention, and the young people of today are the progressive elements of the church. Accordingly the action at Winnsboro in November is hailed with gladness and gratitude to God as the answer to united prayer and full of promise for this organic union of the two churches. A basis of union was prepared and submitted for approval to be sent down in overtures to the Presbyteries. This basis was accepted as an overture and is as follows:

Basis of union reported by the committee, was adopted by a unanimous vote after "considerable earnest but good-natured debate."

"Article 1. The Confession of Faith and the Catechisms as now received by the Associate Reformed Synod of the South (chapter 24th of the Confession of Faith, being modified by the omission of the last sentence of section 4), together with the testimony of the United Presbyterian Church, shall be the doctrinal standards of the united Church; provided, that the Associate Reformed Synod shall not be understood as subscribing to the 14th article of the testimony.

"Article 2. The testimony shall be held as supplementary to the Confession of Faith, setting forth more fully the common doctrines and faith of the two churches. Articles 15 and 16 shall be interpreted and administered in the light of the deliverances of the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church in 1868 and 1901, respectively, recognizing that discretionary power in the reception of members and the administration of discipline which has been exercised on both sides.

"Article 3. It is explicitly understood and agreed that wherein differences may exist, mutual respect and regard for each others' opinions shall be cherished, and the forbearance in love, which the law of God requires, shall be exercised, all seeking to promote the unity and harmony of the Church of Christ.

"Article 4. The arrangements concerning the details of organization, until the united churches shall mutually require and agree upon a change, shall be as follows:

"1. The respective Synods and Presbyteries of the two churches shall remain as at present constituted, it being specifically agreed that colored congregations shall not come under the jurisdiction of Southern white Presbyteries, except by consent of such Presbyteries.

"2. The supreme court of the Church shall be a General Assembly composed of delegates from the respective Presbyteries, the number of delegates from each to be in proportion to the ministerial members constituting the same, as now fixed by the United Presbyterian Church, which is one to every seven, or fraction of seven.

"3. The Associate Reformed Synod of the South shall retain its name, and all its corporate rights and privileges, and shall retain control of its college and seminary, together with the management and control of all funds belonging to said institutions, now or hereafter. The different Boards of the respective churches shall not be affected by this union until a change is found mutually desirable."

This basis of union will also be submitted to the next

General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church and will now come before this body for action at its meeting in May 1904. If the proposed basis is mutually approved by the two bodies concerned, the way will then be clear for their organic union, a result already anticipated by most people concerned.

This step recently taken by one of the smaller branches of the church makes an important event in the progress of organic church union. The A. R. P. Church has a good record for progress, intelligence, conservatism and missionary enterprise. Her union with the United Presbyterian Church will constitute a Psalm-singing church of national dimensions. This too is the beginning of better things among the Psalm-singing branches of the Church. These ought to be one.

There is no doctrinal obstacle in the way at present. The natural order of consistent unity is between those branches already assimilated in doctrines and practice. The great river is formed by rivulets and streams nearest in proximity, flowing into each other. So in the church assimilation is a first and an essential condition to consistent church organization. The hasty process of merging together incoherent masses of people, regardless of affinity, is no advantage to the cause in the end. The proof of this, the United Presbyterian Church herself is the proudest of a happy union, consummated in 1858. The component elements of this union were the Associate Presbyterian and the Associate Reformed Presbyterian, North. These two bodies were as nearly assimilated before their union with each other as the U. P. and A. R. P. South, now are. The United Presbyterian Church stands foremost today as a progressive, missionary body, justifying the action and fulfilling the expectations of those who formed that mission.

Another union movement deserving more notice than it receives, is the Inter-Denominational Committee on the Uniform Metrical Version of the Psalms. This Committee was organized a few years ago and has already revised or proposed new versions as far as 119 Psalm or perhaps even further. The object is to prepare a new Psalter, acceptable to all the Churches represented. The Committee holds two or more sessions each year. At a meeting held in New York City April 8th of this year fifteen members of the committee were present, three from the Canada Presbyterian church, two each from the Northern Presbyterian, the R. P. Synod, the Christian Reformed and the U. P., and one each from the R. P. General Synod, the Reformed Dutch, the Associate and Associate Reformed. At the April meeting thirteen sessions were held and the sessions continued until April the 15th at 6 p. m. That part of the Psalter between Psalm 122 and 150 had previously been apportioned among the members and upon these reports were given. These reports were made the basis of work in committee of the whole. The revision was completed to the end of the Psalter, but a final revision will be made of the work already done, before the new version is submitted to the churches for their approval. Much excellent work has been done in this honest-minded effort to revise the Psalter, and even with its imperfections, the most conservative members of the committee agree that it ought to receive the approval of the Psalm-singing churches. It is the hope and the prayer of this committee and to a great extent the wish of the Church represented on the committee that this new Psalter may become the uniform property of these churches at last. It will be well adapted for worship upon all occasions and if adopted will meet and satisfy a want that has long existed at least among the Reformed branches of the Church.

It is a matter of profound regret that the Southern Presbyterian Church is not represented on this committee. In view of her own conservative character, her scholarship and missionary enterprise, she could have held a commanding influence in the committee and might have rendered invaluable service to the cause of union among the Calvinistic branches of the Church of Christ in America. Why were those seats vacant on a representative committee of such importance?

Will the amiable, genial editor of the Standard rise and explain? Come and join us, dear brethren, for we love you and them "with the voice together shall they sing; for they shall see eye to eye when the Lord shall bring again Zion."

The Incarnation.

The mystery and miracle of all mysteries and miracles is, that Jesus Christ is "God manifest in the flesh." It is the greatest mystery connected with the redemption of man, transcending, on the one hand, the keenest and subtlest philosophic methods and, stooping, on the other hand, to the humblest soul with simplest faith, to minister to its wants, still its restlessness, calm its fears; aye, even make it a "partaker of the divine nature."

So, to our mortal eyes subdued,
Fresh-veiled, but not concealed,
We know in thee the fatherhood,
And heart of God revealed.

The Incarnation was God's thought expressed. In the God-man the world has a revelation of God's nature—his character, his love, his goodness, his kindest thought for man. "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God. And the word became flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." In the instance of the word assuming human nature in its completeness; in the instance of the union of the word with the flesh in the perfection of one person; in the instance of the God-man, Jehovah was tabernacled among men; His holy nature flashed forth in all its beauty and splendor; His great heart streamed in tenderest mercy and loving favor; and without that God had forever remained unknown, like a thought that never emerges from the hidden recesses and impenetrable chambers of the mind. The Incarnation was God's kindest thought for man; the very best gift even God could bestow upon man; the shining way between the eternal throne and lost world, and the "reflection of the God-man leaves the contemptuous or unbelieving soul in the impotence of hopeless ignorance and the darkness of utter despair."

Everywhere from the earliest times, it is sadly manifest that man has not bowed without doubt to the word of God and reciprocated God's love-thought. In the early Church the person of Christ was the occasion of constant wrangle, sharp dispute, and scenes of violence. The Gnostics at one extreme denied his humanity; the Ebionites at the other denied his deity; the Apollinarians and Nestorians and Eutychians, avoiding these extremes, either affirmed or denied too much, ever learning, but unable to come to a knowledge of the truth. In modern times there are those, who, like Stauss and Renan, by sophisticated and fallacious methods, oppose the supernatural element in the God-man; and others like the New England Brahman, often spoken of as the "amiable Emerson," who meekly deny his deity and deign to say that "Jesus was the most perfect of all men that have yet appeared;" and then the more bold of the Unitarians who wage war on the "Divine Logos" by their theory and by their practice. But the fact that the Lord Jesus Christ is the "image of the invisible God" stands upon the written page and in the faith and experience of the Church unaltered, unchanged, and, as an event in the history of the world the Incarnation is universally accepted as a historical fact. When letters are written, documents stamped, private or public exchanges made, the very date which they bear points back to that event in Bethlehem which was heralded by heavenly choirs, when creation is traced back to God the Father the way leads through the intervention of the Son by whom and for whom all things were created. When man would lift his heart to this Maker in gratitude and praise he must do it through the God-man, the only mediator between God and man. It is a solemn conclusion "Whoever denieth the son, the same hath not the Father."

The story of the Incarnation may be represented as incredible, but it is natural, and just what men for thousands of years have been trying to invent. There is nothing in man's experience to suggest it, and yet, from the earliest age, he has been trying to invent a satisfactory incarnation—trying to have "God manifest in the flesh." The mythologies of the Greeks and Romans and Hindu are full of stories about the "gods coming down in the likeness of man." The pagan religions are replete with such incarnations. While these cannot be identified with the mystery of the God-man, still they show that "God manifest in the flesh" instead of being incredible or absurd, is in perfect accord with a universal yearning and longing on the part of man after closer kinship and acquaintance with God.

"Far and wide though all unknowing,
Pants for Thee each human beast;
Human tears for Thee are flowing,
Human hearts in Thee would rest."

What an aching void in the human spirit God incarnate supplies! When therefore, the sophists decry it as mystical because natural they merely display their own absurdity. After the lapse of hundreds of years; after the race had exhausted its ingenuity in trying to invent an incarnation, God actually came in the flesh, with a human soul; and that was the only true incarnation of God. It is clearly, accurately, simply portrayed in the New Testament; and in studying the sacred record it is readily seen that such an incarnation was necessary. It was necessary from the human side; it was also necessary from the divine side. It was a moral and logical necessity. If man was to be emancipated from the thralldom of sin, cleansed from the leprosy of sin, rehabilitated in righteousness, resurrected to life and restored to his Father's house, God must come in his nature and accomplish for him what is otherwise for man an absolute impossibility. The doctrine of heredity which science has brought into such prominence adds weight in showing that the Incarnation was necessary. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." If the "first man is of the earth, earthy," "the second man" must be "of heaven," else He will not be a second man; he will be sinful and earthy like all other men. Inasmuch as God determined to save the sinner and rebel from the awful consequences of sin and its unspeakable misery and eternal woe, to accomplish his purpose necessitated the gift of himself. The reason which Jesus himself gave, who saw it from the divine side, was "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son;" and God was in Christ, "reconciling the world unto himself." The Incarnation was not only a human necessity, it was also a divine necessity.

"The very God! think, Abib; doth thou think?

So the All-great were the All-loving, too,—
So through the thunder comes a human voice Saying, "O heart I made, a heart beats here!
Face my hands fashioned, see it in myself!
Thou hast no power, nor mayest conceive of mine,
But love I gave thee with myself to love."

The possibility of the Incarnation grounds itself in the fact that there are three persons in the God-head. The mystery of it is beyond explanation. The Son of God, the second person, became flesh, lived, labored, suffered with men, and gave himself a sacrifice to restore the fallen sons of God. By this mysterious transaction the diety is not changed. The God-head has three persons still; and this person is not added to the Trinity; the diety is not effected; but by such a union, humanity is changed by being exalted and glorified. "By the incarnation and exaltation mysterious and marvelous, a human nature was carried into the depths of the God-head, and a finite glorified human nature is now eternally united with the second trinitarian person, and a God-man is now the middle person of the Trinity."

"No Pæa there, no Bacchic song they raise;
But the three persons of the Trinity,
And the two natures joined in one they praise."

At this season of the year the thought of young and old are carried back across the centuries to that star-lit stall in Bethlehem where the Son of God was born in the flesh and found in fashion as a man. The following familiar language gives a beautiful view of that event. "The Son of God became man, by taking to himself a true body and a reasonable soul, being conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost in the womb of the Virgin Mary, and born of her without sin." There, in Bethlehem, amid scenes of poverty and want, in the long ago, the Son of God, the sacred person of the Trinity, was born in the likeness of sinful flesh. Then, the Virgin Mother and the anxious Joseph and the star-guided shepherds beheld the face of the God-child and rejoiced to see the salvation of God. And now, amid different scenes, the eye of faith beholds him, standing at the right hand of God in man's image, in man's likeness, the great Intercessor.

"O Soul, it shall be

A face like my face that receives thee, a man like to me
Thou shalt love and be loved by forever!
A hand like this hand
Shall throw open the gates of new life to thee,
See the Christ stand!"

Would that each Christian could constantly realize that a face like his own bends over him tenderly listening now; and, when he dies, a hand like his own throws open to him the gates of Life. Hope thou in Christ. His love can soften the hardest heart, forgive the blackest sin, redeem the darkest tragedy unto triumph and glory.

"See the Christ stand!"

A Christmas Song.

There's a song in the air!
There's a star in the sky!
There's mother's deep prayer,
And a baby's low cry!
And the star rains its fire while the beautiful sing,
For the manger of Bethlehem cradles a King!

There's a tumult of joy
O'er the wonderful birth,
For the Virgin's sweet boy
Is the Lord of the earth.
Ay! the star rains its fire while the beautiful sing,
For the manger of Bethlehem cradles a King!

In the light of that star
Lie the ages impearled;
And that song from afar
Has swept over the world.
Every heathen is aflame, and the beautiful sing
In the homes of the nations that Jesus is King!

We rejoice in the light,
And we echo the song
That comes down through the night
From the heavenly throng.
Ay! we shout to the lovely evangel they bring,
And we greet in His cradle our Saviour and King!
—J. G. Holland.

That Holy Thing.

They were all looking for a King
To slay their foes and lift them high.
Thou cam'st a little baby thing
That made a woman cry.
O Son of Man, to right my lot
Naught but Thy presence can avail;
Yet on the road Thy wheels are not,
Nor on the sea Thy sail.
My how or when Thou wilt not heed,
But come down Thy own secret stair,
That Thou may't answer all my need,
Yea, every bygone prayer.
—George MacDonald.

Christmas Flashes.

I see a flash of light from the long-ago. It is the first century signaling to the twentieth. Christmas today shines with the same star that made radiant the one on which Christ was born. Only has that star increased in lustre. Also are there more wise men following its telegraphic beams. The same angel song is throbbing in the air. But now the melody of that song falls upon a greater number of listening ears. Many have learned its marvelous harmonies. That choral is mingled in these times with the pulsing notes of church bells; with the trembling vibrations of orchestras; with the blowing breath of trumpets; with the rolling thunder of organs; and with the softer carols of multiplied human tongues. The hour hastens when every clime shall send its pilgrims to the feet of the world's rightful King, when every point of the compass shall waft its incense of prayer to his throne; when every tribe and nation shall lift to him the hands of adoration. O Thou of the manger, of the cross, of the tomb, speed thy chariot wheels, and quickly come to thy crowning!

Christmas is the silver hammer that smites the flint of selfishness and splits it into fragments. It is the crucible that melts many a Scrooge into a philanthropist. This is the season of the year when nearly everybody thinks of some one else. The stores have been thronged with purchasers. Many a mysterious bundle has been carried home and smuggled into the house. Accustomed frowns have been frightened from the brow by the smiles that have come out upon the lips, born in the heart, like sun beams peeping through clouds of storm. The ice of egotism has been broken down and dissolved, running off into myriad streams of generosity. The day of Christmas dawns with the glory of a benevolence that plays around many a fire-side and warms many a life.

What is the meaning of it all? Why, it is heaven overflowing with the tides of good-will, those tides backing up into the rivers of earth that so often run with muddied waters. It is the old melody of Bethlehem skies overmastering human discord. It is the manger of the Christ-child, which was a rudely-fashioned casket that held God's present of love to mankind, sending its influence abroad, that influence reaching its fingers clear through the hard shell of self-interest, and bringing forth the kernel of kindness.

Even the lower animals have their share in the spirit of the day. The troughs of the horses are given an extra supply of oats and hay. The cows munch a greater amount of fodder. The sheep find more grain than usual before their hungry mouths. The chickens are thrown more corn. Christ was born in a stable among beasts and fowls. Therefore the love of his natal day lifts its hands of blessing over the barnyard. His star throws its silvery kisses through stalls and coops.

Christmas is also a time of good cheer. It is the golden key that opens the prison doors of many a soul in the dark, bidding those souls come forth into the sun-shine. Love that sat in the shadows of disappointment finds a gift that sparkles with the old action of husband or wife in the glad courting days of yore, learning happily that life is not all a dungeon cell. Poverty that shivered by the ashes of want and dwelt in the barrenness of privation, warms itself beside the flames of a kindled kindness, and sits down to a table loaded with substantial food, here and there a delicacy punctuating the abundance. Absent ones remove the covering of a box brought by mail or express, and in the contents they behold a picture of the hearts at home.

There are but few to whom the radiance of the day comes not. All to whom it flashes its cheer are reminded of the fact that God did not forget the world in its sins. In the fullness of time he came, as he promised he would, bringing with him the glory of love. The earth never had a grander or more expensive gift.

If on Christmas day there be those whose hearts are sour, let them destroy the acidity with the sugar of kindness. If there be those whose disposition is rigid with meanness, let them bend it with a hand stretched forth generously towards others. If there be those whose nature is stiff with dignity, let them get down on the floor and play with the children. Then let the practices and the attitudes of that day be maintained through all the remaining days of life. Let Christian love illumine with its flashes the whole calendar of existence.

It is these things, and more, that this world wants. It wants more philanthropy, that love for mankind uncoiling itself from the spring of God's love. It wants fewer menageries and more hospitals. It wants less of battle on wasted harvest fields and more acres abloom. The very first message of the Gospel, angel-voiced from the pulpit of the clouds, was one of peace and good-will. That message has never been outlawed. Each Christmas day that dawns gives it greater emphasis. Christ came to redeem the world. Therefore, let human agency link itself with divinity, together rolling the earth's burden of selfishness and hate into an everlasting grave.—The Presbyterian.

The Festival of the Family.

Rev. George Jackson, B. A., in N. Y. Advocate.

In one of R. L. Stevenson's delightful essays he tells us how once, when he was crossing America in an emigrant train, a cornet player on the car struck up "Home, Sweet Home." He had played several airs before without attracting much attention, but when he came to that, says Stevenson, "it was truly strange to note how the talk ceased and the faces began to lengthen." A man does not need to have been a passenger on an emigrant car to understand what this means. Thousands this Christmastide the world over, sick at heart amid an alien race, will be turning their thoughts homeward. Soldiers on distant outposts, sailors far out at sea, missionaries on solitary stations, lonely settlers on the fringes of civilization, and multitudes in all our great towns and cities, spending perhaps, their first Christmas away from home—what strange, unutterable things the season will wake within them all! The very word "home" clutches sometimes at our heart-strings till we feel ourselves unmanned, and we are ready to turn away and hide our faces for shame. Yet the feeling is surely one for thankfulness rather than for shame. This is one of the holy things which the cruel feet of life have not yet trampled in the mire. God forgive us if ever we suffer it to perish!

The family, like the Church and the State, is a divine institution; it is part of the divine order of human life. We may adopt the language of St. Paul and say that, just as "the powers that be" are ordained of God, so also are marriage, the authority of parents, and the obedience of children. And the wisdom of the divine ordinance becomes manifest the moment we consider it. God has set us in families for the fuller disciplining and perfecting of our character. In no way is it good for man to be alone. The citizen who shuts himself up within the narrow round of his private affairs, and never shares the larger life of public interests and public activities; the Christian who holds himself aloof from the great brotherhood of believers, and makes of religion only an individual matter between himself and God; the hermit, of whatsoever kind who cuts himself off from human intercourse and kindly human faces—all these can live at best but a maimed life. They may be good and they may do good; books and their own thoughts and solitude may teach them many things; but there is a blessedness for which man was created to which they will always remain strangers; there is moral and spiritual development which is only possible to us in communion with the life of others.

Let us call to mind what home has been to the weak and unfriended, to them that are bruised and broken in life's morning—how it has strengthened the spirit of helpfulness and taught men pity and patience and forbearance, how it has touched with a richer hue the sweet flowers of love and joy and tenderness; let us think of these things, and we shall begin to understand something of the debt which we and all men owe to the life of the family. Changes in the social framework do not, we know, always involve loss. What is done today in one way may be done better tomorrow in another way. But if home cease to be home, it is hard to see what is to take its place or to do its work. We know of what it was that Robert Burns wrote: "From scenes like these old Scotia's grandeur springs." And if "scenes like these" should cease from among us, the greatness of our nation's life would be dried up at its source. "When home life," says Dean Church—and in days like these his words should be written in words of gold—"with its sanctities, its simplicity, its calm and deep joys and sorrows, cease to have its charm for us in England the greatest break-up and catastrophe in English history will not be far off."

Happily we are far removed from this as yet; but here are ominous signs that may well make us anxious. Home life today has its foes—some of them open, avowed, known; others secret, unconscious, and often unrecognized. Of the home's open foes—of them to whom marriage is no longer a holy thing, who sneer at what they are pleased to call the "greasy domesticities" of our average English household—I have nothing now to say. With these we can hold no parley; we meet them, if we meet them at all, not for argument, but for battle, and, by God's help, victory.

But there are others besides these that call for continual vigilance. What, for example, is to be the result of the rapidly changing conditions of our modern social life? Mr. Barrie speaks the thoughts of many hearts in his fears for his native "Thrums;" "With so many of the family," he writes, "young mothers among them, working in the factories, home life is not so beautiful as it was. So much of what is great in Scotland has sprung from the closeness of the family ties; it is there, I sometimes fear, my country is being struck." "What you need in England," Moody once declared, on one of his visits to our country, "is not more churches, but more homes." And if the question be asked, "What then, is to be done?" I can only at this moment answer that that is a question rather for the Christian statesman than for the Christian minister. The watchman on the wall has done his duty when he has blown the trumpet and sounded the alarm; it must be for others to lead the attack against the foe. But let this at least be said, that the nation which is ready to barter the sweet sanctities of home for gold is turning the knife against its own breast. And if anyone is tempted to dismiss this as merely the stamping rhetoric of the pulpit, then let him give heed to these words from the pen of one of our greatest political economists: "Able workers and good citizens," says Professor Marshall, "are not likely to come from homes from which the mother is absent during the great part of the day, nor from homes to which the father seldom returns till his children are asleep. And, therefore, not only the individuals immediately concerned, but society as a whole has a direct interest in the curtailment of extravagantly long hours of duty away from home."

There are other perils, too, of a very different kind, against which we need to be on our guard. One is sometimes tempted to think that, of all the counts in our long indictment of the Church of Rome, none is heavier than its continual exaltation of the monastic ideal. There are some, it is true—saintly, self-denying missionaries, for example—who may choose to remain unmarried "for the kingdom of heaven's sake." Yet even here the gain is not wholly without a corresponding loss; for however one who is freed from the cares and responsibilities of a family may be able to multiply his activities as a Christian worker, he can never bear the witness or do the work of a Christian home. But whatever may be said in exceptional cases such as these, it remains true (as Dr. Dale has said) that marriage is the vocation of most, and the exaltation of celibacy as though it were, in itself and always, the nobler and more Christian state of life, is clean contrary to the whole spirit of the teaching of Jesus Christ.

It would be easy to go on multiplying illustrations of the dangers which threaten us. There is, for example, the spirit of lawlessness, of revolt against authority in all its forms, true and false alike, which is at work today in so many different provinces of life, and which, when it is suffered to undermine the strong pillar of discipline, brings down the whole home in chaos and ruin. There, is, too, on the part of many, a restless chafing against the limitations which home life imposes. We sigh for a wider sphere, a larger stage; we forget that Jesus Christ, who gave three years to the world, gave thirty to the home, and in our impatience we often miss not only the very real opportunities for service which home life brings, but the training for higher service which fidelity there would unfailingly secure us. But I may not dwell further on these points now. I name them that we may gird ourselves to defend more strenuously that which in the past has been so much to us. And if we think there is little that we can do to break the force of perilous tendencies like those to which I have referred, let us remember that to all of us it is given to do something, whether as husbands or wives, as parents or children, as brothers or sisters, in the upbuilding of one pure and Christian home. It is said of Richard Baxter, such was his early life that in after years the ideal which always floated before his mind, as the best work he could do for England, was to make men like his father and homes like that of his childhood. Happy indeed is that land whose sons, with such a past behind them, keep such a goal before them!

The First Christmas Carol.

By Rev. William Hiram Foulkes.

The angel choir has never ceased to sing, yet infrequently is the mortal ear unstopped. The incomparableness of the shepherd's privilege awakens in the worshipful soul sentiments as near akin to envy as conscience will allow. We pluck our heart-strings in vain for an elusive "lost chord." Now it seems to draw near, and thrills our souls, as once the spirits of those night-watchers by their flocks, with its premonition of the unearthly. Then, alas, the strains die away into nothingness and unsatisfied longings alone remain. Still, in the face of yearnings which are insatiate, one dares not, cannot believe that the harmony of the angelic rapture has been hushed. They "sing on,

Their faithful watches keeping."

We may hear them, too; join, even, in their song. Let us together be led as we gather the extant fragments of that first Christmas Carol. May the heaven-gifted Spirit touch our dull ears; and grant us for an excellent Christmas boon, again

"To hear the angels sing."

At least, we know the title of the angelic harmony. It is the "Evangel." If there ever were doubts as to the authentic heavenliness of the music, its matchless superscription stifles the unrest. The Evangel, unique, transcendent! There is only one like it, and that confessedly an echo,—the protevangel of Genesis, culminating in the protevangel of the Baptist. Yet, as those waiting to hear the prima donna tire of lesser lights, however well they appear, thus did humanity weary of all, until in the "fullness of time" a seraphic voice filled the soul-emptiness of a long waiting rose, saying,

"Behold, I bring unto you the Evangel—Good Tidings."

It was the Gospel Song the shepherds heard. The heavenly host gave utterance in its fullness to that gospel which for over nineteen centuries have been preaching and Christians have been singing, though oftentimes in but caricatures of the original, and which, today and ever, heathendom is literally dying to hear.

Inspired in its title, the original Christmas Carol is also divine in the appropriateness of its dedication. For the most part, authors and composers are amenable to no fixed rule in the inscription of their masterpieces. To a friend or a relative; to abstract principles or concrete causes, to what-not they engrave their tribute. This song, contrariwise, was heralded to the world. For an imperishable preface, the archangel wrote these words, "Which shall be to all the people." Beatific exaltation and boundless glory for a lost humanity to receive at the hand of God's holy messenger such a prologue to such a theme!

If it be true that the music of heaven preserves the proportions and elements of earthly harmonies, then one seeks to know to what key the angelic note was attuned,—the flats of creation or the sharps of providence. That is, does the Incarnation come as finality in the evolution of life or as a movement in the march of the ages? Some have fancied, are confident, that the midnight strains of the host of God announced to men the culmination of the creative process,—the perfect flower of the race. Others, equally sanguine, maintain that the manger in Bethlehem marks but an epoch, however meaningful, in the sweep of history. There is a via media, neither in flats nor in sharps, but in the C-natural of redemption! In the epigram of Henry B. Smith, "The Incarnation is ever in order to the Atonement." The delicate harmonies and the intricate variations of the seraphic oratorio require that it shall be chorded with the great redemptive purpose of God. This is its motif.

Of the notes of the angel-chorus, some are hushed, others faint, while still others are yet sounding. "Glory," "joy," "peace," "good will,"—these four in ascending scale form the common chord. Fundamental is the note of "divine glory." It is his music, his choir, his shepherds, his people, his Christmas-Child. The glory is his also. No robing himself in borrowed plumes, no assuming rights that are inalienably his own, but the lustrous outshining of his eternal excellencies,—such is the glory of the highest, and with so perfect a note did the harps of gold begin the first Christmas Carol. "Joy" next,—in heaven first. The Father rejoiced in the great boon he was giving; the Son, "for the joy that was set before him," emptied himself; yet the Father's gift and the Son's kenosis were for men. The note of an everlasting joy, clearer than pleasure and deeper than happiness was so sounded that men might catch its full, rich tone and become singers as well as hearers. Then "peace." That word which fell so carelessly from every Oriental lip a score of times a day, was exalted from its colloquial abandonment to high honor in the conversation of the Almighty. The peace of heaven was brought to earth. Although the cross on Golgotha became the zenith symbol of peace, the Bethlehem manger is rightly the token of its dawn. He who can look upon the Christ-Child can in that view catch a soul-satisfying vision of a reconciled Father's face. "God sent his Son,"—that is the harbinger of peace, "to die,"—there its fullness.

Last of all in the common chord is "good will among men." Here again it is first signified that the good pleasure is of God. He gives not alone the kiss of peace, but the embrace of fellowship. The Father not only uttered a benediction upon his lost, found children, but has made it visible in the person of the Only-Begotten, tabernacled in the house of clay to be their Fellow. Yet, just as one quivering string will make others like it vibrant, so does the one of God's good pleasure toward men set in motion the like strings of the human heart toward the heart of its brother.

One other fragment of the angel-song is needed to give an approximately full ensemble. It is the element of time. Was the Carol a sudden burst of melody or a majestic harmony? It would be entrancing to know, yet not altogether indispensable. Those whose moods are buoyant, on the hearthstones of whose hearts the fire of sentiment glows brightly, will fondly fancy that the song was an avalanche of glory from the celestial heights, weighing down the soul almost to suffocation.

Opposite are those whose souls, calm, and almost passionless, will conceive the music as the stately chanting of a new and more expressive psalm in honor of "David's greater Son." Let each be assured for himself, for it is doubtless so that every variation of tempo and every range of expression, consistent with the loftiness of the theme, found utterance in the original. The members of that immortal galaxy breathed softly as they remembered the home from which He stooped to come. This Child, at least, was born

"Trailing clouds of glory."

There was pathos and wonder in the heart of the angel throng as it saw the Lord of the Universe pass under the yoke of the flesh. Then as it turned to behold the redemptive purpose and its sure accomplishment, the pianissimo of angelic marvel passed by crescendo into the fortissimo of seraphic rapture.

Never, either, had Carol such a choir to sing it! Immortal spirits with voices vibrant as a bell and melodious as a flute; a multitude innumerable. We cannot sing as they sang. Could we decipher the hieroglyphics of history and bring to light the recorded score of that unearthly composition, there would still lack the "voice of angels." But the time is at hand, now is, when the choir of heaven is mute, and every angel leans silently upon his harp. Bending down to the earth with its babel of sounds he listens to a Christmas Carol that even an archangel can never sing,—the love-song of lost and redeemed sinners to their Saviour, who was once the Christmas-Child. It is ours to sing that glad gospel world-wide, until for very joy the universe takes up the echo and hides it for safe keeping deep in the heart of eternity.—The Interior.

Let not one heart be sad today,
May every child be glad and gay;
Bless thou thy children great and small
In lowly hut or castle hall,
And may each soul keep festival,
At Christmas time.

—The Herald and Presbyterian.

The peace which Christ gives is not shelter from trial, storm, and trouble, but a blessing in our hearts which keeps us calm and quiet in the midst of all that would naturally disturb us. Christ had many trials and great sorrows and sufferings, but in them all his heart was kept in perfect peace. This peace he gives unto his people if they will learn to trust as he trusted.—J. R. Miller.

Oh little town of Bethlehem,
How still we see thee lie!
Above thy deep and dreamless sleep
The silent stars go by.
Yet in thy dark streets shineth
The everlasting Light;
The hopes and fears of all the years
Are met in thee tonight.

—Phillips Brooks.

Christmas Day,

O! blessed day, which gives the eternal lie
To self and sense and all the brute within;
O! come to us amid this war of life;
To hall and hovel, come; to all who toil
In senate, shop, or study; and to those Who, Sundered by the wastes of half a world,
Ill-warned and sorely tempted, ever face
Nature's brute powers and men unmaned to brutes—
Come to them, blest and blessing, Christmas Day;
Tell them once more the tale of Bethlehem—
The kneeling shepherds and the Babe divine;
And keep them men indeed, fair Christmas Day.

—Charles Kingsley.

Peace for the world will come when the Prince of Peace is brought to reign in every heart. Till that "glad day" "We who are his" must keep under our warring propensities, and seek to teach men the nobler ways of forbearance and forgiveness.

Helps That Help.

The Presbyterian Committee of Publication is truly thankful to God and to the Church for the rapidly increasing subscription list to all the Sunday school periodicals it issues by order of our General Assembly. The best proof of this appreciation will be in improved service. This we are determined to offer. We are trying hard to get the very best brains, the most successful experience, and the soundest progressive biblical scholarship. We are giving the closest personal attention to the mechanical preparation, illustrations, paper, and type. We have a thoroughly equipped modern subscription and mailing departments.

After careful investigation the Committee decided unanimously to request the Reverend R. A. Lapsley, pastor of Bethel Church, near Staunton, Va., to take general editorial oversight of all our periodicals for six months from January 1, 1904. He has had a varied and successful experience as pastor, evangelist, and correspondent, and has always been an enthusiastic Sunday school worker.

We have enlarged "The Children's Friend" to a page 16 by 22 inches in size, and added a special department for older readers, and a full exposition of the Sunday School Lesson is given each week. "The Pearls for the Little Ones" is prepared especially for the Primary Department, and each copy contains the current Sunday School Lesson.

We have been most fortunate in securing as editor of all our primary lesson treatment Mrs. W. C. Edmondson, the Superintendent of the Primary Department of the Second Presbyterian church, Memphis, Tenn., a trained teacher and a primary worker of acknowledged power and leadership. For Primary and Junior pupils she is preparing the "Primary Quarterly," and the Lesson Treatment in "The Children's Friend," and "Pearls for the Little Ones."

To the Earnest Worker we are bringing the aid of expert scholarship. Accordingly we have secured the services of the Rev. C. R. Hemphill, D. D., Professor of New Testament Literature in the Presbyterian Seminary of Kentucky, to prepare "Critical Notes" on New Testament subjects.

Through Old Testament Subjects we are to be helped by the Rev. W. W. Moore, D. D., professor of Old Testament Literature in Union Seminary, Richmond, Va. Are not these names a tower of strength to us?

"The Home Department Quarterly" is edited with special reference to the organization and development of the Home Department work, as well as for regular lesson study. For the first quarter of 1904 we have printed 10,000 copies. Its popularity is deserved because we are trying to make it most suggestive and inspiring. It will be improved as time goes by.

"The Colors" has for some years been issued privately for the Covenanter work among the boys. We have taken this periodical over as the official organ of the Young People's Society work of our Assembly, and it will hereafter be issued quarterly. This is our present list of periodicals, and others will be added as our work develops. They are sound to the very core, hopeful in tone, adapted to the needs and tastes of our people. Their treatment of the lesson is practical, suggestive, progressive, inspiring and spiritual. Their cost is as low as that of any denominational helps published. No private person or firm is enriched by their circulation. Whatever profits accrue from their sale are turned at once back into the life of the Church in the form of salaries for Sunday School Missionaries, and donations of papers to mission Sunday schools. Twenty per cent of our schools buy lesson helps in part or in whole from other publishers, and this should not be so. We appeal with confidence to our pastors, superintendents and teachers to make a very determined and sustained effort to secure a large increase in the circulation of our papers, and their exclusive use in all the schools of our Church.

Sample copies will be sent free on request.

FLORIDA.

ST. PETERSBURG.—On Thursday, December 10th, Rev. W. S. Milne was installed as pastor of the church at this place by a commission appointed at an adjourned meeting of St. John's Presbytery consisting of Revs. W. B. Y. Wilkie, J. G. Anderson, D. D., and C. O. Groves, with Elder Sumerville of Dunedin church. A large representative audience from all of the churches was present and listened with keen attention to all of the service. Rev. W. B. Y. Wilkie presided, propounded the constitutional questions and charged the people with much effect. Rev. C. O. Groves preached a very appropriate sermon from 1st Cor. 1:18. Dr. Anderson presented the charge to the pastor in his usual style, lengthy, and forceful.

During the first week of Mr. and Mrs. Milne's residence in the town the ladies of the church tendered to them a grand reception at the hotel Detroit for the purpose of their meeting with the people. This proved a successful means to the end in view. The pastor and his wife feel grateful for this wise forethought and they hope for glorious results in the future.

TEXAS.

CAMERON.—The committee appointed by the board of trustees of the Texas Presbyterian Home for Orphans, to outline the plan upon which the orphanage will be instituted, for the benefit of those contemplating donations etc., met in Waco December 10. Present, Revs. J. O. Reavis, Dallas, J. G. Tanonek, Navasota, C. C. Weaver, Cameron.

The plans adopted calls for not less than 250 acres of land to start with. Upon this will be erected a farm house, with necessary outbuildings, two cottages, that will accommodate together, 30 children, two matrons and one teacher. When this is secured the institution will open its doors.

To this is to be added a refractory, schoolhouse, laundry, industrial shops, etc., and other cottages as the need arises and funds permit.

The board of trustees will meet in Fort Worth, February 11, 1904, to consider all bids for a location, and asks those contemplating the offering of sites to have their offers ready for consideration.

We should be glad to receive offers to build one or more cottages, the school house, or refectory, or laundry or shops. Or, offers to donate needed equipment in the way of furniture, implements, building material, live stock, etc.

We earnestly hope a long list may be offered, to be presented to the board at its meeting 60 days hence.

By order of committee,

C. C. Weaver, Chairman.

FORNEY.—On the first Sabbath in November we began a meeting in the Presbyterian church at Forney, Texas. Monday following, Dr. W. L. Lowrance of Oak Cliff, Texas, came to us and preached twice a day through Friday of the same week. His sermons were rich and juicy with the very marrow of the gospel and hence were greatly appreciated by all who were privileged to hear them. Three heads of families were added to the church. These give promise of being very valuable and efficient members. We hope for other fruits from this faithful seed sowing.

At the Sabbath evening service of November 1, 1903, Mr. Lewis Mantins was ordained and installed a deacon in the Forney church. Brother Mantins is a very bright and popular man in the church and we are expecting great efficiency from him in his service to the church.

DALLAS PRESBYTERY.—At an adjourned meeting of the Presbytery of Dallas in the Presbyterian Church of Oak Cliff, Texas, December 10, 1903, Thursday, 2 p. m., the following business was transacted:

Upon the joint request of pastor and people the pastoral relations existing between Rev. W. L. Lowrance, D. D., and the Presbyterian church of Oak Cliff, Texas, was dissolved, and Dr. Lowrance was granted a letter of dismission to the Presbytery of Brownwood with a view of accepting the pastorate of the Presbyterian church of San Saba, Texas. Considerations of health constrained Dr. Lowrance to this move.

The following resolutions were unanimously and heartily adopted: Whereas Dr. W. L. Lowrance has asked to have his pastoral relation to the Oak Cliff Presbyterian church dissolved and to be dismissed to the Presbytery of Brownwood in order to accept work in the bounds of the same, therefore Presbytery adopts the following resolutions: First, in granting these requests it does so with great sorrow, and only because of the evident will of God in the change.

Second, that as one whose connection with the Presbytery is among the oldest now existing, he has always been able, wise, conservative and eminently efficient and coniteous to his brethren in all the work of the Presbytery.

Third, that both as a preacher and as a Presbyter he has, in teaching and practice, been safe and scriptural and loyal to the laws of his church.

Fourth, that on separating with Dr. Lowrance we commend him to the confidence and Christian love of the brethren and follow him with our prayers that God's choicest blessings may abide with him. At the request of the church and for the reason of change of location, the name of City Park Church, Dallas, was changed to Colonial Hill Church.

LANCASTER.—Dr. Frank Lyon and Dr. G. T. Parks having been previously elected to the office of deacon in the Presbyterian church of Lancaster, Texas, were duly ordained and installed in this office on Sabbath 8 p. m., August 16, 1903. These are most excellent and consecrated men of God and they have taken hold of the duties of their office with fidelity and efficiency. Dr. Lyon is a nephew of the late Rev. James A. Lyon, D. D., of fragrant memory. Prof. C. M. Lyon, an older brother, is one of our most efficient elders in this church. The work of this church is very encouraging. The congregations are excellent and increasing, the ministry of the Word is heard with great manifest interest, and there are frequent additions to the church, both by letter and on confession of faith in Christ.

A union Thanksgiving service was held in the new Baptist Church of Lancaster. The sermon was preached by Rev. E. E. Bigger, pastor of the Presbyterian church. This was said to have been the largest congregation ever gathered in Lancaster on any similar occasion. The commodious building was filled and every one seemed to enter heartily into the spirit of thanksgiving, which gave us a most delightful service.

CHILDRESS.—My people have voted me a month's rest which I shall spend with my parents in North Carolina. I shall leave here December 21st for the old North State and would be glad if you would send my paper to me at Red Springs, N. C., until you are notified in regard to it.

A. M. MacLauchlin,

NORTH CAROLINA.

STANLY HALL SCHOOL.—Rev. George H. Atkinson visited the Stanly Hall School on the eighth instant and lectured to a full house on the subject of "A Postage Stamp." The pupils and patrons were highly pleased with the lecture and with a sermon preached at night in the church. Mr. Atkinson is wide awake on school work. The people at Loonst are well satisfied with him as chairman of the committee on education. Teachers, pupils, and patrons feel that his visit was an uplift to the school in many ways and hope to see him more often.

HIGH POINT.—The day before Thanksgiving our congregation gave us a generous pounding, leaving our larder full and our hearts glad because of the kind thoughtfulness of our good people. In this growing, progressive town we feel that we have a wide field for usefulness, and have been here long enough to know that the lines have fallen to us in a pleasant place. Not content with their previous kindness, the ladies of the congregation gave us a pleasant reception, last Friday evening, in the Sunday school room of the church, which was quite a success, in spite of the fact that a disastrous fire broke out in the factory district early in the evening, and kept many of our people from attending the reception. We were thus afforded an opportunity to become better acquainted with our people. There have been a number of additions to the communion since we began our ministry, a month ago, and we expect others soon. The pastoral relation will be consummated next Sabbath. It is delightful for a "Tar Heel" to be in his native State once more, after an absence of seven years. We are now satisfied that the Old North State is hard to beat.

E. L. Siler.

THYATIRA CHURCH, Rowan County.—Rev. Walter L. Lingle held the Thanksgiving service in this church Thursday, November 26. Prayer meetings were conducted by the pastor on the following Friday and Saturday afternoons, and on Sabbath our protracted meeting began, conducted by Rev. E. E. Gillespie of Greensboro, N. C. For six days Brother Gillespie preached with great earnestness making the plan of salvation very plain and presenting faithfully and forcefully the appeals of God to man to accept this great salvation. Our people were helped and refreshed and there were five additions to the church, the sacrament of baptism being administered to three of these.

DAVIDSON COLLEGE.—The fall term of college closes at midday today, and the new term begins on January 5th. Most of the students will spend the holidays at home.

The third number of the second series of the College Bulletin has just appeared. It is in the nature of a souvenir album and is really quite handsome. It contains a number of pictures giving views of the campus and college buildings. Several of the topics discussed are the "Davidson Campus," "Some Recent Improvements," the "Davidson League," "An Iridescent Dream."

Work on the church addition is experiencing some temporary delay from the inability of the contractor to find painters just at present. Dr. Grey's residence is undergoing very practical improvements by the addition of a new room and bath room, commodious cellar, and new front porch greatly enlarged and extending around on south side.

The Davidson Calendar, handsomely illustrated with college scenes, among them the foot ball and baseball teams is offered for sale this week. It represents the business enterprise of two wide-awake students and merits a good sale.

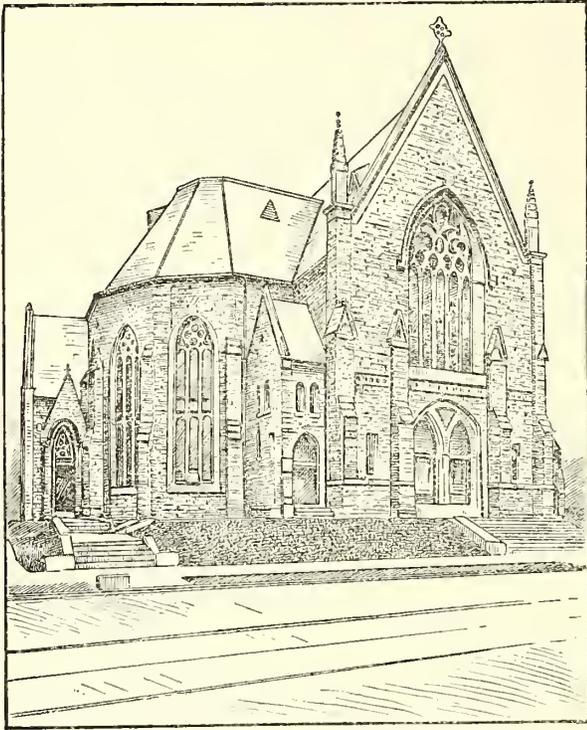

(The souvenir album of Davidson views has been received at the Standard office and it is beautifully gotten out.)

SEVERSVILLE.—On last Sunday the new church at Seversville was formally dedicated. The services were conducted by Rev. J. J. Harrell. The sermon was preached by Rev. G. W. Belk. At the close of the service, the keys were entrusted to the chairman of the board of deacons and some appropriate remarks were made by Mr. Belk.

GEORGIA.

AUGUSTA AND SHARON.—Protracted meetings have been held in the churches of which Rev. W. C. Clark is pastor, Augusta and Sharon. Rev. Joe Hopper of Perryville did the preaching. There were 17 additions to Sharon and 25 to Augusta. The preaching was sound, strong and earnest, and was greatly enjoyed by the congregation.

MISSOURI.

Grand Avenue Presbyterian Church, St. Louis.

Was formed by the union of two small churches, which were colonies, one of the First Church (New School) and the other of the Second (Old School), and a most happy and harmonious union it proved to be. Rev. Dr. S. B. McPheeters was first the pastor, and served the church most acceptably and usefully from 1853 until the pastorate was rudely severed, first and practically by the military authorities who forbade the pastor's preaching and banished him and his family, and then formally though illegally, by the Presbytery, that dissolved the relation against the expressed wish of a large majority of the congregation, which illegal action was later approved and confirmed by the General Assembly. The real reason for this summary action was that Dr. McPheeters, as a true minister of Him whose kingdom is not of this world, refused to announce publicly, from the pulpit and in his prayers, his personal views, wishes and feelings upon the civil and political questions then agitating the country and dividing the people everywhere. For the next three or four years the church held together and maintained regular services, most of the time being served very acceptably by Dr. John Montgomery and Rev. Dr. Mutchmore of Philadelphia. After the war in 1866 Dr. McPheeters was again called to the pastorate, but owing to failing health this call was declined, and a few years later he passed to his rest and his reward.

The pastors succeeding Dr. McPheeters were, Rev. J. C. Thom of Pennsylvania who died a few weeks after beginning his pastorate; Rev. B. T. Lacy D. D., of Virginia, from 1866 to 1870; Dr. A. P. Foreman, of Missouri, who served as stated supply for about a year; in 1872 Rev. Dr. E. H. Rutherford of Virginia became pastor and remained with the church until the spring of 1881, and during his pastorate the present site was secured, the chapel erected, and the church changed both its location and its name from Pine Street to Grand Avenue; the next year, 1882, Rev. A. N. Hollifield, D. D., of Pennsylvania, was called and served the church for seven years, and it was during his incumbency that the present handsome and commodious building was erected, being dedicated April 6, 1884, Dr. Moses D. Hoge of Richmond, Va., preaching the sermon from "My kingdom is not of this world"; in the fall of 1889 the present pastor, Rev. John F. Cannon, D. D., was called and on the first Sabbath of 1889 was installed pastor, a position he has filled with eminent ability and success.

During all these years and under the faithful ministrations of these men of God, the church has grown steadily, has abounded in every good word and work, has a promising daughter—the Cook Avenue Church of this city—largely supports the Bethany Church Mission—the only Presbyterian colored church in the state—and has long had a representative in the Foreign field and now has two. So that today the REV. JOHN F. CANNON, PASTOR.

Grand Avenue Church is one of the largest, strongest, and best equipped and most useful of all the churches in our communion.

NEW MADRID.—Rev. C. H. Little has declined the unanimous call extended to him by the Loukawa, O. T., Presbyterian Church, North. He visited the field in Oklahoma Territory in November and was very favorably impressed with the Territory and people but will remain in New Madrid, Mo., because he has not finished his work and the request of his people to continue in the good work he is doing.

TENNESSEE.

NASHVILLE.—The following officers were ordained and installed on December 13, 1903, at the Woodland Street Presbyterian Church: Elders.—R. S. Webb, E. T. Hollins, C. A. Graves, S. S. McCay. Deacons.—W. E. Metzger, John Langham, Frank Herbrick, W. A. Archibald, E. L. Doak, W. T. Law, C. W. Waller, W. G. Sawrie.

MISSISSIPPI.

SENATOBIA.—With several members added to our church lately and some liberal donations in provisions and money, and now with the salary increased some 15 per cent, with the large and growing congregations and a recently painted and carpeted church, the church at Senatobia, Miss., of which Rev. Charles H. Dobbs is pastor, is in a most prosperous condition and thanksgiving at the manse is a continuous performance. This is a result of growth in grace and not in additions by letter.

VIRGINIA.

WINCHESTER.—There were three additions on profession of faith on December 13, which makes 26 additions in the past year.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Origin and Work of the American Inland Mission.

Its only object is to preach the Gospel to the destitute in the "regions beyond." The fewest people realize the vast extent of these "regions beyond."

Eighty-six thousand square miles of mountains cover the broad expanse of our country east of the Mississippi, from Pennsylvania to Alabama. These are inhabited by over two millions and a half of people, most of them white, and descendants of Scotch-Irish and Anglo-Saxon ancestors.

"They occupy the very heart of this country," says a historian, "and with scarcely an exception, are of the same blood as ourselves. The first settlers of this region, as far back as 1750 were intelligent, God-fearing people, who, with dauntless courage and determined will, had overcome the savages and the wilderness. Many of them bear the names and are the direct descendants of heroes who fought under John Sevier at King's Mountain, and smote with Jackson the veterans of Wellington at New Orleans. But ignorant though they generally are, there is not in the whole country a more honest, brave and liberty-loving class of men than these mountain whites."

One of our Kentucky evangelists says, "Of all the destitutions I have ever seen, this excels all. Not a Bible nor a Christian did we find."

A noble misionary of this Society from New York, writing from the Cumberland mountains says, "My heart aches and my eyes run down with tears at the awful condition of these people."

Mr. Weston R. Gales said, "I know of no people who need and are ready to receive the truth as it is in Christ Jesus with more avidity than our friends who dwell among the mighty summits of the Blue Ridge, Alleghany and Cumberland mountains."

Six years ago a little company of God's children heard this Macedonian cry, and determined to go and help supply this vast need. This was the origin of the Soul Winners Society.

It is an humble endeavor to obey the great command of our master, to "Go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." These are in the world, to which we are sent, and they are not only creatures, but our neighbors whom we are commanded to love as ourselves.

The command to "begin at Jerusalem" spoken by divinest lips, and had a deeper significance than sympathy or patriotism. Jesus was a Jew but infinitely more. He knew that salvation was of the Jews, and "out of Zion" must go the Evangel for the whole world. Therefore He said "begin at Jerusalem."

This Society began with a little company—"A handful of corn on the top of a mountain." God has multiplied its numbers. It now has nearly five hundred members, scattered all over the United States and Canada, composed of members of every branch of the Church, and ministers of various denominations, whose sole object is to give the Gospel to those tens of thousands of our countrymen who are perishing without it.

It is unsectarian and undenominational, as the American Bible Society, and Sunday School Union.

It ordains no ministers, organizes no churches, and exercises none of the functions of a church court.

It is an association of Christian people of various church connections who feel their personal responsibility to God and their duty to their poor neighbors in the mountains.

It is supported alone by free-will offerings of individual Christians in twenty different states, and of every denomination. Every dollar received by the Society is deposited at once with its treasurer, Maj. Robt. S. Bullock, cashier of Fayette National Bank at Lexington, Ky., and every dollar paid out by him, on order of the executive committee.

No officer receives a cent of salary from the Society, and not a dollar is paid to any one except for actual service in the field, and for printing and postage.

It has taken much means to support these faithful missionaries, who receive but a bare living, but God has graciously raised up generous friends all over the world, who have supplied the money to pay our workers every month.

The work is carried on most economically; no evangelist receives over thirty dollars a month, and some are working on half that amount. Nothing but faith in God would undertake such work, without men or means provided. God has never failed His believing children, nor turned a deaf ear to those who cry for help. Will we do it? Beyond the mountains beckoning hands and beseeching voices cry, "Come over and help us!"

Shall we begin at Jerusalem as He commanded? Do we believe that "The light that shines the farthest, shines brightest nearest home?"

Rev. Dr. Edward O. Guerrant, President, Wilmore, Ky.

Elizabeth College For Women.

The Christmas recess of Elizabeth College began Saturday; the students have completed their examinations and a large number of them have gone to their homes. Many of those living in remote states will spend their holidays at the college. There are fourteen states represented in the student body the present session, several northern and western states among the number. The present session is the most successful in the history of the college. The advanced standard of the college has won general appreciation from a discriminating public.

The Gerard Conservatory of Music gave a closing term recital by the advanced students on the 14th. A large audience was present, and the fine work of the performers deservedly secured for them high praise. The Conservatory has grown steadily in efficiency and influence, and is recognized as one of the leading music schools of the South.

The Christmas recess ends Jan. 4th, and the second term begins Jan. 22nd.

The General Assembly's Home Missions

During the month of January the important cause of the Assembly's Home Missions will claim the attention of the Church. Nothing is more vital to the success of the Church and its spiritual life. This is the aggressive work by which the Church sustains her feeble offspring and provides them with houses of worship, and the only agency for expanding her bounds and occupying new territory.

During the past twelve months the Executive Committee has aided in the support of 166 Missionaries, and assisted 362 churches. Of these, 23 were teachers in Mission schools, teaching 11 schools, and over 1,200 scholars; 12 were special Evangelists in as many different Presbyteries; 5 were Missionaries to 13 Mexican churches in Texas; and 9 were Missionaries serving 15 Indian churches. New churches were organized, and ten were assisted in building houses of worship. New stations were opened, and the Church lengthened her cords as far west as El Paso, Texas, where Westminster church was organized, and a Mexican mission established.

In order to meet the demands of this vast and ever expanding work, it becomes necessary to increase the appropriation to $37,000, which requires $9,000 each quarter, or $3,000 each month to cover expenses. Even this falls short of the needs of the field, as is seen in the fact that the Committee is compelled, for lack of funds, to decline applications annually from $10,000 to $15,000. Any deficiency, no matter what the cause, means one of three things: 1. The Church must retrograde; 2. The laborers in the harvest must suffer; or 3. The Committee must again incur debt. The honor of the Church and the success of the cause forbid either.

Every section of this country invites effort and promises the fruit of faithful work; but some places challenge immediate attention. The West is a wonderland of magic. Cities spring up in a night. Population pours in like a rolling tide. Railroads are penetrating everywhere, and the throb of commercial life pulsates where yesterday were trackless forests and bleak plains. The Church cannot keep pace with the progress of the country, and this unoccupied land is an appeal to the Church of God for evangelization. Will the Presbyterian Church meet her share of the responsibility? Will she take advantage of her opportunity?

At its last meeting, the Assembly enlarged the sphere of our operations to include all the vast destitutions of the whole country. Hitherto, it confined its operations principally to the great West; now any weak and frontier Presbytery may appeal to its Executive Committee for assistance. If the funds heretofore have been inadequate to the needs of the work, how much more is this the case when this enlarged work must be undertaken? The only remedy is to enlarge manifold the gifts of the Church. Otherwise, our present successful work will be crippled, and our new undertaking a failure and reproach.

The responsibility is upon the Church.

The January collection will be the response.

May the spirit of God guide and inspire that response.

S. L. Morris,

Secretary of Home Missions.

Remit to W. A. Powell, Atlanta, Ga.

The World.

Not a case of yellow fever has originated in Cuba since three years ago last September.

It is said the French War Office has selected the regiment which Dreyfus will command on his restoration.

The Republican National Committee has decided that the National Convention will be held in Chicago, June 2, 1904.

Mr. John R. Procter, President of the United States Civil Service Commission, died suddenly in Washington last week.

President Charles W. Dabney, of the University of Tennessee, has been elected president of the University of Cincinnati.

The Salvation Army proposes this year to give a Christmas dinner to 50,000 people in this country, of whom some 30,000 will be in New York City.

The claims of the British and Dutch bondholders of Colombia are being considered, and, pending a decision, neither country will recognize Panama officially.

The Senate Committee is now considering the case of Reed Smoot. Petitions have poured in from all over the country, asking for his expulsion from the Senate.

Spain.—The King has been forbidden by his physicians to travel; or to expose himself to cold. Universal opinion is that the monarch suffers from consumption.

The typhoid fever death list at Butler, Pa., was increased to a total of 69 by three additional deaths yesterday. Three new cases were reported to the committee yesterday.

The hundredth anniversary of the birth of Hector Berlioz, which fell on December 11, is being celebrated throughout the world with Berlioz musical festivals, and has led to widespread discussion of the work and personality of this eminent French composer.

"It is an open secret, which must certainly be known in Washington, if not in Spain," says the London Times, "that at one time the United States Government actually approached the Vatican with a request that Mgr. Merry del Val should be sent to the Philippines as the Vatican representative."

The United States has instructed Minister Leischman to demand satisfaction and reparation from Turkey. Turkey now complains that the United States will not allow her to send the Armenian out of the country. Consul Davis will be sent back to Alexandretta in a war ship and will be received in state by the Turks.

In the occupation of Guantanamo last week the United States enters into possession of the first naval station provided by the treaty with Cuba. The force of seven hundred men landed there will also serve as a good police force for Cuba, should any ebullitions of human nature precipitate disorderly proceedings.

While no news has been received at the Japanese legation that Japan has sent an ultimatum to Russia, it is recognized at the legation that a grave crisis is approaching. Major General Yamani, the Japanese military attache, and the Japanese colonel who has been instructing the Yuan Shai troops, have both started for Japan.

The French Chamber of Commerce in London has just published a bulletin respecting the results of the last census of England, from which it appears that on March 31, 1901, the total population of England and Wales was about 32,500,000, as against 29,000,000 on the 6th of April, 1891, and 25,900,000 the 4th of April, 1881. In 1901, the population of Scotland was 4,400,000, of Ireland the same, although in 1841 the latter country counted more than 8,000,000. The total population of Great Britain and Ireland is but nearly 41,500,000 at present; of London 45,366,034, and of London and its suburbs, 6,578,784.

The fourteenth annual session of the Southern Educational Association will be held in Atlanta, Ga., December 30th and 31st and January 1st. Among the speakers will be President George H. Denny, whose subject is "The Call for More College Bred Men." Professor O. L. Crow of Washington and Lee, is the Virginia manager for the association.

Rear Admiral Bancroft Gherardi, retired, died at Stratford, Conn., on the 10th instant, where he had lived for several years. His father was of Italian descent, and his mother was a sister of George Bancroft, the historian. He was a graduate of the Annapolis Academy. In 1858 he was navigating officer of the "Niagara" at the laying of the first Atlantic cable.

Flushing, Holland, Dec. 20.—The Red Star Line ship Finland, which left Antwerp at noon Saturday for New York, and which later ran ashore near Nieuwenhuis, lies in a dangerous position. The weather is foggy. The Finland has a thousand passengers on board. Lighters are now alongside the Finland and taking out her cargo. The sea is calm with light winds.

The British Museum.—The funds for this wonderful institution were raised by a lottery, which was authorized in 1753, by an act of Parliament, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor and the speaker being the managers and trustees, each to receive 100 pounds as an honorarium. The amount of the lottery is said to have been $1,500,000 (300,000 pounds) which was raised by three pound tickets.

Nineteen lives have been sacrificed on the inter-collegiate football gridiron this season, one person has been driven insane, and thirteen have been seriously injured, and some have been disabled for life. One Yale and one Harvard player had a leg broken. One Brekley, Cal., man was made temporarily insane, and two Stanford men have not yet recovered from the fierce experiences of the last inter-collegiate game in San Francisco.—Selected.

Paris, Dec. 19.—Russia has made another move toward avoiding a rupture with Japan, and there is reason to believe it will be followed in a few days by the submission of a second proposition, tending to ameliorate the present strained situation. The action already taken consists in giving assurances that the first proposition which the Czar approved was not in any sense an ultimatum, or sine qua non, but was a preliminary step tending towards a pacific adjustment.

When the Fifty-eighth Congress met last November it voted each member his 10 cents mileage each way, according to law. But it did not stop here. Between the expiration of that session and the beginning of the regular session only a few minutes intervened. Yet for that short period the Congress voted its members another 20-cent mileage—each sum amounting to $190,000, being $380,000 in all. There were days in the republic when such appropriation of the public money would have been the death knell of every member voting for it. But we seem to have fallen upon different times now.—Exchange.

Rome, Dec. 18.—According to the Tribuna, the Vatican had suddenly wealth poured into its coffers today. Cardinal Gotti, prefect of the propaganda, accompanied by Monseigneur Marzolini, one of the late Pope's secretaries, drove to the Vatican today, and carried a mysterious package to the apartment of Pope Pius. They were immediately retired and he remained two hours. Intense curiosity was aroused by this act, and it soon became known that the bag contained 45,000,000 francs ($9,000,000) in bank notes. When Cardinal Gotti entered the presence of the Pope he sank to his knees and pointing to his burden said: "Your Holiness, the lamented Leo, just before his death, confided to me the money which I now lay at your feet, saying that if I succeeded him I was to use it as I thought best, that if another took his place, I was to turn the money over to him after a period of four months had elapsed. This I now do in the presence of Monsignor Marzolini who has been the only other person to share the secret." The Pope was much affected. The Tribuna goes on to relate that just about the time this scene was being enacted in the papal apartments, an electrician, while removing the hangings in the late Pope Leo's chamber in order to get at the electric light wires, found in a hole in the wall several bags which were carelessly tied. These bags when opened were found to contain 9,250,000 francs ($850,000).

Deaths.

"Why should his gain be such a grief to me,

This sense of loss,

This heavy cross.

Dear Savior, take the burden off, I pray
And show me heaven is but a little way."

R. A. Miller.

EDDLEMAN.—Fallen on sleep at the home of his parents in Gastonia on the 27th of Oct., 1903, John Parker Eddleman, son of Dr. and Mrs. H. M. Eddleman, aged 9 years, one month and 24 days. In personal appearance, in loveliness of disposition, in brightness of mind, in demonstration of feeling and all the traits of noble boyhood, Parks was all that a parent's heart could wish. In his sickness his patience, submission and intelligence were very remarkable, so much so as to call for comment. His departure was as gentle as the sunset. As a child of the covenant he was piously trained and as a result he loved to go to Sabbath school and attend on the sanctuary services. A promising boy has been taken, fond hopes and cherished purposes have been blasted but He who loaned this child has received him unto himself. Weeping parents, as you mourn your loss think of your dear boy's gain.

CRAIG.—Died suddenly at her home in Gaston County N. C., on 26th of Nov. 1903, Mrs. Mary Ann Craig, aged 70 years, 11 months and 26 days. The deceased was born in York County, South Carolina. Her maiden name was Thompson. She was first married to Mr. Martin; of this union two children, Mr. W. D. Martin, of New York, and Mrs. Graham McLean, survive. She next married Mr. Craig who died some years ago and of this union two sons, Sam and John, and two daughters, Mrs. Hoke Wilson and Mrs. Will McLean survive. As a daughter she obeyed the fifth commandment, as a wife she looked "well to the ways of her household," as a mother she trained her children in the fear of the Lord, as a neighbor she was ready to help and in many homes she was called to minister in sickness and sorrow. In early life Mrs. Craig joined the Presbyterian church, and was ever ready by her prayers, presence and with her means to support the church. The pastor found in her a wise counsellor and one always ready to co-operate with him in every good word and work. Her Christian life was an epistle for Christ and her death an immediate translation into the presence of her Saviour.

R. A. Miller.

McKELLER.—Mr. Graham McKeller entered into his rest in his home in Forney, Texas, Oct. 4, 1903, Sabbath 11 p. m. So excellent was he in all the relations of life, that he is deeply mourned by family and friends, by Church and community.

The Household.

On Keeping Christmas,

Christmas has been so long associated in the popular mind with the exchanging of gifts that we have lost somewhat the real meaning of these gifts, which are, indeed, only intended as symbols of love and good will. Only to children do we give with that freedom and spontaneity which makes the gift more precious to the giver than to the recipient. To get as much as possible of this real old Christmas spirit toward one's fellows should be the engaging business of every one. We must be good to somebody on Christmas day, and after buying toys for the children no one thing occurs to us that is so easy to accomplish and so full of results as taking a little thought for the lonely. Christmas is a festival of the family. But how many among our acquaintances are there who have no families; how many excellent old bachelors and lonely old maids! We do not mean the poor—there are plenty of philanthropists to look after them, and they are usually well blessed with families; but a man may be as rich as Croesus, and yet if he have no place to eat but a hotel he is poorer at Christmas than an Irishman with six children and only money enough for one meal. He belongs to a class which may well be an object of your solicitude. Perhaps they could buy you out thrice over, but you have a home and they have not. Be good to them—ask the lonely man to dinner. It is not for the dinner's sake, but the spirit in which you make them guests at your house, that these lonely people will bless you. And when they have told a story at your board, and dandled the children (if by good luck you have any), and sat about the fire in the evening, how much cheered and bettered they will go away; how it will warm their hearts to feel that somebody cared enough for them to ask them to be members of a family even for a day. That is all Christmas is for—to show other people that we love them, and to learn and be cheered by the thought that there are people who care about us. The unattached people scrape along after a fashion during the year, but at the holiday season they are in a cold world, and then, if ever, do they crave the thing which never comes truly into their lives; and you, if you have a home—only a little one—share it on Christmas day with some friends who have none.—December Woman's Home Companion.

The Home Circle.

The Heart of Christmas.

By Mrs. Joseph D. Burrell.

Margaret sat before the blazing fire in the library, tired out. She had been shopping all day and was weary from the noise and press of the crowds. Her bundles lay piled on the sofa near by, and as she rested she reviewed their contents. "There's mother's ivory brush," she commented. "That monogram is beautifully carved, and I am sure she will be delighted with it. For father, there's the set of books he wanted; for Harry, there are the skates and the leather boxes for his bureau, and for Midget, the big doll and the dishes. I wonder if it pays to get that child such pretty things, when she breaks them so quickly? But Christmas comes but once a year, and I love to please the child. And there are the things for the girls; for Betty the set of veil pins, and for Helen the brass hook stand; and the presents for the servants are not here yet. That's all, and I think I've done pretty well, and not been extravagant, but—" she shrugged her shoulders ruefully. "I've spent all my next month's allowance, every cent of it!" Just then the door opened, and Margaret's mother came in.

"Tired out?" she inquired. "Well, I don't wonder. The crowds are dreadful this year, even as far ahead of Christmas as this. Have you finished all your shopping?"

"Yes, I have everything, I think," said Margaret. "But, mother, I've had to draw all my January money from the bank. I had to pay for my tailor suit in November, and that with the hat from Madame's took the rest, so I simply had to draw on my future. Father won't like it."

Mrs. Allison looked grave. The girl was young and attractive, and had always had the same pretty things the other girls had had, and she had grown into the way of spending more on them each year from her generous allowance, until it was practically all spent on herself. But before she could speak the door again opened, and Margaret's two especial friends came in. They greeted Mrs. Allison warmly, and then turned to her. "You've been shopping all day, you extravagant girl," said one. "What a pile of parcels! Did you get lovely things?"

"Sweet!" said Margaret enthusiastically. "I can't very well open every thing, for you know perfectly well your own things are in that heap. It's no use pretending after all these years, is it? But if mother will kindly go and see what Midget wants, I'll show you some others."

Mrs. Allison rose smiling. "I'm getting accustomed to removing myself," she said cheerfully. "Harry and Midgett have kept me going from one room to another all day. I am sure my stocking must be going to overflow."

The girls unfastened the parcels given them and exclaimed over the carved ivory brush, the set of books and the other pretty things.

"You have such good taste in choosing," said Helen, the girl with what was known as Fortunatus' purse. "I spend twice as much as you do on my things and get celluloid and plated silver and pressed glass for my money. Even Betty, who calls herself poor, somehow gets lovely things. How do you do it, I'd like to know? Witchcraft, I call it." The girls laughed together. Then Betty said slowly: "I'm feeling guilty enough over the few little things I've bought anyway. I feel as though I'd stolen the money. You see I've just come from a committee meeting of the missionary society and heard something I cannot forget." Margaret sighed.

"That society again," she said discontentedly. "You are getting simply morbid, Betty. I would not have believed after all you have done for it this year, you would let it spoil your Christmas. What is it now?"

"Well, girls, it is something new. Some one, a stranger, came and talked to us about arranging a meeting for Christmas Eve, each one to bring a gift to Christ, because it is his birthday. He said in America alone probably a hundred million dollars were spent each year in Christmas gifts, and of that scarcely one cent was given to Him. And then he quoted the words of the Bible about the Wise Men: 'They fell down and worshipped Him: and when they had opened their treasure they presented Him gifts; gold, and frankincense and myrrh.' He said we had changed all that. We no longer give Him Christmas gifts, but one another, and while we say we do it in remembrance of Him, it is really an exchange of so much which takes no account of Him at all.

"I tell you, girls it made me unhappy. It is so true. All our lives we have given each other and all our friends, freely, and doled out little sums from time to time during the year to the cause He loved best; we gave them grudgingly enough too, sometimes, and wished we dared refuse. Haven't we gone often to missionary meeting and dropped dimes into the plate and gone home to spend dollars on ourselves? And at Christmas time of all seasons, to forget Him and His special cause, the spreading of the 'good news' the angels sang about! Oh, my Christmas is spoiled, I tell you."

The girls sat silent. "They offered Him gifts!" The words rang in their ears. They were all three Christians, church members, and loyal helpers in all good works. They believed in missions and had always given to them, as they had thought conscientiously. But how little the sum was after all, compared to what they had spent on themselves! And now, at Christmas time, they had remembered every one they loved—except Christ, their best Friend, whose day it was. They had no gift for him.

By and by Helen rose. "It's late," she said, "I must go home. I've nothing to say, for I'm ashamed, except that it's all true, and next year I won't let myself be cheated out of my Christmas as I have this year."

After they had gone, Margaret sat still by the fire thinking. Could she still manage to give some present to Christ on His birthday? It would mean the strictest economy all the rest of the winter, if she did, and she knew her father would certainly be seriously vexed, if she ran still further in debt to the allowance he gave her on the understanding she would keep strictly within it. If she could get the money in spite of this she would have to curtail the price of the wedding presents she must give, the new gown she really needed for teas, and the little trip she had planned for the early spring.

Mr. Allison was at least nominally a Christian man, but his life was spent in making money, and he expected his wife and children to do their duty and his as well, in church work and giving. He gave Mrs. Allison a bill for the collection for missions when the time came around or if he was not too tired to go to church, he put it in the plate himself. But he had no such interest in these things that Margaret felt she could talk the matter over with him. Still, that evening she sat down by him and confessed her unwise and too lavish expenditures and her indebtedness to herself for more money than she was entitled to for some time. And then she said coaxingly:

"Now, father, don't you think I deserve some reward for being so honest in at least telling you all this? And won't you please excuse me and forgive me," as Midget says, "and trust me a little more?" I do want something for a very especial Christmas present, and if you will give me something from my February money, just as much as you will let me have, I'll promise to economize tremendously and keep within my allowance all the rest of the year."

Mr. Allison thought the matter over carefully. She had certainly been extravagant and had managed her money badly. He was tempted to refuse her request. Still, it was the Christmas time, and he did not like to be too hard upon her. Perhaps the economy she would have to practice would do her good, and if she promised to keep within limits the rest of the year, the experiment would pay. So he drew out a ten dollar bill and gave it to her.

"You may have so much, Margaret," he said, "so much and no more; and I expect you to do better after this."

The girl smiled a little sadly as she took the money. "I will indeed manage a great, great deal better after this, father," she said as she thanked him. When the missionary meeting came on Christmas Eve, Margaret was present, and gave the treasurer an envelope marked "A Christmas Gift for Missions."

She felt her heart a little lighter, but still her happy day was marred by the remembrance of the tardy gift that she had made to Christ.

As the new year opened, Margaret's quickened conscience made her more than usually faithful in the society of which she was a member. She accepted an office and was faithful to it. She began to read in the little library just put into the church, and with growing interest. The life and death of Good in Africa, the brilliant career and tragic end of Han-nington, the history of the Martyr Isle, the story of China of late years, the Siege of Peking, the heroism of the missionaries and the even more wonderful heroism of the native converts, all filled her with pity and wonder, while the books about the women of India stirred her with unspeakable horror and indignation. Nothing she had ever read seemed to her so marvellous as the recitals of wonderful endurance, of joyful service, of cheerful death. As the months went by she denied herself more and more to put something into her Christmas box. "Not frankincense or myrrh," she whispered to herself, "but gold! This year I shall have a real gift as the Wise Men brought, to give Him on His birthday."

"When will you have your new tailor suit, Madge?" asked Betty anxiously one day in November. "Remember, I need to copy it, and hurry up."

Margaret laughed lightly. This copying of her clothes by the clever Betty, who could not afford those made by tailors, was a standing joke between the girls. "Copy my last year's suit," she said gaily. "It's all I shall have this year, for I can't afford a new one. You know I began in debt last spring, and have had to be very economical ever since. Besides, I have something special on hand for a present this Christmas, and must be careful."

Betty looked interested. "What is it?" she asked. "Are you going to get something extra nice for your mother? You said last year that this you should get her one of those lovely dessert services we saw, and they did cost a lot."

"No," said Margaret slowly, "I am not going to get that, though I am going to get her just as nice a present as usual. I believe in doing all you can for your own, especially at Christmas; but that's not it. I am going to do something else, as I said."

"What can it be?" Betty put her chin in her hands and sat in a brown study, to Margaret's amusement. Before she had come to a conclusion Helen came in.

"Let's go shopping, girls," she said. "It's early, but the Christmas things are all out, and even if we don't want to buy today we can see what there is."

The girls went readily enough. They were young and lighthearted, and any sort of a good time appealed to them. Helen bought some lovely things rather recklessly, and Betty a few simple ones, most cautiously, while Margaret surprised them both by spending her money most carefully than they had ever known her to do before. Toward the end of the afternoon she left them to make a call, and the other girls walked home without her.

"What has come over Madge?" asked Helen wonderingly. "Don't you think she has changed?"

Betty hesitated. It was not easy to speak of serious things to Helen, for she laughed so easily at everything before she stopped to think. But she said, "I heard Margaret say the other day that she had never until recently thought of those words, 'The silver and the gold are His,' and they made her feel she had not spent her money as she should. Perhaps she had that in mind in shopping."

Helen stopped short. "Of course that was it," she said. "What a wretch I am not to have thought of it too. Betty, what do you mean by not reminding me to be good? The meeting will be here in no time and I haven't a cent." She threw out her hands tragically.

Betty sighed. "Well, we are careless enough certainly. I've not much in my Christmas box for my gift, but still it is better than a year ago."

"Well," said Helen emphatically, "never again shall I feel so mean, so humiliated as at this minute. I had fair warning last year and simply forgot all about it, but this next year you'll see."

The night for the offering came. The rooms were bright, and the young people were full of the Christmas spirit as they sang, as one by one they passed up to the table to lay down their Christmas boxes.

When Margaret laid hers on the table, it was with a look of gladness and peace.

Already her gift had returned to her four-fold. When the treasurer opened the boxes, one held gold pieces alone, not many nor large, but all bright, shining gold. A slip of paper lay with them.

"And they opened their treasures and presented unto Him gifts; gold."

Another year brought reverses in business to Mr. Allison. Money invested as he thought safely, slipped away. Investments proved valueless. Even the lovely home had to be given up and the family moved to a quiet street. Margaret had no tailor suit again this year, but became a bread winner, and in her spare hours learned to do cooking and housework, and to make over her gowns for the fast growing little sister. She had to be the light of the home, for her mother was depressed by their hardships and comparative poverty, and her father overworked and full of care.

When winter came, Margaret began to think anxiously of her Christmas gifts. For the family she had dainty things, she had made herself during the summer when most of her pupils had been away.

"Quite as good as cut glass and silver and fine editions," she murmured, smiling at her fancy as she laid them away. But her Christmas box—it was for the present there she trembled. True, it was heavy enough as she weighed it in her hand, but she knew too well that was because pennies were almost alone in it. She lingered along time over the fastenings as she opened it.

A heap of copper rolled into her lap, Mixed with a few bits of silver scattered through the mass. She frowned at it as she began to divide it into piles. How squalid it looked! How unlike the shining, clean bits of gold of last year! Still, she had done her best; her Christmas gift was a real one, representing self-denial, and so it was not unworthy of being offered, after all. Pennies or gold, it was that which counted. She comforted herself with the thought as she divided the money and began to count. One dollar, two dollars, three dollars, who could have believed pennies could add up so. The nickels made nearly four, and the dimes and quarters—Margaret held her breath—could it be true? She actually had five dollars, and one dime over to begin another year! It did seem too good to be true. Five dollars? She could change that into a gold piece and once more she would have a Christmas gift such as the Wise Men brought to Christ to give Him on His birthday.

So the meeting came around, and again the young people sang:

"As with gladness, men of old,
Did the guiding star behold,
As they offered gifts most rare,
At that manger rude and bare,
We our costliest treasures bring,
Christ, to thee, our heavenly King."

And in Margaret's box lay the one small gold piece, and with it the words of the year before:

"And they opened their treasures and presented unto Him gifts; gold"

Betty and Helen had Christmas gifts too in their boxes, real ones, brought with self-denial, though one was only a small handful of silver and the other a large roll of bills.—New York Observer.

A "Lost" Christmas Gift.

At the approach of the first Christmas after the wedding, a certain bride, desirous of giving her best beloved something made by her own affectionate but inexperienced hands, manufactured a truly wonderful nightshirt. It was made of pink and white outing flannel, trimmed with lace-edged ruffles, and was further embellished with rows of elaborate feather-stitching.

The surprised husband expressed a proper amount of gratitude, and said—with truth—that he had never beheld a garment to compare with it; but when asked later why he did not wear it, he replied that it was

Far too good

For human nature's daily food, and that he was saving it for some occasion that really demanded a nightshirt of more than ordinary gorgeousness. It was just the thing, he averred, to wear if one happened to be convalescing from a broken limb or a long attack of fever.

But one day the husband telephoned that he was unexpectedly called out of town on business, and requested his wife to pack his valise and to have it at the station within the hour, all of which she did.

Feeling tired after a long day's ride, and having nothing better to occupy his time, the man went to his room at nine o'clock that night, intending to go at once to bed. When he unpacked his valise he discovered that the long dreaded "special occasion" had arrived, for there, folded neatly in the valises, was the pink and white nightshirt, ribbons, ruffles and all.

The traveller was slightly bald, he wore a sandy mustache, and when he had tied the broad pink ribbons in a bow under his decidedly masculine chin, he made a picture never to be forgotten. He was just about to climb into bed, hoping fervently that no sudden alarm of fire would render it necessary for him to appear unexpectedly in public, when he was startled by a loud rapping at his door.

Supposing his visitor to be the bearer of an expected telegram, he opened the door to find himself confronted by the last person he wanted to see—or to be seen by—in the circumstances. His caller, a man upon whom, for business reasons, he was desirous of making a favorable impression, had discovered his name on the hotel register.

"Good gracious!" exclaimed the astonished visitor. "Are you on your way to a fancy dress ball?"

"No," returned the embarrassed victim. "I'm merely getting ready to go to bed in the nightshirt that my wife made me for Christmas."

The young wife subsequently considered it strange that her husband was never afterward able to recall the name of the town in which he absent-mindedly left that unexampled nightshirt under the hotel pillow.

"There were seven yards of lace on it, too," she would sometimes sigh, regretfully, "and four yards of ribbon; but never mind, dear, I'll make you another some time."—Selected.

What to Do With the Old Turkey.

By MRS. J. W. Wheeler.

Turkey this year is an expensive dish, and thrifty housekeepers are studying how they may utilize every scrap that is left. An eight or ten pound turkey after being pronounced "picked" still has possibilities for two meals—one solid dish and a soup.

The writer has found turkey escallop to be the choicest dish made from a turkey hull. Break the hull apart and carefully scrape off the bits of meat, saving a few of the choicest bits for the soup, run through a meat chopper (all but the last), and you will be really surprised at the amount of meat there is—two or three cupfuls. Chop the stuffing, and, using equal quantities, put alternately layers in a baking dish, seasoning each layer of meat, but not the dressing, with salt, pepper and bits of butter. Moisten, or, if any gravy has been left over, use the gravy, omitting the butter. Finish with a thin layer of bread or cracker crumbs, salt, pepper and bits of butter, and bake until the top is a rich brown, about half an hour, when the escallop will be thoroughly heated.

This is really a delicious dish, and with baked potatoes and boiled onions makes a very good dinner.

For the soup put all the bones, skin and gristle into cold water, boil up and skim, then set the kettle where it will simmer until the little shreds of meat are white and soft. It is now ready for straining, after which it may be seasoned. Pepper, salt and onion juice are best. Add some sliced raw potatoes, and ten minutes later add the pieces of meat that were saved, and dumplings enough "to go around." Boil until the dumplings can be pierced with a straw, and serve immediately.

If for a soup course only, the potatoes and dumplings may be omitted, and boiled rice, barley or vermicelli used instead, but the amount of nutriment will warrant the making of the above mentioned old-time soup.

Sometimes we use the turkey meat for a breakfast dish, especially if the turkey was a small one, or had been more zealously picked. Use toasted muffins, or bread cut with a biscuit cutter, before toasting. Cover each piece of toast with chopped turkey, season with salt, pepper and butter, and place in the oven, until the meat is thoroughly heated and begins to brown on top. This will be pronounced an excellent "change" for breakfast.

Sometimes it happens that a large quantity of dressing is left over. Do not make the mistake of putting it into the soup or with the "turkey on toast;" while a little helps to flavor it, more than a little spoils it. Instead, save it for the next roast of chicken, lamb, or fish, first carefully separating from it any tell-tale bits of skin or blood discolorations. Pack it in a clean dish and set it away until needed. If kept in a very cold place, which admits of no fermentation, it will keep sweet indefinitely and will save making new, when dressing is again on the menu.

That haste makes waste is never so true as when making gravy, for hastily stirred thickening, especially if it be flour, is sure to result in unsightly lumps. Sometimes the lumps are brought about by insufficient stirring, after the thickening is added; in either case do not give the mixture up as hopeless, but try the egg-beater, beating while the sauce or gravy is hot; you will be surprised at the result, the lumps will disappear leaving a light creamy consistency, an improvement upon even the mixture, bearing no accidents, in fact since discovering the valuable aid of the egg-beater in such emergencies, we have formed the habit of using it upon all sorts of liquid mixtures, soft custards, creams and especially cream for eclairs and cream pies.

Lumps have no more terrors for us, neither has the curdled cream, "dip," or gelatine, provided it can be served or hardened at once.

Whip it briskly with the beater, and serve immediately before there is time for the separation to recur; even the most careful cook is sometimes caught with a curdled mixture, especially in mid-summer, but the vigorous use of the egg-beater will get one safely over the exigency.—Exchange.

In His Private Capacity.

By Owen Oliver.

I was walking to the offices of the Society one morning in November, when I observed four smallurchins at a corner. Two of them were dirty and ragged boys. The others were of the opposite sex. They were also dirty and ragged. The smaller girl was sncking her thumb. The smaller boy was screaming for no apparent reason. The less small boy was endeavoring to pull him along. The less small girl was wiping his eyes with a piece of discolored rag. He resisted both processes, till a larger boy appeared on the scene at a run, shook him till he had no breath to roar, and held a grimy fist in front of his nose to prevent further outbreak.

"Now, you kids," he said, "I've got a treat for yer."

"Wot yer got, Billy?" asked the less small boy.

"A—'apenny?" said Billy impressively.

The crying boy grinned and the rest laughed.

"Two fardins!" the bigger girl explained; and they grinned again.

Billy took the smallest boy's hand and the others struggled to get next to him.

They trotted along just in front of me, so I could not help hearing them.

"An 'apenny seems a lot of money," reflected the bigger girl, whose name appeared to be "Mord."

"I 'ad a penny once," said the suck-thumb girl whom they called "Evelin Mybel," "an' bought a 'ole bar of chocklit. My!"

"Tain't nothink," said Billy, "to wot some people 'as. I took a bob on my own last Sat . . . sellin' football editions."

"Ow many 'apennies is a bob?" asked the less small boy, whose name was "Enry."

"Bout twenty. But that's nothink. I shouldn't wonder if the bloke"—he meant me—"wot we passed 'ad got gold money; quids an' 'af quids!"

"Ow many 'apennies in them?"

"Millions!"

"More'n if we 'ad a penny each?" asked "Mord." It was evident that they needed a lesson upon the coinage.

"If I give you a penny each," I said, "how many half-pence will they amount to?"

I hope I have made it clear that I am not likely to be guilty of the reprehensible practice of giving children alms. Instruction is a different matter.

They seemed unable to answer, so I doled out five pennies. I was about to explain their relationship to other coins when I noticed Miss Simmons just behind. She is secretary of the Society. Some of the Board consider her too young and good-looking, but I have always liked her.

"Run off and spend them," I said hastily; and away they rushed, arguing shrilly about the relative merits of "bullseyes," "rock," and "mister."

"Good morning, my lord," said Miss Simmons.

From the way she said it I felt sure she had noticed. So I decided to walk to the office with her and take the opportunity of preventing any misconception. I did not want her to go chattering to the Board.

"Good morning," I said. "There is a good deal of poverty in this district requiring very careful investigation before relief."

"I think the need of relief is apparent sometimes," she answered.

I shook my head.

"Investigation is necessary for four purposes," I quoted from my book. "First to see if relief is really needed; secondly, to ascertain whether the claimant is worthy of assistance; thirdly, to judge if it will be properly applied. Fourthly—"

"But if you see a raged little child, my lord? You know it is poor. It can't be its own fault. And if you give it a penny it will get some enjoyment out of it." She looked up at me with tears in her eyes. I had not noticed at the office that she was so absurdly womanly!

"You forget the danger of pauperizing the child," I reminded her. "The prevalence of mendicancy in Spain, for example, is largely due to infantile training."

"One risks danger, sometimes." She smiled; and I was sure that she had seen me. So I pointed out, also, that exceptions to the general principles might sometimes be made by myself, or even members of the Board, though not by ordinary persons.

I resolved, at the same time, not to make them in future; but the next morning I had the misfortune to meet the four younger children. Miss Simmons was just ahead, and looked round suddenly as I was getting rid of them. I dropped the last penny. She must have heard it ring on the pavement.

"I was making inquiries from those dirty children," I explained when I overtook her, "with a view to soup tickets."

"I am afraid they would not benefit much from soup tickets," she said. "The parents would probably sell them and buy beer. People of that sort always do."

"Ah!" I said. "Umph! Then the children won't want tickets."

"Children never do. They want sweets and toys."

"My dear Miss Simmons!" I protested in horror. "Tickets are a fundamental principle of the Society. If such a thing were mentioned to the Board!" She flushed.

"I did not suppose you would mention it, my lord."

"No, no!" I said hastily. "Certainly not. Anything that we have heard, or seen, in our private capacities is, of course, confidential." She bowed. "I should be very glad to have your opinion in that way."

"I would risk pauperizing the poor little children; and give them any pleasure in my power." I frowned sternly.

"Surely you have studied the Society's pamphlets upon the danger of promiscuous almsgiving?" She laughed.

"In my private capacity I am a woman, and, therefore, insensible to argument." I laughed, too.

"I will refrain from argument until we are inside the office."

"Then I become a paid servant, and do not argue. . . . If you saw how they live, my lord; how little pleasure they get! You do feel for them, I know." "Nothing of the kind," I interrupted hastily.

We reached the office door, and I stood back for her to go in. When she was in the hall she turned and smiled.

"I agree with the pamphlets now, my lord!" she said.

Then she ran off to her room and I went to mine.

Upon reflection, I concluded that the habits of life of the dirty children might furnish useful illustrations of my theories for the next edition of the book. I therefore entered into conversation with them upon subsequent occasions. Such remuneration as I gave for information obtained must not be confused with alms, any more than the payment for other services.

In the early part of December, Evlin Mybel failed to appear, and I learned that she was ill in bed. I suggested to Miss Simmons that it was a case for our district visitors, and possibly beef-tea tickets.

"I will go myself," she said. "You never know that children get the beef-tea; but you do know if you amuse them. Children want cheering up more than anything, when they're ill."

"Exactly" I agreed. "Perhaps you will take a sovereign and apply to any 'cheerful' purpose outside the objects of the Society."

"A sovereign is too much. You can get a very good doll for half a crown."

"Doll!" I cried. "Charity is not intended for the provision of luxuries." She looked at me.

"What do you expect me to do with the sovereign, my lord?"

"I have no doubt you will do something opposed to all principles laid down by charitable authority!" I said severely. "But please understand that I wash my hands of it." Thereupon I put the sovereign down on her desk and left the room.

Evelin Mybel was not seriously ill. Miss Simmons informed me next morning, only weak and ill-nourished.

"However," she said, "I gave her some beef-tea myself, and left her getting the new doll to sleep, and—"

"Miss Simmons," I interrupted, "never mention the word 'doll' to me again, please. I can not prevent your doing foolish things in your private capacity, but you must not expect me to approve of them."

So she said no more about it; but two days later I saw that she had been crying, and asked what was the matter. "It's Evlin Mybel's doll," she told me. "The mother has sold it for a shilling, and gone out drinking. The poor child was broken-hearted, and—and—"

"Why didn't you get another?" I asked. "I disapprove of dolls, of course, but under the circumstances—" I put my hand in my pocket.

"Of course, I bought her another, but that will be sold, too."

"Ah!" I said. "I see. I was wanting to do a good turn to some respectable people in the country. If they could have a child to board with them for a few weeks it would be a help."

"The Society never sends children for holidays."

"I should think not, indeed! We are not a Cook's Agency for dirty children! But if you thought of sending her anywhere in your private capacity"—I laid a banknote on the table—"the good people might as well have the benefit of their regularity." I pencilled down the address of my mother's old gardener and his wife. "I happen to be going there this afternoon by the 2:10 from Charing Cross, so if you insist upon sending the child, I will secure her safe arrival. She'll have to be made presentable."

So she did send her, or, rather, she took her. I pointed out that I could not be bothered with the sole charge of a child. Evlin Mybel looked almost respectable in some new clothes, and with a clean face and tidy hair. Mrs. Brown was quite taken with her. She also formed a high opinion of Miss Simmons.

"A sweet young lady, Mr. George," she said. "I mean, 'my lord.' . . . If your poor mother had been alive—You've a kind heart like her, my lord."

"Nothing of the kind, Mrs. Brown," I said. "Nothing of the kind. You will see that the child has such things as amuse children, of course, and charge me. Goodby."

"God bless you, Mr. George—I can't call you anything else—and the young lady."

Then Miss Simmons and I went back to town. We had a very interesting conversation upon the journey; and I was confirmed in my opinion that she was a very intelligent girl, and well fitted for the post of secretary.

A few days later I met the other boy and girl, both crying.

"Billy's broke 'is leg," she said. "There won't be no Christmas for us now."

"Why not?" I inquired.

"'Cause 'e won't have no money. Goin' to 'ave a Christmas tree for us, 'e was." It is astonishing how wasteful the poor are!

"Toys on it," the boy wailed, "'an' fardin' candles!"

I induced them to study the copper coinage instead of howling, and obtained Billy's address. In the afternoon I went there. It was up eight flights of dirty stairs, but the room itself was clean. Billy was in bed, and his grandmother was making skirts. She offered me her chair, but as it was the only one I elected to sit on the end of his bed. She explained that Billy was her grandson, and that the crying boy and girl were his cousins.

"Rare fond of them children, 'e is," she stated, "'an' Evlin Mybel, wot's a friend of theirs, as I don't approve of, 'avin a drunken mother."

"She can't 'elp it," said Billy stoutly. "She's a good little sort. I s'pose it was you as sent 'er into the country, WILMINGTON N. C.

"Umph!" I said. "Do you want to go there?" He looked doubtfully at his grandmother. "Your grandmother could go and look after you." The old woman drew herself up.

"I ain't never been be'olden to nobody sir, not for myself; but I'd be rare grateful to you, if Billy 'u'd like to go." But he shook his head.

"She'd mope," he told me in a hoarse whisper. "That's wot she'd do."

"You see, sir," she explained. "We're a family wot 'as kep' together, wot is left of us, specially at Christmas time; and Billy alwus set store on the party wot we 'ad and laid out to 'ave a Christmas tree for the children same as last year. 'Owsomever—" She drew a deep breath and went on with her sewing.

"Evlin Mybel was comin' too." He sighed. "Never seed a Christmas tree, she 'adn't. Maybe I'll manage it next year."

"As it happens," I remarked, "I have a Christmas tree that I've no use for. There are some toys too, now I come to think of it. If you would take them—" The boy's eyes glistened, but the old woman frowned over her sewing.

"I am a proud woman, sir, for a poor woman, and never took nothink from nobody" she said slowly. "But hit's different with children." She stopped working and looked up with a smile. "Children 'ave a call on ev'rybody. It ain't no loss givin' to them, I'm thinking; just a loan to God. Just a loan to God!"

"Then you will let me 'lend' some beef-tea and things for William. If my doctor happens to be round this way—"

She began wiping her eyes and I made hastily for the door. People of that class have, unfortunately, no proper control over their emotions.

After I had bought the tree I realized that it was too large for their attic, so I had to hire a room. This involved the provision of furniture and decoration with flags, holly, and other rubbish. A man from the shop called at the Society's office above it. As I was out, and he was a fool, he spoke to Miss Simmons. She seemed quite hurt that I had not consulted her.

"It would have been such a pleasure to do anything for the children," she told me. "We always had a Christmas tree for the poor when father was alive." Her father was a country vicar. Owing to reckless expenditure on Christmas trees and other mistaken charity he left her penniless.

"I should have asked you to help," I assured her. "Only there are some people who misunderstand these matters. If you should mention it to the members of the Board, for example—" She gave me a look like a flash of lightning and turned to the door; but I intercepted her. "I knew you would not tell them," I confessed. "The fact is, I didn't know what you would think of me." She gave a crying sort of laugh.

"Sball I tell you, my lord?"

"Er—no!" I could see she was going to say something foolish. "But I wish you would come and help me choose the toys this afternoon."

So she came and helped. In fact, she did it all, exeopt just writing the check. On the afternoon of Christmas Eve she also helped me to arrange the toys on the tree and lay out the tables for refreshments. I was compelled to have refreshments. The lower classes think so much of eating and drinking.

"Have you engaged any one to superintend the party?" she asked as we were leaving.

"No—o," I said doubtfully. "I thought I could manage somehow!"

"You mean to say you are giving up your own Christmas to it!"

"I am not giving up anything. I shall be bored here instead of at my club. That's all." She drew a deep breath.

"Let me come instead," she proposed eagerly. "I shall be alone in lodgings. It would be such a pleasure to me." I knocked the ash off my cigar thoughtfully.

"Why shouldn't we both come?" I suggested. Her eyes sparkled.

"I shall be delighted to be one of your poor guests," she said merrily. "It will be a curious party!"

"A very curious party," I agreed.

It was. There was Billy's grandmother, sitting in an armchair and beaming on everybody; and her daughter, a stout, red-faced woman, who kept an apple-stall. She had been in the ballet years ago, and showed the children how to dance. Alf, her stepson, who was looked up to by the others, being a well-established crossing sweeper, with a pitch of his own, sat in another armchair nursing his wooden leg. The crying boy and the other boy turned somersaults round the Christmas tree. "Mord" turned them, too, till her mother very properly intervened. "Evlin Mybel" made violent love to Billy, who hobbled about with a stick. The other small boys and small girls—we had let each child ask a friend—did all sorts of preposterous tings.

Miss Simmons turned the chaos into an ordered bedlam, by making them play absurd games. Much against my inclination I was dragged into them. I found myself waltzing with "Mord," and being hit over the back with the hunted slipper. I lost a coat-tail at "Oranges and Lemons," broke my eyeglasses at "Musical Chairs" (a most violent game), and had to stand on a form for a forfeit till a "young lady" lifted me down. The lady was named "Becky," and her surname was either Moses or Solomons (I mixed them up rather). She took me round the legs, and we both sprawled on the floor. It is a pity that the poorer classes can only be amused by horse-play!

I was relieved when supper gave me a rest. At least, I had only to serve ginger-beer and lemonade and cakes and other indigestible things. It is astonishing how much children can eat!

After supper we had bludman's-buff. I was caught with great frequency; and I am sure that the handkerchief was not tied properly. The lower orders have no sense of rectitude in such matters. On the last occasion I fell right over Billy's grandmother, chair and all. She said that she liked to see me 'playin' so 'earty," and that I reminded her of her "pore ole man." He was a travelling tinker, I believe, when he was alive.

She also suggested that, in her young days, young people made a proper use of the mistletoe. So the boys began chasing the girls and hauling them under it. So far as I could see, the girls were perfectly willing to go, and the violent exertion indulged in was quite unnecessary. In fact, when Billy could not hobble fast enough to catch Evlin Mybel, she came back to him.

"Never mind, old Billy," she said, "I'll catch you!"

When "Mord" and "Becky" began to catch me, I thought it time that the orgy should stop. So I arranged them in a line to "draw" for the things on the Christmas tree. Miss Simmons had arranged the process with me so that the children should all draw what they wanted. I called out a number and Miss Simmons gave out the presents, because nobody but herself knew their number! The children had three draws each, and the grown-ups had one present of a more substantial and useful kind without drawing. I was afraid that Billy's grandmother would be offended by having a present given her; but fortunately she was not.

When the distribution was finished, Miss Simmons shared what was left of the cake and sweets among the children. They insisted upon giving three cheers for me, and three more for Miss Simmons, and about twenty more for the two of us. I do not think they would ever have stopped, if the cab had not come for Billy.

When they were gone Miss Simmons and I sat on the table and ate sandwiches and drank ginger-beer. We had not had the time to partake of anything before.

"Hasn't it been splendid!" she cried enthusiastically. "Presents for all!"

"Even the hostess." I produced a small case. It was nothing much—just a little gold watch. I had noticed that hers did not go. "You will oblige me very much if you will accept this." She flushed.

"I—I don't think it would be right for me to take such a valuable present my lord."

"Present!" I said. "Nonsense. It is remuneration for your valuable services in assisting."

"Then I don't want it!" she cried sharply. Women are most curious creatures.

"There's no pleasing you," I said testily. "Of course, it is a present. You are one of my guests tonight and you must do as the rest do, and take what I give you. There's a good girl!" I pushed it into her hand, and by some oversight I did not let her hand go.

"Now there's only—me!" I said.

"It is more blessed to give than to receive" she said, in a very low voice.

"Not if you want something very much. I do. But perhaps I'm too old and cross?" She snatched her hand away and began to cry.

"You aren't," she said, "only—you know what I mean." I put my arm round her.

"I am very lonely, Alice," I whispered.

"So," she sobbed, "am I."

"Perhaps you care for some one else?"

"No," she said firmly, "I don't."

"Perhaps you don't care for me?"

"But I—oh, please let me go."

Of course, I didn't!

"I wonder" she remarked, some ten minutes later, what the Board will say!"

"I do not," I said firmly, "allow the Board to interfere with me in my private capacity!"—Collier's Weekly.

The Effective Remedy

WASHINGTON, IOWA, April 4, 1903.

I was troubled for over a year with so scanty a flow that it was virtually suppression. A heavy cold superinduced this condition and nothing I could do seemed to help me.

The only effective remedy I ever found was Wine of Cardui. Within two weeks I felt the good effects of the medicine and after I had used 13 bottles in all I was as healthy and regular as any woman could wish to be.

WINE of CARDUI

Wine of Cardui cures nine out of every ten cases of the disorders of menstruation. These cures are permanent, whether the trouble is complicated or not.

Wine of Cardui cures the sickness of young girls, relieves the weakness of adults, banishes leucorrhœa, headaches, backaches and nervousness and eases the crisis attendant on the change of life.

Thousands of mothers besides Miss Root's sister have found grateful relief from the pains of childbirth and have had a quick and happy recovery from its use. You cannot afford to suffer when $1.00 bottles are sold by all druggists.

Our Little Folks.

Children's Letters.

Barium Springs, N. C., Dec. 11, 1903.

Dear Standard:

It is not long until Christmas. The holidays begin about two weeks. I hope you will have a good time. The Home has seven cows, two mules, one horse and two colts. I have to work at the barn part of the evening. I have to make a fire under a pot at the spring house to heat water so the milking boys can wash the buckets in warm water. Miss Celeste, our matron, said we may have candy stew tonight if nothing happened. From a little friend who is glad to get a chance to write to you. Jimmie Pope.

R. F. D., No. 14, Derita, N. C., Dec. 5, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl eleven years old. I am going to school at Back Creek. My teacher is cousin Bessie Utley. I go to church at Mallard Creek. We have a new pastor. His name is Mr. J. E. Summer. We like him very much. My Sunday school teacher is Mrs. Galloway. My papa takes your paper. I like to read the letters from the children. I must close for this time. Your friend, Myrtle Kirk.

Red Springs, N. C., Dec. 15, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I have been reading the little folks' letters in your paper. I am going to school to S. P. C. and C. W. at Red Springs, N. C. I am studying arithmetic, second reader and spelling. My teacher is Miss McAllester. I am nine years old. My Sunday school teacher is Mrs. C. F. McMillian. I must close for this time. Your friend,

John Graham.

Old Hundred, N. C., Dec 15, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I have been reading the little letters in your paper, so I thought I would write. I am going to school at the Southern Presbyterian College. My teacher's name is Miss Flautt. I like her very much. We are going to have a Christmas tree in our department. School is out the 21st, and I am expecting to have a good time during the holidays. I must close. Hoping to see my letter in print, I am your Unknown friend,

Edith McNeill.

The Christ Child's Birthday Present.

By May C. Ringwolt.

With her sweet, young enthusiasm she told them of the first Christmastide,—of the Christ Child cradled in the manger because there was no room in the inn; of the Christmas carol of peace and good will sung by the angels to the shepherds watching their flocks by night.

Clarice's face was rapt; her eyes adoring. Of all the teachers in the Sunday-school, none was so lovely as her own Miss Maud. She was certain that the Christmas angels had the same shining yellow hair. Did they wear those fascinating gold hairpins, too? One was slipping out from the soft fluff over Miss Maud's left ear. If only she dared tell her! But that morning she had asked the awful privilege of holding Miss Maud's muff—a rich sable with a beautiful bunch of violets fastened to it—and there was no courage left for further intimate speech. Suddenly the spell was broken, and Clarice turned with an angry jerk from the object of her worship, and fiercely scowled at an inoffensive little girl seated beside her.

"Excuse me," meekly apologized Agnes, the new scholar.

Clarice drew her light blue silk skirts away from the dingy brown cashmere touching them; held herself very straight; and, with a snperb dignity, sniffed the violets on the muff.

"And now, my dears," said Miss Maud, "as you know, Wednesday will be another birthday of the Christ Child, and we want every one here to give him a present—just as you would give a present to your own little brother on his birthday at home." She radiantly smiled. "Do you wonder how you can do that when the Christ Child has become a king in heaven? I'll tell you. He's left in his place all the poor little girls and boys in this big world, and told us that in giving them we give to him. Not far away is a great hospital for little children who have crippled legs and arms, and poor, crooked backs, sick children who can't run and play, but have to hobble about on crutches or lie in bed all day. Wouldn't you like to make their Christmas so happy that they'd forget their pain?" Her smile gathered up their eager nods of assent, as a golden thread gathering pearls. "I knew you would! Well, I'm going to tell you a secret." She leaned confidently near. "The day before Christmas we're to have a dear little service down here, and over there on the platform will be an empty manger, and, as we sing our Christmas carols, we are going to march up to the manger and each put in a gift for some little Christ child at the hospital. Won't we have a jolly time deciding what to bring! Why, it will be almost as exciting as if every girlie of you were playing Santa Claus!"

Again Clarice's smiling face was clouded by a scowl, and one round elbow poked the new scholar's arm.

"Clarice!" exclaimed Miss Maud, severely.

"She's crowding me!" defended a sulky voice.

Miss Maud looked up at the little brown figure shrinking back into a corner. The child's eyes were luminous; her face flushed; her lips parted. "Agnes was so intently listening to me that I'm sure she didn't realize that she was leaning against any one. I'm surprised at you Clarice!" A cheek hid its shamed crimson in the soft muff. To have Miss Maud "surprised" at you was ignominy itself! Hot tears wet the violets. It was all Agnes' fault. She would never forgive her—never!

And when Sunday school was over and Agnes, with a timid smile, asked if she might walk up the street with Clarice, that unladylike little girl slipped her arm through that of her chum, Anabel, and, whispering and giggling, stalked by Agnes without a word.

The tears came into Agnes' eyes, for mother would not let her play with the little girls in the new neighborhood into which they had moved, because the children there were rough and boisterous, and used naughty words, and she was very lonely. But she was a brave little soul, and dashing away the tears, she was soon skipping along in the sunshine, thinking what a lucky girlie she was to have two lively legs, and a straight, strong back.

Agnes remembered the time, before dear father's death, when they lived in a cunning cottage of their own on a pretty avenue, but now mother and she had only one room at the top of a gloomy house on a forlorn back street. Still, as her feet clattered up the dark, uncarpeted stairs, her heart was full of happiness because she had reached home at last,—for even one room is home when mother is there.

"Oh, mother," exclaimed Agnes, "I've so much to tell you!" And cuddled in mother's lap, an arm about her neck, a hand patting her cheek, Agnes sweetly prattled of the Christ Child of old, and how his birthday was to be kept by giving presents to poor, sick little children left in his place. "And mother," she cried, "I've made my selectchen already! I'm going to give a doll just like my own dear Peggy! Do you think, mother dear,—if I sewed, too, you know—you could get the dollie dressed in time?"

The smile faded from mother's lips, and the arm about her girlie trembled. "My dear little Agnes," she murmured, with a catch in her voice, "mother is so sorry to disappoint you." She panted, then bravely went on. "Agnes has grown to be such a little woman that mother is going to explain everything to her. You know, dear, for three whole weeks mother had no work to do."

"Yes," chimed in Agnes, gaily, "and it was just beautiful! We took long walks, and, in the evening, instead of the stupid sewing, you told me the loveliest stories!"

"Bnt love," explained mother, with a sad smile, "when there is no work there is no pay—no money to buy anything to eat nor coal to keep us warm."

"We ate every day, though, mother dear, and most generally always we had a fire."

"Yes, dear, because a kind man let us have all that we needed, and trusted mother to pay for it when she got work again. So, you see, Agnes, the money that mother is making now does not really belong to us but every cent must go to pay our debts."

A small head solemnly nodded.

"It hurts mother very much not to give her darling any Christmas toys nor let her girlie's kind heart have its wish about the dollie for the poor sick little child at the hospital, but Agnes will try to be a good little girl about it, won't she?"

The arms about mother's neck tightened their hold, but Agnes' mouth twitch-ed, and she had to blink very hard to keep back the tears. If she had no present to lay in the Christmas manger, how would the Christ Child know that she loved him? "Of course," she argued to herself, "I could 'splain in my prayers that I had nothug to give." But had she nothing? Her face suddenly crimsoned, and a great lump choked her little throat. There was Peggy herself!

Without speaking, she got down from mother's lap, and darted across the room to her little bed. There, propped up by a pillow, sat Peggy in a stiff pink calico dress. The curls had all been combed out of Peggy's stragging hair; the roses had long ago faded from her cheeks, and in a sad accident Peggy had parted company with the end of her nose.

"You dear!" whispered Agnes. Her lips formed a determined line. How could she have thought of giving Peggy up! What would she do all day without a dollie to play with. What would she do at night without a dollie to sleep on the pillow beside her? But how disappointed her sick little girl at the hospital would be Christmas morning when all the other children had lovely presents, and she found that she had been left out? Agnes stooped over the bed, gathered Peggy in her arms, and pressed her to her aching heart. * * * * *

It was the day before Christmas, and the children had sung all but their last carol—the carol which they were to sing as they marched to the manger and laid down their gifts one by one.

The door softly opened, and a little brown shadow of a girl with a small object hugged to her breast slipped timidly in. For a moment Agnes stood dazed, as if she had suddenly entered fairyland, for the bare walls of the room were festooned with heavy ropes of Christmas greens, the shades at the windows were drawn, and all the chandeliers brilliantly lighted, while above the awaiting manger shone a glorious electric star. Then, ashamed of being so late, she hurriedly tiptoed to her place, the vacant seat beside Clarice.

Clarice met her with a cold stare, but the gaze of Agnes' eyes never reached the unkind little girl's face for it rested in fascinated awe upon a vision of beauty in Clarice's arms. It was a doll such as fairies might dream of. She had dark, clustering curls and magnificent brown eyes. Her cheeks glowed with color, and there was the cunningest dimple in her round chin. She was dressed in claret velvet trimmed in white silk, and wore a claret velvet poke bonnet with white silk springs and an exquisite white plume gracefully touching the brown curls on the right side. And best of all she had a necklace of gold beads, and gold bead bracelets dangling over her hands.

"Oh," murmured Agnes, "won't your little hospital girl be pleased!"

"My little hospital girl!" scornfully whispered back Clarice. "You don't suppose I'd give my best doll away!" Here's my present,"—she held out a box of jack-straws. "Lady Lucile and I simply stopped in." She airily tossed her head. "We're on our way to a Christmas eve party."

"Form in line, my dears," interrupted Miss Maud, briskly. "Yes, our class comes last, but you must sing all the time that we're marching."

The children's voices caroled joyously as the procession pressed forward, but one little singer was mute. She was the last in the line, a little brown shadow of a girl with a small pink object hugged to her breast. Miss Maud stood by the manger now heaped with all sorts of playthings, and nodded and smiled as each wee member of her class approached. Puzzled, she watched Agnes pause, look at the manger with frightened eyes, and hesitate. Then she saw the small pink object lifted to the child's lips, and heard the sound of a smacking kiss of farewell before trembling hands laid a doll with straggly hair, faded cheeks, and a broken nose among the new toys.

"Why, my dear," cried Miss Maud, putting her arms about Agnes, "what is the matter?"

A great sob shook the tiny figure.

"Tell me all about it," comforted Miss Maud.

And Agnes brokenly confided the whole story. But as she explained how mother's money belonged to somebody else, and how she had nothing to give the Christ Child except her only doll, neither of them noticed a little listener who drew nearer and nearer.

"No, no," cried Agnes, "I wouldn't take her back. I want the little hospital girl to have her,—she'll 'preciate Peggy's crippled nose, won't she?" Agnes forced a smile through her tears. "Only," she faltered, "it will be so—so lonesome without any—doll—ie."

Something tugged at Miss Maud's skirts. She turned, and, with a start of surprise, looked down into Clarice's eager face.

"I've lots more at home, you know," she whispered. And laying Lady Lucile in Agnes's astonished arms, Clarice ran after her chum, Anabel.—The Interior.

Welcome into the Realm of Santa Claus.

These are busy days. He has to be everywhere at once, peeping around corners to see who are the good girls and boys, trying to find out what everybody wants, so that he can make everybody happy on Christmas morning. Then he has to come to Belk Brothers and get everything ready to fill the thousands of stockings on Christmas morning. But Santa and everyone else find Belk Brothers wonderfully helpful in getting things for Christmas. Here are the broadest, choicest stocks of holiday goods to be found in the Queen City, a safe, convenient, comfortable store, efficient and courteous salespeople.

We offer special wholesale prices to committees purchasing Dolls, Toys, Xmas Novelties, etc., for Sunday-schools, Church and School Entertainments.

AN OPPORTUNITY FOR PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.

DAVIDSON COLLEGE is the right arm of our Southern Presbyterian Church. It is the manufactory which takes the finest raw material the South can furnish and returns it to the Church and the State in a life-giving stream of trained intellect, moral power, and spiritual leadership. Ever since the War swept away three-fourths of her endowment, the old College has been struggling with poverty. With an income from invested funds diminished by steadily falling rates of interest, confronted by the competition of liberally supported State Colleges and Universities and by the increasing expensiveness of modern college instruction and equipment, she has not only demonstrated her right to live, but is today stronger, more useful, more prosperous than at any time in her long and honorable history.

The long list of improvements recently made in the equipment and facilities of the College is most encouraging; yet the work has only begun. If any one, to whom the Lord has entrusted money for the advancement of His Kingdom on earth, is looking for an opportunity to invest it profitably; to transmute it into brains and character, broadened vision and trained leadership; to set in motion a stream of influence which shall outlast stone and marble and be training immortal souls long after the giver has gone to his reward, let him study the list below of those things which Davidson College needs that she may worthily carry out her high ideals in the Christian training of young men!

1. ANOTHER DORMITORY BUILDING.—The new Dormitory completed last Summer is full of students; so is every other College building. Should the number of new students applying for matriculation next fall number only half as many as have entered this year, the College would find it impossible to accommodate them.
2. AN ELECTRIC LIGHTING PLANT.—This is urgently needed not only for comfort and convenience, but for the sake of economy and safety from risk of fire.
3. AN ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR of Latin, English and Mathematics. These departments are now over-crowded, and it is impossible for the Professors in charge to teach them to the best advantage.
4. THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A CHAIR OF BIOLOGY, with class-rooms and laboratories. This is the most conspicuous and unendurable gap in the list of courses taught at Davidson.
5. A COMPLETE SEWERAGE SYSTEM, with modern sanitary closets. Our splendid system of water works makes this feasible; the rapid growth of the town and College makes it necessary.
6. THE RENOVATION OF THE CHAMBERS BUILDING, with the introduction of steam heat. This immense building, constructed in 1857 at a cost of $85,000, is sadly in need of a complete overhauling. It should be re-floored, repainted, heated by steam, and divided into three parts, giving separate entrances to each of the two wings containing dormitories, leaving the great pillared entrance for the central part of the building containing halls, library, class-rooms, and laboratories.
7. A NATURAL HISTORY BUILDING with Museum, class-rooms, and laboratories for Geology, Mineralogy, Botany and Zoology.
8. A NEW ATHLETIC FIELD, with a high surrounding fence and a comfortable grand-stand. The present athletic ground is entirely too small for our increasing numbers, and an additional one is necessary.
9. A LARGE OUT-DOOR GYMNASIUM, covered with a light roof, like the play-grounds recently constructed in the parks of Boston and New York. The present Gymnasium is entirely too small, and to build one large enough would be very expensive. A thousand dollars would build and equip an open-air Gymnasium which would accommodate the whole College on rainy winter days.
10. A LARGELY INCREASED ENDOWMENT, that the fees charged by the College and rigidly collected may be reduced, that the College may offer more lenient terms to young men struggling with poverty, and that its grounds and buildings may be beautified and kept in more perfect condition.

Christmas Presents.

Fountain Pens.

What is better for a present than "Parker's Lucky Curve" Fountain Pen? This pen is kept in order 13 months and sold at prices to suit all, from 1.00 to 10.00 each, and sold by us only, as we have the sole agency for Wilmington.

In thinking over your list of presents you may want things for every member of the family, and some times the minister and some times the school teacher. We have estimated your wants and purchased our line of Christmas goods accordingly. In toys we have bought largely for the wholesale as well as the retail trade. Our dolls we import direct. They are made in Germany and we can sell them to you for less than others. We have them in almost every grade, from 5c apiece to 6.00. Our dressed dolls at 50c and 1.00 are better than any we have ever shown, and our 1.00 Bisque doll is the same doll we have been selling at 1.25 each. They are hand-made, with sleeping eyes and natural hair.

Men's Clothing.

In the Clothing Department we are working hard for business. Our stock is complete in every detail. We can fit you up with suits that are nobby, pretty, and stylish. To save money on your clothing bill, buy of us, or at least give us a chance to compare prices and goods with other merchants. We have suits at 2.00 that is good goods. For a 5.00 bill you can get strictly all wool Cheviot that is well made and stylishly cut and will give good service. Our 7.50, 10.00 and 12.50 suits are equal to the best and we think are 2.50 less than others ask for the same suit.

Men's Overcoats.

We are showing several different lines and prices. A good, long coat, warm and nice, at 2.98. A heavy coat at 4.50. A better coat at 5.00. An extra good coat at 6.50 and a beauty for 10.00.

Ladies' Cloaks.

These we have in all styles and prices. Some of them are beauties. In cut and style we have them in Military Tight-fitting and loose. We have a variety of colors and in prices to suit all. Our Military Cloaks are especially attractive and are made up in Zibelines and Broadcloths, and range in prices from 6.50 to 9.80 and up to 15.00.

Ladies' Tailored Suits

This is a new venture, but we expect to win, for we can show Ladies' Suits in Zibelines, Broadcloths and Novelty Goods for prices lower than others sell them. They are beautifully made and a splendid fit. We have them for 9.98, 12.50 and 15.00. These, too, we can show in Military-Style, the new fad.

Skirts are on our tables in large numbers, and a good selection, from 1.00 to 7.50. They are much cheaper than to buy the goods and the making, and have a style that only tailors can give.

We also have handsome Waists in Silk, Worsteds and Mercerized goods. There are Sweaters, too, for ladies and girls, men and boys.

Remember our Christmas goods. We have sold toys for the last fifteen years and expect to sell more this year than ever before, for our stock is complete in every department.

Remember, we are headquarters for Christmas Goods.
