The Low Inn.

Henry Jerome Stockard.

Pilgrim, what though, prone, belated,
You are hastening but to win
Somewhere down the lonely valley
The low inn ?

***

It has housed full many a traveler---
Peasant, monarch, prophet, Christ;
And the cheer that it dispenses
Has sufficed.

***

Drink the slumber-giving beaker,
And forget the hurting cold,
While the gradual shades of evening
Are unrolled.

***

Sleep! nor fear, for you shall waken
To the warden's call at dawn;
And, a child, in some glad morning,
Journey on.

Event and Comment.

A Happy New Year to all our friends!

An English court has just awarded $135,000 damages to a railroad to be paid by a labor union. Incorporate the unions and hold all corporations responsible for damages to each other or the public and a better day will dawn.

The Commons and the Lords have both passed the Education Bill, which has been so vigorously opposed by the Non-Conformist Conscience. We shall now begin to see whether the courage of its opponents is as true as their conscience was clear.

Principal McVicar, of the Presbyterian College of Montreal, Canada, is dead. Rev. John Kelman of Edinburgh has declined to accept the call to the theological chair at Toronto. And Presbyterian education in Canada loses heavily by both events.

Certainly one way to make the New Year profitable is to renew or to begin a subscription to the Presbyterian Standard. And a gift of a subscription to a friend will be of spiritual good to the recipient and will remind him of the giver fifty-two times during the year.

It is all right for a Methodist minister to be the correspondent of a secular paper. But when the correspondent suggests that the licensed saloon is the best solution of the liquor problem, and that there should be no legislation against child slavery, the minister ought to omit the usual Amen.

The largest Congregational Church in America, Tompkins Avenue Church, Brooklyn, has secured as pastor, Rev. Nancy McGee Waters, D. D., of Binghamton, New York. The pulpit committee traveled thousands of miles and found their man near home.

Rockefeller made a Christmas gift of $1,000,000 to Chicago University for the cause of education. The articles by Miss Ida M. Tarbell, in McClure's Magazine, on the methods of the Standard Oil Company, detract a little from the universal feeling of gratitude for this particular Christmas gift.

We congratulate Rev. C. G. Vardell on the beginning of his canvass for the Twentieth Century Fund in Wilmington Presbytery, the report of which may be found elsewhere. We hope to have good news before long from the canvass in the western part of the State. Now is the time to get subscriptions.

It may not be a pleasant thought to all, but it may be a profitable thought even at the beginning of the New Year, that some of us will find quarters in the Low Inn of which Mr. Stockard so beautifully writes. The poet has put a great deal of gospel into those four verses. We are all journeying thither, but Christ has entered its door, and after the sleep of the night we shall awaken too.

Dr. Lorenz, the famous Austrian surgeon, has sailed for home, after a visit to America in which he cured hundreds of crippled children and comforted many a mother's aching heart. He is a great physician and his goodness and tenderness of heart have made him a beloved physician, too. And there is no higher calling on earth, saving only that of the physician of souls. The Lord Christ was both.

Christmas week the roses were still blooming in our front yard. O, ye dwellers in the cold and coalless North, come South, all, come South.

Good for Governor-elect Mickey, of Nebraska. Mr. Mickey is a loyal Methodist and the Methodist Book of Discipline condemns dancing, certainly the modern kind. And there will be no Inaugural Ball at the Governor's Mansion this year. We have always wondered why it was that since statesmanship implies brain development, it was necessary to inaugurate the incoming of a state official with a celebration conducted by those who have cultivated merely the agility of the heel and toe.

Those who have been rejoicing over the liberal tendency shown in the institution of a Biblical commission by the Pope should take to heart this principle of interpretation which is to govern the commission: "It is not the laws of hermeneutics, but the divinely appointed guide and teacher, the church, that can throw light on the obscurity of the sacred books; the legitimate sense of Scripture is not to be found outside the church." That commission will not need a Bible at all. All it is asked to do is to find out what the church has said about the Bible and reconcile the contradictions of infallible opinions whenever possible.

The Methodist Episcopal Church, North, set itself to the task of raising twenty million dollars and adding two million converts to its rolls by 1903. The twenty million dollars has been raised, but less than one hundred thousand converts are reported. The raising of money is human work. The regeneration of souls is divine work. On the whole, we think it is very well that the Westminster Confession declares that the number of the elect and the non-elect is "so certain and definite that it can be neither increased nor diminished." The desire to rescue one soul from hell is a better motive than the desire to add two million converts to a church.

In some respects Australia is not antipodal to the United States. It is true, as they used to tell us in our geographies, that it is winter here when it is summer there, that the trees shed their bark as ours shed leaves, and so on. But there is one thing that does not change. Australia is having the same sort of trouble that we have with the Roman Catholics on the question of education. They are fighting the state system and clamoring for grants to their own schools. They vote without regard to national interests, and Catholic politicians appoint their Catholic brethren to office. In some respects Australia is not antipodal to the United States.

"Rankin—Asleep—Pneumonia." This cablegram from Seoul, Corea, was received in Nashville, on December 28. It meant that the beloved and honored editor of The Missionary, Rev. D. C. Rankin, D. D., had died of pneumonia, while on his foreign tour in Korea. So far, that is all we know of the circumstances of his falling asleep. At a later date we shall publish a sketch of Dr. Rankin's life and give his picture to those who have so often read his words and have never seen his face. He was a good man. As we think of his useful career, his value to the church, especially in the last office which he held so acceptably, for he was editing the best missionary magazine in this country, it is his goodness of heart that stands out most distinctly. He was a good man and he has gone to a blessed reward.

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

January! From the old Latin god, Prospective and Retrospective. Janus. There were two things about old Janus that have handed his name to the generations that have had something better to believe in than the Greek and Roman mythology. The temple of Janus was closed in time of peace, the doors standing open in time of war. As the Romans were a warlike people who believed in imperialism without apology, these doors were opened most of the time. But they were closed during a part of the reign of Augustus Caesar, and at the time when Jesus Christ was born. This January dawns upon a world over which peace reigns with scarcely an exception. The war-cloud that hung over the coast of Venezuela has scattered under the benign sun of Arbitration. It may be considered just as foolish some day to put a principle to the test of war, to appeal to the arbitrament of the sword, as the oratorical phrase is, as it seems to us to have been foolish that the ancient Britons tied an accused man up in a sack and threw him into deep water to see whether he was guilty or not of the crime charged against him. Meanwhile let us rejoice that the doors of the temple of Janus are closed. He who was born when they were closed long ago, is bringing it about by his influence upon the hearts of men, that they shall be closed, some day, forever.

And then Janus was a two-faced god. This was not as much to his discredit as it would have been to be double-faced. But he looked behind and before, forward and backward, into the future and into the past. So it has come about that the month that is named for him is the month for taking stock and making plans, for indulging in reminiscences and issuing prospectuses, for profiting by past experiences for the sake of more successful work in the New Year.

This number of The Standard begins the forty-sixth year of its publication, and the sixth under its present editorial management. On the fiftieth anniversary of the paper, if the Lord will, we shall have quite a celebration with old friends and new. There are some who subscribed for the first number who are alive and remain until this day, and many, we trust, to whom our greetings go today, who will celebrate with us the semi-centennial.

But the present only is ours. And this seems to be a convenient time for taking a look backward over five years at least, before going the next step forward.

Five years ago we were wondering how to write a salutatory to an expectant public, after a flattering introduction by an honored predecessor. We had had almost no experience, comprising that of exchange editor of the Hampden-Sidney Magazine, as a college boy, and later, as a Seminary student, that of associate editor on the first staff of the Union Seminary Magazine. We had, in that position, the pleasure of criticising a preacher for an anti-foreign-mission sermon (on the theory that one's neighbor was his neighbor) and the preacher most disrespectfully referred to the writer as "some little fool at the Seminary." We also had the pleasure of suggesting to the Presbyteries that they had better exercise a little more oversight over some of the students who were snapping chapel and recitations, and the students had the pleasure of defeating the associate editor for the position of editor-in-chief the next year. From which we learned the lesson that it is not well for an editor to depend upon an unrestricted suffrage of his admiring fellow-citizens, for his position, so long as he finds it necessary to rebuke them, now and then.

The Fayetteville Presbyterian—four pages, four by six—ran its brief course in one year, and it was about as unpopular for its size as a paper could well be, with some people. And then we started The Synodical Evangelist which was combined with The North Carolina Presbyterian five years ago. It was the warm commendation by Dr. Jacob Henry Smith of the little Evangelist that suggested the possible editorship of the larger paper, and a series of providences seemed to indicate this as the only solution of problems arising in the work of superintending Synod's Home Missions. And so it happened that five years ago we were trying to write a salutatory. Without experience or cash or credit, with a capital that consisted of a small mailing list and the good will of a paper that had never published a dishonorable number in forty years, we began the task. But we had friends who had faith.

It would take a volume to write even the experiences that are recalled now. Some of the controversies appear at this distance to have been hardly worth the while. Others developed important principles as they proceeded, and we can say that we never met a manly and straightforward antagonist for whom we did not feel a greater respect and often a warmer friendship by reason of the controversy. For sophistry and casuistry, the contempt that was felt has not always been concealed, nor for other forms of falsehood and cowardice.

And then people have had to learn that both sermons and writings for the public are public property and subject to criticism, and that criticism is necessary in producing a higher standard of excellence. Especially in the proceedings of our church courts has it been regarded by this paper that publicity was the cure of many evils and the threat of publicity the prevention of many more. We believe that some things have been attempted in the last five years that would have succeeded but that this paper told the people the truth about them, and that the like of them will not be attempted again because it has come to be recognized that this paper will tell the truth without fear or favor and that where principle is concerned it knows neither friend nor foe. Certainly this should be no extraordinary claim for a religious newspaper to make, considering that there are any number of secular papers of high standing that are actuated by the love of truth and disinterested zeal for the public good.

We sincerely hope that there will be fewer controversies in the next five years than in the last. We think that there will be less for two reasons. The paper has largely outgrown the local conditions that once rendered its interference with local abuses a duty. And the Standard has made its reputation for the fearless rebuke of what it considers false or wrong. This reputation has even been enhanced with people who do not see the Standard through the zeal of papers which prefer fighting a rival through the representations of agents, to a controversy in cold print. But we do not wish to be misunderstood. Abuses that need rebuke must not get too rank. And the surest guarantee of peace is readiness for war. We hope for peace. We pray for peace. And we are keeping the powder as dry as some religious papers are.

Looking over the old files of the paper has been a pleasing occupation during the last days of the old year. Each volume is thicker than the one preceding and the last one weighs just ten pounds, which is pretty heavy, whether weighty or not. We have gone steadily forward, from 16 to 20 pages, from 20 to 24, from 24 to 32, and from 32 to 36, making a volume of 1800 pages. At the end of the first year it was decided to change the name from a local to a general one and by a corresponding change in the character of the paper to seek a general circulation. The results have abundantly justified the wisdom of this policy, for the Synod which has been the loyal friend of the paper for forty-five years has now the news and views of the whole church as well as its own. While we think we may say without presumption, that the whole church and even other churches know more of North Carolina Presbyterianism and of Southern Presbyterianism than ever before, and to know is to respect.

Doubtless with the experience of five years as a guide we should have avoided many mistakes. We may claim two things, however, that we have never been shown an error which we did not try to correct, and that today we do not recall a single position of importance that would not be taken again under the same circumstances. Again this should not be much of a boast for a religious paper to make. He who will not acknowledge an error is a poor teacher of truth, while with principle for a guide there is no need to go in devious ways and thus be compelled to retrace one's steps.

Of course, we are sorry for some of the enemies that we have made, or rather, sorry for having made them enemies. If anything we ever wrote struck a responsive chord in the editorial breast of our fellow-craftsmen it was this little paragraph:

The hardest thing about an editor's work is the knowledge, which comes to him more and more clearly, that to serve his constituency faithfully and to ring true on questions of righteousness, he must sacrifice valued friendships and cut the closest personal ties, and be misunderstood by those whose worth he recognizes and whose reasons for hostility to himself he perfectly understands. That hymn must have been written for editors: "We shall know each other better when the mists have rolled away."

But on the other hand we are proud of some enmities that we have incurred, and if we know anything they have been incurred for righteousness' sake. There are only two ways in which such enmities can be cured, by a surrender to unrighteousness or by the regeneration of the unrighteous. If we know it, there will be no surrender.

But as we think of the way over which we have come, the trials and the difficulties, some might call them hardships, of burdens borne and help bestowed, of indifference and incredulity and opposition overcome, and of the friends who had faith, the first feeling that arises is that of gratitude to God for his goodness. And this feeling suppresses any especial care for the future. So far as we can see the prospect is bright enough. So far as we can see this is our life-work and the blessing has been given us of love for our work. What more can a man ask? We are even tempted sometimes to echo the wish of our friend and often times opponent, Dr. W. C. Gray, which may be gratified in his case for all we know, that the Lord has a newspaper job for us on the other side.

An ideal is not worth much that can be realized in this life. It is idle, therefore to confess how far short we are conscious of having fallen from the ideal that we set before us five years ago. We print it again, not as though we had already apprehended, yet pressing toward this mark:

"— to publish a paper, second to none; one that will be attractive to the eye as well as to the mind, that will give the news from all parts of the Church, that will command the best talent of the Church, in its contributed articles; that will take its own position on the questions of the day, guided solely by the love of truth: that will be the enemy of every abuse and the advocate of every reform; that will be the earnest and effective promoter of all the great causes of the Church, looking to the extension of the Kingdom of Christ; that will be the friend of education and of temperance and of social purity; that will be as a pastor to its people, in the comfort of the sorrowing and the tender care of the little ones."

We print also again this appeal, from the pen of George McNeill, soldier, preacher, editor, man of God, first printed in the first number of the North Carolina Presbyterian, January 1, 1858. And we make the appeal our own with far more earnestness and sincerity than we could have felt five years ago:

"Above all we look to the supplications of God's people in our behalf, their earnest and fervent prayers that we may be endued with power from on high, unshrinkingly to declare the truth and unflinchingly to combat error. Let us but know that we are thus remembered and thus supported, and we can tread our path of responsibility in the full confidence that He who hath enabled us to begin this good work will also work in us and by us for the accomplishment of his great and gracious purposes."

The Christmas bells rang peace on earth. But since the days of Augustus Caesar there has never been a better guarantee of world-wide peace than the outcome of the Venezuelan trouble. The three great Protestant peoples have come to a definite understanding.

A few years ago Mr. Cleveland startled two continents by his Venezuelan message. As soon as the facts became known, as disclosed in the message itself, the American people forgot all differences and stood together as one man. And the love of fair play triumphed in Britain over the love of territory and even national pride. When it was learned in England that there had been practised a policy of encroachment upon Venezuelan territory for years, that all proposals to arbitrate a dispute over a boundary line had been refused, and that a war with that little country was imminent as a final resort to consummate a brutal policy, public sentiment in England demanded a return to justice and the matter was settled by arbitration.

And Britain has been the steadfast friend of the United States ever since, while the shallow-pated abuse of the mother country has died out in America, except among the irreconcilable exiles of Erin.

Germany was just a little jealous of American success in the Spanish War and of American acquisition of the Philippines. Germany was a little ugly toward Great Britain during the South African troubles. And America and England, with a perfect understanding between them, resented the attitude of Germany. The Emperor of Germany is no fool. He recognizes a stone wall when his hard head comes in contact with it. And so Prince Henry, the Popular, comes to America, as a token of good-will toward the people who dearly love a prince from somewhere else. And William himself went to Germany to see his royal uncle. And then a little later, English and German war-ships steamed together to the "lightless coast" of Venezuela. And Uncle Sam quietly said that he couldn't endorse a note in bank for Venezuela or anybody else, but in the mean time that he held a first mortgage on all the land in the Western Hemisphere, if any of it had to be foreclosed. And England and Germany said: Certainly, we understand that. And then they asked Mr. Roosevelt to act as umpire, but he very wisely directed them to an umpire that was already chosen, the Hague Court, and the trouble has blown over.

Of course Kipling did not like it and The Rowers was a poem to stir the blood and perhaps it expresses British sentiment to date. But the great English apostle of Christmas, Charles Dickens, is still read in English homes. And the Christmas bells were ringing, Peace on earth.

Consider how much has been gained. The three Saxon nations have handled together, and with cordial understanding, a difficult and delicate problem.

The United States has served notice on the so-called Republics to the South of us, that the Monroe Doctrine is not in conflict with the law of nations and that if a country misbehaves it is liable to a whipping. And Germany, for the first time, and Britain, once more, have disclaimed any intention of violating the Monroe Doctrine, by colonization or the seizure of territory. And both of these things spell peace. America owes much to Richard Olney and John Hay, to Grover Cleveland and Theodore Roosevelt. And the common-sense of Roosevelt declining to meddle, when the Hague

Court was already open for business has practically saved that court from extinction, while setting a precedent for the settlement of future claims. Nor do we care how strong the alliance between these three nations becomes. The combination is too great to quarrel with other nations, much too great to be quarrelled with. It may be the beginning of "The Parliament of Man, the Federation of the World."

Review of Contemporaries.

Extremes Meet. The Two C. P.'s and the Amended Confession.

Says our esteemed contemporary, the Central Presbyterian, quoting from a correspondent of the Philadelphia Presbyterian, with regard to the action of Pittsburg Presbytery in adopting the amendments to the Confession:

"When the earnest plea of a professor of the Western Theological Seminary, against putting in our Confession, as an article of faith, any statement which could not be supported by Scripture, failed to make any impression, all saw that there was no use, and the vote revealed the strength, numerically, of those who were bent on breaking down the bulwarks of faith."

The Central Presbyterian then continues the Jeremiad thus:

"In the Pittsburg daily papers, the Methodist ministers approved the action, one writing, 'I am glad to see the Presbyterians have got squarely on the Arminian platform.'

And the Unitarian minister gave his view as follows: "The action of the Presbytery is in accord with the trend of modern thought, to recognize the humanity of God and the divinity of man."

These things are respectfully referred for consideration to any of our brethren in the South who have given approval to the amendments and additions to the Confession of the Northern Assembly."

The Northern Presbyteries have voted with perfect unanimity to adopt these amendments. As the Central Presbyterian has been holding up this so-called revision as a bugaboo to frighten the unthinking and to confirm the prejudiced, and is now quoting with approval the slanders of ignorant Arminian and Unitarian preachers, as against the overwhelming sentiment of a great Presbyterian Church, it is worth while to remind the reader what the amendments amount to.

We are aided in the attempt by another contemporary, the Cumberland Presbyterian. The two C. P.'s are at the antipodes as to motives but use the same methods. The Central Presbyterian tries to paint the Northern Church in as dark colors as possible, and as different from the Southern Church as possible. The Cumberland Presbyterian is trying to make the Northern Church appear as Cumberlandish as possible. The Central is afraid of union with the Northern Church. The Cumberland is anxious for it.

The Cumberland Presbyterian discusses "The Content and Extent of Revision." It frankly admits that the "Brief Statement," having been adopted by the Assembly alone, "is in no sense a creed, nor a substitute for, nor an amendment of the Westminster Confession of Faith." So far, so good.

The Cumberland Presbyterian does not claim and we suppose the Central will hardly claim, that the changes in the text of the Confession, the only changes proposed, affect any doctrine of the church. These changes are: A verbal one relating to the works of unregenerate men, the elimination of the statement that it is a sin to refuse to take a lawfully administered oath, and the substitution of these words—"the claim of any man to be the vicar of Christ and head of the church, is unscriptural, without warrant in fact, and is a usurpation, dishonoring to Christ," instead of the bolder statement that "the Pope is . . . . Anti-Christ."

Does the Central see anything Unitarian or Arminian in those amendments?

Then there are two foot-notes ordered to be inserted as explanations of the text. The Cumberland Presbyterian calls the first one "a complete revision." You see the Cumberland Church has been making capital lo! these many years out of the supposed fatalism of Chapter III of the Confession. We cannot help believing that still further improvement of the ministerial standard of education would enable our Cumberland brethren to see that they had been fighting a man of straw all these years. Of course there is no fatalism in the Third Chapter, and Presbyterians know what fatalism is just as well, perhaps, as Cumberland Presbyterians do, and they insist that the Third Chapter does not teach fatalism. Yet in deference to the weaker brethren who were so violently offended the following foot-note will be printed at the end of the chapter:

"With reference to Chapter III of the Confession of Faith: that concerning those who are saved in Christ, the doctrine of God's eternal decree is held in harmony with the doctrine of his love to all mankind, his gift of his Son to be the propitiation for the sins of the whole world, and his readiness to bestow his saving grace on all who seek it. That concerning those who perish, the doctrine of God's eternal decree is held in harmony with the doctrine that God desires not the death of any sinner, but has provided in Christ a salvation sufficient for all, adapted to all and freely offered in the gospel to all; that men are fully responsible for their treatment of God's gracious offer; that his decree hinders no man from accepting that offer; and that no man is condemned except on the ground of his sin."

We should like to ask the Central whether it finds Arminianism or Unitarianism in that paragraph, adopted, as the Declaratory Statement says, as a "disavowal by the church of certain inferences drawn from statements in the Confession of Faith."

The next declaratory statement, of course, we cannot expect the Central to accept, though it will hardly find any Arminian or Unitarian tendency in it. It reads:

"With reference to Chapter X, Section 3, of the Confession of Faith, that it is not to be regarded as teaching that any who die in infancy are lost. We believe that all dying in infancy are included in the election of grace, and are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who works when and where and how he pleases."

Even the Cumberland Presbyterian is hard put to it to find anything Arminian or Cumberlandish so far. It falls back on the new chapters, "Of the Holy Spirit" and "Of the Love of God and Missions." Neither does the Cumberland Presbyterian show just where these chapters, which it must be remembered are additions to the Confession of Faith, contradict anything that has gone before. It says that there was no need for the chapter on missions for a church that leads Christendom in missionary enterprise, or of one on the Holy Spirit, where so much is preached already about the Holy Spirit. Then it throws an exclamation point and says: "Note such statements of these in the chapter about the Holy Spirit."

"The Holy Spirit prepares the way for the gospel, accompanies it with his persuasive power, and urges its message upon the reason and conscience of men, so that they who reject its merciful offer are not only without excuse, but are also guilty of resisting the Holy Spirit."

Well, what of it? It is not quite clear that this is inconsistent with Calvinism, or is tinctured with either Arminianism or Unitarianism. We never saw an intelligent Presbyterian who did not believe every word of it. See the Shorter Catechism on Effectual Calling.

Here is another quotation: "The Holy Spirit, whom the Father is ever willing to give to all who ask him, is the only efficient agent in the application of redemption."

Well?

"By the Holy Spirit the church will be preserved, increased until it shall cover the earth, purified, and at last made perfectly holy in the presence of God"—to which the Cumberland Presbyterian makes the addition. "The appropriation of the familiar Cumberland Presbyterian doctrine of the 'preservation of believers,' by the way."

As if any Presbyterian who believes in the "Perseverance of the Saints," should have to "appropriate" anything from Cumberlandism on that point!

And doesn't the Central feel obliged to acknowledge the truth of those quotations from the amended Confession? Or take two others that the Cumberland Presbyterian regards as conclusive:

"It is the duty and privilege of every one who hears the gospel immediately to accept its merciful provisions; and they who continue in impenitence and unbelief incur aggravated guilt and perish by their own fault."

"God in his infinite and perfect love, has provided a way of life and salvation, sufficient for and adapted to the whole race, and freely tenders this salvation to all men in the gospel."

And what is the matter with those statements? The C. P. of Nashville finds them Anti-Calvinistic. Does the C. P. of Richmond find them Arminian?

The fact is, that Cumberland Presbyterianism has made its plea for existence on the ground of a slander. It has accused Presbyterianism of believing in fatalism and disbelieving in the infinite love of God and in the offer of salvation to all men. It has refused to accept the interpretation the Presbyterian Church has put upon its own creed, and is now claiming that the Northern Church has come over to the Cumberland, because it has said, what every Presbyterian preacher with sense enough to come in out of the rain has said for generations. Wittingly or unwittingly, it has built on a false issue, and has sought proselytes through misrepresentation.

Let us not make the same mistake in the Southern Church. The Northern Church has had a long fight over the question of revision and the Conservatives won. The slight amendments proposed do not touch a doctrine. And now the effort to stir up prejudice against our sister church on the ground that it has departed from the faith—and to represent the old creed with these amendments as now satisfactory to Arminians and Unitarians, is ridiculous, whatever a few uninformed Arminians or Unitarians may say. It amounts to a declaration that the Westminster Creed needed mighty few alterations to make it Unitarian or Arminian or both.

We believe these amendments, with one exception, to have been unnecessary. But they may not have been unwise, since even the conservative Herald and Presbyter considers them "not an opening wedge, but a stopper."

A Legend.

A legend was told me the other day which may interest you. A young man, discontented with his lot, dreamed a wonderful dream. He was carried into a beautiful country, and was driven in state through leafy bowers and under arching trees, through groves redolent of orange blossoms. Rare exotics bloomed on every side. The place seemed a perfect fairyland of beauty. After driving for miles and miles, he stopped before a magnificent palace. It was built of marble, and the carving was of the finest workmanship. Its minarets and domes were ornamented with rare jewels, which flashed in the sunshine. The doors were of pearls, the floors of gold, and the ceilings, instead of being frescoed, were studded with rubies and diamonds. The building was of enormous size, covering, with its wings, fully a square mile, and everything was on a scale of rare splendor. Stepping to one side of the palace, his eyes rested on a dark, brown niche, small, but in such striking contrast to the palace, that he asked the guide what it meant, and why that was not marble also and set around with precious stones. Imagine the young man's surprise when he said: "The fault is yours. This is the Palace Beautiful, and this is your niche. You have been unhappy because of your lowly station in life, and since you could not have a position of prominence you have spent your time discontentedly, while others have been improving their time and talents. It rests upon you alone to make this palace perfect." The young man awoke, saw the lesson taught by his dream, and set to work to marbleize his brown niche.—Thrift.

"Live on the Top Floor."

The phrase belongs to Henry Drummond, but it is a modern putting of the exhortation of Paul to the Colossians, "Set your affections on things above"

Every person is affected by the atmosphere that envelops him, and the effect is often greater and more serious than he knows or is willing to believe. A vigorous plant will grow feeble and die if kept in a cellar. It needs the sunlight and the open air. A human plant will likewise sicken and succumb if kept in an atmosphere that stifles every upward desire and hinders every out reach of the soul. As the plant needs the sun or its development and lie, so the soul needs the atmosphere of the Sun of Righteousness or its stimulation and growth.

There is no satisfactory growth on the lower levels of life. For the body, there is only retarded development and physical distress; for the mind, intellectual stagnation and enfeeblement; for the soul, spiritual befogment and dissatisfaction. Only in the higher, better, purer atmosphere, is there safety for body, mind and soul; for in that atmosphere dwells God—Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

If you would hold sweeter communion with God; find an easier and surer victory over temptation; have a clear consciousness of duty; be possessed of firmer religious convictions; know more of the mysteries of the kingdom; be more serviceable to your fellows, and have your life yield richer blessings to yourself, and a more abiding influence in the future, seek the higher atmosphere, think nobler thoughts, do worthier deeds, speak kinder words, live truer lives.—The Christian Advocate.

"Love is appreciated, not so much by what it does as by what it longs and tries to do. For love is of God, and he that loveth is born of God and knoweth God.' Love transfers the base charcoal of human nature into the diamond which reflects the radiance of duty."

Missionary.

Missionaries have been a conciliatory influence again and again, and have allayed hostility which diplomats and traders have aroused. They did this in Japan. The Jiji Shimpō, one of the leading newspapers in Japan, speaks of this in advocating the sending of Buddhist missionaries to Korea. "Japanese visiting Korea will be chiefly bent upon the pursuit of gain, and will not be disposed to pay much attention to the sentiments and customs of the Koreans, or to allow their spirit to be controlled by any consideration for the country or the people. That was the case with foreigners in the early days of Japan's intercourse with them, and there can be no doubt that many serious troubles would have occurred had not the Christian missionary acted as a counter-balancing influence. The Christian missionary not only showed to the Japanese the altruistic side of the Occidental character, but also, by his teaching and his preaching, imparted a new and attractive aspect to intercourse which would otherwise have seemed masterful and repellant. The Japanese cannot thank the Christian missionary too much for the admirable leaven that he introduced into their relations with foreigners, nor can they do better than follow the example that he has set, in their own intercourse with the Koreans."

And missionaries in the same conciliatory spirit have opened, by treaty, some sealed lands to Western intercourse and trade. The United States Government's treaty with Siam was negotiated in 1856, and Dr. Wood of the embassy wrote that "the unselfish kindness of the American missionaries,—their patience, sincerity, and truthfulness,—have won the confidence and esteem of the natives, and in some degree transferred those sentiments to the nation represented by the missions, and prepared the way for the free and national intercourse now commencing. It was very evident that much of the apprehension they felt in taking upon themselves the responsibilities of a treaty with us would be diminished if they could have the Rev. Mr. Mattoon as the first United States consul to set the treaty in motion." In 1871, the Regent of Siam frankly told Mr. Steward, the United States consul-general at Shanghai, "Siam has not been disciplined by English and French guns as China has, but the country has been opened by missionaries."

The great districts of Uganda and Nyassa in Africa were practically secured to Great Britain by the missionaries of the Church of England and the Scotch Presbyterians. When the East Africa Company was on the point of giving up Uganda, which would probably have involved its loss to Great Britain, the Church Missionary Society raised £15,000 of the £40,000 needed to maintain the Company's hold for one more year until the British Government could be induced to take it over. Of the work of the Scotch Presbyterians in Nyassa Land, Joseph Thomason, the traveler, bears testimony after his visit in 1879: "Where international effort has failed," he said, "an unassuming mission, supported only by a small section of the British people, has been quietly and unostentatiously, but most successfully, realizing in its own district the entire program of the Brussels Conference. I refer to the Livingstonian Mission of the Free Church of Scotland. This mission has proved itself, in every sense of the word, a civilizing center.—R. E. Speer.

If any one should obstruct the mails, he would be punished as a criminal. So would he be if he should tap a telegraph wire and steal from himself a message. But he would be guilty of a sin still worse if he should hinder the progress of a gospel over the earth by failing to give for missions or take an interest in them.—Christian Endeavor World.

Phil. 4, 1-13. January 11, 1903.

The church at Philippi has been planted by Paul and Silas, under many difficulties. It seems to have manifested peculiar consideration and tenderness towards the apostle Paul in ministering to his physical wants. He shows special affection for this church and receives their benefactions without hesitation. After his imprisonment at Rome, he sent them the Epistle to the Philippians by Epaphroditus.

This Epistle contains many instructions, exhortations and warnings. The passage now considered, presents some important elements of Christian living.

1st. Christians Should manifest Graces.—They profess to be regenerated by the Spirit and to have His indwelling in the heart, therefore should exhibit His fruits which are graces. One of these is steadfastness. Paul urges his brethren to stand fast in the Lord. Believers should be not wavering nor vacillating, but steadfast in faith and conduct. The Apostle exhorts "Be of the same mind in the Lord." He affirms that the Lord Jesus Christ is the source, both of steadfastness and unity. A third Grace is Joy. Paul says: "Rejoice in the Lord always." Joy from other sources may fail, but the Lord may ever be a source of gladness. Gentleness also should be shown by a Christian. The apostle directs, "Let your moderation be known unto all men." The word rendered, "moderation," denotes not self control, but a yielding, placable disposition. Another Grace to be manifested by the believer is freedom from anxiety. Paul urges "Be careful for nothing," and states that prayer and thanksgiving will exempt from anxiety. In addition to steadfastness unity, joy, gentleness and serenity of mind, the Christian should enjoy Divine peace, which derived from Christ should guard the soul securely.

2nd. Christians Should Uphold the Excellent and Perform Known Duty.—The Apostle commands, "Finally brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things. The disciples of Christ should nourish and sustain in heart and life, the true, the honorable, the just, the pure, the lovely, the approved, all moral excellence, and every thing deserving praise. Nor should they neglect known duty. Paul directs "Those things which ye have both learned and received and heard and seen in me do." He enforces the command with the promise, "And the God of peace shall be with you." Whatever is enjoined by apostolic authority upon believers they should be encouraged by the assurance, that in the path of obedience, they shall have with them not only the peace of God, but the God of peace."

3rd. Believers Should Exhibit Contentment with God's Providences and Divine Strength.—Paul affirms, "For I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." I know both how to be abased and I know how to abound; everywhere and in all things, I am instructed both to be full, and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need." We are not urged to be so content with our worldly estate or our moral condition as to make no effort for improvement. But we are commanded, when we have made all due exertion to do our duty and to secure benefits, to be satisfied with such results as God orders. This is submitting our will to the Divine will, and is true Christian contentment. To be satisfied with poverty if God sends it, or with abundance if he grants it, requires much grace. To be content in all things at home and abroad in failure and success, in prosperity and adversity, demands a large measure of Divine help, and marks a ripe Christian experience. Hence Paul points to the Christian's source of aid and declares, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me."

Why is there so much apathy among our people about the young people's work? From the way in which this work is neglected it would appear that it is something to be avoided as an evil thing. It is one of those things which it is even hard to get people to discuss. Some things are talked to death, but this work of our young people is not even shown the respect in many quarters of being discussed, but just sat upon without any such preliminary. If preachers and elders do not approve of the work, why do they not come out openly and say so? To this writer there seems possible but two reasons. The first is an entire ignorance of the subject, and the second is a feeling shame to be numbered among those who oppose the movement. Now ordinarily, we never think of connecting Presbyterians with shamefacedness or cowardice. On the other hand, they are noted for their boldness in advocating anything which they approve of and just as bravely opposing what they believe to be hostile to the welfare of the Church. What then are we to conclude with regard to their attitude toward this matter? It seems that the inevitable conclusion is that they are ignorant of the subject altogether. This also seems to be a condition which Presbyterians are supposed to not be in for a very long time if there is any possible chance to have the ignorance removed. Why then should we make an exception of this very important matter?

We have the most logical and rational system of theology of any church on the earth because it is Scriptural. We have the system of church government which by test has proven the strongest and best of any system known to mortal man, because it has the authority of the Bible back of it. This work which has been outlined and planned for our young people is either Scriptural or it is not Scriptural. If it is Scriptural it ought to have the hearty co-operation of every pastor and session in our church. If it is opposed to Scripture either directly or by inference it ought to be condemned. Every preacher and elder ought to have well grounded opinions on this matter and having them, ought to be willing to state them. The highest court of our church has declared itself in sympathy with this movement. The church at large therefore stands committed to it and if it wishes to be freed from this responsibility, it ought to start an agitation which would result in the rescinding of the action of our General Assembly. But who is willing to do so? In the mind of this writer it would be a great deal better to have any who may be opposed to this work declare themselves, rather than endure the apathy which seems to have settled down on such a large portion of our people about it. Open opposition is to be courted rather than hostile silence. If you do not agree with the Assembly, come out manfully and say so. Opposition that is not expressed is hard to meet.

Here are a few questions which we hope you will read and answer. If you are interested enough in the work to send your answers to the editor of this column, he will give them careful consideration and publish in this column any that may be offered for publication.

1. Have you ever been closely identified with a society which was doing the work which the Westminster League plans to do?
2. Have you ever observed the workings of any such society even if you not been connected with it?
3. Have you seen good results come from such societies?
4. Have you seen evil results from such, if so, what?
5. Did that society quicken the spiritual life of the young people or did it take away what spirituality they seemed to have before?
6. Did it unfit the young people for future usefulness in the church?
7. Altogether, were the results to the church beneficial or otherwise?

The Vindication of Calvin, Twisse and Edwards.

Rev. Jere Witherspoon, D. D.

The Presbyterian Committee of Publication, at Richmond, has issued a volume of 163 pages from the pen of the Rev. John W. Stagg, D. D., pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Charlotte, N. C. It is entitled Calvin, Twisse, and Edwards on the Universal Salvation of Those Dying in Infancy, and in setting forth the views of these "maligned theologians," as he calls them, he acquaints the reader with three types of opinion on this vital question: The Genevan or Reformed, the Scotch, and the American. The success of the author in the task undertaken is tantamount to the vindication of a great church, which misrepresentation and slander have pursued through the centuries as consigning infants to endless perdition by her Confession of Faith, as well as by her pulpit teaching, after the manner of these, her eminent and honored sons.

The writer of this article purposes no critical review of this interesting book, having no desire to participate in the discussion and thus draw upon himself the fire of controversial attack, and feels no fear for Dr. Stagg that he may be unable to take care of himself and establish what he set out to prove. I shall be satisfied if this production of mine shall awaken an interest in this masterly work in the sacred cause of literary justice and truth, which in price is above rubies, and induce seekers after truth to attend to the author's argument and review the mass of evidence drawn from every quarter with a scholar's discrimination and painstaking care. On the keen lance of logic the reader shall see impaled that old calumny which, being often decapitated, has, like the hydra, arisen again. There are certain persons who ought to give attention to this vindication by all means.

The graceful dedication shows the book to be consolatory in aim, and so bereaved parents should read it. The letter of a mother who was convinced by a newspaper article which our author wrote that Calvin rather championed than opposed the salvation of all dying in infancy, suggested the writing of a book which ought to have its place in every home where "a dead lamb" has been, and where a "empty crib" is found. It is a volume of comfort for grieving parents—the solace being drawn from the great doctrine of covenanted and uncovenanted mercy, which includes every dying infant.

A quotation from Henry's Life and Times of Calvin is given on page twenty-five, showing the very words of the great Genevan. Calvin uses them in a letter of condolence to a parent whose conscience was troubled because his child had died before its baptism, and had written to Calvin to ascertain his views on the matter. Bear in mind that one cause of this parent's distress was a teaching which the theology of Geneva, and later, that of the Westminster Assembly, stoutly opposed. Those who held to the doctrine of baptismal regeneration had little comfort for the parent whose child died unbaptized. Calvin and the Westminster Assembly declared that all infants dying in infancy were saved, and saved not by baptism but by the Spirit's renewing grace. The grieved parent had appealed to Calvin, and strange as it may seem to many who have fancied Calvin to be logic incarnated and intellect divorced from sentiment, as though it gave him pleasure to see lost spirits, old or young, writhe in eternal agony, the letter of a broken-hearted parent inquiring about the state of his dead child, brought back this answer in part: "Our children, accordingly, are redeemed, for it is written, 'I am the God of thy children.' By giving too much honor to the outward sign, we would offend God, and by supposing that our salvation is not secured by his promise, we should throw a doubt on his truth! There being no disrespect to the sacrament on your part, no harm can happen to your child because it died before it was possible for you to bring it to baptism." Referring to his visit, as a pastor, to a home where a child unbaptized had suddenly died, and where similar views about salvation and baptism were giving the parents keen distress, our author says he wishes he had known, as he was trying to find his way in that darkness, these scriptural views of Calvin, clear as the ring of a silver bell, broad enough to give peace of mind for all dying in infancy, and guarded enough to admonish every man not to despise the Lord's covenant." As a handbook of comfort in the broken home, this book is to be commended.

Those who are stirred by the controversy respecting the status of infants, dead or living, and wish to know what these representative teachers and fathers, as well as the church of Calvin, Twisse, etc., hold, cannot ignore this publication. Primarily, the author addresses himself to the task of vindicating our interpreting these three men whom the world makes responsible for a view which sends an untold multitude to perdition. The battle center of the debate about infancy and salvation, like the struggle at Waterloo, shifts here and there. At one time it is in the teaching of our Confession. The friends of revision, for the famous "elect infant" clause, declared that the phrase, "elect infants," implies the opposite: infants non-elect; the opposers of a change even of phraseology, as confidently affirm the phrase, "elect infants," implies nothing of the sort, but rather prescribes the method by which all infants are saved. Dr. Stagg does not set out to defend the Westminster Confession, but its prolocutor, or president, William Twisse, and he does this effectually by citing this language of Twisse from Riches of God's Love: "But every one that is damned is damned for his sin, and that, willfully committed and contumaciously continued in by them that come to ripe years." The scope of this masterly volume is not to define or defend the teaching of the Confession and Catechisms, although this is done indirectly, but to refute the charge against Calvin, Twisse, and Edwards, that they "paved perdition with infant skulls." Let me say again that the author's aim was not chiefly to rush into a battle over the teaching of Scripture on the point at issue. In the Vicksburg Assembly the storm center of controversy was over the Bible view of this matter. The famous resolution after the Assembly's refusal to touch the mooted clause of the Confession about infants dying in infancy, shows the Scripture to have been the battle center. The last General Assembly was "persuaded that the Holy Scriptures, when fairly interpreted, warrant us in believing that all infants who die in infancy are included in the election of grace, and are regenerated and saved by Christ, through the Spirit." The third center of the battle-line in this debate about infants is the teaching of Geneva, Westminster, and Northampton, and it is in that fierce strife, where many contend with forbidden weapons and venomous missiles, that we detect the nodding plume of this new and victorious knight of justice and truth! By logic irrefutable and proof piled in overwhelming array from every source, he shows that Calvin taught that regeneration, which the Spirit is able to accomplish in children, and, as a matter of fact, did accomplish in John the Baptist before his birth, is the only barrier to infant salvation, and not election or predestination, and that as Christ blessed infancy as a state, he warrants the belief that all passing out of that state by death do immediately pass into glory. So far from denying that any dying infants are saved, Calvin strives to show they can be saved and are saved. By ample quotations from Edwards on Original Sin and the Ground of Condemnation in the General Judgment, he makes it clear to any honest inquirer that whatever Edwards may or may not have taught, he is innocent of the charge of teaching that infants are damned.

It is but fair that this book that pleads for fairness to the dead or living, should be read by every one who has charged these great men with advocating a doctrine that makes mankind shudder.

If I mistake not, the author has made good his contention. Some books we call contributions to the literature of a subject; others are strong pleas for this cause or that, but rarely does an author, as in this case, attain fully his purpose and score success. The volume, with the head of the Genevan sage on the cover, is, to the writer's mind, nothing short of a demonstration. When I closed it after a second reading, I felt like adding with my pencil the old formula with which processes of proof in geometry are wont to conclude: "Quod erat demonstrandum."

Bible Study.

By C. Alphonso Smith, Ph. D.

An address delivered at the Bible Study Rally, Sept. 28, 1902, Chapel Hill, N. C.

As you begin today another scholastic year of Bible study, there are five points, young gentlemen, that I wish to emphasize. Perhaps you know them already, but it will do no harm to present them afresh.

I. In the first place, let there be system and unity in your study. Do not attempt too much in your proposed courses. Select some definite phase of Bible thought, some well defined topic; let it be neither too exclusive nor too comprehensive, but let it make for unity and concentration. "He did not read the Bible by snatches," says the biographer of Vance, "as a good many people do, but he read it by subjects and periods, frequently perusing it for hours at a time."

It has long seemed to me that the crying defect in our current methods of Bible study is fragmentariness. In the Sunday school we study the Bible by piecemeal; in the pulpit we hear expositions of small detached portions; in our rooms, if we read it at all, it is usually "by snatches"; and so it happens that matured men and women, Christian men and women, have frequently a far more fragmentary knowledge of the sixty-six books of the Bible than they have of any other literary masterpieces. Hamlet, Henry Esmond, Evangeline, The Crisis, recall to most readers clearly defined ideas. The bare mention of each name suggests a certain symmetry of structure, a certain convergence of details, a certain continuity of design, a certain residuum of impression. These books we have read as units; we felt instinctively that the author in each had, if not a message, at least a dominant purpose and meaning which he wrought into his work. But at the mention of Leviticus, Ezra, Hosea, or The First Epistle of Peter, do you recall a cluster of ideas or even one distinct thought?

The unity inherent in each book of the Bible is of course only one kind of Bible unity. If we study (a) Character Types in the Old Testament, (b) The Women of the Bible, (c) The Children of the Bible, (d) The Prophecies, (e) The Miracles, (f) The Parables, (g) How Bible Heroes were Trained for their Work, (h) The Life and Work of St. Paul, (i) Old Testament Ordinances as Types of New Testament Truth, our study will possess unity and, in a sense, a larger unity than that of any one book of the Bible. But I believe that the unity of books, a unity both structural and topical, should come first. There is a latter day prejudice against memorizing; but until we know by heart the names of the books of the Bible, and until each name suggests something definite, we cannot even handle the Bible intelligently. Anthony Trollope used to say that, "The writer, when he sits down to commence his novel, should do so, not because he has to tell a story, but because he has a story to tell." And the writer of each book in the Bible, whenever or wherever he wrote, did so, not because he had to say something, but because he had something to say.

II. Never forget that the Bible is a part of world-literature. The Koran is literature, but the Bible is a literature. With the exception of the novel and the editorial, both of which arose in the eighteenth century, there is hardly a type of modern discourse that may not be found in the Bible. Throughout your college course you will come in contact with no book whose purely literary claims equal those of the Bible. I yield to no one in my admiration of the classical literatures, of the modern literatures, and of the more technical literature of scientific achievement. But in vividness and intensity, in elevation of appeal, in the extent of her literary empire, and in the duration of her sovereignty, the Bible takes easy and secure precedence. The most advanced nations of the world are the children of her fireside; the centuries themselves have been but handmaidens in her service. There is no modern literature worthy the name that has not felt her influence; there is no regnant people whose strivings she has not shepherded.

Not only is the Bible a literature in itself, but it is a literature that has peculiarly influenced the literature of which our own is a part. From Caedmon to Kipling English literature is permeated by Bible thought and Bible diction. The first coherent words of English speech that have come down to us are Caedmon's Hymn, a Hymn which is not only biblical in its phraseology but which is itself a paraphrase of the first verse of Genesis. Of Shakespeare's use of the Bible, Bishop Charles Wordsworth says: "Take the entire range of English literature, put together our best authors, who have written upon subjects not professedly religious or theological, and we shall not find, I believe, in them all united, so much evidence of the Bible having been read and used, as we have found in Shakespeare alone."

"Bacon's acquaintance with Holy Writ," says Professor J. Scott Clark, "is almost equal to that of Shakespeare, and the works of both unite with many modern masterpieces in testifying to the value of the English Bible as a literary model." Professor Corson thinks that Chaucer made greater use of the Bible than did even Shakespeare. "Given any thousand consecutive lines," he says, "taken at random from Shakespeare and from Chaucer, and it will be found, I think, that the proportion of allusions in those of the latter will be greater than in those of the former."

Are the more modern writers equally indebted to the Bible? "I have found," says Dr. Henry Van Dyke, "more than four hundred direct references to the Bible in the poems of Tennyson." It may be confidently stated that Browning draws far more themes from the Bible than does Tennyson. "Intense study of the Bible," says Coleridge, "will keep any writer from being vulgar in point of style." Ruskin tells us that in his childhood, as a part of his home education, his mother required him to commit to memory select chapters from the Bible. "And truly," says this master of English prose, "though I have picked up the elements of a little further knowledge . . . and owe not a little to the teaching of many people, this maternal installation of my mind in that property of chapters, I count very confidently the most precious, and, on the whole, the one essential part of all my education."

When Kipling's Recessional appeared, in June of 1897, readers seemed surprised at the Hebraic note that runs through it. They need not have been. Kipling's Seven Seas (1896) is as Hebraic in mood and diction as is any single play of Shakespeare or any equal number of pages from the Canterbury Tales. Indeed, a recent French critic, M. Le Viscomte Robert D'Humieres, goes so far as to complain that Kipling is "yet entangled with Christianity," and that "the evangelical shroud wraps him even to the heart."

III. But the Bible is history as well as literature. From Genesis to Revelation there is an historic continuity, a harmony of ideals, an interrelation of actor and epoch, that make the Old and the New Testament essentially one history. The historical unity, therefore, is the most comprehensive of all Bible unities. The different books are but paragraphs in its development. When one considers the unique significance of this history, its influence upon the world's ethical and culture standards, the dramatic vigor and unsparing frankness with which it is told, the primal simplicity and straightforwardness of its narrative,—to say nothing of the countless themes it has furnished to poet, painter, sculptor, and storyteller,—it is not a little surprising that its main outlines are not better known to the average reader. Here, again, the fragmentary method of approach, rather than neglect or indifference, must be held chiefly responsible. The Bible is read and frequently studied with no more view to the continuity of its story than if it were nothing but a dictionary.

Whatever line of Bible study you may elect, fix in your minds at least a few nuclear dates. In preserving the outlines of Bible history it will be helpful to remember:

1. That Abraham lived about 1900 B. C., i. e., about as many years before Christ as we are living after Christ.

2. That as Columbus in 1492 A. D. crossed the Atlantic to find a new land, so Moses about 1492 B. C. crossed the Red Sea to find the promised Land.

3. That the Hebrew Kingdom reached its zenith of prosperity under Solomon about the year 1000 B. C., a date which carries us into the interval between the Trojan War and the composition of the Iliad.

4. That as English history has its rival houses of York and Lancaster, so after the death of Solomon, 975 B. C., the twelve tribes divide into the rival kingdoms of Israel, or Samaria, and Judah.

5. That the Kingdom of Israel, containing the ten revolting tribes, was carried into captivity by Sargon of Assyria, whose capital was Nineveh, 721 B. C.

6. That the Kingdom of Judah, containing the two tribes of Benjamin and Judah who had their capital at Jerusalem, was made subject to Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon, 606 B. C.

7. That Cyrus, the Persian, permitted the Jewish exiles, those belonging to the Kingdom of Judah, to return to Jerusalem, after seventy years of Babylonish subjection, 536 B. C.

8. That about 450 years intervene between the close of the Old Testament and the beginning of the New.

9. That Christ was crucified in the reign of Tiberius Caesar, not far from 33 A. D.

10. That Saint John, whose writings close the New Testament canon, suffered death about the year 100 A. D.

Viewing the Old and New Testaments now as essentially one history, let us glance at some of the controlling ideas and distinguishing characteristics that run through it. This is debatable ground, but critics of every shade of opinion will admit (1) that though the Bible is Jewish and local in origin, its import and application are universal; (2) that every epoch of its history is treated from the standpoint of God, duty, and destiny; (3) that every book is characterized by a passion for righteousness unique in national literatures; (4) that the writers are patriotic to the core, but—strange paradox—unsparing in their denunciation of sin in their own heroes; (5) that though there is a national predisposition to symbol and ceremony, the essence of religion is never thought to consist in symbolism and ceremonialism; (6) that no part of the Bible, nor even the Bible as a whole, is a logically articulated system of theology; (7) that the Bible is a library, showing how men variously gifted cast the truth which they received into as many different forms as genius permitted or as occasion demanded; (8) that there is always exquisite adaptation of style and form to spirit and content; (9) that there is a steady progress in the unfolding of doctrine and ideals; (10) that the New Testament is concealed in the Old, and the Old Testament revealed in the New; (11) that the golden age of this people was in the future not, as with other nations, in the past; and (12) that the dominant fact of the Bible, to which every event leads or from which it flows, is the mission of the Christ.

This historical unity is the more remarkable when we reflect that there are sixty-six books in the Bible and that the lives of the thirty-six authors subtend a period of not less than 1000 years according to the higher critics, and of not less than 1500 years according to the more conservative view.

IV. And now a word about the Bible as a source of power for the writer or speaker. The Greek and Latin rhetoricians urge upon the speaker the desirability of putting himself in touch with his hearers by utilizing some incident, illustration, or allusion that will establish a bond of sympathy between the orator and his auditors. They urge him to appeal to a fund of common memories and common associations; for an allusion wins half its power from its relation to the hearer's own life and experience. Did it ever occur to you how perfectly the English Bible meets this need? The same book lies open upon the desk of the scholar and the pine table of the peasant. "If you touch upon one of its narratives," says Dr. Van Dyke, "everyone knows what you mean. If you allude to one of its characters or scenes, your reader's memory supplies an instant picture to illuminate your point."

No one who was present at the National Democratic Convention held in Chicago six years ago can forget the scene that followed these words: "You shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns; you shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold." A study of Mr. Bryan's speeches will show that much of his power is due to his familiarity with the Bible and to his readiness of citation. A distinguished lawyer of this state won a hopeless case, so he told me, by reading to the jury with appropriate(?) comment the story of Joseph. He wished to impress upon the jurymen the insufficiency and untrustworthiness of circumstantial evidence; and for this purpose he dwelt eloquently upon the episode of the bloody coat, the garment shown by Potiphar's wife, the piece of money in each sack, and the silver cup in Benjamin's sack. The prisoner was promptly acquitted, though the revenue officers had found several barrels of newly made whiskey concealed in his barn.

The telling use made of the Bible by Burke and Webster and Lincoln in their greatest speeches is too well known to need more than a passing mention. Senator Vance had so communed with the Bible that his style, especially in passages of heightened emotion, as in his best perorations, became almost as biblical as that of Bunyan. Three citations will suffice. In each he is concluding a memorable address. His most famous lecture, "The Scattered Nation," ends thus: "So may the morning come, not to them alone, but to all the children of men who, through much tribulation and with heroic manhood have waited for its dawning, with a faith whose constant cry through all the dreary watches of the night has been, 'Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him!'" Addressing the students at Chapel Hill, June 7, 1866, he closed with these words: "Having gone down into the very lowest depths of the fiery furnace of affliction seven times heated by the cruel malice of civil war, I believe there will yet appear walking with, and comforting our mourning people, One whose form is like unto that of the Son of God."

At Wake Forest, June 26, 1872, his peroration was a model of force and beauty: "Pray for the prosperity of our political Zion, that her strength may be as her days require; that as foes assault, her towers may rise higher, her battlements become stronger and her bulwarks increased, until she stands victorious over kings and principalities and powers, and all the weary of earth are gathered securely beneath the peaceful shadows of her walls."

These sentences give evidence of more than familiarity with merely the incidents of Bible history; they exhibit a style moulded by Bible thought and Bible imagery.

I hope that there are before me many young men who aspire to be a force in the world by the power of tongue or pen. It is a noble ambition, worthy of your highest efforts and worthy of the ancestral stock from which you come. To all such I commend these words of a great critic, poet, and essayist: "The Bible," says Arnold in a letter to his mother, "is the only book well enough known to quote as the Greeks quoted Homer, sure that the quotation would go home to every reader, and it is quite astonishing how a Bible sentence clinches and sums up an argument."

V. In conclusion, let me remind you that while the year now closing has witnessed a diminution of sectarian bitterness and of denominational bigotry, it has witnessed an increased interest in the Bible.

Never before has the Bible been studied by so many persons or with such patient scrutiny of its minutest details. The first paragraph of the famous address recently delivered by Dr. Delitzsch before the German Emperor contains this tribute to the world-wide interest that is now being taken in Bible study: "To what end this toil and trouble, in distant, inhospitable, and danger-ridden lands?"

"Why all this expense in ransacking to their utmost depths the rubbish heaps of forgotten centuries? Why this zealous emulation on the part of the nations to secure the greatest number of mounds for excavation? And whence, too, that constantly increasing interest, that burning enthusiasm, born of generous sacrifice, now being bestowed on both sides of the Atlantic on the excavations of Babylonia and Assyria? One answer echoes to all these questions—the Bible."

Of President Roosevelt's recent address on the Bible 80,000 English copies were circulated, and 10,000 Spanish copies. On July 4th of this year the 1700 teachers attending the Summer School of the South rose as one man to second the resolution favoring "the recognition of the Bible in our public schools." The same stand was taken by the National Educational Association in annual meeting at Minneapolis. The American Bible Society declare that their receipts for the last year exhibit "increase in every department" and that now "seven-tenths of the population of the world have the Bible in their own language." A century ago just one-fifth of the population of the world had the Bible in their own language.

You are not asked, young gentlemen, to enlist in a local or provincial cause, but in one whose outposts already do the islands of the Pacific and whose morning drum-beat, "following the sun and keeping company with the hours," is destined soon to girdle the globe.

Immortality.

A sermon preached by the Rev. J. K. Fraser, in the Second Presbyterian Church, Charleston, S. C., on Sunday, December 7th, 1902, the Sunday following the death of the pastor, Dr. Brackett.

Psalm CXXXIII. 3. There the Lord commanded the blessing, even life forevermore.

Life forevermore: a life beyond the grave where the purposes and plans of earth may find completion, a life immortal even here in the influence which it exerts on other lives. This is the blessing, the two-fold blessing, which God commands to rest upon his faithful children. Life forevermore—it is this which clothes earthly existence with infinite meaning, it is this which makes it worth the living. In the light of this great revelation the riddle of life solves, the mystery of death disappears. All becomes intelligible because the Lord has commanded the blessing, even life forevermore.

The belief in immortality may be said to be as old as the human race. It has been found in all ages, in all climes, and among all peoples. True, the belief has taken various forms and has had various degrees of strength and dignity. In some instances it has been little more than a shadowy hope, a vague longing, an indefinable yearning, but in some form or another it has been universal. Belief in a future life is a vital part of the experience of mankind. Wherever man is found there is found a craving for immortality.

And yet the fact of immortality is in the very nature of the case incapable of demonstrative proof, and men act unthoughtfully when they ask for such a proof. The great facts of the spiritual world are spiritually discerned. They must not be submitted to the cold crucible of scientific analysis, for the obvious reason that they lie beyond the pale of science. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of God," and cannot receive them for the reason that they are "spiritually discerned." The outward senses may perceive the realities of the outward world, it is their special function to do this, but when in addition to this, they attempt to handle the things of the spirit—the things of the unseen world—they step beyond the boundaries of their own department, and invade a realm in which they have no right and concerning which they can speak with no authority "Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." What is true of the outward senses, is also true of the intellect, the human reason. The intellect is not the organ of spiritual knowledge and (let what I am going to say be distinctly noted by everyone) the man who attempts to work his way to certainty of belief in things spiritual through a process of intellectual reasoning, and who, in his searchings, ignores the spiritual side of man's nature, shuts his ear to the still small voice of God, and his eye to the presence of the Great Unseen, will most certainly find himself in time, stranded on the barren shores of agnosticism, or it may be of Atheism.

Now, do not make the mistake of supposing that you master the spiritual world by logic. You do not master the world of nature by logic. You do not master it by science. Do you imagine for one moment that it is necessary to be a scientist in order to see and appreciate the beauties of nature? Do not thousands of people daily revel in the wonders of nature, who have never learned the first principles of science? Their hearts thrill with pleasure when in the darkness of night they lift their eyes to the starry heavens, and yet they know nothing of astronomy; it leaps up with joy every time they hear the song of a lark, and yet they know nothing of ornithology; it pulsates with gladness every time they behold a flower and yet they know nothing of botany. O no, my brother, you will never see the splendor of the world of nature through science or through logic. But what you cannot do through science or logic you may do through sympathy and intuition.

It is thus that the painter sees nature, it is thus that the poet sees it, it is thus that the little child sees it. The heart interprets it long before science ever shows you the strange mystery of its working.

And so the intellect is not the sole organ of knowledge. There are realities which lie beyond its narrow boundaries. In this age of religious unbelief and scepticism, when the tendency is to exalt the reason to a place of supreme authority it is well to remember this. It is well to remember that a man's brains are not the wisest part of him, but that in addition to brains, he has insights, intuitions, sympathies, the testimony of which is just as reliable as the testimony of the senses or the inference of logic. How many of our cherished beliefs would have to go, were we forced to dismiss as delusions and shadows everything which is incapable of demonstrative proof. Patriotism would go, heroism would go, inspiration would go, love would go. Because, I ask you, are not these things for which you have no arithmetic, no mathematical demonstration? Why the best and richest and most fragrant clusters that grow about human life, that make life beautiful and winsome, are those which have been produced, not by any analysis of modern science, not by any process of intellectual argument, but by the emotions and prayers and beliefs of the soul. And these are as real as the things which are visible to the outward senses or the human reason, as real, though seen by a different organ.

It is thus that we know God and see God. We cannot know him intellectually. Job felt this long ago. "God is great," he said, "and we know him not." And the Psalmist felt the same—"Who," he cries, "can by searching, find God, who can find out the Almighty to perfection?" And we feel the same today. We can not see God visually; we put out our hand but he is not there; in the darkness of our bewilderment, we cry out with Job, "Behold, I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him: on the left hand where he doth work, but I cannot behold him: He hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see him." Are we then to be agnostics? Oh no, there is another way of knowing God. "God is love, and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him." We know God as we know one another—by love. We have never seen his shape, we cannot comprehend him logically, but we have heard the music of his voice, we have felt the pulse of his life, we are conscious of his surrounding presence. We know him and we see him. No greater mistake can be made than to suppose that you understand Christianity philosophically or theologically. This is why men stumble over the perplexities of religion. They come to Christianity as if it were a science to be intellectually grasped, they approach its difficulties in the spirit of a philosopher or theologian, instead of coming as children, and with the heart interpreting the secrets of Christ. Philosophy has its place, theology has its place, but it is with the heart that a man believes unto righteousness.

So is it with the belief in immortality. The man who lives the immortal life, who lives a life worthy of immortality, will find little difficulty in believing in immortality. And only as he does this will he believe it. The belief, to be worth anything, must come from a personal experience. A demonstrative proof would not do, even were it possible. The evidence must in the very nature of the case be inward, subjective, and in a measure, indefinable. The worldly, unscriptural man cannot see it, the godly and spiritual can not fail to see it, and we must all doubt it until we have inwardly learned it, and then our conviction of it will grow as we grow in depth of nature and in richness of spiritual experience.

Nor is this in any way opposed to reason. There is no conflict between religion and logic. There is no conflict between religion and science. There never was any conflict between them. They simply belong to different departments and each is the correct organ of knowledge in its own department.

The belief in immortality is certainly not in any way opposed to reason. Indeed the contrary is true because looking at the belief even from the point of view of logic, or the point of view of science, I find it easier to accept it than I do to reject it. The region of the unseen life, as we have said, is one concerning which strict demonstration is in the very nature of the case impossible and yet it would be unscientific to ignore the facts which seem to point to the existence of such a life. For one thing it is unscientific to ignore the cravings of any side of human nature and to assume that for these cravings there is no satisfaction. Now, man has a craving for immortality. There is within us all a longing for a larger and fuller life than is possible to us here. There is within us a divinity which keeps telling us that we have been born for higher things, and that we have possibilities which can never be realized in the few brief years allotted to us here.

"But," say you, "are the cravings of our nature to be put forward as a reason why we should believe that these cravings will be met?"

Must we, forsooth, have a thing simply because we want it? Yes, I answer, the cravings of our nature are to be taken into account. We find that the cravings of our lower nature—the physical nature—are every one of them capable of being met by some outer reality. We are hungry and there is that reality we call food to satisfy this hunger. We are thirsty and there is water as real as our thirst. And so on through the whole long list. There is not a desire without an outer reality capable of satisfying that desire. And shall we thus take up this curious position: that every craving of our lower nature is provided for, that for it there is an answering reality; but the cravings of our higher nature must be forever unsatisfied, for these tremendous needs there is no reality? Shall we say that as far as we have been able to ascertain facts we have found that the real needs of our nature imply the existence of realities to meet these needs, but where we have not been able to ascertain whether there be a reality or not, we have concluded that there is no such reality? Would that be a reasonable argument? So, the difficulties of belief may be great but the difficulties of unbelief are still greater.

More than that. A belief in a future life is necessary in order to give this life meaning, otherwise you have no philosophy for life on earth. It is a farce not worth the playing and God himself is a great mocker. The world is full of inequalities. And the wrong is not here put to right. The virtuous starve, while the vile triumph. The martyr dies in agony, while his oppressor lives and laughs. There are times when we feel like crying out with Carlyle in his sad old age, for a God who will do something! We are forever impatient of what seems to us to be the awful patience of God! In a thousand ways life here is incomplete and unsatisfactory. It is full of unsolved problems, and if existence is to have a meaning another stage is necessary, for the completion and interpretation of this. Otherwise God's great work of creation is a failure and God himself like a child who builds a house of toys for the pleasure of knocking it down again. You pick up a volume and at once you find it to be a book of absorbing interest. There is in it plot and purpose. The human living interest of it entralls you. You finish the first volume, throw it down, and ask eagerly for the second. You are told there is no second, that is all the author wrote. "What," you cry, "there is no more! Then what did the writer mean by it all? Why did he ever begin? What a fool he must be to start a splendid work like this and never finish it!" And is the work of God like that, I ask? If after the long process of creation, man has at length been formed with his immeasurable possibilities of growth and progress, his infinite capacity to have God and the universe, is the gain of painful ages then to be in gloriously flung away! Must all this progress, this long painful development end nowhere and in nothing? Are you and I to be buffeted and stripped by time and stand at last like withered trees whose branches have been scorched by the lightning and wasted by decay? Have our fathers and mothers, who nursed us, passed away like the hurrying mists of a summer morning? And the little children who were the music of your home, has their melody ceased? And is their song not to be sung any more? And is Christ still in his grave beneath the Syrian skies? Our very reason answers, no! And that which is higher than our reasons—our moral sense—answers, no! Our whole nature made in the image of God, answers no! We may not be able to prove our immortality, but we believe it, and we believe it because we believe in the goodness and reasonableness of God. Tennyson himself, a great spiritual seer, as every true poet is, calmly voices our faith where, in addressing the Deity, he says:

"Thou wilt not leave us in the dust;
Thou madest man, he knows not why;
He thinks he was not made to die;
And thou hast made him: thou art just."

And after all has been said here is the immovable foundation. If God is good and true, if the world is an honest world, if life has the meaning that we are compelled to find in it, if existence itself does not deceive us, then it is incredible that life has been summoned out of the void only to return as quietly to the void whence it came.

And do we not all in our better moments feel the reality of our immortality? What is there that is tender in human nature that does not long for another life? Who of us is worthy to be called human who does not at times catch himself saying, "My life here is incomplete: I feel I must build again somewhere on a better soil. Although on the earth, I must live above the earth?" Are there not times even in our busiest days when some impulse seizes us, the source of which we cannot tell, and we are impelled to live better and think better and appear better. At such times we feel sure that the grave-stone is not the last milestone on the road of life, but that away beyond the horizon of our earthly view, there stretches a broader and a fuller life towards which our feet are ever pressing.

Such is the longing of the human heart for immortality. And this longing, as we all know, is justified by the teaching of Jesus Christ. And surely he ought to know, because whatever your views may be as to the person of him who is the central figure in the world's history, one thing at least you must admit and that is, that He was the supreme religious genius of time, the expert of all the ages in things spiritual; and it is certainly a strange immodesty which will lead you to set up your opinion against his in a question of this kind. He is for us furthermore the Son of God, the eternal son of the eternal God, "mind of the Father's mind, thought of the Father's thought, heart of the Father's heart," the only begotten Son, who was in the bosom of the Father, and who hath revealed the Father with confidence. We make our appeal to him and always and everywhere we find he assumes man's immortality. He lived in its very atmosphere, eternity was his native air. Life in the other world was as real to him as life in this. The two were separated by a very narrow veil and death was but the gateway to a broader life. He has spoken and we are content: "I go to prepare a place for you."

In the light of this sweet truth, my brethren, we face again the burden of life, we take of its work with both hands. We know that the grave is not the goal of human existence, and that the life we live here is but a training school to fit us for a fuller life beyond. And in the light of this truth, does not death, think you become a very little thing?

I am told by those who ought to know that few people are afraid of death when death is near. At such times there comes such a merciful weakening of the nerve and brain that the fear of death vanishes. But this I do know: that in the gladness of life, in its magnificent noon-day splendor, in its hours of delight, and its years of achievement, when life is so gloriously worth the living, then death is not a pleasant thing to think of. Yet in the power of this mighty faith, in the sure and certain hope of a glorious immortality, we can calmly look death between the eyes. Even now he has no terror for us. He brings us only a broadening vision of the life divine, he brings us greater tasks to do for God and man, and greater power with which to do them.

The practical lesson which all this teaches us this morning is a very solemn one: it is the obligation which comes to each one of us to make his life worthy of immortality, because what is needed to make the "life evermore," spoken of in our text, a desirable thing, is not mere continuance of life, but a better quality of life. Is it worth your while, I ask you in all seriousness, to believe in your own personal immortality, when you feel that you are doing nothing to make yourself worthy of immortality? What good can there be in continuing a life which is so selfish as not to feel the power of an evermore—as not to feel a sense of the endlessness of its days as these days affect others? And there is no life so small or limited that it carries no influence. Over every life is written in large letters the word "evermore"—evermore in its influence for good or for evil. If the grave is not the limit of existence neither is it a limit of the forces which we exert while alive. The good and the bad which men do are not buried with their bones. "Though dead, they yet speak." They "rest from their labors," but "their works do follow them." It is this which makes it such a solemn thing to live—the fact that our influence is immortal, either for good or evil. No life can ever be estimated by itself. Every life completes some life before it opens, and every life is completed by some life or lives after it. Every life touches other lives, and by that touch lifts them up or drags them down. There is no shore that brings to an end the waves which go out from any human life. Life has no limitations! Its years on earth may be numbered, but the influences possible to these years are numbered and undying! Over every life the great Ruler of the Universe, by those laws of his which are irrevocable writes the word "evermore"—evermore blessed or evermore unblessed. May God help us all to learn the lesson.

The message which I have brought to you today, my friends, must come with peculiar force, in view of the sad circumstances under which this congregation assembles this morning. It would be out of place for me, at this time, to attempt to form an estimate of the life and work of your late, beloved pastor. The time for this will come at a future day, when a memorial service worthy of the occasion will be held. True, you need no visible memorials to keep alive in your hearts the memory of his blessed life. Every time you gather here for worship, in the years to come, this old church will speak to you of him. And besides, he lives in your hearts and you can never forget him. But there are things which it is becoming and beautiful to do, though it is not always necessary to do them. And, besides, it is a satisfaction to us, as well as a relief to our feelings, to find some outward expression for our emotions. And then we must remember that there are the little children growing up here who in the years to come will compose this congregation, and we are naturally anxious for them to know what manner of man he was who ministered to this church during the last thirty years of the nineteenth century. And so we shall hope at some future day to put in permanent form, some memorial tribute to him for whom we mourn today.

But it would be unnatural for us not to think of him this morning, and it would be impossible for me not to interpret what I think would be his message to us, were he allowed to speak. He lived the immortal life, and so death for him was but a little thing. In the silent watches of the Sabbath morning, when the city was wrapped in slumber, "God touched him and he slept." And he lives on in your life and mine. His gentle spirit, his helpful words, his self-sacrificing acts are sacred now and actually live in us. Upon him has God commanded his highest blessing—even life forevermore.

And now his message to us, could he speak, would be to carry his spirit of love and duty unto the future. While we think of the past and of those who toiled here in the days that are gone, we must also think of the future. We must do this if we are to be loyal to the past and to those who lived in the past. We all feel this today. We feel we are not going to forget the past, but we are also going to look to the future, and we are going to try to carry into the future, all that has been beautiful and good and holy in the past. Charmed, as we must be by the recollection of him who has passed from us, grateful for all that he was and all that he did for us, for the enrichment he gave to our characters, for the stimulus he imparted to us in service, for comfort in dark and cloudy days, for the way in which he held our feet when they were near to slipping; let us now be followers of him even as he was a follower of Christ. And then some bright morning when the shadows break and the darkness disappears, we too shall see the King in his beauty and shall receive the reward of the faithful.

Do We Forget?

Do we forget when winter snows lie deep
Above the beds where our beloved sleep,
And we no longer wildly weep,—
Do we forget?

Because, when comes the holy Christmas tide,
And love and joy are scattered far and wide,
We check our sighs, and strive our tears to hide—
Do we forget?

Do we forget, because, with mute lips pressed,
To fading pictures, all our love, unguessed,
Lies locked secure within our patient breast—
Do we forget?

Because, across the widening gulf of years,
There comes no loving word to quell our fears
No watchful hand to brush away our tears,—
Do we forget?

Do we forget? Nay, in each heart there lies
A secret place, where, hid from mortal eyes,
Dwells, strong and true, a love that never dies.
Nor can forget! —O. H.

God's Years.

One looked upon the passing Year, and said:
 "God knows I am not loth to see him go.
 His arms are full of disappointed hopes,
 Beside him lies a sword all stained with blood.
 And as for me—what did he bring to me?
 But pain and care and loneliness?
 Friends lying 'neath the grave-yard's grass,
 Hopes dead as they, yet ever haunting me
 And wearing the delusive forms that cheat
 Ten thousand souls.

Dost thou not hear the cry
 Of those who greeted him at first with smiles
 But now are weeping bitter tears for joys
 The cruel Year has stolen? Let him go,
 I pray I ne'er may see his like again."
 Then gently, and in falt'ring tones one spoke,
 With eyes down-dropt and full of tears:
 "Dost thou forget how many captive souls
 This year set free? Souls weary of the strife
 With pain and poverty? Hast thou forgot
 How, through the flying mouths, God's angels bright
 Have brought the messages of love and peace?
 Hast thou forgot the baby lips that smile
 For very joy of life and love? Ah, think
 How many beauteous deeds of Christly love
 That carried joy to darkened hearts and homes.
 How many kisses he has pressed on brows
 Where Pain had set his seal! How many souls
 Have learned this year to trust in God and bide
 His times."

The other turned, filled with surprise
 That one who wore the garb of those who mourn
 Their dead, and unto whose pale lips the cup
 Of sorrow and of care had been so often pressed,
 Could thus defend the dying year. He thought
 To have her sympathy,—thought she would join
 His maledictions of the years. Instead—
 "Nay, nay!" she softly said, the light of faith Clear shining through her tears:

"The years belong
 To God. 'Tis He appoints to them their parts;
 We may not willfully refuse to see
 The beauty and the joy God lavishes
 On others, though perchance our eyes are dim
 With tears. We have not failed to get our share
 Of His rich blessings, and the heart that fails
 To count his mercies has an ingrate proved."
 She ceased. The Old Year passed, and in the east
 I saw the New Year veiled in mists, appear.
 I know not what of good or ill he holds
 For me—but this I know: the years belong
 To God, and whatso'er He sends must be
 The thing I need, and so I lift my eyes
 And greet the shadowy future without fear!
 December, 29, 1902. —O. H.

North Carolina did finely last week in Christmas poetry. Professor Henry Jerome Stockard's "Bethlehem," in the Charlotte Observer, is a fine production from the pen of a genuine poet. And, "O Little Child of Bethlehem!" in the Standard, signed McK., is beautiful, and touches the heart. It is a gem of sacred poetry that may well take its place with Phillips Brooks' "O Little Town of Bethlehem!" After that the Standard ought to be good all the year.—Central Presbyterian.

We must educate the rising generation. It is the highest duty and the loftiest privilege. Let education be neglected and all that we hold dear is lost; pursue the policy of advanced education for one generation and a new life will be seen.—Henry Louis Smith.

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

We almost wish that we could distribute the poetic contributions to this number over several. Professor Henry Jerome Stockard has sent us one of the finest things he has written, we think; while editor and reader are doubly under obligation to O. K. The poem, Do We Forget? was clipped from a small volume of her poems and will touch a responsive chord in many a heart. The other, God's Years, has not hitherto been published.

The New Year sees old friends at their post. The Devotional and Missionary columns are well filled. Dr. Hill begins the new quarter with an excellent exposition of the Sunday-school Lesson and Mr. Hoon, in the Westminster League column, propounds some questions and hopes for some answers.

The contributed matter, besides the two poems, makes up in solidity and ability what it lacks in variety. Dr Witherspoon has an excellent review of the "little book" referred to in these columns before. The address on Bible Study to his University students by Dr. C. Alphonso Smith, is one of the best articles of the kind we have ever read. And Rev. J. K. Fraser, in his sermon on Immortality, proves a claim to the scholarship for which our Canadian brethren, who have settled among us, have been rather noted. An added interest was given to his theme by the fact that the sermon was preached the Sunday after the death of the gifted and beloved Dr. Brackett.

There is variety enough in the Home Circle and the Young People's and Children's Departments, and we close this by wishing all again, old and young, a New Year of usefulness and happiness—and the two are one.

PERSONALS

Rev. L. E. Selfridge has removed from Victoria, Texas, to Beeville, in the same State.

The address of Rev. George F. Mason is changed from Winchester to Chambersville, Va.

Rev. S. M. Logan, of Middlesboro, Ky., has accepted a call to the Church at Wilmore, Ky., and entered upon that work at the beginning of the year.

Rev. S. M. Johnson, of Chicago, filled the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church, Charlotte, on last Sunday, preaching a most appropriate and acceptable sermon.

We extend our congratulations to Rev. R. L. Wharton, of the Cuban Mission, who was married to Miss Annie Ramsey, of Durham, N. C., December 30th. Mr. and Mrs. Wharton expect to leave North Carolina today, for Cuba.

ALABAMA.

COLUMBIANA.—In the absence of the Moderator, upon a constitutional request, I hereby call a meeting of the Presbytery of North Alabama to convene in the the First Presbyterian Church of Birmingham, Alabama, January 13, 1903, at 10 o'clock a. m., for the following purpose:

1. To act upon a call from the Second Presbyterian Church of Memphis, Tenn., for the pastoral services of Rev. A. B. Curry:

2. And if this call is placed in his hands and accepted by him: First, To dissolve the pastoral relation between him and the First Presbyterian Church of Birmingham; second, To grant him a certificate of dismissal to the Presbytery of Memphis; third, To fill the vacancies on Committees caused by his removal to another Presbytery.

W. I. Sinnott, S. C.

MEMPHIS.—The First Colored Presbyterian Church—The Lord has graciously smiled upon this part of his vineyard. One year's arduous labor has been spent in this field. Today we have thirty members in the church and forty children on roll in the Sunday-school. This church is slowly and surely winding its way around the opposing hills into the sunlight of the Son of righteousness. Rev. W. W. Akers and Pastor are bending every energy to make this part of the Lord's field a praise to our Lord and his Christ. Memphis is one of the greatest cities in the South, with her many consecrated Christian gentleman and ladies who are prayerfully determined to do a greater work this year for the salvation of souls than ever before. For seven years I have mailed the Memphis field to him of all Good in the office of prayer, and thanks to be to his name he has replied in the gift of a nice house of worship and manse, and is adorned every Sabbath with praise to his name.

Rev. Lucius Pool.

NASHVILLE.—At a meeting of the Ministers Association on Monday morning, Dec. 29th, 1902, announcement was made of the death of Rev. D. C. Rankin, D. D. at Seoul, Korea, on Dec. 28th, and Rev. Angus McDonald and Rev. H. F. Williams were appointed a committee to draft appropriate resolutions. The following were presented and adopted:

Resolved, That we have received this announcement with profound sorrow, and would hereby express the sense of our loss and bereavement in the death of our beloved brother. His associations with us were always of the most delightful character. He took a warm interest in all the work of the church in our city in which we were interested, and was a faithful helper, both in our Sunday and City Missions. His kindness and courtesy won him devoted friends among all classes of our people. He loved, and was beloved by the little children, who were drawn to him by his own guilelessness and simplicity of character. He was a valued counselor because of his wide and thorough knowledge of all that pertained to the work of the Church and of his deep and genuine interest in it. He was a high-toned, refined and cultured Christian gentleman.

To his bereaved widow we would hereby extend our deepest and tenderest sympathy, praying that the God of all Comfort may give her a sufficiency of grace in this time of her deep sorrow.

We would express our sympathy with other members of Dr. Rankin's family, and with the wide circle of his personal friends, and with the Church at large, of which he was a devoted and faithful and eminently useful servant.

Resolution of Paducah Presbytery.

In dismissing Rev. W. E. Cave, D. D., to the Presbytery of Albemarle, the Presbytery of Paducah desires to place upon records, its high appreciation of the services of Dr. Cave, during the nineteen years in which he has been a member of this body.

As a courteous Christian gentleman, a faithful Presbyter, an able, earnest and profound preacher of the gospel, he has done a great work, both in "Lengthening the cords and strengthening the stakes of Zion," within our midst. We record our personal love and esteem for him, both as a minister and a man, we affectionately commend him to the Christian fellowship of the brethren in Albemarle Presbytery.

Thomas Commins,
J. H. McCoullage,
Committee.

The Church at Paducah, Ky., having declined to accept the resignation of Rev. W. E. Cave, the matter was left to the judgment of the Presbytery which met at Henderson on the 30th ult. After hearing the commissioners, Presbytery accepted the resignation, and Dr. Cave was dismissed to Albemarle Presbytery, and will enter at once upon the pastorate of the First Church of Raleigh

NORTH CAROLINA.

Meeting of Synodical Home Missions.

For the consideration of important business, a session of the Synodical Home Mission Committee of the Synod of North Carolina will be held in Charlotte, N. C., Friday, January 16, 1903, in the parlor of the Central Hotel at half past ten o'clock a. m. The committee is as follows: Rev. H. G. Hill, D. D., Rev. A. D. McClure, D. D., Rev. W. D. Morton, D. D., Rev. W. T. Matthews, Rev. G. T. Thompson, Rev. W. R. Minter, Rev. R. F. Campbell, D. D., Rev. E. C. Murray, D. D., Rev. William Black, Rev. E. E. Gillespie, Messrs A. G. Brenizer, J. R. Young, B. F. Hall, J. M. Rogers, Robert Bingham, J. G. Hall, and Dr. J. W. McNeill.

The importance of the business to be brought before the committee demands a full representation of its members.

E. E. Gillespie, Chairman.

CHARLOTTE.—Sunday, the 4th of January, all the Presbyterian congregations of the city met in the First Presbyterian Church, in joint communion. It has been the custom for some years to hold this service on the afternoon of the first Sunday of the year. The singing of hymns, reading of Scripture, prayer and the administration of the supper made the service. Its simplicity intensifies the solemnity. Probably no service in the entire year leaves a deeper or more abiding impression than the gathering of the various congregations around the table of their one and only Master, Jesus Christ.

Twentieth Century Fund.

Rev. C. G. Vardell reports the following amounts subscribed to this fund: Kenansville, $500; Faison, $1,291.94; Warsaw—one individual,—$30; Mt. Olive, $853; Clinton, $411; Trustees James Sprunt Inst., $500; Total, $3,585.94.

This is a gratifying exhibit for these small churches and an auspicious beginning of Bro. Vardell's canvass.

E. C. Murray, Treasurer.

MEBANE.—This is the fifth call upon our subscribers and it is for the purpose of helping to complete the church, located in the eastern part of Madison county.

Rev. R. P. Smith, Supt. Home Missions in Asheville Presbytery writes: "That the lot was given, and Brother Casady, who has been laboring in that field, raised $440 in cash, and some free labor was given." The building has been completed, is nice and comfortable, and now ready for the pews. There is due on the carpenters work $125. The church building will seat 275 persons, and the school room annexed will seat 60. This is separated from the church by sliding doors. Only a few Presbyterians in that section, but many there out of the church and away from Christ. The needs are great for the teacher and preacher. Rev. E. McDavis will look after this work till we can get another man for the field.

Please send us one dollar, or more, if you can, to aid in this noble work.

Address, Rev. W. R. Hines, Mebane, N. C.

ROCKY MOUNT.—The session of the church at Rocky Mount has recently been strengthened by the election and installation of Dr. H. A. McSwain, who came from the session of the old Bluff Church in Fayetteville Presbytery.

The church at Rocky Mount has within a few weeks past been also strengthened by the addition of four persons by confession of their faith in Christ and of two by certificate.

Besides meeting, and in general, largely exceeding its appointments for the benevolent causes of the church, the Rocky Mount congregation has in November kindly remembered their pastor in many thanksgiving souvenirs.

In December they have fully met all the indebtedness for the Bethlehem Chapel and are keeping up the mission school with zeal and fidelity.

FRONT STREET CHURCH.—STATESVILLE—This congregation is undertaking the erection of a new church on the corner of Front Street and West End Avenue. This lot was given to the church by the late E. B. Stimson. There were thirteen additions to this church at our last communion in November and two more on profession of faith last Sabbath.

DAVIDSON.—The exodus from the campus for the Christmas holidays, which continues this year till January 6th, was very general, and left little more than a dozen students to keep each other company in the absence of their fellows, however most of them sat down to a Christmas dinner on yesterday, either with special friends of the village, or at the home of President Smith or that of some other host. The usual entertainments are taking place, both among the white and colored Sunday-schools. That of the college and village church will be held next week. Dr. Munroe, in charge of the Linden school, gave his annual elaborate programme in Shearer Biblical hall, Wednesday night. This evening the colored Presbyterian school, in conducting which Rev. F. L. Brodie is assisted by white teachers of the college and village, have their "tree." Last night the Covenanters, with the help of Miss Mary Martin entertained their friends in a spider-web party.

The people of Davidson gave a bountiful Christmas dinner to the road-convicts at the stockade near here on yesterday. Chicken and ham and bread stuffs, pies, coffee, apples, nuts, raisins, candy and a good smoke were all a part of the bounty. The firm of Knox and Brown was particularly free in the distribution of the so-called "desert."

These convicts during their stay in this neighborhood have not been neglected in anyway. The Cornelius people gave them Thanksgiving provisions, and all through the seven months of their work. Sunday after Sunday some one minister or layman has been out to preach to them or to give some religious instruction, and certainly it is a work that appeals strongly to one's religious sense of obligation to the needy, and ignorant.

Miss Florence Leftwich who will soon take the Ph. D. degree in old French and kindred studies at Bryn Mawr, is spending a few days, with her sister, Mrs. T. P. Harrison.

Dr. Smith made a successful visit to Rock Hill on the 21st inst., in the interest of the Davidson league. His first visit of the new year will be to Charleston.

Rev. William Black is to preach in Raleigh on Sunday in the absence of the pastor elect, Dr. Cave. Mr. Black's last meeting of only 3 days length was at Lilesville, in Robeson county.

FAYETTEVILLE PRESBYTERY.—The Presbytery of Fayetteville in adjourned meeting in Fayetteville, December 30, transacted the following items of business.

Rev. D. Monroe was granted permission to supply Big Rockfish and Hope Mills churches until the next stated meeting.

Rev. V. G. Smith was received from Winchester Presbytery.

Mr. Martin A. Ray was taken under the care of Presbytery as a candidate for the ministry.

Rev. C. R. Law was replaced on the Home Missions committee.

Rev. P. R. Coppege was assigned more work at Hamlet which forced his retirement from the supply of Bensalem Church.

Rev. T. F. Haney was directed to supply Bensalem Church until the next stated meeting.

A call from Lebanon Church for Rev. M. N. McIver as pastor for one-fourth of his time was put in his hands and accepted and Rev. Dr. H. G. Hill, Rev. Dr. J. M. Rose, and Rev. W. T. Walker were appointed to install him.

The following appointments were made to supply Dnnn Church: Rev. H. Tucker Graham, one Sabbath in January, Rev. Dr. H. G. Hill, one Sabbath in February, and Rev. D. Fairly, one Sabbath in April. Rev. E. W. Sonders was requested to supply it one Sunday in March.

P. R. Law, Stated Clerk.

BARIUM SPRINGS.—The loving interest of the church in her orphans was most substantially attested at Christmas, and friends of the cause everywhere will be glad to know that our children have just spent a most happy and joyous holiday. It would be useless to try to mention those who contributed to the joy of the occasion, so much was done and by so many different individuals, societies, and churches. The greatest compensation these thoughtful friends could possibly have had would have been to have seen the groups of happy little folks gathered around different games, or toys, or dolls, entirely forgetful of all but the make-believe life they were living.

On no previous Christmas have these fatherless ones been so bountifully provided for, never before has there been so many good things.

The Superintendent and managers felt a great deal of anxiety before Christmas, lest there should not be enough to fill so many little stockings, enough to make so many little hearts glad, therefore when our friends were so generous and provided so satisfactorily for our children a joyous Christmas was provided for the Superintendent and managers too in seeing the happiness of these little ones whose happiness means so much to us all.

During the holidays there was a meeting of the Alumni Association of the Orphans' Home held here. About twenty-members were present, each a loyal, true-hearted friend to the Institution which they say will always seem like home to them.

Well might the church feel proud to see and know this body of young men and women whose lives have been so immensely influenced by the care and training the church has given them. Stronger, truer characters than some of these could not be found anywhere.

And now school and work have begun again. We hope and believe that all will work better and to a greater advantage on account of the rest and recreation they have just enjoyed.

To each one who helped to make this splendid Christmas possible, the whole Orphans' Home extends sincere and loving thanks.

R. W. Boyd.

DURHAM.—On Sunday, Dec. 21, the mission of the First Presbyterian Church, known as the Pearl Mission, was organized into the Second Presbyterian Church of Durham, N. C.

Rev. M. C. Arrowood, of Burlington, who was chairman of the Commission, was present and conducted the business in a most satisfactory way.

Mr. Hill C. Linthicum and Mr. Sam C. Claytor were elected Elders, and Mr. S. O. Jordau, Deacon. These officers were ordained at the same time. The church begins work with a roll of sixty-seven members and has good prospects for growth and usefulness.

The Associate Pastor of the First Church, has charge of the new church.

CHARLESTON.—Charleston Presbytery is hereby called to meet in official session on Jan. 2, 1903, at 12 m. in Pastor's study, First Presbyterian Church, Charleston, to receive Rev. D. M. McIver, from Asheville Presbytery and Rev. S. C. Caldwell from Bethel Presbytery and to take such steps as may be necessary to install them over the fields seeking their pastoral care.
F. D. Jones, Mod.

GAFFNEY.—We wish to thank the membership of our church for the 'severe pounding' they gave us on Monday night before Xmas.

ASSEMBLY'S HOME AND SCHOOL.—Dear Friends: Please bear in mind my request that there be no confusion between the fund for the support of the Home and School and that for the debt. When a remittance is made for the debt, kindly so state. If no instruction is given, it goes to the support of the work. Again I ask that, while we truly hope the apportionments for the debt will all be promptly paid, the contributions for the support be not curtailed.

Yours Fraternaly., S. W. Somerville, Supt.

LYNCHBURG.—At a meeting of Montgomery Presbytery held in Lynchburg, Va., Dec. 30, 1902, Rev. Chas. Friend, pastor of the Buchanan and High Bridge Churches was dismissed to unite with Abingdon Presbytery. Mr. Friend takes charge of some important home mission work in Wise county.

STAUNTON.—Dr. DuBose, missionary from China, preached to two large and deeply interested congregations on Sunday, December 7th, at the First Church in the morning and at the Second at night. Rev. J. E. Booker was present at the Second Church service, and being one of the early pastors of the church, was warmly welcomed by the congregation. He had preached in the morning at Hebron Church and administered the sacrament to his old congregation there, where he was for eight years also the well beloved pastor.—Spectator.

Coast Country.

There is a demand for men and women who are willing to move to this section and work for the Master. We do not expect them to work without pay. There are good openings here for men of large or small means to make money, either growing rice or raising cane and truck for market. The rice industry has only begun and there are many acres of our rich lands that will be planted in rice in 1903. The rice is planted in the spring and irrigated from wells that vary from 60 feet to 240 feet, in depth. The working season is about 5 months for the making of a rice crop. The returns from the rice run from $40 to $90 or $100 per acre. We have some drawbacks here as they have in other sections of the world, and men will make a mistake if they expect to find everything smooth. What suits one man, does not suit another.

Vegetables grown to perfection and the flowers are now in bloom (Dec. 22nd.) that is pleasant and yet it is cool enough to give you the tingling sensation of winter.

I only mention these things incidently to give some idea of the possibilities of this section, for men who work for the Master usually have to work for themselves and those dependent upon them. This is comparatively a new town, about 12 years old and it has a mixed population and the Presbyterians are fewest in number, but they are determined to work to build up the cause of the Lord in this section. Our church is composed of good men in all the walks of life. Bankers, carpenters, merchants, Lawyers and farmers are all represented and we rejoice that the Lord has given us a good sound business man and a most excellent pastor in the person of Rev. G. W. Story, who serves us in connection with other points in this section. Recognizing the blessings that God has sent upon us and asking his blessing upon all our land for the New Year.

I remain yours in the Master's work.

W. G. McDouald.

MISSOURI.

JACKSON.—Rev. W. Beale today closes a delightful ten day's meeting, assisting Rev. W. W. Killough at Pennyville, one of his numerous charges. The congregations have been good in spite of the inclement weather. The little church is greatly revived and somewhat strengthened. Dear Bro. Killough is steadily improving, and will probably regain perfect use of his injured limb. He is able already to make the necessary long drives and fills his regular appointments. The months of suffering have told very perceptibly on his former robust physique, although his interest in Zion has not abated.

WEST VIRGINIA.

The installation of Rev. Eugene Daniel D. D., as pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Lewisburg, W. Va., was held on the last Sunday in December and the Greenbriar Independent, published at Lew isburg, contains the following interesting report of the exercises:

"Rev. Eugene Daniel, D. D., in whose hands the unanimous call of the congregation of the Old Stone Church was placed and accepted by him at a special meeting of Greenbriar Presbytery held here last Saturday, was duly installed as the permanent pastor of the church last Sunday morning. The commission appointed by Presbytery to install Dr. Daniel consisted of Rev. R. L. Telford, D. D., Rev. John C. Brown, Rev. M. L. Lacy, D. D., and Elders John D. Arbuckle and E. L. Bell. Dr. Telford preached the sermon, Mr. Brown delivered the charge to the pastor-elect and Mr. Lacy the charge to the people. The mention of these names is a sufficient assurance to the public that the ceremonies were in all respects appropriate and impressive. An unusually large congregation was present, evincing the interest taken in the installation of the new pastor, and when the simple ceremony was concluded all went forward and extended to Dr. Daniel the right band of fellowship.

"Rev. R. L. Fultz, pastor of the M. E. Church, South, held no service in his church that morning and he and many of the members of his congregation were interested spectators of the installation ceremonies.

"Dr. Daniel begins the work of his pastorate here with the hearty support and best wishes of all the people of the community, regardless of denominational differences."—Raleigh Post.

GEORGIA.

SUMMERVILLE.—One of the most delightful meetings ever held in our church has just closed. For ten days, beginning Dec. 7th, the pastor Rev. Wm. Goddard was assisted by Rev. Nathan Bachman, D. D., of Tennessee. The pastors and people of other denominations also entered heartily into the work, and thus denominational lines were lost sight of, and as one family, God's people assembled and worshipped together. For ten days this faithful man of God preached the "word" to large congregations, the preaching was characterized by earnestness and simplicity, strengthening and building up in the faith Christ's professed followers; and by tender appeals to the unconverted, under the Spirit's power thirty-four were led to confess their faith in Christ, and take him as their Saviour, fifteen of the number being from our Sunday-school. This is the third meeting Dr. Bachman has conducted in Summerville, and his rich experience gives force and tenderness to his preaching. So the general expression is that this last meeting was the best of them all. Dr. Bachman has endeared himself to our people of every denomination, and their prayers will follow him in all his work.

Miss Louise More DuBose rendered valuable assistance in singing and at the organ.

MT. CARMEL.—Dr. J. A. Quarles, who has so acceptably filled the pulpit at Mt. Carmel Church since Rev. J. E. Booker went to Timber Ridge, preached his last sermon to that congregation on Sunday morning, December 21st. It is useless to say that the congregation has greatly enjoyed the ministrations of Dr. Quarles, and he is followed by the sincere regards of old and young. Mr. Hamilton will get home this week and will resume his duties as pastor of the congregation on next Sunday. He will receive a cordial and hearty welcome back, after the arduous duties of the year that were imposed on him and to which he has given his best energies, with a success unexpected by many of his friends.—Lexington Gazette.

MONMOUTH.—Rev. C. R. Stribling, pastor of Waynesboro Presbyterian Church, assisted Rev. D. A. Penick, pastor of Monmouth Church, at services at that church on the 14th of December. Mr. Stribling preached Saturday and Sunday to the congregation.

MOUNTAIN UNION CHURCH.—On November 19th the Rev. Carl Barth, of Oriskany, Va., came to this church and held a week's meeting. The visible result of this meeting was the profession of faith by fifteen persons, and two backsliders reclaimed. The church was very much revived and on Sabbath, December 21st, twelve of these persons united with Mt. Union Church, eleven of whom were baptized. Four will join other churches, and one, who was sick last Sabbath, will join Mt. Union Church.

After an absence of two months in Salem, Va., the pastor of the Mt. Union Fincastle Churches has returned to Fincastle with his family. While on a visit in Salem one of the children developed a case of scarlet fever, and from him the other two children took the disease. The family were in quarantine two months.—Central Presbyterian.

M'DOWELL.—The constitutional requirements having been met the Presbytery of Lexington is hereby called to meet in the Lecture Room of the First Church, Staunton, on Jan. 13th, 1903, at 11 a. m. to act upon the following items of business.

1. Hearing the Report of the Evangelist of Presbytery.
2. Taking steps to raise the salary of the Evangelist.
3. Hearing Report of the Agent for Elkin's College.
4. Taking steps to raise the balance of the $30,000 pledge to the college by the Presbytery.
5. To act on request for dissolution of pastoral relation between Rev. J. C. Johnson and the McDowell field and the call from Greenbrier Presbytery for his services. All the members of Presbytery are earnestly requested to attend this meeting. Some of these are important matters.

J. C. Johnson, Moderator.

TEXAS.

EDNA.—Our church has recently enjoyed a very pleasant and instructive and edifying visit from Rev. J. Wallace Moore, of our Japan Mission. Mr. Moore came to us on Wednesday morning and in the afternoon the Ladies Missionary Society met at the manse and had as many of the ladies of the congregation as could be gathered at that time. An informal discussion of the situation in Japan, especially as it affects the work for women occupied the time and the ladies were given a chance to meet Mr. Moore in a social way.

At the night service a houseful of people, representing every denomination and no denomination listened eagerly and attentively to his presentation of the conditions in that land. After the audience was dismissed, as many as desired to do so were invited to remain and ask questions and quite a large number did so and were largely repaid. Mr. Moore is a clear, forcible, entertaining speaker—well acquainted with his subject and above all alive to the vitally spiritual nature of the work.

We most cordially commend him to all our churches and urge them, whether they have a minister or not, to write to their Presbyterian chairman of Foreign Missions and have Mr. Moore visit them. It is an opportunity that no church or community can afford to miss.

CLARENDON.—Rev. E. L. Storey of Kerrville has accepted a call to this church and will enter upon the work at once.

MILFORD.—Rev. E. M. Munroe is reaching his country appointments on horseback, during the muddy roads. More than three weeks ago he went out in his buggy and stuck in the mud, where it has been ever since. The roads are impassable for vehicles of any kind.

Home Mission Literature.

The Executive Committee has now on hand pamphlets, leaflets, articles, etc., all bearing upon the subject of Home Mission Literature, which we can furnish to Churches, Ladies' Societies, Individuals and all persons who need literature of this kind. Please send a communication to our office in Atlanta, Ga., stating what is needed and we will be glad to furnish such literature free.

S. L. Morris, Sec. Home Missions.

Alliance of the Reformed Churches Holding the Presbyterian System.

To the Editor of the Presbyterian Standard:

You very kindly published a recent letter of mine as Secretary of this Alliance, with reference to the Forward Movement. Allow me, acting in the same representative capacity, to request an editorial notice drawing attention to the day of united prayer for all Presbyterian and Reformed Churches on Sabbath, January 18, to Decision Day for children and adults on Sabbath February 1st, and to the use of the month of January 1903, as a period of preparation for Decision Day. I enclose a copy of the circular sent to all pastors. The information which comes to me from ministers in many of the Churches in the Alliance indicates that there is a wide-spread interest in the whole Forward Movement, which you can stimulate for the welfare of souls and for the spread of Christ's Kingdom.

Wishing you a Happy New Year,

Wm. H. Roberts, American Secretary.

Timely Generosity—Mr. Verner's Lecture Outfit to be Re-built.

As London and Chicago profited by their fires, so it seems that my calamity at Greensboro is another instance that "Behind a frowning Providence He hides a smiling face." For now comes the noted colored educator, W. H. Council, of Normal Alabama, with an offer to supply me with his $350 Stereopticon outfit for my lectures. Thus I am freed from the heaviest expense at once. My views are being reproduced from the negatives I left at the Smithsonian Institution, and the collection of curios there is also being drawn on for another and better mounted outfit. I am at work making new maps, fifteen feet square, done in oil colors, so that soon I trust to be better equipped for the work I was doing, than ever. My duties here permit me to go off on the lecturing trips for the Sabbath and Monday night following. I am making my new equipment positively unexcelled in its kind.

Now a word to the friends who are inviting me to deliver these lectures. In the first place, accept our thanks for your interest and encouragement. By the grace of God we mean to try to arouse our people to a realization of the unparalleled opportunities presented to civilization and Christianity in Central Africa, and to the crisis now approaching in those opportunities. Will you not help us to reach the people? My lectures are entirely free, nothing being asked but free-will offerings of the audiences. Every body is encouraged to come whether they can bring any money or not.

So if you cannot directly help in bearing the expense of reconstructing this wonderful illustrative outfit, you can at least co-operate in getting good audiences to see and hear, and to swell the funds for the onward movement by their collective small contributions.

Over my study mantel, as I write, is the little marble bust of Charles Gordon, the martyr of Khartoum, who was, with Leighton Wilson and David Livingstone, the human inspiration to me in choosing Africa, at home and abroad, for my life work. Every time some fresh affliction or calamity comes—and they have been heavy this last year—I look at Gordon and remember how he was not afraid to face the hordes of the Soudan alone nor at last to lay down his life in the cause of the poor people he went to succor; and I ask God to give me faith like his—to give me the courage of Him whom he served. The answer has not failed yet. It never will.

Tuskaloosa, Alabama, Jan. 1, 1903.

Election of a Professor at the Kentucky Theological Seminary.

Last week the Board of Directors of the Presbyterian Seminary of Kentucky held a very important meeting, at which it selected an eminent scholar to fill the chair of Church History in this institution, made vacant by the death of Dr. C. B. H. Martin last spring.

When the Board met last June, it elected, with great unanimity, the Rev. Henry E. Dosker, D. D., of Holland, Mich., to this vacant chair. At that time Dr. Dosker, owing mainly to the difficulty of getting a man to take his place on short notice in the Seminary at Holland, did not see his way clear to accept the position then offered him here. The nominating committee of the Board at once began diligent search in various other directions for a fit man for the place. Though several excellent men were favorably considered, many members of the Board could not dismiss from their minds the hope that, if the call were renewed to Dr. Dosker, to take effect next year, he might see his way clear to reconsider his former decision. This view so largely prevailed, that later on in the summer, plans were made to have the work of the vacant chair conducted for this session by the other professors; and after the vacation, the nominating committee reopened correspondence with Dr. Dosker. The outcome of this was that the Board was called to meet last Thursday and take action.

The meeting was largely attended by the members of the Board. The nominating committee presented, with warm commendation, the name of Dr. Dosker, and the Board elected him heartily and unanimously, which fact was at once telegraphed him.

Before the Board adjourned, a telegraphic reply was received announcing his acceptance of the call. This gave much satisfaction to the Board, and it is understood that he will enter on his duties at the Seminary at the opening of the next session, in October, 1903.

This choice brings to the Seminary and to the service of the Presbyterian Church one of the best scholars in the land, a specialist in Church History, and a teacher with thirteen years of experience. Though well known in theological circles, a few particulars about the new professor may be of interest.

Henry E. Dosker was born in February, 1855, in the Province of Utrecht, in the Netherlands, and is in the very prime of life, being forty-six years of age. His father was a minister in the Free Church of Holland. This is the Reformed (Dutch) Church, of which Dr. Kuyper is the great leader in Holland. Young Dosker was educated in the Dutch schools of his native land, and graduated from the gymnasium with honors in 1873. In that year, when he was eighteen years of age, his father came to this country, having accepted a call to the First Reformed (Dutch) Church, Grand Rapids, Mich., and his son Henry entered Hope College, at Holland, Mich., in 1873, and graduated in 1876. His Seminary course was begun at New Brunswick Seminary, N. J., but completed at McCormick Seminary, Chicago, to which institution he was drawn by the magic influence of Dr. Francis L. Patton, now of Princeton. He graduated in theology, in 1879, and, having obtained his A. M. in the same year, he went to Europe and spent several months in travel and study.

On his return, he entered at once upon the work of the ministry, in which he continued till 1888, when he was made a lecturer in Western Theological Seminary at Holland, Mich., teaching Church History and New Testament Exegesis. Then in 1894 he was called to the chair of Historical Theology in that institution, and has served with much honor and success in this position up to the present time. It will thus be seen that of his twenty-three years in the ministry, thirteen have been passed in the study and teaching of Church History.

Dr. Dosker is an accomplished linguist, not only in the classics but also in the modern languages. He can pursue his investigations in the Dutch, German and French, as well as in English, which gives him a wide range, and will enable him to render special service to the students in this important department.

In 1894 Rutgers College, New Brunswick, N. J., one of the oldest colleges in the land, gave him the degree of D. D., and, in 1898, the University of Leyden, gave him membership in "The Academy of Dutch Letters," for historical criticism of Motley's "John of Barneveldt."

Dr. Dosker is well known as an author of repute. He has written innumerable articles in both Dutch and English in various theological periodicals. His name and merit in this way are quite familiar to readers of the Presbyterian and Reformed Review and the Presbyterian Quarterly, in which he has had several articles. He has also published several useful volumes, a few of which are now mentioned: "The Sunday School in its Origin and Development" (Dutch), 1882; "The Biography of Dr. A. C. Von Routh" (Dutch), 1886; "John of Barneveldt; Martyr or Traitor," 1892; "Topical Outline Studies in Ecclesiastical History," 1901. He is also at present, editor of The Hope, the Church weekly paper for the Reformed (Dutch) Church in the West.

As a preacher, Dr. Dosker ranks high, and is one of the most popular and effective of the preachers in the section where he now resides, and is often called on to preach on important public occasions.

Dr. Dosker's domestic circle consists of Mrs. Dosker and five children. They may all rest assured that a warm welcome awaits them in Louisville, as they leave old friends in their present home, and make new friends here.

The election of Dr. Dosker completes the faculty of the Seminary, which now consists of six men, all tried and trained teachers. With the new buildings to be erected in the near future, this institution is now well furnished to train young men for the ministry.—Christian Observer.

Criticisms and Reviews.

The World's Work for January keeps up the high standard of excellence in its chosen sphere. The editorial review of the events of the preceding month is especially able and there are a number of interesting articles, such as the Industrial Invasion of Canada, Modern Methods of Saving Ships, the Biography of an Office Building and American Manufacture. The magazine is making itself indispensable to those who are doing their share of the world's work in the industrial as distinguished from the literary sphere.

Country Life in America, by the same publishers, The Doubleday and Page Company, has a number of beautiful drawings of country life, among them a bough laden with apples from Western North Carolina. Among the articles of interest we may mention, Hunting Crocodiles in Florida, The Real Apple and Where to Find it, the Making of a Country Home, Camping in the Snow, Riding to Hounds. The illustrations for this magazine are the finest we know in any American Magazine, which is equivalent to saying, any magazine in the world.

Scribner's Magazine for January begins a serial story of great promise, The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come, by John Fox, Jr. English Court and Society in the Eighties, by Mary King Waddington is well written and is illustrated from photographs in the collection of Mme. Waddington. Guiseppe's Christmas, The Story of a Great Grandfather, A Death in the Desert, The Best Gun in the Valley, make a good array of fiction for that always readable periodical.

The Cosmopolitan has an excellent table of contents, among which we note—Pierpont Morgan, by John Brisben Walker, The Young Napoleon, the beginning of a series by Viscount Wolsely, on Napoleon, Captain of Industry, by Edwin Lefore and Robert N. Bennett, the fifth article on Mankind in the making, by Herbert George Wells. The number is unusually full of good articles.

Marriages.

KING-POLLOCK.—Married at Topsail Sound on 14th of Dec., Mr. Alexander Woody King and Miss Mary Susan Pollock, by Rev. S. H. Isler.

COLE-CANADY.—Also by the same, at Jacksonville, Onslow county, N. C., Mr. J. J. Cole and Miss Oneida Cauady, on Dec. 17, 1902.

HOOVER-KIMBRELL.—At the home of the bride's father, Mr. Will Kimbrell, York county, S. C., on Thursday evening, Dec. 18, 1902., by the Rev. J. R. McAlpine, of Pineville, N. C., Miss M. T. Kimbrell was married to Mr. T. Edgar Hoover, of Mecklenburg county, N. C.

M'DONALD-BELLAMY.—In the First Presbyterian Church at Wilmington, N. C., Dec. 9, 1902, by Rev. J. M. Wells, Mr. Thomas McDonald and Miss Amelia C. Bellamy, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Marsden Bellamy, both of Wilmington, N. C.

GEWIN-STEELE.—In the Presbyterian Church, Eutaw, Ala., on the 10th Dec., 1902, by Rev. J. D. A. Brown, Mr. Edwin Evans Gewin of Greensboro, Ala., and Miss Ola Steele of Eutaw.

Deaths.

"If he leads through pain and sorrow,
Yet I trust his love."

JENNIE LOUISE HARDIN.—Westminster Church of Greensboro, N. C., has lost a faithful and much beloved member in the death of Jennie Louise Hardin. She peacefully fell asleep in Jesus, Dec. 5, 1902. She was born April 11, 1877, and was therefore 25 years old her last birthday. Her's was a beautiful Christian character. Everyone who knew was impressed by her thorough consecration. It was her earnest desire to be a missionary, and she had been planning and praying that the way would be opened up for her to prepare herself for work upon the foreign field. Her church has decided to perpetuate her memory by raising a "Jennie Hardin Memorial Fund," to educate a Japanese girl in our Girl's School at Nagoya, Japan. Such will be a fitting memorial of one who was deeply interested in all missionary work, and who desired personally to be a missionary.

ARNOLD.—Mrs. Mary Matthews Arnold was born on Long Street, in Cumberland county, N. C., June 9, 1850, and died at her home near Camerou, in Moore county, N. C., November, 30, 1902, in the 53rd year of her life.

Her parents were Patrick and Margaret Munroe. Of her father's family, two brothers and one sister are still living.

In 1866 the subject of this sketch was married to Mr. Neil T. Arnold, of Moore county, who, with seven children—four sons and three daughters—survive to mourn the loss of a fond, faithful wife and devoted mother.

Peculiarly unselfish and sympathetic, her heart went out in genuine sympathy to others in all their affliction. She was sanguine, her life was full of hope.

Her unwavering, unflinching faith was more than beautiful, it was inspiring. It stood like some granite fortress against which great trials hurled their mad avalanches in vain. It was to her indeed the victory that overcometh the world.

She loved her Lord fervently and served Him faithfully in every walk and condition of life—whether in sickness or health, in poverty's vale or abounding in wealth. She loved His church, His worship, His kingdom. Her's was a Christian life in all the blessedness of that expression, and she died in the triumph of the Christian's faith. We remember clearly how radiantly her face shone, as she told of God's goodness and love, to her, all her life long, just a short while before her release from life came.

Mrs. Arnold first joined Union Church, thence moved her membership to Camerou in its organization and remained a beloved member of its communion until called to the communion above.

It was hard to part but it was wisest, it was best. Her work was done, her race finished, and she had kept the faith.

May God comfort and bless the stricken ones and sanctify this affliction to their good.

Pastor.

HORAH.—Died in Salisbury, Nov. 19, 1902, Mrs. Margaret S. Horah, widow of the late J. M. Horah, Esq., and daughter of W. W. and Amelia Ballard. She was born in Fayetteville, Oct. 20th, 1826, but reared in Salisbury, in the family of her uncle, the late D. A. Davis, Esq. Since 1846 she was a member of the Salisbury Presbyterian Church. Consistent in her Christian life, patient in tribulation, a kind neighbor and a true friend. Three children and two grandchildren survive her. The end was peace.

J. Rumble.

MRS. JOHN M'LAURIN.—Mrs. Callie H. McLaurin, the wife of Mr. John McLaurin for so long the editor of this paper, departed this life at her home in Wilmington, N. C., on Dec. 6th.

Mrs. McLaurin was before her marriage Miss Callie Holmes Blanks. She was the daughter of Mr. William Blanks and Mrs. Elizabeth J. Blauks. Her father was a native of Clinton, N. C., but removed from there to Carroll county, Mississippi, where Mrs. McLaurin was born on April 10, 1836. When she was six years of age, her father returned to his state, and for the rest of her life Wilmington was her home.

She united with the First Presbyterian Church of Wilmington in 1858, and from that time until her death was a faithful and consecrated member of that church.

She was united in marriage on Oct. 25th, 1859 to Mr. John McLaurin. Three daughters—Mrs. Jones of Durham, N. C., and Mrs. Mary Parsley and Miss Sallie McLaurin of Wilmington survive her. A dutiful wife and devoted mother: her memory is very precious to these bereaved ones.

"A virtuous woman, her price was far above rubies. The heart of her husband did safely trust in her. Her children arise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her."

Quiet, and retiring in disposition, she made friends slowly, but once made, she knit them to her with fetters of steel. The throng that came to pay their last tribute of respect and love at her funeral evidenced the deep love of the church and community. Formerly a faithful worker in the Lord's vineyard, increasing ill health during the last few years, compelled her to more and more turn that work over to younger hands, and to leave the lesson that "they also serve who only stand and wait."

The fact that her husband was for so many years the faithful and noble editor of this paper, gives its readers a deeper interest, and a fuller sympathy in her death.

"A woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised."

M'LEOD.—Whereas, God has taken from us by death, our beloved teacher, Duncan M. McLeod, at the age of 59 years, therefore be it resolved,

First, That both in his life and in his peaceful death we recognize the hand of God "who knoweth best and doeth all things well."

Second, That in submission to God's will we say, "Thy will be done," being sure that our beloved teacher has gone to his reward.

Third, That we take this opportunity of expressing our appreciation of his worth as a teacher and a faithful overseer and as a true Christian gentleman, and a noble and upright man whose influence and help we will miss and whose place cannot soon be filled.

Fourth, That we are grateful to God for his example and for bringing him through every trial of life and in comforting him in his last hours.

Fifth, That we believe he has gone to his reward and has joined his loved ones who have gone on before.

Sixth, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to his family as a token of our respect and sympathy and a copy be sent to the Carthage Blade and Presbyterian Standard with request of publication.

Sure of its Victim.

Dr. D. M. Bye, of Indianapolis, Ind., the great cancer specialist, who has cured over six thousand cases of cancer within the last eight years with scolding balmy oils, says that one time he selected a list of five hundred names of persons who had written to him relative to taking treatment, but who, from some cause, had neglected to do so, and wrote to them several months later inquiring after their condition. To his surprise and grief he learned that nearly 20 per cent. had died within five months from the time they had written their letters of inquiry. If left to itself cancer is always sure of its victim. Book sent free, giving particulars and prices of Oils. Address Dr. D. M. Bye Co., Drawer 505, Indianapolis, Ind.

The Household.

Mother and Children.

Stormy days are coming, when the little ones will have to be more or less confined to the house, and the mother will either be taxed to find ways and means of keeping them happily interested and occupied or the house will be turned upside down by the noise and confusion they create. Some suggestions as to meeting these occasions may therefore be helpful. "Rainy-Day Box" is the plan proposed by one mother. It requires, of course, preparation ahead of the time of need. But "forewarned is forewarned." Scraps of velvet and silks, odds and ends of ribbons and dress goods can be saved up for the box and will prove a bonanza for doll dress-making, keeping the girls absorbed for many an hour. Old magazines will provide pictures to be cut and pasted in to scrap-books. If not needed for home use, these will be welcomed by the sick children, in the hospitals, and so thought and work for others can be woven into pleasant occupation, for idle hours.

Interesting employment may be found in "furnishing the house." Let the children cut out all the pictures of furniture and housekeeping articles and sort them out according as they are used in different rooms. Provide a large scrap-book, giving a page to each room of the house. Then let the children arrange the pictures so as to "furnish" the kitchen, the parlor, the dining room, bedroom, etc. The catalogues of furniture dealers and house-furnishing firms will supply an abundance of pictures and cuts of stoves, tables, chairs, couches, bedsteads, pots and pans, etc. The ingenuity of the children will be put to good use, and their powers of observation and memory developed.

A microscope and a magnet are excellent means of occupation. Hunting for the insects on the house-plants, looking at finger-nails, or hair, or anything else, will interest the boys and girls, for the magnifying power makes everything look somewhat unnatural. The magnet may be set to drawing the needles out of an old pin-cushion, or attracting a small heap of steel-filings.

From railway advertisements views of various places may be cut and the children can play they are traveling from one city or town to another by arranging them in order according to the railroad maps. Pan-American scrap-books may be made that will be quite educational, and seed catalogues will furnish material for "making gardens." Mother-wit will multiply these suggestions ad libitum.

"Something new to play" is described by Elizabeth Ward in the American Mother: "The children start the game by saying, 'Now we will furnish a house, and we will begin in the hall.'" One child gives the name of some article of furniture in the hall, such as "chair"; then another answers by giving the name of some other article, the first letter of which must be the last letter of the word just pronounced—for instance, "rug." When several children are playing, the one who answers most promptly holds precedence. From the hall we proceed to the parlor, thence to the library, the dining room, and finally to the kitchen. Up stairs they have the nursery, bath room and bedrooms. The children might plant a garden, beginning with potato, oyster plant, tomato, onion,—thus carrying it on through the entire catalogue of vegetables; or they might plant flowers, or "go to the zoo." When they are older they might "put the books on the shelves," using their titles instead of the nouns.

If there is but one child to be kept interested, the mother, while sewing, may start a story thus: "When we went down to grandma's house, we saw a fence." The child answers, "I saw an elm." Then, perhaps, the mother says, "It grew in a meadow," and the child after a moment's quick thought adds, "By a stream of water." Again the mother takes up the thread, "In its branches sang a robin," and the child continues, "I saw its nest." Then, "I saw a thrush too," may be followed by any number of ideas, for the letter holds many possibilities and suggests houses, horses, hills. Any noun is permissible, provided that its first letter is identical with the last letter of the last noun given, and it is the name of something seen "on the way to grandma's house." —Christian Century.

MISS SARAH FINLEY,

Vice-President of the Palmetto Club, Memphis, Tenn.

WINE OF CARDUI is a thoroughly scientific and modern remedy, meeting the needs of the modern woman in the modern way—without the torture of an operation. Wine of Cardui has cured them in the privacy of their homes and it has found a place in the hearts of American women that no other medicine has found. In their gratitude over 10,000 American women have written letters commending Wine of Cardui. Wine of Cardui meets their wants as no other medicine does. It sustains the young girl at the shock of her entrance to womanhood. Women who take Wine of Cardui have little discomfort during pregnancy and little pain at childbirth. When the change of life appears they enter a happy, healthy old age. Every month it comes to the rescue to assist Nature in throwing the impurities from the body.

Miss Sarah Finley, of Memphis, Tenn., vice-president of the Palmetto Club of that city, speaks for herself and many friends when she bestows the following praise on Wine of Cardui:

"Among the numerous medicines placed before suffering women for their relief none can touch McElree's Wine of Cardui. It towers above them all as a reliable female remedy. It simply drives pain and disease away and restores health in an incredibly short period. I have taken great interest in this medicine for the past two years, since it brought health and strength to me. I have also recommended it to a number of my friends and they who have used it speak of it in the highest terms and I feel that it is praise well bestowed."

If you are suffering from female weakness Wine of Cardui is the medicine you need.

You can have health the same as Miss Finley if you will take the Wine of Cardui treatment. If you need advice further than the complete directions given on the bottle, address The Ladies Advisory Department, Chattanooga Med. Co., Chattanooga, Tenn.

The World.

At a full meeting of the Executive Committee of the Anti-Saloon League, in Raleigh, last week, vigorous measures were adopted looking to the securing from the coming session of the General Assembly a law having the following features:

Restriction of the distilleries to incorporated towns having not less than 1,000 inhabitants.

The privilege of holding local option elections at any time of the year, on thirty days' notice, upon petition of one third of the voters, but not oftener than once in two years.

At such elections the question of having prohibition, the dispensary or the saloon may be voted on as the petitioners may request.

Prohibition of the importation of intoxicating liquor into prohibited territory.

After July 1, 1903, applicants for license for both the manufacture and the sale of intoxicating liquors, shall present with their application a petition in their behalf signed by a majority of the qualified voters of the municipality.

The last recommendation is a modification of the Mississippi law which throws upon the saloon-keeper and the people who want the saloons the burden of establishing the fact of the people's preference. The law of the land recognizes the saloon as something abnormal, as the source of disorder and crime. The proposed law recognizes that in the normal condition of a community the saloon does not exist. We shall comment upon this later and suggest what may be done to have the law passed. Surely no North Carolinian who loves his kind can fail to help.

A Fuller Statement.

The following are the features of the temperance legislation proposed by the Executive Committee of the North Carolina Anti-Saloon League in session with authorized representatives of the North Carolina Methodist Conference and the Baptist State Convention:

1. Prohibition of sale or manufacture of intoxicating liquors outside of incorporated towns. Prohibition of sale of liquor in towns of less than 500 population, whether incorporated or not. Prohibition of manufacture of liquors in towns of less than 1,000 population, whether incorporated or not.

The distinction is made between incorporated towns and unincorporated communities because incorporated towns are organized and policed. It is made also to protect the rural districts from the saloon. It is made also to protect the towns and cities from being surrounded by saloons. The distinction is made in respect to population mainly to prevent the evasion of the law by the incorporation of saloon or distillery settlements.

2. Local Option elections in incorporated towns of more than 500 inhabitants at any time upon 30 days notice and upon petition of one-third of the qualified voters; provided elections shall not take place oftener than once in two years.

In such elections the question of saloons or prohibition, or saloons or dispensary, or dispensary or prohibition, may be submitted as petitioners may request; only one question at an election, however.

3. Prohibition of the importation of liquors by any means into prohibited or dispensary territory.

4. After July 1, 1903, all applications for license to sell or manufacture liquors shall present with their application petitions in their behalf signed by a majority of the qualified voters, save in those towns and cities in which between the date of the enactment of this bill and July 1, 1903, an election shall have been held and carried for saloons.

These propositions are clear, and need no exposition.

They look to the suppression of the saloon and distillery in the rural districts, and to local option elections in the towns and cities in the near future on a fair and reasonable basis. There should not be a saloon in any town or city unless the majority of the people expressly call for it.

The people of North Carolina are entitled to this. They have long been opposed to the saloon. They have never had a fair chance in a struggle with it. They have been hampered by the ignorant vote. They have stood in fear of division. But these things are now passed. And now that they are passed, the General Assembly should freely grant the people's petition for a fair opportunity to grapple with the evil that in their long affliction fastened itself upon them.

Especial attention is directed to paragraph four. That calls for the recognition on the part of the General Assembly that the people of North Carolina are moral people. The saloons now exist not with the consent of the people of North Carolina, but solely because conditions have prevented the moral forces of the State from asserting themselves in elections against the saloons. Every intelligent public man in the State knows that this is true. It is but reasonable to ask now that the patience of the people be rewarded, and that the true attitude of the majority be recognized. Is it unreasonable to presume that the saloons should not be opened unless it is expressly voted by the majority to open them? Is it more reasonable to presume that the people of North Carolina desire the saloons—recognized as ruinous, as the sources of all manner of crime—to go on with their work unless they vote to the contrary? To be sure, he does violence to the character of the people who holds that they favor saloons and that saloons must exist until they have been voted out. One does not ask a good man if he loves virtue. His character is answer. One who believes in the people of North Carolina will say that the people desire the saloons closed, and he will not ask the people to prove this, but will bid the saloon men disprove it. This is just what paragraph four calls for. It is fair; it is representative; it is reasonable; it is only a just recognition of the patience of the moral forces of North Carolina; it presents them with the opportunity that they have long waited for. In their name we ask for this recognition and this opportunity to vindicate themselves and those who respect them.

J. W. Bailey.

Raleigh, N. C., Jan. 2, 1903.

The Executive Committee:—N. B. Broughton, A. J. McKelway, J. O. Atkinson, T. N. Ivy, I. C. Blair, J. A. Oates, J. W. Bailey, and Q. K. Nimmocks, representing the N. C. Conference, and M. L. Kesler, representing the Baptist State Convention.

Bradstreet's review of the business year, issued last Saturday, says:

"To say that 1902 was the best year this country has ever experienced, while truthful enough in the main, does not suggest fully the enormous strides which the United States took in the year just closed. Practically every branch of ordinary trade and manufacture showed an increase above the best of previous years, and yet this immense enlargement of output was not sufficient of itself to satisfy the growing, it might be termed insatiable, demand for all kinds of materials. In many cases the usual foreign outlet for products was, per force, neglected by the American producers, who confined their efforts to supplying insistent domestic demands, while in others foreign production was called upon to reinforce domestic output, with the result that new currents and channels were created in our foreign trade. Export trade, therefore, shrunk, while our imports expanded to unprecedented figures. The railroads of the country, in their efforts to handle the business offered them, suffered as never before from congestion and complaint of interference with production and distribution of the products of the farm, the mine, the shop and the loom was practically universal. Industrial unrest was naturally marked, as it always is in times either of prosperity or of dullness.

"Speculation, it is true, felt the checks imposed upon it by conservatism by short crops in the preceding year, and last but not least by high rates for money, but despite that fact that stock market operations were only about one-half those of 1901. Banking clearings, those usually reliable guides of business, showed aggregate practically equal to the hitherto unheard of totals of 1901. All this was accomplished with a minimum of friction, as reflected in the form of business embarrassment."

Possibly the most important scientific achievement of the year, was the perfection of wireless telegraphy, which made possible the exchange of messages between Cape Breton and the crowned heads of Europe.

In connection with wireless telegraphy progress, mention should be made of the laying the cable from Vancouver to Australia—4,000 statute miles, which completes the encircling of the globe with British cables. Our own cable is being laid in Pacific waters, and before long we shall be in direct communication with our eastern possessions.

In civil engineering, the building of the great dam at Assouan, together with the barrage across the Nile, 250 miles above Cairo has made it possible to store a billion tons of water for irrigation in the dry seasons, and this will increase the earning power of Egypt $13,000,000 every year.

As regards the Isthmian canal, obstacles have been cleared away until the only remaining one is that presented by the Colombian government which demands an excessive price for the strip of land through which the canal will have to be constructed.

In New York City the Rapid Transit Commission has made such progress on the Subway that it is felt certain that trains will be running over the greater part of the route by January 1st, 1904. What this will mean to city traffic can scarcely be estimated.

In Merchant Marine, the great event of the year was the consummation of the steamship combine by which five of the largest transatlantic Companies were merged into with about one million tons of shipping under its control.

In steam engineering the most notable progress has been in the development of the steam turbine. In immediate relation to this is the question of the use of oil fuel which has become one of the burning questions of the day. Airship history has been fraught with tragedy.

In naval and military affairs the past year has not been marked by any startling developments either in ships, armor or armament. A new Italian battle ship has made a speed of 22 knots per hour and the British cruiser "Good Hope" made 24 knots as against 18 knots made by our powerfully armored "Connecticut."

The Beef Trust, organized in Chicago, is now on trial for its legality, with a probability of going to the Federal court. One hundred new trusts have been formed since the Sherman Act became a law.

In social relations we did our best for Prince Henry and sent a special ambassador to the coronation of King Edward, and accepted a gift to Harvard College from the Emperor of Germany. Secretary Hay has followed former diplomacy by a protest against the treatment received by the Jews in Rumania, while the constantly flowing stream of immigration will continue to complicate labor problems. Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. J. P. Morgan and Mr. John Mitchell loom high on our horizon, in connection with what is the largest of all questions that confront us—the relation of capital and labor, which will have to be settled by "We, the people."

The visit of Dr. Lorenz with his new bloodless surgery for hip disease has been hailed by thousands with an enthusiasm as great as the suffering which he taught us how to relieve.

American papers seem to have lost interest in the Venezuelan difficulties at the time they have been declaring another victory to American diplomacy—that victory is the fact that President Roosevelt has persuaded all parties to refer the matter to the Peace Tribunal at the Hague. Mr. Roosevelt and, the Monroe Doctrine seem to have increased their prestige.

It was a calamitous year. There befell far beyond the average of mundane visitations, by volcano, earthquake, storm and flood, and of accidents through human agency by fire, explosive, on rail and in ship. In order of magnitude, in groups, they were as follows: Volcanic eruptions and earthquakes were felt in all parts of the world, the worst in death-dealing results being eruptions in the Islands of Martinique and St. Vincent, 40,000 killed, cities destroyed and abandoned; Torishirna, Japan, 500 killed; Sicily, many killed; earthquakes in Cuernavaca, Mexico, several hundred killed; in Russian Transcaucasia, 2,00 and Andijan, 4,000.

The Work Before Congress.

When the present session of Congress re-assembles after the holiday recess, it will have barely eight weeks within which to accomplish the work before it. Eliminating Sundays and other holidays, there will be about fifty working days. This is but a short time in which to consider many important matters which claim attention, yet the session cannot be protracted beyond March 4, no matter what may be left undone, as the life of the present Congress expires by limitation on that date.

None of the great appropriation bills have yet been disposed of, and most of them have not yet even emerged from the committee. While a few of these measures will occupy little time in following the usual progress through both Houses, the bulk of them will be carefully considered and will consume a good deal of the time at the disposal of Congress. Over and above the appropriation bills, there are several measures of importance which will come up for consideration.

One of these measures is the Cuban reciprocity measure. While the treaty with Cuba will need only the ratification of the Senate, it cannot be made effective without general legislation by Congress, as the Senate alone cannot pass the revenue act needed to give effect to the Cuban treaty. All revenue bills must, in fact, originate in the lower House of Congress. No one need be told that the Cuban reciprocity measure will lead to a bitter fight in Congress.

Another measure that will come up will be the General Staff Bill, which is essentially a controversial measure because of those interested in preventing its passage. Another measure which promises to consume more time than was at first thought likely is the Militia Bill. Considerable opposition has developed to certain sections so if the measure which the War Department and the promoters of the bill are loath to part with, yet it now looks as if these sections will have to be sacrificed to insure the passage of the measure. Still another measure is the Currency Bill, which, however, has small chances of getting through both Houses in time.

It will thus be seen that Congress has a busy time before it, with small prospect of finding much time to devote to other matters than the great appropriation bills. The important questions of Naval increase and Naval personnel will no doubt be tacked on to the general Naval Appropriation Bill, but owing to their importance they are certain to lead to considerable general debate.

The Senate, on its part, will have its hands full if all the reciprocity treaties are called up, as some threaten will be the case. The opponents of the Cuban measure seem determined to call up some, if not all, the pigeon-hole treaties if the Cuban treaty is pushed too strongly, and to link the fate of all the treaties together; that is, ratify all of them or none.

The announcement that bubonic plague prevails at Mazatlan, Mex., is news that demands attention. It does not yet appear how many persons have been attacked by it, but the statement is made that more than half the patients are women.

Doubtless the disease was brought into that port, which is on the Pacific coast of Mexico, by some ship from Asiatic ports, bringing Chinese who are landing in Mexico in considerable numbers in order to get into the United States by smuggling themselves over the international boundary line.

The American Association for the Advancement of Science met in Washington last week. It is a fine body of men and women. Asaph Hall, the retiring president, has been a popular hero ever since he discovered the moons of Mars. His successor, Ira Reinsen, is not only at the head of Johns Hopkins, but also of the American Chemical Society. Simon Newcomb, who enjoys a world-wide reputation among astronomers, is expected to contribute his share towards the success of the meeting.

The famine story in Finland has been confirmed by the Russian press. The causes are: an unusually cold Summer, followed by a succession of floods, and 400,000 people are facing starvation.

A bill has been introduced into the House of Representatives to remove the tariff on works of art.

Serena's Offering.

Serena Lathrop was not a poor woman. All her life had been very comfortably provided for, and the recent deaths of an aunt and a cousin, who had left her generous legacies, had made her very well-to-do indeed. But unfortunately Serena was at heart a pauper.

She hated to give a cent away. When the collector for the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions went on her annual round through the church she always left the call on Miss Lathrop to the last. She dreaded the icy greeting she was sure to receive, the chill demeanor of the lady and the remarks, never omitted, on the waste in carrying out missionary effort. Latterly Miss Serena had been heard to say that she believed the trouble in the far East was wholly due to the missionaries and their mistakes, and that she should hereafter cut down her subscription. It had never exceeded a dollar a year, so that fifty cents was all that Miss Jennie Raeburn, who was collector, had any reason to expect.

"I believe," said Miss Jennie, faltering on Miss Serena's doorstep, "that I'll just add fifty cents to my own collection, and not go to Miss Serena at all." Then another thought came over her mind. "What right have I, on the Lord's own errand, to be faint-hearted and feeble? I am behaving like a coward. I am ashamed of myself for being so timorous when the Lord has sent me forth."

She rang the doorbell, and was ushered into Miss Serena's stately, stiff and formal drawing room. The carpet was rich and thick with huge medallions of flowers on a crimson background at regular intervals. Sofa and chairs were upholstered in green rep, after a by-gone fashion. Every chair was covered with a large crocheted tidy, and on the sofa were three. A round table, marble-topped, stood in the centre of the room, and on the mantel were a French clock and two large china vases holding bouquets of pampas plumes. The walls were ornamented with ancestral portraits, and the whole room was eloquent of order and cleanliness, a very temple of conservatism.

"My dear Jennie," said Miss Serena, coming forward most graciously, "how very glad I am to see you! I have been watching for you all the week. Of course, you have as usual come to represent the woman's auxiliary. I have belonged to it ten years, and I've given only ten dollars in that time. I have been considering the matter, and feel that I've made a great mistake. I owe the society a good deal by way of a back-debt. Here is my offering." And into the hand of the astonished Jennie she slipped ten shining gold pieces, fifty dollars in all.

"Why, Miss Serena!" gasped Jennie, in sheer incredulity and amazed delight.

"I may as well tell you all about it, dear. I've had a change of heart," said Miss Serena.

"Come to my room and have a cup of tea, and I'll explain."

"You see Jennie," she went on a little later as she poured the boiling water over the fragrant Ceylon tea, "I have never been enthusiastic over church work, and missions have not appealed to me. I have been honest and nothing more. Now, of late, I have been convinced that they were a mistake, that good money was thrown away in sending missionaries to the barbarians in China, and the strange, queer people in India and I've been saying that what I gave I'd give right here in my own town where I could see it spent. But the other day I was reading of the missionaries who had been martyred this summer, men, women, even children, and though I felt they'd brought it on themselves going off among such desperately bigoted and superstitious folks. I couldn't get away from the thought of them. The more I tried, the more I couldn't. Against my judgment and against my will something said to me, 'Serena Lathrop, you are a mean, selfish thing. You could never have done it. They've broken the alabaster box. You've never even given the price of a tin box of perfume to the Lord, let alone alabaster.'"

"I kept a-musing and a-musing, and I went to bed and fell asleep. And, Jennie, on my bed I dreamed a dream."

Jennie said nothing, but her big blue eyes never moved from Miss Serena's excited face. That face, usually immovable, was strangely stirred. The cheeks were flushed. The eyes shone. Miss Serena looked twenty years younger.

"I dreamed that I was a child again, and that my mother had sent me on an errand, and I had lost my way. I wandered up and down, but could not find the path. By and by I seemed to be in a boat drifting across a lonely sea. I still knew that I wanted to find my home, but I could not. On sea or land I was just a lost child. At last the boat grated on a strange shore, and I stepped out on a grassy plain, all smooth and flowery, and there were shining forms moving softly about and in the distance I heard sweet music, singing and the tinkling of harps.

"The singing ones were not all grown up people. Some were children like me, and one, a dear, brown-eyed maiden, came and said: 'I am Okara San. Don't you know me? You used to send me letters to Japan from your Sunday-school. Come with me, and I will take you to our Lord.'"

"Okara San was a little girl Miss Serena's Sabbath-school class supported years ago. She died when she was fourteen.

"We went a little way, and I did not seem now to be a child; you know how the scenes change in dreams. I seemed a young lady, twenty years old or thereabouts. The wee Japanese floated away, and in her place there appeared a tall and graceful Hindu woman in white and gleaming robe.

"Come with me, Serena," she said, and I will guide you to our Lord."

"She had a wreath of flowers on her head, and flowers in her hands. She glided quickly by me, and when I said 'Have I ever known you?' she answered: 'Friends of yours have known me well. I believe you did not care for the Hindus, in the land where some people ever walk with blind eyes and beggared souls.'

"I dropped my head in shame. I remembered my cold disdain of the Hindus and my niggardly gifts. But I walked on. Presently my conductor left me, and a group of lovely persons came around me. Again I was neither child nor young girl. I was myself, an elderly woman with grey hair, and stubborn ideas that were like a rock. But all the while, under it all, I knew that I was a lost child, and that I wanted to find my mother.

"Shall I take her to our dear Lord Christ?" said one to another.

"Their eyes were like stars. Their faces were beautiful. They were like those who had gained the victory, and were safe for evermore. And, Jennie, I knew them, for some of them I had met and some had heard speak in missionary meetings, and a still and solemn voice whispered in my spirit: 'These are they which have come out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.' They were martyrs of the cross. I stood before them with empty hands, ashamed and silent.

"From somewhere out of the golden mist which hung over a walk of blooming roses and lillies, suddenly my mother appeared. She looked very wistful and remote, as if she were much displeased.

"Ah, Serena," she said; 'is it you? But you are not fit to be here. Nay, friends, do not take her yet to our Lord. She does not care to help him to find his sheep that are lost.'

"And all around me the air grew more and more chilly and the flowers faded and the faces of the saints disappeared. And I heard a voice far away saying: 'Other sheep I have. Them also I must bring, that there may be one flock and one shepherd.' And then, Jennie, I awoke."

Miss Serena's dream wrought in her steadfast repentance. She was not one to do any thing by halves. It seemed to her that she must make up for lost time, so she began to read and study, she attended the meetings, she ceased to discriminate between God's wanderers in America and in the lands across the sea. In a vision of the night her Saviour had spoken to her, and she was obedient to his commandment.

Jennie, too, had learned a lesson of trust that was not in vain.—Margaret E. Sangster.—The Witness.

The Low-Voiced Woman.

"Her voice was ever gentle, low and soft;
An excellent thing in woman."

It has long been conceded that a pleasant voice is one of woman's greatest charms. And many of us can verify this truth for ourselves by recalling the sweet influence of some woman, who, like the lovely Cordelia, spake in accent soft and low.

Longfellow, describing a sweet voice, likened it to the music of a summer bird, "heard in the still night with its passionate cadence." And Ben Johnson wrote:

"The voice so sweet, the words so fair,

As some soft chime had stroked the air;
And though the sound had parted thence,
Still left an echo in the sense."

A pretty face and a musical voice go well together, but, of the two, the latter is preferable. The power of a truly good woman possessing such a gift cannot be overestimated, especially if she is refined and intellectual. Her harmonious tones fall with a resftul cadence upon the ear of the invalid. They are peace for the weary, balm for the sorrowful, and are frequently more efficacious than a sermon in touching the obdurate hearts of the wayward.

On the contrary, we sometimes find rare beauty of feature seriously marred by the incongruity of a disagreeable voice. It is said of the Empress Eugenie that the stranger was enraptured with her wonderful beauty, but the moment she spoke all admiration was forgotten in the unpleasant sensation caused by her harsh Spanish voice.

English women, as a rule, are not blessed with particularly musical voices. The colds, catarrh and bronchial trouble to which the sudden changes of climate subject them more or less affect the vocal organs. In fact, soft, rippling utterance seems to belong more generally to lands of eternal summer. Yet any woman, no matter how great her natural defects may be, can, with a few exceptions, bring her voice within a becoming key, and by proper care and exercise cultivate distinct, well modulated tones.

Let us hope, with the present movement for physical culture and voice culture and every other kind of culture, the noisy, garrulous woman of watering-place fame will have soon passed away, and in her stead come a being who will not converse as though every one in her hearing were deaf and she were bound to finish the sentence which she is bent on uttering that very moment or never.—New York Ledger.

The Real Helen Gould.

The quiet, unassuming personality of Miss Gould permits her to mingle with the public unnoticed, and the latter would often be surprised to know that the brown-haired little woman whom it has passed with scarcely a glance was one in whom it felt the keenest interest. To be unobserved is regarded by her as the most desirable of all conditions. She cherishes an antipathy for the camera that amounts almost to a mania, and is ever on the alert when there is occasion for the prevalence of the camera fiend. Her parasol has often been called into prompt service to meet such affronts, and not long ago when she was a guest at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, Admiral Philip captured and destroyed a camera that was in the hands of an offending spectator. In stature Miss Gould is not quite five feet and four inches. Her hair is brown and very abundant. Her eyes are dark and soft and earnest, and her face denotes the keen intensity of her nature. Her features are regular, and render her face beautiful with the beauty of goodness and truth. Her smile illumines, and it is the kindest smile imaginable. Her voice is low and musical, and her manner all that is unaffected and friendly.

Her interests are with the real things of life, and her personal effort in behalf of the poor and needy far over-reaches her strength, and is the cause of constant solicitude of her brothers and sisters, by all of whom she is adored. The custodianship to which her fortune has arrogated her is not one which she either sets aside or deposes to at hers, and every hour of every day in the year is listed to correspond with some duty that awaits it.

Miss Gould's New York home is the old family mansion in Fifth Avenue, but her country home at Irvington-on-the-Hudson is where she resides the greater part of the year. Her horses and dogs are there, her garden and conservatories, in all of which she takes greatest pleasure and pride. Her family of little orphaned children are near, and with them she passes many holidays, contributing to their enjoyment. They are her wards, each one of whom it is safe to say will be well established in life in future years.—Mrs. Van Rennselaer Day in The Pilgrim for October.

The Children's Feet.

A ragged woman was crossing the corner of a public park in London, where the children of the poor are accustomed to play, many of them barefoot. A burly policeman stationed on the corner watched the woman suspiciously. Half way cross she stopped and picked up something which she hid in her apron. In an instant the police man was by her side. With a gruff voice and threatening manner he demanded: "What are you carrying off in your apron?" The woman seemed embarrassed and refused to answer. Thereupon the officer of the law, thinking that she had doubtless picked up a pocketbook which she was trying to make way with, threatened to arrest her unless she told him at once what she had in her apron.

At this the woman reluctantly unfolded her apron and disclosed a handful of broken glass. In stupid wonderment the policeman asked:

"What do you want with that stuff?"

A flush passed over the woman's face; then she answered simply:

"If you please, sir, I just thought I'd like to take it out of the way of children's feet."

Blessings on the kindhearted caretaker who was so thoughtful of the children's needs and the children's feet. And should not we imitate so good an example, and take out of the path of the little ones anything which can wound them, injure them, or cause them to stumble?

"What do animosity mean?" said a Charlotte servant girl.

The meaning of the word was explained.

"Wel, I jess wanted to know. I was er talkin' to er fancy nigger last night and he said:

"Does de pleasures of de evenin' excite your animosity?" En he had me."

"What did you say?"

"I said: 'Dey sh' do reprehend my sagacity.' Den I had him."—Charlotte Observer.

Our Young People.

The Passing of Our Sea Birds.

By T. Gilbert Pearson.

The extensive coast line of North Carolina, with its large and shallow sounds, forms the natural feeding grounds for countless numbers of winged tenants of the sea. Once these waters teemed in summer with gulls and terns, beautiful long-winged fliers, who come out of the South, upon the approach of spring, to lay their eggs and rear their young upon our shores. They were the natural scavengers of the sea, and gathered from the waves much decaying animal matter which otherwise would be thrown upon the beach to putrify in the sun. Often the fisherman, lost in the fog, would eagerly watch for the birds to give evidence of the direction of the land, as they winged their way homeward from the deep, with food for their young. Like all sea fowls, they gathered in communities to breed, and placed their beautiful spotted eggs in simple nests, either on the sand or more rarely on clusters of fallen grass in the salt marshes. Full ten thousand gathered each year for this purpose on Shackelford's Bank, between Beaufort and Cape Lookout. They nested among the dunes at Fort Macon and on the sandy beaches about Southport. At Lockwood's Folly there was a large colony, and countless thousands reared their young on the islands about Ocracoke, Hatteras and Oregon Inlets.

Over the waters of Albemarle they were abundant, and in Currituck Sound they gathered in swarms, and everywhere the beauty of their plumage and the grace of their flight were things of joy to all eyes which saw them.

But all this is the past. Fashion issued her decree for sea bird's feathers with which to decorate women's hats. Swiftly the New York millinery dealers dispatched their gunners to the breeding places of the gulls and terns, and all summer the roar of their guns along the shore answered loudly the roar of the ocean. Loath to leave their eggs or clamoring young, the old birds would circle, screaming through the air, regardless of the repeated discharges of the guns which continually thinned their ranks. A few seasons of this work and the vast flock had disappeared. Then, when it was all but too late the bird lovers of the country realized the situation and raised their voices in protest. Now, on the coast of every State along the Atlantic border north of North Carolina, wardens with guns in their hands and laws at their backs protect the colonies of breeding birds from the murderous feather gatherers. Thus prevented from carrying on their work elsewhere the employes of the milliners turned with eager joy to our coast, knowing that here no wardens await, to keep them from landing on our beach, knowing that here no law frowns upon their bloody work, and knowing that the public sentiment and the public conscience yet slumbers on the subject of its duty to the birds. Each summer our few remaining sea birds are followed from beach to beach and hunted, ever to the death.

The Audubon Society of North Carolina, already enrolling in its membership bird lovers to the number of a thousand strong, call upon the good people of the State to aid them in creating sentiment which shall result in the enactment of a law at this meeting of the Legislature that shall make it a crime to destroy the lives of these beautiful and useful birds. To make this law effective when it is passed, the writer is authorized to state that funds sufficient to hire wardens to watch and protect the breeding sea birds have already been raised by kind-hearted and thoughtful men, and will be available for use at once upon the passage of such a law.

What Ralph Saw.

Ralph had been sick a whole month, and now that he was able to sit up again he liked to have his chair by the window, where he could look out and watch the men who were at work upon a new house which was being built next door.

He was so glad that the men were at work there just at this time, for the days sometimes seemed very long to him, and he liked to see the house growing before his eyes. Nothing else entertained him for so long a time.

But one day the funniest thing happened at the new house. A strange workman appeared upon the scene, but this workman hindered more than he helped.

Ralph was at his accustomed place at the window and was watching a carpenter who was measuring pieces of lumber for a certain part of the building. Ralph saw him take out his measure and mark the length with a pencil. He then laid the pencil down beside him while he sawed the board. Pretty soon he looked around to get his pencil, and it was gone. He looked about a few minutes; then he took another pencil from his pocket. He marked another board with this and laid it down as before, and when he wanted it again, it, too, was gone.

The man now began to look vexed, and he searched all about, probably expecting to find some mischievous boy around, Ralph thought. But finding no boy and no pencils, he borrowed another pencil of one of the workmen, and this time, when he got through using it, he put it in his pocket. So he managed in this way to keep the one he had borrowed.

Presently he seemed to have measured all the boards he needed, and then he began nailing them in place. He took a handful of nails from the pocket of the big apron that he wore and laid them down within easy reach. He used a few of them, and when he reached around for more there were no more there. Then he stood straight up, took off his cap and scratched his head.

Ralph had been watching all this time, and had seen where all the missing articles went, and now at the man's perplexity he laughed aloud. Mamma, who was in the next room, heard the merry laugh, and it did her good. She determined to go in as soon as she finished the dusting and see what was amusing Ralph so much.

After the loss of his nails, the workman seemed to think something was wrong. He looked all about, questioned some of the other carpenters, and finally went to work once more. But this time he took the nails from his pocket only as he needed them, and once in a while he would look around as if watching for somebody. But as nobody appeared, he at last seemed quite to forget his mysterious losses, and to work on in his usual manner.

It was a warm day, and as the sun rose higher he began to feel very warm. Ralph could see how heated he looked, and finally he took out a large red handkerchief and wiped his forehead.

He seemed a very absent-minded sort of workman, for now he laid his handkerchief down beside him while he again turned to his work.

"Mamma, come quick, quick!" Ralph shouted, and mamma hurried to his side.

He pointed to the window. "Now, watch that man's handkerchief," he said. "Don't take your eyes off from it."

Mamma wondered what Ralph meant, but she did as he said, and pretty soon, when the man had gone to work and quite turned his back to his handkerchief, down swooped a big black crow, picked up the handkerchief and flew off with it.

Then how Ralph did laugh and clap his hands. "It's just too funny, mamma," he said. And then he explained to her how the crow had been playing jokes on the carpenter all the morning. Mamma laughed too, and then she said, "I think, Ralph, that we will have to arrest Mr. Crow. Shall we tell the man who his tormentor is?"

"Yes," said Ralph; "only do please wait till he finds his handkerchief gone."

So they waited, and presently the man turned to take up his handkerchief, for he had grown very warm again. His look of blank astonishment when he found it was gone was too much for both Ralph and mamma, and they laughed till the tears stood in their eyes.

Then mamma went out on the front steps and tried to call to the man, but he was shouting and gesticulating to the other workmen in such a frantic way that she had to go over to the building before she could make him hear her.

Ralph watched from the window. He saw the man turn at last and listen to what his mamma had to say, and he saw them both go around to the farther end of a pile of lumber, where there was a space between two boards, and there, safely stored away, were the pencils, nails and the handkerchief, as they expected.

Then Ralph saw mamma point up into the branches of a tree which stood near, and from which, as she did so, there came a cry of "Caw! caw! caw!"

The other workmen shouted with laughter. At first the subject of Mr. Crow's practical jokes was inclined to be angry, but at last his better nature conquered, and he laughed with the rest.

As he went back to work Ralph saw him take the handkerchief and tie it under his chin, and mamma explained when she came in that he said he would have to tie his cap on or the bird would be flying off with that next.

But Jim Crow seemed satisfied with his morning's work, and after his trick was discovered he flew off home, and the poor workman was left in peace.

As Ralph was much better the next day, mamma said she believed that his laughing so hard over Jim Crow's pranks had done him more good than medicine. —Southern Churchman.

The Old Fountain.

Once upon a time a mason lived in Granada who was so very poor that he could not earn enough food and raiment for his large family. Work was not always to be had, and bread was dear, and often he could hardly keep actual want away from his door. However, he was glad and cheerful and so were his wife and children, which made up for much. One night there was a knock at his door, and he found outside a tall, gaunt, and rather miserable looking stranger, dressed in a long black coat. He would not come inside the masons' humble cottage, but he beckoned the man into the street, where he said in a sepulchral voice: "Do you want a job?"

"Most certainly do," replied the mason, "and shall be glad enough of it if I may be well paid for it!"

"You will have no reason to complain of that," said the man, "so long as you will agree to my conditions."

"And what may they be?" inquired the mason.

"I shall require you to be blindfolded, and I will lead you by the hand to the spot where the job is to be done and bring you back again."

The mason hardly relished the blindfolding part of the bargain, for he did not like the man's looks; but necessity works wonders, and he reflected that if he lost the present chance it might be long ere another came in his way. He therefore allowed his eyes to be bandaged, and then he was led, as far as he could judge, by a road with many sharp turnings, to a distant part of the city. At length the man opened a door, and entered into a house, and, after a few moments, the muffler was removed from the mason's eyes, and he found himself in a courtyard, with the dry basin of an old fountain in the midst. He was bidden next to construct a sort of vault beneath the basin. At this he worked all the night, but was not able to finish it.

The man gave him liberal wages, and asked whether he was willing to come the next night and finish it. He replied he was quite willing, if he were as well paid for his work. He also made a solemn promise to say nothing about it at home.

When the next night came he was again blindfolded and taken to the same place, where he soon finished the vault. But how horrified was he when the man said, "Now help me to bring forth the bodies which are to be buried in this vault." The mason had some thoughts of running away, and forfeiting his second night's wages, but he considered, on second thoughts, that he was innocent and in no danger. But he was vastly relieved when he found the bodies that were to be buried consisted of three huge earthenware jars. They were so ponderous, too, that the man and the mason, using all their strength could scarcely

A TRAIN FOR MILLIONAIRES

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

WANTED.—A widow desires position in a college or institution as housekeeper or matron, infirmary attendant or superintendent of laundry. Good references. Address Mrs. K., care Presbyterian Standard.

move them. After much pulling and grunting, the three jars were safely ensconced in the new vault, and all traces were removed. The mason was then led to the corner of a street, and ordered to remain there till the cathedral bell had chimed a certain hour. This he undertook to do, and having received his pay, he whiled away the wearisome hours by counting his money, and thinking how he would spend it. When the bell sounded he went home, and had a very pleasant fortnight, he and his family in the enjoyment of plenty, and then he had to be on short commons again.

Some years passed away, and one evening a rich old house owner, who had the reputation of being a very grasping man, called on our friend the mason. He asked whether he was willing to do a job of repairing a tumble-down house.

The mason replied: "Yes, that I am; and I will do it as cheaply as any man in Granada."

"I am glad to hear it," said the other, "for I have an old house in this city which is very much out of condition, and I want it patched up before it becomes a downright ruin. The worst of it is I cannot get any one to live in it since an old tenant I had had died. The dolts who took it were terrified out of their wits by strange noises. They say it is haunted by a demon, who goes about clinking his money as if he were counting it; and the consequence is that the house has a very ill name, and people will hardly go near it after nightfall. But come and have a look at it."

The mason put a few tools in a basket, and followed the old man to the ruinous house. After looking into several dreary rooms, which seemed abandoned to rats and spiders, they went into a courtyard. The mason started, and rubbed his eyes. Where and when had he seen a courtyard exactly like this? Then the truth flashed on him. It was the very place where he made the vault for the man. There was the same old basin, once full of water, when the fountain used to play, but now dry and dusty; and underneath? aye, were those corpulent jars and their rich contents still below, as he had left them. He would like to see into that. So he said to the old gentleman: "If you will let me live in this house rent free I will engage to put it into good repair and charge you nothing for my work. I am too poor to be afraid of ghosts, or even of robbers, who are, to my mind, the worst of the two."

The house owner was glad enough to let the mason live in it on his own terms; so he and his tattered wife and children flitted without delay from their wretched hovel into the haunted house.

The clinking of spectral coins ceased. If coins clinked anywhere, it was in the mason's pockets, and wonderful to relate he became a rich man. His family grew proud as they grew rich for they found money coming without work and they threw it away foolishly. Not one of them was really happy any more, but it was not until he was about to die that the secret which he had kept for years began to weigh heavily upon the mason's soul, then he called his eldest son and told him all. Leaning upon the young man's arm the old father went down into the court yard at night and pressed the spring which kept the stones in place. Back rolled the slab concealing the vault; the old mason in his eagerness let go his son's arm and stepped into it alone. As he did so he must have touched, unconsciously, upon the secret spring, for the slab sprang back into place with a reverberation which shook the house. Try as he would the son could not discover how to open it again without assistance, and hours passed before the servants who were summoned could break an entrance into the vault. When at last they did so the old mason was dead. Gold lay in heaps about him, for he had spent scarce a third of the treasure; yet neither by his son nor by his other children was the money he had got so craftily inherited. As no heirs turned up to claim it, the fortune passed to the crown; thus were the wife and children of the mason poorer than before, since they had now neither money nor content. Still you and I should not have objected to have found that fountain should we?—Church Standard.

The Dog and the Kitten.

One day the servant of the family was told to take a kitten to a pond for the purpose of drowning it.

His master's dog went with him. When the kitten was thrown into the water, the dog sprang in and brought it back to land.

A second time the man threw it in, and again the dog rescued it.

When for a third time the servant tried to drown it, the dog, as resolute to save the little helpless life as the man was to destroy it, swam with it to the other side of the pool, ran all the way home with it and deposited it before the kitchen fire.

From that time the dog kept constant watch over the kitten. The two were inseparable, even sharing the same bed.—London spectator.

Our Little Folks.

CONDUCTED BY MRS. A. J. MCKELWAY.

Children's Letters.

Charlotte, N. C., Dec. 21.

Dear Standard:

I thought I would write you a little letter as I have never wrote to you before. I am a little girl eight years of age. I go to school and I go to Sunday-school. I got a Testament for reciting the Child's Catechism. My Pastor is Rev. W. H. Davis. I did not get to go to Sunday-school today; it was raining. I will close for fear of the waste basket.

Your little friend,
Annie Patterson.

Statesville, N. C., Dec. 28th., 1902.

Dear Standard:

My papa takes the Standard. I have a little brother 7 years old. I go to school and my teacher is Mrs. Stephenson. I am a little girl 10 years old. I wanted a doll Christmas, but my mother says I am too big to play with dolls.

Your little friend,

What Puss Did—A True Story.

Puss had three kittens, and the old speckled hen had twelve chickens.

Pussy's kittens were silvery gray underneath, and all sorts of lovely colors on top.

Old Speck's chickens were all yellow and very fluffy.

Puss kept her babies in a box behind the stove in the kitchen, and old Speck kept hers in a barrel in the woodshed.

Every day, after the hearth was swept, Puss brought her kittens out and put them under the stove; and likewise, every day, after the sun was up, old Speck brought her chickens out into the back yard.

Now, one would think, since Puss and the old speckled hen had so much in common and were such near neighbors, that they would be good friends.

But, dear me, Puss never stepped out into the back yard but old Speck began to scold. Puss could not even sit in the woodshed doorway for the sake of a little air but old Speck would ruffle up her feathers and begin to call her chickens.

"Errer!" she would say, lifting first one foot and then the other. "Errerer! Don't you see that cat? Err! Lookout! Err! Keep close to me!" and so she would go on, while Puss sat with her eyes closed, and never once thought of the chickens.

One day a dreadful thing happened in the speckled hen's family. The housemaid had left a pail of water standing near the woodshed door, and the speckled hen's largest chicken, anxious to try his wings, flew up on the edge of the pail. He tilted back and fourth a few times, trying to get his balance, and then splash! he went into the water. The poor little thing fluttered and gasped, and old Speck, lifting up her wings and her voice, flew in terror about the pail.

After a while the chicken became very quiet, and the old speckled hen went back to her chickens, trying hard to think what it was that made her feel so uneasy.

Meanwhile, the house maid found the chicken in the pail, and, thinking it was dead, but not being quite willing to give it up, she wrapped it in a piece of flannel and put it in the oven.

After a time the poor little drowned chicken began to gasp for breath. Then he tried to wink his eyes, and the house maid took him out of the oven.

She tended him very carefully for a day or two, and then took him in triumph back to his mother.

But, alas! old stupid Speck had forgotten all about her lost chicken, and, thinking he belonged to some other hen, she flew at him and pecked him with all her might.

"And what is to be done with this chicken?" asked the house maid, standing in the middle of the kitchen floor and holding the little thing between her two great warm hands.

"You'll have to take care of it yourself," said the house mistress.

So the chicken was wrapped again in flannel and put under the stove. Now, flannel is not nearly as warm as one's own mother's feathers, and the poor little chicken felt quite forsaken. Pretty soon he crept out from underneath the flannel, lifted up his shrill little voice, and wept.

Puss, who was asleep with her three kittens, moved uneasily, for she did not like harsh noises.

"Peep, peep, peep!" said the chicken. Puss stretched herself and opened her eyes.

"Peep, peep, peep!" cried the chicken.

Puss looked at her three kittens nestled up to her so cozy and warm, and then she looked at the poor little forlorn chicken standing out in the cold.

"Mew!" said Puss, and such warmth of love and tenderness as there was in Pussy's voice!

But the chicken, not understanding cat language, kept on crying, "Peep, peep, peep!"

Then Puss got up very carefully, so as not to disturb her babies, and walked over to the chicken.

"Mew!" said Puss again, and put her head down right over the chicken. It might have been Pussy's motherly mew, or it might have been her warm fur, that won the chicken. Certain it is that the little thing began to utter the most contented and musical peeps that ever a cat heard. Peep, peep, peep! peep, peep, peep! peep, peep, peep!

Then Puss settled down close by the chicken, and the chicken cuddled up close to the cat, and after that Puss had four babies, and the chicken had a nice warm place of its own under Pussy's fur.

Whenever the chicken, straying away into remote corners, began to cry, Puss would wake up and mew; then the little chicken would run home, happy and contented, crying, "Peep, peep, peep! peep, peep, peep! peep, peep, peep!"—

The Tables Turned.

"O mother, how I wish my dollies would suddenly become alive and speak to me!" exclaimed Winifred Gray. "It would be so delightful!"

"Do you think so?" said her mother. "I fancy I should be rather startled if one of your dollies spoke; but there are dolls made with a phonograph inside them, to speak when they are wound up."

"O no, mother. I don't mean that! I mean real alive, proper speaking."

"Well, I think your dollies are very nice as they are, darling. You would not like them any better if they became what the Scotch people call uncanny, which they certainly would do if they spoke like human beings."

Mrs. Gray was just then called out of the room, so she left Winifred alone, curled up in a large armchair.

Presently Winifred heard a rustling noise, and, turning, found her biggest doll, Molly, a huge creature with very red cheeks and staring blue eyes standing by her side. To her amazement, Winifred saw that Molly had suddenly grown to at least four times her natural size, while she herself had dwindled into a small creature no bigger than a good-sized kitten.

"Now, then," said Molly, in a loud dictatorial voice, "I'm going to undress you and do your hair. Perhaps I shall give you a bath as well. I shall see."

"Indeed, I shall not let you do anything of the kind!" said Winifred, with great indignation. "Who ever heard of a child being undressed and bathed at this time in the afternoon?"

"We shall see," answered Molly. "I am mistress now; and you can't help yourself, whatever I do to you."

With this she grabbed Winifred roughly round the waist and lifted her up out of the armchair, in which she seated herself, with her victim sprawling helplessly on her lap, and proceeded to strip off her garments in spite of all her struggles.

"How dare you!" spluttered Winifred, nearly choking with indignation. "If you don't stop at once I'll lock you in the toy cupboard for a month!"

"If you don't be quiet I'll lock you in the toy cupboard," returned Molly. "Don't you see I've become alive as you wished? And now I'm going to show you how it feels to be bundled about like a doll at your owner's good will and pleasure. My goodness! How you have bundled me about sometimes!"

While she was speaking she had removed all Winifred's clothes. This done, she tucked her under her arm, head downwards, and went to search in the cupboard for the bath sponge and brush and comb; but, catching sight of a book, she immediately dropped her helpless victim on the floor, and, seating herself close by, became absorbed in a story, and forgot everything else.

It was a bitterly cold afternoon, and in spite of the warm fire poor Winifred felt miserably chilled, and begged that she might be dressed again; but Molly appeared stone-deaf, and only moved presently to go and reseat herself, with her absorbing book, in the arm chair.

Then another doll, named Ettie, who had also increased immensely in size, came up to where Winifred lay sprawling, and picked her up, saying, "Molly, if you have done playing with Winifred, I'm going to have her for a little while."

"All right," replied Molly, "I don't want her; but do wash her face, it's downright grimy." And she was immediately absorbed in her book again.

Ettie produced from the cupboard a slate sponge, very rough and gritty, with which she scrubbed Winifred's face, holding her meanwhile by her hair. Then she wiped it with a few rough dabs of her pocket handkerchief, which was anything but spotlessly clean. After that she dressed her in one or two ill fitting garments, twisting and screwing her limbs carelessly about while she did so. Then came the hair dressing process, which was, perhaps, the most painful of any; for the cruel Ettie actually fastened the hair back with a pin run straight into the scalp.

"How dare you! how dare you!" shrieked the helpless Winifred. "I will punish you for this!"

But Ettie took no notice and went on calmly amusing herself and torturing the poor victim.

Presently she looked out of the window; and, seeing that the weather was brighter, she flung Winifred into the toy cupboard on a confused heap of boxes, trains, horses, carts, humming tops and all sorts of hard, uncomfortable things, exclaiming: "Come along, Molly! Let's go outdoors for a game."

Molly jumped up gleefully, and the pair went off together. Winifred grew colder, and was just trying to cry when she heard her mother's voice saying: "Wake up, pet! You've been fast asleep, and the fire is all out."—The Beacon.

The Doughnut Menagerie.

Grandma used to fry the little pieces she cut out of doughnuts, and she would give them to us children smoking hot; and we'd stick toothpicks in for necks, legs, tails, horns, or any other parts of animals we wished to make.

One day Rob and I together made a chicken, a rooster, a cow, a pig, a dog, a buffalo, and an elephant; and we were just making pens for them out of sticks of wood, and were going to play that we had a menagerie like the one in Central Park, when in came Rover, grandpa's big dog, and almost at one mouthful ate up all our menagerie, toothpicks and all. Rob, who was younger than I, began to cry because he thought all our fun was spoiled; but I was really troubled for fear poor Rover would choke and die because he'd eaten all those toothpicks. Grandma only laughed and said that a dog that could chew up bones wouldn't be hurt by those little toothpicks. And then she gave us some more little doughnuts, and we made another and better menagerie, and played that there had been a big earthquake that had swallowed up all our first ones.—Mary G. Mooar, in the Youth's Companion.

GOOD FOR CANCER and ECZEMA.

McAdenville, N. C., Dec. 18, 1902

I have been using the Barium water for a bad cancer on my mother's face and I think it is improving, and if I can keep the water for her I believe it will cure her.

Very respectfully, L. L. McCarn.

Mt. Pleasant, N. C., Dec. 18, 1902

I hereby most cheerfully and heartily testify to the wonderful healing properties of Barium water. We had occasion the past summer in our family to use it in a case each of cancer and eczema with happiest results. It succeeded where everything else failed. If it were more generally known and used much suffering might be saved to humanity.

Very truly yours, (Rev.) J. A. Linn.

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

Event and Comment.

The Northern Methodist Church has decided to raise $5,000,000 more for the care of its old preachers, having already raised $20,000,000 as their Twentieth Century Fund. The Methodists always do go to extremes.

We are glad to learn of the expected visit to Charlotte of Mr. Crittenden, of Florence Mission fame. He is a rich man whose heart the Lord opened by a sore bereavement and who has consecrated his time as well as his means to the Lord.

"The Rt. Rev. Dr. Davidson, Bishop of Winchester, has been appointed Archbishop of Canterbury, in succession to the Most Rev. Dr. Temple, who died December 23." Positive, Reverend; Comparative, Right Reverend; Superlative, Most Reverend.

"A preacher of righteousness and hope" is a characterization of Phillips Brooks. Too many preachers of righteousness seem to think that theirs is the voice of one crying in the wilderness, while some are so hopeful as not to see unrighteousness.

The Congregationalist notes with approval the fact that a minister was called recently to an important church, on his record alone. If there is any better way to get at a minister's worth, we do not know it. It is infinitely better than candidating.

An epigram lives long. Perhaps the thing by which the late Archbishop of Canterbury will be longest remembered is what one of his school-boys once wrote of him, while he was Head Master of the Rugby School: "Temple is a beast, but he is a just beast."

It is an old joke of the pulpit on the pew, that some men think mighty little of their religion, judging from their subscription to the pastor's salary. The pew should be pardoned for sometimes thinking that some of the preaching that is paid for would be dear at any price.

There will be many readers beyond the bounds of the Old North State who will be glad to see the picture of our Christian Governor on the first page. His photograph is much easier to find than his like. He belongs to us all, of all parties and churches, and we are all proud of Charles B. Aycock.

An illustration of the truth that different parts of the Christian world are getting close together is that Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall of Union Seminary, New York, is lecturing in India, while Mr. John R. Mott, of the Student Volunteer Movement, is on his way to Australia in the interests of his work.

The Northern Presbyterian Church gained in the last six years 142 ministers, over and above those dismissed to other churches. That does not seem to teach that Calvinism is such a repulsive thing. Exactly the opposite claim might be made from this turning toward Presbyterianism of so many thoughtful and conscientious men, as ministers of all denominations usually are.

Rev. I. K. Funk, LL. D., looks out of his picture published in his own magazine, and gravely informs us that the second coming of Christ is a spiritual manifestation only. His expression would indicate that he was very dogmatic in this assertion, but we are inclined to the view that the angel knew more about it who said, "This same Jesus shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."

The University of Chicago has begun the segregation of the sexes and the woman's department will soon have separate buildings. And the old fogies at the South who never did think the plan of co-education would work in actual practice on a large scale, are softly humming the old melody:

The King of France with twenty thousand men,
Marched up the hill and then marched back again.

Mr. Edison gave out an interesting interview the other day. He says that the storage battery upon which he has been working for four years "solves the traction problem," and that the horse must go; that the next thing he expects to do is to "get electricity directly from coal;" that wireless telegraphy is a success and that in fifteen years electricity will be the motive power of railroads. He says that newspapers will be better this year, and that "the man who does not read them might as well be dead." The man who does not read his church papers is practically dead to all the work of the Church.

The Cumberland Presbyterian Church has been teaching for a long time that its separate existence was due to the fatalism of the Confession of Faith. Latterly it has been teaching that this fatalism has been removed by the "New Creed." The Cumberland Presbyterian gives the case of an energetic Northern Minister who has been sending copies of this "new creed" to Cumberland Presbyterians, and asks: "What think you would be the probable result of an effort to establish a mission in that city, where our own people are made to believe, and truly, too, that the Cumberland Presbyterian Confession of Faith is substantially the same as the 'New Creed?'" Why people would think that the Cumberland Presbyterian Church was mistaken, or was itself a mistake.

The Southern Church should be a little slow about adopting February 1, or any other day as, "Decision Day" in the Sunday Schools, even though recommended by the Executive Committee of the American Branch of the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance, Rev. William H. Roberts, D. D., Secretary. God has said, "Behold now is the accepted time." The text is useless for January or June. If men fix upon one Sunday in the year as the special day for bringing children to decide for Christ, it will result in putting off that decision until that day, while the high-pressure methods likely to be introduced will be far less conducive to genuine conversion, than the old way. The Spirit worketh "when he pleaseth" and it has not been revealed to us that February 1, 1903, is the day of salvation.

Speaking of the successful effort of the Methodists in raising their $20,000,000 fund, the Presbyterian Banner makes an honest confession. It says that while the Presbyterian Twentieth Century Committee reported that they had raised $3,000,000 in 1901, and that this had been increased to $7,500,000 in 1902, the Minutes of the Assembly indicate scarcely any increase beyond that from regular growth of the Church, over a million dollars a year. "It is thus doubtful whether the Fund has materially increased the contributions of the Church during these years, for the Church is always paying off church debts and giving to its educational institutions. . . . The plain truth is that our Fund has been a comparative failure. The reasons for this are, in fact, that the movement was an imitation of the Methodist movement; it started too late and it never took hold of the hearts of our people."

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

There are many lines of argument that go to prove the verity of the Bible. We sometimes make the mistake of assuming its inspiration in arguing with those who reject its authority. Once its inspiration is granted, its authority becomes recognized and we do not need to test its statements or to verify its history. The chief thing is to win assent to its own claims of divine origin and divine authority.

Perhaps the "passion for righteousness," of which Dr. C. Alphonso Smith speaks in the instructive lecture which we printed last week, is the most complete proof of the veracity of the Scripture writers. Granted their veracity and their inspiration follows, for they claimed to possess inspiration. It is this passion for righteousness that gives character to the whole book and makes it worthy of credence. One writer might be a hypocrite, professing loudly what he neither believed or practised. But that all the writers of the Bible, in Old Testament and New, should prove false to their profession, should be guilty of the sin which they unsparingly denounce throughout, is a moral impossibility. It would be a miracle of diabolism for the Bible, with its unswerving rule of righteousness drawn on every page, to have been untrue to its own rule.

Take the nature of God himself as it is unfolded to us in this book. His righteousness, his justice, his truth, how they stand out in boldest relief! Modern sentimentality has found one flaw in the character of the Hebrew Jehovah, namely, the sanction which he is represented as giving to the wars of extermination waged by the Israelites against the Canaanites. But even those wars were the expression of righteous judgment against the unprintable degeneracy of those Canaanitish tribes. The earth was well rid of them, root and branch. The destruction that fell upon Sodom was no more deserved than the extermination by the sword of neighboring cities guilty of the same abomination. In the latter part of the nineteenth century English justice sent to jail and the civilized world sent into an oblivion of infamy, by common consent refusing ever to print his name, a man guilty of such debasement as the translators of the English Bible have veiled by euphemism. The point is that the accusation of undue severity against the God of this Old Testament is only another proof of a higher ideal of righteousness than these infidel sentimentalists have ever attained,

Nor can there be any debate as to the faith of Bible writers in the God of the Bible. They feared him and worshipped him. They believed in his infinite power, in his all-pervading presence, in his all-knowledge. He was also Judge of all the earth, and righteous in his judgments as well. The men who wrote the Bible left themselves, if unrighteous, no loop-hole of escape from the justice of this Holy One whom they believed in as God.

And while they believed that all unrighteousness was sin, there was one particular sin which is denounced from beginning to end of this book as the foundation of all other sins, as the sin to be pre-eminently punished in the world to come. The first chapters of the book represent the very ruin of the race as compassed by a lie, and the origin of that lie is traced to the malevolence of the Evil Being himself, the opposite in every respect of the Holy God. From that chapter on to the end of the book there is no compromise with a lie. Satan is called a liar and the father of it. And the very last chapter of Revelation repeats that dread catalogue of the denizens of the lake of fire, and makes the climax with, "whosoever loveth and maketh a lie."

Suppose thirty-six men in any community noted for their faith in God and their belief in his absolute righteousness. Let them regard it as their main business in life to bring their neighbors to their own conception of the infinite holiness and justice and power of their God. Let them be specially noted for their praise of sincerity and truthfulness and their unmitigated scorn of a lie, of the very smallest departure from the strictest definition of veracity. Let them even pronounce those who do evil that good may come subject to a "just damnation." And then let these men come together on the witness stand and testify with most solemn adjuration, of facts of their own experience, calling down upon their own heads the eternal destruction that they have said unceasingly was the liar's portion, and if they could not be believed, then there would be an end of the trustworthiness of all human testimony. It does not detract from the argument that these men, instead of living together in the same community, should have been distributed over fifteen centuries. They testify, often corroborating one another, about the facts of history which have been so fully verified, in the last half-century, that he is now a rash scholar who lays aside a Biblical story because of apparent conflict with secular history. They testify moreover, in one way or another, that they shared an experience which was not given to all men, of a revelation from God and the controlling influence of his Spirit. They are to be believed.

And when we reach the New Testament writers, of whom we know more through the greater proximity of their age to our own and the richness of contemporary literature, the impossibility of making them liars rises to a hideous absurdity. It does no credit to the head or the heart of any man to accept the theory that John the Beloved, or Paul the Apostle, were guilty of deceiving a credulous age with regard to themselves and the Master whom they acknowledged. There is no truth if these men were not true. Altogether apart from their claim to inspiration it is almost a blasphemy to say that the author of the fourteenth chapter of the Fourth Gospel and the author of the Second Epistle to Timothy were the foisters of a false religion upon an ignorant world.

More than that, somehow the influence of these Sacred Writings is today the most potent force in civilization for the promotion of truth and honor among men. This is a matter of such common observation that when the sanction of the Book is given to the word of a man in the courts of justice his word becomes an oath and his lie becomes perjury. His affirmation with uplifted hand calls the God who is revealed in the Bible as a witness to the truth of what he says. The nations of the world that have a reputation for truth-telling and honest dealings are those nations and those only that are influenced by the Bible, whose people have it in their homes and quote from it as a familiar book. And no other sacred book has saved men from the reproach of dishonesty and mendaciousness, while ignorance of the Bible in the lands in which it has been kept from the people has invariably resulted in the deterioration of national character as regards the virtue of truth.

These familiar facts of literature and history and present-day experience all point one way. The writers of this unique book were, beyond question, truth-loving men, lie-hating men. And they claimed to speak for God and to be inspired by his Spirit. Their claim must be accepted. The Bible is distinct from all other books, in that it possesses divine authority. It seems to us that the argument would be irresistible to any man possessing, himself, the love of truth and the passion for righteousness. Just as the character of Jesus Christ is irresistibly attractive to the man who has a high and true ideal of character. So the man who lacks sympathy with the most prominent feature of the Bible and with the character of him of whom the Scriptures speak, writes himself down as lacking in the love of righteousness which the Bible expresses and in the admiration of Incarnate Goodness which Jesus Christ was.

Men may differ as to what inspiration means, as to the extent of the divine authority of the Scriptures. We do not discuss that here. The plea is made for the acceptance of the claim which the Scriptures make for themselves as to a Divine Revelation and a Divine Influence. That granted, other things can follow in their own place and proportion.

We are told that our citizenship is in heaven. The best proof of that, in individual cases, is the effort to make the earthly conform as much as possible to the heavenly home. The heavenly characteristic is the reaching down and helping of the earthly to higher attainment. If we are true citizens of heaven we make that fact an incentive to endeavor rather than an excuse for indifference. The Christian citizen is one whose citizenship is in heaven and who therefore claims a divine right to oppose evil and to favor good on earth. His heavenly citizenship enables him to rise above the entangling alliances of faction and party and sometimes even of native country. But he is freed from these things that he may work with greater efficiency and not that he may sit down at idle ease.

There has come to the Christian citizenship of North Carolina and to a greater or less extent of the whole South an unprecedented opportunity for the destruction of the most harmful of all the institutions of evil, the saloon. When we pray, Thy kingdom come, we pray that Satan's kingdom may be destroyed. Certainly a very important domain of Satan's kingdom is destroyed with the abolition of the saloon.

Now we are not going to indulge in any tirade against the Demon of Rum. There is no need to enlarge upon the evils of drunkenness and debauchery. It is scarcely necessary to allude to the notorious co-partnership existing between the saloon and the gambling den and the house of shame, except to point out that the saloon is the promoter of the other two evils with which decent society has to contend. We make our appeal to reason and not to passion. The liquor problem is certainly as old as the days of Noah, and it will probably continue to some extent to the end of time. But the very worst solution of that problem is the saloon. One can make no mistake in arguing for any change as an improvement over the saloon.

Nor are we holding any brief against the moderate drinker. It will certainly be admitted that the appetite for strong drink needs restraint rather than encouragement, whether the restraint be that of a strong will or of external law. But the saloon tempts men, not only to drinking, but to excessive drinking. It reinforces the love of drink with every other possible allurements. Nor are things much improved when the state lays its hand upon the saloon and tries to reform it. High license reduces their number, but enlarges those that remain and increases their attractiveness. Moreover, the pressure upon the saloon-keeper to pay a high tax tends to make him unscrupulous, as to evading the restrictions thrown around him, while the temptation to heighten his profit by cheapening his stock leads to adulteration with poisons and the increased destruction of human life and ruin of human reason. Reforming the saloon is like reforming the man-eating tiger when he has had his taste of blood.

More than this, the saloon has been an evil in politics for years. It has been utterly selfish in the preservation of its own interests at whatever cost. It has kept down the normal stature of the people's representatives to the level of the saloon politician. It has practised bribery and corruption on an unlimited scale, thus debauching the electorate. It has used and moulded, during the period which began with Reconstruction, the ignorant and venal negro vote for the election of its creatures and the carrying out of its policies. It has espoused any party that would subserve its interests and betrayed any that showed symptoms of decency.

And now the ignorant negro vote, which the saloon fought so hard to retain, has been eliminated. And in the mean time the Christian Churches have been quietly doing their work of indoctrinating men with the hatred of drunkenness and with the love of their fellow-men and it turns out that the members of the churches are in the majority and can do whatever they will with this gigantic evil in North Carolina and throughout the South.

In this state we have a Legislature already in session of which great things are expected. We have a Governor who is as much in favor of reducing drunkenness as of increasing education, of lessening the saloons as much as multiplying schools. A United States Senator and others high in the councils of his party have declared themselves in favor of reform. One of the most influential newspapers of the state has given its hearty support to the same plan.

The Anti-Saloon forces have formulated their platform as was published in last week's Standard. And all we need is the backing of the good people of the state to carry the plans through even against the utmost efforts of the Liquor-Dealers' Association and their corruption fund and their lobbyists.

We suggest that every minister who reads these lines write to his representatives in both Senate and House and to any others known to him, asking for their support to be given to the Anti-Saloon measures. We suggest that every church officer and every private member of the church do the same thing. Where a local fight is needed and the Legislature can help, exercise the sacred and immemorial right of petition and send the petitions in. They will be read to the House or Senate as the case may be, and will make their own impression. Where it is possible, let local delegations back up their petitions. We have half of the counties of North Carolina already free from the saloon. Every other one helps to free more.

And then there is a disagreeable duty that may have to be performed, and yet a very necessary one if we are ever to rid our public men of the old and now baseless fear of the saloon. Let them be taught to fear the awakened wrath of the people whose representatives they are, if their votes and their conduct prove their subserviency to the saloon.

Let them understand that they can never hold any office again in the gift of their present constituency. The lesson may be hard to teach, but it is a most effective one. And let their successors in the years to come read the names upon the political tomb-stones and the inscriptions that tell what manner of death they died.

The times are ripe for united and aggressive action by the moral and Christian forces of this ancient and honorable commonwealth to wipe out forever that blot upon our Christian civilization, the saloon.

Dr. Herrick Johnson.

Dr. Herrick Johnson recently passed his seventieth birthday, and they did not forget to observe it in Chicago. A dinner was given in his honor at the University Club, which was attended by about sixty members of the Chicago Presbytery and several specially invited guests. Letters were read from alumni of McCormick Seminary and from many of the doctor's friends, congratulating him on his work and wide influence in the city and Church. The after-dinner speeches were a flood of unstinted affection and admiration for the central figure of the evening. Bishop Cheney spoke for the Reformed Episcopal Church, Dr. Gilbert, formerly editor of The Advance, spoke for the Congregationalists, and Dr. Willis Craig spoke for McCormick Seminary. Then followed members of the Presbytery, voicing the pride of that body in its most distinguished and influential member. Dr. Johnson made a response in a spirit of beautiful simplicity and modesty, disclaiming any personal sense of superior worth and declaring, "I am just a poor sinner and nothing at all, but Jesus Christ is my all in all." The whole Church will echo this tribute of honor and praise. By his brilliant gifts, his faithful service, his rich spirituality, and his charming personality, Dr. Herrick Johnson has endeared himself to multitudes of personal friends and to the whole Church and to other churches, and, as everybody else knows this and he doesn't seem to know it, it is well to tell him of it.—Presbyterian Banner.

[The only speech lacking was one from the Southern Presbyterian Church, thanking Dr. Johnson for the Herrick Johnson Rider, which said in effect that the Northern Church could not withdraw its references to the disloyalty and rebellion of the Southern Church. But for that "Rider," the two churches might have rushed together before either was ready for union, and lived unhappily ever afterwards. As there was apparently no Southern Presbyterian present at the occasion, we take the liberty of expressing our gratitude now and wishing Dr. Johnson many happy returns.—Ed.]

The Mask of the Years.

The years come out of the great silence in unbroken succession because we need their divisions in our endeavor to realize, in daily experience, the continuity of eternity. They give us something to grasp and use; but they must not confuse or blind us to the truth that the life we now live is eternal, and that while we number our years and distinguish them one from another, we are already in eternity. To-morrow is already in today; the distant future is part of this swiftly departing present. What we think and do in this brief instant we are and shall be in the far-off cycles to which we move. Our deeds are not of the day; they are of eternity, the moods and emotions, the depressions and exaltations; something indestructible is shaping itself as surely as below the bareness and icy bondage of winter a vast life is organizing itself.

Our sorrows are registered by the days, but if the root of submission and faith is in them they are as certainly overpast as if already the shadows were gone and the heavens were soft and gracious over our heads. So far as the righteous are able to look through the mask of the years, light is not only sown for them; it already floods the skies. So far as the high purpose is deep-rooted and loyally held, nobility and strength and freedom are already achieved. So far as love is pure, unselfish, and sacrificial, it is already safe against the ravages of death. Life is not yet at the flood, but it is ours as truly as if we were in full possession of its unbounded resources; the perfect stature is yet afar off, but if the law of growth is working in us, it is already ours as surely as if we had completely attained. The sorrows which the years bring, the years take away; they are of the time and the place, and we are not the slaves of time and place; but our joys, having their source in the soul, are indestructible. In the darkest night we know that the day is below the horizon; the shadow on the dial does not confuse us; we know that the sun is on the way. In our deepest griefs, if we look into our souls, the joy of eternal possession already stirs; it needs but the ripening of our faith and patience to bear its perfect flower. The life of love is not counted by the years; once born in the heart, it abides forever. Sown in the furrows of time, it blooms in those immortal fields where no shadows wait to hide the sun and no chill of death checks the eternal growth.—The Outlook.

Our Attitude Toward the Cruder Faiths.

Each of us lives inevitably in the atmosphere of his own beliefs. Religious controversy is not good form and in the freedom of America our neighbor's opinions cease to be obtrusive. From the lives of most of us the polemical element has departed. We never have occasion to argue, still less to fight or suffer for our religious opinions.

The result is that we are neither compelled to define our own religious beliefs nor to recognize with any vividness the fact that men about us are shaping life by opinions which we consider totally out-worn or even silly. The variety of religions is not historical, merely, it is contemporary, and the high and low still exist side by side.

Most men, we suppose, associate the stone age with its rude animism or fetichism, its lake dwellings and cannibal feasts, with extinct creatures like the dodo. Yet it exists today in the South Seas, hardly touched by Christianity or civilization. The worship of the snake, the cow, the crocodile as incarnations of divinity is the soul-life of millions. We think of persecutions for religion's sake as ended; but though fire and torture have ceased, the Christians of many countries still suffer loss for Christ. The theory of compelling uniformity has never been disowned and the will to persecute is still avowed.

If these faiths and persecutions seem remote, consider the queer opinions which your next neighbor here in America may hold. He may believe that Adam is God, that in heaven the saints are to have many wives, that the ancients can only be saved by being born into the bodies of infants on the earth, and you call him a Mormon. But there are hundreds of thousands of them, and their churches are in our cities. He may believe that there is no such thing as matter, that a jumping tooth is an illusion and small-pox an imagination of the deceived heart, and he—or rather she—calls herself a Christian Scientist, and has her churches on our streets. He may believe that one Dowie, who makes lace in Illinois, is Elijah returned to this earth and that he can work miracles; and his churches grow in our neighborhoods. He may have made a mumbo-jumbo of his own assured misinformation of what Christ claims and teaches and have no use at all for churches and he makes a multitude about us.

There are good men who are dividing Christ's body because the name of God is not in the constitution, or because hymns are sung or organs used, or the hand of a bishop has not blessed the head of the man who blesses the bread; or because the water of baptism is much or little, or the succession of the week, which they believe dates from the beginning, is not followed. There are quarrels of a hundred years ago alive to plague the church today. There are adorers of bones—like the crowds who gathered a few months ago for the annual novena in honor of St. Anne, the grandmother of our Lord, at a church in New York where a portion of her osseous tissue is treasured.

This particular cult of bone adoration deserves a moment's study because it gives us a remarkable instance of the survival of beliefs. It is like a scene from Italy, or Mexico, or the middle ages. "Each face reflected the awe and veneration felt for the relic. Old, tottering women, deformed and palsied, were helped into the church to subject themselves to the curative power. The interior of the little church, particularly the altar, was decorated with golden vessels, flowers and wax candles, which filled the room with a wavering half light. In the vestibules the sisters of the church were selling rosaries, pictures of the Saviour and the saints and other souvenirs." From the clear, hard light of a New York street you step at once into the middle ages, with all the miracle-working illusion and shrewd money gathering of a spectacular religion.

It may be true that God has called us to the highest and best instructed class in his world school—as many of us believe he has; but that is all the more a reason why we should be kindly in our thought of less advanced or misled brothers. Denying opinions is no reason for not loving men. No man was ever driven to right beliefs, however he may submit to forcible conformities. God has not finished his work with any of his children here on earth—not even with us to whom a clearer light is given. If it is light, we must let it shine. And if it is the true light we need never fear that it will fail to prove attractive to those whose eyes are fitted to its rays.—The Congregationalist.

Sunday Newspapers.

Cardinal Gibbons lately took occasion to speak of the deadening effect of the Sunday newspaper. Commenting on this, one of the evening papers which abstains from publishing a Sunday edition, says, "Waiving for the moment all issues of taste and morality, there is nothing better calculated to soften the brain of a people than indiscriminately to pore over that mass of miscellaneous news, scandal, gossip and illustration, which makes up the Sunday newspaper of today. To devour this mess anaconda-like leaves a man, as Cardinal Gibbons aptly remarks, fit neither for worship nor for rational recreation." A good many people who might not pay much attention to these pungent comments, if offered by a minister, may be disposed to accord them more respect when they reflect that the criticisms come from a prelate of the Roman Catholic Church, a church disposed to take rather liberal if not lax views of Sunday observance, and from a daily paper which is not presumed to look at public questions from a strictly ecclesiastical standpoint.—New York Observer.

Book Notices.

Pass It On!

"If you have a good thing, pass it on!" is certainly an excellent admonition.

One of the very best things that has come into my possession lately is Dr. Stagg's book, "Calvin, Twisse, and Edwards, on the Universal Salvation of Infants, Dying in Infancy." The only weak link in the Presbyterian chain of teaching, has been the doubt in some minds about the teachings of these great leaders. A careful perusal of this little volume will obliterate such doubts, and the chain is proven again to be the strongest known to the "Creeds of Christendom." I have passed it on to a Methodist brother, who is "charmed and helped." A Baptist brother also preached here a month ago, "proving from the Scriptures" that this is the doctrine of God. Pass it on! C. Pres'n.

Another Estimate.

Professor John Campbell, whose brilliant books on "The Hittites," have given him an international reputation, and who is considered by a friend who sends us this clipping, "the finest scholar in the Canadian Church," makes the following remarks about Dr. Stagg's book in the Presbyterian College Journal: "There is no doubt that St. Augustine believed in a mild sort of purgatory for infants, and that the Church of Rome, as well as others holding to baptismal regeneration, regarded non-baptized children as lost, hence the furtive sprinklings practised by Jesuit and other missionaries. The language of the reformed and Protestant creed-builders is, with few exceptions, as vague as that of the Westminster Confession of Faith (Chap. X, 3), and has led to frequent misunderstandings. But it is evident that the very Calvinistic dogma of Divine Sovereignty and Imputation of Grace made the universal salvation of infants possible, and, when fully stated, carried the conviction of its reality. Dr. Stagg has written a learned and useful monograph, not lacking in felicity of style and excellent in temper. It will be helpful to theologians who rely upon the authority of uninspired doctors, and especially to those who, because they call themselves Presbyterians, think they must necessarily adhere to the traditions of Calvin and his theological successors."

Devotional.

A Word to the Perplexed.

Do not be distressed because you are puzzled and bewildered by religious mystery. The most advanced minds in the Church have to pass through precisely your experience. But the path of the just shineth more and more unto the perfect day. Do not make idols of your perplexities. Do not make a boast of your bewilderment. There is a subtle temptation in that direction—to talk about your doubts and difficulties in a tone which suggests that yours is so critical and so judicial a mind that it is not to be put off with the easy solutions that have satisfied intellects of an inferior order. Be honest in your bewilderment, and be simple and true-hearted.

Teachableness is one of the first characteristics of honesty. There is no religious honesty that is not adorned by the spirit of docility. If you are self-trustful, if you walk by your own lights; if you contend even silently and passively, that it lies within the compass of your power to find out everything for yourself, then you are not a scholar in the school of Christ; you are stubborn; you are dogmatical; and as such, you deprive yourself of all the gifts of providence.

How few people are teachable! So many of us go to the Bible and find proofs of what we already believe. Is this not solemnly true? Whatever your form of church government is, you go to the Bible and find a text to vindicate it. Whatever your particular theology is, you open the Scripture with the express purpose of finding in it a proof that you are right. This is not the spirit of Christ. The true believer goes with an unprejudiced mind, truly humble, honestly desirous of knowing what is true? No matter who lives or dies, who goes up or who goes down, "What is true?" must be, and ever is, the supreme inquiry of honest and teachable spirits.

Would that we could all come to the Bible afresh, divesting the mind of everything we ever heard, and reading the Scriptures through from end to end, turning over every page with the breath of this prayer: "Spirit Divine, show me what is truth." Every man would then have the Bible dwelling richly in him, not as a series of separate and isolated texts, but as a spirit, a genius, a revelation, a guardian angel.—Parker.

The Presence of God.

To recognize and to realize the "presence of God" will bring to the soul perfect peace, freedom from all worry, and safety amid all the numerous perils of daily life. Such an one can look into the future with clarified vision and walk among men undismayed by criticism or controversy, mastering all opposition.

Elisha, in a time of imminent danger, was calm and self possessed, while his servant was much disturbed by his immediate environment. Why? Elisha saw the invisible host of Jehovah around him, between him and the forces of the enemy. The young man saw nothing save the encompassing army, until in answer to Elisha's prayer, the Lord opened the young man's eyes. Then he saw chariots and horsemen on the mountain around him, and his master's unseen protection.

In like manner when God gives to us spiritual vision to recognize and to realize "the presence of God," we will know the same truth that stayed the heart of the prophet and his servant: "They that be with us are more than they that be with them."—Rev. J. C. Quinn, D. D.

The souls that would really be richer in duty in some new position are precisely those who borrow no excuses from the old one, who even esteem it full of privileges. plenteous in occasions of good, frequent in divine appeals.—Martineau.

Missionary.

The following admirable definition is taken from the Program pamphlet of the Women's Missionary Society of the Central Presbyterian Church of Montgomery, Ala:

The Model Member:

1. Takes and reads at least one Missionary Magazine.
2. Is always present at meetings.
3. Is willing-hearted.
4. Gives self-denyingly.
5. Prays daily for the work and workers.
6. Keeps eyes and ears open for new plans, and bright ideas.
7. Is willing to offer prayer at the meetings.
8. Secures at least one new member each year.
9. Gives best literary effort.
10. Works for the needy at home.
11. Increases the amount given each year.
12. Receives a spiritual uplift in the work, and imparts a spiritual uplift to the work.

The Use of Questions.

The verdict of one Woman's Foreign Missions Society that has tried the plan for five years, is that the best way to interest members in The Missionary, and of course then in the work of our church in the foreign field, is by the use of questions on The Missionary, prepared by some member appointed by the President to do the work. These questions are distributed in time for the answers to be looked up before the meeting. Of course it becomes necessary to do a good deal of reading before the answer is found, and in this way, many who were fully persuaded that they did not have time to read the magazine, get it! Better still, they discover not only how attractive the magazine is, but that this work of missions is the grandest work in the world; that one is not keeping up truly with the world's movements, if he is ignorant in this direction, and altogether the result only confirms the saying:

"Know, and you will feel.

Know, and you will pray,

Know, and you will help."

"A medical missionary is a missionary and a half.—Robert Moffat.

Mission Items.

It will be news to most of our readers that, according to the law of India, an idol is a "person," and as such may be a proprietor. The Statesman has just published an opinion of the Legal Remembrancer to Government on the question submitted to him as to how the registration of the name of a Hindu god, as the proprietor of certain estates, should be made. In his opinion the Legal Remembrancer says, "That an idol is a juridical person, capable of being endowed with and holding lands, has been held in numerous decisions of the High Court and the Privy Council." So he advises that the idol should be entered as "proprietor," and the priest as "manager." The design apparently is to debar the priest in occupation of the estates from assuming proprietary rights.

Over against this it may be noted that there are not a few signs of the wholesome working of the leaven of Christianity amongst the natives of India. Deserving of mention in this connection is the action of the Gaikwar of Baroda, who, although he has received an English education, still professes himself an orthodox Hindu. Already, in the government of his State, he has shown wisdom and capacity, and now, in an eloquent article in a recent number of East and West, he has come boldly forward as a champion of the cause of the depressed classes. He condemns in particular their exclusion from the benefits of education. Not only does he plead the right even of the out-cast classes to its benefits, but he has himself introduced a scheme of free compulsory education into the state of Baroda.—The Witness.

Acts 17, 1-12. January 18, 1903.

Paul and Silas were brought out of prison and honorably discharged by the rulers at Philippi. These rulers had transcended their power in maltreating, without trial or condemnation, Roman citizens. They were liable to be called to account for such conduct. Yet the Evangelists, at the urgent solicitation of the magistrates, departed from Philippi. Passing through two other places they came to Thessalonica. Here they enter a Jewish Synagogue and preach the Gospel. Several points in their experience here and at Berea claim attention.

1. Paul's Preaching at Thessalonica.—He preached to Jews and Gentile proselytes, in the Synagogue on the Sabbath day. He availed himself of the best means to secure an intelligent audience. We are told that for three Sabbaths "he reasoned with them out of the Scriptures." His preaching was expository. It consisted in expounding the word of God, in appealing, not merely to the emotions, but to the human understanding. He endeavored to convince the mind that he might arouse the conscience and move the heart. It was not merely hortatory, but argumentative and logical. It dealt with man's highest faculties, and every part of his nature. It aimed to convince the understanding, quicken the conscience, sway the feelings, subdue the will and prompt to right action. Thus it must be with all permanently effective preaching. The special topics of Paul's discourse are mentioned. He preached a suffering, atoning Saviour. He showed from the Scriptures that Christ must suffer. The Old Testament Scriptures abound in testimony as to a suffering Messiah. He proclaimed a risen Redeemer, who had vanquished death and the grave and thus demonstrated the truth of His claims, and His power to impart life to man: preaching a dying and a risen Saviour. Paul also urged that Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ. He could do this as Matthew does in his Gospel, by showing how Hebrew prophecies were fulfilled in Jesus' life.

2. The Results of this Preaching.—Such preaching as Paul did always produces marked effects. Many were converted to Christ. "Some believed, and consorted with Paul and Silas, and of the devout Greeks, a great multitude, and of chief women, not a few." Not the rabble, but a number of the best classes of society obeyed the Gospel. But among unbelievers, evil passions were aroused, opposition was organized, the baser elements of society were combined, the disciples of Christ were assaulted, an uproar was produced, false charges were preferred, the rulers and people were agitated, and the preachers forced to leave Thessalonica for Berea.

3. The noble Conduct of the Bereans.—The nobility of the dwellers at Berea, consisted first in docility of mind. They were ready to hear, consider and investigate, what was presented as religious truth. This readiness of mind to receive truth is far more noble than that narrowness and bigotry, which prompts the rejection of whatever is new or strange.

Their second claim to nobility is found in their making the Scriptures the test of truth. They had satisfied themselves that the Scriptures were Divinely inspired, and were therefore willing to submit every religious question to their authority. Hence we read as an evidence of their nobleness of mind, that they "searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so."

4. The Fruits of their Conduct.—This spiritual readiness for pious inquiry and diligent searching of the Scriptures for knowing the truth led to conversion. "Faith cometh by hearing and hearing by the Word of God."

 CONDUCTED BY REV. HUGH W. HOON.

At the organization of a Company of Covenanters, the pastor of the church told the little fellows that there were certain honors to be conferred upon those who would prove themselves worthy. The boy who should be the bearer of the colors must do certain things to prove his fitness for such privilege. The Covenanter pins would be purchased by the Company and only those boys would be allowed to wear pins who showed their worthiness for such an honor. A story of the old Scotch Covenanters was told the boys which set forth the loyalty of those servants of God to Christ, their King. That particular lot of boys had been a source of constant worry to all those who had tried to do anything with them. Their Sabbath-school teachers were constantly coming to the superintendent, asking to be relieved from duty, being assured, they said, that they were totally unfit to do anything for those lively boys. It was not an old established church where the young people had inherited from their great-grandmothers a reverence for the house of God and the services of that house. It was a new church established in a young and growing city. The Sabbath-school was made up of scholars who had attended all sorts of Sunday-schools and no Sunday-school, and were just about as conglomerate a lot as you would find anywhere. Something had to be done. The teachers were in despair. Finally the session concluded to try the Covenanters. Accordingly the boys were invited to remain after Sunday-school one day and the pastor talked to them, setting forth in the strongest terms he could, the privilege of being a Covenanter, not in name, but in fact. The boys listened attentively and with one exception they were all eager to join the Company. Then the pastor repeated to them the real seriousness of enlisting under that banner; that one of the chief characteristics of the old Covenanters was their fidelity; that the fear of death could not make them do anything to bring reproach upon Christ's crown. The boys remained firm in their determination to enlist and that they might be given time to consider the step they were taking, the final organization was put off for a week. They clung to their first decision. A change came over them at once. Young as they were they seemed to grasp the fact that now they occupied a different position; that the honor of their banner and what it stood for, was in their keeping. The effect was little short of marvelous. No more complaints from the teachers. No more reproof from the superintendent and the pastor. Each boy not only looked out for himself, but he saw to it that the other boys did what was right. What the organization of those little chaps did for that school it will do for every school where it is used properly. Put the little fellows to work. Calling the Company up to sing in the presence of the Sabbath-school may not mean much to you, but it can be made to mean a lot to them. Having them distribute the hymn books and Bibles may not seem a great thing to you, but it means much to the little fellow who is thus made to feel that he has his own particular work and that he is not a mere nothing in the church.

In all of our churches we have a large number of people who act as though they have conferred a favor upon the Lord and upon the Church by coming out and making a profession of Christ, and connecting themselves with the Church. They need to have the lesson taught them that it is an honor and an exalted privilege to be counted a child of God: that it is Jesus who has done the condescending when He has called them His brethren. Make men feel that they are being honored by being permitted to number themselves among God's people and one of the greatest obstacles in the way of the Church's progress will have been removed. To do this begin with the children and teach them that it is an honor to be allowed to march under the Covenanter banner and wear a Covenanter pin.

Life and Character of B. M. Palmer, D. D., LL. D.

This is not the time for extravagant adulation; not the hour for anything like reckless enthusiasm; not the occasion when even the language of panegyric may come with anything like thoughtlessness from the lips. We meet here to think and to feel lovingly and reverently, and to speak in words of sincere affection and of deepest honor of one whose form has for the last forty-six years reared itself in this pulpit, upon whose matchless eloquence this congregation has attended, and whose spirit even now seems to hover over this assembly, and admonish the speaker to choose wisely the words he shall utter in this august presence to-night. With this understanding as to the spirit of the occasion, I shall speak of Dr. Palmer's greatness, using that word in its best sense.

For convenience in discussion, and to facilitate retention in memory, I shall arrange all that I have to say under three general divisions:

I. The greatness of Dr. Palmer's personality, in itself considered.

II. This personal greatness as it stands out in expression.

III. This expressed personal greatness viewed relatively, especially in comparison.

BENJAMIN MORGAN PALMER.

I. I approach the first part of my subject with genuine awe. It cannot be necessary to present at this time any extended biography of Dr. Palmer. I have read every line, I may say, about him that has been published in your papers and know that full biographical details have been presented with such accuracy, such extended scope, and such repetition as to justify me in assuming that this congregation is already fully acquainted with the facts in Dr. Palmer's life. With directness, therefore, I go at once into the presence of this personality and speak of him whom all men revere.

1. The characteristics of Dr. Palmer's physical appearance and organism are enshrined in your memory and in your hearts forever. You loved him. That which we can see and touch of those dear to us is precious to us.

There was not a hair upon that venerable head which was not sacred to you. Was he not endowed with wonderful physical vigor? Else, how could he have stood the strain of the long forty-six years? How could he have appeared Sabbath after Sabbath always apparently fresh and always wonderfully ready? How could he have lingered on after the four-score years had passed, majestic still, and through winter's cold and summer's heat, preach with a physical vigor that was the astonishment of this entire Southland in which we live?

Now, the body is a part of the man. As truly as the soul, it has been redeemed with the blood of Christ. It is inhabited by the Holy Ghost. You have seen it in preaching almost transfigured; and you believe that it shall be raised in glory. And so you bless God for that head, that voice, that step always in the way of righteousness, and that hand so often extended over you and yours in solemn peace-giving benediction. We linger not here, for after all, this is only a minor branch of our important subject.

2. I now turn your thought to the spirit inhabiting this temple. Will you look at Dr. Palmer's intellect? The power and the scope and the rapidity of his mental operations have been the marvel of our time. Long years ago, when I was a student in Columbia Theological Seminary, the venerable Dr. Howe, in genial conversation, told me that Dr. Palmer's fellow students laughingly said: "Palmer has only to put a book under his pillow and go to sleep and he will awake next morning knowing all that was in the book." But this native endowment was not left without cultivation. That noble mind was trained by study, especially by life-long, patient and severe thought. I am told that upon one occasion his guest asked him the secret of his ability to speak to audiences without writing and with such readiness and in sentences of such Ciceronian smoothness, and his reply was to point to a well-worn path in the carpet upon his study-floor made by walking to and fro while engaged in study. Thus trained, his mind grew stronger as the years rolled by and retained its vigor and its versatility to the end.

Dr. Palmer's strength of emotion was as marked a characteristic as was his force of intellect. His feeling was strong and masterful. I speak not now of what most men seem to understand by the word feeling; not the hysterical, not the lachrymose, never the fanatical. He ever kept in right relation his mind and his heart. He himself described the intellect as the headlight that went on before, to illumine the way and flash out the track for all else to follow. You have seen him here in hours of great stress, when excitement ran high and when the fire of his soul was burning with intense heat; but his reason always was ascendant and he impressed you as easily master of his audience because master of himself. Emotion enauncipated from reason is fanaticism. Put the whole heart in the mistake of the judgment and you have a zealot or crank. But let passion be controlled and guided by reason, and you have a man who can sway men and command respect while he incites to noble effort. Such a man was Dr. Palmer.

4. To this sound body, this superb intellect, this powerful but well-guided feeling, add a very strong will. This made Dr. Palmer's character pre-eminently one of decision. He was granite in resolution. When once his mind had explored and his feeling embraced what he perceived as truth, then he made his choice—and thenceforward was as immovable as Gibraltar. He would retain his position and let the years sweep by and others change if they would: and in every such case his defence would be an appeal to the first original principle which his mind had grasped and to which his heart had been given. No strong character can ever be formed without force of will. No man can hold the commanding position which Dr. Palmer retained here for forty-six years without firmness and fixedness in purpose and decision.

5. I add one thing more in this discussion of Dr.

Palmer's personality. Rather, I do not add it; I make it transfuse and almost glorify all the characteristics which I have mentioned. In all and through all is Dr. Palmer's genuine and lofty spirituality. He was, and more and more became, a man of true holiness. He scorned sanctimoniousness; he abhorred cant. But men knew him to be a man of God. His spirituality, I have said, was lofty. I mean by this that he communed with his Saviour in His exalted glory. He went into the Holy of Holies in his fellowship with Christ in his Priestliness and Royalty. Not only was this spirituality lofty as respecting God, it was profound as respecting Dr. Palmer's own soul. Every one knew that it took hold of his inmost, deepest being and made his spirit a sanctuary. Here was his true glory. Why, holiness is the glory even of God. When the Seraphims fly through the temple with covered face, they cry "Holy! Holy! Holy! Lord God of hosts; the whole earth is full of His glory." Man's true glory is not in his intellectuality, not in his masterful passion, not in his dominant will, but in all these glorified by true spirituality wrought by the Holy Ghost.

Here then is Dr. Palmer in his personality: a true body, a reasonable soul, with wonderful intellect, with masterful feeling, with decided and firm resolution, and with healthful and profound spirituality. Behold in him by Divine grace the man; the man of God!

II. I must now speak of Dr. Palmer's personality as it stands out in expression. There are two spheres in which personality may express itself; two distinct ways in which man may glorify God—both of Divine ordination. The one is the way of action; the other the way of suffering. Dr. Palmer walked both these ways and his personality is revealed in both. Let us view him first in his life of activity.

1. There are three institutions which Dr. Palmer himself regarded as of Divine origin. I have time to speak of him to-night as he stands related to two of the three. I refer to the family and to the church.

It would be expected that a man such as I have described would have lofty ideals of the family. Very happily for us, his conception of that institution is drawn for us by himself. Long years ago I read in the Southwestern Presbyterian the series of articles from his pen which have since been formed into the clear and suggestive little book on The Family which bears his name. To those in this congregation who desire to know what honor and what responsibility are involved in being the head of a family and how aright to meet the obligations accruing, let me say in passing, get that book and read it. In Dr. Palmer's view, formed from Scripture, the family is the root alike of the Church and the State. God made the first man; and giving to him the lovely counterpart of himself as his help-meet for him, made of twain one flesh and ordained that marriage, while not sacramental, should yet be the holy symbol of the union in high mystery of Jesus Christ and his bride, the Church. The man as challenging the woman's love is the head of the family and the founder of the home. The woman's submission is queenly because wholly voluntary. Parental authority is next to the authority of God. Love is the check Divinely given to protect against abuse of authority. The husband is the Priest in the Home, responsible for offering the sacrifices of prayer and thanksgiving in daily worship, and the children are to be nurtured in the admonition of the Lord. Every home is to be the type and unfold the promise of a home in Heaven.

I have said that Dr. Palmer gives us this ideal. I add only one thing: All of you know that Dr. Palmer was a man to be true to his ideals. He did not preach what he did not practice. He lived daily in his home what he taught in his book. I may not indelicately pass within the sacred precincts of domestic life, nor need I so intrude. Given a man's ideal and then his well-known faithfulness to the same, and you have all that you need to form your judgment. For the beautiful ideal, get the book and read it.

Let us now turn to the Church, the other institution in which Dr. Palmer's personality finds multiform expression. It is obvious that we must place first his service in preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ. And in seeking for the characteristics of this preaching I find as the solid foundation unchanging and unchangeable fidelity to the Bible as the Word of God. He was as true to this book, as not merely containing but as actually being the word of God, as ever was the needle to the pole. He stood immutable while theories might come and theories might go. Other men might preach other things if they would, science, politics, literature, social and so-called practical ethics, but this pulpit was consecrated to preaching Jesus Christ and Him crucified as revealed in the Old and New Testaments. With refreshing faithfulness in an age of sensationalism and its ephemeral popularity, this preacher held himself to the Bible; and did it because he loved to do it. Not only this; Dr. Palmer's preaching, as the world knows, was largely theological. It must not be forgotten that for sixteen years before coming to New Orleans, he had been in close contact with a Theological Seminary. He was not of the shallow, superficial class who decry what Dr. Palmer pronounced the very Queen of Sciences. The very warp and woof of his sermons is fundamental and even technical theological truth expressed in the leading terminology of that science. You take the doctrines of grace as they appear in any theological work, the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Imputation of Adam's guilt or of Christ's Righteousness, Federal Headship, Atonement by vicarious sacrifice, the Judgment—he constantly preached them all, not excluding the full Sovereignty of God. He varied his method of presentation, turned and turned the kaleidoscope, but always he preached doctrines, and those doctrines were always Calvinistic. It is surely a significant thing that just at a time when popular clamor is blatantly insisting that the pastor must avoid doctrinal preaching, a pastorate forty-six years long under a preacher as useful and as potent as the world knows, rises up to denounce the fallacy. Here lies the secret of permanence in the ministry's blessed work; Bible truth in its articulated relationships. And that is Theology.

Very subordinately to these things, I mention another which undoubtedly contributed to the charm—I had almost said the magical charm—of Dr. Palmer's preaching. I refer to his perfectly natural and exuberant use of metaphor. He was not given to relating anecdotes or drawing pathetic scenes for the mere effect of exciting emotions. He did not indulge in very frequent or extended illustration, like Henry Ward Beecher. But more than any man I have ever read or heard, he would put metaphor sometimes in a single word, and suggest the full illustration while not elaborately expressing it. And he would do this, as naturally as a spring would bubble or a bird would sing. Would he oppose subordinating the Church to the State? He would say, "Chain not the Church of Christ to the chariot wheels of Caesar." Would he speak of humility as prerequisite to lofty communion with God in prayer? He would say, "The bird stoops upon the branch of the tree before it springs and soars in the air." I took the charming book on Prayer and on one page containing eight sentences, I found that six out of the eight employed metaphors. This lends the charm of poetry to his preaching. The mind is delighted, often not knowing the reason.

But it were most superficial to pause at this point; something far greater must be considered.

The emotive force of Dr. Palmer appears in his almost unfathomable capacity for sympathy. By nature, by God's grace, by his own experience, he was made with a soul to feel another's woe. I remember well that an elder of the first church I ever served was in this city, and himself heard Dr. Palmer preach on Sunday after the preacher himself had been in sorrow. The subject was the Holy Spirit as the Comforter. Said this elder: "I was never so wrought upon in my life; the tension was so great that I felt positively sick when the exhaustion of reaction from my strained elevation of feeling came on." His power of pathos—for that is what it was, power—was plainly never sought by him or cultivated by him; it was just naturally and simply within him and the ease with which he wielded it was nothing less than majestic. I will try to illustrate my meaning.

I was once with a party of friends on a boat coming down your noble old river, to visit this city. All the way, we had been anticipating the pleasure of seeing the beautiful building of the Convent of the Sacred Heart. But when we came opposite the place where we knew the edifice must be, the mists were around us, and the rains were beginning to fall, and the darkness of night shut out the structure from our view. But, just as we were about to turn away in disappointment, the master of the boat, a few feet away from us on the upper deck, put forth his hand and seemed just to touch a piece of mechanism; and the light darted forth, and streamed across the waters and through the mists, and wandered up and down the bank until it found the building and revealed it from foundation to spire. The thing that impressed me the most was the ease with which the master did it. And so, as men and women waited here in sorrow's mists and rains and wondered if anywhere there was truly a building of God this powerful preacher but touched the Bible and turned on the searchlight, and mortals were comforted as they saw the Jerusalem coming down from God and out of Heaven.

While Dr. Palmer's throne was the pulpit and his noblest work was preaching, it must not be supposed that this was the only service to the Church in which his personality was expressed. He was a Presbyterian. I use that word in its broadest sense, including his relationship to all the ecclesiastical court and to the discussions in them all, from the Session to the General Assembly.

A mind like Dr. Palmer's could not be indifferent to passing events, could not lie inactive while Zion's welfare and God's truth were under consideration. He viewed the Church as one in all ages; Christianity engrafted upon the old Israelitish stock; the dispensations varying and developing, but the Church ever one as the purchase of Christ's blood and the realization of Christ's mystical body. Dr. Palmer's whole life said—

"I love thy kingdom, Lord,
The house of thine abode,
The Church our blest Redeemer saved
With His own precious blood."

Hence it comes to pass that throughout his whole life he has been prominent in all ecclesiastical discussions and has drawn with his own hand many of the most important papers that go to form the historic records, especially of the Southern Presbyterian Church. That he should engage in debate, was inevitable. Let me refer to two things which in my judgment are prominent in all discussions in which he ever engaged.

The first was his unaffected love of truth. Like Dr. Thornwell, his earliest and possibly his dearest friend, he ardently pursued truth: "Buy the truth and sell it not." In all his speeches and writings, he sought to say the thing exactly as it was and he would stand firm a whole life-time in resistance to any efforts to bring him to a compromise of moral conviction. The principle involved must first be satisfied and honored: then, but not until then, might the outer relationship dependent upon that principle be modified or adjusted. Discussion was useless but as a means to the ends of sacred truth and righteousness.

This suggests the other thing to which I have referred: Dr. Palmer's freedom from personalities. He had extraordinary success in presenting his views without awakening animosity. I have never known any man who could go as deeply into church discussions and as much and as earnestly, who was so successful in avoiding unpleasant personal complications. He seldom at any meeting made more than the one speech; seldom in writing offered more than the one article, giving his views elaborately, broadly, comprehensively, in sentences that Macaulay could not surpass. If reply was made, I do not recall any case in which he offered rejoinder. I have yet to hear of any instance in which any opponent in discussion ever left the field without retaining for him profound respect and sincere kindness of feeling. Rare attainment in the pursuit of truth through the shock of debate!

2. For want of time I pretermit what might be said of Dr. Palmer's personality expressed in civic life, and leaving the sphere of action in the family and in the Church, I turn to the realm of suffering. Here the very essence of the true being is exhibited. Here true greatness finds its deepest and noblest, albeit its entirely unconscious self-manifestation.

God's Son was powerfully revealed through action: when He taught on the mount; when He healed the sick, cleansed the lepers, cast out devils; when He opposed hypocrisy and challenged men, baring His heart and saying in conscious integrity, "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" when He walked the waves or hushed the storm. But God's Son is no less powerfully revealed through suffering. To see Him truly, see Him in the woe of His Gethsemane, in the blackness of the Hidden sun of His Calvary.

Christianity must have its heroism or it must largely forfeit its reason of being, its right to live. The eleventh chapter of Hebrews breathes the heroic spirit essential to true faith in Jesus Christ. When Samuel Lapsley in his beautiful youth suffered and died for men and for his Saviour in Africa, he was as truly a martyred worthy of faith as were any of those who were stoned or sawn asunder.

That Dr. Palmer again and again offered his life for men and for God is known of all. When pestilence walked in darkness, or wasted at noonday, he never quailed. When disease and death spread sable wings over a whole city, he was found at the bedside of the sick to pray for them, at the tomb to bury the dead, and everywhere to strengthen the living, raising the drooping spirit, binding up the broken heart. For this your congregation, your whole city, shall revere him forever.

And for the glory and beauty of his personality as represented in the hours of his own individual and domestic grief, you do not merely honor: you love him! God makes no great character without suffering. His was no exception. Repeated bereavements threw long and deep shadows across the threshold of his home. And when these sorrows overtook him, the strong man bowed himself in submission to his God and came forth to you as from the Holy Place where the Shekinah dwelt. Then did you love him most when, like a little child, he took the cup from the Father's hand without word of murmur or sign of rebellion. And did you not most revere him, most sympathetically hear him, when out of the depths of his own experience he told you of Christ's High-priestly heart and of the Holy Ghost's comfort and peace?

III. May I cautiously venture to put Dr. Palmer into comparative relationship? For instance, may I speak of him in connection with his close friend, Dr. Thornwell?

Dr. Thornwell's amazing vigor of mind none can deny. Dr. Thornwell's speech was instinct with majestic power. In his eloquence as in his writing, he gave you "logic on fire." He put you with himself in a prospect car on a cannonball train and rushed you along, stimulating thought, and arousing you with soul invigoration. Dr. Palmer put you upon a stately vessel, moving with combined deliberation, ease, grace and power, with full time to be delighted with every new structure of truth which he showed you as you swept past some city on the shore. Dr. Thornwell was born in 1812: Dr. Palmer in 1818. They were loving and lovely in their lives: in death they are not now divided; what must be their discourse in Heaven!

May I connect Dr. Palmer with the man born just one year after him, Dr. Hoge? In our own Southern Church, the latter was the pulpit orator of the East; the former, of the West. Dr. Palmer was compact, broad-breasted, and when aroused, square-shouldered: Dr. Hoge was tall, slender, straight as an arrow. Both received the homage of breathless attention while they spoke. The very timber of the voices of these two was no mean illustration of the diverse quality of their eloquence. When Dr. Hoge spoke, at times you could hear the vibrant ringing of electricity as it comes forked in startling clangor from the cloud; when Dr. Palmer spoke, the deep-toned artillery of the heavens rolled and rolled, and died away in echoes on the horizon's verge. Both were superb in oratory. Forever the church will honor both.

A distinct quaternion of glorified worthies of the Southern Presbyterian Church is completed by adding the name of Robert L. Dabney. Dr. Palmer and Dr. Dabney had much in common. Both loved truth for itself. Both abhorred pretense and sham. Both were Southern to the heart's vital blood. Both declined to accept any relation between the Southern Presbyterian Church and other bodies which they did not believe to be founded in relative righteousness and consequent mutual respect. If Dr. Palmer was the Macaulay in theological writing, Dr. Dabney was its Carlyle. If the one made sentences incomparable in finish and smoothness, the other made them strong as they were compact and rugged, often unanswerable in convincing power. All the four—Thornwell and Dabney, the modern moulders of our Theology and Polity, and Hoge and Palmer, the models of our preaching—all have now "fallen asleep." Awhile Palmer stood last and alone. God rest him now; he too is gone!

CONCLUSION.

My brother, the pastor of this church, and my other brethren of the ministry, we shall never forget this service to-night. We do well to honor him who never yet preferred honor for himself. None amongst us was ever more beautifully clothed with unostentatious humility. No man was ever more truly a preacher amongst preachers, a brother on simple equality amongst his brethren. His courtesy was as unflinching as his brotherly love was abiding. The minister of humblest position in the church was as sure of feeling welcome in his presence and at home in his home as could be the most distinguished. His helpful and unstudied graciousness to his younger brethren was one of the most attractive as it was one of the most encouraging and uplifting of all his characteristics. His readiness to invite brethren into his pulpit, especially young men, and his word of commendation unflinchingly given where it could conscientiously be offered, has often relieved timid embarrassment and given incentive to future effort. No petty ambition, no mean vanity, no selfish exclusiveness was here. He felt no envy and he awakened none. We loved him; and loving him, we gladly accorded him the pre-eminence which he never asserted, never needed to assert.

"With us his name shall live
Through long succeeding years, Embalmed with all our hearts can give—
Our praises and our tears."

Beloved brethren of the Session of this church and of the membership of this congregation, I have discharged to the best of my ability but with conscious inadequacy, the duty which your call imposed. I now ask to lay before you, in the light of what I have said, my final estimate of Dr. Palmer, first as a man, and next as a preacher.

As a man: amongst all uninspired men whom I have known in the present or of whom I have read in the past, there is not one his superior in the complement of ideals needed to make manhood symmetrical and complete. In forming this thoughtful and deliberate opinion I have taken into consideration the splendor and dignity of his whole personality alike in action and in passion, his lofty devotion to God, the breadth of his sympathy with man, the purity and unselfishness of his life, his exalted sense of honor, his marvelous humility under strongest temptation to pride, his fortitude in sorrow, his tranquil majesty in living and his serene Christian equanimity in dying.

As a preacher and polemic man of God: of all the men who have preached in the century past, I know of not one his equal. Some have excelled him in one thing or in the larger number of things and in the superior quality of his endowments, acquisitions and powers. I consider here his freedom from petty vanities and other small weaknesses; his fidelity to God's Word; his constancy in his devotion to his ministerial duties; his scorn of pulpit trickery and sensationalism; his readiness to serve men of low estate; his power to edify men of any estate; his tender sympathy with all men and his broad-minded consideration for man as man of every denomination and even of no denomination; his triumphant endurance of the strain of preaching for forty-six years in the same pulpit in a city of 300,000 inhabitants, Catholics, Protestants, Jews, residents, visitors, under a constant fire of criticism, with expectation raised to the highest pitch: and all this with lifelong demands for special services on important occasions all over the South. These things considered, I tell you, my brethren, in all honesty, I believe that God lays upon you right here in New Orleans and this Church the honor and the responsibility of having had for nearly half a century the peerless preacher of his day.

And now there comes back to us the refrain, he is gone!

"O for the touch of a vanished hand,
The sound of a voice that is still."

When England's Queen after her long life was called from earth, an American poet of the West wrote describing the universal mourning, when the doors of homes were trailing crepe and when the flags on all ships and in all public places were only half unfurled.

But then he added:

"Still, the Sun awoke to gladness
As of old,
And the stars their midnight beauty
Still unrolled;
For the glory born of goodness
Never dies,
And its flag is not half-masted
In the skies."

The presence of this vast congregation and the tearful silence of this impressive hour, we can never forget. As we go hence subdued in spirit, let us adopt Tennyson's lines and say—

'O good, gray head which all men knew,
O voice from which their omens all men drew,
O iron nerve to true occasion true,
O fallen at length that tower of strength
Which stood four-square to all the winds that blew.

"We revere, and while we hear
The tides of music's golden sea
Setting towards Eternity,
Uplifted high in heart and hope are we,
Until we doubt not that for one so true
There must be other, nobler work to do,
And greater he shall ever be.

"For though the giant ages heave the hill
And break the shore, and evermore,
Make and break, and work their will;
"Tho' world on world in myriad myriads roll
Round us, and each with different powers
And other forms of life than ours,
What know we that is greater than the soul!

"On God and God-like men we build our trust.
The moral disappears, ashes to ashes, dust to dust,
Cease to speak of his renown,
Lay these fleeting honors down."

He hath passed upward from this pulpit to stand before the throne: from this grand old Church so dear to him and to you, to worship God in Heaven. And we need not add:

"In the vast Cathedral leave him,
God accept him, Christ receive him."

A Scriptural View of Sin Necessary to Reconciliation With God.

How awful the thought of not being reconciled with God! We can only faintly realize this by the thought of being out of harmony with our fellowmen.

Call to mind the terrible pain and anguish that accompany the enmity that exists between members of the same family. What feelings of bitterness cherished by a father and son, who refuse to be reconciled! What disturbance of mind and heaviness of soul, when by some grievous misunderstanding, a mother and daughter have severed the sweet and tender relationship that ought to be sustained between them!

How children of God destroy their heart-peace, deny to the world the teachings of the precious Saviour, stir up strife, reproach the name of the master, and dishonor their Heavenly Father, when they allow differences to make impossible that fellowship which is so essential to the advancement of religion! How sweet that reconciliation which takes place between members of a once happy and united family! How precious and far-reaching in wholesome influence that reconciliation made between the professing children of God, who have refused to throw the mantle of charity over each other's faults!

"How sweet, how heavenly is the sight,
When those who love the Lord
In one another's peace delight,
And so fulfill his word!

If enmity between earthly friends is so charged with dreadful consequences, what ought to be the sad realization of enmity with God, who made us, who gave His Son for our redemption, and who is ever ready to stretch forth His strong arm in our defense?

If reconciliation between father and son, mother and daughter, brethren in Christ, is so fraught with peace and joy, what must be the joy of that soul, which is made to span by divine grace, that impassable gulf between itself and God? The result is "joy unspeakable and full of glory."

What can be more desirable than reconciliation with God? How can we live without the assurance of our Father's pleasure in His children? A refusal to be reconciled, means that God is displeased with our conduct, that we are regarded by Him as rebellious subjects—that we are engaged in sin. We can but go our way with the awful consciousness of our Father's frown. What child can experience satisfaction in anything, however inviting, when he is painfully conscious that his mother is not reconciled to him because of acts contrary to her bidding and in violation of that authority, which as mother, she has the right to wield?

What being here on earth can be satisfied with a course of life that bids defiance to the law of God, the example of Christ and the beseechings of the Holy Spirit?

Reconciliation must take place. We can't live in peace without God's favour; we can't die in triumph without the consciousness of God's presence; we can't sit with the Saviour on His throne unless we are one with Him in the love and complacency of the Father.

Can this reconciliation take place? Yes. God has made a great sacrifice that we might be reconciled—even the death of His own dear Son. There is only one way by which this reconciliation can be effected. We must view sin as God views it; we must realize that the sacrifice Christ made for sin was necessary. The atonement of Christ must be real. The cross must be magnetic to the soul. The blood shed for the remission of sin must be applied. We can never be reconciled to God so long as we disregard the means by which He has made reconciliation possible. God Himself has taken the initiative in this all-important matter. He is the party offended. We have sinned. We deserve no mercy. He is not compelled, even in order to vindicate his character, to offer us the means of reconciliation—but "mercy seasons justice," and he condescends to make an overture of peace in the satisfaction of the cross. Can we not see the absurdity of trying to effect reconciliation with God on any other basis than the sacrifice of His Son? A man may live a moral life, but that can never reconcile him to God. The very fact that he is depending on a moral life for reconciliation, only adds in the sight of God, insult to injury.

The man sets up his terms of reconciliation in opposition to God's terms. To seek in any other way, reconciliation with God, bids defiance to His plan, and sets at naught the wisdom of an infinite God and a loving father. The highest manifestation—the supreme expression of that wisdom—is Jesus Christ, "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood." How can man ever hope to be reconciled to God unless he gives his "assent of mind and consent of heart," to the marvelous plan that makes it possible for God to be "just and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus."

Hear God's word: "But now in Christ Jesus, ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ," "For He is our peace, who hath made both one." . . . "And that He might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby." The enmity between God and the sinner is slain by the cross; therefore reconciliation can only take place as we associate that cross with sin, which drove Christ to it, and accept the provision for reconciliation—even Christ who was nailed to the cross. "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself." "We pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."

Since God is the offended one, we must accept the means He has ordained for reconciliation.

We cannot be reconciled to Him either in time or in eternity, unless we have a Scriptural view of sin. That view consists in regarding sin as offensive to God, in the personal acceptance of Christ as the salvation for sin, and in the thought that through Christ and Him alone, can God be propitiated, be brought nigh by His blood, and reinstated into God's favour.

Extracts from the Governor's Message.

EDUCATION.

I commend to your careful consideration the very full and able report of our Superintendent of Public Instruction. I concur in the main in the recommendations which he has so thoughtfully made. But for the fact that some of your honorable body have come to the Legislature instructed by the conventions which nominated you to secure the adoption of an amendment to the constitution by which the taxes paid by the whites shall go to the education of the white children and the taxes paid by the negroes shall go to the education of the negro children, I should make no mention of any race question. I had confidently hoped that this matter would not be before you. We have just eliminated by our constitutional amendment the negro from any large participation in the government of the State. It was my fortune to be the candidate at the time when it was adopted of that party which supported the amendment. In my speech of acceptance made to the convention which unanimously nominated me for the office of Governor I used this language: While universal suffrage is a failure, universal justice is the perpetual decree of Almighty God, and we are entrusted with power not for our good alone, but for the negro as well. We hold our title to power by the tenure of service to God, and if we fail to administer equal and exact justice to the negro whom we deprive of suffrage, we shall in the fullness of time lose power ourselves, for we must know that the God who is love trusts no people with authority for the purpose of enabling them to do injustice to the weak.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the education of the negro has been somewhat disappointing, and there are many of our people who really believe that education is injurious to the negro. They insist that it tends to make him worthless and leads to the commission of crime. Unfortunately we have not gathered sufficient statistics to put this contention fully at rest, but the State's prison does keep a record and from it is found that within the last two years of the negroes who have gone to the penitentiary two hundred and forty-one cannot read and write, while 197 have been admitted who can read and write. 47.6 of our negro population are illiterate and 52.4 can read and write. So that for the higher crimes punishable in the penitentiary it clearly appears that illiteracy among the negroes is an injury to the State in that it produces over 40 per cent. more of crime. But, however this may be, our duty is plain to try to find a way in which his education can be made more valuable to himself and to the State. Certainly this cannot be accomplished by leaving him to the pitiful income arising from his own taxes. The negroes of North Carolina pay for school taxes $126,442.90. There are 221,958 negro children of school age in the State. This would give to each child a little less than 57 cents and would furnish school for them for a little more than one month out of the twelve. It must be manifest that such a provision as this is an injustice to the negro and injurious to us. No reason can be given for dividing the school fund according to the proportion paid by each race, which would not equally apply to a division of the taxes paid by each race on every other subject. Education is a governmental function. The right to collect taxes for that purpose is based on the duty of the State to educate its citizens. The care of the insane is no more the duty of the State than education, and if we divide the school fund according to the races we should also divide the fund for the maintenance of the hospitals for the insane in the same fashion.

It would wrong both races, would bring our State into the condemnation of a just public opinion elsewhere, and would mark us as a people who have turned backwards. The State of North Carolina has heretofore enjoyed the distinction of being first in those things which look to a larger liberty and a consequent higher development of her people. Let us not seek to be the first State in the Union to make the weak man helpless.

CHILD LABOR IN FACTORIES.

I call the attention of your honorable body to the recommendations contained in the report of the Commissioner of Labor and Printing and commend them to your careful consideration. The time appears to be ripe in this State for some legislation in behalf of the children who are working in textile and furniture factories. Most of the States of the Union and many foreign countries have long since passed laws prohibiting the working of children under certain ages in factories of the character named. It has heretofore been deemed inadvisable to legislate upon this subject here. The State owes a duty to her children. The controversy, if there be any, between capital and labor has nothing to do with this question. In a high sense the State is a guardian to the children. A child in this State can be taken by the courts from the care of a parent who is manifestly and grossly unfit to have charge of it. The right of the State to do this is founded on the duty of the State to perpetuate itself by the care of those who are hereafter to constitute her citizenship. This right being conceded it becomes the right of the State to protect small children against labor which tends to dwarf them physically, mentally or morally. It cannot be denied, I think, that work in the factories named by young children is, to say the least of it, dangerous to their health and calculated to make of them weak men and women. I, therefore, earnestly recommended to your honorable body the passage of a law absolutely prohibiting the employment in such factories of any child under the age of twelve years. This law ought also to provide that no child under the age of fourteen shall work in any such factory at night, and after 1905 no child who cannot read and write should be permitted to work in any such factory under the age of fourteen years.

The right of the State to regulate the hours of labor was for a long time questioned, but has at last been generally recognized. When a country is new, sparsely settled, largely given to agricultural and other outdoor labor there is little, if any, need for the interposition of the State between the employer and the employe, but with the increase of population and the gathering of great bodies of men into small communities, making labor in manufacturing plants, it sometimes becomes necessary to protect them against the destructive tendency of overwork. I believe that the hour has come in this State when without injustice to any one the law may properly declare that not more than eleven hours shall constitute a day's work in manufacturing establishments. Where night work is performed, the hours should be restricted to ten. This, I think can be done without the slightest injury to industry, but really with benefit to it and certainly it will be a help to those who toil. We have in this State to-day labor capable of the highest development. Our operatives are in the main native stock, with the fine traits and the steady habits which have ever characterized North Carolinians. The people of this State constitute its wealth and given a fair opportunity for development of mind, body, and heart, they will become as efficient workers as can be found anywhere.

SALE AND MANUFACTURE OF LIQUOR.

For many years the Legislatures of this State have step by step narrowed the limits in which liquor could be sold and manufactured until at the present time this business cannot be carried on in half of the counties of the State, while more than two-thirds of the counties have either by county or legislative action restricted the sale to incorporated towns. No good reason is apparent why the Legislature should not in all the counties apply the restriction which to-day exists in more than two-thirds of them. This should be done for the reason that in the country there is no police supervision of the conduct of the business. Those who live in the country have no protection from the evil results growing out of the manufacture and sale of liquor. In many places the lawlessness due to this business has driven good people who preferred to live on their farms into the towns for safety. I commend, therefore, that a general law be passed prohibiting the manufacture and sale of liquor throughout the State save in incorporated towns. The manufacture of liquor even in incorporated towns should be subject to the same restrictions that now apply to the sale. If your honorable body should pass this law I believe that you would see good results from it in the near future and your action would meet with the approval of the best citizens of the State. In passing a statute on this subject care should be taken to avoid restoring the manufacture and sale of liquor where it is now prohibited by law. Stringent provisions should be made to prevent the operation of blockade stills. The State should no longer depend upon the Federal government to suppress this evil business.

Aunt Dinah's Opinion.

"Yessum, I b'lieves in frien'ology, I sut'nly does, an' I don't have to feel de bumps on nobody's haid to know de kind dey is," said Aunt Dinah, flecking the soapsuds from her hands as she lifted a garment in the washtub.

"Jes' you watch folks an' dey'll show what kind ob frien'ology dey's got. Der's some dat's so tender-hearted dey can't go near no frien' what's in 'fiction. It's got no use for dat kind; dey haint' carin' fer nobody but derselves. Den der's some dat nebber does a kindness 'cept dey puts a mortgage on it, an' ye nebber gits done payin' intrus' on what dey's done fer ye. Der's de kind what's fond ob ye while dey needs ye, an' hain't got no membry when dey don't; an' de high kind what t'inks dey knows what ye needs better'n ye does yerself—all dem kinds is nuffin' but pride an' selfishness. Real frien'ology is a blessed t'ing to hab; der hain't no self-seekin' in it. It's lovin' an' pitiful, lastin' an' long-sufferin' like de Bible tells 'bout. Ye on'y got to live near folks to find out if deys got it; ye don't need to feel der haid."—Forward.

CHARLES B. AYCOCK.

An Appreciation.

(Editorial.)

Born in Wayne county, North Carolina, November 1, 1859. Brought up on the farm. Graduate of the University with the Orator's and Essayist's medal. County Superintendent of Public Instruction, 1881. Granted license to practise law, January, 1881. Appointed United States Attorney by President Cleveland, 1893, and re-appointed ad interim by Chief Justice Fuller. Elector at large and President of the Electoral College, 1893. Elected Governor of North Carolina, 1900.

Such are the chief events of the career to-date of Governor Charles B. Aycock. His personality is a most attractive and winning one. He combines a natural geniality of disposition with a rare firmness of conviction where principle is concerned. He is thus making one of the best, as well as one of the most popular governors this State has ever had. The only criticism of his administration has been for the too frequent use of the pardoning power, and when he showed that he had granted fewer pardons than his predecessors the explanation was offered that even a failing on the side of virtue was regarded by his people as a lowering of the high ideal they had formed for him, and that he is criticised for what would be passed over in an executive from whom less was expected. He is an orator who revives the traditions of the Old South, when scholarship was necessary to statesmanship, and the eloquence of sincerity and conviction the only key to the people's hearts. With all Governor Aycock is a sincere and humble Christian, a member of the Baptist Church.

It is not too much to say, that whenever the occasion may come, there is no office within the gift of his people to which he may not attain, and that he would adorn any whose responsibilities he would be willing to assume.

But Governor Aycock is a type, as well as a personality, the type of the Southern Statesman of the new era, holding to all the worthy traditions of the past, but with his face toward the morning. He is "the enemy of the last abuse and the advocate of the next reform." His "partisanship rises into patriotism and his patriotism into philanthropy."

Owing his election to the people and by an honest vote of the people, he has led in the task of purifying the electorate itself and thus redeeming politics from the taint of corruption and fraud and the reproach of violence. In the promotion of education, in the inculcation of the principles of justice toward all, white and black, in the advocacy of sane measures in behalf of temperance, in the correction of the evils of child-labor, he is blazing the way for the people to walk in, and there is no faltering in his steps.

And such will be the type in the years to come of the political representatives of the South. The South, through them will take the place in the councils of the Nation, that she has lost through war, and reconstruction, and the hopeless mediocrity of those whose minds were occupied alone with the overshadowing menace of the race problem, and knew not how to solve it, save by temporary and often indefensible devices. That day has passed.

We have printed elsewhere extracts from Governor Aycock's message that touch the problems of education, of labor and of the liquor traffic, and appeal to the motives of philanthropy itself, thus rising above the plane of partisanship. It is needless to say that the Standard concurs in the principles enunciated while it leaves the details of legislation and administration for those whom they directly concern.

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

We have sketches this week of two great men, one a great preacher of righteousness who has gone to his reward. The other, the best type of the Southern statesman, who we trust will be long spared to us. Dr. Daniel's masterly oration is given practically in full and will be read with spiritual profit, not only for its great subject, but for the eloquent treatment of his theme. Our question, who is left to tell adequately of Dr. Palmer's greatness, has been answered. We hope that Dr. Daniel may find the opportunity to prepare a biography of Dr. Palmer.

Rev. C. C. Carson gives us an excellent and evangelical exposition of the scriptural doctrine of Reconciliation. The extracts from the message are of more than local interest, and touch on subjects that the whole country is concerned about. The style is excellent as well as the matter. The other departments are up to the standard. And the minister will find something helpful on the 21st page, to which the pew will say Amen.

NORTH CAROLINA.

HYDE COUNTY.—Now that the year 1902 is gone, the Evangelist desires to call attention to some of the blessings of God upon the work of our beloved church in the great County of Hyde.

The church organized near Swanquarter, the county-seat, on the 4th of last May, has enjoyed a steady growth. Last 4th Sunday was communion day, and we had the pleasure of receiving four persons on profession of faith, making six received since last communion. Friends came to our rescue and bought a lot for church and manse purposes, on which there was a three room house. The house has been rearranged, and three nice rooms added, making it a comfortable manse. The work has been done by our church here with very little help from outside. Our people here have contributed more liberally to the church building fund than I had even hoped for, after having done so much in other directions; and after considering the fact that we have only seven male members, we are disposed to thank God and take courage. We owe about $40 on the manse, and if those who love the Lord Jesus, and desire to honor him in this needy field, would come to our rescue, we would appreciate it very much. This church has not yet been named. The Young Ladies Mission Band of the Henderson Presbyterian Church very kindly offered to give us $200 to aid in the erection of our church building, and the church voted to give them the honor of choosing a name for it, as an expression of its grate-fulness. The church building is now going up, and when finished, it will be a credit to the community. Presbytery, at its last spring meeting, took steps looking forward to the establishing of a "High School" in connection with the work here, which we hope to establish in the near future.

Rev. Wm. Black came to my rescue at Makeleyville, and the Lord used him here as elsewhere, and his preaching did our souls good. On the third Sunday in November we organized a church with fifteen members. A Sunday-school was established also with forty members, and has been increasing in numbers ever since.

The second Sunday in December was our regular time for service there, and although the weather was stormy, yet nearly all the members and a goodly number of others were present.

According to former announcement, the matter of naming the church and election of officers was taken up. It was decided that the church should be known as the Makeleyville Presbyterian Church. The officers are: Ruling Elders, Charley Ayres and George W. Mason; Deacons, S. S. Jenette, and George Ayres. Immediately after the ordination service, a sweet communion service was held. The congregation seemed to be greatly moved throughout the entire service. While the simple charge was being delivered to the officers, and all through the communion service, every soul seemed to be filled with a solemn awe, and many were in tears. With thankful hearts, we praise the Lord for the manifestations of his mercies, and begin the New Year with renewed energy.

ELIZABETH CITY.—Mrs. R. L. Grier and son, Master Livingston, the wife and son of Rev. R. L. Grier, the new pastor of Cann Memorial Presbyterian Church having arrived during the Christmas holidays, they are now keeping house in Dyer street, No 19. On last Monday night Mr. Grier's congregation gave him a pounding, which would have done credit to a congregation twice the size of this one. A great number of his members were present on this occasion, which was a most pleasant and enjoyable one. The members of this church are well pleased with their new pastor, who is taking up the work with great earnestness and energy. The church is taking on new life.—Economist, Jan. 2, '03.

Red Springs Seminary.

Everything promises well for the spring term. Of the 156 boarding students enrolled in the fall, all are back except 10 and some of these will return later. Quite a number have enrolled for the spring term and four new students are already on the ground. A large number of additional day pupils have registered. Inquiries and applications for next fall are already coming in. The year's work thus far has been most successful. There has been no case of sickness in the school.

The fine central heating and electric light plant, installed by the D. A. Tompkins Co., of Charlotte, is working successfully.

The personnel of the student body is exceptionally fine and the patronage extends to New York, Maryland, Virginia, Tennessee, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and Alabama. All of the graduate pupils of the Seminary who desire to work are teaching. The present Senior class numbers 21, the largest Senior class in the history of the institution.

Let the Christian Forces Get Together.

I am endeavoring to get in touch with the leaders of the Christian forces in North Carolina. All churches and creeds can make common cause of Temperance and the suppression of the saloon.

I hope the ministers throughout the State will work together for the bill of the Anti-Saloon League, introduced in the Senate to-day by Senator H. A. London.

In many places a meeting of the ministers will be wise and helpful. In many others mass-meetings may be held.

By all means let every minister throw himself and his people into this work. I am to-day sending out letters to the ministers. I hope not one will be neglected. Act immediately.

J. W. Bailey, in Charge Anti-Saloon Campaign.
Raleigh, N. C.

LEXINGTON.—Just before the Christmas holidays it was suggested to the scholars of the Sunday-school that they play Santa Claus for the inmates of the County Home, and give them a good Christmas dinner, to show them that old Santa had not forgotten them. Each member was to bring something good to eat, but those who were not good cooks—e. g., the young men—were to contribute money for bringing fruit. The Sunday-school readily agreed to this, some of the children wishing to go themselves, saying they could walk four miles and carry the dinner. On account of the unfavorable weather the plan had to be changed to a New Year's dinner. The contributions were sent in the shape of chicken, beef, sausage, rolls, pies, cakes, oranges, apples and candy, enough to fill four bushel baskets, besides some smaller boxes. One scholar furnished a mule and wagon, as substitute for reindeer and sleigh, to take the things out to the Home. We had a prayer meeting, then gave to each one a little fruit and cake and candy and left the more substantial for next day, New Year's dinner. They seemed very glad to see Santa and expressed the wish that he would come again.

DAVIDSON.—College honors as shown by the reports of the first term, ending on Dec. 23 '02, come to the following: In the Senior class, H. H. Caldwell, monitor; W. W. Arwood, vice monitor. In the Junior class: E. D. Kerr, J. W. Currie. In the Sophomore class: S. C. Williams, W. P. Gibson: In the Fresh-man class: E. J. Erwin, E. G. Finley. Others on the honor roll, that is, attaining an average of 95 or more, are W. N. Dunn (Sen.) C. A. Cornelson (Jnn.), L. W. White (Jnn.), N. S. Stirewalt (Soph.), W. T. Bailey, Smith Richardson, L. T. Wilds (Fresh.)

The work of the new term has been taken up in earnest and everything is again in good running order. Nearly every man is at his post, several new names have been enrolled on the college register. The college and village had expected to be entertained tonight by Edwin L. Barker, of Chicago, in a monologue play from David Copperfield, but he has had to cancel his southern engagements on account of some throat affection.

A number of the Davidson faculty will attend the banquet given in Charlotte at the Manufacturer's Club on the evening of the 12 inst., given under the auspices of the new organization of Davidson alumni in that city. The organization and gathering means a great deal for the interests of the college.

Dr. Smith, who spoke in Charleston last Sabbath before the Y. M. C. A. on the occasion of its anniversary New Year service, made an address at night in behalf of Davidson in a union meeting of the several Presbyterian churches of the city. Dr. Smith will present the same cause in the Second Church, of Charlotte, on the coming Sunday.

ELMWOOD.—I desire to express publicly my sincere thanks to the good people of Elmwood congregation for the liberal "ponnding" they gave us during the holidays.

Our hearts have been encouraged by these substantial tokens of esteem and affection. These things have for the pastor more than their intrinsic value, and are always specially acceptable because of their double value.

Encouraged by this renewal of interest and fidelity, may both pastor and people be stimulated to greater activity in the Master's cause.
J. E. Summers.

CONCORD.—Thyatira Church—The Ladies' Missionary Society gave a "Silver Tea and Sociable" at the manse Friday afternoon, Dec. 26th. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, there were more than twenty ladies present.

After devotional exercises, and an interesting program of music, readings, etc., refreshments were served, and all present voted the occasion a most enjoyable one.

The free-will offering of silver amounted to five dollars, and the mite boxes, which were opened at the same time contained forty odd dollars, making in all, about fifty dollars. This will go as the yearly offering from the ladies of our church to missions.

FLORIDA.

LAKE CITY.—At our quarterly communion on Sunday, Jan. 4th, the first Sabbath of the New Year, and the first sermon, we had a glorious time. It was a very solemn occasion for us all. When an opportunity at the close of the sermon was given for any one who wished to renounce sin, and accept the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, two persons came forward and gave their hands to the minister and their hearts to God. These were husband and wife, who live at White Springs, Fla., some twelve miles from Lake City, wherein is situated the nearest Presbyterian Church.

The husband was received on profession of faith, was baptized, and received his first communion. His noble wife was a member of the Methodist Church, but joyfully came over and put in her membership with her husband, in the church of his choice.

One of the members of our church, a godly, consecrated man, who is loved and respected by all who know him, was used of God in bringing about this happy union. O that we had more such members! The day was cold and gloomy outside, but the hearts of the people in the little brick church glowed with spiritual warmth and joy in the presence of the Holy Spirit of God.

LAKE CITY.—On the fourth Sabbath in December, Rev. J. A. Kimmons preached in the Presbyterian Church at Lake City, while the pastor, Rev. J. S. Crowley, preached at New Hope. The people of Lake City enjoyed the cream of a long and fruitful ministry, while the New Hope people had a trip to Africa, and made a liberal contribution for foreign missions.

MISSISSIPPI.

OKOLOMA.—Rev. J. W. Moseley, Jr., was formally installed as pastor of the Okolona Church, Monday evening, Jan. 5, 1903. Rev. E. H. Gregory, Rev. D. H. Ogden, Elder H. S. Gillaybee and Elder D. McCadney of the Commission were present.

Rev. E. H. Gregory preached the sermon and propounded the questions, Rev. D. H. Ogden charged the people and pastor.

The Ladies' Aid Society presented the pastor on the day of his installation with a handsome "Teacher's Bible."

TOMBECKBEE PRESBYTERY.—Tombeckbee Presbytery met in Okolona, pursuant to call of Moderator Monday, Jan. 5, 1903, and transacted the following business:

The resignation of Rev. E. H. Gregory as pastor of the West Point Church was accepted and the pastoral relationship was dissolved.

The resignation of Rev. E. H. Gregory as Stated Clerk was accepted and Rev. J. W. Moseley, Jr., was elected in his stead.

Rev. E. H. Gregory upon his own request was dismissed to the Presbytery of Meridian, in order to accept a call from the Moss Point Church.
Stated Clerk.

TEXAS

MIDLAND.—This church has just sustained a great loss in the death of Mr. Winslow D. Watts, who was killed by the accidental discharge of a shotgun in the hands of one of his best friends on Dec. 26th, 1902.

Bro. Watts was one of the most consecrated workers, and liberal supporters of the church at this place, and his loss will be most keenly felt. Mr. Watts was born near Statesville, N. C., April 10, 1866, and was the second son of A. F. Watts and Erixena J. Thomas. He came to Texas about fifteen years ago, and, soon after coming to the State, settled in Midland, where he was most active in establishing the faith of his fathers.

Besides a wife, four sisters and one brother remain to mourn the untimely death of this good and just man.

VIRGINIA.

Lexington Presbytery is called to meet in the First Church, Staunton, Va., at 11 a. m., Jan. 13th, 1903, to transact the following business:

1. Hearing report of the Evangelist of Presbytery, Rev. C. S. Lingamfelt.
2. Taking steps to raise salary of the Evangelist.
3. Hearing report of Agent of Davis and Elkins College.
4. Taking steps to raise balance (about one fifth) of $30,000, pledged by Presbytery to the College.
5. To act on request for dissolution of pastoral relation, between Rev. J. C. Johnson and McDowell and Williamsville churches, and the call from Greenbrier Presbytery for his services.

Wm. G. White, Stated Clerk.

WINCHESTER.—At communion service on yesterday morning, Rev. J. S. Sibley announced the names of eleven who had been added to the roll since the last communion which makes 42 additions in a little over two years and a third.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Thornwell Orphanage, Clinton, S. C.

I have been so busy for the past few weeks, ever since the opening of the Christmas holidays, replying to the hundreds of letters that came to the Thornwell Orphanage, that I have not had time to prepare any notes for the press.

My firstly, secondly, thirdly, are all thanks, thanks, thanks. The good Father surely touched the hearts of his sons and daughters and had them to pity their little brothers and sisters at the Thornwell Orphanage. Christmas was a joyous day with them. Old Santa Claus came in fine style. Toys and candies, fruits, nuts and such like were abundant. We all owe a debt of thanks to Capt. Wagener of Charleston, a devoted Lutheran friend, who filled up liberal bags for 225 children, and it took a two-horse wagon load to do it. Mr. Harvin, of Manuing, sent every one three pairs of hose, and the Union Mills sent another pair, extra, which they will put to better use than hanging in the chimney corner. Turkeys were scarce, but we had flour and pork and potatoes by the wagon-load. One dear friend, Mr. I. McWilliams of Louisiana, sent four barrels of sugar and four of molasses. But I could not have space to enumerate all, if I tried. It is sufficient to say that our hearts have just filled up with gratitude to each and every one of the hundreds of donors, who remembered our little ones. Not the least appreciated were the many gifts received from former pupils. We are glad to be able to add a dozen names to our list of patrons, who contribute $60 each yearly, for the support of a child.

There is one sad strain to all this hymn of joy,—our distressing inability to receive at least a score of the more than a hundred applicants for admission; for fully twenty of these are exceedingly urgent and needy cases. But all our cottages are full—more than full. We feel sure that the church would support the children could we find house room for them. Is there no friend of the fatherless in all our Southern Church willing to build for us a Memorial Cottage, to house a family of twenty-five orphan boys? Twenty-five hundred dollars would do it. Surely, surely there is some one able and willing.

And now we are out for the New Year, 1903. It will take regular and constant giving to keep our big pot boiling. But though it costs sixty dollars a year to provide one child with food and raiment, it only takes ten cents a day to find food for a single child for a single day. Anybody can help the orphans if he has a dime to spare.

Send all gifts to Rev. W. P. Jacobs, Clinton, S. C.

Publication Notes.

Our Publication Committee at Richmond, Va., report a very gratifying increase in their sales during the nine months from April 1st to January 1st. The increase for this period was about 40 per cent. and the holiday trade during November and December was so large they were not able to handle the business with the usual dispatch, and express regret for the unavoidable delay in delivering certain books which sold beyond their expectations. In future ample provision will be made for handling any increase of business which may come.

Mr. R. E. Magill, the newly elected Business Superintendent and Treasurer, entered upon his duties on Dec. 15th and is rapidly familiarizing himself with the details of the business. He will make a careful study of the whole situation and introduce new methods where it seems that an improvement can be made. The coming of Mr. Magill relieves Dr. Phillips of all business details and he is again free to take up the larger work intrusted to him by the church, the direction and enlargement of the work of our Sunday-schools and Young People's Societies. Plans are rapidly maturing for the betterment of our Sunday-school Publication, and it is the purpose of the Committee to increase the helpfulness of these aids in every way possible.

The sale of the building seemed a wise step to the Committee for the reason that the growth of the city had increased the value of the property to the point that it could be sold for a handsome profit. Other property which will answer the Committee's needs, and which has a bright outlook as an investment, will be purchased at once and the Committee will be settled in new quarters by April 1st. It is very gratifying to the Committee that the Church is making larger use of their resources every month, and as their only reason for existence is that they may serve the church and promote all of her interests, it is the earnest wish of the Committee that every one will feel free to write about information on any and all lines of church activities. Books and pamphlets containing helpful information on every phase of religious life are now available in great abundance, and it will be their pleasure to furnish the best obtainable at the lowest possible cost, or without cost whenever necessary.

The collections from the churches and Sunday-schools for Sunday-school extension work for October, November and December were about $3,400, an increase of nearly $1,000 over last year, showing that there has been a noble response by the Sunday-schools to the appeal for aid for our destitute fields.

The Committee now has ten men in the field, all but two giving full time, to the work of visiting families, selling and donating good religious literature, and helping to organize Sunday-schools in destitute places.

The expense of this work, together with the donation of books and literature exceed every year the amount the Committee receives through the collections from Churches and Sunday-schools, the excess amount being paid out of the earnings of the business.

Committee Notes.

The Executive Committee of Foreign Missions met on Tuesday, Jan. 6th, 1903.

The meeting was opened with prayer by Mr. C. A. Rowland, who was present.

The first hour was devoted to a memorial service of the life of Dr. D. C. Rankin, at which the resolutions prepared by the sub-committee were read and adopted, and the Committee was lead in prayer for Mrs. Rankin by Rev. Dr. Bachman.

It was ordered that a supplement with a picture and short sketch of Dr. Rankin be made and placed in each copy of the January number of The Missionary.

Rev. H. F. Williams, who has been Acting Editor during Dr. Rankin's visit to the East, was elected the Editor and Business Manager of our missionary publications. Mr. Williams signified his acceptance of this call and will seek the immediate dissolution of his present pastoral relations in order to give his whole time to this work.

A letter was read from Mr. W. Brenton Green of Princeton, N. J., expressing the thanks and appreciation of the faculty and students of Princeton Seminary for the services of Rev. Dr. DuBose, who recently visited that institution.

Miss M. E. Craig, at present teaching in the school at Cardenas, Cuba, was appointed as a regular missionary.

Mr. Motte Martin, member of the present senior class of Union Theological Seminary, was appointed a missionary to Africa, subject to the endorsement of his Presbytery.

Appropriations were made for the Mission in Cuba and Mexico for the year 1903, as sent in from these fields.

Mr. C. A. Rowland of Athens, Ga., was present by invitation to confer with the Committee about the work of the Students' Summer Campaign. Arrangements were made by which this work could be taken in charge by the Executive Committee and placed under the direction of the sub-committee on the Forward Movement.

The Treasurer's report showed receipts for December to have been $14,918.78, a loss as compared with December of last year of $8,143.42.

The Committee adjourned to meet on the first Tuesday in February.
S. H. Chester, Secretary.

NASHVILLE.—When our beloved and lamented Dr. D. C. Rankin started on his journey to the East it was arranged that the Secretary and Mr. W. H. Raymond should become jointly responsible for his editorial work, and Rev. H. F. Williams, pastor of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Nashville, at the request of Dr. Rankin, kindly agreed to look after the printing and other business details connected with the publication of the Magazines.

But in a few weeks the Secretary and Mr. Raymond found that, almost unconsciously, there had devolved on Mr. Williams not only the business management, but also much the larger part of the editorial work. Then in view of the probable extension of the time of Dr. Rankin's absence Mr. Williams was formally elected by the Executive Committee to the position of Acting Editor and Business Manager of our publications. The Committee has had abundant evidence that his work in this department has given eminent satisfaction to the whole church. So, when at our January meeting we were confronted with the responsibility of filling the place made vacant by the death of Dr. Rankin, we were all of one mind that we already had in Mr. Williams the man whom God had chosen for this great and responsible work, and he was heartily and unanimously called by the Committee to the position of Editor and Business Manager of our publications. After due consideration the call was accepted and Mr. Williams will at once seek the dissolution of his pastoral relations that he may give his whole time to the work.

We feel confident that the Church's endorsement of our action in this matter will grow more and more cordial as our new editor becomes better known through his work in our Missionary publications.

The Executive Committee of Foreign Missions.
S. H. Chester, Secretary.

VIRGINIA

RICHMOND — The Week of Prayer services were begun at a joint communion service on Sunday evening at the Second Presbyterian Church. Notwithstanding the heavy rain of the afternoon, there was a large congregation from all the churches. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Thomas R. English, of Union Theological Seminary, and the communion administered by Dr. Phillips and Dr. McElroy. A notable feature was the large number of ruling elders who shared in the impressive and profitable service. On Monday night the meeting was in the Third Church, Dr. Witherspoon preaching the sermon, and on Tuesday night in the Hoge Memorial Church.

At the Third Church, on Sunday, January 4th, at the communion service, thirteen persons were received into this church, an impressive beginning of the year's work and blessings. Dr. Eggleston preached at 4 p. m. at the Montrose Chapel, near the National Cemetery. At the Christmas celebration of the Sunday-school, Dr. A. L. Phillips made the address, helping very much to make the occasion a great success. A striking feature was the singing of a trained chorus of children. The offering was for the Orphanage of the Virginia Synod. The congregation undertook to reach the needy, and many substantial things were sent out, which gave solid comfort and real joy. Dr. Eggleston, the pastor, received from his people on Christmas day, a handsome gold watch and chain.

PULASKI.—There were 13 additions by letter and three upon confession of faith, to our church here at our last communion—the same number which united at one previous quarterly communion.

Good attendance and good attention encourage the newly installed Pastor.

Mrs. S. R. Gammon, wife of one of our faithful missionaries from Brazil, is now at home on a furlough and recently, by invitation, gave a very interesting account of her work to the ladies of her home church at Pulaski. Our ladies were very much enthused by Mrs. Gammon's address. No man was permitted to be present; even the Pastor was banished, simply because he was not a lady.

Our committee would do well to utilize the gifts of Mrs. Gammon, as well as those of her husband, while they remain at home.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

GREENVILLE.—The labors of Rev. T. W. Sloan, D. D., who became pastor of the First Church last September, have been abundantly blessed. The congregations at all services have been the largest in the history of the church. The seating capacity of the church is taxed to its fullest extent to hold the large crowds. Mr. Sloan is a great success as a pastoral visitor, each member of his church of over five hundred having been visited one or more times since his arrival among them. Sixteen new members have been received into the church.

NORTH AUGUSTA.—The address of Rev. Wm. H. Mills is changed from Manning, S. C. to North Augusta, S. C. Mr. Mills takes charge this week for the Synod of South Carolina of its Evangelistic work in the manufacturing towns of the Horse Creek valley between Aiken and Augusta. Langley and Graniteville are the largest of these and the total population is about 10,000. The Synod has a magnificent opportunity for work in this field.

CHINA.

Extracts from a personal letter from Rev. P. F. Price:

I intended writing you on the work of the committee on Presbyterian Union, which met in Shanghai in the parlor of Rev. G. F. Fitch, President Mission Press, Oct. 22-29. Jas. Graham represented the North Kiangsu Mission, and I the Mid-China. There were representatives of American Presbyterian Church, North, Presbyterian Church of England, Free Church of Scotland, Presbyterian Church of Ireland, Canada Presbyterian Church. The credal basis was a crucial point. Graham and I, and Dr. Noyes and Mr. Garritt of the Northern Presbyterian Mission wanted to see the Confession of Faith the basis, as in Mexico. But the English, Scotch and Irish brethren have started on a different line without a short statement and having the native church to work out their own creed.

What we agreed on was to recommend that each church entering the Union retain its own symbols until the united church agrees on its own formal creed. We declare that we unite on the consensus of belief found in the various symbols, on the question of a declaratory statement embodying that consensus we adopted the Shorter Catechism. It was a hard fight and when we came to that decision in a sub-committee, I felt almost like shouting. The belief is expressed that any future creed will be in essential harmony with the various creeds of the contracting churches. Many other questions of detail were worked out and we came at last to a unanimous decision on the various points.

The report will be printed and I will send you a copy.

The proposed union of Presbyterian Churches is creating widespread interest in all the denominations. What a grand consummation and one General Assembly for all the Presbyterians in this broad land of which there are by our count, about 30,000.

Curious isn't it, that conservatism, both as to attachment to credal standards and in governmental and practical matters, such as standard of church membership, etc., is to be found not in Scotch or Irish, but the American Presbyterian Churches?

The North Presbyterian Church and ours do not report such great numbers as, e. g.: Scotch and Irish, in Manchuria, but both in care of the churches and in standard required for church membership we are much higher, so that 1,000 members in one sphere, and 1,000 in another may tell a very different story.

In comparing indemnity asked for, for property destroyed, by American Board, you compared our Southern Presbyterian Mission saying we did not ask for any indemnity.

That is true, but we never had a dollar's worth of property destroyed. The only question that came before us was remuneration for loss of time, expense of leaving stations, etc.

If there had been property destroyed, I think perhaps the majority of our missions would have voted to receive indemnity from government. However, we didn't, and I am glad of it. This whole indemnity business makes us sick at heart. All, innocent and guilty, are helping pay the price. Conditions of living are growing more and more "bitter." I wonder what the end will be.

I did so enjoy meeting in Shanghai, Jas. Graham, and "Miss Sophie." We seldom meet now, the missionaries are so divided.

SELECTED.

"If I Were a Minister."

By a Layman.

I am not a minister, nor at all likely to become one. God has called me, I believe, to my secular pursuit, and thereby made it as sacred as any pastorate. But if I were not a—what I am, I would rather be a preacher; and the fact that multitudes of laymen make the same admission is proof of the supreme nobility of the preacher's calling, on the principle that the second choice of all the delegates to a political convention is the fittest nominee. I revere the gospel ministry as the loftiest human occupation, and, if I thought that what I am about to write would be held derogatory to that exalted pursuit, and those that follow it, I should lay down my pen with this period.

However, when that pillar fell in Westminster Abbey a year ago, and when certain considerations led London to fear for the foundations of St. Paul's, men were not considered wanting in reverence for their ancient monuments when they raised strict inquiry concerning the causes of such alarms, and demanded an account of those precious charges from those custodians. Indeed, if any one censures my remarks, it will not be the ministers themselves, but their self-appointed apologists. The eagerness of the modern clergy to receive suggestions from the laity has even become a weakness, in some cases arguing less a child-like willingness to learn than a sense of insecurity and insufficiency. I would gladly see our ministers more sturdily independent.

In telling how I would do it if I were a minister, I have not the least confidence that I should live up to my own ideals, if put to the actual test, nor that, even if I were able to do this, I should not fall short in numberless particulars not here set down.

Perhaps it will not be out of place to say that my calling has for years brought me into contact with an exceptionally large number both of ministers and laymen, so that my remarks may claim some basis of experience. Also, I want to say that, though I remain anonymous at the suggestion of the Editor, and doubtless shall push an easier pen because of this anonymity, yet I intend to write nothing I would not stoutly sign, and I hereby permit the Editor to tell who I am whenever he chooses.

The first thing I am moved to say is that, if I were a preacher, I would not preach literature, science, or politics. I would preach religion. Laymen get enough of the newspaper outside the church; they do not want a weekly review from the pulpit. To a minister, with his theological training, the urgent themes of politics, science, and literature, appeal with all the fascination of novelty. He forgets that for his intelligent hearers all this novelty has worn off, while to them the fresh theme is that very theology which has become trite and stale to him. Moreover, that is his citadel, his stronghold. If he discusses the topic of imperialism, dozens of men in the congregation are far better informed than he, and will yawn at his platitudes, deny his statements, and controvert his positions. If he builds a sermon on "Romola," or if his discourse is a veiled treatise on the nebular hypothesis, every high-grade graduate before him will resent such a resurrection of his schooldays. But if he preaches the great doctrines of sin and salvation; if he gets his major inspiration from the Bible, and not from Darwin, Kipling, or the Tribune; if he reaches beyond the times to the eternities,—he will compel attention by the virility of his theme, and fascinate his hearers with its novelty. Rejecting, with David's wisdom, the clumsy armor of a Saul, he will smite with his own proper weapons, and the Goliaths will everywhere fall.

I am well aware that, of the increasing number of clergymen who, to my apprehension, preach politics, literature, and science, there is no one of them all but would indignantly profess to be preaching pure religion. And, indeed, a religious finale is invariably appended to their sermons. But the scientific illustrations overbalance the truths illustrated. The palpable zest is for the struggle with Filippino or Boer, rather than for the combat with that outgrown personage, Beelzebub. We stumble against the religious conclusion of the sermon with just such a shock as we experience in meeting the reference to Dr. Pulver's Purple Pills at the end of that fascinating column in the newspaper.

The ministers that preach thus are eager, I am sure, to be fishers of men, but I am afraid they are using the wrong bait. The laymen that go to church go there, in the main, hungry for spiritual food. If I were a preacher, I should give it to them "straight." I should look into my heart, and, so far as possible, into theirs. I should brood over the sins and temptations, the hopes and fears, the worries and sorrows, the triumphs and the joys, of our common life. I should seek to draw from the supernatural world some mighty inspiration for their labors, solace for their griefs, assurance for their doubts, peace for their turmoil, and enrichment for their joys. I should let all the world help me preach, but only as the glass of the telescope is permitted to focus the light of the stars. It is no guess of mine that the multitude would gladly listen to such preaching, since it has for its model Phillips Brooks, and Spurgeon, and Moody, and McLaren, and all the other great preachers, and Christ himself.

In the second place, I have made up my mind that, if I were to preach, I should not preach the higher criticism. I have no quarrel with some of the higher critics; they are learned and godly men. I do not dispute their theories, except when they are obliged to attribute to the writers of the Bible insincerities and dishonesties that would shock a New York ward politician. Ministers must know the absolute truth about the Scriptures, and must preach in the light of that knowledge.

To preach the higher criticism, however, is like taking a starving man into the kitchen, bidding him note just how a loaf of bread is compounded. Men are hungry for Bible food, and Bible food is not a treatise on the date of Deuteronomy. If, before they mention the possibility of a second Isaiah, ministers would estimate what proportion of their audience has ever read more than two chapters of those sublime writings, they would postpone higher criticism in favor of exposition. What folly to discuss the composite character of the Books of Samuel before a congregation, not ten of whom could give any account, beyond his boyhood, of this second greatest of the ancient Hebrews! If the higher criticism does not undermine the faith of the higher critics, it is because in their case it is only the superstructure of an intimate acquaintance with the Bible. To preach these theories before congregations not thus founded in Bible knowledge, is to lay granite blocks upon the quicksands. If the minister should approach higher criticism as poorly prepared as the average laymen before whom he recklessly presents his critical conclusions, those conclusions would make him as skeptical as they often make the laymen.

In the third place, if I were a minister, I would preach as if I meant it. We laymen yield our hearts very readily to any preacher who is possessed by his subject. I do not mean sawing the air, nor shouting, nor these strained, impressive low tones. It makes no difference to me—nor to most laymen—whether a preacher uses manuscript, or mere notes, or speaks out of his immediate brains, provided he is possessed by his subject. He must be a prophet. The spirit of God must have filled him with a big new thought, and he must be on fire with it. His face will show it, being not an expressionless, immobile compound of cold eyes, stiff mouth, and smooth cheeks, but a countenance beaming with eagerness, and all alert with swift, irresistible changes. His voice will show it,—not impersonal, not keyed on the clerical pitch (which I have always wanted wickedly to find with a tuning-fork, but never quite dared), not over-rich with oratorical artifice, but—well, very much such a voice as a drummer uses when he sets out to sell a bill of goods. And his sermon will show it,—not easily shunted off to this anecdote or that "aside," not cumbered with unnecessary explanations, making clear what was crystalline already; not wasting a word to advocate what his hearers are already agreed to,—but a sermon which in its very first sentence sets out to prove something, and advances in every succeeding sentence steadily toward that proof,—a sermon which burns with conviction, but is sufficiently cool-headed to weave a lawyer's mesh of logic; a sermon which follows the Bible, not like a blinded slave, but like a persuaded disciple; a sermon which is not proclaimed from a bishop's throne, but talked out on a brother's level; a sermon fresh enough to attract, and simple enough to be remembered; a sermon that leaps, not from books, but from life, and so finds issue in new life,—that is the kind of sermon we laymen want.—Sunday School Times.

D., father of the groom and pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Richmond, Kentucky, Mr. John Witherspoon Dodge, of Jacksonville, Florida, and Miss Henrietta Merrell Daniel, of Lewisburg, West Virginia.

Deaths.

"He loves, He cares, He knows.
Nothing this truth can dim;
He gives the very best to those Who leave the choice to Him."

SHIELDS.—Mrs. Anne Shields departed this life on the morning of December the 13th, at her home near Carthage. She was a faithful Presbyterian and loved by all who knew her.

M'LEOD.—Duncan McLeod, Esq., departed this life after a brief illness December the 3rd. He was an elder in the Carthage Presbyterian Church, consistent and faithful in all his duties.

M'LEOD.—Alton, the son of Duncan McLeod, deceased, in the employment of the A. C. L. Railway met an accidental death in the R. R. yards at Florence, S. C., on December 19th. He was a member in good standing of the Carthage Presbyterian Church.

MRS. ANNIE B. BROWN.—The subject of this brief sketch was a woman of no ordinary character. In life, as well as in the hour of death, she impressed all who knew her. She carried in her veins the blood of many generations of noble men and women and her gracious manner and queenly figure told plainly the story of those who had given her being. As the years went by these natural graces and virtues were glorified by the indwelling grace of God until in the closing months of her earthly existence an hour spent with her was like one spent on the threshold of the courts of heaven. As she met life, so she faced death—bravely, humbly, and with power that overcame all things. She was left a widow in 1886 and the varied circumstances of a planter's life were thrust upon her, in addition to the rearing and training of her four children. How well she discharged these duties her acquaintances are glad to testify. Her pastor knew her only during the last few years of her earthly course and intimately, only when incurable disease had fastened upon her. Then as never before, he learned how "heaven begins below." Christ, her Saviour, was as real as her pastor or her physician. She was given a faith that never failed. As quietly and as rationally as one who prepares for a journey in this life, so she spoke of her journey into the world unseen except by faith. There where faith is lost in sight she awaits the coming of those for whom she prayed and upon whom she lavished her love.

Mrs. Brown was married to Mr. Bryan Brown, Dec. 2, 1869 and died August 13, 1902, at her home in Rocky Point, N. C. Pastor.

THE OLD RELIABLE

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure

THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE

JACKSON.—Whereas, it has pleased our Heavenly Father to take from us our friend and brother, J. J. Jackson: And whereas, we, as a session realizing the great loss to our Church, desire to express our sorrow.

Therefore be it resolved,

First, That we bow in humble submission to God's will, knowing that He doeth all things well.

Second, That in the death of Bro. Jackson, Pittsboro Presbyterian Church has lost a faithful, beloved and influential member and the entire community a citizen, who has long aided and sympathized in its growth and best interest.

Third, That we will cherish in loving memory his faithful services to our Church, his pure, noble life and his example as a true patient and faithful Christian.

Fourth, That we rejoice in the hope and firm belief that he has passed from this world of sorrow to that better land of bliss.

Fifth, That we hereby tender our sincere sympathy to the bereaved family.

Sixth, That a page of our minutes be set apart to his memory, and a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Presbyterian Standard for publication.

R. H. Hayes, Clerk of Session, Pittsboro Presbyterian Church.

Vaccinating Bugs.

The science of medicine has reached wonderful perfection. The microbe theory in certain diseases has been proven true beyond doubt. The inoculation of chintz bugs with the microbes of contagious diseases, in order that epidemics may spread among the little pests is a practical method now in use. Dr. D. M. Bye, the eminent specialist for cancer, of Indianapolis, Ind., says that dosing with medicines, cutting with knives or burning with plasters to cure cancer is no longer to be recognized, but that he has discovered a combination of soothing, balmy oils which kill the cancer microbes and cure the most malignant cases. Those who read this will confer a great favor by cutting it out and sending it to a friend who is afflicted. Book sent free, giving particulars and prices of Oils. Address Dr. D. M. Bye Co., Drawer 505, Indianapolis, Ind.

The Household.

A Cheerful Woman a Benediction in Her Home and Community.

In a recent issue of Farm and Fireside we find the following excellent article from the pen of Kentuckienne, an occasional contributor to "Our Social Chat:" "Count that day lost whose low descending sun Views from thy hand no worthy action done."

Some days, when it seems to me as if the whole world and everybody in it was made on the bias, I suddenly encounter one of those cheerful, pleasant women, and then the whole complexion of things seems changed. Ah, what a gift some people have in this direction! Some women cling to their own homes like the honey-suckle over the door; yet like it, fill all the region about with the subtle fragrance of their goodness. They are so richly endowed with all those qualities which conduce to the joy of his or her kind that even the weather and atmospheric changes cannot touch their sunshiny nature. There is an idea prevalent that riches point the surest way to happiness, and mankind clings to that belief despite the practical proofs to the contrary with which they have been furnished.

Happiness depends upon neither wealth nor poverty, but entirely upon the person seeking it, the disposition to accept it, and the capacity for accepting the means placed at their disposal to accomplish the desired end. There is where the true secret lies.

Happiness belongs to no particular family, nor is it ever inherited; but it is within the reach of every individual, and all that is to be done is to cultivate an earnest spirit of contentment and cheerfulness, avoid covetousness and a spirit of deploring one's situation. The happy woman—how we all recognize and feel her presence the moment she crosses our path—she is a living justification of the ways of Providence. She takes troubles as they were meant to be taken, naturally and wholesomely; instead of making her bitter or rebellious, they leave her heart full of sweet compassion for others who have suffered, and her friends instinctively turn to her to get rest, cheer and sunshine.

The cheerful woman, how the heart leaps up to meet her sunshiny face; her heart has learned to look on the bright side from conscientious principles, believing in God, enjoys to the full the good he sends her, and bearing as best she can the evil he permits, whether she understands or not. And now that another day is drawing to its close, the thought of this cheerful woman makes me commune with myself, and ask the question: "What have I done to cheer some lonely heart, to encourage some dependent one, or throw the mantle of charity over some erring one's faults? What have I done today that has made the world brighter for my having lived in it, or the day gladder because I was spared to appropriate its hours?" Day in and day out—there is no to-morrow, and thus we should work to-day. What a pity we do not always act promptly in response to our better natures. It is in the little things, the words we leave unsaid, the things we leave undone, that gives us the heartache when nightfall comes. It's our loved ones that get the bitter, sharp word, oftentimes, and now before it is too late let us commune with our better natures and promise to do better things, to follow the Golden Rule as nearly as we can day after day, and above all, cultivate a cheerful, happy spirit.

The Heavenly Home.

What a home that will be! I suppose none of us has ever had a home that just exactly suited. I have never seen one that would not change if it could be done without any expense or annoyance? I have had the privilege in Europe of looking over many of the famous old palaces, some of which have played a great part in history; the homes where kings were born and lived and feasted and died. But I never saw a palace so splendid but what if I were to move into it, and undertake to make a home of it, I should want to change it a good deal. We are hard to suit in the way of homes. We know that by the way people move about in the city. Every week we see people moving from one house to another. They stop awhile and then move on, leaving the ills they know for those they know not of. But Christ knows exactly what you need. He is the only one who understands all of your little peculiarities, and he will fit your individuality in your heavenly home. How tender those words of promise that as one whom his mother comforteth God will comfort those who trust him. Your fondest dreams shall be more than met in your heavenly home.—Louis Albert Banks.

If the Rev. Dr. Hillis of Brooklyn's Plymouth Church was reported correctly he said during his Thanksgiving sermon: "I sometimes think that the only hope for society is to get all the authors in a corner and shoot them for a generation, till we could assimilate what we already have." It will have to be admitted that Dr. Hillis jokes with difficulty.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Analysis of the Proposed Anti-Saloon Legislation.

Since the first forms of this paper were printed, two bills have been introduced into the North Carolina Legislature for the restriction of the distilleries and saloons. One by Mr. Watts, of Iredell county, which we shall call the Watts Bill. The other by Mr. London, of Chatham, which we shall call the London Bill. Both bills have been published in the daily and weekly press of this State. We attempt here only a brief analysis of the bills themselves.

The Watts Bill contemplates the restriction of both the sale and manufacture of liquor to incorporated towns of no less than 500 inhabitants. The London Bill restricts the sale of liquor to incorporated towns of not less than 500 inhabitants, and its manufacture to incorporated towns of not less than 1,000 inhabitants. The argument for the latter clause is that one or more distilleries might so control the voters of a small town through employes and those interested in the financial advantages of the business, as to debauch the electorate and overcome the moral and decent element of the community.

Both bills make provision for the sale of liquor in drug stores on the prescription of a registered physician for bona fide patients, the prescription to be repeated whenever it is filled. Both bills except from this provision, the manufacture of wine and cider from fruit grown on the lands of the person making it. We regard this as a very reasonable and sane exception. The Watts Bill allows a distiller to purchase fruit from the growers and distill liquor from that. And now the London Bill, while not in conflict with the Watts Bill except in the small particulars mentioned, goes farther in the way of carrying out the provisions of the law and makes two important additions to it. It is a more elaborate bill and has evidently been carefully prepared to meet the various problems arising in the construction of the law.

Now, we are not concerned with any political reasons for abolishing rural distilleries, so long as the measure itself is a good one. We are inclined to agree that a system that builds up a political machine as the distilleries are said to do, is itself an iniquitous one, and it has always been a mystery that whiskey could be sold at $1.00 a gallon after paying a tax of $1.20. But the chief reason for advocating this measure is the fact that our country districts are often left helpless to all the demoralizations that come from the presence of a distillery or a saloon without police protection. We feel confident that this measure, either in the form of the Watts Bill or the London Bill will pass, and this will be a long step forward. Moreover, with the confinement of the saloons to incorporated towns, it will not be possible for them to afflict the towns when they are voted out, by camping in the suburbs.

The London Bill, however, is the one that ought to pass and the one that all the friends of sobriety and temperance in the State ought to advocate. Its provisions, in addition to those enumerated are, first, the securing to every community affected, the right to vote for itself on the question of regulating the traffic. Upon the petition of one-third of the registered voters the Board of County Commissioners shall order an election, though not oftener than once in two years, on two of the following propositions, whether the sale of liquor shall be prohibited entirely, shall be restricted to a dispensary or shall be allowed to saloons. The well known features of the dispensary system are outlined in the bill: closing at sunset, opening at sunrise, the payment of salaries not dependent upon the amount of sales, forbidding the custom of treating or drinking on the premises, and the sale allowed only to those who are sober, have attained their majority, who pay cash for the liquor and register their names and the amount purchased. The details of this law appear to be excellent.

Certainly the right of local determination as to the kind of restriction it wishes to apply to the traffic should be allowed and the county authorities should be allowed to order this election at any time provided one has not been held for two years.

The London Bill further provides that where a community has not voted to have the saloons inside of two years, the saloon-keepers themselves must secure a petition containing a majority of the registered voters, which is to be published, for the establishment or continuance of the saloons, before license can be granted at all.

This is an adaptation of the Mississippi law which has been in successful operation in that State for many years.

Both the London and the Watts Bills require the consent of the county authorities before license can be granted under any circumstances. The Watts Bill proposes that both the town and county commissioners shall vote to grant license. The London Bill declares that "it shall be lawful for the county commissioners to grant license," though not requiring it, after the majority of the voters of the town have declared for the saloon.

Furthermore the London Bill provides against the shipping of liquor by means of the jug-trade from any point in North Carolina into prohibited territory, construing the place of delivery as the place of sale for intoxicating liquor. This will obviate the soliciting of business by firms living just outside of prohibited territory.

We heartily second the call of Mr. J. W. Bailey, who is managing the campaign for the Anti-Saloon forces, and appeal to all the decent and moral people of this Commonwealth to use every possible influence to see that the London Bill becomes law. The people of North Carolina are a moral and God-fearing people. They have been held back for a long time from thorough-going temperance reformation on account of the race issues that have been so constantly injected into politics. That issue has been settled and the responsibility is now upon the white people almost entirely. There is the opportunity also of ridding the state of the greatest curse there is to both races, as represented in the distillery and the saloon.

England and Germany. The public sentiment of Great Britain is not with the government in uniting with Germany to coerce Venezuela. Mr. Kipling has printed a poem which sharply objects to an alliance with those who in the recent straits of England were in open sympathy with her enemies. The lines will undoubtedly cause offense in Germany, for they are very rude, but the poet voices the sentiment of a large proportion of the British population. It is reported that the agreement between the two powers was made first by Emperor William and his uncle, King Edward. This does not tend to make it any more acceptable to the public who jealously insist that the British King must reign, but not rule. Mr. Balfour and his ministers, however, have indulgently made the King's cause their own in this instance. The whole affair is furnishing cartoonists and editorial writers on this side the water, matter for infinite jest.—Nashville Advocate.

The Isthmian Canal. Senator Morgan is renewing his youth in the discussion of the canal question. He insists that something definite must be done before January 28, or else the appropriation under the Spooner act will no longer be available. And he does not vex himself especially at the recalcitrant attitude of Colombia, inasmuch as he has always insisted that the Nicaragua route is preferable. While these lines are penned he is pressing upon the attention of the Senate the advantage of opening negotiations with Nicaragua and Costa Rica, since Colombia will agree to no reasonable arrangement. The American people are not likely soon to forget the devotion to this cause of the venerable Senator from Alabama.—Advocate.

Washington, Jan. 10.—The Board of Construction of the Navy Department has submitted to Secretary Moody its reference that the bid of William Cramp and Sons, for the construction of the cruisers Tennessee and Washington, be accepted. Their bid, which was the lowest submitted, was $4,000,000 for each cruiser, to be completed in 36 and 39 months respectively.

On Thursday night, Robert C. Ogden entertained at dinner a number of Southern teachers and Northern friends of the Southern Educational Alliance. On Friday night a public meeting was held at Carnegie Hall, at which the president of the University of Tennessee and the president of the North Carolina State Normal School told of the educational condition in the South. Both meetings were indicative of the growing interest in the work of the General Education Board, of which William H. Baldwin is president.

A United Effort. As Manager of the campaign for the Temperance Bill, I desire to unite with all opponents of the saloon. So far as possible I am now working with these forces. But I take this means of inviting all the friends of this cause to join with me. I solicit your help in every form. I should like to put your name on my roll of helpers. If you have money, send it. If you have influence I can aid you in directing it. Will send petitions upon application.

Address, J. W. Bailey, Manager.

☞ Raleigh, N. C.

A large hall of the Westminster Palace Hotel was crowded on Tuesday afternoon, when a conference, attended by delegates from all parts of the country, was held on the initiative of the Liberation Society to start a bold campaign for Dis-establishment. Many members of Parliament would have attended, but they were kept at their posts in the House by the sending down of the Education Bill, with the Lords' amendments. Some, however, snatched half an hour during the debate on Sir Charles Dilke's motion to reject the bill in order to voice the sympathy with the movement of the Liberals who have been fighting the bill in the House. Mr. Henry J. Wilson, M. P., who presided, moved the first resolution, recording emphatic condemnation of the Education Bill as a violation of the principles of civil and religious liberty. It further affirmed that a Church established by law is a standing obstacle to the existence of a really national system of education, and the conference resolved to make new and more determined efforts for the dis-establishment of the Episcopal Church. The Rev. Dr. Clifford has been made President of the Liberation Society, and has the support of many prominent men, among whom are Members of Parliament and several clergymen in the Church of England.—Episcopal Recorder.

The Grand Durbar held at Delhi, January 1st, has drawn the attention of the world to India, and what has been accomplished by Lord Curzon during his Viceroyalty. He has created and organized a new frontier province for dealing with the tribes of the northwest; he has shaved down the "Forward Policy" to an inexpensive and efficient system of border police; he has effected a stable rate of exchange in the currency system; he has appointed a commission to lay down a cohesive scheme of irrigation that will decide for the next fifty years the operations of government; he has zealously furthered meanwhile the building of canals and railroads; he has rescued the civil service from the tyranny of the pen by abolishing a large number of reports, and encouraging each member of it to govern in the old patriarchal style; he has confirmed the Pnnjah peasant in the possession of his land by forbidding him to offer it as security to the money-lender; he has almost halved the cost of telegraphic communication between India and England; he has fostered native industries and native arts, and shown the passion of a scholar and archaeologist for the preservation of historical remains.—Harper's Weekly.

The Department of Vertebrate Paleontology of the American Museum of Natural History has come into possession of three specimens of rare interest. The first is the complete skeleton of a small dinosaur, which has been named "the bird catcher," by reason of its apparent ability to run fast and its long, slender, grasping fore limbs. The second specimen is the great Portheus molnssus, secured by Charles H. Sternberg in Kansas in 1900. The fish is 16 feet long, and is one of the most striking specimens of a fossil to be found in any of the world's museums. The third exhibit is a superb pair of tusks of the great Elephas imperator, found last year in Texas. The tusks are 13 1-2 feet in length and about 2 feet in circumference.

Marshall Field & Co. allow no work whatever to be done in their great Chicago stores on Sunday, they publish no advertisements in Sunday newspapers, and all the window shades are kept down on Sunday. Thus the greatest retail business in the world honorably "remembers the Sabbath day, to keep it holy." In all three particulars, the example is worthy of universal imitation, and if generally followed, would be productive of great good.—Dominion Presbyterian.

One of the latest long-distance and high-speed electric railways is that from Seattle to Tacoma, which has recently been completed and put into operation. The power is furnished from the Snonqalmie Falls plant, which is thirty-one miles from Seattle. The line is about thirty-four miles long, and the current is transmitted outside of the cities at 27,500 volts. The motor consists of a combination baggage and passenger car about 42 feet long equipped with motors with an aggregated capacity of 500 horse power, and it is expected to make a speed of a mile a minute.

Owing to the rapidly increasing dimensions of vessels, it has become imperative for the River Clyde to be straightened, deepened, and widened in the vicinity of the various ship-building yards, in order to facilitate the launching of large vessels. The project has been contemplated for some time past, but it will have to be undertaken immediately, as the two new Cunard liners, which are to be the largest vessels afloat, are to be built upon the Clyde, if possible. Construction in the Clyde yards, however, can only be carried out by improving the river, to obtain the necessary launching accommodation.

The House of Delegates in Virginia has passed a law forbidding the employment of children under twelve years of age, and regulates labor between twelve and fourteen years of age, in any factory. Georgia has let this matter go by default; Alabama will take up the question next month.

On December the 27th, the Roumanian Senate, at the request of the Minister of public instruction, agreed that Jews residing in Roumania might be naturalized, and thus acquire the rights of citizens, which have been withheld from them. This is the first fruitage of Secretary Hay's note.

The central purpose of Senator Hoar's Trust Bill is to exclude inter-State and foreign commerce to the industrial combinations known as Trusts, engaged in controlling prices, destroying competition and seeking monopoly. It provides for much greater publicity than was proposed by President Roosevelt, and proposes a punishment of imprisonment for a year, with a fine of $5,000 "to any officer, director or agent," who violates the law in behalf of Trusts.

Venezuela has, it is reported at Washington, complied with all the demands of the European Allies. Minister Bowen will come immediately to Washington, authorized to act for the Government.

During last year, on all the railroads in the United States, 167 persons were killed and 3,586 passengers were injured. On British roads not a single passenger was killed and only 476 were injured.

A bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives, to establish a National Bureau of road construction, the purpose of which shall be to bring about uniform system of taxation for road purposes and the co-operation with any State in the construction of permanent highways.

The Home Circle.

In a Western Parsonage.

The story begins in the East, but it is a story of the West. Jessie Hasbrouck came down to breakfast one morning in early December, and found her mother and her grandmother in excited discussion over a letter bearing a Western postmark.

"The missionary's wife at Rocky Fork, in Idaho, has written, and your grandmother does not know what to make of her letter," explained Jessie's mother.

"Yes," said Madam Hasbrouck, "I never heard of such destitution! The Tripps went from this part of the country. But, Jessie, they have been eighteen years in the field, and now they haven't a thing. Not a thing, from a tack hammer to a shoestring, so far as I can see. Emily Tripp says she doesn't know where to begin or where to leave off. They haven't sheets or pillow slips or towels or underclothing. The father hasn't an overcoat. The mother hasn't a cloak. Priscilla, that's the daughter, hasn't shoes. The little boys have scarcely any clothes. And Emily writes most exasperatingly. She says Priscilla must go to college. The girl might much better learn type-writing!"

The old lady paused for breath. She was a vehement personage, with a kind heart and a sharp tongue.

"How came you to offer help, and why have you the letter?" asked Jessie.

"I am the corresponding secretary of the Ladies' Aid Society. It is customary at certain seasons to send a big box or barrel by express to some missionary family, and I write for particulars, so that we may not work in the dark. Mrs. Tripp is so specific that it is irritating. I'm sure she won't be grateful or appreciative."

"Well, I wouldn't be, either, in her place," said the younger Mrs. Hasbrouck. "The church is not fair to its missionaries on the rough edge of things here in the home land."

She looked at the table, with its solid silver, snowy damask, exquisite china, delicious food. A fire danced on the hearth. Flowers were in the windows. It was a beautiful room.

"No doubt," conceded Madam Hasbrouck, "there is a contrast. The missionaries expect it. But this letter has no reserve. It rubs me the wrong way."

"Poor thing! She wrote in desperation, that is evident." Jessie took up the open letter. "May I read it?" she asked.

"Yes, child, certainly."

The very paper on which the letter was written conveyed a pathetic suggestion of poverty. To the girl the letter was eloquent in what it kept back, as well as in what it revealed. She could not comprehend her grandmother's point of view.

"They must be dreadfully improvident!" exclaimed Madam Hasbrouck.

"I don't think so, mother. You cannot be improvident on nothing, or nearly nothing."

Jessie, who was accustomed to the role of peacemaker, interrupted, "I'd like to do something for Priscilla Tripp."

"Why not?" said her grandmother. "If you have the wish, gratify it. By the way, her mother sent her photograph and her measurements. She is your own age, seventeen; she could wear your clothes. You have plenty to spare."

"But I'd rather send her new ones," said Jessie. "I think she's a girl who would like new ones best."

The photograph showed a young girl with a thin, eager face, large eyes, hair falling in curls on either side and veiling pale cheeks; it was a face that made one sorrowful, for its expression was at once wistful and hopeless. The oldest child of a frontier parsonage, where there was never enough of anything to go around. Priscilla, one could see, had shared her mother's burdens, and tried to share her father's faith, and had held firmly to a single ambition; she must get an education, and be able to lift the load a little from her parents when they grew old, and to give her brothers a start. The whole life-story was told in the photograph for those who had insight. To those who had not, it was merely the picture of a slim girl with a dark, wistful countenance.

Jessie went to school that day, and so did Priscilla by proxy. Her picture represented her. Jessie Hasbrouck was popular, and the president of her class. That afternoon, when the days' work was over, the class held an informal meeting in the Latin recitation room.

"You see, girls," said Jessie, after presenting the case, "it is a little different from making up a box for the settlement. Priscilla is one of our own kind. She wants to be educated. Her parents have prepared her for college, and she is trying for a scholarship. But if she gets it, the difficulty is she has nothing to wear. I want to send her a box with everything one of us would like. And, girls, Christmas is coming!"

"Could she enter college in the winter?" asked one girl, doubtfully.

"Yes, in the February term, if she has the means."

So the girls put their heads together.

Away off in the Idaho home there were many wishes and prayers following in the wake of that letter. The mother had been almost despairing when she sent it, for she had had experience of boxes, and knew how often they were filled with disappointing contributions. She had longed to ask for money—money to buy what she wanted and to free her husband from the shame and distraction of debt, but to that she could not bring herself. She did tell everything else minutely, yet she had strictly excluded every item that was not a real necessity.

The Rev. Jonas Tripp was one of those Christian heroes whose work is done in obscurity, but without complaint and with good cheer. For luxuries and superfluities he cared so little that perhaps he did not know how much his wife and daughter suffered. For the rest, he was thoughtful, brilliant, cheerful and a gentleman.

A fortnight after Priscilla's picture went to school with Jessie Mr. Tripp set off in a lowering, threatening afternoon to visit a sick parishioner. He came back to look in after his goodby and give a caution about the weather. A tempest was brewing. He wrapped a great plaid shawl around his shoulders and plunged away, a big, plodding figure. He always seemed to plunge along.

"Dad is never out of spirits. He is like India rubber," said his daughter.

"Bless his heart, I wish I had his faith! I feel as if I am losing mine in these days." The wife's heart was heavy.

"Mother," said Priscilla, "do you never try to persuade father to give this up and go back to the East? Other men with his talents do well there. Look at his old classmates! Look at almost any educated man who has a chance! There is no chance here. The people are so fearfully poor! It will never be better."

"Yes, dear, but your father accepted this service as a soldier under orders. He would say, if he gave it up, that he was a deserter. I wouldn't mind anything if it were not that I see him wearing out so fast. He is too thinly clad for this climate. And you are so anxious to be at college, and, darling, I cannot give that up for you. Wait till the answer comes to my letter, and we'll see what the church in Vinton sends us."

Priscilla sighed. "It's ungrateful of me, but I'd rather have a straight salary for father than all the alms giving of the rich churches out in the land of plenty. I hate sending our inches, and wearing the cast off, made-over clothes of girls whose parents are not fit to tie your shoes."

"My darling!" exclaimed Mrs. Tripp. "There is no other way. The storm is increasing," she added, after a glance at the window. "I wish your father were safe home."

That wish she was to repeat many times in the next six hours. For the snow came down, white, furious, blinding, a sharp northwestern blizzard. The mother kept the fire burning, and stuffed up the chinks and the loose windows with rags and old quilts. Her little boys and her daughter ate their supper. She could not taste food. Where was her husband? If he would but stay somewhere, anywhere! Her one terror was that he would try to reach home.

But he was occupied with comforting and cheering a soul that was near its end, and when at last death had come, the snow had barricaded the house, and the minister had to stay where he was.

"Parson'll not get home to night," said the nearest neighbor, who had shouldered his way through the drifts to see that all was well in the little home. If there was want, there was also much kindness in the frontier community.

By and by the little boys grew sleepy, and were warmly tucked up in bed. Priscilla and her mother sat up, keeping the stove full of wood, and talking, so that the girl heard more than she had ever been told before of her mother's happy youth in Massachusetts, of her father's college days, and of the high Christian purpose which had led him to this difficult field.

"His life a failure?" said the wife. "Not as God reckons it."

Even as she spoke there was a faint cry borne on the wind. It sounded like the wail of a child.

"It cannot be possible that women or children are out in this blizzard!"

Mrs. Tripp was hurriedly lighting her lantern and wrapping herself up in a blanket, and Priscilla was urging that she might be allowed to go instead. She knew that one of them must make the attempt to save any one lost in the storm.

As she opened the door the cry sounded nearer, although faint, as of one in great weakness. It guided her, and when she had gone only a little way down the road she found a woman, carrying a baby, and almost overcome with exhaustion.

"Mother, mother, this way!" called Priscilla, and before long the three were safe in the house. The wayfaring mother was half frozen, but her baby was warm. They chafed her hands and feet, and Priscilla gave her hot coffee. After a while she lay on the hard lounge and fell asleep.

"A wandering Italian and her child. She looks like a Madonna," said Mrs. Tripp, as she looked on the sweet foreign face, and felt stirring in her own heart the instinct of compassion which all good women feel when they see helpless infancy."

Late the next day Mr. Tripp reached home. The larder was very low, and the two guests whom the storm had sent were two more to feed; but there was still corn meal, and the coffee had not quite given out.

"God will supply all our needs," said the father, undauntedly. "Dear wife," he added, and his face shone, "Henry MacDuff witnessed a good confession. He died trusting in the Lord that his sins were forgiven. I'm sure they were."

Mr. Tripp carefully divided the very last spoonful of porridge, and went smiling to the corner behind the screen which he called his study.

The others were all sitting about in the listless attitude of those who have nothing to do. The Italian baby was creeping on the floor near the stove, and its mother was watching it, when there was a shout at the outside gate. The elder boy ran to see what was the matter.

"A letter," he proclaimed, "a letter for Priscilla!" It was in an unknown hand, the sprawling hand that many girls write. Priscilla waved her thanks to the messenger, and beckoning her mother to come, too, ran behind the screen where her father was, that all might read together. This was the letter:

"My Dear Priscilla: You do not know me, but I know you, and so do lots of the girls here in Vinton, all across the continent. I have your picture. You will soon have mine and those of a half dozen others. We are making bold to send you a Christmas present in a box which cannot fly quite so fast over the long miles as Uncle Sam's mail, so a little bit of our present is in this. We have all had a part in it, and we want you to spend it in the way that will give you the most pleasure. Some of us hope one of these days to meet you, Priscilla, and in the meantime we want to help you in the place where you are now. You are our home missionary, dear, unseen friend. Yours lovingly,

"Jessie, Marjory, Ellen, Harriet, "Frances, Katherine."

In a different hand was written, "Jessie is the one who thought of it, Priscilla."

Folded carefully in a second sheet, in tissue paper, was a check for $100.

Little did those girls in the East, rich girls with large allowances, dream what a god-send this sum was to the starving family. The desert of that Idaho parsonage was transformed into a garden. In a short time there were supplies in abundance, and on the table such dinner as had not been seen for days.

Priscilla read her letter over and over, and between the lines she discerned the delicacy which had tried to save her pride, and the gracious manner which intensified the worth of the gift. Jessie? Who might Jessie be? There was no clue beyond the place whence the letter came, so that nothing could be done except to wait for the box. Vinton was the town to which her mother had written.

But there was another surprise in store. The box arrived, not precisely on Christmas eve, but a few days sooner, and in company with it a barrel packed with such useful and beautiful things as might have gladdened the heart of the most despondent—a suit for the father and a topcoat and boots and a little roll of bills in the vest pocket, a dress and a wrap and hat for the mother, sheets and pillow slips, rose blankets and towels, a complete outfit for each boy, and also for each a pair of skates, a ball and a top. Never had Santa Claus been so bountiful. And there was a message from the ladies of the church, written in such contrition, by Madam Hasbrouck herself, who, she could not tell why, had passed from a spirit of criticism to one of championship, and could not do enough for the Tripps. Madam Hasbrouck wrote approvingly to Mrs. Tripp about her daughter, saying that when the time came for Priscilla to enter college all needed help would be hers for the asking.

But Priscilla's box? It was a marvel of thoughtfulness, the warm, fur-trimmed jacket, the crimson cashmere waist and black skirt, the gray golf suit, the dainty dressing sacks, gloves, stockings and shoes, and the pretty, soft felt hat! Priscilla cried over that box. And when she found Jessie Hasbrouck's card in the pocket of the jacket, she wrote her a letter which Jessie kept, and never showed to any one except her mother. Years later the two girls met and became friends in their womanhood.

The Italian woman and her baby stayed in the little parsonage until the roads were opened, and then went on to find the friends they were going to when the storm caught them at Rocky Fork. They were only two out of many whom the parsonage sheltered in its poverty. It was never to be very rich, yet it had dropped the plummet to the lowest depths on that snowy night.—Margaret E. Sangster, in Youth's Companion.

Mr. Jesse Pradshaw, of Graham, N. C., having a severe attack of fever, which had interfered greatly with his work for nearly or quite a year, had me to order for him ten gallons of Barium Water. The water effected a complete cure, he having had no return of the malady since using the water.

Very truly yours,

Wm P McCorkle,

Now Pastor First Presbyterian Church, Savannah, Ga

Guilford College, N. C. Dec. 20th, 1902.

I have used Barium Rock Springs Water some time. I have Catarrh of the Stomach, and was so bad I had to lay flat of my back for three months. When I got able to travel, I visited every mineral spring of note in Western North Carolina, and I received no benefit until I came back to Barium Springs. I stayed there two months; then came home and used the water two months, and then went to work on my farm and my health continued to get better.

I am a strong advocate for Barium Water—yes, I am a living witness for the good it has done me and what I have seen it do for others. I consider it to be the best water for delicate stomachs. I know of,

Barney's Ox Sense.

By Mary Morrison.

If you think you'll do it, you will, Theodore Parkins; that's all there is to it." Aunt Jane emphasized her remarks by a peremptory flourish of the dishcloth. "Nobody ever goes and does a thing off-hand; it's got to be in their mind first. If you hadn't thought you could get that swarm of bees out of the big basswood, last spring, and save the swarm, you would have found a thousand obstacles in the way that never showed up, being you'd made up your mind to do it. Nobody ever made anything of themselves unless they set out to and I s'pose, too, that nobody ever did any great piece of rascality unless their thoughts led 'em in that direction first. It's a rule that works both ways, I shouldn't wonder," she added reflectively as she wiped the dish pan and turned it over in the sun.

Ted turned away impatiently. He was used to Aunt Jane's lectures. It took something beside thought, up here in Kenosha county, to earn twenty-five dollars. Why, he hadn't seen twenty-five cents in a month. If he ever got a day's work, he had to take store trade for pay, he thought, disgustedly, as he went out to the wood-lot where his thoroughbred short horn steers were grazing. He wouldn't sell Bob and Barney, not if he never went to school.

He let down the bars and whistled shilly on his fingers and listened; then he whistled again, and presently he heard a thrashing through the brush. It was the same call they had learned to obey when as calves they had nibbled cold pancakes out of his fingers. Now they looked almost alarming as they ran toward him, their sharp horns gleaming white in the sunlight, but they stopped quietly beside him to lick at the lump of salt he took from his pocket.

"You'll stay on the place as long as I do, won't you, boys? And that will be as long as you live, I reckon. We have always been chums; we ain't selling out on chums—just yet."

"Haw round, Bob." He put the yoke on Bob's neck and fitted the key into the bow; then he motioned to Barney, who walked obediently up beside his mate while his young master fastened the bow. Then he drove them down to the barn and hitched them up to the lumber wagon. They stood patiently while he went into the house for his coat.

Mother was just putting a wild strawberry turn-over into his dinner pail as a finish to his cold dinner. "You won't be back till night, I suppose," she said. "No, I don't expect to get done much before night. It's rough plowin' amongst the stumps."

"Well, buckwheat fetches a good price most generally." Aunt Jane remarked thriftily. "And it always makes good pancakes, son," added his mother, as Ted went out to the road.

Rank fireweeds grew along the black muck road and sifted little clouds of down with every breeze; straggling black-berry vines, white-blossomed, dotted the thick green undergrowth and here and there a pink wild rose blossomed modestly, but Ted had no appreciative eyes for their commonplace every day beauty. He was pondering the situation of affairs. It was something unusual for him. He wanted twenty-five dollars by the first of September. How he was to get it he had not the slightest idea, but he meant to have it.

"Aunt Jane will figure it out some-way, I s'pose, but I'd rather cipher it out for myself. She'll have enough to do with the work and the milkin', and watchin' out that John don't slight none of the chores if I go out to Uncle Theodore's to school this winter. If—there ain't any if about it. I m a'goin'," he decided, doggedly, as the wagon jolted along over the crossway that ran alongside the big cedar swamp. The grass grew rank and green just over the fence. It was the only piece of woodland fenced in about the country with the exception of their own. There were so many pitfalls and sink-holes, and so many cattle had strayed away and mired there that the men had clubbed together and built a brush hedge around it as a safe guard.

Nathan Dayhoff stood by the road fence as he drove past.

"Hello, Ted! Got your buckwheat in yet?"

"Not quite. I'll sow tomorrow if it don't rain."

"Bet you won't sow tomorrow." Nathan's tones were quizzical.

"Bet you I will." Ted's tones were obstinate.

Nathan laughed tantalizingly. "Don't want to earn twenty-five dollars then I s'pose. Make more money scatterin' a peck o' buckwheat."

"What you drivin' at, anyhow?" "You're doin' the drivin' 'pears to me."

"Oh g'wan. I can't gab here all day." Ted flicked a big Pontiacer fly from Barney's back with his braided whiplash.

"Ever hear tell of my Uncle Ezra? Well, he's come here visitin'. Him and dad have gone out around the country to ask the folks to a loggin' here tomorrow and Uncle Ezra is going to offer twenty-five dollars to the best broke smartest yoke of oxen that can put up three logheaps the neatest and the quickest. I s'pose you calculate yourn's the best broke and the smartest. I know Dan Purdy thinks his'n is and prob'ly there's several more that's just as conceity. Reckon we'll get our patch clogged up pretty spry."

Ted opened his eyes amazingly at such a reckless expenditure of money. "What is he goin' to do that for? He ain't got anything in it has he?"

"Oh money ain't no object with Uncle Ezra. He ain't no slouch with a yoke of cattle, himself; says there ain't one man in fifty knows enough to break a yoke of steers. He used to own some pretty smart cattle himself. Guess he has got an idea there ain't any more such in the country. He's willin' to pay something to find out you see."

Ted nodded. He could understand the pride of ownership in a fine yoke of

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

cattle broke to hand. "What's the time?" he asked.

"One o'clock sharp! But you're goin' to sow buckwheat you know," he called as the wagon jolted on down the road.

Twenty-five dollars! and his steers were the smartest and best broke, except perhaps Dan Purdy's black Galloways, and they were no better. They were heavier, but not so quick motioned and they couldn't obey the word any more quickly. There were no others in the country of whom he need stand in fear. Twenty-five dollars in one afternoon. It seemed like a fortune that had come to him unexpectedly, for he meant to try for it and to win.

Perhaps Dan would not go; he was odd about some things. Maybe his steers were off in the woods; if so it would take a day at least to hunt them up. It was the custom among the farmers in that vicinity to turn their cattle out to feed in the unfenced woodland, after the spring work was over and they sometimes strayed to a considerable distance. Dan had turned his out last year and he had finished putting in his buckwheat over a week ago. If they would only lose themselves for a day or so. Dan didn't need the money so very much; he had a father to take the brunt of things.

It was sundown when he hitched the steers to the wagon and started for home. The mosquitoes rose in a cloud from the rank grass about the big swamp as he bumped over the crossway, whistling cheerily. He usually whistled when he was out alone with the steers; they seemed to like it somehow. Half way across a spring bubbled clear and cold from under an upturned cedar. He generally stopped here for a drink, and sometimes he watered the steers. Now they stopped and waited for him to do so again. He got down and dipping up a pail full set it before Bob, who drank it down in long satisfying gulps. Barney threw up his head and lowed loudly. He was answered immediately by another ox away to the right in the dense verdure of the swamp.

Ted jumped up on a log and peered into the intricate net work of growth. He could hear an occasional crackling of brush and once he caught sight of a dark moving object. He gave a start of surprise.

"Somebody's cattle are in the swamp. I wonder—" He would not voice the question that sprang suddenly into his mind, but he could not resist a feeling of elation. After all, it was none of his business; all he had to do was to attend strictly to his own affairs. "Folks ought to keep track of their cattle."

He dipped up a pail of water for Barney and walked along a few steps. Yes, here was where they had broke in. Such a fence as that was no good anyway; anybody could see it was not fit to turn stock. He hesitated a moment, then he furtively replaced a few saplings that had been pushed off the top and went back to the wagon and drove on, but he did not whistle. Instead he scanned the darkening forest eagerly, but he did not see anything. Only once he heard an ox bawl long and mournfully.

At home he could not bring himself to tell mother and Aunt Jane of his prospects for tomorrow. He only said he had promised Nate Dayhoff to help them log in the afternoon.

He spent the next forenoon in the barn polishing up his old yoke. He had a bright new one but he knew better than to let them wear it. "Old shoes fit best," he said to himself. If any of the neighbors passed he did not see them. After dinner he yoked the steers and threw the log chain over the yoke.

There were several pairs of cattle standing about when he drove into the yard, but Dan Purdy's black Galloways were not among them. He watched each new arrival anxiously, but he did not ask any questions.

The piece of ground had been fitted up in excellent shape. It was burned clear of brush and everything had been cut into handy logging lengths. There were to be four rollers to each team and each team was to make three heaps; that would give them all an equal chance and allow for any extra roughness of ground.

Two teams would operate at one time which would give a better opportunity to contrast their manner of handling logs. Ted stood back with his arm over Barney's neck and watched proceedings.

Sam Whibeck was first in the field with old Duke and Dime. Ted remembered seeing them at logging bees at least eight years ago. It took noise and buckskin lash to get them down to business, but Sam knew how to use both. They were matched against Andrew Thompson's mulleys who were used to being driven with a brad. Ted shivered every time he saw the sharp point thrust cruelly into their flanks followed by drops of bright blood. The dumb cowed look in their great eyes turned him sick. He was glad when Ezra Dayhoff ruled them and their driver off the field.

Lanty Moore took his place. His oxen were common scrubs, but they put up their three heaps in sixty minutes, beating Sam by a good quarter of an hour. Then Bijah Bump and Posy Hale took their places. They finished up in an hour and a quarter and an hour and twenty minutes and were met with shouts of derision.

Then Nate motioned to Ted. "Go on and show 'em some drivin' Ted," he urged eagerly, but Ted shook his head.

"No use waitin' fer Dan; he's hunted all day for Nig and Darky. Something must have happened to them I guess; they never staid away so before," continued Nate.

He watched Ote Higgins and Shorty Rogers take the field, in a dream. He did not notice the cheers that greeted their admirable management; he heard instead the long-drawn plaintive bellow of an ox calling for help. He hooked the log chain over the gate post and slipped unnoticed away. It was only half an hour's walk to the place where he had put up the saplings the night before.

There were no paths through the big swamp except these made by the wild creatures and he jumped from one moss-grown log to another. The bogs shook and trembled beneath his impetuous plunges, but he kept on. Here and there he saw tracks half-filled with miry ooze, leading deeper and deeper into the cool depths where the grass lay in luxuriant swaths, too heavy to stand. A slim dapper blue racer glided swiftly across his path and a spotted water snake slid lazily off a log into the slimy water, but he only gave them passing notice.

Upturned cedars held deep sullen pools under their branching roots any one of which was of sufficient depth to mire an ox; treacherous pitfalls yawned beneath tempting masses of verdure. He came upon a pile of bleached bones. They were all that remained of Dave McBain's only cow. He had pried her out of the slough for the poor pittance of her hide which was all she had to give him. Ted turned his head away from their suggestive ghastliness. He was realizing the existence of several kinds of danger today. Barney had known of one sort; his ox sense had told him to give a warning call, but he, Ted, had been content with putting up the fence. Once he paused to listen and call, "Cusha! Cusha! Cusha!" It was the call Dan had always used. Dan's father had come from New Jersey. Ted had always laughed to hear it; now it came awkwardly from his lips. "Cusha! Cusha! Cusha!"

Away to the right he heard an answering low, and his heart gave a joyous bound.

It was almost sunset when he drove Darky and Nig into old man Purdy's barnyard, covered with mud and slime.

He came out to meet them. "Found em in the big swamp, eh? Well I swan! Never knew 'em to go in that direction before. It's a mercy they didn't mire.

Have to turn out and rig up the old fence a little I guess. Dan? Oh he went over to Dayhoff's a spell ago. Wanted to see your steers haul in the twenty-five dollars. Said he knew Darky and Nig wouldn't stand no show with 'em for speed. He'll be tickled plum to death to think you found 'em and got 'em out safe. Must have took a pile of tackin' and turnin'."

Ted put up the bars and turned away. He hoped the teams would be gone when he got back, but they were all there waiting and the teamsters set up a shout when he entered the gate.

"Come and get your money, Ted. The steers just naturally waltzed right through the figger; never lost a step and won it slick as a whistle. Never knowed a yoke to go to a loggin' bee all by their selves and put up a heap in fifteen minutes by the clock, before; kept it right up too."

Ted looked from one to the other in a dazed way. Were they making sport? Mr. Ezra Dayhoff came up and shook him by the hand.

"I'm proud to know a boy that can break a yoke of steers to work like that," he said. "They tell me you broke them?"

"Yes sir." Ted blushed girlishly. "I never took a better yoke of cattle in hand in my life, and I've handled some pretty handy yokes. Clear cut they are and spry as colts. I see you drive them as I always do, in an ordinary tone of voice. Some folks seem to think an ox is deaf, but mine never seemed to be hard of hearing." He glanced quizzically around the group. "Perhaps I took a liberty in driving them, but the boys all agreed that if they'd work under a strange driver they deserved their good luck, so as you did not come, I took your place. I wouldn't have missed seeing them pull for a good deal."

Ted stammered out his thanks as he took the money. "I'm much obliged to you, sir. Prob'ly they done better for you than they would for me."

"I'd give it all if Nig and Darky could have had a show too. It's just as mean to cheat an ox as 'tis to cheat a boy, but when you've cheated of 'em both it makes a feller feel pretty mean, don't it old boy?" he told Barney when he went to hitch up and Barney put his cold nose to his master's cheek as if he understood.

"And just supposing they had mired, mother," he said after he had relieved his feelings by making a clean breast of the matter. "'Of course I didn't know it was Nig and Darky, but felt dead sure. I don't know what ever made me do it, I never did such a mean trick before,'" he said contritely.

"I told you it would work both ways, Ted, you remember," declared Aunt ane triumphantly. "I s'pose you was wishing you could keep Dan out of it some way and when the chance come, why you just naturally took it, that's all. A body wants to watch what sort of houghts they let into their minds, for thoughts always come first—then deeds."

This opportunity of applying her lecture was too good to be neglected, and for once Ted could only bow a meek acquiescence.—Interior.

Our Little Folks.

CONDUCTED BY MRS. A. J. MCKELWAY

Children's Letters.

Steele Creek, N. C., Dec. 24, 1902.

Dear Standard:

I enclose the answers to the questions asked in December the 17th, in Our Little Folks column.

King Og of Bashan had an iron bedstead. The shortest Psalm is the one hundredth and seventeenth.

I will close with asking the little folks a question: Where is demonstration found in the Bible? John McDowell, Jr.

Age 10.

Belcher, La., Jan. 1, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl eleven years old. I go to school and I am in the fifth grade. Miss Agnes Thompson is my teacher, and I love her dearly. I go to Sunday school every Sunday. Mr. John Glassell is my teacher. Belcher is not a very large place. We had two weeks vacation for Xmas.

I must close for this time.

Your unknown friend,
Novaline Mina Woodbridge.

Micaville, N. C., Dec. 23, 1902.

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl 11 years old. I have a sister and a brother. Their names are Ruby and Earl. Day after tomorrow is Christmas. I have two pet rabbits. Their names are Bunny and Spot; we have a bird, too; his name is Roy. I will answer Helen Cathey's question: Og King of Bashan had an iron bedstead. I will ask a question: Methsela was the "oldest man," How was it that he died before his father?

Your friend,
Ada Clonts.

Sir Lucius and Miss Malaprop.

When I first met Sir Lucius he was in the midst of grave difficulties for so little a fellow. A bad boy had murdered his mother and captured him. The little captive looked so utterly miserable that I paid the ransom placed on his head, put him in my coat pocket and took him home. He was hardly as big as a medium-sized rat, but he took to sweet milk and long naps in the excelsior bed, that was provided for him, so earnestly that results were not long delayed. Every day his little tail grew longer and bushier, and in a couple of months he was as fine a young squirrel as one could wish to see. He was as tame and playful as a kitten, and nothing delighted him so much as to caper after a string as it was moved over the floor.

At first he was on terms of the greatest intimacy with three kittens, but he teased them so incessantly that at last their watchful mother grew tired of it and came near making an end of him. That seemed to spoil his kindly disposition entirely. He had merely played somewhat roughly with the kittens before, now he sought to hurt them whenever a chance occurred. His animosity even extended to the dog, and there again his career came close to an untimely end. But the loss of a section of his tail taught him war, instead of peace, and he took such keen relish in anything that was likely to lead to a duel that it earned him the name of Sir Lucius O'Trigger and lost him his liberty.

A squirrel house was provided and the door closed upon him. This he strongly resented and sulked for a whole day. But the revolving cylinder finally caught his fancy, and going into it he would show an endurance truly wonderful by galloping hour after hour at the top of his speed. Ten o'clock was his hour for recreation, and on the second day of his imprisonment he used it to affect an escape. A great oak grew about thirty feet from his house. He had never paid any particular attention to it before, but as soon as the doors of his prison were opened he jumped out and scampered up it. Coaxing was in vain, and even the argument of a bag of nuts failed to bring him close enough to endanger his liberty. However, when darkness began to fall he found his position in the somber branches of the high tree so novel and weird that he weakened and came down to his house as though this had been his regular habit. Finding the door closed, he scratched and purred vigorously for admission, and when it was granted he seemed perfectly happy.

On the following day he attempted to escape and was promptly recaptured. The incident evidently preyed on his mind all that day, and I do not doubt that the long intervals in his wheeling were spent in thinking out some plan to obviate this latest difficulty. When released the next day he did not even look toward the oak but scampered off in another direction for a few feet, where he began to grub in the ground as though he had just located a buried treasure which must be unearthed without delay. Seeing that for a moment he was not watched, he leaped forward a few feet further, this time in the direction of the tree, and executed another piece of masterly strategy by digging a few vigorous strokes and then pretending that he was eating with great relish some invisible morsel between his paws. These manoeuvres he continued until satisfied that he was near enough to win the race, when he made a bold dash for the tree, where perched upon a limb he fairly chattered with delight over his victory. Thereafter the same performance was a part of the daily programme, and so Sir Lucius came to pass most of his days in the tree.

However, he plainly suffered from solitude, and it was sometimes pitiful to listen to his plaintive little wails that indicated his loneliness. About this time the same boy who had captured Sir Lucius came around with a fine female red squirrel and I bought her, thinking to thereby provide him with a much needed companion. But whether he objected to her complexion, or the color or style of her dress did not appeal to him, I do not know, but certain it is he would have nothing to do with her. He rejected every advance of the little lady, who was inclined to be friendly from the first, and even gave up his bed and slept in the wheel to keep away from her. When she sometimes took a notion to visit him there he always discovered that he had overlooked some important household matter that demanded his immediate attention. He finally found out that if he galloped very fast in his wheel that she could not come into it, and never did a squirrel travel as Sir Lucius in those days. This led to a tragedy. One day she decided to jump for one of the openings in the wheel when it was spinning around at a terrific rate, with the result that her neck was caught between the cylinder and the house and was broken.

Sir Lucius, I am sorry to say, showed not the least compunction for the part he had played in the sad affair, but on the other hand seemed to experience genuine relief. But after the excitement of the tragedy wore off he was even more forlorn than before, and I decided to make one more effort to find him a mate. Sir Lucius was a gray squirrel and I employed the young Ishmaelite from whom I had bought him to procure a female of the same species. His misguided efforts were, as usual, soon successful. The new-comer was a large, stately young lady, but her education had evidently been sadly neglected. There was never so awkward a squirrel, and she was continuously thereafter christened Miss Malaprop. Whether Sir Lucius's early associations had left him somewhat ignorant of the requirements of good form in polite squirrel society or he was possessed of superior powers which enabled him to discover latent virtues in Miss Malaprop is a question, but from the first meeting he was perfectly oblivious to all of her faults. A more beautiful case of love at first sight one could not wish to see. Under a heap of rubbish in one corner of his house he had at odd times buried a choice collection of nuts. These he excavated the day Miss Malaprop arrived, and through his intense hospitality forced her to eat such quantities of them it is a wonder she survived. Then he invited her into his wheel and side by side, keeping step, and, their tails floating in the air, they galloped away on a delightful ride. This was fun, indeed, and the more of it, the better, and without intermission or abatement they kept up the pace until poor little Miss Malaprop grew so tired that she missed her footing and was hurled, all in a heap, around the wheel in the most undignified manner imaginable. No doubt with the vision of that other tragedy in his mind, Sir Lucius hastily stopped the wheel and showed the greatest anxiety until assured that no injuries had resulted from the accident. He then invited her into his house and offered her some more nuts. His bed had been good enough for him, but now he tore it all up, and with infinite labor constructed a big soft nest which, no doubt, would have pleased any squirrel, however fastidious.

On the following day when they were released from the house no effort was made to keep them from the tree, but Sir Lucius could not resist the opportunity to show her what a very clever strategist he really was, so the old trick of approaching the oak while pretending to be intent on other objects was gone through with, even more elaborately than usual, his companion dutifully following his example in digging, wondering, doubtless, what it all meant. They had not been in the oak a great while, when Sir Lucius's companion set up a great chatter which brought him by leaps and bounds from the top of the tree to her side. She had discovered a great knot-hole, which had been lost on his duller perceptions and in which her feminine intuition divined possibilities. After an animated conversation the little lady convinced him of the importance of the discovery if it only had a bottom in it, and he went down to explore. He soon returned with a favorable report, and they both entered. After a while they came out and the way they barked and capered around left no room to doubt their entire satisfaction. It was, indeed, an ideal home, and they at once began the work necessary to put it in order—or rather Sir Lucius did the work, his companion acting in a supervisory capacity. She probably felt she had contributed her share by finding it. For days the labor went on until all of the rotten wood had been cleaned out of the hollow.

Then the work of furnishing the home, and with it Sir Lucius's trouble began. The first article of furniture that he arrived with was the crown of an old straw hat. To this the lady objected, and he reluctantly dropped it. Next he brought forward a stick long enough for a fairly respectable fishing pole, which was also rejected. Nor was his next contribution any more fortunate for even if it had been of any use he could not have possibly taken into the hollow the huge bough that he had spent an hour in cutting off. Then he determined to look for furniture altogether different and he descended the tree. A long time passed and then Sir Lucius appeared, joy beaming from his eyes. He held in his mouth a red and white string over two feet long. The disgust of his companion was palpable. She left the tree, proceeded to their house and returned with a big mouthful of straw. This was the cue he needed, and, hanging his string on a limb, he fell to work with a will, which soon left nothing of the nest in the cage. By this time he was thoroughly aroused, and during the next two days rags, hair, strings and moss went up in sufficient quantities to have filled a dozen hollows as large as their home. Most of this, of course, was rejected by his companion, who finally succeeded in convincing him that they had all they needed. The lady insisted on arranging the furniture. During the process Sir Lucius would very frequently come to his front door, stick his head out, and after surveying the field return to his mate. At last the wonderful home was completed, and Mr. and Mrs. O'Trigger finally gave up their house and came to live in the tree. But the beloved wheel was not forgotten, and for long thereafter they would come down every day for an exhilarating ride in the old vehicle that they had used on their marriage day.

Early the next spring there was joy in the O'Trigger household high up in the tree, for there had arrived two of the most wonderful baby squirrels ever seen. It was hard to tell which one of the parents was the prouder, and all day they brought up the sweetest little berries and acorns that a young squirrel ever tasted. And they barked and frisked and jumped around over the tree at such a great rate that Sir Lucius's old enemy, the dog, was stirred into wonder, if not animosity, and he yelped up at them in the most savage manner imaginable. And when the babies had grown some, they would come to the door of their high home and stick their pretty little heads out and want to know what it was all about anyway.

By and by, when the little O'Triggers had grown some more, their parents brought them down to the ground to show them what a wonderful big world it is. Then they visited the old home, where the babies had a ride in the rolling wheel, and they dined on some sweet peas and on an ear of sugar corn in the garden, and never did two young squirrels have such a good time.

All of this happened some years ago and the babies are long since grown and old, for squirrels. But every spring there are many other babies in that happy family, which now has dozens and dozens of pretty little bright-eyed bushy-tailed members, and not one of them has ever been miserable like the poor little orphan, Sir Lucius, that I bought from that bad boy and brought home in my coat pocket.—The Delineator.

God calls us to duty, and the only right answer is obedience. Undertake the duty, and step by step God will provide the disposition. We can at least obey. Ideal obedience includes the whole will and the whole heart. We cannot begin with that. But we can begin with what we have. God calls. It is better to obey blunderingly than not to obey at all.—George Hodges.

BRICK! BRICK!

A brick is a brick; yes, but what a difference in them. Good clay, good machinery, up-to-date methods, in fact thousands of details, are a necessity to produce the best brick. We have our plant fully equipped for capacity of 5,000,000—not only that, but have a body of the finest river clay ever located in this country. Our plant is on the Catawba river near Fort Mill, S. C., and shipping Station Grattan, S. C.

"A man is a man for a' that," but what a difference in 'em. You require the best lumber for your house; the best coal for your engine; the best flour for your table. One does not buy a common horse when he can get a much better for near the same price. This is true about everything one needs.

In a building nothing is more essential than good material. It adds to the safety and wear, besides 'twill sell for more. Who would not pay more for a building put up out of first quality material than for one thrown together out of common ordinary brick?

Clippings

If this story is true—and it bears the stamp of veracity—it deserves currency as a pleasant example of one method of extinguishing too smart questioners.

A visitor at a Columbia, Mo., school the other day, asked one of the lower grade classes this question: "What is the axis of the earth?"

"An imaginary line passing from one pole to the other, on which the earth revolves," proudly answered a pupil.

"Yes," said the examiner, well pleased, "and could you hang a bonnet on it?"

"Yes, sir."

"Indeed! And what kind of a bonnet?"

"An imaginary bonnet, sir."

The visitor asked no more questions that day.

"How did you come here?" asked the kind old lady with the tract. "Following horses, mum," responded Prisoner 999. "Ah, then you played the races?" "No; dey was hitched to de 'Black Maria.'"—Philadelphia Record.

Event and Comment.

What is the matter with Ireland? Ireland has one saloon for every 188 people, that's what. And the Catholic Church has no objections, that's why.

The evidence is all in proving of the excellence of the London Bill for the regulation of the Liquor Traffic in North Carolina. The Charlotte Observer considers it "pretty rank."

The sum of $18,000,000 was spent last year on Protestant Missions. Even more encouraging than that is the fact that there were 78,000 natives of heathendom at work as missionaries.

The tide has turned in the Southern Church, regarding the supply of ministerial students. We have more than last year. In the mean time the Presbyterian Church of Ireland reports only six new candidates for the ministry, and it has 1,200 congregations.

The most valuable jewel in the world is being prepared for the Pope as a present at his jubilee, an opal weighing four pounds. Considering that the Pope styles himself the Vice-gerent of Christ it is remarkable how much richer the Vice-gerent is than his Master was.

If the short college course men do not take care, President Woodrow Wilson has already laughed them out of court. He said to the Twentieth Century Club in Boston, the other day: "I can't imagine how a man who ever saw a Sophomore can think of graduating one."

The Manila Times prints the photograph of Dr. George F. Pentecost and Archbishop Agilpay in the Thanksgiving Number. They are both free lances who are giving a good deal of trouble to Catholicism. Agilpay is an independent Catholic and Dr. Pentecost an independent Presbyterian.

Madison Square Presbyterian Church, New York, is to be sold to the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company and a new building will be erected at the corner of Madison Avenue and Twenty-fourth Street. We hope that Madison Square Presbyterian Church may continue itself to be a Metropolitan Life Insurance Company.

The people who talk learnedly about the unwisdom of preaching theology should not be judging other people by themselves. President Patton has recently delivered a course of lectures on theology at Pittsburg that were heard with great interest by large audiences, as A. A. Hodge's lectures were heard in Philadelphia, some years ago. It is not everybody who can popularize theology. But not to appreciate it at all is a confession of shallow-mindedness.

Dr. L. W. Munhall, the Don Quixote in the battle with the wind-mills of Higher Criticism, says that Morgan and Meyer have been working in America "not for the purpose of evangelizing the unsaved, but to advertise the Northfield schools and promote their interests." This is the first answer we have received to the question, what Mr. Morgan's mission is. It is easily understood and the work of advertising good institutions is very honorable work.

N. G. Gonzales, editor of the Columbia State, was shot by Lieutenant-Governor Tillman, of South Carolina, on Thursday of last week. The deed was done in broad daylight on the public street. Tillman is said to have been drunk. Gonzales was unarmed and Tillman jumped from a street car to put a pistol to Gonzales' breast. Another part of this paper will give the later news. That such a thing should be possible and the assassin hope to go unwhipped of justice is a sad commentary upon our civilization.

Another inconsolable from Pittsburg Presbytery, lamenting the fact that the Presbytery adopted the Assembly's overture declaring for infant salvation, asks, "Is there anything to hinder two-thirds of the Presbyteries from proclaiming that God must, some time, somehow, save all men?" Nothing, except the small fact that the Presbyteries are composed of Presbyterians, who can generally be trusted to use their minds when they think, though some of them, "sometimes, somehow," forget to do just that.

Fiji was long the name given in ridicule to mission territory by those who decried missionary work. Well, Fiji is no longer missionary territory. The percentage of illiteracy is smaller than in the Catholic countries of Europe. It is now a contributor to Foreign Missions instead of a receiver of aid, and last year its people gave $25,000 to the great cause. The next time anybody says "Fiji," just put on a contemptuous tone yourself and ask him if he knows what he is talking about.

A Russian priest, Father John, of Kronstadt, is a good man. He does not drink, has no other vices characteristic of the Russian priesthood, is an evangelical preacher and is kind to the poor. And it is all so strange to the poor peasants that they have begun to worship him, and will interrupt his service by saying: "Thou art holy," an ascription of praise generally given to God alone. Which shows that the "nominally Christian" world yet requires a heavy accent upon the nominally.

The Episcopal Church has been making great gains in New York City, but it seems that the tide has turned. Last year the increase was only one per cent. The most damaging thing about the Episcopalian statistics according to an Episcopal authority is the decline in infant baptisms. When one remembers how particular Episcopalians generally are about infant baptism, this is a manifestation of the curse of childlessness that rests upon too many homes in the highest social spheres.

The Methodist Church, North, has given a challenge to the other Christian Churches of America that must be met or the consequences fairly faced. It set out to raise a Twentieth Century Fund of Twenty Million Dollars and it has raised it. The Northern Presbyterian Church set out to raise the same sum and it has not raised it yet. The Southern Presbyterian Church set out to raise One Million Dollars. There is time yet. It will not be an adequate reply to make to our critics that the Presbyterians give more from year to year than the Methodists do. That is true. But that is all the more reason for success in this undertaking, for Presbyterianism, North and South. We must put up, or we shall have to shut up.

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

The Denationalization of the South. It should be remembered that the South was a nation a little over a generation ago. It had been growing into a nation for many years, with its own national ideals and principles, with its own type of religion and of civilization. And when the call to arms came, the unity of the new-born nation was notable. For a little over four years this nation lived, the Confederate States of America. And after the death of the nation on the field of battle the states were gradually absorbed into the nation that had conquered, the United States of America.

It would have been unnatural if these states of the conquered nation had not stood together in the sufferings of defeat as they had stood together in the shock of battle. With the states that actually seceded were afterwards counted the three border states of Maryland, Kentucky and Missouri to form the Solid South.

We may mention three influences that kept the South for so long a separate entity in the nation, one political, one social and one religious. In the reconstruction of party lines after the war the South adhered to the party which has been mostly in the minority ever since. It necessarily came about that partisan legislation was also sectional legislation. And such legislation naturally created the resentment that bound the South still more closely together in the effort to check the extortion that has been practised in the name of patriotism. The South is paying now some fifty million dollars a year into the pension fund, of course receiving none of it back as the other sections do. It would be difficult to calculate the drain upon the resources of the agricultural South for the protection of the manufacturing North and West, through the tariff system. The attitude of the party mainly in power since the war has been one of hostility towards the South as represented by the brains and conscience and property of the section. Until recently the speeches of Congressmen and Candidates and even the messages of Presidents were full of the spirit of criticism and meddling interference with things Southern. The South resented all this and stuck together.

The race problem and the fatwittedness of Northern immigrants as to its seriousness compelled the South to draw sharply the social lines that practically ostracised every Northerner who violated the traditions of the people and outraged their sense of propriety; nor did this influence fail also to touch the sphere of politics and control the actions of many in their attitude towards those of a different party.

In religious matters, the same solidarity manifested itself. The sectional lines drawn through the churches in time of war were not at once obliterated at the dawning of peace. Take the Presbyterian Church, for instance, one church up to 1861. The Southern element was not only unceremoniously kicked out of the church in that year, but for years after the war, the Northern branch of the church hurled its anathemas against Southern members and Southern ministers and has never yet had the grace to expunge those unchristian resolutions from its records.

Naturally the Southern Churches preferred to keep to themselves. Let it be remembered then, when the charge of sectionalism is brought against the South, that it had to be solid for the protection of its own interests, and that having some people in it who resented sectional outbreaks against themselves it wrapped itself in the mantle of exclusiveness and agreed that it was sufficient unto itself.

But forty years is a long time, and the men who serve their own generation well fall on sleep because they cannot serve the next. Political animosities are dying out and the sectional animosities that remain are not now comprised within political lines. The social distinctions have taken care of themselves as the people of the North have mingled with those of the South and have come to some appreciation of the difficulty of the task that has been set the South. The business men of the two sections have been especially useful in bringing the two sections together and self-interest has banished the old hatred and suspicion to a large extent. The religious differences will doubtless be the last to be overcome and this is not to the discredit of religion.

For principles, or what men think are principles, in the religious sphere, touch the deepest parts of men's natures. These are the things for which men can die. And where a compromise would appear as a surrender of principle, time is necessary for the reaching of new view-points from which the principles themselves are seen in a new light or some common ground can be discovered on which both sides can stand with honor.

But the lamentable fact is that this isolation of the South for the last forty years has cut it off too much from the life of the world. We were just as good Americans as anybody else, and it is just as easy for a big section to be sectional as for a small one. But in wealth, in government, in literature, in education, the South has not stood for what it really is. For this reason we rejoice in the denationalization of the South that is so evident today and the recognition it is gaining as a great and noble part of our common country.

The question, Who reads a Southern book? is now as foolish as the old question, Who reads an American book? George W. Cable and Thomas Nelson Page, Joel Chandler Harris and Mary Johnston are among the most successful writers of the day and their books are eagerly sought. A North Carolinian, Walter H. Page, was some time ago the successful editor of the Atlantic Monthly and is now the owner as well as editor of one the most successful and readable magazines in the world, The World's Work. Another North Carolinian wrote "The Leopard's Spots," which has passed its hundredth thousand, the criticisms of its crudities being apparently much more severe in the South than in the North. One of the most successful of the religious books of the day has been Dr. Egbert W. Smith's "The Creed of Presbyterians" and we believe that its influence can be traced in the allaying of the popular clamor for revision in the Northern Church. The book with its well arranged quotations from many sources made the impression that after all the old creed had done pretty well. One of our pastors, Dr. J. W. Stagg, in the midst of arduous pastoral duties wrote a little book proving that John Calvin and William Twisse and Jonathan Edwards all believed in the salvation of those dying in infancy, contrary to the generally accepted opinion even among well-informed Presbyterians, and in the face of the most confident assertions and quotations from the enemies of Calvinism. Before the articles suggested by his researches were published, Calvin was one to be apologized for by Northern Presbyterian papers and there was none so poor as to do him reverence. And the book has now been accepted as a demonstration by leading scholars in the North and in Canada, while the abuse of Calvin on all quarters has suddenly ceased. We point out that this service has been done to Presbyterianism by Southern Presbyterians and that these three books by North Carolinians have been published in the last few months. The South is coming into her own and the time is passing when the publication of a book or a periodical at the South is a bar to its general circulation.

Upon the basis of these remarks we submit two suggestions to Southern people. First, believe in your own. We have fallen into the habit of regarding our own things as inferior and imported articles alone as having merit. And yet we know that there was a culture and a standard of education in the South that the war and the convulsions that followed could not destroy. We find our Southern ministers who have gone North filling the most important pulpits, notably in the Episcopal Church, which did not divide on the war issues; and a New York paper recently gave as a reason for this the atmosphere of books and of culture in which the best Southern men had been brought up. Northern ministers come South and we measure them by our own and fail to see the difference that greater opportunity is supposed to give. Their public men come South and in their apparent grasp of public questions and certainly in their gifts of expression they fall far below the Southern standard. We believe that David B. Hill's hopes of the Presidency were really spoiled by his Southern tour and the disappointment felt in him as a speaker as measured by men of merely local fame. Our newspapers are quoted widely at the North and thus their views are communicated by their contemporaries, even if they are not enlarging their subscription lists very much in that direction. A New York newspaper recently said of this paper that it was "easily the best written religious paper that came into its office." It can wait to be the best printed and the best illustrated, if that is so, and those who take Northern religious papers know that it does not compare unfavorably with the best of them. Our colleges give a better education, barring the opportunities that come with abundant scientific equipment, than the overgrown Northern colleges can possibly afford.

And the second suggestion is that we take the best and not the worst as representative of the other section. Those who are stretching out to us the hand of sincere friendship are really in the majority, while those who still hate us and misrepresent us, while their barking makes a great noise and is often very offensive, are a rapidly thinning band.

Any newspaper in the North to-day, religious or secular, that waves the bloody shirt, may be set down as having a little coterie of supporters and no circulation or influence to speak of. The Outlook, which has been notably fair to the South, has over a hundred thousand circulation. The Independent, with perhaps equal ability in its editorial and contributed articles, has nothing like that circulation.

Even in the aggravations of politics we can afford now to be philosophical. Of course it was an outrageous thing for the President to appoint a negro collector of the port of Charleston, against the protest of its citizens who had lavished a wealth of hospitality upon him such as he could hardly have found elsewhere. It was an outrageous tyranny to close the postoffice at Indianola on account of alleged threats against the negro woman who was postmistress there.

But then the President wants another term and the "Southern delegates" at the nominating convention have won a reputation for venality and variableness, while the negro vote is the balance of power in several Northern States. Let us make allowances and consider also that it was really worth the disappointment we have felt in the President to read what the Northern newspapers of the better class have had to say about the whole iniquitous spoils system in its operation in the South.

Even such "rock-ribbed" organs as the Philadelphia Ledger and the New York Tribune have spoken most plainly of the wrong of putting upon the white people of the South officials that are unacceptable and distasteful and whose appointment has no shadow of excuse except the one of political expediency.

It is time that the best in the North and the best in the South were understanding that they are really one. It is time that both sections as represented by their best were considering the welfare of the whole country rather than the interests of the big section that we call the North or the smaller section that we call the South. Let the denationalization of the South go on. We are Americans.

Justifying the Wicked. Good men are all agreed about the sin of slander. That a just man should be condemned is an abomination. That is a proposition to which every one assents. Yet there is a false charity that disregards the converse of the proposition. The Wise Man puts the two together: He that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the just, even they both are an abomination to the Lord.

One of the essential things in civilized society is a standard of righteousness, in actual life. Now when a good man is condemned the minds of people become confused as to what right and wrong actually are and there is no greater calamity that can befall men than that. Precisely the same result is reached when wickedness is justified.

In the one case the actual standard of righteousness is made to appear a reason for condemnation. In the other the ideal standard is degraded. Even they both are an abomination to the Lord.

So it becomes a duty to condemn wickedness whenever it is a duty to say anything about it at all. They are mistaken and may do infinite harm where they mean to do only good, who find excuses for wickedness. Let the truth be told about wrong and wrong-doers. See that condemnation is not misplaced, be sure about the fact of wickedness, but the fact being established, never attempt to justify the wickedness. It is one form of slander, after all, a libel upon righteousness itself, to say that it is like to wickedness.

As the passion for righteousness is a strong and satisfying argument for the truth of the Book that is consumed with it, so the character of Jesus Christ is for us in this age of the world the noblest testimony to his reality and the convincing claim to our homage and love.

Confessedly his was a perfect character. "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" was a challenge, not alone to his generation, but to all human ages, and an unanswered challenge. He is the mystery of godliness, the revelation of goodness. Pilate found no fault in him, Judas declared that innocent blood had been betrayed, and some of the noblest tributes to the perfection of his life have come from men who were his enemies in the after ages, in the sense that they did not believe in him. His friends, his intimates, though sinful men themselves, who do not attempt to cloak their failures, say with the quiet consciousness of truth, "In him was no sin. He was holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners." He is therefore separate from all men who have ever lived, since all save himself are sinners, and no one has ever studied his life and words without feeling that here was something of its own kind, and unapproachable.

Now it is a truism that Jesus Christ is as far above all the great historical characters of the world as the star is above the hills upon which it shines. Is not the same superiority to all the characters of fiction a potent argument that his character was drawn from life?

Here on the one hand are the great literary geniuses who have sent forth the men and women of their own creation into the world to be known of men, to become household words. How is it that none of those characters is a perfect one, even though the writer was not hampered by ought save the limits of his own imagination in the portraiture? The answer is easy enough. Their imagination itself was faulty. The things which were accounted excellencies in the days of Smollett and Fielding would be accounted vices by the soberer judgment of a more enlightened age.

And no man holds a perfect ideal of character in his individual mind, so that that character could be put into the different situations of life and remain true to the highest ideals of other men. As a matter of fact no perfect character has ever been drawn by the writers of fiction.

But here on the other hand are four unlearned and ignorant men who wrote four independent biographies of one man, and they never fall for one moment from the standard of infinite goodness. They wrote in a rude age of the world and they do not make the mistake, once, of limiting their ideal by his age. They know what sin is, confess to it in their own lives, are wonderfully sensitive to its presence in the lives of others. And yet they have given us the picture of the perfect man. And they have made him perfect in all the relations of life, in every spoken word, in every act even in the most trying situations. They have drawn a picture of his death by a disgraceful mode of execution that has moved the world to tears and self-abasement. Unless one would multiply miracles a thousand fold, the simplest explanation is that the character was drawn from life, that these writers had only to tell the truth about him whom they knew, to draw the one perfect man.

And this leads to the consideration, that since by a consensus of testimony from every man who was ever competent to write or speak about Christ, his character was one perfect in all its qualities, why is it that this character does not universally attract men to him? There must be something woefully out of harmony with goodness in the heart of the man who does not respond with adoring love to Incarnate Goodness as he is evidently set forth before us all.

The London Bill.

This able and timely editorial meets with our hearty concurrence.

This bill is reasonable. It is just. It is timely. It is needed. It is representative of the temperance sentiment of North Carolina. It was framed by a committee personally and officially representing the leading Christian bodies in the State.

It is reasonable. Where local option is wise it provides for local option. Where it is not wise, it does not provide for it. The principle of local self-government is preserved. In the unpoliced rural districts and in the smaller towns, it calls for the suppression of the saloon. At the same time making a wise and reasonable concession to the individual berry and grape-grower.

It is just. It calls for local option with the burden of proof on the advocates of the saloon. Heretofore and now we have local option with the burden of proof on the side of temperance. This would be just if there were question of the evil of the saloon, if it were presumable that the saloon is a moral and beneficial institution, or if it were presumable that the majority of the people are immoral. But no one ventures such a presumption. On the other hand, the people of North Carolina are moral people, and they regard the saloon as an evil and a curse, a source of crime and of shame and loss to the State. It is just, therefore, to hold that saloons should nowhere exist save where the majority expressly calls for them.

But how comes it that saloons are now in existence in North Carolina, if the people are moral and recognize them as a curse? It is a good question and worth answering. The saloons exist because the moral forces have never been given a chance at them. The white people in North Carolina have had to stand together for white supremacy, regardless of the saloon question. Now this is no longer so. But have we not had local option for years? Yes, and it is another good question, and worth answering. We have had local option, and by this means and by special legislation the saloon has been suppressed in sixty counties. The other counties, you will observe, are counties in which the ignorant negro vote is larger. This explains the presence of the saloon: It rests upon ignorant negro votes and vicious white votes. But now the negro is eliminated.

The bill is, therefore, timely. The people of North Carolina have waited for this day when they can raise a moral issue freely and when a moral cause will not be jeopardized by a large and ignorant vote. The editor of the Recorder advocated the Amendment in these columns and on the platform, largely on this ground, and the moral forces of the State stood with us. Now the people have won the battle, and they have right to make this issue. Let the men upon whose brows the laurels of the people's victory rest beware how they respond to the people's call for their rights. The Amendment was not an end; it is a means to an end; that end is the rise of North Carolina, aye, the rise of every good cause in North Carolina.

Let it be clearly understood, too, that this bill looks to a fight all along the line—to local option elections in Raleigh, in Wilmington, in Charlotte, in Asheville, in Greensboro, in Durham, in Elizabeth City, in every town and city of 500 population or more in which saloons now exist. These elections will take place before coming July 1, 1903. The bill is, therefore, a call to battle. Let no city or town be lost. We hear from Wilmington, our city of sixty saloons, that the liquor dealers are making ready for their side of the conflict. We have also been told that $50,000 will be spent by the liquor dealers (national and local) to save the State to the saloon. They will fight here in the arena of the General Assembly. Then they will fight in every city and town where their interests are at stake. The moral forces must arouse. They have no easy battle ahead. The saloon is taking its last stand in North Carolina, and it will fight every inch desperately.

If the churches—if the Christian army in this State cannot win, they ought to lay down their arms, throw away their uniforms, release their Captain from their unworthy selves, and go out of business. Never were the ministers, the captains of the moral forces, called upon to prove their loyalty to Christ as they will be the next four months. And the sharper test will be upon them in ten days—is upon them now. For they must hurl the moral sentiment of the people upon the General Assembly now or never.

The bill is representative. It is representative morally. It is also representative of diverse opinions and conditions. For example, it provides for prohibition wherever possible; but where it is not, it makes it possible to establish a dispensary. In this way it gathers the force of the entire anti-saloon sentiment of North Carolina. It will therefore measure the force of that sentiment.

Do we fear the issue? Can we bear the measuring? Surely we can. We are ready for the battle. Let those falter who have a heart for faltering. But let those who have heart for the battle throw themselves into it. The battle will not be won otherwise. Every man must count. Every ounce of influence that you have must be exerted. Every letter that you can write, every word that you can speak, every deed that you can do to carry this bill in the General Assembly, must be done. The saloons have dollars. We have men. We have reason. We have justice. We have right. We have God.

And if we do our duty, we shall have Victory.—Biblical Recorder.

The art of saying appropriate words in a kindly way is one that never goes out of fashion, never ceases to please, and is within the reach of the humblest.—F. W. Faber.

Recollections of a Long Life: An Autobiography, by Theodore Ledyard Cuyler, D. D., LL. D. New York. The Baker and Taylor Company, 33-37 East 17th St., Union Square, North.

Dr. Cuyler has done what we have often wished some of the saints would do. He has given us a message from Beulah Land.

With the long years of his pilgrimage behind him and within sight of the Celestial City, he has sat down under the shade of the trees and told us the story of a life spent in the service of that Master whose yoke is easy and whose burden is light.

Born of Christian parents, he was a child of the Covenant and was, as he says, consecrated to the Christian ministry, by a godly mother, even as Hannah dedicated Samuel.

In his beloved Lafayette Avenue Church he placed a memorial window to the dear mother, representing Hannah and her child Sammel, with the inscription, "As long as he liveth, I have lent him to the Lord."

The author was unusually fortunate in his friendships with distinguished men in his own country and abroad. The chapters "Some Famous People Abroad" and "Some Famous People at Home," are especially interesting and the interviews with Carlyle, Gladstone and many others, told in his own delightful style, give most charming glimpses into the every-day lives of distinguished men and women.

Theological students and pastors will find the book full of helpful suggestions and of inspiration for service. Pastoral work was his passion. He says:

"There is one department of ministerial labor that has had a particular attraction to me and offered me peculiar joy. Pastoral work has always been my passion. It has been my rule to know everybody in this congregation, if possible, and seldom have I allowed a day to pass without a visit to some of your homes."

His estimates of the great preachers who were his contemporaries are just and generous.

Of our own Dr. Palmer he speaks with unbounded admiration. "I do not wonder," he says, "that the people of New Orleans, of all classes and all creeds, regarded him not only with pride, but with an affection that greeted him at every trip through the city of which he was the foremost citizen." In the chapter which he calls "A Retrospect," Dr. Cuyler is at his best. He reviews his life and the life of the church as he has seen it. He gives us his mature judgment as to the methods and agencies of latter-day church work.

He speaks of his personal bereavement in the loss of the little son, the account of whose illness and death is so tenderly told in "The Empty Crib," a book which has found its way into thousands of darkened homes and has ministered to so many stricken ones. He lost a daughter just in her twenties, and then too, he sent out word of comfort and help to others. "comforting others with the comfort wherewith he himself had been comforted of God"

We can not do better than quote his own words in closing. Turing his face away now from the long journey over which he has come, with all of its pleasures and its sorrows, he looks with glorified face toward the light that ever shines from the Celestial City into the Land of Beulah.

"My journey hence to the sun-setting must be brief at the farthest. I only ask to live just as long as God has any work for me to do—and not one moment longer. I do not seek to measure with this hand how high the sun of life may yet be above the horizon; but when it does go down, may my closing eyes behold the bright effulgence of Heaven's blessings upon yonder glorious sanctuary, and its faithful flock. After my long day's work for the Master is over, and this mortal body has been put to sleep in yonder beautiful dormitory of "Greenwood" by the sea, I desire that the inscription that shall be written over my slumbering dust may be, "The Founder of Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church."

Tighten the Buckles.

It is related that a calvary officer, with a small number of followers, was pursued by an enemy who were in large force. He discovered that his saddle-girth<sup>s</sup> was becoming loose; his comrades were urging him on to greater speed; but he dismounted, tightened the loose buckle, and then rode on, amid the shouts of his companions. The broken buckle would have cost him his safety—perhaps his life. His wise delay insured his safety.

This incident suggests several spiritual lessons. A very obvious one is that the Christian who is in such haste to rush off to his business in the morning that he does not spare any time for his Bible or for prayer, is quite likely to "ride for a fall" before sundown. One of the most eminent Christian merchants of New York told me that he never met his family at the breakfast table until he had had a refreshing interview with his God over his Bible and on his knees. His family worship afterwards was not only a tightening of the buckle for himself, but was a gracious means of safety to his household. One of the greatest dangers in these days is that too many children are growing up—even in nominally Christian families—with sadly lax sentiments in many vital directions. They have loose views about God's day and God's Book, and very loose practices as to attendance upon God's worship. They start out in life with a broken buckle, and when the stress of temptation comes, they are easily thrown to the ground. Fathers and mothers owe to their children as well as to themselves the duty of tightening the saddle-girth.

Not only do many families suffer from laxity in parental government, and godly parental training, but I fear that some congregations suffer from laxity in the teachings of their ministers. No church is very likely to rise higher than its own pulpit. If the shepherd of the flock holds loose doctrines; if he is so "liberal" that he gives away, or throws away, vital truths; if he lets down too many bars that the Bible wisely puts up, then it is no wonder that the flock wanders off into the ways of worldliness. There is no danger in these days, of excessive strictness, or of "Puritanical" principles or practices. The danger is just from the opposite direction. Would it not be a wise thing if some pastors, who see that their churches are being overtaken and demoralized by worldly temptations, should call a halt and tighten their buckles?

The incident at the head of this brief article has a very close application to the maintenance of a vigorous, happy and useful Christian life. The very word "religion" is derived from a Latin word that signifies "to bind fast." True religion means the being bound fast to the Lord Jesus Christ in constant dependence on him and obedience to him. How to keep up a healthy spiritual life is the daily problem with every Christian. The parable of the buckle gives a hint. True piety is never self-sustaining. We only can "do all things through Christ that strengtheneth us." Without him nothing; with him everything. Therefore it is that our Bible exhorts us with prodigious emphasis to "pray without ceasing." When we relax in this vitally important duty, the enemies will soon overtake us, and overmatch us, and leave us in the dust. Brethren and sisters, tighten the prayer-buckle.

The Spirit of the Lord.

The spirit of the Lord is upon me,
Because He anointed me to preach good tidings to the poor:

He hath sent me to proclaim release to the captives,
And recovering of sight to the blind,
To set at liberty them that are bruised,
To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord.

—Luke iv. 16-19.

Missionary.

Wanamaker on Missions.

1. While the British government, from India's tax funds, assists India's schools, colleges, and hospitals, I found the largest proportion of humanitarian religious work going on there, traceable to the Christian religion.

2. Of all the Christian missionaries sent out from other lands, that I saw, or by inquiry learned anything about, I discovered only one person who had given up Christ for the ancient Hindu or Mohammedan religion. These old, much revered native religions are not able to win headway with the believers in the gospel of Jesus Christ.

3. By personal contact with the work and workers, I convinced myself that the work of missionaries, clergymen, teachers, doctors, and Christian helpers was healthy, eminently practicable, and well administered.

4. In its business administration it is quite as economically done as any business firm could establish and support business extensions permanently and successfully in lands far distant from home, climate and custom requiring different modes of living. No private business man, in my judgment, can administer from the United States properties and finances in India more effectively for less, as a rule, than the Board is administering them at this time.

5. In all my life I never saw such opportunity for investment of money that anyone sets apart to give to the Christ who gave Himself for us. As I looked at little churches, schools, and hospitals, and inquired the original cost of buildings and expense of administration, I felt a lump of regret in my heart that I had not been wise enough to make these investments myself—yet there are others left. I appropriated some that you cannot have, and wished a hundred times I had known twenty-five years ago what I learned a half year ago; but I can take you to many as good, if you will.—The Advance.

Let Us Pray.

In considering and conducting missions we are mad if we forget to pray; we are fools if we do not make God our trust. Although we have missionaries and converts we can count by the thousands, and agencies that have proven successful and indispensable under the blessings of our Lord, our trust must be in God now, as truly as in the beginning, before there was a convert or the blessed forces of organized work had been set in motion. Christ is our hope, and to Him belongs the kingdom, the power, and the glory.

Foreign missions must be nourished in prayer. God uses agents and agencies, but first and last it is His work, and by His Spirit it must be conducted. The work is too great for the wisdom and power of man. But the plan of our Heavenly Father is to so guide and strengthen us that we can do all things through Him. Let us, therefore, pray without ceasing.

Foreign missions were born of prayer; not the prayer of sentiment, but the prayer of faith which girds itself for work. "Thy kingdom come" means Thy kingdom come in and through me and you, and all who call on the name of the Lord. "God in man, will work out His plan." In 1447 Jonathan Edwards published his "call for extraordinary prayer for the revival of religion and the advancement of Christ's kingdom on earth." A reprint was made of this pamphlet in the latter part of the eighteenth century. In obedience to this call, the Baptist ministers of Northampton, England, "set apart an hour for prayer on the first Monday in each month." Out of this prayer service came forth William Carey, the apostle of modern missions. This man closed his first address to the people with an "appeal for united prayer, and besides, since prayer without suitable effort would be but mockery, the gift of a penny a week was suggested."—Missionary Worker.

Paul's Counsels to the Thessalonians.

II Thess. 5, 14-28. Jan. 25, 1903.

Paul's first Epistle to the Thessalonians was probably written from Athens as in the Epistle itself he refers to being in Athens, when he sent Timothy to them. He was compelled by persecution to leave Thessalonica before he had completed his work. Hence he sends Timothy from Athens to comfort the hearts of the Thessalonians, and to establish them in the Christian faith. For similar reasons, he addresses to them his two Epistles. The passage we are now to consider contains directions relating to man and God, and to good and evil. It also suggests subjects for prayer.

I. Precepts Respecting our Fellows.—We are commanded to "warn them that are unruly." These were disorderly persons, inclined to eat without work or to be busy—bodies in other men's matters stirring up strife or refusing to submit to the laws of Christ. Such were to be warned that they were committing sin and might expect judgments. We are directed to "comfort the feeble minded." The timid and faint-hearted are to be encouraged. We should "support the weak." Those who are spiritually weak and liable to be tempted and to fall should be upheld by words and deeds.

We are urged, "Be patient towards all men." All classes of men, the strong, the upright and the pious, as well as the weak, the guilty and the impious, need at times to have patience exercised towards them. We are required "not to render evil for evil unto any man." This is the kind of retaliation to which the natural man is prone but which the spiritual man must shun, and for which he must substitute returning good for evil.

We are commanded "But ever follow that which is good both among yourselves, and to all men." Christians should ever pursue the good for each other and their fellow-men, as all living things turn towards the light whenever possible.

II. Precepts Relating to God.—The first of these is "Rejoice evermore." Elsewhere it is written, "Rejoice in the Lord alway." We can only rejoice evermore and always when the Lord is our chief source of joy. Then can we say with the virgin mother, "My spirit doth rejoice in God my Saviour." But it is enjoined, "Pray without ceasing." We should ever hold intercourse with our Divine Father, through Christ the mediator and by the help of the Holy Ghost. We should have stated seasons for prayer, should pray under all conditions and like Nehemiah or Stonewall Jackson, mingle prayer with struggle or toil, and with all that we do. Furthermore we are commanded, "In everything give thanks." We are to give thanks unto God for all blessings, for they come from Him and for all Providential dealings because we are assured that they all "work together for our good." Another precept relating to God is "Quench not the spirit." The Divine Spirit in our hearts is a Holy Fire rendering the soul light, warm and increasingly pure. We should not quench His influences by worldliness, wickedness or neglect of the means of grace.

III. Counsels Concerning Good and Evil.—We are directed "Despise not prophesyings." Prophecyings while the Scriptures were being given were utterances in the name of God and by His spirit conveying His will. Now prophesying may denote speaking for God what He has sanctioned in His word. Men may not despise this by neglect or disobedience without guilt and penalty. We are charged, "Prove all things." We are to test all teachings, all characters and all conduct by the standards furnished by the sacred scriptures. We are commanded "Hold fast that which is good."

"The Christ who was cradled amid the cattle, and for whom there was no room in the inn, has made room in every modern state for the child."—O. P. Gifford,

Westminster League.

CONDUCTED BY REV. HUGH W. HOON.

The Sabbath-school first and the young peoples' societies next, have been the training schools from which many an efficient worker has gone to valiant service in the Master's cause.

The Bible does not lack examples of early training in spiritual things. The child Samuel was taken to the temple, there to become skilled in the many forms and ceremonies that were wrapped about the Jewish worship, and from this training became the great high priest of Israel, who, under Jehovah could make and unmake kings. The youthful Timothy knew the Scriptures from childhood. No pomp of ceremonial overhung his young life, but within the quiet walls of a Jewish home, under the loving training of a mother and a grandmother he got the rudiments of that faith that afterwards, under the illuminating words of St. Paul, led him into the true light. And the Saviour himself was not exempt from training in religious matters, for he was found in the temple in his boyhood, according to the custom of the Church. He the great founder of the Church Universal, lived in accordance with the rules of the Church in which he had been reared.

There are but few occupations that are not in need of trained workmen. The more careful the preparation the better the work done. So in the larger work of the Church. When the disciples were called they were ignorant and unskilled, but after three years study under the truest and noblest Model, they were fitted to face the fiercest storm of persecution and to meet undaunted the deadliest of foes that strove to overthrow the power of the new religion. The responsibilities of life come gradually. Few are forced, all at once into trying and difficult places. There are usually steps by which one is led upward towards larger outlooks, and little struggles by which strength is gained for more intense effort. The church may be regarded as a great training school, and now since a place has been found in it for the young people, every effort made by them in ever so slight a way, to further the cause of the kingdom, may be looked upon as a step in that great preparation that will make them later, stalwart workers in the great cause in which the Church will finally win.

Some may ask how such a work can best be carried on, and the answer may be given with emphasis, " whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." There is work for even little hands and no one may safely lay down rules, for duty is such an elastic thing that it changes its shape with every varying circumstance. No one can decide for another what is his duty, but each one knows his own duty, no matter how he may try to evade it. To follow the line of duty is the best possible way of getting in the line of training. The sense of duty will lead one to church; it will make one generous for it will press the claims of the Church upon the conscience, and it will lead one to be consistent. When young people become interested in church work they are much more apt to be loyal to their church than if they stood aloof and let the church work fall on other shoulders. Loyalty involves a good deal. No one is truly loyal who is not willing to give time, service and money to the cause he has chosen, and when training has been given along these lines in after life, a consistent life is not so hard to live.

The proof of allegiance lies in the sincerity of service and it does not matter if there are ten noble talents to be trained or one humble one. When all are used in this grand service they will gain nobility and increase in power.—Natalie H. Snyder, in the Presbyterian Banner.

And we are to become solid in character, and active and skillful in Christian service, not only because we ought for Christ's sake and our own sake, but also because we are in training for larger and better service in the future. When young people cease to be young people they ought to move on out of the young people's society.

Transfigured Moments.

We all have our gray days and our gold-gray days in the physical life, when we wake up in the morning nerveless and inert and mere existence is a burden; golden days when the pulse beats high and the blood courses vigorously through vein and artery. Gray days in the intellectual life when our thoughts are like matches that will not strike, the friction is felt, but there is no fire; golden days, when thoughts like finely drilled soldiers, come when called and array themselves in well marshalled files, ready to do yeoman service. Gray days in the spiritual life, when God, instead of being everywhere and in everything, is nowhere and in nothing; radiant golden days, when every bush is afire with God and the soul leaps exultant to meet its Maker and a thousand voices within call us on and up.

These last are the transfigured moments in the life of the Spirit—moments when the everyday becomes the ideal and the dullest details gleam with the rays from the Sun of Righteousness, as the little particles of dust glisten in the morning light.

What does the Bible seem to teach us in regard to these exalted moments in the life of the soul?

In the olden time they took the form of theophanies—God appearances—seraphic visions, a rapt, glorious dream. It was a transfigured moment in the life of Jacob when he wrestled with the angel at Peniel and extorted from him a blessing. This angel was Christ, and every wrestling with him brings a beatitude to the human soul. This wrestle transformed Jacob from a low trickster into a Prince of Israel. Moses had a transfigured moment when he met his God in the burning bush and another when smitten by the glory of Jehovah on Mount Sinai. One of these radiant moments came to the Apostle Paul when he was caught up into the third heaven and heard unspeakable words which it was not lawful for man to utter.

But the most wonderful of all the transfigured moments recorded in the Bible, were those that smote the enraptured eyes of the saintly seer in his lonely exile on the Isle of Patmos. The disciple that had leaned on the bosom of his Lord on earth saw most of his apocalyptic glory in the City of God.

These moments are not for us, some dejected saint may say; perhaps not in the exact form in which they were vouchsafed to the apostles and prophets of old, but Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, and the spirit's power is felt with even greater fulness now than it was before the pentecostal fires. Hence we, too, should see through the rifts into the bright beyond. We should expect, we should wrestle for these radiant glimpses of the Divine when we pray, when we read God's word with eyes wide open to behold wondrous things from out of his law, when we work in the Master's vineyard, nay more, while we are at the desk, the plough, or in the class-room. Like the wind that bloweth where it listeth we cannot tell how they come. It is certain they will come differently to different Christians, for God never repeats himself. In our Protestant fear of the mystic and unpalpable, we are likely to lose some of the sweetest and subtlest joys of the soul. Dante's highest heaven is assigned to those souls who find their supreme happiness in a serene contemplation of the Divine essence. This is too sublimated a conception for our modern work-a-day world and the Christian Scientists and the Theosophists have done much to discredit all forms of mysticism, and while the revivalists have led us to distrust all forms of spiritual exaltations, because the rebound from them has usually been so violent.

Let us look, therefore, into some of the characteristics of transfigured moments. First, they are rare. For example, in Old Testament, only seven were vouchsafed to Abraham, three to Jacob, and Moses was only a little more favored than Abraham. In the New Testament the same law holds good, even our Saviour, with Divine parsimony, having only a few recorded in his life. And there is a good reason for such sparing manifestations of God's glory. From the very nature of the soul, intense excitement is impossible either for a long time or at frequent intervals. This is equally true of the mental and of the physical life. Few minds, bodies, or souls are capable of severe and prolonged strain. Further, the normal law of Christian life is the law of patient, humble, persistent service. Our Saviour, as soon as he descended from the Mount of Transfiguration, fulfilled the duty of healing the demoniac child. Peter voiced the view of the spiritual rhapsodist when he impulsively bespoke a permanent abiding place on the glory-circled mount.

But it must be remembered that, even though rare, these rapt moments have come into the lives of all of God's saints and they will come into ours.

Oh, we are sunk enough here, God knows!
But not quite so sunk that moments,
Sure though seldom, are denied us;
When the spirit's true endowments
Stand out plainly from its false ones,
And apprise it if pursuing,
Or the right way, or the wrong way,
To its triumph or undoing.

There are flashes struck from midnights,
There are fire-flames noon-days kindle,
Whereby piled-up honors perish,
Whereby swollen ambitions dwindle,
While just this or that poor impulse,
Which for once had play unstified,
Seems the sole work of a life time,
That away the rest have trifled.

Their rarity should not deter us from seeking them, for they are radiant. The white and glistening garments of the glorified Lord on the Mount of Transfiguration, Moses' gleaming countenance when he descended from Mount Sinai, Paul's evident rhapsody, though he does nothing more than mention his vision of the third heaven, and the gorgeous spectacular drama of the Apostle John are a few manifestations of that radiance which comes to all of God's saints who catch glimpses of his glory.

We of course would not confine transfigured moments to supernatural visions or manifestations of such extraordinary character as the above, though it cannot be denied that similar visions have been vouchsafed to God's saints since the Apostolic days and many Christians have heard of well-attested cases in our own time, especially at the death hour, when God's glory smites in the face some saint whose long and lonely life has been slowly unfolding itself with all the placid beauty of the water-lily.

None the less radiant, though perhaps less brilliant, is the spiritual exaltation that comes from a sense of nearness to God and minor attestations of the divine approval. It may be objected that the devout Christian should always be in this frame of mind. This may be true of the sanctified, but very few of us believe in the existence of this class, so long as this muddy vesture of decay doth grossly close us in. The lines and marks of the gout are said to be plainly visible on even the most beautiful butterfly. It is more than hard—it is impossible to whip the offending Adam out of one.

So, for most, the radiance is enhanced by the rarity, but it is as unspeakable as indescribable, as was the vision of Paul, and we feel with Peter that we should love to live forever on this Mount of Transfiguration reared by the soul. But, like Peter, we must descend to life's lowliest duties. In Dr. Taylor's Elijah he tells us that a traveler up above the clouds on the Grand Saterre saw a bird dart through the clouds into the glorious sunlight, carol a joyous song to the sun, and in a few brief moments dart again into the cloud below. So with us, we leave the glorious revival meeting for the kitchen or the counting-house.

Hence transfigured moments are likely to be reactionary.

This is a law of all life. Action and reaction are equal and opposite. Ebb follows flow; valley, mountain; weak heart-beats follow the strong. We laugh at the Irishman who, during a storm at sea, vowed to the Blessed Virgin a taper as high as the mast of his ship and after the storm had abated, presented her with a penny taper. But his case is paralleled by the emotional brother at a revival, who weeps copiously just after a moving sermon and a few days later ignores the collection taken up to defray the evangelist's expenses. A less excitable brother who sits dry-eyed and apparently unmoved, contributes liberally. Right-feeling does not always lead to right-doing, and therein lies the chief danger of false revivals; that is, those worked up from without, in contrast with true revivals which work out from within. In the former, feeling is ever emphasized; doing is ignored or minimized; hence when the feeling subsides as by the law of soul-life it inevitably must, the soul is left dry, its chambers are swept and garnished and seven devils, worse than the one temporarily exercised, enter in and hold high carnival. Hence we sympathize somewhat with the cynical old lady who said of a certain church which had passed through three high-pressure revivals in four years: "If they have another revival in that church they will kill it." We all know something of the right-doing that flows from right-feeling; but might it not be well to reverse sometimes the relation of cause and effect, and find out how much right-feeling can flow from right-doing. Do you cherish hard feelings against anyone? Do him a kindness and try the effect on your feeling. Don't wait either to do something extraordinary for him. A little kindness complete in itself will be enough. It is better always to do ordinary things in an extraordinary way than to attempt extraordinary things and do them in an ordinary way.

We would not be misunderstood as to the value of revivals. If they are genuine, they should bring us many cherished transfigured moments of the soul. But these moments, in their effects on our lives, should be regulative, not permanently reactionary. Every one of us has a normal line of life. With some the line is high, with others, low. If we go above this line at any time, we are so far transfigured; if below, we are disfigured. It was a glorious moment in the life of Elijah when he triumphantly vindicated the ways of God to man on Mount Carmel. Only a short while afterwards, though, he was beating an inglorious retreat before the painted Jezebel's threats and sitting in abject dependency under the juniper tree. The reaction had come. The rebound was great, but God gave him the needed rest, and can we doubt that Elijah's life-line was permanently lifted after his great victory over the priests of Baal?

God-sent transfigured moments in the spiritual life—and all others are spurious—must lift up the life-line. We co-operate with Him, but without Him we can do nothing. He works in us, by us, for us, with us, but in all cases only with our consent. Hence like Paul, we should not be disobedient to the heavenly vision, but follow it insistently, though our old life like his may have to fall down in fragments at our feet.

There are few Mount Carmel struggles in the life of the soul. It is the petty, everyday conflicts that test our powers of spiritual endurance. If our transfigured moments do not hearten and equip us for these, they are of little practical value to us. Kipling tells us in the Jungle Book that what all the wild animals dreaded most was the innumerable swarms of bees in a river gorge. One sting was a comparatively small matter, but the virus from a thousand meant death. The forefront of the hottest battle is preferable to an ambush of sharpshooters. But the ten thousand foes will arise and often in most unexpected quarters and in the guise of pygmy discontents and lilliputian worries. Peace in this life means not absence of conflict but presence of consecration. This comes only by constant contact with God, talking to Him in prayer, letting Him talk to us through the Word, and by constant doing well the God-given daily task, the constant lifting up of our fellows and being lifted up by them. Thus we climb slowly but surely life's mountain road to God till we are caught up from the low levels of the Here to the high attitudes of the Hereafter and reach the sun-smitten summit where the moments are all transfigured and the endless days are gold.

What Constitutes a "Good Library Book?"

If we should call a conference of Sunday-school scholars, and put this question before them, and if we could succeed in getting them to "speak in meeting," what a curious revelation we would have of diverse tastes!

And yet they would unanimously agree on one point, beyond a doubt. They would all say: "A good library book is a book that entertains." Of course the boys and girls would scarcely agree as to what that meant. The boys would mean adventures, hair-breadth escapes, stories of school-boy days, and ball games, while the girls would mean all sorts of experiences in a girl's life—sorrowful as well as pleasing, for most girls do not object to shedding tears over the sorrows of interesting heroines. The spice of romance, and love, soon adds an additional charm for the girl-reader.

Now, the great Apostle Paul, tells us that he "became all things to all men, if happily he might gain some." Let us follow him here, if we really believe that the library is to have its part in the character building of our scholars.

We find that the boys like stories of adventure and the girls like stories of excitement. That both will read fiction when they would not so much as look at the most attractive book of essays. It is idle in this day of fiction writing, and fiction reading either to despise it, or to ignore it.

Our Saviour did not. He used it we believe. Let us follow Him. Ah! there we touch the bottom truth about the use of fiction in the Sunday-school library.

If we use fiction as our Savior did, to point an eternal truth; if we can find fiction that skillfully brings in the beauty and truth of the Christian life; fiction that informs our young people of the growth of God's Kingdom, of the beautiful work that is being done for the evangelization of the nations—such fiction may safely find a place in the Sunday-school Library. Such fiction can be found. There are many excellent books whose merits might be disputed perhaps, by the so-called literary critics, who can not or will not see that there are other ends to be accomplished in the writing of books, than the obtaining of praise for literary excellence, just as there are homely, simple songs that have a work to do for the Master, though they may not please the critics. But there are—and we speak what we do know—many books, ranking as Sunday-school Library books, whose literary merits will compare most favorably with the thousands of so-called "historical novels," and "the novels of today," that are flooding the land and filling the minds and hearts of our young people with evil suggestions, slurs on religion, and altogether false ideas of life, and its aims.

We venture to suggest then, that a "good library book," must be reverent in tone. It must illustrate some truth of God; must show forth the beauty of a life lived for God.

It must show that boys and girls as well as young men and women can witness for Christ. It must be sprightly and natural in tone. It must make smiles and merry laughter, as well as bring tears.

It must not preach. It must not tell that all the good boys and girls die—for thank God! they do not.

It must be a book that when the boy or girl closes it, it will be with regret, with the desire to read it again, and better still, to be like the happy and brave boys and girls and men and women of whom they have read. There are such books—many of them. Let us see that they are in our libraries and read by our young people.

Getting Ready for the Best.

By Faith Somers.

Of one Peter Bell a poet wrote:

"A primrose by the river's brim,
A yellow primrose was to him,
And it was nothing more;"

while of himself the same poet could say,

"To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears."

It is trite saying, "The eye sees that to which it brings the power of seeing," and so true is this that we see it illustrated a hundred times each day. Nor can we lay our limitations in vision altogether at the door of Providence. We see largely, according to the training we have given and are giving ourselves,—the training to see clearly, adequately and with advantage, that which presents itself to us. There are many square pegs in round holes, a fact which we recognize sometimes with rebellious heart and again with submission. What we are too prone to forget is the complementary fact that it is given to us to have somewhat to do with the turning of the lathe which brings these same pegs more into conformity with their appointed niches.

Tennyson puts into the mouth of Ulysses the words,
"I am a part of all that I have met."

In a way this is true. The geranium blooming in my window has assimilated and made a part of itself the constituents of the soil in which I planted it,—in so far as it found its proper food in that soil. Yet, in great part of the soil is rejected, is not soluble, and so does my geranium no good. Many influences go to the making of our characters. Many other influences seem, and perhaps are, lost upon us because they are not soluble in that personality through which our inner selves are reached.

Standing at the portal of this New Year we would pray that we may become a part only of the good which lies along our path,—that the evil may find in us no answering affinity—nothing with which to amalgamate. A few summers back a woman of culture went for the first time to Chautauqua. Out of the fulness of her keen appreciation and enjoyment of the intellectual feast there afforded her, she wrote to a friend at home, "Tell N. and A. to be saving up their money, that they come some time to this wonderful place." One who heard the letter read, said, "And I want to tell N. and A. to get themselves ready for such enjoyment as is Mrs. C's, should the opportunity ever be offered them."

I know a little country girl, not six years old, who recently declared her intention of saving her pennies for "ocean money," adding, "You know I'm going to see the pyramids and the sphinx some day." This same wee damsel is, unwittingly, preparing herself by her interest in pictures and in stories of the Old World for whatever may come to her in the way of foreign travel. We cannot all see the "sphinx," but we can learn its story so far as it is known, can stand as it were, with our ear to its great, calm lips, and listen to what it says of the centuries which have piled the sands of the desert over its stately form. There comes to most of us priceless opportunities for enlargement of vision or for such exquisite enjoyment as is itself a means of culture and growth; but what if we are not ready for these opportunities? We meet a gifted man, we hear a fine lecture, we read a brilliant editorial, we look upon a wonderful picture, and we bring away just what we carried the capacity to receive, no more.

It may be that I am speaking to some young girl whose whole nature responds to what I am saying, but who is tempted to reply, "How can I make myself ready to appreciate what is high and fine, how be ready to get the best from the best, with my limitations?" May I tell you of a young girl who lived for many years shut out from what are called opportunities for culture, save such as she could command in a country home, while her hands were filled with all sorts of domestic labor? She has never made of herself the woman she once hoped to be, but over and over there has come that for which she used to long and for which she tried to be ready. All through those plodding years she did what she could to keep herself in touch with the world of nobler, finer, broader living which lay beyond her limited horizon,—saying within herself, the while,—"I will be of it, though I may never be in it." Especially as she would read of devoted Christian work done, perhaps, in the heart of Africa, perhaps in the slums of London, she would thrill with the thought, "It is my work too, by virtue of my interest in it, my spiritual touch with it." It was her good fortune, once to meet a Syrian physician, a Christian gentleman from Beirut. After a few moments spent in conversation he exclaimed, delightedly, "You have been in Syria! You know our missionaries!" "No," she answered smiling, "I have never been outside my native State." There has never come to this woman anything extraordinary in the way of circumstance or development, yet is she a happier woman today in that she held,—in that she holds to her ambitions.

"What I aspired to be and was not, comforts me." The world—that world in which we would have our inner, real selves to live—is all about us where to choose. We can make ours the great, stimulating, expanding thoughts of intellectual giants. We can stir up our minds by way of remembrance of those who have been nobler than intellectual giants, in that they were spiritual athletes.

Shall we not, then, make this New Year's resolution,—that we will do what in us lies, to be ready for the best which may come to us? Surely our Father's children should neglect no means of growth, should slight nothing which will make us more keenly alive to all the forces he uses in our education.

The sunsets, the mountains, the calm, smooth sweep of the river, the merry dance of the tiny brook, the springing of the grass, the swelling of the leaf-buds in spring, the songs of birds, the clear shining of the stars, all come to us, bringing some message from our Father. Nor do they exhaust his message, for

"The voice that rolls the stars along Spake all the promises."

One of the promises is that His servants shall serve Him. In view of this gracious promise it becomes us to be ready to serve Him with our best, the best we have and the best to which we may attain. It will cost something. It will cost the constant disciplining of our whole natures. It will cost intellectual drudging when we may be tempted to intellectual indulgence, but "neither will I offer burnt-offering unto the Lord my God of that which doth cost me nothing."

When all is done that we can do, there will still be so much that is unattained that we needs must look up and cry.

"So take and use Thy work,
Amend what flaws may lurk,
What strain o' the stuff
What warpings part the aim!
My times be in Thy hand:
Perfect the cup as planned.
Let age approve of youth
And death complete the same."

Two insurance men went into a house a few weeks ago, asking the woman of the house if she would insure her life. She said: "My life is insured." "In what company?" they asked. "The company of the Lord Jesus Christ." "Ah, but you won't have anything at death," said they. "Yes, I shall have everlasting life," said the woman. The men walked out of the house in amazement.

We can get good government only upon condition that we keep true to the principles upon which this nation was founded, and judge each man, not as a part of a class, but upon his individual merits. We are for the upright man, rich or poor.—President Roosevelt.

Chicken and Church Affiliations.

A letter from a friend a few days ago stated that a number of summer boarders had left a summer resort because they had fried chicken three times a day. It happens that not one of these disgruntled boarders is a member of the Methodist Church, and this coincidence has set us to thinking on the relation between church membership and the cooking of chicken.

There are, it will be admitted, certain ways in which the large majority of the members of the various churches prefer the preparation of chicken for the table. Of course there are exceptions, but these only accentuate the general rule.

Take broiled chicken for example. Everyone knows that there is a certain air of distinction about a broiled chicken that does not exist in a chicken that is fried, stewed, or made into a pie. It looks aristocratic, has rich butter over it, and the very sight of the small amount of gravy is appetizing to a delicate and sensitive nostril. Is it a mere accident that the broiled chicken is a favorite with Episcopalians? Somehow the broiled chicken looks best when served on a tray with a snowy napkin; and who can separate the spotless white of the napkin from the white surplice of the minister? We do not enter upon the religious phase of this feeling or of this taste. Should anyone take too much pride in this matter it might be well for him to remember the remark of the vestryman who remonstrated with the old mammy when she got "happy" in an Episcopal Church and shouted. "Why do you make all this noise?" asked the innocent man. "I got 'ligion!" was the happy response. "Well, this is no place to get religion!" said the vestryman. We believe it was old man Carwyle who said to the late Captain White, at Drake's Branch, Va., that he was deeply interested in the Episcopal Church because he understood that it meddled with neither politics nor religion. We do not subscribe to these views; we merely mention them to those who may be inclined to expand their pride like a pouting pigeon.

The attitude of the summer boarders referred to above might be regarded by the Methodists as an affront. Any opposition to chicken fried brown and crisp looks like an intended slap at the grand old Methodist Church. It was a distinguished Methodist preacher who once observed at a conference that a vast number of chickens had entered the Methodist ministry! And we need not add that they entered in the fried state. It would be an interesting study for the scientist to trace the close parallelism between the waving arms and shouting voice of the happy convert at campmeeting, and the flapping wings and triumphant crow of the budding chanticleer. Food is said to have a very close relation to mental—and even moral—attitudes; and it is easy to imagine that the mental attitude of the lusty chanticleer offspring is absorbed in the moral fibre of the person who absorbs the offspring, or to put it plainly, who eats the chicken. And may it not be possible that the process of frying preserves this characteristic of the chicken long enough for it to be transmitted to the one who at meal-time gets on the outside of the chicken! Every true Methodist believes in wings in the future state; and did any one ever hear of a Methodist choir singing,

"Oh, that I had the wings of a dove?"

The inference is too plain to need comment. No dove need apply so long as spring chicken lasts.

The attitude of the Baptists is no less clearly drawn. Stop at the hospitable home of any member of that great denomination and you are sure to be met at the mid-day meal by a large dish of stewed chicken or look with pleasure upon the massive proportions of a chicken pie. And why not? Since the foundation of the Republic, chicken pie has been regarded rightly as one of the outward and visible signs of sturdy independence and democratic simplicity. The man who would turn up his nose at the rich brown crust that conceals the delights hidden beneath, is well worth watching. Napoleon once said, "Scratch a Russian and you will find a Tartar." It might be said with equal truth, "Scratch the man that scorns chicken pie and you will find one who squints toward Monarchy!" Then, too, both stewed chicken and chicken pie require a good deal of water in the cooking; and everyone has noticed that when a hungry man becomes immersed in the appetizing glories of chicken pie, or chicken stewed, and holds a close communion with it for a short while, he becomes completely absorbed by the pie and the pie soon becomes completely absorbed in him.

Harry Tucker tells of a Baptist preacher's wicked son, who was very fond of playing "Seven Up." One night while playing, he heard his father coming. Gathering up the cards quickly he thrust them into a closet, and as luck would have it he shoved them into the pocket of his father's baptismal robe. A day or two later, when a big baptizing was being conducted and the father walked out into the water, an ace floated out of the robe; then a jack followed, and then a two-spot. The old gentleman looked at these cards a moment and then, addressing his son who was on the bank, exclaimed, "Oh, my son, how can I stand this!" The young man shouted back, "Well, pa, if you can't stand on that hand, I don't know what would suit you!" And so it may be said that if a man can't stand stewed chicken and chicken pie he is utterly unworthy of entering the Baptist Church.

And what of the Presbyterian? His taste is wide and deep, yet choice. He believes in education, and he has been educated to enjoy chicken no matter in what way it is served. Should he dine with a Methodist, fried chicken suits him admirably, provided he gets the breast or leg, while he piously leaves to the little Methodist children the saddle, the back or the gizzard. In fact he has been known to leave to his own Presbyterian children these choice bits, including also the neck. The little girl in Farmville, who, when asked one day by a stranger why she was so thin, replied with emphasis, "Cause Papa feeds me on chicken necks; that's hukkum (how come) I so po'," combined much common sense and bitter experience in her answer. It was Willie Eggleston, reared after the strictest sect of Presbyterians on chicken backs and Catechism, who was asked one day when a little fellow on a visit, "Willie, what part of the chicken will you take?" He politely replied, "No choice, thank you," which answer filled every requirement of good manners, but strained truth to the breaking point. "Will the back suit you?" he was asked, and truth was vindicated when he said emphatically, "No, sir!"

The Presbyterian is equally at home in the bosom of a Baptist family, where he soon transfers to his bosom a goodly portion of chicken pie. Possibly this accounts for his genuine pie-ety, for he certainly has it. And he can discuss a broiled chicken with an Episcopalian in most approved fashion. There is no "falling from grace" with him after grace has been said, but a certain falling to—on the chicken. The perseverance of the saints seems to be his as piece after piece disappears, and it may be authoritatively stated that he draws the line at spring chicken only when it is a chicken of the spring of about 1890.—J. D. Eggleston, Jr.

Fuel and Fire for Prayer Meetings.

By Rev. Theodore L. Cuyler, D. D.

Over a large part of our country there has been a serious apprehension of a famine of fuel. To the familiar and stereotyped question, "What shall we get to eat and drink?" has been added the questions "Where shall we find a supply of fuel?" and "How shall we keep our houses warm?" Christian brethren, if the want of physical heat in our dwelling is a calamity, it is equally a calamity to have a famine of spiritual fuel in our prayer rooms. I know of no surer thermometer for the average church than its prayer meeting. Frigidity there pretty certainly indicates a cold and unfruitful church; it is at once the cause and the effect of a spiritual declension. If the appointed place for meeting the Master and for fellowship with each other and for inroking divine blessings is well-nigh deserted; if the prayers offered are only from the throat outward, and without any pith, or point or purpose; if formality chills the tongues and the hearts, then the pastor of such a frigid flock has abundant cause for discouragement and despair. The worst thing of all is that the conduit-pipe of spiritual blessings becomes frozen up.

Wherever a prayer meeting has become cold, formal and lifeless, the first step is to bring in fuel. To those who attend the meeting without any purpose it is a pious sham. It must have a meaning, a definite aim, and Christian people must go there with just as definite an idea of what they are after as brokers have when they go to a stock-board, or voters have when they go to the ballot-box. We never can drift aimlessly into spiritual blessings. "Why am I here to-night? What soul-want have I brought here to be supplied? What thought or word have I brought here as my contribution to this meeting?" These are the questions that every honest Christian ought to ask of himself or herself. The leader ought also to prepare himself for his work as carefully as a minister prepares to preach. Many a prayer meeting is ruined by utter aimlessness on the part of the leader; and the people become just as "scattering" in their remarks or their petitions. One good method of correcting this vice is to select some important practical topic—which may be announced on the previous Sabbath, or be presented by the leader. This tends to directness in speech and prayer; this concentrates the meeting; there is some profitable instruction afforded, as well as a kindling of devotional fervor. The praying and speaking are "at a mark."

Prayer meetings should never be frozen by formality. They are family gatherings; let every one of the household, old or young, male or female, be allowed to bear his or her part. If any one monopolizes too much time, let the pastor or the leader kindly admonish such offender. Absolute freedom should be encouraged—in exhortation, in confession of sin, in asking for prayers, in stating questions of conscience, in personal experiences, and in suggesting lines of Christian effort. Intellect is not so much in demand as heart. Pastors had better not turn devotional meetings into preaching services; they are the people's meetings for their spiritual development and for their direct personal converse with God.

Prayer—and of the right kind—is the main thing in these family gatherings of Christ's household. But as when a family holds a re-union at a Thanksgiving Day dinner each one contributes the fuel of his or her personal experiences and feelings to the warmth of the feast, just in like manner the individual members of the church ought to bring their increment to the interest of the prayer meeting. Much is made in the New Testament of witness-bearing. Those early meetings for social worship which Paul and Peter and John and Silas held, must have been largely occupied with personal testimonies. They testified of the saving grace of Jesus Christ. What a prodigious power there is in the narrative of our actual and deep experience of Christ's goodness and indwelling grace! No skeptic can answer that.

There is a sadly large number of tongue-tied church members. They can talk fast enough elsewhere—in a social company or at the table, or behind a counter in a store or a shop. They can use their tongues when they want to gain a customer, or secure a bargain or a vote. It is only when a good word is to be said for the Master and His cause that their lips are sealed; or if they speak at all, it is too often in a formal and half-hearted fashion. The fuel they bring is only water-soaked wood, or burnt-out cinders.

When a church is under the quickening influences of the Holy Spirit, there is no place that feels the baptism of fire more than the devotional meetings. The "gift of tongues" descends there abundantly. New converts give their testimonies; restored backsliders make penitent confessions; and a single sentence or two, spoken by a new recruit, thrills an assembly more than elaborate sermon. "Come aboard, all hands!" I once heard a young sailor shout out in a revival meeting, "whosoever will, let him come and be saved—captain and mate, cook and cabin-boy!" That nautical paraphrase by the enthusiastic "blue-jacket" gave a fresh idea of the comprehensiveness of the Gospel invitation.

This leads me to say that all the revivals in the churches under my pastoral charge began in the prayer meeting; certainly the first tokens of them appeared there. Let it not be forgotten that as all the coal in the mines of Pennsylvania is of no use until kindled, so all our methods and measures and movements are of no avail without the "power from on high." We may bring in the fuel; but the baptism of fire is from Heaven. The seed of fire is often in one or two, or in half a dozen hearts; then the flame spreads. The most powerful revival my beloved church ever experienced, began in this house I am writing and at a prayer meeting held on a bitter mid-winter evening. When the spark kindles, then we must fan the flame; never despise the day of small things.

Bonfires of pine shavings and tar barrels are sometimes lighted by human hands and make a transient blaze; but "the Lord is not in the fire." Prayers for the Holy Spirit, working with the Holy Spirit, and with the simple desire to honor Christ and save souls is the only sure way to secure the indispensably precious blessing. Bring in the fuel. I beseech the infinitely loving Jesus to kindle the fire. The new year opens with a "week of prayer." Follow it with many weeks of praying, giving, working, and clean honest Christian living. God never broke His promises. Pray without ceasing; labor without ceasing; and above all, quench not the Holy Spirit!

For Intellectual Culture.

I would like to draw the attention of those who are in the habit of reading the Bible to the fact that it is one of the very best means for intellectual culture that can be employed. Whatever may be one's views as to the divine inspiration of the Bible, or whatever one may believe concerning those of its deliverances which seem incredible to such as maintain that they are entitled to the freedom to reject all that is contrary to human reason, it is nevertheless true that the Bible is by far the most intellectual book in all the world. I have read many books, some of them being works of much intellectual strength, of profound reasoning, of brilliant philosophy, but not one of them ever set me to such vigorous thinking as the Bible has. I have been intellectually cultured under the study of works on mental science and various philosophies, but I never received from such studies that fine and strengthening mental culture which has been furnished to me by an absorbing study of the Bible. Take, for example, the book of Job. Now, it matters not a whit what one thinks of the moral and spiritual contents of that book, nor whether it be a veritable history or not. I say that, so far as my present purpose is concerned, it matters not what one's opinion may be respecting those things; the point is, it is a most admirable prose-poem, to be profoundly pondered over for intellectual stimulus and mental culture. As one studies it he will soon have his mind filled with interrogation marks. It is wonderfully suggestive. One gets mental culture, not merely by dwelling on the thoughts which are verbally expressed, but also by the trains of reflection which the words set in motion. It is a starter of thoughts. It awakens the sharpest inquiry. It makes one argue. And one element of value in any strong book is its power to stimulate in the reader the habit of deepest inquiry. One may not agree with all of the positions and statements of a certain book, but if it awakens keenness of thought, if it stimulates the spirit of close inquiry, it is by so much, a useful and worthful book. Hence, as a splendid means of intellectual culture, I urge the reading and close study of the Bible. It is an enduring classic. It contains the profoundest philosophy. Its logic is exceedingly keen and clear-cut. Its poetry is sublime.

The Open Court.

Those Angels and that Hymn.

Dear Standard:

You are a standard in more senses than one. No tall pine of North Carolina ever waved its lofty branches and swung itself to the coming breeze with prouder defiance than does your plume toss itself against the mutterings of discontent with the old and true standards of the faith once delivered to the saints. Therefore it is all the more surprising and may I say amazing to occasionally find you going beyond the limit.

What right, inherent or collateral, have you to pitch into "two classes" or even one class and with a sort of brutum fulmen cut them off absolutely from saying one word about children? Even though we grant that you know all about "crusty bachelors," objective knowledge of course, still in the very last analysis, how do you know that they have not reason and good reason for feeling the same interest in the children that any acknowledged father has? Were they not once children and has the recollective imagination so thoroughly died out that scenes long gone cannot be revived and all their nature feel young again? One of the sweetest poems I ever read was written by an old bachelor whose verses about the children were like honey just pressed from the comb. As to the old maids you seem to give the right hand to the left hand lady and swing round to balance all. But let me tell you that in my early ministry a maiden lady who was as devout a woman as I ever knew get her brain so addled on the subject of infant baptism and so thoroughly persuaded herself that it was not taught in the Bible that she asked for a letter of dismissal and went into the bosom of the Baptist church. She was then past fifty years of age and had been heard to say many times, and sometimes when not exactly in the line of conversation, that she never intended to marry, and she never did.

Oh: though royal and loyal Presbyterian Standard.—"crusty bachelors" and "old maids" are people of like passions with ourselves and they have dreamed in their philosophy as we have lived in ours.

Dr. Benjamin B. Warfield got you into this snap and you went off half cocked. "A very pillow of orthodoxy in the Presbyterian Church of the North." But just now that church does not seem to stand very firmly on its pillows, for in its revision it seems to be walking on stilts. You and Dr. Warfield, or Dr. Warfield and you, put it which way you will, are about ready to discard the hymn book because they will not continue to teach, and have sung, the very silly little piece of doggerel called a Hymn the first verse, or some of which, is:

"I want to be an angel
And with the angels stand;
A crown upon my forehead
And a harp within my hands."

Neither we nor our children can ever be angels in any sense of that word, and it is a terrible wrenching and twisting of the original word to make it read anything like that. Man—humanity—was not made of the substance or likeness of the angels. Jesus Christ did not partake of the nature of an angel when he was born of a woman. The love that sent him into the world and the love with which he redeemed his elect and chosen people was not angel love. John tells us in his first epistle and third chapter that it is a different manner of love which the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the sons of God. To which one of the angels hath he at any time said thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee? The first chapter of Hebrews makes it perfectly clear that he does not class the angels in the family of God, with Christ, as begotten of the Spirit, and it is equally clear that the children of humanity are classed with Christ, as begotten of the Spirit. Where in all scripture do we get any instruction that an angel is to be regenerated, <sup>re</sup>born of the spirit in order to enter the Kingdom of God? To talk about any of the redeemed of Christ, grown people or infants, "crusty bachelors" or the "old maids," with "the mother instinct" ever becoming angels is for the want of a better word—bosh.

Our children in Heaven are to be heirs and joint heirs with Christ to a reserved inheritance upon which the angels can never enter, even by squatter sovereignty. The right of eminent domain, as the joint heirs with Christ, would forever exclude them. To enter that General Assembly and Church of the first born, all children as well as grown people, must have lived in the flesh, died in the faith, been raised up again in the resurrection: for it is the church of the first born, the mediator of the new covenant and the blood of sprinkling made up, not of angels, but of the spirits of the just made perfect. "The innumerable company of angels" mentioned in Hebrews 12:22 is mentioned by way of descriptive contrast to the "spirits of just men made perfect." The angels on the outside are ever hymning the praise of God while the redeemed of the blood of the lamb constitute the church in glory. We want our children in the church triumphant, purchased with the blood of the lamb, and not with the outside angels, who merely hymn the praises of him who never redeemed an angel, but did redeem the heirs of glory, the sons and daughters of human nature.

So much for the facts about the angels and the children. Now about the hymn, so called. Our General Assembly has already in unmistakable action, indicated that we must not have any foot-noting in our Standard. But the very moment the children begin to sing with Dr. Warfield's angels and the Standard's endorsement of his views, there might be a demand for a foot-note to explain just what kind of angels our children would like to be. And there might arise a controversy over that part of our standard called Hymnology as great as was raised over the Homosian and the Homoiosian which had to be finally settled in 325 by the counsel of Nice. And then the next couplet would be occasion for another controversy, whether "the harp within the hand," should be one of those immense tuneful machines which Walter Scott tells us in the "Lay of the last Minstrel" was "carried by an orphan boy," or a plain "Jews Harp" which the little gammins sitting on the curb stone at night touch as lightly, with their little fingers, as if they had studied under a troubadour. The fact is, none of us would like to think that our dead babies were tugging along the streets of the golden city pulling after them the big machine of "the orphan boy;" and it would be equally grating to our feelings to think they were playing the gammin act. No foot-note would ever make it satisfactory to all parties.

But another counsel, greater than that at Nice, would have to be called, the grandiloquent splendor of which would be made up of Sunday-school delegates and representatives from self-constituted lay evangelists and religious tramps and Christian Endeavor delegates, and free lancers in the field ecclesiastical, with two or three shrewd Yankees on the outskirts, and an equal number in the convention, all with an eye to business, selling various kinds of harps as souvenirs of a conclave called to settle the song service of the world. For these conglomerated conclaves never consider of any matter less than the taking of the world.

The conclusion is that it was a wise thing in the committee to leave that hymn out of the hymn-book.

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

As will be seen in the Personal and World items, the editor has been absent for several days. This may account for there being no rejoinder to Titus Tudor; otherwise, the public might think the Standard is keeping its New Year resolution and that Texas Gentleman might plume himself unduly.

We have to acknowledge en masse rather than individually, the generous contributions to this week's issue. The genial face on the cover needs no introduction other than the name. Dr. Cuyler has been for years a most valued friend of our paper. In respecting the wishes of the author of Transfigured Moments, we withhold even the initials, but the modesty indicated only adds to the strength and beauty of the article.

The story of Julia H. Rice should have been credited to The Church Standard.

Rev. E. W. Smith, D. D., has been conducting protracted services in the First Church, Greensboro, N. C., of which he is pastor.

Rev. A. J. McKelway filled the pulpit of the First Church, Wilmington, N. C., on last Sunday, in the absence of the Pastor, Dr. Wells.

Rev. J. F. Preston has presented the Forward Movement to Westminster Church, Greensboro, Rev. C. E. Hodgkin, pastor, and secured a most gratifying contribution.

Changed addresses:

Rev. C. B. Ratchford, from Cross Hill, S. C., to Kirksville, Ky.

Rev. Charles Friend from Buchanan, Va., to Georgel, Wise County, Va.

Rev J. R. Millard from Chester, S. C., to Stevenson. Mr. Millard will take charge of Bethel and Lebanon churches in Bethel Presbytery.

Rev. G. A. Grillbortzer from Ludiauala, to Heathman, Miss. In view of recent newspaper reports, this need not mean a change of work.

ALABAMA.

SELMA.—First Church—The Week of Prayer was held in this church as preparatory to the Communion. On Tuesday the Rev. G. W. Patterson, D. D., of the First Church of Montgomery, came to the assistance of the Pastor and dispensed the work, closing on Sunday night.

His preaching was greatly enjoyed, being rich in spiritual truth, clothed in chaste and striking words, and delivered with earnestness and unction.

In spite of disagreeable weather, the congregations, afternoon and night, were good.

The results of the meeting were especially helpful to Christians. On Sunday four were added on profession of their faith in Jesus Christ. A beautiful sight was seen on Sunday morning, a mother presenting herself for baptism, and then bringing her children and dedicating them to the Lord.

There are others who will join the church who were prevented by sickness.

There have been 43 added to this church since April and a number of others are ready to come in.

At a meeting of North Alabama Presbytery Jan. 13, 1903 a call to the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church of Memphis was accepted by Rev. A. B. Curry, D. D., the pastoral relation between him and the First Presbyterian Church of Birmingham was dissolved, and he was granted a certificate of dismission to Memphis Presbytery. Rev. E. M. Craig of Bessemer was elected chairman of the Home Missions Committee of North Alabama Presbytery.

VIRGINIA.

MANCHESTER.—The Manchester Church began the new year under favorable auspices. Recently a piano has been added to the Sunday-school room. On the first Sabbath there were five added to the Sunday-school, and four additions to the church. The pastor was the recipient of forty dollars as a Christmas present, which shows interest, life and generosity. The Rev. J. E. Cook conducted the prayer meeting last Wednesday evening, to the pleasure of pastor and people.

MASSANUTTON.—A very pleasant social was held at the maase, under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid Society of Massanutton Church, Rev. G. L. Brown, pastor, on Wednesday, the 7th inst., from 5 to 9 p. m. The attendance was large, an elegant supper was provided, and the larder well replenished with good things. Old and young, male and female, were present, and all united in making the occasion enjoyable. Such a gathering of the members together promotes good fellowship, and cheers both pastor and people.

G. L. Brown.

NEWPORT NEWS.—There were seventeen additions to the First Church of Newport News, Rev. E. T. Wellford, pastor, January 11th—nine on profession and eight by certificate.

PETERSBURG.—Notwithstanding the inclement weather last Lord's Day, our churches were well attended. In the morning Rev. J. S. Foster and Rev. W. McC. White occupied their respective pulpits, and Mr. Sevier preached at Old Street. At night the usual services were held at all the churches, Rev. Harry Pratt preaching a special sermon before A. P. Hill Camp, C. V., when there was a large congregation present. The singing on this occasion, under the direction of Hon. William B. McIlwaine, was notably good. Mr. McIlwaine is doing a fine work at Old Street, and is greatly beloved by that people. He is also superintendent of the Sunday-school.

At the Second Church Sunday-school, on the first Sunday in the New Year, in spite of the disagreeable weather, every officer and teacher was present but one, and on last Sunday 115 were present, with every officer and teacher in place. In addition to the Prince George work at Gregory Memorial Church, Mr. George W. Jones, of the diaconate of the Second Church, is teaching a class at the Bank Street engine house, and is meeting with good success. These firemen, who are so situated as to be denied the privileges of the sanctuary, are taking very kindly to this move, and Mr. Jones is held in high esteem by them.

Mr. Lynch, of the Seminary, was promptly on hand, and went down to Prince George to preach last Sabbath. Mr. Lynch, in addition to preaching, is a fine singer, and his musical qualities have been highly appreciated and enjoyed by our people.—Central Presbytery.

RICHMOND.—The Rev. S. R. Gammon, of the Mission in southern Brazil, spent last Sunday at Union Seminary, Richmond. He preached in the morning at the Church of the Covenant for Dr. Stewart, and at night in the Chapel of the Seminary. Mr. Gammon will be in Alexandria next Sunday, and after a few days at Fredericksburg, will return to Union Seminary, on January 23rd, for a week's stay, the guest of Mrs. A. R. Jamison. Miss Charlotte Kemper, of the same Mission, will be the guest of Mrs. James P. Smith the same week.—Central Presbyterian.

Roanoke's Semi-Centennial.

In making arrangements for the celebration of the Semi-Centennial of Roanoke College, June 9th-11th, 1903, the Faculty and the committees in charge wish to obtain the present address and occupation of every former student of the College. As efforts already made to secure this information have not been wholly successful, appeal is now made to the public, through the courtesy of the press, for aid in completing the register of students. While many addresses are lacking for almost every year, the register is especially incomplete for the period of the Civil War, during which no catalogues of the students were published. Any persons who are able to aid in this matter, will confer a favor by sending information to Prof. W. A. Smith, Secretary of the Faculty, Salem, Va.

NORTH CAROLINA.

WINSTON.—First Church.—At the January communion, the pastor announced the names of twenty persons, recently received into the church membership; seventeen by letter, two by profession of faith, and one by restoration.

ASHPOLE CHURCH.—This little band of twelve is making earnest effort to erect a church building to cost about $600 and of this amount $200 is not in sight. Any contributions sent to J. B. Brown, Esq., Ashpole, will be gratefully received and acknowledged.

CLARKTON.—The Clarkton Military Academy, under the oversight of Wilmington Presbytery, is making unusual progress. The buildings, on which $5,000 has been expended, were begun in June; the school opened in September and 100 pupils have been enrolled, four counties and two states being represented in the student body. Prof. R. C. Deal, a Davidson College man, is principal and he is assisted by Prof. J. J. Hutson and Misses Bessie Black and Estelle Timberlake. Mrs. Maggie Pearsall, formerly with James Sprunt Institute, is matron.

The building is attractive in design; it has an auditorium that will seat 400.

BETHESDA CHURCH.—As a result of the meeting recently held in this church, conducted by Rev. Wm. Black, there were twenty-five professions of faith in Christ. Thirteen have united with the church. A number of others who were kept away the closing Sunday, by the extremely inclement weather, will join very soon. A collection of $65.20 was made for the Synod's Mission work.

SARDIS CHURCH.—On the first Sabbath of December Messrs. J. M. Hodges and J. M. Davis were ordained and installed Elders, and W. M. Walker was ordained and installed deacon in Sardis Church.

Presbyterian High School.

We had the pleasure recently of visiting the Presbyterian High School, which is controlled by Wilmington Presbytery, located at Faison, N. C. This school under the capable management of an able faculty, composed of Prof. E. V. Carr, S. E. Hodges and Miss Winifred Faison, has achieved wonderful success. This school opened last September and now has a total enrollment of one hundred and thirty-five. It is an institution of which the citizens of Duplin and adjoining counties may be justly proud as it is doing much for the educational development of the whole section surrounding it, and its influence will have a telling effect on Presbyterianism in Eastern North Carolina. We have on roll nine members: contributed during the year, $27.50.

Fannie Reid Mackay, Sec.

The annual report of the Andrew Watson Missionary Society to the session of the Summerville Church for the year, ending Dec. 31, 1902. This is our first report, though the Society was organized in 1899. This Society has contributed each year of its existence, $2.40

Mrs. J. H. Withers, Sec.

The Ladies' Clothing Society reports: This Society was organized 1900, and assumed the expense of clothing an orphan at the Presbyterian Orphans' Home. We have the pleasure of reporting to the session of the Summerville Church that our usual annual contribution of $15 has been forwarded to Mr. Boyd.

The report of the Willing Workers: This Society was organized Jan. 26th, 1902 with 27 members. Condition of membership, "Penny a week." Amount sent Mr. Boyd from Jan., 1902, to Jan., 1903, $27.55. Amount in Treasury, one cent.

Willie McArtau, Treas.

A Christmas gift by Willing Workers, $4.68.

Fannie Reid Mackay, Pres.

Ruth Withers, Sec.

The Young People of the Church: Report, we have forwarded to Mr. Boyd as a Thanksgiving offering, a box and $15. Total contribution, $92.13.

BARIUM SPRINGS.—Our new farmer has just moved in. It is very desirable that a greater success be made at gardening, trucking and dairying this year, than ever before. Not only that vegetables be provided our tables in season and out of season, but that our boys may be taught correctly how to raise vegetables and can them.

We are now enjoying the fruits of our industry last summer in the tomatoes raised on our own truck farm and canned by our boys and girls.

It is our purpose to do a great deal more this year than last in canning, if we are successful in raising more vegetables than we need for table use.

Are there not of the fertilizer companies or dealers those who would like to contribute to the success of the Orphans' Home farm by enriching it with donations of commercial fertilizers?

In regard to the dairy question, six good cows are needed, or the money to buy them. With milk and butter of our own raising for the tables, no complaint could ever be made of a lack of nourishing food for our orphans.

In making their own vegetables, milk and butter, our orphans are in a way learning to contribute to their own support, which is a healthy sentiment to encourage.

The bread earned by "the sweat of the brow" is wonderfully sweet to many of your wards at the Orphans' Home.

R. W. Boyd.

DAVIDSON.—Mrs. Dr. J. B. Shearer, who has been in failing health for some months past, was stricken with pneumonia a few days ago and died suddenly from heart failure yesterday morning (15th) before the disease had fully developed. The news of her death comes as a great sorrow to a wide circle of friends in this and other States. Few women leading the quiet, domestic life that she led have left behind a record of so many deeds of kindness, charity and true affection. Her life was literally a benediction to the poor and forgotten and indeed to all who felt the need of sympathy and of help in any form that she could bestow. She was full of good deeds, and her heart overflowed with feeling for all who were bearing burdens that seemed heavy. In her home at the South-Western University, in Tennessee, and in these last fourteen years at Davidson, her influence has been potent for good in the college and elsewhere, and many will gladly rise to call her blessed. Her death is mourned by this entire community, for a beautiful light has been extinguished and a sweet spirit has winged its flight to the fair world above. Our hearts go out in deep sympathy and in earnest prayer for the bereaved husband, who with her had reached his three-score and ten. Had they both lived till next September they would have celebrated their golden wedding. Through nearly a full half century the wife has been his faithful, constant, affectionate companion, whose love he valued above words, whose counsel he felt always to be wise, and whose advice he might safely follow.

In his benevolences, Mrs. Shearer had a conspicuous part and the handsome Biblical Hall on the campus, dedicated a year before her death to her memory, is a fitting tribute of affection, the marble tablet at the entrance to the building bearing the beautiful inscription "The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her."

A suspension of college exercises, a rarely beautiful gift of flowers by the students, and others by the faculty and by the ladies in the college homes and from other friends, class resolutions and the spontaneous pouring out at the funeral of a large concourse of people, a number of them from neighboring points, testified to the esteem and love in which this devoted and noble Christian woman was held.

The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Drs. Graham, Jas. Wharey and Howerton, the latter paying a beautiful and at the same time simple tribute to the character of the deceased, whom he has known with affectionate regard since his college days, twenty or more years ago. C. R. H.

CHARLOTTE.—Tenth Avenue Church—There were four additions to this Church on last Sunday. The pastor informs us that there have been additions to this church, either by letter or profession, every Sunday since the new church was opened. The Sunday-school has almost doubled in membership and the whole church has taken on new life.

The old church building will not be sold, but will be used as a school house, reading room, etc. There are forty pupils in our night school.

Home Mission Work.

The Synodical Home Mission Committee of the Synod of North Carolina, convened in the parlor of the Central Hotel, Charlotte, N. C., on the 16th inst., and was in session for several hours. The following named members were present: Rev. E. E. Gillespie, chairman; Rev. H. G. Hill, D. D., Maxton; Rev. A. D. McClure, D. D., Wilmington; Rev. William Black, Davidson; Rev. W. D. Morton, D. D., Rocky Mount; Rev. G. T. Thompson, Charlotte; Capt. A. G. Brenizer, Charlotte; Mr. J. R. Young, Raleigh, and Mr. J. G. Hall, Hickory.

The most important business before the committee was the report of the ad interim committee appointed by the General Assembly, in session at Little Rock, Ark., in May, 1901. The committee was to take into consideration the whole matter of Home Mission work in order to devise a more efficient plan of action and report to the next Assembly the result of its labors. The Assembly at Jackson, Miss., rejected the report and referred it back to the ad interim committee for revision. After a thorough discussion of the report it was revised and adopted by the Synodical Committee as below:

1. The General Assembly's executive committee of Home Missions shall be composed of the secretary and one representative from each Synod, the chairman of Synodical Home Missions, where there is one, together with two business men, residents of the city where the committee has its main office.

2. The cause shall be known as "Home Missions," and shall include all departments of the work as conducted by the General Assembly, Synod and Presbytery.

3. Subscriptions and collections shall be taken in all the churches for this cause in such manner as the Presbyteries, Synods or General Assembly may direct.

4. As heretofore, the months of January, February, June, August and September are designated as the months when this cause shall be presented and the offerings taken.

5. The executive committee shall hold one regular meeting at the office of the Assembly's secretary on the second Tuesday of December of each year, at which all appropriations for the ordinary Home Mission work of the year beginning April 1st next, thereafter, shall be made and any Presbytery is at liberty to apply for aid.

6. A quorum shall consist of a majority of the whole committee.

7. The Assembly at the time of the election of said committee, shall designate seven of the members as a sub-committee, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, who shall meet monthly at the secretary's office to issue all such business as may be committed to it by the executive committee. Said sub-committee shall also hold such special meetings as may be called by the secretary.

The report as adopted will be sent up to the Assembly's ad interim committee, which convenes in Nashville, Tenn., the first Tuesday of February, as a recommendation for its consideration.

A re-distribution of the general evangelist's time among the Presbyteries was made as follows: Asheville Presbytery four weeks, Albemarle Presbytery nine weeks, Concord Presbytery seven weeks, Fayetteville Presbytery five weeks, King's Mountain Presbytery six weeks, Mecklenburg Presbytery four weeks, Orange Presbytery six weeks and Wilmington Presbytery six weeks.

Rev. William Black, the general evangelist, was granted permission to spend one month in work without the bounds of the Synod during which time his salary is to cease.

The Synodical Mission work of the State was found to be in excellent condition. More workers are greatly needed to meet the pressing demands of the growing and encouraging work and four additional evangelists will be placed in the field as soon as they can be secured.

VIRGINIA

PORTSMOUTH.—Since last quarterly communion, Oct. 10, 1902, there have been twenty-three additions, to the First Presbyterian Church, thirteen of the number on profession of faith.

TENNESSEE

Home Missions in Farthest East Tennessee.

To speak of Home Missions in farthest East Tennessee, from a Southern Presbyterian stand point, is to bring into review the conditions and work of Holston Presbytery, hence the prime purpose of this article is to show the needs and possibilities of the work in this Presbytery. Holston Presbytery includes all of Tennessee east of a line running from Cumberland Gap on the North, to the Southeast corner of Blount county on the North Carolina line. Within this territory, there are 14 counties with a population of 255,127. The Presbytery of Holston has, within this area, included in her bounds, 36 organized churches with a membership of 2,624. These churches are distributed in 10 counties, leaving counties in this Presbytery without a Southern Presbyterian Church. Some of the counties in which churches are located have but one each and others only two, while the remaining counties have from three to nine each. Of the organized churches in this Presbytery, there are ten that receive no preaching at all, because of the fact that they are too remote to be grouped, at present, with any other church or churches that can maintain regular services.

At the present time there are three self-sustaining groups, in the Presbytery, that are vacant, and all of them inviting fields, affording great opportunities for usefulness to faithful and consecrated preachers. There is no section of our beloved Southland that should appeal more strongly to Southern Presbyterian preachers, than East Tennessee. With its majestic mountains, its beautiful rivers, its fertile valleys, and its rich stores of mineral wealth, this is a land in which every prospect pleases the natural eye. With a noble, generous and hospitable people, whose ancestors were mostly of the Covenanter stock, many of whom were conspicuous for the part they played in making the history of this nation, it is but reasonable to suppose that this would be a congenial clime for Presbyterianism. All honor to our sister church of the North, for the work she has done in this section. By means of churches, schools, colleges, and evangelistic effort, backed by generous help from the church and individuals in the North, she is doing a great and good work here. But this is naturally the territory of the Southern Church, and to her, and her consecrated sons and daughters do the alarming destitutions and encouraging possibilities of this section of our beloved Zion, cry aloud for sympathy, support and service. Now these facts are presented with the hope that they may be read by some brother who is "willing to endure hardness as a good soldier of Christ," and who might be attracted to this Presbytery, either by the needs and possibilities of our work here, or by the salubrious climate, which is to be found in these beautiful mountains of East Tennessee. The undersigned would be glad to correspond with any one in regard to Home Missions in farthest East Tennessee.

J. M. Clark.

Chairman Home Missions Committee, Holston Presbytery, Morristown, Tenn.

MISSISSIPPI.

MERIDIAN PRESBYTERY.—Dr. W. C. Lindsay, D. D. will leave our Presbytery and join the Presbytery of "Suwanee." We give him up with regret. He has been a good Presbyter, taking interest in our work.

In leaving, he sends us a New Year's gift of a handsome map of our Presbytery carefully drawn by his skillful hand.

Rev. W. O. Stephen asked that the clerk be authorized to give a letter of dismissal to him, should he call for it.

A. B. Coit.

North Mississippi Presbyterian College.

At a recent meeting of the stockholders of the North Mississippi Presbyterian College, the subscription to increase the capital stock of this college to the amount of $15,000 was completed. The entire amount pledged by this city to the Synod of Mississippi for the location of the Synodical female college has now been raised. The entire capital stock as paid in or subscribed by the citizens of Holly Springs now amounts to $30,000. The president, Rev. T. W. Raymond, has been in correspondence with some of the members of Synod in other parts of the State, and they have almost unanimously endorsed the plan of the board of trustees to secure throughout Mississippi and West Tennessee $15,000 subscriptions to stock in addition to the $30,000 raised by the city. The college is now making a safe profit on the business of each session, and the Synodical control not only makes the institution permanent, but largely increases the assurance of its business success. The stockholders, who will be scattered widely over the territory of the churches in control, will become interested supporters of the institution. Those who invest in the stock will have the satisfaction of building up for their own church one of the finest colleges in the South, and besides may have a well nigh certain assurance of fair dividends on their stock. The business of each session now yields a net profit of from 6 per cent to 7 1-2 per cent, and under the present plan the profits on a larger business must be greater. It is not the purpose of the promoters of this enterprise to make large profits, but to allow stockholders a fair interest on their investment, and to use the balance of the earnings in enlargement and improvement of the plant.

This plan has received the endorsement of Synod and is nothing more than an application of the soundest and safest business methods to the administration of the Synodical College. The Synod has pledged itself to undertake to raise $40,000 as a scholarship endowment fund, the interest on which is to be expended in the education of worthy young ladies at this college.

TEXAS

LAREDO.—Mr. Elias Trevino, one of the Mexican licentiates of Western Texas Presbytery and I, went to Corpus Christi on December 26, to assist the Mexican congregation in their Christmas celebration and to hold services for a week in our new church, completed in December. The Christmas exercises were largely attended and made a good impression. The services had a good beginning, in that differences among the members were reconciled, but had to be discontinued because of unfavorable weather without other visible results. On New Year's day we returned to Laredo where we began a meeting on Sunday, 4th inst. From the first service the church has been filled. A consecration service was held, at which all the Christians in a solemn and earnest manner rededicated their lives to Christ. Last night (Thursday) twenty or more manifested interest and asked for special prayer. Tonight seven responded to an invitation to accept Christ unreservedly as their Savior. The weather has been ideal, the congregations large and the interest, great from the beginning, is steadily increasing. The meeting will probably continue through next week.

R. D. Campbell.

AUSTIN.—Dr. Smoot commenced a meeting in his church on the 1st day of January, which closed yesterday. He was assisted by the Professors in the Theological Seminary and the Elders in his own church. As a result of the meeting there were twelve additions to the church.

DALLAS.—First Church.—During the absence of Rev. J. O. Reaves, pastor of the First Church, his pulpit was filled by Rev. T. C. Horton, secretary of the Y. M. C. A. Mr. Reaves is expected to return with his bride about the first of the year.

WESTMINSTER CHURCH.—Rev. Frank H. Wright preached for the Westminster Church, morning and evening, Dec. 21, much to their pleasure and edification. Mr. Wright's work is in Indian Territory.

ROANOKE.—Rev. W. L. Downing, of the City Park Church, Dallas, preaches once a month at this place. It is about twenty miles north of Ft. Worth.

MISSOURI.

SHELBYNA.—On our return from a visit to relatives in South West Missouri, we found that our good people had begun the New Year by replenishing our pantry and woodpile. If it is more blessed to give than to receive, then how blest must be this people. Shelbyna Church always has the pastor's salary in bank to his credit and is prompt in the discharge of her duties. May you emulate her example.

H. P. McClintic.

KENTUCKY.

OWENSBORO.—Seventeen new members were welcomed into this church at communion service the first Sabbath in January, thirteen on profession of faith and four by certificate.

LOUISVILLE—Westminster Church.—The quarterly communion was observed at this church last Sunday morning, and Rev. J. W. Tyler reported twenty-three accessions.

At the First Church, last Sunday morning, the communion of the Lord's supper was celebrated. Dr. Lyons announced thirteen additions, two on profession and eleven by letter.

The Evangelistic Conference of the Presbyterian and Reformed Churches, which takes place in Louisville this week, will hold its meetings as follows:

Wednesday, January 14, 7:45 p. m., Mass Meeting of Presbyterian Churches.

Thursday, 9:45 a. m., Conference with Theological Students.—11:30 a. m., Conference of Ministers—4:00 p. m., Mass Meeting of Women—7:45 p. m., Mass Meeting of Men.

Friday, 10:00 a. m., Conference of Ministers.

All the meetings except the Students' conference will be at the Warren Memorial church or chapel. The Students' conference will be at the Presbyterian Theological Seminary.—Christian Observer.

SHELBYVILLE.—The constitutional requirements have been met and the Presbytery of Louisville is hereby called to meet in the First Presbyterian Church, Louisville, Ky., Jan. 27th, 1903, at 10:30 a. m., to transact the following items of business.

1. To dispose of calls from Eminence and Pleasureville churches for the pastoral services of Rev. W. B. Gray.

2. To receive Rev. W. B. Gray from West Lexington Presbytery.

3. To take action for his installation over said churches if the way be clear.

4. To receive Mr. J. G. Venable, Jr., as a candidate for the gospel ministry if the way be clear.

5. To receive Rev. W. P. Chevalier into the Presbytery.

6. To consider call from Middleboro Church for the pastoral services of Rev. E. L. Wilson.

7. To dissolve the pastoral relation between Rev. E. L. Wilson and the Third Church of Louisville, if the way be clear, and to dismiss him to the Transylvania Presbytery.

J. W. Tyler, Moderator.

David M. Sweets, Stated Clerk.

MISSISSIPPI.

YAZOO CITY.—The first Sabbath of the New Year was celebrated in the Presbyterian Church last Sabbath morning by observing the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The congregation filled the attractive auditorium in every part. There were four additions to the church on confession. The entire service was a great stimulus to all who are trying to begin the year aright.—The Herald.

HOLLY SPRINGS.—At a recent meeting of the stockholders of the North Mississippi Presbyterian College, the subscription to increase the capital stock of this college to the amount of $15,000 was completed. The entire amount pledged by this city to the Synod of Mississippi for the location of the Synodical Female College has now been raised. NATCHEZ.—We are gratified to be able to give our readers a line from the venerable Dr. J. B. Stratton, in which he says: "I have rather improved in general health since last year." A great company will join in the wish and prayer that this "father in Israel" may abide many days in health and comfort, and still bring forth fruit, blessed fruit, in his old age.

WEST POINT.—Rev. E. H. Gregory has accepted a call to Moss Point, Miss., and will leave with his family for that place in a few days. The ladies of the Presbyterian Church will hold a reception at the home of Mrs. R. H. Strong, complimentary to Mrs. Gregory before her departure.—Exchange.

TEXAS.

DENISON.—The Presbyterian Church of Denison has decided to erect a church building to cost $15,000.

HOUSTON.—The Second Church, Rev. S. M. Tenney pastor, has secured lots and expects to erect a new brick church in the near future.

SAN ANTONIO.—Rev. R. M. Hill, pastor of the Westminster Church, owing to impaired health has been given several weeks' vacation. During his absence his pulpit will be supplied by the brethren of the Presbytery.

DALLAS.—The ministers have presented a paper to the retail stores requesting them to close at the same hour on Saturday night as at other times, as it interferes with the attendance at church on the Sabbath.

ABILENE.—Rev. E. S. Lawrence has been given a vacation by his church which also furnished him means to attend the Bible School at Chicago.

TERRELL.—The city of Terrell has a present population of about eight thousand, located in a rich section and is rapidly growing. For a number of years, there has been a Presbyterian Church there connected with the Northern Board; there has of late, however, been a growing desire to be transferred to our Southern Church. At a congregational meeting, lately held, it was voted to take such action. Last Sabbath, Jan. 4th, by invitation, I preached for these brethren, received four adult members and aided in completing arrangements for the transfer of the Terrell Presbyterian Church from the Northern to the Southern connection. The church here has nice property, a church building worth about $2,000 and a manse worth $1,500. My next appointment is Navasota, to assist Brother Tanner.—W. H. Richardson.—Southwestern Presbyterian.

LONGVIEW.—The pastor of the Longview Church, Rev. Thos. F. Gallaher, was remembered most appropriately by his congregation at the Christmas season. He was presented with a beautiful oak sectional book-case for his study.

GEORGIA.

SAVANNAH—First Church.—At the mid-winter communion service in this church, the pastor had the pleasure of announcing the names of fourteen members received since our last communion. The growth of this church in recent years has been steady, and the pastor and congregation are entering upon their New Year's work, "thanking God and taking courage."
Mc C.

VALDOSTA.—The first Sabbath in the New Year the Christian Endeavor Society of the Presbyterian Church here resolved to give during the year 1903 the sum of $50 -- twenty-five dollars to the cause of Home Missions in the Presbytery of Savannah, and twenty-five dollars to be deposited with the Trustees of the Presbyterian Institute at Blackshear., Ga., as the nucleus of a fund to be used by any young man desiring to prepare himself for the Presbyterian Ministry.

Our Christian Endeavor Society is doing earnest work, and is proving helpful to the Church.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

WAFANUCKA.—Rev. R. F. Kirkpatrick was installed pastor of this church by a committee of Indian Presbytery consisting of Rev. C. J. Ralston and Rev. J. A. Williams, the second Sabbath in January. Rev. C. J. Ralston presided, preached the sermon and propounded the constitutional questions; and in the absence of Rev. C. E. Hotchkiss Rev. J. A. Williams delivered the charge to both pastor and people. Both the sermon and the charge were of high order, and were greatly enjoyed by the people. Rev. J. A. Williams filled the pulpit at night, and was heard by a large congregation.

SELECTIONS.

To the Moral Forces of North Carolina.

The General Assembly will not seriously consider the London Bill until we seriously demand it. The General Assembly will not grant our petitions until we demonstrate beyond a doubt that the conscience, the mind and the heart, of the State is behind this bill, is in earnest and will not be lightly disappointed. All depends upon a mighty and a speedy demonstration of the earnestness of the moral forces in the State.

I issue this call that the aroused forces may be properly directed.

1. Let there be meetings everywhere, in every town and hamlet: Let resolutions be adopted and forwarded to your representatives, let committees be appointed and the name of the Chairman be sent to me, and let petitions to the General Assembly be circulated.

2. I want the ministers to send me the names of the citizens that will aid me. I have particular work for them to do. Report them promptly.

3. Be sure that your personal influence counts. Write letters freely.

This is but a newspaper appeal. Will you, therefore, neglect it? I have neither time nor money to write 3,000 personal letters. I hope and pray that every one who is with us will do what I herein appeal for. Go over my requests and if you are with us in this cause, attend to them now.

We shall win this victory by a great struggle and great faith. Let every man count.

Yours sincerely,

J. W. Bailey, in Charge of the Campaign.

Raleigh, N. C., Jan. 16, 1903.

The Prayer Calendar.

Owing to unavoidable delays the committee have been unable to send out the Prayer Calendar. This delay is very much regretted, and any who have sent orders may cancel them and have their money returned if it is so desired.

The Calendars will be delivered about the first of February. The death of Dr. Rankin made necessary a number of changes, and it was also desired to insert a suitable memorial to him. For this and other reasons orders have not been promptly filled.

Death of Rev. J. M. Brown, D. D.

With great sorrow we learn that Rev. Dr. J. M. Brown, of Fordyce, Ark., died on Wednesday last, January 7. He was one of the noblest, best and most self-denying men we have ever known, full of zeal and consecration and devotion to the cause of the Lord. Of him it is recorded that he organized and built, within the bounds of Pine Bluff Presbytery, the following churches: In 1860, Seline; in 1868, Branchville; in 1875, New Bethany; in 1884, Fordyce; in 1888, Pine Prairie; in 1889, Goldman; in 1891, Bethel; in 1896, Salem. Was it not fitting when the time came for such a man to take a season of rest, that the Presbytery honored him with the status of "Evangelist Emeritus?" The honor was so fairly earned.—Observer.

Pastoral Work.

The work of the faithful minister covers all the round week. On the one day he teaches his people in the house of God, on the remaining days he teaches and guides them in their own houses and wherever he may happen to meet them.

His labors, therefore, are twofold: the work of the preacher and the work of the pastor. The two ought to be inseparable, what the Providence of God and good common sense have joined together, let no man venture to put asunder. The great business of every true minister is the winning of souls to Jesus Christ, and to bring them up in godly living. In other words, to make bad men good, and good men better.

All this cannot be accomplished by two sermons a week, even if they were the best that Paul himself could deliver; in fact, the best part of Paul's recorded work was quite other than public preaching. As for our blessed Master, he has left one extended discourse and a few shorter ones, but O, how many narratives we have of his personal visits, personal conversation, and labors of love with the sick, the sinning, and the suffering! He was the shepherd who knew every sheep in the flock. The importance of all that portion of a minister's work that lies outside of his pulpit can hardly be over-estimated. The great element of power with every faithful ambassador of Christ should be heart-power, and the secret of popularity is to take an interest in everybody. A majority of all congregations, rich or poor, is reached not so much through the intellect as through the affections. This is an encouraging fact, that while only one man in ten may have been born to become a very great preacher, the other nine, if they love their Master and love human souls, can become great pastors. Nothing gives a minister such heart-power as personal acquaintance and personal attention to those whom he aims to influence; especially his personal attention will be welcome in seasons of trial. Let the pastor make himself at home in everybody's home. Let him go often to visit the sick rooms and kneel beside their empty cribs, and comfort their broken hearts, and pray with them. Let him go to the business men of his congregation when they have suffered reverses, and give them a word of cheer; let him be quick to recognize the poor and the children, and he will weave a cord around the hearts of his people that will stand a prodigious pressure. His inferior sermons (for every minister is guilty of such occasionally) will be kindly condoned, and he can launch the most pungent truths at his auditors and they will not take offense. He will have won their hearts to himself, and that is a great step toward drawing them to the house of God and winning their souls to the Saviour. "A house-going minister," said Chalmers, "makes a church-going people." There is still one other potent argument for close intercourse with his congregation that many ministers are in danger of ignoring or under-estimating. James Russell Lowell has somewhere said that books are, at best, but dry fodder, and we need to be vitalized by contact with living people. The best practical discourses often are those which a congregation help their minister to prepare. By constant and loving intercourse with the individuals of his church, he becomes acquainted with their peculiarities, and this enlarges his knowledge of human nature. It is second only to a knowledge of God's Word. If a minister is a wise man (and neither God nor man has any use for fools) he will be made wiser by the lessons and suggestions which he can gain from constant and close intercourse with the immortal beings to whom he preaches.—From Dr. Cuyler's "Recollections of a Long Life."

Local Tax by School Districts.

It behooves us to make the most of our resources and to increase them wherever the people of a particular locality are willing to add to the school fund. It often happens that while a county is unable to supplement the school fund by taxation, those living in a particular militia district are willing to add to the state fund so as to lengthen the school term, and they should be permitted to do so.

The present law authorizes the school trustees to purchase necessary buildings, but the amount of the school fund has been inadequate to enable those in the country districts to take advantage of the act. And where the local community is willing to raise the necessary funds, there is no provision of law by which a militia district or school district is authorized to tax itself for such purposes. Ordinarily, the unit in our state government is the county, and the general law now in force only contemplates city or county taxation, but authority ought to be given to a militia district to collect a local tax for a school and school-house purposes, wherever the taxpayers so desire, and I therefore recommend legislation—including a constitutional amendment, if that be necessary—providing that upon the request of two-thirds of the taxpayers in any militia district or school district, a reasonable tax may be imposed upon the property therein, the proceeds of which shall be applied by the school trustees to educational purposes, or to the purchase of land and the erection of school buildings in that particular district,—Gov. Terrell's Message to the Georgia Legislature.

Deaths.

"Be my feelings what they will,
Jesus is my Saviour still."

JOHNSTON.—At his home at Ruffin, N. C., Dec. 1, 1902, in the 61st year of his age, Mr. John Stadler Johnston.

Mr. Johnston was a native of Rockingham county, and lived and died near the old homestead where he was born, in April, 1842. He was a son of R. B. and Susan H. Johnston, and a grand-son of Dr. Lancelot Johnston of Revolutionary fame. He was one of ten children: Fannie, who died when a child, R. B. Johnston, who died in the Confederate army, himself, Dr. R. W. Johnston, T. M. Johnston, Mrs. Bettie Stokes and Mrs. M. B. Riffe, deceased; and P. B. Johnston Esq., of Reidsville, Julius Johnston, Esq., of Youngville and Mrs. Jennie J. Harney, of Greensboro.

He was a man of fine nature, ability, of unquestionable integrity and of great popularity and influence in his county. From his youth he manifested gentle and winning manners, a sympathetic heart, and generous impulses, which were coupled with strong principles of righteousness and deep convictions of truth and duty which marked him as a man to be relied upon and to which he adhered firm and steadfast unto the end. He received a solid business education at the famous "Hughes Academy," in Orange county, and was well fitted for the many honorable and responsible trusts reposed in him in his day and generation, which he served so well. He was a man of great courage and iron nerve, and was faithful to every trust. He served his country for four years during the Civil War, as a brave soldier and a gallant officer. He served his county as a faithful and efficient Sheriff for twelve years; and he served his State both as a Senator and a Representative in the State Legislature.

He was a faithful friend and a wise counsellor to all who sought his advice and help. Above all, he was an earnest Christian man, and a most beloved and consistent member of the Reidsville Presbyterian Church. At Ruffin he was largely cut off from and deprived of, regular attendance upon his own church; but he waited upon God's sanctuary and did much loving and efficient Christian work in the Sunday-schools and churches of that place, and his hospitable home and big heart were always open to all denominations. He loved his church and pastor deeply, and his generous kindness and charitable deeds, to the poor and friendless, were proverbial among those who knew him best.

He will be greatly missed, not only by his loved ones and by his Church, but in the community in which he lived, and in the entire county and State. Mr. Johnston was twice happily married; first to Miss Sarah B. Russell of Caswell county, by whom he had one son who survives him; and the second time, to Miss Cora W. Williamson, daughter of the late Anthony S. Williamson of Caswell county. By this last marriage there are two little girls, and "My little man, John," with their mother, to mourn their father's death. His was indeed a happy home, and those who have formerly visited that happy home, with this loving mother and children, together with their tender, affectionate and devoted husband and father, cannot but feel the deepest sympathy for them in their sorrow, and breathe the heartfelt prayer that the God of all grace and comfort may comfort them, and bring them all at last, an unbroken family, to the thrice happy home above.

"Where perfect love and friendship reign,
Through all eternity."

D. I. C., Pastor.

In Memoriam.

MARY J. BUTLER.—On Sunday evening, Dec. 21, 1902, as darkness fell like a pall over the earth, the spirit of Mary J. Butler took its departure, from its frail tenement of clay, for the better land. She was born March 16, 1845, and from childhood on, through her whole earthly existence, was beloved by all who knew her. In early life she connected herself with Sherwood Presbyterian Church and remained a pious and consistent member of that church until death claimed her to join the church triumphant.

Simple, unobtrusive, gentle and patient, she set an example worthy of imitation and one which will live on in the memory of kindred and friends.

While she leaves a devoted brother and his family and a host of friends to mourn their loss, she has gone to join her parents and sister who crossed the dark river before her.

With chastened hearts we bow in humble submission to Him who doeth all things well, and we wait in hope of the glorious Resurrection when this "mortal shall put on immortality" and we shall meet around the throne of God to sing his praises forever and to rejoice that "Death is swallowed up in victory."

Lina Marsh.

Oh, lovely friend of early days,

Thine absence fills our hearts with pain.

Our loss is thy eternal gain,
So we submit to God's just ways.

Dec. 29, 1902.

The home of the departed was in Cumberland county, N. C.

PRITCHETT.—At her home in Graham, N. C., Jan. 3rd, 1903, Mrs. Margaret L. Pritchett, after many long, weary months of illness which she bore with Christian patience. Her parting message was, "Tell everybody that God's will and God's ways are the best after all." She was buried at Alamance Church. She leaves four sons and two daughters, all devoted Christians.

E. C. Murray.

UZZELL.—On Dec. 16th, 1902, death entered the home of Mr. Thomas W. Uzzell, a prominent citizen of Wayne county, near Seven Springs, and took from him his beloved wife, and from his children a devoted mother. Two of the children, Mr. W. W. Uzzell of White Hall, and Mr. Dunn Uzzell of Wayne county, have married and left the family roof. One son, Mr. Atlas, and three daughters, Misses Essie, Mattie, and Polly are at home.

Mrs. Thomas Wood Uzzell was born August 2, 1848, and was married August 23rd, 1865. Her father was Major Parks and her mother was Pattie Sutton, and her husband is Thomas Wood Uzzell. So that three large and influential families of Wayne and Lenoir counties—Parks, Suttons, and Uzzells—were represented in her, either by birth or marriage. Her mother married after the death of Mr. Parks, Mr. Joel Elmorc. She reared eleven children. A death never occurred in this family until Mrs. Thomas Uzzell was taken. Mrs. Uzzell was a woman of fine character. Her domestic virtues were of the highest type. She was very useful in the community and in the White Hall Presbyterian Church of which she was a member for so many years.

She entered the service of the Lord on earth in 1863, and was transferred by death to service above, on Dec. 16, 1902.

The church at White Hall expresses its tenderest sympathies for the father and the children in their great bereavement.

Pastor.

ALEXANDER.—On the morning of the 8th of December the spirit of Mrs. Sarah A. C. Alexander was freed from its earthly tenement of flesh, and entered into the "city that hath foundations."

Ripened by experience and chastened by suffering, she leaves behind the testimony of a pure, true life—a life of unswerving devotion to her church and pastor; a life founded on faith in a personal Saviour; a life of patient submission to the Divine will. In earthly youth she took her stand for Christ and ever remained a faithful and true witness. For many weary months an invalid through all her sufferings, she maintained her sweet Christian disposition—patient and resigned to the will of God whom she loved and trusted with child-like confidence.

When death came, she was not afraid to answer to the call. With quiet deliberation she sat her house in order, and calmly she entered the "shadow," only to fall into the sleep that wakes on the other side, there to await the "abundant entrance" that remains for the people of God.

She was the object of the most loving devotion, and filial loyalty of both sons and daughters; they will see her face no more, but the memory of her tender care and pious teachings will ever remain as a precious legacy, which time cannot efface.

God calls our loved ones, but we lose not wholly what he has given. They live on earth, in thought, and deed, as truly, as in his Heaven.

COLE.—At his home near Buffalo Church, Moore county, N. C., Jan 7, 1903, Mr. Green Berry Cole, in the 68th year of his life.

Mr. Cole was a pillar of strength in Buffalo Church. He was clerk of Session, Superintendent of the Sunday school and Treasurer of the church. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord."

Tinned Foods—The comparative harmfulness of tinned food is indicated by the results of an investigation by the Canadian government among the physicians of the Dominion. Of five thousand three hundred and forty eight physicians, answers were received from one thousand, three hundred and thirteen, of whom nineteen per cent. gave instances of diseases which they attributed to tinned food within a period of seven years. Only fifteen persons died during these years, of diseases attributed to canned goods. The responsibility for some of this disease was laid to the use of food which had remained in cans sometime after the tin had been opened. The government report says that printed warning should be given on the label of each tin against allowing any of the contents to remain in it after opening, and against using the contents, if it has any unusual taste or smell, or the can shows any other indication of decomposition. These indications should be described on the label.—Good House-keeping.

Salad.—Take a number of bright red apples, cut off a section from the blossom end and scoop out very carefully, so that a portion of the skin may be turned inward to conceal the "rusting" of the meat which comes in contact with the air. The wall should be left about half an inch thick and each apple should rest on a bed of green cress. For filling, take the tender leaves at the heart of head lettuce, add finely chopped celery hearts and cubes of tart apples and dress with the usual mayonnaise. By finishing the top with the tiny leaves of the lettuce the effect will be much enhanced and the whole makes a pretty novelty in the matter of serving, while the salad is regarded here in Pennsylvania as delicious.—Good House-keeping.

MISS IDA M. SNYDER,

Treasurer of the Brooklyn East End Art Club.

MENSTRUAL irregularities are generally the beginning of a woman's troubles. With the vitality at a low ebb, the blood weakened, the digestion disordered, she goes about pale-faced, hollow-eyed and haggard, a piteous contrast to the blooming health of her former self. But over 1,000,000 women have found health again by taking Wine of Cardui. As a regulator of the menstrual periods Wine of Cardui has never been known to fail. It has seldom failed to restore perfect health, even in the most persistent and aggravated case of weakness.

Miss Ida M. Snyder.

Miss Ida M. Snyder, of No. 535 Bergen Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., has used Wine of Cardui and she says it helped her into a new life. Health to Miss Snyder is worth a great deal. She is an attractive young woman with intellectual attainments and she occupies the position of Treasurer of the Brooklyn East End Art Club. This position marks her as a person of intellect, culture and refinement and it speaks highly of the respect and trust her fellow women have in her. She writes:

"If women would pay more attention to their health we would have more happy wives, mothers and daughters, and if they would use more intelligence in the matter of medicines, observing results, they would find that the doctors' prescriptions do not perform the many cures they are given credit for.

"In consulting with my druggist he advised McElfree's Wine of Cardui and Thedford's Black-Draught, and so I took it and have every reason to thank him for a new life opened up to me with restored health, and it only took three months to cure me."

You may secure the same relief as Miss Snyder, if you take Wine of Cardui as she took it. Thedford's Black-Draught is the companion medicine of Wine of Cardui and it is a liver and bowel regulator which assists greatly in effecting a cure. If you take these medicines according to directions, the relief and cure is simple. Some cases are cured quickly and others take longer because the disease has run longer. Remember how Miss Snyder took Wine of Cardui and has health. The same medicines are offered you to-day.

The World.

The Panama Canal.

The Panama Canal treaty is passing through the stage which Adam Smith used to call "the haggling of the market." There seems to be no formidable obstacle in the way of the early conclusion of the treaty, but the question of price, and while Colombia is asking a pretty high figure, the administration recognizes the fact that Colombia has a pretty good article to sell, and is willing to trade on a basis of "reasonable liberality." Colombia says her lowest price is an annuity of $650,000, equivalent to several billions of Colombian money at the present rate of exchange. She makes up this somewhat formidable total in the following way: The canal, she says, will put the Panama Railroad out of business, and the Panama Railroad brings in $240,000 a year. Then there are the harbor dues at the two terminal ports of Colon and Panama, and these must be relinquished to the United States, if we build the canal, and collect all tolls, lightship dues, and so forth. Now the harbor dues of Panama and Colon amount, says Sister Colombia, to $400,000 a year, and apparently $10,000 more is thrown in for luck. To this plea the administration has returned a soft answer, qualified by a secret determination to look up the accounts of those harbor dues and of that transisthmian railroad, to see if they were really in such a condition of blooming prosperity, and to ascertain how far Sister Colombia is stretching it.—Harper's Weekly.

The government of Great Britain has concluded a treaty with Abyssinia in order to "promote the welfare of the vast territories which Great Britain administers conjointly with Egypt in the Soudan."

In one important article Menelek, "King of Ethiopia," engages not to allow the construction of any works across the Blue Nile, the Sobat, or Lake Tsana, which might check the free flow of these waters into the Nile. The importance of this article depends on the value of irrigation by the great Assuan dam, also that the waters of the Blue Nile are much richer in fertilizing properties than the water of the White Nile. Lake Tsana is the source of the Blue Nile, which river is described as a valuable route for trade. Careful study by experts on the spot brings out the conclusion that Lake Tsana is well suited for an artificial reservoir and is destined to play an important part in the stupendous world of irrigating Egypt. Menelek consents to the engineering of the work, although the lake lies wholly within his borders. There is also an article giving the right of way for railway from the Soudan to Uganda, which some day may become a link in the "Cape to Cairo" line. Tsana is more than 1,000 miles from the dam at Assuan, and the lake is about 150 miles in circumference.

On Wednesday there was offered in the House of Representatives at Washington, by Hon. John J. Jenkins, of Wisconsin, Republican Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, a resolution of inquiry into the power and right of Congress to seize all the coal beds, coal mines and the railways and steamboats used in the transportation of coal. Following is the text of the resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Judiciary be and is hereby directed to investigate and report to this House with all convenient speed the opinion of that Committee as to the power of Congress to declare that a necessity has arisen for taking possession of all coal, coal beds and coal mines in the United States, and all lines of transportation agencies, instruments and vehicles of commerce necessary for the transportation of coal, and that if, in the opinion of that Committee the power exists and a necessity for the exercise of such power has arisen, that Committee forthwith report to this House a bill declaring the necessity, providing fully and in detail the occasion, modes, conditions and agencies for said appropriation as will fully and completely exhaust the power of Congress in that regard."—Picayune.

Maracaibo, Jan. 18.—The German cruiser Panther shelled Fort San Carlos at the entrance to Lake Maracaibo yesterday afternoon for one hour. The fort returned the fire with four guns. The Panther withdrew in the direction of Curacao. Fort San Carlos is 22 miles from Maracaibo and commands the entrance to the lake, or inner bay. The correspondent here of the Associated Press has received the following letter from Gen. Bello, the commander of the fort:

"Yesterday afternoon at 12:30 o'clock, Fort San Carlos was attacked and shelled without any provocation on our part, without previous notification, or the delivering of an ultimatum, by the German cruiser Panther, which tried to force the entrance.

"After a fight lasting an hour, during which the fort used only four guns, the Panther was obliged to abandon the fight and retreated in the direction of Curacao. The fort has suffered no damage and only three men were wounded."

A monument was recently unveiled with great ceremony near Junction City, Kan., to mark the supposed site of the famed city of Quivira, which the natives of that section think lies buried beneath their feet. The obelisk is the contribution of the members of the Quivira Historical Society, who are scattered through Kansas, Minnesota and other north-western states. The location and even the existence of Quivira has been an active subject of discussion for a hundred years and much has been written on the subject. It has been located at different times at various places in Mexico, Arizona, and other parts of the Southwest, but this is the only location which can lay claim to a substantial monument to mark its supposed site. Those who doubt the existence of the "City of Gold," as Quivira is spoken of, say that the Indians who were supposed to have peopled the city, and who bore the same name, were the poorest tribe known to history.—Exchange.

Among the recent inventions in medical apparatus is a sweating robe heated by electricity for the treatment of such diseases as are susceptible to the influence of electricity applied in the form of heat. The robe is made of two layers sewed together. A resistance wire arranged in zigzag folds is interposed between these layers. When in use the patient is wrapped in this robe, and a current of proper strength is passed through the resistance wire to generate heat. The arrangement of the wire poles is such as to evenly distribute the heat throughout the robe. By regulating the current, varying degrees of heat may be obtained. On account of the zigzag disposition of the resistance wire the robe may be readily rolled up into a small bundle.—From Scientific American.

There is a report from Europe to the effect that the chiefs of the Macedonian Revolutionary Association will commence a revolt on April 1st; it is known that the Turkish government has recently bought a large supply of arms and ammunition. It is also an open secret that behind the Macedonians is the intriguing of Russia and probably of Austria. So the outlook in the Balkans is rather ominous.

Two months ago Mr. Roosevelt stated at Memphis that "the progress of the Philippine Islands in material well-being has been astounding." On Wednesday of last week he sent a special message to Congress, asking for an appropriation of $3,000,000 to relieve the present distress caused by cholera, famine, and a disordered currency. The adventure, "alien to Republican ideals," comes high.

Germany's trade relations with the United States was again the subject of debate in the Reichstag, at Berlin, last week. The Agrarian leaders urged the government to denounce existing treaties and engage in a tariff war. Baron Speck von Sternburg, the newly appointed Charge d' Affaires of Germany has stated that his mission to this country is to promote good feeling between the two countries. The departure of the German Ambassador from Washington is understood both in this country and in Germany to have been ordered by his government because of his ill-success as a diplomatic agent.

There is a borough in Mississippi with fewer than 1,000 inhabitants. It has had fame thrust upon it by having a negro postmaster, who resigned under pressure, and the President saw fit to close the postoffice. The husband of the ex-official says, "He understands the race problem, and thought it best for her to give up the office." Mail directed to Indianola is now sent to Greenville, some thirty or forty miles distant, but the Indianola citizens have outwitted the government in a neat manner, by having their mail addressed to Heathman, four miles away, and employing a man to make daily trips between the two places. It can not be argued that any citizen has a right to any federal office; such offices should be filled not for the sake of the official, nor his class, but for the sake of the public.

Pekin, July 18.—The dedication of the Von Ketteler memorial arch, which occurred today, was an impressive ceremony. The arch was erected by China. Baron Von Ketteler was the German minister who was killed by Boxers at the outbreak of the Boxer trouble. The dedication took place in the presence of a brilliant assemblage of diplomats, many Chinese officials, all the military officers in Pekin, the entire foreign community of the city, as well as German officers and civilians. The streets and roofs from which a view of the function was to be had, were crowded.

The Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company has announced that it has concluded contracts for a daily service of news telegrams—or Marconigrams—to a mail steamer sailing from Liverpool to New York, which will enable the vessel to publish a daily newspaper during the voyage. The name of the steamer is not given. Thus it happens that the sanctity of an ocean voyage is destroyed and there is no escape from satiety, by land or sea.

The report of the Irish land Conference recommends a "unanimous declaration concerning future governmental aid in Ireland," and this gives a hope for future peace on the Island. The proposed settlement will be on the lines of voluntary purchase, rather than compulsory sale, or in other words, the tenant will be enabled to "buy a home with rent money." To accomplish the aims of the committee the amount to be paid by the Imperial government will be about $3,000,000. in addition to "generous treatment."

The forces in Wilmington opposed to the liquor traffic organized a chapter of the North Carolina Anti-Saloon League on the 16th inst. After addresses by Mr. John E. Oates, editor of the North Carolina Baptist, published at Fayetteville, N. C., and Rev. A. J. McKelway, to an audience of about 400, among whom were many saloon men, the organization was effected by the election of proper officers and the fight is on.

N. G. Gonzales, editor of The State, Columbia, S. C., was shot last Thursday by James H. Tillman, Lieutenant Governor of South Carolina, on Main Street in full view of the State capitol. During the recent primary election Editor Gonzales opposed Mr. Tillman in his race for Governor, using very strong editorial expressions. The desperate deed of the 15th was the fruitage of that opposition. Mr. Gonzales died Monday afternoon at 1.10.

There is a national anxiety when a steamer is overdue; the arrival of the St. Louis, at New York, last week, four days late was hailed by thousands who had no personal interest in her welfare. The delay was caused by the choking of boiler tubes. There is a prospect of many snits against the American Line; the passengers had paid fast passage rates, and one wedding was postponed and one passenger lost an option on a block of $500,000. stock

The Sab Jacinto Oil Company, one of the largest of the Beaumont concerns, went into the hands of a receiver last week; cause, the complete failing of one well, and the decreased output of two others. The difference between the actual output and the amount under contract to be furnished, represented $1,500,000.

The Home Circle.

The Annexation of Cuby.

Miss Alice Caldwell Hegan.

The Wiggesses lived in the Cabbage Patch. It was not a real cabbage patch, but a queer neighborhood where ramshackle cottages played hop-scotch over the railroad tracks. The Wiggs family consisted of Mrs. Wiggs and five children. The boys were named Jim and Billy, but it was Mrs. Wiggs's boast that her three little girls had geography names. First came Asia, then Australia. When the last baby arrived, and Billy stood looking down at the small bundle, he had asked anxiously: "Are you goin' to have it fer a boy or a girl, ma?" Mrs. Wiggs had answered: "A girl, Billy, and her name is European." "

Hard work and strict economy were necessary in the little household. Mrs. Wiggs took in washing, Jim worked at the factory, and the others helped as best they could.

The direct road to fortune, however, according to Billy's ideas, could best be travelled in a kindling-wagon, and while he was the proud possessor of a broken-down wagon, sole relic of the late Mr. Wiggs, he had nothing to hitch to it. Scarcely a week passed that he did not agitate the question, and as Mrs. Wiggs often said:

"When Billy Wiggs done set his head to a thing he's as good as got it."

Consequently she was not surprised when he rushed breathlessly into the kitchen one evening about supper-time, and exclaimed in excited tones:

"Ma, I've got a horse! He was havin' a fit on the commons, an' they was goin' to shoot him, an' I ast the man to give him to me."

"My land, Billy! what do you want with a fit horse?" asked his mother.

"Cause I knowed you could cure him. The man said if I took him I'd have to pay fer cartin' away his carcass; but I said all right, I'll take him anyway. Come on, ma, an' see him!" And Billy hurried back to his new possession.

Mrs. Wiggs pinned a shawl over her head and ran across the commons. A group of men stood about the writhing animal, but the late owner had departed.

"He's 'most gone," said one of the men as she came up. "I tole Billy you'd beat him for takin' that ole nag offen the man's han's."

"Well, I won't," said Mrs. Wiggs, stontly. "Billy Wiggs's got more sense than most men I know. That hoss's carcass is worth somethin.' I s'pect he'd bring 'bout two dollars dead an' mebbe more livin.' Anyway, I'm goin' to save him if there's any save to him."

She stood with her arms on her hips and critically surveyed her patient. "I'll tell you what's the matter with him," was her final diagnosis; "his lights is riz. Bill, I'm goin' home fer some medicine. You set on his head so's he can't git up, an' ma'll be right back in a minnte."

The crowd which had collected to see the horse shot began to disperse, for it was supper-time, and there was nothing to see now but the poor suffering horse with Billy Wiggs patiently sitting on his head.

When Mrs. Wiggs returned she carried a bottle and what appeared to be a large marble. "This here is a calomel pill," she explained. "I jes rolled the calomel in with some soft light bread. Now you prop his jaw open with a little stick, an' I'll shove it in; then hole his head back, while I pour down some water an' turkentine outen this bottle."

It was with great difficulty that this was accomplished, for the old horse had evidently seen a vision of the happy hunting-ground and was loath to return to the sordid earth. His limbs were already stiffening in death, and only the whites of his eyes were visible. Mrs. Wiggs noted these discouraging symptoms, and saw that violent measures were necessary.

"Gether some sticks an' build a fire quick as you kin. I've got to run over home. Build it right up clost to him, Billy; we've got to git him bet up."

She rushed into the kitchen, and taking several cakes of tallow from the shelf, threw them into a tin bucket. Then she hesitated for a moment. The kettle of soup was steaming away on the stove ready for supper. Mrs. Wiggs did not believe in sacrificing the present need to the future comfort. She threw in a liberal portion of pepper, and seizing the kettle in one hand, and the bucket of tallow in the other, staggered back to the bonfire.

"Now, Billy," she commanded, "put this bucket of tallow down there in the hottest part of the fire. Lookout, don't tip it—there! Now you come here an' help me pour this soup into the bottle. I'm goin' to git that ole hoss so het up he'll think he's havni' a sunstroke."

Seems sorter bad to keep on pesterin' him when he's so near gone, but this here soup'll feel good when it once gits inside him."

When the kettle was empty, the soup was impartially distributed over Mrs. Wiggs and the patient, but a goodly amount had "got inside," and already the horse was losing his rigidity.

Only once did Billy pause in his work, and that was to ask:

"Ma, what do you think I'd better name him!"

Giving names was one of Mrs. Wiggs's chief accomplishments, and usually required much thoughtful consideration; but in this case, if there was to be a christening, it must be at once.

"I'd like a jography name," suggested Billy, feeling that nothing was too good to bestow on his treasure.

Mrs. Wiggs stood with the soup dripping from her hands, and earnestly contemplated the horse. Babies, pigs, goats and puppies had drawn largely on her supply of late and geography names especially were scarce. Suddenly a thought struck her:

"I'll tell you what, Billy, we'll call him Cuby! It's a town I heard em talkin' 'bout at the grocery."

By this time the tallow was melted, and Mrs. Wiggs carried it over to the horse and put each of his hoofs into the hot liquid, while Billy rubbed the legs with all the strength of his young arms.

"That's right," she said. "Now you run home an git that piece of carpet by my bed, an' we'll kiver him up. I am goin' to git them fence rails over yonder to keep the fire goin'."

Through the long night they worked with their patient, and when the first glow of morning appeared in the east, a triumphant procession wended its way across the Cabbage Patch. First came a wagon bearing sundry pails, kettles, and bottles, next came a very sleepy little boy leading a trembling old horse, with soup all over his head, tallow on his feet, and a strip of rag carpet tied about his middle.

Thus Cuby, like his geographical namesake, emerged from a violent ordeal of reconstruction with a mangled constitution, internal dissension, a decided preponderance of foreign element, but a firm and abiding trust in the new power with which his fortunes had been irrevocably cast.—Century Magazine.

The Ministry of Sympathy.

We meet every day persons weighted with care and sorrow, of which they do not speak. Their business life is apart from the inner life. It is possible to know them and know nothing of their feelings. But observant eyes could not fail to see the shadow and to find the reason for it.

The young clerk with whom you trade every week lost his mother a few days ago. Your evening paper announced the fact, but it didn't tell, what her neighbors knew, that she was the light of the home, that her boys, sometimes discouraged because they got on so slowly in business, took heart again after they had talked with her about it. The young man's eyes glistened when a customer, just as he was turning away, pressed his hand and said he had heard how much his mother had been to her children.

The man who delivers groceries at your back door had a boy and girl ill with consumption for a long time. He has sent them both into a better climate, hoping to save their lives; but it is taking all he can earn and he is afraid he cannot keep them there. A word of interest from you might give him new hope.

The policeman on your street has been laid up for three weeks, though you have not missed him. He is just taking up his duties again, hardly strong enough to go his round. It would brighten his walk to know that you had thought of him while he was ill and was glad to see him back.

The young woman next door to you has just become engaged. It seems to her that no event ever happened before of such importance and that no two persons ever cared so much for one another as she and her lover do. But the affair took on an added importance when a neighbor came in to congratulate her. Her heart beat faster, her cheek took a brighter glow and the world seemed more beautiful than ever. She is more ready to do a kindness to any one than she ever was before, because you are glad in her happiness.

There will be times, perhaps have been already, when you will reach out your hand blindly in the darkness of a great shadow, hoping some one will clasp it. The rude or effusive grasp would bring you only added pain, but you know the delicate touch of genuine sympathy that carries healing with it. If you have known that unobtrusive ministry, give it to some other. If you haven't experienced it yet, learn to give it. Those who need it are close at hand. It may be you can change for them the color of their sky by a word, a touch, a look.—Congregationalist.

A Picture With a Benediction.

A poor Bohemian gipsy girl of remarkable beauty was employed by a German artist to sit for one of his "studies." In his studio she saw an unfinished painting of the crucifixion, and asked him who "that wicked man" was, and what he had done to deserve such a terrible punishment.

The artist smiled at her ignorance, and told her that the Man nailed to the cross was not wicked, but good above all good men in the world.

From that time her interest in the story of the cross never ceased. She was utterly untought, and it was by her questions—rather grudgingly answered by the painter, who had no real Christian sympathy—that she got her first knowledge of the Saviour of mankind. Noting her employer's lack of feeling, she said to him one day:

"I should think you would love Him, if He died for you."

The remark fastened itself in the artist's mind. The death of Christ had appealed to him as a pictorial tragedy. The Divine life of Jesus had never touched him. The ignorant Bohemian girl had presented the subject to him in another way, and it would not let him rest until he sought religious counsel, and ultimately became a servant and a worshipper of the crucified.

Under the inspiration of a new love he finished the picture, and it was hung in the Dusseldorf gallery, with this inscription: "I did this for thee, what hast thou done for Me?"

Some time afterward he met his former model there, weeping in front of the painting.

"Master," she said, "did He die for the poor Bohemian too?"

"Yes."

And the Man of Galilee had one disciple more.

A few months later, dying in a gipsy camp not far from the city, the girl sent for the artist and thanked him.

"I am going to Him now," she said. "I love Him, and I know He loves me."

Years afterwards a frivolous young nobleman looked on the same picture, and the study of it and the rebuking pathos of its inscription so influenced him that he consecrated himself to the service of God. The young man was Count Zinzendorf the founder of the Moravian Church.

The benediction to the world of a noble and uplifting picture is but feebly measured by the few examples that ever attain publication. It can teach the ignorant, it can rebuke the immoral, it can inspire the devout and thoughtful—and it can preach the supreme truth which St. Paul declared to be his only message and his last enthusiasm.—Selected

A Bible Scholar in the Kitchen.

I know of one dear woman who had only a common school education, "and a very common one at that," she used in her humility to say, who yet became so choice a Bible scholar that in her church and Sabbath-school it grew to be a habit with the people to defer to her opinion, and those who had had abundant opportunity for study learned to mark their own opinion with an interrogation when it differed from hers. To one who questioned her as to how it was possible in her narrowed and wonderfully busy life to give the amount of study and thought that she evidently did to the Bible, she made answer:

"Why, you see I have a great deal of time to myself. After the children are started for school I am alone all day. And I know that at 6 o'clock there will be eleven hungry people who will look to me for a good dinner; so of course I have to spend a good deal of my time in the kitchen. Years ago I foresaw that the larger portion of my waking hours would have to be spent there, and I felt lonely and wanted a companion. So I covered my Bible with slate-colored cambric, and took it to the kitchen with me. After a while my husband put up a shelf on purpose for it, and made a little wire arrangement to hold it open, and we have had real good times together, my Bible and I. I can peep at a verse here and there, and keep thinking it over as I go about my work, and think of all the other verses I know that throw light on it. It is wonderful how many verses one knows that fit in, if we just give them time to find their places! Ironing days were very nice. It was long, slow work, you see, that didn't take much thought, because I knew exactly how to do it, and I could give my mind to some subject that needed studying, and every once in a while find a verse that made it plainer. Then in the evening, when I had a quiet half-hour to myself, I'd look up things that I hadn't had time for during the day, and find out what others thought about the same verse. That would be sure to start me on some new verses, and maybe we would go on for weeks, my Bible and I, studying that one subject."—Pansy, in The Christian Endeavor World.

Jesus once uttered a terrible warning against the discouragement of little children. It were better, He said, for a man that a millstone should be tied to his neck, and that he should be cast into the sea, than that he should cause one of Christ's little ones to stumble. The child is naturally hopeful and glad, and it is a wicked thing to shatter its confidence and to darken its sky.—Robert Speer.

BRICK!
BRICK!

A brick is a brick; yes, but what a difference in them. Good clay, good machinery, up-to-date methods, in fact thousands of details, are a necessity to produce the best brick. We have our plant fully equipped for capacity of 5,000,000—not only that, but have a body of the finest river clay ever located in this country. Our plant is on the Catawba river near Fort Mill S. C., and shipping Station Grattan S. C.

"A man is a man for a' that," but what a difference in 'em. You require the best lumber for your house; the best coal for your engine; the best flour your table. One does not buy a common horse when he can get a much better for near the same price. This is true about everything one needs.

In a building nothing is more essential than good material. It adds to the safety and wear, besides 'twill sell for more. Who would not pay more for a building put up out of first quality material than for one thrown together out of common ordinary brick?

After a Storm, Sunshine.

By Julia H. Rice.

"What does the doctor say, mother? Does he think me seriously ill?"

The speaker was a young girl, and the quick, half irritable tone and sharp clutch of the bedding told of the nervous strain under which she was laboring. Mrs. Allen, who had just entered the room after a short interview with the physician, seated herself by the bedside and, taking the girl's hot hand in her cool ones, began to smooth and pat it while she looked with sadly smiling eyes into the anxious face on the pillow.

"What does he say, Gertrude?" She spoke slowly, trying to gain time and strength for the hard things she must tell her. "Well, he says things are not so very bad. He feels almost sure that you can be well and strong again, but dearie,"—looking down to hide the twitching of her lips—"he thinks—he thinks you must go to the hospital for—"

"Why, mother, cannot you take better care of me here? I am sure I don't want to be sent to a hospital, and, besides, we cannot afford it, so let us say nothing more about that!"

Mrs. Allen was silent for a few moments, but continued to caress the white, well-shaped hand; then she went on in her low, quiet tone: "He says that if he is successful, and if you can have perfect quiet and skillful nursing at the hospital for a month or six weeks, you would soon be able to return to the office and be your own bright, happy self again." She had made frequent pauses and kept her eyes on the pretty fingers until she neared the close, then she spoke rapidly and a bright smile spread over her face.

"But, mother, you do not want me to be taken away from you, do you? I am sure you are a fine nurse; all your friends say that."

"My darling, it will be very hard to let you go, but it seems better for you."

"Is it so bad as that? He wants me to be in the hospital for six weeks! Do you know, mother, that would probably mean the loss of my place; and hospital bills are ruinous—unless—" a pause. "Mother, do you mean me to go as a ward patient?"

"Oh! no, my darling, no! You must have your own little room, where Roy and I can go and sit with you. Dr. Forrester has promised to have everything made as easy for us as possible; and when you are well we will soon pay the bills."

"How?" said Gertrude, "when we lay up so little when Rob and I are both earning? Oh! if all our savings were not tied up, or lost, by that failure!"

"There is little hope of anything coming from that, I fear, but a way will be found. We must have faith, dear. You know we have never been left to suffer."

"What did the doctor mean when he said, 'if he were successful'? And what would happen if I refuse to go to the hospital? I can lie here and rest for a week, or perhaps longer, and then, I am sure that I could go back to my work. These doctors like to frighten people." She spoke wearily and turned on the bed, only to be caught by an agonizing pain. After being partially relieved of this she turned to her mother:

"Must I go, Marmie?"

"Yes," said her mother gravely, "unless you are willing to be an invalid for years, perhaps for the rest of your life."

Then she explained what the physician had said as to the needs of the case, putting in carefully every encouraging word and softening the hard points.

The girl was very still, only asking a question or two. "Mother, I am not worth so much trouble. Just let me slip away. It seems as though it would be very much easier for me than going through all that; and it would save you and Rob a lot of care and trouble," she said at last.

"O Gertrude, what would we do without you? We will miss you dreadfully, even for these few weeks, when I, at least, am to see you every day. How could I bear to live and grow old without my 'Sunbeam' to cheer me? You are blue now because you are ill; when you come back to us free from pain and nervousness, life will be a different thing to you, and how relieved I will be! for, dearie, I have never been easy about you since the day of your fall."

"That was a sad day for us when the building association and I both went down. When am I to go to the hospital?"

"To-morrow."

Mrs. Allen and her children, Gertrude and Robert, lived in a small but cosy flat in one of the suburbs of a large city. Her husband had died eight years before this time, leaving them little beyond a five thousand dollar life insurance. This had been carefully invested, but, in spite of her good management, Mrs. Allen found her property very much reduced before Robert was old enough to assist her. She had kept a home for her children and had sent them both through the High School. After leaving that school, Gertrude at once began to study stenography, and when ready for it, found an office position where her attentive habits and pleasant manners had gained for her frequent promotions.

Her first thought in all she did was for her mother, and many were the plans the young people made for the extra comforts that she was to have when they could earn more.

Robert Allen was a manly young fellow, full of life and fun, but strictly attentive to business during the working hours. It had hurt his pride that his sister, who was two years his senior, should be a 'bread winner' before himself. When both had earned that title, they resolved that only for her own urgent needs should any further encroachments be made upon their mother's little property; and there was a generous rivalry between them as to which should put the larger sum into their little "rainy day" fund.

If all their means were piteously small, it meant a great deal to them that they were independent and had no bills to annoy them. Then there was enough for an occasional "spree" as Rob called it, even if it meant a trolley ride into the country or concert tickets for three.

About six months before the time of this story a great trial had befallen them in the failure of the building association where they had their 'fund.' Gertrude heard the news of the disaster cried by the newsboys in the street, and in her haste to obtain a paper made a misstep and fell to the pavement. She hardly thought of the accident in her excitement over the failure; but her mother's quick eye soon saw a change come over her. She lost her cheerfulness, and there came many a ruffle in her usually smooth temper; she became languid and lost interest in her surroundings; then her work became wearisome, and at last the day came when she had to stop her work and her mother called the doctor.

The evening after his call was spent by the little family in Gertrude's room, each of them trying to hide anxiety by an air of great cheerfulness. When about to go to his own room Robert turned to his sister and said:

"Now, Gertrude, if you have half the spirit that I think you have, you will say to yourself to-morrow, 'Now my part in this little piece of work is to give myself up to my friends and help them all that I can by not worrying about anything; for, indeed, why should I when I have the best doctor and the best mother in town, and a big brother who is almost of age (and who tipped the beam today at one hundred and thirty pounds) and who can manage beautifully?' and he turned on his toes and made her a low bow in the hope of bringing a smile to her face.

"All very well to talk, Rob, but just you change places with me and see how I could lecture you."

"I wish I could change with you, Gertie," and he disappeared.

"What is the matter with Rob Allen? We have not heard a chirp nor whistle from him to-day," said John, the porter at the store, the next afternoon.

Two weeks of suffering and anxiety for them all, and then Mrs. Allen brought home word that Gertrude was much better. "Only time, patience and good nursing are needed now, but she must be kept very quiet," Dr. Forrester had said to them.

How happy the girl was when she found herself free from pain, though still very weak! Her mother caught the sunny smile.

"I will soon be home now, mother," the young girl whispered. But as her strength returned her thoughts went back to her work and the time she had lost; then she heard a remark on the charges for surgical work; how could she ever pay it, and for all these comforts that had been given her without stint? She went over it again and again until her weak brain was bewildered with the effort to compute the cost.

"A little more fever, to-night," said the house doctor when making his evening visit. The next day she was not so well, and in her troubled sleep they heard

Another Appreciation of the Aetna.

LUMBERTON, N. C. November 26, 1902

J. D. BUSHALL, Esq., Manager Aetna Life Insurance Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir:—After a careful comparison of policies submitted to me by the Aetna Life, Bankers' Life of New York, Equitable of New York, Northwestern, New York Life and Prudential, I have accepted $10,000 in the Aetna on the 20 payment life plan, with option of 25 year 3 per cent. Gold Bond Contract.

I have been a policy-holder in the Aetna for nearly eight years, and therefore feel somewhat prepared to judge of its merits from actual results. With all due deference to other companies, it affords me great pleasure to say that in my opinion the Aetna cannot be surpassed for plain and liberal contracts, and for just, conservative and economical management. I now have $12,000 in the Aetna. My partner, Mr. W. W. Carlyle, has $16,000 and one of our clerks, Mr. John T. Biggs, has $2,000 nearly all of which was written and delivered by your special agent, Mr. H. T. Spears.

Wishing you and the grand old Aetna continued success, I am, the words: "failure, work, I must work."

Mrs. Allen knew but too well what it meant.

"Tut, tut," said Dr. Forrester. "What do you say, nurse? that my patient is worrying over her bills? Why, that will never do; she cannot get well while she does that."

"Now, see here, little girl," he began as he took his seat by the bedside, and felt of her forehead and pulse. "You really are not playing fair with me. You and I are partners in this game; my part is to get you well, and yours is to keep as cheerful as you can and so help me along. When you let your brain work so hard that all the blood has to go there, you block my game of healing those horrid wounds. Don't you see that you must not worry? A doctor's work is not all for money; we fellows are regular old 'skinfints,' I know, but we like better to win the game we are playing against disease. Every case is a hard-fought fight; it hurts us to be beaten, so don't you do anything to help the enemy. Besides," he said, rising to go, "your friends will not think the bills so large if I get you out of here well and strong; so don't you think about the bills," and with his courteous bow and smile, he was gone.

Poor Robert was greatly distressed at hearing of his sister's anxieties. He had had his own, for the loss of her salary had left a lack, to say nothing of the weekly hospital bills that they were so anxious to meet promptly. The savings of the last few months were gone, and winter, with its extra expenses, was just upon them. That night brought a killing frost, and the next morning was raw and cold.

"Bobby, your coat needs stretching," said one of his fellow-clerks as he saw Robert struggling to get out of his last winter's overcoat.

"It sticketh closer than a brother; does it not?" said another young man.

"Thompson has a splendid stock of coats, this year, just fine long ones clear down to here," put in a third, measuring down his leg the fashionable length.

"Rob, it will do the locust act if you grow any more," added a fourth.

"My coat is big enough," said Rob; "it is only that I am puffed up," and he filled his lungs pompously and strutted off.

It was easy to stand the chaff of the boys, but, later, when starting on an errand that required haste, he lost several valuable moments in putting on his coat, he was mortified. Mr. Houston, who stood near giving him his instructions, said: "Better get a larger coat, Allen."

"Yes, sir, but I have to wait a while." The next cold day he thought it easier to go without the objectionable coat. "What is the matter with Allen? What does he do with his money that he does not have comfortable clothing?" said Mr. Houston to the bookkeeper, seeing Robert start out with nothing over his office coat. He liked to be comfortable himself, and wanted his employes to look prosperous and "cared for."

"They say his sister is very ill; and I guess it comes pretty hard on him. He asked me if I knew of any work that he could get to do evenings this winter. He is a good fellow and awfully fond of his people."

"Too bad, too bad! I have seen her with him; a real nice girl. Has she been sick long?"

"Three or four weeks, at the hospital. He says she is better, but he goes chasing up there ever evening just for a sight of her, as they are not allowed to talk to her much yet."

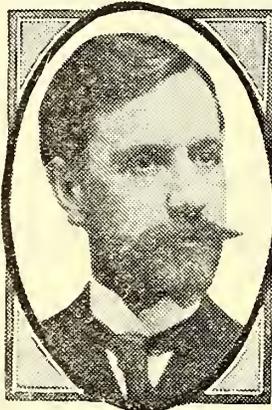

"Suppose I give him Johnson's place; do you think he could fill it? I cannot increase his salary where he is, on account of the other boys; but as Johnson is leaving, we might try him there."

"He can do the work, I am sure; he has a good head for business, and I will gladly coach him at first."

"Well, we will do that, and—you

A TRAIN FOR MILLIONAIRES

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

may give him the same amount that Johnson had."

"You are lucky, Bobby not many fellows at your age get a raise like that but you would better not mention it to the boys out there," was the bookkeeper's comment when Robert told him of Mr. Houston's offer of the new position.

"May I talk to her for just two minutes?" was Robert's greeting to the nurse that evening.

"Say nothing depressing," she replied, smiling at his eager, happy face.

"Not if I know myself," he chuckled. "O Robert!" was all that Gertrude could say when he told her, but she clung to his hand with such force that he laughed out:

"Why, Sis, I did not think that you had so much strength left you must be getting better now only get well, and won't we be happy?"

"I am happy now. O Bob, now you will get an overcoat, won't you?"

"I'll see about it but now I must take the news to the little mother." The electric car seemed a snail that evening to the happy boy but he tried to conceal his impatience and keep his feet still by a happy little whistle, almost under his breath. "A life on the ocean wave" seemed hardly bounding enough to meet the needs of the occasion.

He rushed up the stairs when he reached their home, but grew suddenly quiet as he opened the door of their apartment. He would go in gently and keep his news until he could see her face when she heard it. She knew his step and came to meet him, her face wreathed with smiles. "O Rob, I have two pieces of good news for you."

"Two, mother? Well, I have one big one for you but let me hear yours first."

"Well, in coming from the hospital this afternoon I met one of the ladies from the Dyer & Hunt office; she asked after Gertie, and said Mr. Hunt was impatient to have her come back, as the lady who is taking her place is not quick at understanding the work! I told her it would be some weeks yet before Gertrude could go back, but that it would do her good to know that her place is ready for her. Then, while I was waiting for the car, Roy Campbell passed, but he left the gentleman with whom he was walking, to come and tell me that he had just heard from the receiver of our building association that a 20 per cent. dividend is to be paid to the shareholders early next month; and that we may expect another early in January. He said he thought we would be glad to know about it. Will not Gertrude be delighted?"

Now, dear, let me hear yours."
"Yours is good, and no mistake, but now let me tell mine."

Perhaps it was just as well that the invalid received these happy tidings by degrees, or it might have been too much for her feeble condition. When on the third day she heard that her position would be waiting for her, and her mother added that with these extra resources arrangements could be made to pay most of the bills promptly, her eyes filled with tears. "O mother, how could I have had so little faith? I ought to have remembered the sparrows and who careth for them."

Children's Letters.

Burlington, N. C., Jan. 8, 1903.

Dear Standard:

My papa takes the paper, and I like to read the little letters. I go to school, I am in the second grade. My teacher is Miss Lila Bailey. I have no brothers or sisters. But I have several little neighbors that I like to play with. Now I will close.

Your little friend,

Age 7. Ruth Tate.

Pass It On.

Once, when I was a school boy, going home for the holidays, I had a long way to go to reach the little town in which I dwelt. I arrived at Bristol and got on board the steamer with just enough money to pay my fare, and, that being settled, I thought in my innocence I had paid for everything in the way of meals. I had what I wanted as long as we were in smooth water. Then came the rough Atlantic, and the need of nothing more. I had been lying in my berth for hours, wretchedly ill, and past caring for anything, when there came the steward, and stood beside me.

"Your bill, sir," said he, holding out a piece of paper.

"I have no money," said I in my wretchedness.

"Then I shall keep your baggage. What is your name and address?" I told him. Instantly he took off the cap he wore, with the gilt band about it, and held out his hand. "I should like to shake hands with you," he said.

I gave him my hand and shook his as well as I could. Then came the explanation—how that some years before some little kindness had been shown his mother by my father in the sorrow of her widowhood.

"I never thought the chance would come for me to repay it," said he, pleasantly: "but I am glad it has."

"So am I," said I.

As soon as I got ashore I told my father what had happened. "Ah," said he, "see how a bit of kindness lives! Now he has passed it on to you. Remember, if you meet anybody that needs a friendly hand, you must pass it on to him."

Years had gone by, I had grown up and quite forgotten it all, until one day I had gone to the station of one of our main lines. I was just going to take my ticket, when I saw a little lad crying; a thorough gentleman he was, trying to keep back the troublesome tears as he pleaded with the booking clerk.

"What is the matter, my lad?" I asked.

"If you please, sir, I haven't money enough to pay my fare. I have all but a few pence, and I tell the clerk if he will trust me I will be sure to pay him."

Instantly it flashed upon me, the forgotten story of long ago. Here, then, was my chance to pass it on. I gave him the sum needed, and then got into the carriage with him. Then I told the little fellow the story of long ago and of the steward's kindness to me. "Now, today," I said, "I pass it on to you, and remember, if you meet with any one who needs a kindly hand, you must pass it on to them."

"I will, sir; I will," cried the lad as he shook my hand, his eyes flashing with earnestness.

"I am sure you will," I answered.

I reached my destination, and left my little friend. The last sign I had of him was the handkerchief fluttering from the window of the carriage, as if to say, "It is all right sir; I will pass it on."—Home and School Visitor.

Gather Out the Stones.

"It is such a stony little path between here and Mrs. Harvey's that I can't bear to go over it," said Jim. "And Dick Harvey doesn't like it any better when he comes over here," said Frank. "I heard him say he had got ever so many stone bruises in that path. He was grumbling about it yesterday." "Why don't you clear the way between here and your neighbor's?" asked Mr. Morris. "You would much better do that than to take time to grumble about it." "Why, we should never get all the stones out of that path," cried Jim. "Not all in one day, nor by taking them all at once," said the father. "But if each of the boys who cross there would take a stone out of the way every time he goes, the work would be done. Try it."

The boys did try it. There were a half dozen young lads who used the path and each one helped to clear it by doing a little every time he went that way. By this means the stones were cast out and the path was cleared.

This is exactly the way to make it easier and pleasanter for others in this world. Let each one make it his business, as he goes through life, to take some little hindrance out of the way whenever he can.

Little faults should be cured and little temptations that cause unwary feet to stumble should be removed. Small unkindness should be confessed, and careless ways amended. Trifling slights should be smoothed over, and sharp words, dropped in fits of ill humor, should be taken back, as far as possible. All these things will help to make the path of life smoother. It is well worth while to clear the way. "Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people."—Anon.

Death by Neglect.

Dr. D. M. Bye, the eminent specialist, of Indianapolis, says thousands of persons die from cancer every year from no cause save neglect. If taken in time not one case in a thousand need be fatal. The fear of the knife, or the dread of the burning, torturing plaster causes a few to neglect themselves till they pass the fatal point where a cure is impossible, but by far the greater portion die because their friends or relatives, on whom they are dependent, are insensible to their sufferings and impending danger till it is too late. When Archbishop Patrick J. Ryan of Philadelphia, who has just been appointed a member of the Board of Indian Commissioners by the President, was a very young priest he was stationed at a parish in St. Louis, where Archbishop Kendrick presided over the diocese. The latter lived in a very small unpretentious house, scarcely in keeping with his position in the church.

One day when Father Ryan was passing the house of the Archbishop, accompanied by a Chicago priest, who was visiting the Mound City, he pointed out a house as the residence of the head of the local church. The Chicago priest said with surprise:

"Why you should see the splendid residence we have in Chicago for our Archbishop!"

"Yes," responded Father Ryan, "but you should see the splendid Archbishop we have in St. Louis for our residence." —Omaha Church and Home.

An Open Letter From Dr. Gregory.

Greensboro, N. C., Jan. 1, 1903.
Col. W. H. Osborn, Prest.,

The Keeley Institute,
Greensboro, N. C.

Dear Colonel:

I send you this letter to congratulate you on the success of your work with The Keeley Institute.

Like all other good and grand discoveries and inventions in the healing art, The Keeley Treatment, now so well known and successfully used, met with bitter opposition, but it has lived and flourished proving that "Truth is mighty and will prevail."

Eleven years ago, Oct. 1891, The Keeley Institute was opened in Greensboro, N. C., under your management. Being a practicing physician of the city, and having the pleasure of the acquaintance of the gentlemanly officers of the Institute, and feeling the greatest interest in the practical testing of the discovery of Dr. Keeley, I watched with close care the results; and I unhesitatingly say, that from my professional knowledge and personal observation of the Keeley Treatment, in cases in which it is indicated, that it is the best and most successful plan of cure now known. Facts prove the truth and value of it.

Year after year the good work and success have rewarded your efforts. Business has steadily increased. The year just ended shows a registration of 207 patients with a total of 3,500 since the Institute was opened. Over 100 men from Greensboro and Guilford County have been cured, and returned to their families and homes, and patients have been received from nearly every State in the Union. It would be a great pleasure if I could tell of the joyful and glad hearts this Institute has made, but I know that words can not express the gratitude that the many wives, mothers, children, and friends have felt at the restoration of their loved ones. In my own heart I rejoice with you and ask God's blessings on The Keeley Institute and its officers.

In the management of the Institute every auxiliary is used. The officers know that the patient is diseased from drink or drugs or both, and the co-operation of the patient must be had in his treatment. He is a sick man, and must be treated as such, under the direction and guidance of that skillful resident physician—Dr. B. B. Williams.

The Institute is an ideal home, the splendid residence of Gov. Morehead, with all to make it attractive and every comfort and convenience which modern invention has brought out. In connection with the Institute and for its use is a magnificent farm with its fine Jersey cattle, poultry, etc., to supply the Institute with the necessaries and luxuries to build up the broken-down man.

It is a wise and essential requirement that the patient must reside in the Institute while undergoing treatment, where all necessary influence can be brought to bear upon him and under the kind and watchful care of its officers.

Now, in conclusion, I congratulate you again and assure you that I feel the deepest interest in the Institute and its continued success and prosperity, and will always take pleasure in doing anything in my power to direct in the future, as I have done in the past, the poor unfortunate to The Keeley Institute, Greensboro, N. C.

With my highest regards and best wishes for your continued success in the future, I am very truly yours,

R. K. Gregory, M. D.

Greensboro, N. C.

Preacher's Discovery.

A Prominent Minister of Atlanta, Ga., is the Discoverer of a Wonderful Cure for all Catarrhal Diseases.

Rev. J. W. Blosser, M. D., of Atlanta, Ga., is the discoverer of a successful remedy for the cure of Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness, Bronchitis, and Asthma. It consists of a combination of medicinal herbs, roots and leaves, which are smoked in a common cleau pipe—the fumes being inhaled into the throat and lungs and exhaled through the nose. While the manner of use is simple, yet, no other means can so easily reach and cure the disease in all its forms.

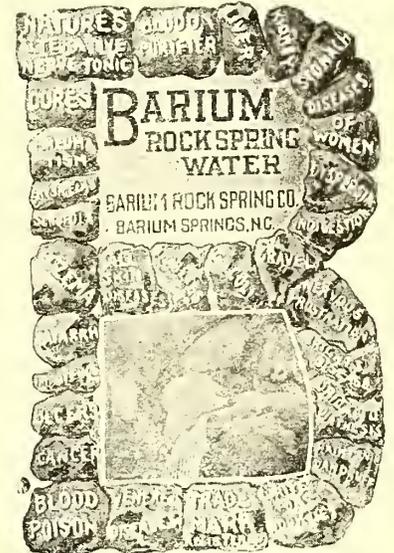

Dr Blosser offers to mail a three days' sample to any sufferer who will write to him for it. If your case is a stubborn one and you desire special advice, he makes no extra charge. This remedy has met with wonderful success, curing cases of 15, 20 and 25 years' standing.

Rev. Geo. E. Parsons, Groveton, Tex., writes: "Cured me of hoarseness. Can preach twice a day." Rev. L. A. Townsley, Covington, Ga., writes: "I am sound and well after using four boxes of your Catarrh Cure." F. A. Wynne, M. D., Atlanta, Ga., says: "Efficacious in all forms of Catarrh."

If you wish a box containing a month's treatment, send $1.00, and it will be forwarded, postage paid. Address Dr. Blosser Company, 355 Walton St., Atlanta, Ga.

GOOD FOR CANCER and ECZEMA.

McAdenville, N. C., Dec. 18, 1902.

I have been using the Barium water for a bad cancer on my mother's face and I think it is improving, and if I can keep the water for her I believe it will cure her.

Very respectfully,

Mr. Pleasant, N. C., Dec. 18, 1903

I hereby most cheerfully and heartily testify to the wonderful healing properties of Barium water. We had occasion the past summer in our family to use it in a case each of cancer and eczema with happiest results. It succeeded where everything else failed. If it were more generally known and used much suffering might be saved to humanity.

Very truly yours,

Clippings

A Philadelphia clergyman who had neglected all knowledge of nautical affairs was asked to deliver an address before an audience of sailors.

He was discoursing on the stormy passages of life. Thinking he could make his remarks more pertinent to his hearers by metaphorically using sea expressions, he said:

"Now, friends, you know that when you are at sea in a storm the thing you do is to anchor."

A half concealed snicker spread over the room and the clergyman knew that he had made a mistake. After the services one of his listeners came to him and said

"Mr. —, have you ever been at sea?" The minister replied:

"No, unless it was while I was delivering that address."

Here is a witticism which is accredited to Senator Hoar of Massachusetts. The senator was showing some of his Boston friends around the capital recently, when he pointed out a magnificent old residence built by a famous lawyer of the earlier period.

"Why," asked the frugal New Englander, "was he able to build that handsome residence by his practice?"

"Yes," replied the senator, "by his practice and his practices."—Washington Star.

New Arrival: "Can you furnish me with a robe that will conceal all the bruses I have?"

St. Peter: "Certainly. We have robes specially designed for New Yorkers."—Life.

In a letter to a friend in Atlanta a rural youngster wrote:

One of the touching spectacles of the session will be the charming deference with which any suggestions that may emanate from Uncle Joe Cannon will be received by his fellow Congressmen.—The Chicago News.

Religion slips through some people's fingers rapidly as ill-gotten money. An old Scotch Minister told his congregation the truth when he said: "Brethren, you are just like the Duke's swans in the lake yonder. You come to church every Sabbath, and I love you all over with the Gospel water, and I pour it on you until you are almost drowned with it, but you just gang awa' hame and sit down by your fire-side, give your wings a bit o' a flap, and you are just as dry as ever again."

A Michigan man owed another man $10. It was due on Tuesday. At midnight on Monday night, the man who owed the money came around, woke his friend up and told him he couldn't pay the bill.

"It worried me so I couldn't sleep, and so I just thought I'd tell you now," he said.

"Dern it," said the other man, "why didn't you wait till morning? Now I can't sleep, either."—The Lyre.

Take a short course, if you like, but my advice to you is to take the longest course possible. The length of time you wish to devote to study rests with you entirely, and should depend on what you intend to become. Just remember that when God wants to make an oak He takes 100 years, but when He wants a squash He takes six months.—The late President Barrows of Oberlin College.

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

Event and Comment.

The Church Missionary Society has just sent out 187 missionaries, one of them, Mrs. Wilson, being a daughter of David Livingstone.

"Charity and Children" is one of the brightest papers in North Carolina, but it ought to take in its sign. It is really, "Criticism of Grown Folks."

Our Cuyler Number came very near being a birthday celebration. Dr. Cuyler was eighty-one years old the Saturday before, and we join with our readers in wishing him many happy returns.

The Washington Post kindly suggests that in discussing the Gonzales murder there is no need of going to the "unjust extreme" of supposing Mr. James H. Tillman a Southern gentleman.

The Congregationalist notes that "the week of prayer was less generally observed than ever before." A good, weekly prayer-meeting would be better than a well-observed week of prayer and to "pray without ceasing" is better still.

"The dignity of the stereopticon service" has been secured, as we learn from an exchange, by putting the stereopticon itself in a room, cut off from the view of the audience. It would be an improvement to have the pictures as well as the instrument in a vacant room.

We learn that Dr. W. W. Moore is in better health than he has been for years. He is now in Rome with his family and is thinking of going to Egypt and Palestine in March. The Southern Church will rejoice to hear of his complete recovery and will be glad to have him back in his chair in Union Seminary next year.

Dr. Pearson, of Chicago, is doing a much needed work in helping the small colleges who are out of debt and know what an endowment is. The trouble about such an announcement, however, is that there are so many colleges that plume themselves on being small and whose chief recommendation is their diminutiveness.

The Anti-Saloon League of Illinois has a sensible platform and is trying to get legislation along local option lines, giving not only villages but city wards the right to say whether liquor shall be sold within their bounds. January 25, there was an united effort on the part of the pulpit in Illinois to arouse the people in favor of this just law.

Rev. J. A. McDonald, of The Presbyterian, Toronto, one of the most brilliant and scholarly editors on this continent, has been called to the editorship of the Toronto Globe. The religious press can ill afford to lose a man who has found out that it is not necessary to be dull in order to be orthodox, or erratic in order to be interesting.

Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D. D., is, we believe, the latest prophet to preach the funeral of Calvinism. And the ink was hardly dry on the pages of his paper in the Outlook before a layman in his Unitarian Church in Boston, "expressed the strong desire that the best things of Calvinism might return to us and that men might have the conception of God's sovereignty, which made Calvinism the mother of individualism in church and state and created the democratic spirit in Holland, Scotland, England and America." When Calvinism can bloom in that barren soil the Standard claims that it has not coined the phrase, "The Calvinistic Century," without reason.

The politician is a man who tries to do what the people want. The statesman does what the people ought to want. If the politician dreads the saloon it is the people's fault, primarily, for not having taught him long ago as they are teaching him now that the wrath of the people will fall upon the head of any saloon politician and follow him to his grave.

They are starting a monument to Dr. R. S. Storrs in the shape of a ten thousand dollar hospital in Fouchow, China, and one to Henry Ward Beecher in the form of a hundred thousand dollar memorial building for "institutional work." The memorials are fitting in each place, and characteristic of the conception of the gospel each great man left in the minds of his flock.

Rev. H. F. Williams, pastor of Westminster Church, Nashville, has been elected Editor of the Missionary Publications of the church. The Committee was fortunate in having him as they had Dr. Chester. in Nashville, when the vacancy occurred, and from what we have already seen of Mr. Williams' work we feel sure that a wise selection has been made. We are glad to welcome him to the editorial fraternity.

When a minister or ambassador of the United States becomes persona non grata at a foreign court he is withdrawn. That idea with regard to postoffice and customs' officials in the Southern States is slowly percolating into the Northern brain and will become intelligible after a while. The United States Government is the only business in the world that is run on the principle that it is a duty to be offensive to one's patrons.

The Interior puts a pertinent question when it asks why the business men of Chicago unanimously turned to the Salvation Army to distribute the fuel to the poor during the coal famine, instead of to the organized churches. The answer had as well be made, in spite of the humiliation involved in it, that the churches are too often guilty of sectarianism even in the distribution of a common fund and have been known to use even the liberality of the world to manufacture prose-lytes.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman has made a public statement that he had been guilty of a mistake in judgment in writing his Life of Moody. We had always thought Dr. Chapman had a right to write what he pleased and that the objection made by Mr. W. R. Moody had a good deal more of the mercenary in it than was seemly, considering that the rival biographies were of the great Christian that D. L. Moody was. But we are glad that the matter has been settled and that Northfield and Winona need not be considered rival institutions for deepening the spiritual life.

Rev. Dr. Joseph R. Wilson died in Princeton, N. J., at the home of his son President Woodrow Wilson on June 21. Dr. Wilson was born in Steubenville, Ohio, Feb. 22, 1825, was graduated at Jefferson College in 1844, and finished his theological course at Princeton Seminary. He was Professor at Hampden-Sidney College from 1851 to 1855, Professor of Pastoral Theology in Columbia Seminary from 1870 to 1874, and of Theology in South Western Presbyterian University from 1855 to 1893. He was a beloved and successful pastor of the churches at Augusta, Ga., and Wilmington, N. C. He was the first Stated Clerk of our Southern General Assembly, and for over 30 years one of the most prominent ministers in our Church. He was buried at Columbia, S. C. We hope to have a fuller tribute to his memory.

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

Violence and Murder. Less than a year ago Senator McLaurin and Senator Tillman, both from South Carolina, engaged in a fisticuff on the floor of the United States Senate, while that body was in session. They were both declared in contempt, pending the consideration of the case by the Senate. Senator Tillman had been invited to meet Prince Henry of Prussia, as a representative of the Senate at a White House reception. Being for the moment not a representative of the Senate, the hint was given that he would better decline the invitation. Senator Tillman declined to take the hint and the President withdrew the invitation.

James H. Tillman was the nephew of the Senator and the Lieutenant-Governor of South Carolina. The President had been invited to visit the Charleston Exposition and to present a sword to a young South Carolina officer who had distinguished himself in Cuba on the field of battle. James H. Tillman assumed the responsibility of withdrawing the invitation that had been given the President to present the sword to Major Jenkins—and every Southern gentleman hung his head in shame.

N. G. Gonzales was the son of a Cuban gentleman, was born on Edisto Island, near Charleston, and had achieved the distinction of acknowledged primacy in South Carolina journalism. We quote from his editorial on the occasion of the McLaurin-Tillman episode as an example of his style and of the scorn in which he held the ill-bred ruffianism exhibited:

"Saturday was distinguished not only as the birthday of George Washington, but by two of the most noted 'fistic' encounters of the period. Terry McGovern defeated Dave Sullivan at Louisville "after fifteen rounds of as desperate fighting as was ever seen in any ring," and Senators McLaurin and Tillman engaged in a bloody and desperate set-to in the most select arena of this country—the United States Senate.

"It is in order, of course, to congratulate the State of South Carolina upon again filling that large place in the public eye which she was wont to fill of old. No less than six columns of press dispatches were devoted on Saturday night to the increase of her fame. South Carolina has the proud distinction of possessing the only two United States Senators who have ever engaged in a punching and clawing match upon the floor of the most dignified legislative body on earth. It will be a long time before this claim to distinction will be eclipsed."

Mr. Gonzales had himself been a soldier in Cuba, under Gomez, before the United States declared war with Spain, and a United States volunteer during the Spanish War. The James H. Tillman incident stung him to the quick and he immediately took the steps to have the President present another sword to Major Jenkins, in the mean time characterizing the Tillman boorishness as it deserved.

Later he opposed the election of James H. Tillman to the office of Governor and the latter attributed to The Columbia State, Mr. Gonzales' paper, his defeat at the primaries. Since the election contest was settled The State has not referred to the matters in controversy nor used again the characterizations of James H. Tillman it considered justifiable during the campaign. It had branded him as a liar and a coward. Perhaps it was forgotten that a coward goaded to desperation is often the most dangerous man.

On Thursday, two weeks ago, Lieutenant-Governor James H. Tillman left the State Senate over which he was presiding officer, at its adjournment, and with a party of friends walked down the main street of Columbia. At the same time Mr. Gonzales left his office alone and started home to dinner. Mr. Gonzales was unarmed. Tillman was armed with two pistols.

As they met in the street, Tillman, without a word, drew one of the pistols and shot Mr. Gonzales through the body. The editor staggered against the wall of a building and as Tillman aimed his pistol the second time, said to his assailant, "Shoot again, you coward." Tillman was arrested and lodged in jail. Mr. Gonzales, after four days of suffering, died. South Carolina and the South could ill afford to lose his gifted pen, with its chivalrous devotion to high ideals and its fearless denunciation of the false and the cowardly and the mean. We have so few editors of his stripe that we cannot afford to lose one by an assassin's bullet.

If the facts, as thus briefly recited, are the real facts of the case, then it seems to us that the forces that make for righteousness, the pulpit, the bar, the press, and the public sentiment of a civilized people, should unite in calling for the just and adequate punishment of the murderer. If a negro had thus shot down a white citizen in the streets of Columbia he would probably have been hanged by a mob for his crime, and Senator Tillman would have defended the mob in the United States Senate. The difference in the color of the skin does not make the difference between murder and justifiable homicide.

It is not usual, and usually it is not proper, for a newspaper to anticipate by its opinions the judgment of a court of justice. But in this case the judgment has been so unanimously prophesied to be an acquittal that we are tempted to ask why that opinion prevails. The New York Herald presumes that as James H. Tillman is a white man he will not be hanged for his crime. It may be said to be current opinion hereabouts that there will be a great legal battle and that the murderer will go free. It has already been predicted that if Tillman is acquitted he will be shot by some friend or kinsman of the dead man. and this is spoken of as probably justifiable, while even the murder of the editor is excused on the ground that he had written severe accusations against the former Lieutenant-Governor of South Carolina.

And yet one of the first marks of civilization is the supremacy of law. Violation of law must occur, in civilized as well as in savage lands. The difference between civilization and barbarism is that in the former condition the violated law is vindicated by the punishment of the offender. And now what does the law say about such a case as this?

It says that the very excuse given, a wrong done months ago, is the evidence of premeditation. It says that Tillman's signed statement, that he thought Mr. Gonzales was armed is no justification, since the victim was not armed, and a coward is held responsible for the fear that drives him to murder. It says that the high office which Tillman held at the hands of the people is an aggravation of his guilt, not a plea for his acquittal. It says that the fact of more than one meeting between the two men since the end of the political campaign without the offering of violence is evident that the murder was as treacherous as it was premeditated. And the law takes no cognizance of family influence, or of political factionalism. It says that when the fact of premeditated murder is proved the murderer should be hanged by the neck until he is dead. The Bible law, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," has never been repealed.

The State of South Carolina, whose majesty has been put at naught by this open and defiant crime, should expect a patriotic duty of her citizens, the vindication of her violated peace. For if this crime goes unwhipped of justice then human life can not be considered safe in South Carolina. The precedent will have been established that the public criticism of a public man can be answered with the assassination of the critic. The corrective influence of publicity in the sphere of politics will have been destroyed. And anarchy will find a fruitful field.

We have abolished the duel in the South, because duelling was one form of murder in spite of its appeal to high courage and sensitive honor. It is not likely that we shall condone assassination. A rope's end would be a fitting termination of an era of bluster and swagger and ruffianism, of cowardly brutality toward the weaker race and of coarse affront to all the traditions of decency and refinement, culminating in this murder, an era that has afflicted South Carolina too long for her own self-respect to say nothing of the esteem of her sister states. They know too well her glorious history and her noble people to doubt that she will soon prove anew her title to their confidence.

The Sacredness of Human Life. A Northern exchange remarks that just as Senator Tillman was calling Attorney-General Knox a murderer because through an alleged non-enforcement of the laws some people had perished for want of fuel, the Senator's nephew, Lieutenant-Governor Tillman was committing murder by shooting a political enemy. Undoubtedly the North and the South have each something to learn from the other regarding the sacredness of human life. While Mr. Knox seems to be doing the best he can with a difficult problem, somebody, somewhere, is responsible for a greater scarcity of coal and a higher price for coal than even the great strike justified. Commercialism has its victims too. And where anger slays its thousands, greed has slain its tens of thousands.

Undoubtedly the South has failed in the proper regard due to the individual human life. The system of slavery required that the master should be a man of unquestioned courage and honor. He had to be just in his dealings with the slaves, and his word had to be taken at face value. Hence he resented any questioning of his word or of his courage. Hence the old-fashioned duel.

The Civil War touched the life of the South much more closely than it did the life of the North. Every able-bodied man in the South, including many below and above military age, had to be a soldier or explain the reason to his inquisitive countrymen and countrywomen. War has as one of its evils the loss of reverence for human life.

Again the presence of a race recently rescued from savagery and with a painful tendency to revert to barbarism, and the necessity of severe discipline for the sake of civilization itself has made us careless about the life of the negro criminal. But human life is human life. And disregard for the sacredness of life belonging to another race will result in the same carelessness with regard to life in one's own race. Withal, the Southern man is generally brave, even to the degree of recklessness concerning his own life. This is a good fault. Life is cheap and should be held cheap when it is one's own life and the cause for which it is staked is a worthy cause. But courage becomes a virtue only when it is coupled with a due regard for the rights of others. The truly brave man would rather die than be guilty of murder.

At the same time we verily believe that the people of these Southern States are the most kind-hearted people upon whom the sun shines to-day. The fact that their slaves multiplied to four millions while even the British slaves in the West Indies died like sheep, is a monument to the kind-heartedness of the Southern people. The affection of their slaves for them during the war that meant emancipation is the crowning proof.

It is because of this kind-heartedness that the child-labor in Southern mills is a recent evil and one that will speedily cease. What we need to learn is, that the life of any individual, white or black, noble or mean, is a sacred thing, not to be sacrificed in anger or on suspicion, and when taken at all, to be taken in defence of life or what is dearer than life, or to be taken by the state, after due process of law. Recklessness begets lawlessness and lawlessness is the mother of all crimes including murder.

On the other hand our Northern contemporary should not be too severe upon Senator Tillman and his charge of murder. He is not to be taken too seriously and his particular mention of Attorney-General Knox is probably wide of the mark. But people have suffered great physical discomfort on account of the coal famine and in the case of the feeble and sick among the poor there has been much loss of life. Somebody or bodies must be held responsible for the coal famine and the conditions that rendered it possible. The stories from the coal miners and from the "scabs" are a condemnation of the greed of mine-owners and the cruelty of labor unions, and in each case life has been sacrificed, almost without protest.

As to the continuance of the coal famine, The Interior puts the matter thus plainly: "Whoever, in hope that a rising market will bring him exorbitant profit holds fast to a necessity of life for which others suffer, is a criminal breaker of the eighth commandment and is in danger of violating the sixth."

As long as the sweat-shops exist in New York City, as long as capital is allowed to make the conditions of life too hard for existence among some who work, it is idle to talk of blood thirstiness as peculiar to the South. The man who kills in anger or even in hatred has always been considered a little higher in the scale of humanity than the man who is willing to sacrifice human life for gold.

But there is one institution which is perhaps the greatest foe to human life for which North and South are equally guilty, and that is the saloon. It will be admitted that drunkenness shortens human life just as inevitably as a bullet through the heart, or work at an unhealthy trade. And it has been proved beyond question that the saloon is the great promoter of drunkenness. The mere sale of liquor is one thing. But the business of the saloon-keeper adds to the number of drunkards that the world would have if there were any substitutes adopted for the saloon. There is no need to make extreme statements here. Drunkenness shortens life. The saloon multiplies drunkards. Therefore the saloon kills men.

It follows that the discussion of the liquor problem becomes a discussion of the value of human life. It can not be denied that any substitute for the saloon that has ever been tried, prohibition, the dispensary, the Gothenburg system, decreases drunkenness and saves life. So the man who, in the face of these facts, advocates the saloon, is an enemy of his own kind. If he does it with his eyes open and for personal or political gain he is a murderer.

A heavy responsibility therefore rests upon our Legislature in Raleigh this winter. They have in their hands the power to encourage or to check the power of the saloon. That means the power to save life or to kill. Let us strip the question down to this naked issue. Life, human life, is in the balance. And where a man throws into the other scale money, or ambition, or any other good, and life kicks the beam, a worthless thing, that man wears the mark of Cain, and should be branded as a murderer by his countrymen.

As Titus Tudor, in his remarks last week about that little hymn, begs the question in the outset and is too good a logician not to know that he is doing so, we turned to the next to the last paragraph to find out what his animus was. The real question is whether the word "angels" in the New Testament is ever used in the sense of the glorified spirits of human beings, as well as in the general sense of "messenger" and the specific sense of the heavenly messengers defined in the book of Hebrews.

I want to be an angel
And with the angels stand,

That question Titus does not discuss. But this is where he comes out strong: "Another council, greater than that of Nice, would have to be called, the grandiloquent splendor of which would be made up of Sunday-school delegates and representatives from self-constituted lay evangelists and religious tramps and Christian Endeavor delegates and free lancers in the field ecclesiastical, with two or three shrewd Yankees on the outskirts, and an equal number in the convention, all with an eye to business, selling various kinds of harps as souvenirs of a conclave called to settle the song service of the world".

After that Titus had as well sign his name in full, for his speech bewrayeth him.

However, the hymn is all right, even if Brother Walden did leave it out of his excellent hymn-book, though of course we knew that any commendation of it would be an affront to the hippopotami mentioned some weeks ago. In fact it was left out of our hymn-book years ago.

It is argued by the friends of the saloon that the feature of the London Bill requiring the saloon to get a statement from a majority of the people saying that they want it is tantamount to prohibition. Will some one explain that confession? Does it mean that the saloon voter is ashamed to sign his name to a petition or that the anti-saloon people are really in the majority when the other side are compelled to make the issue and to win the votes? And ought there to exist an institution for which its own advocates are ashamed to go on record?

We congratulate our friend Rev. Edgar Tufts on his recent victory over the liquor traffic in Watauga county. We thought that he was doing a plenty of things as it was, as preacher, pastor, teacher, architect, carpenter and so on. But a liquor distillery had the impudence to settle down near the Lees-McRae Institute and Mr. Tufts promptly appeared in the role of a lobbyist in Raleigh. The latest news is that the Senate unanimously passed a bill prohibiting the sale and manufacture of liquor in Watauga county. Some time North Carolina Presbyterians will appreciate the good that Mr. Tufts is doing and help him to carry out his plans. We do not know a more successful work done anywhere, on the small means that he has been obliged to use.

The improvement in Charlotte as regards drunkenness shows what can be accomplished even by adding one or two dispensary features to the management of the saloons, such as early closing and screenless doors. A recent law in England makes the treating of a man under the influence of liquor criminal. Another excellent feature is the provision that when a magistrate has once declared a man an habitual drunkard it is a criminal offense for him to buy liquor at any bar-room or for any bar-room or for any bar-keeper to sell it to him for three years after such declaration. The whole world seems influenced by the new temperance movement which is being directed along sane and reasonable lines. Even Russia has lately put the entire control of the liquor traffic in the hands of the government and the improvement is already manifest.

Review of Contemporaries.

In spite of the frequent boast that correspondents are required to tell only the truth, it too often happens that the correspondent finds out which side his bread is buttered on by finding out the side that it will please the editor for him to take. One of the crying evils of secular journalism is the coloring of news to suit the views of the publisher. The Raleigh Christian Advocate mentions a case in point:

A certain correspondent in a certain town in North Carolina has been filling the newspapers with statements to the effect that in that town not a single man could be induced to sign the petition praying for the passage of the London bill. The failure is ascribed to the fact that while there is no objection to the provision which would force the saloons and distilleries from the rural sections, there is a decided objection to that provision which would force the man who wishes to sell liquor in the towns and cities to first prove that the people want him to run his business in their community.

Wonderful, isn't it? What a tender, beautiful consideration is shown for the white-aproned vender in the town! What a cruel arbitrary indifference to the rural vender, perched on his barrel scotched with corn-cobs!

Now, we happen to know that there are in that very town hundreds of people who are anxious for the London bill to pass, for the very reason that in that bill is a provision which gives the town a chance to protect itself against the saloon. Of course this is the provision which, according to the correspondent, is so obnoxious to our patriotic, conservative, fair-play-loving people.

But these are the same old tactics. Watch out for them. The Devil quotes Scripture. The saloon believes in the press.

Says the Central Presbyterian:

Our remarks upon the satisfaction expressed by anti-Calvinists over the revision work going on in the Northern Presbyterian Church appear to afford some material for criticism. We can stand it. Common sense dictates the conclusion that a measure which is hailed by opponents, in such terms as we have presented, cannot be eminently wise. We remain averse to its adoption in our own church, because it is obvious that the conservatives North have gained nothing by their success but a new expression instead of an old one. "The old is better." It is not absolutely perfect, but too admirable to be ashamed of. Reconstruction is a dangerous work.

Since when have we gone to anti-Calvinistic sources to find out what the creeds of Calvinistic Churches teach? The policy of guiding our actions by the opinions of our adversaries and trying to do the things they don't like is mighty poor policy for a church to pursue. Besides there is a question of fact involved. Do the verbal changes in the the Confession as to the sin of refusing an oath, the personality of the Pope, and the moral quality of good works done by unregenerate men, make the Westminster Confession Unitarian? If so it was Unitarian before. Does the explanation of the Third Chapter and the declaration that all the dead children are saved make the Westminster Confession Arminian? Then it was susceptible of an Arminian interpretation before. The old may be better without the new being heretical or infidel. Besides, as the amendments are published in accessible form it should be possible for a Presbyterian editor to form his own opinion and tell it to his readers without making the impression that a great Presbyterian Church has departed from the faith, on the word of a reported interview with two Pittsburg representatives of Arminian ignorance and of Unitarian asininity.

The Outlook has these generous words about the educational work the South has been doing:

The generosity and sacrifice of the South for education, taking into account the limited resources of the Southern people during the last twenty years, are just beginning to be understood at the North, and wherever understood are evoking a response which is a practical recognition of what is due to a people who have put forth heroic efforts to rebuild their social structure, and who are struggling with problems of appalling magnitude. Those who know the history of the South since the war are filled with admiration for the quiet courage, the undaunted energy, and the heroic patience with which that section has been working out its industrial and social reorganization. In no other movement has the enthusiasm, what may be called the gallantry, of the Southern character been more strikingly indicated than in the educational movement. A story of that movement is already a record of individual self-denial and heroic self-sacrifice; if it could be told in terms of personal experience, it would awaken the admiration of the whole nation. Among the men who are leading the South to-day in this new era of its development, there are none better deserving the confidence and admiration of the nation than men like President Alderman, President Dabney, and Dr. McIver.

The three names mentioned are worthy names, but other men have labored that they might enter into their labors. By the way Dabney and Alderman and McIver are all Presbyterians. In fact we believe that Rev. Edgar Gardner Murphy and Professor Claxton were about all that saved the Southern end of the Education Board from being entirely Presbyterianized.

The Southern man who bubbles over in talking about the Old South is generally trying to curry favor with the North. Fortunately his rebuke sometimes comes from a Northern source. Here is Bishop Kinsolving of Texas writing a book on Missions and the editor of the Church Standard of Philadelphia correcting his crude misrepresentations.

"In years gone by we had treated the slave with contempt, and not as a brother. We refused him Christian marriage and family life and education. We trafficked in human flesh and blood, and we suffered the consequences." There is truth in this arraignment, but many thousands of veracious persons, speaking from personal knowledge, would pronounce it to be an exaggeration, and surely the indiscriminate manner in which the Bishop brings his sweeping charge against the "Southland," is a half truth which must include a certain misrepresentation. So far as we can see, the race prejudice, or aversion, or instinctive separation—call it what you will—is quite as strong at the North as at the South, and is much less kindly. Nor can we admit that this instinctive separation, however unreasoning it may be, is altogether useless. We believe it to be providential, and we note with satisfaction that, as the negro rises in the social scale, he is controlled by it, as his white neighbors are; not to the interruption of kindly feelings or kindly dealings, but by the recognition of a line which God has drawn and not man. But for this instinctive separation, the negroes of the South would by this time have fallen into even deper degradation than ever, and the population of the Southern States would be doomed ere long to become a mixed breed in which the vices, rather than the virtues, of the two races might be combined. Many thousands of reputable persons will pronounce it to be a considerable exaggeration to say that, even in the time of slavery, the negro was "refused the privilege of Christian marriage." It is unhappily a matter of history that the law did not protect the marriage of the negro; but every one who knew plantation life in those days knows it to be a fact that one of the chief difficulties of the master was to maintain among his people something like a decent respect for their conjugal relations. This is too large a subject to be dealt with in a few sentences; but it is possible to be so impressed with the separation, social and otherwise, between races so widely different in origin and temperament as the Caucasian and the Negro, as to forget that a complete disregard of the difference between them must result in a disastrous amalgamation. Christianity teaches no such lesson. What it does teach is that every Christian man of every race shall regard and treat every other man, of whatever race he may be, with all the fulness of Christian justice and Christian charity.

Devotional.

The Surrendered Life.

The apostle could cry: "For me to live is Christ." Can we say that? Does Christ dwell within our hearts in such power that all our life is lived for Him, our Brother, our Saint, our Saviour, our God? Happy are we and happy will we be if our life is in Jesus, our Saviour. Dr. D. Hayes Agnew, the great surgeon, when a poor minister asked for his bill, had joy in saying: "You owe me nothing. To your Master and my own I owe all things, and to serve one of his poor suffering messengers is but a little service rendered to Him who gave Himself for me." The physician, the statesman, the lawyer, the farmer, as certainly as the preacher, can live in Christ, can surrender all to Him who is at once the lowly peasant saint and the Son of God. Gladstone said: "All that I think, all that I hope, all that I write, all that I live for, is based upon the divinity of Jesus Christ, the central joy of my poor, wayward life."—Central Christian Advocate.

Remember Jesus Christ.

I think very many times of the one I love best. When in the night I awake, my first thought is of her; and when early in the morning the sunrise comes stealing into the room, my first thought is of her, and constantly through the day my mind goes out to her. I think of all the sweet things she has said, of all the sweet and loving things she has done, and I do remember her. I wish I might as often, and as well, remember Jesus Christ. Dear friends, let us begin it now. To-night when you lie down to sleep, try to bring back some scene or word from Jesus' life, and think of him; and if in the darkness you awake, remember him, and to-morrow morning, when the sunrise softly comes, remember him. Let us begin now remembering Jesus Christ.—Robert Speer.

Kindness.

"The greatest thing," says some one, "a man can do for his Heavenly Father is to be kind to some of his other children." I wonder why it is that we are not all kinder than we are. How much the world needs it! How easily it is done! How instantaneously it acts! How infallibly it is remembered! How superabundantly it pays itself back! For there is no debtor in the world so honorable, so superbly honorable, as love. "Love never faileth."—Henry Drummond.

Have you ever thought what a change it would make if you believed with all your heart and soul and strength and mind that God is? This one belief would alter everything. Some may even think that it would change too much; if we realized God as he really is, we could think of nothing else. This I do not admit. The thought of God should be to the best of our thinking, like the sky to other objects of the landscape—always there, blue, serene, unifying. In his presence, constantly and steadily realized, everything would find its right place: it would be easy to do right and difficult to do wrong. In fact, the problem of life would be solved.—James Stalker.

The spiritual life is enhanced and glorified by an honest business life. The spiritual does not antagonize the natural. There is no conflict but mutual helpfulness. Christianity never taught asceticism. Its devotees were to be in the world, yet not of the world. A man too pious for citizenship is not an ideal Christian and must render unto Caesar the things of Caesar. A woman too pious to attend to her household duties is not an ideal Christian.—Rev. John Brushingham.

"Ian Maclaren" writes that there was one thing in Jesus' life that was sadder than the crucifixion, and that was for the beloved John to fall asleep while his Lord was suffering the agonies of Gethsemane.

Missionary.

When There Was a Revival in Japan.

In 1901 there was a great revival of religion in Japan and men and women everywhere were interested so that they stopped on the streets to talk of the wonderful things of God. Special efforts were made by pastors to spread the good news; in Tokyo daily prayer meetings were held for fifty days. The attendance constantly increased. It was an ever-rising tide. Every church was open every night. A Presbyterian missionary, Rev. George P. Pierson, writing of this most interesting time, said:

"But the Christians, some that had slept a long time, and many, many that had been faithful, were aroused. They marched round the streets handing out notices and stopping here and there for wayside preaching. Children took part and all ranks of people joined in. Fine ladies might have been seen handing out tracts and invitations. A high Christian official, seeing such a lady working thus on one of the chief bridges of the city, said: 'Well, well, this means something when a Japanese lady will descend to such work. She is moved by no ordinary motive. This is the power of God.' The ladies would also stand at the church doors and receive and guard the footgear of those that came to the services. You know in Japan not only the ordinary house but some public places are matted and shoes should never be worn on the mats, so people leave their shoes, slippers, sandals, clogs, etc., at the door and a man there takes charge of them. This is considered quite a menial task, but they did it—these ladies.

"Each house in the district was visited and a two-leaf tract was left. On one side of the tract was a simple statement of the way of life, on the other was a list of the churches and preaching places throughout the city, and somewhere on it an invitation to come and hear. Fine cardboard placards were hung up in all the barber shops and bath houses. One woman, seeing one in her usual bath house, was disgusted and went to another, where, finding a similar placard, she changed again, but wherever she went she could not avoid them. The meetings themselves were crowded. After the Gospel had been presented, people were invited to sign a paper committing themselves to become inquirers and at the same time acknowledging the fact of there being one God and one Saviour. As a result 500 or 600 people in Tokyo signified their desire to become Christians. 'If you go to Tokyo now,' said Mr. Tamura, 'you will find all changed; the weakest churches have become strong. Everybody helped everybody else and everybody preached everywhere.'"

"In the Presbyterian Korea Mission marked success has been gained from the first. Thus, according to the last report of the Pyeng Yang Station, it has one central church with 18 associated places of meeting; 179 recognized out-stations, each having from one to six meeting-places, and 16 or more additional groups. The total adult membership numbers 2,944. Seven hundred and eighty-four adults were baptized on profession during the year: there are 3,837 catechumens, making a total of 11,905 adherents who are more or less regular church attendants. Of the native assistants there are 73 unsalaried local leaders and 19 helpers who travel on circuits. All but six helpers are supported by the people. There are 152 churches and chapel buildings, nearly all provided by the people; 46 have been built this year. There are 41 school teachers, 30 of whom are supported by the people. This is characteristic of the whole Korean Mission."

Once a Brahman, the greatest lawyer in India, stood up before an audience and told them, in a beautiful English oration that it was madness to shut their eyes to the fact that the religion which had conquered Rome and all the Western world had come to India. They must face the new religion, and deal with it honestly and frankly. "And who," he added, "would not wish to deal with it honestly and frankly in the presence of its Founder, the peerless Christ."—Exchange.

Sunday School Lesson.

CONDUCTED BY REV. H. G. HILL, D. D.

Paul at Athens.

Acts 17, 22-34. February 1, 1903.

Paul on Mars' Hill in Athens, addressing the Areopagus, is a most interesting figure. He speaks to the most cultured and intelligent audience in the then known world. Others of renowned deeds and eloquent speech have occupied his position. But Paul has a far higher mission than his predecessors for he has the grand privilege of revealing the unseen Jehovah. He does not accuse his hearers of being "too superstitious," but compliments them upon being "very religious." In proof of this he mentions that in their city, filled with statues to many deities, he had found one "to the unknown God." They had erected this less they should fail in doing homage to some divinity through ignorance. This "unknown God" Paul claims to reveal. The teachings of his discourse and its results deserve consideration.

I. Some Doctrines He Inculcates.—Some people object to doctrinal sermons, but it would be difficult to find one more crowded with profound doctrines than this discourse of Paul. He affirms the doctrine of the creation and declares "God made the world and all things therein." He states the Divine Sovereignty and asserts "He is Lord of heaven and earth." He intimates man's dependence and says, "He giveth to all life and breath and all things." "For in Him we live and move and have our being." He inculcates the unity of the human race and declares, "And He hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth and hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation." This doctrine of the unity of the race was not believed by the Athenians who deemed themselves made of superior clay to that used for barbarous nations and this nation of the ancient Greeks is not yet wholly extinct in the world. Paul also teaches the Doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, as assured by the resurrection of Jesus Christ. He furthermore maintains human responsibility to God, and points to a day of judgment when men will be held accountable for character and conduct.

II. The Duties Enforced.—Doctrines should be expounded that duties may be made clear and emphasized. Paul declares that men should seek God. He says, "That they should seek the Lord, if happily they might feel after and find Him though He be not far from every one of us." If Jehovah is the Creator and Sovereign and we are entirely dependent on Him and if He is to determine the destiny of our nature for eternity then we should certainly seek Him in His appointed ways. Another duty enjoined, is repentance. The apostle affirms, "But now commandeth all men every where to repent." Men are not only creatures but sinners and in seeking the presence and favor of a holy God, must turn from sin. This is the condition of pardon, "Let the wicked forsake his way and the unrighteous man his thought and let him return unto the Lord and He will have mercy upon him unto our God for He will abundantly pardon." The salvation of God in Christ is a salvation, not in sin, but from sin. "He shall be called Jesus for He shall save His people from their sins."

III. The Results of Paul's Sermon.—These are much the same as those produced by faithful gospel preaching in our day. Some mocked and especially derided the doctrine of the resurrection. Men now often ridicule doctrines of Holy Writ that are distasteful to them. Others procrastinated, saying, "We will hear thee again of this matter." How many now under powerful preaching defer seeking God and repenting of their sins! But some believed and united with Paul as disciples of Jesus and a few belonged to the highest social rank.

The Wish Father to the Thought.

The wish to know how many of our pastors and elders have responded to any or all of Mr. Hoon's questions in the Standard of January 7th, grows stronger as one ponders over the needs of our young people. Have officers of the church the real welfare of the young people at heart? No one can answer other than yes. Do they fully realize that to-day a condition, not a theory, confronts the church: that the church is not only losing the efficient service of the young, but that a tendency to worldiness, a tendency to lower Christian ideals, is gradually taking form in the lives of many of our young people whose natural piety is sadly deficient by reason of the lack of opportunity for religious activity?

It is very gratifying to find so large a per cent. of our membership among the young people. It argues well for the future. Nevertheless it is sad to realize that they have no permanent place of responsibility and active work in the church. Consequently they are drifting helplessly on the sea, void of religious experience and in their lives practicing questionable things. To have no safe-guard against these things causes them to lower their Christian ideals. A man will either live up to his ideal or will drag down his standard to his own level. Our young people are in urgent need of spiritual exercise and development.

The infant by ceaseless motion and constant endeavor to use its baby limbs grows in strength and stature. The physical body by careful observance of hygienic laws and proper exercise develops health and strength. Deprive it of these things and the body will sicken and die. "The new-born babe" in the Lord must be fed the "sincere milk" of the Word in order that it may grow into the "full measure of the stature in Christ Jesus" our blessed Master. Feed the young upon the Word, but don't gorge them and then put them to sleep. No, they must be given opportunity for using the strength which they receive from feeding upon the Word, in order to "grow, wax strong in the spirit," and to increase "in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man."

An active young Christian will not lead a questionable life. An inactive one will. Hence to provide regular duties for them in the church is a safe-guard to their religious life and welfare.

Again, by reason of the fact that so large a per cent. of our membership is among the young people is the strongest argument for more earnest attention being given to this phase of church work. They have the natural right to serve their Lord and Master in the church. The good Master set no age limit to His kingdom nor his service, but to the contrary carefully warned his disciples and hearers concerning the danger of offending the "little ones."

It is a crime to deny to the young, food and exercise for the physical body and is not such conduct in regard to their spiritual lives "the offence" spoken of?

Some one may wonder how the young are being deprived of their spiritual rights. By indifference, my friends, by indifference upon the part of Christians concerning the great and crying needs of the young people of our church.

We trust the North Carolina Presbyterians will second the earnest efforts now being put forth for this work by their Synodical Committee. John K. Roberts. Carthage, N. C.

The above article is contributed by Rev. John K. Roberts of Carthage, N. C. Hereafter this column will be devoted to furnishing suggestions to the young people to aid them in the conduct of their meetings. We hope it will prove helpful and interesting.

How the Oldtown Presbyterian Church Got a New Pastor With the New Year.

It has been told in these columns how the Verdantville Church secured a new twelve hundred dollar preacher by the simple and effectual process of shooting Rev. Samuel Senex with a silver bullet. There has just come to my knowledge another case in which a preacher was made over again, not by encouragement from without, but by transformation within. At least this is the way I account for what has just happened in the steady-going Presbyterian congregation of Oldtown, who will not soon forget the surprise given them by their pastor on the first Sunday of this New Year.

To put it mildly, they had gotten somewhat accustomed to the Rev. Reuben A. Longsticker, who has had ministerial charge over them for the past fifteen years.

Not that they were tired of him. On the contrary, his ministrations in the gospel were as much a matter of comfortable satisfaction to them as the wearing of their Sunday-go-to-meeting clothes. His sermons were of that orderly character which enables a congregation to anticipate from the beginning what the middle and end is going to be. They were always cast in the same mold, and that mold was determined when he was in the theological seminary, according to the rules of a famous text book, then and now an authority upon sacred rhetoric in that institution. First came the exordium, usually an anecdote or other illustration leading up to the subject of the discourse; then came the theme, the statement of his subject in a concise, well-worded proposition; then the amplification of the subject under three, sometimes four, heads of doctrine; then the peroration. This last, in the hands of Mr. Longsticker, nearly always took the same shape. After addressing himself to professed Christians for something like twenty-five to thirty minutes, he would say, "And now, my impenitent hearer"—and then the congregation might know that the end of the sermon was near at hand.

It remains to be said, in justice to Brother Longsticker, that while following this inflexible form, his sermons were highly polished, the thought strong, the illustrations apt, the closing appeal fervent. Indeed, having often heard him preach, I have thought that he came very near to being that beau-ideal, scholarly clergyman which most Presbyterian ministers naturally seek to become.

On this New Year Sunday a more than usually large congregation paced decorously up the carpeted aisles of the Oldtown Church and took their seats in the well-cushioned pews. Mr. Longsticker entered the pulpit, the choir sang the New Year anthem, the congregation rose and joined in the doxology, and then—nobody could tell what the change was, but somehow, from the first words of the invocation, a new preacher stood in the pulpit before them. With his first sentences, a solemn hush seemed to settle down upon the congregation; as the service went on, the sensation deepened; at the close of the second prayer, the white-haired elder in the front pew, who alone in the crowded house followed the custom of our fathers by standing during the prayer, remained on his feet for a few seconds gazing upward and whispering to himself, "This is none other than the house of God; this is the gate of heaven." When Mr. Longsticker gave out his text he remarked that it was the first time during the fifteen years of his ministry among them that he had preached from that passage. The text was Jer. 1: 7. "The Lord said unto me, say not, I am a child, for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command thee thou shalt speak." The burden of the sermon was the simple thought that the man who stands before the people Sabbath after Sabbath, ought always to bring a message direct from God. After developing this thought at some length in his usual perspicuous style the preacher stepped slightly to one side of the pulpit with his left hand resting on his unopened manuscript, and began to talk to his people face to face and heart to heart. Soon many in the audience were leaning slightly forward as if drawn by the preacher's voice. As he drew to a close he seemed to gather himself up, and pour the energy of his mind and the intensity of his soul into the hearts of his congregation. Yet the singular power about the sermon was, that in some way the preacher's personality seemed to have disappeared, and every hearer felt himself to be alone and facing the very word of God. While the truths of the sermon fastened on every mind, and the logical power of a well-ordered discourse held them as in a vise, there was something far higher, a divine unction which had wrapped itself about the preacher and made his every word the echo of his Master's voice.

"It was a deeply impressed, almost awe-struck congregation who went noiselessly out of the building, and dispersed quietly to their homes. When the white-haired elder got home from service, there was a rapt expression on his face which startled his wife, who had not been able to get out to preaching. "Why, you look as if you had seen a vision," said she. "I have," he answered. "I have seen the Lord's glory and his power in his sanctuary to-day, as I have never seen them there before."

"I had not heard that we were to have a strange preacher to-day," she said. "No," said he, "it was our own preacher, but, thank God, he has been anointed with fresh oil."

And now for the sequel to this story, or more properly the real beginning of it; and that takes us back to Mr. Longsticker's study. The date is Dec. 31st, 1902, the time is near mid-night, the preacher is on his knees before God. For some hours he has been bowed thus, and he is now pouring out his soul in broken-hearted supplication. This night the Lord has met with him, as he did Jacob of old. Touched with a gleam of the judgment to come, his whole past ministry has risen before him, his formal prayers, his coldly intellectual sermons, his easy-going pastoral work. He sees with an agony indescribable, how many souls have gone down to perdition, who sat for years and slept under the sound of his preaching. He thinks of those who still remain formal professors of religion, self-satisfied worldlings, who gather Sabbath after Sabbath in his church, and go away contented, careless, while having no hope, and without God in the world. He groans and agonizes over his barren, powerless ministry. But the Lord, who is dealing with his soul goes deeper still. He is made to see his low, selfish ambitions, his personal self-seeking aim in life, his lack of a supreme absorbing devotion to the work of Christ and the needs of a perishing world. And as the New Year dawns upon him, his whole soul goes out in strong crying and tears, as he prays for newness of life in a closer walk with God, a new self-dedication to the blessed Master, a new anointing with the Spirit's power.

And the scene closes with the following entry in Mr. Longsticker's diary, which I transcribe as nearly as possible in his own words:

"With the New Year now beginning I would enter into a deeper self-dedication to Him who bought me with his own blood. I lay at His dear feet my future, leaving all its plans to Him. I give up my pride and self-seeking, every vain ambition, every selfish desire. I want to do just that work, and no more or greater than He wants done, and yet no smaller or less arduous than He calls me to do. To this end I supplicate the filling and sealing of His Holy Spirit.

Here's my heart, Lord, take and seal it. Amen.

And this, as nearly as I can describe it, is how the Oldtown Presbyterian Church got a new preacher with the incoming of the New Year.

I do not say that Mr. Longsticker may not again preach some coldly intellectual discourses and offer some formal prayers, and again wake up to find himself sliding back into low ambitions and selfish aims. It is only in the fervid imagination of our Keswick friends, that one night of prayer completely transforms character, and works an entire revolution in the fixed habits of a life-time. And yet without a doubt, a new era in our brother's life as a man and a preacher has dawned with this New Year: and it will forevermore be true that a new man stands in the Oldtown Presbyterian pulpit. God, who has begun this good work in and through him, will continue it, the anointing of that Holy Spirit of promise which he has received will abide and increase. At least such is the firm and glad conviction of his friend,

The Country Parson.

Women of North Kiang-su, China.

China is a wide field and customs so different that individual experiences are not the same. I want to tell you home Christians something of woman's condition here as I have seen it in medical work and daily conversation with guests.

Woman in China usually begins her earthly career as an unwelcome guest. "It is a girl" rarely brings pleasure to a mother's heart, but if sons many she rejoices to have a daughter, or if the only child is a girl, the love for her of both father and mother is very striking, for all their hopes center upon her. I may as well say at this point why it is the Chinese are so anxious for sons. It is because they look to them for support, to keep up the family name, and to worship at their graves, which keeps their souls from suffering in the next world.

One of our servants had two girls, and when the third came she named her "unsavoury," that the spirits might know how displeased they were. Another woman here was a second wife. The first wife's children had all been girls. Her first was also a girl. This displeased the mother-in-law so, she never allowed her to nurse or fondle her baby. It was wrapped up and put upon the bed, and there it stayed, except when feeding time came. That same baby is none the worse for her infant trials. She has developed into a nice girl, is in our Sabbath school, and the only girl in Suchien that I know who does not bind her feet. In our part of China there is no infanticide.

The next event in a woman's life is at five or six years of age, when her mother begins to bind her feet. This is a pitiful sight. You will see the happy little thing rollicking around, jumping about, just like an American child. Another day you see her—her smile not so bright—she sits instead of standing, does not run as formerly; you ask the reason and find her feet are being bound. As I have seen foot-binding it is more an annoying and disagreeable custom than one that causes acute suffering or injures health. In Southern and Mid-China, where rice is largely cultivated and the working women assist with that, many of the women do not bind their feet, but with us every woman does—some tight, some loose, but all bind. The method of binding is to use a bandage of strong cloth, forcing the toes, except the great one, under the foot. She is supposed to walk on her heel and great toe, but in reality the toes become so sore from corns and irritated skin, that many of them walk on the heel only. A woman with her foot unbandaged cannot stand up.

There is a special society at work against this custom, and the Christian schools require all to unbind their feet, but only a beginning has been made.

The bride's feet are the first thing noticed and remarked upon. The men of China have to be educated to want big-footed wives before much can be done.

The next epoch in a woman's life is when about fourteen. She is then shut in, and appears no more in public until her wedding day. If a man comes to the house she is kept in an inner room until he leaves. The little girls come to our guest rooms and play around the streets as the boys. They learn hymns and pick up a good deal of gospel truth, by coming to us as children, that we hope will bear fruit some day.

There are two not uncommon lots for a girl that brings untold suffering. One is to be sold as a slave and the other to be reared by her mother-in-law. These slave girls are often mistreated, but sometimes not. When grown they are married to some one by their mistress or taken as concubines by the master. A woman is never left unmarried, except those of ill-fame.

The child being reared for the son's wife by his mother suffers so much, until it has become a proverb for suffering. This seems most strange, but is true. Several of my friends were thus brought up and have often told me of their sufferings. They were ill-clad, ill-fed, beaten on the slightest provocation, required to do all the disagreeable work about the house and the like.

The next event is our girl's betrothal. This may occur at any age, but more often from fourteen to twenty. It is not unusual to find a girl more than twenty unengaged. Three old women usually arrange the affair. The man appoints a day to exchange betrothal papers, and with his, he sends the bride-elect a present, which is usually bracelets, a ring, and head ornaments. Friends are invited to a feast, heaven and earth are worshipped and the ancestors as well. The girl then waits at home until her future husband names a day for marriage.

I suppose the most trying time in any woman's life in China is the bride's first day. She has lived a life of seclusion at her father's house, seeing only the few women visitors. For three days before her marriage she is allowed very little to eat, and on her wedding day may not even drink tea or water. In this weak, semi-starved, nervous condition, she is put in a chair and carried off, she knows not where, to become the wife of a man she has never seen. Her father or brother escorts her, but does not stay. Her mother-in-law's reception is to pull out the hair of her forehead for about one quarter of an inch and comb the hair back instead of parting it, as all unmarried girls do.

She is then put in her own room and not allowed to speak, but any one, both men and women, may go and stare at her, saying what they please about her. It is for this occasion they want small feet, for they are the first thing criticized. The bridegroom's friends make things lively by throwing peanuts or walnuts at them. They often row half the night. It is custom, and no way to prevent it. A good many manage to live through it.

As was customary among the Jews, the crowning joy of a Chinese wife is motherhood. If the wife has no child her lot is hard indeed. We remember Hannah's sorrow. The Chinese wife is laughed at and often persecuted not only by home folks, but by neighbors as well if she has no child, and besides this she has the horror over her of the other wife, which every husband has the right to get if he has the money. A son is such an important possession that a wife, if she becomes old and has none, will often get another wife herself.

Some one has said the meanest thing in God's creation is a mean woman. This is most manifest in the Chinese mother-in-law. She is the one feared. If a girl does not listen to reason, they say to her: "What will become of you when you get to your mother-in-law?" She seems to try to get back in full out of her daughter-in-law what she herself has suffered. A girl we know was married recently into a family where there was no mother-in-law. The Chinese remarked she would have an easy time; only her husband to please. Husbands and wives often get angry and fight on their own responsibility, but it is oftener his mother who forces or persuades him into beating his wife.

Mrs. Dong, one of our women servants, says her husband never did whip her; that she stayed from home once for three days because his mother wanted him to. If he had been at home and not done it, he would have been unfilial; he must obey his mother.

When you consider the Chinese family, the wonder is not that they quarrel, but that they ever cease. Each son brings his wife home, until the family will have from forty to one hundred members living in the same enclosure. The children are not controlled; whether boys or girls, in their youth they have no religious training as a controlling principle, so how can they live in peace?

We Christian people could not live happily under the same circumstances; and we see also the necessity of the mother-in-law, for the establishment must have a head.

Just a word as to the other wives or "little wives" as they are called here. They are in fact concubines. A man has but one true wife. The others keep their own name and do not wear the red clothes when married, the sign of a bride. These are always girls or widows, who are sold by those who want money more than a good name, for it is considered disgraceful here to sell one to be a concubine. They have a saying that money made that way will never do anybody any good. These little wives are never allowed to visit their fathers' home, or go anywhere else. They are under the true wife, and often cruelly treated. If they have sons, they are considered the true wife's. They have no appeal.

As our father's did, so do we, and the women seem especially bound by customs.

Every woman, according to age, has her dress, head dress, manner of arranging hair, shoes, and everything related to her apparel, fixed by custom. No woman dares show the least independence. Mourning, which is always white, is worn a certain style according to the nearness of the deceased. The bride must be dressed a certain way and go through certain forms. When her first month is complete she visits her mother, and may only stay nine days. The expense of her visit must all be borne by her family. A woman cannot appeal to law, but she has a stronger power in her father's family, or by taking opium or in some other way committing suicide. Her husband's family stand in such awe of this termination that they dare not go beyond a certain degree of ill-treatment. Our water-carrier was so beaten by his wife's relations that he could not leave the house for a month.

I will now mention three striking characteristics of our women—modesty, sympathy, and mother love. Modesty is the one of these to be emphasized. Shut in as they are from society until their marriage, and after that only the poorer classes going out unless in a closed chair, they are usually bashful and modest. This trait is often most marked, even among the lowest classes. In my daily association with the women of Suchien not a guest or a servant has made an unseemly remark in my presence, nor asked me an improper question. This has been a surprise to me. They have their immoral, immodest women, but these are condemned by the Chinese themselves.

While many of the women are cruel and harsh, yet their sympathetic nature often shows itself. This is often shown towards those who come as patients. Then they often sympathize with us, being so far from our mothers. When I first came to Suchien a rank heathen woman was with me. When I was taken ill, she sat by me, holding my hand, and cried over my being sick in a strange land so far from my people. They have the greatest sympathy for a girl married some distance from home, knowing how difficult it will be for her to see her mother.

What these poor mothers endure for their children is wonderful. One of the most repugnant sights I ever saw was a child dying from exhaustion after small-pox. The scabs, scarring, and drawn-pinched look of the child were horrible to see, and yet that mother was carrying it next to her person, her loose Chinese garment folded around it. This is not an uncommon way of protecting children from the cold.

To become an official, and to take a literary degree, are about the only things a woman does not do. We find them as servants, seamstresses, weavers, doing embroidery, making paper money for worship, making mats, baskets, shoes, various eatables to sell on the street; they turn the mill (as each family grinds its own what and corn) and gather grass for fuel. Then there is the singing woman, who chants in a style while she plays an instrument something like a banjo.

Also the readers; these read novels and poetry to the wives and daughters of the officials. One of these visited our guest room for months, and we so hoped she would become a Christian, but she proved to be an opium smoker, and finally drifted away. The fortune tellers are either men or women, who being blind, "are able to see into the next world." For a marriage and many other affairs, the fortune teller fixes the date.

The practice of witchcraft or sorcery is a common occupation for widows in middle life or older. These profess to cast out devils and cure all kinds of diseases by certain forms and incantations they practice. The ones treated give so much money and burn incense besides. Most of the people believe in them to such an extent that their full duty to a sick one is not done until one is called. The practice of obstetrics is entirely in the hands of women.

I should fail to give a true picture of our women if I did not mention the amount of time consumed by their toilet. The combing of their hair, oiling it, wrapping in various strings, putting on various ornaments, then the chalking and painting of their faces, and their feet require no little time and attention. The rich have maids to assist. A wealthy lady does little but keep herself fixed up.

There is one blessed thing about China—fashions rarely change—no Delineator to study, no new spring hat to choose, and the housekeepers—no table linen to keep spotless, no glass and silverware to keep bright.

It made a pang strike through our heart to read how American women cheered speakers from India at the parliament of religions as they described woman's position. Little did they realize what a missionary to the East knows, that all our happiness in the home and all our liberty and development as American women, comes not from civilization or education, but through the Saviour of men. And He it is that I, as your representative, have tried to give to burdened woman across the sea. Woman in China is not just the weaker vessel, but a reproach hangs upon her. On New Year's day it is very unlucky to meet a woman, and none would allow her to cross their doorstep that day. A servant woman coming to our place on New Year's day saw an official coming towards her in his chair. She hid herself that she might not meet him, for she knew he would curse her in his heart for being out and thus bringing him ill-luck. Because of child-bearing and the way they connect sin and suffering, woman's sin is considered the greater. Many of them are surprised to hear that a man will suffer in the next world.

One of China's saddest pictures is the weeping woman. She retires to some unfrequented spot and there she weeps, paying no attention to anything—water streaming from eyes, nose, and mouth, hair dishevelled—truly a pitiful sight. I always write under this picture, "no hope and without God in the world," Ep. ii. 12.

My appeal to you, Christian women of America, is not to unbind the feet of our Chinese sisters; it is not to relieve their physical suffering; it is not for their emancipation, but it is, that by your means and prayers you give them a knowledge of that One who brings hope and salvation.

The Parable of the Unclean Spirit.

By Rev. James Reed.

Matt. 12: 43-45.

"When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest; and findeth none, then he saith: I will return into my house from whence I came out; and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept and garnished. Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there: and though the last state of that man is worse than the first, even so shall he also unto this wicked generation."

This is one of the remarkable parables of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. This parable, as well as all others of our Lord's parables, was intended to teach and impress upon the minds and hearts of the people an important truth; and which perhaps, is more impressive than if stated in plain and naked words. But to understand a parable, it is essential that we should ascertain first, what Jesus intended to teach or illustrate by it. Not to do this, we shall be sure to err in its interpretation. We can be at no trouble in ascertaining the design of this parable, because Jesus himself has told us: "So shall it be also unto this wicked generation." We find it an awful portrayal of that generation.

Let us now notice carefully the facts stated in the parable.

"When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man." Note—gone out, not driven or cast out, but gone out of his own accord. What is meant by unclean spirit is the devil or demon. "He walketh through dry places," that is, through desert regions of country unwatered, sandy, barren, desolate! That our Saviour here speaks according to the ancient opinion of the Jews, that evil spirits had their abodes on those desolate uninhabited regions, there can be no doubt. Nor can there be any doubt that the Bible gives countenance to the opinion: Thus, Rev. 18: 2: "Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils and the hold of every foul spirit."

"Seeking rest and findeth none." What kind of rest does the devil want? I am persuaded that he wants that kind which is often spoken of, when talking about a wicked, evil-disposed man. "He cannot rest unless he is doing mischief." This no doubt is the kind of rest devils want. They cannot rest unless they are doing mischief, and leading souls to ruin. We read in 1 Peter 5: 8: "Be sober, be vigilant; because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may destroy." "Then he saith, I will return into my house from whence I came out." Note—not thrust or forced out, but went out of his own accord. He claims the man as his own house: he had full and undisputed right and possession of him, both soul and body, and had never relinquished his claim. The man was this foul spirit's house and home, and he had gone away for a temporary rest. The idea impressed on my mind is, that the man was so completely under the power and dominion of the devil, that this demon had nothing to do; and being weary with idleness, he took a walk to find some mischief to do. But was not this man a regenerated man, renewed by the Holy Ghost, when this devil went out of him? By no means. The idea that he was, is in contravention of the very design and intent of the parable, as we shall see. In Mark 9: 8, we have an account of Jesus casting "the evil spirit" out of a certain man's son, "Saying unto him, Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I charge thee, come out of him, and enter no more into him." What use or sense would there be for Jesus to cast the devil out of a man, and then leave the devil at liberty to return into him again. Jesus never worked in this useless way, but binds the devil by the same word of his power by which he casts him out, to "enter no more into him." Jesus does his work to stand. The regenerated people of God, are termed, "The temple of God," "God's building," "A habitation of God through the spirit." There is no room for the devil in "God's building, temple and habitation. He cannot enter in them. We will next consider the condition this foul spirit found his home in when he returned to it. "He findeth it empty, swept and garnished." Empty, unoccupied, swept of everything offensive to his fiendish nature. No Saviour, no Holy Spirit in it, no holy thought or desire to be found in any crack or crevice in that man's heart. Not the least particle of good in it. And garnished, adorned, put in order for its owner. "Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself and they enter in and dwell there." They enter in without the very least opposition, they find plenty of room, and a hearty welcome. Finding no place so congenial with their fiendish nature, they are content to dwell there. Devils seem to be very generous and kind to one another. "A kindred feeling, makes them wondrous kind." The number seven is said to denote in the Bible a large, but indefinite number. But a number in this case sufficiently large enough, no doubt, to make the man wretched and miserable forever. "And they enter in and dwell there: and the last state of that man is worse than the first." I here put the question, What is the first state of all men? Will any one dare to say, it is a good and holy state? But that it is a state of depravity and sin. And, therefore, in order that any man be saved, he must be born again—born from above. All are unclean, and unfit for a holy heaven. Therefore, all whom God saves, he saves "by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost." (Titus 3: 5.) Thus making them new creatures in Christ Jesus. The very phrase, "And the last state of that man is worse than the first," plainly implies that the first state was bad, positive bad, comparative worse. The first bad, the last, worse. There is not the least hint of any good state for that man. "Even so shall it be also unto this wicked generation." That is, its last state worse than the first. This unlocks the meaning of the parable. And was designed to illustrate the history of that wicked generation. We take the position therefore, that the first state of that man and of that generation was a hopeful one, and that the last state of that man, and of all unregenerate men, is a hopeless one. And if the Bible teaches this to be true of a community of sinners, then we shall claim our position to be sustained. Now we will briefly consider the history of that wicked generation. I am persuaded that we shall see that the parable does plainly and impressively illustrate the history of that generation. We will take up its history with the ministry of John the Baptist. They flock to John from every quarter. "For there went out to him Jerusalem and Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, and were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins." Would you not call that a great and wonderful revival of religion? And did not the signs look very hopeful? Professing repentance and confessing their sins. But more than that, we learn in Acts 19: 4, that John enjoined it upon them he baptized, that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus." Was not their condition at that time a hopeful one?

The ministry of Christ Jesus commenced before John's closed. And they come flocking to him in overwhelming numbers, as if in haste to fulfill their promise to John to believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus. We read that, "In the meantime, when there were gathered together an innumerable multitude of people, insomuch that they trod one upon another." (Luke 12: 1.) On one occasion they seemed determined to take Jesus and forcibly make him their king.

Again it is written of Jesus that, "In the morning rising up a great while before day, he went out, and departed into a solitary place, and then prayed. And Simon and they that were with him, followed after him. And when they had found him, they said unto him, All men seek for thee." Ah, is not this a hopeful generation? All seeking Jesus! Hear Jesus on one occasion crying out, and saying, O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killeth the prophets and stonest them that are sent unto thee: how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not." Often would Jesus have gathered them together and saved them, notwithstanding their great wickedness in killing the prophets, etc. And they would not. Were they not in a hopeful state when he would have done this? "And ye would not." Mark it, he does not intimate, ye could not, but, ye would not. "And ye will not come to me, that ye might have life." (John 5: 40.) That God has made eternal life or salvation to hinge upon the sinner's choice, is too plainly taught in the Bible to be denied. And hence life and death are set before sinners, and they are earnestly exhorted to choose life that they may live. Witness the triumphal entry of Jesus into Jerusalem. It was his last visit to Jerusalem before his crucifixion. The procession was formed at the Mount of Olives. "And a very great multitude spread their garments in the way; others cut down branches from the trees, and strewed them in the way. And the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna to the Son of David: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest. And when he was come into Jerusalem, all the city was moved, saying, Who is this?" That such a to do is made? They had no doubt that it must be some very great personage, which caused such shouting and demonstrations of honor and glory. We have heard their shouting Hosanna to the Son of David, and Hosanna in the highest, and are not all good Christians who shout? I would never object to a good pious Christian shouting. But all intelligent persons know that shouting is not a reliable evidence of a renewed soul.

We will now consider the last state of that generation; and we shall see plainly that their last state was infinitely worse than the first. A man to be possessed by one devil, and he not the worst, is terrible; but to be possessed by seven of the worst beside the first, is indescribably awful. Now we will see the turning point. When Jesus was on his triumphal march, "And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! But now they are hid from thine eyes." (Luke 19: 41.) Alas! alas! their doom is now forever sealed. Their state is now a hopeless one. "Yea," saith the Lord, "they have chosen their own ways, and their souls delighted in their abominations. I also will choose their delusions, and will bring their fears upon them: because when I called, none did answer, when I spoke they did not hear: but they did evil before mine eyes, and chose that in which I delighted not." (Isa. 66: 3, 4.) "Because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness." (2 Thess. 2: 10-12.) Was not their state a hopeful one when they might have been saved? But their last state a hopeless one? Like the Jerusalemites, there was a time when the things which made for their peace were not hid from their eyes;—a time when they might have been saved,—a time when eternal life was freely offered them without money and without price, and they would not accept it. They chose death in the error of their ways. Their souls are doomed without hope to endless despair, woe, and misery. The film is drawn over their eyes, the darkness of eternal death enshrouded them, hope has fled never more to return. They are now vessels of wrath fitted to destruction. Although such multitudes followed Jesus, the most of them followed him, no doubt, with no better motives than for the loaves and the fishes. But their hearts were not right with God. Jesus said to them, "Ye hypocrites, well did Esaias prophesy of you saying, This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoreth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me." (Matt. 15: 18.)

Again he said: "Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity." (Matt. 23: 28.)

"He that is not with me," said Jesus, "is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad." If we are not with him in heart and soul "having our fruit unto holiness," we are against him, and scattering evil abroad, and will be numbered with the workers of iniquity. Let us briefly notice the last state of that generation. We heard the shout of Hosanna from that great multitude and heard the happy shouting procession as it moved along the streets of Jerusalem; and the anxious inquiry of the astonished citizens, "Who is this?" This personage who is having such distinguished honors done him? But, alas! the shout of Hosanna has scarcely died away in the air, and this shouting procession passed from view, when the scene is changed, and the cry raised, "Away with him, crucify him, crucify him." The most degrading deaths that could be inflicted. Oh, how unstable and unreliable is popular applause; and how little are human attachments to be trusted! "Thus saith the Lord, cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his own, and whose heart departeth from the Lord." (Jer. 17: 5.) They did not stop at this crowning act of wickedness in putting Jesus to this cruel and shameful death, but persecuted and tried to destroy all who professed to believe in Jesus as the promised Messiah. Their wickedness now burst forth like fire that had been pent up and its flames could not be quenched. Let us now hear the testimony of Josephus, the faithful historian, and their fellow-countrymen; who testifies, that, "Their city was so wicked, that if the Romans had not fallen upon them, the earth would have opened its mouth and swallowed them up, or thunder and lightning from heaven would have destroyed them, as it did Sodom; for they were more atheistical than those who suffered such things. There was no one work of wickedness that was not committed, nor can any one imagine anything so bad that they did not do, endeavoring publicly, as well as privately, to exceed one another, both in impiety toward God, and injustice to their neighbors." This testimony is reliable, pointed and unequivocal, and proves beyond question, that the last state of that generation was worse, infinitely worse, than the first. "The last state of that man was worse than the first. Even so shall it be also unto this wicked generation." And so it was. And the prediction fulfilled to the very letter, and to the uttermost. We may learn several important lessons from the subject, but as this article is longer than I expected it to be; I shall leave the reader to his own reflection, with one or two remarks. And first, we learn, that all men have a first state, which is by no means a good one, but bad, yet not a hopeless one, and that every impenitent, unregenerate soul, may pass from this first state to a worse one, that is, a hopeless one. And, therefore, the impenitent sinner is in awful danger of being forever doomed to hell. And hence this subject gives loud warning to the unconverted, whether in or out of the visible church.

"There is a time, we know not when,

A point we know not where,
That marks the destiny of men
To glory or despair."

Is It Either Christian or Manly to Decry the Work of the Church?

R. W. Alexander.

Some well-intentioned, "so-called" Christian men feel called of God, to belittle the work of the church, yea to "rail upon" the institution itself, called of God "the pride of Christ." To the mind of the writer, this is an infinite pity. And the more so that these pessimistic croakings and blasphemous utterances often come from the lip and pen of men who claim to be "heirs of God," and are identified with this unworthy institution. But this is not all, nor is it the saddest fact in this matter. Occasionally, and, blessed be God, 'tis only occasionally, those who have donned her sacerdotal robes and pose before the world as her divinely commissioned ministers, crying to men from her rostrums, "Behold the Lamb of God" for sinners slain; "Christ loved the church and gave himself for it." "Come thou and go with us and we will do the good for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel,"—and then, with face upturned to heaven, tears trickling down the cheek, declare:

"Happy the church, thou sacred place,
The seat of thy Creator's grace;
Thy holy courts are his abode,
Thou earthly palace of our God.

For her my tears shall fall,
For her my prayers ascend;
To her my cares and toils be given,
Till toils and cares shall end."

I say, now and then, these "professed" friends of Jesus Christ are of those who bewail the uncomeliness and unworthiness of His pride. I have just laid aside a paper written by a minister, pastor of a large and influential church, in which he designates the church, "the so-called church, "the professed church." The church of which he is pastor is not, according to his own words, the "real," the "true" church!

Is there, or is there not, something here that smacks of inconsistency, not to say, insincerity? Would, or could, a thoroughly honest, not to say Christian, continue to be the pastor of what he sincerely believed to be only "the so-called church" of the Lord Jesus Christ? Could he?

How could he honestly, with open face and with pure conscience plead with men to identify themselves with an institution that he candidly believed to be only the so-called church—an institution that is consciously, deliberately and persistently disregarding and ignoring the commands of her Lord? What upright man wants to connect himself with a set of "spiritual outlaws"? What sane man wants to join himself to a gang of anarchists—civil or ecclesiastical? Is the church such? Who instituted the church, and for what? Of whom is it composed? Do these questions suggest any thing to your mind?

I do not believe that the church is a great big chaff pile. I believe that there is, in the church, more wheat than chaff. There is more sunshine than rain—more of health than sickness in the world.

Perfection for the church is not claimed in this paper. In the lights of the parable of the tares, given by the great Head of the church, how could one advance such a claim? The fact is, since the Edenic catastrophe there has been no perfect institution on earth; nor perfect man, either—save the Man, Christ Jesus. I am aware that a few isolated ones, "mistaking the leprosy of their pride for the whiteness of their innocence," have laid claim to perfection. But man is not perfect. Even these "perfect" men are very imperfect!

The church is not perfect. Both wheat and tares are found in her communion. Nevertheless, it is "the body of Christ." And when by the "professed" friends of Jesus—those robed in the gown and phylacteries of the sanctuary, such unrighteous aspersions are cast upon this the purest and best institution "known among men," the writer feels right much as did the Moslem who resented the wicked counsel of Cardinal Julian, and had inscribed upon his banner behind which he rode into battle, "O Jesus avenge the insult to thy name."

What distinguishes the United States of America from China? In what consists her superiority? Verily, in something else than color of skin and geographical position. By whom have the strong been taught that the weak have rights and that these rights must be respected? Who is responsible for the presence of magnificent buildings that have sprung up all over this and almost every other land in the form of Asylums, Sanitariums, Hospitals and Refuge Homes? I wonder if the "so-called" church can claim any share in the glory of all this? Who is sending "good tidings of great joy" beyond the seas?

Already I have claimed too much of your space; I, therefore, close with a quotation from Washington Gladden: "Ardent and strenuous souls, who discovered the short comings of the church, and deplore them, are quite too apt to overlook and belittle the work that she is actually doing. There has never been a time, since the days of the Apostles, when the church of Christ was not exerting a powerful influence in behalf of unity and brotherhood. The churches are doing a vast amount of practical charity—doing it in a quiet way, without sounding any trumpets in the streets—a far larger amount of this kind of work, in my judgment, than is done by all other agencies put together. . . . It is doing, ordinarily, a great deal better work than the people who carp at it are doing."—Social Facts and Forces, pp. 206-207.

What Will He Do With It?

By Rev. H. H. Hawes, D. D.

The question is for him who is able to do much more than he does, or ever did for our Lord Jesus. Many such there are—probably. Somewhere or other there is a law of duty. Some circumstances may call for extreme action: others may warrant the "happy medium." What is duty?

To a young man whom He loved, our Lord said: "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me." There seems to be an extreme. Many will feel: "This is an hard saying: who can bear it?" Yet, circumstances made Jesus say it. He knew: therefore spoke He as He did. But let no one think that Jesus was antagonizing rich men as such. The ability to get rich, by right means, is a gift of God. Brain-power, health, opportunity, etc., are God's gifts. What is to be the end of their use? Do we remember the answer to the first question in our catechism? Recently a little boy gave a new version of it—and, perchance, spoke more to the point than he knew: "Man's chief end is to glorify God and annoy Him forever." How many times do actions repeat it so? Thousands profess to "glorify God" by their acceptance of Jesus Christ: then they "annoy Him" by repeating the history in Luke XII. 16-19, in a mighty pulling down of "barns" that greater may be built for bestowal of increased riches.

In the wrecking of ships men have been lost because they tried to swim to shore weighted with belts of gold. How many go down in the "sea of Time" through overburden of riches? When Jesus gave the seemingly hard law to that young ruler, He added: "Verily, I say unto you, that a rich man shall hardly (duskolos—with difficulty) enter the kingdom of heaven. It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God." Did He know? By reference to records of later date (I Tim. vi. 9-19.) it will be seen that no change came to the Divine thought.

"They that (oi boulomenoi ploutein) desire to be rich fall into temptation and a snare and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. "For the love of money"—not money—"is the root of all evil: which, while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith," etc. Does not that "annoy God?" It is when we repeat the history in Luke XII. 16-19, that the harm comes in. And will any deny that the history is being repeated, this day, by many whom God has enabled and allowed to get rich? How could they, comfortably, associate with Jesus? He was a poor man—voluntarily poor for our sakes.

How can two walk together except they be agreed? Jesus agreed to be poor that He might save this lost world. His recompense was to be, "the joy set before Him" beyond. What is the law for His followers?

Let this thought be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus." Are we letting it?

The trouble is in so much acting out that: "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years: take thine ease; eat, drink and be merry." Jesus has need of so much of the wealth expended in glorifying self! Were He—as the poor man He used to be—to come to the palaces of luxury and sumptuous living, where so many of His professed followers are, what welcome would greet Him? So far as those who have means refuse to minister to Jesus in the needs of His work, the answer is given! How many deserve the epitaph: "He hath done what he could?"

Jesus is willing for us to have a plenty of money: but that money must belong to Him as fully as we belong to Him! That is to be realized! Some day we will understand that it is better to be poor, giving all to Jesus, than to be rich, giving Him only the "leavings" after the lusts of the flesh have taken out their part! The law is: "Do not let the love of money stand in the way of eternal life!" Now: "What will he do with it?"

Rev. D. C. Rankin, D. D.

David Cyrus Rankin was born in Guilford county, N. C., of a Presbyterian ancestry. Was a student at Bingham School, King College, Southwestern Presbyterian University and Columbia Seminary. Was ordained by Savannah Presbytery pastor at Valdosta. Supplied the churches of Tarboro, N. C., Plumer Memorial, Virginia, Tabb Street, Petersburg. Was Professor in Tuscaloosa Institute and was called from the pastorate of the church at Holly Springs, Miss., to be Assistant Secretary of Foreign Missions. After serving three years in this capacity he was elected Editor of the Missionary periodicals of the Southern Church in 1893, and served the church faithfully and acceptably to the time of his death in a foreign land.

Dr. Rankin was a good man in every relation of life. He became a veritable encyclopedia of Foreign Missions and no man ever had a heart more fully in the great cause. Perhaps he did not find his best field of usefulness until he began to edit our missionary periodicals. His work in that department was faultlessly done and The Missionary became the most attractive and readable magazine published by a church. He had just completed ten years of that service when he was called to his reward. We append below a tribute from a friend in another church, published in the Christian Observer.

"I am distressed for thee, my brother; . . . very pleasant hast thou been unto me;" the words will come to mind when I think of the death of my dear friend and nearest neighbor, Dr. D. C. Rankin. I would be glad to speak a word of comfort to the hearts of mourners who stood in closest relations to this man of God; but my own heart needs the comfort that it would give. My judgment tells me that the dominant note in our souls should be that of thankfulness for the gift of such a man to the Church; but the sense of loss is so great, the grief we feel is so sore, that we can do little more than weep with those that weep, while we think of the new grave in the far East and remember that we shall see his kindly face no more on earth. These wintry skies have a deeper gloom when we think of our missing friend and brother.

So speaks my heart. I know that what God does is right, and that what He permits is best. I do not mistrust His wisdom, nor rebel against His providence. But this is the paradox of this event to us; the very qualities that make us thankful that God gave such a man as Dr. Rankin to the Church, intensify our grief and enhance our sense of loss when he is taken away.

Dr. Rankin was a burning and shining light. He had a zeal that was according to knowledge. He was a living encyclopedia of missionary information and religious knowledge in general—and his knowledge was minute and exact as it was ample. His soul was on fire with love for lost souls; it was his joy to spend and be spent in his Master's service. Had he been spared to come back to his editorial work after making this Eastern tour, he would have sown the Church thick with facts bearing on the missionary work. He burned and shined; the peril of lost souls quickened his zeal, and the love of the living Christ gave him the spring of power.

The cablegram that brought the tidings of his death, was in these words: "Rankin asleep." Brave and beloved brother, your true heart never failed to respond to the call of duty, your willing hand never rested when it could do any work for your Lord. The Parable of the talents takes on a fresh meaning when applied to such a life as that of Dr. Rankin; the reward of faithful service here on earth will be larger opportunity "Up Yonder" where the laborers shall be reckoned with by the Lord of the harvest. He will find congenial companionship among the heavenly spirits, whose office it is to minister unto the heirs of salvation. Our thought and our love follow him in his flight; through grace abiding and abounding we hope to meet him where our Lord will make good his promise that where He is "we shall be also;" and where He will also make good that other promise which our human hearts so much need in the presence of a sorrow like this; "What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."

Above all and most of all, Dr. Rankin was a Christian scholar and worker. He made all his vast and varied attainments tributary to his work as a minister of the Gospel of Christ. He laid all at the feet of his Lord. He could say with the Apostle Paul, "This one thing I do." He was truly a marvel of scholastic fulness and accuracy;—history, art, science, philosophy, literature, he knew as few men know them. He intermeddled with all learning, and what he knew he knew thoroughly. His mind was a store-house of useful knowledge, not the lumber-room of a pedant. A more transparently guileless man I have not known. He loved the truth, spared no pains in searching for it, and would have died for it, had duty called him to do so. He did not pose as a self-conscious or self-trumpeting hero or martyr: he was not of that sort. But he had the ring of the true metal, the pure gold that is only refined by the fires of affliction, of which doubtless he had some share, as do other good men who meet it uncomplainingly, knowing that the servant is not above his Lord. His life was a blessed life in the truest sense: his home was a happy one, and he was joyfully busy in his Master's work.

The true quality of men's lives may not be known until they stand before the Searcher of hearts at the final judgment; but I feel safe in saying that if ever I have known a man whose daily life would bear the most rigid scrutiny, Dr. Rankin was that man. He lost no opportunity to do good to all that came within his reach. Like his Master he went about doing good, his gifts and his service being measured only by his ability. God's dumb creatures learned to love him, being fed by his bounty and protected by his thoughtful kindness.

I am glad that God blessed my life with the friendship of such a man. I am thankful for the help he gave me in Christian living. I rejoice in the hope that through the unfailing mercy of God I shall meet him where we shall know even as we are known.—Bishop Fitzgerald.

Repressed Curiosity.

A little sermon on Acts 1-7, is appropriate, when millennialism is under discussion: "It is not for you to know the times or the season which the Father hath put in his own power." I beg leave to remind the reader that secret things belong to God. We can know nothing except what he chooses to reveal, and prophecy is carefully guarded and limited by the wisdom of God.

The prophecies of Jesus concerning the future history of man, are so obviously vital in intentional obscurity that we cannot escape the conviction that he meant to conceal, and not reveal the precise information which the curiosity of his disciples demanded. But if the apostles were denied such a privilege, surely we ought to be willing not to know what God has reserved to himself.

It is plain enough that the discourse of our Lord, in Mat. 25th, in answer to the question concerning his "coming," and "the end of the world," did not furnish any clear revelation concerning either of these objects. The sequel proves that the disciples did not know the times indicated, until after the events. This seems to suggest that we, also, must wait. Certain things are foretold which our faith is authorized to believe will come to pass, but when, and how, we are evidently taught to leave in the hands of God. Expectation is hardly warranted, but such a state of mind as would not be surprised by occurrences accordant with the predictions. The moral seems to be conveyed in one word—watch!

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

Afer writing the sketch of Dr. Rankin preceding the tribute paid him by Bishop Fitzgerald we came across this clipping in one of the best of our church papers, The Interior: "He became in 1888 assistant secretary of Foreign Missions for the Southern Presbyterian Church, and in 1893 was made editor of the denominational missionary monthly. Under his enthusiastic management the magazine became one of the most inspiring and informing contributions to missionary literature issued anywhere in the world." It is a well-earned tribute.

Country Parson is always a welcome contributor and his parables from real life are stimulating to both the pulpit and the pew. Rev. James L. Reed's exposition of the parable of the Unclean Spirit is instructive and suggestive. What Rev. R. W. Alexander has to say is worthy of attention, and Dr. Hawes is on his favorite theme. The reports from some of our faithful missionaries will throw side-lights on their work while the regular departments hold their own.

PERSONALS.

Rev. J. D. Stormont, of Sumner, Miss., has been appointed to the Home Mission work at Nephi, Utah.

The address of Rev. A. G. Buckner is changed from Buffalo Forge, Va., to Glasgow, Va., R. F. D. No. 1.

The many friends of Dr. W. E. Cave, will sorrow with him in the death of Mrs. Cave on the 28rd inst., at Paducah, Ky.

Rev. D. F. Wilkinson, who has been pastor of the Church at Crowley, La., has entered upon the work at Baker, in the same State.

Rev. R. D. Stimson, pastor of Hopewell Church, Mecklenburg Presbytery, has accepted a call to Georgia. A meeting of Mecklenburg Presbytery was called on the 24th to dismiss Mr. Stimson. Rev. J. T. Wade has resigned as pastor of New Hope Church, King's Mountain Presbytery, and has accepted a call to South Carolina. Our Synod loses two faithful and earnest ministers.

On Jan. 18th, Mr. W. M. Beatty was ordained and installed a ruling elder in the Beattyville Church, which was recently organized by King's Mountain Presbytery. At the same time two more members were added to the roll of this new, but faithful band. Good congregations attend the preaching and the Presbyterian Church finds favor in this new territory.

Concord Presbytery.

To the Ladies' Societies of the Churches of Concord Presbytery:

Dear Friends: As the Chairman of the Presbyterial Committee of Home Missions, I appeal to you for aid—financial aid—in our Mountain Mission school work. This work must be supported almost entirely by what you do. We cannot use the funds for evangelistic purposes to carry on the school work. In our Mountain district we have projected a great educational work, and it will fail or succeed just as you fail or succeed in giving to its support.

We are in dire need just now of help and I appeal to you to come to our rescue. Some of our teachers have not received anything since the schools opened in September, and we fear that we will be forced to close some of the schools; this would be damaging to our cause. The mission schools of Yancey, Mitchell and Watauga counties are laying the basis of future success. And even now most of those gathered into our church in the mountains are from the mission schools. We cannot afford to relax our energies.

We have several classes of schools.

1. Those self-sustaining.
2. Those partially self-sustaining.
3. Those totally dependent on our support.
4. Summer schools that run three months in the summer and taught by mission teachers who give us their time and we pray their traveling expenses and see that the people board them. We want a large number of consecrated Christian teachers for the coming summer. But you just first give us the "wherewith" before we can do the work.

Send us a liberal contribution at once for this noble cause. Forward to H. C. Dixon, Hickory, N. C., Treasurer Concord Presbytery.

Sincerely,

W. T. Matthews.

HENDERSON.—For several mouths our people have been quietly considering the Forward Movement in Foreign Missions, with this result: We expect to contribute $250 by April 1st, the beginning of the fiscal year. We believe we have the matter sufficiently well in hand to make the sum of $500 our annual basis for this cause, and have undertaken the support of a missionary with a salary of that amount. Last Sunday we had a most pleasant and helpful visit from the Rev. J. Fairman Prestou, who proved of much assistance in giving us definite information as to the aims and progress of the Forward Movement, and in the shaping and crystallization of the work in our own congregation.

This plan will help us to a distinct advance in the "great work," and in our judgment the Forward Movement cannot be too cordially commended. Henderson substitutes definite, systematic, intelligent giving for what is too often merely emotional and sporadic.

The pastor of the church must acknowledge very gratefully the kindness and generosity of the people to himself, continuously and heartily expressed from the time of his coming to the work eight or nine mouths ago. During Christmas he was "remembered" by a large wagon load of handsome furniture, carpets and the like. This is nothing new, but only in line with this church's ancient and well known willingness to communicate: which constant regard for their pastor's comfort may boast with The Brook, that:

"Men may come and men may go,
But I go on forever."

MEBANE.—On January 4, Capt. H. A. Basen and Mr. Henry O. Jobe were ordained and installed Ruling Elders in the Mebane Church. This church enters upon the New Year with very bright prospects.

R. W. H.

CONCORD.—Within the past two weeks the First Presbyterian Church of Concord, has received fifty-one new members, eleven by letter and forty upon profession of faith. Of the latter all but one were from the pupils of the Sabbath-school. There are some three or four more yet to be received.

It was a season of great blessing for the entire congregation. Beginning with Jan. 4th and continuing through Jan. 11th, there were preaching services twice a day by the Rev. R. G. McLees of Greenwood, S. C., an evangelist of South Carolina Presbytery.

DAVIDSON.—The college and community have been in a state of painful suspense for nearly a week while the lives of two popular young men of the Medical College, J. M. Boyce, of Blacksburg, S. C., and O. R. McLeod, of Robeson county, N. C., have been hanging in the balance, and seemingly with little hope of recovery. At this writing (Friday afternoon, 23rd) Boyce appears to be slightly better, and McLeod in a desperate condition. In the treatment of the case all remedies proved unavailing and the doctors as a last resort telegraphed Dr. Barrows of New York for directions in the use of a new preparation of formalin by hypodermic injection, notice of which as a startling discovery appeared in the New York Herald a few days ago, in which the claim was put forward that the discovery was likely to mark an epoch in the treatment of septicaemia, or blood poison. The results from these injections which have already been tried several times on these young men are awaited with intense interest. The dangerous illness of the two grew out of work in the dissecting room. It seems that they were handling a subject that contained the poison in its most virulent form. It was subsequently discovered that one of McLeod's hands had a slight abrasion of the skin, though he was not aware of this, and that in this way his system became infected.

Boyce the same afternoon was cut slightly by a sharp pointed instrument and took the precaution of canterizing the wound, but evidently did not do the work thoroughly. In a few days both patients developed unmistakable signs of acute and virulent blood poison. Their almost hopeless condition, conscious as both have been all the while that they would probably have to die, and yet heroically and calmly facing the inevitable, has spread gloom over the town and prayers in public and private have ascended to heaven that it might be God's good pleasure to spare them for the lives of usefulness that a few days ago seemingly lay so bright before them.

Mr. Van Horn, of the Asheville Association is conducting this week a series of meetings in the Y. M. C. A. The an-ditorium is filled every night by the students and faculty who are hearing with great pleasure and profit his strong heart-to-heart evangelistic talks and addresses. It is hoped that as happy and abiding results will flow from these meetings as those conducted by him here three years ago, when there was a marked spiritual awakening in the college. Several services preparatory to the communion on Sunday are also being conducted by the pastor in the church.

Dr. Smith has been meeting with many hearty responses to his appeals in the interest of the Davidson League that he is having an architect draw up plans looking to immediate repairs and changes in the Chambers or Main college building. As the first change the tremendous auditorium will be cut in two, horizontally reducing the height of the walls 15 or more feet. The entrance hereafter will be level with the third floor and that part of the hall whose walls extend from the level of the second to that of the third floor can be used for making new laboratories and class rooms. Hundreds of feet of space can be utilized at a comparatively small cost, and an auditorium, that at present is very unsatisfactory on account of bad acoustic properties will be entirely transformed.

Rev. William Black has been preaching for some days in Brunswick, Ga.

WILLIAMS MEMORIAL CHURCH.—We observed our quarterly communion at this church on the third Sunday in January. There were two additions by certificate.

The people of this church kindly remembered their pastor during the holidays in a "pounding" with such things as flour, sugar, coffee and meat, and also feed for horse and cow. For all these good things we are thankful and pray the blessing of God to continue with this church.

FOREIGN.

Annual Report of Mattie B. Ingold, M. D.

This report, covering a period of a little more than eight months, brings me to the close of my first five years in Korea.

After last annual meeting January and a part of February were spent in the usual dispensary work, study, visiting and teaching. From Feb. 12th until the last of March, was spent in Koung Mal taking the place of the physician of that station who is not yet within calling distance, but I sincerely hope that he soon may be.

The teaching consisted in the children's Sunday-school, the girls' day school until it was closed in June, teaching the visitors on receiving days, the patients at the dispensary or their homes and the women's week-day Bible class until I went to Koung Mal, at which time I turned it over to Miss Tate permanently.

The Sunday-school shows some increase in attendance over last year, there being an average of fifteen enrolled pupils present each Sunday and two visitors.

The nine older children are studying the shorter catechism and memorizing Scripture, and the younger children a children's catechism. Five of the children were baptized on profession of their faith in Christ last spring, and they seem to be earnest Christians.

Five Testaments for an attendance of forty Sundays without missing once have been given this year, also five hymn-books for an attendance of twenty Sundays and seven primers for ten Sundays. The children like to come to Sunday-school and usually learn their lessons very well.

The girls' day school was held twice a week and I taught an hour each day in it.

The teaching at the dispensary has been mostly done by my helpers as the increased number of patients this year has left me less time than formerly to devote to it. I have enjoyed teaching the women at the house on visiting days and there have been some who listened very earnestly and expressed a desire to "do the doctrine." Unlike last year, most of the visitors have been from the city as owing to the hard times few could come in from the villages, and on this account the number of visitors has been less than it was last year.

During the winter and spring I studied some nearly every morning with my teacher, but cannot see that I have improved much in the language. A part of the time was spent in preparing a children's catechism which was submitted to the Examining Committee and favorably reported upon by them, and returned to me with their suggestions and corrections for final revision, but unfortunately it was lost in the mails and did not reach me.

My main time and energy have been devoted to the medical work which shows an encouraging growth this year. The dispensary was open for six and one-half months and during this time 1586 have been treated, including return patients.

This year most of the patients came from the city as owing to the scarcity of food, few could come in from the country. Last year I think the majority of the patients were from the villages. I am rejoiced to see that the work is beginning to make an impression here where the prejudice is so much greater than it is in the country districts, at least the country people have never been so afraid to take the medicine as the city people have been, but now there is a feeling of much greater confidence among the people here and they do not ask whether such and such dire results will follow their taking foreign medicine nearly so often as they formerly did. Occasionally the medicine is brought back or not given because the husband objects.

One woman was so ill that her husband, though violently opposed to us, allowed her to send for me, and when she was better she said, "Can you not give my husband some medicine to make him stop drinking? He drinks a great deal and beats me and the children so much that it is very hard to live." Yes, I told her, there is a medicine that will cure him—the gospel, and if he will believe and do according to its teaching he will not do these things. She said that she knew this and that others had told her the same thing, but he would not listen to the gospel, but that she had and wanted to be a Christian and "I do believe in Jesus in my heart," she said, "but my husband will not let me go to the houses of any of the Christians, and if he sees the children playing with the children of the Christians he whips them, and although I live here so close to the church, never once has he allowed me to go there. What can I do?" Her case is a sad one and there are many such.

Another woman has been a pretty regular attendant on the church services since she was an inpatient here nearly two years ago. Her husband objected to her coming at first, but she had received so much benefit from her stay here that he was ashamed not to let her come. This summer she passed through a severe trial losing four children and her mother of cholera within three days. I asked her if in the midst of her afflictions she still believed in Jesus? and she said, "Yes, and when the children were so ill and I could do nothing for them I went out alone several times and prayed." She has been to church nearly every Sunday since and although very sad does not seem rebellious.

One woman sent for me to come and pray with a sick boy—said that she had prayed, but that he did not get any better, and she thought my prayers would be more efficacious. I told her that I was willing to pray with her for the boy's recovery provided she used medicine also. She said, "Oh, yes, I will do that." The boy got all right within a few days and she was much pleased at the success of our treatment.

Owing to the hard times this year I have tried to make the medicine as nearly free as seemed best for the patients, and absolutely free for all who were not able to pay anything. In many cases I found that if I gave the medicine outright they had a hesitancy in coming back for more when it was needed, saying that they were ashamed to come for more when they had paid nothing for what they had gotten. Others would buy chickens or eggs to bring me, the cost of which was greater than what I would have charged for the medicine. To save them this embarrassment, I charged usually twenty or thirty cash (two or three cents) in order that they might feel free and easy to come for more medicine. Of course all have not these scruples, some wanting it free and the more they can get the better pleased they are.

Others, whom I knew to be well off, I charged the usual price. The receipts from patients have been 384 1-2 nyang, ($29.04) and from foreigners 10.10 yen ($5.05.)

There have been twenty-one inpatients, their stay varying from a few days to over two months.

I have made 150 visits to patients in 52 homes. More visits could have been made had time and strength permitted.

The teaching of the Gospel, giving of tracts and selling of books have been carried on in the dispensary as formerly, but very few books were sold this year.

Altogether, the work of these six and one-half months has been such as to be cause for thankfulness for the good results in evidence, and encouragement for the future when with larger and better facilities for work, larger and better results are to be expected. I must say, however, that I look forward with some trepidation to the management of hospital, small though it is, and am by no means confident that I can do it wisely or successfully.

In closing I wish to express my thanks to Mr. Tate for the nice house and dispensary that he has built this year, and which have doubtless been a heavy burden to him, though I have heard no complaints.

Chunju, Korea, Sept. 15th, 1902.

TENNESSEE.

WHITEHEAVEN CHURCH.—Whiteheaven Church, of which Rev. B. M. Cowan is pastor, enters the new year with a most encouraging outlook. Four additional elders and deacons have been elected and installed recently; the former being Dr. D. O. Menasco and Mr. P. C. Buford, and the latter, Mr. A. A. Gillespie and Mr. J. N. Beasley. The Sabbath-school is in excellent condition, with a wide awake and aggressive superintendent, Mr. James N. Beasley; and nearly every member of the church belongs to it. The church building has been nicely repainted, the new "Psalms and Hymns" adopted, and the pastor's salary and all other expenses fully paid. One new member was received by letter on Sunday, January 4. The people, rejoicing that they "owe no man anything," go forward harmoniously with fresh courage and thankful hearts.

COLUMBIA.—Rev. A. S. Doak has taken pastoral charge of Bethany and Young's Chapel, Presbytery of Columbia. He began his work in this field Nov. 30, 1902.

This is a very important and promising field, in a thickly settled and prosperous section of Giles county, Tennessee. The Bethany Church, in addition to a good house of worship and a manse, with several acres of land, controls also a fine school property known as Bethany High School. We have a good school now in operation, conducted by Prof. C. H. Walker, a genial and accomplished gentleman and a successful teacher. He is ably assisted by Miss Robinson, a young lady of exceptional gifts, who has already made a fine impression on patrons and pupils. Prof. Walker taught here very successfully some years ago. He has very lately been recalled to take charge of the school. Since Mr. Doak began his work in this field, the Bethany Church has received four members by letter, and one member, a young son of the pastor, a baptized child, by examination. On Sabbath morning, Jan. 18, Bethany Church elected two Deacons, Messrs. Elam Rome and Wm. A. Brown.

Mr. Doak preaches two Sabbath afternoons of each month at Young's Chapel, 6 miles distant from Bethany. There are encouraging signs of revived interest at Young's Chapel. We expect to receive several members by letter at our next service. As the days grow longer and the weather better, and the roads become more passable, we pray and confidently hope for great things from God's blessing on the work.

ALABAMA.

Isbell College, Talladega, Ala.

The first meeting of the Board of Trustees appointed by the Synod of Alabama to take charge of the Isbell College at Talladega was held in that city on Monday night, Jan. 12th. The Board was organized by electing Rev. E. P. Davis, D. D., Chairman, and Mr. J. B. Woodward, Secretary and Treasurer. Other members of the Board present, were: Rev. A. A. Little, Rev. Neal L. Anderson, Rev. R. B. McAlpine, Mr. John W. Durr, Jr.

The Trustees of the First Presbyterian Church, Talladega, formally transferred the Isbell College property to the Trustees of Synod, and deed for same was accepted by the Board, and ordered entered in the office of the Probate Judge.

The Synod assumes the responsibility for an outstanding indebtedness of four bonds of $1,000 each, bearing interest at six per cent. per annum and payable on July 1st, 1910.

A committee was appointed to devise plans for meeting the interest on these bonds, and raising funds for some needed improvements on the property, and to correspond with reference to securing a president of the institution.

The college is located in the heart of one of the healthiest and most charming sections of Alabama, in the midst of a cultured and prosperous community, and is already provided with a handsome and modern building. It is believed that under the auspices of the Synod this institution will soon fill a great need of Alabama Presbyterianism. Its success will mark an epoch in the history of Presbyterian education in the state.

MONTGOMERY.—Central Church.—At the communion service of the Central Church, Montgomery on Jan. 11th twenty-four new members were publicly welcomed into the fellowship and service of Christ. In spite of the inclement weather the attendance on the services was the largest in the history of the church.

MARION.—Rev. Neal L. Anderson recently preached the second of a series of special sermons to young men at the Marion Military Institute at this place.

The first of the series was preached by Rev. E. G. Murphy of the Southern Educational Board, and it is hoped to have Doctor Henry Vau Dyke at the close of the school term in May.

MOBILE.—We learn that Rev. Dr. D. A. Planck was called to Kentucky a short time since by the serious illness of his father, and was absent from his pulpit on Sabbath, the 11th. His father died on Monday the 12th, as reported in the secular press.—Southwestern Presbyterian.

MISSOURI.

ST. LOUIS.—Twenty-four St. Louis Chinamen attend Sunday-school every Sunday afternoon in the Grand Avenue Presbyterian Church.

It is a Chinese Sunday-school. The teachers are Americans, but all the pupils are Chinamen.

The organizer of this unique St. Louis Sunday-school is Mrs. Moses M. Greenwood. Mrs. Greenwood began her Sunday-school work among the Chinese in New Orleans, and has continued it in St. Louis with such success that her pupils are rarely absent, the wind blow as it will.

One of the St. Louis Chinese Sunday-school scholars is now on his way to his native country, where he will work as a missionary. Another has organized a Chinese Sunday-school in Atlanta, Ga.—Post-Dispatch.

PLATTSBURG.—On last Sabbath, Jan. 11th, we had the pleasure of celebrating the Lord's Supper; it being our regular mid-winter season for this service. While the day was very cold, yet a goodly number of the members were present, and the service was a very impressive one. This came as a fitting climax to the Week of Prayer service, which we always observe. Six have been added to the church since our last communion: two by letter, and four by profession. To God be all the praise.

The Christmas season did not pass without the usual remembrance, on the part of the congregation, of their pastor and family. And while we appreciate the gold with which they filled our purse, we appreciate more the gold of love that prompted the gift.—Southwestern Presbyterian.

Meeting of Missouri Synod's Committee.

The annual, and perhaps the most important, meeting of this Committee was held in St. Joseph, Mo., Jan. 20th. All the members but two were present.

The reports generally showed an encouraging and satisfactory condition of the work. The Treasurer reported a balance on hand sufficient with unpaid and good subscriptions to carry on the work and close the year without debt, March 31, 1903. And the prospects for the coming year, reported subscriptions, etc., indicate a slight increase in contributions, though not enough to meet the increasing needs and demands; for the actual application from the Presbyteries for needy and inviting fields exceed by more than $1,000 the probable income.

In view of these facts, especially the urgency of many of the calls and the critical condition of the work in some places, it was determined to make a special and earnest effort, especially in our larger churches and with persons of means, to increase the regular contribution by $1,500 if possible; and to this end several of the brethren besides the secretary were asked to give some time to these special efforts.

The needs, particularly in the Ozark regions of Southern Missouri are great and crying, there are "open doors" on every hand, and loud calls to enter in and possess the land.

The committee therefore most earnestly appeals to all our people to give this cause a place in their hearts, their prayers, and their contributions; and especially to ministers and sessions to see that it is presented to all their churches in February, that subscriptions are made if not already taken, and if taken to have them increased if possible by additional contributions.

An interesting report for the last quarter of last year was presented from the Sunday-school Missionary, by Mr. I. P. Powell, of which this is a summary: 19 churches visited and canvassed in the Presbyteries of St. Louis and Postosi: 98 miles traveled: 585 families visited: 78 Bibles, or parts, sold: 559 books sold for $238 51: and 57 books, with tracts also, donated, worth $7.25. This brother and his work are cordially commended to our people. G. L. L.

St. Louis, Jan. 22.

Notice.

To the ministers and sessions of the Synod of Missouri:

You are reminded that February is one of the months when contributions for Home Missions in Missouri are asked from all of our churches, and when half the subscriptions are due. Please see that this is attended to promptly. And let all money be sent at once to your Presbyterian Treasurer.

For further information as to this cause and its needs, see above notice of committee meeting.

In behalf of the Synod's Committee.

George L. Leyburn, Secretary.

TEXAS.

Presbytery of Central Texas.

The Presbytery will hold an adjourned meeting in the First Presbyterian Church, Waco, Friday, February 13th, at 8 p. m. The resignation of Rev. S. A. King, D. D., as pastor of said church will be considered, and any other business that may come before the Presbytery. Those expecting to attend will please notify Mr. Thomas C. Smith, Clerk of Session, that entertainment may be provided.

M. C. Hutton, Stated Clerk.

Georgetown, Texas, Jan. 19, 1903.

GIDDINGS.—We have an excellent Ladies' missionary society which, beside other work, gave $33 to education last year. We elected an excellent Ruling Elder and Deacon last year and contributed to all causes of our Assembly.

J. W. M.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

COLUMBIA.—The funeral services of the late Dr. Joseph R. Wilson were held in the First Presbyterian Church the 23rd instant at 2 o'clock, the body having arrived here in the morning. The service was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Smith assisted by the Rev. Dr. Hall, who is at present moderator of the Southern Presbyterian general assembly and Dr. J. Wm. Flinn, chaplain of the South Carolina College and a special friend of the family.

Dr. Smith read the psalm and announced the hymns, Dr. Flinn read the lesson from 1 Cor. XV, and Dr. Hall offered the prayer.

The hymns used were "Lead Kindly Light" and "How blest the righteous when he dies."—Columbia State.

MARYLAND

BALTIMORE.—On Sunday, Jan. 18, there were three additions to the Mount Washington Church and on the previous Sunday there was one addition, all on profession. Rev. Byron Clark is pastor.

At the recent communion, the Franklin Street Church welcomed ten members, nine of them by letter from other churches. Rev. Harris E. Kirk is pastor.

MISSISSIPPI.

COLUMBUS.—This church has raised more than six hundred dollars for the support of a Foreign Missionary. This work has been done without any pressure and entirely through voluntary subscription made at the regular services. The Session has called a congregational meeting to consider the matter of assuming the permanent support of a Missionary. God's blessing is upon us, and the work of the church is progressing.

LOUISIANA.

NEW ORLEANS.—First Presbyterian Church.—On Dec. 17th., 1902, a congregational meeting was held for the purpose of electing additional officers, elders and deacons. The result was as follows: Elders, T. G. Hardie, Capt. Wm. Baker, W. C. McLeod, B. Palmer Caldwell, four in all; Deacons, John Davidson, J. C. Morris, Jr., Alfred Raymond, W. A. S. Moore, Robert Hardie; five in all. The Session has appointed Sunday, Jan. 18th, 1903, as the time for the Ordination service.—Exchange.

SELECTIONS.

"Missionary Circles."

The ladies of the Foreign Missionary Society of the First Presbyterian Church, of Augusta, Georgia, after an experience of several years, feel that they can earnestly and confidently urge the use of pre-arranged programs in the monthly meetings of societies, as by their use their society has grown, and the increased attendance has been most gratifying.

Having received encouragement from the publication and sale of their earlier booklets, they are now prepared to issue a new edition of "Missionary Circles."

"Missionary Circles" contains helpful Suggestions how to conduct meetings, Parliamentary Rules, the Missionary Creed and Twelve Programs—one for each month. Each program is made up of Papers, Readings, Music, Children's Exercises, etc., to be assigned to the different members of the church and congregation.

An Exercise by children adds greatly to the interest of meetings; we have, therefore, prepared a book of "Children's Exercises," which can be obtained upon application. A little book called "Suggestive Outlines for Children's Missionary Societies" has been issued by our "Mission Workers;" this can be had from Mrs. Devaga Cohen, 709 Broad Street, Augusta, Ga.

PRICE LIST.

Sample Copy of "Missionary Circles" 25c. Ten Copies or more of "Missionary Circles," each, 10c. Children's Missionary Exercises, 30c. Suggestive Outlines for Children's Missionary Societies, 5c.

Address: "Missionary Circles," No. 416 Broad Street, Augusta, Georgia; or, Mrs. B. F. Brown, No. 3 Goodrich Street, Augusta, Georgia.

N. B.—For the convenience of all Societies, we have thought best to place the discussion of the subjects selected by "The Missionary" a month later, thus enabling us to secure the advertised leaflets, etc.

Will you kindly assist in the good work by sending this circular to some friend interested in the cause?

To the Moral Forces of North Carolina.

Wednesday and Thursday, January 28th and 29th, are the days on which the Joint Committee on Propositions and Grievances, will hear argument for and against the several bills to regulate the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors. This will be the beginning of the hand-to-hand fight. The battle will move rapidly from the arena to the floor of the House and the Senate. I look for it to last many days yet.

I write, therefore, to the moral forces of North Carolina—a good and valiant army, above which shines a pillar of light that moves irresistibly over sea and river and embattled hosts of enemies—to keep up the fight. Be of good courage. Our enemies are numerous, but the Lord of Hosts is our leader.

Let mass-meetings be held every where. Pass resolutions; appoint working Committees. Send them to Raleigh if you can. Take up collections for expenses.

We need reinforcements here at Raleigh. The liquor lobby is 100 strong. We cannot leave the field to these men. They are declaring that their sections are opposed to our bill, that its passage "will destroy the party," etc. We must counteract this false impression by all means. If you cannot come to Raleigh, you can write letters. But if possible, send a delegation here to see your Representatives. We need reinforcements at this point.

Continue to circulate the petitions. Thousands of names are coming in. But we must not be content until every man and woman has been counted that is worth counting. I have plenty of blank petitions, and I will gladly send them to you.

Every time you get 100 names, send them in.

Finally let constant prayer be offered for the help of the Lord of Hosts. He is our Refuge and our Strength.

Do not quit the field of battle until you hear that the Right has triumphed.

Sincerely yours,

J. W. Bailey.

For Teachers.

The State University offers a series of very valuable courses to public school teachers, and those preferring to teach, this year in a term which extends from March 9th to May 16th. The studies embraced are English, mathematics, Latin, Greek, history of the United States and of North Carolina, French, German, pedagogy, physical geography, botany and physics. There is no charge for tuition. The only fee is one of $3 for use of library, etc. Expenses are extremely low. Circulars of information may be obtained from President F. P. Venable, Chapel Hill, N. C.

We are informed that Chicora College, the Presbyterian school for young women, at Greenville, S. C., has a very prosperous session—the largest number of boarding pupils in its history, representing the states of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama and Texas. The faculty which Dr. S. R. Preston, the President, has gathered about him is regarded by many of the best citizens of Greenville as equal to the best in any like institution in the South. Prof. Hagstrom, the accomplished Musical Director, has been compelled to have an assistant on account of increasing numbers. Miss Jonas, the professor of Oratory and Physical Culture, in this her first year, has already built up the largest class in the history of the institution. The Art Department, under the guidance of Miss Oewel, is also full of pupils—several married ladies in the city being among the number. About a half dozen new pupils have already entered for the second half session, which begins January 27th, and others are writing to know if they can obtain room. The total enrollment already is about equal to the capacity of the buildings.

The following comment on much of the so-called education of the young, taken from the New York Tribune, is so good that we pass it on to our readers without comment:

A bright little girl of scarcely fourteen years, belonging to a family of intelligence and culture, writes with evident pride to a relative concerning her standing in scholarship in the public school which she has been attending for a number of years. She reports that she is pursuing fourteen studies, at least eleven of them being "solid" ones, and her average standing in all of them, reckoned on a scale on which "100" indicates perfection, is no less than 99.5-14. In four studies she is marked 100, and in only one as low as 96. In grammar she has attained perfection, being marked 100, while in civics she stands at 98, in physics 97, in physiology at 99, in algebra at 98, and in literature at 96.

In the same letter she tells of some recent incidents: "there has been two boats ashore. . . . Papa took sister and I with him so we could see the boats."

"Grammar 100." So reads her school report, prepared by a teacher who doubtless takes great pride in so clever a scholar. It is a pity, of course, that she stands only 96 in civics, a study so essential to the childish mind, and it might be wished that she had got above 97 in physics, especially seeing that she has only eleven "solid" studies and not more than fourteen in all. She is not yet studying differential calculus, or blowpipe analysis, or Sanskrit, or the French drama of the eighteenth century. Doubtless these will come next term. Then she will probably stand "100 plus" in grammar and be able to write that "me and her done it." Then she will be ready for college. "Grammar, 100!" With only fourteen studies; and only eleven of them "solids." Including civics, physics, algebra, physiology, literature, and two kinds of history.—Southern Churchman.

I find that it conduces to my mental health and happiness to find out all I can which is amiable and lovable in those I come in contact with, and to make the most of it. It may fall very short of what I was once wont to dream of, but it is better than nothing. It keeps the heart alive in its humanity, and till we shall be all spiritual this is alike our duty and our interest.—Moravian.

M'LEOD.—On Dec. 7, 1902, at Alma, N. C., Martin J. McLeod. He had been a faithful Confederate soldier during the civil war and was much esteemed by his comrades. He was a member of Centre Church for years and a habitual attendant upon public worship when his health would allow. During his latter years, his health was impaired, and for many months he was confined to his room and bed, and was subjected to much pain. Yet he bore his sufferings with exemplary patience and Christian fortitude. His friends and kindred mourn their loss but rejoice in his eternal gain. Pastor.

BRICK! BRICK!

A brick is a brick; yes, but what a difference in them. Good clay, good machinery, up-to-date methods, in fact thousands of details, are a necessity to produce the best brick. We have our plant fully equipped for capacity of 5,000,000—not only that, but have a body of the finest river clay ever located in this country. Our plant is on the Catawba river near Fort Mill, S. C., and shipping Station Grattan, S. C.

"A man is a man for a' that," but what a difference in 'em. You require the best lumber for your house; the best coal for your engine; the best flour your table. One does not buy a common horse when he can get a much better for near the same price. This is true about everything one needs.

In a building nothing is more essential than good material. It adds to the safety and wear, besides 'twill sell for more. Who would not pay more for a building put up out of first quality material than for one thrown together out of common ordinary brick?

The Secret of a Happy Home.

We publish this paper mainly for the home, and what it contains; it is intended to help make the home and all its inmates happy and content. There is one secret of happiness, and we say without hesitation that this secret is sincere and genuine courtesy.

The following little story from an exchange tells in a simple way how it is:

"Arriving one afternoon at a small town, a speaker was met by the president of the local Woman's Christian Temperance Union, a soft-voiced woman, with a young face under silvered hair.

"As the two ladies were riding along the shady street, pupils from the public school began to throng the sidewalks. At a crossing, a bright-faced boy, about ten years old, stood waiting for the ladies to pass and lifted his cap with a courteous gesture and sunny smile. The hostess leaned from the carriage with a pleasant greeting and the gray cap covered the brown curls again as they drove on.

"One of your Sunday-school class? ventured the speaker.

"No," replied the hostess, "my only son, Harry."

As they approached the home, they nearly overtook a young girl of about fourteen and a middle-aged man, walking briskly. The man was listening in a deferential way to the girl's chatter. At the gate they paused, the man lifted his hat in a parting salutation, as he held the gate for the girl to precede him; then, bowing, he passed on, as if hurried, not observing the approaching carriage.

"This is our home; that is my husband going to his office," said the hostess.

"And you have another guest—or is the young lady a caller?" asked the speaker.

"That is Margaret, our eldest child. She and her father are great chums," replied the hostess.

"At the daintily appointed tea table, the youngest child, a bashful girl of seven or eight years, had the misfortune to drop and break a fragile piece of china. Her face crimsoned with distress and the violet eyes lifted to her mother's face were large with gathering tears.

"The speaker winced, dreading discordant notes where all had been harmonious. "I hope they will not send her away in disgrace—poor little thing!" her thoughts ran.

"But even as she thought, with perfect courtesy the mother spoke the same conventional words of reassurance which she would have used had the honored guest broken the cup. Seeing the quivering lip of her cherished child—her guest from God—she added softly: "Mother knows you are sorry, dearest. Just let it pass and overcome it," while the father, with ready tact engaged the speaker in conversation. The speaker was charmed."—Exchange.

A Good Remedy for Hoarseness.

Pour boiling hot water into a sancer, and let a large sponge soak it all up. Then squeeze it firmly out again. Hold the sponge to the nose and mouth, and breath alternately through the nose and mouth, in and out.

I sing by exercises, the great scale, passages, etc., and all the vowels into it, and so force the hot steam to act upon the lungs, bronchial tubes, and especially on the mucous membranes, while I am breathing in and out through the sponge. After this has been kept up for ten or fifteen minutes, wash the face in cold water. This can be repeated four to six times a day. The sponge should not be full of water, but must be partly, and I can recommend it highly. It can do no injury because it is natural. But after breathing in the hot steam, do not go out immediately into the cold air.—From Lehmann's How to Sing (Macmillan).

The Physical Hardening of Children.

Statistics from a paper read by Dr Hecker of Carlsbad before a local medical society and published in Munich Medikalische Wochenschrift relate to sixty children, of whom twenty-five had been "hardened" during their first year, seven later, and the rest not at all. A distinction is made between mild "hardening" by daily cool plunge or sponge baths, and severe hardening by cold shower baths, and severe hardening by cold shower baths or other cold water treatments oftener than once a day. Says the writer: "Great liability to colds was shown by thirty-one per cent., of the unhardened, thirty-eight per cent. of the mildly and sixty-two per cent. of the severely "hardened." Of severely hardened young infants seventy-three per cent. were very liable to colds. The effect on the nervous system was favorable in three, unfavorable in four cases of mild hardening; favorable in four and unfavorable in eight cases of severe hardening. Of fifteen children hardened when older than two years, seven exhibited abnormal nervous irritability, while of those not hardened not one was either excessively boisterous or abnormally excitable. Fifty-three per cent. of the unhardened and the mildly hardened infants passed their first year in perfect health, but only nineteen per cent. of the severely hardened developed into perfectly healthy children, while sixty-six per cent. underwent severe illnesses which left them more or less permanent invalids. Adenoid growths (hypertrophy of the tonsils) appeared in twenty per cent. of the unhardened, in thirty per cent. of the mildly hardened, and in forty per cent. of the severely hardened. Other consequences of excessive hardening were anemia, neurasthenia, loss of appetite, crying at night, chronic bowel diseases, and lessened power to withstand disease in general."—Boston Transcript.

Household Hints.

Tinware is hardly worth buying; it rusts and wears out very quickly.

Granite and German-ware are much more durable than tin, and better than iron or porcelain, both being very heavy.

Avoid heavy pots and kettles as much as possible.

Keep the tea-kettle clean inside as well as outside.

Dry all tinware before putting it away.

Wash the cooking utensils—pots, kettles, sancepans and frying-pans—with as much care as you do the china; rinse with clean hot water and dry with a clean towel.

Have long and short two-tined forks to pierce meat and vegetables when you wish to test them while cooking.

Find a better place for cooking vessels than under the sink.

"A man's house," says Beecher, "should be on the hilltop of cheerfulness and serenity so high that no shadows rest upon it, and where the morning comes so early, and the evening tarries so late, that the day has twice as many golden hours as those of other men. He is to be pitied whose house is in some valley of grief between the hills, with the longest nights and shortest days."

It is not an easy matter to build this mental mansion on "the hilltop of cheerfulness and serenity," but how much more comfortable it is to live in than the house in the "valley of grief between the hills!" It is not easy to be bright and cheerful when our best laid plans "gang aley;" when balance sheets will not balance; when the typewriter or sewing-machine will not move swiftly and rapidly, in spite of the fact that the machinery is apparently in good order; when it rains steadily and persistently on the very day when you wish for the sun to appear the brightest; when you must wear for another season the shabby gown or jacket which you had hoped to replace with a new one. It is hard to give a sunny smile to the world when, for you, "the times are out of joint." Make the effort, though, and see how you will be repaid, and what a golden reflection that little smile will throw back on your world within.

"No man ever gained a happy life by chance,

Or yawned it into being with a wish."

The World.

President Roosevelt and His Negro Policy.

Perhaps it would be better to speak of his policies. The President is not afflicted with that vice of small minds called consistency. It would be a great pleasure to be able to speak of the President's principles. For one can respect another's principles although he knows them to be mistaken and it is a grievous thing not to be able to respect the Chief Magistrate of this great nation. We can forgive a politician much that we cannot pardon in a reformer and the President has been heralded far and wide by his friends and intimates as the reformer par excellence. For example, if he planted himself firmly on the principle that as the President of all the people, it was his duty to recognize with official position those of every race forming the citizenship of the nation, that would be intelligible and respectable even though we in the South might deplore the unwisdom of putting negroes in office. But when the negro must belong to the President's party and must even be loyal to the recognized faction in the party the principle disappears and the policy of the ward politician takes its place.

In North Carolina the President found a good many negro post-masters on his accession to the Presidency. Some of them are now in jail for stealing the post-office funds. The negro who will not steal is an exception. Some of them have served out their terms and have been succeeded by white people because the party men in the State had adopted what is called the Lily White Policy. One negro, a genuine negro, with a streak of impudence in him as is shown by his letter to the President, yet having the endorsement as to character and official excellence from the leading white citizens of the place, makes a fight for his office.

The President appears to back him up in his demands until the point is made that he has been disloyal to the faction in his party that tried to turn the negro down and so an investigation is set on foot to find out whether or not Sam Vick, the negro incumbent of the Wilson post-office voted the right ticket in the last election. It is impossible to respect that.

The President was entertained last year by the city of Charleston with a lavishness of hospitality that could not be excelled. Largely as a rebuke to the notorious James H. Tillman who had insulted the President, the people went beyond themselves in the cordiality of their welcome. We saw the outpouring of that hospitality and can never forget it and certainly the object of it all should never have forgotten it. And yet when the occasion came the President appointed as the collector of the port for that proud city of ancient fame, a member of the race that controls scarcely five per cent. of the property of the city and is interested in its commerce not at all. Whether the people are wrong or not in their feelings, the appointment was known to be offensive to the people who had given the President the warmest welcome perhaps that he had ever received. Southern hospitality is proverbial. It is not too much to say that no Southern gentleman, at least, could have returned such hospitality in such way. And the plea of principle falls to the ground because again it is Crum's political record that is made the issue when the appointment is announced as one to be made.

We published last week the change of address of a Presbyterian minister from Indianola to Heathman's, Mississippi. That means that the white people of Indianola are forced to send a special messenger four miles for their mail, thereby circumventing the tyranny of the Post-office Department that would punish the whole community by making it send to Greenville, twenty miles, for its mail. It seems that a negro woman had been postmaster at Indianola for several years. She was asked by irresponsible parties to resign and immediately did so. The Department refused to accept her resignation. The mass meeting of the citizens held to consider the question of asking her to resign had forty white men who voted against the proposition to thirty-seven who voted for it. But the Department demanded of the sheriff and town officials a guarantee of the safety of the postmaster. We do not forget that in South Carolina, some five years ago, a negro postmaster was shot down in his house by a mob of murderous cowards and we fittingly rebuked that piece of devilry at the time. What ought to have been done in this case, if the Department really thought the woman's life in danger, would have been the sending of a military guard, if necessary an army, to protect a government official. But the Department closed the post-office and has thus far refused to open it, making the ultimatum that the local authorities must guarantee the protection of a federal official. The injustice of this is so evident, the demand made is so preposterous, that the whole South has resented it. President Roosevelt had the opportunity of winning the hearts of the Southern people as no predecessor of his has had since 1861. He has thrown away the opportunity, and the worst of it is that there is the inevitable suspicion that the President is thinking just now more about the negro votes in the Presidential Convention than about the good opinion of a great section of the country, and the real welfare of both races living there side by side, in something like equal numbers.

The Booker Washington dinner, while the Southern people felt its serious consequences, especially those who were working against odds for the negro's welfare, was largely attributed to ignorance on the part of the President of the conditions existing in the section where the negro mainly lives and where the race problem presses. It was thought that a private dinner was the President's business, moreover, and that he had probably acted from impulse. But now the news comes that a public reception at the White House to which Southern men and women were invited was attended by negro men and women, also invited guests. That goes a bow-shot farther than anything that has yet been done. People who have been debating whether we had a genius or a crazy man in the White House are now inclining to the latter opinion.

The President as it seems to us overlooked one of the elementary principles of good breeding in the invitations to this reception. He could not have been ignorant that the presence of the negroes there would be offensive to a large number of his guests, certainly to all that were brought up in the South. Knowing that he had no right according to the usages of good society to invite those who would be offended and insulted. Hospitality has no such utilitarian uses as the correcting of people's likes and dislikes, prejudices if you will. Nobody would have cared for his giving a reception to the negroes, to all of them in Washington if the President chose.

But that white men and negro women and negro men and white women should be mixed up in a social function in the White House was an affront to invited guests for which ignorance can now be no excuse unless it be the ignorance of good manners.

It needs not to be repeated here what the whole South knows and what the best-informed people at the North are beginning to understand. Social equality is a misnomer. We should rejoice to see a class among the negroes trained in the usages of the best society as to both manners and morals. The beginnings of such a class can be seen now and are the negro's salvation. But the social intermingling of the two races means amalgamation. And the true Southern people will shed the last drop of their hearts' blood to prevent that, or failing in its prevention, to protest against it with the seal of martyrdom. Logically the Booker Washington dinner and the latest and we trust the last reception at the White House to be attended by Southern people under the present administration, means that the two races are supposed to stand in such social relation as that inter-marriage is permissible. It has meant that in England. It means that in Boston today. Any white man attending that reception, if possessing the advantages of character, intelligence, good prospects and training in the usages of society might innocently aspire to the hand of the president's daughter. If the President can say why a negro, possessing these advantages, introduced to his wife and daughter at a social function may not have the same aspiration and be granted the same right to press his suit, the President will put several wondering people under profound obligation.

The Pacific coast is Marconi's next objective point. It has been suggested that a wireless telegraphy apparatus be placed in the Vatican, so that the Pope can communicate with other parts of the world unimpeded by the Italian Government.

Col. Arthur Lynch, member of Parliament for Galway, was tried, on the 23rd inst. for his treasonable attitude during the Boer War; the sentence of death was passed on each of the four counts in the indictment. It is thought the sentence will be commuted to a short term of imprisonment.

Maracaibo, Jan. 23.—President Aranguren, of the State of Maracaibo, has by a decree published last night, called to arms all citizens from 16 to 60 years of age, belonging to the militia, in order to resist the possible landing of German forces at Lake Maracaibo. About 500 men immediately answered the call.

The treaty between the United States and Columbia was signed on the 22nd by Secretary Hay and Dr. Herran, representing the two countries and was transmitted to the Committee of Foreign Relations. By the terms of the treaty, the United States agrees to make a cash payment of $10,000,000 in gold to the Columbian government, and after nine years, to pay a rental of $250,000 per year for the strip of land to be used for canal purposes—the first lease to be for an hundred years, renewable in terms of 100 years, at the pleasure of the United States.

Columbia University has recently established a department of Chinese, and Prof. Friedrich has been appointed to the chair. The course will include studies in the written and spoken language, beginning with the Pekin dialect, and lectures on the relation of China to Europe, etc.

Reed Smoot has been nominated for U. S. Senator from Utah, by the Republican members of the legislature. Mr. Smoot is one of the twelve apostles of the church of the Latter-day Saints. Mr. Roosevelt has advised against the election of an apostle, and it is said that Presidents Cleveland and McKinley gave similar advice.

Formalin is one of the principal constituents of the embalming fluid used by undertakers. It occurred to Dr. Charles C. Barrows of New York that a weak solution, if injected into the veins of a living person, might be beneficial. The first case in which it was used was a negro woman, suffering from puerperal fever; an examination showed the bacteria of septicemia; the woman seemed to be dying. The improvement began at once, and within four days there was no bacteria. Dr. Barrows is from Mississippi, and a graduate of the University of Virginia. The usefulness of formalin has been discussed before, but to Dr. Barrows belongs the credit of the idea of injecting it into the veins.

The mysterious epidemic—the sleeping sickness that is carrying off the thousands in Central Africa, has not excited great interest in America because of the distance, but, as in the case of the Bubonic plague, it is possible that it may spread beyond its first limits. A British commission has been investigating the terrible disease. Within a few years it has produced a depopulation of great tracts of land; the investigation shows that the malady is a chronic form of meningitis, produced by a germ, and is infectious. Recovery or cure is practically unknown. The duration is from a month to six weeks; the early listlessness passes into coma, and then into death. The results of the investigation will be laid before the Royal Society. Only negroes have been affected.

Mr. Crumpacker has a resolution pending in the Speaker's desk, calling for an investigation of election methods in some Southern States. In regard to this, Mr. Crumpacker has said:

"I believe that each of four or five Southern States now have two or three members more than they are entitled to. On the basis of the last census reports, we should take away from Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina and South Carolina, three representatives each. Under existing conditions one voter in Mississippi has as much power in setting the great policies of the country as four in New York or Massachusetts. Inequality is injustice, and it is the duty of other states to correct this wrong. The district in the State of Indiana which I represent in the House cast nearly as many votes at the last presidential election as were polled in all the seven districts in South Carolina. But we are told that the question belongs to the Southern States, and that they should be permitted to settle it in their own way. Are the people of other states to stand inactive while the constitutional rights of 8,000,000 citizens are in jeopardy? It is not a local question at all, for aside from its political and ethical aspects it involves the material interest of the whole country."

Among the measures recently introduced in Congress are the following:

By Senator Hoar, a resolution calling on the President for information regarding the nature of the government at Guam, and whether there are any persons detained there against their will.

By Senator Dryden, a bill offering a prize of $10,000 for the best plan to increase the speed of ocean steamships.

By Senator Deboe, for the purchase of a series of illuminated parchments by Nestore Leoni of Italy, representing the history in miniature of the United States of America.

By Representative McLachlan, to authorize the issue of national bank currency secured by clearing house certificate of reserve cities.

By Senator Hoar to restore American citizenship to any woman whose citizenship has been lost or suspended by marriage with a foreigner.

A bill for the improvement of the harbor at Honolulu.

By Representative Bell, a bill to prevent extortion by raising the prices of articles of food, fuel and other necessities.

A protest against the ratification of the Hay-Bond treaty by N. B. Church, president of The Fisheries Company of New York.

A resolution adopted by the American Protective Tariff League, protesting against the ratification of all the pending reciprocity treaties.

The Anti-Trust bill will probably not come up before the first week in February.

The Greensboro fire insurance companies held their annual meetings here yesterday. The old officers were re-elected, B. D. Heath president of the Southern Stock Mutual Insurance Company, J. Van Lindley president of the Under-writers of Greensboro, R. L. Holt president of the Home Insurance Company of Greensboro, E. P. Wharton president of the Insurance Department of the Southern Loan and Trust Company, and A. W. McAlister manager of the whole group.

The year 1902 was an eventful year for these companies. Early in the year 1902, the fire insurance companies throughout the country on account of excessive losses advanced their rates 25 per cent. The fire record in North Carolina since the establishment of the insurance department had been exceptionally favorable, and the Greensboro companies took the position that there was no occasion for them to make any advance in rates and they have successfully maintained their position and have stood their ground against much strenuous "persuasion." They increased their net premiums, that is premiums less re-insurance, 70 per cent. during last year, the year's business amounting to over $150,000, and their losses for the year amounted to only 32 per cent. The people of North Carolina will rejoice in the success of these companies, and that they have made a record in 1902, which so fully vindicate their attitude towards the advance in rates.—Ex.

The bill that has come in for the Delhi Durbar expenses is for over ten million dollars.

The Home Circle.

An Old Town On the Gulf of Mexico.

By Mary R. Baldwin.

A visit to the old home of Jefferson Davis.

A trip to Beauvoir, the former home of Jefferson Davis, of the Confederacy, and still in the possession of his heirs, will never be forgotten. Fortunately, the driver was a native of the town, and was well posted as to its history. From him we learned those little incidents and the things that supply the filling to a general outline. The estate had been willed to the ex-President by an admirer and a friend of the lost cause—a wealthy widow. She, in addition to her plantation in the interior, owned this property of twelve hundred acres, that in earlier days when wealth and free labor made it possible, was kept like a garden and must have been a very paradise. As we slowly ride along the beach we hear the story, and find the anticipations strung to eagerness. And now we are within sight of the grounds. Coming to the gateway, the driver calls out to the man who is in charge, explaining that there are dogs upon the premises, and the ladies might be frightened if they came upon them suddenly.

Soon the keeper appears, a dog following, and the carriage enters the grounds. A park after the English style, set with a great variety of trees, holds the buildings of the estate. The principal building, unpretentious in perspective, has its wide verandas and its broad staircases, but inside the appointments are towards the standards of quiet elegance, and there are evidences in every room of this fact.

The pictures and the bric-a-brac are covered, but the old furniture, the massive bedsteads, toilet tables, bureaus and couches are exposed to view; and the books seen through glass doors are well selected and have costly bindings. One little room, however, has a peculiar attraction, filled as it is with heirlooms of quaint yet very simple articles of furniture. The old man and his dog, the latter belonging to the late owner, and on this account carefully watched by the keeper, follow the visitors about the now deserted home. In the yard there is a bush from which hang tiny white roses, and beyond is the garden with its weed-grown parterres, where the old-time flowers, still show themselves, and the blossoming shrubs are fragrant and beautiful. The orange trees and the sweet olive and the bay are holding to life serenely, though the fostering, loving hand is no more.

Returning to the park and standing to try and realize the fact that the head of the Southern Confederacy once walked under the trees, and with courtly grace led visitors up the broad steps, one is ravished by the grandeur and beauty of the scene. The giant trees, the sweeping loveliness of the grounds, the voice of the mocking-bird, and below the terrace the wide expanse of the Gulf waters make it a picture never to be forgotten.

But there is one spot that has not been visited—reserved to the last. It is a cottage to which the ex-President came when first released after the fall of the Confederacy, and where he thought and studied and wrote the history of the rise and fall of the Southern republic. It is to the visitor a very interesting place. Upon a large table in the center of the principal room are pamphlets tied with his hand, ready to be sent to the soldiers who fought for the lost cause. Around the walls are book-cases, filled with volumes that show the scholarly and religious preferences of the owner. We follow the keeper out, and closing and locking the door, he silently leads the way to a path through the most sequestered grounds, where only the song of the birds and of running brooks could disturb a solitary dreamer.

We are informed that Jefferson Davis often walked here alone, after his Cause was lost. One tries to imagine the feelings of the strong-willed man, who held to his purpose through many defeats, and at last when all hope was gone, came like a tired child to throw himself upon Nature's tenderness. He chose well his place of refuge and rest, for here might be found a thousand soothing influences for the worn body, the weary mind and the sorrowful heart.—Intelligencer.

Heart Beauty.

"It is a pity that Margaret is so—well, is so horrid homely."

"Margaret homely! You would never say that if you knew her better."

Mrs. Carter looked up in surprise.

"Certainly, no one would call those irregular features anything but ugly. Poor girl, she must feel it when she is with her sisters, for their beauty is such a contrast."

"You never think of her features when you are about her. She is so ready to do a favor, and is so kind and gentle in her ways. She has always a kind word for everybody."

I heard a slight rustle behind me and glanced around just in time to see Margaret disappear down the steps; she must have been reading in her favorite nook among the honeysuckles at the end of the piazza. That night she came into my room as usual for a little chat before retiring, but she was unusually quiet as she sat on the stool at my feet and gazed at the fire in the grate, for the night was cool.

"I don't know what you will think of me," she said at last, and there was a tremor in her voice. "but I could not help overhearing what you said about me this afternoon, and I want to thank you for it. You see I am so 'horrid homely,' as Mrs. Carter said, and I have always felt it, especially when people will compare me with Edith and Laura, and speak of their beauty. Don't think that I am envious. I am proud of them that they are so pretty, but I can't help being sensitive about my ugliness. I used to get angry and fret because my hair wouldn't curl, and because my mouth was so large and my nose such an ugly shape; until I guess I was getting as ugly inside as I was out," she smiled sadly. "One day an old woman came to the house selling laces and when she went out of the gate she fell. I ran down and helped her up and straightened the things in her basket for her. She laid her hand on my shoulder and said:

"God bless you, young leedy, youse not got the beauty that's skin deep. No, youse not got skin beauty; youse got the heart beauty; that's inside. Youse got a kind word for an old woman. God bless you, child."

"Well, that 'heart beauty' was a new idea to me, and I thought over it a great deal; and I made up my mind that I would try to have that if I could not have the 'skin beauty,' and if I was kind to everybody they wouldn't think of my ugly face. What you said this afternoon—well, it made me feel that I was gaining a little at least. It was the first time I ever heard any one say that I was anything but horrid ugly." She laughed, but there were tears in the gray eyes that looked into mine.

"Heart beauty. I shall try to have it if I can," she said half aloud, then gazed fixedly again at the fire.—May Everett Glover, in New York Observer.

A Higher Life.

One day a mocking bird escaped from its cage and flew out of the open window. In ecstasy it spread its little wings and soared upward into freedom, and as it felt the glad rush of air beneath it, in the exultation of liberty, it cried, "How did I endure the wires of my prison house so long? Here is life; henceforth what joy is mine!"

With a glad heart it perched upon the topmost branch of a pear tree that bowed under the weight of mellow fruit, and burst into a song of liquid melody.

All day it basked in the light of October sunshine, and drank deep draughts of balmy air, and when evening drew near, it slept in safety, and dreamed of another day.

Next morning dawned glorious in beauty, and the bird awoke and trilled another song of joy and hope. But the day wore on; the novelty of freedom passed away, and there in a window hung the open cage. Sweets to which it had been accustomed were displayed in profusion within, and a siren voice which it had loved for years called softly to it from behind the gilded bars. The freed bird hesitated, then flattered against the window pane, drew nearer and nearer to the feast of dainties until it could no longer resist the sight. With a mad dash it entered the open cage, and the door closed on it forever.

One day a soul escaped from its prison house of sin and worldliness. In ecstasy it spread its wings and soared upward into the fellowship of the sons of God, and as it felt the exultation of liberty, it cried, "How did I live in the bonds of iniquity so long? Here is life and joy and peace henceforth for me."

In the heights it rested and sang praises unto Him who had made it free. All day long it basked in the joy of God's presence, and drank deep draughts from the Living Fountain, and at even time it rested secure from harm and danger, saying:

"I will both lay me down in peace and sleep, for thou, Lord, only maketh me dwell in safety."

But the days wore on, and the newness of the higher life was gone. The tempter spread a feast of sweet things in profusion before its eyes and siren voices—voices of the past—sang gently to the soul, "Return, return!"

One moment of hesitation, one backward glance, one faltering step, one hour of flitting around these earthly pleasures, one taste of the old delights, and then a giddy plunge into the very midst.

With a smile of triumph the tempter locks and double locks the gilded bars.

Ay, fluttering soul, beat your bruised wings madly now as you will against those fettering environments to which you have returned; perhaps never again in life's brief span will an opportunity be given you to leave those things "wherunto you desired again to be in bondage."—Southern Churchman.

The Root of all Evil.

By Elizabeth W. Denison, in The Interior.

It is possible that there has been a mistake all these years, and that the love of money is not so exclusive a root of evil as we have been trained to suppose? Without doubt much of mischief in this singular world does spring from a selfish way of managing that very innocent thing in itself, the circulating medium. Then why not say selfishness is the root of all evil which would comfortably cover the whole ground?

The love of money has been called one of the strongest passions of the human creature. But there is a much stronger one and it is the love of influence. We are exhorted by the new theories of charity not to give money to the unfortunate. It is too dangerous. "Give yourself," is the specious cry. "Personal influence is far safer and more effective than money."

Safer, is it? It is a power before which mere gold and silver sink to the lowest insignificance.

"In a dark place one dropped a kindly word,

So weak my voice, he sighed, perchance none heard,

Or if they did, no answering impulse stirred.

Yet in an hour his fortunes were at stake;
One put a life in peril for his sake,
Because that word he spoke!"

Every one of us can trace the chief events of our lives, good or evil, back in a straight line to somebody's influence. A chance word from a beloved friend; a hint of evil import from another source; the pressure of anxious longing from a third quarter; O how our lives here are made or marred by these things! There is, of course, the best of reasons why such a subtle power should be trusted to incompetent and unscrupulous hands. It is an old problem. The "matchbox" is left open everywhere, and we shall all suffer from an indiscriminate use of its contents by ourselves or others, until we learn that fire burns.

"Still the same lesson, day by day,
Is placed before me by Thy hand."

But to avoid a subject which seems incapable of any present solution, it is scarcely the love of influence, of power, that brings about untold harm. How dare we take it upon ourselves to persuade any developed mortal against his own will and judgment?

I well remember, in my callow days, when I set out to inform the world, how recklessly I spent my small store of ammunition. I constantly "exerted" my influence from a stern sense of duty, the legacy of some remote Puritan ancestor, and have now no doubt that it was a serious inconvenience to my friends.

But what of the weak in will, who must be led? If they are always led, how are they ever to grow strong? A child's repeated falls and little mishaps are the appointed means by which he gets control of his muscles. Dominate any mind and you weaken it, no matter how strong the affection or how lofty the influence. The tremendous action of one mind upon another is only beginning to reveal itself. The sovereignty of the individual soul must be protected, and the indiscriminate meddling with so august a thing must be discouraged.

What shall we say then to these things? Are we no longer to help and aid our weaker brother? What of crimes against society, and the thousand and one lapses from morality and virtue? Would you have us let them alone? Far from it, but I would show a more excellent way. Great as the force of our consciences influence may be, and its limit has not yet been reached, there is something far more powerful. There is a way to help and save, without the awful possibility of hindering development and weakening where we would fain strengthen. What we are, is infinitely more than what we can say, in the way of influence. Every thought and act of our lives contribute to that wonderful unconscious power of which we ourselves know nothing. Bring to mind certain personalities within the circle of your acquaintance. O how the simple honesty of one exhorts and moves you! How the loving thought of another rebukes your cold selfishness. How the patient industry of another shames you out of your spasmodic efforts.

I believe that somewhere in the future, the highest teaching will insist that this is the only justifiable way to move our fellow creatures. But how we shall have to "hyper," to use an expressive old New England word, before that blessed way to live can arrive! Meanwhile we shall go on compelling our friends by our "influence" to do all sorts of things for which they have no capacity whatever. We shall spend our lives in jamming round people into square holes, and in vain attempts to adjust square people to round holes, and with the kindest intentions in the world, in doing our best to thwart the designs of providence.

We shall continue to make prigs of our children, instead of leaving the opening mind and heart to the sun and rain of nature's own way.

What is more exquisite than the whiteness of a little child's soul, before even the inherited evil has had time to develop? And yet we do not hesitate to scrawl all sorts of haphazard things upon that virgin purity. We leave the snowy page at the mercy of half-fledged and untrained teachers, and by and by are amazed to find that it is covered with indelible blots and stains.

It is so gratifying to the vanity of the human heart, when we begin to realize that our influence is felt. Motives get strongly mixed up in this world, at best, but the idea of being a "power for good" is the most deceptive feeling that can take possession of the mind. If we could only let the weak of will alone, and find foemen worthy of our steel, less maladjustment might ensue. Then will would match will, and perhaps neither be worse for the encounter. Is it a fanciful thing to say that an easily influenced person ought to be as safe from our campaigning as a wounded soldier? It is too great a responsibility to take. How do we know, finite and purblind embryos as we are, what may or may not be best for another? Let us free our dearest ones from the pressure of our anxious thought. Let us not even ask this or that of our Heavenly Father for them. It is enough to present them in perfect trust before the Infinite Love, and to leave them there.

Miscellaneous.

The men of Stonewall Jackson's army always concluded that a battle was near when they saw the General spending more than usual time in prayer. General Jackson, with characteristic modesty, said of himself once: "I have so fixed the habit of prayer in my own mind that I never raise a glass of water to my lips without asking God's blessing. I never seal a letter without putting a word of prayer under the seal. I never change my classes in the section-room without a minute's petition for the cadets who go out and those who come in."—Earnest Worker.

Huxley's Appreciation of the Bible.—I have always been strongly in favor of secular education, in the sense of education without theology; but I must confess I have been no less seriously perplexed to know by what practical measures the religious feeling, which is the essential basis of conduct, was to be kept up in the present utter chaotic state of opinion on these matters, without the use of the Bible. By the study of what other book could children be so much humanized?—Thomas Henry Huxley.

It is said that when a caravan in the desert wants water, a camel with its rider is sent ahead. At a little distance behind him follows another camel, and behind him another and so on. As soon as the first rider finds water, he shouts, "Come!" The man behind him passes the word along, and soon the entire line is shouting "Come!" That is what is meant by Jesus' words in the last chapter of the Bible: "Let him that heareth say, Come"—Lutheran World.

It is told of Thomas a' Kempis that once during his student days his preceptor asked the class: "What passage of Scripture conveys the sweetest description of Heaven?" One answered: "There shall be no more sorrow there." Another said: "There shall be no more death." Another: "They shall see His face." But Thomas, who was the youngest of all, said: "And His servants shall serve Him."

Our Young People.

What One Girl Has Done for Missions.

This is the story of what a plain, unassuming, unknown girl has done. There are obstacles to her work which, to others, would seem insurmountable. She is so deaf that it is with difficulty conversation can be carried on with her. She is lame, a fall through a hatchway some years ago having dislocated her thigh, and left her a cripple for life. Her general health is frail; frequently she is tortured whole nights with pain; and she has no means of her own. And yet, despite these hindrances, she is a most indefatigable and most successful worker in the cause of missions.

Having been asked to give an account of the beginning and progress of her work, she says: "About eight years ago, the promise, 'Ask of Me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession,' was strangely impressed upon her mind. It greatly perplexed her. What could it mean? Was God really speaking to her? She took the question to him. Shortly after she read this alarming statement, 'There are one thousand five hundred countries in China without a single missionary.' She fell upon her knees with the cry, 'O Lord, send me!' She soon saw that a literal answer to this prayer was impossible, and yet she knew that God's voice had summoned her into the vineyard.

Four years after, as she was kneeling in prayer, the thought came, "If you cannot go yourself, why not support a Bible woman there in your stead?" While waiting before God in prayer, it occurred to her that if she should interest fifty persons in the work, and they should each give two cents a week, the amount would be raised. But fifty seemed to her so many. How could it be done? Again she went to God for light, and under the inspiration of his promise, "Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in him, and he shall bring it to pass," she exclaimed, "Lord, I'll do it." This was in the summer of 1888. In the following December the first quarter's remittance was sent.

Shortly after this she read about India. She says, "We thought it pretty well supplied with missionaries, yet the fact is, that out of the 150,000,000 of women in India and Malaysia, 140,000,000 have never yet heard the name of Jesus." A two cents a week and a prayer circle was started for India, and in the following June the first quarter's remittance was sent for a Bible woman there. Thus two Bible women were now in the field supported wholly by her efforts.

Not long after this it was suggested she should have Scripture texts printed on ribbon for book-marks. In this way hundreds of dollars were added to the fund.

After reading the message for Easter Sunday, 1890, which was to form a society to support two deaconesses to be sent to China, God put it in her heart to support one of them. She says: "Taking two hundred dollars a year as a basis, I saw if one hundred gave four cents a week, it could be done. I knew if I brought forth the seed and planted it, that God would make it grow. I knew the Kingdom of Heaven was not like a seed which a man kept in his garner,—it never could become 'the greatest among herbs' there,—but like a seed which a man planted."

"On Monday I began to plant," she says, "began to try for one hundred, and the first fifty dollars were remitted for a deaconess in China. I prayed that my life might be used as wisely, lovingly, completely and mightily for heathen women as it could be if I were in their midst. The work continued to grow, until after eight years of planting and watering the seed, I have the following fruit for the Master: four deaconesses (missionaries) in China and India, and two native Bible women, at an annual cost of $1,560."

The question naturally presents itself, How has all this been done? The answer is simple. First, she has a zeal with knowledge. She has the faith born of God, and has learned the lesson, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me." Second, she is afire with missionary zeal. It is a passion which consumes her. She makes everything tend to her one purpose, and she imparts her zeal as a contagion to all about her. To use her own illustration, "Plant an apple seed in the ground, and the result will be a tree for its inheritance." Every week this circle widens; some new heart is touched, and a new worker enlisted. Cannot each one of us do as much for the Master?—Mrs. M. D. Stambach, in Missionary Link.

Smoking Cures Catarrh.

A Combination of Herbs, Smoked in a Pipe, Cures Catarrh of Head, Nose and Throat.

SAMPLES MAILED FREE.

Contains No Tobacco and is Pleasant and Easy to Use.

The fact that the smoking of tobacco is injurious to the health is no argument against the use of Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure in a pipe, or in the form of cigarettes, as this remedy contains no tobacco or any injurious drug. The effect of a remedy applied directly to the diseased part is much better than the uncertain action of medicines taken into the stomach. This is the philosophy, profound as it is simple, of the treatment of catarrh with Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure.

It is the only known remedy that can penetrate the recesses of the head, throat and lungs. No liquid remedy can do this. No spray that ever was devised—surely no "constitutional" nostrum taken into the stomach—can reach the inflamed surfaces and cleanse, soothe and heal them as this medicated smoke-vapor does.

In order to demonstrate its merits, a three days' trial treatment will be sent, absolutely free, to any sufferer. Address Dr. Blosser Company, 355 Walton St., Atlanta, Ga.

How Girls Can Help Their Mothers.

Every girl, if she be not throughly selfish, is anxious to lift some of the burden of household management from her mother's shoulders on to her own; but, unfortunately, many girls wait to be asked to do things instead of being constantly on the lookout for little duties which they are capable of doing.

If you would be of any real use in the home you must be quick to notice what is wanted—the room that needs dusting, the flowers which need re-arranging, the curtain which has lost a ring, and is therefore drooping. And then you must not only be willing to do what is needed, but willing to do it pleasantly, without making people feel that you are being martyred.

It is almost useless to take up any household duties unless you do them regularly. If you do a thing one day and not the next, you can never be depended on, and if some one else has to be constantly reminding you of and supervising your work it probably gives that person more trouble than doing it herself would cause.

Have a definite day and a definite time for all you do. The flower vases will need attention every other day, the silver must be cleaned once a week, and there should be one day kept for mending and putting away the household linen. Begin, too, directly after breakfast and keep on steadily till your work is done.

If you begin by sitting down—"just for a minute" with a book, or think you will "just arrange the trimming" on

Another Appreciation of the Aetna.

LUMBERTON, N. C., November 26, 1902

J. D. BUSHALL, ESQ., Manager Aetna Life Insurance Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir:—After a careful comparison of policies submitted to me by the Aetna Life, Bankers' Life of New York, Equitable of New York, Northwestern, New York Life and Prudential, I have accepted $10,000 in the Aetna on the 20 payment life plan, with option of 25 year 3 per cent. Gold Bond Contract.

I have been a policy-holder in the Aetna for nearly eight years, and therefore feel somewhat prepared to judge of its merits from actual results. With all due deference to other companies, it affords me great pleasure to say that in my opinion the Aetna cannot be surpassed for plain and liberal contracts, and for just, conservative and economical management. I now have $12,000 in the Aetna. My partner, Mr. W. W. Carlyle, has $16,000 and one of our clerks, Mr. John T. Morse's "Light."

Rev. George Winifred Hervey relates that, long ago, while pursuing investigations in the Astor Library, New York, he used often to meet there Prof. F. B. Morse, the renowned inventor of the electric telegraph. Once he asked him this question: "Professor Morse, when you were making your experiments yonder in your rooms in the University, did you ever come to a stand, not knowing what to do next?"

"Oh, yes; more than once."

"And at such times, what did you do next?"

"I may answer you in confidence, sir," said the Professor, "but it is a matter of which the public knows nothing. Whenever I could not see my way clearly I prayed for more light."

"And the light generally came?"

"Yes. And I may tell you that when flattering honors came to me from America and Europe, on account of the invention which bears my name, I never felt that I deserved them. I had made a valuable application of electricity, not because I was superior to other men, but solely because God, who meant it for mankind, must reveal it to some one, and was pleased to reveal it to me."

This utterance by a distinguished man of science reminds us again, as many similar utterances have done, not only that true greatness has no vanity, but that superior minds, as a whole, reverently acknowledge the Supreme. They who climb highest see farthest, and the light which comes from above shines the longest way.

A pleasing proof of the felicity and far-seeing wisdom of this eminent man and devout inventor appeared in the result of a grand test by the Postal Telegraph Company. This company had a "field day" a short time ago, when the various transmission methods and alphabets were tried on all their lines. When comparative material costs, salary of operators, accuracy of work, time consumed, and all other factors were taken into consideration, the decision was wholly in favor of the Morse system, which has been in use fifty years.

The inventor's first message—"What hath God wrought?"—intimated in no uncertain way the inspiration which gave his work longevity, and made it a light to the world.

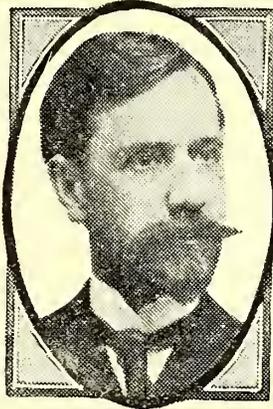

At the completion of one of the Amherst College buildings, when President Hitchcock first assembled his geology class in a new recitation room, with sky windows, this was his introduction to one of his best lectures: "Young gentlemen, all the light we have here comes from above."

The reverent spirit which took that text, and spoke in the Astor Library, dignifies scientific thought, and contributes to success in all search after truth.—Youth's Companion.

Our Little Folks.

CONDUCTED BY MRS. A. J. MCKELWAY.

Children's Letters.

Aberdeen, N. C., Jan. 15, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I enjoy so much reading the letters in your paper, and it has encouraged me to write. I hope that I will see my letter in print.

I am nine years old. I go to school to Miss Janie Dalrymple. She is a good teacher. Mama is my Sunday-school teacher. Our preacher boards with us; his name is Mr. Hancy. We like him very much. I must close for fear of the waste basket.

Your friend,

Tyler A. Campbell.

Rankin, N. C.

Dear Standard:

My uncle takes the Standard and I read the letters. I have three sisters; we are all going to school. Our teacher's name is Mr. D. F. Hunter. I love him very much. My desk-mate is Mary Jennings; she is my darling love.

I go to Sunday-school most every Sabbath; my teacher's name is Mrs. Nannie Caldwell. I love her very much. My pastor is Rev. G. T. Thompson. I go to school at Carmel. I study Grammar, History, Geography, Dictionary and Arithmetic. I will close for fear of the waste basket.

Your true friend,

Age, 13. Vernia Stanford.

Rankin, N. C., Jan. 15th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I have never written to you before, I thought I would write a short letter. My papa takes your nice paper and I enjoy reading the children's letters very much. I go to Sunday-school every Sunday. My pastor is Rev. W. O. Sample. My Sunday-school teacher is Mrs. Belle Alexander. I love her very much.

I will close for fear of the dreadful waste basket.

Your unknown friend,

Age, 11. Mary Sample.

Rankin, N. C., Jan. 15th, 1903.

My dear Standard:

I love to read the letters in your paper very much. As my desk-mate is going to write I thought I would write too. I am going to school. My teacher's name is Mr. D. F. Hunter. I like him very much. I also go to Sunday-school. My teacher is Cousin Emma Hutchison. I think she is such a good woman. We have a new church and a new preacher. Our preacher's name is Rev. W. O. Sample. I will close.

Your friend,

Age, 12. Mary Jennings.

Rankin, N. C., Jan. 15th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

My papa takes the Standard, and I enjoy reading the children's letters very much. I go to Sunday-school every Sunday. My pastor is Rev. W. O. Sample. I also go to school. My teacher is Mr. D. F. Hunter. I study History, Dictionary and Arithmetic. My desk-mate is Annie Lee Patterson. I love her very much. I have two brothers and one sister going to school. I will close, hoping to see my letter in print.

Your little friend,

Leah Sample.

Dear Mrs. McKelway:

My Grandpa takes the Standard, and he lets me read the little letters and I enjoy reading them. I am going to school now. My teacher's name is Mr. Hunter. I love him very much. I have a good time at school. I go to Sunday-school every Sunday. I love to go to Sunday-school very much and also I love my pastor. I will close.

Your friend,

Age, 10. Nettie Jennings.

Charlotte, N. C., Jan. 15th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As my desk-mate is writing to you, I thought I would write too. I go to school at Carmel. My teacher is Mr. D. F. Hunter, from Derita. I love him very much. I study Grammar, History, Geography, Dictionary and Arithmetic. My desk-mate is Mary Sample. I love her dearly. She lives near my home.

I will close hoping to see this in print.

Your little unknown friend,

Age, 13. Verdie Ross.

Charlotte, N. C., Jan. 15, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl 11 years old. I go to the graded school. My teacher's name is Miss Janie McIntosh. I am in the fifth grade. My brother and sister are twins, and their names are Ellie and Edwin. They are in the third grade. Their teacher's name is Miss Fannie Henderson. I will close.

Your unknown friend,

Benlah Thomas.

Salisbury, N. C.

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl seven years old. I have two pets, a cat and a dog. I like to play with my cat the best. I go to the graded school. I am in the first grade. I hope you will publish this. I must close.

Your little friend,

Elizabeth Davis.

Dixie, N. C.

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl nine years old. I go to school at Dixie. My teacher is Miss Myrtle Wolfe. I go to church at Steele Creek. My Sunday-school teacher is Miss Ola Herron. I will answer John McDowell and Ada Clents' question. Demonstration is found in I. Cor. 2 and 4. The reason Methuselah died before his father was because Enoch never died—God took him. I will close by asking where is Chapel found in the Bible?

Ola Griffith.

Tom and Bush.

Tom was a large, gray cat, and Bush was a little gray squirrel. Perhaps their color had something to do with their friendliness; for, when Bush and Tom were curled up beside each other in a cage, they looked very much alike.

Of course, the cage belonged to Bush, but one day Helen's father took the squirrel down to the store with him. The cage stood upon the piazza and the door was open. Tom walked back and forth in front of the cage several times, and at last decided to step in. He was too big and clumsy and, I must confess, too lazy, to spin round upon the wheel which afforded Bush so much amusement, so he only touched it with his nose once or twice and then curled up in the bottom of the cage and took a nap.

In the meantime Bush was enjoying himself in Helen's father's coat pocket. This was the way he always travelled when he went down town; it was a very safe way for a gray squirrel to travel. He usually found a nut or two in the pocket, which kept him busy for a time, and then he generally curled up and went to sleep.

Now Bush never mistrusted that he had a visitor at home, and Tom, being fast asleep, hadn't any idea of what was going to happen. He was greatly astonished, therefore, to awaken from his nap and find Bush snuggled up beside him in the most friendly manner.

Tom stretched out his sleepy eyes and sniffed Bush all over, from his little warm nose to the tip of his large, bushy tail. And then a very sensible idea must have entered his wise head, for he put his great paw around Bush and began to kiss him and fondle him, just as if he had been a kitten. After awhile Bush sprang into his wheel and proceeded to entertain Tom by his gymnastics. This was a little more than the cat could stand, and he walked leisurely out of the cage.

After this, whenever Tom found the cage door open, he always walked in. And sometimes, when it was not open, he would put his paw between the wires and play with the squirrel. Sometimes he would mew softly, as if saying, "May I come in?"

Bush would answer by a queer little squirrel chirp, which meant, of course, "I should be delighted to have you!"

Then Helen, if she were near, would open the door and Tom and Bush would have a frolic which generally ended in a nap together.

It was very amusing to see the squirrel try to induce the cat to dine with him. Nuts were beyond Tom's appreciation, except as playthings; but he would sit and blink admiringly when Bush, after vainly trying to persuade him to partake of his food, took the nut between his paws and cracked it with his little sharp teeth, all the while chattering to Tom about its sweetness.

One day Tom thought it was about time for him to offer Bush a taste of the food he liked; so, when the squirrel returned from one of his down-town trips, he found Tom in his cage with a little mouse held tightly between his paws. After many persuasive meows, Tom found that Bush liked nuts better than mice, and never after was he known to take a mouse into the cage.—Helen M. Richardson, in "Household."

As Cross as a Bear.

"You're as cross as a bear," said Bess to Billy.

Uncle Jim whistled. "Bears aren't cross to members of their own family," he said. "Now, I knew a bear once!"—

Bess and Billy both ran to him and climbed up on his lap.

"Did you really ever know a bear?" cried Billy, with wide open eyes.

"Well, not intimately," said Uncle Jim, "but I used to go hunting them when I was up in Canada, and one day I was out with a hunting party, and we saw right straight in front of us—what do you suppose?"

"A real bear!" gasped the children in concert.

"Yes; a real mother bear and her little son. The dogs started after them, and the mother bear began to run, but the little baby son couldn't run as fast as she did, and the dogs were gaining on him, so what do you suppose the mother bear did? Leave her little son behind? No, sir-ee-ee. She picked the baby near up on her stout nose and tossed him way ahead; then she ran fast and caught up to him and gave him another boost that sent him flying through the air. She kept this up for a mile and a half. Then she was too tired to go any farther, and the dogs surrounded her. Then she sat up on her hanches, took her baby in her hind paws, and fought the dogs off with her fore paws. And how she did roar!"

Bess shuddered.

"You could hear her miles away. She never forgot her baby; kept guarding him all the time. When the mother was shot, the baby cub jumped on her dead body and tried to fight off the dogs with his little baby paws. That's the way the bears stand by each other. Sometimes I think they love each other better than brothers and sisters. Hey, Bess, what are you crying about? I guess I won't tell you any more bear stories if that is the way it makes you feel."

"Billy," sobbed Bess, "you're as good—as good as a bear!"

Then they all laughed together and forgot what they had been cross about.—New York Tribune.

"Set your affections on things above" was St. Paul's way of saying it; "Hitch your wagon to a star" Emerson's way; and "Live on the top floor" Henry Drummond's; and this can be done even though this is a very difficult winter to make both ends meet, and to maintain your credit at the grocer's, the butcher's and the coal dealers.

Clipping.

We doubt, says the Saturday Evening Post, if any French mot or repartee ever surpassed in delicacy the reply made by an East Indian servant of Lord Dufferin, when he was Viceroy of India. "Well, what sort of sport has Lord— had?" said Duferin one day to his "shikarry," or sporting servant, who had attended a young English Lord on a shooting excursion. "Oh!" replied the scrupulously polite Hindoo, "the young Sahib shot divinely, but God was very merciful to the birds."—Salt Lake Tribune.

Prof. Ladd, instructor in psychology at Yale, while lecturing before the members of the senior class a short time ago unconsciously "gave himself away" in this fashion: "Now, let me illustrate that point. One day a celebrated psychologist, a world-renowned psychologist, I might say, was walking down the street when I met a little girl, and I said to her"—What the professor said was drowned in the outburst of laughter from the students.

In a village lived three women who were asked to join a Woman's Club. "Alas," said the first woman, "I have lived but twenty years, and I have read but few books save those of a frivolous character. I do not know enough to join a Woman's Club."

"But I," said the second woman, "have lived twenty-five years, and I have read Ruskin and Emerson and much of Browning. I know enough to join a Woman's Club."

"I," said the third woman, "have lived thirty years, and I know too much to join a Woman's Club."—Carolyn Wells, in Life.

A Mississippi boatman, with immense feet, stopping at a public house, asked the porter for a bootjack to pull off his boots. The colored gentleman, after examining the stranger's feet, broke out as follows: "No jack here big nuff for dem feet. Yuse better go back 'bout three miles to de forks in de roads an pull 'em off dar."

A TRAIN FOR MILLIONAIRES

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

Twentieth Century Presbyterianism.

“We believe that it is our duty as servants and friends of Christ, to do good unto all men, to maintain the public and private worship of God, to hallow the Lord’s Day, to preserve the sanctity of the family, to uphold the just authority of the State, and so to live in all honesty, purity and charity, that our lives shall testify of Christ. We joyfully receive the word of Christ, bidding his people go into all the world and make disciples of all nations, and declare unto them that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, and that he will have all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth. We confidently trust that by His power and grace, all His enemies and ours shall be finally overcome, and the kingdoms of this world shall be made the kingdom of our God and of His Christ. In this faith we abide; in this service we labor; and in this hope we pray.”

Event and Comment.

Elsewhere in this issue will be found an account of the great battle with the whiskey forces in North Carolina, and we call attention to it here lest the reader should miss its perusal.

There are 4,261 students at Harvard University this year. That is the reason President Smith of Davidson thinks he can give more individual attention to the students than President Eliot can.

Of the Twenty million dollars collected by the Northern Methodist Church, nine million goes to the payment of local church debts. That ought to give the denomination a tremendous forward impulse.

The Church of the Strangers celebrated its thirty-fifth anniversary the other day. A Southern man, Rev. Asa Blackburn, is now pastor. Also Miss Helen Gould is a friend of the Church of the Strangers.

Jesse G. Trimble, of Nashville, Tenn., a colored man, has divided the second honor in the Medical Department at Harvard University. The report is untrue, however, that he has been appointed resident physician at the White House.

The news comes from Japan that Mrs. Roosevelt kept the President from interfering in the Boer war. Since recent occurrences at the White House we are not surprised. We hope he will not volunteer as a private under President Castro.

We hope that the death of Editor Gonzales will not prevent the legislation which he so earnestly and eloquently advocated to stop child-labor in the factories. He seemed on the point of winning his fight against the secular papers that are not religious and the religious that are also commercial.

In turning his back on the highest ambition of his life, the Supreme Bench, at the urgent solicitation of the Filipino patriots, Judge Taft has commended himself to the American people as an unselfish and high-minded man. Never mind. The American people may want a President some day who knows all about the Philippines.

The Congregationalist quotes Governor Aycock's appeal to the North Carolina legislators not to sacrifice the lives of children in order to create wealth, as a warning also to the boot and shoe factories, where the employment of children has recently increased eighty-six per cent. That is the way to put the shoe on the other foot.

Albert Shaw of the Review of Reviews will give a lecture before the University of California on the Morals of Trade. We heard Mr. Shaw once on the immorality of taxing the South to pay the pensions, though that was not the title of his remarks. After hearing him there is no need to use his name as an exclamation.

Lord Milne has a good temperance law for the Transvaal. Liquor is not to be sold to natives under any circumstances, that is the native blacks, back and side entrances are forbidden to saloons, sale is forbidden to minors, saloons are closed on holidays and election days, and heavy penalties are attached for selling liquor to drunkards. Some day we are all going to be as solicitous about ourselves as we are about the other races.

Says the Brooklyn Eagle: "Again the murderer of Nellie Cropsey has been found guilty and again the lawyers for the criminal flout the jury by demanding another trial. How many years will it take to lodge the fellow in prison?" Considering the fact that the Molineux trial is fresh in our minds and that Molineux who seemed to be a good subject for hanging on general principles escaped altogether, the Wilcox case does not seem to have been unduly delayed.

Moderator Bradford of the Congregational Council makes a strong plea for the Federation of the Churches. We might tell him as James I. told his counsellors, "Ye are aiming at a Scots' Presbytery which agrees with monarchy [and congregationalism] as God with the devil." We suggest that our Presbyterian Committee of Publication send Brother Bradford a copy of the Book of Church Order. It might be a good model for his "federation."

During the last two years the postal clerks have handled $602,000,000 in money orders with the loss by carelessness and dishonesty of only $251. There is no business in the world that can make such a showing. And yet if the constitution had not given Congress accidentally the power to establish post-offices and post-roads, there would be many people to-day as opposed to government control of the post-office as they are of the railroads and the telegraph, and who would cheerfully pay a dollar a letter for carriage from Carolina to Alaska, instead of two cents.

One refreshing piece of news about the 147 sects in America is that about one twelfth of them are in process of extinction. Another is that the Christian Scientists claim now to have 51,000 instead of a million members. Carlyle said that England's population was forty millions, mostly fools. It has been a grief to American patriots to think that one seventieth of our population were that particular kind. The figures prove that the evangelical denominations have added seven million members in the last twelve years and the Unitarians a little over 3,000.

Says the esteemed Southwestern Presbyterian: "The meaning of the law is the law and for any enacting body the interpretation of the law is to it the law. If the Brief Statement is the Official Interpretation of "what is most surely believed among us" then the escape from the logical dilemma seems impossible. It is the Creed of Northern Presbyterians, because their present construction of the Westminster Confession of Faith." Will our contemporary put the shoe on the other foot and say that the deliverance of the Jackson Assembly on infant salvation is the creed of Southern Presbyterians? If so the esteemed Southwestern is a heretic as far as the Southern Church is concerned.

A Scotchman will tell the truth even about a dead man and an Archbishop. W. Robertson Nicoll in the British Weekly declares that the late Dr. Temple left "the Ritualists winning hands down, the Broad Church party save for a few heroic figures, extinct, and Evangelicals broken-spirited. He leaves the relations between the Church of England and Non-conformists more embittered than they have been for generations." The fact is certainly true, however much or little the Archbishop may have been responsible for it, and as he began his career as a Radical, a Liberal, an Anti-Ritualist and a temperance reformer and was for so long the Primate of the English Church, it would seem that he was to some extent responsible.

Government by the People, or Government by the Saloon.

The Southern people have always had a genius for government. Scratch any Southerner and you will find a politician. From Washington to Lincoln the South ruled the nation, and taking the three departments of the Government into consideration, Legislative, Judicial and Executive, during that whole period it was never without a controlling voice in public affairs. This is not to say that the governing function was always wisely used, or that serious blunders were not sometimes made. But the fact is that the South was "in the saddle" as the phrase was.

During the war the same genius for government was displayed and probably no nation in history, whose whole career was spent in the midst of war's alarms and war's confusion, ever governed itself better or had so many statesmen who were competent to the task, as the Confederate States of America.

Since the war, the defeated section has had to play a smaller part in national affairs. But they had a task sufficient to absorb all their interest and attention in the sphere of local government, and the way the ruling race, in spite of overwhelming odds, has wrested the government from the hands of the weaker race and won recognition of its right so to do from its former enemies, spite of bayonets and constitutions, will grow a larger and larger wonder in the perspective of the years.

Another problem has now arisen that will have to be settled and the question finally resolves itself into this one: Shall the saloon control the people or the people the saloon?

The American saloon is an institution of slow growth, but as an instrument of evil it seems to have attained its perfection. It would be difficult to suggest improvement in the direction of more certainly promoting drunkenness, and the vices that are akin to it. At one time everybody was free to manufacture and to sell intoxicating liquor. It is still contended by some that it would have been better policy to allow full liberty in this regard. But the liquor traffic was soon seen to be the source of disorder and crime and the law laid its hands upon the business to restrict and control it. As it became an unpopular business, through its associations, the government found it a convenient institution to tax and internal revenue and license taxes were laid upon the business of manufacturing and selling. So the grocery that once sold liquor to its customers without either shame or reproach, gradually withdrew from the traffic. Then laws were passed requiring one to secure a bar-room license in order to sell liquor and then requiring the liquor business to be conducted as a separate business. So the saloon as a place for selling and drinking liquor evolved from the process. Then it was made possible for a community and later for a state to rid itself of the business altogether, and the saloon was forced to go into politics to save its life. Self-preservation is the first law of nature. As the saloon cause has always been a wrong cause, its method of securing favorable and preventing unfavorable legislation has been the method always employed by the unscrupulous, namely the debauchery of government itself, both of the voter and of the representative of the people. It has been the greatest contaminating source in politics and it has often made the whole stream foul.

In the South the saloon has used the negro as in the North it has used the foreign element to keep entrenched in power. The marvel is that its impudence and effrontery should have been endured so long. No other traitors to party have been treated with such distinguished consideration. It is a notorious fact that the saloon has been holding the menace of negro supremacy over the head of the Southern white people for years. The threat has been in plain language this: "If you will not accept our dictation as to candidates and as to legislation we will join hands with the negroes and put them on top. We are voters for our own pockets all the time. We can become Democrats or Republicans overnight and the party that favors us, no matter what its policy may be as to other matters, is the party that will get our votes and the votes of every ward heeler and bar-room bum that we can control." Everybody knows that when the issue was made on the suffrage amendment in this state the Liquor Dealers' Association, through its President, threatened the defeat of the amendment if the agitation against the saloon did not stop. And now the word is going forth from Raleigh that if the Anti-Saloon bills there are put through it will lose the western counties of the State to the Democratic Party. We hope that the western counties and the Republican Party duly appreciate the delicacy of the compliment. That would mean that every preacher of the gospel would be considered a Democratic emissary and the turning men into Christians would be recruiting the Democratic Party with voters.

But the menace is an idle one so far as negro rule is concerned. The saloon is turning for help to the most degraded of the white people and to the politician who needs the influence and the money of the saloon to get himself elected to office, or who fears that the saloon can defeat him if he turns elsewhere for help. The man that controls the saloon vote is the man that is controlled by the saloon vote. The man that is controlled by the saloon vote is the man that will control the saloon vote. And so the question becomes a very practical cal one, Shall the people control the saloon or shall the saloon control the people?

It might have been better if the law of the land had never laid its hand upon the business. But it is a hundred years too late to talk about that now. In the midst of the battle it is idle to waste breath with wishing that the conflict had never begun. It is true that the people have the legal power to control the saloon in any way they please or to blot it out altogether. The precedents of a hundred years would have to be set at naught to make that no longer true. Revolution never rolls backward. There is no prospect of surrender on either side. Those who are fighting the saloon think that they are doing the will of God and it is of such stuff that martyrs are made. Those who are fighting for the saloon are influenced by the motives that appeal most strongly to the class which they influence at all, the love of money and the love of power. In ultimate solution it is the conflict between right and wrong. And hence it remains inevitable, that until the saloon is controlled by the people, that most malign of all political influences is going to debauch the electorate and bulldoze the representatives of the people so that the government in its last analysis does not rest with the people but with the coterie of saloon-keepers that meets in the back of a bar-room.

And the point is made that there can hardly be any worse government than this. There is one thing that even negro rule could never have done while the hills stood, namely, debauch the conscience of the white voter. Besides, the saloon does not stand by itself. It is in intimate alliance with the gambling den and the house of shame. Where the saloon rules a city you have a "wide open city," where a man who has boys to raise or girls to give in marriage should hesitate to live, and whither a decent man should hesitate to come lest he be pitching his tent toward Sodom. The man who is subservient to the saloon is not fit to hold any official position. And where the saloon is in control he is the only man allowed to fill any official position.

From the community upward to the State itself the evil grows. Since the Legislature has the exercise of the police power so that it can protect the decent citizens even in a saloon-ridden town, the legislator who wishes to be nominated or elected must get on his knees and make his obeisance to the saloon. And finally with the building up of a saloon controlled political machine, the very highest offices in the gift of the people are dictated by the lowest of all political influences. Even the courts become corrupted and the ermine itself cannot be worn by any man who is not willing to prostitute his high office to the saloon and decide in its favor the cases that come before him.

The saloon sees its interests in legislation that would not be supposed by the inexperienced to touch it. We have known it to unite the negro vote in solid mass against a proposition of the white property-owners to tax themselves for the education of both races. The saloon thought that the people might learn to do without the whiskey-tax for education. And the trouble about the saloon politician is, that he is almost infallibly on the wrong side in every question in which there is a moral issue. The church and the school are both against the saloon and the saloon is against them and the saloon-politician sides with the saloon. Whatever affects the moral and educational as well as the political life of the people is decided against the highest interests of the people. Government by the saloon is government by the devil.

This is the issue before the people of this state, of all the states except where the saloon is so strongly entrenched that the issue need not be made. It has been made in this state and in the South, where the purified electorate is more nearly concerned with the questions that affect the moral and educational life of the people than any body of voters anywhere. The saloon is fighting for its life with all the desperation of despair. No good citizen can keep out of politics when the saloon is in. The people, this great Anglo-Saxon people of un-mixed blood, who have never been governed by anybody but themselves, when once the issue of self-government has been raised, should meet this issue as they have met other issues, with the same indomitable spirit, with the same intolerance of opposition. We are not even suggesting expedients. But we insist upon the gravity of the issue and upon the right of the people to govern themselves without the help of any special interest, least of all the lowest of all. The people should set their power over against the power of the saloon and match its wrath with their wrath; till every representative of the people shall learn that his duty is to them and not the saloon; until the man who tampers with the saloon-vote will commit political suicide; until the fear of the people shall control and not the fear of the saloon. Until that time shall come, government by the people, for the people, is a roaring farce, and government of the people by the saloon is the dismal reality.

The editor of the Cumberland Presbyterian is a brave man. He has published an article from the pen of Professor Bone of the Lebanon Seminary of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church that smashes to smithereens the contention of the editor and a large number of the Cumberland brethren, that the Northern Church had come over to Cumberland ground in the amendments to the Confession. We hope that the learned Professor will not become himself a bone of contention. We give his conclusions not because we have ever had any doubt of their truth, but for the sake of the dear old Central Presbyterian who just now cannot be satisfied with anything but Anti-Calvinistic authority on a question which it seems to be unwilling to investigate at first hand. After reciting these conclusions we wish to submit a few brief and imperfect remarks for the benefit of our Cumberland Presbyterian brethren.

We wish that we had space for the article in full. Lacking that, we condense the statements made, with one or two exceptions where we give exact quotations.

Professor Bone says that a careful examination will show that the Northern Presbyterians proceeded with great caution and conservatism, that in matters where the public interest has been concentrated "we have not been able to trace the touch of the reviser's hand." That on account of rightful reverence for the Westminster Confession and the emphasis of the Presbyterian Church on the importance of a strong creed, together with the scholarship and good judgment of the able committee, the work was not done carelessly, that it was the purpose of the revisers themselves "to reduce revision to a minimum" and that they carried out their purpose. Taking up the verbal amendments of the text it is shown that these do not impair the confessional system, nor are the new chapters considered by the revisers to be new doctrines. The declaratory statements were intended to modify the doctrines of the Confession only in the sense of safe-guarding them from what the revisers considered to be erroneous interpretations. "In the opinion of the revisers the declaratory statements do not give us new, but old, doctrines and interpretations of doctrines. It was their belief that the substance of every declaratory statement could be found in the writings of Dr. Charles Hodge and other theological teachers who have undertaken to interpret the Westminster Confession for the Presbyterian Church."

Particularizing, the statement on the eternal decrees seems to be intended to accomplish two things: First to answer the charge of fatalism. "The theological teachers of the Presbyterian Church have always said that fatalism is not taught in the Confession. . . . The doctrine of the eternal decree is still held by the revisers just as it stands in the old confession; they will not get away from it a hair's breadth.

"But, as they claim, in harmony with this unchanged doctrine, and in order to answer the charge of fatalism, the revisers make the following statements: That God loves all mankind; that his Son made a propitiation for the sins of the whole world; that he is ready to bestow his saving grace on all who seek it; that he desires not the death of any sinner, but has provided in Christ a salvation for all, adapted to all and freely offered in the gospel to all; that men are fully responsible for their treatment of God's gracious offer; that his decree hinders no man from accepting that offer; and that no man is condemned except on the ground of his sin.

"Second, it seems that another motive for adding the Declaratory Statement just referred to was to make good a deficiency in the Confession. That document did not contain a positive statement that God loves all men. The revisers would make this a creedal statement. It was their wish as Dr. Herrick Johnson would say, to bathe the chapter on the eternal decree in the love of God. But it was not their purpose to change it.

"The statement on infants is intended to repudiate what the revisers considered an erroneous interpretation of the Confession. It is said very plainly and emphatically that the Confession is not to be regarded as teaching that any who die in infancy are lost, and that all dying in infancy are included in the election of grace. This simply reaffirms the position held by Dr. Charles Hodge."

The changes that the revisers failed to make are in the title of the third chapter, "Of God's Eternal Decree," the supralapsarian construction of the third chapter, and the doctrines of particular unconditional election, preterition, and effectual calling.

And the writer concludes: "The three Westminster doctrines, election, preterition and effectual calling stand or fall together. Touch one, you touch all three. The recently proposed revision leaves them untouched, in the opinion of the revisers. It was doubtless their purpose also to leave them untouched in the "Brief Statement of the Reformed Faith!"

And now a word to our brethren of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. This analysis of the amendments to the Confession is not from any apologist of the Westminster Confession but from the pen of a professor of theology in a Cumberland Presbyterian Seminary. He has the advantage of most who have written about the matter in knowing something of the literature of the subject discussed. The correctness of his conclusion can not be denied. Therefore the whole movement about union with the Northern Church has been on a false basis, the idea that the Northern Church had modified the Calvinism of the Westminster Confession. And since the Church is merely interpreting its own creed in the Declaratory Statement, the only part of the amendment that touches a doctrine, since the interpretation is not new, but is what well-informed Calvinists have always held everywhere, and since the old creed unchanged with the old interpretation has now been pronounced by Cumberland Presbyteries and editors and writers to be perfectly satisfactory, it follows as the night the day, that the whole contention of Cumberland Presbyterianism is based upon a mis-apprehension.

Not only is its "modified Calvinism" an unnamed hybrid of Calvinism and Arminianism, but the very argument for its own existence, that pure Presbyterianism was in error, is proved to be an error, originating doubtless in ignorance, but perpetuated by prejudice. It is one of the first principles of religious controversy, that an opponent is not to be charged with any belief that he distinctly repudiates. The Presbyterian Church has always denied the belief in fatalism with which the Cumberland Church has charged it, has always denied that the Confession taught it. The Cumberland Church has gone on ignoring this principle of decent controversy, until now its time has come. It has acknowledged the truth of the old creed in its entirety because of an authoritative interpretation which has always been given by the chosen interpreters of the creed. In brief it has been fighting a man of straw, set up by its own imagination, and when it is introduced to the real man it falls over itself in tumultuous haste to welcome a brother.

Now we are not complaining about this at all. The more admirers of Westminster that we find the more we are pleased. And this is not the first time that Arminians, tasting Calvinism without knowing what it was, have smacked their lips and said they liked it. But what puzzles us is just this: If the Cumberland Presbyterian Church can accept the Westminster Confession with the changes indicated; if it has gotten so far from its founders that it now prides itself on its educated ministry and resents any allusion to its former contention in this regard; if it has no sectional differences with either the Northern Church or the Southern, in the name of all that is comical, what does it stand for? A Presbyterian Church with a distinctive name and confessedly without a distinctive principle is something unique. It looks as though it were time somebody made a motion to adjourn.

The Christian people of North Carolina who saw Davenport's splendid cartoon and read Editor Daniels' editorial in Sunday's Observer must have all felt like thanking God that there is at least one daily paper in North Carolina that is not afraid of the liquor-crew and is not in sympathy with the saloon in its efforts to fasten itself anew on North Carolina. We know something of the pecuniary losses that are primarily involved in such a fearless course. We hope that the Christian people who want a good paper anyhow will see that the News and Observer does not lose even in a financial way by its stand for the right.

As an instance of the moral murder perpetrated by the Roman Catholic faith, Italy has 668 per cent. more murders than England and Spain has forty-five to a million, while England has three. Yet, come to think of it, we have a good many murders in the United States, and we claim still to be a Protestant country, though rather mixed as to religion and population.

Review of Contemporaries.

We referred in a recent issue to the "suffering" in Finland caused by a severe famine, [due to drought and flood rapidly following each other. News is now to hand to the effect that the same conditions obtain in the northern part of Sweden, which lies in the same "belt" of disaster. Nearly half a million persons are suffering in Finland, and a quarter as many in Sweden. The smaller number of sufferers seem to be receiving prompt relief, though the relief is far from adequate. King Oscar and his family, with many of Sweden's chief citizens, are doing their utmost by generous gifts. We are pleased to notice that with characteristic promptness the two principal Swedish papers in this country, Nordstjernan of New York, and Svenska Tribun of Chicago, have opened funds, and already the Swedes of this country have sent some $25,000 to the relief of their distressed kinsmen. Unfortunately, not only have the crops of the famine belt failed, but the supply of fish in the Gulf of Bothnia has mysteriously disappeared. The people are now eating pine bark mixed with Iceland moss. Nearly a quarter of a million of dollars have already been contributed in Sweden, but many times this amount will be necessary.—Episcopal Recorder.

The Christian Herald, New York City, is forwarding monies received for the Finland Famine Fund the day they are received. The situation is appalling, though there is so little about it in the papers. Depending on Russian help, 400,000 people are suffering. News of the situation was suppressed by the Russian press for many months.

North Carolina.

It does not require a long visit to this State to find evidence of the remarkable advance it is making along the lines of the best civilization. From the condition in which its people were found in the reconstruction period, as described in Mr. Dixon's remarkable book, The Leopard's Spots, it was a slow and painful struggle into order and industry and the most ordinary home comfort. But out of that struggle the people have come, with self-respect and manliness, into a commendable State patriotism, and a general and enlightened desire for many of the best things.

All the Protestant Churches have large followings throughout the State, and seem to be working with great zeal to reach the destitute sections. The educational work of the churches seems to be well advanced, and thriving denominational colleges and seminaries are well established in all sections of the State.

The State educational work is receiving enlightened attention. The common schools of the State have been much improved, and a plan adopted by which the way is opened for the beginnings of popular libraries in every school district in the State.

The State Literary Society is an effective organization, which is working for the awakening of popular interest in literary production.

An exceedingly interesting paper appears in a late number of the Raleigh News and Observer, by Prof. D. H. Hill, of the State Agricultural and Mechanical College, which reviews the literature by North Carolina authors for the year 1902. It makes a remarkable exhibit of the extensive work done for history and biography. It includes lives of Nathaniel Macon, Col. Edward Buncombe, Senator Mangum, Governor William Tryon, and General Joseph Graham. The State Colonial Records have been re-edited and republished. In the list are histories of the Colonial period, of the Moravian settlement, the sectional struggle, the Mecklenburg Declaration, of cotton and the cotton-gin. There are school histories of North Carolina, and three books of North Carolina stories for children, some of which are used in the schools.

Monuments have been erected to the Revolutionary heroes of North Carolina, and the battlefields have been marked, and are made the places of annual patriotic gatherings.

Temperance and the restriction of the liquor traffic is a subject of wide interest, in which the great body of the people are united, and the able News and Observer is taking an earnest lead.

It takes a long, hard struggle to awaken the great body of the people in any State to confidence in their power to rule, to cast out the miserable personal and factional politics, and engage the powers of the State, with the support of all good people, in the high things of moral and educational advancement.—Central Presbyterian.

[The patronizing tone of this from the Virginia editor is doubly humorous because so unconscious. The Old Dominion will have all she can do to keep up with the Old North State.—Ed.]

The Presbyterian Ministers' Association had another open meeting yesterday, the fourth in the series held under the direction of the evangelistic committee of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. It was held at 156 Fifth avenue, Manhattan. The Rev. Dr. David Gregg presided.

The Rev. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler was the first speaker. The venerable theologian remained seated while talking, owing to an infirm knee, but he spoke with much energy. When he was introduced he rose and saluted the audience, receiving the "Chautauqua salute," as well as a round of applause. He said he was going to discuss the most interesting of all subjects to Christ's servants, that of soul winning. He compared the present time with that when he began his ministry in New York, which will be fifty years in September. He was down in Market street then.

Dr. Cuyler said that statistics showed that there is not the number of conversions to-day that there ought to be. He had found that the character of conversion depended upon the character of one's convictions, whether profound or shallow. "If you want to rouse a lazy ship's crew to action," he said, "stait them to hauling in that man who has fallen overboard. Don't talk all the time about revivals. Above all, never predict one. We heard a great deal just a few years ago about 'the great twentieth century revival' that was to usher in the century. Did it come? On the other hand, that great revival which shook the city in 1858 came without any preliminary trumpets. I bore a part in that campaigning and it happened that I was associated with Horace Greeley in some philanthropic work at the time it began. I dropped in to see him one day and I told him that the whole city seemed to be thinking of religion and I thought that we would better postpone our other work. 'Yes,' he said, 'let the work go on—better postpone our meeting.' The greatest revival that was ever in my church began with a prayer meeting. In fact, I don't know but all real revivals begin in that way.

"Not all the responsibility for conversions rests upon the ministry—if it did, it would be well nigh crushing. It rests upon every professed follower of Jesus Christ. But, brethren, I never want to have any other man responsible for eating my dinner, nor for loving my wife. Nor do I want any other man responsible for plucking a soul from hell and landing it at the foot of the throne of God if I can do it. The famine of anthracite in the coal yards does not trouble me nearly so much as the famine of spiritual anthracite in our churches. And you can do more by personal appeal, eye to eye, alone, than by any number of sermons. That applies to the rich just as well as to the poor. When Mr. Moody went to London he was asked if he was going to try to save the souls of the miserably poor. 'Yes,' he replied, 'and of the miserably rich, too.'

"I am sick to death of the talk about advanced thought in religion to-day. When thought advances beyond the cross on Calvary its advance is over a precipice. He that is wise winneth souls. Trust in Christ, work for Him and by and by you will wear a coronet that will outflash the stars."—Brooklyn Eagle.

Devotional.

Suggestive.

A writer tells the story of the rose of Jericho—how it flourishes in lack of all things wherein plants delight—in the hot desert, in the rocky crevices, by the dusty wayside, in the rubbish heap. Even more, the fierce sirocco tears it from its place and flings it far out upon the ocean, and there, driven by the storms and tossed by the salt waves, it still lives and grows. So should we grow in any and all circumstances, where we may be cast—in sorrow, in hardship, in misfortune, in suffering. A deathless life is in us, and we should be unconquerable. Christ is with us; Christ's life is in us, and we should be unconquerable. Christ is with us; Christ's life is in us; nothing should be allowed to rush us. Live near the heart of Christ and the world's power will not hurt you, nor the world's darkness dim your soul's light.

"Noble souls, through dust and heat
Rise from disaster and defeat,
The stronger;
And, conscious still of the divine
Within them, lie on earth supine
No longer."

—J. R. Miller. D. D.

The longer I live the more sure I am that to the devout soul God is constantly speaking by the little incidents of daily life. Such a man will have that experience corroborated by the word of God on the one hand and sympathetic circumstances on the other. And though everybody says the man is acting in a suicidal manner, the man himself is convinced by ways he cannot define that he has learned the will of God. It may be that this relates to the giving up of a habit, taking a certain course or stepping out in some untrodden path, but the man knows that he knows the will of God. If, however, you do not know, do not act. If I had a little child who could not tell what I wanted, but who at the same time needed to know my will, I would explain even to the adoption of the simplest speech and the shortest words. So we must trust God to make known His will to us. God also works in a man "to do." When you know what God wills, you know that you have sufficient power to do what He purposes. You must not wait to feel it. Believe it is there.—Rev. F. B. Meyer.

Do whatever you can to help every struggling soul, to add new strength to any staggering cause—the poor sick man that is by you, the poor wronged man whom your influence might vindicate, the poor boy in your shop that you may set with new hope upon the road of life that is beginning already to look dark to him. I cannot tell you what it is. You know your duty. No man ever looked for it and did not find it.—Phillips Brooks.

We are saved by hope. Never man hoped too much, or repented that he had hoped. The plague is that we don't hope in God half enough. Hope never hurts any one—never yet interfered with duty; nay, it always strengthens to the performance of duty, gives courage and clears the judgment. St. Paul says we are saved by hope. Hope is the most rational thing in the universe.—George MacDonald.

It is no man's business whether he has genius or not, work he must, whatever he is, but quietly and steadily; and the natural and unforced results of such work will always be the things that God meant him to do, and will be his best.—John Ruskin.

I know not the way I am going,
But well do I know my Guide;
With a childlike trust I give my hand
To the mighty Friend at my side;
And the only thing that I say to Him
As He takes it, is, "Hold it fast:
Suffer me not to lose my way,
And lead me home at last"

—F. R. Havergal.

Missionary.

A Mission Study Class.

I mention a new organization cautiously, for the Church is organized almost to agony, but has your Missionary Society a study class? Have you tried to have one? Where it is earnestly entered into, much can be done.

First, it must have a leader—the busiest body in your society is the one to choose, for such an one has and can always find time for extra work, and this very busy leader must have a pleasing personality, and teaching ability. A fair knowledge of the country or station or book under review is essential. Honest effort, though it be crude in the beginning, will be its own stepping stone. Select a course that can be covered within a given time. Too much will be discouraging. Members can only be secured by personal solicitation. Have each member pledge at least one hour a week for preparation. Six or eight lessons on a subject will open many eyes and hearts.

Have one member look up leaflets, clippings, books, etc., for those who have less inclination, and above all, put prayer and pains into the organization. Do not come to the meetings with an ignorance of the subject that would make you blush in an "Over the tea Cups" club. Once the pebble is dropped, the ripples will take care of themselves. Knowing one station intimately will make you want to know adjoining ones, and before you know it, you will be studying plain old geography, biography, natural history, and hungry for any thing that will bring closer our neighbors across the sea. A little real knowledge is a wonderful leaven. How many can tell—off-hand—the exact location of Korea, where our Dr. Rankin so lately fell asleep?

Helpful leaflets and books are furnished by our committees at Nashville and Richmond. Many readable books may be on your own shelves, and the circulation idea will save money.

If but one book can be bought by your Society, I unhesitatingly say, get "World-Wide Evangelization," the report of the Student Volunteer Convention at Toronto, in February, 1902. A friend who spent a year in a mission training school, whose reading and study has been varied, returned a borrowed copy with the message: "I have found nothing better." The price is $1.50, and it can be gotten from The Student Volunteer Movement, New York.

"It is really a library in itself, and one of the most permanent character. The addresses, with the convention statistics, the outlines (in the Appendix) for missionary meetings, the list of illustrative 'nuggets' from the convention, and the unusually detailed index, make up a volume which anyone interested in missions will find invaluable as a source of information, inspiration, and illustration." Thomas Gradgrind and his "Facts, Facts, Facts," isn't altogether horrible. Facts make the skeleton; prayer and loving sympathy clothe it with flesh.

Impurity is honeycombing all the non-Christian nations. Intemperance is making fearful ravages where it has the right of way, and I am ashamed to say that it has its way far more than it would if Christianity were more aggressive. The opium curse is eating like gangrene into the best life of the strongest race of Asia. Gambling is casting its fascinating spell over the South American republics and other countries, and is leading not only to waste, but to desperation, lawlessness and suicide to a degree of which we know little in Christian lands.—Jno. R. Mott.

Dr. Parker, the well known London minister, in speaking of prayer, said: "I would rather show ten men how to pray than one hundred men how to teach or preach. That is the really important thing."—Ex.

It is very easy to cherish fine theories of duty, but often very difficult at times to put them into practice.

Sunday School Lesson.

CONDUCTED BY REV. H. G. HILL, D. D.

The Church at Corinth Founded.

Act. 1, 1-11. February, 1903.

As Athens was the seat of art and intellectual culture, so Corinth was a centre of commercial activity, wealth, luxury and immoral practices. Going from Athens to Corinth, Paul remained there preaching the Gospel for eighteen months. The fruits of his labors were abundant and a large church was established. The two Epistles afterward addressed to this church attest Paul's interest in their welfare and show the gross errors and sins into which some of the members were betrayed by their former mode of life and by their heathen surroundings. But even these were over-ruled, for instructing that church, and the church of subsequent times, as to Divine truth and Christian duty.

I. Paul's Companionship at Corinth.—After a time Silas and Yimotheus came to him from Macedonia. But before their arrival the Lord provided for him associates, who added to his comfort and increased his usefulness. A Jew Aquila, and his wife Priscilla, driven by Claudius Caesar's command from Rome, came to Corinth. Having the same occupation, that of tent-makers, they were drawn together and Paul abode with them and engaged in his trade. They furnished him with a home in a strange city and he gave them instructions which rendered them zealous disciples of Christ and qualified afterwards to instruct others even the eloquent Apollos, in religious truth. While these companions wrought with their hands, their minds and lips were exercised concerning the things of the kingdom.

II. Paul's Labors at Corinth.—The apostle labored with his hands that he might support himself, that he might not be dependent upon others and that he might not be open to the charge of preaching the gospel from mercenary motives. He also taught in private Aquila and Priscilla the doctrines and duties of Christianity. But he was not content with these private toils during the week. He must serve the Master on the Sabbath. Hence "He reasoned in the synagogue every Sabbath and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks." He addressed the understanding both of Jews and Gentiles. After the coming of Silas and Timotheus the Word of God constrained him to testify to the Jews with more earnestness that "Jesus was Christ." This is the very heart of the Gospel for them and for all men. For if Jesus is not the promised and anointed Redeemer of Men, then mankind is without a Saviour and the world without salvation.

III. Paul's Treatment of Opposers.—This bold advocacy of Jesus, claims as Christ excited opposition. "They opposed themselves and blasphemed." Paul rebukes their conduct and warns them of coming evil. "He shook his raiment," in token of his being free from their guilt and "said unto them your blood be upon your own heads: I am clean." He adds "From henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles. He not only repoves their rejection of Christ and warns of approaching judgment, but he separates from them, to preach the Gospel to them who will hear and obey its teachings. This course pursued by Paul towards obstinate rejectors of Gospel offers, accorded with the Master's directions was uniformly followed by the apostle and is the proper line of conduct with such offenders. They must be reprovved, warned and left for more hopeful hearers.

IV. Paul's Encouragements at Corinth.—The apostle must have been disheartened by seeing his self-denying labors unappreciated by his countrymen and by his brethren rejecting the precious blessings of the Gospel. But the Lord does not fail to give him cheer at the right time and to prevent him from yielding to despondency. He is encouraged by numerous conversions. He does not labor in vain and has demonstrated that the Gospel is "The power of God unto Salvation." At the very time when many Jews rejected Christ it is recorded, "And Crispus the chief ruler of the synagogue believed on the Lord with all his house, and many of the Corinthians hearing, believed and were baptized."

Westminster League.

CONDUCTED BY REV. HUGH W. HOON.

A Covenanter Writes of Their Meetings.

As stated last week we had intended, beginning with this week, to give suggestions on the League topics for use in the meetings of our young people, but will postpone that for another week. Several weeks ago we asked for a contribution from one of the boys of Company 17, Davidson, N. C. We take pleasure in publishing below this description of Covenanter work by one of the Covenanters. We hope other companies are doing as good work as Company 17.

"The Covenanters, as a society for boys was begun in the Second Presbyterian Church of Richmond, Virginia, on the 27th day of March, 1896. Since that time companies have been formed in nearly every Southern State until now there are about seventy such companies on the Directory.

Company No. 17 was organized in the Presbyterian Church at Davidson, N. C., on the 13th day of February, 1899. There were only eleven charter members, but from the very beginning the company gradually increased in membership until there was an enrollment of twenty-three.

In order that others may learn of our work and the manner in which we conduct our meetings, we give below the program of the one held on the 11th day of January, 1903, the subject of which was "The Hawaiian Islands."

The President having called the meeting to order at eight p. m., the following exercises were carried out:

1. Prayer, by Edmund Robinson.
2. Missionary Creed, in concert.
3. Scriptural Reading, Is. 56: 1-18, by John Brown.
4. Prayer, by Earle Morrow.
5. Geography of The Hawaiian Islands," by Hamlin Strohecker.
6. "Historical Sketch of The Hawaiian Islands up to the Time of their Annexation to the United States:" by Willie McColl.
7. "Account of the Annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States," by Gregg Caldwell.
8. "Sketch of Missions in the Hawaiian Islands," by Charles Flowe.
9. Covenanters' Map, by Hamlin Strohecker.
10. Business: 1. Minutes; 2. Roll Call and Dues; 3. Invitation to Juniors; 4. Athletics; 5. Election of Baseball Officials.
11. Adjournment.

After each meeting those able to do so remain and are entertained for the rest of the evening with games, candy-making, etc., which the boys enjoy very much.

During the meeting, the program of which is given above, the athletics, in which we are to take part during the coming season, were discussed; John Brown and Charles Flowe were elected Captain and Business Manager, respectively, of our Baseball Team.

Last year we played a few games with different teams and were very much elated over one or two of our victories, and hope, with the proper training and practice, to have a very good team this year, which we believe, if properly managed, will add interest to the Covenanter Societies as a whole.

Every spring we have a Field Day, in which nearly all the boys take part and are greatly benefitted physically by doing so.

We trust, in giving this brief account of the work that is being done among these boys, that those who heretofore have known very little of this way of inspiring Christian manhood into the hearts and minds of them, will pray that the societies may prosper in every branch of their work; that they may indeed reflect honor upon the noble name by which they are known; that they may be a great help in carrying the gospel of Jesus Christ to those who know Him not; and that they may ever be faithful to their trust, which is so graphically illustrated by their well known motto—"For Christ's Crown and Covenant."

The Lend-a-Hand Book Mission in the South.

I would like to interest the readers of the Standard in a work that is being quietly and efficiently done in our midst by a dear little New England woman, Miss Sarah P. Brigham. In 1892 a Southern minister and teacher applied to Miss Brigham for second-hand publications for free distribution among people who were not able to buy them.

Through appeals in the papers, generous supplies came from the North, with touching expressions of gratitude from those in the South to whom they were sent.

The work increased to such an extent that an assistant was employed.

They go from place to place in the South, meeting friends of education and representatives of various organizations and work with and through them.

The work is entirely undenominational. Hundreds of barrels and boxes of second-hand books, magazines and papers, with freight prepared, have been sent from the North. I haven't the report for 1902, but in 1901 twenty-one travelling libraries had been given to the Woman's Clubs of South Carolina and Tennessee and more were to follow.

Many of the books were new. Each library contained from fifty to one hundred volumes for adults and children, and they are placed where the people have small means and few opportunities.

The applications for reading material have been far greater than can be supplied and there is an eager call for standard books where the taste has been stimulated and educated. To meet this demand Miss Brigham has organized, in connection with the Book Mission, an extension called the Southern Library Fund.

This fund will be used in purchasing new books for travelling libraries and for free public libraries where the people are making an effort to help themselves.

I heard Miss Brigham lecture at a Congregational church in Arlington, where she set forth the work and the needs.

She would never have expected a Southern woman to be in that audience, but no word was said or statement made that could annoy the most extreme Southerner.

When, in a little burst of enthusiasm, she said: "I just love those Southern people!" I, for one, knew she was doing another work as great as establishing libraries.

But she has had no success in organizing societies in North Carolina.

Having met people of so much intelligence there, she cannot understand it. Nor can I!

Hearing this little woman making appeals for help for my own section: coughing between every few words; frail almost to attenuation; yet with the heroism born of noble work nobly done. I felt ashamed to think we could fail in appreciation of the help she has offered and our great need for it.

Is it possible that North Carolina is less alive to her needs, less public-spirited, less helpful towards those who need help?

Miss Brigham is anxious to have the work placed on a permanent footing and with this in view she went to see Mr. Carnegie. She had a letter from Carol D. Wright endorsing her and her work, also a carefully prepared statement showing the work being done, with a list of the board of managers, all well-known men and women.

But, to my mind, Mr. Carnegie gives, not in the way and place most needed, but as a monument to his own glory. He must be the great and mighty I, and the glory must all be his. Miss Brigham was sorely disappointed. In addition to everything else, she pays her own and her assistant's travelling expenses. Surely those for whom she is doing this great work might make an effort to get free transportation for herself and assistant and for her freight. Every appeal for help fills her with joy, for she knows the work is growing and the Lord's hand is in it.

Her work is almost entirely among the whites, not because of less sympathy with the negro, but she finds them better provided for by Northern friends.

Who will organize the first Lend-a-Hand society in the dear old State?

All that is necessary is to get a room as a distributing point, then collect all the books, papers and magazines that have been laid aside, from the friends all around you.

Where people do not care enough for reading material to come for it, take the time and go to them. Get them interested in some way. Write to Miss Brigham, 1 Beacon Street, Boston, and she will give you further directions and send you literature.

Right here I would suggest that nothing better and more stimulating than the Presbyterian Standard could be sent around.

I have a dear old friend here who assists in collecting and sending papers to the seamen's Bethel in Boston.

It is a real trial to give up the back numbers of the Standard, but I look them over and say good-bye, for you see they mean more to me, so far away from home, than they probably do to many and an earnest prayer goes out that some heart may be touched and some life transformed, through reading them. This is an opportunity that nearly everyone who reads this letter has, and "there is nothing on earth so small that it may not produce great thing." With the hum of factories going up all over our State, there is an increasing population to uplift and if we do our duty now, the vexed questions that are like a seething volcano in so many parts of the country, will adjust themselves more easily.

Margaret McB. Baxter.

The Sufferings of Others.

There is not that considerateness for the sufferings of other people which the spirit of true brotherliness demands of us. Even among those of the highest type of humanity there is a lamentable proneness to oftentimes be coldly indifferent to the suffering experiences of those who are in close association with them. It is strangely true that many husbands, a though kind and devoted in a general way to their wives, are, frequently, practically unconcerned about certain types of suffering which their wives are undergoing. A husband of phlegmatic temperament, always strong in nerve and robust in health, is very apt to slightly regard the torturing suffering which his intensely nervous and sensitive-spirited wife is enduring. Quite likely he imagines that she is hysterical, unhealthily imaginative, and is needlessly complaining; but it is not so. The secret of the trouble is the fact that the extreme delicacy of the wife's organism has created a capacity for the most excruciating suffering, and there are times when she is absolutely powerless to prevent it or suppress it. She knows that her husband is so constituted that he cannot understand her feelings nor begin to appreciate her sufferings; but she does ask her husband, and also others, to have patience with her and make all possible allowance for her condition. I know a man, having an exceedingly delicate nervous system, and hence a super-sensitive temper, whose physical and mental sufferings are frequently terrible; but his wife, being sluggish in temperament and cool in nerve, has no adequate conception of his great sufferings; and the consequence is, she often fails to humor him and to so adapt herself to his condition as to help him bear his affliction. Now, what I plead for is, that those who are comparatively free from nervous and mental suffering shall exercise a most charitable forbearance towards such as are thus suffering. When one tells another that he is undergoing terrible torments, even to the pit of despair, let there be the best of patience exercised in that one's behalf; and be very thankful that you are free from such anguish.

Bible Study for Personal Spiritual Growth.

By John R. Mott.

Let us note at the outset that it is the Bible of which we are to think in this discussion, not books about the Bible, no matter how many, or how helpful, or how accessible they may be. Let us also bear in mind that it is Bible study that is to engage our attention, not the subject of Bible reading, although we might profitably spend much time upon that. Nor are we to consider the subject of Bible listening, although that is almost a lost art in these days. It is Bible study which we are to emphasize, with all that the word study means to us as students. Moreover, it is Bible study for personal growth. It is not that form of Bible study designed to equip us to lead others, one by one, to Jesus Christ, although it furnishes an essential part of our equipment for such work. Nor is the object of such study first of all to enable us to help other Christians spiritually, by preparing us to give Bible readings, or to make spiritual talks, or to teach Bible classes, or to guide the Bible study of others, although it will prove invaluable as a preparation for all such work. It is Bible study for each man's own life which we shall keep clearly before us. It is intensely personal. Its object is personal growth.

What kind of growth is meant? Not growth in knowledge, although the world could far better afford to lose any other sixty-six books than these, viewing them simply as a storehouse of essential knowledge. Not intellectual growth, although it may be stated confidently that there is no other group of writings the study of which affords the same intellectual suggestiveness, grasp, breadth, and power. Above and beyond all this is the meaning of the term to which we shall limit our thought—Bible study for each man's spiritual growth. It is that Bible study which will make us better men to-morrow than to-day; which will find us far higher up the mountain path of Christian experience a year hence than at present; which enables us to meet God and to hear His voice and to know that it is His voice. It is that Bible study which opens up to us, each day, further and further vistas into the possibilities of the life hid with Christ in God.

1. To us as Christians. It is the test of true discipleship. Christ says, "If ye abide in My word, then are ye truly My disciples." We may call ourselves His disciples, but that does not prove that we are. Our names may be on the roll of His professed disciples, but that is not sufficient proof. The real test is the life, and that is not possible apart from devotional Bible study. If you abide in the Word—that is, if you spend time there, if you dwell there, if you live there—then will you necessarily be a true disciple. Such Bible study alone shows us the needs of our spiritual lives. It reveals to us the weak places in our armor, the points of least resistance in our lives. It shows us ourselves as we are, and therefore as God sees us. Chrysostom says, "The cause of all our evils is our not knowing the Scriptures." Therefore, if we would overcome doubts, temptations, passion, evil imaginations, unclean, unholy, and proud thoughts, let us centre our energies upon such study. The devotional study of the Bible alone shows us the possibilities of our spiritual lives. Why be satisfied with living on the dead level or in the valley, if God intends that we be climbing to the peaks?

2. To us as Christian workers. Would we work without friction, strain, anxiety, worry? Then let us apply ourselves to this kind of Bible study. We may not work so many hours, but we shall accomplish more, and when we leave, our work will not have to be undone. Without deep devotional study there is danger that our work become purely mechanical. It alone will make our experience fresh, rich, and full, and keep the realities of our faith vivid. If we would shape the work, and not be shaped by it, we must through these studies preserve a strong and ever-expanding inner life. Moreover, our fruitfulness in Christian work is absolutely conditional on our abiding in the Word. Above all, it is impossible to have the power of the Spirit of God as a constant possession apart from the study of the Bible. To do the work of God we must have the power of God. To have the power of God we must have the Spirit of God. The Bible is the channel through which the Spirit comes into the life. We do not find Spirit-filled men apart from deep, devotional Bible students. If we would be filled with the Spirit, keep filled, and have our capacity constantly increase, let us become possessed with the Bible study passion.

3. To us as Christian leaders. If those over whom God has placed us are to be spiritual, we must be spiritual leaders. The stream never rises above the fountain head. Moreover, if we would be safe leaders we must study with intensity the mind of God concerning our work and problems. The Bible is the principal place where that is revealed. More than all, if we would have the true idea and spirit of Christian leadership, we must study with diligence the life of that Leader of leaders, as clearly set forth in the Scriptures.

Let us clear the ground, first of all, of that supposed hindrance—lack of time. In each country that we visit the students and Christian workers claim that they are busier than those of any other country. We have had to admit this point in at least fifteen countries. There are many persons who conscientiously think they do not have half an hour a day to spend in Bible study. Let us suggest two ways of meeting this hindrance. There is time to do the will of God. Is it the will of God that I grow spiritually? Yes; for He does not wish me to become unspiritual or to stand still. Has a man ever grown spiritually apart from devotional Bible study? We have not found that man. Have you? Therefore, there is time to study the Bible daily for our own spiritual growth. This, you say, is logical but theoretical. Well, then, will you for one month try the plan of spending the first half hour of the day in Bible study, and at the end of the time let us know whether it has interfered with your regular work or standing or efficiency? Hundreds of persons in different parts of the world have accepted this challenge. Thus far not one has reported that his work or standing has suffered in the least. On the other hand, many of them report that such study has enabled them to do more and better work. Is it fair, therefore, for any of us, without trying it, to say that this cannot be done?

Some people are kept from this kind of Bible study by the fact that they are studying the Bible for other purposes. Some students have said: "We are studying the Bible for other purposes. Some students have said: "We are studying the Bible in the college curriculum; will not that take the place of this form of Bible study?" It certainly will not, for the simple reason that each student has his own needs and temptations which may not be known to the teacher; and, even if they were, they could not be taken up and met in public. Each student needs to have God speak to him personally each day. On the other hand, some say, "We are teaching Bible classes. Will not the preparation for teaching take the place of such special devotional Bible study? The answer is much the same as before. Each teacher has his personal and peculiar needs, which may not be those of his pupils. He likewise needs to hear the voice of God speaking to his own soul each day.

Many conscientious Christians raise the question whether the reading of devotional books will not take the place of Bible study? We firmly believe that much of the lack of spiritual fibre among Christians to-day is due to a second-hand knowledge of the books of God. We would not be misunderstood, for we have derived too much benefit from such books as The Confessions of St. Augustine, The Imitation of Christ by Thomas Kempis, The Spiritual Letters of Fenelon, Baxter's Saints' Everlasting Rest, Jeremy Taylor's two spiritual classics, Law's Serious Call, and the more recent writings of Murray, Meyer, and Miss Havergal. The point is, why not go to first sources? One, in speaking of some of these writings, has said that in their most appealing tones they echo the voices of the Bible. After all, these things ought we to have done and not to have left the other undone.

Some people are hindered from studying the Bible devotionally because they are afraid to do so. One day while in India two young men said to us: "If we study the Bible in this way, we are afraid it will compel us to abandon our plan of entering Government service, and to devote ourselves to Christian work." A Mohammedan student in Egypt told us that, if he studied the Bible in this way, he would have to become a Christian. In another college a young man said it would make it necessary for him to give up a certain bad habit. Afraid of the light! How unscientific and unscholarly and cowardly!

1. Break up the subject to be studied into convenient or suitable daily sub-divisions. In this way there will be some definite thing to take up each day, and valuable time will not be lost casting about to find out where to begin. If we are to really search the Scriptures, we must have things in mind for which we will search.

2. Be alone, if possible, while engaged in such devotional study. This will often be difficult, but it is well worth the effort. We need to be where we can speak aloud to God. It is said that David Brainerd, in order to be alone for meditation upon the Word, was in the habit of committing to memory passages of Scripture, and then walking alone in the streets of New Haven, or in the neighboring fields, revolving these passages in his mind, applying them to his life, and conversing with God.

3. Keep in mind constantly the object of this kind of Bible study. It is to meet my spiritual need, not that of another. It is to enrich my life. It is to lift my ideals. It is to enable me to meet God and to hear his voice, to me, personally. We do well to remind ourselves of this object many times during our study.

4. Let there be resolute detachment of mind. Let us keep our thoughts from the thing which we have just been doing and from the thing which we mean to do next, and shut ourselves in alone with God and His Word. This is all the more important if our time be limited. If we have but half an hour to devote to such study each morning, we do not wish to spend half of it getting the mind fixed upon the subject.

5. Do not be diverted from the main purpose of the study. This is the peril of most students. We come to something which, as Peter says, is hard to be understood, and are apt to think that that difficulty must be removed before we can go further in our devotional study. Not so. Let us keep a paper on which we can note any difficulty that we come to, and at some subsequent time, as true scholars, let us seek to understand it. But let us not be cheated out of our daily spiritual food by mere intellectual curiosity, important as that is in its proper place.

6. Be thorough. We have far too much surface study of the Bible. Gold dust is often found on the surface, but as a rule we have to dig for the nuggets. We need to sink a shaft in the Scriptures in order to get at the deep things of God.

7. Meditate. Jeremiah best defines this process: "Thy words found and I did eat them;" that is, I take these words into my mind, I store them in memory, I revolve them over and over again, I let them touch the springs to conscience, I let them find me, I let the will act upon them and apply them, I give them right of way in my life, I make them part of myself, I realize in actual experience that the words of Christ "are spirit and are life."

8. Record results. If you put down one point each day you will gain over three hundred points within the year. Most of us keep a financial record. All of us are in the habit of taking notes on what we hear men say. Is it not worth while to keep a careful record of God's dealings with us? It is our practice to carry slips of paper in the Bible constantly, on which to note such points. We would rather part with the notes taken when listening to the most distinguished lecturers we have ever heard than with these little papers which contain the record of our own soul struggles and of God's personal dealings with us.

1. It should be an earnest or intense spirit. Ruskin says, "He who would understand a painting must give himself to it." He who would understand the deep things of God must give himself to them.

2. It must be a spirit of dependence upon the Holy Spirit. The Spirit must interpret what the Spirit has inspired.

3. This suggests that it must be a prayerful spirit. George Mueller, in writing of his experience in Bible study, says: "Spending three hours on my knees, I made such progress that I learned more in those three hours than in years before. From that time I became a lover of the Word of God." Does he mean that he learned more facts in three hours than in years before? No; he means that he spent enough time with the light of God's presence shed upon the Word to have revealed to him a secret which in turn unlocked other secrets, and thus to have opened before him a whole vista of truth. Many times we need to turn from the sacred pages with this prayer: "Open Thou mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of Thy law." We can see the ordinary thing without the help of God; but the unaided intellect, at its best, is absolutely unable to grasp the wondrous things of God.

4. It should be a childlike spirit. Bacon urges, "One must enter the kingdom of the natural sciences like a little child." Christ insisted, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven," still less understand its deep mysteries.

5. It should be an obedient spirit. We must be willing to let the Bible mean what it wants to mean. We must be willing to have our lives changed, cost what it may. "The organ of spiritual knowledge is an obedient spirit."

6. Finally, it should be a practical spirit. This term is best defined in the Scripture language, "All that the Lord hath spoken we will do." If we would determine at once that henceforth in our Bible study, as we come to commands which we have not obeyed, we would with God's help obey them; as we come to precepts which we have not heeded, we would in His strength heed them; as we see examples which we have not imitated, we would under the Spirit's influence imitated,—our lives would grow by leaps and bounds.

1. Let it be a regular time. We should have a Median and Persian hour, that is, an unchangeable hour. It is a well-known law of psychology that to form a habit we must suffer no exceptions.

2. Let it be a daily time. Some of us may have a regular time, for example, once each week; but the daily plan is the more excellent one. The world pulls us daily. Satan spreads his snares for us more than once each day. Self asserts itself many times each day. Therefore, we should fortify our lives spiritually at least once a day.

3. Let it be an unhurried time. We should give ourselves believing time. It takes time to become spiritual. Spirituality is not a matter of chance; it must be preceded by an adequate cause. If we would have large spiritual results in our lives, there must be sufficient spiritual causes. There is natural law in the spiritual world. But some one asks, How much time is unhurried time? We trust it will not mean less than half an hour each day for any of us. Yet more important than this, it means time enough to forget time; time enough to forget the watch and the clock; time enough to forget the thing we have been doing, and the thing we mean to do next; time enough to meet God, and to hear Him speaking to the depths of our lives. We are not pleading for a mere form, but for an actual, personal, daily meeting on the part of each soul with its God.

4. Let it be the very choicest time in the day. When is that? We used to think it was the last thing at night, but we found that usually the mind was tired or occupied with the many things which had taken place during the day. Then we tried the middle of the day, but found it impossible to avoid interruptions then. At last, several years ago, when we were at Cambridge, we heard of the Morning Watch—the plan of spending the first half hour or first hour of the day alone with God—and adopted the plan. With some of you who are following the same plan, we firmly believe that it is the best time in the day. The mind is less occupied. The mind is, as a rule, clearer, and the memory more retentive. But forget these reasons if you choose. The whole case may be staked on this argument; it equips a man for the day's fight with self and sin and satan. He does not wait until noon before he buckles on his armor. He does not wait until he has given way to temper, or to unkind words, or to unworthy thoughts, or to easily besetting sin, and then have his Bible study. He enters the day forewarned and forearmed.

John Quincy Adams, President of the United States, noted in his journal, in connection with his custom of studying the Bible each morning, "It seems to me the most suitable manner of beginning the day." Lord Cairns, one of the busiest men in Great Britain, devoted the first hour and a half of every day to Bible study and secret prayer. We have all heard how Chinese Gordon, while in the Soudan, had a certain sign before his tent each morning which meant that he must be left alone. A friend recently saw his Bible in the Queen's apartments at Windsor, and told us that the pages of that book, which was his companion in the morning watch, were so worn that one could scarcely read the print. He always reminds us of Sir Henry Havelock, who took care to be alone each morning to ponder some portion of the Bible. When on the heaviest marches it was determined to start at some earlier hour than that which he had fixed for his devotions, he arose quite in time to hold undisturbed his communion with God. Ruskin, in speaking to the students at Oxford, said, "Read your Bible, making it the first morning business of your life to understand some portion of it clearly, and your daily business to obey it in all that you do understand." Francke spent the first hour of every day in private devotions. Wesley, for the last forty years of his life, rose every morning at four o'clock, and devoted from one to two hours to devotional Bible study and prayer. Rutherford was accustomed to rise every morning at three o'clock, and the whole of the earlier hours of the day were spent by him in prayer and meditation and study. Greater than all, we have it on the best of evidence that Christ rose a great while before it was day to hold communion with God. What he found necessary or even desirable can we do without? Spirituality costs. Shall we pay what it costs?—Daily Bible.

A TESTIMONY.

The vigor of our spiritual life will be in exact proportion to the place held by the Bible in our life and our thoughts. I can solemnly state this from an experience of fifty-four years. * * * In July, 1829, I began this plan of reading from the Old and New Testaments. I have read since then the Bible through one hundred times, and each time with increasing delight. When I begin it afresh it always seems like a new book. I cannot tell how great has been the blessing from consecutive, diligent, daily study. I look upon it as a lost day when I have not had a good time over the Word of God.—George Mueller.

We would not for a moment have our Southern friends imagine we thought child labor was peculiar to the South. Its dreaded wrongs have at some time or other been committed by most communities. We are against such child labor anywhere, north, south, east or west, and against it all the time, and we believe that the best element in all sections of the country agrees with us. We think we understand—at least partially—the distress of the reconstruction period of the South, and we are fully assured that the Southern States will rise to the privilege of ridding themselves of that which all right-minded men deem to be an unmitigated evil. Who are the Northern capitalists? What are they doing? A move on their part would stop this iniquity.—Episcopal Recorder.

Greatness in the Kingdom of Heaven.

Matthew. XVIII, 1-14.

Who shall be greatest in Heaven? His Excellency, his Lordship, Archbishop—Elder—the munificent giver of iron and oil fame? And he called unto him a little child and set him in the midst and said: "Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise (even) enter," and then he adds, Mt. XVIII, 4-14. Note especially verses 5-6 and 10-14.

I wish to direct your attention to the principles herein contained:

I. Child-likeness is the criterion of entering and attaining in the Kingdom of Heaven, vs. 2, 4, 10, 11-14; and under this I believe:

First, The little children are presumably in the Kingdom.

1. Christ sets a literal flesh and blood child before them and pointing to it says, expressly, "Of such is the Kingdom." The little child is then the model—to enter or attain, you must model after it. Does it not then follow that the model itself must be acceptable? I want a yard of cloth just like this sample, surely then the sample is just the thing.

2. But there is this difficulty, there is in that child the taint of sin. It is also by racial inheritance under the curse which excludes it from the blessed, genial and heavenly environment.

Just as certainly as it grows up to responsibility environed as it must be here below—even in a Christian home—that taint will develop; and just so certainly will the child become "particeps criminis."

Answer.—(a) Yes, but the Bible teaches we are held responsible only according to light and opportunity. Further, the analogy of salvation in Christ shows that the elect in Christ, though representatively incorporate in Christ, yet do not actually become in Christ until by individual declaration they so announce.

Therefore, though the little children will surely and justly become individually guilty and lost sinners if left to themselves because of their racial connection with Adam; they are not actually lost until as responsible agents they have, by their own action, become partakers in the crime.

(b) God may by grace, deliver from these consequences in two ways:

1. By convincing and converting them, and thus by leading them to turn to him after they have become adults—responsible agents.

They have become "as little children," and prove their election, 1 Pet. I: 5-6 and 10.

2. Or, by the Holy Spirit's operation upon them, regenerating them even before they have become responsible.

In this case they prove their election, that God has chosen them either by the same manner as for adults in case they live to become adults.

Or, by being taken out of this evil environment before as responsible agents they individually can become partakers in the racial sin.

In other words, I believe it is a necessary deduction from the teachings of Scripture that the very fact of infants (those who have not yet attained to responsible action) being taken away by God from this world of sinful environment in this state is an evidence of their election and consequent salvation.

We can to a large extent judge of God's purposes only by their accomplishments of Him as a cause only by the results.

We see a man rush to the railroad track, grasp a little child from before the onrushing train. We conclude by this result that the intelligent cause intended (had chosen) to save the child.

We see God by some act of his Providence—mayhap by the superstitious mother's devoting to the Ganges—seize a little child to remove it from the onrushing train of individual pollution formed by evil environment.

We must also conclude that God intended to do this: i. e., had chosen the little child for his own. Therefore the very fact that an infant dies in infancy is evidence that the infant is elect or as. Calvin said, "It is in the salvable state."

(c) This argument is strengthened by, (a) Mt. XIX: 14. So large will be the proportion of such little ones in the Kingdom that its King may say "Of such is the Kingdom." (b) by Mt. XVIII, 10. Here I refer to "Bible Student," Nov. 1902., article by B. B. Warfield. He makes it very probable that we have here not only a necessary inference, but a direct declaration that "the departed (angels) spirits of these little ones," do always—in every case—appear before our Father which is in heaven. (c) Note also whole tenor of this passage, Mt. XVIII: 14.

3. Notice Sacramentarian and all anti- and non-Calvinists can give no logical solution for the salvation of infants dying in infancy, unbaptized, and of course unable to take the initiative in their salvation.

Calvinists judging God's purposes by their results, knowing his revealed basis of responsibility, know that infants taken away in infancy from the awful onrushing engine of destruction, were taken away because he, who does all things and yet nothing, except in accordance with his own will, had chosen to take them to himself. And even in heathen lands where sin abounded, yes because it abounds and there his abounding grace does much more abound.

4. Conclusion from all this must be that the burden of proof rests upon those who would say of any infant—it is not in the Kingdom of Heaven. They are presumably there until they prove themselves not there, and every effort must be made to bring them, if spared, to prove they are of the Kingdom of Heaven.

2. All who become like little children enter in and attain in the Kingdom of Heaven.

I will not develop this point, but refer:

1. To Jno. III; 4, Eph IV. 14, 1 Cor. XIII: 11, 1 Cor. XIV: 20—As to wherein they are not to be like children.

2. To contrast of above and 1 Pet. II: 2, Mt. V: 44-45 as to wherein they are to be like children.

II. The necessity of receiving those little ones, vss. 5-14.

From I, 1, 4, above, and from 5-14, we see that they and all like them in spirit are presumably in the Kingdom, and woe to him who negatively or positively does aught to offend them. I direct my attention here principally to the children.

1. By what means are they to be secured for the Kingdom?

For if they are to be received surely means are to be employed—not to employ those means or to wrongly employ them in the awful offense of vss. 6-9.

1. By family religion—here is the basis on which rests all.

All the Y. P. S. C. E's and Y. M. C. A's and S. Schools in creation cannot and must not interfere with or be substituted for this.

Note, family Covenant is O. T. Constitutional law—never repealed in N. T. amendments. The King says still, "Of such is the Kingdom."

Any failure of the parents, father as well as mother, will bring upon their devoted heads this awful curse vss. 6-9.

2. Emphasise also duties of preacher and teacher and all Christians by precept and example to make every possible effort to retain those little ones in the Kingdom. If by omission or commission we offend vss. 6-9.

2. How we may offend those little ones—examples.

1. By not entering the Kingdom ourselves.

2. By neglecting family religion, family worship, too much engrossment in business or pleasure. Beware of questionable amusements or habits or language.

3. Encouragements to earnestness in seeking these little ones and receiving them.

1. vs. 5—we are thus receiving Christ himself.

2. vss. 10—we shall be the means of bringing in those who shall always be in the presence of our Father.

3. 11-13. Example of Jesus himself, who earnestly sought them.

4. It is our Father's will that not one of these little ones should be lost. My young friends are you ambitious for the attainment of this world's honor, for entree into its society, that you may receive its titles?

Have you even entered into the eternal Kingdom? Except ye turn and become as little children ye shall in no wise enter—but if you humble yourself as the little child you shall be greatest in the Kingdom.

Christian parents, here is a promise, if the words of God be upon your heart, and you teach them diligently unto your children; talking of them when sitting in the home, when walking by the way, when lying down, when rising up—Dt. VI: 6-9; God says from that path they shall not depart Prov. XXII: 6. Then at last before your God with joy you can sing, "Here am I and the children thou hast given me." D. J. Woods.

Practical Prayer Meeting Plans.

By Amos R. Wells.

A good prayer meeting is both a manufacture and an inspiration. It is a human manufacture before it is a divine inspiration. It is made before it is born. I am a hearty believer in prayer meeting mechanics, because though no contrivance of man's can take the place of the presence and power of the Holy Spirit, yet He will not come until men, by the utmost exercise of their own energies and thoughtfulness have prepared for His coming. It is my purpose in this article, then, to describe some prayer meeting methods that strike me as novel, helpful and soundly practicable for any church, however circumstanced.

I wish first to urge that the prayer meeting topics should always be announced beforehand, and, if possible, several months in advance. This does not preclude changes if specially timely themes come up, but it does make thorough preparation possible. Nor does this mean that there should always be a definite topic. Indeed, some of your best meetings will be prompted by the call, "Come with a helpful thought, born of your week's experience." Only this also should be announced in advance.

While I believe that the pastor should always select the topic, yet I believe that he should always invite suggestions of topics from others. Place a box for that purpose in the prayer meeting room. Let the prayer meeting occasionally appoint a committee to propose topics. Make use of all the printed lists of topics you can find. A meeting with a good topic is half made already.

As to the leader, in my judgment the pastor, however skillful in the conduct of a prayer meeting, will find the meetings on the whole more effective if he leads them only half the time. His use of the lay leader will vary with the ability of the latter. Sometimes the pastor will say, "Mr. Simonton, I want you to read a ten-minute paper on the subject at the opening of the next prayer meeting;" or, "Professor Teazle, after my introductory remarks next Friday, I want you to take charge of the meeting and run it like one of your classes;" or, "Dr. Saddiebags, I shall be glad if you will sit on the platform with me at our next prayer meeting, read the Scriptures, and give us a five-minute comment upon the passage." Sometimes the pastor will think it safe to hand over the entire meeting to some layman, while he himself makes useful observations from the midst of the congregation. Sometimes the pastor will appoint two laymen as leaders, apportioning the work between them. Sometimes he will plan a leaderless meeting, carried on with apparent spontaneity according to pre-arrangement, the pastor sitting below and merely announcing when the time for general participation has arrived, and, at the close of the hour, pronouncing the benediction.

The opening of the meeting must be carefully planned. Many a leader who says, "The meeting is now open," might far more truthfully proclaim, "The meeting is now tight shut." The introductory remarks are almost invariably too long and too comprehensive.

The ideal introduction contains but a single sample thought, and a dozen thought-provoking questions.

Often it is best for the leader to put his "opening remarks" at the very end of the meeting, and if they have been anticipated by half dozen speakers, he will judge that the meeting is better off, by about six participants, than it would have been had he spoken first.

Vary the opening. Now begin with three or four hymns, sung in swift succession. More frequently, reserve the singing to rest the congregation midway of the hour, and start in with the Bible meeting. Or, learn how impressive a beginning is in a series of prayers. Or, leap at once to the theme and the testimonies, and let Bible reading, prayers and song come in later.

Ingenious variations of the opening Bible reading furnish a bright stimulus to the meeting. Now let the leader read the verses alternately with the congregation. At another time, let the leader read a few verses, and then some one in the audience will take it up by appointment, he to be succeeded by another, while a fourth concludes the reading. Again, read from some other version than King James's; or, if there are many differences, read the authorized version, while some church member, after each verse you read, repeats the verse in the Victorian revision. It is a profitable plan to assign some psalm each month, which the church will commit to memory and repeat in concert at the opening of the prayer meetings.

For these exercises, and many others, it is an inestimable advantage to have a full supply of Bibles, one for each person present. I never could see why the hymn book, an admittedly secondary aid, should be placed in every one's hand, while our text book, the Bible, is conspicuous in a solitary copy on the leader's desk. In these days of marvellously cheap Bibles, there is no excuse for such neglect. With the Bible accessible, the leader can call on every one in the room to find an appropriate Scripture passage, and read it, if possible, with a comment. It will be possible to announce a whole book, such as Amos or Nehemiah or Ephesians, as the theme of the meeting. Or you may base a prayer meeting on an entire chapter, or on the life of some character like Joseph, and the record will be ready for consultation.

One of the problems before the prayer meeting leader is how to secure many prayers. I would not unduly emphasize the first half of the word, "prayer meeting," and I would remember that it is also to be a conference meeting, an experience meeting, a testimony meeting, yet, of course, it will be a failure if it is not permeated with prayer.

The pastor should have a list of men who have declared their willingness to be called upon at any time to offer prayer, and this list he should use, always seeking to extend it, but making it understood that he will never call upon any one to pray who has not thus given consent.

It is well sometimes to call for several prayers upon some one subject that has especially appealed to the meeting. It is well, sometimes, at seasons of especial earnestness, to call for a few minutes of silent prayer, always specifying the subject of the prayer, and continuing the silence long enough to give opportunity for real devotion.

I believe that often our prayers would mean more to us if we would put ourselves in a less familiar attitude, if the entire congregation would kneel or stand while prayer is offered upon some special theme.

I am a staunch advocate of sentence prayers, "chain prayers," those brief, almost ejaculatory, petitions which in our young people's societies have done so much to render the meetings devotional, and cultivate the power of public prayer. I see no reason why this form of prayer would not make an equally valuable adjunct to the methods of our older members' meetings.

Of course, it is essential for a good prayer meeting that many should take part. There are exceptions to this rule; but, generally speaking, a prayer meeting is a failure if the time has been occupied by a few long, able, spiritual, admirable addresses, to the exclusion of the stammering, faltering, commonplace testimonials of unskilled Christians. To bring out the latter (and sometimes, also, to suppress the former), is foremost in the aim of a capable leader.

Sometimes it is done by postal invitations to take part in the next meeting; sometimes by verbal urging. Sometimes the meeting may strictly be placed on a one-minute basis, and every one urged to claim his sixty seconds. Some times every person that enters the room may be given a slip of paper bearing a Bible verse, or a stanza of a hymn, or a quotation from a secular author, or a question on the topic, the question to be answered in the meeting, and the quotations read, with some comment, however brief. Sometimes a set of questions will be printed on a black-board or on a large sheet of paper, in the expectation of eliciting testimonies.

A question box meeting is an excellent device for arousing those that seldom take part. Advertise the plan well, allow questions on all religious topics, privately urge the church members to contribute, and get the promise of as many as possible to answer such questions as you may refer to them in the course of the meeting.

An answer meeting is the reverse of this. Some important and interesting question is propounded, and all the members are requested to write out answers, which are read at the prayer meeting, with comments. The pastor will read only a portion, commenting upon them; the others he will assign to various church members to read.

Still another variation is the question meeting, to which every member contributes a question. These are collected and the boxful is again passed around, that each member may take out a question, and answer it in the meeting.

One plan, generally successful in bringing out new voices, is the arrangement of the chairs in some unfamiliar way, perhaps in circles, with the leader sitting in the centre. The novelty, and the homelike effect, are likely to lift the meeting out of its ruts.

There are several branches of what might be called the Prayer Meeting Secret Service. One member may be called the Starter. The leader goes to him quietly, expresses his anxiety, lest the meeting may not start off briskly and helpfully, and asks him to be ready to take part as soon as opportunity is given. A Pause Committee might be appointed, consisting of faithful members, who will hold themselves in reserve for the pauses in the meeting, ready to fill the breach, perhaps in a prescribed order. A Front Seat Brigade might be chosen, made up of the young people chiefly, who will agree to occupy that little-desired position.

The close of the prayer meeting should be planned quite as carefully as the opening. Leave abundant room for an effective close, and invariably close on time. Once in a while appoint an inspiring speaker as a summarist, to gather up the evening's thought of a few sentences that can be carried away. Save some surprise for the close. Every prayer meeting should end with what Lyman Beecher used to call a "snapper." Do not fall into a monotonous sameness. Close sometimes with a burning appeal, ending with a question, and the benediction. Often omit the closing hymn. A conclusion far more effective is a final prayer, all being seated, with heads bowed. Carefully adapt the ending to the character of the meeting, and the impression you wish the congregation to carry away with them.

And now, in closing this chapter of methods, I wish to repeat what I said at the beginning. All modes of religious action are futile unless the power of religion has entered them, unless they are filled with the Holy Spirit. He wishes us to plan our shrewdest. He wants us to use our utmost energies. And then He will come in and enlarge our plans beyond our imagining, and reinforce our energies with superhuman dynamics, and make every meeting place of God's people a Bethel. Let us do our best that our best may be overwhelmed in His glorious infinity.—Exchange.

[Editorial.]

Charlotte Versus New York.

The following notice of Dr. Stagg's book on the Universal Salvation of Infants is from the columns of the conservative New York Observer:

In this little volume Dr. Stagg creates a strong presumption that these three great men, Calvin, Twisse and Edwards, believed in and taught the salvation of all infants dying in infancy. He makes extensive citations from Calvin's writings and from these the inference seems inevitable that, in Calvin's opinion, infancy became a gracious state through the blessing of Christ and that all who died in that condition are among the saved. On that view only can Calvin be made to be consistent with himself. He did not believe that little ones were saved because of their innocence. He held that all were involved in the sin and guilt of the race, and were thus subject to the wrath of God. But a remedy has been provided for them in God's grace. Regeneration is held to be the essential thing, and Calvin insisted that infants dying in infancy are regenerated by the Holy Spirit without the ordinary means, and are thus made partakers of the redemption of Christ. This appears also to have been the view of Twisse and Edwards. Dr. Stagg believes it to be the teaching of the Bible. He has done good work in the interest of truth. It is to be hoped that this will put a final quietus on the oft repeated slander that Calvinists teach the reprobation of infants. The truth is that they were the first in modern times to reaffirm the Bible teaching of the salvation of children, dying in infancy, without baptism or the use of any other outward means whatever.

The fact that the Observer publishes this commendation is a striking one. In the first Revision Controversy, Dr. Henry Van Dyke published his attacks on Calvin's teaching in the New York Observer and retired with the honors of war, offering as a parting challenge the gift of a thousand dollars to some charitable institution if any one could find from Calvin's writings that he taught infant salvation. And Dr. Henry Van Dyke's father, Dr. Henry J. Van Dyke, wrote the following passage in his "Variations of Calvinism," pp. 39, 40:

"Now let us be candid with ourselves, and even with our opponents. Historic Calvinism does include what Calvin himself calls the horrible decretum, that, by the election and predestination of God, many nations with their infant children, are irretrievably doomed to eternal death. The language above quoted cannot be interpreted as referring only to the guilt of Adam's first sin, by which remedy for it is the very essence and glory of Christ's gospel. The judgment came upon all men to condemnation because (1) That is true of all and not merely of many nations (2) That guilt and condemnation is not without remedy; the Lamb of God taketh away the sin of the world. (3). The judgment that has come upon all men to condemnation, so that all were in the person of one made liable to eternal death is not what Calvin singles out from the results of the covenant work and tags as a horrible decree. His reasoning is the other way. He assumes as a premise which it is impossible to deny that God, by his decree of predestination and for no other reason than because it seemed meet to him to do so, has involved the infant offspring of many nations in eternal death without remedy."

Dr. Van Dyke was looked upon as a considerable scholar in his day, besides being the prominent and successful pastor that he was. And now, if Dr. Stagg has proved anything in his little book, it is that every statement made in this quoted passage is an error. In the first place, Calvin never said that any decree of God was "horrible," and it is the essence of crudeness that contends for that translation. He does not say that many nations with their infant children are irretrievably doomed to eternal death. He says, "so many nations, with their infant children," and as it is not allowed to say "so all," he makes the phrase "so many nations" equivalent to "man" in the next sentence. The decree itself is shown to be the universal condemnation of the race, and Dr. Van Dyke's phrase, "without remedy," is a mistranslation of the Latin, "except for the remedy," as Calvin himself indicates in another place. The judgment that came upon all men is exactly what Calvin does call "an awe full decree." Calvin's premise is that "countless mortals are made liable in the person of one man to eternal death," and then he twits his opponents who have swallowed this camel with being unable to swallow the gnat that this was by God's decree. "Countless mortals," "so many nations with their infant children," and "man" are the three phrases used by Calvin in the same paragraph of the same argument to show that condemnation was universal and that it was by the decree of God, though not without remedy.

We are tempted to ask why it is that our Southern Presbyterian editors have left it to our Northern and Canadian Presbyterian papers to publish their unqualified commendation of this little book, and why our theological professors who have never been able to give any satisfactory statement to their classes about John Calvin and infant salvation are "verifying quotations" and leaving the Canadian scholars to say that the book is a demonstration? If some writer of another church had thus cleared the skirts of the man for whom our system of doctrine is named, cleared his skirts of an odious and opprobrious slander that has involved Calvinists and Calvinism as well as Calvin, there would have been quotations and commendations galore. Is it possible that the esteemed brethren aforesaid are waiting until people have forgotten previous utterances of theirs in which they committed themselves to what is now the wrong side? How long must we wait before they can persuade themselves of their own fallibility?

A Prediction.

An esteemed Cumberland Presbyterian gentleman from Tennessee now sojourning in Florida, said to the writer that the union movement suggested by some border Synods on both sides of the Ohio would, if seriously entered upon, in his opinion, result in many farther South going to the Methodist Church, but many others into the Southern Presbyterian Church.

It is certain that our Cumberland brethren have been mistaken as to Old School Presbyterians teaching "fatality."

Dr. N. L. Rice expresses our view in the title of his admirable little work, "God Sovereign and Man Free." I would that our Cumberland brethren would procure that clear treatise not with a view to being proselyted, but for their own satisfaction. The best way to bring about Christian union is for every church to recognize what is good in every other church. The Cumberland Church has now been in existence for nearly one hundred years. They number nearly as many souls as the Southern Church; they are active, earnest and zealous and God has saved thousands through them. The fine print at the bottom of the 30th Chapter in the Confession which is Scripture undiluted, is according to the old lady, harder to believe than the larger print above.

Beauty in God's Word.—G. B. F. Hallock, D. D. The Westminster Press, Philadelphia, $1.00

"This little book aims to take only a treasure text, a divine love-word here and there, and hold it in the light until at least a little of its beauty shall be seen. The object is to send the beholder to a fresh study and appreciation of all the jewels in the treasure chamber of our King."

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

We concluded to play a little joke upon some of our readers this week. The selection on the first page, that caught the eye and charmed the mind and satisfied the spirit, is from the so-called New Creed of the Northern Presbyterian Church, a paragraph from the Brief Statement adopted by the New York General Assembly. We have one or two criticisms of the Statement itself, but there is nothing the matter with this paragraph.

We think the Devotional, Missionary, Sunday-school and Westminster League Departments are unusually excellent this week. Among the Contributed Articles, we note the one on the Lend-a-Hand Mission by Margaret McB. Baxter, and heartily commend this appeal, from personal knowledge.

"The Sufferings of Others," teaches a good New Year Lesson, and "Greatness in the Kingdom of Heaven," is well written. The selections are worthy a careful reading.

NORTH CAROLINA

CHARLOTTE.—Mr. C. N. Crittenton, founder of the Florence Mission of New York and other cities, for the reclamation of fallen women, has been conducting a most successful series of meetings in the Tryon Street Methodist Church, Charlotte, looking to the establishment of a Rescue Home in Charlotte. Last week Mrs. Barrett, who is in charge of the home in Washington came to Charlotte. She addressed the meetings at the Methodist Church and so charmed and thrilled her auditors that the Academy of Music was packed with men to hear her on Sunday afternoon of this week. On Sunday night she talked to some fifteen hundred women from the pulpit of the Second Presbyterian Church. A large subscription has already been raised for the establishment of the home and it will probably reach the sum of $10,000.

As this is about the anniversary of Mrs. Taylor's visit to Charlotte we desire to give an equally faithful version of Mrs. Barrett's address in the Second Church. The meeting was announced for women only, though the pastor, the editor of a religious paper and the ushers were all so busy getting seats for the women that like Dr. Reed in New York, they got "hemmed in." Dr. Stagg conducted all the exercises. Mrs. Barrett made an address and did not preach or pray. Moreover, she is a Southern-born woman, of refinement and culture, the mother of six well-raised children, who since her husband's death has given her life to this work.

We suppose it is in order to hear from Country Parson, the Central, the Southwestern, M. B. S., R. A. Lapsley and other valued correspondents. We suggest that it would be just as well to enclose a cheque for the Florence Home in Charlotte with the manuscript.—Ed.

DAVIDSON.—Young McLeod, one of the two medical students, who for two weeks past had been so dangerously ill from blood poison, succumbed to the disease this morning at 8 o'clock. From the first the case had been well nigh hopeless, and death would have come several days sooner but for the young man's wonderfully strong constitution and remarkable vitality. He was a fine athlete, and has been from the start a star player on the foot-ball team. His record in athletics was so brilliant, that among his fellows he has long been counted a hero, and a popular one at that. It is comforting, when one sees a young life thus cut short, and so fine a specimen of vigorous manhood brought low in death, to know that the soul has gone to be with God in a better world. The funeral exercises were conducted this afternoon by the pastor, Dr. Graham. The body will be taken for burial to the family home in Robeson county, under an escort of his fellows from the two colleges. The pall-bearers consisted of the foot-ball team of the past season. The other sick student, Boyce, is thought to be on the road to recovery, though his condition can hardly be pronounced safe as yet.

The services conducted by Mr. Van Horn in the Y. M. C. last week were greatly blessed and there were a number of hopeful professions. There were about 15 additions to the church on Sabbath morning at the Communion, most of these on profession of faith, some children of the Sunday-school and others from both of the colleges. Several on certificate were also received some weeks ago.

Dr. Smith presented the claims of Davidson in Statesville last Sabbath. He expects to speak at Rutherfordton and Brittain on the 1st of February. Rev. William Black begins a meeting on Sunday with Rev. J. C. Story at Summerville, Brunswick county, where it is hoped to effect a church organization. Mr. McCollough, of the International Committee made a most inspiring and excellent address on a call to the Foreign Missionary field in the Y. M. C. A. on the 26th inst.

Mr. J. S. Morse, of Abbeville (class of '04) has been elected chief marshal from the Bumenian society for the coming commencement. His assistants are T. H. DeGraffenreid, Chester, W. H. DuBose, Socoow, R. I. McDavid, Woodville, W. T. Thompson, Jr., Washington, D. C., all from the En society. The Phi. election takes place next week.

WILMINGTON PRESBYTERY.—The constitutional requirements having been complied with, I hereby call a meeting of Wilmington Presbytery to be held in the lecture room of the First Presbyterian Church, Wilmington, N. C., on Monday, February 9th, at 11 a. m., for the following purposes:

1. To consider the resignation of Rev. D. P. McGeachy as pastor of the Burgaw, Mount Williams, Pike and Hopewell Churches, with a view to his acceptance of the call of the Twentieth Century Committee to their work and to assure and conclude all matters properly arising from said resignation.

2. To consider the call of the Oak Plains Church for Rev. R. M. Mann and arrange for his installment if said call be accepted.

C. W. Trawick, Moderator.

BRUNSWICK COUNTY FIELD.—The week of prayer was observed at two of our churches in this county—New Hope and Southport. Although the weather was inclement, yet there was a fairly good attendance at all the services.

Results of Mission Work in Western North Carolina.

At the request of a number of persons the writer gives the following information to the public, hoping that it may be a message of encouragement to all supporters of mission work. The following is an outline of what has been accomplished during the past six years in the eleven counties which comprise Asheville Presbytery.

Six years ago we had in this territory seventeen organized Presbyterian Churches; now we have twenty-three, also twenty-six well established mission points that are served regularly with preaching. Then we had 950 members; now, 1450. Then we had seven ministers laboring in this large territory; now we have fifteen. In this time have erected twelve buildings (houses for worship and manses) at an average cost of $750 each, and all bills are paid. While we write carpenters are at work on four more buildings. Some of these small churches have developed into self-supporting groups and others are making rapid strides in that direction. Twenty-three additional Sabbath-schools have been organized in which something over a thousand more children and young people have been reached with religious instruction. Four day schools have been established and maintained with success; from these a number of worthy boys and girls have been sent off to high-grade academies and to colleges, where they are being prepared to occupy useful positions in life. Most of these students are from families that are able to bear only a small part of the expenses incident to these superior advantages, the balance is paid by benevolent friends of our work. Thousands of pages of religious literature, and hundreds of copies of the Scriptures have been judiciously distributed, giving information, cheer, and comfort to many homes.

With all "there remaineth yet very much land to be possessed." Numbers of committees are begging us to give them the privilege of the gospel; with deep regret we have been compelled to say no to most of the appeals made recently, because we have not the means to employ workers. How long must we behold the needs and not be able to help? Truly we feel grateful to all who have helped us in this work which is full of promise.

R. P. Smith.

Dr. A. L. Phillips at Red Springs, N. C.

The Sunday-school Institute held at the Seminary Auditorium last week, gave our girls the opportunity of hearing a splendid series of helpful lectures, by Dr. A. L. Phillips. It was a privilege to hear directly from the head of one Sabbath-school work, in the Southern Presbyterian Church. Dr. Phillip's intense enthusiasm, his practical, clear way of presenting the plans for systematic study of God's Word caught the attention and held it. His genuine touches of humor were delightful. Only such a man, with natural ability, quick sympathy and on fire with his subject, could keep a firm grip upon his audience, through his consecutive lectures. The students poured into the hall, each time eager to hear all the Dr. had to say—numbers of the girls took notes of the lectures.

The Sunday-school was presented, not only as one of the greatest sources of good, but as one of the most attractive phases of Christian activity—a means of spreading the gospel throughout the most destitute districts, and giving new life and vigor to our town and city churches. In his vigorous, forceful style, he made a strong plea for the graded systems in our Sabbath-schools. Here he was peculiarly happy, for every argument carried convincing power.

In testimony thereof I cite this instance. Last Sabbath the Sunday-school in Red Springs was reorganized on the plan outlined by Dr. Phillips.

We earnestly commend Dr. Phillips' methods when our Sabbath-schools are organized on these plans—there is no measuring their influence.

Dr. Phillips is doing a grand work and doing it well. The seed sown by this faithful servant of the Master, in the hearts and minds of these young women will surely bring forth good fruit, as they go out into active Christian work. This final solemn appeal to them to dedicate their young lives, with all their gifts and attractions to Christ rather than to worldly, selfish ends, fell upon stirred, attentive hearts.

A deep, and we trust, an abiding impression was left, and a new interest, in Sabbath-school work, awakened which may prove a lump of true leaven, to enrich many committees represented by our young women throughout the South.

Third Creek—1840-1865.

The frequent reports of the passing of dear old friends deepens the gloom of these wintry skies. But the memorial service of Dr. Palmer and the beautiful tribute to Dr. D. C. Rankin were "sweet to the soul and health to the bones."

The passing of the late Honorable and Dr. J. G. Ramsey stirs pleasant memories of old Third Creek Church, in Rowan county, N. C., where he lived and served for half a century, a useful public man and foremost citizen.

Born in Prospect Church, Iredell county, where his father was an honored elder, James Graham Ramsey was sent to Davidson College—a college in whose founding his father and mother and others were active agents. After graduating in the second class, he took the prescribed course in Jefferson Medical College, and began to practice his profession in Third Creek, midway between Salisbury and Statesville and soon worked into an extensive practice among a well-to-do Scotch-Irish population.

The young men were sent to Davidson and the young women to Salem. Wm. H. Johnston, B. Scott Krider, Wm. A. Wood and Robt. Z. Johnston became ministers and others worked successfully in other professions. The latest books, professional journals and best newspapers were on Dr. Ramsey's desk, and music, pictures and flowers came when his wife came to make his home, where sisters, cousins and aunts resorted, making it a delightful place for guests who frequented his domestic circle and enjoyed his hospitality. Railroads, telegraphs and 'phones had not come, but fine horses, carriages and buggies were in evidence. The people were not rich, nor were they poor, but lived well and owned negroes and knew how to treat and manage them. Young men and women were fine riders and knew how to drive fine horses and behave well in crowds on Sundays.

When the Waddells, Brandons, Chambers, Grahams, Knoxs, Gillespies, Kerrs, Irwins, Ramseys, Carsons, Steeles, Niblocks, Rufus, Woods, Burkes, Kilpatricks, Krider, Luckeys, Flemings, Halls, Montgomerys, Andersons and Johnstons assembled every Sunday, filling the groves around the church with carriages, buggies and horses and were orderly seated in the old brick church and the negroes in the three long galleries, and the pastor (J. M. H. Adams or S. B. O. Wilson) rose in the pulpit, he faced the best congregation to be found in the State in those days. Dr. Ramsey always attended service on Sunday forenoon and the people knew where to find him. He would ride away at noon with a pleasant smile to serve his patients and return home late in the evening to enjoy his guests, and appear clean-shaven and well-dressed Monday morning. At the Centennial Anniversary in 1892, Dr. Ramsey read an historical sketch of the old church which was published and should be carefully preserved. When Southern Presbyterians were forced to set up for themselves, Concord Presbytery made no mistake when Dr. Ramsey, a representative of this typical old Presbyterian Church, was chosen with others to organize the Southern Presbyterian Church in December, 1861. Soon after the memorial service in New Orleans in memory of Dr. Palmer, the Moderator, comes the passing of Dr. J. R. Wilson, the Stated Clerk, and Dr. Ramsey, the last member of the first Southern Presbyterian General Assembly from the Synod of North Carolina.

SPARTANBURG.—The First Presbyterian Church of Spartanburg, Rev. Jno. S. Watkins, D. D., pastor, is steadily growing, new members coming in every month. It bids fair soon to become about the strongest church in the Synod.

Converse College, under the efficient administration of the Rev. R. P. Pill, is maintaining its popularity and high character for efficiency. Preparations are going forward for its great Music Festival in May, and a contract has been made with the Steiff Company for the supply of 34 new pianos next summer.

Rev. C. B. Ratchford has resigned the pastorate of Liberty Springs, Friendship, Lisbon and Mountville Churches in Enoree Presbytery, and has been dismissed to Transylvania Presbytery, having accepted a call to Kirksville Church, Ky.

Rev. M. G. Woodworth, a professor of the Presbyterian College, at Clinton, S. C., has been received into Enoree Presbytery on certificate from St. John's Presbytery, Fla.

News Notes from the Thornwell Orphanage.

The total listed family of this institution, to-day, including pupils and teachers is 225.

We are in the midst of a trying epidemic of measles. There are to-day, some forty-four sick, and more expected. These occasions considerable expense, and our friends will please bear our sick children in mind. Perhaps one-half of our whole family will have the disease. We badly need some new cots in the Infirmary. Twenty-five dollars will find a cot to bear the name of the donor.

One of the very satisfactory things connected with this Orphanage, is the demand for its graduates as teachers. All of the last class were at once provided with schools, and as many more could have been arranged for. In June next, quite a large class of young teachers will be sent out.

Six more orphans have been received during the month just ended. Quite a number of other applications are before us, perhaps above one hundred. The Thornwell Orphanage does not receive children with a living father, nor orphans with a living mother, if the mother is able to pay for their support.

The payment of five dollars a month constitutes any church, Sabbath School, Society or individual the patron of one orphan.

We will be glad to receive donations of books for the library, specimens for the museum, and bread for the children, and to furnish information at any time to those who desire it. Regular monthly contributions would go a long way toward relieving the pressure upon us.

Address Rev. W. P. Jacobs, Clinton, S. C.

MAITLAND.—A meeting has been called—pro re nata—of St. John's Presbytery by the Moderator, Rev. I. M. Auld, to be held in Tampa, Feb. 10, at 2 p. m., to dissolve the pastoral relation between Rev. J. M. Forbis and Plant City Church, and dismiss him to the Presbytery of King's Mountain, North Carolina.

ST. JOHN'S PRESBYTERY.—The constitutional requirements having been met I hereby call the Presbytery of St. Johns to meet—pro re nata—in the First Presbyterian Church of Tampa, Fla., on Feb. 10th, prox, at 2 p. m., to transact the following business if the way be clear.

1. To dissolve the pastoral relation between Rev. J. M. Forbis and the church at Plant City.
2. To dismiss Rev. J. M. Forbis to the Presbytery of King's Mountain.
3. To fill vacancies in the committees caused by the above action.

GEORGIA.

CONYERS.—This church has just passed through a profitable year. Under the direction of the pastor, Rev. J. W. Stokes, and the five ruling elders, progress has been made along all lines. The prospects for the coming year are bright. With the introduction of the new Psalms and Hymns the singing has greatly improved. The Sabbath-school enters the new year under a new regime. The new hymns are being learned by the children to fit them for engaging in the church service of praise. The scholars are encouraged to read the Bible daily. A teacher's Normal Class, held after the weekly prayer meeting, is promoting the efficiency of the teachers to instruct and to win souls for Christ. One or two of the classes are organized into class societies for mission work. The Ladies Aid Society despite many disadvantages has done good work in ministering to the needy and the sick. The members are thoroughly in earnest for the coming year to aid the pastor in the Lord's work. A large field of Christian endeavor is opening to the church at Milledgeville, a manufacturing town in building two miles distant. This factory work is a great and important mission for the Southern Presbyterian Church to engage in. Concerted effort is necessary to complete success.

VIRGINIA.

LYNCHBURG.—Sunday was the seventh anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. F. T. McFaden in Lynchburg. Mr. McFaden was called to the First Presbyterian Church to succeed Rev. Dr. Hall, who went from here to the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C. For several years preceding his acceptance of the Lynchburg pulpit Mr. McFaden had labored with the Presbyterian Church in Marion, and his work there had prepared his friends here to anticipate from him noble and earnest work and to predict for him a successful ministry. That their expectations have been fulfilled is the unanimous verdict of all who have been interested in the career of the First Presbyterian Church; for to-day the congregation is worshipping in a new and handsome edifice, and their enthusiasm and devotion was never more pronounced. The work of erecting a new house of worship was begun under Mr. McFaden's administration and it was pushed to a successful conclusion with remarkable rapidity. When the congregation entered into the splendid structure that now adorns the corner of Ninth and Court streets they found every cent of indebtedness paid and a balance in the treasury. Thus it was that they were confronted with a bright and prosperous future and were able to devote their energies with great effectiveness to the various departments of the church's organization. With such gratifying achievements has Mr. McFaden's ministry in Lynchburg been crowned. But this is not all; for his preaching has carried the simple word of God into the hearts and lives of all who have listened to his preaching, while his daily life and his work among the poor and needy and the sick and sorrowing have been a bright example of consecrated service.—Lynchburg News.

Union Seminary Notes.

For a fortnight past the Seminary and the community about it have been kept in some anxiety by the discovery of a case of varioloid. Mr. A. D. Watkins, of the Senior Class, was removed to the hospital a mile or two away, the rooms were thoroughly fumigated, and a general vaccination ordered. Those students who were especially exposed were segregated, and the whole Seminary quarantined. Under the prompt and thorough action of the chairman of the faculty, Dr. Hersman, with the advice of physicians, everything possible was done for the safety of the students. We are gratified to inform our readers that there has been no other case, the quarantine has been removed, and no case even of suspicion as to health remains in or about the Seminary. Mr. Watkins was found to be very slightly affected, and has now recovered, and will soon be in his class again. All are greatly relieved to go out and visit the city and their friends as they may care to do. We have reason for gratitude to God that the threatening cloud has been dispersed and anxiety has passed away.

A handsome portrait of the Rev. Dr. John Holt Rice, the founder of the Seminary, has been presented by Miss Catherine R. James, of Richmond. It was painted by Ingham, of New York, a famous portrait painter of his day, for Miss James' father, Mr. Joseph Sheppard James, between whom and Dr. Rice, then his pastor in Richmond, a warm friendship existed. It is a valuable addition to the gallery of portraits in the Library Building.—Central.

A Battle Royal in Raleigh—Victory in Sight. (Editorial.)

On Wednesday and Thursday of last week the joint committee of the two houses of the General Assembly heard the representatives of the Anti-Saloon League and those of the Saloons, the Distillers and the Liquor Dealers' Association, in arguments pro and con the legislation now before this Assembly. On Friday the General Assembly elected Honorable Lee S. Overman United States Senator, a worthy choice after a long and exciting fight. But the interest in the senatorial contest was overshadowed by the interest in the temperance fight. We use the word temperance in the Bible sense. The originators and advocates of this movement in North Carolina are not extremists or fanatics. They have waived most of the questions usually discussed under the head of temperance. They are fighting to decrease the curse of drunkenness and to increase the virtue of sobriety so far as these virtues can be achieved through legislation against the liquor-traffic. As was said once before we are not expecting the millennium immediately in North Carolina, but neither are we in favor of enlarging hell.

The battle was really opened with a brilliant editorial in the News and Observer of Sunday, together with one of Davenport's famous cartoons. The editorial should be read entire. It was eloquent and unanswerable. The cartoon should also be seen to be appreciated. It represented the liquor-traffic, producers, distributors and consumers, in procession.

The rich distiller rode in front in his automobile, then came the wholesale manufacturer with his carriage and pair, then the retailer in his racing turnout, and then the motley crew of consumers, tramps, paupers, walking skeletons, penitentiary convicts and the like. The only thing lacking was the hired attorney of the liquor interests, pegging along on a bicycle, between the consumers and the retail bar-keeper.

Wednesday morning a conference of the anti-saloon delegations in Raleigh was held. They had come from every part of the State, representing Methodist Conferences, the Baptist Convention, districts, counties, towns, leagues, churches, but all asking for local protection and for general legislation against the distillery and the saloon. State Superintendent Joyner was there representing the children of the State, especially those whom the poverty and the blight of drunkenness deprive of all opportunity for education. It was a notable assemblage. Mr. Josephus Daniels of the News and Observer and Mr. Watts of Iredell, author of one of the bills to be considered, helped with their presence and counsels. Mr. Watts' hands have been greatly strengthened by the action of his own county, which is asking for absolute prohibition after having borne too long the reputation as being the greatest whiskey county in the State.

Mr. J. W. Bailey was put in charge of the campaign before the committee and he managed it with great tact and success. The Senate chamber and the galleries were soon filled with an eager throng whose sympathies were very evidently on the side of the temperance advocates. There was an even larger crowd present on the second afternoon and we combine the accounts of the two meetings in one.

Mr. Bailey introduced, one after another, the representatives of the different churches and localities interested. Rev. J. M. Rhodes was the official representative of the North Carolina Methodist Conference, numbering 180 ministers and 67,000 members and Rev. S. B. Turrentine of the Western North Carolina Conference, representing 75,000 members. Rev. M. L. Kessler was appointed by the Baptist State Convention, with 1,000 ministers and 173,000 members. The editor of this paper explained that he was not the official representative of the Presbyterian Church in North Carolina but he claimed, nevertheless, to represent his people in asking for advanced legislation against the saloon. He said, moreover, that the banner Presbyterian county of Mecklenburg was of the same mind that it was four years ago when it sent up a petition against the saloon of 3,500 voters, as the Mecklenburgers were not a people to change their convictions lightly, and that by several test votes since they had buried every man that had opposed them then who had offered himself to their suffrages, as a candidate for public office.

Mr. Edwards represented the Free Will Baptists of Eastern Carolina and Rev. J. O. Atkinson represented the Christian Church of this State.

One woman's voice was raised and its appeal was one that went straight to the heart. She said that she did not represent any church but the very oldest institution of earth, the home.

And then there were any number of delegates representing the different localities of the State, among whom we may mention, Mr. F. D. Swindell of Wayne county, representing a large proportion of the people of that county, Mr. C. H. Ireland, with a petition signed by 800 men of Greensboro, Hon. A. M. Scales, chairman of the Democratic Committee of Guilford county, Mr. Y. T. Ormond, with 600 out of 750 business men of Kinston on his petition, Mr. N. B. Mills of the Statesville board of Aldermen, and Rev. H. K. Boyer, with a petition signed by the majority of the voters of Iredell county. Dr. L. L. Nash of Rocky Mount, Mr. A. F. Johnson of Clinton, Rev. W. R. Bradshaw of Wilkesboro, Mr. W. R. Royal of Brunswick, Rev. Mr. Croxton, of Union, Mr. J. C. Clifford of Harnett, Professor J. A. Campbell, of Buie's Creek, Rev. R. C. Beaman, of Durham, with 600 voters of Durham already on his petition, Rev. M. C. Arrowood and Mr. P. H. Fleming of Burlington, Mr. F. P. Gibson of Gibsonville Mr. E. D. Mercer, of Richmond county, who gave a graphic description of the harm done to that county by its distilleries, Mr. H. H. McLendon of Wadesboro and Mr. W. B. Cooper of Wilmington, asking that New Hanover county be not exempted from the operation of the bill that might be passed, whatever might be the wishes of the Senator from Wilmington. We earnestly echo his wish that whatever legislation may be passed, no senatorial courtesy or any other consideration shall allow any county to become a pest-hole and source of corruption to others.

Speeches were made by Mr. J. W. Bailey, of Raleigh, Mr. J. D. McCall, and Mr. C. W. Tillett of Charlotte, Mr. R. N. Simms of Raleigh, Mr. Henry A. Page of Aberdeen, Mr. W. A. Dunn of Halifax and Senator London on one side. On the other were Mr. W. C. Guthrie of Charlotte who appeared for the saloon men of Charlotte and who thought that the country distillery was an unmitigated evil; Mr. Cameron Morrison of Rockingham, who thanked God that a drop of the cursed stuff had never passed his lips, and who appeared as attorney for the country distilleries; Mr. I. C. Mewborne, of Wilson, representing the Liquor Dealers' Association, who was not opposed to temperance but thought that the people ought to decide these questions for themselves; Mr. Charles O. McMichael, of Rockingham who represented "certain interests" on the whiskey side and who was terribly afflicted about the evils of the deadly cigarette; and Mr. D. M. Reece of Yadkin, who was more concerned about the hogs who are now fattened with the refuse of the forty distilleries of that county than about the other hogs who swill the liquor. Mr. W. T. Dortch of Goldsboro interjected a question or two and Mr. N. Glenn Williams, whose brand of whiskey is named appropriately after the devil, explained that Mr. S. Otho Wilson, was deposed from his position as chairman of the Distillers' Association, the day before.

It is needless to say anything about the argument of these last named. With the exception of the distiller mentioned they were all paid to represent the liquor interests, and they probably did the best that could be done for a bad cause.

The other speeches were all eloquent with the conviction that goes always with right and truth. Mr. McCall and Mr. Tillett well upheld the excellent reputation of the Charlotte bar. Mr. Simms of Raleigh, has aided our executive committee with his legal advice and made a fine analysis of the London bill. Senator London has endeared himself yet more to the Christian people of the State by his earnest and manly stand. One of the officials of the state administration heard the plea about the revenue produced in Yadkin and Wilkes counties and he immediately furnished Mr. Simms the figures, that Yadkin county cost the state $3,200 more than it gave the state in revenue and Wilkes county $5,000 more, a striking commentary on the cost to the taxpayers of the criminal expenses that the country distillery brings in its train.

Mr. Henry A. Page made a terrific arraignment of the country distillery as he had seen it in Moore county, how the peace and thrift of a happy valley had been destroyed, murders and suicides committed and the people, their farms mortgaged to the distiller, all terrorized so effectually that they were unwilling to inform on him for his violations of the law. It was a dramatic part of his speech that was not generally known, that the man was sitting behind him, one of the distillers of Yadkin county, who had sent a letter to Mr. Page's fifteen-year-old boy offering to sell him four quarts of liquor and send it in a sealed and plain package so that nobody could know.

The speech made by Mr. J. W. Bailey was thrilling in its appeal and one of the finest specimens of real eloquence we have heard for some time. Mr. Bailey has had this matter on his mind and heart all these weeks while the forces have been gathering to the battle and he spoke with a ready mind out of a full heart. The whole hearing was excellently managed and must have made a deep impression upon the committee and the numerous members of the Legislature there present.

At this writing we do not know what action the committee will take as it has at least three bills to consider along the same line. The London bill goes a step farther than the other two in requiring that the saloon, since it is acknowledged by the law to be a quasi-nuisance, should show its right to existence by securing a petition for it from a majority of the voters of the municipality, or forcing the saloon to have an election and carry it in its own favor every two years. Whether we shall get this put into legislation at this time we cannot say. But if the Christian people will do their duty even now we can secure these results, we think without doubt:

1. The closing of all distilleries in the country and allowing them to exist only in incorporated towns with police protection when the people are willing for them to come. 2. The confining of saloons to incorporated towns with police protection. 3. The privilege of voting the saloon out with a dispensary, where prohibition cannot be secured or enforced. 4. The prevention of the jug trade in prohibited territory. 5. The right of prohibited territory to be undisturbed in any of its privileges by present legislation.

The bill agreed upon by the committee with some possible amendments will be passed or rejected by the General Assembly. Let every man who loves his state see that his influence counts in Raleigh with every man who has the decision of this great question. Send letters and petitions and telegrams. Now as in olden time, They that be with us are more than they that be with them. The spiritual forces of righteousness and truth are fighting for us. Let us not fail in our service. Let not the curse of Meroz rest upon us, who went not up to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

And we need some money too for the necessary postage and printing and travelling expenses. The Standard shall be glad to receive and forward any to the proper persons. In spite of the saloon politicians that have been sent to this legislature, whom we shall not name now, as we hope their vote may yet be on the right side; in spite of the corruption fund, which has undoubtedly been raised by the liquor interests, and the liquor attorneys that are lobbying while the friends of temperance sleep, we believe that we shall yet win. And the day the bill becomes a law will be the brightest day that has dawned upon North Carolina since the passage of the amendment that lifted the burden of negro rule, and which was fought by the Liquor Dealers' Association just as these Anti-Saloon measures are fought to-day.

But right is right, for God is God,
And right the day will win,
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To falter would be sin.

Right on With the War.

The meeting at Raleigh was a triumph. The men who came here and the people that sent them rendered the State a lasting service. The opposition fled before them. That magnificent editorial in the News and Observer had filled the liquor lobby with dismay, and it only remained for the people themselves to come on the scene to make the rout complete.

But this is the beginning, not the end of the battle. The liquor lobby was reinforced by a delegation from Halifax Friday morning. Defeated in open conflict they are resolved to recover their ground by private work. If we shall let up now, reaction will set in, and our triumph will be turned against us. I expect the conflict to last three weeks yet, and perhaps longer, I, therefore, make haste to appeal to the moral forces every where to immediately follow up the present triumph with decisive action.

Continue to circulate petitions. I will send blanks freely. Continue to write to your representatives, and get others to do so. Keep in touch with the General Assembly. Talk and work for the cause all the time. This is no 20-day understaking. We have come into this warfare to stay until there shall be nothing to fight for. From the Committee we move to the House and Senate. From them we shall move to the cities and towns; and, if need shall be, we shall move the scene of conflict to the country also.

Our safety is in persistence. We are not to speak once, but a hundred times; not to pray once, but without ceasing; not to do one thing, but a hundred things. Remember how the dying prophet laid his hands upon the King's hands and told him to shoot arrows, the arrow of the Lord's deliverance and the arrow of the deliverance from Syria. "And he said, Take the arrows. And he took them. And he said unto the King of Israel, Smite upon the ground. And he smote thrice upon the ground and stayed. And the man of God was wroth with him, and said, Thou shouldst have smitten five or six times; then hadst thou smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed it."

Our victory shall rest in smiting our enemies again and again and again and again and again, and if necessary, again. So only shall we convince the General Assembly, by an overwhelming demonstration, by mass-meetings, petitions and personal appeals, that the conscience of the State is aroused and will accept no compromise.

Are you in earnest? Then up and to your task this hour.

Deaths.

"More homelike seems the vast unknown
Since they have entered there."

FAUCETT.—On the 6th day of November, 1902, at his home in Waynesville, N. C., William H. Fancett departed this life and went to be with Jesus.

Brother Fancett was the son of John Fancett and was born in Orange, now Alamance county, N. C., on the 13th day of March, 1830. When a young man only 22 years of age he was united in marriage to Miss Jane Ector and for nearly a half a century they lived happily together as man and wife. They had no children, but with tender love they took into their home and hearts several, who are now useful men and women. His wife died two years before he did and he never recovered from the loss of his beloved companion, and his health which had been feeble for some time, grew worse and worse after her death.

He was lovingly cared for and nursed by his devoted loved ones who did every thing in human power for his comfort and welfare.

He came to Waynesville in 1878 and was identified with the growth and development of the town as long as he lived. No man, who ever lived here, more entirely received the confidence and respect of the entire community than did he, and well did he deserve it, for his was a life upright and clean in all his relations to his fellow man, private and public. He held many positions of public trust the duties of which were always faithfully and conscientiously discharged, and no man ever doubted his integrity. Several of the most prominent men in this town have said to me since his death, "Mr. Fancett was the most upright man that ever walked the streets of Waynesville." He was absolutely void of sham and deceit and with entire fearlessness he would condemn wrong in any one, high as well as low, rich as well as poor. He measured all conduct by the square of virtue and he never said behind one's back what he would not say to his face, and whenever he believed any man was acting crookedly he would tell him so plainly, but even those whom he condemned respected him because of his own unquestionable truthfulness and integrity. While he was an ardent Democrat, yet for many years he held the office of United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue under Republican administration, while the late Judge Dick was on the bench. A prominent lawyer here said to me a few days after his death, that many years ago he tried to have him removed from the office so as to have one of his own party put in his place and the plea made before Judge Dick was that Mr. Fancett had been biased in some of his decisions. He said that the Judge gave them a patient hearing and then said: "I have known William H. Fancett from his boyhood and have never known him to do an unclean thing and if every man in your county were to swear that he had rendered any decision otherwise than what he believed to be right I would not believe it. He will continue to hold his office." And he did so as long as the Judge lived.

He served his day and generation well and has left a name that will ever be remembered as the synonym of honor. He was a faithful friend and a wise counsellor and is sadly missed by many. On the 25th of October, 1879 he united with the Presbyterian Church at Waynesville and in August, 1885, he was ordained an elder in this church and at the time of his death was the senior member of the session. When he joined this church she was but a weak little band struggling for existence. His heart, hand and purse were gladly given and used for her upbuilding and he lived to see her self-supporting and independent. Much of her growth was due to his love, life and labors, and the session has placed on record in their minutes their testimony to this fact. For years he was superintendent of the Sabbath-school. He loved his church and to work for her gave him joy and pleasure.

My first intimate acquaintance with him was when I came to this pastorate, four years and a-half ago. My association with him as a man and an officer in the church was always most pleasant and harmonious. I have seen him tried, when to discharge a duty was hard and trying to the flesh, but when convinced that it was his duty he never halted until it was done. To me, a loving friend and a loyal supporter in the Master's work, his loss is indeed a sorrow, and by me deeply felt. But I rejoice in the knowledge that he died in the triumph of the Christian's faith, and what to us is a loss is to him gain, for "to be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord."

Well did he obey the teaching of the Scriptures, and follow the injunction of the Poet to

"So live that when the summons comes
• to join

The innumerable caravan that moves
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take

His chamber in the silent halls of death, Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,

Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed

By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave,

Like one that draws the drapery of his couch

About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams." Frank D. Hunt.

PATRICK.—At Fort Smith, Ark., Tuesday morning, 6th January, Mrs. Alice Cardwell Patrick, wife of Mr. David S. Patrick, aged fifty-seven years. She was a native of Rockingham county, N. C. Early in life she made a confession of her faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and she died in the faith of the gospel. She was a devoted wife and mother, and a tower of strength in time of trouble. Her husband and four children survive her—three sons and a daughter, and all were with her as she passed under the shadow of death. May the consolations of God be with them.

M. McN. McK.

WALKER.—Most truly did a recent issue of The Standard note the sympathy which is being felt for Rev. W. T. Walker, pastor of the Ashpole group of churches, in the loss of his devoted wife, Mary Kenna Stokes, who fell asleep in Jesus on the 27th of December last in the 36th year of her age.

Mrs. Walker was one of four daughters reared by Capt. Richard and Mrs. Sarah J. Stokes, all of whom became the wives of Presbyterian ministers.

Very well do those who used to attend the college and seminary at Hampden-Sidney remember the delightful Virginia home and the pious family of Capt. Stokes. The old college church was their place of worship, and here Mary Kenna, early in life gave her heart to the Saviour, whom she so faithfully followed to the last.

She was united in marriage to Rev. W. T. Walker in the fall of 1891, and truly has she been a help-meet to him filling well that delicate sphere of a minister's wife, in all of its departments, careful, patient, industrious and faithful to every charge, now diligently and wisely caring for the comforts of the home, now reading aloud to her husband, now watching as only a mother can watch and pouring the wealth of a mother's love into the lives of those bright little girls whom God had given her, and when God asked for two of them, she gave them back again without a murmur but with tears not a few.

One child is left to our dear brother and our prayers ascend for Heaven's choice blessings upon little Mary Kenna Walker. The mother's name and the mother's blessing are hers, and when in childish sobs she begs for the mother to return, she does not refuse to be comforted when told that she may one day, go to the mother though the mother can never come to her.

Yes, truly do we sympathize with our brother in his bereavement for she whose price is far above rubies has gone from his earthly home.

May the Father of mercies and the God of all comfort, who comforteth us in all our tribulations "so comfort him that he may be able to comfort them, which are in any trouble, with the comfort where-with he himself is comforted of God."

J. B. M.

YOUNG.—Capt. James E. Young, born in Newberry, S. C., Dec. 28, 1835, came to Lake City, Fla., at about the age of twenty years. He early gave himself to God, and united with the Presbyterian Church at this place, and was a consistent member. He served for many years as sole deacon, and in 1885, was elected to the eldership. On Jan. 17, 1903, surrounded by his family, God called him to Himself. He leaves a wife and six devoted children to mourn.

DICK.—Mrs. Harriet McNeill Dick was born near Alfordville, N. C., July 24, 1878 and died at Mrs. Harriet McKay's Dec. 1st, 1902.

She was a daughter of Mr. C. B. and Mrs. C. A. McKay Cox.

She is survived by them, her husband, four brothers and two sisters.

Her parents acknowledged God's claim upon her when she was an infant, and entered into covenant relations with Him in her behalf. When but a child she made profession of her faith, and united with Ashpole Presbyterian Church.

In 1898 she was united in marriage to Mr. Jno. E. Dick of the same community, and soon afterwards moved to Kansas Here she remained until a few months before her death. She returned to her home in July, 1902, and very quickly developed what proved to be a serious illness. She went to the home of her grand-mother near Red Springs, expecting to go on to that town in order to use the water there. But she was too much prostrated by the trip to go further. Here she remained through a long siege of tedious sickness, in which she was most tenderly nursed by her loving people. She had come to die among her own kindred. She finally passed away despite the strenuous efforts made to save her useful life.

Mrs. Dick was a devoted Christian. Her walk was consistent. She adorned the doctrine of God our Saviour. Her life was one of faithful conscientious service. Wherever she went her lot was cast with God's people in holy activity. We can but believe that she gladly received the summons to rest from earthly toils and pains and to enter into the joy of her Lord.

A man's environment is the smallest part of his world. The world which is made by circumstances, by the accidents of birth and wealth, of social position, or even genius, has less to do with his happiness than the world which he creates for himself and in which his real life is passed. If I were a magician I might give you fame or beauty or valor or untold and inexhaustible riches; but in bestowing all these things I should not necessarily make you either contented or useful. It is even possible that I might add fuel to the consuming fire of your selfishness or avarice. These gifts might prove a curse rather than a blessing. If you wish to live in a beautiful world, you must create it. It may be a difficult task, but with the help of God you can perform it.—Louis Albert Banks.

MISS FAY LEE,

President of the Shakespearian Club, Kansas City.

Miss Fay Lee.

"Your booklet came to my home like a message of health when I had suffered with headache, backache and bearing-down pains. I was weak, nervous and hysterical and had not consulted any doctor, thinking it would pass away in time, but instead I found that the pains increased and were more frequent. I decided to try Wine of Cardui and in a short time was much improved. It seemed to act like a charm. I kept up the treatment and the result was most satisfactory. Words fail to express my gratitude for the suffering that is now saved me. I am in fine health, physically and mentally. I can only say 'thank you', but there is much more in my heart for you."

BEARING-DOWN pains are the worst that women know. If you are suffering from this trouble you need not be uncertain about it. The pains in the abdomen and back that feel as if heavy weights were pulling down on the nerves of the stomach are "bearing-down pains". They may not be particularly severe at present but they are growing worse. That headache which nearly drives you distracted now is caused by the terrible nervous tension. The nerves soon begin to give way under the strain. You perhaps jump at any unusual disturbance, or laugh or weep, hysterically, at no apparent cause. That is what Miss Fay Lee, 603 1/2 North Seventh Street, Kansas City, Kansas, was coming to when she rescued herself by taking Wine of Cardui. The Wine made her a strong, healthy woman again, as it has made a million other women strong and healthy. By inducing regular menstruation the entire system is relieved of the terrible wasting drains. The ligaments which hold the womb in place are strengthened by a healthy flow and that organ is returned to its normal position. Returning health is the result. This is what Wine of Cardui has done for thousands of the best women in America.

If you need advice write The Ladies' Advisory Department, The Chattanooga Medicine Company, Chattanooga, Tenn., describing all your symptoms freely, and a letter of advice will be sent you. Secure a $1.00 bottle of Wine of Cardui from your druggist to-day.

A Valuable Gift.

Parents, guardians, friends and relatives could not present one with a more valuable gift than a scholarship in one of Draughon's Business Colleges located at Nashville, St. Louis, Atlanta, Montgomery, Shreveport, Galveston, Little Rock and Fort Worth. A gift of this kind is something which one can not steal, fires burn or floods wash away. Such a gift costs but little in comparison with its real value and will be a stepping stone—a firm foundation whereon one may build a successful career. Elsewhere in this issue will be found an advertisement of Prof. Draughon's Colleges. Write for catalogue before entering elsewhere.

The question of revising the street names is being agitated in Washington. In 1888, Congress authorized the numbering of streets running North and South, State names for the avenues, and city names for the East and West streets, after the alphabet was exhausted, but the suburban divisions are now giving trouble. One suggestion is to name the streets after distinguished Americans.

Ira F. Gilmore, of Bloomington, Ill., has perfected and patented a wireless piano which he has been working on for thirteen years. Being unable to get the reed made satisfactorily in this country, he set about this task himself, and for a piece of steel he fashioned with drill and file a five-octavo comb reed from which, it is said, combined with a bridge and sounding board, he secures a fine, sharp tone.—Ex.

A new grain is being grown in the State of Washington. It is called corn-wheat. and the claim is made that it combines the good qualities of both corn and wheat. In appearance the grain resembles wheat, though the kernels are about twice as large as those of ordinary wheat. The yield is from 60 to 100 bushels to the acre. The cultivation of this grain is believed to promise considerable economic changes in the Pacific Northwest, where Indian corn does not grow very well. Corn wheat is to be used in fattening stock.—Exchange.

Vienna, Feb. 1.—It is reported that the Standard Oil Company is making an investigation into the conditions prevailing at the oil fields of Galicia, with a view to purchasing the entire property. American experts are now at Boryslav, an important petroleum center in Galicia, conferring with the owners.

The price named is $10,000,000 but this is exclusive of some of the largest oil wells. The Standard Oil Company trade in Germany recently has suffered by the competition of Galician oil, the enormous production in Galicia causing prices to fall to the lowest point. The Schodnica company, the largest oil producers in Galicia, yesterday reported a loss of $186,000 on last year's workings.

President Rodrigues Alves, lately called to preside over the Brazilian Republic, was nominated by the conservative Republican party, and has assumed office under encouraging conditions. President Alves represents the highest type of South American statesmen; he has surrounded himself with an able cabinet; the Minister of Foreign Affairs was U. S.

Minister during Mr. Cleveland's second administration, and may be expected to combat the anti-American feeling among his people. The President has declared for an increase in the army and navy, and the sanitary improvement of Rio de Janeiro. The city is devastated every year by yellow fever. Making it a wholesome place of abode will make President Alves a model for imitation for other rulers in South America.

Washington, January 31.—The President to-day sent the following nominations to the Senate:

Assistant Treasurers of the United States—William S. Leib, at Philadelphia, George A. Marden, at Boston.

Collectors of customs—John M. Holendorf for the district of St. Mary's, Georgia, John Roster, for the district of Rappahannock.

Surveys of Customs—Jeremiah J. McCarthy, in the district of Boston and Charlestown, Mass; Charles H. H. Henseny, for the port of Wheeling, W. Va.

Collector of Internal Revenue—Peter E. Garlick, for the Twenty-first District of New York.

Consul—William H. Bishop, Connecticut, at Genoa, Italy.

A special Committee of Congress which visited the Hawaiian Islands last summer, for the purpose of thoroughly investigating the conditions of affairs there, has recommended among other things, that Congress make some provision for Ex-Queen Liliuokalani as an act of grace and justice.

Prior to the revolution which dethroned the Queen, she had as good a title to her throne as any other monarch to his, and it should also be remembered, as President Cleveland openly admitted, that the Queen was dethroned, not merely by her rebellious subjects, but through the aid and comfort given the rebels by the armed forces of the United States—in a word, the revolution was successful through a sort of treachery on the part of the American representatives in the Islands. As a result of the revolution the crown lands were confiscated, and the Queen shorn of her rights and privileges, as well as of her income.—Exchange.

Coldly considered, the attack on San Carlos is the most unfortunate thing that could have occurred for the Emperor William. It has greatly diminished the prospect of cementing the permanent friendship between Germany and the United States which he has so openly and cordially sought to establish; it has strengthened the British resentment of the Venezuela alliance; it has spread throughout South America an aversion for Germany which must have a damaging influence on German commerce; and it has done more than any event ever did before to convince the South Americans that their safety and independence are at stake unless this country shall inflexibly maintain the Monroe Doctrine. The Emperor is too shrewd a man not to have foreseen the consequences of such an act, and unless he had given up his cherished scheme of a strong commercial co-operation between Germany, Great Britain and the United States, it is incredible that he could ever have planned or consented to so perfectly gratuitous a folly.—Church Standard.

Tangier, Feb. 1.—The sultan's troops have utterly routed the forces of the Moorish pretender and captured Bu Hamara himself.

A special courier who arrived today after making a record journey from Fez, brought this news. He reports that at daybreak last Thursday the army of the sultan, commanded by the war minister, El Menebbi, attacked the pretender's position and inflicted a complete defeat on his following, at the same time capturing Bu Hamara.

Another runner who has reached here from Fez confirms the news of the defeat of the rebels, but says that the report of the capture of the pretender is incorrect. He adds that it is uncertain whether Bu Hamara's body was among the great number slain. The sultan's victory was absolute, almost the entire following of the pretender being either slain or captured. His camp, provisions and ammunition were taken and the artillery which was lost by the sultan's army in the battle of Dec. 23 was recaptured. Even if Bu Hamara escaped it is hopeless for him to seek to retrieve his defeat as his claim that he is a saint is exploded. The details regarding the battle are meagre, but it is known that the pretender's camp was surprised and rushed at dawn.

The most powerful gun ever built in the United States was tested January 17 at the Sandy Hook proving-ground under direction of General Crozier, Chief of Ordnance. Three great projectiles were hurled across an ocean range, fired from the new 16-inch coast defence rifle which was recently constructed at the Watervliet arsenal, at a cost of $100,000. The first shot was backed by a charge of 550 pounds of smokeless powder and weighed 240 pounds. For the second and third shots, 640 pounds of powder were used. The range of the gun is twenty miles, but it can be used to hit objects only four or five miles distant, from the fact that the target could not be seen at a greater distance. Firing from Sandy Hook, the new gun could drop a shell into Central Park or into any part of Brooklyn. If it were stood up on its breech beside a three-story house, enough of the muzzle would overtop the building to form a respectable chimney. It is 49 feet long and 6 feet 2 inches thick at the breech.—Scientific American.

The Textile World, of Boston, presents quite interesting statistics of cotton mill construction in 1902. Eight more cotton mills were built in 1902 than in 1901, 16 more silk mills, while there was a decrease of 7 woolen and 11 knitting mills compared with 1901. Of the new woolen mills the number is the same in the Middle and Western States as in 1901, the gain in the South three—one each in Georgia, Virginia and West Virginia—while here is a loss of 5 in New-England. Of the new cotton mills there has been a large increase in the North, 43 per cent. of the new spindles being in that section against 11 per cent. in 1901.

South Carolina leads the South in new mills, spindles and looms, and the South leads the North in mills and spindles but is behind it in looms. The South put in more new spindles last year (490,256) than in any year of the past seven except 1900 (1,109,584) and 1899 (669,970.). Of the new knitting mills, of which there were 82, 18 were in the South—three each in Alabama, Georgia and Mississippi, four in North Carolina, two each in South Carolina and Tennessee and one in Virginia. In silk mills the South neither gained nor lost except that Maryland established one. The South's part in the new miscellaneous mills is represented by one canvas belting and one duck in Maryland, one bleaching mill in South Carolina and one burlap in Tennessee. Reviewing the whole field and the year's achievement The Textile World observes that "the showing from every point of view is good, and not the least cause for congratulation is the evidence of conservatism which is apparently restricting mill construction to the increased requirements arising from the growth of the country."—Observer.

There has been great outcry of late in the North against child labor in the South, particularly in the Southern cotton mills; but it now appears, according to the New York Tribune, "that we need to turn our attention homeward." It has been found that about 16,000 children under fourteen years are employed in New York City in spite of the law, and it has been claimed by workers among the poor that more child labor exists in New York than in all the States of the South combined, which The Tribune calls "a remarkable revelation." An independent body, known as the Child Labor Committee of New York, has investigated the matter, and in its report declares that "grave defects exist in the present Child Labor and Compulsory Education law, to the great injury of the rising generation and of society at large." In spite of the effective work of the State factory inspectors and the city board of health in the enforcement of the present law, children are employed before the educational test has been complied with, and they are employed under the legal age of fourteen. The committee indorses the position taken by Governor Odell, in his message to the legislature recommending the amending of the child-labor laws and has already entered on its campaign for legislation on the subject. The committee in its report cites some phrases of the law and shows the defects "due to the loose phraseology." The law says that children shall not be employed under fourteen, but this allows them to work "if they are accompanied by a parent or elder brother or sister who is paid for the child's work the name of the child not appearing on the pay-roll.

"Compared to this the child slavery of the South is the greatest freedom," says the Memphis Commercial Appeal. "There is nothing in Southern factories," it adds, "to be compared to this, and yet the evils that exist in Southern factories might be abated."—Literary Digest.

The Home Circle.

From England to Scotland

Very soon after leaving Newcastle on the Tyne the marked change in the scenery of the country through which we were passing apprised us of the fact that we had crossed the border and were now in Scotland. Instead of the level or gently undulating fields, tilled like gardens, and the fine oaks and other trees here and there, giving the country a park-like aspect, there were bold hills on every hand, intensely green, without a tree as far as the eye could reach, and dotted only with white sheep. And, instead of the tame rivers, winding lazily through wide meadows, such as we had seen everywhere in England, there were brawling brooks dashing down the ravines with an energy that made them fit symbols of the strenuous activity of the race whose land we were entering. Nothing in a Scottish landscape is more striking to the American eye than the uniform absence of trees on the hills and mountains. There are some forest-clad mountains and ravines,—The Trossachs, for instance, as readers of Scott will remember,—but in most cases there are only grass, ferns, and heather. This has the effect of throwing the shape of the mountains into much sharper outline to the eye than is the case with our American mountains, with their dense forests.

If we had had the choosing of the conditions under which we should enter Scotland, we would not have changed them in any particular. The afternoon sun was pouring golden light over the hills. The sky was as blue as that of Italy, save occasional masses of snow-white clouds towards the horizon—that one of our party calls "Williams' shaving soap clouds"—and the air, with its abundance of ozone, had an exhilarating and tonic effect such as I have never known anywhere else in mid-summer.

When we left the train at Melrose and took up our quarters in the Abbey Hotel, we found that our good fortune continued, as our rooms looked right down upon the lovely ruins, and, as we sat watching them, the moon rose slowly over the Tweed, so that we had the opportunity to obey literally the poet's counsel in the "Lay of the last Minstrel"—

"If thou wouldst view fair Melrose aright Go visit it by the pale moonlight."

To one who like myself regards Sir Walter Scott as the greatest novelist that ever lived, the opportunity to visit his home at Abbotsford and his grave at Dryburgh a second time, and to drink in the exquisite beauty of the Tweed Valley at this point, is one to be thankful for indeed. There are some things both by way of praise and blame that I wish to say about Scott to the readers of this paper, and I trust that I shall have opportunity to do so later, but I must not pause to say them now.

Edinburgh at last! No. 4 Atholl Crescent. It was delightful to settle down here, in our rented apartments, after long toil at home and long travel abroad, for a real rest, with just enough walking and hill-climbing daily, in and around the city, to give us a keen appetite for our meals. Round the bowl of yellow Scotch earthenware in which our oatmeal porridge was served every morning, ran these lines from Burns:

"Some hae meat that canna eat,
And some wad eat that want it.
But we hae meat an' we can eat,
So let the Lord be thank it."

And, as our appetites sharpened more and more, with the snell air of the German Ocean, and the abundant exercise on the heath-clad hills, and the exemption from wearing responsibilities, we entered more and more fully into the sentiment.

By the way, the famous definition given by Dr. Samuel Johnson in his Dictionary runs thus: "Oats. A grain, which in England is generally given to horses, but in Scotland supports the people." "Aye," said a Scotchman, when he heard it, "and see what horses they have in England and what men we have in Scotland." Dr. Johnson, who by the way owes his immortal fame to a Scotchman, affected a dislike for Scotland, and said, among other uncomplimentary things, that the only good road in Scotland was the road that led to England.

Our feeling is exactly contrary to that, and we are so charmed with what a good friend of mine calls "God's country north of the Tweed," its wonderful beauty, its matchless romance, its heroic history, the thronging memories of its unsurpassed services to the causes of religion, liberty and letters, that we shall find it difficult to tear ourselves away and take the road to England at all.

But before undertaking to say anything of the vast and fascinating themes just mentioned, let me set down in the remaining space of this letter my impression of certain features of the present day customs of the Scottish people in their public worship.

In a number of particulars the church usages among Presbyterians in England and Scotland differ from ours in America. It is the universal custom when entering a pew at the beginning of the service to bow for a moment or so in silent prayer. Likewise at the close of the service, when the minister pronounces the benediction upon the standing congregation, all the people bow again in silent prayer before leaving the church. They then rise and withdraw in a quieter and more reverential manner than is usual with us. In America it is not infrequently the case that the moment the minister says "Amen" at the close of the benediction, the organist pulls out all the stops of his instrument, sweeps the keyboard with might and main, and fills the building with a crashing tempest of sound, apparently a very lively march, not to say a waltz, to the jublinat strains of which the people move down the aisles, while, instead of the subdued greetings that seem more suitable to the sanctuary, they are straining their voices to make themselves heard over the uproar of the music.

Even in Scotland, however, the custom of a rather lively postlude from the organ as the people are retiring, is growing, as in Free St. George's, Edinburgh, which has the best organist I have heard in Great Britain, Mr. Hollins. He is blind but I have never heard a man pour such melody from an organ, or lead a singing congregation more judiciously and effectively with an instrument. At times he leaves the organ quite silent in the midst of the hymn, beating time with his hand, and throwing out the voices of the people themselves. The organ as he uses it is not a crutch for a lame congregation to lean on, but a vaulting pole for an active one to spring with. And the singing is magnificent. Happy the church with two ministers such as Dr. Alexander Whyte and the Rev. Hugh Black, and an organist such as Mr. Hollins! Little wonder that the great building is crowded to the doors at every service, and that if one wishes to be sure of a seat he must come a half hour before the time for the service to begin. This is quite easy for us to do, as the apartments which we have occupied for a month are but a few doors above the church. The church music in Scotland is generally far superior to ours in America. Solos and quartettes are almost unknown. The choirs are large, and sit in front of the congregation, just under the pulpit, and regard it as their business not so much to display their talents in rendering difficult choir pieces as to lead the congregation in this important part of the worship of God. And the people sing, generally and heartily, rolling up to heaven a great volume of praise. I am struck with the fact that the Scotch Presbyterians have continued to use some of the most majestic and uplifting of the ancient hymns, such as the TeDeum, which we in America have in many places ceased to use, substituting for these great hymns of the ages the ephemeral jingles which make up too large a part of our so-called "Gospel Hymns." There is more both of dignity and variety of the right sort in the Scottish church music, secured by the free use of close metrical versions of the Psalms, paraphrases of other parts of Scripture, and anthems of the best type—all sung, mark you, by the whole congregation and not by the choir only.

There is another thing about the Scotch churches that I would like to see introduced into every church in America, and that is the use of the Bible by the people. A book-board is affixed to the back of every pew, running the whole length of it, and on this are laid a sufficient number of hymn-books and Bibles for all the people in the pew behind. When the preacher is about to read his Scripture lesson (there are always two at the morning service, one from the Old Testament and one from the New), he announces the book and chapter, then pauses a minute while the people turn to the place, and, as he reads, they follow. So, too, when he announces his text. It is an excellent custom. It would be difficult to overstate the value of it. It is not unconnected with the fact that the Scotch people as a whole know more about the Bible than any other people in the world.

The International System of Sunday-school Lessons has done more to promote knowledge of the Bible than any other system ever generally used since the modern Sunday-school came into existence notwithstanding the sweeping and indiscriminating strictures made upon it by some good brethren of late. But that system is certainly capable of improvement. One of the unfortunate results charged to the use of the lesson sheets of the International series is the neglect of the Bible itself. The children, it is said, do not bring their Bibles with them, and do not become familiar with them as a whole, in the Sunday-school. It is too true in many cases. But are not their seniors equally indifferent about having Bibles in the regular service? How can ministers expect to bring about the desired revival of expository preaching unless they can get Bibles into the hands of the people during the service? Suppose that like the Scotch we had an adequate supply of Bibles as a regular part of the equipment of our churches and Sunday-schools, would not this difficulty about the neglect of the Bible, which so many charge to the use of the lesson leaves, be effectually met? Why should there not be at least as good a supply of Bibles in a church as of hymn-books? Never were Bibles so cheap as now.

Three Tests of Friendship.

What is a friend? We often speak the word lightly, not realizing how much it means. A friend is one who needs us, and one whom we need. Around us may be many whose companionship we enjoy, but were they suddenly to drop out of their places there would be no soreness, no senses of deprivation, no lack of comfort elsewhere. We do not need them, neither do they need us.

A friend is one to whom we cling, though many leagues of space separate us, whose fellow-feeling we never doubt, though years pass with no sight of his face or a word from his pen. We know our friend loves us, and that when we meet again it will be on the same old terms; we shall begin where we left off.

A friend is one in whom we confide. The secret chambers of our soul open to his touch on the latch; we give and take tenderest confidences.

Noting these three characteristics of friendship, we can see how great a thing it is to have found a real friend. Many go through life without it. Thousands imagine their friends are numbered by scores, but if subjected to these tests every one of them would fall off into the great sea of common humanity or comradeship. In view of all this, how great is the wonder of the Lord saying to us, "Ye are my friends!" If we are Christ's friends then He needs us as we need Him; then He loves, though our eyes see not His face, nor ears hear sound of His voice; then all the secrets of God are, or are to be, as soon as we can bear it, revealed unto us.—The Congregationalist.

On Kindness to Servants.

The saying that "No man is a hero to his valet de chambre," was disproved in the case of Robert Browning. He was so gracious and yet so dignified with servants that he was as profoundly revered by them as he was beloved. An exact account of his gentle geniality in this regard might read like exaggeration. He appeared to dread giving his inferiors trouble; it was as though he would fain spare them the sense of servitude, which his own independent spirit caused him to imagine a painful burden. It seemed as if he were ever striving to place a cushion under a galling yoke, and in vain one sought to convince him that service rendered to such as he could only be a source of pride and pleasure to the server. He would always resist the hand of a friend or menial that tried to assist him, even in so small a matter as the adjustment or removal of his great-coat or his hat. "Nothing that I can do for myself should be done for me," he would say; and brave was the servant who dared hold an umbrella over his head as he stepped into or out of his gondola. "What do you take me for?" he would exclaim. "An infant or a man?" In Venice his memory will live in many a humble heart until its pulse has ceased to beat. "There'll never be another like him," is still the common saying where ever his name is mentioned to those who served him.—Cornhill Magazine.

Our Young People.

Aunt Tabitha's Letters.—No. 5.

My dear Girls:

I suspect that you have been too busy with the pleasure which young people will try to crowd into the Christmas holidays to have missed your old auntie's letter. I hope, however, that you have not forgotten that I wanted to talk to you about manner—a subject that too many people neglect.

There are a great many people who have good manners without being possessed of a pleasant manner, and I have seen people who possessed a pleasant enough manner, whose manners could scarcely be pronounced good. There is a distinction then very plainly, between manner and manners, and while I hope to call your attention to the importance of manner as an item in the "make-up" of a young woman, let me say that no Christian man or woman can afford to be indifferent to what is known as good manners, though it seems that many good people are recklessly indifferent. Of course the term good manners is simply the name given to the expression of a courtesy that dwells in the heart, and that of courtesy we have a beautiful example in our Lord's reply to the High Priest. We are sure that Paul possessed it from his address to Felix. We believe its speech to be the dialect of the kingdom.

Perhaps some of you are saying: "Why is she wasting time talking about good manners? Of course everybody believes in good manners."

Alas, dear girls, it may be true that everybody believes in good manners, but how many practice what they believe in? Do I not know, do not all of you know kind-hearted boys and girls, men and women who are as indifferent,—I had almost said contemptuous—about some of the requirements of good manners, as if they were impositions rather than kindly restraints?

Did you never see some one whom you respect and even admire, ignore some of those customs that from time immemorial have been the marks of courtesy and of good breeding; yea, more, has some one whom you truly love never caused your heart a throb of pain by some thoughtless word said, or by some gracious and kindly word he has left unsaid—for there are unspoken words, and neglected acts which may be violations of good manners, of true courtesy, as well as rude or thoughtless words.

Suppose that you are sick, or in trouble, or lonely, or disheartened, and I know it, and yet pass you without the smile, the word of sympathy—the warm hand-grasp, have I not broken one link of that chain that should bind all human hearts? Have I not shut out at least one of the sunbeams that was meant to brighten your life? Have I not failed to speak the dialect of Christ's Kingdom?

This is not all that might be said about good manners, not by any means but let us discuss manner for awhile.

To use a French idiom there are manners and manners. Have you never heard people tell unpleasant things so pleasantly that you almost forget they were unpleasant, and, on the other hand have you not heard pleasant things, or what were intended for pleasant things told in a way that "rubbed your fur the wrong way," and made you wonder why the person tried to say anything?

Yes, there is a pleasant manner, and there is an unpleasant one. There is a cordial greeting that sends you on your way smiling, and there is a rough, brusque manner that mistaken ones call sincerity. There is too a flattering manner which should be put out of circulation just as quickly as counterfeit coin, and there is a kindly, graceful praise of what is deserving of praise, that is one of God's ways of beautifying life.

Take the matter of greeting people. It does not matter whether I hold my hand on the level of my chin, or beneath the level of my waist; whether I shake up and down, or side ways; whether I am shaking according to the latest style(!) or not, but what you want to feel—what all genuine people want to feel when you meet me, is, that I am really glad to see you. You want a gentle, cordial grasp that assures you that hands are carrying messages of sincere esteem, affection, or love, from heart to heart? Isn't that so?

This thing of manner, can it be cultivated? you ask? Certainly, with patient determination and with God's help—for God means us to work for the up-building of character. We are given one manner along with other gifts "to profit with." Some day we must give an account. God will ask how we have traded with our one pound, or two, or three, of manner as well as of money and time.

Yes, dear girls, we can practice courtesy. The gift of a gracious winsome manner has been acquired, and "what man has done, man can do."

Again, there is a pleasant way of receiving a kindness or a compliment. What is known as gush, is disgusting to honest and refined people, but there is a kindling of the eye; and a smile that are as much compensation for a little act of kindness as words, though they may take the place of words.

One word more—there is a manner of entering a church or concert room,—any large gathering,—a manner that stamps one at once as a gentleman or lady, as the case maybe.

Let me illustrate: Your Aunt Tabitha was at an entertainment not long ago, and was seated where she could watch the audience come in. It was highly entertaining and she took a note in order to call your attention to this apparently trivial matter.

Of the hundreds that streamed past her, there were scarcely a dozen who looked at ease. Some wore an angry expression, some looked solemn, others walked awkwardly because so self-conscious, some simpered, for the same reason.

Some were flashily dressed and talked and laughed loudly; some slunk in as if ashamed to be seen on such a festive occasion, others almost ran to get through with the trying ordeal of facing the crowd for the main entrance to the room was near the stage. I am glad to report that there were a few who came in quietly, holding their heads erect and smiling, for this was an occasion for enjoyment. These walked to their seats because that was the only way to get there, but they did not think of how they were doing it.

This may all seem a small matter to people who do not recognize the fact that small things are often powerful. What things are small, anyhow?

Can any of you say? One thing is true though, that if we are truly anxious to become noble men and women,—men and women of social influence—leaving our impress on society, when God calls us away—we will not despise “the day of small things.”

Let me close with a Wordworth gem, which we can make to fit our subject: “Small service is true service while it lasts.

Of humble things, bright creature, scorn not one,
The daisy, by the shadow that it casts,
Protects the lingering dew-drop from the sun.”

Sincerely yours,
Aunt Tabitha.

The Boy Minister.

When the day of Donald Cargill's execution came, and the Grass market in Edinburgh was thronged with a restless crowd, jostling and pushing each other to get a last look at the old Covenanter, who stood on the gallows, his Bible in his hand, joy in his heart, and words on his lips that rang a never-dying meaning into one soul at least among the multitude, there was no one who noticed a boy standing near the scaffold.

With strained face and wide blue eyes, he watched the dying struggles of the brave old man, and in the presence of his suffering, vowed to take up Donald Cargill's work and follow him to the same death, if need be.

The boy was James Renwick, the only son of a poor weaver, who had dedicated him to God. He was passionately fond of study, but even in childhood he was haunted by doubts and fears that seemed to almost overwhelm him. The way dawned clear before him at last, however, and from the gloomy day of Cargill's execution, he had no hesitation about the path he was to tread.

He studied at the University of Edinburgh, but was finally refused his degree for adhering to the cause of the Covenanters. He went to Holland, but could not rest while the martyrdoms and sufferings of his brethren increased with terrible rapidity. At the end of six months he returned to Scotland—to a felon's death and a martyr's crown.

Almost from his coming the Covenant cause took on new life, and the persecuted people recognized a leader in the minister, who was scarcely more than a boy. The midnight preachings in the hills were more secret, more carefully concealed, but more frequent. The men, worn with suffering, watching and exposure, grew more determined, and grasped their short swords with a grim despair that boded no good to their oppressors. The women, who had grown still and grave with seeing their loved ones shot down and their children murdered, drew the little ones that were left closer to them, and followed the men to the field meetings.

There, above the noises of the night and the souging of the wind, rose the sound of psalms and the voice of the minister.

Standing, as he knew he did, on the border-land between death and life, he stirred his people with marvelous power, sometimes giving them visions of the glory and beauty of that far country that lay just beyond the shame and ignominy and pain of the torture and scaffold; sometimes rebuking or encouraging those who seemed to falter at the entering of the sorrowful way; often stopping to comfort those whose dear ones had already sealed their testimony in blood. From far and near the people came to hear James Renwick. Swift horses bore him from place to place, and the soldiers scoured the country in vain to find him. A price was put upon his head, spies were set to dog his footsteps, and the people were forbidden, on pain of death to give him food, drink, or shelter.

Some of his escapes were so wonderful it seemed as if the angel of the Lord walked beside him and kept his feet.

At one time he was in the cottage of some of his friends when the dragoons rode up. They did not recognize him, and Renwick finally offered to guide the soldiers to the conventicle to be held that night, at the same time promising to put the hand of James Renwick in that of the captain. The dragoon was delighted and slipped some coins into the unknown minister's hand.

He led them through glen and covert until they reached a place where the horses could go no further. Tying them to the trees, he and the soldiers slid down the steep hillside to the hollow, where the Covenanters were gathered. The retreat could not have been found except by one who knew it, for high cliffs and

Another Appreciation of the Aetna.

LUMBERTON, N. C., November 26, 1902

J. D. BUSHALL, Esq., Manager Aetna Life Insurance Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir:—After a careful comparison of policies submitted to me by the Aetna Life, Bankers' Life of New York, Equitable of New York, Northwestern, New York Life and Prudential, I have accepted $10,000 in the Aetna on the 20-payment life plan, with option of 25-year 3 per cent. Gold Bond Contract.

I have been a policy-holder in the Aetna for nearly eight years, and therefore feel somewhat prepared to judge of its merits from actual results. With all due deference to other companies, it affords me great pleasure to say that in my opinion the Aetna cannot be surpassed for plain and liberal contracts, and for just, conservative and economical management. I now have $12,000 in the Aetna. My partner, Mr. W. W. Carlyle, has $16,000 and one of our clerks, Mr. John T. Biggs, has $2,000, nearly all of which was written and delivered by your special agent, Mr. H. T. Spears.

Wishing you and the grand old Aetna continued success, I am,

Yours very truly,

ROBERT D. CALDWELL.

dangerous peaks and moss hags enclosed it on all sides. The congregation saw them, but did not seem at all dismayed or frightened. Seeing a man standing near the desk who looked like Renwick, the captain shouted, "Take Renwick, and slay every man that hinders you!" But as the soldiers turned, behind a great boulder twenty-four guns were leveled at them, and the order came, "Drop your guns or we fire!" They were compelled to yield, and Renwick, taking the captain up to the desk and extending his hand, said, "You paid me to put James Renwick's hand in yours. I do so now, but I return you your money. I am James Renwick."

"If you are James Renwick," exclaimed the astonished dragoon, "I for one will pursue you no longer."

This was but one of his many escapes, and sometimes he seemed almost to court the danger, but his strength was failing, and as he grew frailer and weaker, it became more and more difficult to escape the many snares laid for him.

At last he was taken and brought before his judges. Graham exclaimed, "Is this boy the James Renwick that the whole nation has been so troubled with?" But he did not waver before his accusers, and so amazed them with his unflinching courage that one of them said, "He is the stiffest maintainer of his principles that ever came before us. Others we used always to cause, one time or other, to waver; but him we could never move." His sentence was prepared beforehand, but it did not disturb his peace.

After he was condemned, a wonderful scene took place about his prison door. Lords, judges, gentlemen, the king's advocate, bishop and priests, streamed to his cell, one after another begging him to sue for pardon, so anxious were they to save his life. They failed to move him, and for the priests who urged him to recant he had only one word, "Be-gone!"

Three days after, on the 17th of February, 1688, he came to his execution. The beating of the drums drowned the sound of his voice, as he tried to speak to the people, but those near the gallows heard him say, as he looked up into heaven, "I shall soon be above these clouds; then shall I enjoy thee, and glorify thee, O my Father, without interruption and without intermission forever. Death to me is as a bed to the weary."

The napkin was drawn over his eyes, and James Renwick went to that land where the prisoners rest together, nor hear the voice of the oppressor.

He was the last of the great heroes of the Covenant, and his blood the last required to establish the rights ratified by William of Orange, a year after his death. The sacrifice was not in vain, and he was one of the chief of those who, in the bloody years of persecution in Scotland, proved true.

"Truth forever on the scaffold, wrong forever on the throne,
Yet that scaffold sways the future, and behind the dim unknown,
Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above his own."

Our Little Folks.

CONDUCTED BY MRS. A. J. MCKELWAY.

Children's Letters.

Dear Mrs. McKelway:

I will try to write a letter to the Standard, as I have never written before. I love to read the letters very much. I go to church at Amity. Mr. Hagan is our pastor. I go to school at Progress; Miss Ruth Alexander is my teacher. I like her very much. I study arithmetic, spelling and reading. I will close as this is my first time,

Your little friend,
Charlotte, N. C. Blanche Harkey.

Rowland, N. C., Jan. 10th, 1903.

Dear Presbyterian:

As I dearly love to write letters, I will write you one. We had a delightful time Christmas. Our house was full of company. Old Santa Claus came and brought us lots of nice things. He gave my little sisters, Annie and Eva and myself a big doll apiece. But the Christmas holidays are over and we must go again to school. We go to school at Rowland. Our teachers are Mr. Smith, Mr. Reed and Miss Irene McQueen. I will close.

Your friend,
Belle Bullock.

Graham, N. C., Jan. 1, 1903.

Dear Standard:

My father preaches in the Presbyterian Church. I have four brothers and one sister. My little baby brother is two years old and is so sweet. His name is Marion. If you ask him who is sweet he will say "Little me." We have a black cat. We call her Jet. One day Marion shut her up in the washstand drawer but mother got her out. We had such a nice time Christmas. Our tree was beautiful. I got a great many things on Christmas eve. We had a treat at the Sunday-school. I must close now. Good-bye.

Your little friend,
Age 11. Lillian Murray.

Lumber Bridge, N. C., Jan. 20, 1902.

Dear Standard:

I will write, being I have not in such a while. My mother is sick and I don't go to school much now. I have not went to school any this week. Monday I did not go to school because Uncle Angus was coming and if I went to school I would not see him that day and to-day I did not go to school because it was such a bad day and I am not going to-morrow if it be as bad a day as to-day. I go to school at L. B. and my teacher is Mr. E. D. Easterlin. I like him very much for a teacher. Miss Hattie McAuthor is the assistance teacher. Miss Alice Taylor the music teacher. I will close by asking one question: How old did Adam and Eve live to be?

Yours truly,
Age 10. Hector McLean.

Bessemer City, N. C.,
Jan. 24th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I thought that I would write a few lines for the first time to the Presbyterian Standard. I am going to school now and it will go out in three weeks. I like to read the little boys' and girls' letters which they write to the Standard. I have eight brothers and nine sisters. My school teacher's name is Mr. Lee Bullwinkle of Dallas. I like him very well. He is not very hard on me. Papa was 47 years old. Papa died 28th of October, 1902. My teacher makes me get recitation every two or three weeks. I am 12 years old. I am going to the Castner school house. There are between 20 and 30 scholars going now.

Your friend,
Crown F. Ratchford.

Buie, N. C., Jan. 24, 1903.

Dear Standard:

This is my third letter. I have my Billie goat yet. I am going to school to Miss Kitte Humphrey at Buie, N. C. I love to go to school to her very much.

My church is Philadelphus. Mr. Pace is our pastor. He has moved to Red Springs, N. C., and living there now, four miles from the church. I love him very much. I love to read your valuable paper. We get it once a week. I will close by asking The Little Folks a question: How many times is the word "Coffin" used in the Bible and where is it found? I hope to see my letter in print.

Your little friend,
Age 10. W. H. McBrown.

St. Pauls, N. C., Jan. 25, 1902.

Dear Standard:

I will answer the question asked by John McDowell, Jr., in Our Little Folks column.

"Demonstration" is found in 1 Cor. 2: 4.

I will close by asking the little folks a question: Where is the word "spectacle" found in the Bible?

Willy's New Year Sled.

Willy declared he had wanted a sled for nearly a hundred years; but Willy's mother still said he was not old enough to have one.

Finally Willy wrote a letter about it to Santa Claus, telling him how well he could manage a sled, and asking him to bring one Christmas. He said nothing about this letter to his folks, for he feared they might write to Santa advising him not to bring the sled for at least one year more. "But if he only just gets it here," thought Willy, "I know that they will let me keep it."

Willy had not learned how to make "really writing," but he felt sure Santa Claus would know what was meant by the pencil marks, and for two days he was happy in the thought that he would soon have a sled. Then came Christmas, and more gifts than he could count—but there was no sled, and at the moment when he should have been happy he sat among his gifts crying as if his heart would break.

"Why, Willy!" exclaimed his astonished mother, "what is the matter?"

And then Willy told her about his letter to Santa Claus. "It was done just right," he concluded sorrowfully. "I took one of Papa's envelopes, and I took a stamp off one of his letters, and I put it in the mail-box myself."

"Perhaps it hasn't had time to reach Santa Claus," replied his mother.

Willy brightened up. "Maybe that's it," he said, rubbing the tears from his cheeks, using his handkerchief vigorously, and smiling hopefully. "And if that is it, Mama, he can bring the sled for New Year's, can't he?"

"I think you'd better tell Papa about it, Willy," said his mother, "and ask him whether he thinks Santa Claus would be likely to do that."

When his father came home to dinner, Willy had a talk with him, and was very hopeful when Papa said he believed there had been cases where Santa Claus had brought the gifts on New Year's Day which weren't ready at Christmas.

"Of course," said he, "only very good children have such a special favor, and and they always expected to make some one else happy themselves."

Willy was out of bed bright and early New Year's morning. There, sure enough, by the sitting-room fire stood a beautiful bright red sled with one of his own stockings drawn over the toe of each runner, so that all might know it was intended for him and no one else. There was a letter also, and as he couldn't well wait for his mother to wake up and read it to him, he decided to jump on her bed and kiss her until she opened her eyes. This was the letter:

"Dear Little Willy:—

On the first Day of the New Year every one should try to make someone happy, but this duty is especially binding upon a child who gets a New Year gift, for naturally more is expected of him than of those children who get nothing. Santa Claus."

Willy sat on his mother's bed looking very serious for quite a long time after he had heard this letter. He was trying to think how a little boy could make anyone happy, for he much wished to do as Santa Claus expected him to.

At last the wonderful moment came when he was allowed to take his sled to the hill, just behind his home, where other boys went to play. He had the hill all to himself at first, and his heart beat high when he found he could coast down without falling off or becoming frightened.

"Hello a, Bub! wait a minute!"

Willy was just preparing to start down the second time when he heard this call. He looked up and saw a ragged boy, considerably larger than himself, coming across the hill. He didn't like the looks of the stranger, and decided to coast quickly down out of his way; but a ragged boot placed under one runner made that impossible. "Hold on a jiffy, Governor," the boy said; "I want a ride on that sled!"

"I don't want to hold on," replied Willy, very truthfully, "because I don't want you to ride on my sled!"

"Don't be saucy, little chap!" said the boy. "I can stand you on your head in that snowdrift, and jam you down so hard you can't get out until spring!"

Willy looked at the boy and then at the snowdrift. He was a brave little fellow, and he had been taught to use his reason when inclined to be afraid, and find out for himself if there was really any cause for fear.

"This isn't a very big snowdrift," he said, after a moment. "You couldn't put me down very deep, and I can wiggle like anything. My Mamma can't hold me when I get to wiggling, and she squeezes tighter than that snow can."

The big boy looked at Willy thoughtfully. He was the bully of the village and most boys of his own size usually obeyed him promptly. "What would you do," he said, "if I should jerk the sled-rope out of your hand? I'm bigger than you, and I can do it easy."

"But you wouldn't jerk the rope out of my hand, just because you are the biggest," said Willy confidently. "Brave persons never do things like that. Mama said so."

"I could make you afraid of me," said the big boy, hesitating, as if he were undecided whether to make the attempt or not. Willy's fearlessness had made an impression on him, and he really didn't like to use force on a boy who believed him too brave to "pick on" one smaller than himself. Still, he wanted a few rides on the new sled.

"I should think," he said, "that you'd want to let a fellow ride when he's poor and never had a sled of his own, or any thing else to make him happy."

Willy's heart was touched, instantly.

"Of course you can ride on my 'Jack Frost,'" he said. "You go down, then I will, then you, and we'll keep it up till noon. Will that make you happy?"

"You bet!" replied the big boy.

"Then I'll be doing as Santa Claus wanted me to," said Willy, and he told about the letter that came with the sled; and while the big boy dragged the sled up the hill, after the first ride, a very naughty plan formed in his mind.

"He's an awfully green little kid," he thought, "and I can work it all right, easy."

The two played together a little while, and then the big boy said, "If you really want to please Santa Claus—but I don't suppose you care very much about it, do you?"

"Yes, I do," replied Willy earnestly. "But you wouldn't make anyone happy if it made you feel bad to do it?"

"I would do anything that Santa Claus wanted me to do," said Willy. "Of course I would. You know I would."

"Down where I like," said the big boy, "in the other end of the village, there is a sick little boy, very poor, who never had a ride on a sled in his life. It would do him good if he could have a ride or two on a sled live this!"

"Why didn't Santa Claus bring him a sled, then?" asked Willy.

"He was going to," said the big boy, "but he didn't have but one, and when he got your letter he brought it to you."

"That Willy is a pretty decent sort of chap," Santa Claus said to himself, "and he'll see that the sick boy gets some rides."

"How do you know he said that?" inquired Willy.

"He sent a letter to the sick boy telling him how it was," answered the big boy promptly.

Willy looked perplexed. (Willy had never known boys who told lies.) He had no doubt that it was his duty to share his sled with the sick boy, since he might have owned it had it not been for his own letter to Santa. But it was hard to part with his sled even for a few minutes.

"I suppose I could go with you," Willy began, but the big boy interrupted. "It's too far. You'd get tired. Besides, your mother wouldn't let you."

"How long would you be gone?"

"Oh, about two hours."

"Two hours!" cried Willy.

"Maybe I could get back in an hour and a half by running all the way," said the big boy. "But I'd want to give the poor little fellow at least two good rides."

"And you'd be very careful not to scratch the paint off?"

"Careful as if 'twas made of gold," the big boy answered him. "The little fellow is so thin he couldn't hurt it any—why, he's nothing but skin and bones"

"You may take it," said Willy. "Do you know, I think you are an awful nice boy to want to make the poor sick boy happy! I expect God will like you for that. You can keep the sled two hours."

The big boy coasted down the hill, and was out of sight by the time Willy had walked to the foot of it. He felt very lonely, as he went home without his precious sled, but he comforted himself with the thought that he'd tried to make some one happy, as Santa Claus wished.

But when he told his mother about it, she said, "My little son, you should not have lent your sled without coming home to ask me, though we'll hope it will turn out all right."

"In two hours what time will it be?" asked Willy.

"Just twelve o'clock."

Twelve o'clock came, bringing Papa, but no sled.

"You'll never see it again, I'm afraid," said Willy's father, when he had heard the story.

"Papa," protested Willy, earnestly, "he said that he would bring it back, and he is a good boy."

"What makes you think he is a good boy?" asked his father.

"Because he wanted the sled just to give a poor sick boy a ride," said Willy. "He didn't ask to take it himself."

But when night and bed-time came, and still the sled had not been returned, Willy looked very sober.

"I'm lonesome for my sled," he told his mother, "but I know he'll bring it back as quick as he can. Maybe the sick boy couldn't go out for the ride until pretty near supper-time."

Quite early in the morning there came a ring at the doorbell, and Willy flew to answer it.

"Oh, Boy! Boy!" he cried out joyfully, "I knew that you'd bring back my sled! I knew you were a good boy!"

"That's what made me bring it back," replied the boy, in a low voice. "If you hadn't said I was good and brave, I shouldn't have brought it back."

"Oh, yes, you would. Did the poor sick boy have a nice ride?"

"There wasn't any sick boy," said the big boy, turning very red. "I rode on it myself, but I didn't have a good time."

Then without another word the big boy turned and ran swiftly down the street, leaving a very puzzled little fellow standing in the doorway beside his dear red sled.—Effie W. Merriman, in Our Little Folks.

Clippings.

Ten Chinese henpecked husbands agreed to form themselves into a society for resisting the oppression of their wives. At the first meeting they were sitting talking over their pipes, when suddenly the ten wives, who had got wind of the movement, appeared on the scene.

There was a general stampede, and nine of the husbands incontinently bolted through another door, only one remaining unmoved to face the music. The ladies merely smiled contemptuously at the success of their raid and went away.

The nine husbands then all agreed that the bold tenth man who had not run away should be at once appointed their president: but on coming to offer him the post they found that he had died of fright!—From Giles's China and the Chinese (Macmillan).

A correspondent writes to the Westminster Gazette: "An old gentleman of pronounced religious views—a friend of our family in Scotland—wished to have cut over the door of a new house the text 'My house shall be called a House of Prayer.' He left the workmen to carry out his wishes during his absence, and on his return his horror was great to find the quotation completed, 'But ye have made it a den of thieves.' 'We had a wee thing mair room, ye see, so we just pit in the end o' the verse,' was the explanation given by the Bible-loving Scot."

Lord Cockburn, after a long stroll, sat down on a hillside beside a shepherd, and observed that the sheep selected the coldest situation for lying down.

"Mac," said he, "I think if I were a sheep I should certainly have preferred the other side of that hill."

The shepherd answered, 'Ah, my lord; but if ye had been a sheep ye would have had mair sense.'

Lord Cockburn was never tired of relating the story and turning the laugh on himself.—Tid Bits.

The South's Great Shoe Firm.

It is always gratifying to see evidences of the growth of the Southern States and their recuperation from the ravages of war.

Nothing gives better evidence of returning prosperity than the successful development of manufacturing and the extension of trade. In Lynchburg, Va., there is a firm, the Craddock—Terry Company, which does the largest business of any shoe firm in the United States, catering exclusively for Southern trade.

The business of this firm has grown from a little over three hundred thousand dollars in 1889 to nearly two millions of dollars in 1902. They are makers of remarkably cheap ladies shoes, described in their advertisement in this paper. But while their prices are low, they make quality their watchword and in this fact lies the secret of their wonderful success. The name Craddock—Terry is widely recognized as a guarantee of excellence in ladies shoes. The South is to be congratulated upon the possession of a firm doing such an immense business and commanding the confidence of the public everywhere.

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL

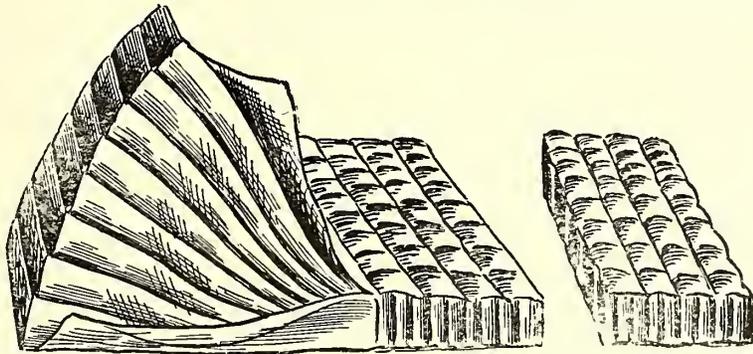

POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

Event and Comment.

Rev. Alexander G. Wilson, of Nebraska, has accepted a professor's chair at Omaha Theological Seminary.

There are seventeen Protestant and twenty-two Catholic Churches in Manila and the Catholics have been there as many centuries as the Protestants have been years.

We regret to learn that since the death of his devoted wife, our beloved and honored Dr. Shearer, seems to grow more feeble. His has been a useful life. May its years of usefulness be yet prolonged.

A World's Sunday-school Convention will be held in Jerusalem in 1904. New York is to-day the city of the largest Jewish population in the world. We give these facts to our Latter-Day Judaizers to digest.

A bill is pending in the New York Legislature legalizing Sunday golf, baseball and football games. Well-bred people do not play games on Sunday, and we do not see why the ill-bred should have the protection of special legislation.

It gets to be truer every year of the life of the world that the educated man is the leader in every department. It is the half-educated man who is passed, by the man who lacked his opportunities but excelled in the use of the materials at hand.

A Cathedral of the Greek Church, costing a million and a half dollars is to be erected in Cleveland, the Russian crown contributing the most of it. Meanwhile the American people are doing what they can to save the Czar's Finnish subjects from starvation.

Along with commercial supremacy for the United States is coming educational supremacy. Oxford and Cambridge Universities are feeling the pinchings of poverty, while our great universities have millions bestowed upon them for scientific and philosophical research.

Our friends in other States may either excuse the amount of space given just now to the anti-saloon fight in North Carolina, or profit by the lesson for their own localities, just as they please. We are in the battle to win, and are using every ounce of influence that we can. The Legislature adjourns in a few weeks.

It is worthy of note that George E. McNeill, the New England labor leader, will be one of the main speakers at the meeting of the New England Sabbath Protection League. When organized labor takes up the fight for the Sabbath, the cause will be won. "Six days shalt thou labor," also means, Six days only needest thou labor.

South America is almost entirely under the domination of the Catholic Church. Brazil is the only country where the circulation of the Bible is at all encouraged by the government, while in Peru and Ecuador the public exercise of any other religion than the Roman Catholic is forbidden. So much for Catholic toleration.

The Congregationalist continues to complain of Un-Presbyterian methods. It speaks of "the folly of churches harboring as their pastors men who refuse to identify themselves with the regular Congregational ministry, to submit their credentials to councils or at least to associations, and to give opportunity for the inspection and approval of their former record." But when a church is independent, what can one do but rail at its folly?

We say again what we have been saying for five years, that the Southern Presbyterian Church and the Reformed (Dutch) Church ought to get together. The Southern Church needs nationalization and the Reformed needs mission territory and each can supply what the other lacks. And both are "so sound that they are tight."

After all the pow-wow with Rome last fall, the Friar problem in the Philippines remains in statu quo, which means, generally, in a mighty bad fix. Meantime the Independent Catholic Church continues to grow, and the Friars are now able to return to their former parishes—when accompanied by a strong guard of American soldiers.

Dr. Gunsaulus, of Chicago, while preaching in his church the other Sunday suspected that the building was on fire and so told his audience that he had a pain in his leg and asked them to leave quietly. They did and a possible panic was averted. And now they are discussing whether Dr. Gunsaulus had a right to lie under the circumstances.

The Synods of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Germany bewail the decay of religion among the university teachers. The Christian religion secures its sanction from its fundamental facts. The questioning of those facts, which has been the chief business of theological Germany for a half-century, has necessarily resulted in the loosening of the hold of that religion. But the fact remains that the facts remain in spite of the questioning.

Dr. Donald, of Trinity Church, Boston, seems to be a worthy successor of Phillips Brooks. In a recent address to theological students he dwelt on two simple thoughts "so impressively that they seemed like a new revelation," and these thoughts were, the necessity of knowing God at first hand, and of belief in conversion. He referred to the first as the great power of Phillips Brooks' life and the second as the success of Dr. Gordon, his neighbor. Much of the infidelity of our day is occupied with explaining away the fact of conversion.

There was a notable conference in New York City the other day, of Episcopal, Methodist and Presbyterian representation, to discuss the best way of meeting the divorce evil. In North Carolina a bill offered to allow the guilty party, in the case of divorce for abandonment, to remarry, was met by a bill, which has passed one branch of the Legislature, forbidding divorce on the ground of abandonment. The Supreme Court of the United States declines to recognize the validity of the South Dakota divorce, granted without bona fide residence, and several adulterers who thought their adultery legalized are in a state of mind.

Lyman Abbott has come in for a good deal of sharp criticism lately. Dr. Burrell, of the Reformed Church, said: "If there is such a thing as infidelity, Lyman Abbott stand for it." The Evangelical Messenger speaks of his "spiritual quackery." We think the real trouble is that Dr. Abbott's inclination to accept the "results" of the Higher Criticism has far out-run his ability to make investigation for himself. He is a better preacher and writer than he is a scholar. It is only fair to add his recent statement of belief in reply to these attacks:

"My faith in God as the All Father, in Jesus Christ as the Son of God and the Redeemer of the world, in the Bible as the record of the revelation of God, in human experience culminating in the life and teachings of Jesus Christ as rendered in the four gospels, and in the progress of the human race under the guidance and inspiration of God toward that universal brotherhood which is the culmination of all history, has been often repeated by me in sermon, article and volume."

The Woman That Was A Sinner.

There is no equal to the Scripture story, in its pathos, the consciousness of guilt, the recognition of purity, repentance, forgiveness.

The same Saviour reveals his compassion to-day toward the same kind of women as she was who is mis-called "The Magdalene." And his Spirit makes the story of his love effective to-day in winning much love from the much forgiven. This was in brief the fact that Mr. Crittenton and Mrs. Barrett succeeded in impressing upon the people of this city during the last few weeks. We have seen the salvation of which the Bible tells, was their message, and the people have responded right willingly in an effort to help these that are sinners, it is true, but also sinned against.

Here is one place where, emphatically and distinctly, the Church of Christ takes infinitely higher ground than any worldly society. Society absolutely and forever closes its door upon the unfortunates who have stepped from the path of virtue. But as long as the Church manifests the spirit of Jesus rather than that of Simon, the Pharisee, it will never close its door of hope upon them. The difficult thing has been the knowing how to reach them and so to save.

We believe that Mr. Crittenton has solved the problem, so far as the right plan is concerned. Years ago we had the pleasure of visiting the Florence Mission in New York City. It was kept open day and night for any unfortunate, asking for succor. There were nightly meetings conducted in the little chapel looking out upon the street. Hundreds of women have been reclaimed from lives of sin at this mission.

But the success of the work has been so marked that a circle of these Florence Crittenton Homes has been established. And one is so connected with the other that they supplement the work of each other. It is often best that those who have sought the home in one city, should be sent to one in another. There is sometimes room in one when another is full. And so, by these homes, and the circles of helpers that are established even where no home is built, a wide area of territory can be covered. It is thus one of the best managed as well as one of the most beneficent of charities.

We could wish that it could be even more wide-spread than it is. The evil is wide-spread enough. We suggest that in every town where these unfortunates are to be found, the minister go with some motherly, Christian woman, and speak a word of hope and helpfulness, in the name of Him who talked with the woman at the well of Sychar. There are many obstacles in the way of beginning a better life, a false sense of honor that makes it a shame for a woman of this class to become anything else than she is, the dread of meeting the world once more, the influence of bad men, oftentimes; the hopelessness of making a livelihood again. But it would be a mistake to suppose that many of them do not loathe their life, do not know its probable and bitter ending, and do not long for the home that was left and the innocence that was once theirs. If they can be gotten away from their surroundings, and into the companionship of Christian women, the home provides against many of the difficulties in the way of a return to a better life. It is an eloquent fact that out of the hundreds of fallen women that have been brought, even for a little while, under the refining and Christianizing influences of the Florence Crittenton Homes, seventy-five in every hundred, have forsaken the old life forever.

Of course there is something for the law to do also, even the imperfect law that we have inherited from a lax age of English history. And it is often the case that in the effort to extirpate the evil, offenders against the law may be sent to these homes instead of to jail and there it may be learned whether there is hope of reclamation, or whether they are incorrigible. It is said that the city of Atlanta has saved thousands of dollars that would have been spent in the costs of the courts and the expense of keeping prisoners in jail, by the alternative of the Florence Crittenton Home.

More than this, it is often possible to save for lives of usefulness the little children, oftentimes born of innocence betrayed. For the fact of motherhood is an evidence of comparative innocence. Sometimes it is the very love for the child of shame that is the mother's salvation. We commend this much neglected cause to those everywhere who count themselves the ministry of reconciliation.

It need hardly be added here, what has so often been pointed out, that the saloon is the partner and advocate of the house of shame, and that there can be no effective reformation of the social evil so long as the saloon remains. Men who make beasts of themselves with drink will stoop to bestiality in other directions. The degradation of intoxication destroys respect for all purity in man and woman. The debauchee is impartial in his devotion to drunkenness and lust. Wine and women, in the bad sense of both terms, have been coupled together through the centuries.

He who strikes a blow at the saloon is striking for the purity of the home in more than one way, and he who advocates the saloon is an enemy of decency in more than one sense.

We commend to President Lackey, of the A Sneer and Its Answer. North Carolina Liquor Dealers' Association and Chairman S. Otho Wilson, of the Distillers' Association, our local contemporary, the Charlotte Observer, for honorary membership in both organizations on account of faithful services rendered.

In the midst of the fight in North Carolina, for sobriety and decency, for the school and the Church and the home, for the poor drunkard that needs protection from his own temptation, for the boy who will soon be tempted into sin, the Observer comments thus:

By a large majority—15 to 4—the House committee of the Legislature on propositions and grievances reports favorably the Aycock-Simmons-Watts anti-liquor bill. This is the first knockout for the Morally Stunted. The bill will doubtless pass, and then will come up the London bill, which in effect provides for State prohibition. This will not have such smooth sailing and it is likely that it will be materially modified before it becomes a law, but the Pure in Heart are certainly giving the Morally Stunted a run for their money about now. It would be funny if they should get a law under which they couldn't get any sow-paw themselves.

Now this wholesale charge of hypocrisy should not be passed by. Hypocrisy is the homage which vice renders to virtue. There is something, therefore, that is worse than hypocrisy, namely, shamelessness.

But who are the people thus virtually accused of undue fondness for drink? We never heard that Governor Aycock or Senator Simmons had that reproach cast against their character. It could hardly be true of the representatives of the great religious bodies of North Carolina. There are some saloon politicians in the General Assembly who will be branded for what they are, before long. But they are not voting for the bills now before the house. We think we might say for such men as Henry A. Page, A. M. Scales, Superintendent Joyner, C. W. Tillett, J. W. Bailey, that they would not regard it as an unspeakable calamity if they should be unable "to get any sow-paw for themselves." We take it that there are thousands of men, who may or may not practice total abstinence themselves, who yet would cheerfully surrender all personal tastes, for the sake of those who, with the saloon and distillery-groggery abounding, are and are to be the victims of that curse and the slaves of that tyrant, strong drink.

To intimate that these men are not sincere in their opposition to the liquor-traffic is to raise the question of one's own sincerity.

We deem it proper to reply also to the argument that the London Bill in effect provides for State Prohibition. We serve notice now, on the "Dealers," their attorneys, and editorial allies, that any temperance legislation in North Carolina means the prohibition of the saloon, finally. But it is only in that sense that the London Bill provides for prohibition. And we call the attention of the Prohibitionists, to the confession of their quondam ally. The Observer is what one might call a dispensary-prohibitionist. It does not hate prohibition less, but the dispensary more.

Contrary to the impression that has been made by the three classes aforesaid, the London Bill does not even aim at immediate prohibition. It differs from the Watts Bill in the particulars of allowing a community to vote for a dispensary with the same liberty with which it now votes for a saloon. There is no one outside of an idiot asylum that really believes the saloon to be an improvement on the dispensary. Furthermore, as in the case of Fayetteville and Monroe in this State the dispensary has rendered prohibition possible and actual.

Another provision of the London Bill is the prohibition of the importation of liquor into prohibited territory. It always was an outrage that the rights of a community could not be made secure by law, that it was able to forbid its own citizens, but was unable to forbid outside citizens from selling liquor within its bounds. The London Bill makes the place of delivery the place of sale. And finally, the London Bill embodies the feature of the Mississippi law, under which that progressive Southern State has been thriving for more than a decade. It requires the saloon-keeper to show that the community wants the bar-room, instead of requiring the decent element to prove that the community does not want it. It makes the saloon-keeper get up a petition, with a majority of the names of the voters on it, before he can be granted license. Mississippi makes him publish the names in a paper for a month. But the bill says this need not be done, when the saloon has been voted in, within two years. It gives the saloon-keeper the option of calling an election every two years on the question.

If that really means absolute and immediate prohibition in North Carolina, it means also that the sentiment against the saloon is already so strong that a majority of the voters everywhere are unwilling to petition for it, or that in an election, in which the saloon would assume the offensive and force the issue, it would be voted out. If these things are already true of the Old North State, then it will be a violation of the will of the people for the London Bill not to pass.

It ought to pass. It ought to become a law, that the saloon shall prove its right to existence by an appeal to the people, or ought to be done to death.

The press claims to be the great moulder of public sentiment. It is often accused of being a follower rather than a guide. In one view, the great newspaper is the one that sees and speaks the truth so clearly that its leadership is followed without question. In the other view, the wishes and hopes and aspirations of the people are seen so clearly, that with adequate expression given to them, the people turn with gratitude to their interpreter. If the judgment of enlightened and progressive newspapers is any criterion, then the saloon, as an institution, is doomed. Its sentence has been pronounced and it is only awaiting the day of execution.

The New York Journal, which with all its "yellowism," is a paper that appeals to a large class of people and is ably edited, has been a conspicuous and notable adversary of the saloon. The Richmond Times, now the Times-Dispatch, having recently absorbed its rival, and probably the best paper published in the South, has been bold in its denunciation of the saloon, and in its advocacy of some substitute that will at least alleviate the intolerable conditions that make the environment of the saloon. We have noticed before the splendid work done during several months by the Raleigh News and Observer, in its uncompromising advocacy of anti-saloon legislation. Now whether we take the complimentary or the uncomplimentary view of the case that these papers, and a host of others, are really leading the people or have merely put themselves in the front of the onward resistless march of the people, the conclusion is the same, that the people are advancing.

We have been especially pleased to see the attitude of most of the county papers in this State. And even the Observer's sneer intimates the prospect of victory for the forces of righteousness.

Review of Contemporaries.

The American Christian College.

The first written constitution in the world was drawn up by a graduate of Cambridge University, Elder William Brewster, on board the Mayflower. Of the first six hundred settlers in Massachusetts, one in thirty was a graduate of the English University. Harvard College was founded when there were fewer than four thousand settlers in the colony. Sixty years later the charter of Yale College stated its purpose to be "the training of youth for public service in the church and civil State." During the Eighteenth Century, twenty-nine per cent. of Harvard graduates and forty per cent. of Yale graduates entered the ministry. In 1743, Samuel Adams discussed in a thesis for the Master's Degree the question, "Whether it be Lawful to Resist the Supreme Magistrate if the Commonwealth can not be otherwise Preserved." Thomas Jefferson attributed the bent of his life to the presence of a certain professor in the faculty of William and Mary College. Dartmouth trained Daniel Webster, Williams gave us the American Board, an Indian college the Young Men's Christian Association, and Oberlin a tremendous religious impulse. The American college has been the source and the conservator of the best things in American life. Beneath the surface and in spite of the rising flood of commercialism and materialism it has kept American life splendidly, deeply, savingly idealistic, altruistic, religious.

But the influence of a college is local. Its students do not come from great distances, and, when they are graduated, not many of them go out into new regions. Seventy-one per cent. of all college students in this country attend colleges within their own home States. The eleven famous colleges of Massachusetts find fifty-four per cent. of their students within that small State. Rhode Island supplies fifty-nine per cent of the students in Brown University. In the Middle and Western States these proportions are much larger, being eighty-five per cent. for Ohio, and ninety-three per cent. for South Dakota.

About the same proportion of college graduates remain near their colleges after graduation. This means that a vast portion of our country is not, as yet, much affected by college influences.

The tier of States lying along the west bank of the Mississippi river are comparatively old, well settled and rich. West of these States lies sixty-one per cent. of the population. It is a region of vast mineral and agricultural resources. Its population is increasing more rapidly than that of any other part of the country. Some of the most serious problems of national life must soon be solved there.

This new West needs Christian colleges as the East needed them two hundred years ago. The few already established are weak and struggling, without equipment and without money. The people who live there are poor with but few exceptions. The mines, railroads, cattle and mortgages are owned by Eastern men, and the profits, if given away, go to Eastern institutions. This is a situation full of injustice and danger. Any man whose money has been made in the West is under sacred obligation to give there. An ounce of the prevention of the disease of ignorance and vice is worth far more than the pound of cure in the shape of delayed benevolence. Thousands now will do what millions can not do by and by.

The Presbyterian Church has boasted through a hundred years that she is a college building church, but it has been nearly a hundred years since that proud boast was true. While giving nobly to other causes, she has allowed Methodists, Baptists, and Congregationalists to outstrip her by far in this. The statistics recently published by Dr. Ray, of the Board of Aid for Colleges, are a startling indictment of our church for criminal negligence with regard to her colleges. They show that in regard to the number of institutions, property, productive endowment, annual income and benefactions, the Presbyterian Church is far behind the Methodist, Baptist, and Congregational bodies. We are chiefly concerned with the problem as it appears in the West, for it is there that both the need and the opportunity are. In that region the Methodists and Baptists have been very active, the Congregationalists very wise, the Presbyterians—not the workers on the field, but the givers in the East—very much asleep. As a result we are losing daily in power and influence. Our seminaries are becoming empty, and our mission boards calling in vain for volunteers.

It is from the small college, in recent years more and more from the Western college, that we get our candidates for the ministry and the mission field. With the growth in members and in wealth the Eastern college has lost something of the earlier spirit of consecration. Yale and Harvard no longer send twenty-five or forty per cent. of their graduates into the ministry. Princeton has but few more of her sons in the pulpit than has Washington and Jefferson, while in proportion to the number of graduates sent out, Wooster, Park, Parsons, Bellevue, and Huron surpass them all. Neither on grounds of patriotism or self interest can the Church afford longer to neglect her colleges, especially those in the newer West.—N. Y. Observer.

We are profoundly in sympathy with the much needed reform inaugurated by Senators Hale and Burrows. They have each registered a kick against any dinner which takes more than three hours to devour or more than twenty-four hours to digest. Let the good work go on. But it will not do to come to too sudden a stop. To throw on the brakes suddenly will wreck a train as surely as to let it run wild. But why not compromise upon six courses and an entree instead of say, thirteen changes? Little by little the senators may get down to a ten cent lunch handed in by a boy in a paper box. Senator Hale himself does not recommend any more Draconian reduction than an eight course dinner to be served by a butler inside an hour; but we believe he could safely take in a reef or two beyond that. The menu suggested by Senator Hale consists of oysters, soup, entree, roast, game, a vegetable, salad and an ice. That is not so bad. If the senator will add a little coffee, of the right sort, and guarantee the prompt and certain payment of the bill, we will accept his proposition and not press the matter any further. But it is evident something must be done pretty soon—or we shall be short a senator.—The Interior.

Slowly but surely our "Friends," the Quakers, are retreating from their belief that what is subject to rule cannot be of the Spirit. It was a strangely illogical position,—something as if one should maintain that the infinite perfections of a flower were not of God but only the motley, incongruous colors of a kaleidoscope; not the majestic sweet of great constellations but only the sudden plunge and flare of some vanishing meteor. They have begun to weary of their self-annointed prophets, and their recent assembly took the first steps toward the foundation of a training school for their young preachers. They are ready to believe with Paul that "attention to reading" will not retard but may promote Timothy's spiritual development. They have also found in the five-year meeting that Roberts' Rules of Order are a good deal better than everybody's impulsive confusion. Even their singing has come to be reduced to the restraints of time and harmony; and it is possible that this reconciliation of piety with good sense may arrest the threatened dissolution of the body. But there is a lesson for all disciples in this collapse of spirituality allied with eccentricity. The hope of the church must be not in the natural by itself, nor in the supernatural isolated and alone, but in the supernatural animating and making effective the natural as the divine life was incarnate in the humanity of Jesus. To banish either element is to disfigure the gospel.—The Interior.

Now that Mr. Reed Smoot, the Mormon apostle, has been elected United States senator with all due forms of law by the indefeasible authority of a sovereign state, it is the deliberate judgment of The Interior that an attempt to have him denied his seat at Washington would be thoroughly unwise. It is much against such a campaign that it would certainly be useless; it is more that it would stultify any church or Christian organization that undertook it. There are no charges of immorality or law-breaking to be alleged against him,—the Mormons were clever enough this time to choose a candidate invulnerable on that score,—and neither his religious connections nor his beliefs afford a tenable ground for excluding him from office under the system of government which we cherish. If Mr. Smoot's relationships prevent him from being a loyal official in the political senses of which alone the Senate is able to take cognizance, we shall have to wait until some overt act of his demonstrates his disloyalty. Allowing him to take his seat now without protest cannot bar future action against him if his official career gives reason for it, and it is better policy at present to let Mr. Smoot unreel several coils more of the rope.—Interior.

The grand jury assigned to investigate the coal famine in Chicago, through returning a big load of indictments for conspiracy in restraint of trade, expressed the opinion that these conspiracies were not the cause of the extravagant prices of fuel. "The normal law of supply and demand" was adequate explanation, we were told, for the vaulting and soaring of coal market quotations, and therewith that phase of the subject was rather too complacently dismissed. What the jury declared may be true enough, but for the sake at least of impressing public opinion at an impressionable moment, the jurors ought to have added that the law of supply and demand is no sacred sanctuary for the criminality of a selfish heart. Whoever, because scarcity allows him, charges upon a necessity of life in his possession a profit that his neighbor cannot pay without depriving self and family of other needed comforts, is a thief, and the condition of the market is no palliation of the act. This is a principle of ethics that blankets over several acres of the field of economics.—Interior.

Religious journalism takes the place of the personal messenger. Luke, the beloved physician, greets the church in Laodicea through its columns. Our interests are one. The Christian who cuts himself off from his brethren is a schismatic, however orthodox he may be in theology. The great apostle never lost interest in the Church at large. Through the bars of his prison he listened for the slightest intelligence. The cause had embodied itself in the organization. Selfishness and exclusiveness are twin brothers. When a Christian has no interest in the Church beyond his own people, he has mistaken the name for the spirit. When one is despondent and discouraged it is refreshing to know that it rains somewhere. The news of a revival often incites one on to more faithful work. The age of a contentious Church journalism has passed. Discussion is ever legitimate. It stirs the waters and keeps them alive, but the voice of God is in the fire and not the thorns. Every intelligent Christian must be a reader of some Church paper. He may be intelligent on much else, but there is a kind of knowledge that comes through no other channel.—Presbyterian Journal.

■ A revived church means not only holier living and more earnest efforts to reach the unsaved, but more prayer, and greater confidence in prayer. A revival brings Christians on their knees, and leads to importunate beseeching of the Throne of Grace. A quickened spiritual life comes in answer to prayer, and equally leads to importunate praying. The revived believer seeks not only blessing for himself, a fuller experience of divine mercy and grace in his own soul; but he pleads as earnestly and perhaps even more confidently for blessings on others. His heart goes out toward those about him unappreciative of spiritual blessings, and his remembering them in his prayers not only leads to expectation that God will hear and answer, but to watchful solicitude that no opportunity be lost to speaking the word in season and exert the helpful influence which may win a soul for Christ. If the special meetings of prayer, so generally held during the past month, have no other effect than to revive in Christians a sense of the privilege and power of prayer, they will have yielded blessed and abiding results.—Christian Intelligencer.

The Religious Telescope quotes Rabbi Hirsch, of Chicago, a Jew noted for his scholarship and patriotism, as speaking out in these brave and uncompromising words in behalf of the proper observance of the Sabbath: "There has been much loose talk in this country lately about the tyranny of the Sabbath laws. I am not here to defend the blue laws of New England, but I can say that the sound sense behind those narrow and bigoted laws has preserved the manhood of the people. The Sabbath sentiment has thrown around the American workman the rampart of protection. It has given him what no other laboring man on earth has—the feeling that one day out of seven he is a free man, free from the shackles of slavery." America will be recreant to her inheritance, and the laboring man will be a slave, if we let go our Christian Sabbath, so long the glory of our land and the palladium of our liberties.—The Presbyterian.

Book Notices.

The February number of The American Boy is before us. It is rich in illustration, story and anecdote and full of practical and helpful hints for American boys. The friends of this unique periodical will be pleased to know that it has passed the 100,000 mark in circulation—truly a great achievement. A full page illustration of an ice boat going at full speed adorns the front cover. It is an inspiring picture. The seventh installment of the life of Napoleon Bonaparte, written by the editor of The American Boy, for boys, appears in this issue. In March will start the last serial story written by the late George A. Henty, the best-known writer for boys in the world. The Sprague Publishing Company, Detroit, Mich. $1.00 a year.

The Outlook's Magazine Number for February has (besides its usual strong news and editorial departments, fiction, poems and a long installment of "A Fight for the City" (the story of Mr. Jerome's campaign against Tammany, told by his private secretary, Mr. Alfred Hodder), an illustrated article by Booker Washington, called "Two Generations under Freedom;" an installment of ex-Secretary Long's "The New American Navy" with pictures from photographs taken for this express purpose; an attractive article on "The Pines" (pictures and text by Mr. J. Horace McFarland): half a dozen large portraits of notable men of the month, with brief sketches; Mr. Justin McCarthy's article on Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman (with portraits), and two or three other articles notable for their picturesque and original illustration.

The March Delineator presents an unusually excellent collection of literary features and in inviting display of the fashions for spring. In the Social Life of the Army and Navy, Waldon Fawcett writes of the social pleasures of the two arms of the national defence, afloat and ashore. In fiction two excellent short stories are conspicuous: The Wreck of the Night Express, an exciting railroad story by Francis Lynde, with illustrations by Marchand; and A Competent Spinster, a delightful tale of the deeds of a strenuous girl, written by Jeanie Drake and illustrated by A. I. Keller. The love story Thyra Varick, drawing to a close, yet increases in interest. A quaint Philadelphia house is the subject of the article in the Homes of the Past and Present series. In the Miladi papers Miss Clara E. Laughlin writes entertainingly of woman's relations to the hand-made and the product of the factory. Mrs. Birney's article on fear, anxiety and grief in children is of special interest to parents, and the sewing lesson will prove of benefit to the children, for whom there are the usual stories and pastimes. The social, fancy-work and household departments are up to the standard.

Alone With God.

The late George Mueller, who conducted great orphanages containing hundreds of children by faith alone, and who received nearly a million dollars in answer to prayer, told how he found out the will of God as follows:

1.—I seek at the beginning to get my heart into such a state that it has no will of its own in regard to a given matter.

2.—Having done this, I do not leave the result to feeling or simple impression. If I do so, I make myself liable to great delusions.

3.—I seek the will of the Spirit of God through, or in connection with, the Bible.

The Spirit and the Word must be combined. If I look to the Spirit alone without the Word, I lay myself open to great delusions also. If the Holy Ghost guides us at all, He will do it according to the Scriptures and never contrary to them.

4.—Next I take into account providential circumstances. These often plainly indicate God's will in connection with his Word and Spirit.

5.—I ask God in prayer to reveal his will to me aright.

6.—Thus, through prayer to God, the study of the Word, and reflection, I come to a deliberate judgment according to the best of my ability and knowledge.

Grateful for Discipline.

A good man said to his wife, who was complaining that she was tried beyond bearing by some persons with whom she had relations in her daily life: "My dear, you are not taking the right view of this matter. You are forgetting that these people are giving you a great deal of help in developing the finer qualities of your character. You are sweeter, more self-restrained and nobler through the exercise of tact, tenderness and unselfishness to them. You ought to thank God that He has given you just this discipline."—Margaret E. Sangster.

Many and many of these men whom we see plodding on in their dusty ways are travelling with visions in their souls. Nobody knows it but themselves and God. Once, years ago, they saw a light. They knew, if only for a moment, what companionships, what attainments, they were made for. That light has never faded. It is the soul of good things which they are doing in the world to-day. It makes them sure when other men think their faith is gone. It will be with them till the end, until they come to all its prophecies.—Phillips Brooks.

There is yet a harder and higher heroism—to live well in the quiet routine of life; to fill a little space because God wills it; to go on cheerfully with a petty round of little duties, little occasions; to accept uncomplainingly a low position; to smile for the joys of others when the heart is aching; to banish all ambition, all pride and all restlessness in a single regard for our Saviour's work. He who does this for a lifetime is a greater hero than he who for one hour storms a breach or for one day rushes undaunted in the flaming front of shot and shell. His works will follow him. He may not be a hero to the world, but he is one of God's heroes; and, though the builders of Nineveh and Babylon be forgotten and unknown, his memory shall live and be blessed.—Dean Farrar.

Bear in mind that your happiness or your misery is very much of your own making. You cannot create spiritual sunlight any more than you can create the morning star; but you can put your soul where Christ is shining. Keep a clean conscience. Keep a good stock of God's promises within reach. Keep a nightingale of hope in your soul that can sing away the dark hours when they do come.—T. L. Cuyler.

Training in Giving.

Giving is living; it is a law of growth and order. It prevails in the physical universe, and in the social world is the open sesame which is establishing universal reciprocity and brotherhood. In giving, man's capacity for receiving and being enlarges. The miser's greatest sin is against himself. Avarice atrophies, but generosity is twice blessed. Happiness, activity, selfhood, and purpose are bound up in giving—giving freely.

As a lamentable result of failing to preach the scriptural doctrine of the tithe, it has been computed that while the Church owns one-fifth of the wealth of the country, one sixteenth per cent is given for evangelizing the heathen world.

O, let us train our young people into exact, business-like methods of caring for the kingdom! Christianity needs the youth, with their boundless faith and hope and their fiery enthusiasm. In training the youth into scriptural habits of giving we are teaching them that they are called to the service of a living Christ. If we urge the earnest habits of giving, our youth shall belong to a knighthood which shall never perish, and as incarnations of the King shall press the battle for righteousness to the end of the earth and hold the citadels of truth.—Dr. Charles E. Locke.

African Christians.

In regard to the African Christians Mr. H. M. Stanley has but lately made these ringing statements:

"I take this powerful body of native Christians in the heart of Africa—who prefer exile for the sake of their faith to serving a monarch indifferent or hostile to their faith—as more substantial evidence of the work of Mackay than any number of imposing structures clustered together and called a mission station would be. These native Africans have endured the most deadly persecutions: the stake and the fire, the cord and the club, the sharp knife and the rifle bullet, have all been tried to cause them to reject the teachings they have absorbed. Staunch in their beliefs, firm in their convictions, they have held together stoutly and resolutely, and Mackay and Ashe may point to these with a righteous pride, as the results of their labors, to the good, kindly people at home who trusted in them."

Bishop Phillips Brooks was asked, "Suppose, Dr. Brooks, you were called to take charge of a parish burdened with debt, needing many things for the development of its own work, and almost in despair of ever getting the best of its difficulties, what would you do first to remedy the situation?" Quick as a flash came the reply, "The first thing I would do would be to ask that congregation to make an offering for foreign missions."

Does that seem strange to you? It is both good philosophy and good theology. It is both common sense and Bible truth. It is belittling, narrowing, and weakening to keep the people's attention on the small things immediately around them. It is elevating and inspiring to keep their eyes and their hearts on the great things of the kingdom of God. The people who are heartily interested in missions in China and Africa will find it easy to take care of the small things at home.—Central Presbyterian.

A Canadian friend of missions writes, noting the abundant indications of great ingatherings in all the world, especially in China, and also noting how slow Christians are to rise up to the opportunity: "Our people are much in the position of a farmer, who, having invested in good land, good seed, good plows and good harrows, and having at last in sight a good crop, called a halt, saying, 'I cannot afford wagons to bring in the crop.'"—Frank S. Dobbins.

Christian Self-Control.

I. Cor. 8: 4-13. Feb. 15, 1903.

Self-mastery from Christian motives is always a part of true piety. A person who allows his natural appetites and passions to dominate his mind and conduct, gives little evidence of indwelling Divine grace or of Christian character. But it is possible to put some check upon vicious inclinations and indulgences from a regard for self interest or public opinion. To render self-control Christian, it must be practised, from love to Christ and a desire to do His will and to promote His Kingdom. In Corinth, with a church gathered from among the heathen and surrounded by many hurtful influences, there were many temptations to idolatry, vice and sinful indulgences. Paul's teachings as to self-control from Christian motives were needed by them and may be equally profitable to ourselves. From the passage now studied, three topics may be considered:

I. Personal Knowledge of God Destroys Idols.—If we know Jehovah as revealed in His word then idols as objects of worship are not only dethroned, but cease to exist. There is no room in a land in the world or in the universe for other deities, if we are satisfied that God is self-existent, Almighty, Sovereign and Omnipresent. Hence when Scriptural conceptions of God are received as true, idols are banished from a land. This has been verified by facts in the history of Christian progress in every age and in every part of the world. Intelligent believers in Christ and His Gospel can say with Paul, "We know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one." There may be those that "are called gods." "But to us there is but one God, the Father of whom are all things and we in Him." Not only does a proper personal knowledge of Jehovah banish outward idolatry from a land, but it also dethrones idolatry in the heart. Just in proportion as God revealed by Christ is apprehended by the Christian, is all disposition to set up in the heart any rival of Jehovah, removed.

II. Knowledge of God Leading to Self-Indulgence May Injure our Fellows.—All Christian converts, having some knowledge of God, were not fully emancipated from heathen ideas and habits. Some were not fully satisfied that idols were nonentities and therefore in eating meats that had been offered to idols violated their consciences because they supposed they were countenancing idolatry and rendering homage to false deities. If their more enlightened brethren who deemed idols nothing in the world partook of these meats they acted like those who were idolaters and encouraged their more ignorant brethren to do that which they could not do without wounding their consciences and committing sin. Thus those of superior knowledge and enlightened consciences might by their example incite their weaker brethren to do wrong. Some might gratify their appetites with impunity but others could only do so by impairing their moral nature and incurring personal guilt. Paul dissuades the more intelligent and enlightened Christians from so using their knowledge as by carnal indulgence to offend their weaker brethren. His words deserve to be pondered. "But meat commendeth us not to God: for neither if we eat: are we the better: neither if we eat not are we the worse. But take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumbling block to them that are weak."

III. Believers Should Control Personal Appetites and Desires that they may not Injure Others.—Paul affirms, "For if any man see thee which has knowledge, sit at meat in the idols' temple, shall not the conscience of him which is weak be emboldened to eat those things which are offered to idols: And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish for whom Christ died?" "But when ye sin so against the brethren ye sin against Christ."

A Study of Home Missions.

Acts 1. 6; 8. February 22.

Home Missions is the term which is used to distinguish between the mission work done in the home land and that done in the foreign field. This Home Mission work has its subdivisions, beginning in order with that nearest to us and reaching out further from our door-steps. The first has to do with the mission work which is done by each congregation within its own bounds and may be termed congregational missions. The next step takes us away from the bounds of our own congregations and we call this next subdivision Presbyterian missions as it is the work done within the bounds of each Presbytery and is in charge of a Presbyterian committee. This work consists of helping weak churches or groups of churches who are unable alone to sustain their work. The weakness of these churches is ordinarily because they have been newly established and have not yet gained sufficient strength to stand alone, or they are old country churches which in these last days have become weak because their strength has gone to feed the town and city churches or because the churches are located in places sparsely settled by Presbyterians. In addition to this work, the Presbyterian committee of home missions pushes its work into the regions where we have no church and establish new churches. Then outside of the work done in the different Presbyteries there are home mission Presbyteries which need help to do their work. This we call Synodical home missions. A letter in last week's Standard will give an idea of what has been done in Asheville Presbytery partially through the work of Synod's committee of home missions. This committee is doing great good to the cause of Christ and Presbyterianism in different parts of the Synod. Then beyond the bounds of our own state there is the work to be done in Synods which are unable to overcome all of the destitutions within their bounds. This work is under a committee elected by the General Assembly and is called assembly's missions. Our young people should familiarize themselves with the work that is being done in these various home mission fields that they may realize how great it is, and the need of the help of the young as well as of the elder members of the church.

But another idea may be attached to the name "Home Missions" than simply to make a distinction between the work done in the home land and that done abroad. The home missionary is essentially a person who goes into the home of the spiritually destitute and carries the gospel of Christ. The fact that a family lives under the shadow of a church or within sound of the church bell does not make it impossible for that family to be a worthy object of home missionary endeavor. Sometimes there are people living in just such close proximity to the church building who are as spiritually destitute as those who live in the foreign field. The reason is because they have no love for God's house or His worship and they become hardened and are the hardest of all to reach. Here the Christian must go and carry the gospel of Christ and so doing he becomes a missionary to the home. Our young people have a special privilege in this kind of work. Often times the attempts of older persons to reach such cases result in failure because the object of their endeavors suspects their mission and put many obstacles in the way, while a young person may come upon such and have reached their hearts many times unconsciously. A little girl on one occasion went to see an infidel who was sick. The sick man's motto was "God is nowhere." The little one innocently sang of Jesus and his love. The infidel said, "Sing no more of that. Don't you see my motto there." The little one was just learning to read and turning to the motto, this is what she spelled out; "God is now here." It was unexpected, but God carried the message home and the infidel became a follower of Jesus.

System in Our Beneficence.

We are accustomed to call the contributions of our churches for the benevolent objects of our work, "Systematic Beneficence." Every year the General Assembly furnishes the churches and the Presbyteries blanks upon which to report these contributions; and every year the Assembly, as do most of the Presbyteries and Synods, appoints a Standing Committee on Systematic Beneficence, whose duty it is to tabulate these reports, and call attention to any facts connected with them which may require consideration.

But the reports of these committees always bring out a sad lack of system in our contributions. Many churches report no contributions at all, many others contribute to only a part of our objects of beneficence; and very few indeed evince a thoroughly systematic beneficence. So that the burden of these reports is usually the lack of benevolence and how to remedy it.

And when we come down to the churches, it is the same thing. True, most of our stronger town and city churches use the envelope system, according to which there is an envelope marked for each object embraced in the Assembly's scheme of beneficence, put in its proper place in the package, so as to remind of the day specially designated for that particular collection. But even in these churches, the majority of the members do not use the envelopes, or neglect to bring them with their contribution on the appointed day. And as to the weaker, especially the country, churches, very few of them use the envelope plan, and if they raise the collection at all, content themselves with simply a "basket collection" for the object on the Sabbath named, merely putting in the loose quarters or dimes or nickels which they happen to have at hand.

Thus, while the Assembly designates its objects of beneficence, divides them out among the months of the year for their respective collections, urges the churches to sustain them regularly, and calls this Systematic Beneficence; yet there is really a notable lack of system about the whole business. And as a consequence, nearly all our Causes, through which the church expresses its life and development, are suffering for want of due support; and the various secretaries representing them are crying out and appealing piteously to our people for funds to maintain the work undertaken and to seize the golden opportunities offered.

Now where does the trouble lie?

Not in the financial ability of our people. This might have been pleaded 30 or 40 years ago, when our country had just been devastated and impoverished by a desolating war, and when we were still in the clutches of the vampires of "Reconstruction." But that has all changed, and unwonted prosperity has returned to our fair Southland. Our people as a whole were probably never so rich, certainly never so prosperous, as today. And they are abundantly able to maintain and carry forward all the work which our Church has undertaken.

Nor are they unwilling to contribute for these objects. Much has been said about the illiberality, even the stinginess, of our church people with regard to religious objects. But, while model generosity, such as that which Paul commended in the churches of Macedonia, may not prevail among us, while it may be that very few of us hold their earthly property as thoroughly consecrated to God, to be used with personal self-denial for His service; yet I am persuaded, from a somewhat extensive observation, that where the objects of our Church benevolence are duly presented, our people are generally willing to respond, and do it liberally.

Then, I ask again, where lies the trouble?

I answer, In the proper system in our beneficence. Let the several Causes endorsed by the Assembly be duly set before the people, and a use of proper system to draw out their beneficence, then, I feel sure, the funds will be forthcoming.

We are all reading with wonder and delight the reports of our young Missionaries who are conducting the Forward Movement in Foreign Missions. Nearly every congregation which they visit, surprises the pastor and the people themselves in the liberal response made. And what is the explanation of it? The object is clearly and simply set forth; after which an excellent system is applied,—a system which aims to take in every church member, and to secure from each the promise of a definite amount, not to be paid in all at once, but weekly, monthly, or quarterly, at regular designated periods. And the result is marvelous.

Again, we wonder at the success of our Ladies' Societies. Considering the small membership enlisted and the restricted circumstances under which they give, the amount which they raise is surprising. And how may we account for that? The object is steadily kept in view and intelligently apprehended, and every member promises and contributes a small amount regularly.

Then let me suggest the general adoption of this plan,—which is not my own; and which is not new, but is successfully used in a number of our churches. At the beginning of the year,—calendar or ecclesiastical,—let the pastor or session put clearly before their people the several Causes embraced in our scheme of beneficence, supply each member with a card containing the names of all the Causes; and urge every one to subscribe something, however small, to each object for the year, payment conditioned on ability in Divine Providence, and payable, say, on the days appointed for the several collections by the Assembly,—two for Assembly's Home Missions, three for Local Home Missions, two for Foreign Missions, two for Education for the Ministry, and one each for Publication, Ministerial Relief, Bible Cause, and Colored Evangelization. Let the subscriber keep for reference the pledge card as filled out and signed, and the church Treasurer enter the same in his book with express authority to remind the subscriber if the amount is not fully and promptly paid. Then, on or before the several collection Sundays, let the pastor, in order to refresh the memory and quicken the interest, briefly set forth the particular Cause again, and take up the collection, using envelopes for it.

I have said that some churches among us use substantially this plan. And I conclude this article by giving the results in a church in South Carolina, which I happen to know, from the statements made by the pastor on the floor of Synod uses this general plan. Without having conferred with the pastor or session, I simply copy the figures from the statistics of the last Assembly. The membership of the church is only 26; and it reports last year for Foreign Missions, $172; Assembly's Home Missions, $50; Local Home Missions, $250; Colored Evangelization, $25; Ministerial Relief, $39; Education, $321; Publication, $25; Bible Cause, $25.

Isn't that wonderful? Suppose that all our churches contributed that way! But somebody will say, "These are mainly the gifts of one wealthy and liberal man, and if his contributions were subtracted, the remainder of the church would show up just about as others do." The pastor stoutly denies this, and claims that it is the result of the system used. And I venture to say that the pastors of other churches who use such a system could bear similar testimony.

O then, let us have SYSTEM in our Beneficence.

John Knox as a Man and a Christian.

Lecture by Sheriff Guthrie, K. C., Son of the Famous Dr. Guthrie, of Edinburgh.

In the Y. M. C. A. Hall, Golspie, on Sabbath evening Sheriff Guthrie, K. C., delivered a lecture on John Knox. The hall was crowded to overflowing.

Mr. Lindsay, who occupied the chair, in introducing Mr. Guthrie, said that the county was to be congratulated on having a gentleman of such high standing and of such high Christian character charged with the administration of law and justice within its bounds. They welcomed Mr. Guthrie not only on account of his own worth and standing, but very particularly on account of the honored name he bore, and as the son of a man who had done noble work in his day, the results of which were visible now. He said Mr. Guthrie was worthily and forcibly giving effect to all that was best in the traditions of Scotland and its religion.

The learned Sheriff said the main object of his lecture was to dispel the distorted views and memories which had gathered round the name of John Knox. He claimed for him the highest rank as a reformer, theologian, and educationalist, putting him along side Chalmers and Gladstone as an orator and statesman. He was not an austere man although he had to do austere things. He was a gentleman and a courtier; a man of broad tolerant views; a Protestant to the core, yet not a narrow Presbyterian; a man of immense proportions and of great standing in the world; a man who neither feared nor flattered; a timid man—a man who had to be pushed from behind before he took upon himself the office of preacher. Mr. Guthrie dwelt specially on Knox as a husband, parent, friend, and foe, and the charming and vivid picture he drew will not soon be forgotten by those who were present. Twice married to ladies of rank and culture, he was as young at 59, the age at which he married the second time, as many men are at 25. As a friend he was genial and hospitable; as a foe he was courteous while scathing, firm as a rock in holding by the right, unmoved by sentiment and tears when wrong had to be scorched and denounced; a gentle knight and fearless champion for his God and Scotland. Mary Queen of Scots, he held firmly to her limits and duties as a ruler. The lecturer, in his concluding remarks, said that the question for Scotsmen was not so much what John Knox did in his day, but what would he do to-day with all its pressing problems. Could they doubt but that a man with such great faith in God, a man of such big intellect, a man with such a warm, genial heart would be a reformer, a reformer in the best and fullest sense.

The lecturer held his audience from first to last in rapt attention and delight. The subject was a great one; it was handled with a knowledge, point, and culture worthy of our greatest Scotsman. The charming manner and twinkling humour of the lecturer threw on the whole a finish and touch of sparkling light worthy of a Guthrie of his ilk.

One thing We Know.

Oh the years they come
 And the years they go;
 First the bitter winds,
 And the cold and the snow;
 Then the singing birds,
 And the sunshine fair;
 Then the gorgeous woods
 And the frosty air,
 And the purple grapes,
 And the meadows sere
 And once more we come
 To the dying year
 With its snow and rain
 And its fields all bare.
 So the years they come
 And the years they go,
 But though swiftly they fly
 One thing we know,
 Come the wintry wind
 Or the summer heat,—
 Seems the season long,
 Or the season fleet,
 Whether sun or shade,
 On our pathway fall,
 At the end of the way
 There's a Home for all,
 Where years never come
 And so years never go;
 And there we shall dwell
 For God's Word says so.

A Reminiscence and a Prophecy.

Mr. Editor:

Your editorial in the Standard of the 21st inst., vividly calls to mind the last interview I had with Dr. Moses D. Hoge.

It was the second day after I arrived at home from Appomattox, I learned that Dr. Hoge was in Milton, N. C. Dr. Hoge being a friend of our family, I had known him from early boyhood, met him during the war several times at Richmond and Petersburg, Va., also was with him at St. Georges, Bermuda and it was on our vessel he ran the blockade into the Confederacy on his return from England, where he had gone to obtain Bibles and Testaments for the use of our Southern soldiers.

In view of these associations, it was not strange that I, a broken hearted youth, bewildered and perplexed by the unexpected blow that staggered his faith in the righteousness of our Southern Cause, should seek consolation and counsel from this beloved prophet of God.

Our meeting occurred on the crest of a hill in Milton, overlooking the beautiful valley of the Dan, on this lovely day in April, 1865. But no beauty, then appeared to us in either landscape or sky, for every breeze brought to our ears the drum beat of an exultant foe, encamped twelve miles distant up the river at Danville, Va.

Words fail me to express the sad tender greeting Dr. Hoge gave me, while tears coursed down his manly cheek. The long loving pressure of my hand before his quivering lips could give expression to the gentle words of consolation, spoken to soften the cruel blow, that at "one fell swoop," crushed all my earthly hopes and aspirations. Then after a short period of silence he turned his eyes as if looking into the future and gave utterance to these words:

"I do not believe all the prayers, the sacrifices and blood shed in behalf of the Confederacy have been in vain! The end is not yet! The curtain has only dropped upon the first act in the great drama! It will rise again and reveal more clearly to our bewildered senses the purposes of our Divine Master, and the mission of our Southern people upon the earth!"

In a short time my duties called me away, thus ending my last interview with the great Chaplain of the Confederacy, who at that time was a fugitive from his home, outlawed by the Federal government, and menaced by a reward, offered for his person dead or alive.

Is it surprising that through all the years that have intervened since then, years in which the writer has participated in the sorrows, oppressions and misrepresentations that have afflicted our Southern people, that memorable scene has never been effaced from his mind; that the words of Dr. Hoge have never ceased to be an inspiration; nor his faith been shaken as to the ultimate fulfillment of that prophecy.

Are we, Mr. Editor, to accept your views of the "Denationalization of the South," and believe that we, as a people, have no special mission on the earth? Were all the prayers, sacrifices and blood shed during the four years of the Confederacy in vain? All the succeeding years of humiliation, poverty and struggle for Anglo-Saxon supremacy to be the end of our existence as a "peculiar people?" Our purest of Anglo-Saxon speech be absorbed by the harsh dialect of our Northern conquerors? Our political unity be broken up and its several units simply become so many factors in the "body politic" under whose flag no distinction of race, color, or social equality can be recognized?

Scientists tell us that the tiniest pebble let fall in the ocean sets in motion a circle of wavelets the influence of which extends to the uttermost confines of the deep! That a word spoken likewise creates wavelets of sound that are transmitted to the uttermost parts of the earth! How then, is it possible that the most heroic struggle for freedom recounted in the history of any people should create no wavelets upon the ocean of human action? And the greatest tragedy of ages end a farce?

Did not the curtain rise again? And has not the second act in the drama been on the stage during the past 38 years. Part I reveals the Southern people passing through the "Valley of the shadow of death." A nation in mourning for its dead, having their servants for masters, and carpet-baggers for their rulers. Part II relates of the Southern struggle for bread and Anglo-Saxon supremacy, while Part III portrays the Southern triumph over poverty, oppression and political disenfranchisement, ending in the political, social and industrial ascendancy of the Southern people in a manner that challenges the admiration of the world.

The curtain has dropped the second time, relegating into history the two acts that have been played, but leaving the audience in suspense as to what will be revealed when it rises on the third act in Southern Drama.

This much we know: "The end is not yet!" Neither has the prophecy been fulfilled, for the mission of the Southern people has not yet been revealed. This much of the next act is disclosed by the mutterings behind the curtain, "That the trials and tribulations of the Southern people are not at an end."

Scarcely had the ink dried upon the columns of the Standard in which its able editor congratulated its readers upon the arrival of that period in Southern history in which its people could safely accept their present condition as an earnest of their destiny, when by one act the President of this Nation convinced every intelligent person in the South of the fact that they are confronted by a graver peril than any one heretofore encountered—that of social equality or its alternative—a "race war."

Of the two evils our Southern people would readily accept the alternative.

I do not believe, however, that a war of races is imminent, simply because I believe there is a Divine Providence shaping the course of our people, and accept this new issue so unexpectedly sprung upon us, as a lesson to impress upon the people of the South the fact that our mission on earth and destiny as a people are not concurrent with those of our Northern brethren, and to make us willing to undertake and carry out the Divine purposes of the Lord of Hosts, "that of taking a leading part in the establishment of his kingdom on earth."

The Gospel of the Lilies.

Matt. VI. 28-30.

Edward O. Guerrant, Wilmore, Ky.

The greatest preacher was the simplest. The "common people heard him gladly," and understood him easily.

This was his first sermon, his "Inaugural Address!" In it he states the character of his kingdom, and lays down the laws of its government, and the duties of its subjects. He shows its superiority over all that preceded it, and the absolute security and happiness of all its inhabitants.

"Multitudes" waited on his teaching. He was the "desire of all nations." For four thousand years a guilty, hopeless world had been expecting a Deliverer. All other helps and hopes had failed.

"In the fullness of time" he came to save a lost world; to bring a race of immortals back to God; to restore order and peace to God's kingdom on earth. It was a mission worthy of a God, and only a God could do it.

This great sermon on the mountain was his first utterance. He used plain language. He was speaking to plain people. Most of them were poor and unlearned. Their life was a hard one; a struggle for bread, long and sharp. He knew something of it himself. Probably he was in sight of Nazareth, where for years he had lived in a humble home, and worked as a carpenter. He was speaking to multitudes who were accustomed to walk by sight, to depend upon their own arm for a living.

The daily inquiry was "how shall we get bread and clothes for our selves and children." They saw nothing beyond the narrow horizon of a hard life, and nothing above the roof of their humble homes.

For years they had been ground beneath the heel of tyrants and deluded by teachers who taught a false religion, without a Saviour or a hope. They felt the need of something better. This was the occasion.

The object was to teach them, and you and me, a better way,—the Divine the Heavenly way. We need it. The old Galilean cry has come down to us—"what shall we eat." It occupies most of our time and thoughts and energies.

He came to show us a better way; to set the world right; to lift up the burdens which have crushed humanity for six thousand years.

His great theme was to let God do our thinking, planning and providing: to let God bear our burdens; to let Him be what He ought to be, our Father, our Helper, our Redeemer, our "All in all."

He showed them the utter helplessness of man; the utter folly of thinking more of their clothes than their bodies; more of their food than their souls.

Looking down into the valley where beautiful lilies were blooming, He calls their attention to them, and says, "Consider the Lilies."

What a scene! What a sermon! How simple, yet how sublime! He made those lilies; He painted their heavenly colors with His sunlight; He refreshed them with His dews and showers. He dressed them in colors more regal "than Solomon in all his glory." They "neither toil nor spin." No milliner could have made their wardrobe. God only could make it.

Now let us consider:

1st. God's care of the lilies. He made them, and planted them along mountain, glen and stream; in field and meadow. He fed and clothed them. The wild lilies have no other provider.

God alone cares for them. How well it is done. No human heart or hand can take His place. He planted them where they grow; He selected their home. They grew as He wisely ordered by stem and leaf and flower. He watered them when thirsty, and fed them when hungry.

"They have no care:

They bend their heads before the storm,
And rise to meet the sunshine warm.

God cares for them:

His love is over every one;

He wills them good;

His will be done.

He does neglect no single flower;

He makes them rich with sun and shower,

Their song of trust is sweet and clear,

And he that hath an ear may hear."

You see the lesson. The Maker of the lilies made you; the Lover of the lilies loves you. Will He not clothe and feed you? Are you not worth more than all the lilies? Why, then be "anxious" about the morrow? Why then, be afraid to trust God? How unnatural; how unreasonable; how ungrateful.

This is the lesson—Trust God, like the lilies, and He will take care of you, like the lilies. This is the life of faith the lily-life; the child life—the Heavenly life.

2nd. Then consider God's prodigality to the lilies. Go into a beautiful garden and examine the flowers. What a wealth of color and shape and perfume. All colors, all beautiful shapes, all exquisite perfumes. The wealth of heaven poured out on earth. No wonder Jesus called Heaven 'Paradise'—the beautiful garden of God.

But that lily is only a poor soulless flower. It can never know who made it, or feeds it, or clothes it, or loves it. It can never see, or know, or enjoy Him. You can. This is your God; your Father. Consider what He does for the lilies, then doubt what He will do for you, His child, His image, His loved one. You can know Him, see Him, love Him, enjoy Him. How much more then will He do for you? What prodigality of love and grace and riches and honors He has for you!

See what He has already done for you. Who did He make the lilies for? and the birds? and the sunshine?

and the world? All for you. Who did Jesus die for? Who are angels ministering to? Who is heaven waiting for? All for you.

"Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him."

3rd. Then consider God's resurrection of the lilies.

They vanish with the summer, and the snow of winter covers the grave of the lilies, and we imagine they are dead. The wild bees seek them in vain, and the valley is desolate where they bloomed, and the children wonder where they went. But God smiles over the landscape with April suns and showers, and the lilies rise from the dead and bloom again. This is the resurrection of the lilies. Does it teach us no lesson? Hear Him say "Consider the lilies."

Have we no loved ones beneath the sod, and the snow, whom we call dead?

"An angel form walks o'er the earth
With soft and silent tread;
And bears our best loved friends away,
And then we call them dead."

And will not the God of the lilies smile on them again, and make them rise from the grave and bloom again? He says He will. "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust."

Hear Him say, "Thy brother shall rise again," and thy mother, and husband, and child.

We will "consider the lilies," and thank God for the beautiful, sweet lessons they teach us.

The loving Hand that heals the broken lily with divine surgery will bind up the broken heart of His child.

The mighty voice that calls the sleeping lilies from beneath the snow and sod, will call our loved ones from their graves.

Blessed Resurrection! With beauty beyond all lilies, and life beyond all death, we will receive them again to our rejoicing hearts and homes.

When hard times come, and your hearts fail, "Consider the lilies how they grow" and take courage. When death comes, and takes your best loved ones away, then "Consider the lilies how they rise, and rejoice."

The Best Way.

"As for God, his way is perfect." Ps. 18:30.

Thy way, O God, is perfect!
Thy way with me then take,
Though I sometimes, must suffer,
It's for my own mistake.

Oh, could I always trust Thee,
And Thy own time abide,
I should have smoother sailing
Upon life's ocean wide.

When Thou, my Lord, delayest
Some promise to fulfill,
I often grow impatient—
To have my own sweet will.

And pressing blindly onward
To find my hidden way,
Till, like a child, I wander
And only make delay.

In my distress and peril
I always come to Thee,
And Thou, again, hast taught me
Thy way is best for me!

The Nashville Daily News said the next day after the passage of the Adams temperance bill, which, by the way, subsequently passed the lower house by a vote of 81 to 11, and is now a law under which practically all of Tennessee except eight cities will be prohibition territory: "Reviewing the struggle which culminated in the Senate yesterday, the circumstance developed that the immediate leaders in the able campaign were ministers. They bore themselves valiantly, and their allies of all classes throughout the State, public men and private citizens, have won a victory. It now remains to preserve its fruits."—Cumberland Presbyterian.

A Course of Outline Bible Study.

It is proposed to begin in The Standard, with the issue for March 4th, a course of outline Bible study on the Epistle to the Galatians. One chapter will be treated at a time, and a study will be published every two weeks; and the course therefore will run through twelve weeks.

The plan followed will be chiefly question and answer, and the answers will be suggested mainly by scripture reference, so that the studies will cover a much wider scope than the one epistle. At the same time, the Epistle itself will be studied in its main outlines as thoroughly as possible in such limited space.

Answers to the questions, accompanied with return postage, sent to the address given below, will be corrected and returned, thus giving the course of study somewhat the form of a Bible correspondence class.

The Epistle to the Galatians is selected because it stands first among the shorter Epistles of Paul and so suits the commencement of a series of Bible studies, should it be thought desirable to extend this course further than the one Epistle. While this Epistle is in some respects a difficult study, yet it presents in brief compass a greater variety of interest than almost any other of the shorter books of the New Testament. The student will find here most interesting side light on the history in the book of Acts, an instructive parallel to the doctrinal discussions in the Epistle to the Romans, and rich experimental truth similar to the contents of Ephesians and Philippians. Thus the first and second chapters are mainly historical, the third and fourth chapters, doctrinal, the fifth and sixth chapters, practical.

The difficulties presented by the study of this Epistle are largely matters which interest the critical scholar, but have little bearing on its doctrinal and experimental teaching. For example it makes no difference as to the practical value of the book, whether Paul wrote to the Galatians from Corinth, as Conybeare and Howson maintain; or from Ephesus, according to Elicott; or from Rome, as is stated in our common English Version. While this is an interesting question, which will be touched on its place, yet it is of little practical moment.

Now as to the plan on which these studies are based. The writer has heard from the lips of earnest Christians over and over again, the lament, "I do not know how to study the Bible." There is one method of Scripture study, which once learned and followed, never fails to be interesting and profitable; and the main failure of it is to compare Scripture with Scripture, to study the Bible in the light of the Bible. That is the plan which will be followed in these studies on Galatians; one part of this Epistle will be examined in the light of all the rest, there will be brought to bear on this one book of the Bible all that can be gathered from the whole Word of God. Thus it is hoped that there will not only be benefit derived from the contents of this particular book, but the student will become familiar with a method of handling the entire Bible, which the writer has long followed himself, and which he has always found most helpful.

It will be seen that this is not infant class work, but it is designed for those who already know enough of the Bible to make them eager to learn more. If these lovers of God's Word shall find in this course of study that which interests and profits them, the writer will consider himself richly repaid.

Address all correspondence on this subject to Rev. R. A. Lapsley, Greenville, Va.

An example of the late Archbishop Temple's directness of speech was his reply to certain students of a theological college of which he was head. The doctor was digging in the garden when a deputation approached and laid bare a terrible grievance. The country folk, it seemed, had not treated the students nicely—"in fact," said the spokesman, "they do not treat us as if we were gentlemen." "Because you're not," said Dr. Temple, and went on digging.—Dominion Presbyterian.

What More Do They Than Others?

The primary object of what follows is to show the place which Presbyterians occupy and the part which they legitimately share in the enormous undertaking of evangelizing the world. Every Christian should be intelligently posted respecting the sacred enterprise of missions, as a whole, and especially respecting the work of his own denomination, so that when exaggerated or untrue statements are made in his hearing or undue prominence given to any organization, presumably, for effect, he will not be forced to the humiliating position of Ophelia in English story of accepting it as true because he does not know a single reason why it should not be true.

In popular treatises on the subject, modern missions are usually dated from William Carey. But for all such movements among men there are influences issuing often-times from other men which cannot be ignored. No fair-minded student of missions would be intentionally guilty of plucking one star from the glittering crown of Carey, but that which counts for the most in the sphere of moral and religious activity is the truth, which to know, is a credit to all and an injury to none.

It is a well-established fact that during the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries the duty of evangelizing the heathen was regarded with minute consideration. The effort to practice the missionary mandate on the continent of Europe by such men as Ziegenbalg, Schwartz, Weston, Egede and Zinzendorf was exceedingly limited in its influence upon the rest of the Protestant Church. The chilling and paralyzing effects which rationalism and deism are calculated to produce, had all but stifled the conscience and religious sensibilities of the Church in Germany and England; and as a result the varied efforts which were made to carry on missionary work experienced merely a languishing existence until the time of William Carey.

But in Scotland the aspects were somewhat different. In 1709 at Edinburgh, a society was formed for the promoting of Christian knowledge which continued with increased interest and endeavors. In 1744, this society assumed the support of David Brainerd, a Presbyterian minister of America who was ordained at Newark; and to Brainerd may be traced the essential beginning of modern missions, rather than with Carey who correctly belongs to the second generation of missionaries. Carey had not been born when Brainerd was feeding on boiled corn and soup, lodging in a crude hut made with his own hands, sleeping at night on a heap of straw, and enduring unnamed privations that he might preach the gospel to the Indians. And when, after having experienced the severest hardships, after his broken health forbade him continuing longer, he died in his thirtieth year, his life was written, a copy of it fell into the hands of Carey and the story of Brainerd's piety and zeal and self-devotion which had not been surpassed since the days of the apostles, became the potent force, says A. J. Gordon, in the missionary ardor of Carey, and in fact, a potent agency in modern missions. A copy of Brainerd's life also fell into the hands of Henry Martyn and as he perused its pages his soul was filled with holy emulation of such a man and fired with the resolution to follow his noble example. Both Carey and Martyn went to India, one as the representative of the Baptist Missionary Society, and one as the chaplain of the East India Company; both wrought for the same Master, preaching and translating, until their bodies pierced with torturing pains and weariness, they died on a foreign shore where they had instituted a work which has expanded into marvelous proportions and whose magnitude waits for eternity to disclose. This immense harvest is the essential and fitting outgrowth of the sacrifice and death of Brainerd, who, like the grain of wheat falling into the ground and dying "bringeth forth much fruit."

The Scottish Society of Edinburgh, in 1746 appointed a day for monthly public united prayer for the universal spread of the gospel. The dying message of David Brainerd to his spiritual children among the Indians was that they observe this day. What influence the united prayers of these Scotch and Indian Christians from the shores of two continents exerted in effecting the missionary spirit and activity which subsequently arose, Heaven alone knows.

Immediately following the movement of Carey in England was that of Samuel J. Mills, a Presbyterian minister of America. Deeply interested in sending the gospel to the heathen, Mills instituted a forward movement while in the seminary, with the assistance of Newell, Nott, Hall and Judson. Mills was a man of indefatigable energies and almost unlimited mental resources, and from his cherubic soul sprang the American Bible Society, the United Foreign Missionary Society and a movement for the evangelization of the African. In 1817, he was sent by the Colonization Society to explore Sierra Leone and Western Africa. On the eve of his return he died and was buried in the sea. The career of Mills was brief, but his name will ever be associated with these movements, and with the stupendous history of the missionary activities of America to whose holy enthusiasm it owes so much.

From the earliest times Presbyterians have occupied the front rank in the evangelization of the world. Illustrations here must necessarily be abbreviated. They were the first to enter China. Robert Morrison landed at Canton in 1807. Fifteen years later he was joined by David Abeel, a Presbyterian from America. The work of Morrison consisted in translating the Bible and composing a Chinese dictionary. He labored seven years before he made one convert and at the end of twenty-seven years had no more than four followers. But during the succeeding years his one convert has multiplied many thousand-fold. Through the self-devotion of John Ross, a Scotch missionary in Manchuria and the consecrated tact of H. M. Allen, a medical missionary, the Presbyterians were the first to occupy Korea, and in 1887 organized the first evangelical church on the peninsula. They were the first to begin operation in Formosa, an island off the coast of China and the home of nearly two millions of people. The English Presbyterians entered in 1864, and a few years after Dr. G. L. Mackay of the Canadian Presbyterian Church began work in and about Tamsni and the story of his labors is among the most brilliant on record. In Siam and Laos the Presbyterians were among the first and to-day they have entire control of the enterprise which has been marvelously successful. The work in Madagascar has fallen exclusively into the hands of Presbyterians; and the same is true of the work in Syria and Egypt. The first Protestant Church to grace the pages of Japan missions was organized on the Perry treaty-ground at Yokohama in 1872 by the Rev. James Ballagh of the Dutch Reformed Presbyterian branch, and another by other representatives at Tokyo, the capitol in 1873. In addition to these instances, descriptions of the work carried on by Presbyterians in Turkey, Greece, Mexico and South America might be given in the most glowing terms.

The Presbyterian Church has given to the cause of missions such men as John G. Paton, who has devoted his life to the savages of the New Hebrides; Robert Moffat, David Livingstone, and Andrew Murray, who, whether living or dead, shine with undiminished splendor amidst the horrors of the Dark Continent. William Murray, who devoted himself to the pitiable blind of China and Alex. Duff the pioneer of education in India; and a host of others whose lives have been freely given to the glory of the Master in the salvation of souls, and whose sacred dust sleeps on many a foreign land, thousands of miles from its native air. Presbyterians may point to any altitude or latitude with feelings of humble gratitude that under God their mission in the great world has been so marvelously projected and their influence so extensively felt. Their seal or emblem is beautifully illustrated in their mission, and their mission is a charming comment on their seal or emblem.

The Point of Contact.

How many Sunday-school teachers ever think of finding a point of contact between the lesson and the child? Yet there can be no teaching unless this point of contact is found.

It is related of Dr. Pratt that he once entered the Sunday-school room when the class was asked by the teacher, "What is sin?" The pupils answered glibly, "Sin is any want of conformity unto, or transgression of, the law of God." "Who can explain what that means?" asked the venerable preacher. There was dead silence. Taking a piece of chalk the Doctor made a line on the floor. "Suppose that line is God's law. If I fail to come right up to it, that is 'want of conformity unto the law;' and if I step over it that is 'Transgression of the law.'"

Who could ever forget that, or fail to understand it? There was a point of contact between the Doctor's explanation and the children's experience. If children are to derive any benefit from teaching they must be taught in terms of the child mind, and not in terms of the adult mind. It is probably true that the majority of preachers and teachers do not think of this when teaching children the wholesome lessons and saving truths of the Bible. Sometimes the children get as much mixed up as the little boy who was asked by the Sunday-school superintendent, "What is a lie?" He answered promptly and vigorously, "A lie is an abomination in the sight of God; a very present help in every time of trouble!" This boy had been taught the first part of his definition and he had learned by experience the second part.

Some of the older citizens doubtless remember the times when the mammy who looked after the health of the colored children on the old plantation used to call them up every Sunday morning, whether they were sick or well, and give each one a dose of sulphur and molasses, in order to keep off any possible sickness that week. Do we not treat the children to spiritual sulphur and molasses, when we might easily make the dose an attractive one?

Many of the children will appreciate the feelings of the boy that once slipped out of the cabin door while a Bible class was being taught. An old negro had gotten permission from "Ole Missus" to gather all the colored children on the place and teach them the Bible. He got them in his cabin in a circle around the four walls. Starting with the boy next the door he asked, "Who made you?" "I dunno, suh!" said the boy. "Gord made you. Now don' fergit dat." Looking at the next boy the old negro asked: "What did Gord make you outen?" "I dunno, suh," said the second boy. "He made you out er dus'. Now don' fergit dat." The third boy was asked, "Who was the fus man?" and had to be told that it was "Marse Adam." And so the old negro continued around the circle he had exhausted his knowledge and reached the last boy. Then turning to the first of the circle he asked, "Who made you?" The boy piped out, "Dus!" "Look heah, nigger, didn't I tole you Gord made you?" "Nor, suh. I aint de one. De one what Gord made done slip out de door!"

By finding a point of contact between the child and the lesson, the teacher could make the lesson so interesting that there would not be such a strong desire to "slip out de door." J. D. E., Jr.

Critical on John XIV. 16, 17.

By Rev. H. H. Hawes, D. D.

The verses read: "And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever; even the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you and shall be in you." This criticism is on the translation of the word "receive."

However true it may be that the world cannot receive the Holy Spirit, the question is: Was our Lord speaking of that, in this teaching?

Look at the circumstances of the utterance. He had told the disciples that He was to be taken away from them: therefore they were troubled. But what comfort was there in telling them, just then, that the world could not receive the Holy Spirit? His object was to comfort them. The Greek word, translated "receive," is "labein," from "lambano," which means, First, To take, take hold of, grasp, seize. Second, To have given to one, receive, get. In view of the connections in which the word is here used, the natural translation would be, "take, or take away." Translating thus, the comfort appears, and is emphatic. Then we read: "Even the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot take away." Their reason follows: 'I am a visible, tangible presence. The world can see me, handle me, and is going to take me away from you; but the substitute, whom the Father is going to send, will be invisible, intangible, spiritual. The world, therefore, cannot know Him as it knows me, nor see Him, nor touch Him; therefore cannot take Him away as it will take me. He will stay with you permanently for your comfort and guidance, in compensation for my absence.'

In support of this, note how the same word is translated in other places:—Matt. V. 40, "If any man will sue thee at law, and (labein) take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also."

Matt. XV. 26, "It is not meet (labein) take the children's bread, and cast to dog's"

Rev. VI. 4, "And power was given to him that sat thereon to (labein) take peace from the earth."

Passages have been given in which the form of the word is identical with that in Jno. XIV. 17. The same word (lambano) is used in many other passages, in its first signification, but different form.

Accepting the translation, "take away," for verse 17, the teaching appears in a new and better light. The continuity of thought is preserved, and our Lord's work, of comforting His disciples, is not interrupted by the introduction of new matter in His teaching. It is believed that this criticism will stand further study, and be thus justified.

The Open Court.

Critics Criticised.

Dear Standard:

I hope the Open Court is open enough to let in a few words from a constant reader who always turns first to the Editorial column—not merely because they are the first columns of your paper. Country Parson's story of pastoral regeneration is too good to be marred by the gratuitous insertion of the fling at a great man who is dead—if such a man as R. L. Dabney can be truly called dead. Dr. Dabney had a very retentive memory, but he forgot more than the average country pastor will ever know.

Another of the heirs (presumptive, if not apparent) of "Old Man Know All" once said of Dr. Dabney's rules on sermon-building, that "they suited the smallest number of preachers"—because forsooth very few have a brain like Dr. Dabney's.

There are many of your readers who will read Country Parson's humorous words with a sort of amused regret that such a man as we know him to be should pose as a critic of Dr. Dabney, for the sense of humor is not by any means confined to the writers of the Standard. Many of us don't need a tin tag to make us recognize a joke when we meet one in the road. But there is a deeper regret, that those who don't know the real man veiled under the nom de plume, will do him the injustice of thinking he is what his words make him seem. Many of us know, but some do not, that he is modest, true and large of soul. He, like "Clarke," (and you, sometimes) makes the mistake of leaving his mustard jar open on his desk and sometimes his pen is dipped in that by mistake for the inkstand.

Do you suppose these brethren would be willing to sign their real names to everything they write? It not, why not? And if so, why write these things?

L. B. Johnston.

Rev. Joseph R. Wilson, D. D.

(Editorial.)

Joseph R. Wilson was born in Steubenville, Ohio, on February 22, 1825. He received his classical education at Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, and his theological at Western Theological Seminary and at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Ohio, and his first charge was the church at Chartiers, Pennsylvania, 1849-51. His scholarly tastes and his gifts as a teacher led him to accept a professorship at Hampden-Sidney College, then the important Presbyterian College of the South. During his professorship he supplied the church at Walkers' in Appomattox county. When Dr. B. M. Smith, who had been pastor at Staunton, Virginia, went to Union Seminary, at Hampden-Sidney, Dr. Wilson was brought to the attention of the Staunton people and was called to that church, going there in 1855. After laboring there for three years he was called to Augusta, where perhaps the most fruitful years of his pastoral and pulpit work were spent, 1858-70. He was pastor of this church at the first meeting of the Southern General Assembly in 1861, and though of Northern birth and education, like so many others from that section, who had become acquainted with conditions in the South, he threw himself with great heartiness into the Southern cause. He was elected Permanent Clerk of the new Assembly and upon the death of the former Stated Clerk, was elected to that position, which he filled with great ability and acceptance until his resignation of the office in ————. It was in this capacity that most of his brethren, in successive generations of commissioners, learned to know him and admire him. He was the soul of wit, an inveterate punster, the best company in the world at dinner, and he made even a Stated Clerkship a source of joy. He could kill an unwise overture by the way he would read it and then glare at the Assembly as if lost in wonder that any such thing had ever been thought of. His pleasantries brought the ripples of laughter that are so often a safety valve in strenuous times.

And yet there was no point of poison to his shafts of wit. He was professor of Pastoral Theology for four years at Columbia Seminary, and since he was a born teacher and loved his work he was very successful in this capacity. From '74 to '85 he was pastor of the First Church, Wilmington, and did a great work in that city. His sermons are still remembered for their clearness and force, and he blended in delightful combination an ornate style with impassioned fervor. During much of this time he wrote regularly for the editorial columns of the North Carolina Presbyterian, and proved himself as gifted with his pen as he was in the pulpit and the professor's chair.

In 1879 he was honored with the election to the Moderatorship of the Assembly of that year.

He was called from this delightful pastorate to the chair of Theology in the Southwestern Presbyterian University, and was never a regular pastor again. He resigned this position after eight years of faithful and successful service, in 1893.

After his resignation he supplied several churches in the absence of pastors or, in vacancies, among them Durham and Wilmington. While in Wilmington we heard constantly of the delight of his former parishioners, with the power and grace of his sermons. Many of them thought that he even surpassed the work of his earlier years, and certainly in his preaching, his eye was not dim nor his natural force abated.

During the latter years of his life Dr. Wilson suffered from an affection of the arteries that frequently brought on attacks of vertigo and dizziness. He spent his last days in the delightful social and literary atmosphere of old Princeton, and it was his happiness to see honors fall thick and fast upon the head of his distinguished son, President Woodrow Wilson. We have not been able to learn the particulars of his death, but doubt not that he fell asleep with serene faith in the Master he had served so long. He was buried in Columbia, S. C.

So another of the Old Guard is gone, one who watched the beginnings of the Confederacy and of the Southern Church. The ranks grow pathetically thinner with every year. But Dr. Wilson knew the North as well as the South and his convictions were free from bitterness and his view was a broader one and his attitude more generous than some who knew only one side.

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

We have variety enough in this issue to please the most fastidious. Besides the regular departments there are ten contributed articles of interest and value. Rev. T. H. Law, D. D., speaks a needed word on the system necessary for systematic beneficence. O. H.'s poem is as melodious as it is true. Dr. Guerrant gives us the Gospel of the Lilies in his own striking style. Another poem of merit is from the pen of M. E. C. Rev. R. L. Benn asks a pertinent question, What do they more than others? J. D. Eggleston, Jr., gives some valuable points relating to the work of the Sunday-school teacher, and Rev. H. H. Hawes gives us a most suggestive rendering of John 14: 16, 17.

Our readers will be delighted to know that Rev. R. A. Lapsley is going to give us the outline of Bible Study he describes. Mr. Lapsley is one of the most original thinkers and facile writers in the Southern Church and the Standard congratulates itself and its readers in having secured him as a regular contributor.

The author of a Reminiscence and a Retrospect misunderstands us if he thinks we meant that the South has no mission in the future. Rather a grander mission than ever as the best part of a great nation.

Erratum.—In last week's Westminster League column, the date of the Davidson covenanters meeting was given as Jan. 11. This was an error. The meeting combining missionary, athletic and social feature was not held on Sunday.

The New York Mission Conference.

The tenth Conference of Foreign Mission Boards in the United States and Canada held its annual meeting on January 14th and 15th, in the Bible House. Thirty mission boards working in the foreign field were represented by sixty delegates. The Executive Committee of Foreign Missions of the Southern Presbyterian Church was represented by Dr. S. H. Chester, Secretary; Rev. H. P. Williams, editor, and the Rev. S. R. Gammon, of Brazil. The American Bible Society entertained the delegates at luncheon. The Rev. Dr. S. J. Dennis, author of Christiana Missions, reported on various phases of institutional mission work. He said there were in the mission field 95 universities and colleges, 384 theological and training schools, 886 high schools and seminaries, 188 industrial, and 68 medical schools, 122 kindergartens and 18,742 elementary or village schools. The total number of educational institutions is 20,485, and students attending them number 1,051,811. Under mission management there are besides 395 hospitals, 789 dispensaries, and 258 orphan asylums and homes for infants, with a total of 17,821 inmates. The Honorable Emily Kinnaird, sister of Lord Kinnaird, read a letter from the English committee of the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission, proposing to American friends of missions in India that they co-operate in work in that country. Miss Kinnaird and Miss A. E. Edge, who has come with her to New York, are authorized to arrange, if possible, to establish an American branch of the English committee.

Wanted—A Business Man for our African Mission.

A very excellent young man in the senior class of one of our Seminaries has recently been appointed, subject to the action of his Presbytery, as an evangelistic missionary for Africa. The committee has been in correspondence with several other men who have been considering the call that has been several times made for another man who would go to take especial charge of the business department of the work in that field. Having recently almost concluded with one who seemed specially adapted to that work it was found that at last he could not go and we were again disappointed.

At the meeting of the Committee on February 3rd, the Secretary was instructed to issue another call. We desire a man who will go as a missionary and only from the missionary motive, but who has already proven his capacity for the management of business affairs. We could wish this man when sent out, to use every opportunity he might have of taking the gospel to those with whom he came in contact. But his special work would be to take charge of and re-organize the business affairs of the African Mission. It is necessary that who ever goes should go unmarried. But the committee is willing to send a man with the understanding that he might stay for three years and then return home. We feel satisfied that a man in that length of time could largely accomplish what we desire to have accomplished by this man for whom we are calling. At the end of his first term he would not be considered bound to the committee for further service in Africa unless he should be desirous of continuing his work. The question of matrimony might be on a different footing at the end of three years than it is now.

We shall be very glad to receive responses to this call from any one, either minister or layman, whose heart the spirit may prompt to respond to it. The need is very urgent and the work so necessary to be done has been long delayed.

Mr. Morrison has recently again been ordered home by Dr. Sims who is his consulting physician. Mr. Vass, whose first term has expired, has since been instructed by the Committee to return home. Inasmuch as these two are leaving no white man will be left on the field.

Let us have an early answer from any who feel moved to consider this call.

Respectfully,

S. H. Chester, Secretary.

Card from Dr. Chester.

Dear Brethren:

Rev. H. F. Williams, recently elected Editor of The Missionary, has also been made Chairman of a sub-committee of the Executive Committee of Foreign Missions on our Forward Movement, and will assist the Secretary in both the field and office work connected with that movement.

Correspondence relating to the Forward Movement may be properly addressed directly to Mr. Williams and will receive his prompt attention.

S. H. Chester, Secretary.

TEXAS

TYLER.—Rev. J. L. Stewart, Jr., was with us last Sabbath and presented the "Forward Movement" in Foreign Missions.

Our church took subscription and decided to undertake the support of a missionary. We hope to do as much for the Home work also.

J. D. McLean.

M'KINNEY.—We learn, through a friend, that the Texas University, in which Dr. Claggett has been so interested, will be located at this point.

MISSISSIPPI

Presbytery of Mississippi will meet in Hazelhearst, Thursday, April 23, 1903, at 11 a. m. opening sermon by Rev. Geo. T. Chandler. Churches will send up reports on narrative, statistics and systematic beneficence; and also commissioner's fund at the rate of 10 cents per member.

S. O. Caldwell, S. C.

KENTUCKY.

The Constitutional requirements having been met, the Presbytery of Louisville is hereby called to meet in the First Church, Louisville, Tuesday, Feb. 17th, 1903, at 10:30 a. m., to act on the request for the dissolution of the pastoral relation between the Woodland Church and Rev. R. B. Griunan, D. D., and to dismiss Rev. Dr. Griunan to Asheville Presbytery if the way be clear.

J. W. Tyler, Moderator.

NORTH CAROLINA

Letter to Pastors and Sessions of the North Carolina Synod.

Dear Brethren:

Permit me to urge upon you the necessity of acting promptly in the appointment of sessional committees on Ministerial Relief. This great cause can never go forward satisfactorily till it is properly organized in all our churches. Do not delay.

The needs of our aged and disabled ministers and the widows and orphans of our deceased brethren constitute a sacred and pressing claim upon us.

If your sessional committee is not already appointed, will you not make a point of appointing it this week?

Yours in His service,

Egbert W. Smith,

Chairman N. C. Synod's Committee on Ministerial Relief.

MOORESVILLE.—Our pastor, Rev. Dr. Pharr, preached an interesting and instructive sermon at Prospect Church yesterday on the Bible—its inspiration—its value—and its superiority over all other books, aside from its moral and religious influence, and made this request to the congregation: That every one who could read, old and young, would read the entire Bible through this year, and give him their names at the close of the year. And I predict that we will have more Bible-reading this year than we have had for a long time.

A Member.

To the Alumnae and friends of Statesville College:

The present session has been very successful, and the college, with a splendid faculty, with 40 boarders and a total enrollment of 120 students seems to be entering upon a career of prosperity and influence. Will every friend of Statesville College and every one who has been a student there lend her name to the President? In return information will be furnished that will interest every friend of the college.

Statesville, N. C.

Rev. J. A. Scott.

DAVIDSON.—Once more has the grim messenger, death, come into our community, to call from earth another member of the Davidson Church. On three of the four past Fridays a funeral has been conducted in the village church, first Mrs. Shearer's, then young McLeod's and now to-day Mrs. Helper's, the widow of the late H. P. Helper, Esq. Her death occurred suddenly last night from heart disease. Her death was strikingly like that of her husband several months ago. Both had been in their ordinary, but not vigorous health, till within a few minutes of their decease, both died near midnight, and after a moment's warning of the approaching end. Mrs. Helper has been for long years an earnest member of the Presbyterian Church. She was a kindly neighbor, a warm hearted friend, a devoted wife and mother. On last Sabbath she was at church where Dr. Graham preached a singularly beautiful and comforting sermon on Heaven as the Christian's Home, a sermon especially appropriate for a congregation to which so many bereavements have come recently, and which seemed indeed a message to God's sorrowing people. No one could foresee that in the briefest time her eyes would close on the things of earth, and that united with loved ones gone before she would see and experience for herself the blessed and happy home-coming of which Jesus tells in the 14th. of John's Gospel and of which her pastor was speaking in words eloquent in their emotion and sweet assurance of peace for all believers.

For a generation the Helpers have been prominently identified with the public, social and church life of Davidson. Since Mr. Helper's death the old home has been broken up and the property is now offered for sale. So true and sad it is that the places that knew us shall know us no more forever.

A lecture by Dr. Thos. P. Harrison on "Men and Books" in the Shearer Biblical Hall is announced for Monday evening. On Wednesday night the Sophomore class banquet will be celebrated.

On Friday evening the students of the two colleges, the faculties, and their wives will be tendered a reception by the faculty and your young ladies of the Presbyterian College in Charlotte. A happy and brilliant evening is anticipated.

The marshals in the Phi. society are H. A. Knox, R. D. Dickson, A. W. Shaw, Henderson Irwin. There is universal regret in college that Mr. A. R. McQueen of the Senior class, editor of Quips and Cranks, and a prominent member of the Glee Club has had to leave Davidson and go to Texas for an indefinite time to nurse a sick brother.

February 6, 1903.

VIRGINIA.

Union Seminary Notes.

The friends of the Seminary will hear with deep gratitude that the anxiety of the past two weeks is removed, and that by a marked dispensation of Providence there have been no additional cases of varioloid or small-pox. Mr. A. D. Watkins of the Senior class was the sole victim of a very mild form of varioloid, though fully one third of the students were directly exposed to the disease; and while we believe firmly in vaccination and quarantine, as observed at this time, it does seem in this especial case that the Providence of God consisted in something more than the mere blessing of these means. The quarantine was raised on Tuesday last and regular work resumed.

The missionary interest of the community is being stimulated by the visit of Rev. S. R. Gammon of the Brazil Mission, wife and little daughter, who are the guests of Mrs. A. R. Jamieson. Miss Kemper also of Brazil is expected soon to visit at Dr. J. R. Smith's on Chamberlyne Ave. Last night, in the Seminary chapel, Mr. Gammon spoke most interestingly on "Christ's Accession Command," taking a basis for his remarks Act. 1: 8, 9. To-night he will speak on "Christ's Accession Gift" and on next Monday at 7: 30 p. m., his theme will be "The Brazil Mission." This most earnest and faithful missionary of the Cross has won the hearts of the students and his visits will be fruitful of much good to the cause he loves.

Two other meetings of a missionary character will be held on Sunday and Wednesday evenings of next week when the community will hear, with peculiar interest, Rev. I. E. Yohannon, class '01, of Persia, who will return soon to his native land.

Rev. Geo. L. Leyburn of St. Louis, Mo., Supt. of Home Missions of the Synod of Missouri, is spending a few days on the hill in the interest of the work in that section; and in the near future, Rev. E. E. Gillespie of North Carolina will present the Home Mission work of that Synod to members of the graduating class. The class numbers only fifteen and numerous calls have come in already. How truly are the words of the Master emphasized, "The harvest truly is great but the laborers are few: pray ye, etc."

Rev. J. F. Preston, one of the three travelling representatives of the Forward Movement in the Southern Presbyterian Church, has been here recently with a view to enlisting students for this special work of the Church during their summer vacations. Several are giving the matter careful consideration.

Mr. S. B. Spring, of the Choctaw Nation, Indian Territory, has entered the Seminary, and is living at Westwood.

A valuable addition to the portraits in the Reading Room of Spence Library is a very handsome oil painting of Dr. John Holt Rice, founder of the Seminary. The work is that of Ingham of New York, a famous portrait painter of his day, and is kindly presented by Miss Catherine R. James of Richmond whose father, Mr. Joseph S. James, was a warm friend of Dr. Rice, then his pastor.

One of the most enjoyable sociables of the session was the reception given by Mrs. A. R. Jamieson, Jan. 30th. at her beautiful new home on Chamberlyne Ave. in honor of Rev. and Mrs. Gammon, and Miss Kemper all of Brazil. Among the invited guests were the Presbyterian ministers of Richmond and their wives, the faculty of the Seminary and their wives and a number of the students. The effort to make the interest of the evening center around the mission cause was altogether successful, and we feel that this reception had the sanction and blessing of Him who choose to grace the festive occasion at Cana of Galilee.

W. M. Walsh.

RICHMOND.—At the minister's meeting on Monday morning, there were twelve present. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. S. R. Gammon in behalf of our mission and educational work at Campinas and Lavra, Brazil. Much interest was expressed in his important school work, which Mr. Gammon has so much at heart, and steps were taken looking to assistance.

A letter was adopted recommending Messrs. Yohannon and Sayad to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions for their enlisting them as missionaries in Persia.

At the Hoge Memorial Church, on Sunday morning, the pastor, Mr. Cook, baptized one child, and at the homes of his people, six others. At the night service there was a large congregation, and the communion was administered.

At the Third Presbyterian Church Mr. Eggleston began a series of Sunday night sermons. A neat card announces these sermons as twenty minutes long, and gives the subjects for each night. For February they are as follows: February 1st, "Organized Labor from a Scriptural Standpoint;" February 8th, "The Business Man from a Religious Man's Standpoint;" February 15th, "The Wonderful Power of One Woman's Life;" February 22nd, "The Greatest Sin of this The Greatest Age." Dr. Eggleston and some of his workers have opened a mission at Montrose Chapel, near the National Cemetery, at the east end of the city, with good prospects.

DAGGERS.—The Rev. R. W. Jopling writes, January 28th: "On Saturday, January 24th, we went up to our new mission chapel, through a blinding snow storm, and organized a Ladies' Missionary Society, with nineteen charter members. We hope to double this number in the near future. Miss Daisy Deisher was elected president; Mrs. M. C. Robinson, vice-president; Mrs. Bertha Newcomb, secretary, and Mrs. M. K. Deisher, treasurer. Having heard and received this gospel ourselves, we want to send it to others.

FRONT ROYAL.—At a congregational meeting held on a Sabbath, February 1st, it was decided to go to work at an early day to build a much needed manse for the Front Royal Church. Most of the money for the purpose is in sight, and we feel encouraged.

HILLSVILLE.—At a congregational meeting held in the Hillsville Presbyterian Church, January 25, 1903, the church, at the request of the pastor, Rev. Letcher Smith, united with him in requesting Abingdon Presbytery to dissolve the pastoral relation between himself and that church. Mr. Smith goes to North Carolina, where he has accepted work in the Presbytery of Fayetteville.

On leaving the pastorate of the Hillsville Church the pastor desires to say that he does not expect to find a kinder nor more generous people anywhere on the earth. During his whole stay of over four years among them they have ever been careful of his comfort and careful also to discharge their duty in administering to his necessities in the sickness and distress of him and family. Surely God's mercy and blessing will ever be with them.

MANCHESTER.—At the communion service on last Sunday, February 1st, Rev. J. J. Fix, pastor, five persons were added to the church. The congregations are increasing, and the people are much cheered with the prospect of growth and revived interest.—Central Presbyterian.

GEORGIA.

ATLANTA.—At the meeting of the Presbyterian ministers, January 26th, held in the parlors of the First Presbyterian Church, Rev. G. W. Bull, D. D., read a paper on "The Natural and Supernatural in Miracles." The paper was listened to with much interest, after which there was discussion. Dr. Bull announced that he would follow up the paper at future meetings on the same subject.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

WALTERBORO, CORINTH AND M'PHERSONVILLE.—Rev. S. C. Caldwell was installed pastor of Walterboro Church on Sunday, January 11th, by a commission of Charleston Presbytery. Rev. Alexander Sprunt, D. D., preached, presided and propounded the constitutional questions, and also delivered the charge to the pastor. Rev. Alexander Martin delivered the charge to the people. In the afternoon of the same day Mr. Caldwell was installed pastor of Corinth Church by the same commission.

Temperance.

In Behalf of the Women.

A correspondent of the principal saloon organ in North Carolina writes deprecatingly of the "many preachers and women" who have visited Raleigh and written to the members of the Legislature in advocacy of the London Bill. We think he has been misinformed as to the first part of the charge. Of course we have no means of knowing how many letters have been written. But this anti-saloon movement is essentially a movement of men and of laymen. We believe that there are two preachers on the Executive Committee, who are also interested in business enterprises, namely the editing of religious papers. There were some ministers at the hearing before the Committee on Propositions and Grievances, representing the great religious bodies of the State, and some local bodies. But the great majority of those appearing before the committee were laymen of the different professions and business men. And there was only one woman who spoke before the committee, the president of the W. C. T. U., which has been working altogether independently of the Anti-Saloon League.

Still it would be felt even by the most degraded bar-room habitue that a preacher who was on the other side in this fight had missed his calling or had sold himself to the devil, in advocating the saloon.

Of course we are very sorry if any of the women—we suppose the preachers can speak for themselves—have written injudicious things to the members of the Legislature. We are sure that the great body of the women have been silent unless their voices have been raised to the Father that seeth in secret. At the same time it would be a great mistake to suppose that because they are not voters and their influence does not enter the realm of politics through political channels therefore the women have nothing to do with the temperance question, or that any interest they may show in the securing of righteous laws is an impertinence. Softly, my masters, they have everything to do with it.

The saloon is to-day the greatest enemy of the home and the home is woman's kingdom. We do not blame a woman for being even tigerish in defending her home, or in the indulgence of the fiercest hatred to the destroyer of the home. The women have suffered too much, they have been disgraced and humiliated too much to make any truce with their enemy.

When the saloon began to tempt the boy into paths of vice and riotous excess it was the mother who bore him that bore the burden of his sin and shame and suffered as he will not suffer this side of hell. And the young man's sisters who were so proud of him and hoped so much from him have had to bear their burden too, of disappointment, of the shame to the family name, of the taint that attaches to the drunkard's very kindred as though there were something evil in the blood. And then some fond and foolish woman has persuaded herself that for her sake and for her great love's sake the young man will reform. And he has stood with her at the altar, as pure herself as the orange blossoms in her hair, and he has made vows of love and honor and protection and sacred cherishing. And then the young wife has had to drink the bitter cup and find that even her love was powerless. It will never be known this side the judgment day what the wives of drunkards have suffered, in abuse, and violence, and the shattering of every dream of happiness, and the death of love itself. Nor is the poor wife the last of the women to endure and suffer. The drunkard's daughter has her share of it too. No matter how personally attractive she may be, there is a blight upon her young life, and it really makes little difference whether her father is brought home in a carriage or stumbles to his hut in a poverty-stricken neighborhood, she is the drunkard's daughter still, with the taint of his passion poisoning her life. Nor is it always the women who can talk about it that suffer the most. There are some homes where very loyalty keeps the lips closed from the denunciation of the saloon, lest the finger be pointed at the sad example of the ruin of the innocent their own home can furnish.

So we hope, gentlemen of the Legislature, that you will excuse some of the women if they have written too many letters. Southern gallantry is not yet dead. The women may not understand all the conditions and compromises that have to be made to secure legislation. But they want the saloon, the enemy of their peace, the destroyer of their kingdom, done to death. They do not vote and they would scarcely know whether you ran for Congress or the Vice-Presidency, last fall. They have nothing to do with politics. They know nothing about politics. But they know something about the misery that the saloon has brought into their lives or the lives of their sisters. And they have something to do with that after all.

The World.

The most refreshing piece of news that the country has had for a long time was the announcement of the fact that J. Edward Addicks had given up his attempt to buy a seat in the United States Senate. It does begin to look as if the political standards of the country were improving.

Mr. J. Edward Addicks was a successful business man, who made his millions in gas. Except for his political ambition and the method he chose for entering a political career, he might have handed down an honorable name, even though obscure. He has been exalted to the "bad eminence" of a corrupt and corrupting politician, who tried to buy for himself, with his money, what his own talents or abilities would never have suggested to his admiring fellow-countrymen. Undoubtedly, however, his defeat was far the best thing for himself and for his party. It is scarcely possible that he could ever have been admitted to the Senate in the face of the unblushing bribery that he has practiced. And the endorsement which his admission would have meant would have been too heavy a load for his party to carry in the evenly matched fight that is next before it. Then how could any man, however coarse, be happy in the possession of a public office won in that way? He would have been absolutely without influence, his name would have been a hissing and a by-word, and his example one for the moralist to hold up to the execration of men. Mr. J. Edward Addicks ought to be congratulating himself that he has been relegated to comparative obscurity and saved from the conspicuous position which he coveted. He would have needed the epidermis of a rhinoceros.

The story of the fight is one to the credit and discredit of human nature. Delaware used to be known in the nation for the ability of the statesmen who represented her in Congress, such men as Thomas F. Bayard, like the Bayard of old, "without fear and without reproach," and George Gray, now the impartial and fearless head of the body of distinguished men who make up the Coal Strike Commission. For a number of years the state has been Democratic. But it was a small state and it was becoming a doubtful state. And Mr. J. Edward Addicks saw, or rather imagined that he saw, his opportunity to buy up a sovereign state as he would have bought a gas-plant. Two things were necessary to accomplish his desired end, the changing of the political complexion of the state from Democratic to Republican and the control of the majority thus elected. Therefore, since the advent of Mr. J. Edward Addicks there have been three parties in Delaware, the Democratic, the Union Republican, as the Addicks supporters called themselves, and the Regular Republicans, who were opposed to Addicks and his methods.

First Mr. J. Edward Addicks had to secure citizenship in the little state of Delaware. He then set to work to corrupt first the Republican Party and then the electorate of the state itself. His determination and perseverance were unbounded and his moral sense was adequately blunt. He perhaps thinks himself, even now, a greatly injured citizen. He soon gained control of the majority of the party, and then he succeeded in buying enough Democratic votes to give his party the majority in the legislature. But the two minorities, the Democratic and the Regular Republicans, were, united, a majority. And while they have been unwilling, up to this writing, to unite in electing the Senators to which the state is entitled, so that it has gone unrepresented in the Senate altogether, they have prevented the election of Mr. J. Edward Addicks.

And his spectacular withdrawal from the race the other day is a tribute to the honesty of the little commonwealth, all things considered. George Kennan, the famous correspondent, published in last week's Outlook some of the details. The chief effort was made in the two Southern counties of Sussex and Kent. Much has been said of the sturdy Anglo-Saxon strain of these two counties, as an evidence of the impossibility of bribing the people. Mr. Kennan remarks that "more than fifty per cent of the Republican voters in Kent and Sussex counties are 'Anglo-Saxons' from the Coast of Africa, whose incorruptibility is not wholly beyond question." So the North, whose decent people of course condemn the whole Addicks crew, has another lesson on the value of the negro vote and the imperative necessity of limiting that suffrage. The final lesson will come, when through the negro votes of some National Convention, some statesman of the Addicks type, buys his way into a nomination for the Presidency, or when the negro vote that holds the balance of power in several Northern States is bought wholesale, as Addicks bought them in Delaware. A bill has just been introduced into the Kansas Legislature, recommending the disfranchisement of the negroes. What a pity some things were not thought of forty years or so ago!

Mr. J. Edward Addicks has paid dearly in cash for his exaltation from obscurity to infamy. In campaign years alone he has spent in Delaware $400,000. The difference in the cost of white and negro votes is stated in the act that 89 votes at one precinct cost thirty dollars apiece, while 100 negro votes at the same precinct cost only ten dollars a piece. The market price of votes has been known to advance from fifteen dollars in the morning of a close election to twenty-five dollars in the afternoon, and although five thousand dollars was spent in one precinct the plurality gained was only 98. In one precinct 258 out of 260 negro voters were "persuaded" to vote the Union Republican ticket. A German citizen having two sons who were also voters presented a peculiarly shaped button, given him by the voter's assistant, to the "cashier," and received $75 in exchange. He remarked that it would take a good many drops of sweat to make $75.

A Regular Republican, Dr. L. H. Ball, was offered the other United States Senatorship, if he would support Addicks, and when he refused, was threatened with defeat for Congress and was defeated, by the running of the Union Republican, Byrne—a Democrat getting the place.

It was this Byrne, whom President Roosevelt recently appointed District Attorney, with that intermittent want of principle in appointments, which was noticeable sometimes while he was Governor of New York. The Senate very properly refused to confirm Byrne, and it was probably this action that discouraged Addicks finally, as a forecast of what he might expect when knocking at the Senate door.

One thing has been accomplished. The state has been bribed away from the Democratic Party, by the purchase of venal Democratic votes. By rights there should be two Democratic Senators from Delaware as in former times, instead of the two Republican Senators who will now probably be elected. But at least the main briber will not get in. We think that his defeat is a hopeful sign. Money is mighty in beneficence, but a weak thing to him who leaves out of view the power of conscience and the incorruptibility of true manhood. Considering that about a half-million of dollars has been spent in a state of small population, $80,000 in two counties, among less than eight thousand voters, and that this effort failed, we think that the Republic is safe from the dangers of a money-corrupted electorate—certainly since the elimination of the venal negro vote. Mr. J. Edward Addicks was doubtless like Pharaoh of old, "raised up for this purpose." And perhaps also to point the necessity of electing Senators by popular vote. One cannot bribe a whole people as easily as one can a few representatives.

The causes of the coal famine by which the larger cities on or near our Atlantic coast have been afflicted, are less obscure than they were last week, but it is to be hoped that they will be made the subject of a searching inquiry at the hands of the Pennsylvania Legislature. It is certain that the Reading Company is striving to make the largest delivery of anthracite in its power, and that it has faithfully kept its promise to keep down the retail price of all the output from its own mines to $6.75 per ton. All those consumers, on the other hand, who are obliged to rely on anthracite mined by individual operators have had to pay very much higher prices. It now turns out that the supply of anthracite would be ample if the normal consumers of that combustible were not now subjected to competition on the part of manufacturers who ordinarily use bituminous coal. It is the relative dearth of bituminous coal in the seaboard cities which is now at the root of the trouble. Who is to blame for this dearth? The bituminous operators assert that they could produce from two to four times as much coal as they now do if the Pennsylvania railway lines would haul it. The railway officials, on their part, say that they have neither cars nor locomotives enough to haul any more coal than they now do. They are suffering, they say, from a general freight congestion, and cannot be expeoted to devote the whole of their rolling-stock to the transportation of bituminous coal. Whether this explanation is well founded is just one of the questions upon which light might be cast by a legislative inquiry. One thing seems certain, namely, that bituminous coal, usually worth in seaboard cities three dollars or four dollars per ton, retail, is not now selling at seven dollars to nine dollars a ton because there is a demand for it on the part of householders, who would prefer anthracite. On the contrary, it is manufacturers who, unable to obtain their normal supplies of bituminous coal, are now buying the small sizes of anthracite formerly used in private houses. The responsibility for the present inordinate prices of fuel seems to lie between the bituminous operators and the Pennsylvania railway.—Harper's Weekly.

Ever since Prof. Tyndall first discovered the movement of glaciers, attempts have been made by scientists to ascertain the exact depths of these natural phenomena by boring. Profs. Blumcke and Hess, from Bavaria, who are well known for their studies of glaciers, have succeeded in boring through the Hintereis glacier in the Otztal Alps, and found the ice to be 153 meters deep. The machine used for boring was driven by hand, and somewhat resembled that usually employed for experimental boring in mines, but was fitted with special arrangements for washing out fragments of ice from the bore hole to prevent their freezing together again. The expenses of the investigation, which is of incalculable benefit to science, were defrayed by the German and Austrian Alpine Clubs.—Scientific American.

San Francisco, Feb. 8.—News of a fearful loss of life in a disastrous storm which swept over the South Sea Islands last month, reached here to-day by the steamer Mariposa, direct from Tahiti. The loss of life is estimated at 1,000 persons. On January 13 last, a huge tidal wave, accompanied by a terrific hurricane, attacked the Society Islands and the Puamotu group with fearful force, causing death and devastation never before equaled in a land of great storms. The storm raged several days. From the news received up to the time of the sailing of the steamer, it is estimated that 1,000 of the islanders lost their lives.

Governor Odell, in his message to the New York Legislature, called for an amendment of the present tenement house law, and this has been followed by a series of demands by the tenement builders. The proposed changes will allow 75 instead of 70 per cent. of the lot to be built upon, and permits rooms with no windows, and simply stipulates that men may be able to see, instead of to read in the rooms. Meetings were held last week by the Federation of Churches and Christian organizations, at which the tenement question was considered, and strong effort will be directed against the proposed amendments.

Brig-Gen. William Crozier, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance of the War Department, dedicates to the public his invention of certain improvements in wirewound guns. Gen. Crozier has taken this step in order that inventors who desire still further to improve on the gun may have the opportunity to use his invention as the basis of their work. In his letter he says that:

"A feature of my invention consists in the manner of so locking together the parts of the gun that they cannot separate in a longitudinal direction under the action of the forces to which the gun is subjected, at the same time interrupting in a very slight degree the continuity of the wire envelope."

None of the industries have been so benefitted by the present era of prosperity as that of locomotive and railroad rolling stock construction. It was announced a few weeks ago that the Canadian Pacific Company was compelled to send an order for locomotives to Scotland, for the reason that it could not be placed in this country except for delivery in the remote future. This order involved twelve ten-wheeled modern locomotives.

W. H. MacMillan of St. Louis has planned an exploration of the Blue Nile, to see about opening a route for trade between Abyssinia and the Mediterranean. One hundred camels with forty helpers will be provided. The expedition will start in June, and traverse the thousand mile course of the Nile, to its junction with the White Nile at Khartoum.

The present Parliament in Japan promises much of interest. Two important measures are to be discussed; the government's plan for the expansion of the Navy, and the rate of land tax. The naval expansion scheme contemplates the expenditure of about eleven and a half million yen. This is needful if Japan is to hold her own in the East, and no other source can furnish the sum of money but the present land tax. The principle point then will be whether the people are able to bear this tax.

At a village in Sussex, less than fifty miles from London, a field of natural gas has been struck which promises to be greater than any single American field. The possibilities are vast—the company hopes to furnish light and power to the whole of southern and central England—the initial boring is estimated at 15,000,000 cubic feet per day—twenty such borings will furnish the area mentioned above.

It is stated that an International Congress on Wireless Telegraphy will take place in Berlin about the first of April. The United States, France, Austria, Hungary, Italy and Russia have responded to the call, on condition that the program is fixed before hand, and sent to each country. England's official assent to the Conference has not yet reached Berlin.

Arrangements are in progress in Concord, Mass., for the observance of the centennial of the birth of Ralph Waldo Emerson, May 25. The Social Circle, of which Mr. Emerson was a member for forty-three years prior to his death in 1881, has appointed a committee to prepare the programme. In the morning there will be exercises in the Town Hall for the children and in the afternoon the exercises will be in the Unitarian Church.

Brother Dowie tempts disaster by planning a campaign in New York City. He will find that evangelizing the simple, innocent and unwordly populace of Chicago is a very different proposition from grappling with the iniquitous society leaders of the metropolis, who have successfully resisted the powerful wrestlings of Colonel Watterson himself.—Chicago Chronicle.

A bill has been introduced in Congress providing for a statue of President Monroe to be erected in Central Park, New York. That city is a believer in the Monroe Doctrine, and a monument to the originator of the doctrine would be a welcome addition to its memorials—providing it is more artistic and impressive than some of the statues which now adorn its public places.—Troy Times.

The German steamer Moltke has been cruising in West Indian waters—so says a N. Y. journal—and taking photographs of the fortifications. A number of military and naval officials are on board, who have been making soundings among the Islands. This may be solely for geographical reasons. However, it is interesting.

The Anti-Trust bill, framed by Mr. Littlefield, seems to have the approval of Mr. Roosevelt and the Attorney General. In it, a refusal to comply with the provisions intended to assure publicity is no longer punishable by imprisonment, but by a fine not to exceed $5,000.

Canada papers state that Mr. Chamberlain has agreed with the leading financiers in the Transvaal that its contribution towards the expense of the war be fixed at 30 million pounds sterling.

An organized effort is being made in Paris to resuscitate the Dreyfus affair. The question of teaching politics in the schools of France caused a lively debate in the Chamber of Commerce last week.

The Congo Free State, Africa, has taken steps to stop the ruthless slaughter of elephants. At the present rate of extermination, they will be extinct in ten years.

Mr. Carnegie, in furtherance of his educational scheme for Scotland has decided to give $5,000,000, the proceeds of which will go to scientific research.

The Battleship Illinois will go to New Orleans for the Mardi Gras, if the Mississippi is deep enough; otherwise, the Texas will participate in the festivities.

One thousand street railway employes at Montreal, Canada, are on a strike.

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell
When I embark:

LEONARD.—Mrs. Lucy J. Leonard, wife of Mr. Geo. Leonard, in her sixty-first year entered into rest on Nov. 22, 1902. Although a great sufferer for many years, yet her faith in Jesus remained unshaken throughout her severe affliction. She always delighted to have her pastor to read and pray with her.

DAVIS.—Mrs. Barbara Davis, wife of Mr. Martin C. Davis, died Nov. 9th, 1902, in her 45th year, after a short illness from pneumonia.

She was a member of Sugar Creek Church, an amiable Christian, faithful wife, and devoted mother. None knew her but to love her. Her end was peace.
T. J. Allison.

BARRINGER.—Mrs. Mary Cordelia Barringer, daughter of the late John F. and Jane C. McCorkle, of Rowan county, was born April 22nd, 1841. She was married to the late M. L. Barringer, June 20, 1867. She died at her home in Charlotte, N. C., Dec. 19 1902. She leaves two children, Mrs. E. B. Watt's of Statesville, N. C., and W. M. Barringer of Charlotte, N. C., also two sisters, Mrs. C. Scott of Charlotte, N. C. and Mrs. J. E. Fogartie of Clarksville, Tenn.

Mrs. Barringer was a woman of quiet gentle Christian character. Her life was consecrated to her Master's service in the home and the church. She was for many years a devoted member of the First Presbyterian Church of Charlotte, N. C. Her last illness was singularly free from suffering and the end came quietly and peacefully. Conscious till within a short time before her death and fully aware of her condition, her mind was in perfect peace and she welcomed her dismissal to rest.

Resolutions adopted by the Sunday-school of the First Presbyterian Church of Rock Hill, S. C., Jan. 25, 1903.

Whereas, God in his inscrutable wisdom has removed from us our loved and honored friend, Andrew Hutchinson White, who labored so long and faithfully amongst us; therefore, be it

Resolved, First, That while we bow humbly to the will of God we recognize that we have sustained a great loss in his death.

Resolved, Second, That we now express our sincere appreciation of his devoted service to this Sunday-school as teacher, as superintendent, and as librarian.

Resolved, Third, That we commend to all our members his example of devotion to duty, of unvarying promptness, and of thorough consecration to the Master's service.

Resolved, Fourth, That we express to his bereaved family our deep sympathy in their great sorrow.

The Household.

The Sorrows of Childhood.

May Sherrill, the little girl who was dangerously burned in her efforts to save her doll from being destroyed by fire, is still living.

She ought to live, one cannot keep from thinking. The child has in her the great unselfish motherhood that dares and counts nothing as a sacrifice. She has been penalized rather heavily, and because she is only three years old and has not learned to think as the world thinks, she probably suffers as much on account of the destruction of her doll as she suffers because of her own bodily pain.

Do children really suffer? Suffer! Why, there is no agony on earth more excruciating than the suffering of a child. You are grown up now and think you have forgotten, but you haven't. When you come to die, or in tense moments, you will feel that you have a great white scar that marks the supreme, wild sorrow that possessed your helpless child's soul. Can't you understand the swift, clean agony that came to that little girl as she tottered rover to save that burning doll with the eyes of China blue—her doll—her child? Suffer—a child suffer? The man immersed in business cares finches even now when he looks back on the years and remembers the death of the dog, his dog, that died when he was young and tender—finches at keen recollection of the cold, bleak sky, the stillness in the atmosphere, and the little dark body that romped no longer, but lay cold and inert. The bitter, bitter wail that choked the throat then might have filled a universe with its sadness. Children are the playthings of Grief a thing that the added years learns one to fight and, God willing, to subdue. The child has since died.—I. E. Avery, in Charlotte Observer.

St. Valentine Dinner.

As St. Valentine's Day is one of the gayest festivals of the year, and no longer a day confined to the interchange of love lorn letters elaborately fabricated of gold and silver and paper lace, it affords an excellent opportunity to give a delightful dinner. February is a bleak, cold month, winter has become an old story, and therefore anything suggestive of spring is welcome. A happy combination for a Valentine Dinner is dainty, spring-like fare, with a setting replete with coziness and good cheer. Choose for the general color scheme a royal red, the color of the ruby, the gem symbolical of the core of the heart. For Valentine's Day the festival of lovers, the rose is the flower for table decoration. The dining-room should be lighted with candles; the shades should be made of artificial red roses. The soft light of the candles, with the glow of the shades, gives a wonderfully mellow light.

On entering the drawing-room the guests should find a screen made of a sheet, upon which are pinned as many hearts as there are couples. These hearts are made of scarlet cardboard and should be about six inches in length, in order to make a fair target. Upon the reverse side of each heart should be the name of a young woman present. The men are provided with bows and arrows, and by their luck in archery their choice of dinner partners is to be determined. That is to say, the heart that a man strikes or pierces with his arrow carries the name of the young woman he is to take to the dinner table.

The effect, you see, is not far different from what it used to be when our great, great, great-grand-fathers and mothers tossed their little, inscribed billets or hearts into a basket, and then drew the slips lottery-wise. Only in the old time one's "Valentine" lasted not through the evening merriment alone, but through the entire year. In those days one was bound to the service of his Valentine. Indeed, it was no uncommon thing for the imaginary to lead to a real engagement. Of these old customs our English poets have sung enchantingly, of all, perhaps, Herrick the most completely and affectionately—one might almost say most racially, for the very flavor of our race is in his country songs.

Those were the days of graceful symbolism, and it is interesting to think that we are reviving customs thousands of years old, and much refining them with the archery and red hearts.

Before dismissing this point of the evening's merriment, we might suggest that a statuette of the ancient god of love—there is a pleasing one by an old Greek sculptor—might be placed in some niche lighted with lamps and made fragrant with red roses. Or the little statue might be set over the screen upon which the hearts are pinned, the presiding divinity, as it were, of the archer's fortune. In the symbolic use of Cupid's statue for this evening there is great opportunity for the display of individual taste and fancy.

The place cards are heart-shaped valentines, decorated in water colors with cupids and suitable valentine verses. To the red streamers are attached two smaller hearts, one for the name, the other for the date. The centerpiece is a heart-shaped basket, made of cardboard, covered with red crepe paper and filled with meteor roses and asparagus fern. The shades are of a simple and severe style, decorated in water colors with red hearts. The daring red on the plain white is clear cut and effective.

The oyster cocktail is most attractive when served in ice shells. These are easily made at home by piling up small scalloped tins half filled with water which is allowed to freeze. The tins will separate readily when they are slightly warmed. After the shells are filled with the oyster cocktail, place in the centre of each a heart cut from a pimento or Mexican pepper, with a heart-shaped vegetable cutter.

In each plate of consomme put several tiny hearts cut from thin slices of beets. The creamed fish is prettily served in heart-shaped paper cases. The sandwiches should be very thin and stamped into hearts with a heart-shaped cake cutter. Brown roast of lamb is always an attractive piece de resistance, and with the tender green peas offers a taste of spring fare. The salad is a most effective one.

The dessert is a distinctly novel and dainty one. The tiny hearts of ruby-colored jelly, scattered over the soft fluff of whipped cream, make an altogether fascinating dish. The cakes are of home manufacture.

A white cake mixture was baked in heart-shaped pans. The icing was colored red with a harmless vegetable coloring matter used by confectioners. Each cake is pierced with a metal arrow. The bonbons are red and white hearts and a dish of delicious candied cherries. They and the cakes are in heart-shaped silver dishes.—Collier's Weekly.

Hints for Home Makers.

A simple desert whose garnishings give it quite the company touch starts with some small light cakes baked in round tins and served fresh from the oven, with a hot chocolate sauce poured over them and a spoonful of whipped cream placed lightly on top of each.

Bananas can be served as a vegetable if they are used green. Cut the fruit in halves, stew twenty-five minutes in a very little water, drain, cover with a cream sauce such as is used with cauliflower, and serve hot.

The ripe fruit is delicious as a garnish to meat. Cut round slices from ripe firm bananas, fry in butter, and lay a few on top and around a broiled steak as it goes to the table.

A new short-cake is made by cutting a square sponge cake into slices half an inch thick, piling them solidly with cut-up pieces, and covering them with whipped cream.

"Collar" is the unusual name applied in England to preparation of meat that is only slightly different from one often served here. Equal parts of cold cooked ham and tongue are put through the meat chopper, and afterwards pounded to a paste, a little dry mustard added, and the whole heated. When warm press down in a bowl, put on a weight, and let stand to get cold, and pack into form. Slice thin and serve at luncheon or supper.—Harper's Bazaar.

The Home Circle.

The Story of a Life.

By Robert J. Burdette.

Night. Silence. A struggling for the light.

And he did not know what light was. An effort to cry. And he did not know that he had a voice.

He opened his eyes "and there was light." He had never used his eyes before, but he could see with them.

He parted his lips and hailed this world with a cry for help. A tiny craft in sight of new shores; he wanted his latitude and longitude. He could not tell from what port he had cleared; he did not know where he was; he had no reckoning, no chart, no pilot.

He did not know the language of the inhabitants of the planet upon which providence had cast him. So he saluted them in the one universal speech of God's creatures—a cry. Everybody, every one of God's children, understands that.

Nobody knew whence he came. Some one said: "He came from heaven." They did not even know the name of the little life that came throbbing out of the darkness into the light. They had only said: "If it should be a girl." They did not know.

And the baby himself knew as little about it as did the learned people gathered to welcome him. He heard them speak. He had never used his ears until now, but he could hear them. "A good cry," some one said. He did not understand the words, but he kept on crying.

Possibly he had never entertained any conception of the world into whose citizenship he was now received, but evidently he did not like it. The noises of it were harsh to his sensitive nerves. There was a man's voice—the doctor's strong and reassuring. There was a woman's voice, soothing and comforting—the voice of the nurse. And one was a mother's voice. There was none other like it. It was the first music he had heard in this world. And the sweetest.

By and by somebody laughed softly and said, in coaxing tones:

"There—there—there—give him his dinner."

His face was laid close against the fount of life, warm and white and tender. Nobody told him what to do. Nobody taught him. He knew. Placed suddenly on the guest list of this changing old caravansary, he knew his way at once to two places in it—his bedroom and the dining-room.

He looked young, but made himself at home with the easy assurance of an old traveller. Knew the best room in the house, demanded it, and got it. Nestled into his mother's arms as though he had been measured for them.

Found that "gracious hollow that God made" in his mother's shoulder that fit his head as pillows of down never could. Cried when they took him away from it, when he was a tiny baby "with no language but a cry." Cried once again, twenty-five or thirty years afterward, when God took it away from him. All the languages he had learned, and all the eloquent phrasing the colleges had taught him, could not then voice the sorrow of his heart so well as the tears he tried to check.

Poor little baby! Had to go to school the first day he got here. He had to begin his lessons at once. Got praised when he learned them. Got punished when he missed them.

Bit his own toes and cried when he learned there was pain in this world. Studied the subject forty years before he learned in how many ways suffering can be self-inflicted.

Reached for the moon and cried because he couldn't get it. Reached for the candle and cried because he could. First lessons in measurement. Took him fifty or sixty years of hard reading to learn why God put so many beautiful things out of our longing reach.

By and by he learned to laugh. That came later than some of the other things—much later than crying. It is a higher accomplishment. It is much harder to learn and much harder to do. He never cried unless he wished and felt just like it. But he learned to laugh many, many times when he wanted to cry.

Grew so he could laugh with a heart so full of tears they glistened in his eyes. Then people praised his laughter the most—"It was in his very eyes," they said.

Laughed, one baby day, to see the motes dance in the sunshine. Laughed at them once again, though not quite so cheerily, many years later, when he discovered they were only motes.

Cried, one baby day, when he was tired of play and wanted to be lifted in the mother arms and sung to sleep. Cried again one day when his hair was white because he was tired of work and wanted to be lifted in the arms of God and hushed to rest.

Wished half his life that he was a man. Then turned around and wished all the rest of it that he was a boy.

Seeing, hearing, playing, working, resting, believing, suffering and loving, all his life long he kept on learning the same thing he began to study when he was a baby.

Until at last, when he had learned all his lessons and school was out, somebody lifted him, just as they had done at first. Darkeness was the in room and quiet now, as it had been then. Other people stood about him, very like the people who stood there at that other time.

There was a doctor now, as then: only this doctor wore a grave look and carried a book in his hand. There was a man's voice—the doctor's, strong and reassuring. There was a woman's voice, low and comforting.

The mother voice had passed into silence. But that was the one he could most distinctly hear. The others he heard, as he heard voices like them years ago. He could not then understand what they said; he did not understand them now.

He parted his lips again, but all his school-acquired wealth of many-syllabled eloquence, all his clear lucid phrasing, had gone back to the old inarticulate cry.

Somebody at his bedside wept. Tears now, as then. But now they were not tears from his eyes.

Then some one bending over him said: "He came from heaven." Now some one, stooping above him, said: "He has gone to heaven." The blessed, unflinching faith that welcomed him, now bade him Godspeed, just as loving and trusting as ever, the one unchanging thing in this world of change.

So the baby had walked in a little circle after all, as all men, lost in a great wilderness, are said always to do.

As it was written thousands of years ago: "The dove found no rest for the sole of her foot and she returned unto him in the ark."

He felt weary now, as he was tired then. By and by, having then for the first time opened his eyes, now for the last time he closed them. And so, as one who in the gathering darkness retraces his steps by a half-remembered path, much in the same way as he had come into this world he went out of it.—"Chimes from a Jester's Bells."

His Last Will and Testament.

"Yankee, tell Conway to come here."

The office boy went out, and the business man looked, with eyes that saw not, over the roofs into the blue beyond.

His business had been wife and child to him, and now, at sixty-eight years of age, he found his grasp of the situation slipping. Competition was keen, many of the later publications had proven unprofitable, and for some time he had felt a brain trouble coming—a handwriting on the wall that soon he would be out of the race.

Conway, who had been confidential man for years, came in and stood, waiting to know Mr. Smithfield's wishes.

"Sit down. Is the door shut? I have been going over the accounts. Conway, unless something turns up there is but one thing ahead of the house."

"This edition is a drug." He picked up a volume and handled it as a woman might a rare bit of china. "It has not paid for the advertising. I thought the people would want it. I'm afraid I'm done for. Do your best for a while. I am going back to Canada for a bit—I can't think here. The worst can not come to the worst quite yet. If it should, wire me, and I will come and see that every thing is properly assigned. Here is my Power of Attorney. Thank God the record is clean. Do nothing underhanded—not even to save the House."

Conway saw the moisture in Mr. Smithfield's eyes, and the trembling touch, and left him alone. A younger man might have noticed that he had made no reply to the conditions; he had pledged himself to nothing. An opportunity was opening to prove the financial faith that was in him.

It was an open secret that Smithfield & Company was shaky; he found this out as he mingled with men whose tongues were loosened with wine. He knew that a certain sum raised by the 10th proximo would bridge present needs; he knew, too, that Mr. Smithfield expected to be recalled about that time. Since rumors were afloat about the Company it was almost impossible to borrow. The bread that Mr. Smithfield had cast on earlier waters had not returned in other coin than gratitude and respect. To plant the business on a firm footing meant a name for Conway. Compared with this, saving the pride of the old man's heart tipped the balance lightly.

Within two days printed circulars were mailed to picked men, book-lovers and buyers, in the South and West, telling in detail of an elegant edition of Greek Drama (known in the office as "The Classics," ) of the fine vellum on which it was printed, and the part Eastern Art had played in the dainty tracery on the pages, and this valuable addition to any library, in ten volumes, could be had for only $60.

Trusted stenographers were put to work and within a few days personal letters followed the Smithfield circulars. The letters were as follows:

"My dear Friend:

"We understand that you are capable of appreciating a work of literary and artistic value, hence we take pleasure in giving you the following data:

"Several months ago a large Eastern House issued an unauthorized edition of Greek Drama, edited by ----- No effort or expense was spared to make it a choice addition to any library, but when the Editor discovered the fraud, a law-suit was instituted. The Court promptly decided that he must be paid a royalty. The head of the Publishing House declined either to do this, or to further advertise the books.

"Learning of this, we offered to take the Edition off of his hands at $5 per set—in this case nothing more than junk price. The Court allowed this upon our agreeing to pay the imposed royalty.

"To celebrate our tenth anniversary, we are going to give our friends the benefit of this Masterpiece at $15 per set, if ordered within five days. The same books have been quoted within a very few days, at $60 per set.

"Very truly yours,

"Sideman & Company."

During four days Conway gave close attention to the business of Smithfield & Company. Not an order came for the sixty dollar set of books. On the morning of the fifth day, he opened the office of Sideman & Company on an adjoining street. The first delivery brought nearly one hundred orders, with cash enclosed. By night the number was largely increased, and many others followed on the second and third days. Sideman & Company sent out printed acknowledgments of the orders, and shipments from Smithfield & Company followed as fast as the orders could be handled. The public did not question, and the present was saved.

A second lot of circulars went out, to be followed by personal letters to other fortunate friends, and the third launching of the net saved the credit of the House.

Two days before the 10th, Conway wired the omnious "Come," and planned an elaborate dinner-party.

Mr. Smithfield was fishing that morning—fishing in the creek that ran back of the old village, and saw former things in the cool dark holes under the rocks. He was taking the rest-care faithfully. It was so easy to forget the now, and go back. There was the lane where he used to drive the cows. (Was that the tingle of their bells he heard in the far-away?) Over the hill was the brick school house, and under those trees the boys used to play ball. He leaned against the mossy tree and held the rod lightly. Other men have fished when a catch would have startled them. Fifty years ago they gave him a farewell dance. His hair was cut straight from ear to ear, and he wore glory in the form of his father's dress coat that came from over the sea. Each of the boys had followed him out of that little world; not one of them was there to welcome him. Jim Rathbone was a Chicago Professor. Little Charlie Johnson was a Cincinnati Railroad President, and Matt Burrows was a surgeon in Baltimore. Some of them could not be traced. That dance and the moonlight walk home with one of the girls, the tender boyish sorrow in saying good-by, and the way his mother tucked the cover about him that last night, were being kaleidoscoped in the water when the blue-coated boy broke into the picture-making.

For a while he fingered the telegram before he opened it, then with the patience born of hopelessness, he wound up the fishing line and gave it to the messenger. In the fields across the creek the harvesters were bringing in the last sheaves of grain.

Fearing the effect if he told it all at once, Conway led his employer slowly to the happy tidings.

"The Classics did it. Judicious advertising—the entire lot went like hot gingerbread."

"We'll get out another Edition—thought that people would come to, after a while." He chuckled after the manner of a man who has just landed a blue fish. He forgot the pain in his head, in the pure joy of being alive to see the old House renew its youth. Conway was set away for his earned rest; on his return there was to be a re-adjustment of the firm name.

Morning wore to evening for ten days; in his mail Mr. Smithfield found one of the Sideman letters with the inquiry if that was really the same edition that had been prized at sixty dollars. One man out of a thousand had been a doubter.

As he read, the old pain came back. A saying of a lawyer friend. "It sav time to look for the crooked end first," burned through his brain. He had questioned so little, and now staring at him were the words "unauthorized Edition," "discovered the fraud," "law-suit," "tenth anniversary."

When they found him his hand lay on the fateful page. Across it he had written: "Conway, sell the House and return every dollar of that money."—Gardiner's Magazine.

A Valentine.

Oh! little loveliest lady mine,
 What shall I send for your valentine?
 Summer and flowers are far away;
 Gloomy old Winter is king to-day;
 Buds will not blow, and sun will not shine:
 What shall I do for a valentine?
 I've searched the gardens all through and through
 For a bud to tell of my love so true;
 But buds 'are asleep, and blossoms are dead,
 And the snow beats down on my poor little head;
 So, little loveliest lady mine,
 Here is my heart for your valentine!

Anecdotes of St. Bernards.

A New England mill-owner allowed his pet St. Bernard to sleep in the office, quite near his house. As he unlocked the door one morning he heard a low growl, and there stood the dog over the prostrate body of a man. As the mill-owner approached, the man tried to arise, but another warning growl made him drop back, ejaculating: "For God's sake, call off your dog! He's been standing over me four hours." Burglar tools lay beside him. He was unharmed and so was the safe.

A lady who was going on a long journey one summer left her "Brenner" in the care of a livery stable keeper, a friend who knew and loved the dog. Brenner was a very quiet and unobtrusive fellow, careful, to keep out of the way, yet always near at hand. So quiet was he that strangers thought him cowardly, and many times he was shoved about by teasing, human bullies—just to see what he would do. Brenner took all their rough jokes in good part until one day after his toes had been trodden on repeatedly by his chief tormentor. Finding it apparently impossible to provoke the dog, the bully turned upon the stable keeper and began wrestling with him. Up sprung Brenner like a tiger, and pushing his great body between the men he forced them apart. Then, erect upon his hind legs, he put his forepaws upon his enemy's shoulders and uttered just one fierce growl. That was enough. His toes never suffered again.

A three months old pup, by careful observation, learned the connection between the pump handle and his supply of fresh water. When the pan was empty and he felt thirsty he would seize the handle and shake it repeatedly as well as he could. If this proceeding failed to attract the attention of any one, he would take the pan in his mouth and bang it violently against the pump. As he grew older he helped the boys about their farm work—or tried to—and with very little training became a good cattle driver, never annoying the cows by barking in front of them, but following them closely and brushing the stragglers gently to persuade them to rejoin their friends. When the door of the cow barn was opened it was the signal for him to go down the lane to the pasture and bring the cattle home. He was proud of his skill, having been praised repeatedly for it. One blazing July day a chance visitor opened the door. Bravo, lying in the shade, heard and saw. It was hours too early and he was loath to leave his comfort, but the call of duty must be obeyed, and away he speed. The cows were taking their comfort, too, some resting under the elms, some standing knee-deep in the cool stream. Up they had to come, one and all, most reluctantly, surprised and unhappy. Bravo never understood why he got such a rating that afternoon.

No other breed of dog is more adaptable to changing conditions. Give him his friends and he is happy, whether hemmed in by the limitations of a city flat or free to roam over a hundred acres. He loves humanity.—Country Life.

A Gas Meter.

"This," observed Wu, as he lifted a box-like affair from his trunk, "is one of the greatest wonders of America."

"It doesn't look very wonderful," commented Tsi Ann, tucking one foot up where she could sit on it and the throne at the same time.

"No, but even in America no one can understand it. Listen."

"Don't put that thing to my ear," cautioned Tsi Ann. "Is this another of those telephones?"

"O no. This is worse than the telephone. It is a gas meter."

"A gas meter? What does it do?"

"The consumer."

"How does it work?"

"That is a mystery. It is only known that it works always and untiringly. It works while you sleep and while you wake. It never stops. It is constructed after the Newtonian theory of creation. It has something in it that just keeps it whirling on and on, at so much per revolution, and nobody knows what keeps it moving, and nobody can stop it."

"That's funny."

"Funny, yes. But very sad in America. Listen to it. Hear it running right along. Thank Confucius and the 900 gods of the Pale Green mountains! The gas company never will get the chance to read what this meter has recorded."

"But," said the empress, "is there no escape from this in America?"

"None."

"It must be worse than manifest destiny."

"It is."

"Wu," remarked Tsi Ann, with that intelligent smile which has enshrined her in the hearts of curio collectors, "Wu, I am glad you were sent to America. At one time I almost had decided to become civilized."

"So had I," acknowledged Wu, "but the bite of the dog, as the foreign devils put it, will cure the hair."—Chicago Tribune.

Then suddenly she laughed. "I wish the minister'd tell me what mine is!" she cried.

The Reflecting Stone was close to the homestead so close that Aunt Emmeline's lamplight made a gentle radiance over it. Rhoda sat down on it to "reflect." When she was a tiny thing she had thought out all her little problems and sobbed out all her little woes on that old stone.

Slowly the girl pulled off her gloves and lifted her bare fingers. She would count the things that weren't her talents. Thumb, book-learning.

"I never got above the middle of any class," she reflected, honestly. "Or below—that's some comfort. But being in the middle of things isn't a talent." And she folded the thumb under with a little sigh. Fore-finger, music—mercy! Even deaf Aunt Emmeline shuddered when she tried to sing. And long ago—how long was it?—she had shut up the cabinet organ and made a table of it.

Third finger, art—art! "I can't draw my breath straight!" laughed Rhoda, ruefully. "Once Aunt Emmeline thought she was going to teach me to make feather flowers—I wonder if feather flowers are 'art?'—but she gave it up. She never said she put 'em in the fire, but I smelt 'em."

The fingers were lessening. Rhoda wriggled the unsteady little third one thoughtfully.

"That's one's dressmaking," she decided, "I made over Ann Emmeline's black bombazine, and got both sleeves for the same arm and the collar in upside down. Poor auntie, I knew she'd go to heaven if that was her only chance. The angels themselves couldn't have borne it better, if I'd made over their black bomba—" Rhoda caught herself up hurriedly, and hastened on to the little finger.

"Bonnetts—I mean millinery," she said. "I can't trim anything—in—this—world. There was poor Mrs. Dooley's best bonnet—besides, you couldn't put 'Bonnetts trimmed—only washwomen need apply," on your sign! Well, here's one hand all used up. Go on to the other, my dear—don't flinch. Perhaps when you know what your talents, aren't, you'll find what they are."

The other hand went the way of the first. Rhoda groaned softly when all the fingers were down. Still, there was nothing to suggest the existence of the one little talent, except the minister's words. He had said "everybody." Everybody had one.

"And I'm somebody—I suppose. I'll go in and ask Aunt Emmeline!" Rhoda said.

Aunt Emmeline sat in her rocker, knitting. Knitting was Aunt Emmeline's talent. Twice a day she thanked the Lord that it was only her legs he had crippled, and sometimes, in between, Aunt Emmeline shut her eyes and moved her lips softly, as if she were thanking him again.

"Aunt Emmeline, am I somebody anybody?" Rhoda forgot for once to raise her voice. Aunt Emmeline was deaf.

"Eh, dearie? Annie Cody? Was she to the meeting?"

"Yes," smiled Rhoda, quietly, "Annie was there." She went nearer Aunt Emmeline and spoke with slow distinctness. "She said she'd found her—talent, you know—and meant to take it out of its napkin and polish it up. I can't find mine, Aunt Emmeline."

The knitting needles clicked together as they dropped into the old lady's lap. Aunt Emmeline's hand went up and stroked the girl's wistful face. "I guess it's takin' care of an old woman, dearie. Don't worry any more about that. Run away and wash up your dishes. Or are you too tired, dearie? You could leave 'em till mornin' as well as—"

"Tired!" laughed Rhoda, turning up herself from her brown, plump arms. "Was I ever tired? I'll have the water bubbling in a twinkle and then you'll see the dishes fly, auntie. I can polish those if I haven't any talents to polish!"

She was aproned, and armed with dish mop and soaper in another moment. She began to sing as she worked. It was her usual accompaniment to dish washing.

"I suppose any of the other girls would think it was awful to have to come home and wash up a mess of dishes. They'd stay at home from meeting first. That's where Rhoda Campbell's different! believe in my soul she likes to wash 'em! Of all things!—people would think you were crazy, my dear. Don't tell anybody."

The dishes rattled softly together in the big pan and came out in straight, orderly rows on the drainer, with their soap-bubbles catching the lamplight. The girl in the big apron hummed on gayly.

If there was one thing in the world she could do as it ought to be done, it was wash dishes—why! Rhoda stopped with a little exclamation of astonishment. "Why, I believe—that's—it!" she cried. "I believe to my soul it is! Whoever heard of burying your talent in the dish pan!—and fishing it out all sudsy and drippy! But there it is. There's your 'talent' my dear. Drain it and wipe it and then sit down and look it in the face."

And that was what Rhoda did, with a curious blending of amusement and seriousness in her face. It was not altogether a pleasant thought, now, was it, to sit there and reflect that the only talent you had in the world was a talent for washing dishes? Ugh! it made you feel ash—

"No, it doesn't either!" exclaimed Rhoda, with sudden energy. "It isn't anything to be ashamed of, is it, to have your tumblers always speckless and clear and shiny, and your dish towels the whitest ones in Meadowbrook? And aren't they?—didn't the doctor's wife say so? Didn't she say she wished you would come over and wash hers for her?"

Rhoda caught herself up at the odd ideas that had popped into her head. The oddness of it made her laugh, and then, little by little, the lines about the corners of her mouth steadied into sober, thoughtful ones. Why not? Why shouldn't she put her one little talent out to usury, too, instead of keeping it buried in the dish-pan?

ARE YOU RUPTURED?

Some Wholesome Advice Where Badly Needed.

Rupture is one of the many Chronic Diseases requiring special skill and experience for its proper treatment. Not only is it a source of constant pain, but if neglected or improperly treated it completely disables and incapacitates one, rendering 'hem unable to stand the least physical exertion. Unskillful treatment is dangerous, for it only aggravates the trouble and makes the patient worse. No matter how competent your family physician may be, there are many diseases which he cannot treat satisfactorily for the reason that he has not the time necessary to devote to the deep study and research of Chronic Diseases nor has he had the experience in treating them which is absolutely necessary in order to enable him to understand them thoroughly.

My cure is prompt and certain, no matter what other treatment has failed.

No delay, but write at once and be cured.

No other physician in the United States has treated as many cases of rupture as I have, and the superiority of my special plan of treatment is demonstrated in every case I undertake. I do not rely upon old-time, slow and torturous methods so long in vogue, but I have originated a thoroughly modern, scientific plan which is prompt and certain in results, in even the most severe cases. It is absolutely painless and does not involve the horrors of the knife or other dangerous treatment relied upon by other doctors. Write me for symptom blanks which explain fully how I can cure you at your own home.

General Passenger Agent, Wilmington, N. C.

The little church at Meadowbrook was in need of a new organ. The old one, spent and wheezy and tremulous with age, was never opened now and the choir of girls sang as best they could, without accompaniment. Annie Cody had been organist, and Annie had "struck." She said all the stops in the old organ were "tremulo stops," and somebody else would have to pull 'em out—she wouldn't any longer. Annie was little and fair and mild-looking, but when she said she wouldn't, she wouldn't.

That night, after meeting, the minister had made an appeal to everybody to polish up his "talents" and put them into service for the church—to get a new organ. Let everyone earn as much as possible—whether a little sum or a large one. It would all help. And think how beautiful it would be to hear sweet, clear music pealing out in the old church once more!—that had been the minister's peroration. Going home, as far as the cross-roads, the girls had talked it over enthusiastically. Only poor Rhoda had failed to think of any way to help earn the new organ. But she had thought of one now.

"I'll put out my shingle to-morrow," she laughed, a little wistfully. It would astonish people, and probably everybody would laugh. Well—let 'em!

"I would, myself," she thought, whimsically. "As if it wouldn't make me laugh to go along a road and see a sign—'Rhoda Campbell, Dishwasher. Inquire Within'—nailed to a tree! Heigho! Well, I've made up my mind to earn an organ for the church, and here goes!"

It was the doctor's wife who discovered it first. She came up the gravel walk, laughing.

"Is Miss Rhoda Campbell, Dishwasher, within? I'd like to inquire—"

"I am Rhoda Campbell, Dishwasher," the young lady in the doorway answered with dignity. The doctor's wife dropped to the doorstep and patted the space beside her invitingly.

"Let me 'inquire' without—can't I? It's so pleasant here. I want to see if I can't get somebody—professional preferred—to come over and wash my breakfast dishes for me. I have to get the children off to school and wash the baby, mornings, and the dishes do have to wait so! If I could employ a dishwasher—"

"I'm your man!" laughed Rhoda. "Try me ma'am. I've been in my 'last place' sixteen years—"

"References?"

"Annt Emmeline."

"Engaged!"

That was the beginning. Deacon Spinner came next. His broad, brown face was smiling, but the smiles did not wholly conceal its eagerness.

"Well, Rhody—er—I should say, Miss Rhody Cam'el—"

"Dishwasher. Inquire With—"

They both laughed. The old man sobered first and got down to business. He was in earnest.

"Mis' Spinner's down with sciatica ag'in an' I'm keepin' house," he said. "I don't mind anything but the dishes"—the deacon groaned. "They stick me, Rhody. I calculate they get dirtier every time I wash 'em! An' the dish towels would give Mis' Spinner a worse pain than the sciatica. I've—re—hid 'em. The new ones is givin' out. What I want is—"

"Rhoda Campbell, Dishwasher. You can have her for a reasonable sum—to be expended in church organs! Bnt I can't come till one o'clock. Can't you leave the breakfast dishes and let me do them when I do the dinner ones?"

"Jest well's not!" cried the deacon promptly. "An—er—the dish towels, rhody—" He shifted his position uneasily. It was evident the dish towels weighed upon the deacon's mind.

"I'll see to them, Deacon Spinner. Have them all unhidden to-morrow noon. I'll make them so white they'll cure the sciatica!"

So engagements thickened. There was all the home work to do first, and Rhoda soon found herself busy as a bee, and as contented. She buzzed and hummed about her work like a veritable little "worker" bee. Before the week was out she had another "customer." This time it was flurried little Mrs. Curtis, mother of ten lively small Curtises.

"Bnt I'm engaged mornings and noons, you see," Rhoda said, slowly.

"Then come nights to do the supper dishes, dear. I believe I'd rather you'd come nights. It takes me so long to wash ten faces and twenty hands—I put the children to bed clean, anyway—and to hear ten blessed little prayers, that actually, my dear, sometimes it is eight o'clock when I get round to my dishes! And once or twice I've fallen asleep with the baby and not got 'round' at all. John washed them once, but he wiped them all on the hand towel and I had to do it all over the next day—don't tell him!"

"I'll come," Rhoda said, promptly. And as that filled up her days she had to refuse all other customers.

Three weeks later Rhoda worked out a complex sum in addition on her school slate, one evening. It was complex because a portion of it dealt in "futures" and required thoughtful computation.

"I've got the answer!" she exclaimed, gayly. "If the next three weeks are as good as the last I shall be able to buy my share of the organ!" She hurried in to Aunt Emmeline and hugged her without prelude or warning.

"Bless me!" Aunt Emmeline gasped, out of breath.

"No, bless me, auntie!" cried Rhoda, her cheek rubbing against the soft, gray hair, "I've found my talent and got it out at interest. I'm going to invest it in a church organ!"

"Bless the child!" Aunt Emmeline's sweet old voice murmured.—The Advance.

A Valuable Gift.

Parents, guardians, friends and relatives could not present one with a more valuable gift than a scholarship in one of Draughon's Business Colleges located at Nashville, St. Louis, Atlanta, Montgomery, Shreveport, Galveston, Little Rock and Fort Worth. A gift of this kind is something which one can not steal, fires burn or floods wash away. Such a gift costs but little in comparison with its real value and will be a stepping stone—a firm foundation whereon one may build a successful career. Elsewhere in this issue will be found an advertisement of Prof. Draughon's Colleges. Write for catalogue before entering elsewhere.

The Best Railway Service.

The Seaboard Air Line has absolutely the shortest line from New York to Florida and with the inauguration of their new trains, the Seaboard New York Limited and the Seaboard Florida Limited, on January 12th, they make the quickest trip made between New York and Florida. These trains are made up of five Pullman cars—compartment, drawing-room, dining, sleeping and observation. By taking this train passengers get to St. Augustine first and get choice of rooms in hotels. This is the fastest train ever scheduled to Florida.

my double umbrella, black inside and white outside, for fending off both sun and rain, but had closed it over my hand, without clasping it, to go through a narrow opening in the bushes. I had crossed a little open grass plot of a few rods, and was just entering a narrow footpath through the mountain jungle, that would take me down to the east foot of the mountain, where I was to meet my pony.

Suddenly a spotted tiger sprang into the path between the bushes, and disputed the passage. I saw at once what he wanted; only great hunger impels these tigers to come out during the day; he had eaten no breakfast, and wanted missionary meat for supper. I did not wish him to have it; besides I had an appointment for that evening with the people of three villages, and wished to keep it. He stood in the only path through that dense mountain jungle glaring at me. I eyed him equally intently, and, gaining his eye, held it while I formed my plan.

It is always best, if a scrimmage is to take place, to be the attacking party. My old grandmother used to teach me that everything would come in use within seven years, if you only kept it. When I was a boy I had gone out among an Indian tribe in Michigan and learned their war-whoop. I had kept it for thrice seven years, but it proved trebly serviceable then. When my plan of attack was formed, springing forward toward the tiger, I raised this war-whoop and at the same time suddenly opened my double umbrella.

What it was that could so suddenly change a perpendicular dark figure into a circular white object, and at the same time emit such an unearthly yell, the tiger did not know. He stood his ground, however, until I dashed forward, and, suddenly, shutting my umbrella, raised it to strike him over the head. It seemed instantly to occur to him that I was the more dangerous animal of the two, and that one of us had better run: as I did not, he did. Springing aside, over a bush, into the open ground, he made for the crest of the hill which I had just passed. The crest consisted of granite slabs and masses, thrown up perpendicularly by some convulsion of nature. From a crevice of these there had grown a banyan tree, whose branches spread out over their tops. Between the leaves and the rocks, in one place I could see the sky in a circle as large as a bicycle wheel.

For this the tiger made. His spring was the neatest specimen of animal motion I had ever seen. His forepaws were stretched straight out, and he had his nose between them. His hind feet were stretched equally straight, and between them his tail. Straight as an arrow he went through that opening. I knew that about twenty feet down on the other side he would strike a grassy ground, and that that slope led down to a little stream, which my path again crossed less than a quarter of a mile below. Wishing to make the subjugation complete, I scramble up to this open place, and, looking through the leaves at the side of the opening, I saw the tiger trotting down the slope, but looking around every now and then, evidently wondering whether he had done a wise thing in running away.

Putting my head, with its big, white sun-hat into the opening, I once more raised the war-whoop. Down he dashed again with impetuosity. Withdrawing my head until he slackened his pace, I repeated the operation, and on he dashed, and so continued, until I had seen him cross the stream and go up into the woods on the opposite side of the valley. Then, feeling sure I would see no more of him that day, I turned and wended my way down three miles to the foot of the hill, mounted my pony, and kept my appointment.

I am thankful to say that such incidents are not common in our preaching tours. I have never known of a missionary being seriously injured by ravenous beasts or venomous reptiles. But such an incident forcibly reminds us of the protection promised us in the last few verses of the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, in connection with the giving of the great commission and that promise is wonderfully fulfilled.—Southern Churchman.

A Deer Story.

Brute instinct has formed the theme of many an article, and wonderful instances have been given of the exercise of almost human judgment by animals, but the following which came under our own observation, lays just a shade over anything we ever read: Last Sunday C. Sweeters and the writer were driving up the water canyon, and as we turned a bend we saw a doe and a young fawn drinking from the stone ditch. At our approach the animals were startled, and in attempting to turn and run, the fawn lost its balance and fell into the ditch. As many of our readers know, the water runs very swiftly and in great volume up there, and of course the fawn was carried down the stream. The mother deer seemed to lose all fear of us, and ran along the edge of the ditch trying to reach her offspring with her head.

Suddenly she ran ahead of the floating fawn for some little distance. She plunged into the ditch with her head down stream and her hindquarters toward the fawn, and braced her fore feet firmly in the crevices of the rocks to resist the rush of water. In a second the fawn was washed up on its mother's back, and it instinctively clasped her neck with its forelegs. The doe then sprang from the ditch with the fawn on her back. She lay down and the baby deer rolled to the ground in an utterly exhausted condition. Mr. Sweeters and I were now not more than thirty feet from the actors in this animal tragedy, but the mother, seemingly unconscious of our presence, licked and fondled her offspring for a few minutes until it rose to its feet, and the doe and fawn trotted off up the mountain side.

If there is anybody that doesn't believe Mr. Sweeters when he tells this story, let them come to us and we will vouch for it.—Banning Herald.

Questions for Boys and Girls to Think About.

If you are good at guessing or answering, here are a few questions you can wrestle with: You can see any day a white horse, but did you ever see a white colt? How many different kinds of trees grow in your neighborhood and what are they good for? Why does a horse eat grass backwards and a cow forward? Why does a hop vine wind one way and a bean vine the other? Where should a chimney be the larger, at the top or bottom, and why? Can you tell why a horse when tethered with a rope always unravels it, while a cow always twists it into a kinky knot? How old must a grape vine be before it begins to bear? Can you tell why leaves turn upside down just before a rain? What wood will bear the greatest weight before breaking? Why are all cow-paths crooked and none straight?—Exchange.

The Phonograph Discovered by Attention.

"I discovered the principle by the merest accident," says Edison, the great inventor. "I was singing to the mouth-piece of a telephone, when the vibration of the voice sent the fine steel point into my finger. That set me to thinking. If I could record the actions of the point and end the point over the same surface afterward, I saw no reason why the thing would not talk. I tried the experiment first on a strip of telegraph paper, and found that the point made an alphabet, shouted the words 'Halloa! Halloa!' in the mouthpiece, ran the paper back over the steel point, and heard a faint 'Halloa! Halloa!' in return. I determined to make a machine that would work accurately. That's the whole story. The phonograph is the result of the pricking of a finger."—Thomas A. Edison.

His Reward.

It was Donald's first year at school and he came home one day a very sober boy.

"Mamma," he said, "the teacher says if we do it again we'll all have to stay after school. I don't just know what it is,—if we whisper or if we don't study,—but any way it's something like that, and when she told us, we all cried together."

"Well," said mamma, "you need not feel badly, because I don't suppose you will have to stay," and she gave Donald a reassuring smile.

"Why?" he asked.

Because you have too much sense, it must be a very stupid boy who will play and whisper in school and then have to stay in and study in play time."

Donald seemed satisfied with this hopeful view of the case.

Two days after, his mamma saw him coming up the street holding his head so high he fairly leaned over backward. He came in and hung up his hat.

"Ho! Some boys may like to play and whisper and get kept, but I've got sense! All the boys but me got kept. We can't tell yet which it was,—whisper or not study,—but it was one of em, and I was still and worked, and here I am!"—Youth's Companion.

Cure Catarrh at Home.

A Practical Remedy so Simple and Pleasant that Even a Child can use it.

A neglected cold lays the foundation for catarrh; neglected catarrh lays the foundation for consumption. Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure will break up the cold, or cure the catarrh and prevent consumption.

The symptoms of catarrh are a discharge, which is either blown from the nose or runs back and drops into the throat; a dull headache; a stopped-up feeling in the nose and head; extreme liability to take cold, etc. These conditions often lead to noises in the head, deafness; sore throat, bronchitis, asthma, indigestion and consumption.

If you suffer from any of the above troubles you should begin the proper treatment at once.

Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure is the best remedy known to medical science for these diseases. It cures 9 out of every 100 cases.

Mrs. T. B. Teel, Clanton, Ala., writes: "Cured my boy of catarrh of four years' standing." Mr. Joe F. Williams, Zion, Miss., writes "Cured my catarrhal deafness." Mr. J. J. Mitchell, Warfield, Tenn., writes: "It removed every symptom before I had used three boxes."

SAMPLES MAILED FREE.

In order to demonstrate its virtues, a three days' trial treatment will be mailed free to any interested sufferer. The price of the remedy is $1.00 per box (one month's treatment), sent postpaid. Address Dr. Blosser Company, 355, Walton St., Atlanta, Ga.

A TRAIN FOR MILLIONAIRES

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

Raeford, N. C., Jan. 31, 1903.

Dear Standard:

My papa takes the Standard and I enjoy reading the little letters. I am going to school. My teacher's name is Miss Mary Watson. I love her very much. I go to Sunday-school every Sunday. Our pastor's name is Rev. T. A. McLaurin. I will close hoping to see my letter in print.

Your little friend,
Age 9. Willow McMillan.

Madison, Fla., Jan. 22, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I go to school, and Miss Mattie O'Neal is my teacher. I love to read your good paper. Madison has a stand pipe; it is one hundred feet high; so the town has artesian water. I have a brother that is a machinist. And I have a sister that is married. I have 5 brothers, 3 sisters. I will close.

Your friend,
Hayden Mickel.

McAdenville, N. C., Jan. 26, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl nine years old. Mama takes your nice paper. We all like it very much. I saw a letter in it from my little cousin in Statesville. I have four brothers and no sisters. My oldest brother is in Newton at school; he came home on a visit Christmas. Mama gave me a doll Christmas. I go to Sunday-school and day school. I go a mile to school. Miss Nellie Roseman and Miss Pearl Leonard are my teachers. I will close by asking a question: Which is the longest chapter in the Bible.

Julietta Maud Rankin.

Salisbury, N. C.,

Dear Standard:

I am a little girl 9 years old. My papa has been taking this paper for a long time. I go to the graded school. I am in the second grade. My teacher is Miss Lewis I have three pet cats, Nig, Dewey, and Sunflower. Please publish this.

Two Valentines.

Ralph and Ruth were sitting soberly on the rug before the cheery grate fire.

"It's so funny we never thought," Ruth said, watching the flames dancing out of sight up the broad chimney. "Someway we were so busy sending to the girls and boys that we forgot!"

"And getting such a lot ourselves," chimed in Ralph. "Well, what can we do? I've got just three cents left!"

"And I've only got two pennies," Ruth added mournfully. "Sides, everything's sold. Don't you know, the clerk said this mornung there was't a valentine left?"

"That's so; and we can't send one of ours, 'cause mamma's seen them all," Ralph said. "Anyway, 'twouldn't seem's if we sent them, you know!"

Ruth did not answer. She was too busy thinking. Just then, she caught sight of a Sunday-school card pinned to the wall. It was one of the large ones given for ten little tickets with Bible verses on them.

"Oh, I know!" she cried, jumping up suddenly. "You know that box of Sunday-school cards upstairs—let's buy some ribbon and tie some of them together—they'll make lovely Valentines!"

"Oh, let's!" cried Ralph; and in three minutes, two small figures were slipping quietly out the big front door.

It was Valentine's Day, and in the excitement, the children had not once thought of sending Valentines to father and mother, and it had occurred very suddenly to Ruth that neither had had a single one. How dreadful it seemed—a Valentine's Day without a valentine!

The five pennies were speedily exchanged for two yards and a half of bright blue baby ribbon, and home again Ruth and Ralph hurried. Mamma's stiletto was borrowed from the machine drawer and carried with the box of cards and the ribbon to the library.

There was a careful choosing of colors and verses; and then round holes were neatly punched in the corners of six of the prettiest cards, and three were fastened, one above another, with the ribbon, which was tied in a pretty bow at the top.

Mamma's was all pink-tipped daisies, and papa's pausies and ferus. And every card bore one of the sweet love-messages of our beautiful gospel.

Two happy children danced across the parlor floor, when the Valentines, each in a square white envelope, had been laid at papa's and mamma's places at the table. And, oh, how surprised both mamma and papa were! And both declared they had never, no, never, seen such dear, loving Valentines as those tender words of our Saviour, fastened together by loving little hands.—(Written for Dew Drops by Alice Miller Weeks.

What a Horse Would Say If He Could Speak.

Don't hitch me to an iron post or railing when the mercury is below freezing. I need the skin on my tongue.

Don't leave me hitched in my stall at night with a big cob right where I must lie down. I am tired and can't select a smooth place.

Don't compel me to eat more salt than I want by mixing it with oats. I know better than any other animal how much I need.

Don't think because I go free under the whip I don't get tired. You, too, would move up if under the whip.

Don't think because I am a horse iron, weeds and briars won't hurt my hay.

Don't whip me when I get frightened along the road, or I will expect it next time and maybe make trouble.

Don't trot me up hill, for I have to carry you and the buggy and myself, too. Try it yourself some time; run up with a big load.

Don't keep my stable very dark, for when I go out into the light my eyes are injured, especially if snow be on the ground.

Don't say "whoa" unless you mean it. Teach me to stop at the word. It may check me if the lines break, and save running away and smashup.

Don't make me drink ice-cold water, nor put a frosty bit in my mouth. Warm the bit by holding it a half minute against the body.

Don't forget to file my teeth when they get jagged and I can not chew my food. When I get lean it is a sign my teeth want filing.

Don't forget the old Book, that is a friend to all the oppressed, that says: "A merciful man is merciful to his beast."—Farm Journal.

Bessie's Button.

"Bessie was learning to sew on buttons. Her mother had marked the places where they were to go, and Bessie was sitting beside the open window sewing them on her new dress. They were pretty white pearl, with little stars cut on every one. Bessie just loved to look at them as they lay ranged in a row on the window-sill, shining in the sunshine.

"I've sewed on three," said Bessie; and she reached out her hand for the fourth, when in some way she knocked six of the out of the window.

"Dear me!" she said. "Now I shall have to go out and pick them up. I hope I'll find them all!" So she took off her thimble, laid the dress across a chair, and ran out into the yard.

Somebody was there before her and had picked them up, every one. Mr. Toots, the big snow-white rooster, was standing under the window, and the last button as disappearing within his beak when Bessie came around the corner.

Now Bessie was very fond of Mr. Toots. He was quite tame; and, whenever she caught him, she would lay her cheek against his smooth neck and hug him.

Whenever he saw her he would come up on the door-step "on purpose to be hugged," Bessie said. She fed him every mornung, saving the nicest crumbs for his breakfsat, and he loved to walk about the garden with her.

But now, when Bessie saw what he had done, she turned and ran into the house as fast as she could. She was almost crying. "Oh mamma, mamma," she said, "Mr. Toots has eaten six of my buttons, and he will die!"

Mamma looked surprised, then she smiled. "Oh no, Mr. Toots won't die," she said. "Buttons are just the sort of things Mr. Toots needs to chew his food with."

Bessie opened her eyes wide at that, and her mother laughed. "You know Mr. Toots hasn't any teeth," she explained, "so he has to grind his food in a little tough bag inside of him, which is called his gizzard. But there needs to be something hard, like gravel stones or bits of crockery, to mix with the food and help grind it fine as the gizzard squeezes and squeezes it. Your buttons, with their fine edges, will be nice for that purpose."

And just at that moment Mr. Toots answered for himself in a hearty voice, looking in at the door. "Cock-a-doodle-doo!" he said, which meant, "Nonsense, don't worry about me!"—Susan Brown Robbins, in Little Folks.

Harry's Valentine.

O lady fair,
With golden hair,
Pray listen to my lay!
For heart of mine
Doth now incline
To sing of love to-day.
The Saint so good,
'Tis understood,
We may, forsooth, beguile
And seek his aid.
O, pretty maid,
I crave from him thy smile.

I now declare,
A jewel rare
I truly would possess,
And wish that he
My want may see,
And my desire will bless.
While at his shrine
The soul of mine
Would to thine own impart
The bliss of thought
That is enwrought
Within this suppliant's heart.

O may the saint
Who does not faint
At meeting all demands,
Bestow on me
Sweet boon from thee,
Thy heart, with clasping hands.
—Eagle.

Said William Wirt to his daughter:
"I want to tell you a secret. The way to make yourself pleasing to others is to show that you care for them. This is the spirit that gives to your time of life its sweetest charm. It constitutes the sum total of all the witchcraft of womanhood. Let the world see that your first care is for yourself, and you will spread the solitude of the Upas tree around you."

Charles Kingsley's receipt for being miserable is as follows: "Think about yourself, about what you want, what respect people ought to pay to you, and what people think of you. In other words, centre all your thoughts on self, and you will have abundance of misery."

God's ways seem dark; but, soon or late,
They touch the shining hills of day;
The evil cannot brook delay,
The good can well afford to wait.

—Whittier.

Oil Cure for Cancer.

Dr. D. M. Bye Co., Indianapolis, Ind.:

Dear Friend:—I write to thank you for saving my life. I am now seventy-six years old; have had cancer for over twenty years. For the last six years it has been very bad—it was on my nose and under my right eye. Many physicians treated me. I was treated last by an old doctor, who claimed to cure cancer but I got worse. My nose was eaten nearly off. I was afraid to wipe my nose for fear I would wipe the end of it off. My nose and face had swollen so that I could not see. My sufferings were so intense that I was compelled to go to bed, as I thought to die in despair. Some friend sent me the Religious Herald, published in Richmond, Va. Rev. H. H. Butler, who lives near me and who has visited me and gives me much spiritual comfort during my sufferings, gave me your book, "The Message of Hope," saying while there was life there was hope. He wrote to you for me. You sent the oils and I used them and began to improve immediately, and it was not long before my nose began to heal nicely. The great sore under my eye healed up, and I am now well. Glory—Glory to God! I am now living and those terrible sores are gone. I can't find language to express my gratitude to you, dear Doctor Bye, for what you have done for me. I wish everybody suffering knew of your oil cure. God bless you.

Yours, ingrateful remembrance,
Jesse Ballard, Suffolk, Va.
Suffolk, Va., May 8., 1895.

Dear Doctor Bye—You have made one of the most wonderful cures in the case of Brother Jesse Ballard I ever knew. He was at death's door; now he is well.

Another Appreciation of the Aetna.

LUMBERTON, N. C., November 26, 1902.

J. D. BUSHALL, ESQ., Manager Aetna Life Insurance Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir:—After a careful comparison of policies submitted to me by the Aetna Life, Bankers' Life of New York, Equitable of New York, Northwestern, New York Life and Prudential, I have accepted $10,000 in the Aetna on the 20-payment life plan, with option of 25 year 3 per cent. Gold Bond Contract.

I have been a policy-holder in the Aetna for nearly eight years, and therefore feel somewhat prepared to judge of its merits from actual results. With all due deference to other companies, it affords me great pleasure to say that in my opinion the Aetna cannot be surpassed for plain and liberal contracts, and for just, conservative and economical management. I now have $12,000 in the Aetna. My partner, Mr. W. W. Carlyle, has $16,000 and one of our clerks, Mr. John T. Biggs, has $2,000, nearly all of which was written and delivered by your special agent, Mr. H. T. Spears.

Wishing you and the grand old Aetna continued success, I am,
Yours very truly,
ROBERT D. CALDWELL.

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL

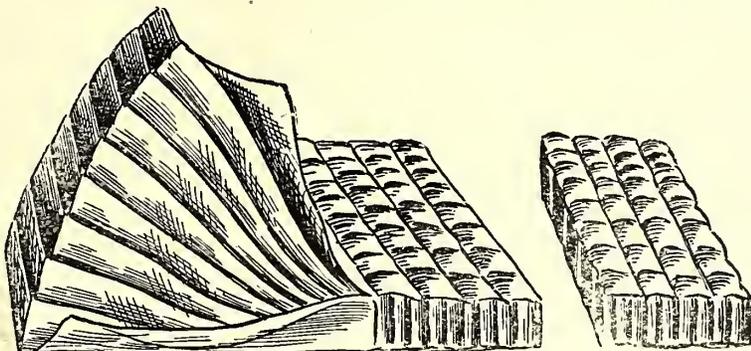

POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

If We Had But a Day.

We should fill the hours with the sweetest things
If we had but a day.
We should drink alone at the purest springs
On our upward way.
We should love with a lifetime's love in an hour
If the hours were few.
We should rest not for dreams but for fresher power
To be and to do.

***

We should guide our wearied or wayward wills
By the clearest light.
We should keep our eyes on the heavenly hills
If they lay in sight.
We should trample the guile and the discontent
Beneath our feet.
We should take whatever our Lord has sent
With a trust complete.

***

We should waste no moments in weak regret,
If the day were but one;
If what we remember, and what we forget,
Went out with the sun.
We should be from our clamorous selves set free
To work or pray;
And to be what the Father would have us to be
If we had but a day.

Event and Comment.

The Nashville American is another of the great papers of the South that is standing like a stone wall for thorough temperance legislation.

We are glad to note that the Supreme Court of Nebraska has reversed the decision of an inferior, a very inferior, court, which decreed that the Bible should not be read in the Public Schools.

While the Y. M. C. A. does an excellent and much needed work in cities the size of Charlotte and larger, perhaps it is most useful in the 1500 colleges throughout our land where it has gathered a membership of 82,000.

The out-pouring of affection and esteem for the memory of Abram S. Hewitt from all over the country, but especially from the city where he was both loved and feared, is another proof of the fact that after all the whole world loves a man.

A few years before his death D. L. Moody told a friend that he was praying the Lord "that he might allow me to finish my life's work without making a fool of myself." The humility of that prayer was the best guarantee that it would be answered. Perhaps the most uncommon thing in the life of Moody was his sterling common sense.

Rev. John Royal Harris is the name of the superintendent of the Tennessee Anti-Saloon League, through whose efforts the Adams bill with its stringent regulations became a law. Mr. Harris has just accepted a call to the First Cumberland Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania. If this temperance sentiment moves Northward Pennsylvania will not be safe.

Speaking of the discovery of what appears to be the most ancient manuscript of the Old Testament, dating about the year 753 A. D., some of our exchanges, by a natural mistake, have referred to it as the oldest known manuscript of the Bible. It is a fact that there are complete manuscripts of the New Testament that date back to the fourth century of our era and some fragments of the gospels in the Egyptian papyrus, that were written in the third or perhaps the second century.

We have been in favor of legislation against child-labor in the mills all along and are glad to see that some steps in the right direction have been taken by Alabama and South Carolina and will be taken by North Carolina. Nevertheless the revelations that have recently been made in Northern States lead to the observation that those States have had good laws, but worse abuses through evasion of them, than have ever been known in Southern States, with no protecting legislation. They are quoting Governor Aycock's message on the subject in Massachusetts now.

Calvin is getting to be a name to conjure with even in "Liberal" circles. Christian Work and The Evangelist enters a plea for the enrichment of the service by asking: "Why should not the deeper spiritual offices of an Ambrose, an Augustine, a Cranmer, Bucer or Calvin, be utilized to the uplifting of human hearts? May we not use that beautiful "Prayer of General Confession" of Calvin's in the Prayer Book—"Almighty and most merciful Father, we have strayed from thy ways like lost sheep"? It would be found practicable and most welcome to use Calvin's prayers at the beginning of the service, just as the Doxology is used."

In writing the article on Addicks, in the World Department last week, we were not aware that he was a legalized adulterer. He was the party to a divorce suit brought by his wife, on statutory grounds, and while resisting this, he allowed the divorce to be obtained on the ground of abandonment, and then married the other woman. It would be just as well for our American women to turn their attention from the Mormon Smoot, who is yet the husband of one wife, to this Boston candidate for the Delaware Senatorship, who is a practical bigamist according to the laws of many States and an adulterer according to the teachings of the Bible.

Bishop Brent has apparently been converted into a liberal Christian by his experience as a missionary in the Philippines. He announced before he left that he was going to work in harmony with the Catholic authorities. That generally means, for an Episcopalian, a hostile attitude toward Protestants. He speaks now of the "pallid, nerveless beauty of uniformity," and says of the different Protestant churches: "It is my purpose to lock arms with their interests and to share with them my own with as broad a catholicity as I can command." There is a great difference between Catholicity and catholicity.

Speaking of the General Education Board, The Congregationalist, (Boston) says: "It is suggestive to note how pronouncedly New England is left out of account in the directing of the policy of the new agency." It should be noted also that the Board is working for the education of both races and has therefore to deal with the negro problem in the South. The New England record on that question is not one to be proud of. It was the original promoter of the slave trade, voted against Virginia and other Southern States for the perpetuation of slavery at a time when it might have been peaceably abolished, and then sold its slaves to the South after they had proved unprofitable in New England. It then became oppressed with the iniquity of Southern Slavery, began the agitation that ended in a fratricidal war, and urged the suffrage policy which Secretary Root has just admitted to be a forty year failure. Since the foisting of a helpless people upon the whole nation it has been much more liberal with theories than with charities and has furnished more salaried reformers than dollars for reform. Then there are too many mixed marriages in Boston every year to suit the absurd prejudices of the Southern people. More than all, the Board needs money now more than anything else and it is probably in view of the paucity of New England funds and the quality of New England advice in such matters in the past, that it has asked that interesting section of our common country to go way back and sit down.

We have been the earnest supporters of the Education Boards since their plans were first promulgated, but what we need for education in the South just now is money. We have a better class of teachers already than they have in the North, according to President Hall himself, and the gathering of educational statistics is less important than the giving of opportunities for education, unless the one is simply preparatory to the other. When the South is spending thirteen million dollars a year on public education and North Carolina alone a million dollars, the one hundred thousand a year for ten years, now at the disposal of the Boards, is nothing to speak of. Perhaps the suggestion may be kindly taken that it has already been spoken of too much, and that it is just a little irritating to read the accounts which seem to indicate that education in the South began with the formation of the Boards.

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

It must be remembered that for the last generation practically all the general legislation in these Southern States has been on the side of the saloon. The saloon has been a recognized power in politics. As one of the speakers in Raleigh said the other day, John Jones may invest a thousand dollars in groceries and open a store and he is a political nobody. But let John Jones buy a thousand dollars worth of liquor and open a saloon and he is a political force. It has been generally understood that the race question was the "paramount issue" in every election and that if the saloon could control votes on the right side of that issue it was best to placate the saloon, and since it was able to control votes for the other side, it was best not to offend it. So most of the laws on our statute-books have been put there through the influence of the saloon.

One of the most iniquitous of the things that the saloon has effected in the way of legislation has been the arrangement by which the license tax which the saloon pays has been put to the school account. Then of course the argument is immediately raised, If you do away with the saloon you will have no money to support the schools.

Of course the argument for revenue is on a rather low plane, but there is an effective reply to the saloon advocate. If he is so unselfish in his desire to see the schools with a plenty of money he ought to advocate the dispensary as the substitute for the saloon. As a producer of revenue for the government the saloon is not to be compared to it even under the highest license system. For the license is only a percentage of the profits which the saloon-keeper makes, and although the consumption of liquor is only half as great under the dispensary system, yet there are only one or two salaried officers to be paid by the dispensary, instead of the families of all the saloon-keepers and their assistants, so that all the profits, under this system of combination and economical management, go to the government. The government is a partner who receives a fixed sum from the business of the saloon, and the government controls the business in the interests of sobriety and decency and order, in the case of the dispensary. If a State Dispensary law should be passed by North Carolina to-day, and every saloon closed, the problem of the support of the schools would be solved. But by the time you get the saloon advocate to see this he turns on you and rails you for your low and mercenary ideas. This scribe actually had that experience once, with the chief saloon organ in North Carolina, and the commiseration expressed for those who made the argument from the point that an immense revenue might be justly reaped by the government, was really touching.

Of course the argument that the saloon support the schools is shown to be an insincere one by the hostility of the saloon advocates to the dispensary. It can be easily shown besides that the argument is fallacious. In the last analysis all the profits come out of the pockets of the people. As a matter of fact the license is a very small percentage of the gross sales of whiskey by the saloon. A thousand dollars are spent by the community, in the gratification of a useless and generally harmful appetite, for every dollar that goes to the school fund. So that it is a most expensive way of raising money.

Not only so but it can be easily shown that the saloon limits the productiveness of the community where it is located and where it tempts man to excessive drinking. Every great employer of labor, such as the rail-road, has now its fixed rules for dealing with the men who frequent the saloon. It has learned the unproductiveness of saloon-tainted workmen. And when we consider the loss to the community of the brains that the saloon destroys, the degeneration of mind-power, through the degeneration of the brain, the damage is incalculable in dollars and cents. One of the saddest things in this world is to see what might have been a great brain, what was a great brain, sodden with drink; to see a man who might have been the companion and the equal of the great men of earth, keeping company with the low gamblers and loafers that haunt the saloon.

Furthermore, the saloon is the greatest breeder of poverty in our land. There is no excuse in this country of ours for the curse of deep poverty to fall upon any able-bodied man. And yet every county must support its poor-house and while often its inmates are themselves innocent, it will nearly always be found that the bread-winner of the family was ruined by the evil influences of the saloon.

And so the dear people who are paying the taxes ought to see what a miserable cheat the saloon is as a revenue-producer for any public purposes. The saloon is an expensive luxury. If the people have to support the poor-house, for the sake of the few hundred dollars that go to the school-fund, perhaps it would be just as well to shut up the saloon, save the money now used for the poor-house and for the support of the indigent generally by private liberality, and put that to the credit of the school fund. The saloon makes money for the people in the same way that the two Yankees on a desert island made money by swapping jack-knives.

And then when we come to the final argument that the saloon is the source of some ninety per cent of all the crime and disorder that gets into our courts, and that the expenses of these courts have to be paid by general taxation, the tax-payer ought to get his eyes open to the fraud that is perpetrated on him every year. Money saved is money made. It is a very easy matter for legislation to arrange where the school-fund is coming from. If even half of the expense of the courts could be saved, and the whole court system is expensive, there would be far more in the general fund that might be put into the school than was ever put into the school-fund by the license tax through the special arrangement between the legislator of a former time and the saloon-keeper.

If the license taxes could be diverted to paying for the courts and the salaried officers of the courts, and then the cases that the saloon brings into court, tabulated, with the expense of conducting each one, it would be an eye-opener.

For there is no sort of doubt that the saloon is at the bottom of a large percentage of the crimes that add to the criminal expenses of a community. The one murder in Charlotte, the other day, by a drunken fool, with the pistol of his friend, the saloon-keeper, will probably cost Mecklenburg county more than that saloon will pay both the city and the county. But the people must pay for that out of their pockets, and the saloon has been allowed to send its tax in the direction of the school fund, so of course it would be a great hardship upon the people to pay ten dollars to the schools instead of a hundred dollars to the criminal expenses of the county.

There was a striking instance of this large expense connected with the saloon and the distillery evil which we are fighting now in this state, when it was shown that Wilkes county, whose good people are fighting now for prohibition, which also has a reputation that is not desirable on account of these grogeries, that Wilkes county cost the state of North Carolina $5,000 more than its contribution to the general fund, while Yadkin county which is not far behind Wilkes, cost the state some $3,500 more than it paid in.

It would be a very good plan if this old ruse of the saloon-keepers could be defeated by repealing legislation everywhere, that provides for it. While it is not meant to take the children's bread and give it to dogs, it is hardly fair on the other side to take the saloon money and give it to the children. Not a dollar of that money goes to the education of the children in Charlotte, thanks to the wise foresight of somebody. And it is a poor principle to put any kind of a premium on immorality, or measure the excellence of the schools by the quantity of liquor that a community consumes.

Meanwhile, please God, there is a generation of school-children growing up in North Carolina, who have been taught by the saloon-keeper's license money, and who hate the saloon. If anybody thinks that there is a strong temperance tide in the Old North State this year, let him wait ten years and see!

Within the last few weeks certain of the Southern States have observed January 19, The Fame of Lee. Lee's birth-day, as a legal holiday; a member of the Virginia Senate has proposed the placing of a statue of Lee in Statuary Hall, in the Capitol at Washington, beside the statue of Washington, Virginia being entitled to thus honor two of her greatest citizens; Mr. Charles Francis Adams of Massachusetts has made a plea for a statue of Lee at Arlington and a bill has been introduced in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, carrying the appropriation of $20,000 for the erection, jointly with the State of Virginia, of a monument to Lee on the battle-field of Gettysburg. The surprising thing about this last incident is the reception it has met with in Northern newspapers. According to the Literary Digest the majority of them agree with Colonel A. K. McClure, of Philadelphia, who speaks of the plan as one "to give historic value to the most memorable battle-field of the country, and to present General Lee as one of the most heroic chieftains of both sides who are illustrious representatives of American valor." The Army and Navy Journal says that all the surviving major-generals, all but three of the surviving brigadiers and all but one of the surviving colonels are in favor of the monument.

Of course the Grand Army posts are rampant. It is to their interest to rage at every such opportunity. Whenever people get calm enough to consider such a proposition they may also begin to consider whether every sutler and deserter who contracted a hoarseness in explaining his war record is entitled to a pension. One of these posts, at Media, Pennsylvania, calls the bill "an insult to the memory of our dead comrades, not only of Pennsylvania, but of the whole country." Well, the Pension Roll is either given a monument itself to Lee's genius as a war captain, or it is a gigantic fraud.

The New York Sun says that the Grand Army posts "are struggling against a tide that cannot be stemmed in their endeavor to prevent the erection of a monument to Lee at Gettysburg." The Philadelphia Ledger says "The State which contains Gettysburg can unite with the State that produced Robert E. Lee to erect a monument to Lee at Gettysburg, with only the best effect upon the new patriotism of the new Union."

When it is done we shall have done better than the Greeks, who erected no monuments of their civil wars. We shall have built them to the heroes of both sides.

Of course there are some papers with a war record to sustain which more or less temperately demur. Among them is the Brooklyn Eagle which makes this comment:

The idea of a commonwealth appropriating money to honor a man who invaded her territory suggests that the willingness to forgive injuries must, in extremes like this, be accompanied by an extraordinary capacity to forget facts. They who would thus honor Lee recall his fine moral character, his unquestioned military genius, his chivalric courtesy to his foes, his calm courage in the face of difficulties and his commendable acceptance of the result which an accumulation of those difficulties made inevitable. They do not recall, or at least they do not appreciate the significance of his attempt to overrun the state from which they now seek funds for the commemoration of his career. They do not recall the narrowness of judgment, the lack of provision which prevented him from seeing that loyalty to his State meant treason to his country and that a war based upon slavery was the surest means of effecting the ruin of the cause in behalf of which it was precipitated and waged. They forget that the proposed erection through state aid of a statue, or monument, to him on the field where his treason reached its flood, might logically be interpreted to mean the indorsement by that State of principles which it condemned and in supporting which Lee labored to its hurt. Nevertheless the monumental record of Gettysburg will not be complete without some recognition of Lee. Dissent from this proposition is anticipated by the expression of a hope that discussion of it will be broad in scope, courteous in conduct and educational in effect. If Lee was not a great man he was a great soldier and Gettysburg, as it now stands, is one vast memorial to the prowess and sacrifices of the finest soldiery of the last generation.

The faults with which Lee is here charged, as proofs that he was not a great man, are narrowness of judgment and lack of prevision as to the issue of the conflict. But it is on record that Lee believed secession to be "anarchy." That he said that if he owned the four million slaves in the South he would give them all to save the Union. And it was with this prescience that he deliberately chose to side with his State. The time will come when history will as much applaud his choice as his magnificent effort to win victory for the side he had espoused. In resigning his commission, after having been offered the position of Commander-in-chief of the Federal forces, he wrote to his superior officer that except in defence of his native State he never wished to draw sword again. What it cost a West Point graduate, a veteran of the Mexican War, and an ardent lover of the Union, to make that choice is as unintelligible to some people as the impossibility of bearing arms against his native State, is to others. But he did not have to choose between loyalty to his State and treason to his country, as the Eagle puts it. His State was his country, his fatherland. When Lee offered his sword to the State of Virginia, the country for which he had fought before was made up of two warring countries. It happened that the Northern section had the Washington Government, the old flag and conjured with the name of Union, after Disunion had been forced by the perfidious effort to land supplies in Sumter and the call for troops to invade some of the Southern States. The struggle with Lee was between sentiment for the army in which he had served and patriotism. He chose patriotism, and God never put any man in the hard case of having to be a traitor to one cause in order to be loyal to another. There cannot be two hills without a valley between them.

General Thomas was a Virginian, too. According to British authorities he ranked third after Lee and second after Jackson among the real captains of both sides. He chose to stay with the army as against the call of his State to defend her soil from invasion. Well, somehow, with all Thomas' military genius and distinguished services, his name is nothing like the name of either Jackson or Lee, or like some other general of the Northern side, who heard and heeded the call of their States as Lee did and Thomas did not.

And curiously enough the Eagle unconsciously betrays the weakness of its contention in speaking of Lee's invasion of the State of Pennsylvania and the duty resting on Pennsylvania of remembering that against him. As if Pennsylvanians had not been invading Virginia for three years and more, before Lee crossed over into Pennsylvania soil. Why should Pennsylvanians resent the invasion of that State and Virginians not even resist the invasion of Virginia?

And this suggests the point of view that will assuredly be taken by the next generation. The right of secession was left an open question by the founder of this government, even if we do not say with Charles Francis Adams and Mr. Roosevelt that the argument was decidedly with the seceding States, from the Constitution historically considered. The nation could not exist half-slave and half-free. Waiving questions and accusations of responsibility for the war, it may be seen now to have been inevitable. But while the Union was dissoluble and actually dissolved, the States were indestructible in spite of the cataclysm of war. And it was each man's duty, North and South and West, to stand by his State. He who did so was the patriot. He who did not—well, traitor is an ugly word, and would better be dropped altogether. In the border States it was difficult to determine what the State itself was, and men took sides as they pleased. A part of Virginia was cut off into a separate State to give the plea of patriotism to those who sided against the Old Dominion. But Lee is immortal for drawing his sword in defence of his State, just as the Copper-heads of Ohio have never been greatly respected by either side.

And Lee's fame is so secure, both as a man, as the first gentleman of his age, as a soldier, as an educator and inspirer of youth, withal as a true and humble Christian, that we could wish our Northern friends like Colonel A. K. McClure and Mr. Charles Francis Adams would not excite people unduly by such propositions as they so eloquently defend.

The South has some very good statues that will do for a while at Lexington and Richmond. Virginia will certainly put Lee next to Washington in Statuary Hall as she has enshrined the two together in her heart of hearts. Lee could not be kept out of the New York Hall of Fame, of which we heard so much two years or so ago. And because truth is truth and history will tell the truth finally, the greatness of Lee will some time be known by the North as it is known by the South and by England now. Of course if the North is going to insist that he belongs to the South alone, the South has no very urgent objection to make. But Americans everywhere will know him some day to have been the greatest American soldier, whose sword was as stainless as his life was true, the noblest among the mighty, the gentlest among the brave.

We once heard a missionary from Brazil who had suffered much from the intolerance of Romanism, make a striking exposition of Second Thessalonians, 2:3-10.

His contention was that the Pope was the "man of sin" there spoken of, and he made pointed application in his own experience of the "lying wonders" and "deceivableness of righteousness" of the Catholic Church, and referred to the assumption of authority by the Pope as fulfilling the prophecy of the one "who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped, so that he as God sitteth in the Temple of God showing himself that he is God." It must be admitted that the adoration of the Pope in past centuries and his quasi-adoration now, makes him the nearest approach to the "man of sin" that has yet appeared in history.

But it must not be forgotten that this prophecy of the Scripture may not have been fulfilled, or at least may not have been entirely fulfilled. Prophecy has a springing and germinant meaning. The Pope who ordered a Te Deum at the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day, may rightly have been considered the "man of sin and son of perdition" by the persecuted Protestants. But in the years to come some other "man of sin" may fill out these outlines drawn by the pen of inspiration yet more completely, while the saints shall pray for the destruction of the monster by the brightness of the coming of the Lord.

The word "Antichrist" is used in the Westminster Confession as synonymous with the "man of sin" and both appellations are applied to the Pope. It would seem however that in the strict scriptural sense of the term the Pope could plead not guilty to this last indictment. With all its idolatry the Catholic Church does proclaim the Divinity of Christ as a cardinal doctrine. And the Antichrist of whom John writes in his first and second epistles is one who denies that Divinity. "He that denieth that Jesus is the Christ," "he that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh," is an antichrist. The antichrist is not a Papist, but a Unitarian.

We are glad to note that they are getting back in New York to the discussion of first principles in the religious sphere and that Dr. D. J. Burrell of the Reformed Church is a leading spirit in defending this fundamental doctrine of Christ's Divinity. Dr. Lyman Abbott has had to explain his position, as we noted in last week's paper, in view of the charge of infidelity. Dr. Minot J. Savage said recently in his Christmas sermon (why should a Unitarian ever want to preach a Christmas sermon or any other kind?):

There is no good reason in the New Testament, or in the early church history, for the belief that Jesus was God. I believe and I assure you that all the best, all the unbiased scholarship of the world is back of this statement, that Jesus was born in Nazareth, that his father was Joseph and his mother Mary."

The scholars whom Dr. Savage would call "unbiased" are the ones whom John the Beloved, who was closest of all men to Jesus Christ, calls liars and antichrists.

Liars! We suppose we shall be within the bounds of scriptural propriety if we indicate the specific proof of John's general charge. When Dr. Savage says that the scholarship of the world is back of the statement that Christ was born in Nazareth, he says what he cannot prove and what he must have known was without foundation. Matthew and Luke, the writers of the First and Third Gospels are absolutely the only authorities which we have, telling where Christ was born. Both of these say that he was born in Bethlehem and Luke gives the reason, namely, that there had been ordered an enrollment of the people and that Bethlehem was their ancestral home. When a man appeals to the "scholarship of the world" on a question of this sort he is playing to the galleries as no true man will do. There is not a line of testimony anywhere in the world that says Jesus was born in Nazareth. The critics like the spider have spun that web out of their own bowels. And even that theory is practically exploded. The fact is that the imitative "scholarship" of America is not even scholarly enough to keep up with the real trend of scholarly research. In an article in the New York Sun Dr. Savage betrays the school of thought to which he belongs, and it is practically a defunct school. "Jesus nowhere claims to be God, and no person in the New Testament whose name is known makes any such statement in his behalf;" and again, "There is no text in the New Testament which is authentic and whose authorship we know, which can be properly interpreted as teaching that Jesus is God."

Now that would have been in the fashion forty or even thirty years ago. But the battle has been fought and won as to the authorship and authenticity of the New Testament writings, and the "scholarship of the world," to use Dr. Savage's glittering generality, knows better to-day than to back any such long-retired theory as Dr. Savage advances. It is too late in the history of New Testament Criticism to frighten anybody with high sounding references to the "scholarship of the world." It is the mark of the dabbler and the sciolist, if not of the outright impostor.

As to the blasphemous assertion that Joseph was the father of Jesus Christ, scholarship has nothing to do with that question at all. There is not a scintilla of evidence, outside of the Scriptures, upon the subject, and those who testify there say that Christ was the Son of God. The Unitarians of Christ's day took up stones to stone him once because he said that God was "his own" Father. The suggestion of Dr. Savage owes its origin to a lower source than "the scholarship of the world." It is best to be plain of speech in such a case. Christ said to those who refused to believe in him, "Ye are of your father, the devil. If ye believe not that I am He, ye shall die in your sins."

And we are glad that Unitarianism has so unclashed its hideousness in our great metropolis. So long as it busied itself with denying the metaphysical doctrine of the Trinity, rejecting the orthodox contention, but still proclaiming some kind of divinity for Christ, it was subtle and dangerous. But if we mistake not there is bound to be a revulsion of feeling against such bald blasphemy as that which Dr. Savage has uttered. Nor are there wanting able defenders of the faith. One writer says:

"Looking at the subject coldly, the arguments of Dr. Savage would seem to me to call for a new trial for Jesus Christ.

"There is no use evading the question. Jesus was crucified on the specific charge that he was an impostor. He was guilty, or not guilty. Before the court of Pilate the people said, 'We have a law, and according to the law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God.' Before the court of Caiaphas, the high priest, the question was put to him directly. 'I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us if thou be the Christ the Son of God.' And Jesus said, 'I am. And you shall see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of the power of God, and coming with the clouds of heaven.'

And sturdy Dr. Burrell refuses to mince words either. He says, and we are indebted to him for the title to this article:

"If any man denies the divinity of Jesus Christ, he is Antichrist, and the doctrine he teaches is Antichrist.

"No heresy ever dies. The denial of the divinity of Christ was taught by the agnostics, and, since their day, by many other heretics under many different names.

"John pronounces this denial of Christ's divinity a lie, and for the man who denies he has another word—John calls him a liar. The reason he denounces this heresy is that it strikes at the very root of Christianity. You find me a man who denies the divinity of Christ, and you will find a man who denies every one of the fundamental truths of the Christian religion."

Says a correspondent of the Cumberland Presbyterian, "It is a well known fact that Cumberland Presbyterians as a rule not only avoid Presbyterian churches when coming into Presbyterian communities, but connect themselves with Arminian churches in preference." The poor things have been diligently taught that Presbyterians believe in fatalism and infant damnation. What else could one expect?

Margaret E. Sangster says: Among the best influences that can be brought to bear upon the twentieth century, I unhesitatingly name family prayer. This need not be a long service, a weariness to the flesh. Just a few verses read, a little prayer made, but the sweet service never omitted and it draws the whole family by visible lines of attraction nearer to the throne of God.—Ex.

Devotional.

"We are glad that Jesus tasted joy as well as sorrow—that there were months of wonderful gladness. At times the cloud of coming suffering may have cast its shadow upon His path, but His daily work was full of light. Could He behold the gladness of household after household and be Himself unmoved? Could He heal the sick through wide regions, see the maimed and crippled restored to activity, and not participate in the joy which broke out on every hand? Could He console the sorrowing, instruct the ignorant, recall the wandering, and not find His heart full of joyfulness? Besides the wonder and admiration which He excited on every hand, He received from not a few the most cordial affection, and returned a richer love.

"It is impossible not to see from the simple language of the evangelists that His first circuits in Galilee were triumphal processions. The sentences which generalize the history are few, but they are sentences which could have sprung only out of joyous memories, and indicate a new and great development of power on His side, and an ebullition of joyful excitement through the whole community. 'And Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee: and there went out a fame of Him through all the region round about. And He taught in their synagogues, being glorified of all.'

"To suppose that Jesus had no gladness in the work which diffused so much happiness, that He could see the tides of excitement flowing on every side without sympathy, that He could touch responsively every tender affection in the human soul, and not have a vibration of its joy in Himself, is to suppose him less than human. Any worthy conception of a Divine nature must make it richer in affection and sympathy than men can be. Whatever rejoicing attended His career through Galilee, we may be sure that no one was more happy than He."

Have you lost ground? Cease your repining, renew your consecration and faith. Be cleansed, be obedient be loving. Forget the steps that led away from God. Yield to the softest whisper within. While pained with regret, obey all light quickly. Walk in the Spirit. Are you shadowed by the memories of what has been lost? Look up and onward. Somewhere you will pass the place where you rested awhile so sweetly in the arms of omnipotent Love and poured fresh oil of praise on the altar of God's love and mercy, and then on! on! on!—Consecrated Life.

We long for Truth, O God, but cannot always see the way. If doubt assails us, to whom shall we go for assurance save to thee, O Lord, the sum and substance of all knowledge? How shall we find light apart from thy light? How can we come out of darkness till we come nearer to thyself? Show us the way, O God, lead us step by step. And whatever we may fail to understand forbid that we lose sight of Thee, for that were blindness indeed. Show us not the abyss of thy absence; content us with thy presence evermore. Amen.

Yes, I know as well as anybody else that one can hear anything he listens for. . . . I have heard my name called, and started to answer, when the quick thought came, with a sad disappointment, that the voice I heard calling me had been silent half as many years as I have lived. We can hear what we listen for, believe what we wish were true, expect what we desire, anticipate and dwell in a better future. My body is this cabin camp where I sleep and rest. My soul is myself, free to wander where it will, to see lands not lit by the sun, and to hear music which comes not in the chariots of the air.—Dr. W. C. Gray.

Now I want you to think that in life troubles will come, which seem as if they would never pass away. The night and the storm look as if they would last forever, but the calm and the morning can not be stayed; the storm in its very nature is transient. The effort of nature, as of the human heart, is ever to return to its repose, for God is Peace.—George MacDonald.

Missionary.

Vast Promoters of Trade.

All this appeals less to the modern commercial judgment than the actual work of missions in promoting trade. They have done this in various ways. They have stopped war so as to allow the energies it consumed to engage in trade. "To be welcomed in the land of cannibals," said a Dutch traveler in Sumatra, Lunibing Hiram, "by children singing hymns, this indeed shows the peace-creating power of the gospel." "The benefits" of the missionary work in New Guinea, said Hugh Milman, a magistrate, "are immense; inter-tribal fights, formerly so common, being entirely at an end, and trading and communication, one tribe with another, now being carried on without fear." The successful war which missions and philanthropy waged against the slave trade in Africa was of incalculable advantage to commerce in saving the honest trade of great areas from total destruction. Missionaries have taught trades, developed industries, created wants, and the results have been pure gain to commerce. "It is they," says Sir H. H. Johnston, in "British Central Africa," "who in many cases have first taught the natives carpentry, joinery, masonry, tailoring, cobbling, engineering, book-keeping, printing, and European cookery, to say nothing of reading, writing, arithmetic, and a smattering of general knowledge. Almost invariably it has been to missionaries that the natives of interior Africa have owed their first acquaintance with a printing-press, the turning lathe, the mangle, the flat-iron, the saw-mill, and the brick-mold. Industrial teaching is coming more and more in favor, and its immediate results in British Central Africa have been most encouraging. Instead of importing printers, carpenters, store clerks, cooks, telegraphists, gardeners, natural-history collectors, from England or India, we are gradually becoming able to obtain them amongst the natives of the country, who are trained in the missionaries' schools, and who, having been given simple, wholesome local education, have not had their heads turned, and are not above their station in life."—R. E. Speer.

A young man who had gone through the great school of Oxford, and done well in his studies, made up his mind to go to Africa as a missionary. One of his teachers who loved him said: "You will die in a year or two in that hot country. It is madness." But the brave young servant of Jesus answered: "I think it is with African missions as with the building of a great bridge: you know how many stones have to be buried in the earth, all unseen, to be a foundation. If Christ wants me to be one of the unseen stones, lying in an African grave, I am content, certain as I am that some day Africa will belong to Jesus." The young man did die in a year.

Obviously, each generation of Christians must evangelize its own generation of non-Christians, if Christ is to see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied with reference to that particular generation. The forces of evil recognize this. Not one of them is deferring its operations.—Jno. R. Mott.

When Bishop Thoburn went to India, thirty-eight years ago, a European gentleman pointed out to him a brick pillar, and said, "You might as well try to make a Christian out of that pillar as out of one of these people." Today there are in India nearly three million native Christians, and among them are doctors, lawyers, judges, editors, teachers, and business men.—Exchange.

It is a noble and great thing to cover the blemishes and excuse the failings of a friend, to draw a curtain before his stains and to display his perfections; to bury his weaknesses in silence, but to proclaim his virtues upon the housetop.

Sunday School Lesson.

CONDUCTED BY REV. H. G. HILL, D. D.

Christian Love.

The present lesson describes Christian love. Charity in modern usage, denotes only one form of Christian love or kindness shown the poor and needy. But Christian love as exemplified by Jesus Christ and cherished by His disciples is much broader than charity and far more comprehensive. It embraces the love of delight for God, Christ and all excellent things and beings. It includes the love of beneficence towards all created beings. It involves the love of pity or compassion for the needy, the poor, the distressed and the guilty. Our lesson presents this love in several important aspects.

I. The Vital Nature of Christian Love.—It is absolutely essential to Christian character. A man may have many precious gifts without being a Christian at all. He may have the miraculous gift of tongue and yet be as "sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." He may have the gift of prophecy and understand the mysteries of God and reveal His will and still "like Balaam, after sublime prophetic utterances die in his iniquity." He may have the faith of miracles and by imparted Divine power work wonders and finally like Judas Iscariot perish in hopeless misery. He may practise enlarged charity and part with goods for so doing and yet like Ananias and Sapphira fail to enter the kingdom of God. He may manifest great self-denial and even part with earthly life and yet if destitute of Christian love, his sacrifices will secure him neither permanent gain nor eternal salvation. How vitally important then is Christian love, if a man may possess such grand Divine gifts and yet die in sin for lack of this grace. Many scriptures accord with this passage in exalting Christian love. It is placed first among the fruits of the spirit. The apostle declares that "God is love." Again its vital importance is emphasized in the word "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ let him be anathema maranatha."

II. The Fruits of Christian Love.—These are enumerated from the 4th to the 8th verse. Love produces forbearance or long-suffering towards the evil and the injurious. It prompts to kindness not only to the good and attractive, but also to the vicious and repulsive. It frees from envy at the good possessed by others. It delivers from pride and vain-glorious boasting. It causes its possessor to shun unbecoming and reprehensible conduct. It is not selfish and does not seek its own interests to the neglect of or at the expense of others. It is not easily moved to anger by injuries or wrong-doing. It does not dwell upon or plot evil. It finds no pleasure in iniquity but "rejoiceth in the truth." It bears all kinds of burdens, believes all revealed and attested truth, hopes for all things that have a Divine warrant and endures all ills inflicted by men and all disciplinary afflictions visited by God. These are some of the gracious results caused by the exercise of Christian Love. It should be the dominant principle of a pious life and if it were supreme in the heart and conduct of avowed believers it would free man and society from multiplied ills.

III. The Superiority and Permanence of Christian Love.—In the concluding portion of the chapter the Apostle exalts this love above many things justly valued in the Church and makes it the chiefest of the Christian graces. He affirms that prophecies revealing the Divine will would cease to be given, that miraculous tongues would cease to be bestowed and used, and that the imperfect knowledge of earth would vanish away before the perfect knowledge of heaven as the dim light of the stars disappears before the radiance of noontide. He declares that the clearer vision of a future life would differ from our present perceptions as objects seen through a dark glass from those discerned by the open eye, or as the defective conceptions, speech and thoughts of childhood from those of the ripest manhood.

Christ Teaching Blessedness.

Matt. V: 1-12. Topic for March 1.

The world calls the man blessed or happy who gets on in business, who prospers and grows rich or who rises to power. It is along these paths to the places of distinction that the racers throng. There is no scramble for the honors of sainthood. Not many people envy the heroes of Christian faith. Yet as the angels see this world, its highest seats are filled by God's believing ones. If we study the beatitudes, we shall learn who are really "blessed." If we trace the word "blessed" through the Bible, we see who come within the radiant circle.

The man that maketh the Lord his trust is blessed. Why? He has been lifted out of the horrible pit. His feet are on a rock that cannot be shaken. He has a joy that nothing ever can break. His trust is one that no storm or flood, no financial panic, no political defeat, can ever disturb.

Is it not worth while to have such a secure blessedness? No other trust is absolutely safe even in this life. Then what about the day of death and judgment that comes after, and the eternity? We cannot leave out these stupendous events when estimating what is best. It is not hard to prove that none are really blessed save those whose trust is stayed on God. The question, however, is, Where is your trust? Are you among the blessed?

The blessed ones of the Bible are not those whom the world considers happy. Indeed, in the opinion of earth, those whom Christ calls blessed have a dreary life. He says the meek are blessed, the poor in spirit, the pure in heart, the peacemakers, they that mourn, and they who are persecuted for righteousness' sake. It would be hard to convince the man of this world that these are the really blessed ones. But that is the way it looks to the eyes that look down from heaven, and that is the standard of life by which we must be measured in the divine judgment.

It is assuring to hear Jesus himself speak beatitudes for men. He knew who really are the blessed. He knew the difference between the earthly ideals of happiness and the heavenly ideals. We may safely trust His estimates and know that they are right. We know too that He came into the world to make blessedness possible for men who were lost in sin. On the cross He died to make men happy. It is pleasant to remember, too, that the last glimpse this world had of Jesus He was in the attitude of blessing men. He had His hands stretched out over His disciples when He began to ascend. Ever since that moment benedictions have been raining down from those pierced hands upon a sorrowing earth. Those who do not receive blessings shut their hearts against them.—J. R. Miller, D. D.

When God called Abraham He said, "I will bless thee and thou shalt be a blessing." Jesus said, "Blessed are ye when men shall persecute you for righteousness' sake." Every person who is blessed by God is to be a blessing. They who are blessed when they are persecuted hand down a blessing to others. It is a law of God. No better illustration of this truth is to be found than in the history of the persecution of the old Covenanters. When the House of Commons, during the reign of Charles the Second, ordered the "League and Covenant" to be burnt by the common hangman in Westminster Hall and attempted to make all who would hold office in the kingdom receive the Communion according to the writes of the Anglican Church and renounce the League and Covenant, they thought that thus at one blow they would stamp out Presbyterianism, but instead they only inaugurated a period of bloodshed, which was seed from which our own present religious liberty has grown, one of the greatest blessings which has come to mankind in the history of the Church.

A Tribute to Dr. Rankin.

Having received from Korea the distressing intelligence of the death of the Rev. D. C. Rankin, D. D., the Mission of the Southern Presbyterian Church in Japan desires to record in the form of this memorial its tribute of sorrow and estimation.

A little more than a year ago, when the matter of his coming for a visit to the work and the workers in the Far Eastern fields of Japan, China and Korea was suggested, it met with a most hearty and unanimous response, for all of those among us who knew him felt that a visit from one who for so many years had been doing such an important and successful work for the Cause of Missions would result in great blessing to the workers and in good to the work when he should have returned to his editor's chair in the Homeland.

He spent but one month with us in Japan, in the midst of our summer vacation when he saw but little of the actual work being done and when the workers were resting. This month was all too fleeting and we scarce realized that he was among us before he was gone from us to China. Yet during this brief period we were profoundly impressed by his personality and gentle spirit which we shall love to remember.

His enthusiastic interest in all that came within the horizon of his vision was remarkable. Each small detail of the native life and custom around him interested him, and the pages of his note-books were being rapidly filled with stores of items of interest for the columns of his magazines in after days. He was wide-awake and nothing seemed to escape his acute observation.

No less noticeable was his eagerness to learn all about the lights and shadows of Missionary life; the forms and methods of missionary work; mission policy: successes and hindrances, and to see everything from the proper point of view. Many who have come out to study missions have all too soon developed into teachers and critics of missionaries. This spirit was conspicuously absent in him and his attitude was that of the earnest student trying to acquire all possible information from direct sources rather than that of a self-constituted reformer of mission life and policy.

His personal appreciation of each little thing done for his comfort and pleasure was very touching and made each one feel who had aught to do with his entertainment that the honor was entirely on the side of the server. In social intercourse he was most refreshing and his presence and great-heartedness made one forget for the time all else but the dear man and the purpose for which he had come among us.

Perhaps that which impressed one deepest was his ardent yearning to be a blessing to the missionaries wherever he might find them. He came among us with his heart aflame with this desire—to give good as well as to receive it, therefore he was a blessing to the many and to the few, in private intercourse as well as from the pulpit on the Sabbath days when he ministered to us publicly.

At Karuizawa he was much in demand on all sides so that those who were supposed to be his entertainers sometimes felt a bit jealous at giving him to others so frequently.

Especially at the Mission-meeting in August his presence was a benediction and many regard it the most blessed meeting held in years. His gentle and unselfish presence, his overflowing gratitude for all the little things done for him, his talks to the young and old, all were opportunities which he wisely used for impressing upon others the spirit of Christ which was in him.

When, finally, he bade us farewell to go on to China to be present at the Mission-meetings there early in September, it was with the full expectation of having him with us for another month in Japan on his return, when he could visit the workers at their stations. Our hearts were made anxious some weeks later when we heard that he had been stricken down with Asiatic cholera and was temporarily laid aside at Chinkiang.

He dictated a letter to assure us of his safety and improvement. The last letter received from him was one sent back by the pilot from the little Russian steamer on which he had embarked from Shanghai to Chemulpo, Korea. We were planning and hoping much in connection with his coming again to us, after visiting the work in Korea, and after a time began to wonder why we received no word from him.

The only word we had from Korea was of his translation at Pyeng-yang, in the north, whither he had gone to visit one of the most remarkable works of grace of modern missionary times.

While with us, and afterwards in his letters from China, he said that but for one thing this visit was the happiest period of his life—the "one thing" being the inability to bring his wife with him. That was the one cloud which obscured the sunshine of his visit, but it exhibited the heroic courage of both the wife and the husband in being willing to endure the separation for the good of the Cause of World Wide Evangelization, so dear to both their hearts and for which they both made personal sacrifices. It is to her grieving, widowed heart that our sympathy now outpours with earnest prayer for Divine grace and comfort in this sore bereavement.

We, each one, feel this sorrow as a very real and personal one. While some may be tempted to ask "To what purpose was this waste" of money, man and ability in sending him out here to die in a strange land, there are more who can say knowingly and feelingly that there has been no waste, for the blessing that he brought to us and the inspiration which must needs follow to the Church at home will be abundantly seen in the coming days.

His heart's longing from his early years has been to be a missionary to the heathen. For thirteen years, and more, he served the Cause nobly and excellently in an important position at home, and at last it was granted to him to lie down to rest in a heathen land having been in a very real sense a missionary to the missionaries.

In his farewell speech at Karuizawa he used a figure to express the impressions which he should carry thence with him, and we can do no better than to use his own beautiful figure, applying it to himself.

He said: "My memory of Karuizawa, and of all the kindness that I have received here, will be as green as its mountains and as fragrant as its lilies." So of him be it said that our memory will be as green as the velvety mountain tops and as fragrant as lilies.

Our sympathy goes out to the dear stricken wife; to the Committee of Foreign Missions; to the office-workers and to the Church at large. God bless them all and may He soon call some one as capable and as enthusiastic to take up the work where he laid it down, and to carry it forward.

Civilization in the Cove.

The years sweep by the Coveite and leave the son as the father was. His case is the case of arrested development and consequent degeneracy. He has within him the seeds of thought and of virtue, the germs of genius and of art; but because of the lack of appropriate environment, correspondence is denied, development is discouraged, the splendid possibilities of his life remain unrealized and thought and virtue, genius and art die.

The Coveite has an environment, but there are no stimuli in it. It is an environment of rock, crag and forest. He cannot keep pace with the race. There are no lines of advance; there is no impulse to advance. There are no movements in the Cove except those of wind and water. The wind whilth about continually and returneth again according to his circuits. The rills slip through the cleft rocks and lose themselves in the river and so on to the sea.

There is no such movement among the people. On the contrary there has taken among them what takes place in the mountains everywhere, always,—a damming up of the stream of humanity and a gathering of that stream into pools. These pools, because they have no outlet, soon give off their freshness and precipitate their salts. Just as chips and bubbles on the surface of such pools float round and round in slow circles, narrow and yet more narrow, moving but never advancing, so too, human life in the Cove. The minds of the people there are as placid as a mill pond, as green too, unruffled by any current of progress.

The primitive folk of Arcadia were as primitive in the Golden Age of Pericles as they were the day they fled before the Dorian Invasion. The Basques dwelling in the Pyrenees show what life was in western Europe before the Aryan immigration. The mountains of Caledonia furnished an asylum for Picts and Scots when they fled before the Romans. Their asylum became their prison; their asylum and their prison then and in the days of the Saxon Invasion and in those of the Norman Conquest. The Gaelic speech and manner of the elder day is the Gaelic speech and manner of the modern day. Scott pictures the ancient life; Ian MacLaren pictures the modern. The pictures are the same except that the spear has been beaten into a plough share and the sword into a pruning hook; not quite that, for the Scotchmen still have a "manly thirst for martial fame, the stormy joy of mountaineers." The Highlanders who yesterday defeated the Boers are the same as those who, six hundred years ago, followed Bruce to the defeat of the English.

The peasant dwellers in the Alps remain this century what they were the last. Civilization has gone around their mountains; it has passed under, going through the Mount Cenis tunnel!

These illustrations drawn from life in the mountains of Greece, Spain, Scotland and Central Europe indicate what we are trying to say about life in the Southern Appalachians.

"These mountains gave way a little as earth and water must when the Anglo-Saxon starts, but only to say, 'You may pass over and on, but what drops behind is mine; and I hold my own.'" For the most part the people passed over and on to win the West. They won it. A considerable number of the halt and the lame dropped behind—the ascent was so steep, the axle broke, the ox team gave out. So the hardy pioneer, less hardy than his brother who pushed on to the plain, went into camp. In the Cove high up in the clouds he found a lodge in a vast wilderness, a boundless contiguity of shade. His children and his children's children remain there to this day. The mountains have held them; held them to their habit and to their habit.

"They are wrapped round in a Rip Van Winkle sleep; they are covered with a Lethean gloom. The waves of progress and civilization wash all around the confines of the unfortunate region, the vast sargasso, a dead sea surrounded by an ocean of life."

The years sweep by the Coveite; but the hours hang heavy on his hands. He has an abundance of time; more of that than of aught else.

"Time is a wild beast

Which though classified yet by no naturalist.

Abounds in the mountains, more hard to ensnare
And more mischievous too, than the lynx or the bear."

The Coveite reverses the poet's apothegm; to him Time is long and Art is fleeting. In fact time is so long as not to be measured accurately. His time-piece is not a clock synchronized by the chronometer at Washington; but a compass mark cut on the door post. When the shadow cast by the noon sun approaches this mark the busy house-wife—she is always busy—calls the men to dinner by a blast from a tin horn. After dinner the Coveite, the male Coveite (not the female) will take time to talk and to think.

In the great world people have no time to talk or to think. Whoever stops to think is run over by the electric car. Whoever stops to talk misses the train. The city man's office is down town, away down town.

He reaches it travelling forty miles an hour. Other men earlier than he occupy the seats. He swings to an overhead strap till his wrist aches; with the other hand he holds the newspaper close to his nose to read what the fluctuations are on 'Change. His office in the eighth story is reached by an elevator. He dictates letters to a stenographer and transacts business over the telephone. He has no time to talk, no time to think. He must act, act, act, in the living present.

In the Cove how different! The people have ample time to talk; they talk, and talk, and talk. They think, they think profoundly; they study, scheme, and plan and do nothing.

"Seems like I never wants nothin' more,
'Ceptin' ter set down here this way,
Take little Jake up on my knee,
Have me a corn-cob pipe like this
With a stem as long as A is from Z
An' a pocket chock full o' nigger twis."

Approach the Coveite as he sits after dinner smoking his corn-cob pipe. Approach him without any air of condescension; avoid the patronizing manner and he will interest you. This is about what he will say:

"Yes, stranger, this here kentry's all a goin' to change. The Gov'ment is a wantin' to buy up all the mountin' lan.' They're a 'goin' to everlastin' improve hit. They'll bring in deers and turkeys an' fill the woods with 'em, an' put fish in the creeks stid of saw dust. Yes siree. The kentry will be on a boom then. But I shan't live to see it. I'm too ole. I shan't never be different from what I am. They's specerlaters a wantin' to buy my lan.' They're a goin' to build railroads hither and yan to git the isinglass an' sich out to town. An' they'll build mean little towns an' fill 'em with furriness from beyant the sea. They'll bring in the furriness to git out the mineral. I'd ruther hev the mineral in ther groun' an' the furriness back yander in ther own land. Bar-rooms too! Instid o' the boys a drinkin' a little mountain dew an' a little moonshine whiskey like they've been used to; w'y they'll get to drinkin' all sorts o' pizen stuff in them licensed saloons—Tom and Jerry, an' Mint Julep, an' peach and honey, an' Cock-tail, an' gin an' rum an' beer, lager beer that sizzes and foams sam'er than soap-suds on wash day. You dassent let a feller that is tanked up on them city drinks come about yer. He'll steal an' lie."

At this point the Coveite will pause for breath and to knock the ashes from his pipe. Then he will continue:

"They'll be buildin' big houses—residences they call 'em—somers along this here creek an' a puttin padlocks on ther crib dores. My crib never has had nothin but a wooden pin to keep the dore shet an' to keep the chickens out. I'll be done dead then; but Jake—this is Jake a settin' on my knee—Jake he'll hev to learn to steal too. He'll hev to steal to keep up and live. O, yes, stranger, there's a goin' to be the all firedest improvement in the mountains. I'm Irish, Nancy, she's my woman, she's Dutch. Sam, our oldest boy, he's tuk up with one of these here Polish wimmen down in the settlement. It takes a smarter man than me to tell what kinder man Sam's Shaver'll be when he is growed up. These here city wimmen are a comin' 'roun with ther silk dresses rustlin' samer than ther leaves o' ther trees. When them wimmen speak ther lips drop honey comb and ther mout is smother than oil Ugh han! Ther'll be a time on the big creek then, sure enough.

"That's a part of civlyzation, ain't it, fren'? I wont be here to see none o' hit. At least I hope so. My folks is lived here sence Andy Jackson's day. My father was a Whig an' voted for Andy. No man 'd ever say that one o' us n'd steal or lie. No man in this here Cove ever needed help an' didn't git hit from me; but they'll be different atter I'm gone. I don' see how Sam can keep from cuttin' that Polish woman's throat an puttin' her in the soap kittle like that feller did up yander in Chicago. We ain't up to Chicago's scientific ways yit; but we are larnin'. They say you can reach Chicago in twenty-four hours on the train from Asheville. But I don' want to go."

This speech of the Covite indicates the feeling of the mountain people. They have a longing desire for the good that is in the outside world, a desire that is hesitant because of the evil that is mingled with the good.

"Twenty-four hours from Asheville to Chicago!" says the Coveite. Half that time from his house to Asheville, a journey of a day and a half between the civilization of the remote Cove and that of the great metropolis! Nay not that but the journey of a century and a half and no wagon roads and no railroads! How shall the one ever attain unto the other?

A Few Questions for Parents.

I have never written for the press, and in fact, have never had any aspirations to do so, but "from the fullness of the heart" some times the mouth or pen seems impelled to speak.

For fifteen or twenty years I have been teaching in the Sunday-school and have tried, as far as I knew how, to do my duty. The deep sense of responsibility in training the young minds aright, and my incompetency to do the holy work which seemed so plainly laid before me, is often appalling. But after prayerfully and carefully studying the lesson, and begging that I might be given mouth and wisdom to teach, and that the Holy Spirit would open the understanding of the scholars in order that they might receive the lesson aright, I have gone to church to meet my class. Perhaps I would begin by saying: "Little ladies I hope you all have nice lessons this morning. This is a beautiful lesson, and I hope we all know it."

There would be a smile on every face and then, perhaps one would say: "I lost my Quarterly and could not learn my lesson." Another would say: "I didn't have time to learn mine." Others say: "I did not get up in time to learn mine this morning." My reply would be: "Well why did you not learn it last Sunday afternoon?" Oh, I go to the other church, the Methodist or Baptist Sunday-school in the afternoon and can't learn my lesson then. Now there is a class of girls or boys that I am to teach and actually they do not know where the lesson is or if it is about Joshua and Caleb, or Paul and Silas. Perhaps they have very little if any idea who they are and in what time they lived. How am I to begin and where! I can't begin at Genesis and tell all the history up to the lesson. What am I to do. In spite of my misgivings I begin and soon see and feel that I have very little attention. One girl is admiring a new hat, dress or sash another girl is wearing. At the other end of the class they are whispering a little gossip. One turns her head around to look at another class or some one coming in. Once when I saw a girl looking back I called the attention of the class and asked what woman in the Bible was turned to a pillow of salt because she looked back. They looked at me as though they thought I had made up something to tell them. They never heard of such a woman and were astonished at my telling such a thing. When the bell taps for the school to close I feel that I have been pounding away on something without having made the slightest impression because they knew nothing when they came and did not care to learn any thing after they got here. They go to one Sunday-school and then another just to put in the time on Sunday, really violating the day and breaking the fourth commandment, to a certain extent, because they go, not so much for any good they may derive from it but simply to put in the time. When the Sunday-schools are all finished up they spend the remainder of the afternoon walking about in crowds or groups.

My Christian friends there is a cause for this trouble somewhere? Let us see where it is, who is at fault? We can not lay it upon the children for if we let them do as they please they are not apt to settle down quietly to study a Sunday-school lesson unless they happen to be naturally very good and not many of us are naturally good. I know very well I was not, and even now have to hold tight reins to keep Satan from getting ahead of me. I will tell you where the trouble begins. In the home. Some of the mothers have a house full of little ones and if they have any help at all it is very indifferent and there is so much to do and they are often tired and feel as if they could do no more after looking to their bodily necessities. When Sunday comes they are often glad to let the children go to all the Sunday-schools in town so that they can get rid of them and have a little quiet rest or some of them are visiting while their children are being taught by a teacher whose duty it is to teach the children, perhaps they think. Others have so many social duties they have no time for training their children teaching them the Sunday-school lesson or any thing else. With the afternoons consumed with euchre parties, Monday afternoon clubs, Tuesday clubs, Wednesday clubs, Thursdays, Fridays and Saturdays and then Germans between times, or something that must be attended at City Hall, theatre or some other place which they think just as important.

I have spoken first of the mothers, for the impress of the mother is the most indelibly stamped upon the children and some of our grandest men have had noble Christian mothers.

But what of the fathers? Are they excused from taking any part in raising the children which God has given them? Are they exempt from all the training and disciplin of these dear little ones who are to be the men and women, in a few more years, when we shall have passed away? When we dedicated our precious little ones to the Lord in baptism were the vows more binding upon the mothers than the fathers? Of course the fathers are very busy making money, to provide for the necessities of these little ones, but very many of them are striving to lay up riches until they can be called millionaires. Isn't that true? Some of them have their club rooms, (bar-rooms) and many important places where they must go and have no time for "chaps" or "kids" as they sometimes call their children. When the mothers are so busy with the many household duties, and the care of so many little ones, do the fathers ever think the duty of soul training devolves upon them? Do they ever find time to teach the little ones or the larger ones the Shorter Catechism, or the Sunday-school lesson? Must the duty of training the souls of these dear children be put upon the Sunday-school teacher who only has about twenty-five or thirty minutes to devote to them once in seven days? Christian parents, I appeal to you in behalf of the children God has entrusted to your keeping. Are you doing your duty? The care and trouble may seem too much for you now, but let us look around us to-day. See boys running away from home, stealing, fighting and killing, perhaps of his own family, or else a friend. We hear of so many heart-rending occurrences in this way. Fathers and mothers, are we doing our full duty? Are we laying a solid foundation in the homes which sacred duty rests solely upon us? If we are not training these precious souls to love and trust God and to walk in the footsteps of our blessed Saviour we are coming far short of the responsible duty God has seen fit to trust us with, and He will hold us accountable if we are not faithful to the trust.

A Mother.

Swiss Synods.

A number of the Synods of the National Churches of the Swiss Cantons hold their annual session during the months of October and November. It may be interesting to our readers to see what subjects are considered by Church courts, which deal with very few of the topics that occupy so much of the time of Courts outside of Switzerland, and many of which never come before the Swiss Churches. Thus, one never hears of any "Revision of the Confession," simply because this document has been fixed for the Church by the Canton. One never hears of Foreign Missions, this being regarded as a matter for the individual rather than for the Church as a whole, contributions going to what ever Mission Society may be desired. The exception to this is in the Federated Churches of the Romande, which sustain a most interesting and progressive Foreign Mission in South Eastern Africa. There is nothing about Home Missions, for the area of the Church is the Canton; and as a rule every parish has its Protestant Church provided for it by the Canton, so that while the Church may contribute a little for some special object, it is hardly as a Church Committee or Board that it does so. Let us see then what they do consider.

The Synod of the Berne National Church met last October. The Synod consists of three distinct sections or "groups," the strength of each party being indicated by the membership of the Synodical Council or Executive Commission. This consists of twenty members, of whom six are evangelicals, four are conciliators, and ten are liberals. The list of members is prepared in advance under an understanding between the friends of each party, and yet it is said, that the interests of the Church are not so carefully borne in mind as are local considerations. The devout church members seem to be gradually detaching themselves from the National Church, while others who are its warm supporters complain that it is becoming more and more clerical in its membership, and are ceasing to attend where they are powerless to amend. Out of 175 members of the Synod, 105 ministers and 68 members—not elders—were present. When these members seek to secure somewhat of order, the ministers, if the Press does not do so, complain that their liberty is being encroached on. As to business: A discussion took place as to the manner of conducting funerals. Last year, the Synod had remitted to its Synodical Council to consider and report on a motion, that baptisms celebrated in private houses by persons not ministers of the parish, should not be registered in the National lists, unless the officiating minister was either a member of the Berne or of some other Cantonal Church, and that the sanction of the parish minister had been given to the baptism. The object of this proposal was to show the members of the Evangelical Society, that they could not claim to be members of the Church, while not worshipping in connection with it. The Synodical Council approved of the proposal, and though strongly opposed, it was carried by 99 as against 48 votes. Another discussion took place on the motion by the Council to ask the Government to suppress the gambling houses that had recently been opened in Interlaken and Thun. The motion was opposed very strongly by several parishes as well as by a number of ministers, who claimed that the gambling was harmless, that it pleased visitors, that a large sum of money was by this means spent in the localities; but finally, by a vote of 71 against 33, the proposed action was carried, the question now being—Will the Berne Cantonal authorities do what the Synod has asked them to do? As a final item of business the Synodical Council has been instructed to prepare a collection of Chants for mixed choirs—to report next year. The "Docket" being thus gone through, the Synod adjourned. The number of Church members entitled to vote for the delegates to the Synod, is 10,300, of which number only 333 took the trouble of casting a vote!

The Synod of the National Church of Vaud had much more of what we generally understand by the term "Church business" under consideration. The report on Evangelistic work stated that during the year it had held twenty-two "revival" prayer meetings, and that in addition, addresses had been given in fourteen parishes on Public Morality. Outside of its ordinary duties, it had opened a preaching station, and a minister had already been appointed to take charge. This action is not without some singular features. The station has been opened by the Synod, outside of its legal powers, yet the minister has been nominated by the Government on the recommendation of the Committee on Evangelization, thus giving it a legal standing. The salary will be provided by the Church, and the house rent by the Canton. As for a place of worship, there is a small building the property of the Free Church, which the Committee wished to have on every Sabbath morning and on two Sabbath evenings each month, but the Free Church Session, while willing to give it for the morning service, was not disposed to give it for the evening, unless there would be some security that the National Church preacher would be in accordance with their theological views (i. e., Evangelical). The Synodical Commission did not feel authorized to give such an assurance, and so the services are for the present conducted in the basement of the school building. Other discussions took place in reference to the custom of presenting Bibles to each newly married couple,—to the Marriage laws, and to Sabbath observance. There were also discussions condemning the use of the church building for election purposes,—calling attention to the precarious condition of the Ministerial Pension Fund,—urging the necessity of having regular collections in the churches, a portion of which should be sent to this Fund, criticising the ecclesiastical law of 1863 in reference to the election of ministers,—the rights of sessions, the right of women to the church franchise,—the law decreeing the periodical re-election of ministers, discipline, and leaving the church buildings open for private prayer, in addition to the seasons of public worship and other matters, while the meeting was closed with a Synodical observance of the Lord's Supper.

The Synod of the Grisons met at St. Moritz, and having admitted three new pastors to its ministry, found itself lacking in business. It therefore added to its Synodical business a meeting of its Pastoral conference, whose topic for consideration was—"What may be yielded to Modern Criticism, without sacrificing fundamental truth?" The concessions of the speaker who opened the discussion were somewhat striking: The existence of God, the absolute value of the moral order of the universe, the unique character of Christianity amid all other religions, cannot be theoretically demonstrated. The point, therefore, on which resistance should be offered to the critics is, the impression which the Personality of Christ produces on us, and the respect which in consequence moves us so profoundly, and draws us to his feet. It is in such an experience, that we find the confirmation of the invisible government of God, of his love, and of our responsibility. The speaker was however somewhat embarrassed, when he was asked, Which was the Christ he meant?—since the impression he spoke of would imply the historic value of the evangelical narrative on which again many other questions depended. The discussion was, after all, a passage at arms between the practical reason of the followers of Ritschl and the theoretic reason of the Rationlists, and showed that neither of these schemes can furnish us with a satisfactory conclusion on the question at issue.—London Quarterly Register.

Joseph Parker—An Appreciation.

By F. W. Gunsaulus, D. D.

Joseph Parker's nature declared itself in his mobile and expansive face. It is a dull-eyed soul who saw not a great spirit with mighty experiences looking out of the window of the house which he inhabited.

He had so meditated upon the Scriptures and lived with kings, prophets, psalmists, and captains of the Bible that he became part of them, and they a part of him. When he preached upon David, it was no small man attempting, with circuitous externalism, to measure the poet-king's girth, or even, with a mental kodak, standing upon the outside of his character and its experiences, to represent the man himself. On the contrary, Parker was David at that time. Not only the man who looked out of his body in response to the wooings of righteousness, but also he who peered forth in answer to the charm of iniquity, could be seen and heard as the characterization went on. One instant, it was the boy looking aspiringly into the heights of manhood as he talked with Samuel; the next, it was the man looking down from the physical safety and moral insecurity of his palace into the defenseless home of Uriah. Once when I heard him, and the theme was Isaiah's visit to the springs, the preacher had room for the movement of such a man within the hospitable largeness of his own nature, and when he spoke in whispers or trumpet tones, one thought not so much of the cost with which capacious genius pays the expense of being able to entertain so great a soul, as of how unobstructedly and lofty the prophet-statesman of Israel moved in City Temple. Yet withal, this elasticity of mind went with rock-like integrity. His antiquity was full of modernity.

It is true that Joseph Parker chose great themes and pledged himself, in so far as a man may add to a career involving greatness, when he chose to be an expository or scriptural preacher. But every man lives in his choices and there he declares himself. No ordinary man fifty years ago would have deliberately chosen simply to open up the Scriptures. John Henry Newman left the Scriptures because he would not trust his own soul with them, or them with his own soul, and in a fashion unmanly but very appealing to a certain class of good people, he handed his destiny over to Rome. Contrariwise, his more valiant brother stood for sheer rationalism. Even evangelical religiousness fifty years ago was under the sway of a rationalistic mental method, or it sobbed and yearned with infinite sentimentality.

Now, it is not because Joseph Parker was insensible to the fascination of Rome, or unable to feel the joy and command the processes of reasoning, that he found himself a student and expositor of the Scriptures. He chose the Scriptures by necessity of his large and needy nature, and like Martin Luther, he has inaugurated a reform. We owe more to Joseph Parker and to the Melancthon of this recent friendship,—Dr. Alexander McLaren, of Manchester,—than to any other two men of our time, for our well-grounded hope that, by opening unto them the Scriptures, the children of tomorrow shall be neither rationalists nor Romanists, but devout and earnest believers and workers in the Kingdom of God and his Christ.

As one looks into that newly made grave, it seems impossible to put sufficient emphasis upon the fact that these forty years of incandescence came because the sources of supply for all this heat and light were demonstrably infinite. A great man with a great theme—Joseph Parker with the Scriptures of God and man—how marvelously they reinforce and illustrate each other! Can a man's thought and feeling become weak or decrepit with this impulse beneath and within them, which has made vigorous the hope and aspiration of thousands of years? The answer is, Joseph Parker was as fresh a preacher on the day of his last utterance in City Temple as was the spiritual purpose of God which flows from the creation of Adam to John's vision from Patmos. His abounding quality came from the abundance of material which he did not have to invent, and he had a push forward into the consciousness of those who listened to him behind which was the life of the Hebrew people and the all-conquering career of Christ and his apostles.

It would be idle to assume that mediocrity may ever get as much from such a harvest field as genius gets. Also, it is to be observed that many an ethical teacher now would be hesitant to permit the creation and training of a man who had within him such abilities for blundering and such capacities for evil. Cromwell, David, Burns, Augustine, with varying colors, portray to us the cost or the peril of letting loose a great soul on the earth. Joseph Parker, by the grace of God, did make mistakes of judgment; but also, by the grace of God, he avoided so many pitfalls which such a genius appears to be busy digging for such a man, that I regard him as little less than a wonderfully endowed and restrained man. He would never have been a little sinner: he was not a little saint.

"Lord, is it I?" That was the question asked wistfully and tragically at the moment when Jesus was saying to his disciples in the upper room: "One of you shall betray me." It takes a man like Phillips Brooks with the full resources and entire perils which belong to a great physical, mental, and spiritual personality, to exhibit the meanings of such an outbursting question. Exegesis like this is a matter of complete personality; it is not a matter of learning in Greek or skill in analysis. —So Joseph Parker actually lived broadly, deeply, loftily; and there was no little of the dramatic element in his entire life. What wonder that he responded sometimes to the more than Shakespearean possibilities of an event or an episode in scriptural history, as with the rush of a mighty wind through contemporaneous history! The legend of his eloquence will be told by many generations.

The great mountain will oftentimes be lost sight of by those who fail to comprehend its largeness or appreciate its solidity, because such beautiful vines grow about the trees which half cover it up to the snow line, or because the mind is interested in iridescent peaks that jut out from the many elevations into the blue. Let us be thankful that upon such greatness there lived so much beauty, and that with such shadows there abides the demonstration that here a great light once appeared and behind it shone a great sun.—The Interior.

A Friend of Education.

At the home of a relative in Asheville, N. C., Feb. 12, 1903, Dr. J. L. M. Curry died, aged 78 years. His was a long life crowded with achievement.

He was born in Georgia; graduated from the University of Georgia in 1843, and from the Harvard law school in 1845. He served in the Mexican War, with the Texas Rangers and in 1857 went to Congress from Alabama, as a State's Rights Democrat. With his colleagues he withdrew from Congress in 1861. He was a member of the Confederate Congress; also an able cavalry officer, serving with distinction on the staffs of Generals Wheeler and Jos. E. Johnson. His mettle was proved on many a battle field.

After the war he entered the Baptist ministry, becoming, successively, president of Howard College, in Alabama, and professor of English in Richmond College.

He was twice minister to Spain, first as the appointee of President Cleveland and then as a special representative of the boy King, of whose birth he, as a member of the diplomatic corps at Madrid, retained a personal recollection.

But it is not as minister, soldier, or statesman that Dr. Curry will live longest in the memory of his countrymen. His figure stands out as the pioneer of industrial education in the South.

In 1881 he became the agent of the Peabody Fund, "laboring in behalf of public school education, higher, normal and industrial, for all the people of both races." Under his supervision there was a wise and liberal policy adopted and continued enlargement of the field. He had no uncertain or illusory ideas of the work. He gave the detail of it his shrewd and tactful care, and sent this benevolence into channels of great efficiency.

A Christian, an orator, a writer, a man who did things, a gentleman, with all the Southern significance of the word, was Dr. Curry, and he has passed on before his age bore heavily upon him. The South is his debtor.

Beyond.

We may not know why our most ardent hope

Is blighted like some bloom by early frost,

And we are left in sadness as we grope,

Like children in the dark—mourning our lost.

We may not know why some bright promise fails,

And we are left to sigh, "it might have been;"

And earthly joys seem but as idle tales,

While our best things are touched with blight of sin.

Ah, yes! we may not know the reason now.

Cheer up, brave heart: why should God's child despond?

Look up from shadows deep, to Calvary's brow,

And trust thy Father for a bright beyond.

The Harvest and Its Lord.

In choosing "the harvest" as the type of evangelistic work, the Master presents three distinct thoughts.

First, when "the field is the world" how vast is the harvest! Second, how beautiful are the fields of golden grain and how joyful the laborers in gathering the harvest! Third, the harvest quickly perishes.

This harvest has a proprietor. We were deeply touched by the prayer of a Princeton volunteer; "Heavenly Father, we thank thee that the harvest has a Lord." Its Lord is omnipotent. He is enthroned in glory.

The farmer, in time of harvest, if he has few laborers, is in desperate straits. The Great Husbandman places a deep responsibility upon his people who feel their sore need, and exhorts them in humble faith to pray to the Lord of the harvest.

The North-Kiangsu Mission asks for seven and the Mid-China Mission for eight men,—three doctors and twelve preachers—to be sent out during 1903. Nashville has appealed to the Church. Pious physicians are without number; let us in the closet, at the family altar, and in the great congregation pray for the three to go.

There are fifteen Seniors at Union Seminary; nine at Clarksville, six (Southern) at Princeton; five at Columbia and five (Southern) at Louisville. Let God's people bear their names before a throne of grace and ask the Master to select "the twelve" and ordain them to be with Him in services. Hampden C. DuBose.

"Once More into the Breach, Dear Friends!"

This week the battle is on in both Houses of the General Assembly. We have good reason for hope. We went into the battle to fight, and to fight unto victory. Let no one falter now. To falter now is to surrender in the critical hour. If you have any means of influence for the London bill, and do not exert it in the battle here and in the sight of Him who presides above all the conflict between Good and Evil, you count against us. For at this moment he who is not for us is against us.

The Assembly looks to the people. Let the people look to the Assembly and answer it well. Everywhere the State is stirred. Our desire is that this sentiment shall be put in definite, palpable and active form—in mass-meetings and delegations to Raleigh—at the earliest moment possible.

Let the people everywhere pray for the help of Him in whom is all our help.

Sincerely,

Josiah William Bailey.

The President and the Race Problem.

We have felt sincere regret at the ill-advised attitude of President Roosevelt toward the negro question, as shown in his appointment of Crum as Collector at Charleston and in the Indianola incident. He will gain by such action nothing that will at all recompense him for the good will of the South, which he had, but is in a fair way to forfeit. And if he thinks to contribute by any such martinet methods to the final solution of the race problem, this only shows how little he understands its gravity. No merely political advantage inside the Republican party—if indeed any is to be gained—could possibly justify a deliberate affront to the deep-rooted sentiments of the whole people of the South, regardless of party lines. It is a pleasing theory that the negro should be allowed, without regard to color, to occupy any post for which he is fitted. But in no part of the United States is his color disregarded. It never was. The indications are that it never will be. Why need Mr. Roosevelt affect to ignore this fact? Such affectation is hardly short of absurd. And if, recognizing the fact, he is persuaded that he can over-ride it, this is absurd. Government positions, small and great, exist for the service of the people, not for the bestowment of political wards, or the carrying out of impossible theories, whether political or social.—Nashville Advocate.

The Open Court.

Hangshaw, China, Dec. 31st, 1902.

To the Editor of the Presbyterian Standard:

I wish to ask a question of you and of our Presbyterian Church, through your paper with your permission. Is it right to receive money from heathen sources for Christian institutions? Or to put the same question in another form, Is there anything wrong in receiving voluntary contributions from friendly heathen for our Christian institutions? This question came up at a late called-meeting of our mission and elicited warm discussion. The occasion of the discussion was, that contributions had been made by high officials and others, for the purpose of building additional wards to our hospital, for the treatment of insane patients. When this fact was stated the propriety of receiving the money was immediately questioned, and the debate was on and was carried on with considerable warmth for several hours, when it was decided to decline to receive any more money from such sources. As a practical question this subject was rather new to most of us and no special study of it, in all its bearings had been made by us. Before the Boxer troubles the receiving of money from heathen to help in our work was something almost unheard of, but since then the attitude of officials and people towards things foreign, including the foreign missionary and his work, has undergone a great change. They are now almost pushing their money upon us, in some places and for certain lines of work. They are willing to help us in building schools, colleges and hospitals though they know that the Christian religion will be the governing principle in the teaching and the practice of these institutions.

In some instances high officials have built government schools or colleges, and have employed missionaries as presidents and professors. There is one such college in the capital of the Shantung province and another in the capital of the Shan-si province, but the presidents and faculties have hardly got settled before the question of the worship of Confucius came up. The missionaries remonstrated against requiring the Christian students to observe this rule, but the Chinese trustees were inexorable and the whole foreign staff of the Shantung college resigned to take effect at the New Year, if the rule is still enforced, without exempting Christian students.

At Soochow the Southern Methodists are erecting large and expensive buildings for a "university," to cost probably a hundred thousand Mexican dollars, of which heathen Chinese have subscribed twenty thousand. They say that the university is to be entirely Christian, and that the only object of its establishment is to advance the Christian religion, but one cannot be inquiring if this was the only object of the heathen subscribers.

At our mission meeting last September one of our physicians reported that several young men, not Christians, desired to study medicine with him, but he had to decline to receive them for want of rooms, whereon they handed him several hundred dollars to build rooms, on the mission lot, for their accommodation. The mission did not feel competent to decide the question of receiving this money for this object, so the question was referred to our Executive Committee for its decision. At our late meeting two weeks ago, one brother stated that he had been receiving money from heathen to aid in building a church, and asked the mission to give its decision on the point, but as the church is being built entirely with money from native sources, and the mission is not called on to furnish any of the funds, it was thought by some that it could not exercise any jurisdiction in the case. Still the question was pressed and the mission finally decided to discuss the question at its regular meeting next September, and appointed a committee of three of our best Biblical scholars to bring in a report for its consideration.

This question is a practical one and must be decided not only in theory but in practice. And it is important, as it affects mission work directly, involves the interests of the Master's cause, the progress of Christianity and the salvation of souls. But it is beset with difficulties, and cannot be decided off-hand. There are arguments both for and against the reception of heathen money, some of which are drawn from the Scriptures, some from reason, some from experience and some from example. It was argued that the case was parallel with the receiving of money by the home church, from unbelievers. That all the gold and the silver and the cattle on a thousand hills are the Lord's, and if a heathen wishes to give some of it to Him, it should not be declined. Our church does not supply all the funds that we can use with advantage in the work. That our object is to benefit the land of the heathen and they should be allowed to take part in it. Self-support is very desirable, let them begin now to help in the support of work done for their benefit. We do receive money from them now in the form of fees for medical attention and medicine, and for tuition in our school.

On the other hand, it was argued that the apostles did not receive money from the heathen, nor is there any record of money being received from them in the Old Testament. That if we accept their money we place ourselves under some moral obligation to carry out their wishes. That our church is well able to supply all the money needed in mission work. That it would deprive it of spiritual blessings, if we cut it off from this privilege by receiving from the heathen.

These are only specimens of the arguments used on either side, and the writer has tried to state each side fairly without indicating his own view. He does not wish to convey the impression, however, that he is on the fence, for he thinks that both his feet are planted firmly on solid ground.

He wishes to let the home church know something about the difficult questions which constantly come up for our consideration and decision on the heathen field. We would like to hear the opinions of others on this point before it comes up for discussion and settlement at our meeting in September next.

It is worthy of note that George E. McNeill, the New England labor leader, will be one of the main speakers at the meeting of the New England Sabbath Protection League. When organized labor takes up the fight for the Sabbath, the cause will be won. "Six days shalt thou labor," also means, Six days only needest thou labor.—Presbyterian Standard, February 11, 1903.

Dear Standard:

Permit me to add that organized labor has taken up the fight for the Sabbath; has been fighting that fight in fact for years, and is wondering why the Church recognizes its efforts and helps it so little

A regular feature of the fight for shorter hours of labor is a requirement of "double time" for Sunday work; that is, if a member of a certain trade receives 30 cents an hour for work during an eight-hour day in the week, his union fixes his wages at 60 cents an hour for Sunday work. This is intended to be prohibitory. The unions want their men to have their Sunday rest. And yet for insisting on a fixed schedule of hours, wages, and other rules of the highest social value, our churches usually condemn them as tyrannical, and side with the employes who are robbing them and forcing them to break the fourth commandment by Sunday work, the fifth and sixth commandments by child labor and woman labor; and who are denying to them the right of organization and other rights, with such un-Christian feudalistic arrogance as to goad them to violence and to covetousness. I am glad to see that you are disposed to help the great cause of social justice. Keep it up. The way the churches usually treat organized labor leaves no room for surprise that the average working-man is not fond of going to church.

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

We are glad to publish the tribute to Dr. Rankin by friends in Japan. Civilization in the Cove is written by one who knows all about the facts and from the point of view of a sympathizing friend, who is carrying Christian Civilization into the Cove. A Mother's Questions to other parents are suggestive. The Appreciation of Dr. Parker, by Dr. Gunsaulus is an excellent sketch of the last of the great preachers of the 19th century. Dr. H. C. DuBose is always a welcome contributor and we hope Mr. J. W. Bailey's appeal, which we heartily endorse, will be heeded by our great Presbyterian constituency. The Open Court discusses some interesting questions. That is a beautiful poem on our first page and "Beyond," is a message of hope.

Correction.—In "A Friend of Education," page 14, read, "a special representative at the coronation of the boy-King."

The first letter in Open Court should be dated from Hangchow.

PERSONALS.

Rev. R. B. Grinnan, D. D., of Louisville, Ky., has signified his acceptance of the call of the Hendersonville, N. C., church, and is expected to arrive about the 1st of March.

Rev. S. C. Byrd, of Columbia, S. C., has been called to the church at Winnsboro, S. C., made vacant by the death of Rev. D. E. Jordan, D. D.

Rev. T. H. Law, of Spartanburg, S. C., general agent of the American Bible Society, occupied the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church, Greensboro, N. C., last Sunday.

At the communion service, held the 1st Sabbath in February, the Second Presbyterian Church, Louisville, Ky., received twenty-six new members, seventeen of them on profession. Fifty-two have united with this church since the beginning of Rev. Neander M. Woods' pastorate.

Temperance.

The Battle In Raleigh.

(Editorial).

We were profoundly impressed, last week, with the immense gain that has been made by the temperance movement in the last ten days. The people have been heard from. The General Assembly has some men in it who are opposed to all temperance legislation. There are others still who have a natural and even praise-worthy ambition for honor and preferment in the future. The first are blind. But the last are being convinced that the people are terribly in earnest.

We attempt to give a faithful and accurate sketch of the present status of affairs. Before the Legislature met Senator Simmons came out in an interview in which he proposed the rooting up of the country distilleries, and the confinement of them and of the saloons to the incorporated towns. It was at once recognized what an immense stride this would be in the direction of temperance—and we use the word always in the same sense, the equivalent to sobriety. There was already manifest a strong under-current of popular feeling on the subject—the Anti-Saloon League has not been idle for a year and the influence of all the religious papers has been worth something to the cause.

Governor Aycock's message was along the line of advanced legislation. But the Anti-Saloon League put in its platform a series of demands which were embodied in the "London Bill." Senator London was requested to introduce it on account of his well-known and long-standing advocacy of the cause. This bill was at once announced as extreme, by the liquor interests, and the theory was accepted by those who did not take the trouble to read it. Then came the broadside of the News and Observer that helped to wake the people up and incidentally sent the whiskey attorneys scampering from their paid espousal of a rotten cause like rats from a sinking ship. Then came the hearing before the joint committee of both houses in which according to the Charlotte Observer the morally stunted were outclassed. And the petitions began to come in in a steady stream, sometimes rising to a flood, for the London Bill.

The chief point of attack in that bill was the fifth resolution, requiring the saloon keeper to get a majority of the voters on his petitions for license or to call an election once in two years. Last week the Senate Committee amended that proposition, by requiring that only one-third of the voters would be sufficient to secure the license. It was amended by some of the most earnest advocates of temperance. We have contended for it entire as a sound principle and a reasonable measure, but we have never regarded it as a vital part of the bill, in the original or amended form.

As thus amended the bill was favorably reported to the Senate and will come up Thursday of this week, before the Senate. We have good reason to believe that it will pass that body. In the mean time the Watts Bill along the line of the Simmons interview, was favorably reported to the House by a large majority of the committee. As a substitute for the Watts Bill, Mr. Smith of Gates offered his measure, which is a modification of the London Bill, in the particular of allowing the country communities now afflicted with the distilleries and saloons (there are very few saloons left in the country,) the privilege of voting to retain them, and putting all communities not voting by a majority of ballots or petitioners before July 1903, for retaining the saloons and distilleries, on a prohibition basis.

But the encouraging thing has been that both these house bills have been shown to be defective and to need amendment in the right direction. And the pressure has been enormous to amend. The idea has gotten abroad over the State that anything less than the London Bill would be a make-shift, a sop thrown by the politicians to the Cerberus of Prohibition. The cry has been more and more insistent for the London Bill. So on Saturday it was understood that Mr. Smith was willing to accept an amendment abolishing the country distillery (the main feature of the Watts Bill.) and Mr. Watts has since offered an amendment giving the right to the incorporated towns to vote at any time for dispensaries as well as for prohibition or the saloons and for or against the distilleries (a feature of the London Bill.) The Watts Bill needs now but the incorporation of the anti-jug law, making the place of delivery the place of sale, for it to be stronger than the Smith Bill and practically identical with the London Bill. The Amendments have been in the right direction and for the purpose of getting the needed votes for the passage of the bills.

And now one good strong pull altogether, this week, and the work is done! Ask by letter and telegram and delegation that the representatives of the people as distinguished from the representatives of the saloon, stand firm, and let them feel around them the supporting arms of their people—and a new era dawns upon North Carolina.

Church News

TEXAS

EDNA.—At a meeting of the congregation, the first Sunday in February, it was unanimously resolved to raise the pastor's salary and steps were taken to make an increase for the current year of 40 per cent.

The congregation has recently completed a neat manse and this provision for the pastor enables him to go on with his work "free from worldly cares and avocations."

There were four additions to the church, announced at the last Communion, and some others are to come in soon.

A supply of the new Psalms and Hymns has just been secured and an effort is being made to increase the efficiency of the church's song worship.

The church begins the New Year with an outlook for increased usefulness.

BEAUMONT.—Since coming to the work at this place on the last Sabbath in November, we have met with great encouragement. Our Sabbath-school has grown steadily, increasing from about 60 to 140 enrollment. The people are taking great interest in the work, and a petition will go up to the Spring meeting of Presbytery for the organization of a church, and we hope to organize with about 30 members.

We have commenced regular work at the oil fields, but can not tell much about the results as the people are very transient. On the night of the 23rd of January our residence was stormed, and about 60 people, old and young, effected entrance by heavy pounding, and captured the hearts of wife and myself, by their overwhelming kindness and carried off our profound gratitude. Our basket and store were filled to overflowing with good things, and our pockets made to swell because of the gift of much needed funds.

With humble hearts we acknowledge our Father's bounty and pray for His richest blessings upon our kind friends.

F. A. Sale.

TENNESSEE.

JOHNSTON CITY; First Church.—At the morning service, Sunday, Feb. 8th, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered. Thirteen new members were welcomed—ten by letter and three on profession of faith. A large congregation was present to renew their covenant vows. In the afternoon three children were baptized.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

CLINTON.—Rev. Thornwell Jacobs has begun night services at the Second Presbyterian Church. The audiences are excellent in number and attention. The cotton mill families furnish the audience, making a full half of the white population of the town of Clinton. President A. E. Spencer conducts a Sabbath-school in the afternoon which enrolls 60 to 70 pupils.

A site for a chapel has been offered us by Mr. Leake at the Lydia Mills. It will be accepted and a room built for Sunday-school purposes. In both these schools union literature will be employed, and teachers of any denomination.—Our Monthly.

NORTH CAROLINA

To the ministers of Mecklenburg Presbytery:
Dear Brethren:

It is very necessary that you attend to the matter of taking up collections for Presbyterian Home Missions this month, and send in the amounts at once. The committee must have the money needed for the workers.

By order of the committee.

G. F. Thompson.

Lees-McRae Institute.

"Line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little." Like unto this has been the growth and development of the Lees-McRae Institute. Prayer upon prayer, letter upon letter, appeal upon appeal, here a little and there a little. The first cash contribution one dollar, the next five, one of the last one hundred. No single amount even more than $200. But the work has gone steadily forward until to-day we have property worth $6,000, eighty-odd pupils, four Christian teachers and a matron and less than $250 of debt. This debt has been reduced from about $500, which was made in order to get in our new academy before cold weather.

We want again to thank the many friends, churches and societies who have helped to make this school what it is by their prayers and contributions, and that they and others may know that their money has been well used we call attention to the following testimonials:

I believe myself to be pretty well acquainted with the mission work in the mountains of the South, as carried on by the Presbyterian Church, and by other denominations, and I am ready to say that the work done by Rev. Edgar Tufts, and his helpers, in Watanga county, both on educational and evangelistic lines, is the most successful work of which I know, and bears greater marks of permanency.

A. J. McKelway,

Editor of Presbyterian Standard.

Having visited the Lees-McRae Institute, at Banner Elk, N. C., and knowing the management and work of the school, I take pleasure in endorsing it in the highest terms and commending it as thoroughly deserving the most generous support of all those who are interested in the education of the Southern mountaineers.

James I. Vance.

"The work the Lees-McRae Institute has done among the girls and boys of the mountains of Western North Carolina will always tell for good. The Institute deserves liberal financial support to enable it to do the greater work it can and will do, if means are provided."

W. J. Martin,

Prof. of Chemistry, Davidson College, N. C.

"It gives me great pleasure to testify specially to the marvelous intellectual, moral and religious up-lifting done by the Lees-McRae Institute of Banner Elk, North Carolina.

It has my unqualified endorsement and recommendation."

C. A. Monroe,

For 11 years Ch'm'n Home Missions in Concord Presbytery.

One of the chief needs of our mountain people is Christian education. The Lees-McRae Institute is furnishing this need in a heroic manner so far as it is able. It needs greater resources and is worthy of the most hearty support of all Christian people.

John Wakefield.

Dr. Butterick of the Educational Board also says: "I know Mr. Tufts personally and we have in our files endorsements of him and his work from the most reliable men in the State of North Carolina. . . . A regular appreciation has come to us from this school and for one reason only did we find ourselves unable to make an appropriation for the work, namely: the school is a denominational school."

The very reason that Dr. Butterick gives for not helping our school is one of the very strongest reasons why every Presbyterian ought to be interested in it. The Educational Board is doing a great work along the line of secular education. Important as this is, it is not a panacea for all the ills of life. If our pupils were all from Christian homes and regular attendants upon the Sunday-school and church services, this theory of education would be good and its work would be all that could be desired. But as a matter of fact, this is not the case. Our theory of an all round education is based on our belief that man is a trichotomy, and that the most important part of a youth's education is that which teaches him his relation to God. Next the secular education of the mind and third (and this is very important) the training of the body. It is the carrying out of this theory that makes our mission schools the right arm to the church as well as the means of fitting the pupils for citizenship. And we believe that in proportion to the time that we have been running and the amount of money that we have used, that the Lees-McRae Institute has rendered more of this double service to God and humanity than any institution in the State of North Carolina!

Our greatest need at present is money to build a boy's dormitory and to better equip this department of our school for the work that lies before us. From our experience in the past and knowledge of the conditions, we unhesitatingly promise, that if God spares our health, to duplicate in value by donations from the mountains, in land, lumber and work every dollar that is sent us for this work during the next twelve months and to increase our enrollment to at least 200 pupils, during the same period. On the other hand if we do not go forward with this work we are going to loose the further cultivation of much of the ground that we have broken up.

Humanly speaking, if there is a better investment for a limited amount of the Lord's money, we know not of it.

Edgar Tufts.

CHARLOTTE.—The 28th anniversary of the Young Men's Christian Association was held in the Academy of Music, last Sunday afternoon. A large audience was present. Mr. James H. Southgate, of Durham, N. C., made an effective address on the subject: The Influence and Power of a Young Man, Clothed with an Inflexible Purpose to do the Will of God. The association reports 693 members and 13 professed conversions during the past year.

The sixth annual meeting of the Woman's Foreign Missions Union of Orange Presbytery will be held in Lexington, N. C., March 25-27, 1903.

All adult and junior societies not now included in the Union are invited and urged to co-operate with those who form the Union, in their four specific aims: To promote:

1. Women's organized missionary work in the Presbytery.
2. The missionary training of children.
3. Dissemination of missionary literature.
4. Prayer for missions.

"This Union shall consist of all the Women's F. M. Societies in Orange Presbytery, which shall, through their president, subscribe to the constitution and by-laws, and shall pay the annual dues, as hereinafter provided." (Constitution, Act. I.)

Societies notifying the Union by delegate or by written statement of their purpose as above, will be received and recognized as members of the Union.

There are now thirty six adult and junior societies on the roll, representing about eight hundred and fifty members, whose increased usefulness and spirituality proclaim how great results would be gained if there were genuine, whole-hearted, systematic co-operation of all our societies.

Each society is entitled to send two delegates. These will please notify Mrs. Z. V. Walser, Lexington, by March 10th at latest, that entertainment may be provided.

Mrs. R. D. Blacknall,

Pres. W. F. M. Union.

DAVIDSON.—The annual praise meeting of the Ladies' Missionary society was held on the evening of the 10th inst. at the home of Dr. Martin. Mrs. H. C. DuBose made a most interesting talk. The contributions amounted to about $50. The supper given the evening before by the King's Daughters also netted a neat sum.

The Sophomores held their class banquet on Wednesday night. It was a very handsome, not to say sumptuous feast. The menu cards were from Elliott, of Philadelphia, of most beautiful pattern and finish. The toasts were quite varied, and showed that the class possesses its full share of youthful eloquence. Dr. Graham and Dr. Munroe, as always, were present and from the faculty, Drs. Grey and Harding. Representatives from the Medical College and the other academic classes constituted the other guests. The entire company gathering for such good fellowship numbered about fifty.

On last Sabbath Dr. Graham preached from the text: "It is appointed unto men once to die but after this the judgment." The sermon was one of his best, earnest, solemn, awe-inspiring, and convincing, with it all, filled with love and a proclamation of Gospel mercy. If any apology were needed for the frequent reference in the correspondence to the village pulpit, it could be easily found in the fact that the church here is filled from Sunday to Sunday with the youth that come from Christian homes scattered through many states and hundreds find comfort and satisfaction in knowing that their sons sit under such a blessed ministry.

Tonight, the 13th, the students are off for the reception at the Presbyterian College in Charlotte. A special train is to bring them back at 12 o'clock. It is safe to say that no snow storm at least will block their return and keep them twelve hours on the way, as was the case a year ago. The air and sunshine to day have been the breath of spring.

February 13, 1903.

According to the Book of Church Order, Orange Presbytery is called to meet in Greensboro First Church Tuesday, Feb. 24, 1903, at 10 a. m.

1. To receive Rev. S. M. Rankin from Transylvania Presbytery.

2. To place in his hands calls from Alamance and Springwood churches.

3. If the way be clear, to arrange for his installation.

J. H. Grey, Moderator.

FAYETTEVILLE PRESBYTERY.—At a special meeting of the Presbytery of Fayetteville held in Maxton, Monday, Feb. 9th, the pastoral relation between Rev. A. McLaughlin and Ellerbe Springs and Pee Dee Churches was dissolved, and he was dismissed to the Presbytery of Macon.

John M. Rose, Temporary Clerk.

The Needs At Barium Springs Orphans' Home.

At the Synod's Orphan's Home there are seven completed buildings. The superintendent's cottage, the Infirmary and the Burroughs Art Building are three of these. The remaining four are the Synod's Cottage, the Annie Louise Cottage, the Mrs. Lees' Cottage and the Rumble Hall which are used for taking care of 120 orphans. The Alexander Industrial Building including the laundry is to be used for teaching mechanical trades and is now incomplete. There are many applications for taking orphans into the home that cannot be granted for want of room. The last Synod recognizing this fact instructed the board of regents to take steps during this year to raise funds for erecting another cottage that would accommodate 30 more orphans. In obedience to this direction the regents at their last meeting appointed as a committee to raise the needed funds, Dr. J. Rumble, Dr. J. W. Stagg, and Dr. H. G. Hill, the last being made chairman.

This committee was instructed to try and raise at least $6,000 for the building fund. Of this $4,000 would be required for the new cottage and $2,000 to complete the Alexander Industrial Building. The pressing need now is this $2,000 for finishing this building and making it available for the purposes intended. This need is rendered more imperative by the fact that the building fund being exhausted, the support fund has been drawn upon to such an extent in order to put the Industrial building under roof and prevent its being injured by the weather that there is very little money in the treasury for any purpose. The support fund can be reimbursed just so soon as the building fund is replenished.

There are three funds at the Orphans' Home, "the building fund," for erecting buildings and repairing or improving property, "the support fund," for paying current expenses and "the press fund," for maintaining the paper as the organ of the Home. These funds are kept distinct by the Treasurer but are sometimes temporarily drawn upon to aid each other. The building fund has now urgent need of increase. If one of the Lord's Stewards would give $4,000 to erect another cottage to care for 30 orphans he would erect a monument more enduring and useful than the costliest cenotaph found within our commonwealth. If one desiring to train boys to be useful citizens by rendering them morally developed as well as masters of trades he could not accomplish his purpose better than by giving $2,000 to complete the Alexander Industrial building. But if we can not secure such large gifts from the rich will not those of moderate means send contributions for the Barium Springs Building Fund to the Treasurer. Mr. T. M. Brown, Charlotte, N. C. This appeal is to the Presbyterian public. I address letters to individuals and I suppose other members of the committee do the same.

H. G. Hill.

TENNESSEE.

MORRISTOWN.—On Sunday, Feb. 1st, four persons were received into the church—one by letter and three on profession. On Sunday, Feb. 8th, five were received, one by letter and four on profession. This makes eleven accessions here since Jan. 1st and that without any special services in our church.

J. M. Clark.

MISSISSIPPI.

OXFORD.—A called meeting of the North Mississippi Presbytery was held here Feb. 6th to consider the resignation of Dr. W. D. Hedleston as pastor of the Presbyterian Church of this place. Unanimous opposition to his acceptance of a call from the Covington, Ky., Presbyterian Church was made by this congregation. After a full discussion of the circumstances the Presbytery decided not to accept the resignation of Dr. Hedleston, and he will remain here.—Southwestern Presbyterian.

FLORIDA.

Dr. E. O. Gnerrant, of Kentucky, has been preaching at St. Petersburg, Florida. He was to return to Umatilla on Monday of this week.

Committee Notes.

The Committee of Foreign Missions met in the Mission Rooms on Tuesday, Feb. 3rd, 1903.

The first item of business was to instruct the Secretary, in view of the Committee's recent disappointment in securing a business man for Africa, to issue, in the name of the Committee another call for a volunteer for this work.

Miss Florence S. Rodd, who was previously appointed as a missionary without having her field designated, was assigned to the China Mission, and it is hoped we will send her out as a reinforcement to that Mission during the coming summer.

The following action was taken in regard to special object work, namely: "The Committee, concurring in the expressed judgment of our missionaries on the field, discourages direct support of native workers or helpers by local home churches and societies and recommends that churches and societies desiring to have their contributions applied in that way take one or more of the $50 shares into which the Station work has been divided, to be applied to the Station where they wish to employ native helpers." This will leave all direct dealing with native helpers to the missionaries, and will remove the danger of disappointment of those engaged in this kind of work on account of the frequent changes in the individuals employed.

The sub-committee on the Forward Movement was instructed to take such steps as are necessary and practicable to prosecute the Student Summer Campaign for the coming summer as a part of the Forward Movement.

It was also ordered that the Committee co-operate with the movement looking towards holding an Inter-denominational Missionary Conference for Young People in the South.

It was ordered also that the balance of the Congo Boat Fund be transferred to the general fund, and that hereafter all funds for the Congo Boat will be reported in the general receipts.

A request from the British and Foreign Bible Society that Rev. J. R. Smith, D. D., be allowed to give part of his time to the work on the new translation of the Bible into Portuguese for the Brazilian Church was granted.

The request of the Japan Mission for $350 to put the house in which Rev. and Mrs. S. R. Hope are now living in a more comfortable and sanitary condition had to be postponed for the present. The Committee is very desirous of doing this work and would very much appreciate it if some kind friend would make a special contribution which would enable us to place these missionaries in such condition as to a home as would be for their health and comfort.

The Treasurer's report showed that the receipts for January were $13,063, a gain of $764 as compared with January of 1902.

The Assembly's Ad Interim Committee on Home Missions being in session the Secretary was instructed to send to that Committee our fraternal greetings, and offer them the use of our Rooms for their work.

Rev. W. R. Dobyns, D. D., of St. Joseph, Mo., was present during the meeting and was invited to sit as a corresponding member.

After transacting the usual routine business the Committee adjourned and was closed with prayer by Dr. Dobyns.

S. H. Chester, Secretary.

The Virginia senate has passed the bill to provide for the placing of Lee's statue in the national capitol alongside of Washington's as the State's greatest two sons. The vote was 30 to 9. Among the senators who supported the bill was a son of President John Tyler, who made an impressive speech in which he referred to Lee as one in whose life and character "America's highest ideal of military greatness, of civic worth and human excellence found expression."—Exchange.

The President is seriously concerned about the health of Mrs. Roosevelt who has apparently given way under the strain of the continued gaieties of the social season. She had a fainting spell on Friday and had to be excused from seeing the guests invited to dinner and to the large musicale afterward. Her physicians consulted in regard to her health and order absolute rest for the next few weeks. Mrs. Roosevelt has therefore canceled all her present social engagements. Last night the guests at the musicale were received by Mrs. Hay, as wife of the Cabinet officer next in succession to the President.

During the past fifteen months, the British Board of Trade has been able to announce that not a single passenger has been killed on the railroads of Great Britain—the most crowded railroad system in the world. Here in the United States, within the past fifteen days, 77 passengers have lost their lives, and numerous railroad employes. These figures being presented to a railroad official, he put his hand on the weak spot: "The different results are to be explained by a difference in national temperaments—here we take chances." He is right—we do take chances, and the results show 77 passengers in fifteen days. It is interesting to know that a German invention for the avoidance of railroad accidents is being tested at Frankfort; a third light center rail is laid, which is connected with an electrical apparatus carried by the engine. By this means danger signals can be given by electric bells and lights in the cab, and electrical brakes can be set by the same signal that gives the alarm. The engineer is in telephonic communication with the stations, and with trains ahead of him.

Moved by the spirit in which Herbert W. Bowen has conducted the peace negotiations with representatives of the allies, and anxious that his mission should succeed, Andrew Carnegie, upon hearing of Germany's action in demanding a cash payment of 1,718,000 bolivars instead of the $27,500 previously promised her, sent the following message to Mr. Bowen dated February 12:

"I shall be glad to hand you over at once $360,000 to meet the German demand, if Venezuela desires it."

This fact became known to-night after the last of the addenda to the peace protocols had been signed at British embassy. Mr. Carnegie, it is said, has been watching with close interest the progress of the negotiations here. The message was sent as soon as the news of Germany's demand was published.

Mr. Bowen dispatched a grateful reply to Mr. Carnegie, thanking him for his generous offer which, however, it was not necessary to accept.

The acute stage of the Venezuelan controversy was ended the 13th by the signing of the preliminary protocols providing for the raising of the blockade and the submission to the question of preferential treatment to the arbitration of The Hague Tribunal. Three weeks have been consumed in these negotiations, and at times there were serious hitches in the deliberations. By means of great tact and firmness, Mr. Bowen, Venezuela's representative, has finally brought about settlement which is honorable alike to all concerned.

According to the terms of the protocol, the blockade is to be raised immediately, and all the vessels belonging to Venezuela, whether naval or mercantile, which have been captured by the allies, are to be promptly returned. These are two important points gained by Mr. Bowen, which are the greatest boons to Venezuela. The blockade has been a serious drawback to industry and commerce, and the capturing of her ships was a great humiliation, which will be in a measure compensated for by their return.

The protocols all provide for the payment in cash to each Power of £5,500, and in addition Germany is to receive in equal monthly installments the aggregate sum of $340,000, while Italy will be paid the full amount of her recognized claims, less the cash payment of £5,500 already referred to. Venezuela, on her part, promises to set aside 30 per cent of the customs revenues, beginning March 1, and to hold the proceeds on deposit in the Venezuelan Treasury until the question of preferential treatment is determined by The Hague Tribunal.—Picayune.

Most people have but a vague idea of the boundary dispute with Canada over the Alaska line; commissions appointed to adjust the trouble have resulted in deadlocks. In describing the differences between the United States and Canada, the Literary Digest says:

"The whole dispute is, in brief, whether the boundary line of the Alaska 'panhandle'—which lies between Canada and the ocean for more than 500 miles—is thirty miles from the coast's windings and indentations, or thirty miles from the coast's general line. If the former, it cuts off Canada from the water for all that distance; if the latter, it gives Canada Dyea, Skayway, Pyramid Harbor, and other ports on Lynn Canal. It appears that until recently the former course of the boundary was undisputed. Frederick W. Seward, who was Assistant Secretary of State under his father, William H. Seward, and took part in the negotiations for the purchase of Alaska, points out in a letter to The New York Tribune that the acceptance of the Canadian claim would cut that part of our territory in two and give Great Britain a harbor that could be made into an impregnable naval station. He pronounced the Canadian claims absurd, and gives this interesting information:

"On the table before me, as I write, are some copies of the maps—the map prepared at St. Petersburg in 1829 by the Russian topographical bureau; the map compiled by the deputy surveyor general of Lower Canada in 1831; the map offered in evidence by Sir George Simpson in London in 1874; the map prepared by the United States coast survey, and, finally, the British Admiralty chart published in 1877 and corrected to 1898 by the hydrographer of the royal navy. In all these the boundary line between Russia and British America runs thirty miles inland, coming nowhere near the grand old arm of the sea known as the Lynn Canal or any of its harbors—the line just as it was laid down at the time of the treaties, and just as the United States says it should be now."

Attorney General Knox, who is known to have prepared the important features of the anti-trust bills now enacted into law, on being asked to show how they would be regarded by the administration, said: "The legislation against trusts passed at this session of Congress is satisfactory to the administration and the prompt response to the President's wishes is gratifying.

"The giving and taking of railroad rebates is now prohibited by a law capable of effective enforcement against corporations as well as individuals and the courts of the United States are clothed with jurisdiction to restrain and punish violators.

"The act creating the Department of Commerce vests in that Department complete authority to investigate the business methods of corporations engaged in inter-State and foreign commerce, and to that end to compel the testimony of persons having the desired knowledge. The legislation is concise in its terms, but very comprehensive in its scope. Under its provisions a fair opportunity will be offered to test the effect upon the tendency towards industrial monopoly of its guarantees of no favors for the great producer as against the small one.

"Discretion is lodged in the President as to the publication of facts useful to the public and of a wise administration of much that is helpful and nothing that is harmful.

"The law to expedite the hearing of cases and giving an appeal directly to the Supreme Court from the court of first instance assures within a reasonable time authoritative decisions upon important pending questions in the knowledge which future legislation, if necessary, can be confidently framed.

"Upon the whole, the situation is satisfactory and the result of concessions, modifications of views and forms of expression upon the part of many earnest and thoughtful men, who have endeavored within a very brief session to meet a rational public demand in a rational and effective way."

Deaths.

MRS. WALKER.—Resolutions passed by the Ladies' Aid Society of the Rowland Church.

Since it has pleased Almighty God in His mysterious, but all wise Providence to remove from our midst Mrs. W. T. Walker, who for many months was a member of our Society, we meet to pay a loving tribute to her memory. While we mourn and feel deeply her removal from us, we rest assured that our loss is her eternal gain; we bow in humble submission to the will of Him who "doeth all things well."

She was modest, true and sincere, and we testify to her gentle Christian character.

Her love for her God, her husband and her little daughter, was intense and there was no sacrifice that she would have hesitated to make for them.

We cherish her memory, extend our heart-felt sympathies to the sorrowing ones, and commend them to that God whom she loved and served, who alone can comfort their hearts.

Hearts of loved ones find great comfort in the thought of a faithful life and a peaceful death.

A Progressive Washington Party.

This exciting form of entertainment is built upon several features or contests each suggestive of "The Father of his Country." While the idea is available for any patriotic American holiday it is particularly appropriate for Feb. 22. The features may be varied by the hostess to suit her plans and the number of her guests. The following set will be found novel and delightful for a company of any age or tastes.

The Cherry Tree Contest.—This is founded upon the ever famous cherry tree about which little George could not tell a lie. For if the hostess secures in advance a bough of any green tree—a branch of evergreen will serve—and arranges it upright in a flower pot. She attaches to the branches with silk thread a couple of dozen candied cherries. Each cherry should depend from the boughs by two or three inches of silk. Each in succession and turned around three times, given a pair of scissors and told to help from the cherry tree as much of the fruit as possible. He is allowed three minutes in which to do his clipping. No player is supposed to feel for or touch the tree with his hands. He simply clips into space wherever he thinks the cherries are. When all players have tried, the person who has the most fruit to show for his three minutes receives a box filled with crystallized fruit of the appropriate variety.

A Big Story Feature.—Washington could not tell a lie, and the fun of the second game is founded upon this proposition. All guests are invited to draw their chairs into a circle and see who can tell the most improbable story. Stories

Mrs. Laura S. Webb,

Vice-President of Women's Democratic Clubs of Northern Ohio.

THERE ARE MANY sickly women between the ages of 45 and 55, but there are very few invalids over 55 and 60 years of age. The change of life coming to a woman near her forty-fourth year, either makes her an invalid or gives her a new lease on life. Those who meet this change in ill health seldom live ten years afterward, while a woman who lays aside the active duties of womanhood in health seldom fails to live on in happiness, years after she has passed 60. This is truly a critical time.

Mrs. Laura S. Webb, of Toledo, Ohio, recognizes the change of life as a dangerous period and she also has faith in Wine of Cardui. She writes:

"As I had always been troubled more or less at the menstrual period, I dreaded the change of life which was fast approaching. While visiting with a friend I noticed that she was taking your Wine of Cardui, and she was so enthusiastic about it that I decided to try a bottle. I experienced some relief the first month, so I kept on taking it for three months and now I menstruate with no pain and I shall take it off and on now until I have passed the climax. I do not dread it now, as I am sure that your Wine of Cardui will be of great benefit at this time."

Wine of Cardui is the remedy to re-inforce a woman against the shock that comes with the change of life. It re-establishes healthy functions after years of suffering. In doing this it has saved thousands of sufferers just in time. Do not wait until suffering is upon you. Thorough preparations should be made in advance. Begin the Wine of Cardui treatment today.

H. F. Grant, Real Estate Agent, Asheville, N. C., January, 1903:

Members of my family have used the Barium Rock Spring Water for more than two years and have found it an excellent heart and kidney tonic.

Mrs. J. Cutchins, Troy, N. C.:

When I left home to visit Barium Springs I could only eat light food, but after using the water two weeks I could eat any kind of food without discomfort, besides gaining in weight and strength. I highly commend the water. I was so pleased with the water and the beautiful place I wanted to make my home there.

should be original. The hostess or a committee of three persons who do not enter into the game decide upon the various yarns. Then, amid general surprise and laughter, the prize, a book of good short stories, is awarded to the player whose performance was voted poorest. This reward is explained by the hostess in a few words to the effect that Washington was a poor hand at telling stories and that all patriotic persons should endeavor to be like him.

Burying the Hatchet.—Every candy shop sells, around February 22, little candy boxes in hatchet shape. One of these boxes is the foundations of the third game. The company is divided into sections, one of which adjourns to the hall or a neighboring room, while the other seizes the opportunity to put the hatchet carefully out of sight. The other party then returns and endeavors in five guesses to locate the hatchet. If the persons of the guessing side succeed in telling where the hatchet is hidden, their side wins a point. If not they win nothing. The hiding party now adjourns to the hall and becomes guessers. This continues until each side has guessed and hidden three times. The division which at the end of this time has won most points receives the hatchet filled with bonbons. The members of the victorious division draw among themselves to decide the individual possession of the prize.

What do you know about him?

An enjoyable memory test follows the merry frivolity of hatchet hiding. This consists of a series of twenty questions about the great man whose fame is being celebrated; the following will be found good for the purpose.

1. In what State was Washington born?
  2. In what year was he born?

Dishes Renowned in Scottish History.

The tourist rushing through Britain knows immediately, by way of the palate, when he has crossed the border into Scotland. He will encounter dishes he enjoys for their novelty and tastiness; others he may characterize as "nasty." Three times a day he will be reminded of Sydney Smith's disdainful remark. "In Scotland they feed oatmeal to men; in England we feed it to horses."

"Ay," said a Scotchman, unscathed by the scorn of the famous wit, "ay, but whaur will ye fin' sich men or sich horses."

Once over the border the tourist will be invited to partake of oatmeal porridge, oatmeal brose, oat cake, oatmeal in haggis, oatmeal thickening in kail and soups or even oatmeal fried dry in dripping, when it is called "mirlins."

An American in Scotland finds himself frequently as far at sea for a common language as in France. A New York woman, who spent a few days at an Ayrshire hotel last Summer, asked eagerly at her first breakfast in Scotland for a dish of oatmeal. "Oatmeal, did ye say, me' em?" queried the stolid young waiter incredulously.

"Yes, oatmeal, real Scotch oatmeal."

"What will ye tak' it wi'?" he questioned.

"Cream and snogar."

In five minutes he returned and set before her a yellow bowl filled with dry oatmeal. Beside it stood the sugar and cream.

"Mercy, I can't eat this; I want it cooked," said the young woman, lifting a spoonful of the rough, dry grains.

"Weel, what made ye spier for oatmeal? This is oatmeal. Whaun it's cooked it's parritch."

In spite of the frequent appearance on Scottish tables of oatmeal in all its forms, there is a score of dishes so excellent that they are not forgotten, and an American housewife frequently returns from abroad with a variety of recipes begged from Scotch land ladies. One of them is sure to be cockie-leekie, rendered immortal by Sir Walter Scott, who regaled his heroes and occasionally even his willowy heroines on this hearty dish. It can be made on an American stove as well as over a peat fire, and the beauty of it is that the best cockie-leekie calls for a venerable fowl, which the housewife generally views with alarm. Here is the traditional recipe for this famous soup.

Cockie-Leekie.—Choose a large, rather meaty fowl and prepare it as if it were to be roasted. It may be cooked with or without dressing. If dressing is to be used, and the dish is desired with all the Scotch flavor, oatmeal enriched by butter and well seasoned with pepper, salt and chopped onion is the regulation mixture.

Into four quarts of boiling water drop the stuffed, dressed fowl; simmer very gently for four hours. When the fowl goes into the pot add five leeks cut into inch lengths. Half an hour later add four more leeks cut up, also pepper and salt to taste. Sometimes when the fowl is not stuffed, it is cut up and small pieces are put in the tureen with the soup. A knife and fork are laid by the spoon at each place, and when the soup is served the meat is eaten afterward on the same plate. If the fowl be stuffed it is served as a second course.

Hotch Potch.—This is another famous Scotch soup. Put three pounds of meaty shin of beef in four quarts of cold water. Allow it to come to a boil and simmer for a few minutes, then, skim it carefully. Cut into dice two onions, two carrots, two parsnips, two turnips, one head of celery and, when the meat has cooked for two hours, add this to the contents of the pot with four sprigs of parsley, chopped fine, half a cupful of shredded cabbage and half a cupful of barley, which has been soaked over night. With the vegetables add seasoning of pepper and salt to taste. In two hours put in one cupful of green peas or one can of peas. Half an hour later the soup pot should be ready to take from the fire; bind slightly with two tablespoonfuls of flour and two tablespoonfuls of butter rubbed to a paste. After serving the soup, follow it with the meat and boiled potatoes as a second course.

O Lord, work in me, I beseech Thee, an unfeigned repentance, that I may heartily bewail my former sins, and loathe them, and serve Thee henceforward in newness of life, in godliness and piety towards Thee, and in Christian love and charity towards all my neighbors.—L. Bailly.

He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small,
For the dear God who loveth us
He made and loveth all.

Lafayette, the Brave and True Friend of Liberty.

M. G. Spratley, in The American Boy

Next to the "Father of his Country," no character in the history of the American Revolution is more worthy of love and veneration than that of the Marquis de Lafayette—the hero, patriot and philanthropist, who endangered life and property to aid the United States in their struggle for independence.

Marie Jean Paul Joseph Yes Gilbert Motier, Marquis de Lafayette, was born in the Chateau de Chavagnac, among the picturesque mountains of Auvergne, on the 6th of September, 1757. When an infant two months old, his father was killed in the battle of Rossbach, where Frederick the Great defeated the French and Imperialists. Born of a family whose name is illustrious in history, and reared by a gentle mother whose rare attainments fitted her to mould the character of her son, it was not surprising that he won the homage of two continents. At an early age he was sent to the College of Louis the Grand, in Paris. His noble mein and pleasing manners attracted the notice of Queen Marie Antionette through whose influence he obtained a position in the Mousquetaires du Roi, the king's bodyguard, composed only of the most distinguished of the nobility. At the age of seventeen, he won the heart and hand of the lovely Countess Anastasie de Noailles, daughter of the Duc d'Ayen, with whom he spent thirty three happy years of wedded life.

During the summer of 1776, while stationed at the citadel of Metz, on military duty, he attended a dinner party at which American affairs were discussed and the Declaration of Independence read. Across the Atlantic came the cry of a feeble colony, which groaned under the yoke of oppression. France, not loving England, heard and sympathized. Lafayette's soul was fired with enthusiasm and, throwing up his command, he hastened to Paris to offer his services to the American cause. Immolating domestic felicity and the pleasures of a gay court on the altar of patriotism, he hazarded life and fortune to help a foreign people. Silas Deane, the American envoy, objected to his youthful appearance, but Dr. Franklin, whose quick discernment seldom erred, was so forcibly impressed with his noble generosity that he favored his offer. The king, however, would not give his consent; the British minister protested; and Lafayette's family and friends entreated him to give up the wild project—but their efforts were in vain. This was in 1776, a time when a dark cloud overshadowed the hopes of the colonies. The defeat at Long Island, the evacuation of New York and retreat of the American army through New Jersey, pursued by a large British force flushed with victory, were enough to fill all hearts with dismay. The credit of the colonists was destroyed in Europe, it being the general opinion that the so-called rebellion had been nipped in the bud.

Lafayette's resolution, however, did not waver; other Frenchmen caught his enthusiasm and flocked to his standard. Mr. Deane told them the credit of his country was too low to furnish a transport. Then it was that the true nobility of Lafayette's character revealed itself. He said: "Until now, sir, you have only seen my ardor in your cause; and that may not prove at present wholly useless. I shall purchase a ship to carry out your officers. We must feel confidence in the future, and it is especially in the hour of danger that I wish to share your fortune."

He carried out his plan and, as his ship, the Victory, ploughed the deep, blue sea, Lafayette's thoughts lingered with his devoted young wife. He wrote to her on the voyage and with expressions of love patriotic sentiments were mingled: "From love of me," he said, "become a good American. The welfare of America is closely bound up with the welfare of all mankind; it is about to become the safe asylum of virtue, tolerance, equality, and peaceful liberty."

Strange words of prophecy, considering the doubtful destiny of the United States at that time! It seems, as with the eye of prescience, he saw a star-gemmed banner floating in triumph over a great country, which is indeed—"the safe asylum of virtue, tolerance, equality and liberty." On the nineteenth of April, 1777, the Victory arrived at Charleston, South Carolina. Lafayette proceeded at once to Philadelphia, and presented to Congress the letters from the American commissioners at Paris. Appreciating the disinterested conduct of the young patriot, Congress adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas, the Marquis Lafayette, in consequence of his ardent zeal for the cause of liberty, in which the United States are engaged, has left family and friends, and crossed the ocean at his own expense, to offer his services to the United States without wishing to accept any pension or pay whatsoever; and as he earnestly desires to engage in our cause, Congress has resolved that his services be accepted, and that in consideration of his patriotism, his family, and illustrious relations, he shall hold the rank and commission of major general in the army of the United States."

Dr. Franklin felt such a warm regard for Lafayette, he wrote a private letter to General Washington, asking him, for the sake of the anxious young wife, to shield his life from danger as much as possible. This request, it seems, was useless, as the brave young officer always sought posts of peril. Washington was struck with the frank, unobtrusive manner of the marquis, who declined for some time to assume the rank Congress had bestowed upon him. When urged by the commander-in-chief to do this, he modestly replied that he was not as yet capable of discharging the duties of so important a post; that he must begin by being instructed himself and by learning to obey, before he could command. This admirable speech won the respect of General Washington, who soon loved him with parental affection. The suffering of the poor soldiers, with no means to give them necessary supplies, touched his compassionate heart and he presented sixty thousand francs for their relief to General Washington, who was deeply affected by this noble act of generosity. On hearing of the extreme want in General Moultrie's command, with his characteristic liberality he sent him uniforms and equipments for one hundred and fifty men. It is said he expended in the cause of American Independence 700,000 francs, and not only with his princely munificence did he give aid, but with wise counsel and personal influence both in France and America.

Lafayette shed his first blood for the cause on the Battlefield of Brandywine. He was shot in the leg and refused to dismount from his horse to have the wound dressed, but remained on the field, acting with great bravery until the battle ended. He was carried to Philadelphia for treatment, but, on the advance of the enemy, was removed to a safer place. So impatient was he to return to active service, he joined General Green in New Jersey before his wound healed. After this, he was in other contests, and General Green was so charmed with his gallant conduct that he made honorable mention of him in his official reports. Congress was so sensible of his meritorious behavior that it promoted him to the command of a division, consisting of 2,000 men, whom he armed and equipped, presenting each officer with an elegant sword and belt. He was with Washington at Valley Forge, participating in the severe hardships of that campaign, and aided many a poor fellow who was without shoes and scarcely any clothing.

While devoted to the cause he had so warmly espoused, Lafayette yearned to see again the dear one who held the first place in his heart. He had been absent about eighteen months, when Congress gave him permission to return to France and, in January, 1779, he sailed from Boston. Few could have borne, without vanity, the distinguished honors this young man of twenty two years received, for his heroism and unlimited generosity had carried his fame to all parts of the civilized world. On his arrival in France, he was welcomed with great demonstrations of joy. Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, famous for her wit and beauty, bestowed on him many flattering attentions. The queen honored him with private audiences, and asked many questions concerning America. Afterward, on meeting Dr. Franklin, she merrily said: "Doctor, do you know that Lafayette has made me in love with your General Washington? What a man he must be, and what a friend he possesses in the marquis!"

Lafayette spent several happy months with his family at Auvergne, and again returned to the United States. Many of his countrymen, accompanied him and on the 26th of April, 1779, they landed at Boston, amid the roar of cannon, ringing of bells and a grand display of fireworks. A large crowd greeted him "as the patriot, hero, friend and benefactor of America."

In 1870, when Washington had his headquarters at West Point, then under command of General Benedict Arnold, the marquis was with him. It was at this time the conspiracy between Arnold and Andre, a gallant young officer of England, took place. Poor Andre was captured, but the traitor made his escape in the British sloop of war, Vulture.

When the British made their last stand in Virginia, Lafayette took a prominent part. The siege of Yorktown ended a revolution which has no parallel in the history of the world. In the nation's supreme glory, Lafayette's valuable services were not forgotten. The enemy also acknowledged his merit, as it is said Lord Cornwallis wished to surrender his sword to him, but the modest young hero declined, knowing to whom that honor belonged. With the plaudits of a grateful people sounding in his ears, Lafayette returned to France, in December, 1781, where he again met acclamations of praise. While relating to the king some of the stirring events of the war, so free was he from self-conceit, no allusion to himself was made. Louis observing this, facetiously inquired, "But, pray, sir, where were you all this time?" The journey to his home with his happy wife and little son, George Washington then three years old, was one of continuous ovation—cries of "Long live Lafayette!" arising from the assembled crowds.

Three years later the marquis again visited the United States. He spent two delightful weeks at Mount Vernon, where he was regarded as one of the household. Washington accompanied him to Annapolis, where the final farewell words were spoken between these two illustrious men and devoted friends.

It is not the purpose of this sketch to follow Lafayette's career in his own country, where he reached the highest pinnacle of fame and then saw the bright star of his destiny dimmed by misfortune. There is an incident, however, worthy of mention which relates to the active part taken by a young American in attempting to rescue him from the prison of Olmutz. Lafayette had aided the king and queen in their flight from Paris to escape the fury of the mob, and he was also falsely accused of conspiring against the liberties of his country. The Jacobins had marked him as a victim, so he fled to Holland, intending to seek refuge in America, but fell into the hands of enemies and was carried to Olmutz, where, in a gloomy dungeon, five wretched years were spent. Great was the sympathy felt for him in the United States, and Washington, sorely grieved, did all he could in his behalf. His brutal treatment excited universal pity and indignation, but nothing equaled the daring attempt of two young men to procure his liberty. One was Henry Bollman, a young physician of Gottingen, Germany; the other, Francis Huger, of Charleston, South Carolina. As the prisoner was strictly guarded they did not know how to communicate with him, but gold is a sesame and—the way opened. Lafayette's physician represented to the governor of Olmutz that riding in an open carriage where he could get fresh air was necessary to the health of his patient. The request was granted with the proviso that the governor should always be with him. These rides had continued several weeks when, on a certain day, the carriage passed two horsemen who were riding very slowly. Lafayette did not know them, but when one drew from his pocket a white handkerchief, he did the same, as this was the signal agreed upon. When the carriage reached the appointed place, Lafayette, on some pretext, was permitted to get out and walk; then it was that the horsemen dashed forward, and Huger sprang from his horse to help him mount behind Bollman. In the meantime, the governor hurried to the scene and grasped the prisoner's arm, assisted by a guard, whom Huger caught by the hair and hurled to the ground. Lafayette thrust his handkerchief into the governor's mouth to stifle his cries for help, and had his hand severely bitten. He succeeded in mounting behind Bollman, and they had ridden eleven miles when they discovered they were on the wrong road. While returning to find the right way, they were captured by a party searching for them. Meanwhile, Huger had fled to a thicket where he was arrested by a peasant and, with hands tied behind his back, was carried to the town and thrown into prison. They were tried, and the first sentence was imprisonment for life, afterward changed to a term of years. Finally, they were set at liberty, a large ransom having been paid to the government by their friends.

Lafayette's condition, severe before, was after this almost unbearable. He was put in irons, shackles being fastened to his feet and secured to the wall. Mental anguish equaled physical torture, as he could learn nothing of his family, nor of the fate of his two friends. Alleviation came at last when, through the influence of two noble ladies of Vienna, his wife and daughters, Anastasie and Virginia, were permitted to share his captivity. The Austrian government refused all demands for his liberation until Napoleon Bonaparte threatened to march to the prison and release him by force. This had the desired effect, and on the 25th of August, 1797, Lafayette regained his freedom. When he thanked his deliverer for interfering in his behalf, Napoleon said: "I don't know what the devil you have done to the Austrians, but it cost them a struggle to let you go."

Lafayette lived in retirement many years, but, later, became interested again in public affairs, and took part in the revolution of 1830. After aiding in the establishment of a limited constitutional monarchy, and in the elevation of Louis Philippe to the throne, he withdrew from public life. Many invitations to visit the United States were received by him and, on the 15th of August, 1824, he arrived in New York. A joint committee of Congress tendered him a formal invitation to visit the Senate and House of Representatives. He was received by the members of the Senate and conducted by Mr. Barbour, chairman of the committee, to a seat on the right of the president pro tem., the Hon. John Gaillard, in the presence of the senators, all of whom were standing. The following day, Henry Clay, speaker of the House while addressing the nation's guest, alluded eloquently to its gratitude. He said: "This sentiment now fondly cherished by more than ten millions of people will be transmitted with unabated vigor down the tide of time through the countless millions who are destined to inhabit this continent to the latest posterity."

While Lafayette rejoiced in the marvelous prosperity of the country, he found cause for sadness—the friend whom he loved and revered as a father, the immortal Washington, had passed away. He went to Mount Vernon and, at the tomb of the dead patriot, paid the tribute of tears.

During this visit, on the 17th of June, 1825, the foundation of the Bunker Hill Monument was laid, the corner-stone of which Lafayette put into its place. His triumphant tour through the country, north and south, was one never to be forgotten. In every city aged veterans, youthful heroes and women cheered, while little girls scattered flowers in his pathway. It was the grateful homage of a nation's heart—a testimonial of its love for the great and good man who had made their cause his own.

In September, 1825, Lafayette was borne away from the land he loved in the frigate Brandywine. We can imagine what emotions stirred his soul as the shores of America were lost to sight. Nine years after, he passed into the great Beyond, leaving a fadeless name.

Cordial Old-time Greetings in England.

Englishmen are sometimes inclined to regard with rather a superior air the more effusive methods of salutation, especially between men, common on the continent; but for centuries England was the land of kisses. When a man greeted a woman, whether it was for the first or the hundredth time, he kissed her. Chaucer alludes to the customs as existing in his day. In the "Somnour's Tale," the Frere, when the mistress of the house enters the room where he and her husband are sitting together—

Aristh up ful curstily,
And hire embraceth in his arms narwe,
And kisseth hire sweet, and chirkeþ as a sparwe,
With his lippes.

Two hundred years later, Erasmus, in one of his graphic letters from England, wrote very appreciatively of the custom. "If you go to any place," he tells his correspondent, with reference to English ladies, "you are received with a kiss by all; if you depart on a journey, you are dismissed with a kiss; you return, kisses are exchanged. They come to visit you, a kiss the first thing; they leave you, you kiss them all around. Do they meet you anywhere, kisses in abundance." It was no wonder that Erasmus told his friend that if he had once experienced the custom—"on my honor, you would wish not to reside here for ten years only, but for life."

This mode of salutation continued in fashion, more or less, through the seventeenth century and into the eighteenth, but occasionally there were protests. Bunyan condemned it severely in his "Grace Abounding," and other serious writers followed his lead. Like other fashions, it died out gradually, first among the 'quality,' as society people were then called in town, and later among the country folk.—London Globe.

Our Young People.

First in the Hearts of American Boys.

The parsonage was but a mile from the farm homestead. Both were on historic ground. The Manor of Springton, of which they formed a part, was reserved for his own use by William Penn—the founder of Pennsylvania—when he offered for sale his land grant received from Charles II. The old homestead was called Springton Farm. Bordering its eastern edge ran the storied Brandywine. From a noble pool of its water the great wooden wheels of Springton Forge were driven, when in 1776 its trip hammers forged musket barrels for the patriot army.

Across Indian Run, and over Indian Town Hill where an Indian burial ground lies, down where the tick-tack and rumble of an old grist mill of 1756 responds in the romping swash of escaping water in its stone tail race, stands the parsonage. By its side on a fair sward, my father built a cottage school-house, that the gifted daughter of our loved minister might have a place near her home to teach the children of the neighboring families.

It was during the "noons" of these school days, when I was a boy of nine that I met a grand old lady, tall, slender, dignified, with a face so kind, cheerful, encouraging that we who took our noonings loved to get her smile and have a word with her. She, with her two pretty granddaughters, annually visited our minister when the Brandywine Hills were loveliest in their summer clothing.

She was Mrs. Sarah Malin. With what interest, respect, almost awe, we greeted her; for our teacher had told us that when Mrs. Malin was a little girl she had known the great George Washington—the Father of His Country—and Martha Washington, his wife. She had been patted on the head by him and taken in the broad lap of his lady. She was far above all other women to us, save our own good mothers.

Two years later I went to school in her home city—Philadelphia. Once a month, on Saturday afternoons, I used to array myself in my very best and visit her home on Chestnut street. These visits were great treats, for there I had long talks with Mrs. Malin, and perhaps talks with her merry granddaughters added to the treat.

On these precious Saturday afternoons she told me stories of her early life that roused my patriotism and made my blood tingle. I remember her graceful presence, her face, and voice, and words as well to-day as when I was a lad in roundabouts, and plastered my hair as tight to my head as I could get it. It was the style in those days—the days of just half a hundred years ago.

She told me how, during the Revolutionary war—our war for independence—when she was a little girl, a party of British soldiers came into the front yard of her father's house and demanded something to eat. How her brave mother, with her arms bared, just from the bread she was baking, commanded them to stop where they were, and she would bring them fresh bread, but told them if they entered the house she would throw her whole baking in the fire.

They did not enter, but got the bread and went away without further molesting them.

She laughed as she told: "I remember that I was very angry at the sight of their red coats, and guns, and their tramping the grass in our front yard, and at their getting all our fresh bread. But I was not at all frightened; I was alongside of my mother. I remember thinking that if my father was at home he would knock them all down and throw them out of the yard."

But her fascinating, thrilling story was of when she, a girl of twelve, stood with twelve others, side by side with their good mothers, to give the Great Chief welcome and strew his path with flowers as he, on April 21, 1789, rode toward Trenton town and crossed its famous bridge.

"There were thirteen of us," she said, and her face lighted with delightful memories as she recalled the scene, "all dressed in white and wreathed with flowers. I was the youngest. Our mothers were with us, dressed in their very best and looking very proud and handsome. There were companies of militia with their guns, and officers with gay uniforms riding spirited horses; bands of music and plenty of drums. All the great families from the town, and the country about, were there in their gaily decked coaches, and crowds of men, women and children trigged out as for a holiday. Our loved General was coming! He was on his way from his home at Mount Vernon to New York City, here he was to be inaugurated first President of the United States, on April 30, 1789. His road lay across the bridge in front of us—the wooden, covered bridge over Assunpink Creek, where twelve years before he had fought the Battle of Trenton, and whippd the British and Hessians and turned our once despondent people into glad one.

"The women of Trenton had erected a great triumphal arch and decorated it richly with flags and flowers. On it was this inscription:

THE DEFENDER OF THE MOTHERS WILL BE THE PROTECTOR OF THE DAUGHTERS.

"How the people shouted, the bands played, the guns rattled, the cannons boomed, hats rose in the air, handkerchiefs, flags, even bonnets waved, as Washington on horseback came out of the Trenton end of the bridge!

"How my heart throbbed and my cheeks tingled when I saw him sitting on his horse, bareheaded, his fine face in the bright sunlight covered with dust, his hat in his hand and bowing in his courtly dignified way to the people."

She rose as she spoke. Her tall figure grew girlish, her face earnest, her left hand seemingly held a basket; her right hand took flowers from it.

"As he approached the arch we sang two verses in his honor. I will sing them for you."

She sang in a sweet, low voice, trembling with age and excitement, her face glowing from the sublimity of her

"As we sang the last line we strewed flowers upon the ground for him to pass over and his horse to tread upon."

There, before me, she imitated her actions of sixty-three years before, and strewed the parlor carpet with imaginary flowers. What a vision of Washington, as she saw him that day at Trenton Bridge, must have stood to bless her!

When she finished singing, she said, "I looked up as he passed. His face was covered with dust. Down his cheeks the tears made furrows in it." She sat a few moments in silence, and I saw that tears were coursing among the wrinkles of her own. Then she continued.

"As we ceased singing, the choir took up the music and sang the same verses. The whole scene was grand. Before General Washington left Trenton he handed a letter to a gentleman (the Reverend J. F. Armstrong) telling of his grateful feelings."

This letter is preserved as a precious heirloom. It reads: "General Washington cannot leave this place without expressing his acknowledgement to the matrons and young ladies who received him in so novel and grateful a manner at the triumphal arch in Trenton, and for the exquisite sensation he experienced in that affecting moment. The astonishing contrast between his former and actual situation at the same spot, the elegant taste with which it was adorned for the present occasion, and the innocent appearance of the white-robed choir who met him with the gratulatory song, have made such impressions upon his remembrance as, he assures them, will never be effaced.

"Trenton, April 21st, 1789."

She told me how, often, when she was passing General Washington's house, then on High (now Market), above Sixth street, Philadelphia, on her way from her nearby school, Madam Washington at her front window, by beckon or voice, invited her and her schoolmates to enter. She told of her gentle motherly greeting, and entertainment most pleasing; and how, as they sat with her, she sometimes saw General Washington coming down the street with his friends, towering above them as he walked, for he was six feet two, and parting with them in most courtly manner at his door; how on his entrance he greeted his wife as if she was the queen of the land as well as of his heart, and herself as a child he loved.

It was told me by one near to her that when war broke out in our land, Mrs. Malin, aged, feeble, blind, requested to be taken to the State House—Independence Hall—and led to the old bell which proclaimed, as the legend upon its cracked substance tells, "Liberty throughout the land and to all the people thereof." Her wish was gratified. She then and there, placing her hands upon the bell, offered earnest prayer that "The liberty it had proclaimed to the United States of America might still be preserved and the nation carried safely through the first great trial which had come upon it."—The American Boy.

George Washington's School Days.

George Washington was born in the Washington homestead, at Wakefield, in Westmoreland County, Va., near the banks of the Potomac, February 22, 1732. When George was ten years of age his father died, and the task of the education and guidance of the future great man devolved upon his mother. When about twelve years old George entered the neighborhood school at Wakefield. He had already had some instruction at the parish school from a Mr. Hobby, who was the sexton of the Parish Church near Falmouth, on the Rappahannock. At Wakefield his teacher was a Mr. Williams, who had come from England, where he had been a teacher in Wakefield Academy in Yorkshire. Richard Henry Lee also went to school under this same Mr. Williams, as did also William Fitzhugh and Lawrence and Robert Washington, distant cousins of George.

While in Mr. Williams' school Washington drew up a code of rules of conduct. In these rules Washington pictures the boy whose manners should be avoided. Here is an exact copy, spelling, punctuation and all, of some of these rules:

"Do not Puff up the cheeks, Loll out the tongue, rub the hands or beard thrust out the lips or bite them or keep the lips too long open or Close.

Kill no vermin as Fleas Lice ticks &c., in the sight of others. If you see any filth put your foot Dexterously upon it If it be on the cloaths of your Companions Put it off privately, or if it be on your own Cloths return thanks to him who puts it off.

Shake not the head Feet or legs rowl not the Eyes, lift not one eyebrow higher than the other wry not the mouth and bedew no man's face with your spittle by approaching him while you speak.

Put not off your cloths in the presence of Others nor go out of your chamber half drest.

SHIFT not yourself in the sight of others nor Gnaw your nails.

KEEP your Nails clean and short, also your Hands and Teeth clean, without showing any great concern for them.

WHEN you Sit down Keep your feet firm and Even without putting them one on the other or crossing them.

IF YOU Cough Sneeze or yawn do it not Loud but privately; and Speak not in your Yawning, but put Your handkerchief before your face and turn aside.

Spit not in the Fire nor Stoop low before it neither Put your hands into the Flame to warm them nor set feet upon the Fire especially if there be meat before it.

On Christmas day, 1779, the schoolhouse in which Washington had laid the foundations of his greatness burned to the ground, destroying the school—books, maps, etc. of Washington's school days. Schoolboys in those days wrote out in rude blank books, maps, arithmetic tables and copies for practice in penmanship. This was largely because there were so few books to be had. About all the facilities Mr. Williams had were a big globe, a wall map, and a geography as big as a family Bible. Each boy really had to write his own geography, and there is in existence the one that Washington wrote. Here is how he bounds America.

"America is bounded on ye East with ye Atlantic Ocean on the West with ye Pacific Sea on the North without Bounds on the South by ye Megellanic Sea."

There are many pages of this geography. Some of them are filled with astronomy work.

As will be imagined from the rules of conduct we have quoted, Washington was a neat boy though not a fop. One of Washington's biographers, speaking of Washington's play, says that he could never endure trifling games such as marbles and tops. His delight was in a manly sort of game; jumping with a long pole, heaving heavy weights, running, wrestling, etc. In these he excelled. He early cultivated an accurate eye for measurement, and it is said that Mr. Williams was especially skillful in this and that a good part of his instruction lay in the measuring of distances with the eye. From Washington's manuscript books we learn that he studied arithmetic very thoroughly, even geometry and trigonometry. He left school just before his sixteenth birthday, the last months of his schooling being devoted to the study of higher mathematics and surveying.—American Boy.

Our Little Folks.

CONDUCTED BY MRS. A. J. MCKELWAY.

Dear Little Folks:

One afternoon the Lady of the House went out. Barelegs and Suck-my-thumb had to dress and as Suck-my-thumb was the proud owner of a new suit, he could dress himself. It was the first store suit Suck-my-thumb had ever had. Mrs. Mama had made all the others and they were a poor sort too; they never had more than one pocket and to tell the truth not often even one. Then the trousers were full at the knees and had elastic in them and were first cousins to girls' dresses. But the store suit fit close and tight and there were buttons on the outside of the legs and enough button holes to wear out a little boy's fingers. Then there were pockets, two pockets and a "hind pocket" and Suck-my-thumb seemed to grow two inches as soon as he put on the suit. And at the table he refused a bib and insisted that he must have a napkin, so Mrs. Mama put on his bib and gave him a napkin and he kept on growing.

But that afternoon Mrs. Mama was out as I said before and Suck-my-thumb went to the drawer to get out his suit. He put on a pair of pantaloons and he put on a blouse and at once, as is a boy's habit, he stuck his hands into his two side pockets. He drew out one hand and there was a nut. "Where did I get that nut?" he thought as he walked slowly out of his room.

"Suck-my-thumb," said Barelegs, fiercely, "where'd you get that nut? You've got on my pants too, and I put it in my pocket myself."

"It ain't your pants and it was in my pocket," said Suck-my-thumb.

The pantaloons came almost down to his shoe tops, but what did that matter, the pockets were there and best of all a nut was in one pocket. He cracked it and coolly began eating it.

Barelegs stood and looked on.

"Are those his pants?" he said to the little girl.

"Of course not," she said laughing. "Oh Suck-my-thumb if you could see yourself?"

But Suck-my-thumb, undismayed, ate on.

"They's mine, they was too long all the time, Mama said so."

"But it's my nut, I was savin' it and put it in my pocket," said Barelegs and as he saw the last crumb go down the wrong red lane he could stand it no longer.

"Whack," and the doubtful owner of pants and nut went rolling over in a heap and Suck-my-thumb sang the same little tune that all the little knocked-over boys have sung since Cain and Abel.

Barelegs rejoiced for a small moment.

"An' I'm goin' to take some 'phin of yours some day too, I am." And the music swelled and echoed.

"I'm goin' to do it some day cause you got on my pants and you took my nut."

Louder and louder grew the sounds. Suck-my-thumb dug his fists into his eyes in bitterness of spirit. Which of his most valued possessions would be taken from him by this merciless brother?

"You ain't," he wailed, "I'm goin' to tell Mama."

And then a certain terror took possession of Barelegs' soul, and the memory of unheeded commands stopped the repeated threats and left him gazing open-mouthed at Suck-my-thumb and his long pantaloons. He could even hear the words of the Commander-in-Chief, "You must not strike Suck-my-thumb, he is a little boy—no, not under any cir-cum-stances."

He thought he heard her coming, what would she say? And Suck-my-thumb was howling louder and louder as he thought of all the precious things Barelegs would some day take away from him.

Barelegs came close and spoke softly.

"Suck-my-thumb," he said, "I won't never take anything of yours again."

Suck-my-thumb stopped to listen.

"What?" he said.

"I won't never take nothin' of yours, if you will take off my pants and won't never tell Mama."

"Taint your pants," said Suck-my-thumb.

I don't know what would have happened next if the little girl had not walked in with the pantaloons tied up high.

"There now," said Barelegs, "What'd I tell you?"

Suck-my-thumb had the nut safe and sound, but he also had misgivings, he had no business with Barelegs' pants and that nut must have belonged to Barelegs. What would she say?

He could not exactly remember what bargain Barelegs was making. He wondered if Barelegs would stick to it now that the pants were proved to have been his.

"I'm going to tell Mama you knocked me," he said, beginning to dig with his fists again.

"Please don't, Suck-my-thumb," said Barelegs very humbly. "If you won't I'll let you off from takin' somethin' of yours, and keepin' it and eatin' it up or breakin' it to pieces—will you Suck-my-thumb?"

Suck-my-thumb grinned while his head was down, that nut was good.

"Yes I will," he said and the bargain was closed.

Children's Letters.

Newell, N. C., Feb. 16, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I will try to write a letter as I have never written before. I love to read the letters from the little folks. I go to church at Newells. Mr. Hagan is my pastor. I go to Sunday school every Sunday. My teacher is Mr. John Newell. I like him very much. I go to school at Newells and my teacher is Miss Bessy Utley. She is an assistant teacher. My papa is dead. He died last Sept. 21, 1901. I will close now, as I hope to see my letter in print. Bertie Warlick.

Caldwell Institute, Feb. 9, 1903.

Dear Mrs. McKelway:

My papa takes the Standard, and I enjoy reading the little letters. I go to school at Caldwell Institute. Our church is Little River. We have no pastor now and do not have any Sunday-school to go to. I miss our Sunday-school so much as we have no where to go on Sunday as my

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

Shamrock, N. C., Feb. 9, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I am a little boy eight years old. My brother Nat is two years older than I am, but I am as tall as he. We live in the country, and go to school at home to Miss Octa Hargrave all the morning and the afternoon. We take our music lessons on the piano and practice an hour.

I have two sisters—Kathleen and Ida Moore; they go to the Presbyterian college in Charlotte. I hope that the boys and girls will not laugh at my long name.

J. Milton Caldwell Alexander.

New Stirling, N. C., Feb. 7, 1903.

Dear Standard:

My papa takes the Standard and I enjoy reading the letters and Aunt Tabitha's letters too. I like to see her letters come often. I have four sisters and two brothers. We all go to school except little Eva and Eugene. Our teacher's name is Mr. W. D. Davis of Statesville. I love him very much. We have not missed a day this winter. There are 62 scholars on the roll. My desk-mate is Annie Alexander. I study Grammar, History, Geography, Physiology, Spelling and Arithmetic. We have a spelling race every Friday evening. We hope to have a new school house to go to next winter. They failed to have it ready this winter. I go to Sunday-school at New Stirling A. R. P. Church. Our church is too far away for us to go to it, especially in the winter time, the roads are so bad.

My teacher's name is Mrs. E. F. Griffith. I love her very much. I recited the Shorter Catechism to my pastor, Rev. W. C. Brown just before Christmas. I learned them so I could ask and answer them. It took me nearly a year to memorize them. We have an organ but I cannot play it. I will close, hoping to see my letter in print.

Your unknown friend,

As I have not written to you in a long time, I will try to write you a few lines to-night. I am going to school but it will be out Friday. I am so sorry for I love to go to school. Miss Laura E. Meres is my teacher. I did not go to preaching Sunday it was so rainy. It rained all day Saturday. Rev. A. McFaydgen is our pastor. Mrs. A. Faydgen is my Sunday-school teacher. I like her very much. I will answer the question asked by Our Little Friends Eoline Shaw. Spectacle is found in I Cor. 4th chapter and 9th verse. I will also answer another question asked by Hector McLean. Adam was 930 years old. The Bible does not give any account of Eve's age as I can find. I will close by asking my Little Friends a question, Which verse in the Bible contains all the letters of the Alphabet except one and which is that?

Pinkey's Preference.

Most wild animals stoutly resist all of our well-intentional efforts to bring them up in door-yard ways, and take to the woods again with the first opportunity. I have tamed many squirrels, but, sooner or later, every one of them has escaped to the wilds. I have never known but one wild animal that wanted to be domesticated, that refused to stay in the woods when taken there; and this was a little 'possum named, from the color of his long nose, "Pinky."

He was one of a family of nine that I caught, several springs ago, and carried home. In the course of a few weeks his brothers and sisters were adopted by admiring friends; but Pinky, because he was the "runt," and looked very sorry and forlorn, was not chosen. He was left with me. I kept him, for his mother was dead, and fed him on milk until he caught up to the size of the biggest mother-fed 'possum of his age in the woods. Then I took him down to the old stump in the brier-patch where he was born, and left him to shift for himself.

Being thrown into a brier-patch was exactly what tickled "Bre'er Rabbit" half to death, and any one would have supposed that being put gently down in his home brier-patch would have tickled this little 'possum still more. Not he! I went home and forgot him. But the next morning, when breakfast was preparing, what should we see but Pinky, curled up in the feather cushion of the kitchen settee, fast asleep.

He had found his way back during the night, had climbed in through the trough of the pump box and had gone to sleep like the rest of the family. He gaped and smiled and looked about him when awakened, altogether at home, but really surprised that morning had come so soon.

He took his sancer of milk under the stove as if nothing had happened. We had had a good many 'possums, crows, lizards, and the like, so, in spit of this winsome show of confidence and affection, Pinky was borne away once more to the briars. He did not creep in by the pump box-trough that night. Nothing was seen of him, and he passed quickly out of our minds. Two or three days after this I was crossing the back yard, and stopped to pick up a big calabash-gourd that had been on the wood-pile. I had cut a round hole, somewhat larger than a silver dollar, in the gourd, intending to fasten it up for the bluebirds to nest in. It ought to have been as light as so much air, almost, but instead it was heavy—the children had filled it with sand, no doubt. I turned it over and peeked into the hole, and lo! there was Pinky.

How he managed to squeeze through that opening I don't know, but there he was, sleeping as soundly as ever.

And what became of him then? My heart smites me whenever I think of it. I took him back again to the woods the third time, and again he returned, but blundered into a neighbor's yard, and—and a little later he was drawn up in a bucket of water from the bottom of that neighbor's well, still asleep, only—they could not wake him up.—St. Nicholas.

Why the Leaves Turn Red.

By Herbert A. Jump.

"Ankis, why do the leaves turn red in the fall?"

It was Fritzie who asked the question, one October afternoon, of his friend Ankis, the Indian, as they were walking through the woods.

"Haven't I ever told you?" answered Ankis in surprise. "It is one of the old legends of our tribe." And, as they seated themselves under a maple-tree that blazed with color, Ankis began:

"Long, long ago there were a great many more trees than there are now, and a great many more birds too. And the trees loved the birds, for the little feathered people sang from early dawn till late at night, and flashed their blue and yellow and brown wings everywhere through the green forest. And the trees said to one another: 'Oh, how dull it would be if we didn't have our birds!'"

"So the trees spread out their limbs like great loving hands to hold up the tiny nests, and they covered bird-homes with foliage to hide them from the prowling squirrels until the fledglings should have grown up and flown away.

"But one night, in the month of the harvest-moon, when the feathery thistle-ships were no longer sailing the ocean of the air, a messenger came running down from the White Country in the north, and whispered into the ears of the trees. He was a little Frost Boy, and his words were:

"Beware! The Chief of the Cold is coming! And he has with him a great snow army! And all their quivers are full of ice arrows!"

"Then the trees made ready to meet the army of the Chief of the Cold, and wrappd their bark close round their bodies and the bodies of their frail bud-children. Suddenly some one thought of the birds.

"Do they know the snow army is coming?" And the trees tried to warn their friends, but trees cannot talk very loud, and the mother-birds were so busy teaching their children to fly and sing that they heard nothing of what the trees whispered.

"Oh! how can we make the birds hear?" the trees cried in agony. Then a maple-tree said:

"I know! Let's light a fire signal as the Indians do, and when the birds see the flame they will come to ask what it means; then we can tell them."

"And they did so, and the next morning the fire signal had been set a-burning among all the leaves of the forest, and everywheer the trees were red and crimson and scarlet. And, sure enough, the birds hastened to learn what it meant, and the trees told them that the Chief of the Cold was on his way. And when the birds heard it, they swiftly rose on the wing and started for the Southland.

"Since that time every fall when the Frost Boy brings his warning to the trees, they light their fire signal of red leaves. And whenever you see those red leaves, Fritzie, watch carefully, and you will find the birds every night and morning flying southward to escape the ice arrows and of the snow army."—Sunday-school Times.

Clippings.

Three little school children were seriously discussing the social conditions and positions of their respective parents and their ancestry, each one evidently determined to go one better than the other.

"Mother says I am descended from Mary, Queen of Scots," triumphantly asserted little Eva.

"So am I, then," retorted Cousin Willie.

"Don't be silly, Willie," interpolated the third. "Why, you're a boy!"—New York Times.

While travelling recently Mark Twain was asked by a friend and fellow passenger if he remembered the first money he had ever earned.

"Yes," answered Mr. Clemens, puffing meditatively on a cigar. "I have a distinct recollection of it. When I was a youngster I attended a school at a place where the use of the birch rod was not an unusual event. It was against the rules to mark the desks in any manner, the penalty being a fine of $5 or public chastisement.

"Happening to violate the rule on one occasion, I was given the alternative. I told my father and as he seemed to think it would be too bad to have me publicly punished, he gave me the $5. At that period of my existence $5 was a large sum, while a whipping was of little consequence and so"—here Mr. Clemens reflectively knocked the ashes from his cigar—"Well," he finally added, "that was how I earned my first $5.

Concer Cured Without Disfigurement by Anointing With Oils.

Dutton, Ont., Can., Oct. 31, 1898.
Dr. D. M. Bye Co., Indianapolis, Ind. :
Dear Doctors:—I can not say enough about your Oils. I have had a cancer on my nose for four years and tried three different doctors, and at last they advised me to have it cut out. A friend told me about your Balmly Oils and I sent for them the 28th of April, 1898, and I started using them on May 1st, 1898, and on June the 14th the cancer was all out, and on July the 1st my nose was healed over again, but it was very tender, but now it is filled in and as tough as any part of my face. For your Blood Purifier, I may say, I never took better medicine, for I have not been in better health for twelve years. Now, dear Doctor, you may word this as you wish, but I can not say enough, nor be thankful enough. If anyone wants to find any more about the Oils, they may write to me. We are all well and happy now. Hoping you are the same, and wishing you all success, and God bless you, I remain.

ROYAL QUALITIES.

HERE IS A BRIEF TABULATION OF THE PRINCIPAL

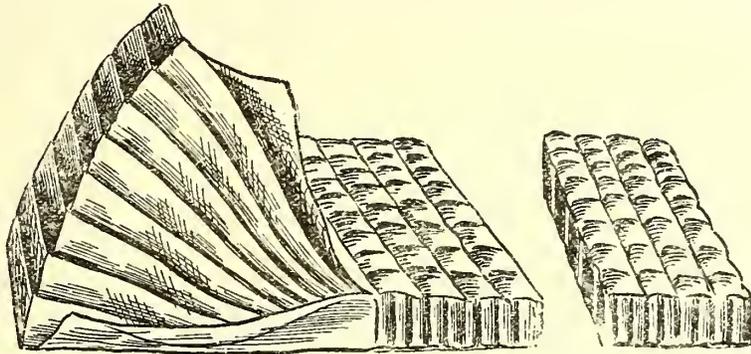

POINTS OF ROYAL MATTRESS VIRTUE.

1. The Royal Elastic Felt Mattress possesses sufficient "give" or softness so that it will readily conform itself to the shape of the body and thus conduce the best kind of sleep—it is softer than the softest hair, besides possessing more elasticity and durability.

2. It possesses a healthful resistance, an elasticity

4. It is composed of a material which is hostile to moths, vermin and germs of every kind, whereas hair, wool, and feathers invite these evils.

5. This material is so evenly distributed, and of such a nature as to retain its shape and elasticity for a very long period unimpaired. 6. Its price is sufficiently reasonable so as to make the comfort and purity it represents, far more worth having than the money it costs. Manufactured and for sale by city which, while giving away to the weight of the body, ever continues to exert this springiness upward.

3. It is non-absorbent of moisture or mineral gases and its purity is uninfluenced either by the oils and moisture of the body, or by the surrounding atmosphere—It floats in water.

Prayer.

PRAYER is the peace of our spirit, the stillness of our thoughts, the evenness of our recollection, the seat of our meditation, the rest of our cares, and the calm of our tempest. Prayer is the issue of a quiet mind, of untroubled thoughts; it is the daughter of charity and the sister of meekness. He that prays to God with a troubled and discomposed spirit is like him that retires into a battle to meditate, and sets up his closet in the outquarters of an army, and chooses a frontier garrison to be wise in.

For so have I seen a lark soaring upwards, beaten back by the sighings of an eastern wind, and descending more at every breath of the tempest than it could recover by the libration and frequent weighing of his wings, till the little creature was forced to sit down and pant, and stay till the storm was over; and then it made a prosperous flight, and did rise and sing as if it had learned music and motion from an angel.

Event and Comment.

Our excellent contemporary, Christian Work, which recently absorbed The Evangelist has taken in another publication, The Gospel in All Lands. We always thought it was Christian work to spread the gospel in all lands rather than to absorb it.

As the answer, we suppose, to Bishop Potter's and Dr. Savage's and Dr. Rainsford's tolerant opinions as to the necessity for the saloon in New York City, it has been shown that there are now more saloons according to the population on Fifth Avenue than on the East Side.

The words of Lincoln at Gettysburg have a striking application to the mouthings of the people who are opposing any memorial to Lee on that immortal battleground. "The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here."

A great business house in the West, started by five Methodist brothers fifty years ago, of whom only one survives to-day, celebrated its fiftieth anniversary with a gift of $200,000 to the Y. M. C. A. "as a memorial and a thank-offering." It is a good thing to prosper. It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord.

Rev. F. B. Meyer "resumes his regular ministry at Christ Church, England." Good! Irregularity either in politics or religion is a temporary expedient for temporary evils. Permanent irregularity carries its own condemnation. A higher Christian life will be best cultivated through the regular ministry, one of whom will henceforth be the Rev. F. B. Meyer.

The Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine will be the grandest specimen of church architecture in the United States. The Catholics are planning to eclipse it with a cathedral to hold seventy thousand people and to cost $20,000,000. Meanwhile the "sects" are doing some missionary work among the heathen for building up the body of Christ.

The vicar of Clerkenwell, England, is having a service in the dark, with an unlighted church, because, "the minds of female worshippers are apt to deviate from serious thoughts to the inspection of hats and gowns worn by other lady members of the congregation." We wonder if by this time the other lady members of the congregation have not stopped coming.

Our Methodist brethren are being twitted with the allegation that in their anxiety to reach the million and a half converts at the same time that they finished the twenty million dollar fund, they have been doing some tall counting that is not borne out by the completed returns. Well, even if they do beat other people counting they frequently have more to be counted and not a few to be counted on.

We rather wish that the bill that has been offered in the North Carolina Legislature, prohibiting the work of Christian Scientists and Osteopaths, so far as the healing of the body for pay is concerned, had been divided so as to let the Osteopaths out. We do not know what our physician may do to punish this opinion, the first time he gets a chance, but it strikes us that Dr. Lorenze was something of an osteopathist on a large scale. But Christian Science ought to be prevented by law from inflicting its superstitions upon diseased minds, for the sake of the helpless children if for no other reason. The idea that sickness can be healed by prayer at so much a word would be blasphemous if its absurdity could rise to that degree of seriousness.

A good story is going the rounds, with a Methodist and an Episcopal clergyman as the joint producers. The Methodist was complaining that he had very little opportunity to preach to sinners, as ninety-five per cent of his people were professing Christians. The Episcopalian rejoined, "Why, in our church we call them all sinners." The Methodist replied, "O, I was not thinking of confirmed sinners."

More money is spent in New York City ever year for beer than is spent for bread. This is but one kind of liquor. And yet there is an impression among some business men, millers and grocers and bakers among them we suppose, that any restriction upon the sale of liquor injures business. We have often wondered what these business men imagined would be done with the saloon money if it were not spent for whiskey.

While there are still some American irreconcilables who think that the war with Spain was an outright iniquity, it is interesting to note that the Spanish Minister, Senor Ojeda, recently paid a most heartfelt and eloquent tribute to the magnanimity of America in the conduct of that war, and that this feeling is gaining ground so rapidly among thoughtful people in Spain that it is considered an excellent time for pushing forward the work of American Protestantism.

New York City is about one-third Catholic and one-third Jewish. If any city in the country might be supposed to protest against the reading of the Bible in the public schools, New York is that city. And yet the present Superintendent of the New York schools says that during seventeen years he has never known a protest against the reading of the Bible from any patron of the schools in the city. The State Superintendent of Public Instruction has just reversed the silly decrees of his predecessors against the reading of the Bible.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan has found a most discouraging condition of affairs in his travels for the last few months, sees no prospect of a general revival, finds an alarming prevalence of "indifference" among the masses and a passionless condition in the church. It is time for Rev. G. Campbell Morgan to follow Mr. Meyer's example and "resume the regular ministry", leaving to several thousand of his regular brethren and several years of time and especially to the ministry of the Holy Spirit the task of "deepening the spiritual life" of America.

The indignation in Northern circles over Senator Hanna's bill to pension the ex-slaves is really comical. Of course it is nearly forty years too late, but there would have been an element of justice in it just after the war. The foisting of four million paupers upon a people impoverished by a disastrous war, while appropriating absolutely nothing for their support and education, was a great hardship for both races in the South. But the Grand Army that freed him needed all the pensions that were going and the country needed all the money that was left.

A very "Liberal" contemporary, which is always in favor of trying some new thing, confesses that the results of Decision Day "are meager, very meager." And now the question recurs, if the idea has been inculcated into the minds of the children that Decision Day is the great day of the year for deciding for Christ, and still with "meager results", what will be the story of the other fifty-one Sundays? And it almost sounds like an echo of the Presbyterian Standard to hear our contemporary say, "For one thing, times and seasons, 'Weeks' and 'Days', all good in their way, are not the catholicon that will cure."

PRESBYTERIAN STANDARD, Charlotte, N. C.

The apostle of common sense has a plain word on that subject which we would do well to heed in these later times. It almost looks as though James saw with prophetic insight some of the congregations of our own day when he wrote, "My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ with respect of persons. For if there come unto your assembly a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment; and ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool: are ye not then partial in yourselves, and are become judges of evil thoughts? But if ye have respect of persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors."

Let us suppose that there are in one city several churches of the same faith, as for instance, the Presbyterian Churches in Charlotte, or Richmond, or Louisville, or New Orleans. And suppose two Presbyterian families move into the town at the same time, one poor, one rich. Now we may have progressed some since James' day. Honestly we do not know that any poor family would be slighted or insulted by the suggestions that James quotes, unless by some underbred person who is so anxious to get up a little in the social sphere that it is felt necessary to draw the distinction against those now a little worse off. We have even known a preacher to profess some degree of concern as to the class of people that were to compose the membership of his church, but we believe this to be the rarest exception. We repeat, that the poor family would probably be cordially received by the best people in the church. But, hearken my beloved brethren, as James would say. Would there not be just a little more running after the rich family than after the poor one? A little more constant stream of callers from the rival churches, a little more talking up the advantages of one church as compared with another, a few more invitations, not only to the homes but to the churches of the members?

And is not that respect of persons? And is it not therefore a sin?

Whatever the motive it is not the highest, by any means. Christ proclaimed it as the proof of his Messiahship that he preached the gospel to the poor. The Church, as the representative of Christ, should consider that its great mission, preaching the gospel to the poor. When the idea begins to change to that of receiving the contributions of the rich, then Ichabod would as well be written over the door of the Church, for its glory is departed.

The fact is, that the Church of Christ should be too consciously dependent upon God and too proudly independent of man to consider men as either poor or rich. They are sinners all, who need salvation, or they are called to be saints and need sanctification. They should be made to feel that they need the Church far more than the Church needs them. We are commanded to go out into the highways and hedges and compel men to come in, but that does not mean that we should besiege a fine house in the effort to get a Presbyterian to join our particular church, especially when the highways and hedges are still full of people upon whom no church has made any particular claim.

And we believe that the rich men themselves would like it better if the Church treated them as just folks. Some of them really could not help being rich, others have made their money and are abundantly able to do good with it in their own way. They would like sometimes to be appreciated for themselves, for their own qualities of mind and heart, rather than for the size of their bank-account. We should think that Christian fellowship with no thought of the size of the weekly offering would be as grateful sometimes to a rich man as friendship without the thought of benefit save by the friendship itself.

And then there are always two extremes. It sometimes happens that the preacher will feel called—there is no telling, sometimes, what a preacher may feel called to do—called to make personal and pointed mention of a rich man in his church and the duty of the rich man to part with his money, until one grows ashamed for the church itself. We have been treated to some sensationalism of that sort recently, in what amounted to an attack on young Mr. Rockefeller, by his pastor. Mr. Rockefeller is said to be an earnest Christian man, is a Sunday-school worker, and yet he has been pilloried lately with the crude interpretation of the story of the Rich Young Ruler, by which it was pointed out that he ought to give up all that he had, there being no report of any dear possession that any one else in pew or pulpit should feel bound to surrender for Christ's sake. This is just about as disgusting as the toadying before referred to. Let the Church of Christ be one place where "The rich and the poor meet together—the Lord is the maker of them all."

We have just come from the conclusion of a scene in the court-room, in which a man was on trial for his life. By his side, through the long ordeal, sat a patient, sweet-faced, tired looking woman, with the eyes of a stricken deer. And she had to listen, not only to the story of the murder, but of her husband's shame as a drunkard and debauchee and seducer. Now and again she would twine her fingers about his arm or give some other gentle caress to encourage him. In his hour of trial, though the very story was also her shame, she failed him not. On her breast-pin she wore the picture of the little one at home, the pledge of love that should have been as true on his part as it was on hers.

Behind her sat an older woman, whose husband had risen from her side at night to clear his house of unwelcome intruders, and then had died with his head in her lap and a pistol ball in his breast.

And we thought, How the women suffer for the sins of the men whom they love! How much better it would be if the men would think about the women and the sorrows they must bear before a deed of blood or of shame is done!

Think about the mother, young man, and her grief if your sin should find you out. You may be smart enough for a while to hide it from her eyes and to keep its shame from humbling her fond heart. You owe it to her to make such shame impossible by doing right.

Think of the wife, O man. You have sworn before God and men to love and cherish her. You are bound by your manhood to protect and defend her. And yet no evil could so scorch and blast her life as an evil deed of your own. By her love, by her sacrifices, by the holiest and tenderest ties, we adjure you to be true to her. In these days, when many run to and for and knowledge is increased, the wife and children are not so much the hostages to fortune that they once were. The double and the multiple life becomes more easy. There are men who in the brief stay at home would be considered model husbands, who yet away from home plunge into every sort of dissipation. And they run the risk, which is really not a risk but a certainty, the certainty that their sin will find them out, the risk that they will drag a good woman's name in the mire, and shame her before the world, for the sake of a brutish passion and its brutish gratification.

And then there is need that men who have a spark of manhood in them should think about other women in a different way from that in which they have learned to regard them. There are men in these days who wear the virtue of the women they have ruined as an Indian wears the scalps of his victims upon his belt. One of the problems that Bob Ingersoll used to propound was this: "What sort of a religion is it that holds that a man may be forgiven for the sin of seducing a woman who in the agony of her shame took the suicide's road to hell? You say that she is damned, and that the man who wronged her may live in heaven." It is the glory of the gospel that it is able to save even the seducer. But we should think that there would be none upon earth so certain of their forgiveness as that they could bear the thought of standing before the bar of God with the women whose lives they have dragged down to hell, and that the hell of hells must be that which the seducer and betrayer shall suffer.

And the worst of it is that it is her very love that makes the woman suffer so, whether she be mother or sister, whether wife deserted or maid betrayed. The deeper and truer the love, the deeper the sorrow, the bitterer the shame. There is probably not a man who reads these lines, whose fall or whose published disgrace would not hurt some good woman somewhere, more than it ever could hurt him, though he had to be hanged by the neck until he is dead. Before the sin is committed, before the deed is done, or even the plan is laid, think about the women. It would save a great deal not only of suffering but of crime, if that advice could be always taken, Think about the women.

The Saloon

and the Home.

We have reached the last of this series of articles on the saloon. We reach the heart of the question at the same time. The home is the foundation of our civilization. If the foundation be undermined, the superstructure, no matter how proud or beautiful, tumbles to earth. The home is the foundation of all influences for the life of the coming generation. If the fountain be defiled, the stream is made foul, and there is no way to cleanse it from below the fountain-head. And the saloon is the corrupter of the home and the defiler of the home.

The home begins with the man and the woman who have plighted their love and joined hands in wedlock. There may be dependents on his side or hers. But these two make the beginning of the home. The man is the bread-winner. The woman is the home-keeper. She is not only the keeper-at-home but the keeper of the home for him. And the normal and the blessed thing is that when the day's work is over and rest-time comes, he should come to the home which has been kept for him, and to its peace and its joy.

Now we are not saying that the woman is always free from blame. And at some other time we might make an appeal to the woman for her own sake and her husband's to make her home just the sweetest and happiest place on earth. Better let some of the outside work go if one jot of the peace or the happiness of the home is to be sacrificed. But the saloon stands as the woman's great enemy, to take advantage of her slightest fault, even of her physical weakness or sickness or nervousness, and present its attractions as the rival of the home's. More than that, be she a very paragon, it will try to steal her husband from her arms until it can send him to her with its fiery brand upon him claiming him as its own.

It is said sometimes that the saloon is the "poor man's club." If so, there is no deeper damnation for it than that. The club is the place for those who have no home in the real sense. When the club begins to assert itself as the rival of the home, then it becomes an agency for evil. The leisure class may be able to enjoy both. A man may attend his lodge or his club as a place of good fellowship with friends. But when he begins to attend either constantly then the home life is gone. Home is the place for a man, whether he be rich or poor, when the work of the day, in mart or mill, in office or study, is over.

But the poor man is bound to be a working man, if he is a man at all. For him the only holiday is the time of rest, at the close of the day, or on the Rest-day itself. If he spends the few hours of recreation between working-time and sleeping-time at the saloon, for him there is no time at home. There begins estrangement. And the company that fills the saloon is not as good for him as that of his wife, or of the friends that drop in to see him under his own roof. And the liquor that he learns to love more and more does not help him for the next day's work. So both ends of the candle are burned at once. The bread-winner loses efficiency, the home-keeper loses all incentive for her efforts, and home making as a business for these two is at an end. And then comes the inevitable drunkenness and the cruelty and bestiality that slays love itself; and the home is destroyed.

It is even worse with the complete home, which is the home where the children's prattle is heard and the patter of their footsteps. Husband and wife have become also father and mother and the duty of the man to be at home rather than in the "poor man's club" is a double one. When he stays at the saloon the children grow up worse than orphaned. For they might be taught to revere a father's memory. But they cannot respect his example. Whether the boys follow in his footsteps or not, they lack in the crisis of their lives a father's authority. And too often, far too often, they inherit a taint of the blood that sends them to the bar-room just as certainly as if the taste were an instinct. And so every end of the home, as the place for love and play and rest, and for training the children in the paths of peace, is destroyed. Small wonder then if in the grimy poverty that comes when the bread-winner has become the saloon-loafer, the wife becomes a slattern and the children are unkempt and begin almost in infant years the man's work of winning bread. The home has been done to death by the saloon.

But it would be a great mistake to suppose that the saloon is the enemy of the poor man alone. It is as great a leveller as death itself. We have seen here in Charlotte a proud, handsome woman sitting in her carriage at the door of a saloon, while some sympathizing friend went within to bring out her maudlin husband. How often the refined and cultured home, with all the luxury that wealth could buy, has been ruined by the saloon!

We are not discussing drunkenness although it can be easily shown that the saloon is the great promoter of drunkenness. Prohibition allows drunkenness, and no law can be framed except one that shuts all the drunkards up in prison, that will not allow drunkenness. But under prohibitory laws there can at least be prevented any such rival of the home, as the saloon is. There can be no open assembling of men to drink. The dispensary allows drunkenness, though it does all that law can do to prevent and discourage it. But the dispensary is as inhospitable as an ice-house. It is no rival of the home. And this it seems to us is the most damning charge that can be brought against the saloon. It destroys human life, because it promotes drunkenness. It is in alliance with the gambling hell and the house of shame, because evil passions run together. It is a source of disorder and crime. It taxes the people to death to pay for the mischief it works, through its criminality. It corrupts government, debauches politics, tyrannizes over the people. But these things are as nothing to its avowed enmity to the home. The nearest thing that is left to a man on earth to remind him of the heaven that was lost and the heaven that may be attained is his home. And the saloon takes that heaven and turns it into a hell of shame and sorrow and remorse and violence and cruelty. The land that would keep its homes of purity and happiness and peace, whether magnificent or humble, is the land that must drive out the saloons.

Review of Contemporaries.

The Brooklyn Eagle is a little off on General Lee but it is eminently sound on the negro question and we take pleasure in giving this extract to our readers as an instance of the change that has come over thinking men in the North. We should only add that there should be Christian as well as industrial education and that a pure religion is the greatest hope of the negro race:

This government is now under no more obligation to take care of negroes than of the whites. Whites do not ask the government to take care of them. They take care of themselves. And they engage to take care of the negroes through state governments in the matter of education and to take care of them in the labor world under the laws of employment and the like. The negro of to-day as the ward or charge of the Federal government has no status and should have none. He was freed forty years ago. In that time he has been the cause or occasion of a deal of trouble in the country, but only because he has been coddled, pampered or privileged beyond his measures of capacity or development by those who do not understand him and whose motives as partisans were, to say the least, not philanthropic. What the negro needs is abstention from politics, abstention from office holding, educational facilities, on industrial lines, which recognize his aptitudes and his limitations, and then to be let alone, to stand or fall, according to his deserts.

It may be said that the Constitution recognizes his political rights. But the Constitution in that part does not recognize human nature, and human nature was before constitutions, is stronger than they and will conform them to its instincts and mandates. This is a government of states as well as a Union. Suffrage in states turns on state treatment of suffrage. And public opinion in states touching office holding classes, considered by races, will get the best of political experimentation against it, or at the expense of it. The white race everywhere keeps the red man under, keeps the yellow man under and keeps the black man under. The latter problem is a little harder here than elsewhere, because the blackman is massed rather than diffused here. But the policy and the instinct of the white race will not be hanged on account of that fact, any more than it has been changed by constitutions or laws which did not take race instinct and race limitations into account.

What can be and what should be done to the negro will be discovered and effected when what cannot be done and should not be attempted for him is candidly recognized. Mr. Root recognizes it. Mr. Roosevelt now presumably does. Hard sensed men in both parties recognized it before either of these statesmen admitted that he did. Life is a competition in which the fittest last. Government is an evolution of the needs and genius of men among whom the fittest dominate. The fittest race in the world is the Caucasian. Among the weakest is the negro race. Neither poetry nor proclamation nor constitutions nor laws nor oratory will change the fact that it is best for the whites to control and best for the blacks that the whites should control. For both races should be education, and personal and civic freedom. But for the whites should be government and for the blacks should be adequate education and decent protection under government by the whites.

If the convictions of a great many men of varying standards of good judgment are not wholly wrong, the Convention for Religious and Moral Education, held in Chicago last week, is to be accounted an altogether unique occasion and a force to be reckoned with in the future. In the number and representative character of its attendance it surprised not only all who respond to the call for it, but quite as much those who worked so long and hard to assure its success. Not less than three thousand people faced its chairman as he opened the first session in the great auditorium, and each of its five succeeding business sessions averaged an attendance of fully a thousand. But the most significant fact in this connection was the disproportionately large number of men present throughout. For it is surely a most exceptional feature in any general religious gathering to find men composing from seventy-five to eighty per cent. of the attendance, morning, afternoon, and evening, for two days. This is the more notable in view of the vast preponderance of women teachers in the schools of both State and Church. The only blunder was made here in nominating but one woman among the sixty or more officers finally chosen. The formal enrollment included over four hundred signatures, with addresses ranging over twenty-three States and five foreign countries, representing twelve denominations, as well as public schools and ecclesiastical agencies, young people's societies, and interdenominational movements, some liberals and many more evangelical conservatives, the greatest State universities of the West and the oldest universities of the East, church colleges and scientific technological schools, pastors, professors, editors, Sunday and public school teachers, fathers and mothers. Representatives of the Roman Catholic priesthood and laity and of Jewish schools and synagogues were in the audience, but unfortunately not on the programme. The spiritual tone and devotional spirit were as marked in platform utterance as in the earnest prayer and fervent song which opened and closed each session. This religious atmosphere, together with the profoundly serious earnestness and fearlessly free fellowship which pervaded the whole occasion, made it impossible to suspect the presence or possibility of any factional control, ulterior motive, or polemic purpose. Every man when on his feet was his own man and no one else's. In volunteering to discuss a topic, one man ventured to remark that he perhaps should not say what was deepest in his heart, when he was immediately interrupted by good-natured appeals to "let it out"—which he did with dignity and discretion.—The Outlook.

In his annual report to the New York Legislature, Charles R. Skinner, State Superintendent of Public Schools, discusses the reading of the Bible in public schools. His position is that the Bible is emphatically an unsectarian book and that it should be read as the law provides without note or comment. In view of the action of the Legislature in refusing to enact a law prohibiting the reading of the Bible in the schools, and of the action of the Legislature in providing that it shall be read in the schools attended by so large a majority of the children of the State, and also in view of the practice of all the States of the Union, save seven, Mr. Skinner is "very loath to adhere to the ruling adopted by my predecessors in regard to this question." The superintendent makes a statement that will surprise some, viz.: "That during the seventeen years that he has been connected with the department he has never known of an appeal or protest from an inhabitant of the City of New York with reference to reading the Bible in the schools of that city, although it has been daily read in every one therein during all that period." The best argument for reading the Bible in the public schools is the simple fact that the people want it read, and the practice is still further accentuated that it is enjoined by virtue of four distinct legislative enactments, covering a period of more than fifty years. Still, should the question be raised, the courts would have to decide the matter, and it would be decided, we scarcely need say, in accordance with the principles of law as laid down in the Constitution of the State.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

It is poor economy for a church that has a pastor to require him to make all the financial sacrifices in the community. In these prosperous days corporations and individual employers of labor alike are everywhere increasing the salaries of those who toil for them. Why should we require our pastors to labor on and on without enlarged compensation? The cost of living is growing. Nearly everything the preacher must buy is higher than last year, and we all know that even last year the good man who provided spiritual food for us and ours had some trouble buying with his too-meager stipend physical and mental food for himself and his.—Cumberland Presbyterian.

The French League for Public Morality has presented to Parliament an urgent petition for the suppression of the immoral press, which, says the petition, by its flaming headlines and atrocious posters make the streets a menace to the morality of children. "At a time when Young People's Christian Associations are multiplying and Girl's Clubs are being founded almost everywhere, you will understand the urgent need of purifying the streets, that our children be not exposed to the dangers which affect them in the obscene publications with which we are inundated," says the petition. The Prefect of Police is entirely in sympathy with this movement. Several months ago he called the attention of police-captains to the pictures contrary to good morals which, notwithstanding previous warnings, still appeared in the show windows of book stores and news-dealers. It appears that the power of the police is not sufficient to abate this nuisance. Pastor Wilfred Monod of Rouen, one of the leaders of the Social Christianity movement, is president of this League which now appeals to Parliament.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

We wish that the Presbyterian Standard came to every home and especially where there are young people. In the past few years this paper has doubled its size and improved in almost every respect, while the price remains the same. We often hear it said by church people of different denominations that their church papers are too costly, and they compare the price of a denominational paper with that of a secular paper. Now, while the denominational paper gets support from only a small part of one denomination, the secular paper receives support from all classes and this gives it a much larger circulation, while the cost of printing a paper for its large list of subscribers is but little more than the cost of printing one for the small list of the religious paper. You can note this difference in price between secular papers, where one has a large circulation and the others a small circulation, because it is a difference made necessary by the difference in the cost per copy. Let every family that possibly can take this paper for one year and we feel sure that none will regret it or begrudge the subscription price.—The Covenanter.

Education is becoming an increasingly great interest in America and the church must in some vital if not mechanical sense control it or it will control or mayhap destroy the church. This is not to say that the church can either make or unmake truth by an appeal or an anathema. The church of Christ is founded on the truth, on the fact of things, however, and must be loyal to it, and expose lies and shams wherever found. If the church allows theorists and secularists to palm off on an unsuspecting public as "education" a kind of training which is morally unhealthy and ruinous to faith, it is untrue to its mission and thereby surely undermines its own future. The church is not a Star Chamber to control opinions or to manage men, but it is a fount of spiritual grace, and has a vital interest in the promulgation of truth in place of error on all subjects and at all times.—N. Y. Observer.

The Interior has this to say of the Episcopal clergy and their relation to the greatest among them born on American soil:

It does not serve for the commendation of the Protestant Episcopal church of today that in all the chorus of appreciation for the character and greatness of Phillips Brooks which was evoked by the tenth anniversary of his death, its voice should have been weaker than that of any other church. Simply because he was too large a man for his fraternity in Christ to be confined by denominational limitations, his name is yet unpleasant to the ears of Episcopalian clerics.

That is a very sweet little poem we publish today from the Presbyterian Standard by Mr. Jerome Stockard of Raleigh. Very rarely have we read anything more exquisite from a North Carolina poet than "The Low Inn."—Charity and Children.

Devotional.

"I Am All Right."

Near me lived a fine old Scotchman. Time had shortened his steps. His hair was silvery white. His shoulders were bent, and he was sorely drawn out of shape by rheumatism. But when I hailed him with, "How are you to-day, grandfather?" there came back the cheery words:

"Oh, I'm all right. My old body's gi' in' oot; but I'm all right."

The earthly tabernacle was trembling to decay, but the house not made with hands, the heart and soul and the better part, were all brighter and brighter and brighter the nearer the journey came to the other side.

What a fine thing it is to keep one's heart pure and sweet, through all the changes of this life! Sometimes we see men, and women too, who seem to become more and more unhappy—more and more down-hearted and unhappy—the farther they get along the road of this earthly pilgrimage. We hardly know what to say to these low-spirited travellers on life's way, lest we may start them off on a disheartening plaint of all the troubles which they are meeting. They are full of aches and pains. Their lot is a most gloomy one. They are not like my good old friend, the Scotchman, "all right" within, no matter what may come to the house given us for the day.

Did you ever think how the ring of some men's voices lifts us out of the shadow and gives us help and comfort? There may be nothing out of the ordinary in what they say—just the little things which come from the every-day meetings and partings of life—and yet we go away helped and comforted, stronger for the hard things which lie so thickly about us.

Don't you think it is worth while to do all in one's power to keep the heart all right, in spite of the annoyance that may beset us? Suppose by our cheerful manner we encourage some friend who is not so quite able to bear the burdens of life alone—is it not a thing to be desired? Aches and pains vanish when the mind is lifted out of itself for a little while. And then, there are many aches and pains of the inner man if we but give way to them. We are easily hurt sometimes by the word spoken by those who are really dearest of all on earth to us. On other days we would not be touched at all by the same words. Blessed be the man or woman who comes to us at such times and by his cheery way helps us to rise away above the poor grievances of this, our earthly body! Keep yourself "all right."—Exchange.

Henry Drummond was right when he said: "What the cause of Christ needs is not so much more of us, as a better brand of us." Christ is being wounded more sadly in the house of His friends than by the weapons of His enemies. Here again is the pathos of Christian history! Oh, for new standards in the Church of Christ. For a burning sense of shame at our shallow, selfish religion! For an abiding purpose to live Christ so truly that all who know us will believe in our genuineness, and will give honor to our Lord because of it!—Daily Bible.

Why showest thou outwardly this dolor and sadness on account of thy offenses? Keep this sadness to thyself and God only, and pray him of his mercy that he forgive thee and restore to thy soul the healthy joyance whereof it hath been deprived as a punishment for thy sin. But before me and others be heedful ever to have cheerfulness, for it becometh not a servant of God before his brother or any other, to show sadness and a troubled countenance.—Francis of Assisi.

Penitence and holiness are near akin. It is by way of penitence, self-renunciation, lowliness of spirit, that men draw nigh to God.—R. J. Campbell.

Missionary.

Missionaries as Openers of the Unexplored World.

The missionaries are the greatest of the pioneer agencies opening the world, and bringing the knowledge of it to the civilized nations. "We owe it to our missionaries," said the London Times, "that the whole region of South Africa has been opened up." Indeed, the one name which towers over all others in African explorations is David Livingstone's. "In the annals of exploration of the Dark Continent," said Stanley, "we look in vain among other nationalities for such a name as Livingstone's." "Religion, commerce, and scientific zeal," said Professor Whitney of Yale, "rival one another in bringing new regions and people to light, and in uncovering the long-buried remains of others, lost or decayed; and of the three the first is the most prevailing and effective." In his book on "The Languages of Africa," Dr. Cust speaks of "the wonderful, unexpected, and epoch-making results of their (the missionaries') quiet labor." "Their contributions to history, to ethnology, to philosophy, to geography, and to religious literature," says a Smithsonian publication, "form a lasting monument to their fame." Or, as Sir H. H. Johnston says, "Indirectly, and almost unintentionally, missionary enterprise has widely increased the bounds of our knowledge, and has sometimes been the means of conferring benefits on science, the value and extent of which itself was careful to appreciate and compute. Huge is the debt which philologists owe to the labors of British missionaries in Africa! By evangelists of our own nationality nearly two hundred African languages and dialects have been illustrated by grammars, dictionaries, vocabularies, and translations of the Bible. Many of these tongues were on the point of extinction, and have since become extinct, and we owe our knowledge of them solely to the missionaries' intervention. Zoology, botany, and anthropology, and most of the other branches of scientific investigation, have been enriched by the researches of missionaries who have enjoyed unequalled opportunities of collecting in new districts, while commerce and colonization have been . . . notoriously guided in their extension by the information derived from patriotic emissaries of Christianity"—Ex.

What a Sixpence Did.

A Scotch woman used to lay aside a penny a day for missions. A visitor, incidentally learning that the poor woman had been for many days without meat, gave her a sixpence to buy some. But she said: "I have long done very well on my porridge, so I will give the sixpence also to God." This fact was narrated at a missionary breakfast, and the host and his guests were profoundly impressed. The host said: "I have never denied myself so much as a chop for God." A very large sum (£2,200) was immediately subscribed as a result of that touching incident. Ought it not to make a similar impression upon our hearts? What have we ever denied ourselves for the advancement of Christ's kingdom? Has it ever cost us the necessities of life to show our love for our Saviour?—Exchange.

A Christian heard a heathen woman praying passionately in a heathen temple. She had in her arms a pitifully misshapen baby, and she was praying that it might grow beautiful like other babies. As she turned to go away, the Christian asked her, "Friend, to whom have you prayed?" "I do not know," she answered, "but surely there must be some one somewhere to keep a mother's heart from breaking!" The message of missions is that there is this Some One.—Exchange.

The old hymn says, "Jesus shall reign where'er the sun does his successive journeys run." He will reign whether you and I do anything to further His kingdom or not. But how ashamed we shall be if His kingdom comes and we have had no hand in its coming!

Sunday School Lesson.

CONDUCTED BY REV. H. G. HILL, D. D.

Paul and Apollos.

(Owing to a delay in the mails Dr. Hill's exposition did not reach us in time for this issue, so we use that of Rev. I. W. Gowen, in the Christian Intelligencer.)
Acts 18: 24-19:6. March 1.

Corinth was Paul's headquarters for a year and six months. At Cenchrea, the seaport of Corinth, about nine miles distant, he took a vow, which indicated his willingness to observe the Jewish customs, although he had preached the Gospel unto Gentiles, "Unto the Jew he became a Jew that he might gain the Jew." From Cenchrea he started for Jerusalem to fulfill his vow in the temple, Aquila and Priscilla sailing with him as companions. The ship stopped at Ephesus, and on the Sabbath Paul preached in the synagogue and was so well received that he promised to return after his visit to Jerusalem. He left his two companions at Ephesus and proceeded on his journey to Cesarea, whence he departed by land for Jerusalem. He greeted the church and fulfilled his vow in the temple, thus showing his loyalty both to the old and the new dispensation. He visited Antioch, the missionary center which sent him forth, and received, doubtless, a royal welcome from the Christians. This closed the second missionary journey, after a tour of two or three years. Asia Minor and Europe were now in the circle of Gospel effort, and the Gentile church was becoming a factor in world-evangelization. The Church was loosed from its swaddling bands and was growing in power and influence in the centers of the world.

The third missionary journey began at Antioch, and from that city Paul started to revisit the churches of Asia Minor. The story of this visit begins our lesson text. Galatia and Phrygia, with the churches at Lys-tria, Iconium and Antioch, were visited in turn, and the disciples were strengthened by further instruction and inspiration. Paul's story of the success of the Gospel must have acted like a tonic to these early disciples.

While Paul was at Jerusalem, Aquila and Priscilla were, by no means, idle at Ephesus. These tent-makers were soul-winners. They fished in every place as wise fishers of men. Apollos, whose brief biography in our lesson is all that we know of him, "a Jew, an Alexandrian by birth, a learned man, came to Ephesus." He was thoroughly conversant with the Old Testament Scriptures. He followed the light of Old Testament prophecy until it led him to the baptism of John, the end of the road. He had never heard "Behold the Lamb of God" from the last of the Old Testament prophets, and so his preaching of Jesus had not reached beyond the Jordan. Cavalry and Pentecost had not yet entered into Apollos' gospel. There are latter-day preachers who have not gone beyond this limit. But Aquila and Priscilla, the tent-makers, had a message for the eloquent Alexandrian. He readily sought the light and came into its fulness, laying his mighty gifts upon the altar of service. He went to Corinth and helped by letters of commendation, he found a welcome and a work in the church there. He built up the Christians and championed the Gospel cause among the Jews. So great was his influence in Corinth that many chose him as their leader. Paul refers to him in his letter to the church at Corinth and commends his work. "I have planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase."

While Apollos was at Corinth, Paul arrived at Ephesus. He found a group of disciples, following the teachings of John the Baptist, devout, but austere, like their teacher. They had come in from the mountains, perhaps having heard from some one the first story of John's preaching of the coming Lord. Such sects are still to be found in the world. Paul asks them a question, "Did you receive the Holy Ghost when you believed?" Their answer shows that Pentecost's experience had never reached them.

Christ Teaching Heart-Righteousness.

Matt. [5: 20-48; 6: 16-18. Topic for March 8.

There is a wide contrast between what Christ teaches about righteousness and the standards for righteousness which men set up. The world looks upon the outward life of a man and judges it good or bad according as the spoken words and overt acts of that life may indicate. And yet Christ teaches that a person's life, from the stand-point of the world may be altogether righteous and yet the man be guilty of sin against almost every command of the decalogue. This would be a bad enough state of affairs of itself, but it is not the worst side of the question. In the eyes of the Master it makes no difference what opinion the world has of us if we ourselves are all right. If the world judges us adversely but that judgment is false in the eyes of God, we need care little for the world's frown. They judged our Saviour adversely and they were wrong and our Lord tells us plainly that the servant cannot expect a more favorable opinion from the world than the Master received. But the deplorable thing about the judgment of righteousness according to the world's standard is that too often we form that same judgment of ourselves. We take the world's standards when we look at our own lives and if we have not committed any overt act that is a heinous sin, we flatter ourselves that we are pretty good sort of people. There is not one of us but that would condemn the self righteousness of the Pharisee and how often we are not one whit better than he. To be sure we do not all go up into some public place to parade our imagined virtues before the world, but within us we have a complacency which is not in keeping with the true state of affairs in our hearts as God sees those hearts. The trouble is that we do not search our hearts but are satisfied with a survey of the exterior of our lives. This was exactly the difference between the publican and the Pharisee who went up to the temple to pray. The Pharisee took a survey of his life from the standpoint of the world and was wonderfully well pleased with himself, and this is what he prayed: "I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this Publican. I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all I possess." Now apart from its boastfulness, as the world sees men, that Pharisee was not a bad sort of a fellow. No doubt he was considered a very good man by his neighbors and yet in the eyes of Jesus he was far from the kingdom. But I wonder how many people could measure up well alongside of him. Outwardly he conformed strictly to the letter of the law and in some points even went beyond the requirements of the law. Any amount of people who condemn the Pharisee cannot begin to measure up to his standard, and yet he fell far short of true righteousness. The trouble was he surveyed his life instead of searching his heart. The publican on the other hand though not the upright man, possibly, in the days that had recently gone by that the Pharisee had been, had nevertheless searched his heart. How long before he stood in the temple with downcast face does not matter. When he stood there in God's house he was looking at the very bottom of his heart and all through that heart he beheld sin and he was made to cry out in an agony, "God be merciful to me a sinner." Searching the heart in the light of Christ's teaching will inevitably lead to a realization that heart-righteousness in great abundance does not exist. In the nature of the case the true Christian will often deplore his lack in this matter, for the higher we climb on the path of the Christian life, the more clarified will our vision become and the things which did not upbraid us in the earlier days will appear to us in the clearer light as unholy things.

The time is near at hand when the reports to Presbytery will be made out. Last spring the complaint was that the reports were very meagre and imperfect.

The Making of a Creed.

By Rev. Thomas A. Hoyt, D. D.

The history of the Church shows that all its great creeds have been the fruits of controversy.

Consider the stupendous conflicts out of which emerged the Athanasian Creed, which defined the faith of the Church in regard to the doctrines of the Trinity, the deity of Christ and the personality of the Spirit. The Church and the Empire were convulsed through long years of debate, of strife, of persecution. Athanasius, the champion of the truth, was five times driven into exile. In the midst of these trials, his character, as Dr. James Orr says, "shines out in splendid greatness," "He is," as Stanley says, "the only one of all the saints of the early Church who has actually kindled the cold and critical pages of Gibbon into a fire of enthusiasm." Or, as Principal Cairns expresses it, "Athanasius masters Gibbon." Hooker describes the condition of those times thus: "The whole world against Athanasius, and Athanasius against it."

"To say that Athanasius was the greatest man of his age is to say very little. In comparison with the shifty, intriguing, unscrupulous men opposed to him—in comparison with the emperors who drove him into banishment—he towers as a giant in moral stature and strength of purpose. In good report and in evil report, he held to his faith without wavering." All Christians see now, with admiring reverence, that this illustrious man was raised by God to vindicate the fundamental truth on which rests the religion they profess—the Triune Personality of the Godhead. It is difficult for us to realize that this elementary—yet most abstruse—doctrine, was fixed in the consciousness of the Church by struggles so intense and so prolonged. When our children answer the question, "How many Persons are there in the Godhead?" they little know that the answer was wrought out in tears and blood, by "the great of old." But this is God's method of lodging his truth in the minds and the hearts of his people. They are called to strive, to agonize, in order to enter into the kingdom of God and the possession of its treasures.

The next important development of the Creed of the Church was that associated with the name of Augustine—fifth century. The doctrines here defined were those of Man, Sin, Grace.

What is Man by nature, spiritually and morally? What is Sin, in its essence and effects? What is Grace, in its origin and its influence on human nature?

These are the mighty problems which agitated the Church. But the first battle-field was the heart of the great man who was appointed by God to solve them. Augustine's "Confessions" relate to the struggle through which he passed in coming to the knowledge of the truth. In this wonderful record, the secrets of his heart and life are laid bare with a fidelity without a parallel in literature. "The thrilling story is told of his early years and youthful aberrations; of his saintly mother's prayers; of his disgust of heart in the midst of his excesses; of how he fell into the snares of the Manichaeans in his search for a solution of the problems of evil, and for nine years was held captive by that sect; of his gradual disillusionment, and attraction for a time to Platonism; of his removal to Milan, and contact with Ambrose, whose personal influence and preaching, and not least the sweet music of his church, broke down his prejudices and won him back to faith; of the marvelous crisis of his conversation in the garden of his villa at Milan, where in deep agitation at the narrative of the conversion of two others, he flung himself beneath a fig tree and wept and wrestled for forgiveness, and for strength to break with his sins." He thus relates the stress of his anguish: "Thus soul-sick was I, and tormented, accusing myself much more severely than my wont, rolling and turning in my chain. * * * And Thou, O Lord, pressedst upon me in my inward parts by a severe mercy, redoubling the lashes of fear and shame, lest I should again give way, and not bursting that same slight remaining tie, it should recover strength, and bind me the faster."

Through such spiritual conflicts did this "chosen vessel" come to know himself, his sin, and God's grace. Thus was he prepared to set forth clearly before the Church of his own age, and of all subsequent ages, the true doctrines of Man, Sin and Grace.

But the strife, though composed in his own bosom, was transferred to the world without. Of his long and strenuous controversies with the Manichaeans, the Donatists, and the Pelagians, time fails me to speak particularly. Church history narrates them at great length.

What we especially notice is that by means of bitter controversy was the true doctrine vindicated. Evidently the appointed time had come; when the Church was ripe for it, the battle was joined. Two great champions sprang into the arena—Pelagius, the champion of error, and Augustine, the champion of truth.

The next great doctrine to be formulated in the Creed of the Church was that of the relations of the divine and human natures to each other in the Person of Christ. On this mysterious and sacred subject occurred the most virulent controversy that ever agitated the Church—lasting from the fifth to the seventh centuries. Many errors sprang up and battled fiercely with the truth. Apollinaris denied to Christ a true human soul; Nestorius resolved Christ's single person into two; the Eutychians represented the nature of Christ as a mixture or fusion of deity and humanity. Against these and other false doctrines, Cyril of Alexandria, and other defenders of the true faith, contended with a vehemence which seems harsh to our age of sceptical indifference. Yet in this fiery furnace did God refine the pure gold. Out of the heat and turmoil of this conflict emerged to view the true doctrine of the Person of Christ, viz: "That two whole, perfect, and distinct natures, the Godhead and the manhood, were inseparably joined together in one person, without conversion, composition, or confusion; which person is very God and very man, yet one Christ, the only Mediator between God and Man." This had been the implicit belief of the Church in all ages, but only by means of long and violent disputations was it articulated in a credal statement.

Next, we come to the definition of the vital doctrine of the Atonement. The discussions on this subject lasted from the eleventh to the sixteenth centuries. They began with Anselm and Abelard, and extended to the Reformation. Anselm's treatise, "Cur Deus Homo," was an epoch-making book, in which the nature and necessity of Redemption were for the first time systematically reasoned out. He brought clearly into view the sublime truth that the death of Christ was a voluntary, vicarious, expiatory sacrifice for sin. This truth has been incorporated in every subsequent evangelical Creed.

Abelard represents the opposite pole of the doctrine of Salvation. "A brilliant dialectician, but, as events showed, sadly lacking in moral depth and stability, his view of the Atonement is defective precisely on the side on which Anselm's was strong." He rejects every form of the satisfaction doctrine of the Atonement, and places the effect of Christ's sufferings and death wholly in their moral results. We have seen this false view reproduced lately in a book by a member of the Revision Committee.

Bernard opposed Abelard, and Aquinas, Duns Scotus, and by the discussions of the schoolmen the doctrine was further developed, until the Reformation, when it assumed the form it holds in the Protestant Creeds.

Thus five centuries witnessed the growth of this mighty dogma.

The last great "Creed Epoch" I shall notice is that of the Reformation. By the controversies which ensued during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the essential doctrines of "Justification by Faith," and of "Regeneration," were more clearly brought to view than ever before. This heroic period is familiar to us all. The dramatic career of Luther, the genius of Calvin, the agitations of Europe, the Thirty Years' War in Germany, St. Bartholomew's Day in France, the Spanish Armada, the War of the Netherlands, the wide spread persecutions, the constancy of the martyrs, the flight across the ocean of the bolder spirits, the settlement of a new continent—all illustrate its historic splendor.

The Westminster Confession was the fullest expression of the faith of this lofty age. It is "the express essence of pure spirits." It is the most complete credal utterance of the Church. It has satisfied the spiritual wants of great churches and great men for nearly three centuries. It was the fruit of intense controversy. Out of the storm is brought the faithful into a haven of confessional rest.

In this way have the Creeds of the Church been formulated—through strife and stress, through tears and blood.

Now, in contrast, observe our modern method of making and altering a Creed. The appointed committee, seated around a table in a well-furnished office, courteously agrees upon a report, which is adopted by the Assembly with the wild emotions of a political convention, instead of with the solemn sense of responsibility proper to a church court. In this flippant manner, the Westminster Confession, which for centuries has been the bulwark of the Presbyterian Church, is to be supplanted.

Those noble Standards of the Reformed faith were framed in a far different spirit, and by other methods. Those who prepared them were men very learned and saintly, and most deeply in earnest. Their souls were stirred to their inmost depths; their minds were wrought to the highest energy. They were unconscious heroes in the battle for truth. All their powers were enlisted.

Compare with the debates in the Jerusalem Chamber of Westminster Abbey, the dilettante symposium of our committee, and the easy-going assent of the General Assembly. "Look on that picture, and then on this."

"If I Were a Layman."

By a Minister.

If I were a layman, I should get as close to the minister as he would let me come. If it be true, as the New Testament declares, that we are all priests unto God, then the minister is only one among many brethren, chosen by his fellow-Christians to teach and lead, but in no sense standing in a class apart. And why, then, should there be an awful gulf between him and the other members of the household of faith? I should bridge the gulf, and show myself a sympathetic and co-operating brother. I should do this for the minister's sake, and for my own. We could build each other up. Poor man! The preacher needs to be built up like other mortals,—and who will build him if laymen do not do it? He needs companionship,—Jesus did. Our Lord fell back, in the crises of his life, upon the twelve men who were nearest him. He shrank with horror from the thought of being left alone. "Could ye not watch with me one hour?" is a question full of heart-break. The modern servant is not above his Master, nor the twentieth-century disciple above his Lord.

A minister needs encouragement, and it is the duty of laymen to give it. He needs it, not because he is a baby, but because he is a man. A man, to succeed as a preacher, must have a stout heart and a buoyant spirit. Every kind look reassures him, and every hearty hand-clasp braces him. He needs encouragement, and a great deal of it. The world constantly stabs him, or ignores him, and his brethren must show themselves friendly. Some churches are dumb. Some Christians cannot say "I praise you" without having the words stick in their throat. Many a clergyman has been killed simply by lack of encouragement.

It is the finest and truest men to whom such neglect is fatal. The temperament essential to effective preaching is affectionate and sensitive. It withers and dies in an atmosphere chilled by silence. If I were a layman, I should at least once a year speak to the pastor some one approving sentence. I put the figure low, knowing that great enterprises must be undertaken by slow and gradual approaches. Sudden shocks are to be avoided. If a man has heard his minister preach for five years without once letting him know that he has received a particle of comfort, uplift, or light, from any of his sermons, it would be hazardous for such a man to attempt much at first. All that could reasonably be expected the first year is some very slight manifestation of Christian life,—just enough to let the minister know that the man is not a deaf-mute. This duty of bracing men for arduous tasks by cheering and fraternal words is not rife. There is no surer way of increasing the power of the pulpit than by enlarging the heart of the preacher by drenching him in great floods of affection and good will. If a man becomes spoiled by being loved, there is nothing lost, as the man at the start was worthless.

A man who speaks of "our" church with pride, and of "our" minister with affection, has a right to offer suggestions and to disapprove. But if I were a layman, I should not disapprove of every new enterprise suggested by the pastor, nor should I find fault with him if he occasionally said something in the pulpit to which I could not say "Amen." A minister must have his own viewpoint, and take his own attitude. He must do his own thinking, and must lead his people as he feels himself directed by the Lord. I should therefore keep my tongue off him if he did not echo in every sermon my own opinions and convictions. I should endeavor to bear in mind that I was only one in a large company of people, and that a minister who always thought as I did would be sure to be ruffling up the spirits of a large number of his hearers who have as much right to hear their ideas promulgated from the pulpit as I have to hear mine. A layman is well on towards perfection when he realizes that he is only "one." Whenever the minister made statements which struck me as incorrect or misleading, instead of exploding like Mt. Pelee, I should quietly re-examine my own conclusions, and remind myself that I differed from the minister as widely as he differed from me. And, if he was broad enough to tolerate me in the church notwithstanding my divergent opinions, I should do my best to be broad enough to live in peace with him, in spite of his inability to square his ideas with mine. So long as a minister preaches his truth "in love," why should not a layman hear it "in love?"

And if at any time I had a word of criticism which must be delivered, should never speak it on the Lord's Day. After a preacher has gotten through his sermon, his nerves are abnormally alive. The man who approaches him while in this state of excitement for the purpose of criticism or controversy is sure to hurt him. Nor should I hurry toward the pulpit as soon as the benediction is pronounced with some matter of personal or ecclesiastical business related in no way to the sermon. The sermon always makes a deep impression on at least one man,—the preacher. Into it he has poured his blood, and in the preaching of it he has given his life. He has preached it that it might impress the hearts of those who heard it, and mould their after lives. If then, at the conclusion of the sermon, a man comes forward with not a trace of the sermon clinging to him, and begins to converse enthusiastically about some matter which has not been once in the preacher's mind, it looks as though the sermon has made on at least one heart no perceptible impression. Such a man has a millstone for a heart, and the discouraged preacher is apt to wish he had another millstone around his neck.

And if I were a layman I should behave at home as well as in church. I should never in the presence of my children, either at the dinner-table or anywhere else, speak of the minister, or the sermon, or the church, or anybody connected with the church, in a tone which disparaged. And if my children were small, I should be doubly careful. No living creature hears so much as a three-years child. And, if a child is playing, his capacity for hearing what big folks are saying seems to be increased. The man who criticises the church, or anybody connected with it, in the presence of growing children, is locking doors which he may never be able to open, although he may strive to do so with prayers and tears. Thousands of children are lost to the church because of the foolish talk of thoughtless parents. In my home the Church of God should be spoken of always with reverence and love. It should be the theme of many a conversation, and in all my talk it should be made supreme and glorious. Among the papers on my table should be at least one church paper, and among the latest books should be a few small volumes of church history, or of Christian doctrine, or the biographies of some of the modern heroes of the faith. My drawing-room table should proclaim to my own household, and to all who came to see me, that the Christian Church is august and sovereign, and that in my judgment a man is behind the times who reads the latest novel, and ignores the splendid literature which the Church of Christ is to-day producing. Never under any circumstances should a Sunday newspaper come into my home. For my health's sake, and for the sake of my sons and daughters, I should keep one day in the week free for the reading of books written by the masters of the supreme problems of life and thought. Like the Christians of the first century, I should have a church in my house, and this church in my house should be made to furnish atmosphere, vitality, and power for the church upon whose book my name had been enrolled and before whose altar I had dedicated my entire life to God.—S. S. Times.

A Message from Dr. Peter Stryker.

"He being dead yet speaketh!"

(The beloved Stryker will never be forgotten, nor his influence die. From a manuscript sermon of his, preached in 1887 in Minneapolis, we quote extracts which will be read with interest by many.—Editors of C. I.)

I am to speak to you this morning upon the subject of "Ministerial Relief." This brings before us a small army of aged ministers. Do you see them? Their hair is thin and silvery; their faces are furrowed and their forms bent; they are feeble. Leaning upon some strong arm, each one goes forward, tottering. Soon they will be beyond our help. But they are here now. We see their hands clasped in holy prayer; we hear their tremulous voices as in union they cry out, "Cast us not off in time of old age!" That prayer ascends to heaven; it reaches the ear of the Almighty, and at once He sends it back to us and bids us answer it. We are to take the place of the Lord and provide for these faithful old servants.

Suppose one of them was your father—would you turn him over to the alms-house or hospital? No, indeed; you would not treat an old family servant in that way. I don't believe you would turn out a faithful dog to die. I received a letter from a friend in the East a few days ago. He said, "Do you remember the old sorrel horse that took us down to Long Branch last June? He was swamped in the mire one night last week, and the next morning we found him dead. He was 25 years old and not worth much for use, but we loved him and cherished him for what he had been."

Yes, I remembered the old horse well; and how kind and gentle his owner was to him! And I also remember, when we were taking that ride last summer to the seashore, how my friend spoke of an old domestic who for some 50 years had lived in the family and had cared for him when he was a little boy. She lived to be nearly a hundred years old. For a long—perhaps half a score of years—she was not able to do any service. During the latter part of that period she was entirely helpless and required constant care and help. Did they send her to the poor house? By no means. She had been their faithful servant; she had done hard work in that family; she had cared for the children in their infancy and had helped to nurse the aged parents in their last sickness. With tears running down his manly cheeks, my friend said to me: "It was a privilege to care for that old woman, and when the breath left her body I felt I had lost a true friend."

If as individuals we care for a dog or a horse or a faithful old servant, how should we as individuals and as a church regard our superannuated or worn out Gospel ministers?

Our Church is noted for its liberality quite as much as for its orthodoxy. An appeal for help is never disregarded. It matters not who it is or where he is, the person in distress is sure to get our sympathy and substantial aid. He may be an heathen, an infidel, an anarchist, if he is in distress we try to relieve him. This is well. We are acting the part of the good Samaritan; we are obeying the teachings of Christ and following the example of the divine Philanthropist.

But here is an appeal which comes to us with especial force. This is not charity, but duty. Nature as well as grace bids us listen to the cry and yield the assistance.

It would be well if our churches took better care of their ministers when they are young and well and strong and doing them good service. Then there would not be so many in a destitute condition in their old age or when dragged down by sickness. This is a delicate subject for pastors to treat, and the elders should relieve them of it. In many cases they do, and I could give you some very tender reminiscences on this point from the leaves of my own pastoral experience.

But all churches are not as careful of their pastors as they should be, and some very good people in their thoughtlessness not only neglect to give their minister their full support, but they actually work against him and not infrequently undermine his influence.

Did you ever hear the story of Deacon Lee? Deacon Lee was an old man. An uneasy church member came in to see him and to enlist him in an effort which a few were making to get rid of the pastor. The deacon was very reticent at first, so that the other said: "You talk so little, deacon, that no one can find out what you think."

"I talked enough once," said the old man, rising to his feet, "for six praying Christians. Thirty years ago I got my heart humbled and my tongue bridled."

"What happened to you 30 years ago?" asked the visitor.

Then the deacon went on to tell how he had been led into a scheme to remove his old pastor from the place where God had put him. The effort was successful; the aged servant retired. But hardly had he gone, and before his place was supplied, a powerful revival of religion broke out in the church, and among others converted were the children of the deacon. It had been argued that the pastor was too feeble, and, therefore, that the cause of the Lord in their midst was languishing. But they learned that the seed the pastors had so long and faithfully been sowing was that which gave them the abundant harvest they were gathering.

Deacon Lee heard that the old pastor was ill. So he took his oldest boy with him as one of the trophies of the revival, and rode 25 miles to see him.

The aged minister was dying. "What did I care then," said the deacon, "whether the pews by the door were seated or not?" Bending over the old man he said, with choking utterance, "My pastor!" The dying minister looked up into his face, and said, "Touch not my anointed, and do my prophets no harm." That was all. The deacon stayed with him all night and tenderly nursed him, and in the morning closed his eyes as he slept his last sleep.

After relating this story to his visitor the deacon said: "Since that day I have talked less than before and have supported my pastor even if he is not a very extraordinary man. When a minister's work is done in a place, I believe God will show it to him. I will not join you in the scheme that brought you here; and moreover, if I hear another word of this from your lips, I shall ask the brethren to deal with you as with one who causes divisions."

If there were a few more men like Deacon Lee there would be less uneasiness in our churches; pastors would not be driven from one city to another as were the apostles of old; and there would be an opportunity for that continuous and solid pastoral work which would result in a true revival of religion.

Pastors should be sustained as well as supported. They should be well cared for and protected. The people should give them more than their sympathy; they should give them their love. They should pray for them, encourage them, and defend them. When a person talks against his minister, or listens to others as they find fault with him—he may not be aware of it, nevertheless it is true—he is playing into the hands of Satan. Nothing can please his majesty from the pit better than for a few people in a church to begin and persist in undermining the minister.

The first thing then in this matter of ministerial relief is to protect the pastor. Let the elders and deacons, the women and the young people rally round him and say to the discontented ones, "Hands off! This is the man of God. He was divinely sent to us. God has blessed his ministry here, and will bless it more and more if the devil does not have his way. Don't you hear the voice that shouts from heaven, 'Touch not mine anointed and do my prophets no harm?'"

The next thing is for every church to consider whether it is doing all it can for the pecuniary support of its pastor. It is much easier to preach faith than to practice it. We all have an opportunity to do both. But the pastor especially. He has not the privilege of making money from day to day which is accorded to other men. Very properly he is expected to give himself fully and solely to the work of saving souls, and to encourage him in this he is promised the fidelity and support of his people. At the time of his installation they solemnly so engaged.

But now we go a step farther. Each individual member and every church is not only responsible for the care of his pastor or their pastor, but for the pastors of other churches within our bounds. We ought to be: we are a mutual life insurance company, and the Board of Ministerial Relief is the organization through which we operate.

Two things are worthy of special notice—one is that there are many needy ones who will not apply for help because the relief fund is so small and they feel there are others who need the help more than they do. There was an aged and infirm minister. The last handful had been taken from the barrel of meal. When he was asked why he had not applied to the fund for assistance his reply was, "Because I thought there might be many of God's dear servants in greater need, and I knew the supply was small."

Another fact is that in the apportionment the sums given have often been very inadequate. It is the policy of the Board never to go in debt. This compels not only the most careful discrimination, but sometimes the cutting down of the sums recommended. One minister thus wrote: "It is with unfeigned gratitude that wife and I acknowledge the receipt of check, but we are sorry it had to be discounted 25 per cent. My wife has been sick for four months with a severe cough. Not being able to hire help, I have to do the cooking, and that was but poorly done. It is hard for me to do it, for I can hardly walk, so crippled am I in my lower limbs. I am in my 79th year. I do not know sometimes how we are to get along on so little means. They recommended me for $200; but your Board have to be governed by the funds in your treasury."

This was bad enough, but here is another still more touching: "You cannot conceive the effect of a cut down when already below the living point. A former cut down I think caused the death of my wife. We had quite enough to bear before, but when that came she soon sank under it."

Let us think of the aged ministers, the disabled ministers, the widows of ministers, the orphans of ministers. Let us pray for them. Let us all give something for their relief. We should give liberally, and if not prepared to give to-day we should not forget the cause, but contribute as soon as possible.—Christian Intelligencer.

The Assembly's Home and School.

Dear Friends:

In December last Miss Maggie Maben of Auburn, Ky., died and bequeathed her estate to the Assembly's Home and School at Fredericksburg, Va. I am not able yet to say what is the value of this estate, but I can safely say about $400. You may think this a small estate, but there are several circumstances that render it a valuable contribution to our cause, enhancing many fold the value of the dollars realized therefrom and causing us to cherish the memory of this noble Christian lady. In the first place, it was her all. And who can say how much this means? Again, she was poor, but so rich in love to her Saviour that she often gave against the protest of her pastor and friends. She made her living by weaving and I am told she often added extra time at night to her weaving that she might increase her contributions to the Lord's causes. For 57 years she was a professing Christian, having first united with the Presbyterian Church at Salem and after Salem Church was disorganized, she united with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church at Auburn, Ky. From what I can gather she was one of those bright, consecrated Christian women, who are a blessing to the Church and to the community in which they live, cheering, comforting and helping those with whom they come in contact. Miss Maben loved the orphan and did much for them and before she died she determined to give her all to the orphans of our sainted ministers. That Jesus loved children no one can doubt. That He loved tenderly the fatherless we also know and I believe He loves with peculiar tenderness the orphans of those who have spent their lives in the Gospel ministry. Friends, let us imitate this noble example that Miss Maben has set us. Send us what you can for this great work and help us to enlarge it. We trust that others may be led by her example to provide in their wills for the support of the work that it may go on helping the orphan and cheering and comforting the widow. The exact title of the Institution is "The Assembly's Home and School at Fredericksburg, Va." I am indebted to Mr. S. M. Stokes of Auburn, Ky., for the facts in this case.

Yours fraternally,

Fredericksburg, Va. S. W. Somerville, Supt.

Answer to a Puzzling Question.

After an address in College Square, Calcutta, at an open air meeting, one of the students walked with me from the meeting to the hall. His question was: "As there are different ways of going to the top of a house so may there not be different ways of being saved? You may go by the ladder, or by the lift, or stairway; so may not Christianity be the religion adapted to Western people, and Hinduism and Mohammedanism to people of the East?" The same question had been asked of me before I went to India. The figure was different, but the question was the same. I had never been able satisfactorily to answer it, but here was a stimulus which had never been present before. If I failed to meet the objection of this keen Hindu student I might lose him forever. The answer came like a flash. "There is only one way of going to the top of a house and that is by overcoming gravitation. Does your religion save you?" He answered, as every one of them will answer when asked that question: "I hope some day to be saved." I replied: "Only Christianity gives present assurance of present salvation. The religion that lifts, and only that religion is true. By experiment it has been shown that only Christianity enables a man to rise above himself, to stand upon himself, to trample himself underneath himself."

The Open Court.

TWO LETTERS AND TWO EDITORIALS.

From a Northern University Professor.

The Reverend John W. Stagg, D. D.

My dear Sir:—

Will you accept my cordial thanks for your little book on "The Universal Salvation of Infants." I have read it with much interest and benefit and, I may say, with appreciation and approval of the reasoning and conclusions.

Your estimate of Calvin, I am able to state from my own study of his life and opinions, is just and accurate. He is one of the much-maligned and misunderstood men of history, in regard to his opinions upon this as well as other questions. If he did not teach Universal Infant Salvation directly and positively, yet he taught nothing contrary to the tenet, but opened the way for it as a logical deduction from the Scriptures and from his own opinions. In this matter he was in advance of the theologians of his day and even of some orthodox divines of later times.

Charles W. Shields.

Princeton University, New Jersey, February 17, 1903.

From a Southern Editor.

My dear Bro. Stagg:

I wrote you recently, promising a review of your Book. I have just finished reading it; and will as brother writing brother, give you the result candidly and unreservedly.

Reconizing the worthiness of your twofold object—the vindication of Calvin et als. from current misrepresentation, and defence of our maligned creed, I have struck upon some difficulties, which I will now freely state.

I. Aside from reference to your performance, I question the wisdom of complicating the defense of our creed with the vindication of even representative men; should the latter not prove to some absolutely convincing, it would with such prejudice rather than help the cause.

II. I cannot, in the question of individual salvation, separate the status of infancy from infants; and it seems to me, if Christ's blessing the Hebrew babes carries with it the salvation of infancy as such, all men having once been infants were once in a state of salvation, and the lost adult must consequently have fallen from the grace of infancy!

III. Your widening the Abrahamic covenant by which Paul vindicated Gentile Church Membership through possession of like faith, into a Christ covenant embracing infancy as such without reference to parentage—logically lands in Church Baptism as opposed to family baptism and justifies Episcopalians and Methodists in baptizing children by whomsoever presented.

IV. Your lavish use of hypothesis and ad hominem devices to harmonize Calvin's statements, is not always to my mind clear or convincing.

Such bald statements as this: "Countless mortals are taken from life while yet infants. Now put forth your virulence against God who hurls innocent babes torn from their mothers breast into eternal death," will convince most readers despite your ad hominem explanations, that Calvin, who elsewhere stands for absolute and indisputable sovereignty in God, means to teach the perdition of some infants.

Now these criticisms would be proper for review article in our Quarterly, because of the class of those reading it, who would understand the friendliness of the paper and it would admit of full reply in the same organ; even in that case I would not attempt such review without thorough study of Calvin at first hand and in his Latin: A religious weekly has as the bulk of its reader a different class before it by whom criticism would be misconstrued. I cannot print Dr. ———'s article written for another paper, without seeming to endorse it, which would be the case if published without partial dissent, and I would not detract from its warm commendation.

Your Book has this splendid value—it has convincingly proven that to Calvin belongs the credit of teaching first or foremost the possibility of the salvation of unbaptized infants dying such, and still more important, of showing how they can be saved without personal faith and repentance: to wit, by sovereign electing grace!

You need not be told how heartily I am in accord with you in your opposition to revision of Elect Infant Clause—I thank you for your strong words. Trusting you will appreciate my dilemma, desire to oblige, but conviction to the contrary.

[We publish above with Dr. Stagg's consent, two letters about his little book," one from the learned Professor Charles W. Shields, D. D., of Princeton University, the other from the editor of a Southern religious paper whose name is withheld. It will be noted that Dr. Shields agrees with the conclusions of the book and declares that Calvin opened the way for the deduction from the Scriptures and his own opinions of the doctrine of universal infant salvation.

Our brother editor, on the other hand, is unwilling either to review this book by a Southern minister or to publish a favorable review of it by another minister. He "questions the wisdom of complicating the defense of our creed with the vindication of even representative men." But are we not named Calvinists and does not every unanswered slander of Calvin reflect upon Calvinists and the Calvinistic creed? Was not William Twisse the President of the very Assembly that gave us the creed which our brother wishes to defend without "complication?" Was there ever a creed, devised by men, that was not complicated with their known opinions. Certainly, before Dr. Stagg's book was published everybody thought that Twisse was committed to an interpretation of the elect infant clause that meant infant damnation. He has been shown to believe in the impossibility of infant damnation. And now for fear that somebody may think this proof not "absolutely convincing," when the current belief has been that Calvin and Twisse both believed that horrible doctrine, the editor is unwilling even to give a review of the book. And then the editor is unable to separate the "status of infancy from infants." The question is not one of the editor's ability but of historic fact. It is a fact of history that Calvin said, in commenting on "Suffer the little children to come unto me," "nothing can be plainer than that he intends those who are in a state of real infancy." The question is not whether the editor agrees with Calvin but whether Calvin taught the salvation of all who die in that state which Christ has blessed. As to the Covenant—perhaps Calvin and Jonathan Edwards knew as much about that as this editor. But it is new doctrine that a book cannot be reviewed because there might be drawn a logical inference that might justify a practise of Methodists and Episcopalians. Whether Calvin were right or wong Calvin taught that Christ's Covenant "embraced infancy as such," and the "little book" is an inquiry as to what Calvin taught, without any attempt to harmonize his view with other people's crotchets.

As to the "use of hypothesis and ad hominem arguments"—Go to now.

The Book "has this splendid value," that on one point it does harmonize with the editor's crotchets. And yet what a confession to make, that a contributor's opinion cannot be published without "partial dissent," although, to make such dissent it would require a "thorough study of Calvin first hand in Latin."

This is journalism as exemplified in a Southern Presbyterian paper.

The editor "would not detract from the warm commendation of the book," but "cannot print an article written for another paper without seeming to endorse it." He is willing for this quack to poison a neighbor's baby, but he must not come into the editor's home. It seems to us that he ought to cry out against the quackery that is circulating the poison.

Lest we should seem unduly severe we quote below an editorial from Zion's Watchtower, Chicago. We have known and felt that our whole Church was slandered because of a small but reactionary minority. There is no telling the harm that has been done and that will be done by such slanders until a remedy is found. The trouble is that when one reads the accusation of the Watchtower and then the editorial that caused it, it is hard to accuse the Watchtower of slander.

This is another evidence that the "little book" ought to be circulated even more than it is.—Ed.]

From Zion's Watch Tower.

The movement for Presbyterian Creed revision, it should be remembered, is amongst those of the Northern Synods only. The Southern Presbyterians constitute a totally separate body of Presbyterians. (There is only one body of Christ.) In this connection note the following comment from the columns of the Southwestern Presbyterian in criticism of a published communication. The editorial note follows:

"Note by the Editor in Charge.—The statement in the above communication, that 'our church as a whole doth verily believe' that it 'is taught in God's Holy Word that all infants dying in infancy were given by the Father to the Son in the councils of the Deity before the foundation of the world, as a part of the reward of his atoning sacrifice,' is wholly unwarranted. The church's belief is found, not in the deliverance of one Assembly, but in its Standards alone, and not until these are changed is any one warranted in saying that the church believes in the salvation of all infants dying in infancy. As the Standards are now, they are absolutely silent on that question, because the Scriptures are silent on it. We may hope that it is so, but the Scriptures do not declare it. When the Psalmist says: 'The wicked are estranged from the womb; they go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies' (Psalm 58:3), it does seem to imply the possibility that the children of the wicked perish with their parents.

"But our Standards do neither affirm or deny it. They only affirm, as the Jackson(?) Assembly declares, that the elect who die in infancy, 'are saved in a different manner from adult persons who are capable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the Word,' leaving it an open question whether the children of the wicked are saved or not, inasmuch as this is one of the things of which Moses says: 'The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children, that we may do all the words of this law.'—Deut. 29:30."

"Forward Movement."

Do you like the phrase? Does it sound orthodox in Presbyterian circles? Does it fall sweetly upon a Scotchman's ears? The pages of current Presbyterian religious literature fairly bristle with Forward Movements. When we consider the Forward Movement in missionary enterprise, the Forward Movement of Ministerial Relief, the Forward Movement of combined American Presbyterianism with a locomotive man in the lead, and the many other Forward Movements, our heads are slightly inclined to go round in a whirl, and we begin to feel that the Presbyterian Church is at last "getting a hustle on itself."

Our surprise is great—as great as that of Dr. Joseph Parker, when, at a Wesleyan Conference, a certain Presbyterian minister, being called on to speak, referred to himself as an humble Presbyterian. Whereupon Dr. Parker exclaimed: "I will turn aside and see this great sight." When the Forward Movement gets fully on the wing the sweep of its pinions will be a sight worth while for modest Presbyterians.

But then we recall that there was a Forward Movement of lay evangelism, and another by Financial Agents. There was a Woman's Forward Movement, and a Man's, to catch up with the Twentieth Century. There was a Forward Movement of Christian Endeavor Societies, and an attempted ingrafting of the same into the organic life of our Church. It is gratifying to note that the Church survived all these Forward Movements, albeit probably somewhat demoralized thereby.

The thing aimed at by the phrase, Forward Movement, and which has become the rage of the hour, is all right. Advancement, growth, is essential to the welfare of Christ's Kingdom. "Go forward" is the command. But the phrase as now used smacks of a fad of the age. It has the odor of the American fever of haste. It suggests the figure of God's people straining at the chariot wheels of the Almighty.

The writer once announced from the pulpit of a Presbyterian Church in a fine old community of well-instructed Scotch-Irish Presbyterians that on a certain day there would be a "Grand Rally" of the Sunday-school forces of the church. But he never made the announcement in that form again. By the time of the next notice he learned better. The meeting was held, however, and it was a great success, but it was only a "general gathering" of the Sunday-school forces. Do you get the point?

The Presbyterian Church is not in need of high pressure methods nor highfalutin phrases. She will not have them. She will sometimes kill the cause to be rid of the name. What we need as a church today more than anything else is more loyalty to the kingship of Jesus according to Presbyterian polity, more old-fashioned, solid, sensible, quiet, systematic, persistent work along all lines of Christian endeavor, and more importunate prayer.

P. H. Gwinn.

The Lend-a-Hand Book Mission.

I was glad to see "Lend-a-Hand Book Mission in the South" contribution in the Presbyterian Standard and to see that the movement met with your approval. I desire to put myself on record as a possible pioneer in North Carolina in this mission. Several years ago, it came to my notice that books and papers could be procured in this way for gratuitous distribution by asking for them. Application was made and the books and papers came from different places in the North. They were distributed to all who wished to read and "touching expressions of gratitude" came from many who wished to read, but were not able to buy books. We had no formal organization of a club, but we rec'd and distributed more than a ton of reading matter. Many have been greatly benefitted.

Tea-Pot and Punch Bowl.

At one of the social functions in Washington City the last week of January, (as usual two ladies served), one lady sat at the tea-pot and served tea; the other lady sat at the punch bowl and served punch. Nearly all the gentlemen took tea and nearly all the ladies took punch.

As to the personal attractions of the two ladies, honors were easy. There must be some other explanation.

The Editor's Chat With the Reader.

Dr. Hoyt is always a valued contributor to our columns and we are glad to see him more and more assuming the wider pastorate of the pen. The points he makes on creed revision are excellent. Yet we think the slight amendments that have been adopted can hardly be said to 'supplant' the Westminster Confession with a new creed. "If I were a Layman" is the answer to "If I were a Minister," recently published in the Sunday School Times. We commend this to the pew as we commended the other to the pulpit. A Message from Dr. Stryker is a timely one, and mutatis mutandis may well be applied to our own Church. Mr Somerville gives a touching instance of self sacrifice for Christ's sake, and Mr. W. W. White gives us an Answer to a Puzzling Question. The Open Court has some "mighty interesting reading," as Horace Greely used to say. We understand that Dr. Sagg's defence of the three great Calvinists has met with a gratifying sale already, and that the second thousand will soon be demanded. It is a pity that our own Southern Church has been so backward in realizing the merit—judged by our theological professors and editors.

We close this week the series of articles on the saloon. We trust that they have been of general as well as of state-wide interest and influence. We are glad to note the continued evidence of popular sentiment. The Charlotte News has gotten down from the fence and fallen on the right side very plumply. The Charlotte Observer has climbed the fence from the wrong side. Both are moving in the right direction.

TEMPERANCE.

As we go to press the Senate in Raleigh is considering the London Bill, the Watts Bill, with the amendment of which we spoke last week, having already passed the House by a good majority. We shall have good news, we hope, next week, for those who have not already heard it.

Whatever is done, we advise our friends in this state to consider the fight as just beginning for the rescue of the whole state from the curse of the groggery-distillery and the saloon. County by county, city by city let the fight be waged. If the anti-jug law does not pass, then try to get it at this legislature for individual prohibition counties, as Robeson has it now. Agitate, arouse public sentiment, wait for the best time and then secure the calling of an election to drive the saloon out. It will take work and it will mean hardship and even slander and persecution, as we can well attest. But the end is worth the striving for, worth even dying for, the rescue of the Old North State, from the seductive and debauching influences of the saloon. To your tents, O Israel!

TEXAS.

CROCKETT.—The church at this place during the year 1902 received a net gain in its membership of 17. The total contributions of the church for the year 1902 was nearly $400 more than for the preceding year. It now has a desirable manse lot paid for. Since the beginning of the year 1903 one member has been received by profession, and one by certificate. The Ladies Aid Society has been quite active, lately, adding liberally to their funds for improvements on our house of worship. The Ladies Missionary Society has been steadily at work. The Sabbath-school has made some improvements.

S. F. Tenney.

TEMPLE.—The Presbytery of Central Texas will meet in Temple, Texas, Thursday, April 9, 1903, at 8 p. m. Sessional blanks will be mailed to the churches March 2nd, and if any church fails to receive its blanks by the 10th of March, please notify me that I may mail others.

M. C. Hutton, Stated Clerk-Treasurer.

MILFORD.—The first Sabbath of February was the tenth anniversary of the present pastorate—Rev. E. M. Munroe, D. D., pastor.

At the morning service there was a brief review of the work of this pastorate. At the evening service two members were received and on Wednesday evening following two were received, all on profession. The last two mentioned are girls of our new Female College.

E. M. Munroe.

FLORIDA.

JACKSONVILLE; First Church.—Our beautiful sanctuary will soon be completed. We are to hold our first service in the auditorium on Sabbath, the 8th of February. On Sabbath, Jan. 25, the names of twenty-eight new members were read as having been added in the last quarter. The Sunday-school reported a larger number in attendance than was ever before present. New people are coming into the city all the while. We need the presence and power of the Holy Spirit very, very greatly!—Southwestern Presbyterian.

ST. PETERSBURG; First Presbyterian Church.—A series of revival meetings held in the above church, beginning Sunday, January 25, closed Sunday, Feb. 8. For one week the meeting was conducted by the eloquent Kentucky evangelist, Dr. Edward O. Guerrant, and was carried on another week by Dr. John G. Anderson, of Tampa. Great interest was shown, especially amongst the children. It is expected that some fifteen or twenty will soon unite with this church, and probably others later.

The services were union in nature.

Albert H. Roberts.

PLANT CITY.—The pastoral relation existing between Rev. J. McC. Forbis and the church at Plant City was dissolved at a pro re nata meeting of St. John's Presbytery, Feb. 10, 1903. At the same time the Presbytery adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas, the relation between the Rev. J. M. Forbis and the Plant City Church has been dissolved and Bro. Forbis dismissed to the Presbytery of King's Mountain. Therefore, be it resolved that this Presbytery hereby expresses its appreciation of the labors of Bro. Forbis as a Presbyter and as a pastor for the last six years. The Presbytery expresses its regret at losing so faithful and earnest a brother and hereby commends him to the churches of King's Mountain, Long Creek and Bessemer City, and to the brethren of King's Mountain Presbytery, and pray that the blessing of God may accompany him and abide with him in his new field of labor." A live man with small family is needed to take up Bro. Forbis' work. Dr. J. D. Parks of Plant City, will answer all correspondents.

D. L. Lander, Stated Clerk.

WEST VIRGINIA.

BEVERLY.—This church is still without a pastor. Several names are under consideration; any others who wish should write at once. Rev. C. J. Boppell lectured on Africa for them on last Thursday and preached Friday. Steps were taken to remove a small remnant of indebtedness so as to leave a clear field for an incoming pastor. Address Maj. T. P. R. Brown.

MISSOURI

LEXINGTON.—In this church on account of repairs to the interior of the building, the regular quarterly communion service appointed for January was observed on the third Sunday in February. On that day a violent snow storm prevailed, but over one hundred persons attended the service. Since the last communion in October, 1902, seven persons have been admitted to the Lord's Supper in this church on examination, one of whom was baptized.

During this winter about $1,200 have been expended in repairing and decorating the interior of the building and in securing a new hot air furnace. These improvements, with enlargements made to the building several years ago, give one of the most commodious, well-arranged and attractive church edifices in this section of Missouri.

Besides its home Sunday-school with its Home Department, two vigorous mission Sunday-schools are maintained by the members of this church in coal mining villages near the city.

ARKANSAS

DeQUEEN.—The Presbytery of Ouachita will meet at Junction City, Wednesday, April 8, at 7:30.

Chas. H. Murray, S. C.

VIRGINIA.

The Presbytery of Roanoke will meet at Pamplin City on Tuesday, April 7th, at 7:30 p. m.

H. A. Brown, S. C.

GEORGIA.

FORSYTH.—Since the coming into our midst of Rev. R. H. Morris as minister, the Forsyth Church has begun to flourish as it has not before in a long time. Six new members have been added to our roll, all of whom are among the most prominent and substantial people of Forsyth. On last Sunday several new officers, who had been elected previously by the congregation, were ordained and installed. Mr. T. McC. Gamble was ordained and installed elder and Messrs Rutherford, Harper and Harrison deacons. The two other elders of the church are Brothers Sharpe and Anderson, and the other deacon Bro. Brown. The church feels very much encouraged over its prospects.

ALABAMA.

The Presbytery of Tuscaloosa will meet at Centreville, Ala., Tuesday, April 14th, 7:30 p. m.

An Appeal from Mangum, O. T.

Dear Brother:

A speaker on the floor of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, in making a plea for the work in Western Australia, said "that by allowing townships and whole communities to take shape and develop without the influences of religion the empire is preparing a far country for prodigal sons."

We have a far country prepared in western Oklahoma. This far country, into which many from the southeast and north have already gone, our Home Mission Committee is striving to take for the Master. We have organized the First Southern Presbyterian Church in Oklahoma, at Mangum, in Greer county. This we trust is the opening wedge. In Mangum we have some twenty-one members; the town contains a population of 3,000, the county about 40,000.

In order that the work may be carried on effectively we find it necessary to build a home for the Church. The few members are at work for this purpose, but on account of their weakness in numbers and resources they are compelled to ask for aid.

Can you or your church assist us with this work?

Send contributions to Rev. H. S. Davidson, at Bowie, Texas, or to Mrs. E. C. Moore, Mangum, O. T. Acknowledgments will be made in the papers.

Yours for His service,

H. S. Davidson.

Bowie, Texas, February 9th, 1903.

REIDSVILLE.—On January 29th Orange Presbytery accepted the resignation of Rev. Cornelius Miller as Evangelist of the Stokes county field, and dismissed him to unite with the Knoxville Presbytery, Tenn. The matter of supplying the field made vacant by the removal of Bro. Miller was entrusted to the Home Mission Committee, the Rev. E. C. Murray, D. D., Chairman.

RALEIGH.—Our Secretary of Ministerial Relief preached on that important subject in this church the Second Sabbath of February and moderated a congregational meeting. Prof. Hill spoke feelingly of the great sorrow of their Pastor, Dr. W. E. Cave. Prof. Dinwiddie read a paper that was heartily adopted expressing the tenderest sympathy with their pastor and the desire that he should take such time as he saw proper in removing his family from Paducah, Ky., and the hope that his health might be soon restored and the way clear for him to begin in a short time his important work in this city when a cordial welcome awaits him.

MT. GILEAD.—Rev. A. M. McLaughlin, formerly pastor of this church will leave this week for Camilla, Georgia.

We certainly regret to give him up. All the people like him; he is earnest and consecrated, and preaches such helpful, good gospel sermons. May God's special blessing be with him, in his new field of work.

To the Pastors, Sessions and Superintendents of Sabbath-schools in the Synod of North Carolina:

In view of the fact that reports to Presbyteries on Sabbath-schools and Young People Societies have been so unsatisfactory and inadequate, let me urge the greatest care and thoroughness in making out these reports to be submitted over to the spring meeting of Presbyteries. Let all schools and Young People Societies be fully and carefully reported so that our statistics in future will represent more definitely this work, than ever in the past.

Very respectfully,

Geo. H. Cornelson, Jr.

Concord, N. C. Church Synod's Com.

Barium Springs Orphanage.

The Synod from the beginning has had a full appreciation of having a competent and regular support for the Orphans' Home. Knowing that church collections at Thanksgiving, even though liberal, would not be sufficient it has ever been sought to enlist all Sunday-schools in making one collection every month for the support of the Home.

The resolution adopted at the late meeting, at Winston, reads, "That all our Sabbath-schools be urged to contribute to the Orphanage once every month." A universal compliance with this recommendation would so supplement the church collections as to make a competent and regular support. Many Sabbath-schools have complied with this recommendation, and in every case, so far as reported, the plan has worked well, increasing interest in the schools and increasing contributions to all other causes. But unfortunately quite a number of Sabbath-schools in the stronger churches have for one reason or another failed to comply with the recommendation of Synod and by so doing crippled the work. Will not the pastors and elders, in connection with the Sabbath-school superintendents, take this matter into prayerful consideration, and promptly bring their schools into full co-operation with all other schools, make this plan an assured success and save the management of the Orphans' Home the humiliation of making spasmodic appeals during the summer month for bread for the fatherless children entrusted to the care of the church?

The Twentieth Century Fund.

Rev. C. G. Vardell reports the following subscriptions to this Fund: Hopewell, $109.75; Keith, $57.00; Clarkton (for Clarkton school), $1500.00; Rowland (partial canvass), $700.00; Total, $2,356.75.

There have been received thus far, from 26 churches and the Trustees of James Sprunt Institute, pledges to the amount of $25,588.23, of which about $6,085. has been paid.

There are other doubtful or conditional pledges, and also special contributions to certain institutions not reported to Synod's executive committee.

The undersigned, as treasurer of Synod's Executive Committee of the Twentieth Century Fund, would esteem it a great favor if church treasurers would do these three things; First, make regular and prompt collections of all installments when due; second, forward all collections promptly to me; and third, at least report to me all contributions to special institutions, if they are unwilling to forward such contributions through me.

I am endeavoring to keep an exact account of the amounts actually collected in each church, the receipts from each Presbytery, and the contributions to each institution. If this can be done accurately, our committees annual and final reports will be complete and interesting. At present I have no definite idea as to what portion of their pledged amounts some churches have actually paid, nor to what amount certain institutions have been benefited by money that has been pledged them. In short, it is very important that every cent of money pledged and collected, be forwarded, or at least reported, to Synod's treasurer. If not, then when the canvass is ended four or five years hence, no one will know what has really been done.

LOUISIANA.

NORWOOD.—Last Sabbath, Feb. 15th was a memorable day in the history of the Comite Church, signalized as it was by our worshipping for the first time in our commodious and beautifully furnished church home in Norwood.

Comite Church was built in 1846 and is probably the oldest Presbyterian Church in East Feliciana Parish.

Naturally, it was a grief to its people, especially to its older members, to whom it was endeared by the tender associations of many years, to abandon it and build a new church in the growing town of Norwood, four miles distant on the Y. and M. V. railroad, but the welfare of the congregation seemed to require it.

Our new church is, we believe, one of the prettiest in the state, outside of our large cities. With inclined floor, elegant pews, acetyline lights, and surrounded by a beautiful magnolia grove, it is indeed a picture of loveliness.

The pastor of the Baptist Church, the only other in town, courteously omitted his services, and with his people and almost every one else in town, worshipped with us.

We pray that the Divine blessing may rest upon our town and people, and upon the work thus auspiciously inaugurated.

D. O. Byers, Pastor.

A Presbyterian Theological School in China.

Dear Mr. Editor:—I feel it incumbent on me to call your attention and the attention of your readers to this exceedingly important part of the church work in this great mission field—a part of the work which, alas! exists as yet only in name. To one acquainted with the facts as they stand out on the field to-day, it goes without saying, that our China mission as a whole is woefully behind in the matter of developing, of training and using native preachers. And we are correspondingly behind too in the number of converts and in the occupying of the large field which is practically left to us—a field, or rather fields, containing thousands of square miles of territory and millions of inhabitants who are practically untouched with the Gospel message. This is true especially of the North Kiangsu mission. The Mid-China mission is better supplied than we are with native preachers—they have had some schools, we none—and they of course have far better “results” than we, more converts, more churches, in short, they are much farther advanced than we are. In the North Kiangsu mission we have perhaps in all three or four natives who regularly preach. At one or two of the stations there are none at all, and at none of the stations are there anything like the number that could be used and that the needs of the work require.

While I would not in the least discourage increasing the number of ordained, it still goes with the saying that we can never hope to carry on the work with much success without a largely increased force of well-trained native preachers, much less can we ever overtake, even to a tithe part, the vast destitutions around us. The need is as great as one could imagine any need to be, and the supply either at present or prospective, is utterly inadequate to the needs. Not only do we need natives to do what we can never hope to do, on account of the largeness of the field and the greatness of the work to be done, but we need them greatly to increase our own efficiency in the work. In fact, they are almost absolutely indispensable to us. After many years of experience and of observation I can say with all confidence, that it is a very poor policy to send a missionary to the field, to keep him here at considerable expense and have him work single-handed from year to year on this raw heathenism. His usefulness, if not entirely curtailed, is at least so much crippled that it would be quite an open question whether it be wise to keep a man on the field under such circumstances. Surely in some cases it would not be wise, while in others it might be justifiable. This much is certain: No business firm would think of sending its foreign agents to Shanghai, pay their salaries and incidental expenses and then not give them wherewith to secure and use the best native agents that they could get to assist them in their business. Every business firm at once realizes that it must work through the natives, and this is accordingly done. Any other policy would be madness and folly from a business standpoint.

But I need not argue this question with the home churches; for I know that they fully believe in our training and using native workers. We need at the earliest practicable date to start into operation a theological school in this part of China. I say “in this part of China,” because

1. There is no such school here nor near this place. There is a training class in operation in Soochow this winter, but this bears about the same relation to our Northern Mission as a training class in the City of Mexico would to the Southern Church at home. 2. Because we need as speedily as possible to increase the number of native preachers. 3. Because our present haphazard way of training natives is very unsatisfactory to us and does not do them justice. We want and we need men and men well equipped for their duty, which is by no means a light one. The native preachers do not get the sufficient amount of teaching and training that they need and of course they are not as satisfactory as we wish them to be. Their knowledge of the Bible, their spiritual life and Christian characters all suffer from inadequate and poor training. True, some of us—myself among the number—have for years, off and on, spent a month, six weeks or two months, a year trying to teach our native preachers. But this has been done at immense disadvantage both to the teachers and to the students. We have never given a tithe of the time and attention to this part of the work that its importance demands. “What is everybody’s business is nobody’s business.” It is impossible for a busy, overworked foreign evangelist to give anything like the amount of time and attention to fitting his native helpers that they need, and to do this at spare moments and under great and serious disadvantage. It is absolutely necessary for the best results in the work that each department of it receive a full share of attention and for someone or some ones to give special attention to each department. Every ordained missionary is not gifted in teaching. The home church has theological schools and set apart men specially gifted in teaching to train men for the ministry. Why should we have another policy here—one that would be entirely unsatisfactory at home?

In the matter of both using and teaching native preachers I speak from many years of actual experience. I am now having a class composed of our three regular helpers and three other young Christian men who may be suitable for this work in time to come. I meet the class four times a week, just two miles away from home, over a road, or rather a path, that is often scarcely fit for a donkey to travel. I go this distance, because there is no suitable place nearer, and the one I use is only a “street chapel.”

Now in starting such a school here we need not hundreds of thousands of dollars to begin with six students, as did the Texas theological seminary last autumn. We need, say, $1,000 gold to put up a new plain building nearer home than the one I am now using, and then an endowment of, say, $5,000 the interest of which would pay the running expenses of the school, not counting the missionary’s salary. Now while our church at home is collecting hundreds of thousands of dollars to further the cause of Christian education in a land already comparatively full of good Christian schools, cannot one or two men or women who have the money give that is so much needed to start a theological school on our mission field? Could there be any better investment of money in an educational enterprise?

We often hear it said, as if it were the only thing that we had to do, that we must pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth laborers into His harvest.

I would not in the least undervalue prayer in any way; but first, we must work for what we pray. “Faith without works is dead,” and what is prayer worth if it be not an expression of faith? Simply to pray for more laborers without making earnest, systematic efforts to secure that for which we pray, is but a lazy, sanctimonious way of shirking heavy, responsible and important work. Second, the Church at home does not and never has, acted on the principle of prayer alone to supply its pulpits. Why should we be expected to act on it here? What we want therefore and what we most urgently need is a little money to start a theological school here and to start it at once. Of course we do not mean a full-fledged seminary, but we must make a beginning. I have taken upon myself the burden of attempting to agitate this matter, not because it is a pleasant task, but because I feel it a duty, because I have had some experience along the line of native workers and can speak from facts and because someone must “raise the question.”

Chinkiang, China, Jan. 3, 1903.

The World.

A Miscarriage of Justice.

While the workings of the legal mind are not always intelligible to the lay mind, we desire to say that the outcome of the trial of Arthur L. Bishop in this city for murder is, in our opinion, a miscarriage of justice. The dead man, Wilson, was awakened out of sleep, at a late hour of the night, by his wife, who told him that a strange man and another woman were in the parlor drinking with Wilson's nineteen-year-old daughter. Wilson found the door locked. When it was opened the woman left at once, and Bishop, under the influence of liquor, stayed after having been ordered out several times, until in the effort to put him out and the scuffle that ensued, Wilson was shot by Bishop. It is doubtful whether Bishop was struck at all with the walking-stick which Wilson carried into the parlor, yet enough doubt for the prisoner to have obtained the benefit of it and to receive the penalty of murder in the second instead of in the first degree. But if ever man had a right to put another out of his house, Wilson was the man. Bishop was a married man, with a bad reputation, had been on a week's debauch, and some of the circumstances that can hardly be printed, even though they may have been unknown to the dead man, should have influenced the jury to give the criminal the full penalty. The burden of proof was upon the defendant to show that it was not murder in the second degree. The jury, however, brought in a verdict of manslaughter, the maximum penalty of which is twenty years imprisonment in the penitentiary, and then Judge Walter H. Neal sentenced him to five years imprisonment. In the face of the epidemic of murder in the Carolinas it would seem that an example of severity was needed rather than of the putting of a premium on such double criminality as Bishop was guilty of. There was a bar-room murder in Hamlet Saturday and another on a public street in Raleigh in which a man was slain because he dared defend the honor of his family. These are the things that encourage lynch-law.

The efficacy of formalin as a cure for blood-poisoning is not yet conceded by the doctors. Some of them say that it is the salt-and-water which has been injected into the veins of the patients on whom the formalin solution has been tried that has done good, and that the formalin used was so much diluted as to be of no consequence. Happily it is not denied that a method of treatment has been discovered which is exceedingly efficacious in some cases of blood-poisoning. The public will not stickle for formalin if salt-and-water will work the cure.—Exchange.

The House has passed and sent to the Senate the general deficiency appropriation bill, the last of the regular budgets. It carried $13,698,781. The only amendment of importance was one appropriating $1,100,000 to replace the stores and storehouse at the Rock Island arsenal, recently destroyed by fire. The bill to amend the railroad safety appliance act was sent to conference and the conferees were instructed, on motion of Mr. Underwood, of Alabama, not to insist upon that portion of the House amendment giving the Inter-State Commerce Commission power to reduce below 50 per cent. the number of cars equipped with patent air brakes.

An incident entirely fragmentary but not without interest is reported to Collier's from the Hawaiian Islands. It is described as a band concert heard over an area of six thousand miles. The leader of the Territorial band, one of the famous musical organizations which have been heard in almost all countries of the world, finding himself unable to visit the islands as thoroughly as he would have liked to do, arranged with the telephone company to place a huge transmitter in the room where one of his concerts was being given and to notify all telephone subscribers throughout the islands that by going to their 'phones at the given hours they could have the benefit of the music. The scheme is stated to have worked out with remarkable success. The leader of the band was Captain H. Berger. Government officials eighty miles from Hilo, where the concert was given, listened to the programme with manifest satisfaction.

"One of the most interesting things which has appeared of late in the domain of electrochemistry," says The Engineering Magazine, "is the fact that it has been found advisable to form a commercial organization for the express purpose of conducting a continuous campaign of scientific research. Thus there has been organized at Niagara Falls a company whose object is not to manufacture anything in particular, but to conduct experimental researches upon a large scale with a view of developing methods and processes in electrochemistry for disposal to operating companies or other purchasers. Already the work of members of the company has developed such results as the method of producing artificial corundum by the fusion of bauxite, and also the process of fixation of atmospheric nitrogen and the production of nitric acid and artificial nitrates, both of which processes are in commercial operations by undertakers, to whom they have been disposed."

The New Orleans Mardi Gras is a season celebrated by Catholics. It gives a brief season of pleasure just before the beginning of the penitential period of Lent. It is a movable feast, being regulated from Easter Sunday, which it precedes by some forty days, and it depends on the new moon, which comes first after the vernal equinox. Mardi Gras, or Shrove Tuesday, is the last day of the Carnival, while Lent commences next day, with Ash Wednesday, Mardi Gras comes in February or March and is celebrated with out door festivities, where the climate is suitable for such diversions.

A measure of great importance to business men and lawyers—and, indeed, to the whole community—is the bill which was signed by the President on February 5, and by which the bankruptcy law of 1898 was materially amended. We observe, in the first place, that by the new law, preferred creditors of a person who soon afterwards becomes a bankrupt are not debarred from having other claims passed upon by a failure to surrender the amount received. In pursuance of a decision of the United States Supreme Court, a preferred creditor may now retain the amount paid, provided, of course, the payment was not fraudulent, while at the same time, as regards debts unpaid, he will share the rights of other creditors. Another important amendment provides that the appointment of a receiver for an insolvent corporation shall be deemed an act of bankruptcy, entitling the creditors to choose their own trustee. Among the objections to a discharge which are included in the new law is the giving of a false mercantile statement, or the proof that a voluntary bankrupt has sought to go through bankruptcy more than once in six years. The bill just enacted also adds to the list of debts from which a bankrupt cannot be relieved by a discharge in bankruptcy. Among these additions are debts to wife and children, and alimony; also any sum due under a judicial decision to a seduced woman or for the support of an illegitimate child. We note, finally, that the list of corporations permitted to go into voluntary bankruptcy will hereafter include mining corporations, and that the fees of referees and trustees are to be increased on an average by about fifty per cent. of the fees hitherto allowed by law.—Harper's Weekly.

The following from the North Carolina State Superintendent of Public Instruction is worthy of careful reading. We agree with Mr. Joyner most heartily, and commend his position before the Legislature:

"The failure to provide this money now would work a hardship to more people than the failure to provide for any appropriation made by the last Legislature. This second $100,000 was appropriated by the Legislature of 1901 for this purpose. It is as binding as any other appropriation made by that Legislature. It affects more vitally the educational interests of the great masses of the people of North Carolina than any other appropriation made by that Legislature. If the other appropriations made by that Legislature are provided for, and some of them have been paid in full to date already, then this appropriation made for the benefit of the little children of North Carolina must be provided for. If there should not be enough money to pay all the appropriations made by the last Legislature then, as State Superintendent of Public Instruction, and a legal representative of the educational interests of the children of the State, I shall insist that all appropriations shall be scaled, and that this appropriation shall be put upon the same footing with all others, and that the same per cent. of this shall be paid; in other words, if we have not money enough to pay all, then I shall insist that all appropriations made by the preceding Legislature shall be pro rated. It would not be fair or just to allow all the deficits or the largest part thereof to fall upon the appropriation for the public schools and the little children. I am confident, however, that this Legislature, composed of many of the State's able, patriotic and just representatives, will see the wisdom and the justice in providing the means to keep the State's pledge to its little children."

M'PHAUL-M'LEAN.—Near Branchville, Robeson county, at residence of Mr. Alex McLean, on Jan. 29th, 1903, by Rev. A. N. Ferguson, Mr. N. A. McPhaul and Miss Ada McLean, all of Robeson county, N. C.

Deaths.

"I am the resurrection and the Life."

DAVIS.—On the morning of January 6th, 1903, the spirit of Mrs. Dorcas Anna Davis was borne aloft to its heavenly mansion, after an illness of eight days from pneumonia, in the 53rd year of her age.

She was the wife of Capt. James M. Davis, and the daughter of Mr. Lafayette and Mrs. Margaret Alexander.

Mrs. Davis gave to her husband thirty-two years of happy married life, for she was an affectionate and helpful wife, always cheerful and hopeful. She was the mother of six daughters and one son, who survive her, and of four children, who are with her in heaven. She was devoted to her home and to her children who had never ceased to look to her for counsel and help; and "her husband did safely trust in her. She looked well to the ways of her household, and ate not the bread of idleness. Her children arise up and call her blessed: her husband also, and he praiseth her."

She was not only a joy and comfort in her home, but her cheering presence and cordial ways were alike felt and appreciated in the house of God, which she never failed to attend, unless providentially hindered, bringing to it the sunshine of her love, and a heart full of devotion to her God. She was an active and useful member of Sugar Creek Church, and was always ready and forward to aid in any effort for the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom.

The Ladies' Missionary and Aid Societies will greatly miss her presence, counsel, and help. Many a poor and needy person will surely recall her prompt and generous response to their cry of distress. Indeed a good woman has gone to her reward.

To human eyes her place will be hard to fill.

But with eyes bedimmed and hearts risen, let all bow in humble submission to the will of God, who causes all things to work together for good to them that love Him.

She was laid away to rest in Sugar Creek cemetery, and her grave was covered with a rich profusion of beautiful flowers, while a large concourse of sympathizing friends from town and country looked on with sad hearts, and ne'er spoke a word.

T. J. Allison, Pastor.

MORRISON.—At her home near Branchville, in Robeson county, on the 25th Dec. 1902, Miss Margaret Morrison, after a very brief illness, departed this life, aged 65 years. She was for many years a faithful and devoted member of the Presbyterian Church. On the Sabbath previous to her death, she was in her place in the sanctuary, and being at communion service, she was privileged for the last time on earth sit down at her Lord's table and commemorate His dying love. She was one of the Lord's noble ones, "an Israelite indeed in whom was no guile." She ever showed herself a friend indeed, in that she was a friend in need. She will be sadly missed in the family circle, and in the church, and community.

"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

After the brief space of only about two weeks the subject of the above notice was followed by her sister, Mrs. Geo. C. Fisher in the 55th year of her age. She, like her sister, who preceded her, had been for many years a consistent member of the Presbyterian Church and a devoted disciple of her Lord.

For thirty odd years she was the beloved wife and help-meet of her husband and though for most part of these years she was more or less an invalid; yet she lived to rear six children, and to have the joy of seeing them all come into full communion with the church to which she belonged. To them and to the bereaved husband she has left a rich legacy, in the good name she bore, and the noble character she sustained. She manifested the spirit of her Saviour, in that she was meek and lowly in heart, and so of a most amiable disposition. In her long affliction which was at times attended by acute suffering, she recognized the hand of a loving Father and with the Psalmist could say "I know O Lord that thy judgments are right, and that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me." And we doubt not that the afflictions thus endured, are now working out for her a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

JOHNSON.—At Hope Mills, No. 1, Jan. 15, 1903, Bertha May, three-year-old child of Mr. and Mrs. Neill Johnson and great-grand child of the late Rev. J. P. McPherson.

One link more to bind the sorrowing parents to the heavenly world.

MORGAN.—At Hope Mills, No. 3, Jan. 20, 1903, Mrs. Henry Morgan. She was a member of Hope Mills Church.

May God sanctify this sad providence to the good of the aged father, stricken husband, sorrowing brothers and sisters and four motherless children.

M'DONALD.—At the old home in Cumberland county, N. C., sixty-nine years of age, Miss Christian McDonald quietly fell asleep in Jesus Monday morning, Feb. 2, 1903.

The summons came suddenly, but found her ready.

She was the daughter of the late Mr. John McDonald, for many years a ruling elder in Big Rockfish Church and superintendent of the Sunday-school.

She was dedicated to God by Christian parents in infancy, named Christian, and for a half century or more lived a consistent Christian life as a member of the church in which her youngest brother, Mr. Lauchlin McDonald, now wears his father's mantle.

He, Rev. Angus McDonald, D. D., of Nashville, Tenn., another younger brother, and Mrs. McEachern of Laurinburg, N. C., an older sister, are the only surviving members of the large McDonald family so well known and loved in this section.

It is their privilege and that of the other numerous relatives and friends of our departed sister to "sorrow not, even as others which have no hope.

For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." Hers was a beautiful, well rounded Christian life in every sphere of contact with her fellowmen.

She will be missed—sadly missed in the community in the church, in the Sunday-school, but especially by her brother and family where her presence was a continual benediction.

It was not the privilege of the writer to have been personally acquainted with her very long; but long enough to know that in her he had a true friend and great helper in his work. He was encouraged by the warm grasp of her hand and her kind appreciation of his efforts to tell the old story. When able, Miss Christian was always at church and in the Sunday-school; an attentive listener, a devout worshipper, and earnest, faithful teacher. Saturday before her departure Monday, she was hoping to be strong enough to attend church next day. The Lord did not permit this privilege; but was otherwise preparing her for "the home not made with hands, eternal in the heaven." "And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them."

"She being dead yet speaketh," saying to us all: "Therefore be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh."

The Household.

Two Rules for Making Chocolate.

During cold weather a good cup of chocolate is more welcome. The two following rules, first-hand from first-class chefs, are both delicious and "hard to beat." What is called "Maillard's style" for richness and delicacy cannot be excelled. Stir together in a saucepan one cupful of grated chocolate, two-thirds of a cupful of sugar, a good pinch of salt, and one cupful of boiling water; then, after stirring smoothly, add another cupful of boiling water and a cupful of boiling milk. Boil one minute only. Dissolve one teaspoonful of corn starch in half a cupful of cold milk, and stir in, boil one minute longer, and remove from the fire. Add one teaspoonful of vanilla flavor, and it is ready to serve. The salt, the vanilla, and the corn starch add greatly to its richness.

Another way is to enrich it with an egg, which also increases the amount of nutriment. Chocolate in any form is flesh-creating, and should be avoided unless one wishes to increase his avoirdupois. Allow a large spoonful of grated chocolate to each person. Pour over boiling milk, slowly, and stir till it thickens; then add milk enough to cool it, and stir in a well-beaten egg, and sugar to the taste. Then add milk, or milk water, till the quantity is sufficient. Simmer, not boil, for ten minutes, then add vanilla flavor. For either of these rules, whipped cream is a necessary addition in serving. It is little trouble, a great improvement, and half a pint of cream goes a long way. A milk-boiler is the proper vessel to make chocolate in. Often invalids, who cannot retain tea or coffee, readily digest these.

Some consider it an improvement to add some clear strong coffee to the pot of chocolate, just before serving.—Mrs. Abbie M. Worstell, in New York Observer.

You Should Bear in Mind.

That a pound of lean beef and a quart of milk contain about the same amount of nourishment, but the meat, although it costs more, is more valuable for food, as it contains the nutrients in more suitable proportion.

That the popular notion that "fish is a brain food" is a mistake, for eminent physiologists tell us that fish no more than any other nitrogenous food contributes to brain growth and development. All nitrogenous foods, such as fish, meat, eggs, and so on, repair the waste tissues of the body, but fish is of no more importance than the others.

That ham has a much better flavor if it is boiled for one hour and then baked two hours, with brown sugar sprinkled over it for the last fifteen minutes.

That hollowed out apples or beets make artistic and pretty cups to hold salad.

That four or five ounces of sugar is all that an adult in good health should eat with impunity in the course of a day.

That corn meal is an excellent food for winter, as it contains so much fat, and when eggs and milk are added to it, it has a high nutritive value.

That fruit, to be appetizing and luscious, should be kept in a cool, dry place and not on ice.

That a very pleasing addition to the ordinary nut cake is a cup of raisins.

That the use of a thermometer on the oven of a practical woman is an assurance of success in baking.

That baking powder biscuits require much more heat than bread; 440 degrees Fahrenheit is right for biscuit, while a temperature of 380 degrees is better for bread.

That sour milk and soda make a more delicate devil's food cake than the sweet milk and baking powder.

That the success of whipped cream depends upon the fact that the dish, the beater and the cream are thoroughly chilled in advance.

That jelly keeps much better if hot paraffine is poured over each tumbler than when covered with paper.

That although "hunger is the best sauce," a daintily garnished dish is the next best.

That cream sauce is very much improved by a thorough beating.

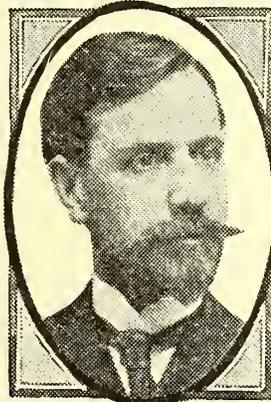

That potato salad is much more savory if mixed with the salad dressing while hot.

That white grapes, asparagus tips and English walnuts with whipped cream dressing, make a novel and dainty salad.

That there is more need of common sense in culinary science than is ordinarily supposed, because we cannot become a strong people mentally unless our physical beings are well nourished.—What to Eat.

Catarrh Can be Cured.

Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure has cured More People of Catarrh than any Other Remedy.

This is the only remedy that goes directly to the diseased parts and cures Catarrh, Bronchitis, Deafness and Asthma, without burdening the system by taking into the stomach medicine which deranges the digestion and breaks down the general health.

Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure is a vegetable compound to be smoked in a pipe. The medicated smoke is inhaled into the head, nose, throat and lungs, reaching every affected spot, giving speedy relief and effecting a permanent cure.

Rev. G. E. Parsons, Groveton, Tex., writes: "I am cured of one of the worst cases of catarrh." Mr. Wm. H. Burton, Glenloch, Tenn., writes: "Your Catarrh Cure is a God-send to catarrh sufferers." Mr. J. P. Hill, Seffner, Fla., writes: "Yours is the only effectual catarrh and asthma cure on the market."

This remedy is put up in tin boxes containing a month's treatment, which will be sent by mail to any part of the United States or Canada for $1.00.

Trial samples will be mailed free to persons desiring to test the remedy. Address, Dr. Blosser Company, 355 Walton St., Atlanta, Ga.

Ovarian Tumor Cured by Anointing with Oils.

Another letter from the Rev. S. W. Jones, of Pittsburg, Texas.

Pittsburg, Texas, Feb. 3, 1899.

Dr. D. M. Bye Co., Indianapolis, Ind.:

Dear Doctor Bye—It has been some time since we wrote and I thought I would write you a few lines to let you hear from us. This leaves wife in fine condition. She goes where she pleases and is still improving in health and flesh. Glad to have to say to you that she is permanently cured of the tumor. We are still receiving letters of inquiry. Persons that have written to us some months past, now write to me asking what we think of Dr. Bye's treatment now, and if we think she is permanently cured. Dear Dr. Bye, we feel under many obligations to you for wife's recovery from what we thought was certain death. May God bless you continuously in your labor of love.

Yours truly,

S. W. Jones.

A Valuable Gift.

Parents, guardians, friends and relatives could not present one with a more valuable gift than a scholarship in one of Draughon's Business Colleges located at Nashville, St. Louis, Atlanta, Montgomery, Shreveport, Galveston, Little Rock and Fort Worth. A gift of this kind is something which one can not steal, fires burn or floods wash away. Such a gift costs but little in comparison with its real value and will be a stepping stone—a firm foundation whereon one may build a successful career. ## The Home Circle.

The Jerusalem Chamber as Seen by Dr. W. W. Moore.

(Selections from the Children's Friend.)

The two parts of Westminster Abbey connected with the work of the Assembly are at the two opposite ends of the building: the Chapel of Henry VII, at the eastern end, and the Jerusalem Chamber at the western; the one the most beautiful chapel in the world, the other a plain but comfortable rectangular room. Immediately after the service with which the Assembly was opened, and in which both houses of Parliament took part, and which was probably held in the choir of the Abbey, where the regular daily services now take place, the members appointed to the Assembly ascended the steps to the Chapel of Henry VII, and there the enrollment was made and the earlier sessions held. That was in summer, but when the weather became colder the Assembly gladly forsook the architectural magnificence of this chapel, called by Leland "the miracle of the world," for the comfortable warmth of the homely room at the other end of the Abbey; for, as Robert Baillie, "the Boswell of the Assembly," says in his delightful account of the proceedings, the Jerusalem Chamber "has a good fyre, which is some dainties at London."

In this removal of the historic Assembly from the cold splendor of the finest perpendicular building in England to the plain comfort and common-sense arrangements of the little rectangular room where they were to reason together through so many months concerning the teachings of Scripture, one may see a parable of the Assembly's action in rejecting the ritualistic type of worship with its predominating appeal to the aesthetic sensibilities through elaborate ceremonies, and its adoption of the New Testament type with its predominating appeal to the mind through the oral teaching of truth. They were convinced that the spiritual life can be really nourished and developed only by the intelligent apprehension of the truth. Their own statement of the matter, drawn up in this very room, is that "the Spirit of God maketh the reading, but especially the preaching of the word, an effectual means of convincing and converting sinners, and of building them up in holiness and comfort, through faith unto salvation." And so those churches which have adopted the standards then framed by the Westminster divines have steadily magnified the didactic element of public worship, accentuating the teaching function of the minister to the extinction of the priestly.

We pass from the nave of the Abbey through a door on the south side into the ancient cloisters, and, turning to the right, ring at the door of the janitor. A cherry-cheeked woman appears, and when we state that we wish to see the Jerusalem Chamber, she brings a key, turns with us again to the right, which brings us to the southwest corner of the Abbey, and ushers us through an ante-room into the celebrated meeting place of the great Assembly, a rectangular room, running north and south, about forty feet in length by twenty in breadth, with a large double window in the western side opposite the spacious fire place referred to by Baillie, and another fine window in the northern end, which, by the way, contains the finest stained glass in the whole Abbey.

A long table, covered with a plain green cloth, occupies the center of the room, with chairs around it ready for convocation; for the room is still regularly used for the meetings of ecclesiastical functionaries, occasionally also for special gatherings of wider interest, the most notable of which, since the Westminster Assembly, was the series of sessions held here by the company of scholars who had been appointed to revise the common English version of the Scriptures, and who, in 1885, brought that immensely difficult and important work to a successful conclusion by their publication of the Revised Version of the Old Testament.

The Jerusalem chamber was built about five hundred years ago, in the old days of monastery, as a guest chamber for the Abbot's house. I may pause here a moment to remind my younger readers of the fact that the word "minster," as in "Westminster," is equivalent to monastery, from the Latin monasterium, and the still more curious fact that the word has been preserved more nearly in its Latin form in the Monster Tavern and the Monster Omnibuses, well known in the immediate neighborhood of the Abbey, which derive their name from the same ancient monastery now known as Westminster.

The name, Jerusalem Chamber, seems to have been derived from the tapestries with which the walls were originally hung, and which portrayed different scenes in the history of Jerusalem. Before the meeting of the Westminster Assembly, however, these had been replaced by another series of pictures representing the planets, and it is to these that Baillie refers when he tells us that the room was "well-hung." To the same keen observer, whom nothing escaped, we are indebted for the information that the light from the great window was softened by "curtains of pale thread with red roses." But the curtains and tapestries that Baillie saw have in turn given place to those which the visitor now sees on the walls, and which do not call for special notice here. The first tapestries, however, those which gave the room its name, are connected with one of the most memorable events that ever occurred in this historic apartment, the death of Henry IV. in fulfillment, as the King thought of the prophecy that he should die in Jerusalem. In his old age Henry projected a visit to the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, by way of penance for his usurpation, and when the galleys were already in port to bear him on his journey, he came to pay his parting devotions at the shrine of Edward the Confessor in Westminster Abbey. There he was seized with a chill and as the old chronicler says, "became so sick that such as were about him feared that he would have died right there; wherefore they, for his comfort, bare him into the Abbot's place, and lodged him in a chamber, and there upon a pallet laid him before the fire, where he lay in great agony a certain time." When borne to the bed, which had meantime been prepared for him in another room, the scene occurred which is so graphically described by Shakespeare:

"King Henry—Doth any name particular belong Unto the lodging where I first did swoon?"

Wrawick—'Tis call'd Jerusalem, my noble lord.

King Henry.—Laud be to God!—even there my life must end,

It hath been prophesied to me many years I should not die but in Jerusalem:

Which vainly I supposed the Holy Land: But bear me to that chamber; there I'll lie;

In that Jerusalem shall Harry die."

But Henry IV. was not the only man who looked death in the face in this room. Many years later, when Henry VIII. was just beginning that infamous career of divorcing and beheading wives, and burning Protestants as heretics, and hanging Romanists as traitors for saying that the Pope was superior to the King in matters of religion—a career which has made his name one of the most detestable in history—Sir Thomas More, the noblest Englishman of his time, was arrested for his refusal to swear that Henry's marriage with Anne Boleyn was lawful, and on his way to the Tower of London was confined for four days in the Jerusalem Chamber. Shortly afterwards, under the act of Parliament which directed that every one who refused to give the King a title belonging to him was to be put to death as traitor, Sir Thomas More was executed on Tower Hill because he could not honestly give Henry the title of Supreme Head of the Church of England.

Other dead bodies, too, besides that of Henry IV. have lain in this room. The body of Dr. South, the witty and eloquent court preacher, lay in state here. It was South, who when reading from the seventeenth chapter of the Acts the accusation of the Thessalonian mob against Paul and Silas—"These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also"—remarked that it was well for the apostles to turn the world upside down, because the devil had turned it downside up.

From the Jerusalem Chamber the body of the illustrious essayist, Joseph Addison, after lying in state for four days, was carried forth in that memorable funeral procession at dead of night which was led by torch-light round the shrine of St. Edward and the graves of the Plantagenets to the Chapel of Henry VIII, the body being finally laid to rest opposite the Poet's Corner in the South Transept. "Such a mark of national respect was due to the unsullied statesman, to the accomplished scholar, to the master of pure English eloquence, to the consummate painter of life and manners. It was due, above all, to the great satirist, who alone knew how to use ridicule without abusing it; who, without inflicting a wound, effected a great social reform, and who reconciled wit and virtue, after a long and disastrous separation, during which wit had been led astray by profligacy, and virtue by fanaticism." So wrote Lord Macaulay of Addison, reminding us at the same time how Addison "was accustomed to walk by himself in Westminster Abbey, and meditate on the condition of those who lay in it"; and now Macaulay himself lies there close to the grave of Addison.

But the most illustrious man whose body has ever lain in state in the Jerusalem Chamber is Sir Isaac Newton, the great philosopher, whom his friends called "the whitest soul they had ever known," and of whom Pope wrote the celebrated couplet:

"Nature and nature's laws lay hid in night;

God said, Let Newton be, and all was light."

Such are some of the great names associated with the Jerusalem Chamber—Henry IV., Thomas More, Robert South, Joseph Addison, Isaac Newton—and to some of them the whole world is indebted, as to Sir Thomas More for his calm refusal to purchase his life at the cost of his convictions, and to Joseph Addison for all that he was as an author, a man, and a Christian, and to Sir Isaac Newton for his lofty character and his unparalleled service to the cause of human knowledge; but after all it may be doubted whether the world is more deeply indebted to any of them than to that body of thorough-going scholars and profound thinkers who in this room two centuries and a half ago formulated the statement that "effectual calling is the work of God's Spirit, whereby, convincing us of our sin and misery, enlightening our minds in the knowledge of Christ, and renewing our wills, he doth persuade and enable us to embrace Jesus Christ, freely offered to us in the gospel"—and one hundred and six other propositions concerning the most momentous interest of human existence which for luminous condensation of truth have never been surpassed in all the history of the human expression of the doctrines of Scripture.

To Conquer Pain.

As every physician will testify, pain is greatly intensified by the imagination, and half of our suffering would be obviated if we had no previous knowledge of the curious sensation which we have called by that name.

"I am teaching my baby not to know that there is such a thing as pain," said a young mother brightly and confidently. "If he hurts himself and puckers up his face to cry, we laugh at him. And then he will laugh, too, even though I know the place must be smarting."

Of course, such education has its obvious limitation, but there is a great deal in the theory, nevertheless. If a baby were commiserated with instead of laughed at, he would undoubtedly cry lustily. A fine, healthy setter dog would come back torn and bleeding, but uproariously happy after a successful canine fight, but could be made to howl with anguish by his owner when he had no physical ill whatever, simply by the latter adopting a commiserating tone, and pitying him for imaginary woes.

"Oh, the poor foot!" his mistress would say. "How did Jowler hurt it?" And the dog would lift up his paw, look at it mournfully, and if the sympathy were continued would commence to lick it and moan and whine as if he were in the greatest suffering, believing evidently that he felt all the pain that he imagined he was feeling.

The suffering that we dread at a dentist's would be a mere nothing if it came accidentally and without forethought. Why should we not therefore consider pain as simply a peculiar sensation, and, unless particularly severe, as not involving suffering?—New York Tribune.

A First Sight of One's Mother.

A minister living in an Indiana village received a call once from a parishioner:—

"Will you go to Indianapolis for me?" he asked. "We have decided to send Johnnie there for an operation. We have received encouragement that he might yet be made to see."

Johnnie had been born without sight, and now, a little lad of six, bright and sunny, and hardly realizing that he lacked anything to make life happy, he was facing a future of darkness, little hope having till now been given to his parents that anything could be done for his eyes.

"Go with my wife and Johnnie," said the father. "I cannot go: I dare not go. But stay with her till it is over, and either rejoice with us or comfort us, and send me word as fast as the lightning can fetch it."

The minister went and stayed with the lad. The oculist, not over confident, began his work and persevered till, with a thrill of triumph in his tone, he said.

"That boy will see."

The glad wire tingled with the message to the father. The minister, with the overjoyed mother, retired to wait for the time when the bandaged eyes could bear light enough for a first look at the beautiful world.

At last came the notification of the expected test. In the dimly-lighted room the mother and the minister stood breathless, while the doctor carefully raised the shade. The little lad, overwhelmed by the sudden possession of a new sense, cast a bewildered look from one to another of the three.

"Johnnie," said the minister, "this is your mother." The little arms went up and clasped her neck, the happy boy verifying his new sense by those already tested. Caressing the loving face he saw leaning above him, he cried, "O mother! Is this really you, or is it heaven?"

It was indeed like a glimpse into heaven.

"I felt," said the minister, "as if I witnessed something of the glad bewilderment of a newly translated soul in its first sight of the face of our Heavenly Father."—Youth's Companion.

Our Young People.

Harold Mason's Reward.

"I want Harold to spend the summer with father," declared Mr. Mason, the foremost lawyer in the thriving city of Lincoln, one morning at the breakfast table. "I had planned to send him to Dirigo Camp, in Maine, for a couple of months but the more I think of it, the more I am convinced he needs a summer at Richmond, on the farm. They may be better boy-trainers than father," recalling his own youthful experiences, "but for my part I doubt it—the Spartans even not being excepted."

"I think, myself, that a summer on the farm, with his grandfather to direct him, would be of greater benefit to Harold than two months in the Maine woods, delightful and instructive as such an outing would be," said Mrs. Mason, as she handed her husband a second cup of fragrant coffee.

"There are a great many things Harold needs to learn," continued Mr. Mason, thoughtfully, "but above everything else he lacks perseverance—'stick-to-it-iveness' father used to call it, and I'd trust him to inculcate it in a boy sooner than anyone else I know."

So, three weeks later, Harold found himself on the small platform of the unpretentious railroad station at Richmond, greeting his grandfather.

The following morning Harold's grandfather took him over to Buxton. Here Mr. Mason found a market for his annual crop of wool. On the way back he drove up to a hardware store. Hitching his horse, he said, mysteriously:—

"Let's go in and see what they have for hoes, Harold. I made a bargain with you, before you came and haven't even consulted with you on the matter; rather a one-sided affair," and his eyes twinkled as he spoke.

"If you've made it, it's all right! I'm ready to become a silent partner without questioning!"

"It isn't a partnership," declared Mr. Mason, still more mysteriously. "It's a but-one-member-of-the-firm company, and you're the company. Your stock in trade is a potato-patch, hoe, and perseverance."

"The potato patch you have; I've donated it. The hoe we'll get in here, and the perseverance, if you haven't all that's required already can be cultivated along with the potatoes."

"I guess that will suit," decided Mr. Mason, after Harold had tried a number of hoes of different sizes. "If one is to accomplish all that is possible, one must have the most convenient tools to work with."

All the while Harold was in perplexity as to his grandfather's plan.

"It's this way," explained Mr. Mason, as he unhitched his horse. "You want a delightful summer—lots of fun and that sort of thing—but that isn't all you want, You want a profitable one as well."

"The last time you were on a visit I noticed how small your arms were; what you need is muscle! Now my plan is this: I have a new piece of land that was never ploughed before this spring, planted to potatoes. With proper care a big crop can be raised. They're all up, ready to begin hoeing on next week. A third of an acre I've set aside for you. Now, it will take a good deal of time, a good many backaches, and some sacrifice, but you can take care of the patch and have all the profits in September. What do you say?"

"It's a bargain! I'm already the but-one-member-of-the-firm company, only I guess you'll have to squeeze into the company just enough to give advice."

"That I'll be glad to do. You do the hoeing, keep the plants free from bugs dig your potatoes in September, and I'll buy them of you, and pay you the regular market price."

"My! how his back ached before the rows were hoed! Then the wheelbarrow loads of water he had to trundle to the field, with which to mix his Paris green for destroying the potato bugs!

At last the first hoeing was over, and Harold took a breathing spell, but it was of short duration, for the first rows gone over were again ready for the second hoeing.

At last September arrived, and Harold harvested his crop. All but the last row was dug. "I shall be glad when it's over," and Harold drew a deep sigh.

The row was finished, with the exception of three hills. "I guess I'll leave those," and Harold leaned hesitatingly on his hoe handle. "No; I'll make a clean job of it," resolutely. "That's what grandfather'd do," and the young farmer continued his digging when, in the last hill, what had his hoe struck? He stopped to pick it up. It was a small, old-fashioned purse!

He opened it excitedly. Within lay a ten-dollar gold piece. Beside it was a bit of paper which read: "From grandfather and grandmother—a reward for perseverance!"

His grandfather had placed it there that morning, and was now watching Harold from the road.

"That isn't the only reward I've got for my summer's work," said Harold, triumphantly, the day he returned to Lincoln. "See the muscle I've gained."

"That and the other thing you've acquired are worth vastly more than the money," said Mr. Mason.

"The other thing?" inquired Harold, curiously.

"Stick-to-it-tive-ness!" said his father. —The Morning Star.

The Prince and the Liberty Bell.

It is recalled with interest that the recovery of the famous Liberty Bell from the dust and rubbish of an attic was due to a remark made by the Prince of Wales, now Edward VII.

When the Prince—so the story runs—was in Philadelphia, in 1860, he took great interest in the relics of the revolutionary period, although his visit to Independence Hall was projected purely in a spirit of mischief by his entertainers.

In rummaging in the garret, the party discovered the old, cracked bell, which had been somewhat contemptuously hidden away, and this, more than any other

A TRAIN FOR MILLIONAIRES

Is to Run Between Chicago and Florida Resorts.

Chicago, November 21—Chicago is to have a millionaire's train between this city, Jacksonville and other Florida resorts, which will be as fine in equipment and as fast in time as the famous train running over the Atlantic Coast Line from New York to Florida points. The new train will be placed in service by the East Illinois soon after the first of the year, and will make the trip from here to Jacksonville in thirty hours, instead of thirty-one, as heretofore.

All the equipment to be used is to be new and is now in course of construction by the Pullman Company. The cost of the necessary equipment will be between $700,000 and $1,000,000.

This elegant new train from the West will be operated via Evansville, Nashville, Albany and the Atlantic Coast Line to Jacksonville, thence to St. Augustine, Fla.

It will be seen that the Atlantic Coast Line will maintain its reputation for perfect passenger service from the West as well as from the East.

relic, seemed to fascinate the Prince, whose words have been thus reported:

"This old bell is the greatest relic this republic has to-day. Instead of being here, covered with this accumulated dirt, it should occupy the chief place in this Hall of Independence. It is to you what the Magna Charta is to England. It is cracked, but it is an inspiration. Believe me, my friends, it affects me more than anything I have been shown."

The good sense of this suggestion appealed immediately to the pride and sensibility of the custodians of the relics, and from that moment the Liberty Bell took its "chief place in the Hall of Independence," which it left only for a few months' public exhibition to the World's Fair in Chicago—and recently at the Charleston Exposition. It is strange that a rebuke for the neglect by Americans of a symbol of their liberty should have come from an English prince and the direct descendant of the monarch who endeavored to deprive us of that liberty.—Youth's Companion.

A Dictionary Game.

We call it our Dictionary Game, and so far as we know it is original with us. The requisites are pencils, paper and a dictionary. Number one takes the dictionary, opens at any page and gives out a word for definition. The others are to write their definition of the word given on slips of paper in ten or fifteen words. At a given signal these are put into a box or hat and each player draws one and reads it aloud. The holder of the dictionary decides on the one which approaches nearest in accuracy and conciseness to the definition given in the dictionary. The author thereupon announces himself. Score may be kept in any way desirable. The dictionary then is passed to the winner and the game proceeds.

The amusement and interest can hardly be estimated without a trial. One can alternate common words with words of unknown meaning. It is surprising how difficult it is to define briefly even the most ordinary objects. If prizes are given it will add to the interest of the game.—G. P. B.—Home Journal.

In a Prairie Freshet. - A True Story.

By Sydney Dayre, in The Presbyterian Journal.

"Surely you're not going out, when it looks so stormy?" asked father.

"Why, of course, father, I must."

"I don't believe anybody else will be there," said mother, with an uneasy glance at the clouds.

"O yes, there will be. Not many, but some of my little chicks are too brave to stay at home."

"The creek will be high. Up to the bridge, likely. It poured and rained all night," her father added.

"That will not keep them at home, though," replied his daughter, and then the cheery, hard-working school-mistress said good-by, and set out on her muddy walk along the prairie road. The cheeriness faded a little from her eyes as she went on, for in her heart lay a small shadow, cast by unfulfilled longings and ambitions. She was unconscious of the mud, and of the picking of her way from one side to the other, in the absorption of her mind in one prevailing thought.

"O dear, I should like to go East."

"East meant so much in the way of opportunity for growing, widening, improving. As often before she sighed it to herself for want of some one else to whom she could sigh it. Never to father or mother, for they were growing old, and needed her. Not to the neighbors, for the dwellers on the prairie farms, far from town or railroad, did not sympathize with any such ambition, and probably would have been shocked at her indulging it.

Janet Wells had formed a warm friendship with the lady who for two or three years had taught the township school, making the Wells's home her own. Since then Janet had read all she could find to read, had subscribed for a magazine, and besides, had been sent away for a year or two to a school in the nearest town, where she had made enthusiastic use of all the privileges within her reach.

Returning home, she had herself been appointed teacher for the district. A great rise, so the neighbors said, and so, with pride and delight, thought her parents. For a time Janet was satisfied, but the longing revived for something beyond—something greater and better.

Her mind was swiftly recalled from day-dreams to stern realities as she reached the creek. The first sight of its swift, turbid waters brought back her mother's foreboding.

"It's really not so bad as I thought. If I had time, and it was not so muddy, I'd run back and tell mother. But I must not keep the children waiting. If the weather looks threatening I believe I'll dismiss them early."

Her way led for a little distance along the stream, as she came near the school-house, set close to the bank on a bend, around which the water hurried with a babbling and boiling delightful to a dozen or so children who played on its brink. The boys were bare-legged, wading into the shallow water, which, in one low place, had already overflowed the bank, while the girls threw in sticks to watch them toss and whirl until they disappeared under the bridge.

"You here, Kitty! Why, I thought such a little one would stay at home today. Come out of the water, boys."

"Well, there are not many of us here," gazing with a smile on the gathering on the benches, "but more, I believe, than I thought would come. Thirteen of you. A brave baker's dozen. Now for lessons."

The school-work went busily on, notwithstanding an occasional anxious glance of the young teacher's eyes at the clouds, as an increasing shadow darkened the room, so slowly as to be at first scarcely noticeable. She went at length to the door to take a glance outside.

The rains farther up the creek, which wound through an undulating country, must have been more severe, for even during the time in which they had been in the school-house a change had taken place in their surroundings. A little above the slightly built school-house was a place in the bank somewhat lower than the ground on which the little building stood. As the young girl considered this, the oldest of the small boys, two or three of whom, recognizing the fact that this was a day of lax discipline, had followed her, pointed up stream.

"The water's spilling out there."

"See—makin' a little bit of a creek this side."

Janet saw the slight ripple over the bank taking a direction behind the house, which, in time, would cut off the building from the surrounding ground, and inwardly determined to have no afternoon session.

"Run in, run in," she called, as rain began to fall, and the laughing youngsters scampered to shelter.

The rain continued, but not so heavy as to cause alarm. Quiet again fell on the small students, to be followed by a rush and a roar which brought all to their feet with scared, wondering faces.

"Back, back, all of you," cried Janet, as a frightened little group crowded near her at the door. The small porch, on which some of them would have set heedless feet, was breaking away, parting with a crash and a splash. And all about them was water, rushing, foaming, raging with all the violence created by a cloudburst a few miles higher up. The bank above had given way, and a new torrent whirled and foamed along the back of the house. Under them, too, the strong current was busy with the foundations, and already the frail building rocked and trembled.

"What shall I do?" was the cry in Janet's heart. Thirteen little ones crowded about her with wide-open eyes and lips quivering with fear. Were these innocent little lives indeed in peril? There was no help near. Either she must be equal to this most-undreamed-of occasion, or they would be helpless in the threatened catastrophe.

With hasty, reassuring words she put them from her. "Polly, Jack, all of you—you must do exactly what I say, so that I can get you out of this. For I'm going to—mind. Polly and Tom, you are the oldest: you show the others how to wait, while I take Kitty first—"

Seizing the smallest child, she stepped out of the door—to find the water up to her waist. Land was twenty feet away—twenty feet of boiling, rushing water, but not for one moment did the young teacher give up the determination to bring to safety those entrusted to her care.

But she had miscalculated her strength and that of the foe against whom she strove. Whirled about, swept along, buffeted, she fought her way, sometimes nearly off her feet, her heart straining in wild supplication for the help which did not fail, so that, with what seemed her last possible effort, she grasped the limb of a tree and found her footing.

"Now, Kitty," she gasped, setting the dripping child on firm ground, "run, run as fast as you can to Mr. Wade's, and tell him to come and help us. Run, Kitty!"

Janet's idea had been to bring each of her charges to safety in the same way. But now, with a despairing heart, she realized the impossibility of it. Her strength seemed gone. It would be all she could do to get back to them. This she must do—share their peril, to die with them if need be.

The straining eyes swept the horizon in search of help, of which there was slight hope. The sodden earth and pouring rain kept within doors the few neighbors in the thinly-settled country.

But—was here an unlooked-for chance of help? New hope sprang to her heart at the sight of an old horse, at some little distance, along the bank, patiently awaiting the movements of two of her young pupils whom he had brought to school.

Quickly making her way to the horse, she seized the stout rope by which he was tied to a tree, loosed him and led him to the bank of the now-rapidly-deepening water. Calculating her point nearest the school-house, she again plunged into the torrent, leading the horse.

"Courage now—good old Sawdust. Get up—in with you," she called, peremptorily shouting her orders, as the frightened animal at first resisted a little.

"Come on, good old fellow—no, boys, stay where you are—." She was distracted between her efforts with the horse and her fear that some of the excited and clamoring children might venture into the water.

Higher and swifter it rose, sweeping on with a force which the girl desperately strove to stem, a creaking and rending mingled with the roar of the angry flood, sending a new terror to heart. She dragged the horse to the corner of the building, and tied the rope to one of the foundation timbers. Loosened from its foundations, the school was already rocking and whirling before the new onset.

"Now, Sawdust—get up—get up—."

Heading the horse a little down stream until the rope was drawn taut, Janet rejoiced to see that the building readily moved after him. But the creaking and splintering behind her told of the impending collapse, and still with loud cries she urged him on.

It was short work. The moment in which the tottering building touched the opposite bank there came a scramble of scared morsels of children, some in Janet's own brave arms, some leaping to the ground. None too soon, for, as the schoolhouse swayed and was again driven on the bank, the second shock proved too much for it, and, in the moment in which she untied Sawdust, with a final crash it went down, and whirled on, a shapeless mass of time-worn timber.

Janet could have cried as she followed the last child to safe footing. But every one of the thirteen was ready to do exactly the same, and that would never do. So she only leaned against the horse for a few moments to rest her trembling limbs, murmuring:

"Poor old Sawdust! You never can know what you have done."

Janet still cherishes a desire to go East, but not a harrassing or insistent one. For, when the longing seizes her, she sometimes whispers to herself: "If I had gone East I might never have had the opportunity of saving thirteen lives."—"East and West."

Another Appreciation of the Aetna.

J. D. BUSHALL, Esq., Manager Aetna Life Insurance Co., Raleigh, N. C.

Dear Sir:—After a careful comparison of policies submitted to me by the Aetna Life, Bankers' Life of New York, Equitable of New York, Northwestern, New York Life and Prudential, I have accepted $10,000 in the Aetna on the 20-payment life plan, with option of 25 year 3 per cent. Gold Bond Contract.

I have been a policy-holder in the Aetna for nearly eight years, and therefore feel somewhat prepared to judge of its merits from actual results. With all due deference to other companies, it affords me great pleasure to say that in my opinion the Aetna cannot be surpassed for plain and liberal contracts, and for just, conservative and economical management. I now have $12,000 in the Aetna. My partner, Mr. W. W. Carlyle, has $16,000 and one of our clerks, Mr. John T. Biggs, has $2,000, nearly all of which was written and delivered by your special agent, Mr. H. T. Spears.

Wishing you and the grand old Aetna continued success, I am,

Yours very truly,

Children's Letters.

Raeford, N. C., Feb. 16th.

Dear Standard:

I haven't written before and I thought I would write. My teacher's name is Miss Mary Watson. I got 100 in spelling. We have about seventy fat hens; they lay a lot of eggs. I have a brother at Davidson College. He is going to be a preacher. He came home Christmas. I am one of the Cheerful Workers. My bramah rooster is big as a turkey. He got in a fight and got his wing broke. I had fifty cents in my mite box.

Age 9. James Gillespie Dickson.

Raeford, N. C., Feb. 15, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I will write you a letter as I have not wrote in a year and tell you that we opened our mite boxes to-day. We had fifty dollars and three cents. Our pastor Mr. McLaurin preached to the children. Our missionary society's name is "Cheerful Workers." Mrs. McIntyre is our leader. I enjoy reading the children's letters. My father takes the Standard. I go to school at Raeford. Miss Lizzie McDuffie is my teacher. She is a good, smart teacher and we all like her fine. There are five teachers in all. My father keeps a drug store here and Dr. G. A. Graham is in business with him. I go to Sunday-school at Raeford every Sunday and my teacher is Mrs. McIntyre.

I have a large doll I got Christmas. It can wear my brother's clothes he had when he was a baby. I have a big sister; her name is Fannie. She spent Xmas off. I have my missionary hen yet; I told about her in my last letter. I live in Robeson and go to school in Cumberland. Our pastor's wife is sick and we are all sorry. They have a sweet baby named James Leroy McLaurin. I study six books at school. I will close by asking one question. How old did John the Baptist live to be?

Your friend,
Susie Wright Dickson.

Query's, N. C., Feb. 14, 1903.

Dear Standard:

As I have never written I thought I would write a short letter. My papa takes your nice paper. I enjoy reading the letters very much. I go to school at Back Creek. My teacher is Mr. T. G. Furr; I like him very much. We have forty pupils. I go to church at Mallard Creek. We have no pastor now. I will close, hoping to see this in print, for I want to surprise my sister.

Your unknown friend,
Age 10. Myrtle Kirk.

Red Springs, N. C.,
Feb. 16th, 1903.

Dear Standard:

I love to read the letters from the little boys so much and love to read the paper too, so I am going to write one and hope to see it in print. I want my papa who is away to see it. I have two pets, a cat and a dog. My cat is name Mary and my dog is name Carlo. He is four years old.

We have a horse name Joe. I go to school every day to the North Carolina Military Academy. I go to Sunday-school every Sunday at the Presbyterian Church. Rev. C. F. Rankin is our pastor. We love him so much. My teacher is Miss Isabell Robeson; she is such a sweet good lady. My little sister is name Margaret; she goes to school at the Seminary; she is eight years old. As this is my first letter I will close. If you can, please put my letter in your next paper.

Your little friend,
Age 11. Jim Edens.

The Story of Little Joe's Life A Barium Springs Orphan.

On Sunday morning the first day of February, God took our little Joe home to Himself. In all the history of the Home we have never had a greater shock.

He had not been well for several days, but as he had no fever, was bright and happy and able to sit up most of the time, we did not feel uneasy about him. On Saturday he seemed better and sat up all day.

Sunday morning when the other boys were getting up he begged to get up too, but as he didn't seem quite so strong as the day before we thought it best not to let him get up, but told him that a place would be fixed for him down stairs.

One of the "big brothers" was waiting with him to carry him down when the place should be ready. He noticed that Joe closed his eyes and seemed to be going to sleep. He took him up and carried him down, but it was our dear little boy's last sleep. In less than three minutes his heart was still and his breathing lushed. Nothing we could do would bring the little soul back and the awful hush of a great sorrow settled down over our Home.

We feel sure that many of our friends in different parts of the State have learned to know and love our little Joe.

The letter he wrote Santa Claus at Christmas reached so many loving hearts. We want to thank them again for making his last Christmas here such a glorious one.

Joe's disposition was a lovely one and his little life a beautiful lesson to us all. One day not long ago one of the big sisters was teaching Joe his catechism, she told him to say, "The Devil tempted Eve and she gave the fruit to Adam," (in answer to the question "Who tempted them to eat the forbidden fruit?"), but Joe refused to say it. She insisted but Joe was not to be persuaded. When she asked him why he wouldn't say it he said: "because it is a bad word." To his pure little soul, Devil sounded profane, and so it couldn't pass his lips. When she told him to say Satan he did so and went on with his catechism.

As we came back from the dining hall after supper Joe nearly always talked about the stars. He never could understand where they stayed in day time. And Ah! how well we remember his turning his little face up to the stars and saying, "When us gets dead us'll go up there." We didn't know how soon he was really going up there.

In Joe's death a musical genius was taken from the world. He would sing anything he heard. His little baby tongue couldn't say the words but he always caught the music. He would sing using just any words that sounded right to him.

He sang not only easy songs and hymns but classical songs that he had heard only once or twice. He would stand by the piano while the girls played instrumental music and sing that without making a mistake and sometimes would sit listening for an hour at the time while they practiced exercises.

Sometimes when he had been to service we would ask him to sing the hymns he heard and he would do it.

Just before Christmas the piano at Rumble Hall was tuned. The next time Joe heard it he came and listened for a little while and then he asked if it was the same piano. When he was told that it was, he said, "Who sounded it?" He knew there was a difference in the sound. Possibly there were not five other people in the Home who would have noticed the difference.

The one thing Joe talked about most was being a man and building a church. He always said he was going to make a porch to his church.

We laid his little body away in a pretty spot near the place we have selected for our church. His is the first grave in our burying ground.

Can't those of us who love little Joe carry out the dream of his short life by putting the church there by his grave? Are there fathers and mothers, who have laid away in God's acre not only the body of a precious child, but the brightest dreams of their life, who would like to build the little church? Are there others, who listen with swelling hearts while their own wee laddie tells what he will do when he is a man, who would love to make a thank offering of this kind to the Heavenly Father who has given them so much to look forward to?

There may be some little men and women full of young life and gladness who as they look at their bright future would love to help us carry out the plan of Joe's little life. Then we know there are other lives too who have hidden away from the world dead hopes, hopes that were once as real and as dear to them as our little Joe's vision of the church was to him—Wouldn't you, dear friends, like to help us carry out this frail little creature's dream?

During the Christmas holidays Joe sang for some friends who were being shown through the Home. His sweet innocent manner and unusual talent impressed them very much and they gave him forty-five cents to spend as he pleased. It won't build his church, but we want to use it as the beginning. We are sure he would rather have it used that way than any in the world. If you want to put something to the forty-five cents please let us know.

The little life has been a blessing to us, and when we have the church, which we are sure will come, we hope there will be very many more lives blessed.

We know that God knew best, when he took the soul from our baby boy's frail little body.—Our Fatherless Ones.

My Raccoon.

He was my first pet. He was just like a little bear. His body was clumsier and "bunchier" than a cat's though no larger. He had a sharp nose, sharper than a collie dog's and this, with certain dark and light streaks of fur on each side of it, gave his face a curious three-cornered sort of expression. More than that, he had a wise, shrewd look, even when he was planning mischief, and planning mischief was the occupation of most of his working hours. His color was dingy brownish gray, and his most characteristic feature was his tail, which looked like a string of dark-colored fur rings.

I loved him with my whole heart. Whether the rest of the family shared the sentiment I will not say, but surely there was seldom one stagnant day in our household after he got acquainted with it.

This was his history. My cousin and another man were out hunting on my uncle's farm, and saw an old raccoon and five young ones walking out on limb of a large tree. They disappeared in a hole in the tree, and then one of the men stayed on the ground while the other went to my uncle to get permission to cut the tree down, for it was a large oak. Consent being given, several men and boys, and the farm dogs, went down all ready for sport. When the tree finally fell we all made a wild rush into the foliage.

The mother coon, being large and heavy, was pinned in somehow with in the trunk of the fallen tree and could not get out. I am sorry to say they killed her with an ax. One poor little coon died from the fall. The dogs killed another, and three little baby coons were made prisoners. Such comical little fellows as they were! We boys held them by the nape of the neck, as a cat carries her kittens, for they had keen, sharp teeth that they knew well how to use.

They acted almost like monkeys. Each poor little motherless coon clapped his little paws right over his eyes and held them there. Gradually, when we didn't seem to notice, each little animal would peek through his fingers at us, and at last they would carefully take off one paw, but at least notice on our part back would go the paws over both eyes.

One of the baby coons was given to me. I made him a home in a box, but I forgot to fasten the lid that first night, and he got out after we had all gone to bed. Next morning he was nowhere to be found, and there was great dismay. I guess I shed a few boyish tears, for he had been so cunning.

I remember well as I sat by the open fire reading, some noise made me look up, and there was the little raccoon clinging to the chimney jamb, the fire nearly singeing his fur. It seems he had been unable to get out of any door or window, and so had gone up the chimney flue, as the fire had been carefully covered for the night. As the chimney curved in at the top, he could not climb clear out, and finally, in the morning, the fresh smoke drove the little fellow down.

As he grew older he developed many interesting traits. Like all wild animals, he was very fond of sweet things.

FERTILIZERS NO HIGHER!

Everything else is, INCLUDING LABOR. Thoughtful agriculturists say, "too little fertilizer used per acre." How is it with you?

AXIOM:

Treble quantity, double crop!

Cotton high! Corn high! Tobacco high!
Likely to continue high!

His favorite lunch was a thick piece of bread soaked with molasses. He learned to pick pockets with great dexterity. His face would assume a rapt, far-away look, while he thrust his cunning little paws deep into the recess, and if there was anything eatable in there, it had to come.

Some boys who may read this have doubtless seen what are called craw-fish, a kind of small inland lobster, found along country brooks or creeks. Our raccoon was very fond of them, and could catch them better than a boy. He would wade along the edge of the water, dexterously feeling under the stones, and woe betide the poor crawfish who happened to be at home when Master Raccoon called.

He was oddly suspicious of any round object in his food. He would roll peas in his fingers till they were crushed. Once I gave him some of that kind of candy which at first tastes innocently enough, but afterwards grows furiously hot in the mouth. When the candy began to burn him he took it out of his mouth and gravely rolled it: having put it into his mouth again, and finding it still burned him, he rolled it once more, and at last, in apparent desperation, swallowed the candy, chewing as fast and hard as he could, although it must have burned all the way down.

His behavior with the kittens was peculiar. He would hold one in his arms about as clumsily as an old bachelor holds a baby, and would bite the kitten's ear till he provoked the old cat to charge at him. He seemed to do this on purpose to tease her. He had many a romp with a little white lapdog, but as the coon grew older and rougher the dog was half afraid of him, and then he would chase the dog all over the house to make him play.

He was very fond of me, and when he was tied up, and happened to see me, he would give a peculiar call, like a loud, almost shrill purr. He would steal in among a lot of children and gently bite their bare feet, as a joke.

But he had one failing which finally worked his ruin. He loved chickens not wisely, but too well. His first victim was a little downy one, and that was passed over. One day we killed a chicken for dinner. The headman left the fowl lying on the ground a few minutes, and it was promptly appropriated by the raccoon. He vanished under the house with his booty, and after an hour or two emerged with stuffed sides, and more than his usual look of satisfaction.

Next time my little brother was set to watch the dying chicken, and presently appeared carrying both the headless chicken and the coon, the latter holding on tightly, and the weight of both being almost more than the little boy could manage.

We made him a long light chain of links of wire, and he used to go about the premises dragging a yard or two of chain after him, and turning up in the most unexpected places, like an uncanny spectre.

Finally a family council declared after due deliberation, that the coon must "go."

After a few honest tears of regret I saw him sold. His ultimate fate was, I fear, too distressing to be minutely searched into.

I am afraid that by and by he passed into the hands of some steamboat men—"deck-hands," they were called—and was at last pitted against some cross dogs and came to a dreadful end.

I wish now that I had taken him deep into the still, dark woods he loved so well, and, with a few farewell caresses, turned him loose.—New York Evangelist.

Susie's Job and Aleck's.

"Grandma gave you the nicest job," grumbled Susie; "I believe she loves you best."

"Best—nothing!" answered Aleck, in boy lingo; "grandma set me to drive the sheep 'cause I'm a boy and 'cause I've got a whip. Girls can't drive things!"

These two little city children had only slept a single night in the old-fashioned trundle-bed in the farmhouse where their father was born. But directly after breakfast they had asked for a job—some thing that papa used to do when he was little.

And now as Aleck was a good-hearted fellow and did not like to see Susie vexed, he "swapped" jobs with her, and set off to pick raspberries whistling like a redbird.

But alas for the folks that turn from their own work to snatch at other people's! Before Aleck had covered the bottom of his shining tin pail he heard loud screams from the lot, and, dropping pail and berries, he flew to see what was the matter. Ah, the little red-frocked girl! She was flying—and screaming as she flew—before the old turkey-cock, which, with a hateful sound of "gobble—gobble—gobble," was close upon her.

Dusty with her falls, and smeared with tears and grass stains, Susie sobbed on grandma's shoulder: "I tried to catch him—I thought I—thought he was a scarlet tanager, like the picture in my book!"

"And Mr. Turkey thought you were a little soldier coming to give him battle," laughed grandma.

"Next time I'll attend to my own job," said the little scholar, who had learned something that morning more important than the difference between a turkey-cock and a scarlet tanager!—Elizbeth Preston Allan.

At a local theatre last night, two comedians had fun at the expense of Roosevelt's negro policy, and such a demonstration has not been seen in a theatre in Washington in a long while.

"Why didn't the ground hog come out today?" Asked one of the fun makers; and his team mate was back at him with the reply, "He was afraid the president would put a coon in his place."—Exchange.

THE ROYAL WAY.

THE REASON OF OUR SUPERIORITY.

There are other Cotton Mattresses besides the "Royal"—giving more or less satisfaction—mostly less, because in none of them has the most important feature received proper attention—i. e., that the raw material used in making the filling shall be of the best staple cotton procurable.

In no other way can a felting be obtained that will stand the test of continued use and retain through a life time its first elasticity.

In all other cotton mattresses except the Royal this "keystone" feature has been overlooked.

Dear Sirs:—I have your favor of the 12th inst. and take pleasure in expressing to you my opinion of the "Royal Elastic Felt Mattress," which it was my good fortune to use when I stopped at Hotel Kennon a few nights ago. I cannot imagine anything more deliciously restful than a night spent on one of those mattresses. In my opinion they are far superior to a hair mattress, however expensive.

Yours truly,

"Why do you think he will be a success in life? Has he such remarkable ability?" "Only in one way." "What is that?" "When he feels like it he can put on an air of respectful admiration that will make, you think you are the greatest man that ever happened." —Chicago Evening Post.

An English clergyman tells this story: A friend of mine once shared the box seat with the driver of a stagecoach in Yorkshire, and talked with the coachman about his team, admiring one horse in particular. "Ah," said the coachman, "but that 'oss an't as good as he looks: he's a scientific 'oss." "A scientific horse!" exclaimed my friend; "what on earth do you mean by that?" "I mean," replied Jehu, "a 'oss as thinks 'e knows a deal more nor he does."

"What kind of a man was Napoleon?" said the little boy.

"He was one of the men whose mistakes made them famous," answered his cynical parent "He undertook to control the world by organizing armies instead of organizing a trust." —Washington Star.

"The fact that I am a good musician," said the lady from a country village, "was the means of saving my life during the flood in our town a few years ago."

"How was that?" asked the young lady who saug.

"When the water struck our house my husband got on the folding bed and floated down the stream until he was rescued."

"And what did you do?"

"Why, I accompanied him on the piano."

A sexton at a parish church not far from Dumfries was busy one day digging a grave, when a stranger walking through the church yard thought he would go over and have a little fun with him. He found it no easy matter to draw old John into conversation, however.

First he tried remarks on the weather, then expressed his admiration on the fine country side, but "Ay" and "No" were all the stranger could get out of him till he asked the question:

"Do people die often here?"

John straightened his back for the first time, and, leaning on his spade, looked up in the stranger's face and solemnly replied:

"No; they only die once." —Exchange.

James, four years old, had been naughty to the point of evoking a whipping from his long-suffering mother, and all day long a desire for revenge rankled in his little bosom.

At length bedtime came, and, kneeling beside her, he implored a blessing for each member of the family individually, she alone being conspicuous by her absence. Then rising from his devout posture, the little suppliant fixed a keenly triumphant look upon her face, saying, as he turned to climb into bed:

"I s'pose you noticed you wasn't in it." —Harper's Magazine.

It was during the hearing on appeal of a case in which a certain attorney appeared as a pleader, followed by an escort of office clerks bearing legal tomes. The judge looked up, and, with a twinkle in his eye, remarked, "How is this? Cant' you read law enough in your office without bringing your books here?" "I'm not reading law," reported the attorney. "I'm reading the decision of the Supreme Court of California."

If the coal combine insists on squeezing us, we shall insist, at least, on its giving $5,000,000 to a university or a library, or something. That's the present-day theory of philanthropy. —The St. Louis Globe-Democrat.
