THE FRIENDS OF EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANITY, AND ESPECIALLY TO THE YOUNG, IS
AFFECTIONATELY DEDICATED.

P R E F A C E.

THE CYCLOPÆDIA OF METHODISM presents to the friends of the church and to the general reader the chief facts in Methodistic history and economy. It does not profess to be a book of original investigation, nor does it contain any prolonged discussions. Its simple aim is to collect, condense, and render easy of access important information which has been scattered through a multitude of volumes, or which has never before been collected. By its alphabetical arrangement, reference can be easily made to any topic or place, and the contained information can be at once obtained. It will thus be valuable to any family, and it will be especially useful to the young and active members of the Church. The general reader also, whatever may be his denominational preferences, will find in it important information, not to be found in any other one volume, touching the growth and economy of a large and widely-diffused branch of the Christian church.

Under appropriate heads will be found the chief facts, dates, and incidents connected with the rise and growth of Methodism in England and America, and its introduction into each separate country. In the United States, a sketch is given of its progress in each State, and in each Annual Conference, and of its present statistics in each city or village of three thousand inhabitants.

A succinct view of its doctrines is presented, showing their agreement with, or divergence from, the doctrines taught by other denominations. Each peculiarity of ecclesiastical economy or usage is also stated and explained in a separate article.

In the survey of Methodistic work, special attention has been given to its literary department. Sketches have been obtained as far as possible of its seminaries, colleges, universities, and theological schools. In the Appendix, as well as scattered through the work, will be found notices of books written by ministers or members of the church. The list of authors, though not complete, will be valuable for reference. The mission fields of the church are particularly designated, and their progressive extension among various nationalities and languages.

Nor is this survey of Methodism confined to any one branch. While more attention is given to the Methodist Episcopal Church than to any other, because of its larger membership and its wide diffusion, and because the editor is more intimately acquainted with its history and condition, yet the aim has been to give a fair and impartial view of every branch of the Methodist family. For this purpose contributors and correspondents were selected, as far as practicable, who were identified with the several branches, and who from their position were best qualified to furnish information as to their respective bodies.

The editor regrets that his efforts were not as successful in reference to some of the branches as he had earnestly hoped. The articles in the biographical department are generally very brief. When it is remembered that nearly four millions of living communicants are marshaled under the various Methodist branches, that the traveling ministers alone number more than twenty thousand, that the local ministry is still more numerous, that the field occupied reaches almost to the extremities of the globe, and that an immense host has passed away, the reader will see that not only must the sketches be brief, but that they can embrace only a very few. The purpose has been to give the most eminent among the departed; and among the living, those who occupy official positions under the General Conference, or who have charge of the literary institutions, or of the publishing and benevolent movements of the church. The editor has depended on correspondents for many of these sketches, and he regrets that a number to whom circulars were addressed did not respond in time to secure their insertion.

The public sources from which information has been derived, and which are referred to here to avoid the inconvenience of frequent reference throughout the volume, are the "Minutes of the Annual Conferences" of the various churches, the "Journals of the General Conferences," and the historical works, such as Bangs', Stevens', Tyerman's, Smith's, Redford's, McFerrin's, etc., together with the biographies of the early Methodist ministers. The statistics are taken from the minutes of 1876, except in a few instances, where they could not be obtained. In all cases where reference is made to population the numbers are taken from the census of 1870, unless otherwise stated.

The editor takes pleasure in referring to the assistance which he received in the preparation of the work from Rev. E. M. Wood, Ph.D., of the Pittsburgh Conference, and from Professor W. H. Larrabee, of Brooklyn. He also acknowledges important contributions from Rev. C. Churchill and Rev. J. Kersop, of London; Rev. Dr. Carroll and Bishop Carman, of Canada; Rev. Dr. Drinkhouse, of Baltimore; Rev. Dr. A. Clark and Rev. W. H. Kincaid, of Pittsburgh; Rev. Dr. L. C. Matlack, of Delaware; Rev. Dr. Benson, of California; Rev. H. K. Hines, of Oregon; Mrs. M. L. Dickinson, of New York; and Revs. C. W. Buoy and James Morrow, of Philadelphia. He also returns thanks to many of his brethren in the ministry and membership for important facts furnished as to the growth of the church and its institutions in various localities. He is aware that in the collection of matter from so many sources, as well as in copying and preparation, and in passing through the press, some errors may have escaped notice. These, he believes, are generally of minor moment, and can be corrected in the next edition.

The enterprising publishers, Messrs. Everts & Stewart, have done themselves great credit by the style and mechanical execution of the work, and they have added greatly to its interest by the number and character of the illustrations with which it is embellished.

The editor hopes that this volume will supply a felt want of the church and of the public, and that it will tend to inspire the young with the Christian zeal and activity that shone so prominently in those who laid the foundations of the great evangelistic movements of the age.

Aargau (pop. 199,720), a canton in Switzerland, separated from Baden by the Rhine. A majority of its inhabitants are Protestants. The services of the Methodist Episcopal Church, under the direction of the Conference of Germany and Switzerland, were introduced a few years since. At Lenzburg there is a church edifice, valued at $10,000, and recently preaching has been established in Aarau, the capital of the canton. The membership, including probationers, is reported at 145, and the Sunday-school scholars at 380.

Abandoned Churches.—The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in 1876, adopted a report, saying, "In some cases church property has been abandoned by a changing population, so that neither trustees nor worshipers remain. Such property was created by the generous contributions of the members of our church, who have removed to other localities, or died in the Christian faith. It is little less than sacrilege, to pervert their benefactions from the holy uses, to which they were originally consecrated by faith and prayer. Such property, by every principle of justice and equity, should be held and used in some way, for the benefit of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in accordance with the intention of its donors." In harmony with this declaration, it changed the Discipline so as to read, Article 381: "In all cases where church property is abandoned, or no longer used for the purposes originally designed, it shall be the duty of the trustees, if any remain, to sell such property and pay over the proceeds to the Annual Conference within whose bounds it is located; and where no such lawful trustees remain, it shall be the duty of the said Annual Conference to secure the custody of such property by such means as the laws of the State may afford." The duty of the Annual Conference, in reference to these funds, is specified in Article 374: "In case of the reorganization of the said society, and the erection of a new church building within five years after such transfer of funds, then the said Annual Conference shall repay to said new corporation the moneys which it had received from the church or society as above mentioned."

Abba is the Hebrew word אבא, ab, father, under the Syriac form, אבבא, abba, which gives emphasis to it and makes it equivalent to "THE father." It is used by St. Mark and by St. Paul, as it was well understood in the synagogues, but there is added the Greek equivalent. It has been applied in the Roman Catholic Church to persons holding certain official rank, and hence we have the words abbot and abbess, and transferred to their place of residence, the word, abbey.

It is employed in its emphatic sense in Methodist hymnology, as in the well-known couplet of Mr. Wesley.—

"With confidence I now draw nigh,
And Father, abba, father! cry."

Abbeokuta (pop. 75,000 to 100,000), a large city in Western Africa. It is situated on the river Ogoon, and is the capital of the Egba nation. It was built about fifty years ago by refugees, who escaped during a terrible war, and found shelter under a shelving rock on a granite hill, hence called abbe-okuta, or under-stone. In 1851, they became acquainted with a Wesleyan missionary in Badagry, who sent, on their invitation, a native preacher to reside among them. He was successful in his ministry, and his labors were appreciated by the chiefs of the nation, who furnished ground and aided in erecting a church. Wars and occasional persecutions have retarded the spread of the work. At present, the reports for Lagos and Abbeokuta combined, in the Gold Coast district, show a membership of 940.

Abbett, H. Winslow, an educator in the M. E. Church South, was born May 10, 1839, in Marion Co., Ky. His father, Rev. W. McDowell Abbett, was born in Philadelphia, and was prominently connected with the Methodist ministry for thirty-five years. His mother, the daughter of Major Winslow, of Virginia, was also educated in the Methodist Church. After having pursued academical and collegiate studies in Covington and Shelbyville, Ky., he entered the Senior class in Dickinson College, Pa., and graduated under President Collins, with honorable rank in a class of twenty-four. He was licensed to preach in Carlisle, and then traveled four years in the Kentucky Conference, after which, he was appointed teacher of ancient languages in the Carroll High School. Subsequently he spent five years as professor in the Ky. Wesleyan College, when he was elected principal of the Carroll High School. After laboring two years, his health declined, and he engaged for a time in the pastoral work. He is now one of the principals of the Millersburg Female College, Bourbon Co., Ky. One of his published sermons appears in "The Kentucky Pulpit."

Abbott, Benjamin, was born in Pennsylvania, in 1732, and died Aug., 1796. He was one among the earliest laborers and pioneer preachers in New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland. His youth had been irregular, but at the age of forty he was converted, and he immediately commenced an active Christinn life. Through his influence, a society was organized near Penn's Grove, where he resided, and he became its class-leader. He acted as a local minister for a number of years, and preached successfully and extensively. In 1789, he was admitted on trial in the Philadelphia Conference M. E. Church, and in the following year, according to the rule which then existed, was admitted into full connection. He had not enjoyed the advantages of an early or extensive education, but he was exceedingly earnest and frequently remarkably eloquent, sometimes overwhelmingly so; and many thousands were awakened and added to the church under his ministry. The minutes of the Conference in 1796, recording his death, say, "Perhaps he was one of the wonders of America. No man's copy: an uncommon zealot for the blessed work of sanctification, he preached it on all occasions, and in all congregations; and, what was best of all, lived it. He was an innocent, holy man. He was seldom heard by any one to speak about anything but God and religion; and his whole soul was often overwhelmed by the power of God."

Abbott, Howard B., a minister of the M. E. Church, was born in Sidney, Me., Sept. 14, 1810, and died at Waterville, Feb. 2, 1876, aged 65. He was educated at Bowdoin College, and, when converted, united with the Baptist church in Calais, in 1838, while studying law. He acted as an attorney about eight years, when a sense of duty directed him to the ministry. Obtaining an honorable dismissal from the Baptist Church, and believing heartily in the doctrines of the M. E. Church, he united with it in 1847, and was received on trial in the Maine Conference in the same year. He continued in the effective relation until less than a year before his death. His naturally vigorous constitution was permanently broken by excessive labor. He fell at last a victim to his own self-denying zeal, and came to the final hour of life calmly and fully trusting in God.

Abernethy, George, was born in New York City Oct. 8, 1807, and joined the M. E. Church in 1825, and, in 1833, was appointed class-leader in Duane Street church. He was selected as missionary steward for the Oregon mission, and sailed from New York Oct. 9, 1839, with Rev. Jason Lee and a large reinforcement, for Oregon. He had the superintendence of the secular department of the mission until it was discontinued by Rev. George Gary, the then superintendent, in 1845. He was mayor of Oregon City in 1844. In 1845 he was elected governor of the whole Northwest coast, at the time when it was erected into a provincial government by the inhabitants, including all nationalities. His election was highly complimentary, as it took place without his knowledge, and at a time when he was on a visit to the Sandwich Islands. He continued to hold that office until the territorial disputes were ended, and Oregon Territory was regularly organized by the Congress of the United States, in 1849. In his office he exerted his influence to restrain intemperance, gambling, licentiousness, and kindred vices, and was ever ready, personally and officially, to aid in promoting education and public enterprises. He helped to build the first Methodist church, and, indeed, the first Protestant church, on the Pacific coast. He was the first lay delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church from Oregon, and attended its session in Brooklyn in 1872, serving on several of the most important committees. For many years he was president of the board of trustees of the Taylor Street church, in Portland, and was an active and devoted class-leader to the day of his death. After attending to his ordinary duties, on the evening of May 2, 1877, he died suddenly of heart disease.

Abstinence, is a refraining from the use of certain articles of diet, or a very slight partaking of ordinary meals. It is a species of fasting, and is recommended for religious purposes in the discipline of the Methodist churches. (See FASTING.)

Acton, John H., a member of the Oregon Conference and editor of the Pacific Christian Advocate, entered the Ohio Conference in 1858. After filling various pastoral charges, he was elected by the General Conference of 1876 to the editorial chair which he now fills.

Adams, Charles, D.D., is a native of New Hampshire, was born in 1808, educated at Wilbraham Academy and Bowdoin College, where he graduated in 1833, and immediately entered the traveling ministry. A large portion of his public life has been spent in the work of education. For five years he had charge of Newbury Seminary, Vermont. Four years he presided over Wilbraham Academy. Two years he was a professor in the Concord Biblical Institute, and for ten years he was president of Illinois Female College. His labors in the ministry were mainly at Lynn, Wilbraham, Boston, Lowell, and Cambridge, Mass., and Cincinnati and Xenia, O. Dr. Adams has prepared several books, among which are brief biographies of Luther, Cromwell, Dr. Johnson, C. Wesley, and W. Irving; also, sketches of the "Women of the Bible," "Evangelism in the Middle of the Nineteenth Century," "Earth and its Wonders," and one or two other publications.

Adams, Samuel, a member of the Pittsburgh Conference, M. E. Church, was born in 1776, and was in early life affected with infidel views. In maturer years he was brought to a knowledge of the truth; and at a camp-meeting in 1813 he consecrated himself to divine service. Being convinced that God had called him to the ministry, he relinquished the practice of medicine, which had furnished him a fine income, and with great earnestness devoted himself to ministerial duties. He died in Beaver, Pa., March 6, 1832.

Adcock, John, a minister of the United Methodist Free Church, England, entered the ministry in 1858. He has traveled in Bradford, Leeds, Sheffield, London, and Bury. He has been twice in Bradford, and is now laboring a second time in Sheffield. He was president of the Annual Assembly in 1873.

Adoption is an act by which one takes another into his family, owns him for his son, and appoints him as his heir. The custom of adoption was occasionally practiced among the Jews, but was more frequent among the Greeks and Romans, who had express provision for its accomplishment. It is still common in Eastern countries, and especially among the Mohammedans. The ceremony of adoption, in some countries, consists in placing the garment of the one who adopts upon the adopted. This seems to have been an ancient Oriental custom, for Elijah adopted Elisha by throwing his mantle over him; and when Elijah was carried up in a fiery chariot, his mantle was taken up by Elisha, his adopted successor in the office of prophet. So the promise of God to Eliakim reads, "I will clothe him with thy robe, saith the Lord, and strengthen him with thy girdle; and I will commit thy government into his hand." Possibly alluding to this custom, Paul says to the Philippians, "Put on the Lord Jesus," "Put on the new man," denoting the adoption of sons.

"Adoption, in a theological sense, is that act of God's free grace by which, upon our being justified by faith in Christ, we are received into the family of God and entitled to the inheritance of heaven. In the New Testament, adoption appears not so much a distinct act of God as involved in and necessarily flowing from our justification, so that at least the one always implies the other; nor is there any good ground to suppose that in the New Testament the term adoption is used with special reference to the civil practice of adoption by the Greeks, Romans, or other heathens; therefore these formalities are illustrative only so far as they confirm the usages among the Jews. Likewise, the Apostles, in using this term, appear rather to have had before them the simple view that our sins had deprived us of our sonship, the favor of God, and reconciliation with him. Our forfeited privileges were not only restored, but greatly heightened, through the paternal kindness of God. They could scarcely be forgetful of the affecting parable of the prodigal son. And it is under the same view that Paul quotes from the Old Testament: 'Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters.' (II. Corinthians vi. 17, 18.)

"Adoption, then, is that act by which we, who were alienated, and enemies, and disinherited, are made the sons of God and heirs of his eternal glory. 'If children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ.' (Romans viii. 17.) Here it is to be remarked that it is not in our own right, nor in the right of any work done in us or which we ourselves do, though it should be an evangelical work, that we become heirs, but jointly with Christ, and in his right. To this state belong freedom from a servile spirit, for we are not servants, but sons; the special love and care of God, our heavenly Father; a filial confidence in him; free access to him at all times and in all circumstances; a title to the heavenly inheritance; and a spirit of adoption, or the witness of the Holy Spirit to our adoption, which is the foundation of all the comfort we can derive from those privileges, as it is the only means by which we can know that they are ours. The last-mentioned great privilege of adoption merits especial attention. It consists in the inward righteousness or testimony of the Holy Spirit, the sonship of believers, from which flows a comfortable persuasion or conviction of our present acceptance with God and the hope of our future and eternal glory. This is taught in several passages in Scripture (Romans viii. 15, 16): 'For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God.' In this passage it is to be remarked that the Holy Spirit takes away fear, a servile dread of God as offended. That the Spirit of God here mentioned is not the personified spirit or genius of the gospel, as some would have it, but 'the Spirit itself,' or himself; and hence he is called (Gal. iv. 6) 'the Spirit of his Son,' which cannot mean the genius of the gospel. That he inspires a filial confidence in God as our father, which is opposed to 'the fear' produced by the 'spirit of bondage.' That he excites this filial confidence and enables us to call God our father, by witnessing, bearing testimony with our spirit, that we are the children of God. (Gal. iv. 4-6:) 'But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father.' Here also are to be noted the means of our redemption from under the curse of the law,—the incarnation and sufferings of Christ. That the adoption of sons follows upon our actual redemption from that curse, or, in other words, upon our pardon; that upon our being pardoned, the 'Spirit of the Son' is 'sent forth into our hearts,' and producing the same effect as that mentioned in the Epistle to the Romans, viz., filial confidence in God, crying, 'Abba, Father.' To these texts are to be added all those passages, so numerous in the New Testament, which express the confidence and the joy of Christians, their friendship with God, their confident access to him as their God, their entire union and delightful intercourse with him in spirit."—Watson, Institutes.

Adrian, Mich. (pop. 8438), the capital of Lenawee Co., is a beautiful village in the interior of the State. It has not grown very rapidly of late years. In 1860 it was the third in size in the State; but in 1870 it ranked as the sixth. It is the site of the principal college belonging to the Methodist Protestant Church. The M. E. Church has a beautiful edifice, with 510 members and 400 Sunday-school scholars. The church property is valued at $50,000. The Methodist Protestants have also a prosperous church organization. The statistics are not reported in their general minutes.

Adrian College is located at Adrian, Mich., and is under the control and patronage of the Methodist Protestant Church. It was organized in 1859 under the auspices of the American Wesleyan Church, and was so conducted until 1868. It was then transferred to a new board of trustees nominated by and representing a corporation known as "The Collegiate Association of the Methodist Protestant Church." This board assumed the financial liabilities of the institution, which at that time amounted to more than $30,000, and entered into an obligation to endow it with a sum of not less than $100,000. In 1870 the incorporation was so changed as to increase the trustees from twelve to thirty, and the election of the trustees was vested in the General Conference of "The Methodist Church," which was empowered to elect at each of its quadrennial sessions one-half of the entire board. By these arrangements the institution came more fully under the control of the denomination under whose patronage it is placed. In 1876 a further change was made, by which the alumni of the college were empowered to elect six additional trustees. Four buildings have been erected: the north hall contains rooms for the Theological Association and for about one hundred and twenty-five students; the south hall has rooms for the lady teachers and for the accommodation of about one hundred young ladies; the other two buildings contain the chapel, library, lecture and society rooms, laboratories, and cabinet. The buildings are situated on a plot of ground containing twenty acres, donated to the institution by Hon. L. G. Bury and Dr. D. K. Underwood. The assets of the institution, including buildings, grounds, apparatus, etc., are estimated at more than $137,000. The endowment fund, which bears interest, is about $80,000, though a larger sum has been subscribed. The location of the college is easy of access, being on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad. It has six departments of instruction: Classics, Mathematics, Natural Science, Philosophy, Political Science, and Modern Languages. All of these are equally open to both sexes. There is also a preparatory department with a course of study extending through two years; also a department of Music; and arrangements have been made for furnishing to suitable candidates tuition in Theological and Biblical Literature. The present officers are G. B. McElroy, D.D., President and Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy; A. H. Lourie, M.A., Professor of Political and Social Science and English Literature; D. S. Stevens, M.A., Mental Science and Rhetoric; I. W. McKeever, M.A., Natural Science, and Amos Professor of Theology; M. L. Jennings, M.A., Latin and Greek; B. H. Rupp, Instrumental Music and Musical Composition; Mrs. A. A. Easterbrooke, Principal of the Ladies' Department, and Teacher of Modern Languages; August Reichert, Teacher of Vocal Music and Assistant in Instrumental Music; George C. Smith, Tutor.

Adult Baptism. At the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1784 this direction was given: "Let every adult person and the parents of every child to be baptized have their choice either of immersion or sprinkling, and let the elder or deacon conduct himself accordingly." With unimportant verbal alterations these directions have remained in the Discipline until the present time. At the same Conference a provision was also adopted to meet the cases of those who might have scruples about the validity of their baptism in childhood, and the ministers were directed in such cases to "remove their scruples by argument; if they could not the office might be performed by immersion or sprinkling, as the person desired." This provision remained in the Discipline until 1786, when it was omitted. Occasionally persons were rebaptized; but the General Conference of 1864 declared explicitly "the rebaptism of persons known to have been previously baptized is not consistent with the nature and design of baptism as set forth in the New Testament."

In 1792, the minister performing the ceremony was directed as to the mode of his baptism to "dip him in the water, or pour water upon him." But it was provided in the General Conference of 1864, that the minister should "sprinkle or pour water upon him (or if he so desired it, shall immerse him in water)." It will be seen by this that sprinkling or pouring is the preferred method and practice of the church, and that immersion forms the exception.

It is not to be supposed that the Methodist Episcopal Church administers this ordinance without due reference to the fitness of the candidate. He is required to assert his faith in the Christian religion, and to take upon him very solemn obligations of renouncing all sin and cleaving with true faith to Jesus Christ. There is nothing in the Discipline requiring this ordinance to be administered exclusively in the church edifice. It may be administered in private houses or elsewhere. The church, however, is the most appropriate place for the performance of all the ordinances.

The form for administering this ordinance was prepared by Wesley, copied chiefly from the ritual of the Church of England. He omitted, however, some prayers and Scripture lessons, and also some phrases seeming to teach regeneration by or through water baptism.

It is the order of the church that persons shall be baptized before they shall be admitted to the Lord's Supper, or to full membership in the church.

The form at present in the Discipline is, with slight verbal alterations, the same which was adopted by the church at its organization. The candidates for baptism are called forward in the presence of the congregation, and after a brief address prayer is offered, and lessons are read as prescribed in the ritual. The minister (the congregation standing) then addresses the candidates:

"Well beloved, who have come hither desiring to receive holy baptism, you have heard how the congregation hath prayed that our Lord Jesus Christ would vouchsafe to receive you, to bless you, and to give you the kingdom of heaven, and everlasting life. And our Lord Jesus Christ hath promised in his holy word to grant all those things that we have prayed for: which promise he for his part will most surely keep and perform.

"Wherefore, after this promise made by Christ, you must also faithfully, for your part, promise, in the presence of this whole congregation, that you will renounce the devil and all his works, and constantly believe God's holy word, and obediently keep his commandments."

Then shall the minister demand of each of the persons to be baptized:

"Dost thou renounce the devil and all his works, the vain pomp and glory of the world, with all covetous desires of the same, and the carnal desires of the flesh, so that thou wilt not follow nor be led by them?" "I renounce them all."

"Dost thou believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth? and in Jesus Christ his only begotten Son our Lord? and that he was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary? that he suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried? that he arose again the third day? that he ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty, and from thence shall come again at the end of the world, to judge the quick and the dead?

"And dost thou believe in the Holy Ghost? the holy Catholic Church? the communion of saints? the remission of sins? the resurrection of the body, and everlasting life after death?" "All this I steadfastly believe."

"Wilt thou be baptized in this faith?" "This is my desire."

"Wilt thou then obediently keep God's holy will and commandments, and walk in the same all the days of thy life?" "I will endeavor so to do, God being my helper."

These questions being satisfactorily answered, prayer is again offered, and the minister baptizing says, "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." The services are closed by the congregation uniting with the minister in repeating the Lord's Prayer, or an extemporary prayer may be added.

Advocates, Christian, is the family title given to a large number of periodicals in the M. E. Church. The first weekly paper published in New York by the M. E. Church was called the Christian Advocate, and as other papers were established from time to time, they were named according to the localities, Western, Northwestern, etc. Some local papers, published by Annual Conferences or by individuals, have adopted the same general name. In other cases they have selected different titles. The German and Scandinavian Church papers have also different titles. The names, places of publication, and dates of commencement of the church Advocates are as follows:

Christian Advocate, New York	1826
Western Christian Advocate, Cincinnati	1834
Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, Pittsburgh	1844
Northern Advocate, Syracuse	1844
Northwestern Christian Advocate, Chicago	1852
California Christian Advocate, San Francisco	1852
Central Christian Advocate, St. Louis	1856
Pacific Christian Advocate, Portland	1860
Methodist Advocate, Atlanta	1868
Southwestern Christian Advocate, New Orleans	1876

In addition to these, the Missionary Advocate and the Sunday-School Advocate have been published at New York, by their respective societies.

Africa, one of the four quarters of the globe, and the seat of an ancient civilization, is a vast peninsula, formerly connected with Asia by the Isthmus of Suez, but now separated by the canal which was opened a few years since. Its interior is less known than any other large portion of the globe. Its area, exclusive of its islands, is estimated at 8,500,000 square miles. Its population is not definitely known, no census having been taken by its interior and tribal governments. Geographers have variously estimated its inhabitants from 80,000,000 to 200,000,000.

Paganism chiefly prevails through its interior.

Mohammedanism controls its northern coast and has extended into various parts of the central countries. Of its different governments, Abyssinia is the only one in which Christianity has continued to prevail from ancient times. The first Methodist society was organized in Sierra Leone, by some negroes who had been taken by the British government from America to that colony. Hearing of their destitute condition, the Wesleyans of England sent them missionaries in 1811. In 1833, missionaries were sent from the United States to the colony which had been established in Liberia a number of the colonists having previously been members of the church. From time to time the number of missionaries was increased, so that a Methodist Episcopal Conference was organized in that republic. The Wesleyans have also established missions on the Cape Coast, the Gold Coast, and on the Gambia. In 1814, Dr. Coke, on his voyage to India, left a missionary at the Cape of Good Hope, who, after fruitless efforts, abandoned the mission and joined his brethren in India. In 1816 a missionary was sent to the Cape, who penetrated into the interior of Kaffraria, and successfully established a mission among that people. From that centre, the mission has spread through the southern and south-eastern provinces, embracing Cape Colony, South-eastern Africa, and Natal. Within a few years, the United Methodists of the Free Churches of England have established a mission at Freetown and York, in Western Africa, and also a missionary station at Zibe, on the eastern coast, near Zanzibar; and very recently an effort has been made to occupy the interior, near Lake Nyanzi. At present, the Wesleyans have in Southern Africa, embracing Natal and the Vaal River country, six districts, containing seventy-two circuits, with 14,638 members. In Western Africa, in the Sierra Leone, Gambia, and Gold Coast districts, they have fourteen circuits and 9452 members. The Liberia Conference of the M. E. Church reports 2215 members; the United Methodists report in West Africa 3000, and in the eastern station about 40; making a total of nearly 40,000 members of the various Methodist churches in Africa. For more particular statements, the reader is referred to the articles on the several countries.

African Methodist Episcopal Church.—This organization was formed in April, 1816, and was composed of members who withdrew from the Methodist Episcopal Church.

History.—In early Methodism the white and colored members worshiped in the same congregation, the colored people occupying special seats. Some difficulty arose about their seats when the gallery was erected in St. George's church, Philadelphia, in 1786. In consequence of these difficulties, the few colored members left the church, and the minutes of 1786 and 1787 report no colored members. Uniting with others they formed an association in 1787, which ultimately inclined towards the Protestant Episcopal Church. Some of them returned, and, others having joined the church, the colored membership in 1794 amounted to 66.

At that time, led by Richard Allen, who subsequently became bishop, a blacksmith-shop was purchased, and a separate place of worship was opened, which was dedicated by Bishop Asbury, June 29, 1794. This congregation adopted as a part of their platform the following: "We consider every child of God a member of the mystical body of Christ," . . . "yet in the political government of our church we prohibit our white brethren from electing or being elected into any office among us save that of a preacher or public speaker." As the reasons for desiring a separate place of worship, they adopted on June 10, 1794, the following paper:

"Whereas, from time to time many inconveniences have arisen from white people and people of color mixing together in public assemblies,—more particularly in places of public worship,—we have thought it necessary to provide for ourselves a convenient house to assemble in separate from our white brethren:

"1st. To obviate any offense our mixing with our white brethren might give them.

"2d. To preserve as much as possible from the crafty wiles of the enemy our weak-minded brethren from taking offense at such partiality as they might be led to think contrary to the spirit of the Gospel, in which there is neither male nor female, barbarian nor Scythian, bond nor free, but all are one in Christ Jesus.

"3d. That we might the more freely and fully hold the faith in unity of spirit and the bands of peace together, and build each other up in our most holy faith."

They named their church "Bethel," and adopted a charter which placed it under the control of the M. E. Church, but their deed was not made in the prescribed form. Richard Allen acted as their chief pastor, and was ordained by Bishop Asbury in 1799, being the first colored minister so ordained in the United States. The congregation remained associated under general pastoral supervision with St. George's church, until 1815, when various difficulties having arisen, a convention was called to meet in Philadelphia, in April, 1816, and invitations were sent to the colored people in various localities. This convention consisted of five delegates from Philadelphia, seven from Baltimore, three from Attleborough, one from Salem, N. J., and one from Wilmington, Del. Bishop Payne thus describes it:

"The above seventeen opened the convention on the 9th day of April, 1816. The most distinguished members of this convention were Rev. Richard Allen, Rev. Daniel Coker, and Mr. Stephen Hill, an intelligent layman of Baltimore, Md. It is said, 'to the counsels and wisdom of this latter, more than to any other man, the church is indebted for the form it took.' The speeches made in this important convention are lost to posterity. The most important things that were done after the organization of the convention were: a. The election of a bishop. The votes being polled, Rev. Daniel Coker was declared bishop-elect. But . . . he resigned the next day in favor of Elder Allen, who being duly elected on the 10th, was consecrated bishop on the 11th, by Rev. Absalom Jones, a priest of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and four other regularly ordained ministers. b. The adoption of a resolution declaring that any minister coming from another evangelical church should be received in the same official standing which he held in the church whence he came. c. The adoption of the following: 'Resolved, That the people of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other places, who might unite with them, should become one body under the name and style of the African Methodist Episcopal Church.' d. The Book of Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church was adopted with its 'Articles of Religion,' and its 'General Rules,' as drafted by the two Wesleys, entire, complete, excepting the Presiding Eldership."

No full statistics have been preserved as to the number of members that united with the church at its formation. Bishop Payne estimates the number as near 3000, and the minutes of the M. E. Church show in 1816 a diminution of about 2400 colored members in Philadelphia and Baltimore, which would seem to harmonize with this statement.

Bishop Allen continued to act as bishop until his death in 1831. In 1828, Rev. M. Brown was elected to the same office, as was also E. Waters in 1838.

The growth of the church was constant, though for a time not very rapid, as it was confined chiefly to the free States and to the border slave States. In 1817 a church was formed in Charleston, S. C., which, in 1822, numbered 3000, but which was suppressed by the city authorities. In 1826, as Bishop Payne informs us in his semi-centenary book, there were 2 conferences, 17 itinerant preachers, and 7937 members. In 1836 there were 4 conferences, 27 itinerants, and 7594 members. In 1846 there were 6 conferences, 67 pastors, and 16,190 members. In 1856 we have no statistics furnished. The Civil War and the emancipation of the slaves opened a wide door to the church; and in 1866 there were reported 10 annual conferences, 185 pastors, 286 churches, and 50,000 members. Since that period the work has extended very rapidly in the South, and the statistics for 1876 show 27 conferences and 212,000 members. This large increase was in great measure derived from the colored membership which had formerly attended the worship of the M. E. Church South.

In 1852, D. A. Payne and Willis Nazrey were elected bishops. In 1856 the Canada Conference was constituted a separate church, and Bishop Nazrey became its bishop, yet claiming to retain his position as bishop in the African M. E. Church. This gave rise to differences which were not fully settled until 1864. Propositions for a union of the African M. E. Church and the African M. E. Zion Church were favorably considered, and committees to effect a union were appointed, but owing to unexpected difficulties the measure was not consummated.

In 1864, A. W. Wayman and Jabez P. Campbell were elected to the office of bishop. Both of these ministers had been distinguished for several years for their energy of character and for their unwavering devotion to the interests of their church, as well as for their pulpit ability.

The African M. E. Church has a publishing house in Philadelphia, and a weekly religious organ. It is also giving increased attention to education. Its chief institution is Wilberforce University, at Xenia, Ohio. (See WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY.) It has also commenced several academies, which are, however, only in their infancy. The estimated value of the church property is now nearly three millions.

African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church is a branch of the Methodist family consisting almost exclusively of colored members. Its doctrines are precisely the same as those of the Methodist Episcopal Church, from whose Discipline its articles are copied. Its system of polity also is very similar, the chief difference being that the bishops are elected every four years by the General Conference, and are installed or consecrated according to the ritual of the M. E. Church without the laying on of hands. The General Conference, which is the supreme tribunal, is composed of one for every seven ministers in the Annual Conference and of two lay delegates for each Annual Conference except where there is but one ministerial delegate. In other respects there is but little difference from the parent church.

History.—Its organization dates from 1820, when a large congregation of colored Methodists in the city of New York, which had been known as the Zion church, seceded, and with one or two other churches formed an organization. It took its name from the name of the principal church. That congregation had been formed as early as 1796, and had erected an edifice in 1800, but had remained subject to, and in perfect harmony with, the general church economy until 1820. At that time James M. Stillwell, who had been a pastor of the old John Street congregation in New York, withdrew from the church, taking with him about 300 members. On the evening of his withdrawal, he visited the colored congregation, informed them of the step he had taken, and induced them to fancy that their religious liberties were in danger. The reason assigned was, that the New York Conference desired more definite legal action to secure the property of the church from being lost in case of secession. By Mr. Stillwell's influence they were led to take steps preparatory to a separation, and requested him to take charge for the time being of their societies. As they were then erecting a new church, they invited him to preach the first sermon at its opening, and in a few weeks declared themselves independent. Hearing of the difficulty, Bishop Allen, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, visited New York and endeavored to induce them to unite with the organization which had been formed by him and others in Philadelphia and Baltimore, but after full consultation they preferred to form an independent organization, adopting the Discipline of the M. E. Church. During the agitation which followed, a second colored church in New York and a church in Brooklyn united with the Bethel church of Philadelphia. The Zion congregation having become independent, sent messengers to induce other colored congregations in different cities to unite with them, and they formed an association called "The African Methodist Episcopal Church in America."

Not wishing, however, at that time to be wholly independent, they proposed that their association should be treated as a distinct and separate Annual Conference under the patronage and government of the M. E. Church, and they applied to Bishop McKendree to preside in the Conference, to conduct it according to church usages, and to ordain their ministers. The Philadelphia Annual Conference, learning their condition, passed the following resolution: "The Philadelphia Conference do advise and recommend that one of our bishops do attend and preside in the African Conference appointed to sit in New York, and to superintend their organization as an African Methodist Conference, under the patronage of our bishops and Conference, agreeable to the proper plan (if the New York Conference agree with us), to wit:

"1. One of our members always to preside in the said Conference, or, in case no bishop be present, then such white elders as the bishop shall appoint are to preside.

"2. Our bishops to ordain all their deacons and elders, such as shall be elected by their own Conference, and approved of by the bishop, and educated for the office."

This resolution, adopted by the Philadelphia Conference, was forwarded to the New York Conference, but it did not meet with their approbation. They alleged that the organization of an African Annual Conference must be effected by the General Conference, but could not be by one or more Annual Conferences. Defeated in their purpose, they proceeded to hold their Conference, June 21, 1821. Joshua Soule, subsequently elected bishop, and Dr. Phœbus having been invited, met with them. They first elected a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church to preside; but he not being present, Dr. Phœbus was chosen, who acted as their president for the session; and Joshua Soule served as secretary. Freeborn Garrettson also attended their meeting, and said to them that he thought an African Conference would be established at the next General Conference. The second Conference was held in 1822, in Philadelphia, and the bishops of the M. E. Church were again invited to preside; but they believing they could not do so officially, the Conference elected a president of their own. Bishops Robert and George, however, called upon them, and recommended them to delay further action until the meeting of the ensuing General Conference. The African Methodist Episcopal Church organized in Philadelphia, and known as the "Bethel Church," however, availed themselves of their unsettled condition, and through their influence a number of the members united with them; fearing a further loss should they delay, they voted to proceed to a permanent organization. Accordingly they met in New York, and having elected several local preachers as elders, they were ordained by Mr. Stillwell, assisted by two elders who had also withdrawn from the M. E. Church. At their organization 22 ministers and 1426 members were reported. In July, 1822, James Varick was elected as their first bishop, or superintendent, as the office was then called. He was elected in 1826, and continued to serve until 1828; at that time Christopher Rush was chosen superintendent. In its earlier history, the growth of the church was comparatively slow. In 1847, 26 years after its first Conference, they reported only 5000 members, 75 traveling ministers, and 50 church edifices, though they also reported a number of congregations without church buildings. The General Conference, which held its session in Philadelphia in 1864, sent delegates to the Methodist Episcopal General Conference then in session in the same city, and also passed resolutions in favor of forming a union with the African M. E. Church.

Owing, however, to differences which subsequently arose, the proposition was not carried into effect. During the progress of the civil war, and especially at its close, a number of ministers of the Zion Church visited the South, and organized societies in various parts of the country, and from year to year reported a large increase. At present (1876) they have 7 bishops, viz., J. J. Clinton, S. T. Jones, J. J. Moore, J. W. Hood, J. M. Thompson, James H. Lomax, and William H. Hillery. They also report 17 annual conferences, 1200 traveling ministers, 1063 local preachers, 1154 exhorters, 225,000 members, and 25,321 probationers. They report also 9083 churches, 15,094 Sabbath-schools, 25,000 officers and teachers, and 102,474 Sunday-school scholars. It is but proper to say, however, that these statistics are not wholly reliable. Such was the unsettled condition of the colored people at the South when their societies were formed, and such the lack of education and systematic order among the ministers and members in many localities, that doubtless great errors have been made. From the most careful inquiries, it is not probable the membership exceeds, if it equals, the number of 150,000. They report two educational institutions under their patronage, viz., Rush Academy, at Fayetteville, N. C., and Zion Hill, in Washington Co., Pa. They have the nucleus of a book concern in Washington City, D. C., but at present have no well-supported periodical.

African Publishing House.—The publishing department of the African M. E. Church is located at 631 Pine Street, Philadelphia, where the publications of that church are kept on sale, embracing hymn-books, disciplines, catechisms, and the books of study ordered by the Conferences. The value of the building is estimated at $6000, and the estimated business done annually is about $20,000. They have a printing department in which they print their church paper, The Christian Recorder, which has a circulation of about 8000 copies.

Akers, Peter, D.D., was born in Kentucky, and entered the ministry of the M. E. Church in that State. He subsequently removed to Illinois, and has spent about fifty years in preaching in important charges, in acting as presiding elder, and in other duties. For several years he was president of McKendree College, and was engaged in literary pursuits. Among the productions from his pen is a valuable work on chronology.

Akron, Ohio (pop. 10,066), the capital of Summit Co., was first settled in 1825, and so rapidly did it increase in population and importance that in 1841 it was chosen as the county seat. It is finely located for manufacture and commerce. The Cleveland and Zanesville, and the Atlantic and Great Western Railroads here intersect each other. The elevation being 400 feet above Lake Erie it forms a summit, as the name of the county indicates, it being the highest point on the canal between the lake and the Ohio River.

For many years Methodism did not make any very special advancement in this town, but more recently it has rapidly risen to a commanding position, so that its churches and Sunday-schools have almost a national reputation. It is said to have one of the finest Sabbath-school rooms and one of the most vigorous Sabbath-schools in the State.

The Methodist statistics are as follows:

Churches.	Members.	Sunday-School Scholars.	Church Value.
First Church.....	644	678	$100,000
Second Church.....	62	170	6,000

Akron First M. E. Church is one of the best church edifices in Ohio. The audience-room, exclusive of the vestibule, has an area of 90 by 64 feet; around which extends a gallery supported by brackets. The wood-work is of solid black walnut, and the house throughout is neatly and beautifully furnished. The basement below the audience-room affords commodious space for lecture-room, pastor's study, church parlor, kitchen, and Sunday-school library. The most attractive feature is the Sunday-school department. Not only has the church a commodious basement, but adjoining the church, school-rooms are built in the form of a semi-octodecagon, having an area of 64 by 45 feet; furnished with chairs, piano, fountain, pictures, etc. Around this is built a projection two stories high, providing rooms for separate classes. The rooms are airy and well lighted, and ample provision made for the infant department. The rooms can be closed separately, and can be thrown open into the main room by arched doorways, so that the superintendent may have, from a central point, command of every department of the school. The Sunday-school rooms were finished in 1870, at a cost of $20,000. The entire church and furnishing did not exceed $120,000. At the time of its erection, the membership was about 400; at present (1876) it is 644. The edifice is of brick with Ohio stone dressings, and is erected in the most substantial manner.

Alabama (pop. 996,992) was admitted as a State into the Union in 1819. Its early history is somewhat obscure. It is supposed to have been discovered by De Soto in 1541, and the first permanent settlement was made by the French in Mobile in 1711. After the war between England and France had been terminated by the treaty in 1673, Alabama passed into the hands of the English, and subsequently became part of the State of Georgia. In 1798, the region comprised in the States of Alabama and Mississippi was organized as a Territory, called Mississippi, with the exception of that part south of the parallel of 31 degrees north latitude, which at that time was embraced in Florida, and was under the government of Spain. In 1817, the western part was organized and admitted into the Union as the State of Mississippi, and the present Territory of Alabama remained until 1819, when it was also admitted as a State. At that time it had a population of 127,901, of whom about one-third were slaves. It had been previously inhabited by the Creek Indians, who, in the war of 1813 and 1814, were very troublesome, and destroyed a number of white settlers. They were, after a series of bloody encounters, subdued by General Jackson.

The first Methodist sermon, and probably the first Protestant sermon preached in Alabama, was by the famous Lorenzo Dow, in 1803 or 1804. In 1807, Bishop Asbury, at the South Carolina Conference, called for volunteers to go as missionaries to Tombigbee, and one minister offered his services. Two years afterwards, 80 church members were reported. In 1807, the Indian title to another part of the State was extinguished. And in 1809 there was a circuit of 170 members, to whom a minister was appointed from the Western Conference. In 1811, 400 members were reported in different parts of the State. At that time traveling was both difficult and dangerous. In 1810, a missionary records "that on his way to his charge he had to sleep under the trees thirteen nights." In 1811, the Territory of Alabama was placed in the Mississippi district of the Western Conference; and in 1817 it was organized into the Mississippi Conference. In 1820, the Tennessee Conference embraced that part of the State lying north of the Tennessee River, and the Mississippi Conference included the other parts of the State. In 1824, the lines were so changed that the Tennessee Conference embraced that part of Alabama over which the waters ran into the Tennessee River; the Mississippi Conference occupying the south. In 1832 an Alabama Conference was created, but the territory of the State was still shared in part between the Tennessee and Mississippi Conferences. At the separation of the M. E. Church South, in 1845, the Conferences including the State of Alabama identified themselves with the Southern organization: and the M. E. Church South was the strongest ecclesiastical organization in the State. At the close of the Civil War in 1865, the ministers of the M. E. Church were invited into the northern part of the State, and congregations were organized, which gradually extended their range over a large part of the territory. At the present time (1876) there are two Conferences of the M. E. Church, viz., the Alabama and the Central Alabama, having a membership of 10,720. The M. E. Church South has two Conferences, to wit, the Alabama and the North Alabama, having a membership of 41,219. The Methodist Protestant Church reports a membership of 2874. The African M. E. Church has a Conference, and reports 11,625 members. The African M. E. Zion Church and the Colored Church of America have also organizations, but we have not the exact numbers. The Church South does not in its general minutes report the value of its church property. The M. E. Church reports 202 churches, valued at $702,610. The M. E. Church South has 233 Sunday-schools with 27,140 scholars. According to the government census of 1870 there were in the State 2095 church organizations, 1958 edifices, 510,810 sittings, and church property valued at $2,414,515. These were divided among the different leading denominations as follows:

Alabama Conference (M. E. Church) was organized by the General Conference of 1832, having boundaries including "South Alabama, that part of Mississippi not included in the Mississippi Conference, and West Florida." The first session of this Conference was held in Tuscaloosa, Nov. 27, 1832. There is no report of its session except that there were in it 38 preachers. In 1833 it reported 8196 white, and 2770 colored members. In 1845, after the division of the church, this Conference adhered to the Church South. By the authority given to the bishops at the General Conference of 1864, Bishop Clark organized a new Conference at Talladega, Ala., Oct. 17, 1867. It reported 8362 members, 42 preachers admitted on trial, and 48 in all, 132 local preachers, 73 churches, value, $15,060, 69 Sunday-schools, and 3491 scholars. The General Conference of 1868 fixed its boundaries so as to embrace the State and that portion of Florida lying west of the Apalachicola River. In 1872 it simply included the State. By the General Conference of 1876 it was divided into the Alabama and Central Alabama Conferences. The Alabama Conference now includes the Lebanon, Birmingham, West Alabama, and South Alabama districts, embracing also the Sand Mountain and Scottsborough charges. The statistics are as follows:

Preachers, 40; members, 4788; churches, 97, value, $14,116; parsonages, 2, value, $175; Sunday-schools, 21; Sunday-school scholars, 1363.

Alabama Conference (M. E. Church South).—This Conference adhered to the Church South after the division of the church in 1845. It then "included all that part of the State of Alabama not included in the Tennessee Conference, West Florida, and the counties of Jackson, Greene, Wayne, Clark, Lauderdale, Kemper, Noxubee, Lowndes, and that part of Monroe east of the Tombigbee River, in the State of Mississippi." In 1845 this Conference reported, preachers, 110; white members, 26,514, colored, 13,537; local preachers, 394.

It now (1877) embraces the southern part of the State and Western Florida, including the Mobile, Greensboro', Selma, Prattville, Montgomery, Union Springs, Enfauila, and Marianna districts. Its statistics are given in the minutes as follows: members, 29,039, 64 of whom are colored; Sunday-schools, 333; Sunday-school scholars, 14,097.

Alabama Conference (M. P. Church) embraces the State of Alabama, and reports 35 itinerant and 15 unstationed ministers, 2900 members, 30 churches, and 6 parsonages, valued at $60,000.

Alabama Conference (African M. E. Church) was organized in July, 1868, at Mobile, by Bishop J. M. Brown. It includes the whole State of Alabama. At its organization, it reported 22 preachers, 5600 members and probationers, 6 churches, value, $4850, and 7 Sunday-schools. It now (1876) reports 89 preachers, 11,067 members, 135 Sunday-schools, with 7587 scholars, and 139 churches, value, $63,903.

Albany, N. Y. (pop. 76,216), is the capital of the State, and occupies a beautiful site on the west bank of the Hudson River. It was early settled by a Dutch population, who established religious worship according to the order of the Dutch Reformed Church. It was one among the first cities in which the early Methodist services were held. In 1767, Capt. Webb, before he visited New York City, was connected with its barracks, and held religious worship, though without the organization of any society. It was the scene of part of the labors of Freeborn Garrettson and others whose names have been distinguished in the history of the church. Methodism encountered at different periods much opposition in this city, but it has ultimately succeeded in gaining a very favorable position. The M. E. Church has now six edifices and societies, which report as follows:

Albert College, the principal educational institution of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada, is located in Belleville, on the Bay of Quinté, about midway between Kingston and Toronto. It was founded in 1855, and opened in 1857 as the Belleville Seminary: and has grown steadily through successive stages till it has become a reputable university in its character, and one of the best established and most efficient schools in the Province. The Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada, from the day that by its own action in 1828 it was set off from the Methodist Episcopal Church, inheriting the spirit of the founder of Methodism, has liberally promoted education, and been ever eager to start and perpetuate institutions of learning. In 1832 the Upper Canada Academy, now Victoria College, at Cobourg, was established. On the changes that occurred in the Methodism of Canada in 1833, the portion of that people that retained the name and polity of the Methodist Episcopal Church found themselves without any educational establishment, and so remained until the founding of the Belleville Seminary, now Albert College, in 1855.

ALBERT COLLEGE.

Pressed by the necessities of the case,—for the youth of the church that would be educated were compelled to go to the schools of other denominations, or other countries, and thus generally were lost to the M. E. Church, and sometimes to the country,—the Bay of Quinté Annual Conference resolved, in 1853, on the erection of a seminary of learning. The Niagara Annual Conference, and finally the General Conference, furthered the scheme; and, in July, 1857, in their spacious new brick edifice of four stories, 120 feet by 80, the authorities of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada were permitted, in the good providence of God, to behold the satisfaction of their desires and the answer of their prayers, in opening the doors of their seminary. It is a school for both sexes, and yet affords to both the broadest advantages of the highest culture and the highest honors. The first seminary faculty was composed of Joshua H. Johnson, M.A., Principal, and Professor of Ethics, etc.; Hiram P. Shepard, M.A., Professor of Ancient Languages and Literature; Jas. N. Martin, M.A., Professor of Natural Science, etc.; A. Carman, B.A., Professor of Mathematics; G. Goldsmith, English Tutor; Miss E. A. Deaver, Preceptress, and Teacher of Modern Languages; Miss A. Masury and Mrs. F. Crowell, Music Teachers. To-day the college council is constituted as follows: Rev. J. R. Jaques, D.D., Ph.D., President, and Professor of Ancient Languages and Literature; Geo. S. Wright, Esq., Ph.D., Professor of Modern Languages and Literature; Rev. E. I. Badgley, B.D., Professor of Hebrew, Ethics, etc.; Rev. A. Carman, D.D., Emeritus Professor of Metaphysics, etc.; Jno. Maconn, M.A., Professor of Botany, Geology, etc.; Jas. T. Bell, Esq., Professor of Agriculture, Mines, etc.; D. F. Wilkins, B.S., Professor of Mathematics, Chemistry, etc.; John Johnston, Esq., Lecturer on School Law; H. Which, Esq., Professor of Music; Mrs. J. R. Jaques, Preceptress, etc.; Miss C. Bannister, B.S., Painting, Drawing, etc.; Mrs. Henry Which, Assistant in Music. Besides these are employed several tutors and instructors. In 1860 Belleville Seminary was affiliated to Toronto University (the Provincial), and thus became Belleville College. In 1866 it was granted by the legislature an independent charter in arts, under the name of Albert College. In 1870 this charter was enlarged in its powers by the Parliament to all the arts and faculties, thus erecting Albert University. Its financial interests are held and controlled by a board of managers appointed by the General Conference. Its educational interests and scientific standing are guarded by the college council and by a senate, appointed by the same Conference, and approved by the Crown. Its work is done under statutes sanctioned by the Crown. So in a good sense it is a national institution. Signally, as in many church institutions, it has enjoyed the helping hand of a kindly Providence in the supply of men and money in the day of necessity. Perhaps the most noteworthy instance of this favor is the devotion of the treasurer, J. G. Robinson, a retired merchant, who has lifted the endowment fund to over $40,000, and is still leading on.

Albert University.—The literary and scientific corporation and body politic of Albert College, as above described, enacting curriculums and general statutes, and conferring degrees and honors under powers vested in them by the legislature and the Crown. The bishop of the church is the chancellor. The college professors are ex-officio senators, and the senate is enlarged at pleasure by the General Conference of the M. E. Church in Canada. The university is now conferring degrees in the faculties of Arts, Law, Theology, Science, Agriculture, Engineering, and Music.

Albion College.—As early as 1833, the project of founding a seminary of learning in Michigan, under Methodist patronage, was discussed by various ministers: and the enterprise, in 1831, received the sanction of the Ohio Conference, which at that time embraced a large part of Michigan. On March 23, 1835, a charter was obtained, from the legislature of the Territory, incorporating the trustees of Spring Arbor Seminary; and the first session of said corporation was held October 29, 1835, in the village of Jacksonburg, at the house of Dr. S. Stoddard. Officers were elected, and deeds of land, amounting to 210 acres, were executed in favor of the seminary, by William Smith and M. Benedict. Rev. Elijah Crane was appointed first financial agent. Numerous subscriptions were obtained, and 100,000 bricks for the seminary edifice were provided.

The financial crisis of 1836-37, however, delayed the work of building, and as the eligibility of the site selected was doubted by many, a proposition was made to remove it to whatever place should offer the most favorable inducements. The citizens of Albion having donated beautiful grounds for seminary purposes, and having subscribed a few thousand dollars for buildings, it was transferred to that place; and in 1839, an amendment to the occurred in 1850, when the charter was amended, and the institution was incorporated, under the name of "Albion Female Collegiate Institute and Wesleyan Seminary." The Rev. Clark T. Hinman was elected president, assisted by Professors E. W. Merrill, Norman Abbett, L. R. Fisk, and I. C. Cochrane. Miss Sarah Hunt was principal of the female department, and W. H. Brockway was appointed general agent. The number of students during the year was 355.

In 1861, the title was changed to that of Albion College, and the faculty was organized with Rev. Thomas H. Sinex, as president, and C. C. Olds and John Richards, professors; Miss Julia F. Robertson being principal of the female departcharter was obtained, changing the name to the Wesleyan Seminary at Albion. The corner-stone of the central edifice was laid July 6, 1841, and on October 7, 1842, a preparatory school was opened, under the direction of Rev. G. P. Tyndall, in a temporary building erected for the purpose. In November, 1843, the seminary proper was opened, under the presidency of Rev. Charles P. Stockwell, A.B., assisted by a corps of teachers. At first the sessions were held in the Methodist church edifice, but in January, 1844, they were removed to the central edifice, which had just been completed under the supervision of Rev. A. Billings, agent. The number of students during the winter was 117, and during the summer 183. The next change in the character of the institution ment. The number of students for the year was 290. In 1865, the last change was made in the charter, by which Hon. John Owen, E. G. Merrick, Esq., and E. J. Connable were constituted an "endowment fund committee," to secure, hold, and invest all money contributed for the endowment of the college, and to pay over to the board of trustees, semi-annually, all the interest accruing thereon. The faculty consisted of Rev. George B. Jocelyn, D.D., president, and Professors W. H. Perrine, W. H. Shelley, Mrs. L. B. Perrine, and Miss Rachel Carney. During the past year, Dr. Jocelyn died and James H. Hopkins has acted as vice-president, assisted by Professors W. M. Osband, Natural Science; Mrs. Lucy A. Osband, Modern Languages; Roland C. Welsh, Greek and Hebrew; George B.

Merriman, Mathematics; Louis F. Sternes, History and Belles-Lettres; with teachers of music and other accomplishments. The property of the institution consists of buildings, grounds, and furniture valued at $65,000; library, apparatus, and cabinet, $5000; president's house, $2000; funds in hands of endowment committee in bonds, mortgages, and notes, $143,554; in the hands of the Albion board of control, invested in notes, $28,896. The income for the past year was $15,942.97. There is an indebtedness of $19,200, for which a sinking fund has been created. The institution having passed through many changes, and through a series of difficulties, has now a fine prospect for the future.

Albion, N. Y. (pop. 3322), the capital of Orleans County. In 1845 the Methodists, Presbyterians, and Baptists had each one church, and there was an academy and a female seminary. Present Methodist statistics:

Albion Seminary is located in Albion, Marshall Co., Iowa, six miles north of Marshalltown. The village is healthy and moral, and contains about 800 inhabitants. The building is a substantial brick structure adequate to the necessities of the institution. The seminary is under the patronage of the Upper Iowa Conference of the M. E. Church; the property of the corporation, including grounds, buildings, and notes, amounts to $25,000. Through the munificence of Professor John F. Eberhart, of Chicago, the endowment has been increased to over $10,000. The average number of students is about two hundred. The seminary was organized in 1872, with Thomas B. Taylor as principal. He was succeeded by Rev. S. G. Smith. The present faculty are John Sanborn, A.M., Principal, and Professor of Mathematics and Latin; Rev. John S. McIntyre, Professor of Science and History; Miss Adelina N. McCormac, Music, French, and Grammar; Miss Jenny M. Besom, Drawing and Painting; G. H. Blanchard, Commercial Department.

Albright, Alexander, Count de Hirschfeld, a minister and teacher in the M. E. Church South, was a native of the duchy of Oldenburg, Germany, and descended from a renowned family. He was a regular graduate of the military school at Eutin, in Holstein. In 1840 he entered the army with the rank of lieutenant. In 1843 he entered the Austrian army with the rank of captain. In 1853 he came to the United States, and in 1856 joined the M. E. Church South in Missouri. In 1871 he was transferred from the Missouri to the Texas Conference, and assigned to the German mission at Galveston. The next year he was appointed to the New Braunfels circuit. In 1873 he was made supernumerary with the design of teaching as a professor of German literature in the Texas University. His health failing, however, he never entered on his duties. In 1874 he was superannuated. He died at Georgetown, Texas, March 2, 1875.

Albright, Gen. Charles, of Mauch Chunk, was born in Berks Co., Pa., December 13, 1830: was educated at Dickinson College; studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1852; in 1854, went to Kansas, and participated in the early struggles of the Territory for freedom. In 1856 he returned to Pennsylvania, and resumed the practice of law at Mauch Chunk, where he still resides. In 1862 he entered the army as major, and after the battle of Antietam was made lieutenant-colonel. In 1863 he was commissioned colonel, and in 1865 he was brevetted brigadier-general. In 1872 he was elected a member of Congress from the State at large. As a business man, he has been in the manufacture of iron since 1863, and as president of the Second National Bank at Mauch Chunk since 1864. As an attorney, he is well known for his successful prosecution of the "Molly Maguire" cases. For a number of years he has been an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, filling various official stations. He was a member of the General Conference of 1872, and has been chiefly instrumental in erecting a beautiful church in his village.

Albright, Hon. Charles J., was born in Carlisle, Pa. He was a descendant of Methodist ancestry, and his father's house was frequently the home of Bishop Asbury and other heroes of early Methodism. For over forty years he has been a resident of Ohio, chiefly at Cambridge, his present residence. For over twenty years he has been connected with the press, and has occupied prominent and responsible public positions at different periods. From 1855 to 1857 he was a member of the Thirty-fourth Congress, and for several years thereafter was in the United States Internal Revenue Service in the district where he resides. He was elected lay delegate from the Pittsburgh Conference M. E. Church to the session of the General Conference of 1872.

Albright, Jacob, the founder of the "Albright Methodists," or properly "Evangelical Association," was born in Lancaster Co., Pa. He was a descendant of the Mennonites who had early settled in that county. It was the custom of that society to choose their ministers by ballot or lot. In this way Martin Boehm was chosen their minister before he was converted. He was the father of Henry Boehm, the centenarian of American Methodism. But Martin was awakened and converted by his own preaching. He then with fresh vigor called the people to repentance and salvation, and among his converts was Jacob Albright. Mr. Boehm's preaching not being acceptable to the Mennonites he was disowned by them, and Mr. Albright, Mr. Boehm, and others united with the M. E. Church, and Mr. Albright became a local minister in the M. E. Church about 1790. Being a German, he began to labor extensively among his own people. He began in 1796 to travel as an evangelist, believing his call was exclusively to the German people. He organized classes and churches in 1800, and in 1803 he was appointed as presiding elder over them. In 1807 the work under his supervision had increased so much that the ministers assembled as a Conference. He died six months after this Conference. He seems to have had no thought of organizing a church; that was a work done after his death, in 1809. He was very highly esteemed by Bishop Asbury.

Albright Methodists.—See EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION.

Alderson, Alberly L., a minister of the M. E. Church South, was born in Hart Co., Ky., and united with the Kentucky Conference in 1833. Whether on circuit, stations, or districts, he was eminently popular and successful. His sermons and addresses were earnest, clear, and logical, and his defense of the truth able and convincing. His culture was of a high order. He died in peace in the county of his birth, November 3, 1871, in the sixty-first year of his age.

Alexandra College, Canada.—In the seminary period of Albert College, by virtue of the subscription covenant it provided instruction for both sexes. In the primary College period (affiliation), under the Toronto University restrictions ladies were not eligible to degrees. In the secondary College period (Albert), the board of management prescribed a distinct course appropriate to ladies, and authorized a suitable diploma. Now this provision is extended, and the university senate may at any time admit competent ladies to the usual arts degrees. Ladies attending Alexandra College have all the advantages of the lectures of Albert College, besides the usual provisions of ladies' colleges in the various branches of ornamental education. The aim is to afford superior facilities to women for solid education; and though the prejudices of the country are largely against co-education, this department of the scholastic work of the church has been well sustained.

Alexandria, Va. (pop. 13,570), seven miles below Washington, on the Potomac River. It was once the residence of Washington, and the church where he worshiped is still standing. It is first noticed in the minutes for the year 1792, when Rev. Ezekiel Cooper was appointed pastor. The Baltimore Conference was held there the same year. In 1816 there were reported 530 members. The troubles connected with slavery, in the border States, seriously impeded the growth of the church. At one time a large proportion of the strength of the membership united with the Church South. The statistics at present are:

Algona College is located at Algona, Iowa, on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad. The College campus contains eight acres, and is finely located on the bank of the Des Moines River. Natural forest-trees adorn the entire grounds. The building contains a chapel, recitation-rooms, library, museum, reading-rooms, etc. It is furnished with valuable chemical and philosophical apparatus, and a museum of considerable merit. It has collegiate and preparatory departments. Attention is paid to music and commercial instruction. It numbered last year 108 students, of which about one-half were ladies. Its faculty consists of Rev. William F. Barclay, A.M., President; Albert N. Bushnel, Mathematics and Natural Science; Ella M. Ray, French and Latin, assisted by a number of instructors.

The building is valued at $6000. The endowment is estimated at $17,000. It is owned by, and is under the patronage of, the Upper Iowa Conference M. E. Church.

Allegheny City, Pa. (pop. 53,180), is situated directly across the Allegheny River from Pittsburgh, and has had a rapid growth. It is related to Pittsburgh as Brooklyn is to New York, or Camden is to Philadelphia; and its growth has been owing to the overflowing of the densely crowded population of the city of Pittsburgh, as the inhabitants prefer to move across the river rather than climb the adjacent hills. Its wide and regular streets, its beautiful parks, and its greater freedom from smoke have made it a desirable place of residence. The Presbyterian, United Presbyterian, and Reformed Presbyterian have each in this city a theological seminary. From these advantages, as well as from the character of the early settlers, the Calvinistic churches have grown rapidly. Methodism without such resources has, nevertheless, made steady progress since it commenced its labors in the city. At the Conference held at Wellsburg, Va., in 1832, Rev. Alfred Brunson was appointed to Allegheny Town. This is the first mention of the place in the Conference minutes, although there had been preaching for years before when it was connected with the churches in Pittsburgh. At the ensuing Conference 214 members were reported, and Rev. Daniel Limerick was appointed pastor, and was succeeded in the following year by the Rev. S. R. Boekunier. In the same year it became the head of a district, which took its name from the city. From that period the growth was gradual but constant. The city enjoyed the labors of some of the most eminent men of the Conference, among whom were Joshua Munroe, Charles Cook, Robert Hopkins, and Simon Elliot. In 1838, the station was divided, and the two churches were named Beaver Street and South Common, which together reported the following year 441 members.

At the separation from the church, which took place in 1830, the Methodist Protestants organized a society in Allegheny City, and some time after erected a handsome church on the East Common, and more recently a second church, on Rebecca Street, in the lower part of the city. Other churches have since been erected by the M. E. Church, the most beautiful of which is North Avenue, which has a very flourishing congregation and Sabbath-school. The statistics of the different branches are as follows:

Allegheny College is located at Meadville, Pa. Preliminary measures for its establishment were arranged in 1815; and March 24, 1817, the college was incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania under a board of fifty trustees. Rev. Thomas Alden, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was inaugurated as its first president, July 28, 1817. The corner-stone of Bently Hall, its principal building, was laid July 5, 1820. About this time Dr. Bently, of Massachusetts, gave to it a library valued at $3000. Isaiah Thomas, of Worcester, made it handsome donations, and ex-Governor Winthrop gave a private library valued at $6000. Presidents Jefferson and Madison, who examined these libraries, spoke of them in the highest terms. The college was under Presbyterian management until 1833, when it passed under the control of the Pittsburgh Conference, M. E. Church, and subsequently, the Erie and West Virginia Conferences formed from it, became jointly with it patronizing bodies. They appointed members who become a joint body of control, having, by agreement with the trustees, power to nominate professors, fix the salaries, and nominate persons for vacancies occurring in the board of trustees. Martin Ruter, D.D., was elected the first president under the new organization in 1833; Homer J. Clark, D.D., in 1837; Rev. John Barker, in 1847; George Loomis, D.D., in 1860; and Lucius H. Bugbee, D.D., in 1875. Ruter Hall, which is occupied by the chapel, cabinets, and library, was subsequently erected, and also Culver Hall, devoted to co-operative boarding and dormitory purposes. It will accommodate one hundred students. The invested funds amount to about $200,000. These funds are held by chartered bodies under the several Conferences according to the amount subscribed or raised by them for endowment purposes, and are dispensed through their treasurers for the payment of salaries. The buildings, grounds, cabinets, apparatus, and other properties of the college are estimated at $300,000. The scientific collections are especially rich and varied, comprising among others the well-known collection of Francis Alger, of Boston. Tuition is free, the contingent fee being $10 per term, there being three terms in the academic year. Boarding does not usually exceed three dollars per week. Young women are admitted to all of the privileges of the college. A preparatory school of thorough grade was opened in 1876. A military department was opened in April, 1877, under an officer assigned by the government from the regular army. There are now in operation the following schools: 1. The School of the Liberal Arts. 2. The School of Modern Languages and Science. 3. The School of Philosophy. 4. The School of Theology. 5. The School of Military Science. 6. The School of Preparation for College. The present faculty is as follows: Lucius H. Bugbee, D.D., President and Chamberlain, Professor of Philosophy and Christian Evidences; Jonathan Hamnett, D.D., Vice-President, and Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy; Jeremiah Tingley, A.M., Ph.D., Professor of Physics and Chemistry, and Librarian; Ammi B.

Hyde, D.D., Professor of Greek and Hebrew; Charles W. Reid, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages; George W. Haskins, A.M., Bradley Professor of Latin Language and Literature, and Secretary of the Faculty; John S. McKay, A.B., Preparatory School; Nathan Shepherd, A.M., Lecturer on English Literature and Public Speaking; W. W. Wythe, M.D., Lecturer on Mechanical Philosophy; James A. Montgomery, A.B., Assistant in the Laboratories.

The constant effort of the trustees and faculty is to give a solid and liberal education to the young people of the country at such a reasonable cost as to bring it within the reach of all. Among its professors and students are many who now occupy ments and library and in other ways to add to its usefulness.

Allen, Charles F., a minister and educator in the M. E. Church, was admitted on trial in the Maine Conference July 19, 1843, and has filled a number of appointments in that Conference; and also in the East Maine, such as Bath, Portland, and Bangor. In 1872 he was appointed president of Maine State College, which position he now fills. He was a reserve delegate to the General Conference of 1860, a delegate elect in 1864 and 1868, and a reserve delegate in 1876. In accordance with the action of that Conference he was appointed on the committee to revise the Hymn-Book.

distinguished positions in the church and in the country. Bishop Simpson was Vice-President and Professor of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry in 1837 and 1838. Bishop Kingsley graduated in 1841; he was Assistant in Mathematics in 1840, and closed his connection with the college in 1856 as Vice-President and Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy. Among the alumni are ex-Governor Pierrepont, of West Virginia; George W. Clark, D.D.; Alexander Martin, D.D., President of the Indiana University; James Marvin, Chancellor of Kansas State University; Albert Long, Professor in Roberts College, Constantinople; James M. Thoburn and J. W. Waugh, missionaries in India; Col. J. R. Weaver, Consul at Antwerp; Rev. Drs. Moses Hill, W. A. Davidson, and many others who have distinguished themselves in various professions and departments at home and abroad. An effort is now being made to increase its endow-Episcopal Church South, was born in Charleston, S. C., Aug. 24, 1808, and died in Tennessee in 1868. He was converted in his nineteenth year, and entered the South Carolina Conference in 1829, and, after filling several appointments, located in 1836 on account of failing health. He emigrated to Tennessee, and there united with the Memphis Conference at its first session in 1840, with which he was connected at the time of his death. His last sickness, although protracted, was borne with great patience and even triumph. His last words were, "All is glory ahead, brother." His knowledge of general literature was extensive and accurate. This made him a useful member not only of the church but of the Conference. He filled his appointments with efficiency, and was twice elected as a delegate to the General Conference.

Allen, Richard, a colored minister, was the first bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. He was born in 1760. At the age of seventeen he joined the Methodist society in Delaware, and at twenty-two commenced his labors as a local preacher. He was the leader in erecting the first African church in America, which was built in Philadelphia, 1793. He was the first colored preacher ordained deacon by Bishop Asbury, in 1799. He remained in connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church until 1816, when, with a large number of the colored membership, he withdrew, and assisted in organizing the African Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1816, and at their first General Conference, he was elected bishop. He was a man of but little education, but of great energy of character, united with good judgment. He died March 26, 1831. A monument to his memory has recently been erected in the Philadelphia Park by the members of his church.

Allen, Stephen, D.D., a delegate from the Maine Conference to the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1852, 1856, and 1872, was born in Maine in 1810, was graduated from Bowdoin College, where he graduated after a four years' course. After leaving college he taught Greek and Latin for two and a half years in the Oneida Conference Seminary at Cazenovia, N. Y. He then returned to Augusta to take charge of the high school of that city, but in a few months he accepted the professorship of Chemistry and Natural Philosophy at Dickinson College, Pa. After occupying this chair for ten years, he filled that of English Literature for three years. From his youth he has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and during his residence at Dickinson College, he was a regular contributor to the Methodist Quarterly Review. He also delivered lectures in Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, and Indianapolis. In January, 1850, he was appointed president of Girard College, where he remained for nearly thirteen years. After retiring to a farm on the banks of the Delaware for two years, he accepted the presidency of the Pennsylvania Agricultural College. In 1867 he was recalled to Girard College, and is still president of that institution. He is also president of the American Bible Society, to which place he was elected in March, 1872. In 1850 the degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred upon him by the Union College, N. Y., and also by Emory and Henry College, Va.

Allentown, Pa. (pop. 13,884), the capital of Lehigh County, is situated on the west bank of the Lehigh River. William Penn granted 20,000 acres of land embracing this locality, and William Allen built the first house, in 1750. The surrounding tracts were bought by Philadelphia capitalists, and constituted a famous hunting-ground, known as Gentlemen's Land. On one of these sites was built the first Lutheran church in America. In 1762 the town was laid out and called Northampton, but, in 1838, changed to Allentown. The population is mostly German descent, and is extensively engaged in iron manufacture. The growth of Methodism has been slow and difficult. The following are the statistics:

Alliance, Ohio (pop. 4063), is an important and rapidly-growing town at the intersection of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad with the Cleveland and Pittsburgh Railroad. Mount Union College, one of the flourishing institutions of learning in the Methodist Episcopal Church, is in close proximity.

This region was originally included in Salem circuit, and the appointment was first called Williamsport, the name of one of the towns now embraced in Alliance. Rev. Martin L. Weekly organized the first Methodist class in 1839. The first Methodist church was built in 1844. A new church on a new site was erected in 1865, enlarged and improved in 1874. It has 408 members; church property, $25,000; Sunday-school scholars, 430.

Allin, Thomas, an eminent minister of the Methodist New Connection, England, was born Feb. 10, 1784, and died Nov. 7, 1866. From earliest years he was distinguished for strong manifestation of devout feeling and correct moral conduct, and when about thirteen years old he gave his heart to God. Shortly afterwards he united with the church, became a Sunday-school teacher, and, after acting as a local preacher for a few years, he was admitted into the Conference in 1808. From the commencement of his public labors he gave promise of great success, and, in a few years, rose to great popularity and eminence. In 1833, because of physical weakness increased by an attack of cholera, he was compelled to retire from the fatigue of circuit work: very frequently, however, he preached to large and appreciative audiences the unsearchable riches of Christ. The predominant quality of his mind was capability and taste for metaphysical and philosophical discussion, and in such themes he appeared to wonderful advantage. His delivery was distinguished for its earnestness, and its effect was greatly heightened by his finely modulated enunciation, his penetrating eye, and his strikingly expressive countenance.

For fifteen years he was the chief administrator of the church. The year after he became supernumerary he was elected corresponding secretary to the connectional committee, which office put into his hands nearly all the business of the denomination in the interim of Conferences. He was frequently chosen to serve on the stationing committee, and for ten consecutive years was missionary secretary. Through the liberality of a few wealthy laymen he had for some time the training of young men for the ministry. His first publication—a sermon preached at the opening of Salem church, Halifax, 1815—was on the subject of church government. This discourse contains an exposition of the principles of the Methodist New Connection polity, which the author afterwards expanded into a treatise in the third and fourth chapters of the Jubilee volume. The question of church government he made a special study. He also wrote letters to Rev. John Maclean, containing objections to the government of Wesleyan Methodism. The gatherings of the Evangelical Alliance brought him to a personal acquaintance with some who were the chief upholders of that polity in Methodism to which he had been hostile, and that acquaintance dispelled some impressions he had received. He found he could esteem them for their many Christian excellences, while he was faithful to his convictions on points of ecclesiastical difference. The first time he entered the arena of controversy was in defense of the doctrine of the true and proper divinity of Christ's person against the teachings of the Rev. Mr. Harris, a Unitarian minister.

In 1828 he published a volume of discourses on the character and folly of modern atheism and the necessity of a divine relation. In this volume he incorporated a discourse on the immortality of the soul, previously published separately, and which has received great attention. In 1848 a second edition of this work was issued, with an introduction and notes, in which German pantheism and the gradual development theory of "the vestiges of creation" were discussed.

Allison, David, President of Mount Allison Wesleyan College, Sackville, N. B., was born July 3, 1836, and was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1859. He became in the same year

HON. JOHN ALLISON.

At the opening of the Sheffield Mechanics' Institution in 1833, he delivered the inaugural address, taking for his theme the proposition that Christianity not only allows but requires the acquisition of general knowledge. This address was received with such favor as to be repeated by request, and so delivered in successive weeks to two large and respectable assemblies, in the music hall of that town. It was subsequently published.

The Conference of 1862 requested him to prepare a volume of his discourses for the press, and in complying with this wish of his brethren he closed the labors of his life. He was seized with paralysis in a severe form, and immediate dissolution was expected. He rallied, however, and for two years longer lingered, having his mind uninterruptedly filled with the peace of God.

principal of the Stanstead Academy, Stanstead, Canada, and in 1860 teacher of Ancient Languages in the Mount Allison Wesleyan Academy, Sackville, N. B. He was elected president of Mount Allison Wesleyan College in 1869.

Allison, Hon. John, was born at Beaver, Pa., in 1812, and descended from an early settler of Washington County. He studied law and was admitted to the bar, but did not practice. Became a member of the M. E. Church in his early manhood, and held various official relations in it to the close of his life. In 1847, 1848, and 1850 he was a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature. He was elected to Congress in 1850, and again in 1854. President Lincoln appointed him a paymaster in the United States army, and he served to the end of the war, and retired honorably from the service.

He was at the commencement of President Grant's first term appointed Register of the United States Treasury, a position which he filled with ability and fidelity until his death, which occurred March 23, 1878.

Allman, Hon. William, was born in 1818, and in his early manhood was converted and received into the M. E. Church. He was educated at the Indiana Asbury University, and then settled at Sturgis, Mich. For thirty years he has adorned the office of steward and Sunday-school superintendent, and holds a position of commanding influence in the State. He has filled many positions of responsibility in civil and church affairs. Has rendered important service as trustee of Albion College. At the present time he is president of the First National Bank of Sturgis. He was lay delegate from Michigan Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Allyn, Robert, D. D., president of the Southern Illinois Normal College, was born at Ledyard, Conn., January 25, 1817. He was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1841, and in the same year became a teacher of mathematics in the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham, Mass. He joined the New England Conference of the M. E. Church in 1842, was engaged in pastoral work from 1843 to 1846, and was in that year elected principal of the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham. In 1848 he was appointed principal of the Providence Conference Seminary, at East Greenwich, R. I., and continued in this position till 1854, when he was elected Commissioner of Public Schools of Rhode Island. In 1857, he became Professor of Ancient Languages in the Ohio University, at Athens. In 1859, he was chosen president of the Wesleyan Female College, Cincinnati, and in 1863, president of McKendree College. In 1873, he returned to itinerant work, but was shortly afterwards elected president of the Southern Illinois Normal College, at Carbondale.

Dr. Allyn was a member of the legislature of Rhode Island in 1852 and 1854, was a Visitor to the United States Military Academy at West Point in 1854, and was a member of the General Conference in 1872.

Alma College.—This institution, designed at present solely for the education of girls and women, is in its incipient stages. It is to be located at St. Thomas, Elgin Co., Ontario, on the Canada Southern Railway, about midway between Buffalo and Detroit. The three Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church in Canada have all thoroughly indorsed the scheme, and have given pledge of substantial support in liberal voluntary subscription. The town of St. Thomas has contributed already $5000, a site of five acres has been obtained, an agent in the field on twelve circuits in three months has secured $4000, so that the friends of the enterprise have no doubts of its success.

Alms, or the giving of relief to the poor, as an act of charity, is enjoined in the Holy Scriptures. The teachings of both the Old and New Testaments are clear and explicit, but no specific amount or method is enjoined. The Jews were directed to leave the gleanings of their fields and of their vineyards for the poor, and special attention to them was enjoined. The early Christians made collections to assist the poor in times of distress, not only in their own immediate vicinity, but in distant parts of the country. In the Methodist churches alms are collected on every sacramental occasion, prior to the Lord's Supper, and also at the love-feasts. The ritual prescribes portions of God's word to be read while "persons appointed for that purpose shall receive the alms for the poor." Liberality and benevolence are earnestly inculcated.

Altar.—This word was originally used to signify a structure on which sacrifices were offered to the Deity. They were erected in heathen temples and at the gates of cities. In the Jewish tabernacle and temple the altar was the place where the sacrifices of the people were presented. Wherever altars were erected they were considered as an asylum for those who fled for refuge. In the early services of the Greek Church the phrase was employed to signify the Lord's table, probably from an expression in the Epistle to the Hebrews, "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle." In many of the Christian churches a table was placed whereon alms were laid, and this table was sometimes called the altar. In Protestant churches the communion-table sometimes receives that designation. In Methodist churches, as the communicants kneel around a railing which partially incloses the pulpit, it is sometimes termed the altar, and in the services persons are invited to kneel at the altar of prayer. When employed in this sense it has no reference to any sacrificial offering, but simply expresses the presentation of the individual in a special service of supplication and prayer.

Alton, Ill. (pop. 8665), is situated on the Mississippi River, 25 miles above St. Louis. The Methodist Episcopal Church has 165 members, 175 Sunday-school scholars, a church valued at $21,000, and a parsonage at $4000. The African M. E. Church has 91 members, 45 Sunday-school scholars, and a church valued at $3000. The German M. E. Church has 218 members, 180 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $6000.

Altoona, Pa. (pop. 10,610), is a young and flourishing city on the Pennsylvania Railroad, near the slope of the Allegheny Mountains. It has been mostly built since the opening of the railroad, and has had a rapid growth. Methodist services were established immediately on its settlement, and the church has grown steadily with the population.

It is in the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and the statistics are as follows:

Alverson, James Lawrence, LL.D., late professor in Genesee College, was born in Seneca, N. Y., in 1816, and died at Lima, N. Y., September 12, 1864. He was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1838, and in the same year became principal of an academy at Elmira, N. Y. In 1841 he was engaged as a teacher in the Oneida Conference Seminary, and in 1844 became a teacher in the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary. In 1847 he was appointed principal of the latter institution. In 1849 he was elected Professor of Mathematics in Genesee College. He continued in this position, serving a part of the time as acting president of the college, till his death.

Amedon, Moses, was born October 10, 1794, in Vermont. He became the subject of religious experience at the age of seventeen; was admitted on trial in the New York Annual Conference in 1814, and continued to labor in various appointments until he ended his course, March 21, 1830. When near his end he was asked whether he was willing to exchange worlds. He replied, "Willing, willing, willing," and fell asleep in Jesus.

Amen is a Hebrew word, which has passed without alteration into all the languages of Christendom, and which is generally used at the close of prayer. Its original meaning was "surely" or "truly," giving intensity to the petition. It is now the response of the people after the minister has used the invocation. In the early Christian church the assembly at large responded "Amen" at the close of the prayer. St. Jerome says, "At the conclusion of public prayer, the united voice of the people sounded like the fall of water, or the noise of thunder." In the Eucharist the communicant was directed, on receiving the elements, to say, "Amen." In the Church of England it was used not only at the end of public prayer, but also at the end of specific paragraphs in the prayer, as well as at the end of the Creed. The ritual of that church directs that "the people shall at the end of all prayers answer 'Amen.'"

The early Methodists, having been trained in the Church of England, and having been accustomed to respond "Amen" at the close of various petitions, as directed in the Prayer-Book, transferred the practice into extempore prayer; and when petitions were offered in which they felt a deep interest, they gave utterance to such a response. In this response was indicated, simply, the earnest desire of the petitioner for the fulfillment of the prayer. As a historical fact, it may be observed, that the use of this exclamation is much more frequent in churches established in communities accustomed to the ritual of the Church of England than in those which are established in communities of Presbyterian or Congregational proclivities.

America is a grand division of the globe, extending from the frozen fields in the extreme north to Terra del Fuego, near 55 degrees south latitude. This immense tract, about 11,000 miles in length, embracing every variety of climate, soil, geological formation and production, is estimated to contain from fourteen to seventeen millions of square miles. It is naturally separated into two grand divisions by the Isthmus of Darien, which is, at its narrowest part, but 28 miles; North America containing about 8,500,000 square miles, and South America about 6,500,000. The continent is four times as large as Europe; about one-third larger than Africa; but is one-half less than Asia, including Australia and Polynesia; and it comprises about three-tenths of the land on the surface of the globe. The greatest breadth in South America is 3250 miles, and in North America, about 3100 miles. Its discovery, near the close of the fifteenth century, gave a vast impulse to European enterprise, and its immense mines added to the wealth of the civilized world. Prior to its discovery by Columbus, however, it appears to have been visited about the year 1000 by the Icelanders and Norwegians, who introduced Christianity into Greenland; all traces of it, however, had disappeared when the discovery by the Spaniards took place in 1492. The Spaniards being intensely Roman Catholic, that form of religion was established wherever they penetrated, and hence prevailed over the southern part of North America, Central America, Peru, and Chili. The Portuguese, who settled in Brazil and other parts of South America and in portions of the West Indies, also established the same form of religion. It was also established by the French in Canada and through the Mississippi Valley,—priests always accompanying their exploring expeditions. The Atlantic coast was settled chiefly by Protestants from England, Germany, and Holland, and by the Huguenots from France; and by them the Protestant religion was introduced. In the various wars which occurred, the English arms triumphed over Spain in the West Indies, and over France in Canada and in the Mississippi Valley; and thus these countries came under Protestant dominion; subsequently, by purchase and by cession, Florida and the territory west of the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean, was obtained from France, Spain, and Mexico.

Methodism was introduced into New York and into Maryland about 1766, and it gradually spread, by the efforts of Wesleyan ministers from England, along the entire Atlantic coast until the Revolution in 1776. After that period the religious services were conducted chiefly by native preachers, and the M. E. Church was organized in December, 1784. It has since spread through the entire territory of the United States. In its history several divisions have occurred, establishing various branches of Methodism, all of which, however, retain the same doctrines and the same general usages. In 1786, Dr. Coke visited the West Indies, and established missions in those islands. About the same time Methodism was introduced into Nova Scotia, and subsequently into Upper and Lower Canada. The Wesleyans have also established a few missions on the coast of Central America in the British Provinces. The M. E. Church has established a mission in the Argentine Republic in South America, and, in 1873, a mission was opened in Mexico, under the superintendence of Rev. Dr. Butler, where a few congregations have been gathered at various points. The largest development which Methodism has made has been in the United States, where it has steadily grown with the increase of population, until, numerically, it is the largest of all Protestant denominations. The Methodists of Canada have also grown steadily, and have manifested much missionary zeal in forming societies through the partially settled portions of the North and West; but in Mexico, Central, and South America but little has yet been accomplished.

American Colonies and Methodism.—To show the relation of Methodism to the cause of the American Colonies during the Revolution especially is the design of this article. As it respects John Wesley, it has been too often supposed that he was opposed to the real interests of the Colonies during that period. A full investigation, however, of all his writings relating to this matter will satisfy the most skeptical that he was their friend. It is very true that he was loyal to the government under which he lived, and frequently expressed in official ways his readiness to obey his government in all things agreeable to the word of God. In heart, however, John Wesley was opposed to war. He considered it an "amazing" way of deciding controversies, and that mankind must be very degraded before war could enter the affairs of men. If at any time, however, war was to be considered defensible it would be in a case of invasion; and, in accordance with this view, he at one time offered to raise some troops for the defense of England against the expected invasion of the French. He seems, however, to have almost repented of this offer, as he never renewed it, and says he never intended to. Concerning the conduct of England toward the American Colonies, he said, in 1770,

"I do not defend the measures which have been taken with regard to America. I doubt whether any man can defend them either on the foot of law, equity, or prudence." In 1775 he wrote that statesmanlike letter to Lord North, the Prime Minister of England, a copy of which was sent to Dartmouth, the Secretary of the Colonies. In this letter, among other expressions, he referred to his prejudice for his own country, and yet he said, "I cannot avoid thinking, if I think at all, that an oppressed people ask for nothing more than their legal rights, and that in the most modest and inoffensive manner which the nature of the thing would allow." His fullest biographer says this document is "full of warning and foresight, which were terribly fulfilled, and for fidelity, fullness, terseness, in short, for multum in parvo, was perhaps without a parallel in the correspondence of these ministers of state." It is well authenticated in history that Lord North was for some time a secret friend of the American cause. It is also known that John Wesley was the intimate friend of Lord North, as he was also of Dartmouth. It is true, however, that John Wesley wrote, or rather abridged from Dr. Johnson, what is known as the "Calm Address to the Colonies." His design was purely pacific. He had societies in America as well as in Europe, and, knowing that war must generally prove disastrous to religion, he was very anxious for the preservation of his societies in both countries. But the address failing to accomplish his purpose, and observing this failure, he said afterwards, "All parties are already too much sharpened against each other. We must pour water, not oil, into the flame. I had written a little tract ('Calm Address') upon the subject before I knew the American ports were shut up. I think there is not one sharp word therein; I did not design there should be." He also, after this, wrote a calm address to the inhabitants of England. His design in this address was somewhat similar to his design in the address to the Colonies. He was still laboring for an amicable adjustment of the difficulties,—like Pownall, Fox, Burke, and others, who were laboring earnestly in the British Parliament in favor of the cessation of hostilities,—so, also, was Wesley laboring for the same end.

It should be remembered, also, that all hope of unity and reconciliation was not abandoned in England until 1780. Indeed, we may go forward as far as Jan. 1782, when by a bare majority of a few votes the House of Commons passed a motion virtually acknowledging the independence of the Colonies. Wesley's great aim seemed to be, as he expressed it, "A restoration of civil and Christian liberty."

As it respects Wesley's co-laborers in America, it should be remembered that they came to America as missionaries, not certainly intending to make it their permanent home: hence, the war breaking out, the most of them returned to England. Asbury chose to remain and share the fate of the country during that struggle. He being, however, a foreigner by birth, was suspected of being in sympathy with his native country, yet his great foresight assured him of the independence of the American Colonies, and he told the missionaries from England that "he felt quite sure the Americans would never be satisfied with anything short of independence, and that he felt a presentiment that God Almighty designed America to be free and independent, and that a great American Methodist people would be gathered in this country." Ezekiel Cooper said of Asbury,—and he knew him intimately,—that he was a "safe and good citizen, a circumspect Christian, and a faithful minister of the gospel, worthy of confidence as a friend to the country of his choice, of which he had voluntarily become a citizen. He thought it would be an eternal disgrace to forsake in this time of trial the thousands of poor sheep in the wilderness who had placed themselves under the care of the Methodists, and, fully sympathizing with the cause of the struggling Colonies, he resolved to remain and share the sufferings and the fate of the infant connection and of the country. Like many of the religious people of those times, he was from conscientious scruples a non-juror, as were all the other Methodist preachers, and also many of the clergy of the Episcopal Church, but yet he chose to remain in the country. As their character and motives were not understood, they were exposed to much suffering and persecution."

Some of the native ministry and membership had inherited the sentiments of John Wesley and Asbury in their opposition to war. Upon general principles they were non-jurors, and did not feel themselves at liberty to bear arms. Some refused to bear arms even when taken into camp. Many of them, however, entered the army, and did loyal duty for their country. At last, when "the authorities became convinced that there was no treason in the Methodist preachers, and that their scruples were of a religious, not of a political nature, and that they were merely intent upon preaching the gospel of peace as humble evangelists, they were permitted to exercise their functions unmolested." As might have been expected, the war was very disastrous to the success of religion, yet Methodism increased more than any other church. At the first Conference in 1773, there were 1160 members. In 1783, the year of the treaty of peace, there were 13,740 members: being an average yearly increase for ten years, despite the desolations of war, of 1258. In 1776, the year of the declaration of independence, there were in America 24 preachers, 4921 members, 11 circuits, and 4 church edifices. In 1783, the year of the declaration of peace, there were 82 preachers and 13,740 members; being an increase during the Revolutionary period of 58 preachers, 8819 members; the ministry being increased nearly fourfold, and the membership nearly threefold.

As to the loyalty of the Methodist Episcopal Church to civil government in general, the reader is referred to the article LOYALTY.

American Indians.—The first Methodist mission established among the American Indians was in 1819, among the Wyandottes, in Upper Sandusky, Ohio. (See WYANDOTTE MISSION.) Long before that time, the condition of the Indians had attracted the attention of leading minds in the church. Mr. Wesley's sojourn in Georgia had led him into contact with the tribes in that vicinity, and Bishop Asbury early contemplated sending a missionary under the care of the chief Cornplanter. Shortly after the Wyandotte mission was established, attention was directed to the Cherokees, Creeks, and Choctaws in the Southern States, and services were commenced among them. Their removal to the Indian Territory west of Arkansas impeded for a time the missionary work. That Territory, however, became the most fruitful field among the aborigines; schools were established, and excellent teachers were employed. These missions passed into the care of the Church South in 1845. (See CREEK, CHOCTAW, and CHEROKEE INDIANS.) In 1835, missions were established among the Flat-Head Indians in Oregon. (See FLAT-HEAD INDIANS.) Services were also commenced among the Indians remaining in the States of New York, Michigan, and Wisconsin. Under the present policy of the United States government, the Methodist Missionary Society nominates agents for several Indian tribes, which are allotted to its care, by the Indian Department, in the distribution which is made among the various denominations. These agencies are chiefly in Montana, and on the Pacific coast.

Americus, Ga. (pop. 3259), is the capital of Sumter County. The M. E. Church South has a strong church with 450 members,—other statistics not given. The African M. E. Church has 195 members, 160 Sunday-school scholars, and a church valued at $2000.

Ames, Bernice D., a teacher in the M. E. Church, was born at Shoreham, Vt., December 26, 1817, and died at Mechanicsville, N. Y., January 5, 1876. He was graduated from Middlebury College when twenty-six years old. During the next three years he was professor of the Latin and Greek languages in the seminaries at Fort Plain and Fort Edward, N. Y. He joined the Troy Conference of the M. E. Church in 1857. During 1863 and 1864 he was principal of the Providence Conference Seminary at East Greenwich, R. I. In 1865 he was secretary of the United States Christian Commission at Philadelphia. He became principal of the Mechanicsville Academy, N. Y., in 1868, and continued in that position till his death.

Ames, Edward Raymond, D.D., LL.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Amesville, Athens Co., Ohio, May 20, 1806. He was educated in the Ohio University, and along the northern lakes and on the western frontier, and aided in establishing schools among the Indian tribes west of Arkansas. From 1844 to 1852, he was stationed preacher or presiding elder in Indiana. In 1848 he was elected president of the Indiana Asbury University, but he declined the position, preferring to remain in the more active ministerial work. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1840, 1844, and 1852; in the latter during his student life he united with the church, in August, 1827. After leaving the university, he engaged for some time in teaching, and entered the traveling ministry in the Illinois Conference in 1830. At the formation of the Indiana Conference in 1832, he became one of its members, and spent his active pastoral life in the State of Indiana, with the exception of two years spent in St. Louis. After filling important stations and acting as presiding elder, he was in 1840 elected missionary secretary, his work being chiefly in the West. He traveled extensively, visiting the Indian missions year he was elected bishop. Since that period he has traveled extensively over the church, having first visited the Pacific coast in 1852-53. During and after the Civil War he was active in extending the borders of the church through the South. He was offered some important positions by the government, but declined to accept them, because of ecclesiastical duties. He was appointed by the General Conference of 1868 to visit the Irish and British Conferences as a fraternal delegate; but the condition of his health led him to decline. For several years past he has resided in Baltimore.

Amos, Joseph J., a layman in the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Bourbon Co., Ky., Sept. 30, 1803. He was much given to reading from boyhood. Unfortunately, when about twenty years of age, he fell in with infidel writings, became an unbeliever in the Christian religion, and took great delight in throwing obstacles in the way of believers. While in that condition, the Lord, by his Spirit, found way to his heart, and he professed saving faith in Christ. Soon after, he united with the M. E. Church; but some local trouble arising, he was induced, soon, to withdraw. Fifty-six persons followed him the next week. They left because of a difference of views on church polity. They formed a church by themselves, until the "Reformers" at Baltimore declared a separation from the M. E. Church, when they came into the new movement. Mr. Amos was a member of the first convention at Cincinnati, and ever since has been prominent in all the interests connected with the church. He was always a strong anti-slavery advocate. His benefactions to the church and college have been a sure indication of his denominational loyalty.

Amsterdam, N. Y. (pop. 5426), a town in Montgomery County, and situated on the Mohawk River. In 1845 the Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Universalists had each one church.

The first Methodist church was erected on Main Street, in 1830. This being disposed of, another on Market Street was built in 1845, and enlarged in 1860.

Present Methodist statistics are as follows:

Amusements.—The general rules prohibit "the taking of such diversions, as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus;" also, "the singing those songs or reading those books, which do not tend to the knowledge or glory of God;" and also, "softness and needless self-indulgence." Mr. Wesley, however, was neither austere nor morose. His views were broad and catholic, and he beautifully exemplified what he termed "the cheerfulness of faith." Yet he discountenanced all undue levity, and all frivolity and dissipation. The Methodist Churches have clearly enjoined sobriety and holiness of life, but they have left much to the judgment and conscience of the individual Christian. By reference to the general rules, and to such enactments as have been made by the General Conference, questions as to amusements, as well as to other departments of conduct, must be ecclesiastically determined.

In 1872 the General Conference explicitly declared that "dancing, playing games of chance, attending theatres, horse-races, circuses, dancing-parties, or patronizing dancing-schools, or taking such other amusements as are obviously of misleading and questionable moral tendency," are imprudent conduct, and that all persons guilty of them should be subject to disciplinary action.

Anamosa, Iowa (pop. 3000), the capital of Jones County. It is first mentioned in the records of the church for 1847, when Wapesequinicon, the name of the river on which the city is situated, was supplied by R. Swearengen. It was at this time connected with Colony mission. In 1848 Wapesequinicon mission reported 65 members, and Samuel Farlow was appointed missionary. In 1849 it reported 76 members, and the name was changed to Anamosa mission.

The first Methodist class was organized by Harvey Taylor in 1851, and consisted of 9 members. The services were first held in the court-house, afterwards they were held in the United Brethren church, rented for that purpose; after this they returned to the court-house. In 1862 the old Congregational church was purchased and fitted up for worship. The new church was commenced in 1864, and dedicated in 1865. It was made a station in 1869. It is in the Upper Iowa Conference, and has 325 members, 260 Sunday-school scholars, and church property, $9000.

Anderson, Ind. (pop. 3126), is the capital of Madison County, and is well situated for prosperity. The first Methodist church was erected about 1845, but never completed. In 1851 a one-story frame church was built on the corner of Meridian and William Streets. The present edifice was erected in 1871. There are 345 members, 300 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $30,000.

Anderson, John, was born at Gibraltar, and entered the British Wesleyan ministry 1812. The language of his life was, "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world." He was a powerful and efficient preacher. His last words were, "I am upon the Rock! The blood of Christ, applied by faith, through the power of the Eternal Spirit, cleanseth from all sin." He died 1840, aged 49.

Anderson, Samuel, was born in Norway, May 3, 1824. He emigrated to America in 1849 and settled in Chicago. Having been converted under the ministrations of a missionary, and feeling himself called to preach, his earnest desires were to enter the missionary work. He entered the Wisconsin Conference M. E. Church in 1853, and labored effectively until March 16, 1860. As a preacher he was logical, eloquent, and pathetic. He was a superior classical scholar, and spoke four or five languages readily. He possessed a vast amount of theological lore, and a marked zeal for the salvation of his countrymen, for whom he worked zealously and efficiently. "He left his monument in the erection of churches and parsonages, and in hundreds converted to God through his instrumentality." He died suddenly and triumphantly.

Anderson, William Henry, D.D., a teacher and editor in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Wilmington, N. C. He was member of the General Conference of the M. E. Church South in 1850, 1854, 1858, 1862, 1866. During the Civil War he was a chaplain in the Southern army.

Andrew, James Osgood, a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Wilkes Co., Ga., in 1794. He was a son of Rev. John Andrew, an itinerant Methodist preacher. He be-graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1837, and in the same year joined the Kentucky Conference of the M. E. Church. In 1843 he was appointed a professor in the Transylvania University, now the University of Kentucky, at Lexington. From 1850 to 1854 he was editor of the Quarterly Review of the M. E. Church South; from 1854 to 1861, president of St. Charles' College, Missouri; from 1861 to 1863, president of Central College, Fayette, Miss. In the latter year he engaged in the pastoral work of the Louisville Conference of the M. E. Church South. Mr. Anderson was a came a member of the church when thirteen years of age, was licensed to preach when eighteen, and was received into the South Carolina Conference immediately after, in 1812. From that period until 1832, he was constantly engaged in pastoral labor or in the duties of a presiding elder. He was an active, earnest, forcible, and emotional preacher, and won for himself a high position in the confidence and affections of the church. In 1832 he was elected and ordained bishop, and he traveled extensively throughout the entire church until the General Conference of 1844. Shortly before the session of that Conference, he married an estimable lady in Georgia, who was the owner of slaves. As no bishop in the Methodist Church had ever before been connected with slavery, this fact produced great excitement. The committee on episcopacy waited upon the bishop, who informed them that he had married a wife who inherited slaves from her former husband; that he had secured them to Southern Conferences met in Louisville, and was presided over by Bishops Soule and Andrew; and he, having adhered to the Southern church, continued to travel throughout its bounds, and to act as bishop until 1866, when the General Conference relieved him from active duty. He attended the Alabama Conference in 1870, and his last sermon was preached in Felicity Street church, New Or-her by a deed of trust; and that she could not emancipate them if she desired to do so.

The embarrassment of the case was deeply felt by all parties; but after a protracted discussion the General Conference, by a vote of 110 to 68, adopted the following: "Resolved, that it is the sense of this General Conference that he desist from the exercise of his office so long as this impediment remains."

By this action the ministers in the Southern Conferences felt deeply aggrieved, and it led, as is well known, to the formation of the M. E. Church South. In May, 1845, a convention called by the leans, the Sunday night before his death. He died March 2, 1871, the month and day on which Wesley died eighty years before. His last words were to his children, grandchildren, and the ministers present, "God bless you all, victory, victory!" As a preacher he was exceedingly effective, having a voice of great compass and power. He was devoted and ardent in his friendships; was kind to the poor, and was a general favorite among his acquaintances. He was the author of several valuable works.

Andrews, Edward Gayer, one of the bishops of the M. E. Church, was born August 7, 1825, in New Hartford, Oneida Co., N. Y. He pursued his academic studies chiefly in Cazenovia Seminary, and subsequently entered the Wesleyan University, where he graduated August 7, 1847. He became a communicant in the tenth year of his age, but during his stay in the seminary he received a more distinct and clear religious experience. He was licensed to preach early in 1844, and after his graduation was employed for eleven months as assistant preacher on the Morrisville circuit. In 1848, he joined the Oneida Conference, and was ordained deacon by Bishop Janes; was received into full connection and ordained elder, by Bishop Scott, in 1850, at Utica. Subsequently he was stationed at Stockbridge. His voice becoming affected by his ministerial services, he accepted a situation as teacher in Cazenovia Seminary, in 1854. In 1855, he became president of Mansfield (Ohio) Female College. In 1856, he was elected principal of Cazenovia Seminary, succeeding Dr. Bannister, who removed to the Theological Seminary at Evanston. In 1864, he re-entered the pastoral work, was transferred to New York East Conference, and stationed at Stamford, Sand Street; Brooklyn, St. James and Seventh Avenue. He was a member of the General Conference of 1864 and of 1872, and in the latter year he was elected to the episcopacy. Under the arrangement of episcopal residences, he removed to Des Moines, Iowa, and has since been constantly engaged in his official duties. In 1876, he visited Europe and India, organizing the Conferences of Sweden, Norway, and South India, and visiting Germany, Switzerland, and Italy.

Andrews, Robert L., a minister in the M. E. Church South, a native of Williamson Co., Tenn., was converted in early life, and admitted on trial in the Tennessee Conference in 1829. He filled a number of important stations, and whether as preacher or presiding elder he was much loved by the people, and his life was useful. He died in peace, in Mississippi, after thirty-five years of faithful toil.

Annapolis (pop. 5744), the capital of Maryland, is also distinguished for being the site of the United States Naval Academy. It was early visited by the Methodist preachers. In 1777, Mr. Asbury preached both in the city and vicinity. At that time infidelity was quite prevalent, and very few were professors of religion. The services were held in the play-house. There was also much opposition, and on one occasion, not far from Annapolis, Mr. Asbury's carriage was shot through. Its first notice as a separate appointment was in 1788, with John Haggerty as preacher in charge. The return of the following year shows 269 members, of whom 141 were colored. From that time, either as a circuit or a station, the name appears upon the minutes. In 1862 the second charge was established, and a second edifice was erected; and a church for the colored members has also been erected. At the present time the following table shows the statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars	Ch. Property.

Ann Arbor, Mich. (pop. 7363), is chiefly noted for being the site of the Michigan University in 1837. It has connected with it three colleges for literary, medical, and law purposes.

Annesley, Samuel, D.D., maternal grandfather of John Wesley, was born in 1620, and was educated at Oxford University. As a student, he was noted for diligence and devotion, and he entered upon the ministry with fine prospects of success. He acted as parish priest for a time and a chaplain at sea, but refusing to obey "the act of uniformity," he endured severe persecution. He became one of the leading non-conformist ministers, and was one of the most active partisans in times of great danger and excitement. He died in 1696, after preaching more than half a century. His last words were, "I shall be satisfied with thy likeness; satisfied, satisfied." Those who knew him spoke of him in the highest terms. His character was drawn by De Foe; and Richard Baxter described him as "totally devoted to God." He was a nephew of the Earl of Anglesea; and on her death-bed the Countess of Anglesea desired to be buried in his grave. Calamy calls him "an Israelite indeed."

Annual Assembly is the name given to the Supreme Court of the United Methodist Free Church, England. It meets on the last Wednesday of July, each year, at a place chosen by the Assembly of the preceding year, and usually lasts for about ten days. Its constitution is strictly representative. Circuits, according to their number of members, may send either one, two, or three representatives. The scale is, for under 500 members, one representative; under 1000 members, two representatives; over 1000 members, three representatives. To prevent the exercise of undue influence by weak, dependent circuits, some restriction has been put on the right of representation. A regulation was adopted some years ago, that to entitle a circuit to annual representation it must have, at least, 100 members, unless its claim had already been allowed, or raise £50 towards a minister's salary. In some cases small circuits were given the right of biennial representation. It is, however, contended by some that such restrictions are illegal, being contrary to the provisions of the deed which regulates and prescribes the mode of constituting the Annual Assembly. (See FOUNDATION DEED.) Practically, we may regard the scale mentioned above as acted upon intact. The circuits are under no restriction as to the class of men they must elect. They may choose ministers or laymen, at their discretion. There is usually a large preponderance of ministers in the Assembly, but this is the fruit of unfettered choice, not of any law or prescription.

The only exception to the representative character of the Annual Assembly is the presence of the four chief officials of the body, called Connectional officers, elected by the preceding Annual Assembly. The President, Connectional Secretary, Corresponding Secretary, and Connectional Treasurer, elected one year, are bona fide members of the Assembly the following year; and they form the connecting link between successive Assemblies. On these four officers is devolved the task of examining and pronouncing upon the credentials of brethren claiming to be representatives. Doubtful cases are referred by them to the decision of the brethren whose credentials are indisputable. No business can be done till the Assembly is thus constituted.

The Foundation Deed does not expressly say that all representatives must be members of the circuit which appoints them. A minority, respectable both in numbers and intelligence, contends that membership in the body is the only qualification necessary, and that a circuit has the legal right of choosing a member of the body to represent it, wherever that member may reside. The majority, however, has declared that it is not contrary to the spirit and intention of the Foundation Deed to limit the right of representing a circuit to the members of that circuit, and that in practice the opposite course would act most injuriously. In all ordinary cases, therefore, the existing regulation is that members can only represent their own particular circuits. An exception to this, however, is admitted in the case of certain office-bearers, on the ground that the presence of these officials in the Annual Assembly is desirable, and that they sustain a relation to the entire connection, and not merely to the circuit where they happen to reside. These heads of departments, separated to a particular work, are allowed to represent any circuit which chooses to elect them. These officials are the General Missionary Secretary, the Theological Tutor, the Chapel Secretary, and the Book Steward. The Connectional Editor had the same privilege, but as the Annual Assembly of 1876 determined that the magazines should be edited by brethren doing circuit work, this privilege of editorship will become obsolete or be abolished.

The Annual Assembly does not make rules for the internal government of circuits, nor does it exercise any jurisdiction on matters affecting church membership. No appeal lies to it from the decision of local courts on matters purely of a society or circuit character. On all such questions the authority of local courts is absolute and final.

Despite this limitation of authority, regarded by the body as an excellence, the Annual Assembly is never in lack of business. The time usually occupied barely suffices for the vast amount of work it has to do. It has entire control over the connectional ministry, calling men out, stationing them to circuits, fixing their status and, partially, their remuneration. It determines as to the studies of the junior ministers and the admission of students into the Theological Institute. Should there unhappily be occasion, the Annual Assembly can censure ministers or expel them from the ministry. It can admit to fellowship churches which ask for recognition, or should circuits which it has acknowledged become unsound in doctrine or faithless in discipline, it can, after neglected admonition, solemnly disown them. It hears minutes, necessarily long, of committees' proceedings during the year; it listens to reports of all connectional funds and institutions, and appoints officers and committees to manage them during the year. It inquires into the numerical and spiritual state of the connection; chronicles the decease of ministers, and puts on its minutes facts concerning their life and death. It makes prospective grants towards the support of the ministry, to circuits which need such aid apportioning the profits of the Book Room, and fixes the amount to be devoted to various benevolent objects. It deals with district meetings; fixes from time to time their functions, appoints their conveners, and hears their suggestions. It discusses motions of which notice has been given by some of its members, and takes notice of public movements which bear on the interests of the body or the nation. It hears memorials from public bodies, or appoints committees to deal with them, and hears their reports. It makes regulations for all connectional affairs, modifying, repealing, or annulling former rules which have ceased to be suitable, and in its own domain of legislation its authority is indefeasible. It issues an address to the churches, fixes the meeting-place of the next assembly, and determines the list of circuits entitled to send representatives.

Annual Conference is the name given to an ecclesiastical body with or without lay delegates, which assembles every year in a given territory for church deliberation and action. Such bodies exist in all branches of Methodism, but differ in several matters as to their composition, jurisdiction, and functions.

1. Wesleyan Methodists (England).—The highest ecclesiastical court, as well as the only legislative body in the Wesleyan Methodist connection, is the Annual Conference, constituted in accordance with Mr. Wesley's "Deed of Declaration," bearing date February 28, 1784, and is there termed "The Yearly Conference of the people called Methodists." This assembly consists of one hundred members, all of whom must be "preachers and expounders of God's holy word, under the care and direction of the Conference." These, during the life-time of Mr. Wesley, were appointed by his sole authority; but since his death till 1814 the Conference, in filling up any vacancies which occurred from time to time, limited its choice to the senior ministers of the connection. From this period, for more than fifty years, three of every four such vacancies were filled up by election (by ballot) from the ministers next in seniority; and the fourth by nomination and vote of those who had traveled fourteen years, the legal hundred, by a separate vote, confirming such nomination. By a recent enactment, however, each alternate vacancy which occurs is filled up by election on the ground of seniority, and the other by nomination and vote on the part of those ministers who have traveled ten years and upwards, subject as in the former case to the confirmation of the legal hundred. No minister who has not traveled fourteen years at least is eligible for such election. The president and secretary of the Conference are chosen on the same principle from year to year.

The duration of Conference, as established by the "Deed Poll," must not be less than five days, nor more than three weeks. The continuous presence of forty members of the legal hundred is necessary to the validity of the proceedings.

At the first Conference after Mr. Wesley's death, it was unanimously resolved that all the preachers in full connection with them should enjoy every privilege that the members of the Conference themselves enjoy, agreeably to the expressed wish of their "venerable deceased father in the gospel."

The first Methodist Conference was held at the Old Foundry, Moorfields, London, on the 25th of June, 1744. After that period a Conference was annually convened by Mr. Wesley; he inviting what preachers he saw fit, from year to year, to confer with him. Such an assembly, however, had no legal specification: and at Mr. Wesley's death would have become "an empty name." Hence the necessity of establishing by such an instrument as the "Deed of Declaration" the legal definition of the term, "The Conference of the people called Methodists;" making it thereby the "chief ecclesiastical authority" in the Wesleyan Methodist connection.

Important changes seem to be impending in the constitution and working of the Annual Conference; it will suffice here to notice that at the last (the 133d) Conference held in 1876 it was resolved, "that as soon as practicable the Conference will admit laymen to take part in its proceedings." When the financial and other matters, as classed in the report of a mixed committee appointed last year, and accepted by the Conference, shall be considered and decided.

(For further information on this point, see LAY REPRESENTATION.)

The following plan, subject to such modifications as may hereafter be rendered necessary, shows the plan of rotation and the places where the Annual Conferences are held, viz., Newcastle-on-Tyne, Camborne, Sheffield, Nottingham, Bristol, Bradford, Birmingham, London, Liverpool, Leeds, Manchester, Hull, Burslem, London.

The ordinary business of the Conference may be briefly summarized: after the opening of the Conference with devotional exercises, and the various vacancies in the legal hundred are filled up, the president and secretary are elected by ballot. The time and place of the next Conference are fixed. Various committees are appointed. The names of those to be admitted into full connection, with those of probationers, are read over. The death-roll of the past year is presented with accompanying solemn devotional exercises. Questions respecting character are asked, and every name is subjected to scrutiny. Then the questions of, "Who are now to become supernumeraries?" and, "Who are returning to the work?" are answered. Changes in circuits, division of circuits, and requests for additional ministers come under review. The stations of the ministers as prepared by the stationing committee are read, revised, altered, and ultimately, on what is termed "The third reading," confirmed. Chairmen of districts are chosen by ballot. The numbers of members in society reported. Committees appointed with reference to different departments. Inquiries made and recorded respecting the Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove Schools, the schools for ministers' daughters, the Book-Room, General Chapel Fund, Chapel Loan Fund, Chapel Building Fund, Children's Fund, Contingent Fund, Auxiliary Fund, and Theological Institution, etc., with appointments for the coming year. Local committees are appointed, notices of motion discussed, orders and resolutions on miscellaneous matters are determined and passed. The pastoral address read and confirmed, and the minutes all entered on the Conference journal.

When the business is concluded, the doors are opened to an expectant crowd of friends, and the minutes passed during the Conference then closing are read, and put to the vote for confirmation by the legal hundred. Their assent is given by all standing up and witnessing the signing of the journal by the president and secretary. A short address is given by the president, and, after singing and prayer, the apostolic benediction is pronounced, and the Conference is over.

2. Methodist Episcopal Church.—The boundaries of the Annual Conferences are determined by the General Conference to suit the necessities and convenience of the ministers and churches in different sections of the country. These boundaries have been changed to a greater or less extent at each General Conference, and consequently the number of them has varied from time to time. The first Annual Conference was held in Philadelphia, in July, 1773. In 1776 the place of meeting was changed to Baltimore, where it continued during the Revolutionary War, though it was always found more convenient to hold an additional Conference in the South. At the organization of the church in 1784 there were but three Annual Conferences; these were subsequently increased according to the judgment of the bishops, until, in 1792, there were twenty. It was found, however, that while it seemed to be convenient for the preachers to meet in small districts, there was difficulty in making interchanges, and there was not sufficient opportunity for careful consultation. The General Conference of 1796, desiring to fix the boundaries more permanently, determined the number at six, authorizing the bishops, if necessary, to organize a seventh. As the church has extended its boundaries, both in the United States and in distant lands, the number has been almost constantly increased, until at the last General Conference there were 89. As difficulties had frequently arisen in the change of Conference boundaries, it was also determined that hereafter no change should be made until due notice had been given to the Conferences whose boundaries might be affected. At the same time the Conferences were authorized to create a commission of five members from each Conference, who might readjust their common boundaries, subject to the approval of the bishop or bishops presiding at their subsequent sessions.

The Conferences are composed of all the itinerant ministers in full connection within the assigned limits, including the supernumerary and superannuated preachers. The young men, who have been admitted on trial, are expected to attend the sessions, to be examined in the course of study, but they have no part in the deliberations. The time of holding the Conference is arranged by the bishops, but the places are determined by the several Conferences. If, for any cause, a change of place becomes necessary, authority is given to the preacher in charge and the presiding elder of the district to make such changes after having consulted as far as practicable with the other presiding elders. In their sessions the bishop is the presiding officer, who is required by the Discipline to permit each Conference, if it wishes to do so, to sit at least a week. If the bishop be not present, he may appoint a member to preside in his absence; if no such appointment is made, the Conference elects its president "by ballot from among the elders without debate."

The duties of the Conference are almost wholly ministerial: they may receive on trial such preachers as have been recommended by quarterly or district Conferences; and they admit into full connection after two years' probation those who have been approved in their studies and in their ministerial qualifications and conduct. They are also authorized to elect proper persons to deacons' and elders' orders; to determine the relations of preachers as supernumeraries or superannuated, or in given circumstances to locate them. The Conference also has power to elect to deacons' orders local preachers who have been four years in the ministry, and who have been properly recommended by a quarterly or district Conference; also, to elect to elders' orders such local deacons as have exercised that office four years, and have been properly recommended as above. It is also made their duty to examine carefully into the state of domestic missions, and to allow no mission to remain which in its judgment is able to support itself. At each Annual Conference the preachers in charge of the several stations or circuits report carefully the number of members and probationers, the amount and value of church property, the contributions for the various benevolent organizations, and such collections as have been ordered by the General or Annual Conference. They also report the number of local preachers, of baptisms, and of deaths; returns are also made to the "Sunday-School Union" of the number of Sunday-schools, and of their officers, teachers, and pupils. The Conference also elects its secretary, who, with proper assistants, keeps an accurate journal of the proceedings, which is sent quadrennially to the General Conference, that the acts of the Conference, and the decisions of the bishops, if any, may be examined and approved; and that its proceedings, in reference to the trial of members, may be subject to examination or review. The Conference session usually begins on Wednesday, though, in small Conferences, the commencement is deferred until Thursday. The meetings are usually seasons of great interest, as the ministers greet each other, and expect to spend the week in social conversation, as well as in the discharge of their official duties; and their interest is enhanced by the fact, that the appointments to their new fields of labor are made at the close of the Conference session. Many laymen from the various charges, though they have no official duties, are frequently present. They are pleased to meet their former ministers, to attend the religious services, and the anniversaries of the several societies, and are also, oftentimes, interested in the prospective appointments of their pastors. The Conference usually sits from eight or nine o'clock in the morning until twelve or one, at noon. In the afternoons various committees meet for consultation, and in the evenings religious services are held, or the anniversaries of the various benevolent organizations. In addition to the examination of ministerial character, which takes place by the calling of every name, and the answer as to whether there is any charge against the minister, and the reports alluded to, the Conference considers the condition of the various benevolent operations within its bounds, referring to various committees such subjects as, the Bible cause, missions, church extension, freedmen's aid, Sunday-schools, tracts, and education. The establishment and patronage of the literary institutions of the church have been chiefly under the control of the Annual Conferences, and the members of these bodies have generally given very liberal financial aid, according to their means, and have solicited funds in their various charges for their proper maintenance.

The appointment of the preachers is not properly Conference business, but during the afternoons of the sessions the bishop, in consultation with the presiding elders, having received such representations as may be furnished by the ministers and people, arranges the appointments of the ministers for their ensuing fields of labor; and at the close of Conference, after singing and prayer and a suitable address, these appointments are announced. The preachers who are on trial are examined in a course of study, which has been arranged by the bishops under the direction of the General Conference. This examination is conducted by a committee appointed by the Conference for each year. At the end of the second year, having passed the examination creditably, and their ministerial character and service being approved, they are eligible to admission into full connection and election to deacons' orders. The examination is continued by a similar committee for the third and fourth years, at the end of which time the candidates are eligible to elders' orders. The inquiries to be made in the Annual Conferences are specified in the Discipline as follows:

"1. Have any entered this Conference by transfer or re-admission?

"2. Who are admitted on trial?

"3. Who remain on trial?

"4. Who are admitted into full connection?

"5. Who are the Deacons of the First Class?

"6. Who are the Deacons of the Second Class?

"7. Who have been elected and ordained Elders?

"8. Who are the Supernumerary Preachers?

"9. Who are the Superannuated Preachers?

"10. Was the character of each Preacher examined?

"11. Have any located?

"12. Have any withdrawn?

"13. Have any been transferred, and to what Conference?

"14. Have any been expelled?

"15. Have any died?

"16. What is the Statistical Report?

"(1.) Membership—Number of Probationers. Number of full Members. Number of Local Preachers. Number of Deaths.

"(2.) Baptisms—Children. Adults.

"(3.) Church Property—Number of Churches. Probable Value. Number of Parsonages. Probable Value. * Amount raised for the Building and Improving Churches and Parsonages. * Present Indebtedness.

"(4.) Benevolent Collections—For Conference Claimants: for Missions—from Churches, from Sabbath-schools: for Woman's Foreign Missionary Society: for Board of Church Extension: for Sunday-school Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church: for Tract Society: for Freedmen's Aid Society: for Education: for American Bible Society.

"(5.) Sabbath-schools—Number of Schools. Number of Officers and Teachers. Total Number of Scholars of all ages.

"* Number of Scholars fifteen years of age and over.

"* Number of Scholars under fifteen, except Infant Class.

"* Number of Scholars in Infant Class.

"* Average Attendance of Teachers and Scholars in whole school.

"* Number of Library Books.

"* Total Expenses of School this year.

"* Number of Sunday-School Advocates taken.

"* Number of Sunday-School Journals taken.

"* Number of Officers and Teachers who are Church-members or Probationers.

"* Number of Scholars who are Church-members or Probationers.

"* Number of Conversions this year.

"* (6.) Ministerial Support—Claims. Receipts.

"17. What are the Claims upon the Conference Fund?

"18. What has been received on the foregoing claims, and how has it been applied?

"19. Where are the Preachers stationed?

"20. Where and when shall the next Conference be held?

"* 21. Have any Local Preachers been ordained?

"* 22. Are any of our Literary or Theological Institutions under the control and patronage of this Conference, and what is their condition?

* 23. Who are the Conference Board of Church Extension?

[NOTE.—The items marked with a * are not to be included in the General Minutes.]

Since the last session of the General Conference, according to permission given, new Conferences have been organized. The whole number is now ninety-one.

(For their names and statistics, see METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.)

3. Methodist Episcopal Church South.—The organization and functions of the Annual Conferences in the Church South were precisely the same at the time of its separation as in the Methodist Episcopal Church, but since that period there are a few features of distinction. In the Church South, there are four lay delegates, from each presiding elder's district, admitted into the Annual Conferences, and who participate in all action except in what is strictly ministerial. In their annual reports as published in their general minutes they do not include the number and value of churches and parsonages. At the time of the organization of the Church South, in 1845, there were fourteen Conferences which were confined to what was then slaveholding territory. Since that period they have extended into several of the Northern States. The number of their Annual Conferences is thirty-seven. (See METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH SOUTH.)

4. Methodist and Methodist Protestant.—These Conferences are constituted nearly in the same manner as in the churches already described, but they differ in several particulars. First, having no bishops, each Conference elects a president annually, who not only presides during the session, but has oversight of the general interest of the churches during the year. The president in conjunction with a stationing committee, appointed by the Conference, arranges the appointments of the preachers. In the Conference the laymen have an equal representation with the ministers, and instead of the classification of ministers adopted by the elder branches, they have a list of stationed and unstationed ministers. The number of their Conferences was, Methodist 23, Methodist Protestant 21. (For statistics, see the articles on those churches.)

5. Wesleyan Methodist Connection.—The Annual Conferences of this church, chiefly in the Northern States, resemble very nearly those of the Methodist Protestant Church, in that laymen have equal place in the body; and in their electing a president each successive year. The difference between these bodies consists not so much in form, as in the fact that among the Wesleyans there was originally an earnest protest against slavery, and also against secret societies. (See WESLEYAN METHODIST CONNECTION.)

6. African Methodist Episcopal Church.—These Conferences, twenty-seven in number, in all their features resemble those of the M. E. Church, except that local preachers are members of the Conference.

7. African M. E. Zion Church.—The same as above, except that in each Conference the bishop has associated with him in arranging the appointments a stationing committee.

8. Colored Methodist Episcopal Church of America.—This is modeled precisely after the constitution of the M. E. Church South.

9. Methodist Church of Canada.—Prior to 1874 the Wesleyan Canadian Conference and the Eastern British Conference were parts of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of Great Britain, and their Conferences were modeled after that of the parent country; the British Conference, however, appointed the president. Since that time, by agreement with the Wesleyans in England, an independent church was formed, and a union has been effected between the Canadian, the East British, and the New Connection Conferences, under the title of the Methodist Church of Canada. The territory has been divided into six Annual Conferences. Each Conference elects annually its own president, who acts with its stationing committee in arranging the appointments; and the order of business partakes partly of the Wesleyan Conference in England, and partly of that of the Methodist Episcopal Churches of the United States.

10. Methodist Episcopal Church of Canada.—In this church the constitution and functions of the Annual Conferences are similar to those of the M. E. Church of the United States.

11. Australian Conferences.—Until 1874 Australian Methodism was a part of the Wesleyan Methodism of Great Britain. Since that period it has had a separate organization, and has four Annual Conferences. The duties and general arrangements resemble those of the Wesleyan and Canadian Conferences, already described.

12. The French Conference is an affiliated branch of Wesleyan Methodism, and adopts the same general provisions.

13. The Annual Conferences of the Primitive, New Connection, United Free Methodist, and Bible Christians in England, have the same general constitution as the Wesleyans, from whom they separated, except that lay members are admitted to participation in all their deliberations. Among the Primitives there are two laymen for each minister. Having no General Conferences, legislative as well as ministerial functions are vested in the Annual Conferences.

Annuitant Society is an association in the British Wesleyan Church. In the life-time of Wesley he was often deeply troubled with the fact that physical weakness and premature old age had made sad inroads on several of his devoted preachers. Accordingly, in the minutes of Conference for 1765, a resolution was adopted for the relief of those who were worn out, and for those unable to travel circuits with the ordinary means of subsistence. This led to the formation of what was first called "The Preacher's Fund." At first the traveling preachers only subscribed to the relief of their worn-out brethren what they desired; hence it was ruled in 1765 thus: "Let every traveling preacher at the Conference contribute half a guinea yearly to this fund."

In 1796, after most careful deliberation, the rules were amended, and Dr. Adam Clarke was appointed secretary of what was then called "The Preacher's Annuitant Society." At this time the stipends of the preachers were £12 per annum; in a few circuits they were £16, and in London only £20, to which were added a wife's allowance of £12, with servant's board and wages £6, and £4 for each child; out of which one guinea had to be paid to "The Preacher's Fund," with a fine of half a crown for non-payment.

The above fund being inadequate to meet the demands upon it, the rules were altered, and a committee formed to obtain contributions from those able and willing to give. Still, this effort secured only an insufficient sum. In 1804 this was combined with the former, and was called "The Methodist Preacher's Merciful Fund." That year the subscriptions were raised from £1922 to £2635. In 1813 the subject came again under careful review. The subscriptions of the people were separated from those of the preachers, and it then took the title of "The Methodist Preacher's Auxiliary Fund." We have now to do with what is properly entitled "The Itinerant Methodist Preacher's Annuitant Society." It is really a mutual life insurance company, sustained by the preachers alone. The rules of this society have not undergone any material change since its first establishment; but the rates of subscription and the annuities granted were revised in 1837, 1860, and 1864. In 1763 the subscription was ten shillings and sixpence; in 1765, one guinea; in 1799, three guineas; and in 1846, six pounds, at which it now remains, although immediately it was raised to seven guineas, and subsequently reduced to the present amount. Ministers in the foreign work are charged £11.4, but the extra amount is paid by the Wesleyan Missionary Society. Probationers in Great Britain pay five guineas per annum. A marriage premium is also paid in order to secure a reversionary interest to the widow. The amount varies according to the relative ages of the parties concerned. The following is a summary of the graduated scale of allowances, with proportionate amounts for intermediate years. These amounts were fixed in 1864, being an increase of 10 per cent. over those of 1860:

For 5 years, £6.1; 10 years, £8.5; 20 years, £14.17; 30 years, £22; 40 years, £32.9; 50 years, £45.2; and 60 years, £60.5.

The annuities to widows are one-eighth less than the above. A few years since the affairs of the society and fund were in such a state that, owing to the disproportion between the subscriptions and rates of annuity, it led very judiciously to an authorized and thorough investigation of its affairs by eminent actuaries; under their advice important modifications were made, which have been attended with most satisfactory results.

The invested funds of the society have been more than doubled, and are now considered apart from the capitalized value of the Book Room grant (which has for many years contributed £3000 per annum from its profits), as included in the revenue returns of last year, £179,233.

This improved state of its funds has been largely promoted, not only by the self-denying sacrifices of its members, but also by the bequests and benefactions of liberal and generous friends of Methodism and its ministers. The number of annuitants last Conference were as follows: supernumeraries 300, widows 379=679. Number of members not annuitants 1389.

Ansley, Samuel, a member of the Georgia Conference, was born in Warren Co., N. J. He entered the ministry when young, and traveled extensively through Virginia and Georgia, from the seashore to the mountains. He died in 1837.

Anthony, Elihu, was born in the State of New York, but removed with his parents when a child to Indiana. He was converted and united with the M. E. Church in 1841. He was afterwards licensed to preach, and traveled two or three years on trial. In 1847 he joined an emigrant train, consisting of about 150, and started for Oregon. Having reached the Humboldt Sink, Mr. Anthony, with his family and a few others, took the trail for California; reached San José in September, 1847; halted a short time, held religious services, and organized a class. He moved on to Santa Cruz in October of that year, and determined to make his home there. He at once engaged in the work of the Lord, held services, and organized a class. He visited other settlements, and did the work of an evangelist. After prayerful examination he ceased preaching as soon as regular pastors were appointed to the churches. He surrendered his parchments as a local deacon, and took his place in the ranks of the laymen, where he has remained, but not a whit less useful or influential, as a laborer in the Lord's vineyard. He has ever been the true friend and wise counselor of the itinerant ministry. He educated a younger brother for the ministry. Mr. Anthony still resides in Santa Cruz, Cal.

ELIHU ANTHONY, ESQ.

Antigua (pop. 39,000) is one of the British West India Islands. It was discovered by Columbus in 1493, and remained for many years under the Spanish government. Methodism was introduced into it through the influence of Mr. Nathaniel Gilbert. He was the inheritor of one of its large estates, which had been in the possession of his ancestors for several generations. He was an able and influential citizen, and had been Speaker of the House of Assembly. Having visited England with several of his negro servants, two of them were awakened under the ministry of Mr. Wesley, and were baptized by him; and Mr. Gilbert himself was so deeply affected that on returning to the West Indies he became an evangelist. He preached to his own slaves, and formed among them a small society. Mr. Gilbert died in 1774. In 1778, John Baxter, a Methodist ship-builder at Chatham, felt himself impelled to embark for Antigua, "that he might have an opportunity of speaking for God." After his arrival in the island, he wrote to Mr. Wesley, "The former people have been kept together by two black women, who have continued praying in meeting with those who attended every night. I preached to about thirty on Saturday night; on Sunday morning to about the same number, and in the afternoon to about four or five hundred." He continued his labors among them, and in 1787, Dr. Coke, who had sailed for Nova Scotia, was driven by stress of weather to the West Indies. Landing at Antigua on Christmas morning, he met Mr. Baxter on his way to perform divine service, and who gladly welcomed him to the island. He found among the inhabitants nearly two thousand attendants at worship, embracing not only the negroes, but a large portion also of the white population. Mr. Baxter having been elected an elder by the Christmas Conference, which was held in Baltimore in 1784, was then ordained by Dr. Coke, who remained some time visiting the work, not only in that island, but in others contiguous. The Antigua district of the Wesleyan Methodists now embraces not only Antigua, but also includes Dominica, Montserrat, Nevis, Saint Christopher, Saint Eustatius, Saint Bartholomew, Saint Matthew's, Anguilla, and Tortola, having 9429 members. On the island of Antigua alone there are 1603 communicants. The M. E. Church is not represented there, although it took part in planting Methodism in that island.

Antinomians (from anti against, and νόμος the law) are those who hold that the moral law is not binding upon Christians. Mr. Wesley earnestly protested against Antinomianism, as one of the greatest obstacles in the way of a pure Christianity. He defined it to be "the doctrine which makes void the law through faith." Its disciples hold a false view of the atonement, considering that Christ performed for men the obedience which they ought to perform; and therefore that God, in justice, can demand nothing further from man. They also hold that a believer is not obliged to use the ordinances, and that preachers should not exhort men unto good works: "not unbelievers, because it is hurtful; not believers, because it is needless." Against this error as existing in ancient times the Epistle of St. James is strongly directed. Its full development was made by John Agricola, one of the earliest associates of Luther. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries Antinomianism was openly taught by many and was embraced by some High Calvinists. It is a doctrine that "withers and destroys the consciousness of human responsibility. It confounds moral with natural impotency, forgetting that the former is a crime, the latter only a misfortune; and thus treats the man dead in trespasses and sins as if he were already in his grave; it prophesies smooth things to the sinner going on in his transgressions, and soothes to slumber, and to the repose of death, the souls of such as are at ease in Zion. It assumes that because man can neither believe, repent, nor pray acceptably unless aided by the grace of God, it is useless to call upon him to do so. It maintains that the gospel is only intended for elect sinners; and therefore it ought to be preached to none but such. In defiance, therefore, of the command of God, it refuses to preach the glad tidings of mercy to every sinner." Against this form of High Calvinism which was then taught, Mr. Fletcher wrote his celebrated "Checks to Antinomianism," and Mr. Wesley also both preached and wrote vigorously against it. Alluding to the injury done by Antinomianism, in contrasting the law and the gospel, Mr. Wesley says, "There is no contrariety at all between the law and the gospel; indeed, neither of them supersedes the other, but they agree perfectly well together, yea, the very same words considered in different respects are parts, both of the law and of the gospel. If they are considered as commandments they are parts of the law; if as promises, of the gospel. This, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart,' when considered as a commandment, is a branch of the law; when regarded as a promise, is an essential part of the gospel. . . . The gospel being no other than the commands of the law proposed by way of promise, there is, therefore, the closest connection that can be conceived between the law and the gospel; on the one hand, the law continually makes way for and points us to the gospel; on the other, the gospel continually leads us to a more exact fulfilling of the law. The law, for instance, requires us to love God, to love our neighbor, to be meek, humble, and holy. We feel that we are not sufficient for these things; yea, that 'with man this is impossible.' But we see a promise of God to give us that love. We lay hold of this gospel, of these glad tidings; it is done unto us according to our faith; and 'the righteousness of the law is fulfilled in us' through faith which is in Christ Jesus. The moral law contained in the Ten Commandments, and enforced by the prophets, Christ did not take away. It was not the design of his coming to revoke any part of this. This is a law which never can be broken, which stands fast as the faithful witness in heaven. The moral stands on an entirely different foundation from the ceremonial or ritual law, which was only designed for a temporary restraint upon a disobedient and stiff-necked people; whereas this was from the beginning of the world, being written, not on tables of stone, but on the hearts of all men."

At this day Antinomian doctrines are seldom heard in the pulpit of any denomination, though occasionally there are tendencies in that direction.

Apologist, The Christian.—A newspaper in the German language, published weekly by the Western book agents in Cincinnati. It was commenced in 1838, and was edited by Dr. William Nast, who has been re-elected by each successive General Conference from that period to this. It is the organ of the German departments of the M. E. Church in the United States, and has accomplished great good both in explaining the doctrines and economy of Methodism and in defending them against the assaults of enemies. It is liberally patronized by the members of the German Methodist churches, and it has obtained a high standing, both for its literary ability and for its unswerving devotion to evangelical piety.

Apostles' Creed, the, is an expression of the Christian faith in which all branches of the evangelical churches agree. Richard Baxter says, "The antiquity of this compendium of Christian doctrine, and the veneration in which it has been held in the church of Christ, are circumstances which deservedly entitle it to be publicly pronounced from time to time in our Assemblies, as containing the great outline of the faith we profess, and to be committed to the memory of our children for the perpetuation of that faith from age to age." At what period this summary was made cannot now be definitely ascertained. Many writers in the Church of Rome teach that it was composed by the apostles themselves, during their stay at Jerusalem, and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. One of their writers, named Augustine, pretends that "a part of the Creed was contributed by each apostle." And he gives the order as follows: "Peter said, 'I believe in God the Father Almighty;' John, 'maker of heaven and earth;' James, 'and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord;' Andrew, 'who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary;' Philip, 'suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried;' Thomas, 'he descended into hell, the third day he rose again from the dead;' Bartholomew, 'he ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty;' Matthew, 'from thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.' James, the son of Alphaeus, added, 'I believe in the Holy Ghost; the holy Catholic Church;' Simon Zelotes, 'the communion of saints; the forgiveness of sins;' Jude, the brother of James, 'the resurrection of the body;' Matthias, 'the life everlasting.'" While all this is rejected as wholly fanciful, and while there is no evidence that the Creed was composed by the apostles, yet its authorship must be very ancient; for, with the exception of the phrase, "he descended into hell," it is found in the works of Ambrose, who lived in the third century. In the early ages it was not used in public worship, but candidates for baptism were required to subscribe it. The Westminster divines, placing it with the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer, in connection with their Catechism, say, "It is here annexed, not as though it was composed by the apostles, or ought to be esteemed as canonical Scripture as the 'Ten Commandments and Lord's Prayer,' but because it is a brief summary of the Christian faith, agreeable to the word, and anciently received into the church of Christ." It is contained also in the Catechism of the M. E. Church, and of other branches of the Methodist family, as well as in those of the Presbyterian churches, and is used in the baptismal service of the Roman, Greek, and leading Protestant denominations. The phrase, "he descended into hell," is omitted in the form used in the Methodist Episcopal Church. It is worthy of remark, that while more extended confessions of faith, or forms of creed, are used as terms of membership in many churches, no other creed is used in their forms of baptism.

Appeals.—The right of appeal from a decision in a primary trial is guaranteed by the constitution of the Methodist Episcopal Churches to every member and minister. The fifth restrictive rule, which limits the power of a General Conference, says, "They shall not do away the privileges of our ministers or preachers of trial by committee, and of an appeal; neither shall they do away the privileges of our members of trial before the society, or by a committee, and of an appeal." In the trial of a member, the appeal is from the decision of the committee to the next Quarterly Conference of the circuit or station. This Conference has power to confirm or reverse the decision, or to grant a new trial. If, during the investigation, questions of law are decided by the preacher who presides over the committee, exceptions may be taken to the ruling, and may be submitted to the presiding elder at the Quarterly Conference. The decision of the presiding elder may also be excepted to, and the questions carried to the bishop presiding at the next Annual Conference within the bounds of which the case occurred. The decision of the bishops on questions of law are reviewed by a committee of the General Conference, appointed for that purpose; and the judgment of the General Conference is in all cases final. In the trial of local preachers in the Quarterly Conferences, the appeal is to the ensuing Annual Conference, which may hear the cause by committee, or in full session, as they may judge best. In the trial of ministers by the Annual Conference, or by its judicial committee, an appeal may be taken to a Judicial Conference, composed of members of three adjacent Annual Conferences, whose decision is final; but questions of law decided by the bishop may be carried to the General Conference as before. In the case of the trial of a bishop by a Judicial Conference, his appeal is directly to the next General Conference.

Appel, Louis, a well-known and active layman in the M. E. Church, residing in Chicago, was chosen a lay delegate from the Chicago German Conference to the General Conference of 1876. This Conference being represented by only one minister and one layman, their duties were very onerous, and Mr. Appel therein rendered effective service.

Appleton, Wis. (pop. 4518), was formerly called Grand Chute, because of the rapids of the Fox River, which furnish immense water-power. It is the seat of the Lawrence University, which has added largely to the growth of the place. The M. E. Church has 260 members, 340 Sunday-school scholars, and a church and parsonage valued at $25,000.

Apportionment is the assignment to Conferences, districts, or pastoral charges, of their equitable division of the amount which should be raised for various church objects. The missionary committee, at its annual meetings, having to determine the amount needed for the current expenses of the year, apportions to each Conference the part which in its judgment should be raised within its bounds. That amount is subdivided by the Conference, first among the districts, and again among the several charges; thus, each church learns what is supposed to be its proper proportion which should be raised to sustain the various missions. The same process is applied to other collections. The amount needed for the support of the bishops is estimated by the Book Committee, and is by them apportioned among the Conferences, and subdivided to the several charges. The amount required for the support of the presiding elders is determined in the meeting of the district stewards, and is by them apportioned to the various churches. Where there are large circuits, and sometimes in stations, the amounts required are apportioned by the stewards to the several classes. These apportionments are not understood to constitute any claim, but they are regarded simply as indicating what should be expected from the several churches as their equitable proportion.

Appropriations are grants made by church boards to Conferences or charges, and which are placed in some form to their credit. The missionary committee appropriates annually a definite amount to certain Conferences, or in the case of foreign missions to each general missionary field. These appropriations are distributed by the Conferences, or by the Missionary Board, to the necessitous parts of their work according to their supposed requirements. They are drawn for, on the order of the Conference, by the presiding bishops, or, under the direction of the board, by the missionary secretaries, and they are applied by the presiding elders or superintendents to the respective fields. The appropriations made by the Church Extension Society are distributed according to the joint action of the Conference and the parent boards. In the Sunday-School and Tract Societies, and in the Freedmen's Aid Society, the appropriations are made directly to the individual field.

Arbitration is the hearing and determining of a case between parties in controversy by a person or persons chosen by the parties. In the Discipline of the M. E. Church, under the section entitled "Disagreement in business and non-payment of debts," it is said, "On any disagreement between two or more members of our church, concerning business transactions which cannot be settled by the parties, the preacher in charge shall inquire into the circumstances of the case, and shall recommend to the parties a reference, consisting of two arbiters chosen by the plaintiff and two chosen by the defendant, which four arbiters so chosen shall nominate a fifth; the five arbiters being members of our church. If either party refuse to abide their judgment he shall be brought to trial, and if he fail to show sufficient cause for such refusal he shall be expelled. If any member of our church shall refuse, in case of debt or other disputes, to refer the matter to arbitration when recommended by the preacher in charge, or shall enter into a lawsuit with another member before these measures are taken, he shall be brought to trial, and if he fail to show that the case is of such a nature as to require and justify a process at law, he shall be expelled." This rule was made to prevent hasty and unnecessary litigation, and is in harmony with the general rule, which forbids "brother going to law with brother." It intimates, however, that there may cases arise, in which the party will be justified in resorting at once to a legal remedy.

Arch Street Church, Philadelphia, is a beautiful Gothic edifice built of white marble, at a cost of about $200,000. The society was organized in 1862, by a few members from Trinity and Union churches, who worshiped for some time in a hall. The cornerstone of the chapel was laid in May, 1864, and the main edifice was finished and dedicated in 1870. The audience-room is 68 by 85 feet in the interior, and has galleries on three sides. It is furnished with lecture-room and class-rooms, and is one of the finest Methodist churches in the world.

Archer, Oliver H. P., a manager of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in the city of New York, January 14, 1825, and received his education in the schools of that city. He has been engaged during his business life in connection with the transportation of freight, and has been associated with the management of this department in leading railroads. He has been a generous giver to the church, contributed a memorial window to the Rev. George G. Cookman in the Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal church, Washington, D. C., and bore a leading share in the erection of the church at Allendale, N. J., a prosperous suburb of New York City.

Argentine Republic is a division of South America which lies south of Brazil and Bolivia, and extends from the Atlantic Ocean to the high mountain region which separates it from Chili. Its population is estimated at about 2,000,000. The inhabitants consist of Europeans and their descendants, and of the native Indians, with a number of mixed races. In their religion, they adhere chiefly to the Roman Catholic Church. In 1823, religious toleration was granted by the government to all denominations. In 1836, a mission was commenced by the M. E. Church in Buenos Ayres; the services, however, were designed chiefly for the English-speaking people, and were conducted in the English language. A church has been founded, with a good edifice, which supports its pastor and pays its current expenses. From this centre, appointments have gradually extended into the interior, where services are held both in the Spanish and the English languages. In 1872, a mission was opened in the province of Santa Fé, in Rosario, a city of 12,000 or more, and where a number of English people reside. The mission, from its commencement, has been under the care of Rev. T. B. Wood, and has good prospects of success. This is the only province in South America where the services of the M. E. Church have been established. The number of members reported in the mission is 450, and the value of church property is estimated at $150,000. Schools have been established in connection with the services, and an orphanage for boys has been founded at Rosario, under the special care of Mrs. Wood.

Arizona (pop. 9658). This Territory embraces about 30,000 square miles purchased from the republic of Mexico in what is known as the "Gadsden Treaty." As early as 1687, the country was explored by a Jesuit missionary from Sonora, who established missions at various points in the valleys. On his return, having reported the country as being very rich in the precious metals, a large immigration took place. In 1757, an old map shows more than forty towns and villages occupied, and it is said that more than one hundred silver and gold mines were in operation. Subsequently the native Indians, having been subjected to slavery, and having been cruelly treated, rose against their oppressors, and, with the aid of the wild Apaches, ultimately expelled nearly all the Spanish inhabitants. There are traces still remaining, however, of a former civilization and of extensive mining operations. The Pima and Maracopa Indians followed agriculture and possessed some of the arts of civilization, and are kindly admitting teachers and schools among them. But in the mountains and secluded valleys wild and fierce tribes roam from place to place, and put to death unguarded explorers. The chief settlements are near Tucson, which was the capital, and near Prescott, which has been built chiefly by Americans.

The first Methodist services in Arizona were performed by Rev. Mr. Gilmore, an army chaplain, at the military station in the vicinity of Prescott. In 1872, Rev. Mr. Reeder, of the North Ohio Conference, was sent out as a missionary, and he established a church in Prescott, and traveled extensively through the Territory, holding services in various localities; his health became impaired, and he was succeeded by Rev. Mr. Wright; but, owing to the unsettled state of the country, the results of this labor have been comparatively small. The

M. E. Church South has also extended its work into Arizona in connection with the Los Angeles Conference, and has gathered a few congregations. There can be no reasonable doubt that when the wild Indians are subdued and the mines can be sufficiently worked, and especially when the Southern Pacific Railroad shall be extended through the Territory, there will be a large immigration and good prospects of extensive usefulness.

Arkansas, State of (pop. 484,471), takes its name from a once extensive tribe of Indians who spoke the Osage language. A trading post was established by the French as early as 1685, but the Territory was not settled until a comparatively recent period. In 1820, it contained a population of a little more than 14,000, but since that time it has rapidly increased. The lower lands, though interspersed with swamps, are exceedingly fertile, while the western part of the State is rich with mineral products, and there are some indications of the precious metals. Methodism appears to have been introduced into this State about 1817, when the Missouri Conference was first organized and William Stevenson was sent to Hot Springs. At the Conference of 1818 he reported two circuits organized, Hot Springs and Spring River, and John Harris reported to the next Conference 324 members. A Black River district was organized mostly in that State, of which William Stevenson was presiding elder, and the following new laborers were sent into that region: John Shrader, Thomas Tenant, Washington Orr, and James Lowry. A Conference was organized within the State in 1836, and reported 2733 white members, 599 colored, and 1225 Indians. The most of the Methodists in the State adhered to the Church South at the division in 1845. A few, however, adhered to the M. E. Church. In 1852 the M. E. Church re-organized a Conference in that State. According to the census of 1870, there were of all denominations 1371 church organizations, 1141 edifices, 264,225 sittings, and church property amounting to $854,995, distributed as follows:

Arkansas Conference, M. E. Church, was organized in 1836, and its boundaries were arranged to "include the Arkansas Territory, that part of Missouri Territory lying south of the Cherokee line; also so much of the State of Louisiana as is included in the Louisiana district." At its first session there were reported 2733 white, 599 colored, and 1225 Indian members. The Territory was divided into six districts, viz., Little Rock, Batesville, Arkansas, Alexandria, Monroe, and South Indian Mission; and thirty-six preachers were stationed within its bounds. In 1840 Louisiana was detached, and there was added "so much of Texas as is embraced in the Red River district." At the division of the church in 1845, the Conference adhered to the M. E. Church South. After the close of the Civil War the M. E. Church proceeded to re-organize Conferences in the South, and Arkansas was included in the St. Louis Conference. In 1868, this Conference had permission to divide, so as to form a separate Arkansas Conference, when, in its judgment and that of the presiding bishop, the interests of the church required it. No action was taken until 1872, when the General Conference re-organized the Arkansas Conference, so as to "include the State of Arkansas and the Indian country west of the State." Its first session was held at Little Rock, January 29, 1873. Bishop Bowman presiding. It reported 34 preachers, 4781 members, 57 Sunday-schools, and 2003 scholars. The boundaries of the Conference still remain the same. It now (1876) embraces three districts, to wit: Little Rock, Batesville, and Fayetteville; and has 39 preachers, 4816 members, 38 churches, value, $40,600, 4 parsonages, value, $950, 55 Sunday-schools, and 1846 scholars.

Arkansas Conference, M. E. Church South.—This Conference adhered to the Southern church at the division in 1845. Its report in 1846 was 52 preachers, 154 local preachers, 7366 white members, 1702 colored. The latest report from this Conference (1875) is as follows: members, white, 10,791; colored, 7; local preachers, 162; Sunday-schools, 84; scholars, 4671. It has stationed 60 preachers, including 5 presiding elders. The General Conference of 1874 gave it the following boundaries: "Beginning at the point where the North Fork of White River crosses the Missouri State line; thence down North Fork to its mouth; thence down White River to the point of White River Mountains; thence with said mountains to Miller's Ferry, on Little Red River; thence south with the range of mountains to the head of Palarm Creek; thence down said creek to Arkansas River; thence up said river to the mouth of Petit Jean; thence along the line between Yell and Perry; thence so as to include Perry County; thence in a direct line to the southwest corner of Yell County; thence due west to the western line of the State; and thence with the State line to the beginning." There are also two other Conferences of the M. E. Church South, containing parts of the State of Arkansas, to wit: Little Rock and White River.

Arkansas Conference, African M. E. Church, was organized in 1868, by Bishop Shorter. It then embraced the State of Arkansas and the Indian Territory, and had 3698 members, 14 traveling preachers, 441 Sunday-school scholars, and 16 churches, valued at $2359. At the General Conference of 1876 it was divided into the Arkansas and South Arkansas Conferences, the Arkansas occupying only the northern part of the State. The statistics for the Arkansas Conferences are 44 ministers, 2826 members, 2008 Sunday-school scholars, 29 churches valued at $35,680.

Arminianism is the term applied to a system of theology taught by James Arminius, Professor of Divinity in the University of Leyden, and which is in its leading features opposed to the peculiar doctrines taught by Augustine and Calvin. The controversy in reference to the divine decrees, as related to the fate of individuals, was commenced at an early period in the history of the Christian church. Before the time of Augustine, which was in the fourth century, the fathers generally taught that salvation was conditioned upon faith and obedience, and that the decrees were in accordance with what was foreseen by the divine mind. St. Augustine, in the controversy with Pelagius, taught that the salvation of the elect depends upon the bare will of God, and that his decree to save them is unconditional. In the sixteenth century, the controversy in reference to predestination and election assumed no small degree of bitterness, Calvin warmly embracing the doctrines of Augustine. His followers taught, "that God had elected a certain portion of the human race to eternal life, passing by the rest, or rather dooming them to everlasting destruction; that God's election proceeded upon no prescience of the moral principles and character of those whom he had thus predestined, but originated solely in the mission of his free and sovereign mercy: that Christ died for the elect only, and therefore that the merits of his death can avail for the salvation of none but them: and that they are constrained by the irresistible power of divine grace to accept of him as their Saviour. To this doctrine that of Arminius, and of his legitimate followers, stands opposed. They do not deny an election, but they deny that it is absolute and unconditional. They argue that an election of this kind is inconsistent with the character of God: that it destroys the liberty of the human will: that it contradicts the language of Scripture; and that it tends to encourage a careless and licentious practice in those by whom it is believed. They maintain that God has elected those only who according, not to his decree, but to his foreknowledge, and in the exercise of their natural powers of self-determination, acting under the influence of his grace, possess that faith and holiness to which salvation is annexed in the gospel scheme. Those who are not elect are allowed to perish, not because they were not elect, but purely and solely in consequence of their infidelity and disobedience; on account, indeed, of which infidelity and disobedience being foreseen by God their election did not take place. They hold that Christ died for all men in the liberal and unrestricted sense of the phrase; that his atonement is able, both from its own merit and from the intention of Him who appointed it, to expiate the guilt of every individual; that every individual is invited to partake of the benefits which it has procured; that the grace of God is offered to make the will comply with this invitation, but that this grace may be resisted and rendered ineffectual by the sinner's perversity. Whether true believers necessarily persevered, or whether they might fall from their faith and forfeit their state of grace, was a question which Arminius left in a great measure unsolved, but which was soon determined by his followers in this additional proposition: 'that saints may fall from the state of grace in which they are placed by the operation of the Holy Spirit.' This, indeed, seems to follow as a corollary, from what Arminius maintained respecting the natural freedom and corruption of the will, and the resistibility of divine grace."

In the controversies which occurred in Holland, in the latter part of the sixteenth century, Arminius took an active part; and being a professor in the Leyden University, and a man of superior intellectual powers and literary attainments, he became, early in the seventeenth century, not only distinguished in the controversy, but the recognized leader of that school of thought which has since borne his name. The celebrated Barneveldt was one of his pupils, and, embracing his general principles, was among the first European statesmen who strongly advocated religious toleration; and the disciples of Arminius in Holland were the real fathers of true religious toleration. After the death of Arminius the controversy increased in bitterness, and in 1610 his followers presented a petition to the government, which was called a "remonstrance." This remonstrance set forth the points in which he differed from the Calvinistic theory. The state authorities in vain attempted to reconcile the opposing parties, and finally a national Synod was called at Dort, in 1618, which continued its sittings through the following year. This Synod, so well known in history, condemned the five articles which the Arminians had set forth in their remonstrance. Strange to say, they soon deemed it necessary to direct the preparation of a new Dutch translation of the whole Bible, in order to more clearly fix the sense of disputed passages. This was completed in 1637, and was followed by a new version made by the Arminians, and published in 1680.

The declaration of their opinions led not only to protracted and bitter religious controversy, but to great personal suffering on their part. Throughout the state their ministers were forbidden to preach, and the laymen who supported them were deprived of civil office. Barneveldt, their great leader, was put to death in reality for his religious opinions, though nominally for a political cause. Grotius and Hoogerbeetz, under a pretext more plausible than solid, were unjustly doomed to perpetual imprisonment, from which, however, the former afterwards escaped, and fled into France. Their crime was "defiance and a spirit of religious toleration." Many followers of Arminius left Holland and retired to different parts of the adjacent countries; but after the death of Maurice, in 1625, a number returned, and in 1630 they were permitted to build churches and schools. Having established congregations in several places, they founded a school in Amsterdam; and the renowned Episcopius became its first professor of theology. The confession prepared by Episcopius, at the request of the Remonstrants, was received with great favor by the Lutherans throughout Europe; and a number of leading scholars and eminent divines became advocates of the same system of doctrines. This controversy not only divided the Protestants in Europe, but it was a matter of contention between the Jesuits and the Jansenists in the Roman Catholic Church. The Lutherans generally sympathized with the Arminian party; and Ebrard says, "The true tenets of Arminianism were not killed at Dort, but grew up silently but surely within the bosom of the orthodox Reformed Church." In England a system of doctrines, similar to Arminianism, had been taught by leading divines before the days of Arminius; and the Articles of the Church of England were differently interpreted by the theologians of the various schools. Some of the English Arminians, however, were unsound on the doctrine of the Atonement; and while on one hand opposing Calvinism, on the other they passed into Pelagianism and Arianism.

The doctrine of Arminius, as taught by himself, was revived in England, and clearly and distinctly taught by John Wesley and John Fletcher. This system was embodied not only in the general minutes of the Wesleyan Methodists, but was subsequently clearly maintained by Richard Watson in his "Theological Institutes." The Wesleyan Methodists, the M. E. churches, and all the branches of the Methodist family, except the few that are recognized as Calvinistic Methodists, hold the doctrines of Arminianism as taught by Wesley and Fletcher; but at the same time they reject, as thoroughly as do the Calvinists, all Pelagian, Socinian, or Arian sentiments. Dr. McClintock, in his able Cyclopædia, makes the following clear statement: "The views of Arminius on the points of predestination and grace are presented in the following articles, drawn up almost entirely in words which may be found in his writings:

"1. God, by an eternal and immutable decree, ordained in Jesus Christ, before the foundation of the world, to save in Christ, because of Christ, and through Christ, from out of the human race, which is fallen and subject to sin, those who by the grace of the Holy Spirit believe in the name of his Son, and who, by the same grace, persevere unto the end in that faith and the obedience of faith; but, on the contrary, to leave in sin, and subject to wrath, those who are not converted and are unbelieving, and to condemn them as aliens from Christ according to the gospel. (John iii. 36.)

"2. To which end Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, died for all and each one, so that he has gained for all, through the death of Christ, reconciliation and redemption of sins; on this condition, however, that no one enjoys that redemption of sins except the faithful man, and this too, according to the gospel. (John iii. 16, and I. John ii.)

"3. But man has not from himself, or by the power of his free will, saving faith, inasmuch as in the state of defection and sin he cannot think or do of himself any good, which is indeed really good, such as saving faith is; but it is necessary for him to be renewed again, and renewed by God in Christ through his Holy Spirit, in his mind, affection, or will, and all his faculties, so that he may be able to understand, think, wish, and perform something good, according to that saying of Christ in John xv. 5.

"4. It is this grace of God which begins, promotes, and perfects everything good: and this to such a degree that even the regenerate man, without this preceding or adventitious grace, exciting, consequent, and co-operating, can neither think, wish, or do anything good, nor even resist any evil temptation. So that all the good works, which we can think of, are to be attributed to the grace of God in Christ. But as to the manner of the operation of that grace, it is not irresistible, for it is said of many, that they resisted the Holy Spirit, in Acts vii. 51, and many other places.

"5. Those who are grafted into Christ by a true faith, and therefore partake of his unifying spirit, have abundance of means by which they might fight against Satan, sin, the world, and their own flesh, and obtain the victory, also, however, by the aid of the grace of the Holy Spirit; Jesus Christ assists them by his Spirit in all temptations, and stretches out his hand; and provided they are ready for the contest, and seek his aid, and are not wanting in their duty, he strengthens them to such a degree, that they cannot be seduced or snatched from the hands of Christ by any fraud of Satan or violence, according to that saying, John x. 28, 'no man shall pluck them out of my hand;' but whether these very persons cannot, by their own negligence, desert the commencement of this being in Christ, and embrace again the present world, fall back from the holy doctrine once committed to them, make shipwreck of their conscience, and fall from grace, this must be more fully examined, and weighed by the Holy Scriptures, before men can teach it with full tranquillity of mind and confidence.

"This last proposition was modified by the followers of Arminius so as to assert the possibility of falling from grace. In his scheme of theology, Arminius accepted the church's developed ideas respecting God and respecting man, and then expounded with keen dialectical rigor the only doctrine which could harmonize the two. His mission was to point out how God could be what the church taught that he was, and man what the church declared him to be, at one and the same time. The re-adjustment of the disturbing abnormal relations of man to God, by justification, is the central thought of Protestant theology: the announcement and exposition of their relations in that re-adjustment was the work of Arminius. Magnify either of the related terms to the final suppression of the other, and error is the result. Magnify the divine agency to the complete suppression of the human in that re-adjustment, and fatalism is inevitable. Magnify the human to the complete suppression of the divine, and extreme Pelagianism is the result. To Arminius is the church indebted for her first vivid apprehension and scientific statement of the Christian doctrine of the relation of man to God."

Watson thus states the benefits which followed from the teachings of Arminius: "They preserved many of the Lutheran churches from the tide of Supralapsarianism, and its constant concomitant, Antinomianism. They moderated even Calvinism in many places, and gave better countenance and courage to the Sublapsarian scheme; which, though logical, perhaps, not much to be preferred to that of Calvin, is at least not so revolting, and does not impose the same necessity upon men of cultivating that hardihood which glories in extremes, and laughs at moderation. They gave rise, incidentally, to a still milder modification of the doctrine of the decrees, known in England by the name of Baxterism, in which homage is, at least in words, paid to the justice, truth, and benevolence of God. They also kept on record, in the beautiful, learned, eloquent, and above all these, the scriptural system of theology furnished by the writings of Arminius, how truly man may be totally and hereditarily corrupt, without converting him into a machine or a devil; how fully secured in the scheme of redemption of man by Jesus Christ is the divine glory, without making the Almighty partial, willful, and unjust: how much the Spirit's operation in man is enhanced and glorified by the doctrine of the freedom of the human will, in connection with that of its assistance by divine grace; with how much lustre the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ shines, when offered to the assisted choice of all mankind, instead of being confined to the forced acceptance of a few; how the doctrine of election, when it is made conditional on faith foreseen, harmonizes with the wisdom, holiness, and goodness of God, among a race of beings for all of whom faith was made possible; and how reprobation harmonizes with justice, when it has a reason, not in arbitrary will, the sovereignty of a pasha, but in the principles of a righteous God."

Many Calvinistic writers, both in England and in America, confound Arminianism with Pelagianism, and thus do great injustice to those who embrace that system of doctrines; and many attacks made upon Methodism, in a doctrinal point of view, are based upon this error. No branch of the church teaches more clearly than does Methodism the depravity of human nature, and the necessity of regeneration by the operation of the Holy Spirit; and no class of Christians more earnestly contends for the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, than do the followers of John Wesley; but while strictly orthodox in these positions, they utterly reject the Calvinistic doctrines of election and predestination. They do not believe that any man is elected to eternal life, or condemned to eternal death, simply by the pleasure of God, or by an unconditional decree. In this respect Methodists are thorough Arminians. With this broad and liberal Christian doctrine, they have embraced the same spirit of toleration which Arminius loved to manifest; they are always ready to join with Christians of all denominations in works of benevolence and in plans for fraternal union, believing that the true essence of religion manifests itself in purity of heart, rather than in clear and exact intellectual perception of the relation of the various truths of the gospel.

Arminius, James, a distinguished divine in Holland. He was not a Methodist, having lived more than a hundred years before the organization of that system; but he was recognized as a great teacher of the system of theology embraced in Methodism, having given his name to the school of Arminianism, and hence a brief notice may not be improper. He was born in 1560, at Oudewater, a small town in Holland, and was sent to school at Utrecht, and subsequently at Marburg. At the age of fifteen he entered as a student at the University of Leyden, and after six years was supported by the Conference of Amsterdam, on his agreement that he would not serve any other church without the permission of the burgomaster of that city. In the following year he entered the Theological School of Geneva, where, in his occasional lectures, he manifested great independence of thought. He then visited Basle, but returned to Geneva and spent three years more in theological studies; after which he visited various schools in Italy, and proceeded to Rome. His enemies circulated the report that he "had kissed the Pope's slipper, and held intercourse with the Jesuits," a charge from which the testimony of friends traveling with him entirely acquit him. He frequently remarked that he derived a benefit from his journey, as "he saw at Rome a mystery of iniquity much more foul than he had ever imagined." Recalled to Amsterdam by the burgomaster of the city, he was ordained as a minister in 1588. A work having been published shortly afterwards attacking the Calvinistic view of predestination, Arminius was requested to answer it; but on careful examination he became convinced that the doctrine taught by Calvin and Beza could not be supported by the Holy Scriptures. He took occasion soon after to express his views in his lectures on the ninth chapter of Romans. In 1603 he accepted a professorship in the Leyden University, where he received the degree of D.D., being the first to receive from the university that high honor. His lectures attracted great attention, but his doctrines were severely assailed by members of the theological faculty. He was denounced as a Pelagian and worse than a Pelagian, and in 1607 an assembly was convened at the Hague to decide in what manner a synod was to be held to determine the controversy. In 1608, Arminius, and Gomar, his chief opponent, appeared before the Supreme Court of the Hague, which, having heard their statements, decided that the points on which they differed were of little importance and unessential to religion. He had been for some time in feeble health, and died October 19, 1609. He was a man of acute and powerful mental faculties, and was distinguished above his contemporaries for his style and eloquence, and while amiable and gentle in manner he especially excelled in theological power. Neander styles him "the model of a conscientious and investigating theologian." Though accused of Pelagianism and Arianism, his writings show that he had no tendency in those directions. He was broad and liberal in his views of church union, and earnestly longed for the time when Christians of all denominations should form one great unity in brotherly love.

Armstrong, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ireland, 1787, and died in Laporte Co., Ind., Sept. 12, 1834. He was converted in Philadelphia at 17; licensed as a local preacher, in Baltimore, at 24; emigrated to Indiana in 1821, and entered the itinerant ministry in the same year. He labored with great success until his death. He was an earnest and useful minister, and many were added to the church through his labors.

Armstrong, J. W., D.D., a distinguished educator and member of the Northern New York Conference, was born in Woolwich, Sept. 21, 1812, and emigrated with his parents to Quebec in his twelfth year. He entered Cazenovia Seminary as a student in 1837, and was admitted into the Black River Conference in 1841. In 1850 he became teacher of experimental science in Cazenovia Seminary, where he remained four years; after which he engaged in pastoral work, and he was appointed presiding elder in 1864. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1860, 1864, and 1868. From 1865 to 1869, he was head-master in Oswego Training School. In the latter year he was appointed principal of the State Normal and Training School, at Fredonia, N. Y., where he still remains. He has written a number of scientific articles for various periodicals, and has delivered public lectures, and read papers before scientific and educational associations.

Armstrong, William, is an official member of the Broad Street church, Philadelphia. He has taken a deep interest in church enterprises, especially in the erection of churches. He is a member of the Board of Church Extension. He is also actively engaged in business in the city.

Army and Navy Work (British).—This is a branch of Home Missionary operations, and is under the direction of the same committee. Its attention seems to have been more especially directed to the interests of Wesleyan soldiers about the year 1858, when, by the sanction of the commander-in-chief of her Majesty's forces, a chaplaincy was established at the camp at Aldershot for the benefit of the troops stationed there.

For some time this was the only station occupied. The first committee was appointed the following year; but entire freedom from all restrictions to visit the camps and depots was not enjoyed till 1867. Through the indefatigable efforts of the Rev. Charles Prest, free communications were entered upon with the War Office and the Admiralty; the status of Wesleyan ministers was fully recognized, and every facility obtained for pastoral visitation among the sailors of the Royal navy, the Royal marine artillery, and the marines; with all the regiments of the line, whether stationed at home or abroad. When it is considered that a large proportion of the young men annually joining as recruits have been trained in Sunday-schools, or in Christian homes connected either with our own or some other branch of the Methodist Church, it becomes not a matter of connectional polity merely, but of paramount importance to the young men, that they should feel that the church of their fathers has not ceased to care for them. Many who have resisted all religious influence at home have been reached by the Methodist chaplain, and have joined the church, while many backsliders have been gathered in again, even in distant lands; as a rule, no class of men are more earnest and consistent members than Methodist soldiers and sailors.

Fourteen stations have ministers set apart for this special work. The committee consists of the London members of the Home Missionary Committee. At each district meeting in May, inquiry is made as to the numbers marched to divine service during the year, also the number meeting in class, with the average number of the militia attending divine service during the training weeks.

The last returns of "declared Wesleyans" in the army and navy throughout Great Britain, amounted to 4180, of whom 314 were members of society. The number in the militia was 2730, of whom 72 were church members.

Arnold Park camp-ground is situated on the right bank of the Allegheny River, about fifteen miles above Pittsburgh, Pa. It is readily reached by the Allegheny Valley Railroad, and the company have built a depot at the grounds, which are so near by that conveyances are not needed to reach them. The grounds are ample and well adapted to camp-meeting purposes, being abundantly supplied with shade and living water. Although this is the second year of this association, it is already incorporated, and extensive improvements have been made. It is designed to make the location permanent. It is chiefly under the control of the Methodist Episcopal Church, yet nearly all religious bodies are associated with it.

Arnold, Wesley P., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, united with the South Carolina Conference in 1827. In 1829 he was ordained deacon by Bishop McKendree, and at the first session of the Georgia Conference, in Jan., 1831, was ordained elder by Bishop Hedding. His last appointment was to Milledgeville station, Dec. 1869, where he died suddenly on Christmas in the same year. He had given 43 years of earnest and successful labor to the ministry. A man who shunned no toil that duty seemed to require: of unusual vigor, even in later life. When 60 years of age he was accustomed to walk to his appointments. He was pronounced by those who knew him as the noblest type of Christian manhood.

Arthur, Wm., was born in Ireland, in the year 1819, and entered the British Wesleyan ministry in 1838. After a brief sojourn in the East Indies he returned home, and shortly after the pages of the Wesleyan Magazine were enriched with "A Narrative of a Mission to the Mysore," which at once fixed his fame as a writer. Various other works have issued from his pen. Few men have made better marks on the annals of their times than he. He is well known in the United States as having visited the General Conference as a deputation. He is well known as a fluent Italian scholar and preacher, having done good service to the European work by his visits to different stations on the Continent. For some years he has been mysteriously laid aside from active work by a loss of voice; still, as Honorary Secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, he renders active and efficient aid to the cause. In the chair of the Conference in 1866, he showed rare administrative ability. A calm and dispassionate speaker, a rich unction often attending his utterances, and a disposition like the beloved disciple, he occupies a high position among his brethren, while his pen richly dispenses wide-spread influence wherever his works are read. He still lives, and will ever live in the love and esteem of his brethren, and of a constituency wide as the world. His thrilling work, "The Tongue of Fire," has been widely circulated.

Articles of Religion.—The Creed of the Methodist Episcopal Church, or its Confession of Faith, is mainly embodied in twenty-five sections, which are termed "Articles of Religion." They were abridged and slightly altered from the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, and were printed in "The Sunday Service," and adopted at the organization of the church. They did not, however, appear in the Discipline, as published, until 1790. On comparing them with the Articles of the Church of England, it will be perceived that the 3d, 8th, 13th, 15th, 17th, 18th, 20th, 21st, 23d, 26th, 29th, 33d, 35th, 36th, and 37th of the English Church were wholly omitted, and that the 6th, 9th, and 19th were abridged. With the exception of a few verbal alterations, the other articles are contained in the Discipline of the church, to which reference has been made. The 23d article, which refers to the rulers of this country, inserted in lieu of that on the civil magistrates in England, was drawn up by Mr. Wesley, and was adopted in 1784, but was amended in 1804. The chief doctrinal differences between the Articles of the Church of England and those of the M. E. Church consist in the omission, by the latter, of the section on predestination, and a part of the article on original sin. Other articles were omitted, as in Mr. Wesley's judgment they were unnecessary, such as those on "the authority of the church," on "the authority of general councils," on "the authority of ministers," on "the use of the Lord's Supper by unbelievers," on "excommunicated persons," on "the homilies," and on "the consecration of bishops and ministers."

These articles have been uniformly adopted by nearly all the branches of Methodism in America; and in many of the churches the restrictive rules forbid their alteration. They are a clear, definite, but brief declaration of Christian faith and order, and are as follows:

"I. Of Faith in the Holy Trinity.—There is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body or parts, of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the maker and preserver of all things, visible and invisible. And in the unity of this Godhead there are three persons, of one substance, power, and eternity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

"II. Of the Word, or Son of God, who was made very Man.—The Son, who is the Word of the Father, the very and eternal God, of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin; so that two whole and perfect natures, that is to say, the Godhead and manhood, were joined together in one person, never to be divided, whereof is one Christ, very God and very man, who truly suffered, was crucified, dead and buried, to reconcile his Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for the actual sins of men.

"III. Of the Resurrection of Christ.—Christ did truly rise again from the dead, and took again his body, with all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, wherewith he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth until he return to judge all men at the last day.

"IV. Of the Holy Ghost.—The Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, is of one substance, majesty, and glory with the Father and the Son, very and eternal God.

"V. The Sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for Salvation.—The Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation. In the name of the Holy Scripture we do understand those canonical books of the Old and New Testament of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church. The names of the canonical books are—

"Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, The First Book of Samuel, The Second Book of Samuel, The First Book of Kings, The Second Book of Kings, The First Book of Chronicles, The Second Book of Chronicles, The Book of Ezra, The Book of Nehemiah, the Book of Esther, the Book of Job, The Psalms, The Proverbs, Ecclesiastes or the Preacher, Cantica or Songs of Solomon, Four Prophets the greater, Twelve Prophets the less.

"All the books of the New Testament, as they are commonly received, we do receive and account canonical.

"VI. Of the Old Testament.—The Old Testament is not contrary to the New; for both in the Old and New Testament everlasting life is offered to mankind by Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and man, being both God and man. Wherefore they are not to be heard who feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises. Although the law given from God by Moses, as touching ceremonies and rites, doth not bind Christians, nor ought the civil precepts thereof of necessity be received in any commonwealth; yet, notwithstanding, no Christian whatsoever is free from the obedience of the commandments which are called moral.

"VII. Of Original or Birth Sin.—Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam (as the Pelagians do vainly talk), but it is the corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and of his own nature inclined to evil, and that continually.

"VIII. Of Free Will.—The condition of man after the fall of Adam is such that he cannot turn and prepare himself, by his own natural strength and works, to faith, and calling upon God; wherefore we have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us, when we have that good will.

"IX. Of the Justification of Man.—We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservings. Wherefore, that we are justified by faith only, is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort.

"X. Of Good Works.—Although good works, which are the fruits of faith, and follow after justification, cannot put away our sins, and endure the severity of God's judgments; yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and spring out of a true and lively faith, inasmuch that by them a lively faith may be as evidently known as a tree is discerned by its fruit.

"XI. Of Works of Supererogation.—Voluntary works—besides, over, and above God's commandments—which are called works of supererogation, cannot be taught without arrogancy and impiety. For by them men do declare that they do not only render unto God as much as they are bound to do, but that they do more for his sake than of bounden duty is required: whereas Christ saith plainly, When ye have done all that is commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants.

"XII. Of Sin after Justification.—Not every sin willingly committed after justification is the sin against the Holy Ghost, and unpardonable. Wherefore, the grant of repentance is not to be denied to such as fall into sin after justification: after we have received the Holy Ghost, we may depart from grace given, and fall into sin, and, by the grace of God, rise again and amend our lives. And therefore they are to be condemned who say they can no more sin as long as they live here; or deny the place of forgiveness to such as truly repent.

"XIII. Of the Church.—The visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered, according to Christ's ordinance, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same.

"XIV. Of Purgatory.—The Romish doctrine concerning purgatory, pardon, worshiping and adoration, as well of images as of relics, and also invocation of saints, is a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warrant of Scripture, but repugnant to the word of God.

"XV. Of Speaking in the Congregation in such a Tongue as the People understand.—It is a thing plainly repugnant to the word of God, and the custom of the primitive church, to have public prayer in the church, or to minister the sacraments, in a tongue not understood by the people.

"XVI. Of the Sacraments.—Sacraments ordained of Christ are not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession, but rather they are certain signs of grace, and God's good will toward us, by the which he doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirm, our faith in him.

"There are two sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel: that is to say, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord.

"Those five commonly called sacraments, that is to say, confirmation, penance, orders, matrimony, and extreme unction, are not to be counted for sacraments of the Gospel: being such as have partly grown out of the corrupt following of the apostles, and partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures, but yet have not the like nature of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, because they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God.

"The sacraments were not ordained of Christ to be gazed upon, or to be carried about; but that we should duly use them. And in such only as worthily receive the same, they have a wholesome effect or operation: but they that receive them unworthily, purchase to themselves condemnation. as St. Paul saith, I. Cor. xi. 29.

"XVII. Of Baptism.—Baptism is not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christians are distinguished from others that are not baptized; but it is also a sign of regeneration, or the new birth. The baptism of young children is to be retained in the Church.

"XVIII. Of the Lord's Supper.—The Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another, but rather is a sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death: inasmuch that, to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ; and likewise the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ.

"Transubstantiation, or the change of the substance of bread and wine in the Supper of our Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions.

"The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper, only after a heavenly and spiritual manner. And the means whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper, is faith.

"The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped.

"XIX. Of both Kinds.—The cup of the Lord is not to be denied to the lay people; for both the parts of the Lord's Supper, by Christ's ordinance and commandment, ought to be administered to all Christians alike.

"XX. Of the one Oblation of Christ, finished upon the Cross.—The offering of Christ, once made, is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual: and there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone. Wherefore the sacrifice of masses, in the which it is commonly said that the priest doth offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt, is a blasphemous fable and dangerous deceit.

"XXI. Of the Marriage of Ministers.—The ministers of Christ are not commanded by God's law either to vow the estate of single life, or to abstain from marriage: therefore it is lawful for them, as for all other Christians, to marry at their own discretion, as they shall judge the same to serve best to godliness.

"XXII. Of the Rites and Ceremonies of Churches.—It is not necessary that rites and ceremonies should in all places be the same, or exactly alike; for they have been always different, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's word. Whosoever, through his private judgment, willingly and purposely doth openly break the rites and ceremonies of the Church to which he belongs, which are not repugnant to the word of God, and are ordained and approved by common authority, ought to be rebuked openly, that others may fear to do the like, as one that offendeth against the common order of the Church, and woundeth the consciences of weak brethren.

"Every particular Church may ordain, change, or abolish rites and ceremonies, so that all things may be done to edification.

"XXIII. Of the Rulers of the United States of America.—The President, the Congress, the General Assemblies, the Governors, and the Councils of State, as the delegates of the people, are the rulers of the United States of America, according to the division of power made to them by the Constitution of the United States, and by the Constitutions of their respective States. And the said States are a sovereign and independent nation, and ought not to be subject to any foreign jurisdiction.*

"XXIV. Of Christian Men's Goods.—The riches and goods of Christians are not common, as touching the right, title, and possession of the same, as some do falsely boast. Notwithstanding, every man ought of such things as he possesseth, liberally to give alms to the poor, according to his ability.

"XXV. Of a Christian Man's Oath.—As we confess that vain and rash swearing is forbidden Christian men by our Lord Jesus Christ and James his apostle: so we judge that the Christian religion doth not prohibit, but that a man may swear when the magistrate requireth, in a cause of faith and charity, so it be done according to the prophet's teaching, in justice, judgment, and truth."

Asbury, Francis, the second bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the first ordained in the United States, was born in Handsworth, Staffordshire, England, on the 20th of August, 1745. He was trained by pious parents, who were members of the Methodist society. At an early age he was placed in a good school, and when between six and seven commenced reading the Bible regularly, with the historical part of which, he says, "he was greatly delighted." In his fourteenth year, he was apprenticed to learn the business of making "buckle chapes." During this period he had the opportunity of listening to such preachers as Ryland, Stillingfleet, Talbot, Hawes, and Venn, who were among the distinguished ministers of the English pulpit. When about fourteen, he was converted, and he pursued, in his leisure hours, a course of theological reading, among which were Whitefield's sermons. When about sixteen, he commenced holding prayer-meetings, both in his own village and in those adjacent; and at eighteen, he was licensed as a local preacher. The fervency and eloquence of his early efforts surprised both preachers and people, and multitudes listened, "wondering and weeping."

Besides attending to his ordinary business during the week, he preached, not only on the Sabbath, but frequently three or four times during the week; until, at the age of twenty-one, he was received into the Wesleyan Conference, and regularly appointed to a circuit. He was remarkable for his strict devotion to the work of the ministry and for his faithful discharge of all his duties. He made himself thoroughly acquainted with the doctrines and discipline of Methodism, and cherished for them the warmest attachment. In 1771, his mind became deeply impressed with the conviction that he should go as missionary to America, where two ministers had been sent by Mr. Wesley two years before. At the Conference Mr. Wesley called for volunteers, and Asbury presented himself, and was accepted. He sailed from Bristol, with Richard Wright, a minister of one year's standing, on the 4th of September, and arrived in Philadelphia on the 27th of October. The voyage had been long and disagreeable, but during the passage he had divided his time between reading theological works and conversing affectionately but earnestly with the sailors and his fellow-passengers. The first religious service he attended in America was in St. George's church, Philadelphia, where Mr. Pilmoor officiated. He immediately commenced his labors, chiefly in New York, Philadelphia, and the adjacent sections of country. Only five years before, the first Methodist sermon had been preached in New York, and three years before, the first Methodist church edi-

* "As far as it respects civil affairs, we believe it the duty of Christians, and especially all Christian ministers, to be subject to the supreme authority of the country where they may reside, and to use all laudable means to enjoin obedience to the powers that be: and therefore it is expected that all our preachers and people, who may be under the British or any other government, will behave themselves as peaceable and orderly subjects."

fice had been built. The whole number of communicants at that period was reported at three hundred and seventy-one; about one hundred being in New York and Philadelphia each, and the remaining one hundred and seventy-one being scattered in New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland. The year following he was appointed by Mr. Wesley as "General Assistant in America," to supervise both preachers and churches, and watch over unwilling to leave. He believed it wrong to abandon the thousands of persons who had placed themselves under the care of the Methodist preachers, and he had confidence in the righteousness of the struggle through which the colonies were passing. He, however, had conscientious scruples as to taking the oath which was prescribed at that early period, and believed it to be his duty to stand aloof from the whole political excitement. As some of the English all their interests. In 1773, however, Mr. Rankin, who was an older minister, was sent from England, and to him Mr. Wesley gave the general supervision, and the first Conference was held by him in Philadelphia in 1773.

After the Revolutionary War broke out, Mr. Rankin and nearly all the ministers who had come from England left their work and returned to Great Britain. Mr. Asbury sympathized deeply with the American people, and had become so attached to the interests of the Western Continent that he was ministers prior to their leaving had been imprudent, all the preachers were exposed to much suffering and persecution: several of them were imprisoned and otherwise punished. But they bore their sufferings with meekness, and were the means, even in prison and through the prison grates, of preaching to many, who were converted through their labors.

In June, 1776, Mr. Asbury was arrested in the vicinity of Baltimore, and fined £5 for preaching. Nevertheless, he continued traveling and filling appointments day by day, until, in the spring of 1778, he was compelled to retire. He found a hospitable shelter in the house of Thomas White, of Delaware, a distinguished citizen and a judge of one of its courts. There he remained in seclusion for about two years, though, with the exception of about ten months, he occasionally preached to small congregations. During this time, a private letter which he had written to one of his English associates who was leaving the country, and in which he defended the cause of America, fell into the hands of the military authorities, and they became satisfied that so far from his being an enemy, he was a true and earnest friend. From that period he suffered no further annoyance, and the Methodist preachers generally were permitted to travel throughout the country. Mr. Asbury was requested by the preachers, in the absence of any assistant appointed by Mr. Wesley, to take the general supervision of the church, and from 1780 he virtually exercised the office of superintendent.

At the close of the Revolution, the Methodist societies earnestly desired the administration of the sacraments. They had hitherto been regarded as affiliating with the Church of England. Their ministers were considered simply as laymen, and the members had received baptism and the Lord's Supper in the parish churches. But, during the war, the ministers of the Church of England generally fled from the country; the parish churches were unoccupied, and there were none to administer the sacred ordinances. Some of the preachers desired to elect and ordain some of their own number for this purpose, but Mr. Asbury earnestly opposed any change of ecclesiastical order until Mr. Wesley had been consulted. The case was laid before him, and, after full consideration and earnest prayer, Mr. Wesley resolved to take the necessary steps for the organization of the societies of America into a separate church. Accordingly, with the assistance of several clergymen in England, he set apart Dr. Coke for the office of superintendent, ordaining him according to the form for ordaining bishops in the Church of England. He also ordained two elders, and sent them to America with Dr. Coke, to whom he gave directions to ordain Mr. Asbury as a joint superintendent.

A Conference was convened in Baltimore on Christmas, 1784; a church was organized, by the unanimous consent of the preachers present, called the "Methodist Episcopal Church," and Dr. Coke and Mr. Asbury were elected superintendents or bishops. Mr. Asbury was ordained by Dr. Coke, with the assistance of Revs. Whateoat and Vasey, who had been ordained elders by Mr. Wesley, and also by Rev. Mr. Otterbine, of the German Reformed Church.

At that time there were eighty-three Methodist ministers and about fourteen thousand church members. The superintendence of the church devolved almost entirely upon Bishop Asbury, as Dr. Coke, in the following spring, returned to England, and thereafter only visited, for a few months at a time, the churches in the United States.

From that time forward the life of Bishop Asbury was one of constant activity and of increasing care. He traveled from Georgia to Maine almost every year, and, crossing the mountains, he kept up with the increasing tide of population which was sweeping both westward and southward.

His severe labors impaired his health, and on several occasions he wished to retire from his position, but the earnest entreaties of his friends and of the church induced him to continue his work. In 1814 he suffered from an attack of inflammatory fever, and for some time his friends despaired of his recovery. When he was able to travel, some friends in Philadelphia presented him with a light carriage, in which he crossed the Allegheny Mountains. From that time he was frequently so weak that he was unable to stand in the pulpit. Often was he carried from the coach into the church, and set upon a table in the pulpit, from which he preached with great earnestness and solemnity for nearly an hour, being unable either to walk or stand. In March, 1816, he journeyed from the South towards Baltimore, hoping to reach the General Conference which began the 1st of May. At Richmond, Va., he preached his last sermon, on Sunday, March 24, 1816. That week he reached Spottsylvania. On the following Sunday morning his friends proposed to send for a physician, for he was evidently sinking. He objected, saying that it was of no use, as his work was about done. His traveling companion at his request conducted religious services, and at its close, Bishop Asbury, forgetting that he was not in a church, requested that the "mite collection" might be taken. This was a collection he took in behalf of poor frontier preachers, thus showing that his sympathies were with his brethren in his last moments. During the afternoon he calmly fell asleep in Jesus.

Bishop Asbury was a man of deep thought and wise conclusions. He had remarkable power in estimating character. He was a man of uniform piety, and when convinced of duty, no perils could divert him from his purpose. In passing through the Indian country west of the mountains, he often encamped in the wilderness, where no one ventured to sleep, except under the protection of a trustworthy sentinel.

His journals contain the outline of his wonderful work; he manifested a zeal apostolic in its character, and an industry and patience almost unrivaled. Notwithstanding his constant traveling, he read many of the most valuable works. He had a fair knowledge of the Scriptures in the original tongues, and as a theologian was remarkably accurate and sound. As a preacher he was clear, forcible, and generally very earnest. His sermons are represented as having been oftentimes very powerful and eloquent. As an executive officer he especially excelled. He possessed unusual talent for organizing, and seemed to have an almost instinctive recognition of the talents and fitness of the preachers for their several positions. He was a friend of both ministerial and general education.

In 1783 we find him conferring with John Dickins in reference to the foundation of a seminary, and immediately after the organization of the church he laid the foundation of "Cokesbury College" at Abingdon. For the erection of its building he collected money from house to house; he selected its teachers, and occasionally addressed its students, and was virtually its president. He was especially desirous of establishing seminaries in different districts of the country. The early destruction of the college at Abingdon by fire, and the like destruction of the one which succeeded it in Baltimore, led him to believe that Providence did not favor, at that time, the further prosecution of this branch of church work, and he gave himself chiefly to the duties of evangelism. He took a deep interest in the publication of Methodist literature, and with Mr. Dickins projected the founding of the "Methodist Book Concern," whose interests he carefully fostered as long as he lived. He was a model of personal economy; though neat and careful in his personal appearance, he was exceedingly plain and simple. That he might give himself wholly to the work, he refrained from marriage, but sent part of his salary—which was only sixty-four dollars a year—to his widowed mother. He was supported by gifts and donations from benevolent friends, but all he received, except what barely sustained him, he divided among the suffering preachers, especially in the Western Conferences. In some cases he parted with much of his own clothing to help his fellow-laborers. To him the Methodist Episcopal Church is largely indebted for its discipline and organization. Under his supervision it grew from a small band to a strong, compact, and numerous church. When he came to America there were 14 itinerant preachers, with a few local preachers, and 371 members. At his death there were nearly 700 itinerants, 2000 local preachers, and 214,000 members.

Asbury Manual Labor School is located near the town of Enfield, in the Creek Nation, Indian Territory. It was established in the year 1847 by an act of the Creek Council, and was put under the charge of the Foreign Board of Missions of the M. E. Church South. Rev. John Harrell, legal representative and superintendent of the Indian Mission Conference in behalf of said board, agreed to take charge of the school buildings, farm, and other property connected therewith, and to furnish a competent superintendent and suitable teachers, and to receive, clothe, feed, and take care of eighty scholars, male and female, of suitable ages. The trustees, in behalf of the Creek Nation, stipulated that for such service payments should be made at the rate of $70 per year for each pupil so educated, making an aggregate not exceeding $5600 in any one year. In addition to the amount received from the Nation, the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church South has contributed annually from $1200 to $1500. The school buildings, farm, and property connected therewith are estimated as worth $15,000.

Previous to, and at that time he was United States Internal Revenue Assessor. He has long been a devoted member of the M. E. Church, and active in the promotion of its interests.

Ashland, Pa. (pop. 5714), a flourishing town in Schuylkill County. It has one M. E. church, with 363 members, 385 Sunday-school scholars, and a church and parsonage valued at $20,000.

Ashville College, Harrogate, England, is an educational establishment of the United Methodist Free Churches. It is designed for the sons of both ministers and laymen, the sons of ministers being admitted on special terms, in the proportion of one to every two sons of laymen.

After preliminary inquiries and reports the matter was brought before the Annual Assembly of 1876, by Rev. Jos. Garside. The subject was taken up with considerable enthusiasm, and many handsome contributions were tendered, the ministers vying with the laity in offering liberal contributions. A committee was appointed to take preliminary steps, and a most eligible site presenting itself, Ashville estate, near Harrogate, Yorkshire, was purchased at a cost of nearly £6000. The estate consists of thirty acres, with a mansion-house, beautifully situated, and possessing a most commanding view. Five acres are occupied by the house and demesne, the remaining portion being let for farming purposes. The house has been enlarged so as to accommodate 60 pupils, all of whom are to be boarders, with teaching staff and domestics. A design for completing the building, by the addition of wings, has already been adopted. When these wings are added the college will accommodate more than one hundred pupils. The designs have been prepared by Edward Potts, Esq., of Oldham, who is himself a member of the body and a liberal contributor to the building fund.

The college is under the management of thirteen trustees, appointed by the Annual Assembly, to whom are added six other brethren, elected for three years by the Annual Assembly, two of whom retire annually, but are subject to re-election.

The legal estate is vested solely in trustees, but, to keep the college in close connection with the Annual Assembly, the four connectional officers and six brethren, as aforesaid, are joined with the trustees in the management of the college. It is also provided in the trust deed that all rules and regulations for the government of the college must have the sanction of the Annual Assembly.

At present the head-master is Mr. W. Richardson, LL.D., of Dublin University. The second master is Mr. A. Halstead.

Ashworth, John, author of "Strange Tales from Humble Life," was born at Cutgate, a small village near Rochdale, England, July 8, 1813. He found peace in believing October 3, 1836. He had previously commenced to meet in class with the Wesleyan Methodist Association, now merged in the United Methodist Free Churches. He retained through his life his attachment to the church of his early choice, and at the time of his death was a local preacher and class-leader in connection with it. It was not, however, till 1858, that he commenced those efforts to gather the outcasts in, with which his name will ever be identified. He opened a "chapel for the destitute," and continued, till heart and flesh failed, his philanthropic efforts to rescue the perishing. Mr. Ashworth's education had been limited. A true tale from his pen, entitled "The Dark Hour," appeared in the Free Methodist Magazine in 1861. Its great success led to the publication of a series of true tales, which have been widely circulated. The tales are in quite an original vein. He issued another series of tales entitled "Simple Records." It is a shorter series, but possesses the same characteristics as "Strange Tales from Humble Life." Mr. Ashworth visited Palestine in 1868, and on his return published a little work entitled "Walks in Canaan." He also published a companion volume, entitled "Back from Canaan." He often lectured on Palestine, subsequent to his visit, and computed that he secured more than £2000 for Free Methodist objects by this lecture alone. In 1873, he represented his denomination at the great gathering of the Evangelical Alliance at New York, and greatly delighted in the assembling of saints from all quarters of the globe. In the following year his health failed. He had to abandon his public efforts. His disease proved to be cancer of the stomach. He suffered much, but suffered patiently. On January 26, 1875, he entered into rest.

Asia is the most populous portion of the globe, and has been frequently styled "the cradle of the human race, of nations, and of arts." Its area, excluding Australia and the Polynesian Islands, is about 16,500,000 square miles: its inhabitants are estimated at from 700,000,000 to 800,000,000; of these, about 600,000,000 are pagans of various classes. From 60,000,000 to 70,000,000 profess Mohammedanism; from 10,000,000 to 15,000,000, chiefly in Russia, adhere to the Greek Church. In Asia Minor several Christian denominations are found, such as the Armenians, Nestorians, Jacobites, etc. The number of Protestant communicants in affiliation with the European and American churches, as the result of missionary labors, is about half a million.

Methodism was introduced into Asia in 1814, the first point being the island of Ceylon. Five missionaries led by Dr. Coke sailed from England for the East Indies December 31, 1813. Their apostolic leader died on the voyage before reaching his destination. The missionaries landed in Ceylon and commenced their labors; the difficulties were very great, but they persevered until success crowned their efforts. They carefully studied the language, published grammars and dictionaries, founded schools, and gained influence among the people. There are now in Ceylon 51 stations, with over 2400 members. Subsequently the Wesleyans established missions in Madras, Calcutta, and the adjacent regions, and have since established themselves in China and Japan. In 1856, the M. E. Church sent Dr. William Butler with other missionaries to India, occupying the northwest portion as their special mission-field. Scarcely had they arrived and commenced their labors before the Sepoy rebellion occurred. Their lives were in great danger, but they succeeded in escaping to the mountains, where they found refuge; and after that frightful rebellion was crushed they successfully prosecuted their work. Missions were also established by American Methodists in China; they occupying Foo-Chow, Shanghai, and Peking, while the Wesleyans occupied Canton and Hankow. The Methodist Episcopal Church South has also a mission in China, with headquarters in Foo-Chow. More recently missions have been established both in China and Japan, by various branches of Methodists both in England and America. The number of communicants in the different branches of the Methodist Church in Asia is, Wesleyan Methodists, 3795, M. E. Church, 5400, M. E. Church South, 107, United Free Methodists, 125, New Connection, 276. These numbers, it will be observed, represent only the actual communicants, and not the attendants on worship, or the members of families represented by the communicants. In all the stations much work has been done in translating the Bible and works of a religious character into the various languages and dialects; schools have been established and orphanages both for boys and girls, and the literature of the church is now published in the principal dialects in India and China. Public opinion has become more tolerant, and the doors for missionary labor are opening widely in every direction. In India and China, generally, the "Woman's Foreign Missionary Society" of the M. E. Church has accomplished a great work in sending forth educated young women, some of whom, trained in medical schools, are practicing as physicians in families where men could have no access; and, either as physicians or visitors, are telling the story of the Cross to the women who have been kept in almost perfect seclusion. Native ministers have been raised up who are preaching the gospel successfully to their brethren, and schools have been established wherein they can obtain the training essential to their work. Though in proportion to the population the communicants are few in number, yet the indications are favorable for a large and rapid increase.

Assistant.—In the large minutes of Mr. Wesley, which formed the early discipline of the Methodists, the question is asked, "Who is the assistant?" The answer is given, "That preacher in each circuit who is appointed from time to time to take charge of the societies and the other preachers therein." Another question was, "What is the office of an assistant?" The answer was, "To see that the other preachers in his circuit behave well and consistently; to visit the classes quarterly, regulate the bands, and deliver tickets, and take in and put out of the society or the bands: to keep the watch-nights and love-feasts," etc. In the early history of the Methodist societies in the United States this term remained in use. It was afterwards substituted by the phrase, "preacher in charge," whose duties are of a similar character. The term among the Wesleyan Methodists is now Superintendent. In the United States, the preacher to whom Mr. Wesley assigned the general superintendence of the societies prior to the organization of the church was called the general assistant. Prior to 1769 the societies were managed by the local preachers, by whom they had been formed. In that year Richard Boardman and Joseph Pilmoor were sent by Mr. Wesley, at the request of these societies, to act as pastors, and Mr. Wesley constituted Richard Boardman his general assistant. In 1771, Francis Asbury came to America, and in the following year Mr. Wesley made him his general assistant; but in less than a year he was superseded by Thomas Rankin, who had been sent out by Mr. Wesley, and who was Mr. Asbury's senior. The preachers from England, after the commencement of the Revolutionary War, returned to that country, and in 1779 the ministers requested Mr. Asbury to act as the general assistant. This position he held by the request of the Conference until 1784, when at the organization of the church he was elected general superintendent or bishop. The term then dropped out of use. Jesse Lee says, "The general assistant was the preacher who had the charge of all the circuits and of all the preachers, and appointed all the preachers, and their several circuits, and changed them. His being called a general assistant signified that he was to assist Mr. Wesley in carrying on the work of God in a general way."

Assurance, Christian, is a firm persuasion or conviction of our being in a state of salvation. The early Methodists strongly insisted upon this conviction as essential to a Christian experience, and maintained it was the privilege of every true believer. In his later writings, Mr. Wesley admitted that, perhaps, his early expressions were too strong, and that he believed one might be a Christian without having so positive a conviction as would exclude all doubt and fear; and yet at the same time, he vigorously maintained that such was the privilege and duty of every believer. In no other point did the early Methodists differ so widely from those around them as in insisting upon this experience. And it was this which gave life and power to their ministrations. They had personally experienced this gracious state, and were living in its constant enjoyment, and they testified frequently and forcibly of the peace and joy which accompanied it. At that period of time, the doctrine of assurance was not generally preached in other pulpits, and many ministers, as well as private Christians, denied the possibility of its attainment: yet it was by no means a new doctrine. Mr. Wesley remarks: "I apprehend that the whole Christian church in the first centuries enjoyed it, for though we have few points of doctrine explicitly taught in the small remains of the anti-Nicene fathers, yet I think none that carefully read Clemens, Romanus, Ignatius, Polycarp, Origen, or any other of them, can doubt whether either the writer himself possessed it, or all whom he mentions as real Christians; and I readily conceive, both from the Harmonia Confessionum, and whatever else I have occasionally read, that all Reformed churches in Europe did once believe 'every true Christian has the divine evidence of his being in favor with God.' I know likewise that Luther, Melancthon, and many others, if not all, of the Reformers, frequently and strongly asserted, that every believer is conscious of his own acceptance with God, and that by a supernatural evidence." Thomas Aquinas taught that God sometimes gave to Christians direct knowledge on this subject, but that such cases were but few, and that Christians generally had not a satisfactory assurance. In the Reformation, Luther strongly asserted the privilege of this personal knowledge, and it is taught in the Augsburg Confession as involved in saving faith. The Westminster Confession, in its eighteenth article, says, "Although hypocrites and other unregenerate men may vainly deceive themselves with false hopes, and carnal presumptions of being in the favor of God, and state of salvation (which hope of theirs shall perish), yet such as truly believe in the Lord Jesus, and love him in sincerity, endeavoring to walk in all good conscience before him, may in this life be certainly assured that they are in a state of grace, and may rejoice in the hope of the glory of God, which hope shall never make them ashamed. This certainty is not a bare conjectural and probable persuasion, grounded upon a fallible hope, but an infallible assurance of faith, founded upon the divine truth of the promises of salvation, the inward evidence of those graces upon which these promises are made, the testimony of the spirit of adoption witnessing with our spirit that we are the children of God, which spirit is the earnest of our inheritance, whereby we are sealed to the day of redemption. This infallible assurance doth not so belong to the essence of faith, but that a true believer may wait long, in conflict with many difficulties, before he can be a partaker of it; yet being enabled by the spirit to know the things that are freely given him of God, he may without extraordinary revelation, in the right use of ordinary means, attain thereunto; and therefore it is the duty of every one to give all diligence to make his calling and election sure, that thereby his heart may be enlarged in peace and joy in the Holy Ghost, in love and thankfulness to God, and in strength and cheerfulness in the duties of obedience, the proper fruits of this assurance, so far as it from inclining men to looseness. True believers may have the assurance of their salvation in divers ways shaken, diminished, and interrupted, as by negligence in preserving it, by falling into some special sin which woundeth the conscience and grieveth the spirit, by some sudden and vehement temptation, by God's withdrawing the light of his countenance and suffering even such as fear him to walk in darkness and have no light; yet are they never utterly destitute of that fear of God and life of faith, that love of Christ and the brethren, that sincerity of heart, and conscience of duty, out of which by the operation of the spirit this assurance may in due time be revived, and by which in the mean time they are supported from utter despair." Sir William Hamilton, in his "Dissertations on Philosophy," says, "Personal assurance, the feeling of certainty that God is propitious to me, that my sins are forgiven, fiducia, plerophoria fidei, was long universally held in the Protestant communities to be the criterion or condition of a true or saving faith. Luther declares that he who hath not assurance wipes faith out; and Melancthon makes assurance the discriminating line of Christianity from heathenism. It was maintained by Calvin, nay, even by Arminius, and is part and parcel of all the confessions of all the churches of the Reformation down to the Westminster Assembly."

Some Calvinistic writers who teach the doctrine of assurance, maintain that it is an assurance, not only of personal salvation, but of final salvation also: their theory very naturally follows from the doctrine of predestination. But Wesley and the Methodist writers generally, advocate the doctrine of assurance as confined to a personal salvation, and as connected with the witness of the spirit. This assurance arises, first, from an observation upon our conduct as compared with the word of God. St. John declares, "hereby we know that we do know him, if we keep his commandments." "Whosoever keepeth his word, in him is, verily, the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him." "If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteousness is born of him."

Secondly, it proceeds more directly from an examination of our thoughts, tempers, and impulses. The believer feels in his own consciousness that he loves God, that he loves his brethren, and that he loves the exercises of holy worship. The Apostle says, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." And, "Hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him." Because we "love one another, not in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth." So, also, we are conscious whether we are moved by impulses of pride, envy, and selfishness: or whether we have abiding faith and love. All these evidences we have from the testimony of our own spirits.

Thirdly, in addition to those marks, God gives by his Spirit a clear, inward conviction, whereby we feel that we are the sons of God. (See WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT.) The assurance which arises from the examination of our conduct and of our inward emotions is the result of careful reflection; and it depends for its steadfastness upon a conscious conviction that our walk and spirit are in perfect harmony with the word of God. The assurance that comes from the witness of the spirit brings with it calmness and peace; not the result of reasoning, but a state of joyous consciousness that we are walking in the light, and that a gracious, divine influence rests sweetly upon us. It is accompanied by emotions of gratitude, and by simple, filial trust, which relies upon God as a gracious, forgiving, and indulgent father. It is strengthened and confirmed by the self-examination and reasoning to which we have referred. It exalts the scriptural characteristics, and the believer realizes that the Spirit of God bears witness with his spirit, that he is born of him.

Astoria, N. Y. (pop. 5204), is situated on the East River, and is now a beautiful suburb of the city. There are churches of several denominations, and a female seminary. The Methodist Episcopal Church has 107 members, 150 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $10,000.

Atchison, Kan. (pop. 7054), is the capital of a county of the same name, 25 miles above Leavenworth. In its early history, it was the scene of much contention between two rival emigrant companies, one from South Carolina, and the other from New England. Methodist services were introduced in 1857. At first they worshiped in a small store-room, where the Otis House now stands. A class of ten persons was organized during the year. A subscription was also raised of about $2000 for the building of a church. It was completed during the pastorate of Rev. I. F. Collins, in 1858 and 1859. The building cost about $3000, and was situated on Parallel Street, between Fifth and Sixth. In 1861 the Kansas Conference met in the city, and Atchison became a station. A parsonage was built during the pastorate of R. L. Harford. During the pastorate of H. D. Fisher, from 1868 to 1870, the old church was sold, and a new one on Kansas Avenue was commenced. This was completed by Rev. T. J. Leak, and cost about $22,000.

The first services by the M. E. Church South, were held in 1857, by Rev. F. M. Williams. The place of worship was a school-house in the western part of the city. The Conference assembled in 1861, but the political excitement was so strong, that it left the city the next day. The society was disorganized during the war, and was re-organized in 1866. Between 1868 and 1870, a church was erected on the corner of Sixth and Park Streets, which was dedicated in 1871. In 1873 the Western Annual Conference of the M. E. Church South was held in this place. The present statistics are as follows:

Athens, Ga. (pop. 4251), is a prosperous town, the seat of Franklin College, and has a number of churches. It is first mentioned in the minutes of the church in 1819 as a district in the South Carolina Conference. As a separate appointment it is first mentioned in 1826, when Rev. Lovick Pierce was sent to Athens and Greensboro'. The following year he was returned, with Stephen Olin as supernumerary, and reported 142 members. The minutes of the Church South show Athens station, 374 members; Oconee Street, 132 members; Factory Mission, 205 members. The African M. E. Church reports 190 members, 275 Sunday-school scholars, and a church valued at $4000.

Atherton, Wm., commenced his ministry among the British Wesleysans in 1797, and faithfully fulfilled his duties in the ministry for fifty-three years. His discourses were logical in arrangement, well-studied throughout, and full-fraught with evangelical theology, and were delivered with readiness, earnestness, and power. Their results were found in the conversion of sinners and the edification of believers. He died in 1850.

Atkins, Hercules, a merchant of Philadelphia, is a member of the Board of Church Extension, appointed in 1876. He is earnestly interested in general church movements, and is a local preacher in the Green Street church.

Atkinson, George W., was born in Kanawha Co., W. Va., in 1846; was converted and joined the M. E. Church in his early manhood; educated at an academy in Charleston, W. Va., and at the Ohio Wesleyan University, and spent some time in teaching. He studied law two years, and then became part owner of the West Virginia Journal. In 1871 he was appointed postmaster at Charleston, and reappointed in 1875. For a number of years he has been a local preacher. He was elected lay delegate from West Virginia Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Atlanta, Ga. (pop. 21,789), is one of the most important cities in the State, being second only to Savannah. It was laid out in circular form in 1845. After the close of the Civil War it became the capital of the State and increased rapidly. Methodist services were introduced in 1847 by the M. E. Church South, and in 1848 the first church was erected. This is now being rebuilt, and when completed will be worth $60,000. There are now six churches of that denomination.

Shortly after the close of the war, worship was established by the M. E. Church, and in 1868 Lloyd Street church was built. In the same year, by authority of the General Conference, the Methodist Advocate was commenced at Atlanta, Dr. E. Q. Fuller being the first editor. In 1872, it was selected as one of the cities for episcopal residence, and Bishop Haven fixed his official residence there. In the same year the Freedman's Aid Society established Clark University, for the education of colored youth. The African M. E. Church has also established services. ATLANTA FIRST M. E. CHURCH SOUTH.

Atlay, John, entered the traveling connection under Mr. Wesley in 1763, and continued in it until 1788. He was a man of respectable attainments as a preacher, and possessed capacity for business. Mr. Wesley selected him as book steward to superintend his publishing accounts. After Mr. Wesley had selected the preachers composing the legal hundred for his Conference, being dissatisfied that he was not placed in the number, Mr. Atlay left Mr. Wesley's connection, and took charge of an independent church.

Atmore, Charles, of the British Wesleyan Church, was sent into the ministry by the venerable Wesley in 1781. His piety was sincere, his preaching plain, sound, experimental, practical, and often accompanied by much divine unction. He was elected president of the Wesleyan Conference in 1811. His last affliction was long and severe; yet, full of faith and hope and love, he was enabled to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. He fell asleep in Jesus in his sixty-fifth year. In 1801 he published a memorial volume, containing a sketch of the lives and characters of the preachers who had died in the traveling connection. It is valuable for reference.

Atonement.—"The doctrine of the vicarious and sacrificial death of Christ is taught in many passages of the Holy Scriptures, and is the foundation of the gospel as contained in the teachings of Christ and his apostles. It is grounded upon man's liability to be eternally punished in the future life for sins committed in this. Atonement for sin, which was made by the death of Christ, is represented as being the only means by which men may be delivered from this impending ruin. This end it proposes to accomplish by means which, with respect to the Supreme Governor himself, preserve his character from mistake and maintain the authority of his government; and with respect to man, give him the strongest possible reason for hope, and render more favorable the condition of his earthly probation. How sin may be forgiven, without leading to such misconceptions of the divine character as would encourage disobedience, and thereby weaken the influence of the divine government, must be considered as a problem of very difficult solution. A government which admitted no forgiveness would sink the guilty to despair: a government which never pardons offenses is a contradiction; it cannot exist. Not to pardon the guilty is to dissolve authority: to punish without mercy, is to destroy; and where all are guilty, to make the destruction universal. That we cannot sin with impunity, is a matter determined. The Ruler of the world is not careless of the conduct of his creatures: for that penal consequences are attached to the offenses is not a subject for argument, but is a matter of fact, evident by daily observation of the events and circumstances of the present life. If, then, the interests of the moral universe require that man's restoration to divine favor ought to be so granted that no license shall be given to offenses; that the holiness and justice of God shall be as clearly manifested as his mercy, and that the authority of his government may be maintained, we ask upon what scheme except that of the New Testament are these necessary conditions provided for? But may not sin be pardoned in the exercise of the divine prerogative? The reply is, That if this prerogative were exercised toward a part of mankind only, the passing by of others could not be reconciled to the character of God; but if the benefit were extended to all, government would be at an end. Nor is the scheme improved by confining the act of grace to repentant criminals. What offender, in the immediate view of danger, feeling the vanity of guilty pleasures now past forever, and believing the approach of delayed but threatened punishment, would not repent? Were this principle to regulate human governments, every criminal would escape, and judicial forms would become a subject for ridicule. Nor is this the principle on which the Divine Being governs man in the present state. Repentance does not restore health injured by intemperance, property wasted by profusion, or character once stained by dishonorable practices. If repentance alone can secure pardon then all must be pardoned, and government dissolved, as in the case of forgiving by mere prerogative; but if a selection be made, then different and discordant principles of government are introduced into the divine administration.

"To avoid the force of these obvious difficulties some have added reformation to repentance, and would restrain forgiveness to those only who to their penitence add a course of future obedience to the divine law. But a change of conduct does not, any more than repentance, repair the mischief of former misconduct. The sobriety of the reformed man does not always restore health: and the industry and economy, of the former negligent and wasteful, do not repair the losses of extravagance. This theory is in direct opposition to the principles and practice of human governments, which in flagrant cases never suspend punishment in anticipation of a change of conduct; but, in the infliction of the penalty, are looking to the crime actually committed, and the necessity of vindicating the majesty of the violated law.

"But we may go further, and show that the reformation anticipated is impracticable. To make this clear, it must be recollected that they who advocate this theory leave out of it not only the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, but also that agency of the Holy Spirit, which awakens the thoughtless to considering, and prompts and assists their efforts to attain a higher character. Man is therefore left, unassisted and uninfluenced, to his own endeavors, and in the unalleviated circumstances of his morally depraved state. How, then, is this supposed reformation to commence? If man is totally corrupt, the only principles from which reformation can proceed do not exist in his nature; and if so, his propensity to evil is stronger than it is to good, it would be absurd to suppose that the weaker propensity would resist the stronger: that the rivulet should force its way against the tides of the ocean. The reformation, therefore, which is to atone for his vices is impracticable.

"How, then, can mercy be extended to our guilty race, consistently with the character and government of God, and with the highest interests of his moral creatures? The only answer is found in the Holy Scriptures. They alone show, and indeed they alone profess to show, how God may be just, and yet the justifier of the ungodly. Other schemes show how he may be merciful; but the difficulty lies not there. This meets it, by declaring 'the righteousness of God' at the same time that it proclaims his mercy. The voluntary sufferings of an incarnate divine person 'for us' in our room and stead, magnified the justice of God, displayed his hatred to sin, proclaimed the 'exceeding sinfulness' of transgression by the deep and painful agonies of the substitute, warned the persevering offender of the terribleness and certainty of his punishment, and opened the gates of salvation to every true penitent.

"The same divine plan secures the influence of the Holy Spirit to awaken the wanderer to repentance, and to lead him back to God; to renew his fallen nature in righteousness, at the moment he is justified through faith, and to qualify him to 'walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit.' All the ends of government are here answered. No license is given to sin, the moral law is unrepealed, the day of judgment is still appointed, future and eternal punishment still display their awful sanctions, a new and singular manifestation of the divine purity is afforded, pardon is offered to all who seek it, and the whole world may be saved."—Watson, Institutes.

The doctrine of vicarious sacrifice is typified by many of the sacrifices of the Jewish system. To atone for sin, and to make expiation possible, the lamb was sacrificed; and to this fact John the Baptist referred, when he said on the first public ministration of Christ, "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." In the prophetic imagery of Isaiah, the same type was employed when he exclaimed, "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and like a lamb before his shearer, so opened he not his mouth. In his humiliation his judgment was taken away, and who shall declare his generation? for his life is taken from the earth." And afterwards added, "He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed. The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." These passages Philip, the Evangelist, applied to Christ, and the truth of the application was sealed by the influence of the Holy Spirit in reaching the mind of the serious inquirer. So the apostle declares that "we are redeemed with the precious blood of Christ as of a lamb without blemish." And in the Book of Revelation, Christ is represented "as a lamb newly slain."

This doctrine was distinctly recognized by the principal fathers of the church, and at the time of the Reformation all the great divines agreed that the salvation of the sinner was owing to the mediatorial work of Christ. The Socinians, however, deny the vicarious atonement. They say, "The Lord God needs no reconciliation with man; that Christ suffered not to satisfy the divine justice, but as a martyr to his truth, and as an example to his followers." The Dutch Arminian divines presented very prominently the idea of sacrifice, and of Christ's vicarious atonement. Methodist theology asserts this doctrine strongly, and presents prominently the love of God as the source of redemption, and holds that the free manifestation of the divine love is under no law of necessity.

"Extent of the Atonement.—One of the important questions in the modern church, with regard to the atonement, is that of its extent, viz.: whether the benefits of Christ's death were intended by God to extend to the whole human race or only to a part. The former view is called universal or general atonement; the latter, particular or limited. What is called the strict school of Calvinists holds the latter doctrine, as stated in the Westminster Confession: "As God hath appointed the elect unto glory, so hath he, by the eternal and most free purpose of his will, foreordained all the means thereunto. Therefore they who are elect, being fallen in Adam, are redeemed by Christ; are effectually called unto faith in Christ, by his Spirit working in due season; are justified, adopted, sanctified, and kept by his power through faith unto salvation. Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, effectually called, justified, adopted, sanctified, and saved, but the elect only." The so-called moderate Calvinists, the Church of England chiefly, the Wesleyans, and the Methodist Episcopal Churches adopt the doctrine of general or universal atonement. The advocates of a limited atonement maintain that the atonement cannot properly be considered apart from its actual application, or from the intention of the author, in regard to its application; that in strictness of speech, the death of Christ is not an atonement to any until it be applied; that the sufferings of the Lamb of God are therefore truly vicarious, or, in other words, that Christ in suffering became a real substitute for his people, was charged with their sins, and bore the punishment of them, and thus has made a full and complete satisfaction to divine justice in behalf of all who should ever believe on him; that this atonement will eventually be applied to all for whom in the divine intention it was made, or to all to whom God in his sovereignty has been pleased to declare its application.

"But they believe, that although the atonement is to be properly considered as exactly commensurate with its intended application, yet that the Lord Jesus Christ did offer a sacrifice sufficient in its intrinsic value to expiate the sins of the whole world, and that if it had been the pleasure of God to apply it to every individual, the whole human race would have been saved by its immeasurable worth. They hold, therefore, that on the ground of the infinite value of the atonement, the offer of salvation can be, consistently and sincerely, made to all who hear the gospel, assuring them that if they will believe they shall be saved; whereas, if they willfully reject the overtures of mercy, they will increase their guilt and aggravate their damnation. At the same time, as they believe, the Scriptures plainly teach that the will and disposition to comply with this condition depend up in the sovereign gift of God, and that the actual compliance is secured to those only for whom, in the divine counsels, the atonement was specifically intended.

"The doctrine, on the other hand, that Christ died for all men so as to make salvation attainable, is maintained, first and chiefly, on scriptural ground, to wit: that according to the whole tenor of Scripture 'the atonement of Christ was made "for all men."' The advocates of this view adduce,—

"1. Passages which expressly declare the doctrine: (a) Those which say that Christ died 'for all men,' and speak of his death as an atonement for the sins of the whole world. (b) Those which attribute an equal extent to the death of Christ as to the effects of the fall.

"2. Passages which necessarily imply the doctrine, to wit: (a) Those which declare that Christ died, not only for those that are saved, but for those who do or may perish. (b) Those which make it the duty of men to believe the gospel, and place them under guilt and the penalty of death for rejecting it. (c) Those in which men's failure to obtain salvation is placed to the account of their own opposing wills, and made wholly their own fault. The Arminian doctrine is summed up in the declaration, that Christ 'obtained (impetravit) for all men by his death reconciliation and the forgiveness of sins: but upon the condition that none actually possess and enjoy this forgiveness of sins except believers.'" —McClintock & Strong.

From their earliest history and in all their branches, Methodists have clearly and fully taught the doctrine of vicarious atonement, and, with the exception of the small Calvinistic societies, of its ultimate extent in behalf of the human family. Mr. Wesley, Mr. Fletcher, and the early Methodist writers were frequently assailed for holding and proclaiming the doctrine of a general atonement, and their opinions were denounced as injurious and heretical. At the present day, however, their views are held by a great proportion of Christians in many of the principal denominations.

Attributes of God are the qualities or perfections of the divine nature: in other words, different parts of his character. Rejecting all scholastic and mystic distinctions in these attributes, they may be divided into two classes: the natural and moral. Natural attributes are those which do not immediately include the idea of moral action, but simply refer to the divine nature: such are unity, trinity, omnipresence, omniscience, omnipotence, immutability, invisibility, and incomprehensibility. His unity is asserted in opposition to dualism, or the belief in two eternal and antagonistic deities, one good and the other evil, and also in opposition to polytheism, or a plurality of gods. We recognize in his omniscience not only the knowledge of all that has been, and that now is, but also of that which will be. This knowledge, however, of the future, or foreknowledge, does not interfere with man's free agency or responsibility. The spirituality of God is held in opposition to materialism and pantheism, both of which systems are destructive of his real personality and spirituality. The moral attributes are those which are related to his perfections, and involve the exercise of the will, such as wisdom, goodness, holiness, justice, mercy, truth, and love. Wisdom, which is partly a natural as well as a moral attribute, inheres essentially in his perfection as creator, upholder, and governor of all things: goodness or benevolence is his disposition to promote the highest happiness of his creatures and especially of man; holiness and justice relate to each other, so that justice is but the expression of his holiness in action; mercy is shown in compassion to the fallen and wretched, and in forgiveness to the erring and sinful; truth is his perfect veracity, so that man may not doubt that one word which he has uttered shall fail of fulfillment; while love is the outbeaming of all his glorious attributes exercised for the forgiveness, regeneration, sanctification, and ultimate salvation of all his people. The trinity of the divine nature is taught as in no wise interfering with or contravening the idea of unity. Rejecting the mysticism, taught by many German theologians in reference to scientific discriminations in the attributes of God, the church prefers to accept the plain statement and declaration contained in the Holy Scriptures.

Atwood, Anthony, a minister of the Philadelphia Conference of the M. E. Church, was born June 27, 1801, in Burlington Co., N. J. He was converted in 1818, and having served as a supply in Salem circuit, he was received into the Conference in 1825. He has been active in his ministerial work, filling many prominent appointments. He has written the "Abiding Comforter," and has contributed largely to the church periodicals.

Auburn, Me. (pop. 6169), in Androscoggin County, is a town of considerable enterprise and natural advantages for prosperity. It is in part a branch from Lewiston. The Methodists here first worshiped in a hall, having withdrawn from the Lewiston Park Street charge. They, however, erected a church edifice about 1865. There are now 144 members, 175 Sunday-school scholars, with a church and parsonage valued at $11,000.

Auburn, N. Y. (pop. 17,225), the capital of Cayuga County, is one of the most prosperous cities in the State. The leading denominations have for many years been organized, and the Presbyterians have had superior advantages by reason of the "Auburn Theological Seminary," founded in 1821. Methodism was not introduced till the year 1816, when the Rev. James Kelsey organized a small society. The church was incorporated in 1817 or 1818. In 1820 the society had increased to 80 members. A local authority says, "Methodism had a severe struggle for existence in this growing town, which was the Presbyterian headquarters from an early period. Auburn appears first in the minutes as a station in 1820, and with difficulty they erected a frame church on Chapel Street in 1821." In 1826, Rev. Manly Tooker says, "The society had suffered much in consequence of the apostasy of some of its prominent members and from the embarrassed and unfinished state of the edifice." Through his efforts the chapel was completed and dedicated in 1827. In 1832 a lot was purchased on the corner of North and Water Streets, and a larger edifice was dedicated in 1833. It was, however, embarrassed with debt. After having been greatly improved it was destroyed by fire in 1867. After worshiping in "Corning Hall" a lot was purchased on Exchange Street, and the building was dedicated in 1870. It now has 426 members, 350 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $44,000. In 1856 the Wall Street M. E. church was organized, and was dedicated in 1859. It has 273 members, 180 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $12,500.

Augusta, Me. (pop. 7808), the capital of the State, is situated on the Kennebec River, and was first settled in 1754. When Methodism was introduced, this section was in the Upper Canada district of the New York Conference, and was embraced in the Oswegatchie circuit. In 1808, the name was changed to Augusta. It reported 347 members. In 1810, in the change of boundaries, it was included in the Genesee Conference. It subsequently became a station, and is now one of the leading appointments in the Maine Conference. It has 350 members, 150 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $14,000.

Augusta College was located at Augusta, Ky., and was the first Methodist college organized after Cokesbury had been destroyed. A county academy had been in operation for several years, when, learning that the Ohio and Kentucky Conferences desired to found an institution of learning, the citizens of Augusta tendered it for the purpose of organizing a college. In 1822, Rev. John P. Finley was appointed as principal, in which office he remained until 1825. In 1823, Jonathan Stamper was appointed missionary to collect funds for Augusta College. In 1825, John P. Durbin was appointed Professor of Languages and Joseph S. Tomlinson Professor of Mathematics, in which chairs they remained until the spring of 1832. In 1827, Mr. Akers was appointed agent, and, in 1828, Martin Ruter, who had been book agent in Cincinnati, was elected president. In 1829, Dr. Durbin added to the duties of Professor of Languages those of the agency. In 1831, H. B. Bascom and Burr H. McKown were added as professors. In 1832, Dr. Ruter resigned the presidency and took charge of a church in Pittsburgh, and Dr. Durbin was elected editor of the Christian Advocate, New York. Dr. Tomlinson was then elected president and J. H. Fielding Professor of Mathematics. Dr. Tomlinson remained president until in 1844, when a proposition was made to place the Transylvania University, at Lexington, under the care of the Kentucky Conference, and to accomplish that purpose Augusta College was abandoned. The enterprise, however, at Lexington was unsuccessful, and in a few years an attempt was made to resuscitate Augusta College. Owing to the division which had taken place in the church, and the difficulties in the border States, and the Ohio Conference having transferred its patronage to the Ohio University, at Delaware, but little was accomplished, and the institution was for the second time abandoned. During the period of its existence this college was of great service in the West. In its halls were educated many young men who became prominent both in the ministry and in the various professions of life. The impulse which it gave to the cause of education led, directly or indirectly, to the establishment of other institutions which are still enjoying prosperity.

Auld, James C., was a lay delegate from the Kansas Conference to the General Conference of 1876. He has been largely engaged in developing the railroad interests of that sturdy State.

Aultman, Cornelius, a distinguished inventor and manufacturer of agricultural implements,—a native of Greentown, Starke Co., Ohio, and now fifty years of age; joined the M. E. Church in his seventeenth year, and for over a score of years has held important official positions in it. He founded the Professorship of Mathematics and Civil Engineering in Mount Union College by the gift of $30,000, and for many years has been an officer of the board of trustees of that institution. His generous benefactions to the church at Canton have contributed to give Methodism its present commanding influence in that community. He was chosen a lay delegate from the Pittsburgh Conference to the General Conference of 1876. The highest civil positions in the State have been tendered to him.

Aurora, Ill. (pop. 11,162), a beautiful town in Kane County. It has had a most wonderful growth. The census of 1850 gives no report of this town, and in 1860 it reported 6011. The first M. E. Church was organized in 1837, and the first church was built in 1843. In 1851 it became a station, and in 1852 reported 142 members. In 1860 it had two charges with an aggregate membership of 284. Its present statistics are:

Aurora, Ind. (pop. 3304), is a town of considerable importance in Dearborn County. The M. E. Church has 340 members, 300 Sunday-school scholars, and a church and parsonage valued at $23,000.

Austin, Texas (pop. 4428), was chosen as the capital of the State of Texas in 1844, and is located at the head of navigation on the Colorado River. It was named after Col. Stephen F. Austin, who took the first American colony into Texas in 1821. Rev. Henry Stephenson visited it as a preacher as early as 1824. In 1839 the name first appeared on the minutes of the church, and Rev. John Haynie was appointed pastor, and the same year he was elected chaplain to Congress. In 1840 the Texas Conference was organized. At that time the statistics in the whole State showed only 1853 members and 25 preachers. In 1845 the Methodist societies in Texas adhered to the Church South. At the close of the Civil War, services were again established by the M. E. Church. The present statistics are as follows:

Austin Conference M. E. Church.—The General Conference of 1876 passed the following resolution: "That whenever it should be requested by the majority of the white members, and also a majority of the colored members, of any Annual Conference that it be divided, then it is the opinion of this General Conference that such division should be made, and in that case the bishop presiding is hereby authorized to organize the new Conference or Conferences." Under this provision, a majority of both white and colored members in the West Texas Conference having so voted, the Austin Conference was constituted by Bishop Peck, to embrace the white membership of the West Texas Conference, other than the Germans, in the State of Texas. It has not yet held a separate session. The place of first meeting is Dallas, Texas.

Austin, James B., was born in North Carolina in 1806, and joined the Ohio Conference in 1828. After traveling for twenty-five years with diligence and usefulness in some of the largest and most important charges his health became impaired and he was obliged to desist from labor. "He suffered greatly in his last illness, but was calm and triumphant. His last words were, 'Precious Christ!'"

Australasia.—One of the large divisions of the globe, embracing Australia, Van Diemen's Land, New Zealand, New Guinea, and groups of smaller islands. It extends from the equator to latitude 47 degrees south, and from longitude 111 to 183 degrees east. The land area is estimated at 3,500,000 square miles. The islands were inhabited until recently by aboriginal tribes, but a European population, especially in Australia, is rapidly increasing.

Methodism was introduced first into Australia (see AUSTRALIA), and has since spread not only over the provinces of that island, but into the adjacent ones, and into Fiji and the Friendly Islands. The work in these various places was for many years directed by the Wesleyan Missionary Society, and was managed and controlled as other foreign missions. In 1854, Rev. W. Young was sent on a tour of inspection, and under his advice an affiliated Conference was organized. The discovery of gold and the large increase of population gave a greater impulse to the work, and many of the churches developed into strong self-supporting churches. In 1873 the British Wesleyan Conference authorized the churches in Australasia, if they saw fit, to organize an independent branch of Methodism. This measure was hailed with delight by the various Methodist organizations, and according to the plan proposed an Australasian Wesleyan Methodist Church was organized, which see.

Australasian Wesleyan Methodist Church.—The first Methodist missionary reached Australia in 1815, and as the work enlarged other missionaries were from time to time added. (See AUSTRALIA.)

In January, 1855, the churches were organized into a separate Conference, and population having increased, literary institutions were founded, papers and books were published, and improvements were made in every department. In 1873, the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in England adopted measures looking toward the organization of an independent church for Australasia, and the plan was favorably received and adopted by the various church organizations, and delegates were elected to form a General Conference. In May, 1875, "about forty assembled in Melbourne as representatives from the Methodist Church, in all the Australasian colonies and Polynesian missions, to constitute the first General Conference." Under the new arrangement this body, after full deliberation, organized a separate church, adopting without alterations the doctrines, usages, and general regulations of English Wesleyanism. The economy was, however, in some respects changed; the territory was divided into four Annual Conferences: 1. New South Wales and Queensland. 2. Victoria and Tasmania. 3. South Australia; and, 4. New Zealand, which see. These Conferences meet annually, and exercise the general functions of Annual Conferences in the examination and approval of ministerial character, in all arrangements for preparing the appointments, and for the general oversight of the working of the church. Delegates from these Conferences, elected by them, constitute the General Conference, which meets once in four years, and which elects the various general officers of the church, and which has, under certain restrictions, the whole legislative power of the church. The general officers of the church are ex-officio members of the next ensuing Conference. A plan of lay representation was also adopted to enable the membership to exert a more direct influence on the legislature and government. This lay representation extends in a limited degree not only to the General but also to the Annual Conferences. At the time of its full organization the Australasian church reported, including probationers, 67,912 members, with 312 ministers in full connection and 50 on probation. Though but little time has elapsed since the organization of the church, the reports show general satisfaction and considerable prosperity. At the sessions of the Annual Conference in 1876 lay delegates were present for the first time. The results of the experiment were declared to be "satisfactory and most encouraging."

Australia, a large island in the Southern Ocean, lying south of the East Indian Archipelago. It is about 2500 miles long by 1900 miles wide, and has an area of about 3,000,000 square miles. Its present population of European origin is about 1,835,450, and, since the island embraces some of the most flourishing English colonies, is increasing very fast. The aboriginal population is disappearing. In 1854, it was variously estimated at from 6000 to 50,000, and must now be very small. The natives have traits which distinguish them from all other tribes. They are in a low, savage condition, and have only the most indefinite idea of religion, and no knowledge of arts or order. Australia was discovered by Spanish or Dutch navigators about the beginning of the seventeenth century. After it was visited by Captain Cook, it was occupied by the English, who established a penal colony at Port Jackson, in 1788. A settlement was made at Sidney in the same year, and another settlement on the Swan River in 1829. The transportation of convicted offenders to the penal stations was discontinued by the British government several years ago. The Australian colonies have since enjoyed a wonderful growth and prosperity. A Wesleyan mission was established in New South Wales, which was then a penal settlement. In 1815, some settlers who had been Methodists, being surrounded by criminals on one side and savage heathens on the other, asked the Wesleyan missionary committee to send them help. They had already formed a class and begun to hold meetings. Mr. Leigh was sent out by the committee as the first missionary. He reached Australia in August, 1815. Soon three chapels were erected, four Sunday-schools were organized, and a circuit was formed, with fifteen preaching stations. Mr. Lawry, who followed Mr. Leigh, made the instruction of the heathen one of the objects of his mission, and began the work among them in 1818. In 1820, Mr. Walker was appointed to labor exclusively among the aboriginal population. An institution for the children of natives had been established at Parramatta under the governor's auspices, and an allotment of land made for cultivation by the pupils. Mr. Walker began his work with a tribe who knew English. Two youths were converted, who soon afterwards died. Otherwise but little impression was made upon this tribe. Mr. Walker sought another field at Wellington Bay, where there were six tribes. No progress was made there, and the work was suspended. Missions were begun again in 1836 at Port Philip and Swan River, where considerable success attended the effort. Another mission was established at Buntingdale, now Geelong, in 1838, which prospered. Schools were opened, a printing-press was established, and catechisms, school books, and Scriptures were printed for the use of the mission. The reports of the Wesleyan Missionary Society do not distinguish between the work done among the natives and that done among the British settlers. The former work, however, is comparatively small, for the natives do not take readily to civilization, and are fast dying out. The latter work has assumed great importance.

The Australian churches were organized into a Conference, affiliated with the British Conference, the first session of which was held in January, 1855. In the next year there were returned in this Conference 21,141 members, with 2219 on trial. In 1874, Australia and Tasmania were divided into three Annual Conferences, connected with the Australasian General Conference, which was formed at the same time. They were New South Wales and Queensland, the Victoria and Tasmania, and the South Australia Conferences. The reports of the Wesleyan Missionary Society for 1876 show that there are connected with the missions in Australia 219 missionaries and assistant missionaries, 1213 local preachers, 21,520 full members, 2380 on trial, 770 Sunday-schools, with 7392 teachers and 63,044 Sunday-school scholars, and 158,747 attendants on public worship. The mission to the Chinese in the colony of Victoria includes two stations, which are served by two Chinese missionaries, and return 25 members.

The Wesleyan missions in Polynesia, including the Friendly Islands, Fiji, and Samoa districts, and the newly-established missions in New Guinea, New Britain, New Ireland, and the Duke of York's Island, are now under the care of the New South Wales and Queensland Conference. The reports of these missions returned, in 1876, 17 missionaries, 63 native ministers and assistant missionaries, 1639 local preachers, 879 catechists and head teachers, 26,389 full members, 5659 on trial, 1322 Sunday-schools, with 3880 teachers and 58,475 scholars in the same, and 113,861 attendants on public worship. Since this report was made the Fiji Islands have been devastated by measles, which were very fatal among the Wesleyan population; consequently, the numbers in that district have been reduced, and a corresponding reduction may be expected to appear in the footings of the next returns from the missions.

The Primitive Methodist Missionary Society in 1849 had in Australia 7 missionaries and 240 members. In 1876 it reported 84 ministers and 6849 members. The society of the Methodist New Connection had in 1874-75, 3 stations, 2 ministers, 8 lay agents, and 177 members. The United Methodist Free Churches had in the same year 21 stations, 21 ministers, 49 lay agents, and 951 members, and the Bible Christians have 31 principal stations, 38 ministers, 170 lay agents, and 2442 members.

The Moravians conduct a native mission in Gipps Land, and the Free Church of Scotland and the Hermannsburg Missionary Society have native missions in South Australia. Most of the denominational organizations of Great Britain are represented in the general missionary work of the colonies, which they regard as one of great importance.

Authors.—The active life of the Methodist itinerant ministry is not very favorable to authorship. The early preachers were compelled to travel almost every day; they could be at home but little, and were but scantily furnished with libraries. The character of their work, also, being connected with revival efforts, necessarily deeply enlisted the feelings and turned the whole attention chiefly to one line of thought. Under these circumstances it is surprising that so much has been accomplished in authorship. As the records will show, their great leader, Mr. Wesley, was exceedingly systematic in the arrangement of his hours. He read when on horseback or in a carriage, and wrote at moments of intervals which are usually wasted, yet his writings were exceedingly voluminous. His followers partook of his spirit, and of the Wesleyan ministers in England, a very large number have issued publications larger or smaller. Rev. Dr. Osborn has prepared a Wesleyan bibliography, which, while almost necessarily imperfect as being the first attempt, shows that prior to 1869 there were "more than 620 preachers who have aspired to the honors of authorship, or have those honors thrust upon them." Of these, he says, "A vast amount of intellectual energy has been created and developed, by Methodist influence, to the incalculable advantage of these realms. Many of these writers were originally laborers, mechanics, or handicraftsmen, who, on becoming religious, began to cultivate their minds in earnest, and by self-education qualified themselves to become public instructors, both in the pulpit and through the press; but who, without that stimulus to mental activity which their religion supplied, would probably have remained to their lives' end on the same intellectual level as they were at first. But very few of the whole number had a liberal education; and it is impossible to examine their record without admiring the grace of God, which in so many cases has raised up children to Abraham out of the very stones, and enabled them to contribute so largely, both in English and in other languages, to the instruction and edification of their brethren." The larger number of educated men who have more recently entered the ministry, and the demands for translation and publication which the various missions have created, have largely added in a few years to the number of authors. In America, the fathers, having a wider field and greater inconveniences in travel, wrote but little. Mr. Asbury prepared his journals, which to the student of Methodist history are invaluable; and small works were written by a few of the traveling preachers. At as late a period as 1830 the publications were comparatively few; since that time they have regularly and constantly increased, and the Methodist writers in the United States now exceed the number of those in England. stitutions have given facilities and opportunities to professors, many of whom are not ministers, to prepare literary works for the press. A full and accurate list cannot now be given. We refer the reader to the Appendix for an approximate list of Methodist writers in our own country as well as in other lands.

Autographs.—A desire is generally felt to see the handwriting of men who are admired and loved. To gratify that feeling, on the opposite page will be found the autographs of a number of the distinguished men in early Methodism. The handwriting of Mr. Wesley was in early age and middle life very precise and clear, but the tremor of age is plainly visible in the autograph which is given.

Auxiliary Fund of the British Wesleyan Church, as its name imports, is AUXILIARY to the Ministers' Own Life Assurance Society. It is what the connection supplements to the sum to which the ministers, on their retirement from active work, are entitled. It was raised from different sources,—by annual subscriptions from friends, and by legacies and donations on annuity.

The administration of this fund had for a series of years been intrusted to eleven ministers chosen annually, and usually known as the "committee of eleven;" but in the year 1835 it was placed in the hands of a mixed committee of eleven ministers and eleven laymen, by whom all claims are considered and all grants determined.

Until the centenary year (1839), this fund was supported by a small portion only of the Methodist connection, and being distressingly inadequate to its intended objects, it was placed on a new basis and under new regulations, and was called THE NEW AUXILIARY FUND.

In agreement with the recommendation of large and influential committees, which approved the principle, the plan makes provision for supernumerary ministers on a graduated scale, according to the number of years in which they have been engaged in the work of the ministry; and for each widow according to the years in which her husband had been so engaged. These suggested that an appeal should be made to the members of every class in the month of September of each year; every circuit being held responsible for an average of 6*d*. per member, according to the members published by the Conference for the March previous.

This plan was first submitted to the several district meetings, when financial matters were specially under consideration, and received the cordial concurrence of the Conference, which granted a sum of £9000 to the new fund, which, in conjunction with the private donations collected as usual in the first week in June, would enable the committee to begin their operations without delay.

The sums given to supernumeraries and widows were divided into seven classes, thus:

Supernumeraries.—First class, 29 years and upwards, £50; second class, 34 years to 39 years, £45; third class, 29 years to 34 years, £40; fourth class, 24 years to 29 years, £35; fifth class, 18 years to 24 years, £25; sixth class, 12 years to 18 years, £20; seventh class, under 12 years, £15.

The same classes for widows give: first, £18; second, £15; third, £15; fourth, £15; fifth, £15; sixth, £12; seventh, £10.

In 1863 the Conference added to the first four classes of the senior widows the following angiaentation:

First, from £18 to £24; second, from £15 to £20; third, from £15 to £18; fourth, from £15 to £16.

The rate of 6*d*. per member is sustained, and the subscriptions are increasing.

At the Conference of 1873, the Rev. J. Rattenbury was separated from circuit work that he might promote more largely the interests of this fund, his object being to raise a sum of £100,000, so that apart from the ordinary income the allowances might be proportionally increased. Subscriptions to the amount of £70,000 have been already paid and invested. At the Conference of 1876, the scale of payments was considered, and it was resolved, that "the sum of £1 per annum being allowed for each year a minister has traveled, a further sum of £12 shall be added in every instance to the amount so calculated. To all widows an increase of £3 per annum on the old scale shall be given."

At the Conference of 1872 it was enacted, "That in future all ministers, whether members of the Methodist Preachers' Annuitant Society or not, shall be equally entitled to the benefits of the 'Auxiliary Fund.'"

Avery, Charles, a merchant and manufacturer in Pittsburgh, and one of the earliest and most active members of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Westchester Co., N. Y., in 1784. He was converted when a youth, and united with the M. E. Church, and labored zealously and successfully for several years as a local preacher. In 1828 he withdrew to take part in the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church, in the interests of which he labored until his death. In 1812 he commenced business in Pittsburgh, Pa., and gave the first five dollars he made to assist some poor people in building a church. This "first fruit offering" God honored by giving him great success in business, and he devoted a large part of his means to benevolent purposes. He early espoused the cause of the suffering African race, and was among the most earnest and efficient anti-slavery men. He built an institution in Allegheny City for the education and elevation of the negro race, and at his death left a large portion of his wealth to sustain it and to extend missionary and educational work in Africa and Canada. He also aided most liberally in erecting several Methodist Protestant churches, and in his will he left to them liberal bequests. He died as he lived, full of faith in God and love to man, at the age of 71 years. He was a man of fine personal appearance, with a frank and genial manner, and was eminently the poor man's friend.

Axe, W. W., is engaged in the printing business in Philadelphia, and is an official member of the church in Frankford. He has served on the Board of Church Extension since 1876.

Axley, James, entered the traveling connection in 1804, and, after having spent nineteen years in the active ministry, he located in 1823. As a local preacher he was remarkably diligent and useful. He was an earnest, devoted, and successful minister, with but little culture and with marked eccentricities.

Ayliff, John, of the British Wesleyan Church, was early converted, and, filled with missionary zeal, went out to South Africa, hoping to find opportunities for evangelical labor; nor was he disappointed. In 1827 he entered the ministry, and gave himself entirely to the South African mission, and his labors were abundantly blessed. In his final affliction his mind was kept in peace,—stayed on God. One of his latest sayings was, "O glorious work! if I had ten thousand lives I would devote them all to thy mission work." With great tranquillity he passed away into the presence of the Saviour.

B.

Bachelder, George W., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., June 15, 1836. He pursued his studies for a time in Pennington Seminary, and afterwards acted as classical teacher. In 1857 he was admitted into the New Jersey Conference of the M. E. Church, and was appointed to Princeton. Such was his influence upon society, and such was his power in the pulpit, that Princeton College conferred upon him the degree of A.M. His health was always delicate, and after a struggle with pulmonary disease he died, March 30, 1865. He was remarkable for his purity of character, as well as for his clearness of intellect, and few young men gave greater promise of usefulness to the church. Such was his pulpit ability that, had he lived, he must have been extensively useful, and must have taken high rank in the church.

Bacon, Jarvis C., was a young member of the Allegheny Wesleyan Conference. In 1848 he was appointed one of several missionaries to the South, in Grayson Co., Va. His field of labor was where many were converted by his labors, and a church of 18 members the first year increased to 111. But the uncompromising hostility to slavery, which refused slave-holders admission to the church, developed malignant antagonism and mob violence. Three hundred armed men at one time met to drive him from the State. But other armed men said nay, very positively, and the first party were content to resolve his expulsion, and offer a reward for his arrest, if found in Virginia after Aug. 5, 1848. After three years of arduous labor, under great year, in Loudon circuit, Baltimore Conference; educated in a private grammar school, Prof. John Edgar, principal; entered the Ohio Conference in 1838, and became a member of the Pittsburgh Conference in 1840 by change of boundary. He managed the publishing interests of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate from 1852 to 1856, and in May, 1856, was elected editor of that paper by the General Conference for the quadrennium ending 1860. Subsequently, in connection with ministerial work, he was editor of the Salem (Ohio) Journal. In 1858 he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Allegheny College. He was a trustee of Pittsburgh Female College for several years. Has spent nearly forty years in the Methodist itineracy, and occupied excellent appointments, and is now presiding elder of the Blairsville District, Pittsburgh Conference. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1856 and 1864.

Baird, William S., a member of the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church South, was born at New Liberty, Lycoming Co., Pa., Nov. 4, 1815, and died in Baltimore, Md., Aug. 13, 1874. He was converted in early life, and graduated from Allegheny College, Pa., in 1841. He was received on trial in the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church, March, 1842. He filled a number of appointments with great acceptability. From September, 1860, to July, 1866, he had charge of the Wesleyan Female Institute, at Staunton, Va. From 1867 to 1871 he was presiding elder of Winchester district. In March, 1872, he took charge of the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist, in connection with which he died. "In these various positions of responsibility and trust he discharged his duty with that conscientious fidelity which characterized him in every relation of life. In his last hours he talked freely of his hope and assurance in Christ, and of the blissful home which he was soon to enter."

Baker, Charles J., was born in Baltimore, May 28, 1821. He entered Dickinson College in 1835, and graduated in 1841, under the presidency of John P. Durbin, D.D. During his stay in Carlisle, in 1836, he was converted, and united with the M. E. Church. Mr. Baker has been prominently and successfully identified with various mercantile, commercial, and manufacturing interests in the city of Baltimore. In 1867 he was chosen president of the Franklin Bank, and in 1870 was elected president of the Canton Company, both of which positions he yet fills. In 1860 he was elected a member of the second branch of the City Council, and at its organization was chosen its president; which position he continued to fill during the memorable days of 1861,—and the period which followed,—acting as mayor of the city, ex officio, from September, 1861, to January, 1862.

Mr. Baker has long been officially and usefully identified with the Sunday-school and church interests of the city, especially in church building. He has for a number of years been a trustee of Dickinson College. He is a devoted friend to the cause of missions, and liberally aided with his means the Rev. Dr. Jacoby in his great work in Germany. Because of the "border" troubles in 1860, Mr. Baker withdrew his official relations from the church, and aided in the foundation and growth of several Independent Methodist churches. He and his family are members of the Bethany Independent Methodist church.

Baker, Gardiner, a delegate from the Northern New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, also a member of the General Conferences in 1840, 1844, 1852, 1856, 1860, and 1864, was born Sept. 11, 1802, and joined the Genesee Conference in 1824. Under appointment of the General Conference of 1860, he served as a fraternal delegate to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canada in 1862. He has been exceedingly active in planting Methodism in Central and Northern New York, and was presiding elder at different periods for thirty-one years.

Baker, Henry J., is a native of Maryland, and was for many years a merchant and manufacturer in Baltimore. He subsequently removed to New York, and engaged in manufacturing chemicals. He united with the M. E. Church in his youth, and has been an active and liberal supporter of its interests. He has aided in the erection of a number of churches, and is specially interested in the missionary field. He has long been a member of the Missionary Board.

Baker, Osmon Cleander, a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Marlow, N.

II., July 30, 1812, and died in Concord, N. H., Dec. 20, 1871, aged fifty-nine years. He entered Wilbraham Academy at the age of fifteen, where soon after he was converted, and was received into the church by Dr. Fisk, then principal of the school. He was licensed to exhort in his seventeenth year, and in 1830 entered the Wesleyan University, and passed successfully through three years, when fail-death. He was elected to the episcopal office in 1852; and he discharged its varied duties with diligence and success until 1866. He was attacked with partial paralysis while on his way to attend the Colorado Conference. He reached his destination, however, with great difficulty, and in his private room examined and ordained the preachers. He returned home, having suffered much pain and ing health compelled him to leave the institution. While at the university he was licensed as a local preacher, and he labored diligently in that office. In 1834 he became a teacher in the seminary at Newbury, Vt., and in 1839 was elected principal. In 1844, having resigned the principalship, he was appointed pastor of the church in Manchester, N. H. In 1846 he was appointed presiding elder of the Dover district; but during the next year he accepted a professorship in the Biblical Institute, at Concord, N. H., in which city he resided till his extreme exhaustion. His health became sufficiently restored to enable him to preside at a few Annual Conferences, and to attend the annual and semi-annual meetings of the Board of Bishops for two years longer, when his strength declined, and his voice was greatly affected. No longer able to take a public part in the church services, he nevertheless continued to attend and enjoy them until a short time before his death. Returning from service one Sabbath, he fell helpless at the threshold of his own home, but he regained his strength for a time. The fatal stroke of paralysis came Dec. 8, 1871. He lingered but a few days afterwards. In his general character he was distinguished for regularity and symmetry. His temperament was even and quiet; he was possessed of sound judgment and retentive memory, and combined calmness with firm religious convictions. As a teacher, he was assiduous; as a preacher, he was persuasive in manner, chaste in style, and oftentimes his ministrations were attended with divine power. As a bishop, he was impartial and judicious, and his administration was marked by a clear understanding of the constitution and laws of the church. His published work on the Discipline indicates his thorough knowledge of the administration of the church.

Baker, Reuben, of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Trumbull Co., O., in 1829. His parents were among the first to organize the Wesleyan Methodist connection, at Unionville, Whiteside Co., Ill. In April, 1858, he was converted, and joined the Wesleyan Methodist connection. He received orders in 1860. In the winter of 1863 he raised a company of volunteers, in Jo Daviess County, for the 17th Illinois Cavalry. He was a Wesleyan delegate to the Cincinnati Convention of 1866, and labored in favor of bringing the Methodist Protestant and Wesleyan Churches together. In 1868-69 he served the North Illinois Conference as president. In the spring of 1870 he removed to Radical City, Kan. At his first appointment, April 10, 1870, his congregation was composed of whites and Indians. He is decidedly a "pioneer preacher," toiling also with his hands.

Baker University is located at Baldwin City, Kan. The institution was founded as a seminary shortly after the settlement of the difficulties connected with the admission of Kansas as a State. The town was laid out and lots were sold, from the proceeds of which it was supposed buildings could be erected. Owing to depression in business, and various causes, difficulties ensued, which retarded the progress of the institution, and involved it in debt. Recently its friends have made strenuous efforts to cancel the indebtedness, and to secure the foundation of an endowment. Their efforts have been to a good degree successful, and the institution has now fairer prospects than at any previous period. Rev. J. Dennison, D.D., is president, and is assisted by able professors. The institution is under the patronage of the Kansas and South Kansas Conferences.

Baldwin, John, was for many years a lay member of the M. E. Church in North Ohio. By a gift of land, and by erecting a building, he was the originator of Baldwin Seminary (now Baldwin University), at Berea, O. He removed to Louisiana, where he has founded a school on the Teche.

He has lived exceedingly plain, and has given very largely in proportion to his means.

Baldwin, S. L., a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church in China, was born at Somerville, N. J., in 1835, was graduated from the Biblical Institute, at Concord, N. H., in 1858, and joined the Newark Conference, and was appointed a missionary to China in the same year. Here, being a practical printer, he has had charge of the mission press at Foo-Chow, and has made it very efficient. He has done much service in preparing books for publication in Chinese, mostly in the Foo-Chow colloquial, in the translation of parts of the Bible, in assisting in the translation of the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in other work of a similar character. He is conductor of a periodical published in the interests of the mission, the Fokien Church Gazette. Mrs. Baldwin has co-operated with him in the work of translations, giving attention especially to the Berean series of Sunday-school lessons.

Baldwin University is located at Berea, O. In 1846, Mr. John Baldwin gave a building which he had erected, together with valuable lands, to the North Ohio Conference of the M. E. Church, for educational purposes. It was commenced as a seminary for both sexes, and was quite prosperous. In 1856 the name of the institution was changed from Baldwin Institute to Baldwin University, and full university powers were conferred upon it. The course of study was enlarged, and several departments were added; among these was the department for teaching German, designed to assist chiefly German young men who were preparing for the ministry. In 1863 this department became independent. (See GERMAN WALLACE COLLEGE.) The institution has three large buildings; the north and south halls are three-story brick buildings, about 40 feet by 70. Hulet Hall is of stone, 56 by 90, having recitation-rooms in the lower story, and a fine audience-room in the upper. Baldwin Institute was opened April 9, 1846. At its first term 100 students were in attendance. In 1855 the number for the year had increased to 238, and in 1864 the university had in all departments upon its catalogue 383. A few years since, efforts were made to merge its property in the Ohio Wesleyan University, but the proposed arrangements failed, and the institution is continued, although somewhat limited.

Ball, David W., a layman of much influence in that portion of Wisconsin where he resides. He was honored as lay delegate from the West Wisconsin Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Ball, Ephraim, Col., a man of extraordinary inventive genius, especially relating to agricultural implements. Mowing- and reaping-machines were a specialty, and his name will long be remembered in connection with these modern inventions. He lived, and died about four years ago, in Starke Co., O. He was a local preacher of a high grade, and a writer of some force. He acquired his military title for services during the Civil War. Methodism in Canton is largely indebted to his efforts and manly piety.

Ball, Hannah, was born at High Wycombe, England, in 1744. Through the preaching of the early Methodist ministers she was converted, and became a member of the Methodist society at that place. Being anxious to do good, in 1769, in the twenty-sixth year of her age, she organized a Methodist Sunday-school in that city. It is stated by Tyerman, that "Hannah Ball, a young Methodist lady, had a Methodist Sunday-school at High Wycombe fourteen years before Robert Raikes began his at Gloucester." She became one of Wesley's favorite correspondents, and in the next year after opening her school, she wrote to him, saying, "The children meet twice a week, every Sunday and Monday. They are a wild little company, but seem willing to be instructed. I labor among them earnestly desiring to promote the interests of the church of Christ." It seems that Wesley consulted her frequently upon the temporal interests of that city. In a letter to Miss Ball, March 13, 1777, he says, "It seems the time has come when you are to have two new commodious preaching-houses at High Wycombe. I will give you a plan of the building myself, and employ whom you please to build."

Baltimore, Md.—The first Methodist sermon preached in Baltimore was in 1770, by John King. He had for his pulpit a blacksmith's block, at the junction of Front and French Streets; and under these services, the deputy surveyor of the county was awakened. He preached his next sermon at the corner of Baltimore and Calvert, but being on the training-day for the militia, he was surrounded by a drunken rabble, and was considerably annoyed. Subsequently, he was invited to preach in St. Paul's church, but the invitation was not repeated. The same year Mr. Pilmoor preached on the sidewalk near St. Paul's. Little was accomplished, however, until, in November, 1772, Mr. Asbury visited Baltimore, and commenced preaching both at the Point and in the city; and early in 1773 he succeeded in organizing two classes. Mrs. Martha F. Allison was one of the earliest class-leaders for the women. In November, 1773, a lot was purchased on Strawberry Alley, where the Dallas Street church now stands. In 1774 two lots of ground were purchased, and a church was erected in Lovely Lane, in which the first Conference in Baltimore met, in 1776.

In 1784, in this chapel, the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized. The church was specially fitted up for this important Assembly. The seats, which were only common benches, had backs put to them. A gallery was erected, and for the first time a stove was put in it to warm it. In 1785 the Lovely Lane chapel was sold, and a site secured on Light Street, on which a larger church was erected. Baltimore being very centrally located in reference to the spread of Methodism, was soon recognized as its chief place. For many years the closing Annual Conference of the year sat in the city, and all the General Conferences before 1812. Bishop Asbury had a room in connection with the Light Street church, where he frequently rested, and in which he kept his books. The Methodist people of the city were intelligent, enterprising, and deeply devoted; and many of them were in very comfortable circumstances. The growth of the church was constant, and sometimes rapid, until the radical controversy, which prevailed from 1820 to 1828. Baltimore was one of its chief centres. There the "Mutual Rights" was published, and union societies were early organized. At one time it was supposed the majority of the churches were affected with radical opinions.

In 1827 a convention was held preparatory to organizing independent societies, in case the ensuing General Conference did not change the Discipline; and, in 1828, the associated Methodist Churches were organized, which were ultimately merged in the Methodist Protestant Church. When the secession took place, a number of the strong and influential members took part in the new organization, but the number was much less than had been anticipated: and, after a few years of agitation, the churches settled down in peace. A portion of the colored people had previously seceded, in 1816, following the lead of the church in Philadelphia, which organized the African Methodist Episcopal Church. From 1830 until the excitement in reference to the subject of slavery became intense, the growth of the church was uninterrupted. A large proportion of the citizens of Baltimore sympathized with the South, although slavery was never so strong in that city as in other parts of the slaveholding States.

At the separation of the South, in 1845, Baltimore Methodism remained intact, although there were not a few who sympathized with their Southern brethren. At the breaking out of the Civil War there was much excitement in the churches, and several organizations of a Southern character were formed, and also one or two independent congregations were organized. At the close of the war the churches which were Southern in their sympathies united with the M. E. Church South, while the independent churches have remained distinct and separate. The controversy and agitation retarded the progress of the work, and for several years there was but little increase in the membership, and but little was done in the erection of churches. Since that period peace has been restored to the churches, and the progress of the Methodist Episcopal Church has been quite satisfactory. The M. E. Church South has also a number of congregations established, and there are five or six independent Methodist churches. A female college was organized in Baltimore by Rev. N. C. Brooks in 1849, which has been of service in educating many young women of the church under religious influences. (See BALTIMORE FEMALE COLLEGE.) A few years since the ladies of the city formed an association, and erected a beautiful and commodious building as a home for the aged (which see). A large and beautiful property has been purchased on Baltimore Street, which is occupied as a Methodist Book Depository, under the control of an association, and commodious rooms for preachers' meetings and church purposes are also furnished. The old Light Street, so long the headquarters of Methodism, was removed by improvements of the city; and the congregation purchased the Charles Street church, when that organization removed to their new church in Mount Vernon Place. This new edifice is the most beautiful Methodist church in Baltimore, and is not excelled by any in Methodism, unless it be by one in Toronto. It was built under the pastorate of Rev. Dr. Edly, and is an honor to the church and to the city. The statistics in 1876 are as follows:

In addition to these, there are several Methodist Protestant Churches; but detailed statistics have not been received.

Baltimore Conference M. E. Church.—The history of Methodism in the United States is intimately associated with that of the Baltimore Conference. Within its bounds some of the earliest societies were formed. By some it has been contended that Strawbridge preceded Embury, and that the society on San's Creek was organized before the society in New York. There is, however, no proof of this; the probabilities are strongly on the other side. Mr. Strawbridge located on his farm, and preaching on Sunday, was the means of awakening several who became active and zealous Christians, and some of them entered the ministry. In 1769, Robert Williams, who preceded Boardman and Pilmoor to New York, after their arrival passed into Maryland, and there co-operated with Strawbridge, and extended the work beyond the bounds formerly occupied. The following year they were joined by John King, an earnest and zealous young man, whose whole soul was in the work of revival. Shortly after Mr. Asbury arrived he visited Maryland, and gave form, compactness, and energy to the movement. Unfortunately, in a few years Mr. Strawbridge, who was impatient of restraint, rejected the authority of Mr. Rankin, who was Mr. Wesley's assistant, and, in 1776, became the pastor of a separate congregation. The Annual Conferences of 1773, 1774, and 1775, were held in Philadelphia; but from that period onward, until the organization of the M. E. Church.

the Conferences were held in Baltimore, and it was recognized as the central point of Methodism, the work having spread southward more rapidly than north of that point. The General Christmas Conference of 1784, which organized the church, met in Baltimore, and every General Conference from that period until 1812. Bishop Asbury made it his headquarters. Cokesbury College was established within its bounds, and, after its burning, a new effort was made at Baltimore. The presence of leading preachers, and the influence of the literary institutions, gave an impulse to early Methodism in Baltimore and its vicinity, which it received nowhere else, and which has not ceased to this day. From 1784 to 1792 the Baltimore Conference was regarded as of chief authority in the church. After that time, the boundaries of the Conferences being fixed by the General Conference, the six Annual Conferences were equal in ecclesiastical position and authority; but, by its numbers, its culture, and its central position, Baltimore still retained a high prestige. Its boundaries embraced the Virginia Valley, the District of Columbia, Western Maryland, and all of Pennsylvania west of the Susquehanna, with Western Virginia, and the settled portions of Eastern Ohio. In the progress of time Ohio, Western Virginia, and Western Pennsylvania were separated into other Conferences; but for many years that part of Pennsylvania lying between the Susquehanna and the Allegheny Mountains remained in the Baltimore Conference. Its present boundaries embrace only Western Maryland, the District of Columbia, and the Winchester district in Virginia. It was greatly affected by the contest on the subject of slavery in the church, as in part of its territory the Church South established congregations after 1845; but it was more deeply affected by the events which preceded and accompanied the breaking out of the Civil War. The churches in Virginia north of the Rappahannock, and in some parts of Maryland, declared themselves independent of the General Conference early in 1861, and during the progress of the war many societies were broken up, and several churches were destroyed. After the close of the war the ministers and churches which had declared themselves independent of the General Conference united with the M. E. Church South, and established congregations, not only in Virginia but also in many parts of Maryland, organizing several churches in the city of Baltimore and one in the city of Washington. The old Baltimore Conference, however, retained a large proportion of its strength, with its former vigor and vitality; and, notwithstanding all the difficulties, it has continued to improve. A book depository has been established in Baltimore, under the sanction of the Conference, which serves as a centre for the spread of religious intelligence.

Baltimore Conference is one of the patronizing bodies of Dickinson College, in which it has always taken a deep interest. Its present statistics are 193 traveling preachers, 191 local preachers, 33,607 members, 34,588 Sunday-school scholars, 354 churches, valued at $2,792,200, and 74 parsonages, valued at $295,500.

Baltimore Conference M. E. Church South.—A large portion of the members of the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church, in 1861, declared themselves independent of the authority of the General Conference. This action was taken in consequence of the General Conference of 1860 having taken strong anti-slavery ground. The journals of the Conference were held by those members who claimed to be the majority. The Civil War commencing shortly after, and much of the territory being traversed by the armies, but little advance was made. At the close of the war these members adhered to the M. E. Church South, and were organized as the Baltimore Conference, of that church, at Alexandria, Va., February 7, 1866, Bishop Early presiding. It then reported 11,189 white members and 627 colored. The larger proportion of this membership was in Virginia. The statistical report for 1877 is as follows: 25,165 white members and 89 colored, 103 local preachers, 407 Sunday-schools, and 21,417 scholars.

Their General Conference of 1874 fixed the boundaries of the Conference, so as to "embrace all that part of the State of Maryland which lies north and west of the Great Choptank River, and also the part of Caroline County, in said State, lying south and west of said river; Newcastle and Kent Counties in the State of Delaware, and so much of the States of Virginia and West Virginia as is included in the following boundary lines: beginning at the mouth of the Potomac River; thence up said river to the county line between Stafford and King George Counties; thence with said line to the Rappahannock River, and with said river, including Fredericksburg station, to the Blue Ridge Mountains; thence by that chain of mountains to Pilot Mountain, in Floyd County, Va., and thence with the top of said mountain to the crossing of the Jacksonville and Christiansburg Turnpike; and thence on a direct line to New River, at Pepper's Ferry, and by that river westward to the line of Greenbrier County, West Va., so as to include all the pastoral charges in that locality embraced in the Lewisburg district; thence with the line between Pocahontas and Randolph Counties to the Allegheny Mountains; thence by said mountains northward, so as to include all the territory which may be now, or hereafter, under our jurisdiction, and not embraced in other Conferences."

Baltimore Female College was established in the city of Baltimore by N. C. Brooks, LL.D., and was chartered by the legislature of Maryland in 1849. It is under the patronage of the Baltimore Annual Conference, but the property is chiefly owned by Dr. Brooks. It has educated a large number of young ladies, and has trained and sent forth more than 150 teachers. It is beautifully situated in a grove, on a lofty eminence that commands a view of the country around the city, and the river and bay, for many miles. There are shady walks for exercise, and arrangements for recreation and amusement. The buildings embrace the modern improvements for heating and ventilation, with every convenience for boarding and day pupils. There is also a library of about 3000 volumes, with a valuable collection of minerals, metals, and ancient and modern coins, some of which are very rare. A chemical hall and lecture room has been fitted up with chemical and philosophical apparatus. There is also a painting-gallery, with a number of fine copies, and a collection of copies of ancient gems, procured at an expense of about $1000. In addition to the regular instructors, lectures are delivered by gentlemen of science not connected with the institution. For the advantage of young ladies who desire to prepare themselves for teachers, a normal class is conducted. In 1860 the legislature of Maryland gave to the institution a small endowment, on condition that one pupil should be admitted from each county in the State free of charge for tuition or books. Of 210 college graduates, 82 have become teachers, and are engaged in various positions of importance. In addition to degrees conferred, a silver medal is also given, and six honors are awarded to the graduating class. Dr. Brooks has associated with him a corps of able and successful teachers.

Band-Meetings.—In early Methodism, Mr. Wesley encouraged the system of bands. These consisted of not more than five or six persons of similar circumstances in life, and to some extent of similar taste, who met together to converse freely touching their Christian experience and their habits of life. Their conversation was more minute and particular than would be proper in a more promiscuous assembly. The examination of personal character was very strict, and the intention was to promote a more holy and useful life. Each band met weekly for its own religious services; but they also occasionally met in general band-meeting; for one of his directions was to hold a love-feast quarterly for the bands only. Band-meetings, however, were not enjoined as a rule of discipline, and they were not at any time generally observed. In 1812, the Wesleyan Conference, endeavoring to revive and extend their mission, directed the superintendents of the various churches to "form, out of their classes, as many bands as possible from those believers who do not at present meet in bands, and who are willing so to do, putting into each band those who are most acquainted with each other." The questions proposed originally to each one before being admitted into the band were as follows: "I. Have you the forgiveness of your sins? II. Have you peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ? III. Have you the witness of God's Spirit with your spirit that you are a child of God? IV. Is the love of God shed abroad in your heart? V. Has no sin inward or outward dominion over you? VI. Do you desire to be told of your faults? VII. Do you desire to be told of all your faults, and that plain and home? VIII. Do you desire that every one of us shall tell you from time to time whatever is in his heart concerning you? IX. Consider, do you desire we should tell you whatsoever we think, whatsoever we fear, whatsoever we hear, concerning you? X. Do you desire that in doing this we should come as close as possible, that we shall cut to the quick and search your heart to the bottom? XI. Is it your desire and design to be on this and on all other occasions entirely open, so as to speak everything that is in your heart without exception, without disguise, and without reserve?" In 1744, Mr. Wesley gave to them specific directions as follows: "You are supposed to have the faith that overcometh the world; to you, therefore, it is not grievous, I. Carefully to abstain from doing evil in public. (1) Not to buy nor sell anything at all on the Lord's day. (2) To taste no spirituous liquors nor dram of any kind unless prescribed by a physician. (3) To be at a word both in buying and selling. (4) To pawn nothing, no, not to save life.* (5) Not to mention the fault of any behind his back, and to stop short those that do. (6) To wear no needless ornaments, such as rings, ear-rings, necklaces, lace ruffles. (7) To take no needless self-indulgence, such as taking snuff or tobacco, unless prescribed by a physician. II. Zealously to maintain good works in public. (1) To give alms of such things as you possess, and that to the utmost of your power. (2) To reprove all that sin in your sight, and that in love and meekness and wisdom. (3) To be patterns of diligence and frugality, of self-denial, and taking up the cross daily. III. Constantly to attend on all the ordinances of God in public. (1) To be at church and at the Lord's table every week and at every public meeting of the bands. (2) To attend the ministry of the word every morning unless distance, business, or sickness prevent. (3) To use private prayer every day, and family prayer if you are at the head of a family. (4) To read the Scriptures and meditate thereon at every vacant hour. (5) To observe as days of fasting or abstinence all Fridays in the year." In America these meetings were never organized to any great extent; they were held in a few of the cities and of the larger towns, but at present they are almost unknown. The article on the subject of bands has been recently omitted from the Discipline.

Bangor, Me. (pop. 18,289), is the capital of Penobscot County, situated on the Penobscot River, sixty miles from the ocean. Near it is located the Bangor Theological Seminary, under the control of the Congregational Church. Jesse Lee visited this region in 1793. He ascended the Penobscot River to Oldtown, and speaks of these villages as Indian settlements. He does not say, however, that he preached in this city. In 1795, Penobscot circuit was organized. The first Methodist sermon was preached in Bangor, by Joshua Hall, April 18, 1795.

As early as 1814, a Methodist class was organized in this city, but the church did not make much progress until 1826, when Bangor circuit was organized. In 1827, Moses Hill was appointed to that circuit, and immediately commenced to build a church. A great revival followed, during which Methodism took a position which it had not occupied before. Among other converts were Joseph Janne and Mark Trafton, who afterwards became ministers. The First church, situated on Summer Street, was dedicated in November, 1828. The Maine Conference held its session in Bangor, for the first time, in 1835, Bishop Emory presiding. In 1836, a brick church on Pine Street was commenced, and it was dedicated on the 12th of December, 1837, and the Summer Street church was abandoned. In 1842, the Millerite excitement did great damage to the church. In 1846, the question of forming a second church was agitated, and the Conference sent a second preacher, who reoccupied the old Summer Street church, it having been repaired for that purpose. The two pastors, however, in the city alternating between the two congregations, it was still considered as one pastoral charge. In 1847, the Summer Street congregation became a separate charge. The Union Street church was built in 1855, and again the old Summer Street church was abandoned, and was soon after sold. The present statistics are:

Bangs, Heman, an eminent minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Fairfield, Conn., April, 1790, and died Nov. 2, 1869, in New Haven, Conn. He united with the New York Conference in 1815, and remained in the work of the ministry fifty-four consecutive years; being thirty-three years in the pastorate, three years agent of the Wesleyan University, and eighteen years presiding elder. The most of his life was spent in and about New York City and New Haven. He was among the first who advocated and assisted in the organization of the Missionary Society. He was also an earnest friend of education in the church. The temperance reform and every benevolent and moral movement engaged his thoughts and efforts. "In every position he filled he was equal to the responsibilities imposed upon him. As a preacher he was peculiar to himself, he imitated no one; nobody could anticipate his sermons; they were original, always connected, short, and eminently practical. At times he would seem to bring the whole heavens down, overwhelming his audience with an emotion and power altogether superhuman. As a pastor he excelled." Bishop Janes remarked at his funeral, "No man ever came nearer to 'warning every man and teaching every man in all wisdom' than Brother Bangs." His death was one of great peace and triumph. Among his last utterances were, "I am saved! I am saved!" And again, "I am so unworthy. I see nothing but imperfection in myself; but, oh, the blood, the atoning blood, it meets my case!"

Bangs, Nathan, D.D., was born May 2, 1778, near Bridgeport, Conn., and died May 3, 1862. He was converted in 1800, and in 1802 was admitted into the New York Conference, which then embraced Canada. The next six years he spent in Canada, going from village to village as a missionary. In 1808, he was returned to the State of New York, and appointed to Delaware circuit. He was chosen as delegate to the General Conference of 1808, and was a delegate to every session after, with the exception of 1848, until 1856. After filling important positions both as pastor and presiding elder, he was, in 1820, elected book agent. Under his wise and skillful management previous embarrassments were removed, and the business was greatly extended. He was re-elected to the same position in 1824. The Christian Advocate having been established in 1826, he furnished most of the editorial matter from that time till 1828. He was also editor of the Methodist Magazine. In 1828 he was appointed by the General Conference editor of the Advocate, as well as of the Magazine. In 1832, the Magazine having been changed to a quarterly, he was elected its editor, as well as editor of the books. He was the chief founder of the Missionary Society, writing its constitution and its first address. For sixteen years he served as secretary, vice-president, and treasurer, gratuitously. The missionary work having enlarged, in 1836 the General Conference appointed him missionary secretary. In 1841 he accepted the presidency of the Wesleyan University, but resigned the chair in the following year, and returned to the pastoral work, in which he remained actively engaged until 1852. In 1812, the General Conference appointed him chairman of a committee to collect historical material. This work led him to the publication of his "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church," in four volumes. He published also several works defending the doctrines and usages of the church. He was always deeply devout, and in his advanced years he seemed to obtain a higher Christian experience. The Wesleyan doctrine of sanctification was to him peculiarly precious, and he delighted to attend services having special reference to this subject.

Bangs, Stephen Beekman, son of the Rev. Heman Bangs, was born in New York, 1823, and died March 20, 1846. He was converted in his thirteenth year. He graduated in the New York University with honor in 1843. He was licensed to preach in 1844, and was admitted on trial in the New York Conference. His style of preaching excited anticipations of great usefulness. The closing scene of his life was marked by the presence and power of God. Seeing the light of the evening sun, which fell upon the wall before him, he said, "The sun is setting, mine is rising." In a moment he said, "I go from this bed to a crown." Then folding his arms across his breast, his last words were, "Now I am going to glory."

Bangs, William McKendree, son of Dr. N. Bangs, was born in the city of New York, Dec. 15, 1810, and died in the same city, Sept. 5, 1852. His elementary classical training was obtained in Columbia College, but he graduated in the Ohio University, in 1829, with the highest honors. He accepted a professorship in Augusta College, Ky., but, impressed with the duty of entering the Christian ministry, he resigned, and, in 1831, entered the New York Conference, and continued until feeble health compelled him to desist. He was awakened under the preaching of Dr. Durbin, in 1827, and was converted while at the Ohio University. He was licensed to exhort in his seventeenth year, and to preach in his eighteenth year, and was but twenty-one years old when he entered the regular itineracy. He filled several important appointments in the New York Conference. As a controversial writer he excelled. His biographer says, "He was eminently fitted to be a theologian, and with good health and longer life he would have probably become a standard authority in divinity among his brethren." Bishop Hedding pronounced him "the ablest theological thinker in the denomination."

Bankruptcy or Insolvency.—One of Mr. Wesley's General Rules forbade his members "to borrow without a probability of paying, or to take goods without a probability of paying for them." One of the questions very early asked in his Conference was, "What shall we do to prevent scandal when any of our members becomes a bankrupt?" It was made the duty of the assistant or preacher in charge to talk with such a person freely, and if it was discovered that he had not kept fair accounts, or had been concerned in the practice of raising money by coining notes, commonly called then the Bill of Trade, he was to be expelled immediately. So much of this provision as was applicable to America was adopted by the M. E. General Conference of 1784. In 1787, if any members were found to have failed in business or contracted debts which they were not able to pay, it was made the duty of the elder or deacon to select two or three judicious members of the church to inspect the accounts of the supposed delinquent, and if it were discovered that he had behaved dishonestly, or borrowed money without a probability of paying, he should be suspended until his credit was restored. At the General Conference of 1796, one of the provisions of the present Discipline of the church was adopted, which made it the duty of the preachers having the oversight of circuits or stations to execute all the rules of the church, fully and strenuously, against all frauds, and particularly against dishonest insolvencies; suffering none to remain in the church on any account who were found guilty of any fraud. The General Conference of 1800 particularized the method of procedure in all such cases, by directing that two or three judicious members of the church should inspect the accounts, contracts, and circumstances of the case of the supposed delinquent. And it was added in 1860, if they judge that he had behaved dishonestly or borrowed money without a probability of paying, he was to be brought to trial, and if found guilty, expelled. The defendant, however, has in this case the right of appeal to the ensuing Quarterly Conference, which may more thoroughly investigate the case; the verdict of which body is final.

Bannister, Edward, D.D., late president of the University of the Pacific, was born in Phelps, N. Y., Dec. 14, 1814, and died in Marysville, Cal., Sept. 27, 1871. He was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1838, and engaged in teaching at Vienna, N. Y. In the same year he joined the Genesee Conference of the M. E. Church, but afterwards studied medicine. In 1841 he was appointed teacher of natural science in the Gouverneur Wesleyan Seminary, N. Y., but afterwards engaged in pastoral work in the Black River Conference. In 1844 he was elected teacher of Natural Science in the Oneida Conference Seminary. In 1850, having been appointed by the Missionary Board to establish an institution of learning in California, he opened a classical school in San José, in that State, became principal of the same, and in 1852 opened the preparatory department of the University of the Pacific, at Santa Clara. In 1854 he became a stationed pastor in San Francisco. In 1855 he opened Oak Grove Institute, at Alameda, Cal. In 1856 he returned to pastoral work, and continued in it till 1860, when he was elected president of the University of the Pacific. He returned to the itinerant work in 1870. He was once a delegate to the General Conference.

Bannister, Henry, D.D., professor in the Garrett Biblical Institute, was born in Conway, Mass.,

REV. HENRY BANNISTER, D.D.

Oct. 5, 1812, was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1836, and afterwards took a course in the Auburn Theological Seminary. In 1838 he was chosen teacher of Greek, Hebrew, and Latin in the Oneida Conference Seminary; in 1840, principal of Fairfield Academy, New York; in 1843, principal of the Oneida Conference Seminary; and in 1856, Professor of Exegetical Theology in the Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Ill. Dr. Bannister was a delegate to the General Conferences of the M. E. Church of 1864, 1868, and 1872.

Baptism, Christian, is an ordinance established in the church by divine appointment, and consists in the application of water to the candidate in the name of the Holy Trinity. It is founded upon the command of Christ, given to the apostles, to baptize all nations, and also upon the practice of the apostles and that of the early Christian church. With but slight exceptions, the church in all its branches, from the earliest ages, has observed this ordinance. The Friends, or Quakers, however, are an exception; they assert that water baptism was not designed to be continued in the church of Christ any longer than Jewish prejudice made such an outward ceremony seemingly necessary. They argue from the first baptism spoken of in Ephesians iv. 5, that there must be only a baptism of the Spirit. It was administered, however, to Gentile converts and not confined to the Jews, as appears from Matt. xxviii. 19, 20, compared with Acts x. 47. That the baptism of the Spirit did not supersede water baptism was the judgment of Peter, and of those that were with him; so that the baptism spoken of seems to have embraced that of water,—the communication of the Holy Spirit being outward baptism only in a figurative sense. The Apostle Paul speaks of all Christians as baptized, and argues for the obligation of baptism in such a manner as to indicate its perpetuation in the church.

The mode of baptism has given rise to much controversy. It has been administered by sprinkling, pouring, and immersion; and the various bodies of Baptists contend for immersion as the only valid form. Mr. Wesley, in accordance with his broad and liberal views, believed it to be right to leave the choice of the mode to the individual, and directed that it should be administered either by immersion, sprinkling, or pouring. The various branches of the Methodist family adhere to the same view, and deny that immersion is essential to the validity of baptism, and accept either mode as valid; believing that the essential element is simply the application of water in the name of the blessed Trinity as an emblem or symbol, as well as an attestation of the faith of the party, or of the parents. The general practice of the Methodist Churches is to administer by sprinkling or pouring, as being in full harmony with the affusion of the Holy Spirit, and as being more convenient in its administration. At the same time, whenever the person to be baptized desires immersion, the church directs that his wishes shall be complied with.

As to the subjects of baptism, the Methodist

Churches from the beginning have adhered to the general views of the majority of the Christian churches. The ordinance is administered to all adult persons, who repent of their sins and renounce the world, and profess faith in Christ as their Saviour. It also recognizes the divine and ecclesiastical authority for infant baptism, and teaches that parents should consecrate their children in this way to the service of Christ, as an expression of their faith, and a covenant on their part to train the children in Christian knowledge and duties. (See INFANT BAPTISM.) These churches also teach that the administration of the ordinance of baptism is a function of the ministerial office, and it is only in extreme cases that it is proper for lay persons to baptize. The validity of lay baptism under extreme circumstances, and performed with a true intent, in the name of the Trinity, is recognized by the church, and it is not repeated. In the baptismal ceremony the Methodist Churches do not recognize sponsors or god-fathers, as is the custom in the Roman Catholic Church, and in the Church of England. Parents or guardians are considered the proper persons to present their children for baptism, and to take upon them the vows for their Christian education. While parents live, no persons can supersede them in these duties. As to the efficacy of water baptism, the Methodist Churches do not regard it, in itself alone, as a saving ordinance,—that is, they do not consider that sins are washed away by the application of water, nor is there any absolute or invariable relation between the performance of the ceremony and the spiritual cleansing, or regeneration of the soul: in other words, Methodists do not believe in baptismal regeneration. It is regarded as a command of the Scriptures, and, like other commands of the Saviour, is to be faithfully and fully obeyed. There are in it the elements of a sacrament which indicate on the part of God the pledge of divine love and grace, and on the part of the adult person the obligation of allegiance and obedience until death. In the case of children, the parents or guardians assume a solemn obligation to train their children in the fear of the Lord; and when the child has arrived at the years of responsibility, he is called upon before the church to ratify and confirm the baptismal covenant, and to consecrate himself to the full service of God. Baptism in ancient times was regarded by the Jews, when administered by them to converts from heathenism, as indicating the laying aside of the old form of faith and practice and entering into the covenant relations peculiar to Judaism. So Christian baptism indicates the renouncing of all evil practices, the commencement of a new and holy life, and is the ceremony of admission into the privileges and fellowship of the Christian church.

Baptized Children, their Relation to the M. E. Church.—One of the earliest inquiries of the American Methodist Conference was, "What shall we do for the rising generation?" As an answer to this question, they proposed plans for the moral and religious instruction of the young. Preachers were required, wherever ten children could be gathered together, to meet them at least an hour every week, or once in two weeks, to converse with them upon their religious duties. They were also especially enjoined to pay particular attention to the young children in every household in their pastoral visitations.

In 1787 the preachers were required to take a list of the names of the children, and if any of them through their instruction should become truly awakened, they were to admit them into the church. In 1824 this duty was made still more explicit: to obtain the names of the children belonging to the congregation: to form them into classes for the purpose of giving them religious instruction. In 1836 the nature of this instruction was specified with greater care: that it should embrace the nature of experimental religion, as also the nature, design, privileges, and obligations of their baptism; the preacher was directed, when absent, to appoint a leader for each class of the children thus to be instructed. After religious instruction had been imparted for a length of time, and signs of true awakening appeared, such children were to be received on trial, and the preacher was to leave a correct account of each class thus formed, with the name of its leader. Rev. Dr. Hibbard prepared and presented to the General Conference of 1856, a section in the Discipline bearing the title of this article, the design of which was to more clearly define the relation especially of baptized children to the church. In the ceremony of baptism the religious instruction of the child is specified, but nothing is said in that form concerning the relation of the baptized child to the church. The section as it now stands in the Discipline of the church is as follows:

"We hold that all children, by virtue of the unconditional benefits of the atonement, are members of the kingdom of God; and, therefore, graciously entitled to baptism; but as infant baptism contemplates a course of religious instruction and discipline, it is expected of all parents or guardians who present their children for baptism, that they use all diligence in bringing them up in conformity to the word of God; and they should be solemnly admonished of this obligation, and earnestly exhorted to faithfulness therein. We regard all children who have been baptized as placed in visible covenant relation to God, and under the special care and supervision of the church. The preacher in charge shall preserve a full and accurate register of the names of all the baptized children within his pastoral care; the dates of their birth, baptism, their parentage, and places of residence. The preacher in charge shall organize the baptized children of the church at the age of ten years or younger into classes, and appoint suitable leaders (male and female), whose duty it shall be to meet them in class once a week, and instruct them in the nature, design, and obligations of baptism, and the truths of religion necessary to make them 'wise unto salvation;' urge them to give regular attendance upon the means of grace; advise, exhort, and encourage them to an immediate consecration of their hearts and lives to God, and inquire into the state of their religious experience; provided, that children unbaptized are not to be excluded from these classes. Whenever baptized children shall have attained an age sufficient to understand the obligations of religion, and shall give evidence of piety, they may be admitted into full membership in our church, on the recommendation of a leader with whom they have met at least six months in class, by publicly asserting before the church to the baptismal covenant, and also to the usual questions on doctrines and disciplines.

"Whenever a baptized child shall, by orphanage or otherwise, become deprived of Christian guardianship, the preacher in charge shall ascertain and report to the leaders' and stewards' meeting the facts in the case, and such provisions shall be made for the Christian training of the child as the circumstances of the case admit and require."

Bardsley, Samuel, was received as a preacher on trial in the British Wesleyan Church in 1768. During half a century he maintained an unblemished character both as a Christian and a minister. From divine love which filled his heart, flowed his unfeigned love of the brethren, and of all mankind. The unction of the Holy One accompanied all his ministrations; he was truly a man of God. He was suddenly called home August 19, 1818.

Barker, John, D.D., was born in England, March, 1813, but when he was three years of age his parents emigrated to America. He was early fond of study, and graduated at Geneva College in his twentieth year. Shortly afterwards he was converted and licensed to preach. His talents as an educator were early recognized, and he was appointed Professor of Mathematics in the Geneva Wesleyan Seminary. In 1839 he succeeded Bishop Simpson as vice-president, and Professor of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry, in Allegheny College. In 1846 he accepted the professorship of Ancient Languages in Transylvania University, Ky., and on the resignation of Dr. Clark, in 1848, was elected president of Allegheny College. During the same year he was admitted into the Pittsburgh Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, and he continued to fill the office of president until February 26, 1860, when he was suddenly stricken down with paralysis, and in a few hours passed away. Though he had never sustained the relation of pastor to any charge, he was a preacher of superior ability, lucid, strong, and oftentimes eloquent. He was a man of extensive and varied reading, of clear perception, of original thought, and withal exceedingly pleasant and genial. His conversational powers were highly developed, and his sallies of wit made him the life and centre of the social circle. As a preceptor, his great stores of varied learning and his clear and happy illustrations imparted unusual interest to the recitation-room, and greatly endeared him to the students who were under his care. His sudden death produced a profound sorrow not only in the circles of the college and the church, but of the whole community.

Barker, Stephen, resides in the vicinity of New York, where he has long been engaged in mercantile business, with connections in the West. He has been, from early life, an active member of the M. E. Church, and has liberally sustained its interests. He is a member of the General Missionary Board in New York.

Barnes, Samuel, a delegate from the Central Pennsylvania Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, joined the Baltimore Conference in 1853, and has served in itinerant pastoral work in connection with the Baltimore, East Baltimore, and Central Pennsylvania Conferences.

Barr, Geo. R., D.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Stokes Co., N. C., July 25, 1810; converted in 1823; licensed to preach, April, 1842; ordained deacon and elder, 1842; and was received into the Virginia Conference in Nov., 1842. He organized churches in Washington, Lee, Russell, and Scott Counties from 1842 to 1845. These were the beginnings of entire circuits. He was a representative to the General Conference of May, 1858, and also to the General Convention of 1867. A member of the General Conferences of 1870 and 1874, and a representative elect to the General Convention of May, 1877, for the completion of the union of the Methodist and Methodist Protestant Churches. He is a fraternal messenger elect to the M. E. Church South, May, 1878. He was president of the Holston Conference in 1867; re-elected, 1872 and 1873; president of the Virginia Conference, 1874 and 1876. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Western Maryland College, June, 1872.

Barratt, Philip, was one of the prominent laymen of early Methodism in Delaware. He was judge of one of the courts, and is spoken of in history as "Judge Barratt." He was the intimate friend and defender of Bishop Asbury during the Revolutionary War. He took an active part in all the enterprises of the growing society, and contributed liberally to the erection of the church in his neighborhood, which from him was called "Barratt's Chapel." He was a man of eminence and influence in his neighborhood, and was beloved into sympathy and tears. The congregation caught the glowing emotion, and the whole assembly, as if struck with a shock of heavenly electricity, burst into a flood of tears. Every heart appeared overflowing with love and fellowship, and an ecstasy of joy and gladness ensued. I can never forget the

by a large circle of friends. He died in 1784, before the arrival of Dr. Coke.

Barratt's Chapel was one of the first churches built in Delaware. It is about a mile from Frederica, and the deed of the ground is dated May, 1780. The house was built of brick, 42 by 48 feet, two stories high, with a vestry. It was long considered the best country chapel in Methodism, though it was not finished until two generations passed away. In November, 1780, the floor being laid and rough seats arranged, the first quarterly meeting was held in it, and it was supposed that nearly a thousand people were present. Mr. Asbury, with Hartley and others who had suffered or been in exile during part of the war, was present and officiated. The church is specially memorable, as the place where Coke and Asbury first met, and where plans were laid for the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Ezekiel Cooper says of this meeting, "While Coke was preaching, Asbury came into the congregation. A solemn pause and deep silence took place at the close of the sermon as an interval for introduction and salutation. Asbury and Coke, with hearts full of brotherly love, approached, embraced, and saluted each other. The other preachers at the same time were melted into sympathy and tears. The congregation caught the glowing emotion, and the whole assembly, as if struck with a shock of heavenly electricity, burst into a flood of tears. Every heart appeared overflowing with love and fellowship, and an ecstasy of joy and gladness ensued. I can never forget the affecting scene." It being a quarterly meeting, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered by Dr. Coke to several hundreds of people. It was the first time that the Lord's Supper was administered in America by a regularly ordained Methodist preacher. In 1815, Bishop Asbury for the last time, in great feebleness, preached in that chapel. Judge Andrew Barratt, the son of Philip, was present, and invited the bishop to dine, remarking, "Oh! I know that my father and mother thought more of him than of any man upon earth, and well does it become their son to respect him."

The seat on which Dr. Coke and Mr. Asbury had their first consultations is still preserved in the pulpit of the church. Mr. Asbury arranged the rules of this chapel when it was opened, appointed stewards, and made arrangements for the preachers to meet and instruct the children. It is said that when it was being built, a neighboring gentleman desired to know what use was to be made of it. Being informed that it was a place of worship for the Methodists, his reply was, "It is unnecessary to build such a house, for by the time that the war is over, a corn-crib will hold them all." The building of the chapel excited much opposition in the neighborhood, but in a few years that passed away.

Barrett, Alfred, was early converted, became a member of society when fifteen years of age, and used to engage very much in private prayer. The Holy Spirit wrought powerfully within him, and so penetrating were his views of the evil of sin and of the holiness and justice of God's law, that they led to an intense and long-protracted agony of soul. Experienced Christians were not slow to perceive that he was being prepared for eminent usefulness. He entered the British Wesleyan ministry in 1832, and for twenty-six years occupied a leading position as an able preacher and faithful pastor. He filled the office of governor of Richmond College to the lasting advantage of many ministers. He enriched Methodist literature with some valuable contributions. Failing health compelled him to retire from public life, and in the comparative seclusion of home he went down to "the river," which, being neither broad nor deep to him, he passed triumphantly over, "to be forever with the Lord."

Barrows, Lorenzo D., D.D., was born in Windham Co., Vt., July 1, 1817. He was converted in his fourteenth year. He was educated in the district schools, and in the Sanbornton and Newbury Seminaries, and in his seventeenth year commenced teaching. In 1835 he was licensed to preach, and in 1836 united with the New Hampshire Conference. He filled leading appointments in New England, and on account of impaired health was transferred farther south and filled stations in Newark and Cincinnati. He was for three years president of Pittsburgh Female College, and for six years president of New Hampshire Conference Seminary and Female College. He has also been presiding elder for several years. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1848, 1860, 1868, and 1876.

In impaired health he visited the South, and in connection with the Freedman's Aid Society had oversight of some sixty teachers, and aided in establishing the "Clark Theological School," at Atlanta. He was an early and active friend of the temperance cause, and in connection with other duties has edited temperance newspapers,—was Prohibition candidate for governor, and holds advanced views. He was also one of the earliest anti-slavery advocates, but remained firm to the church when many seceded. He was associated with Dr. Dempster, Bishop Baker, and others in establishing the first theological seminary, and wrote in its behalf in Zion's Herald. He has also been identified with the erection of a number of beautiful churches. He has recently accepted the position of president, and Ladd professor in the New Hampshire Conference Seminary and Female College.

Barry, James, a British Wesleyan minister, was for many years a faithful laborer in the Lord's vineyard. He labored much and suffered much, and all with unwearied patience. In his death he suffered nothing, stealing quietly away. His end was peace, quietness, and assurance forever. He died at Gainsborough, in Lincolnshire, England, 1783.

Barth, John H., a German minister of the M. E. Church, entered the Kentucky Conference in 1843, and was transferred to the Ohio Conference, and stationed in Columbus. He has traveled extensively in Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky, filling a number of the most prominent charges. He represented the Southeast Indiana Conference in the General Conferences of 1860 and 1864. He has been constantly devoted to the work among the German people, and is at present stationed in Kentucky. For a number of years he served as presiding elder.

Bartine, David W., is a member of the Newark Conference of the M. E. Church. In 1832 he joined the Philadelphia Conference, in which his father had been a member. He filled a number of the largest stations in the Conference, and served as presiding elder. He has twice served as delegate to the General Conference. In 1867 he was transferred to the New Jersey Conference, and stationed in Trenton, and in 1870 he was transferred to the Newark Conference, where he has been stationed in Jersey City and Morristown.

Barton, John B., a minister of the M. E. Church, was born in Philadelphia, Aug. 27, 1806, and died in Liberia, March 19, 1839. He was converted in 1831, admitted into the Georgia Annual Conference in 1834, and appointed by Bishop Andrew missionary to Africa, where he arrived in August, 1835; he visited the United States in 1837, but returned to Liberia in 1838. His health failing soon after his return, he paid a visit to Cape Palmas, hoping it might prove beneficial. But he was seized with a violent ague, and rapidly sunk under the disease. He was a man much beloved and a faithful missionary.

Barton, Samuel Saxon, became an itinerant minister of the late Wesleyan Methodist Association, England, in 1846; was elected president of the United Methodist Free Churches in 1861. On the death of Rev. Robert Eckott, in 1862, Mr. Barton succeeded him as foreign missionary secretary. In 1864 he was set apart from circuit work, and appointed general missionary secretary. He held this office for seven years, and returned to circuit work in 1871, and is now laboring at Littleborough, in Lancashire.

Barwick, Joseph S., was born in Indiana, and pursued his studies in the Indiana Asbury University. After graduation he entered the Indiana Conference. He engaged in teaching for a time, and transferred to Missouri. He has filled a number of the leading appointments in that Conference.

Bascom, Henry B., D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Hancock, N. Y., May 27, 1796, and died at Louisville, Ky., Sept. 8, 1850. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church in Western Pennsylvania in 1811, and was licensed to preach and received on trial in the Ohio Conference in 1813. He soon beto 1850, when he was elected bishop, at the General Conference of the M. E. Church South at St. Louis. At one period he was perhaps the most popular pulpit orator in the United States. His sermons, though long, did not weary the people. They were evidently prepared with great care. As is often the case, in reading his sermons we miss the brilliancy and vivacity of the living speaker. He wrote the famous "protest of the minority" in the General came famous as a pulpit orator. He was elected chaplain to Congress in 1823; in 1827 was elected President of Madison College, Pa., which position he filled until 1829, when he became the agent of the American Colonization Society. He was elected in 1832 as Professor of Moral Science, in Augusta College, Ky., and in 1842 he became the president of Transylvania University. He was a delegate to every General Conference from 1828 to 1844; and in 1845 he adhered to the Church South. He was editor of the Southern Quarterly Review from 1846

Conference of 1844; and the "report on organization" at the formation of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in 1845. Among other works, he published an elaborate volume in defense of the Southern Church, entitled "Methodism and Slavery." He was a man of remarkably fine personal appearance, and had a voice of great compass and power.

Basel, or Basle (pop. 40,000), is the largest manufacturing and commercial city of Switzerland; it is situated on both banks of the Rhine. The inhabitants are mostly of the Reformed Church; about one-fourth are Catholics. The mission was commenced in the spring of 1860. Rev. L. Nippert was the pioneer, who not only was successful in founding a good society, but also left a very nice chapel as a monument of his diligence. There is now a membership of 450, with nearly 800 Sunday-school scholars. The value of the church property is 76,500 marks, or $19,000.

Bassett, Ansel H., has been connected with the Ohio Annual Conference of the M. P. Church since the year 1830, and is now its senior member. He was born in Massachusetts, July 1, 1809. His early education was limited. In 1821, at twelve years of age he became a subject of salvation, and united with the M. E. Church. August 30, 1830, after a searching examination in Quarterly Conference, by his pastor, Rev. Asa Shinn, he received license to preach. Subsequently, for many years, he was placed in charge of various circuits and stations, and was one year a college agent. He was seven successive years secretary of his Annual Conference, when he was called from this position to the presidency of the Conference. He was five times elected to serve in this relation, and he retired from it in 1845, to take charge of the religious paper of the denomination, then called the Western Recorder, and which had been commenced several years before, by Rev. C. Springer, at Zanesville, O. For ten years Mr. Bassett conducted this journal as an individual enterprise, under the sanction and patronage of his Conference. In 1854-55 the publication was transferred to the church, and became its official organ for the entire North and West. A. H. Bassett was by a General Convention, held at Zanesville, unanimously elected to serve as editor and book agent under the new arrangement. He remained in close connection with the publishing interests, serving both as agent and editor, until 1860, and afterwards published most of the time, until 1872, when he voluntarily retired. He was elected a representative to all the General Conferences of his denomination for the last thirty-five years, save that in one instance he was called as alternate to fill a vacancy. He was also chosen as delegate to all the General Conventions, seven in number. He was one of the founders of the Book Concern, located at Springfield, O., and delivered the address at the laying of the corner-stone, in 1860. He has in possession entire files of the church periodicals, for over fifty years, beginning with the controversy in 1822.

The last General Conference voted a request for Mr. Bassett to write a history of the denomination. The work is now well advanced, and will be a valuable contribution to the literature of the church. He was a member of the Baltimore Union Convention, called in May, 1877, to consolidate the Methodist and Methodist Protestant Churches.

Bassett, Richard, of Dover, Del., was one among the early and prominent Methodists in that State. He first met Bishop Asbury in 1778, at Judge White's, and such was his prejudice that he was unwilling to converse with him; but after forming his acquaintance, invited him to his house. He was a man of large means and extensive business. After the conversion of his wife, he was so troubled that he purposed to sell his property and remove to a distant section of the country, but shortly afterwards, when absent from home, he was converted, and became a devoted member of the church. Wesley chapel, in Dover, was erected, chiefly by his means, in 1784. He was an excellent singer, an earnest exhorter, and loved to attend camp-meetings, two of which he had in a beautiful grove on his land. His house was ever open for Methodist preachers, and he formed among them an extensive acquaintance. In 1787, Mr. Bassett was a member of the convention which formed the Constitution of the United States. Shortly after he served as a member of Congress, and also as governor of the State of Delaware. In the latter part of his life he was judge of the United States District Court. He died of paralysis in 1815, leaving an only child, a daughter, who was married to Hon. James Bayard, who had studied law under Mr. Bassett. Governor Bassett owned six thousand acres of land in Bohemia Manor, which he had inherited. On it he built a log chapel, where many of the itinerants preached. Bishop Whatcoat died at his house in 1806. In his memoir it is said,

"He lived a bright example of holiness, and left the world praising God."

Batavia, N. Y. (pop. 3890), the capital of Genesee County, an important railroad centre, is a beautiful and flourishing village. To this place the inhabitants of Buffalo fled during the devastations of the War of 1812. In its earliest Methodist history it was included in the Buffalo and Black River circuit. The first society was organized and incorporated in 1819. A stone chapel was erected on Main Street, in the west part of the village, in 1823. A more convenient house, called St. John's church, was built of wood on Jackson Street, in 1841, at a cost of between three and four thousand dollars. The present large and beautiful church was erected of brick on Main Street, in 1869, at a cost of about $28,000. There are 310 members and 150 Sunday-school scholars. The Evangelical Association has a small edifice, erected a few years since.

Bateman, Ebenezer B.—This well-known layman from the Pacific coast represented the California Conference as lay delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

Bates, Daniel W., was born of Quaker parentage in the town of Medford, N. J., June 10, 1815. In his boyhood he became impressed with his religious responsibility, and under the ministry of Rev. Mr. Stewart he united with the M. E. Church, March 12, 1829. As his parents had but limited means, and no good schools were in their vicinity, his early education was very limited. In April, 1832, he was apprentice to a mechanic in Mount Holly, where he took an active part in church work. In 1835 he was licensed as an exhorter, and in 1836 appointed as a class-leader. In 1840 he joined the Methodist Protestant Church; and in 1842 was elected a delegate to the Annual Conference, with a recommendation to the itinerancy. In March of that year he received his first appointment. In 1865 he was elected as an alternate, and in 1874 a delegate, to the General Conference. In 1877 he was elected a representative to the General Convention which formed the union of the Methodist and the Methodist Protestant Churches. He was also elected as president of the Maryland Annual Conference, which office he now fills.

Bates, James Y., a delegate from the New York Conference to the General Conference of the M. E. Church, in 1876, was born in Delaware County, N. Y., about 1831, joined the New York Conference in 1855, and has since been in the active ministry. In 1873 he was appointed presiding elder of the Newburgh district. He is a member of the general missionary committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church, representing the second mission district in that body.

Bates, Lawrence Webster, D.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Burlington Co., N. J., Nov. 10, 1819. Converted June, 1830; licensed to preach Jan. 18, 1840; joined the itinerancy of the Maryland Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church in April, 1840; ordained deacon in 1842, and elder in 1844. He has filled all the prominent appointments in the gift of the Conference, and was its president in 1860-61. He is the author of a popular tract, "Old Moses," published by the Tract Society, and many editions have been circulated. He was editor of the Methodist Protestant in 1862 and 1863, and also in 1872 and 1873. Received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, Pa., in 1868. He was elected an alternate delegate to the General Conference of 1854, and a representative to the General Conferences of 1862, 1864, and 1866; also to the General Convention of 1867, and the General Conferences of 1870 and 1874. Of the last named he was the president, and also elected by that body one of the commissioners on church union, and was chairman of the commission of the Methodist Protestant and Methodist Churches. He was President of the General Convention which consummated the union of the Methodist and the Methodist Protestant Churches.

Bates, Lewis, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Cohasset, Mass., March 20, 1780, and died March 24, 1865. He was a descendant of the martyr John Rogers. He united with the church in 1801, and with two others formed the first Methodist society in Springfield, Vt. In 1804 he was admitted on trial in the New York Conference, and in 1806 into full connection in the New England Conference, and was ordained deacon by Bishop Ashbury. He spent sixty-one years as a minister, forty-six of which were effective. He was remarkable for his cheerfulness of spirit, frequently changing the line so as to sing, "Now I can read my title clear." His ministry was everywhere effective, and many were converted through his agency, some of whom became ministers of the gospel.

Bath, Me. (pop. 7371), is situated on the Kennebec River, twelve miles from the ocean, and is one of the oldest towns in the State. The French attempted to settle it in 1603 and in 1607, but, owing to the hostility of the natives, it was abandoned. In 1756 a permanent settlement was effected by the Americans, and the town was incorporated in 1780. This region was doubtless visited by Jesse Lee, in 1793, when he formed the first circuit, called Readfield, on the west side of the Kennebec River. In 1796 the fourth circuit in the State, called Bath, was organized near the mouth of the Kennebec. Lee says, "The preacher was to spend most of his time in the town of Bath, but was to travel as far as the town of Union. The first time that the Methodists preached in Bath was on the 15th day of September, 1793, and the first time in the town of Union was Sept. 22, 1793. We were not as successful in our labors in Bath as we were in many other places. The disputings about the settled minister ran high, and the contention was too severe on both sides. In Union there was a good work begun, and souls were awakened and brought to God, and religion has been prospering more or less in that place ever since. The first time the Methodists preached in Thomastown was June 11, 1795. Since that time we have raised a society there, and some souls have been brought to the knowledge of God. The prospect of religion in that part of the country was very small when we first went among them, and the people who enjoyed religion were pretty generally opposed to us, and were afraid that our plan would hurt the cause of religion; yet we had not labored among them long before the Lord gave us seals to our ministry, working by us "in the conversion of many souls."

Baton Rouge, La. (pop. 6498), was formerly the capital of the State, and is situated on the east bank of the Mississippi River, 129 miles above the city of New Orleans. It is one of the earliest settlements made by the French colonists. Methodism was introduced into this city in the year 1805, by Rev. E. D. Bowman, who speaks of it as a Spanish garrison. Battelle, Gordon, D.D., was born in Newport.

Ohio, Nov. 14, 1814. He pursued the early part of the course of his study in Marietta College, but graduated at Allegheny College in 1840, where he was recognized as one of its most talented students. He was a clear and effective speaker, and a ready and able debater. In 1842 he was admitted into the Pittsburgh Conference M. E. Church, and from 1843 to 1851 was principal of an academy in Clarksburg, Va. From 1851 to 1860 he was pastor of some of the largest churches, and was also an active and efficient presiding elder. He attended as a delegate the General Conferences of 1856 and 1860. At the commencement of the Civil War he took a very decided and active part in favor of the Union, and was selected as a visitor, in 1861, to the military camps. His talents and influence led the citizens of Western Virginia, without any desire on his part, to elect him as a delegate to the convention which framed the constitution of West Virginia. In that body he was exceedingly active, and to his efforts, as much, if not more, than any other, was due the abolition of slavery in that State. He was appointed chaplain to the first West Virginia regiment, and died of typhoid fever in Washington City, Jan. 7, 1864. He was a man of clear and strong intellect, quick perceptions, of superior education, of deep piety, and possessed more than ordinary power as a pulpit speaker.

Battersly, Charles, a minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Manchester, England, in 1836. He was converted while teaching near Saugerties, N. Y., and soon after entered the State Normal School at Albany, where he graduated in February, 1858. He resumed his profession as teacher at Gravesend, L. I., and was soon called to take charge of a vacant church in that vicinity. In 1864 he entered upon mission work in the city of New York, and joined the New York Conference in April, 1865. He received his first appointment to the Five Points mission, and his three subsequent were as chaplain to the city prison. His public labors were devoted to the City Mission and Tract Society work. He resided near the prison, and his life was one of incessant toil among the inmates, and in the abodes of poverty in the surrounding neighborhood. His system, overtaxed with labor, became affected by the pestilential atmosphere, and he fell a victim to typhoid fever and a martyr to the cause of suffering humanity.

Battle Creek, Mich. (pop. 5838), is situated on the Michigan Central Railroad and Kalamazoo River. It has a strong and growing Methodist Episcopal church, reporting 364 members, 403 Sunday-school scholars, a church valued at $25,000, and a parsonage at $2800.

Battle-Ground Collegiate Institute, Ind.—This institution was founded in 1857. It is located on the site of the famous Tippecanoe battle-ground.

The beauty of the ground, its pleasant and convenient surroundings, and its historic memories, give it no ordinary importance. There are also chalybeate springs, which are considered valuable. The buildings and grounds were secured by subscriptions, and are estimated to be worth $100,000. The support of the institution is derived from tuition. There are five departments, with a president and five instructors. The last annual catalogue numbers 335 students. A full course is given in the sciences, and a partial course in the languages. Diplomas are given to those who finish the course, and degrees are conferred. There is a fair apparatus, and there are commodious rooms. The location, being in the midst of an intelligent and moral community, makes it a desirable place for parents sending their children from home. George W. Rice, A.M., is president of the institution.

Baughman, John H., a pioneer minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Harford Co., Md., in 1803, and in early life removed with his parents to Ohio. He was converted when nineteen years of age, and admitted on trial in the Ohio Conference in 1823. He labored twelve years in Ohio, and thirty-two in Michigan. He was truly a pioneer in both States. He received forty-three appointments from the bishop, and a number of them, both as stations and districts, among the best in the Conferences. He was a member of the General Conference of 1844. He died suddenly in Detroit, Mich., March 1, 1868. "As an advocate of abstinence from intoxicating drinks, as agent of the Bible Society, and as a preacher of the gospel he was known all over the State, and no man in it perhaps has contributed more to its genuine and solid prosperity."

Baxter, Matthew, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, has been recognized as an itinerant minister since 1836. He was president of the Annual Assembly of the late Wesleyan Methodist Association, in 1856. He labored nine years at Kingston, in Jamaica; was editor and book steward for five years, and superintendent of the mission in New Zealand for five years. In 1873 he became supernumerary, and since then has continued to reside in New Zealand. Mr. Baxter is the author of two books; "Memorials of Free Methodism" and "The Laud of the Blessed."

Bay City, Mich. (pop. 7064), the county seat of Bay County, is situated on the Saginaw River. There are 3 churches, as follows:

Bayley, Thomas Adams, entered the itinerancy in 1836; was president of the late Wesleyan Methodist Association, England, in 1852. In 1862 he went to Australia, as representative of the missionary committee and to take a general oversight of the missions. Mr. Bayley still resides there.

Bayliss, J. H., D.D., a minister of the M. E. Church, of Southeast Indiana Conference, was born in Staffordshire, England, Dec. 20, 1835; came to the United States with his parents in 1837, locating in New York. He was converted in Wyoming Co., N. Y., in 1852. He was educated in Genesee College, at Lima; but failing health compelled him to leave before graduation. He was received on trial in the Genesee Conference in 1857, transferred to Rock River Conference in 1866, and in 1871 to the Southeastern Indiana Conference. He has been stationed in Chicago and Indianapolis, and was a delegate to the General Conference of 1876. He was appointed a member of the Hymn-Book committee, and has devoted much time to its labors.

Bay View is the name given to a tract of some 300 or 400 acres of land arranged for camp-meetings and for a summer resort. It is within one mile of Petrosky, Mich., and is at the present terminus of Grand Rapids and Indiana Railroad. It commands a beautiful view of the bay, and is considered as a sanitarium for those afflicted with hay-fever and similar diseases. The grounds are beautifully arranged, and large public assemblies have been held.

Beadle, Gen. W. H. H., a native of Parke Co., Ind., was born in 1838. At the time he was elected lay delegate to represent the Des Moines Conference, in 1872, he was engaged as a surveyor-general. He early became active in church interests, and especially as a Sunday-school worker—a graduate of Michigan University, and also of the law department of that institution. During the Civil War he gave five years of service, rising from the ranks to the grade of brigadier-general by brevet,—securing three brevets for gallant and meritorious services. His literary qualifications, as a writer, are worthily associated with his abilities as a speaker.

Beale, Charles, a lay delegate from the East Maine Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Augusta, Me., in 1807. His parents were among the earliest Methodists in the State. He has served several terms in the House of Representatives, also in the Senate of the State legislature. He is engaged in the lumber and mercantile business near Bangor. Mr. Beale enjoys the distinction of having been the first lay delegate ever elected to the General Conference.

Bear, John, is one of the oldest ministers in the Baltimore Conference. He has filled appointments in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Maryland, and Virginia, and has the record of a long and useful life. He was delegate to the General Conferences of 1832, 1836, and 1844.

Beard, Thomas, an earnest and useful British Wesleyan preacher, was arrested during the persecution of the Methodists at Newcastle, and was "torn from his trade and wife and children, and sent away as a soldier; that is, banished from all that was near and dear to him, and constrained to dwell among lions for no other crime, either committed or pretended, than that of calling sinners to repentance." His health gave way under the burdens laid upon him, when he was placed in the hospital, where he praised God continually, and in a few days was called to his eternal home. He has been styled "the first martyr of Methodism." A letter is extant, dated Sept. 17, 1744, and addressed to Rev. George Whitefield, in which he says, "I find I stand in need of the prayers of all the children of God. I was pressed for preaching, and was sent away as a soldier. I earnestly pray for them that were the occasion of it. . . . I have lately been on a command in Scotland, and met many that inquired concerning you. I preached at Cunningham. Some of your friends came to hear me at Cowpersmith. Many thought it strange to see a man in a red coat preaching." On the occasion of his death, Mr. Charles Wesley wrote two beautiful hymns, one of which commences with:

"Soldier of the Cross, adieu,
Thy conflicts here are passed;
The Lord hath brought thee safely through,
And given the crown at last."

Beauchamp, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Kent Co., Del., April 26, 1772; united with the church in 1788, and, after teaching a year in Virginia, began to preach in 1791. After traveling a year under the presiding elder, he was admitted on trial in 1793, and was subsequently stationed in New York and Boston. In 1801, on account of impaired health, he located, and in 1807 settled on the Little Kanawha River, Virginia. In 1815 he removed to Chillicothe, Ohio, and acted as editor of the Western Christian Monitor, a monthly paper, which preceded in point of time either the Advocate or the Methodist Magazine. The General Conference of 1816 having resolved to establish a monthly magazine, he retired from the editorship of the Monitor in 1817, and removed to Mount Carmel, in Illinois. There he founded a settlement, in which he was pastor, teacher, lawyer, and engineer. In 1822, his health having improved, he re-entered the pastoral work, and in 1823 was appointed presiding elder of the Indiana district, which then embraced nearly the entire State. In 1824 he was a member of the General Conference in Baltimore, and lacked but two votes of being elected to the episcopacy. He died at Paoli, Orange Co., Ind., Oct. 7, 1824. He was an able preacher, and at times displayed superior eloquence. He possessed great and extensive abilities, and was also a diligent student. By faithful application he had mastered the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages. He was also a clear and forcible writer. He published a work of decided merit on "The Truth of the Christian Religion." He also prepared letters on itineracy, which were published after his death, and which were accompanied by an obituary sketch by Bishop Soule; also a volume on the eternal Sonship, an essay on salvation, and an essay on the divine law, an English grammar, etc. He was widely known throughout the West, and justly ranked among its ablest ministers.

Beaumont, Joseph, M.D., an eminent minister in the British Wesleyan Church, was the son of Rev. John Beaumont, and was born at Castle Downington, March 19, 1794. While receiving his education in Wesley's famous school at Kingswood, he was converted, and after some years spent in the study of medicine he entered the ministry. He could have been received into the Church of England, as the way was open, but he preferred to remain with the Wesleyan Methodists, and was received in 1813, on trial by the Conference. He was soon observed to be a minister of more than ordinary talent, but an impediment in his speech greatly hindered his success; but by his strong determination and severe exercise he overcame the difficulty and became a fluent and effective preacher. His pulpit discourses were characterized by brilliancy, earnestness, and impetuosity. For many years he was one of the most popular pulpit and platform speakers in Great Britain. He died suddenly in the pulpit at Hull, Jan. 21, 1855.

Beaver College and Musical Institute.—This institution is beautifully located on the bank of the Ohio River, in the town of Beaver, Pa., twenty-eight miles below Pittsburgh. It was projected in 1853. Among its originators were Hon. Daniel Agnew, chief justice of Pennsylvania, who has been for many years the president of the board of trustees, and Bishop Simpson, who at that time resided in Pittsburgh, and who took a deep interest in its plans. For a time it passed through severe financial difficulty, but it was relieved by the generous subscriptions of the members and friends of the Pittsburgh Conference. In 1859 it was placed under the direction of Rev. R. T. Taylor, a graduate of the Wesleyan University, who is an experienced and successful teacher. Its number of students gradually increased until its halls were crowded, and additional facilities were demanded. In 1873, largely by the munificence of John F. Dravo, Esq., who had removed to Beaver for the education of his children, additions were made to the buildings, which gave to the institution extensive and excellent accommodations. The institution has given great attention to the cultivation of music, both vocal and instrumental, being well supplied with pianos and an excellent pipe organ. The officers were led to this measure, feeling that Protestants were often induced to send their daughters to Catholic convents, for the purpose of securing better musical advantages than could readily be obtained in ordinary seminaries. The results have demonstrated the wisdom of the officers in this respect. Many of the scholars attending are day pupils. The boarders have ranged from fifty to one hundred, and so healthy is the location, that for more than a score of years no case of fever has been known, nor any other serious illness, and no death has ever occurred in the institution.

Rev. Franklin Moore, D.D., who died in the Philadelphia Conference, was a native of Beaver, and in his poetical language thus described its beauty: "The skies which overhang the hill-girded plain are peculiarly rich and soft,—are in unison with the scenery, which is boldly beautiful rather than sublime; it seems as if, in carving the outline of my native village, God had cut an exquisite emerald brooch to nestle on the throbbing bosom of nature."

Beaver Dam, Wis. (pop. 3265), is situated in Dodge County, on the St. Paul and Milwaukee Railroad. The first Methodist society was organized in 1846. Worship was conducted for some time in a private building. A frame church was built 26 by 40 feet, and was enlarged in 1859. The present edifice was erected in 1871. The German Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1864, and held its services in the old church until the new building was erected. The Free Methodist Church was organized in 1871. Statistics as follows:

growing town on the Beaver River, at the crossing of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad. Since the Economites have established manufactures in the place it has rapidly increased, and has probably nearly doubled its population since the census was taken. A few Methodist members had resided in the village for several years, and were attached to New Brighton. In 1868 they were organized into a society, and a church was erected. The Methodist Protestants also have an organization and a church edifice. The statistics are as follows:

Bedford, John, was born in 1810. Converted in his youth, he entered the British Wesleyan ministry when twenty-one years of age. He labored with zeal and fidelity in various circuits until 1860, when he was appointed clerical secretary to the Chapel Building Fund; here his sagacity and prudence have proved of inestimable value to the connection. In 1862 failing health compelled him to resign this office, but he is still secretary of the Board of Trustees for Chapel Purposes, and by his counsels gives all the aid his strength allows. In 1867 his brethren marked their estimation of Mr. Bedford's value by choosing him as president of the Conference.

Beecham, John, D.D., sacrificed his prospects in early life to his convictions of duty. He entered the British Wesleyan ministry in 1815, and for sixteen years labored in several circuits with growing usefulness and esteem. In 1831 he was appointed one of the general secretaries of the Missionary Society. For twenty-four years he labored incessantly and devotedly in that office to promote the work of God, displaying great wisdom and integrity, combining kindness with firmness, and promptitude with caution. He filled the presidential office with skill and judgment during a year of great difficulty and trial. In the latter years of his life he was much occupied in constituting affiliated Conferences, with a view to the extension of the work of God in different parts of the world. His last days were eminently peaceful. All was quietness and assurance.

Belfast, Ireland (pop. 175,000), a flourishing city, with extensive trade, especially in linen goods. It has 11 Wesleyan Methodist churches, with 2700 members and 4810 Sunday-school scholars. A beautiful church, worth $125,000, has recently been presented by Mr. Carlisle. It is also the site of Belfast College, an institution of great value. The new connection has one charge, with about 200 members.

Belfast, Me. (pop. 5278), situated on Belfast Bay, on the west side of the Penobscot River, thirty miles from the ocean. Castine, nine miles distant, on the opposite side of the bay, was the most easterly point reached by Jesse Lee in his first visit, in 1793, to this Province. It was originally included in the Penobscot circuit, which was the third circuit organized in the State. The first sermon was preached in 1795, in a private dwelling-house, by Joshua Hall. In 1823, through the efforts of Rev. G. F. Cox, a small chapel was built, costing $1300. In 1858 the present brick church was erected through Rev. J. W. Wilson, and was dedicated in 1859. It reports 200 members, 300 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $15,000.

Bell, George, was a native of Barningham, England. He was at one time corporal in the Life Guards. He was converted in 1758, and united with the Methodist Society. He professed to be sanctified in March, 1761. A few days afterwards he wrote an account of his new experience to Mr. Wesley. His views upon this subject were extravagant. He soon began to hold meetings in his own town, declaring that God had changed the order of his proceeding in the conversion of the world, and that all true preaching and sacraments were to be found nowhere else but in his assemblies and the assemblies of his friends. He declared that none could teach those who were renewed in life unless they were in that state themselves. His admirers believed themselves to be more holy than our first parents, and, moreover, incapable of falling. They professed to have the gift of healing, and indeed made attempts to give sight to the blind and to raise the dead. These extravagances arrested the attention of Wesley at once. He determined to know for himself what was the nature of Bell's teaching. He quietly one evening approached the place where a meeting was in progress, and stood where he could both hear and see without being discovered. He afterwards says that he told Bell what he thought right and wrong in his proceedings. He did not approve of his screaming every now and then in so strange a manner that one could scarce tell what he said; secondly, his thinking that he had a miraculous discernment of spirits; and, thirdly, his sharp condemnation of his opposers. After this Wesley sent to Mr. Bell and others a fuller statement of what he disapproved in their teaching. Among other things he declared his opposition to such doctrines as that any man may be as perfect as an angel; that he can be absolutely perfect; that he can be above being tempted; or that the moment he is pure in heart he cannot fall from it. He also disapproved of their depreciating justification. He disliked also their appearance of pride and their disposition of undervaluing others. He disapproved also of their enthusiasm, attaching so much importance to feelings and impressions, expecting the end without the means, and undervaluing reason, knowledge, and wisdom. In general, he did not believe that they magnified the law enough. He especially deplored their littleness of love to other brethren, and their want of union with them; their want of meekness; their impatience of contradiction, and their proneness to think hardly of all who did not agree with them. He also disapproved of their methods of holding their meetings; by slighting the rules of the society: by appointing meetings which hindered the people from attending public preaching; by their spending more time in their meetings than many of them could spare from the duties and callings of life: the speaking or praying of several of them at once; their praying to the Son of God only or more than to the Father: their using such bold, pompous, magnificent, and irreverent expressions in their prayer; their great desire to tell God what they were, not what they wanted.

But evidently Wesley had delayed his condemnation of their course too long, as already the spirit of division was abroad in the society, especially in London. Disregarding all these cautions of Mr. Wesley, Mr. Bell waxed worse and worse, until Wesley was compelled to exclude him from his society. In his letter, telling him that his services were no longer needed, he says, "The reproach of Christ I am willing to bear, but not the reproach of enthusiasm, if I can help it." Mr. Fletcher, at this time, also greatly deplored the religious state of the society at London, because of these extravagances of Mr. Bell. About this time he wrote to Charles Wesley a letter, in which he says, "Spiritual pride, presumption, arrogance, stubbornness, proud spirit, uncharitableness, private mistakes, in short, every sin of enthusiasm, is now at work among them." Mr. Bell, with a number of his followers, came to Wesley, and threw down their tickets at his feet, telling him to his face that he was a hypocrite, and that, for that reason, they had resolved to have no further fellowship with him. About thirty left the society. Mr. Bell, however, reached the height of his extravagance when he prophesied that the end of the world and the judgment would be Feb. 28, 1763. On the day previous to this predicted event, Bell and his followers ascended a mound near the site of St. Luke's Hospital, in order to take a last look at the city of London before its destruction. But the authorities of London, considering him perhaps insane, sent two constables, with a warrant, and arrested him and carried him before a magistrate in Long Acre, and then before another in Southwark. The magistrate committed him to prison, there to await the fulfillment of his own prediction.

On the evening of the world's last day, as predicted by Bell, Mr. Wesley preached at Spitalfields on "Prepare to meet thy God." The burden of his discourse was to show the great absurdities of Bell's predictions, and at its close he exhorted the people to retire to rest, assuring them that neither the end of the world nor any serious calamity was coming upon that city.

The injury done to Methodism by the extravagances of Bell, Maxfield, and others was a long time felt in the London society, and very frequently referred to with sorrow by Wesley himself. It so weighed upon the mind of Wesley, that he published a pamphlet, entitled "Cautions and Directions Given to the Greatest Professors in the Methodist Society," the aim of which tract was to teach his people humility, dependence, sobriety, and order. Long after this, John Pawson, referring to the state of the London society, said, "We have a very blessed work here, but the old people are so afraid of George Bell's work returning, that they can hardly be persuaded it is the work of God, because of the little disorder that attends it." In 1766, Wesley, visiting the London society, deplores its condition. It was then over $3000 in debt. The number of members had been reduced from 2800 to 2200. "Such," says Wesley, "is the fruit of George Bell's enthusiasm and Thomas Maxfield's gratitude."

Bell, Graham, was born in Mississippi in 1845. In 1852 he removed to Louisiana, and in 1865 was of that class who received the great boon of liberty by the Emancipation Proclamation. He was converted in 1868, and became active in official duties at Wesley chapel, New Orleans. He entered the Union Normal School soon after becoming a freed-man, and received a fair education. He has been connected with the General and State governments. He was elected lay delegate from the Louisiana Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Bellaire, O. (pop. 4033), below Wheeling, was formerly connected with West Wheeling circuit. The first class was organized by the Rev. C. D. Battelle. The first church edifice was erected in 1840; the present building was erected in 1860. It has 386 members, 380 Sunday-school scholars, and a church valued at $12,000. There is also a colored M. E. society reporting 80 members and 85 Sunday-school scholars. The African Methodist Church reports 42 members, 20 Sunday-school scholars, and a church building valued at $1250.

Bellefontaine, O. (pop. 3182), is the county seat of Logan County, and has a flourishing Methodist church. It reports 357 members, 190 Sunday-school scholars, a church valued at $15,000, and a parsonage at $3000. The African M. E. Church reports 53 members, 30 Sunday-school scholars, and a church edifice valued at $2000.

Belleville, Ill. (pop. 8146), is the capital of St. Clair County, fifteen miles southeast of St. Louis.

The population of the town and its vicinity is largely German. The services of the Methodist Episcopal Church were introduced at an early period, and the church has enjoyed fair prosperity. The statistics are as follows :

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	217	300	$13,000
German M. E. Church.....	148	160	15,000

Belleville, Ontario, Canada, lately incorporated as a city, is beautifully situated on the bay of Quinté. It is a prosperous commercial centre, and Methodistically ranks among the chief cities of the Dominion. The Methodist Church of Canada has two circuits, known as Belleville First and Belleville Second. The first circuit has three churches under its care. The largest and most important is on Bridge Street, and took the place of an humble edifice on Pinnacle Street, which for thirty years previously had been occupied. The present building is of stone, centrally situated, and will seat 1400. Its cost was $25,000, exclusive of the lot, worth $4000, and which was given by the Hon. B. Flint, Dominion Senator. The second church is on Hollaway Street, and was dedicated January, 1877. It cost without the ground $10,000, with seating capacity of 800, exclusive of lecture-room, etc. In the suburbs of the city is a third church, built of brick, costing $3000, seating 250. The ground was the gift of the Aris brothers. The second circuit has a church on Bleeker Street, originally built more than twenty years ago. In 1865 it was burned down, but was again rebuilt, and in 1875 it was enlarged by the addition of a school-room; it cost $5000, seating capacity about 400.

Beloit, Wis. (pop. 4396), in Rock County, was incorporated in 1845. It is the site of a prosperous college. The Methodist Episcopal Church has 90 members, 65 Sunday-school scholars, and a church edifice valued at $5000.

Belvidere, Ill. (pop. 3231), is the capital of Boone County, and is an important railroad town. It has two Methodist Episcopal churches and one Free Methodist. Statistics, as follows :

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
First Church.....	100	100	$3500
Second Church.....	178	217	9800

Benevolent Collections.—It has been the custom of the Methodist Churches, both in England and America, to make it the duty of the preacher in charge to take up various benevolent collections in the different congregations, and to report them to the ensuing Annual Conferences. Various methods have been suggested by the General and Annual Conferences for raising the collections; but the details of the methods are generally left to the option of the preacher in consultation with his official board. The first rule adopted, enjoined upon the preachers that collections should be made quarterly if needed. After the organization of the various benevolent agencies of the church, the General Conference required the preachers to take up yearly collections for the support of those enterprises. Chief among them at the first, authorized by the General Conference, was the cause of missions. Others have been added until collections, now authorized and required by the General Conference, are for missions, superannuated preachers, church extension, Sunday-schools, tracts, Freedman's Aid Society, and education. There are other benevolent agencies which the church encourages and fosters, but collections for which the preachers are not required to report to the Conference, such as the American Bible Society, Women's Foreign Missionary Society, etc. The total amount of benevolent collections raised by the Methodist Episcopal Church, not including those for ministerial support, nor for local missionary societies, nor for collections not required by the church, were, for 1876, $915,757.

Benham, John B., a missionary and minister in the M. E. Church, was born at Rome, N. Y., Sept. 20, 1806, and died in Newfield, N. Y., May 1, 1868. He was converted at the age of seventeen, and having spent a year at Cazenovia Seminary, he was appointed in 1828 as a missionary to the Indians of Upper Canada. Here he lived and labored for about five years. In 1834 he returned, and was received on trial in the Oneida Conference. Having filled several charges, a mission to Africa being opened, he offered his services to the Missionary Board, was accepted and appointed superintendent of the Liberia mission. Notwithstanding the vigor of his constitution, the unhealthiness of the climate compelled him to return after a labor of two years. His interest, however, in the missionary cause continued until his death, and in his will he made a handsome bequest to the Missionary Society. After his return from Africa he served several charges, the last of which was Newfield, where he died. His last words were, "Oh, how sweet it is to sleep!" He left two works ready for the press, one entitled "Mission Life in Western Africa," the other "Indian Missions."

Bennett, Charles Wesley, D.D., a professor in Syracuse University, was born at East Bethany, N. Y., July 18, 1828, was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1852, and in the same year became principal of the Stanstead Seminary, Quebec. He was elected teacher of Natural Science in the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary in 1854, and principal of the seminary in 1856. He was afterwards associate principal of Fort Plain Seminary, N. Y., in 1859; superintendent of public schools in Schenectady, N. Y., in 1860; and principal of Louisville Academy, N. Y., in 1861. He took a pastoral charge in the East Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1862, and in 1869 was again appointed principal of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary. From 1866 to 1869 he studied church history in the University of Berlin, and traveled in Italy, Egypt, Palestine, Greece, and other countries. In 1871 he was elected Professor of History and Logic in Syracuse University. He was a member of the General Conference in 1872. He has contributed various articles for the reviews and other publications.

Bennett, Ziba, a lay delegate from the Wyoming Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Connecticut in 1800. He removed to Wilkesbarre, Pa., when fifteen years old, and became a merchant in that place; joined the Methodist Episcopal Church at the age of twenty, and has held official positions in the local church. He is the founder of the Bennett Library of Wyoming Seminary, and has been from its foundation an officer and trustee of that institution. He has served as a member of the legislature of the State of Pennsylvania and as associate judge of Luzerne County.

Benson, Henry C., D.D., was born near Xenia, O., and was converted in his sixteenth year. In

REV. HENRY C. BENSON, D.D.

1839 he entered the Indiana Asbury University, and graduated in 1842. He was admitted into the Indiana Conference M. E. Church, and appointed to Mooresville circuit. In the spring of 1843 he was transferred by Bishop Soule to the Arkansas Conference (with Rev. W. H. Goode), and appointed principal of Fort Coffee Academy, an institution established for the benefit of the Choctaw Indians. In 1845 he was transferred by Bishop Morris to North Indiana Conference, and served as pastor five years. In 1850 he was elected Professor of the Greek Language and Literature in the Indiana Asbury University. In 1852 he was transferred by Bishop Janes to California, and served as pastor at Stockton, Placerville, and Marysville, and on the Stockton and Marysville districts as presiding elder. He was a member of the General Conference in 1864, at which time he was elected editor of the Pacific Christian Advocate, and transferred by Bishop Clark to Oregon Conference. In 1866, in the absence of Bishop Baker, he presided over the session of the Oregon Conference. He was a member of the General Conference in Chicago in 1868; and was elected editor of the California Christian Advocate, and was re-elected by acclamation in 1872. He was a member of the General Conference in 1876, and was elected as editor the third time, by acclamation. In 1867 he was elected president of the Willamette University, but did not accept the position.

Benson, John, an eminent member of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, was born at Eggleston, in the county of Durham, Oct. 12, 1817. He was trained in the fear of God, and received a liberal education. When about sixteen years of age, he went to a situation in a bank, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, the town where he continued to reside till his death, and of which he became one of the most prominent and respected denizens. He was brought to the assurance of salvation after a sermon by Rev. R. Aitkin, Sept. 28, 1834. Mr. Benson soon entered on a course of Christian activity. He became a teacher in the Orphan House Sunday-school, and when only twenty-two years of age was elected superintendent of the school, and held that position eleven years. In 1843 he became a class-leader, and some years after a local preacher. In 1849, Mr. Benson identified himself with the Wesleyan Reformers, and was very active and prominent in the movement. He rejoiced in the amalgamation of the Reformers with the Wesleyan Methodist Association. He attended the Assembly of 1857, where the two bodies came together. It was on his motion that the new denomination received the title of the United Methodist Free Church. He died of fever, Feb. 19, 1866. Mr. Benson was universally beloved.

Benson, Joseph, one of the most eminent Methodist ministers in England, was born at Melmerby, Jan. 25, 1748. His father designed him for a minister of the Church of England, and for this purpose he was taught Greek and Latin. At sixteen he came in contact with the Methodists and was converted. In 1766, Mr. Wesley appointed him classical master at his Kingswood school. He devoted himself closely to philosophy and theology. In 1769 he was appointed the chief instructor in Lady Huntingdon's Theological College, at Trevecca, Wales, but in 1771 he left it because of its becoming a thoroughly Calvinistic school. In August, 1771, he was admitted into the Methodist Conference, and soon became one of its ablest preachers. He filled the largest stations, and multitudes attended his ministry. Dr. Clarke calls him "a sound scholar, a powerful and able preacher, and a profound theologian." He was elected president of the Conferences of 1798 and 1810. In 1803 he was elected editor of the Methodist Magazine. His "Commentary on the Scriptures" is regarded by the Wesleyans as one of their standard works. He also wrote other valuable works. He died in great peace Feb. 16, 1821, at London.

Benson, Michael, a fraternal delegate from the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canada to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Canada. He entered the ministry about 1845, and was for more than ten years secretary of his Conference, and a member of the board of managers of Albert University and Alexandra College.

Benson, Stephen Allen, ex-president of Liberia, was born of free parents in Cambridge, Md., in March, 1816. He sailed with his parents for Liberia in 1822. He was captured, with six other children, by the native tribes in their attack on the infant colony, and was held by them for four months. He assisted his father and attended school until he was fourteen years of age. He then served as clerk and storekeeper in Monrovia for four years. After being successfully engaged in a temporary war with the natives, in which he served as a volunteer, he became secretary for Governor Buchanan. In March, 1838, he embraced religion, and united with the M. E. Church. In 1841 he was licensed as a local preacher. In 1842 he was chosen a member of the Colonial Council; and in 1848 he was appointed judge of the Admiralty Court, in which he served until 1853, when he was elected vice-president. In 1855 he was elevated to the presidency of the republic, being the highest office in the gift of the people.

Benton, Horace.—Born in Chardon, O., Feb. 27, 1827, and at the age of eighteen was converted. Entered Western Reserve College, Hudson, O., in class of 1850, but health failed before graduation. Subsequently pursued his studies, and was honored by that institution with the degree of A.B., and also A.M. He has held the office of class-leader, steward, and trustee. He has resided at Cleveland, O., his present residence, for twenty-six years, and for fifteen years has been superintendent of the Franklin Street M. E. church. He has been twenty-three years a trustee of Baldwin University, and part of that time its treasurer. For a quarter-century he has been an officer of the Bible Society and trustee of the Y. M. Christian Association. He has held for years civil positions. For many years has been in mercantile life. Was a delegate from the North Ohio Conference to the General Conference of 1872, and was a reserve delegate to that body in 1876.

Berean System, The, of Sunday-school instruction was suggested, as to its name, by the example of those Bereans spoken of by Paul, who "searched the Scriptures daily." So this plan provides for daily readings of the various portions of the word of God bearing upon the lesson for the following Sunday. It was developed by Rev. John H. Vincent, D.D., corresponding secretary of the Sunday-School Union and Tract Society of the M. E. Church. It has not only been adopted by the M. E. Church, but also, in a slightly modified form, by the principal religious bodies. No system of Sunday-school instruction has been so popular or efficient. These Lesson Leaves are now published in almost every language where there is a Sunday-school established. In the M. E. Church alone, there are placed in the hands of teachers and pupils weekly not less than one million six hundred thousand copies of the Berean Lesson.

Berkley, W. W.—Prominent in the church interests in the Old Dominion, he was chosen lay delegate from the Virginia Conference to the General Conference of 1872. He has long been an enterprising citizen in Alexandria, Va.

Berlin, Prussia (pop. 968,634), has a Protestant population, only 50,000 being Catholics, and 30,000 Jews. Rev. L. Nippert was the first Methodist missionary sent to Berlin, in 1858, who was succeeded in the spring of 1860 by Wm. Schwarz. The chapel, with parsonage, was dedicated October, 1866, in which English services are also held for the benefit of the American residents sojourners in the city. The American minister, Hon. Joseph A. Wright, took great interest in this enterprise, but died before the chapel was finished. The property is valued at 138,000 marks, or about $34,000; members, 97; and a Sunday-school of 300 children.

Berridge, John, an eminent and eccentric minister of the Calvinistic Methodist Church. The following sketch of his life is taken from the inscription on his tombstone, which he wrote himself, except the last sentence: "Here lies the earthly remains of John Berridge, late vicar of Everton, and an itinerant servant of Jesus Christ, who loved his Master and his work, and after running his errands many years, was called up to wait on him above. Reader, art thou born again? No salvation without the new birth. I was born in sin, Feb. 1716; remained ignorant of my fallen state until 1730; lived proudly on faith and works for salvation, till 1754; admitted to Everton vicarage, 1755; fled to Jesus alone for refuge, 1756; fell asleep in Christ Jan. 22, 1793." He was graduated from the Cambridge University in 1749, and accepted the curacy of Stapleford, which he served for the next six years. He is said to have been equal to the most celebrated in science and literature in the university. He maintained his literary habits, often studying fifteen hours a day before he entered upon his evangelistic labors. For more than twenty years he traveled extensively, preaching ten or twelve sermons a week, and in some places addressing congregations numbering from ten to fifteen thousand. On Sabbath he usually preached four sermons. He was a man of great liberality, converting even his family plate into clothing for his itinerant preachers. For nearly thirty years, he spent about three months annually in London, preaching in Whitefield's tabernacle and other places. Wesley first had an interview with him Nov. 9, 1758. After this they were frequently together in their labors, but Wesley disapproved of many of the eccentricities attending his services.

Berry, Genl. J. Summerfield, is a leading citizen of Baltimore, and has been from his youth a member of the M. E. Church. He has been prominent in public matters, having been adjutant-general of the State, and having served in the legislature, where he was chosen as president of the body.

Berry, L. W., D.D., one of the distinguished educators in the West, was born at Alburt, Vt., 1815. In 1838 he was admitted into the Indiana Annual Conference of the M. E. Church. He filled, with great popularity and usefulness, a number of the most prominent appointments. In 1848 he was elected president of the Indiana Ashbury University, where he continued about six years, when he was elected president of the Iowa Wesleyan University, at Mount Pleasant, where he remained about three years. In 1857 he resigned his presidency in Iowa to take charge of an incipient educational institution at Jefferson City, Mo. He was a profound divine, a good scholar, an orator of uncommon power, and eminently a holy man. In every department of the church he showed his devotion to all its interests, and was diligent and faithful in every trust. Among the last words which he ever wrote was a message to his brethren of the Missouri Conference, saying, "Tell my brethren of the Missouri Conference to push the battle to the gate, and God will be with them." He died in peace in Cincinnati, July 23, 1858.

Bethel Academy.—At the Conference held in North Carolina, in 1789, Dr. Coke, alluding to some letters from Kentucky, says, "Our friends in that country earnestly entreat us to have a college built for the education of their youth, offering to give or purchase three or four thousand acres of good land for its support. We debated the point, and sent them word, that if they would provide five thousand acres of fertile land, and settle it on such trustees as we should mention under the direction of the Conference, we will undertake to build a college for that part of our connection within ten years." This project was not carried out according to the plan of Dr. Coke. Subsequently, Mr. Lewis, of Jessamine

County, donated 100 acres of land as the site of an academy. Collections were made on different circuits, and a building was erected 80 by 40 feet, three stories high; the lower part of the building was finished, and a school was commenced. The legislature of the State afterwards gave a donation of 6000 acres of land to Bethel Academy. The land was located in Christian County, south of Green River, and remained for a long time unproductive. In 1802 the academy was incorporated, with all the powers and privileges of a literary institution. In 1798, Rev. Valentine Cook was the first principal of the academical department, though a primary school had previously been kept, and a number of students entered its halls. Unfortunately, some difficulties occurred, and Mr. Cook resigned. The Conference of 1800 was held in this building, and Bishop Asbury makes the following entry: "Saturday, 4th, I came to Bethel with Bishops Whatecoat and William McKendree. I was so dejected I could say but little, and weep. Sabbath-day it rained, and I kept at home. Here is Bethel, Cokesbury in miniature, 80 by 30 feet, three stories, with a high roof, and finished below. Now we want a fund and an income of $300 per year to carry it on, without which it will be useless; but it is too distant from public places. Its being surrounded by the river in part we now find to be no benefit; thus all our excellencies are turned into defects. Perhaps Brother Poythress and myself were as much overpleased with this place as Dr. Coke was with the sight of Cokesbury; but all is right that works right, and all is wrong that works wrong, and we must be blamed by men of slender sense, for consequences impossible to foresee, for other people's misconduct. Sabbath-day, Monday, and Tuesday, we were shut up in Bethel with the traveling and local ministers and the trustees that could be called together; we ordained fourteen or fifteen local and traveling deacons. It was thought expedient to carry the first design into execution, and that we should employ a man of sterling qualifications, to be chosen by and under the direction of a select number of trustees and others, who should obligate themselves to see him paid and take the profits, if any, arising from the establishment. Dr. Jennings was thought of, talked of, and written to." Dr. Jennings was at that time teacher of an academy at New London, and was a local preacher in the church. His services, however, were not obtained, and Rev. John Metcalf taught in the institution for a time. He was succeeded by Rev. Nathaniel Harris, who occupied the building and kept a school for the neighborhood. The people were poor, and divisions having occurred, the building was suffered to fall into a dilapidated condition. The land on which it was built reverted to Mr. Lewis's heirs, and the proceeds of the property were transferred to Nicholasville, and incorporated into a county academy, in which the church ceased to have any special interest.

Bethel Ship.—When the Scandinavian emigration began to set rapidly on our American shores, the attention of the Rev. Mr. Hedstrom, of the New York Conference, himself a Scandinavian, was drawn toward them. He opened a room in his own house to hold a prayer-meeting with his countrymen. Afterwards he worshiped in a public school-room. When that was torn down he became despondent, until a vessel at the foot of Carlisle Street, Pier No. 11, North River, was opened to him. His first service was held in it as a watch-night, on New Year's eve preceeding January, 1846. He continued to hold services in that vessel until it became too old and too small. A congregation had been organized, many had been converted, some of whom had returned as missionaries to Denmark and Norway. The trustees succeeded in procuring a larger vessel, which was opened for service in June, 1857. On that ship services were held, not only on the Sabbath but on week evenings, and it became a home for many a sick and weary emigrant. The converts from this ship are scattered over the Northwest, and through Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. With the increasing of improvements and demand for dock room, the ship has been abandoned.

GEN. JOHN L. BEVERIDGE.

Beveridge, Gen. John L., was born in Washington Co., N. Y., in 1824. In 1842 he removed to De Kalb Co., Ill., and afterward to Tennessee, where he studied law, and was admitted to practice. In 1855 he removed to Chicago, and established himself at the bar. In 1861 entered the service as major of 8th Illinois Cavalry. In 1863 returned, and organized 17th Illinois Cavalry, of which he was commissioned colonel, and was afterwards promoted to the rank of brigadier-general. In 1870 he was elected Senator from the Twenty-fifth district; in 1871 to Congress, to fill the unexpired term of Hon. John A. Logan; in 1872 elected lieutenant-governor, and, by the election of General Oglesby to the United States Senate, became governor of Illinois, inaugurated January 23, 1873. He has been for a number of years a member of the M. E. Church.

Bewley, Anthony, a member of the Arkansas Conference, and a martyr for his opposition to slavery, was born in Tennessee, May 22, 1804. In 1829 he was admitted into the Tennessee Conference, and in 1843 was transferred to Missouri. When the Southern Conference, in 1845, separated from the M. E. Church, he refused to adhere to the South, and preached for several years independently, supporting himself and his family chiefly by the labor of his hands. A few other preachers gathered about him, regarding him as a presiding elder. When the M. E. Church, in 1848, re-organized its Conference in Missouri, Mr. Bewley entered the regular work; and when Arkansas and Northern Texas were separated from Missouri, he labored in those States. As the anti-slavery excitement increased, severe persecution assailed the ministers of the M. E. Church. In some localities they were not only ostracized, but they suffered from violence. In 1858, Mr. Bewley was appointed to Texas, but left his work on account of the dangers which everywhere assailed him. In 1860 he returned to that field of labor. His friends tried to dissuade him from going; but his reply was, "Let them hang, or burn me, on my return, if they choose; hundreds will rise up out of my ashes." Accordingly he and his family, including two sons-in-law, returned to Texas. The excitement against him became very intense, simply for preaching an earnest gospel, while he belonged to what was regarded as a Northern organization. Surrounded with dangers, he left the country. After his departure, charges without any foundation were alleged against him, and a reward of $1000 was offered for his capture. He was taken in Missouri, and carried back to Fort Worth, where he was hanged on a tree by a mob, September 13, 1860. He was a plain, earnest, fearless preacher of the gospel.

Bibb, B. S., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born April 30, 1796, in Elbert Co., Ga., and removed to Alabama in 1822. A few months after locating in that State he united with the M. E. Church. In 1830 he joined the Methodist Protestant Church. He was a delegate to nearly every session of the Alabama Conference since its organization to the present. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1842, 1858, and 1874, and was a delegate to the General Convention of May, 1877, to complete the union of the Methodist and Methodist Protestant Churches. In 1825, he was elected judge of the probate court, and, after two years, re-elected, and served twelve years. In 1864, he was elected judge of the criminal court of the city and county of Montgomery, Ala. In 1828, he was elected to the representative branch of the legislature, and subsequently to the Senate, and has alternated frequently between the two.

Bible Christians, sometimes called Bryanites, compose an organization which is one of the branches of Methodism. It was founded by William O'Bryan, a local preacher in Cornwall, England, in 1815. In their general economy they strongly resemble the British Wesleyan Methodists. They hold precisely the same doctrines, and adopt chiefly the same usages. They manifest great plainness and simplicity in dress, and are very zealous in their mode of worship. They have class-meetings, love-feasts, circuits, districts, and an Annual Conference, into which they admit lay delegates, in equal numbers with the ministers. As it consisted chiefly of the laboring classes in England, its losses by emigration were large, but by this means it spread itself in other countries. In 1833 a missionary was sent to Prince Edward Island, and another to Ontario, Canada. Shortly afterward they organized in Cleveland, O., and in Yorkville, Wis. They have also established churches in Australia. In 1876, they reported in the whole connection 284 itinerant preachers, 1828 local preachers, 30,197 members, 896 churches, and 51,658 Sunday-school scholars. The growth in the United States has not been large; but in their work embraced in America they have eight districts united in one Conference, known as the Canada Conference. They report 85 ministers, 177 churches, 6943 members, and 9396 Sunday-school scholars. They have a book-room at Bowmanville, and they publish a weekly paper, called the Observer, and a Sunday-school paper, called the Ensign, issued monthly. The income of their Missionary Society last year was $20,419, which was expended chiefly on domestic missions. A few years since an effort was made to form a union, in Canada, with the Wesleyans and other branches of Methodists, but it was not successful.

Biddeford, Me. (pop. 10,282), a flourishing town on the Saco River. Previous to 1847, Biddeford and Saco (which lies directly across the river) were one charge. At that date they were separated, and a building committee was appointed in Biddeford, consisting not only of Methodists, but also of those who were friendly to the enterprise. The edifice was built of brick, and in just forty-seven days from the time the first brick was laid the house was dedicated by Rev. Dr. Pitman, who was then secretary of the Missionary Society. When the church was built it was found difficult to find trustees who would assume the cost, which was $6700. At last a brother, still living, said he would sacrifice all he had to build the house. Four others followed his example, and the church was transferred into their hands. The membership increased, and, in 1869, the house was sold, with a view of building a new one, and a beautiful edifice, costing $25,000, was completed and dedicated Aug. 31, 1871. It now has 511 members and 350 Sunday-school scholars.

Bidlack, Benjamin, a pioneer preacher of the Wyoming Valley, and a member of the Oneida Conference. He was born in New England in 1759, and died at Kingston, Pa., Nov. 27, 1854, in the eighty-seventh year of his age. He removed with his father to the valley of Wyoming in 1777. The entire family took an important part in the early trials and difficulties of that region. One son was made a prisoner on Long Island, and died by starvation. Another was captain of a company, in the great Indian battle in the Wyoming Valley, and fell at the head of his company. Benjamin was seven years in the Revolutionary War. He was at Boston when Washington assembled his forces to oppose Gage; at Trenton, at the taking of the Hessians; at Yorktown, at the surrender of Cornwallis; and in the camp at Newburgh, when the army was disbanded. Soon after this he was converted, and he entered the itinerant ministry in 1799. The last twenty-five years of his life he was superannuated, but was able to preach occasionally, and he took a lively interest in the enterprises of the church.

Bigelow, Noah, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Conway, Mass., March 4, 1783, and died Aug. 2, 1850. He was converted in 1803, entered the New York Conference in 1810; was transferred to the New England Conference in 1813; re-admitted to the New York Conference in 1823; superannuated, 1827; made effective from 1828 to 1836; after which he was superannuated. As a minister and presiding elder he was abundant in labors, and much fruit attended his efforts. The last few months of his life were spent in extreme suffering. He was, however, peaceful, saying, "My only hope is in the atonement; on that I really lean; through that I expect to be saved."

Bigelow, Russell, one of the most distinguished and useful pioneer ministers of the M. E. Church. He was born in Chesterfield, N. H., in 1793, and died in Columbus, O., July 1, 1835, in the forty-third year of his age. He was converted in Vermont when nine years of age, and removed with his parents to Worthington, O., in 1812; and at nineteen received license to exhort. He was admitted on trial in the Ohio Conference, Sept. 8, 1814, and appointed to Hinkstone Circuit, Ky. He continued to fill important appointments as preacher and presiding elder until, in 1827, he was sent as a missionary to the Wyandotte Indians, at Upper Sandusky, O., where his labors were attended with great success. In 1828 he was appointed presiding elder of Portland district. In 1831 his health failed; but improving somewhat, in March, 1835, he was appointed chaplain to the Ohio State Prison, at Columbus. The work, however, proved to be too laborious for him, and his health rapidly declined until the following July, when he passed away. Bishop Thomson said of him, "As a preacher I have yet to hear his equal. Thousands of souls will rise up in judgment and call him blessed, and his name will ever be like precious ointment to the churches." A prominent chief justice once remarked concerning him, "It is one of the greatest regrets of my life that I did not know him better: had I never known him, I should have loved him for the effects of his apostolic labors and holy example. We were a wild people when he was among us, and we never duly appreciated him." Few men have ever wielded such power over a congregation.

Bignall, William P., was born in Philadelphia, June 6, 1826, and was trained in the Sunday-school of old St. George's church. He graduated with honor at the Philadelphia High School, in 1843, and for some time engaged in teaching. He was converted in his twentieth year, and entered the Erie Conference of the M. E. Church in 1851. After filling various stations, he became presiding elder of Meadville and of Franklin districts. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1876.

Bingham, Hon. William, born in Annville, Lebanon Co., Pa., March 13, 1808, and died in Pittsburgh in 1873. He early became a Methodist, and was very useful, but quiet and staid in his methods of work. After various business changes he became identified with the canal transportation business and the public works of Pennsylvania, which gave him signal fame in commercial circles, until railroads superseded canals. In the spring of 1838 he removed to Pittsburgh, to manage the vast transportation interests of the Bingham's Line Transportation Company. He became active in Methodist circles, and held honored official positions; and largely through his efforts and liberal gifts Smithfield Street church was rebuilt. In 1855 he was elected mayor of Pittsburgh by a large majority, and held office but one term. He died in triumph, and his name is "like ointment poured forth."

Bingham, Isaac S., D.D., a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1856, 1860, 1864, 1868, 1872, and 1876, joined the Black River Conference in 1843. In 1860 he was elected editor of the Northern Christian Advocate, and served in that position for four years. He afterwards served for three years as an agent of the American Bible Society. He has been an assistant secretary of the General Conference, and has served the church as a member of important general boards and committees.

Binghamton, N. Y. (pop. 12,690), the capital of Broome County, is situated on the Susquehanna and Chenango Rivers, and on the Erie Railroad. It was settled in 1787, by William Bingham, of Philadelphia. The first Methodist class was formed in 1818. Prior to that time it had been included in the Broome circuit, but no opening was found for regular worship. The first meetings were held in the third story of Mr. Manning's house. In 1821, a great revival occurred, which added several useful members. The society was then incorporated, and a lot containing two acres of ground was deeded to the trustees for $200. A chapel was opened upon it, afterwards called Henry Street church. It remained an appointment upon the Broome circuit until 1828. The present statistics are:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
Centenary Church.....	452	700	$65,000
Main Street.....	280	297	14,000
High Street.....	146	227	2,000
Free Methodist.....	60	25	10,000
African M. E. Church.....	49	50	4,000

Birmingham, Eng. (pop. 334,000), is noted for its extensive manufactures. It was early visited by Mr. Wesley, and societies were organized under his supervision. There are now stationed in this city 13 Wesleyan ministers, besides 5 supernumeraries, who report 3536 members. The Methodist New Connection stations 4 ministers, and reports about 450 members. The United Methodist Free Churches report 3 ministers and 400 members.

Bishop, Hon. James, of New Brunswick, N. J., became a member of the M. E. Church in his youth and has been deeply devoted to all its interests. He was for a number of years extensively engaged in mercantile business. He was the principal founder of St. James' church, in New Brunswick, and was an early and ardent friend of lay delegation in the General Conference. He represented the New Jersey Conference, as lay delegate, in 1872; and was one of the Centenary Committee, which, under the direction of the General Conference, arranged for the exercises of 1866. He has held several important civil trusts, and has represented his district in Congress.

Bishops are the highest executive officers in the Methodist Episcopal Church. They are "constituted by the election of the General Conference and the laying on of the hands of three bishops, or at least of one bishop and two elders." "If by death, expulsion, or otherwise, there is no bishop in the Church, the General Conference shall elect a bishop, and the elders, or any three of them, who shall be appointed by the General Conference for that purpose, shall consecrate him according to the ritual of the Church." The General Conference is also authorized to elect missionary bishops under certain circumstances. The duties of the bishops are to preside in the General and Annual Conferences, and when present in the district Conferences also. They arrange the districts for presiding elders, and fix the various appointments of the preachers. They are further required to travel through the church at large, and to oversee the spiritual and temporal interests of the church, to consecrate bishops, and ordain elders and deacons, and to decide all questions of law arising in the proceedings of the Annual Conferences; such decisions, however, being subject to an appeal to the ensuing General Conference, but in all cases the application of law is with the Conference. The bishops are also directed to prescribe a course of study on which those applying for admission on trial in the Annual Conferences shall be examined, and must be approved before admission, and also to prescribe a course of study, and of reading proper to be pursued by candidates for the ministry for the term of four years.

The bishops are strictly amenable for their moral and official conduct. Should a bishop be accused of imprudent conduct, a presiding elder "shall take with him two traveling elders, and shall admonish the bishop so offending, and in case of a second offense, one of the bishops, together with three of the traveling elders, shall call upon him and reprimand and admonish him: if he shall persist in his imprudence, he shall be tried in the manner of the order for immoral conduct. When he is accused of immoral conduct, the presiding elder within whose district his immorality is said to have been committed, shall call to his aid four traveling elders, which five ministers shall carefully inquire into the case, and if in their judgment there is reasonable ground for such accusation, they, or the majority of them, shall prepare and sign the proper charge in the case, and shall give notice thereof to one of the bishops; the bishop so notified shall convene a Judicial Conference, to be composed of the triers of appeals, thirty-five in number, in the five neighboring Conferences, and the said Judicial Conference shall have full power to try the accused bishop and to suspend him from the functions of his office, or expel him from the church, as they may deem his offense requires; one of the bishops of the church shall preside at his trial. The accused, however, shall have the right of peremptory challenge, yet he shall not reduce the number of the Judicial Conference below twenty-one. He shall have the right of appeal to the ensuing General Conference, if he signifies his intention to appeal at the time of his conviction, or when informed thereof." This full and specific mode of trial was provided only in 1872; originally the Discipline gave the General Conference the right "to expel him for improper conduct," without giving any specification as to the mode. It was thought, however, by the Conference of 1872, that bishops should have a preliminary trial and right of appeal as in the case of other ministers. It has been a gratifying fact to the church, however, that while from the beginning of its history the bishops have been held to a strict amenability by the General Conference, no charge of immoral conduct has ever been presented against any one of them.

In the rules of the early General Conferences, the bishops being members of the body in common with other ministers, took part in all the deliberations, making motions, presenting resolutions, and participating in the debates; but since the formation of the delegated Conference in 1808, they are no longer members of that body, but simply presiding officers; hence they take no active part in the deliberations or discussions of the Conference. In the Discipline of 1784, they were called superintendents. But their power was greater then than to-day, for they were authorized "to receive appeals from the preachers and people, and decide them." In the revision of the Discipline, which was adopted in 1787, the title of superintendents was changed to that of bishops, and the power of receiving and deciding appeals was taken away. Before 1796 they called together the preachers in Annual Conferences, within such boundaries as were deemed by them most convenient, and no permanent Conference boundaries were fixed before that period. In the early history of the church no specific mode was provided for the support of the bishops. Dr. Coke spent but little time in the United States, and being a man of large property, he not only supported himself, but contributed freely to the various objects of benevolence. Bishop Asbury was a single man, and was generally on horseback, traveling from place to place; and friends furnished him, from time to time, with what was necessary to meet his very simple wants and habits. When additional bishops were elected, the General Conference directed that their support should be provided by the different Annual Conferences. Subsequently, their salaries were fixed by a committee of the Annual Conference where they resided, and were paid by the Book Concern. In 1872, in the M. E. Church provision was made that a specific collection should be taken for their support, so as to relieve the Book Concern, and to bring the system in harmony with the general methods for ministerial support. This system was further changed at the General Conference of 1876. From the 1st of Jan., 1877, the book agents are prohibited from either giving or loaning any of their funds to meet the salaries of the bishops; though they may loan to the fund whatever may be deficient in house-rent and traveling expenses. The bishops of the church are equal in authority, and have joint jurisdiction in every part of the church. There are no dioceses or districts within which they are confined. They usually meet semi-annually, and arrange for the times of holding the Annual Conferences, and for distributing the work among themselves. The General Conference of 1872, however, designated certain cities as proper locations for episcopal residences; the design being, to secure for each part of the church more certain and constant episcopal supervision. There is no bishop for any specific territory, except as assigned temporarily by his colleagues. In the case of a missionary bishop, his residence is permanent in the Conference where he is elected. This plan has been tried only in Liberia, and the death of Bishop Burns, and then of Bishop Roberts, has left the church without any such arrangement. The General Conference has supreme power over the bishops personally, both as to their moral and official conduct. Prior to 1808, they had also power to change the constitution of the church from its episcopal form; but when the great body of the ministry gave up their right to be present in the General Conference, and agreed to select a few delegates to represent them, they, by restrictive rule, prohibited the General Conference from doing away with the episcopacy, or from making any modification which should destroy the plan of itinerant general superintendency. The church as a whole, embracing both the ministry and the laity, has full power to change any feature of church polity, but such fundamental changes can be made only by a concurrent vote of two-thirds of the General Conference, and of three-fourths of the members of the Annual Conferences. The constant and careful supervision which the bishops have been able to give to the church, have secured statistical reports more perfect and complete than are found in churches generally. The number of bishops has varied from time to time, according to the growth and necessities of the church. Excepting the occasional presence of Dr. Coke, Bishop Asbury was alone in his office for nearly sixteen years. Prior to the death of Bishop Janes, last year (1876), the number of bishops in active work in the M. E. Church was twelve. The following table presents a statistical view of their birth, entrance into the ministry, Conference relation, election as bishops, and residence, since the formation of the church:

* Entered M. E. Church South, 1845.

† Resigned the office in 1852.

‡ Missionary bishops, their episcopal jurisdiction being restricted to the Liberia Conference.

The duties and responsibilities of the bishops in the M. E. Church South are similar to those just described. The General Conference of that church, however, have invested their bishops with a power over legislation which is not in the M. E. Church. If the General Conference in the M. E. Church South should pass a measure which, in the judgment of the bishops, is unconstitutional, and they, or the majority of them, so communicate in writing, the measure can then be adopted only by a vote of two-thirds of the General Conference, with a concurrent vote of three-fourths of the members of the Annual Conferences. They are supported directly by the contributions of the churches. Their names, Conference relations, date of election, residences, etc., are as follows:

The Canada M. E. Church has one bishop, Rev. Albert Carman, D.D., who was elected in 1874, and whose residence is in Belleville, Can. It previously had Bishops Reynolds, Alley, Smith, and Richardson, who have deceased.

The African M. E. Church had as bishops Richard Allen, elected in 1816; Morris Brown, 1828; Richard Waters, 1832; and Wm. Paul Quinn, 1844, who have deceased. The present bishops are D. A. Payne, Xenia, O.; A. W. Wayman, Baltimore; J. P. Campbell, Philadelphia; J. P. Shorter, Xenia; F. M. D. Ward, Atlanta; J. M. Brown, Washington, D. C.

The African M. E. Zion Church elects its bishops every four years. The present incumbents are Joseph J. Clinton, John J. Moore, James W. Wood, S. T. Jones, W. H. Hillery, J. P. Thompson, and Thomas H. Lomax.

The Colored Methodist Church of America has four bishops, viz.: W. H. Miles, Louisville, L. H. Halsey, J. B. Beebee, and Isaac Lane.

Black, Hon. James, was born Sept. 16, 1823, at Lewisburg, Pa., and labored on a farm until twelve years of age. In 1836 his parents removed to Lancaster, and in 1838 he entered the high school, where he studied at the head of his class. Subsequently he attended the academy at Lewisburg, where he acquired a fair knowledge of the ancient languages. Pursuing the study of law, he was admitted to the bar in 1846, where he has practiced successfully. He gave his first five-dollar fee to the cause of God. When nineteen years of age he connected himself with the M. E. Church, and has been ever since devoted to its interests. He has been trustee since 1846, and also a member of the board of stewards of the Philadelphia Conference. He has been a Sabbath-school teacher and superintendent since 1842. He very early connected himself with the temperance organization, and has devoted a large part of his time and means to the advancement of that cause. He has collected a large library, the temperance department of which is said to be the largest in the world.

HON. JAMES BLACK.

He was a chief originator of the National Temperance Publication House, which owes much of its success to his thought and labor. In 1872 he was nominated by the National Prohibition Convention, as their candidate for the office of President of the United States. He has written largely on the subject of temperance, and has been a representative of the Good Templars of Pennsylvania, not only at the conventions which have met at different points in this country, but also in England.

Black, William, "the apostle of Methodism" in the eastern British provinces, was born in Huddersfield, Yorkshire, England, in 1760. What Jesse Lee was to New England, and William Losse was to Upper Canada, William Black was to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island. His parents emigrated to Nova Scotia in 1775. About the same time, a number of earnest Yorkshire Methodists settled in various parts of that province, but remained for several years destitute of regular services by their own preachers. They supplied the lack of ministerial services by holding meetings for reading the Scriptures, prayer, and exhortation. Through these meetings and the reading of good books, Mr. Black was converted when nineteen years of age. By his efforts a great revival commenced in the surrounding settlements, and several large classes of from eighty to one hundred were organized. Unhappily, some Antinomian preachers injured his efforts and divided the societies. Frequent letters, however, from Mr. Wesley encouraged him to continue in the work. At one time he expected to attend Kingswood school, but he was disappointed in his arrangements. By diligent private study under the guidance of the Holy Spirit he became a good theologian; and he also acquired considerable knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages. As a preacher he excelled in power and in pathos. Thousands were brought to God through his instrumentality.

He visited the celebrated Christmas Conference held in Baltimore in 1784. In this journey he visited and preached in the city of Boston with considerable success. His return to his own country was the commencement of a deeper interest and of greater success, as several ministers accompanied him. In 1789, Dr. Coke appointed him superintendent of Nova Scotia and the other northeast provinces, which position he held while he remained an effective minister. He visited the United States in 1791, attended the Philadelphia and New York Conferences, and received ordination from the Rev. Dr. Coke. He also obtained six additional preachers for the provinces. He attended the General Conference at Baltimore in 1792, and accompanied Dr. Coke on a visit to the West Indies. In 1816 he was appointed with Mr. Bennett to attend the American General Conference, to adjust some difficulties arising out of the occupation of the same territory by missionaries from both England and America. He exercised a commanding influence over the Methodism of the provinces, and was in correspondence with the ablest men of the church. He died in Halifax, Nova Scotia, September 6, 1834, aged seventy-four years.

Blackman, Learner, one of the most eminent pioneers of American Methodism, was born in New Jersey about 1781. He entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1800, when about nineteen years of age. In 1802 he emigrated to the West, and became a member of the Western Conference. In 1805 he was sent as a missionary to Natchez. In order to reach his field of labor, he had to travel through a wilderness of nearly eight hundred miles, inhabited mostly by savages and beasts of prey. He was fourteen days and nights making this journey. Says his biographer, "At night he would tie his horse to a tree, and, taking his saddle-bags for a pillow and his blanket for a covering, and commending himself to God's gracious care, would lie down in the woods to seek the repose which nature demanded. When he reached the place of his destination, he found that Methodism had scarcely gained a footing, though there were a few who had been converted through the labors of the Rev. Tobias Gibson, and who were struggling to stem the current of prevailing wickedness." He had no associates in his missionary work. So marvelous was his success that, in 1806, a presiding elder's district was organized, and he was appointed to superintend it. He continued in that district during the year 1807. New laborers arrived, and the field extended. When he first entered upon his work there were but 74 white and 62 colored members; but after laboring for three years, there were five circuits and a large increase in the membership. He was appointed successively to Holston, Cumberland, and Nashville districts, and finally was re-appointed to Cumberland district. He was elected to the General Conferences in 1808 and 1816. His sad and sudden death spread a gloom over the church. Returning from a visit to his friends in Ohio, when crossing the river on a flatboat at Cincinnati, his horse becoming frightened plunged into the river, carrying Blackman with him, and he was instantly drowned. His biographer says, "By this fatal casualty the church was deprived of one of its most gifted and every way promising young ministers."

Blackmer, R. H., of Cleveland, Ohio, now deceased, was a prominent member of the M. E. Church until 1838; then he and others organized a Wesleyan Church in that city, which still continues. He was a devoted friend of the slave, a generous man, and an active Sabbath-school worker. He left a precious memory among the people, who knew him only to love and honor him as a genuine Christian.

Blackstock, Moses, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ireland, March 1, 1793, and died near Paxton, Ill., Aug. 31, 1873. He was converted when eighteen years of age, while attending college in the city of Dublin. One year after his conversion he was licensed to preach, and he returned to the college to prepare himself for the itinerancy. In 1818 he left Ireland for Canada, where he preached regularly for forty-two years, filling important positions in connection with the Wesleyan Conference. In 1856 he removed to Lafayette, Ind., and identified himself with the North-west Indiana Conference; but because of impaired health he was not able to do regular work. He gave sixty years of faithful and successful service to the ministry. His death was calm and gentle.

Blain, John D., was a native of New Jersey, and entered the ministry, in New Jersey Conference M. E. Church, in 1842. He was transferred to California in 1852. He was a good preacher, a devoted pastor, an energetic business man, and wonderfully successful in his labors, no matter what his field might be. He traveled on districts several years, and served as a pastor in Sacramento, Marysville, and San Francisco. He was a member of the General Conference in 1856. His health having failed, he removed to New York in 1865, where he rested, rendering some service as a pastor. He returned to New Jersey, and labored according to his ability till June, 1876, when he passed from labor to reward. He did an excellent work in California.

Blair, Franklin Otis, late professor in Lawrence University and McKendree College, was born in Blandford, Mass., Nov. 30, 1822; was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1848, and in the same year became a teacher in the Providence Conference Seminary, East Greenwich, R. I. He was elected, in 1856, Adjunct Professor of Intellectual and Moral Science in Lawrence University, and in 1858 Professor of Natural Science in McKendree College. He served, in 1870, as financial agent of McKendree College, and in 1873 as district agent of the American Bible Society. He joined the Wisconsin Conference of the M. E. Church in 1857.

Blair, James Gilman, M.D., D.D., LL.D., of the West Virginia State Normal School, was born at Marcellus, N. Y., Sept. 18, 1816; was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1841, and in the same year became principal of the Ohio Conference Seminary. He joined the Ohio Conference of the M. E. Church in 1842, and engaged in pastoral work. In 1845 he was elected principal of Greenfield Seminary, Ohio; in 1852, vice-president and Professor of Natural Science in Ohio University. In 1864 he became editor of the Parkersburg Gazette, W. Va. In 1871 he was appointed principal of the State Normal School at Fairmount, W. Va.

Blaisdell, Henry J., a prominent Methodist in Nevada, and ex-governor of that State. In the year 1872 he was a delegate from Nevada Conference to the General Conference of 1876. He was extensively engaged in business, and was interested in mining.

Blake, J. D., a merchant and active layman of the M. E. Church. He represented the Minnesota Conference as lay delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

Blake, Samuel V., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Easton, Md., Jan. 15, 1814, and died in Baltimore, May 9, 1871. He was converted in his youth, and licensed to preach in 1834, and in 1835 was received on trial in the Baltimore Conference. He filled a number of important appointments, both as a circuit and station preacher, and as a presiding elder. He was a member of the General Conference in 1856 and in 1868. While preaching in Jefferson Street church, Baltimore, April 9, 1871, he was prostrated by disease, which proved fatal. He had the elements of sincerity, energy, and industry. His last word was, "Victory."

Blakely, John, a merchant of Philadelphia, was born in England. He united with the M. E. Church early in life, and has been an active official member as trustee and Sunday-school superintendent. He was one of the projectors of Christ church, West Philadelphia, and contributed very largely to its erection.

Blakemore, Wm., a native of England, a leading member of Bromfield Street church, Boston, was among the first, in 1842, to unite with the Wesleyans. He was very efficient in Sabbath-school and all church work. He returned to the Methodist Episcopal Church, and resumed his place in the confidence and esteem of his old brethren, and in active labor for the cause of Christ.

REV. FRANCIS DURBIN BLAKESLEE, A.M.

Blakeslee, Francis Durbin, A.M., principal of Greenwich Academy, was born Feb. 1, 1846, at Vestal, Broome Co., N. Y. He was converted Jan. 16, 1857, and immediately joined the M. E. Church. He was licensed to exhort in 1863. From December, 1863, to June, 1865, he was clerk either in the army or in the Quartermaster-General's office. Prior to this time, he had been a student in the Wyoming Seminary, and after the war closed he returned to that institution, where he remained one year. He entered Genesee College in 1866, where he prepared for graduation. But as the college was about to be merged into Syracuse University, he preferred to graduate with its first class. He was licensed to preach in 1866, and joined the East Genesee Conference in 1871. He was appointed as a pastor to Groveland, Livingston Co., and in 1873 was elected principal of Greenwich Academy, the position which he now holds.

Bland, Adam, was born and reared in Virginia, and united with the Baltimore Conference M. E. Church in 1845, and was transferred to California in 1851. His time has been about equally divided between stations and districts. He has done good service as a pioneer. He has been an apostle to the churches in the southern portion of the State. He organized at least one-half of the societies now embraced in the Southern California Conference. He was a member of the General Conference in Chicago, in 1868. Mr. Bland is a member of the Southern California Conference.

Bloomberg, F.—This worthy and influential German was elected lay delegate, and served well the interests of the Southern German Conference at the session of the General Conference of 1876.

Bloomington, Ill. (pop. 14,590), is the capital of McLean County, and is in the centre of one of the most beautiful parts of the State. It is the site of the Illinois Wesleyan University. Methodist services were introduced shortly after the settlement of the country, and the church has had a prosperous growth. The statistics are as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
First Church.....	935	525	$60,000
University Charge.....	247	219
German M. E. Church.....	95	150	4,100
African M. E. Church.....	97	80	4,900

Bloomsburg, Pa. (pop. 3341), is the capital of Columbia County, and is situated in the anthracite coal region. In 1831, Rev. George Lane occasionally preached in Bloomsburg, which was then a small village. A few persons had attended services at a distant appointment and had united with the church, prominent among whom was Dr. Gearhart, who was a popular physician. They applied to be a regular appointment on the Berwick circuit, and so continued for some years. The first class, consisting of nine members, was organized Sept. 30, 1832. They worshiped, for a time, in the village school-house, and then in a wagon-shop, fitted up for their accommodation. In 1837 a small frame church was erected at a cost of $575, and was paid for before dedication. This gave place, in 1857, to a large and more substantial edifice, dedicated by Bishop Scott. Bloomsburg became a separate charge in 1862. It has 372 members and 230 scholars. The church is valued at $10,000 and the parsonage at $2500. The African M. E. Church was organized in 1870, and a neat church was built, which, with the ground, is valued at $1000. It has 18 members and 35 Sunday-school scholars. The Evangelical Association has also a small society.

Boardman, Richard, the first Methodist missionary in America, was born in 1738. He entered the itinerant ministry in 1763, and is noticed as "a man of great piety, of an amiable disposition, and possessed of a strong understanding." In one of his early circuits he had a remarkable escape. His journey lay upon the sea-coast, and he had been assured if he proceeded rapidly he could reach a point of safety before the tide would rise. But it began to snow and he could scarcely see his way. In this condition, the tide rose and surrounded him on every side, and he found himself hemmed in by perpendicular rocks. He commended his soul to God, not having any expectation of escaping death. But in his own words he says, "I perceived two men running down a hill on the other side of the water, and by some means they got a boat and came to my relief just as the water had reached my knees as I sat on my saddle. They took me into the boat, the mare swimming by our side until we reached the land. While we were in the boat, one of the men said, 'Surely, sir, God was with you.' I answered, 'I trust he is.' The man replied, 'I know he is: last night I dreamed that I must go to the top of such a hill. When I awoke, the dream had such an impression on my mind that I could not rest. I therefore went, and called upon this man to accompany me. When we came to this place, we saw nothing more than usual. However, I begged him to go with me to another hill at a small distance, and there we saw your distressed situation.'" He gave his deliverers all the money he had, which, he says, was about eighteen pence, and stopped all night at the hotel to which they had taken him. In the morning he urged the landlord to keep a pair of silver spurs till he could redeem them, but the landlord immediately answered, "The Lord bless you, sir, I would not take a farthing from you for the world." In 1769, when Mr. Wesley called for volunteers for America, Mr. Boardman at once responded. He had recently lost his wife, and had resolved to dedicate himself fully to pioneer labor. On his way to Bristol, he preached at the village of Moniash. A young woman who was in the congregation was awakened under his sermon, which was on the prayer of Jabez. Nearly ten years after that time she married William Bunting, and her first-born child was named Jabez, in honor of that sermon. He subsequently became the recognized leader of British Methodism. Mr. Boardman and Mr. Pilmoor, having received funds from Mr. Wesley, and a collection also having been taken for them at London and Bristol, embarked in the latter part of August, and arrived at Philadelphia Oct. 24, 1769, after a stormy passage of nine weeks. Mr. Boardman, being the elder minister, acted as Mr. Wesley's assistant until after the arrival of Mr. Asbury. In 1772, Mr. Boardman preached chiefly in New York and Philadelphia, but also made excursions southward to Baltimore, and northward as far as Boston. After Mr. Rankin's arrival, as superintendent, he attended the first Conference, in 1773, but did not receive any appointment, as he and Mr. Pilmoor had resolved to return to England. They embarked January 2, 1774, and Mr. Boardman, resuming his ministerial duties, labored in Ireland till 1780, when he was appointed for one year to London. In 1782 he was appointed to Cork, in Ireland, and immediately after his arrival he was affected with symptoms of apoplexy. He continued, however, to preach every evening until Friday, when, after praying with unusual fervor for the success of the gospel and for his brethren in the ministry, he lost the use of his speech and was released from his sufferings. A modest monument marks the place of his interment in St. Barry's church-yard.

Board Meetings are composed of the entire official members of any circuit or station. They are not prescribed or authorized by the Discipline of the M. E. Church; but in some places they are substituted for leaders' meetings. According to the Discipline the leaders' meetings are composed of the leaders and stewards of the charge, together with the minister, but the board meetings embrace the trustees and other official members. Where they are regularly held, the work assigned to the leaders' meetings is usually transacted by them, and they also attend to the general financial interests of the church.

Boehler, Peter, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, Germany, Dec. 31, 1712. He was educated in the University of Jena. When sixteen years of age he united with the Moravians. When twenty-five he was ordained by Count Zinzendorf. He was immediately sent on a mission to the negro population in Georgia and South Carolina, via London. On arriving at London, he had his first interview with John Wesley, Feb. 7, 1738. He remained in that city until the 4th of the following May, during which time the Wesleys had frequent interviews with him. They went in company from London to Oxford, and Mr. Boehler, afterwards giving an account of this journey, says, "I traveled with the two brothers, John and Charles Wesley, from London to Oxford; the elder, John, is a good-natured man. He knew he had not properly believed on the Saviour, and was willing to be taught. His brother, with whom you (Zinzendorf) often conversed, a year ago, is at present very much distressed in his mind, but does not know how he shall begin to be acquainted with the Saviour. Our mode of believing in the Saviour is so easy to any man that they cannot reconcile themselves to it. If it were a little more artful they would much sooner find their way into it." Charles Wesley began to teach him English. Questions were asked him, and he usually answered them by direct quotations from the Scriptures. His explanation of saving faith was new, even to many London Moravians.

Among other things which he taught the Wesleys was, that true faith in Christ was attended by dominion over sin; and also, that constant peace would arise from a sense of forgiveness; and again, that saving faith in Christ is given in a moment. To this last doctrine Wesley was at first decidedly opposed; but searching the Scriptures for himself, he became clearly convinced that Mr. Boehler's doctrine was true; yet he was inclined to believe that what occurred in the first ages of the Christian church, with respect to conversion, did not continue until these later times. Mr. Boehler removed his objections to this by bringing into his presence a number of the Moravian brethren, who testified from actual experience that in a moment they had been translated out of darkness into light. Wesley then said, "Here ended my disputing; I could now only cry out, 'Lord! help thou my unbelief.'" The Wesleys, however, did not experience assurance until after Mr. Boehler had left London, May 4, for South Carolina. Mr. Boehler, finding that his mission in South Carolina was not successful, removed to Pennsylvania about 1740. At the forks of the Delaware he was joined by Count Zinzendorf and a number of elders, who were engaged in the visitation of the North American churches. His labors were successful at Bethlehem, Pa., where the Moravians had established a settlement. His episcopal visitations were extensive in England, Ireland, and Wales. A stone in the Moravian cemetery at Chelsea bears this inscription, "Petrus Boehler, a bishop of the Unitas Fratrum, departed April 27, 1775, in the sixty-third year of his age."

Boehm, Henry, was born June 8, 1775, in Lancaster Co., Pa., and died December 29, 1875, aged one hundred years six months and twenty-one days. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1798. In 1799, Bishop Asbury records of him as follows: "Martin Boehm, his father, is all upon wings and springs since the Lord has blessed his grandchildren. His son Henry is greatly led out in religious exercises." In 1800 he was licensed to preach, and in 1801 was received on trial in the Philadelphia Conference. After the General Conference held in Baltimore in 1808, he became the traveling companion of Bishop Asbury, who was then sixty-three years old. He was the bishop's friend, companion, and associate for five years. After he ceased to travel with the bishop, he was successively presiding elder of Schuylkill, Chesapeake, and Delaware districts. At the close of his the 16th day of December he met a company of ministers of the Newark Conference, and at the close of this pleasant interview, Father Boehm arose and formally addressed the company on the goodness of God, after which he led in prayer. He was remarkable for the gentleness of his spirit and his uniform courtesy to all whom he met. His intellectual powers were remarkably preserved to very advanced life. He had a vigorous and well-balanced mind. He preached fluently both in service in this office, he returned to the pastorate, in which he labored earnestly and faithfully until his infirmities compelled him to take a supernumerary relation. After the division of the Philadelphia Conference he was connected with the New Jersey portion. At the organization of the Newark Conference he became a member of it, and remained connected with it until he died. On the 8th of June, 1875, by the direction of the Annual Conference, his centennial anniversary was celebrated in Trinity church, Jersey City. There was a large gathering of ministers and laymen from various parts of the country. He preached in John Street church, New York, on the 12th of July; and on the first Sabbath in October he preached at Woodrow, Staten Island, and administered the sacrament. His text was, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock." On English and German. The first sermon in the German language preached in Cincinnati, O., was by him. Before 1810, he had preached the gospel in German in nearly fourteen States. He was requested by Bishop Asbury to superintend the translation of the Methodist Discipline in the German language. In 1807, the work was completed by Dr. Bomar and himself, and was largely circulated. On Sunday, the 12th of December, he read sixteen chapters of the book of Revelation, and laid it aside, intending to finish it on Monday. On the night of the 17th of December he was taken sick, and most of the time until he died his pain was very severe; yet his frequent expression was, "Precious Jesus!" Just as the sun went down, this centenarian of American Methodism was gathered to his fathers.

Bolton, James W. W., M.D., was born in Harrison Co., West Virginia, in 1834. Converted early in life, he joined the West Virginia Conference in 1857. When the war commenced, he was elected chaplain of the 2d West Virginia Infantry, and afterwards became chaplain of the 5th West Virginia Cavalry. He was present at the battles of Lloyd Mountain and Bull Run (second battle), and other engagements, and was seriously wounded in the first, May 9, 1864. He was confined to the hospital until March, 1865, and still gives evidence of the wound. Through these years he received special mention for bravery and services rendered as chaplain. He returned to the Conference in April, 1865, though using crutches. In 1867 he studied medicine and practiced, while holding a supernumerary relation, and also spent some time in teaching in West Virginia and Ohio. He re-entered the active work, and spent four years as presiding elder. In his early ministry, his debate, in 1858, on Campbellism gave him a great reputation as a polemic, and the debate was useful to the church. Though without a collegiate education, he is a fine Latin, Greek, and Hebrew scholar. He was a delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

Bombay (pop. 250,000), the capital of Bombay Presidency, in India, and one of the earliest British possessions. Methodism was introduced a few years since by Rev. William Taylor, especially among the Eurasians, or native-born descendants of Europeans. It now has a self-supporting church, and is the centre of a district. The work is spreading among the native population in several languages.

Bond, John Wesley, a minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Baltimore, Dec. 11, 1784, and died Jan. 22, 1819. He entered the Baltimore Conference in 1810, and was appointed to Calvert, Fairfax, and Great Falls circuits, after which he traveled as companion to Bishop Asbury until the death of the latter. In 1816 he was appointed to Severn circuit, and in 1817 to Harford, during which year he contracted a fever, which was the cause of his death. He was a man of clear and sound judgment, and was faithful in his ministerial and Christian duties.

Bond, Thomas Emerson, a distinguished physician, editor, and local minister, was born in Baltimore, February, 1782, and died in New York, March 14, 1856. His parents early removed to Buckingham Co., Va. After studying medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, he returned to Baltimore to practice, and received the degree of M.D. from the University of Maryland. He rose so rapidly in distinction, that he was called to a professorship in the university, which, however, because of impaired health, he did not occupy. From his early life he had been a diligent student of English and classical writers, and had acquired a chaste, strong, nervous style. He brought to the investigation of theological questions a mind of singular acuteness. At an early day he united with the M. E. Church in Harford Co., Md., and while practicing medicine in Baltimore was licensed as a local preacher. While the church was agitated by questions of reform in its government, from 1820 to 1830, Dr. Bond took a very active part. In 1827 he published a work, entitled "An Appeal to the Methodists," in which he opposed the changes proposed by the reformers. In 1828 he published another work, entitled "Narrative and Defense of the Methodist Episcopal Church." From 1830 to 1831 he edited The Itinerant, a paper published in Baltimore in defense of the church. In all of these publications he showed himself a master, and his writings had great influence in preserving the integrity of the church. In 1840 he was chosen editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal, which position he held until 1848. He was re-elected to the same place in 1852. He achieved during this time the greatest success of his life. In editorial skill he has rarely been surpassed.

Bonnell, John M., a minister and teacher in the M. E. Church South, was a native of Bucks Co., Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., when about eighteen years of age, and emigrated to Georgia. He was converted in 1842, and in 1845 was admitted into the Georgia Conference. Having peculiar fitness as a teacher, he was soon called to that vocation. At the time of his death he had been eleven years the efficient president of the Wesleyan Female College, Macon, Ga. He died suddenly, from heart disease, at the latter place, Sept. 30, 1871. "He possessed a clear and highly-cultivated intellect. He was of versatile talent, and might have become eminent in any department of science, art, or literature. He was pure, gentle, and even-tempered."

Bonner, Hon. Benjamin R., a native of Illinois, born in 1831, early moved to St. Louis, and joined the M. E. Church in his twentieth year. His parents were Methodists, and he was faithful to the church in adverse times in that State, and has long been an active office-bearer in the same. He served several years in the legislature of Missouri, and held the position of chairman of the committee on Commerce. He was president of the Board of Trade in St. Louis, and has held government and other civil positions. As a lay delegate to the General Conference of 1872, he rendered valuable service as chairman of the special committee to investigate the Book Concern.

Bonney, Isaac, was born in Hardwick, Mass., Sept. 26, 1782, and died in Marlboro', Sept. 16, 1855, having been in the ministry of the M. E. Church fifty-three years. He was converted in 1800, and served as a local preacher until 1808, when he joined the New England Conference. He was a successful preacher, and was often the object of violent persecution. He was an able minister, a wise and prudent counselor, and was several times elected to the General Conference.

Book Agents is the title given to the persons selected to manage the publishing interests of the Methodist Churches in America. Mr. Wesley termed them book stewards, and that name they still retain in England and Canada. They supervise all matters pertaining to the publication of books and periodicals. They are elected every four years, and have always been ministers with the exception of Mr. Phillips, who was elected in 1872. The M. E.

Book Concern.—The publishing department of the Methodist Episcopal Church is known by this name, which, though somewhat peculiar, was adopted by the fathers of the church. Its first regular establishment was in Philadelphia, when, in 1789, John Dickins's name appears as book steward. Prior to that time, however, books were published by the ministers, and circulated, and Church has an agent and assistant agent both at New York and Cincinnati. Those who have filled the office, with the date of appointment, are, in the East: Agents: 1789, John Dickins; 1798, Ezekiel Cooper; 1808, Joshua Wilson; 1812, Daniel Hitt; 1816, Joshua Soule; 1820, Nathan Bangs; 1828, John Emory; 1832, Beverly Waugh; 1836, Thomas Mason; 1844, George Lane; 1852, Thomas Carlton; 1872, Reuben Nelson, John M. Phillips. Assistant Agents: 1804, Joshua Wilson; 1808, Daniel Hitt; 1812, Thomas Ware; 1816, Thomas Mason; 1824, John Emory; 1828, Beverly Waugh; 1832, Thomas Mason; 1836, George Lane; 1844, Charles B. their profits applied to religious and charitable purposes. Robert Williams came to America as a local preacher, preceding by some two months Messrs. Boardman and Pilmoor, Mr. Wesley's first missionaries. He was a man of energy and well acquainted with business. In addition to preaching as an evangelist, he published several of Mr. Wesley's sermons, and appears to have realized some profits. It seems that complaint was made to Mr. Wesley, who, in 1772, wrote to Mr. Asbury, requesting that "Robert Williams should not republish his works without his consent." In March, 1773, Mr. Asbury, in his journal, states that he learned that Mr. Williams was publishing religious books for the sake of gain, and adds, "This will not do." When Mr. Rankin was appointed general assistant, he called the first Conference in Philadelphia, July, 1773, and one of its resolutions was, that "no one must republish Mr. Wesley's books without the consent of Mr. Wesley, if it could be obtained, and the consent of his brethren." Yet a minute was adopted, that "Robert Williams might sell the books he had already printed, but should print no more except under the above restrictions." From this it may be inferred that some plan was adopted by which the profits from the printing and sale of Methodist books were applied to the general interest. Long before that time, however, Benjamin Franklin had reprinted Mr. Wesley's sermon on "Free Grace," and also several of Mr. Whitefield's sermons. At the close of the Revolutionary War, John Dickins was requested by Mr. Asbury to take charge of New York, and one writer remarks it was "for the purpose of superintending our book business." As two preachers were stationed in New York in 1783, and the number of members amounted only to sixty, we infer that John Dickins, who was the junior preacher, must have engaged chiefly, if not wholly, in the book business. The following year he was in charge of New York, and by his side, on Long Island, was Philip Cox, with a membership of only twenty-four, who, in 1789, is named as book steward in Virginia, when Dickins took charge of Philadelphia. With the exception of the year 1785, John Dickins was stationed in New York from 1783 to 1789, when he was transferred to Philadelphia. In 1786, Mr. Asbury mentions in his journal that he was looking over the papers of the Book Concern; and in the Discipline of 1787, the following minute occurs: "As it has been frequently recommended by the preachers and people that such books as are wanted be printed in this country, we therefore propose: First, that the advice of the Conference be desired concerning any valuable impression, and their consent be obtained before any steps be taken for the printing thereof. And, second, that the profits of the books, after all necessary expenses are defrayed, shall be applied, according to the direction of Conference, toward the college, the preachers' fund, the deficiencies of our preachers, the district missions, or the debts of our churches." Jesse Lee, in his history, adds: "From that time we began to print more of our own books in the United States than we had ever done before, and the principal part of the printing business was carried on in New York." From these items we should infer that books had been printed for the church for several years before, and that the printing had been done where the best contracts could be obtained. When Mr. Dickins commenced publishing books in Philadelphia, there was little if any accumulated capital, for it is said that he lent from his private funds $600 to commence the business. The first publication was "The Christian's Pattern," by Thomas à Kempis, an edition of "The Discipline," and "The Saints' Everlasting Rest." This was the fifth edition of the Discipline which had been published. These books were followed by one volume of The Arminian Magazine and a part of "Fletcher's Checks." One of the duties which devolved upon the Council, which met in 1789, was "to direct and manage all the printing which may be done, from time to time, for the use and benefit of the Methodist Church in America." In 1790, it selected traveling book stewards, and directed what books should be published. Among these were four volumes of Mr. Wesley's sermons. In the proceedings of that Council we find the following question and answer:

"Q. Shall the bishop have power to draw any money out of the book business, for the partial supply of any church or preacher that may be in pressing need?"

"A. By the recommendation of the elder of the district, the bishop may draw as far as three pounds per annum, but no further."

Unfortunately, the minutes of the General Conference of 1792 were not preserved. Mr. Lee says, "At this Conference we again employed John Dickins to superintend our printing interests in Philadelphia, for which he was to be allowed a house and $666.33 per year, to be paid out of the profits arising from the business." Conference also allowed to Cokesbury College $4000, to be paid in four years: $800 the first year, and the rest to be equally divided for the remaining three years. As the college was burned in 1795, the whole sum was not paid. The same Conference directed that the Book Fund should pay the distressed preachers $666.67 per annum, and to the bishops for the benefit of district schools $64 per annum. Mr. Lee adds: "It was supposed that the profits arising from our book business would amount to at least $2500 per year." The General Conference of 1796 directed the publication of a Methodist magazine. The first and second volumes appeared in 1797 and 1798, but at the death of Mr. Dickins it was discontinued. A further order was added, that "the proceeds of sales of our books, after authorship debts are paid, and a sufficient capital is provided for carrying on the business," should be regularly paid into the Charter Fund. In September, 1798, Mr. Dickins died of yellow fever, which then prevailed in Philadelphia as a terrible epidemic. Ezekiel Cooper was appointed to fill the vacancy, who remained a book agent until 1808. In his report, when he declined a re-election to the agency, he says, "When I engaged in this Concern in 1799, the whole amount of clear capital stock, including debts and all manner of property, was not worth more than $4000; and I had not a single dollar of cash in hand, belonging to the Concern, to carry on the work or to procure materials, or to pay a single demand against the Concern, which at that time was nearly $3000. At the General Conference of 1804, the Concern had so far prospered that I could show a capital of about $27,000."

In 1804, for some reason, we do not know precisely what, the book business was removed to New York, Mr. Cooper being retained in charge. At that General Conference, a rule had been adopted limiting the term of ministerial appointments to two years; the editor and general book steward and his assistant were made exceptions. In 1808, Mr. Cooper was succeeded by Joshua Wilson, the capital then being $45,000. In 1816, the capital was reported at $80,000; but by some means, the Concern had become considerably embarrassed. The Conference directed the publication of a periodical to be called The Methodist Missionary Magazine, and also declared it "improper for agents of the Book Concern to purchase or to sell grammars, or any other such books." The agents recommended the Conference to authorize the purchase of real estate, and to open a printing-office, but the subject was postponed to the following General Conference. In 1818 the Methodist Magazine was commenced, but the word "missionary" was omitted from its title. It has been continued to the present time, though, after the establishment of the Advocate, it was changed to the Quarterly Review. In early times the book business was conducted on the plan of issuing books on commission. They were sent to the presiding elders and preachers, who made a report of sales, and received a commission for their labor. It was found, however, that this plan worked badly; sometimes sales were neglected, and the books were injured: the capital of the Concern was scattered over the country, and collections were not promptly made. In 1820, Dr. Bangs, who had been elected agent, infused more energy into the business, by publishing Benson's Commentary, and also a revised edition of the Hymn-Book. In 1822 the agents rented the basement of the Wesleyan Seminary, in Crosby Street, and began binding their publications. This was the first attempt at performing mechanical labor under the superintendency of the agents. For nearly forty years the books had been printed and bound by contract, and were simply sold at the agency. Owing to the great difficulty in transportation in those early times, a depository was needed in the West. A few individuals made generous contributions, and grounds were secured and buildings were erected in Cincinnati, the General Conference having authorized the establishment of a depository. (See WESTERN BOOK CONCERN.) In 1824, Dr. Bangs and Emory being the agents, the seminary building was purchased, and in the following September the printing business was commenced. This period marks the rise of the extensive publishing interests as they now exist. On Sept. 9, 1826, was issued the first number of The Christian Advocate, which was the first weekly official publication of the church. A lot was purchased on Mulberry Street, where new and commodious buildings were erected in 1833, and where the manufacturing department is still located.

On Feb. 18, 1836, the buildings with the entire stock were consumed by fire; the estimated loss being $250,000. A large fire in New York had previously so embarrassed the insurance companies that but little insurance could be collected. Public sympathy was excited, and a collection was made amounting to $89,984.98, which, added to the insurance collected, the value of the ground, etc., left an amount of $281,650.77. At the General Conference which sat in May, liberal offers were made of suitable grounds both in Baltimore and Philadelphia, but these offers were not accepted; new buildings were commenced in New York, and the business became larger and more prosperous than before. The separation of the Church South, in 1845, gave rise to a suit in the United States Court, and under the decree of the court a pro rata division was ordered. In accordance with this decree, the agents at New York and Cincinnati paid the representatives of the Church South $270,000 in cash, and also transferred to them the presses and papers belonging to the Concern in the South, and all the debts due and payable in the bounds of the Southern Conferences. Notwithstanding these large payments, under the skillful management of the agents the business progressed without embarrassment, and was annually enlarged. It was deemed best to secure a more prominent site for the increasing business, and the General Conference having so authorized, a large building on the corner of Broadway and Eleventh Street was purchased jointly by the Book Concern and the Missionary Society. The church offices were removed to this large and beautiful edifice, but the manufacturing department, as stated above, is still retained in Mulberry Street.

Between 1868 and 1872, there were rumors of some irregularity and loss through some of the employees. A very earnest and somewhat painful discussion took place respecting the general management. The agents were divided in judgment, and the members of the book committee were unable to agree as to the facts involved. The matter was referred to the General Conference of 1872, and was carefully examined by a large committee, composed in part of men eminent for business ability as well as for integrity. The conclusion arrived at was, "That frauds had been practiced in the bindery by which the Book Concern has suffered loss, but in no other department of the Concern." That there had "been irregularities in the management of the business." But there were no "reasonable grounds to presume that any agent or assistant agent is or has been implicated or interested in any frauds." This report was adopted without debate, and with great unanimity, and the controversy was thus closed. To guard against future difficulties, the manner of constituting the book committee was changed, and skillful laymen were added as auditing committees. The Conference also elected, for the first time, a layman as assistant agent at New York.

Notwithstanding the general depression in business and the severe financial distress so universally felt, the credit of the Book Concern has remained unimpaired. Its business is increasing, and its issues are annually multiplying. The reports of 1876 show that the capital at New York amounts to $1,013,687.29, and at Cincinnati, to $503,285.73. While this capital has been accumulated, large amounts were paid for a number of years in dividends to the Annual Conferences, to assist the superannuated preachers, widows, and orphans; also in meeting the deficiencies of the expenses of delegates in the General Conferences; in establishing new papers in different sections of the country; and in paying the salaries and traveling expenses of the bishops, and of the allowance made to the widows of bishops. The dividends, however, were discontinued several years since; and the salaries of the bishops are now paid by collections from the churches.

The value of the Book Concern is not to be estimated simply or alone by its profits, but chiefly by the assistance which it has given to church periodicals and church agencies, and by the publication of standard theological works, which clearly and distinctly set forth the doctrines of the church. It has been an agency of great power, and thousands of youthful minds have been stirred by the earnest volumes it has issued. To facilitate the diffusion of its publications, depositories have been established in Boston, Pittsburgh, Buffalo, Chicago, St. Louis, and San Francisco (which see), and large book-stores, in appropriate buildings secured for the purpose, have been opened in Philadelphia and Baltimore under the church sanction, but not as the property of the publishing department. When it is remembered that this business has been transacted for the period of ninety years through ten thousand traveling preachers, many of whom were inexperienced and some of whom were employed by presiding elders without full knowledge of their habits, it is astonishing that so little loss should have been incurred, and that its prosperity should have been so great. It has never suffered during its entire history from a defaulting agent, and, with a single exception, it has not been shown that any fraud has been practiced by an employee. It has also competed with other organizations, which have endeavored to furnish their books at cost or nearly so; such as the American Tract Society, the American Sunday-School Union, and kindred associations. From an humble beginning, with the smallest possible means, it has grown to meet the wants of the church, until it has become the largest religious publishing house in the world.

Book Establishment, The (English Wesleyan), may be said to have had its commencement in the Foundry in 1739. It was founded by Mr. Wesley, who at an early period of his career printed, published, and sold his own and his brother's books, with those of the Rev. John Fletcher and others, for the defense of Methodism and the benefit of mankind. These publications were chiefly sold by superintendents of circuits (then called assistants), who were, of course, responsible to Mr. Wesley for sales and returns.

From the profit of these sales he helped the most needy of his preachers, and aided the spread of the gospel to the utmost of his power.

After his death, a codicil to his will, dated Oct. 5, 1790, was accepted in probate, conveying to seven ministers of the connection all the property of the Book Room, as it was then first called. This was to be held by them, in trust, for all ministers in connection with the Conference according to the Deed of Declaration of 1784. This property (held in trust) was sold by the trustees to George Whitefield and his assigns, to and for the sole use and benefit of the Conference and its successors forever. Thus it remained till the Conference of 1804, when two deeds were prepared; one, by which George Whitefield was to convey the property to fifteen members of the Conference, through an intermediate person, in trust; and another, by which the book steward for the time being should be obliged to account with the Conference from year to year for the business carried on, and all profits arising therefrom. These deeds were executed, and the property settled and secured in trust.

The management of the whole of the book affairs, as belonging to the Conference only, is purely ministerial. The property was willed to them, when in financial difficulty, through larger grants made from it than its return supplied; they relieved it, and furnished capital for carrying it on, and to them the concern has from the beginning been one of deep interest.

When the new chapel in City Road was opened, the Book Establishment was removed from the Foundry to premises adjoining.

In 1839 the premises purchased in 1808 were enlarged to meet the steadily increasing demands both at home and abroad. The entrance to this enlarged house of business is at No. 2 Castle St.,

City Road, and is now known as the "WESLEYAN CONFERENCE OFFICE AND BOOK ROOM." There is a branch city establishment at No. 66 Paternoster Row.

The venerable John Mason was the book steward for many years, and managed its affairs in times of financial difficulty with exquisite tact and skill. His successor is the Rev. F. J. Jobson, D.D., under whose administration the business has very largely increased.

The book committee usually meets on the first Monday of every month, and consists principally of the officials and superintendents of the London circuits, with six ministers chosen from the adjacent circuits. The Rev. Benjamin Gregory is editor, and at present Rev. T. Woolmer is the secretary of the committee. The official appointments are for a term of six years, renewable as deemed expedient.

As to its regular publications, first must be named The Arminian Magazine, commenced by Mr. Wesley in January, 1777; this, as a monthly publication, flourished for a century. It now bears the title of The Wesleyan Methodist Magazine: at the commencement of this year the City Road Magazine was incorporated with it, and it was reduced in price from one shilling to sixpence. The London Quarterly Review, The Christian Miscellany, The Sunday-School Magazine, Early Days (enlarged), Our Boys and Girls (illustrated), all have a very large circulation.

"The Wesleyan Hymn-Book and New Supplement," sanctioned and authorized by the Conference for use throughout the connection, was published in 1876, and within a year of its publication has been circulated to an extent of upwards of a million copies. It has been gratefully welcomed both at home and abroad. A "New Tune-Book," containing a tune for every hymn, is in the press, and will be published before the present work is completed.

The issues from the Conference office last year, before the publication of the Hymn-Book, were upwards of twelve millions, not reckoning newspapers, which are published elsewhere. The publications by the Conference office are acknowledged to be among the cheapest and best literary productions of the kingdom. Formerly they were circulated principally through ministers, but now they are sold as well by all publishers and booksellers. There is also a large and flourishing Tract Society connected with the establishment.

The book steward, by authority of the Conference, makes annual grants from the profits of the Book Room to "Home Mission Work in Ireland," to the "Home Mission and Contingent Fund," to the "Worn-out Ministers' and Widows' Fund," and of £3000 to the "Itinerant Methodist Preachers' Annuitant Society." These grants to be modified by the Conference according to circumstances.

Book Room, Canada.—See CANADA BOOK ROOM.

Book Room, The, of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, is situated in Salisbury Court, Fleet Street, London. It is managed by a book steward and committee, elected annually by the Assembly. The present book steward is Rev. Thomas Newton. The treasurer, who is also elected by the Annual Assembly, is Mr. John Cuthbertson. This office he has held for fifteen years.

The Book Room publishes the Hymn-Book appointed for congregational use, the Sunday-School Hymn-Book, Book of Services, monthly magazines, model or reference deeds for the settlement of chapels, class-books, and other church requisites. The magazines are three, the United Methodist Free Churches Magazine, Sunday-School Hive, and Welcome Words, the last being a juvenile missionary magazine. The Annual Assembly appoints the editors, who are responsible to the Assembly alone, the Book Room committee having control over the commercial transactions of the Book Room only. Until the Assembly of 1877, one minister edited the three magazines, and for many years the editor was free from circuit work. By a new arrangement the editing is distributed, and a minister appointed to a circuit edits each of the three magazines respectively.

The Book Room owns the copyright of many of Rev. James Everett's works, and has brought out new editions of them. It has also published other volumes, though its operations as a general publishing house are not extensive. It keeps other works besides on sale.

Its profits are yearly devoted to connectional objects by vote of the Annual Assembly; and as these profits are considerable, the Book Room has proved of essential service to several of the connectional funds. The profits on the year 1875-76, the last returns at the date of this writing, amounted to £1354.9.6. Since the Union of Wesleyan Reformers with the Wesleyan Methodist Association in 1857, the entire profits have reached nearly £16,000. The capital of the Book Room amounts to about £6000. The committee of the Book Room meets monthly. Its members are all, for convenience of attendance, chosen from the London district.

Booneville, Mo. (pop. 3506), the capital of Cooper County, on the Missouri River. It is in the midst of a rich agricultural region, and in the vicinity of valuable mineral deposits. In 1818, Rev. Justinian Williams, a local preacher, organized the first Methodist society in the county. It was composed of but four, but was shortly afterwards enlarged. Mr. Williams subsequently became a member of the Conference. The circuit was organized in 1834, and in 1840 it became a station. The church edifice was commenced in 1833, and dedicated by Bishop Soule in 1838, during the first session of the Annual Conference held in this place. The society, in common with the great majority of the churches in Missouri, adhered to the Church South. A German Methodist society was organized, and it erected a church in 1852. A small society of the Methodist Episcopal Church has been formed, but has no edifice. The statistics at present are as follows:

1833	M. E. Church South	200	75	$600
1852	German M. E. Church	30	120	4000

Booth, Thomas M., a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerancy in 1857; was elected president of the Annual Assembly in 1876.

Boothby, Asa, Jr., a professor in the Wesleyan Academy, Wilbraham, Mass., was born in Linington, Me., Sept. 23, 1834, and was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1859. In the same year he was appointed teacher of Mathematics, and subsequently teacher of Natural Sciences, in Falley Seminary. In 1867 he was elected teacher of Natural Sciences in the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham, Mass. Mr. Boothby has published a pamphlet on the "Nomenclature of Chemistry" (1862).

Bordentown Female College was opened in Bordentown, N. J., in the year 1851, as a young ladies' boarding-school. It was originated by Rev. J. H. Brakeley, Ph.D., a local preacher in the M. E. Church, who had been Professor of Languages and Natural Sciences in the Wilmington Female College. The property was purchased by himself, and is not owned by the church, but the school has been under the patronage of the New Jersey Conference. It is located on a high point of ground overlooking the Delaware River, and is easy of access both from Philadelphia and New York. The institution was chartered in 1853. A library has been collected, together with philosophical apparatus and a cabinet and museum. For a number of years Mr. and Mrs. Brakeley, assisted by competent teachers, conducted the institution prosperously, and a large number of young ladies have graduated from its halls. After laboring for twenty-three years, Mr. Brakeley retired, and has been succeeded by Rev. W. C. Bowen, A.M., an experienced teacher from the State of New York. He has associated with him a corps of able instructors, and the institution is now pursuing a successful career.

Boston (pop. 250,526) is the centre of New England Methodism. In no city of the Union was the introduction of Methodism more strongly opposed than in this, with the possible exception of Savannah, Ga. It was visited by Charles Wesley, on his return voyage from Georgia, Sept. 24, 1736, the vessel having to put into that port because of a severe storm. He remained in the city about a month, preaching in Christ church, Salem Street, and in King's chapel, on Common, now Tremont, Street, and other places. This city was first visited by Whitefield, September, 1740, when he preached in Battle Street, Old South, New North, and Summer Street churches, and on the Common. He visited it again in 1745, 1756, 1764, and the last time in 1770.

Richard Boardman formed a small society in Boston in 1772, which, being left without pastoral care, soon expired. William Black, the founder of Methodism in Nova Scotia, preached six months, in 1784, in private houses and halls, and also in the Sandemanian chapel, to good congregations. Freeborn Garrettsen, in the summer of 1790, preached several times in private houses, engaged a meeting-house and boarding for a preacher, but formed no society. Jesse Lee, traveling through New England to organize Methodist churches, came to Boston on July 9, 1790, after Mr. Garrettsen had left, meeting each other on the way, and on the 11th of July preached his famous sermon under the elm-tree in the Common. The public were readily attracted by his fervor and eloquence, and his audience grew from four men at the beginning of his service to three thousand attentive listeners, who were gathered around him when he closed. Having gone east as far as Portsmouth, N. H., he again stopped at Boston on his return, and preached there several times, in the Common, in a private house, in a vacant Baptist meeting-house, and in Charlestown. He went to Boston again on the 13th of November, in the same year, by the appointment of the Conference in New York in October, and spent four weeks endeavoring to find a public place in which to preach. He preached, however, Sunday evening, Nov. 14, in a private house. He was unsuccessful, and went to Lynn, where more encouragement was offered him. In this town he organized the first Methodist society in Massachusetts, Feb. 20, 1791. Asbury visited Boston on the 23d of June of this year, and preached twice. He was coldly received, had small congregations, and went away discouraged.

At length Samuel Burrill opened his house for the Methodist meetings, and a society of twelve members was formed in July or August, 1792. Some of the names were Samuel Burrill, Elijah and Daniel Lewis, Abraham Ingersoll, Uriah Tufts, Jacob Hawkins, and Mrs. Green. Fifteen members were reported to the Conference held that year in the new church at Lynn, and Jeremiah Cosden was appointed pastor of the society. When the congregation had grown too large for Mr. Burrill's rooms, the use of a school-house was obtained. The services were held at five o'clock in the morning. Some persons complained that they were annoyed by the ringing of the bells at so early an hour, and had the school-house closed against the society. A room in a hotel was the next meeting-place, but that was soon shut against the unpopular Methodists. A chamber was at last found in the house of Mr. John Ruddock, in Ship Street, now Ann Street, which was dedicated by the Rev. James Martin, August 19, 1793.

In 1794, the society, now numbering about forty-two members, resolved to build a chapel. Five hundred and twenty dollars were subscribed, and a lot was bought on what is now Hanover Street, but was then called Methodist Alley. The corner-stone of the new building was laid by Jesse Lee, presiding elder, and John Harper, pastor, August 28, 1795, and the church was dedicated by Joseph Pickering, May 15, 1796. This church was occupied till 1828, when the congregation removed to North Bennett Street. In 1800 the church in Boston reported 66 white and 6 colored members.

The corner-stone of the Bromfield Street church was laid by the Rev. Peter Jayne, on the 15th of April, 1806, and the church was dedicated in November of the same year by the Rev. S. Merwin. In 1810 the Boston circuit reported 330 members, white and colored; in 1820, Boston and Charlestown returned 619 members. A colored society, known as the May Street chapel, was formed in 1818. The Bennett Street church was founded in 1828, and its chapel was dedicated in the same year by the Rev. Stephen Martindale. This church became eventually the strongest Methodist church in the city, and though it no longer exists in its identical organization, it is well represented in several churches which have originated more or less directly in colonies going out from it. In 1829 the Rev. E. T. Taylor received his first appointment to the Mariners' Bethel, an appointment to which, in marked exception to Methodist usage, he was regularly re-assigned for thirty-three years, till his death in 1872. During this period he preached to his congregation of seamen and strangers with remarkable vigor and eloquence, and gained a wide fame. This church continues to appear in the list of appointments, but makes no statistical returns. The first church organization in Dorchester was made in 1817; the first church building was erected in 1818, and was replaced by a second building in 1825. In 1830 there were in Boston, Dorchester, and Charlestown (now all included in the city of Boston) 899 members. The Church Street church was organized under the pastoral care of the Rev. Abel Stevens, and its house of worship was dedicated by him July 4, 1834. The Russell Street church was organized by the Rev. Moses L. Seudder in Blossom Street in 1837, and its chapel was dedicated in 1838. An attempt was made to form a church in South Boston in 1810, it being the first effort by any denomination to establish worship in that part of the city. It was unsuccessful, as was also the second attempt, in 1825. A third attempt, in 1836, resulted in the formation of the Centenary church, which was dedicated by the Rev. E. T. Taylor, June 17, 1840. The church in Roxbury was formed about this time, and appears on the minutes in 1840, with 103 members. The total number of members in this year, within the present limits of Boston, was 1907. The church at East Boston was organized in 1839, and was first recognized as a distinct charge in 1842. It is represented by the Meridian Street church. The Bethel chapel of the Boston Port Society was built about this time for the Rev. E. T. Taylor by the liberality of the citizens of Boston. With it were connected a seamen's boarding-house, Sunday- and week-day schools, a store for seamen, and other auxiliary means of usefulness. The number of members and probationers within the present limits of Boston was in 1850, 2495, and in 1860, 2875.

In 1871 the Boston Wesleyan Association, a corporation of twenty laymen, owning and publishing the Zion's Herald, erected a large building, of granite, on Bloomfield Street, which was called the "Wesleyan Association Building." Besides business-rooms for the association and the Zion's Herald, it contains rooms for the Depository of the Methodist Book Concern, for society and social meetings, and other appurtenances designed to render it suitable for use as a "General Methodist headquarters" for New England. It has been adapted for the purposes mentioned, and is appreciated as a valuable addition to the Methodist institutions of the city.

Most of the original Methodist churches in Old Boston have given way before the changes in population, and are now represented by mission churches or by new organizations under new names in the present residence quarters of the city. The following table exhibits the present condition of the churches. The column headed members includes local preachers and probationers, and that headed value of church property includes the parsonage, where there is one:

Boston University was incorporated in 1869. Its founders were Isaac Rich, Lee Claffin, and Jacob Sleeper. Mr. Rich bequeathed for this purpose his large estate. The chief organs of curatorial and academic administration are the following: the University Corporation, the University Council, the University Senate, the University Convocation, the Faculties of the Colleges, and the Faculties of the Schools. The first consists of the president of the university and five classes of trustees, each holding office for five years; the second consists of the president and registrar of the university, and the deans of all the faculties; the third includes all members of the council and all regular professors in the different faculties; the fourth consists, under certain statutory limitations, of all persons who have been admitted to degrees in the university.

The statutes provide for the establishment of a large group of colleges, with distinct faculties and administrations. Departments so organized as to presuppose on the part of the student a collegiate preparation, or its equivalent, are called schools. Such of these as are organized and administered in the interest of persons preparing for professional life are called professional schools. Crowning all is the School of All Sciences, a purely post-graduate department for candidates for the higher degrees.

The following are the colleges and schools already in operation, and the dates of their establishment, respectively:

College of Liberal Arts.....	March 14, 1873.
College of Music.....	July 3, 1872.
College of Agriculture.....	Feb. 11, 1873.
School of Theology.....	May 3, 1871.
School of Law.....	Feb. 17, 1872.
School of Medicine.....	Feb. 15, 1873.
School of Theology.....	June 17, 1873.
School of All Sciences.....	April 9, 1874.

The College of Music and School of Oratory are in character and standard entirely unique in the history of American education. The place of the College of Agriculture is supplied by the Massachusetts Agricultural College at Amherst. The College of Liberal Arts has fixed a higher standard of admission than has heretofore been maintained in any American or English university. For two or three years past the number of students in the three professional schools of Theology, Law, and Medicine has exceeded the aggregate of the professional students of any of the other American universities maintaining the same faculties. By virtue of a special arrangement with the National University of Greece, and with the Royal University at Rome, members of the School of All Sciences of Boston University, who are Bachelors of Arts, can pursue regular or special courses of study in either of said universities without charge for tuition, and on returning, take their degrees precisely as if they had remained in residence. In all departments women enjoy all the privileges of men. It is the first university in the world organized from the first and throughout upon this principle.

The School of Theology was projected in Boston, in 1839; opened in Concord, N. H., as the "Methodist General Biblical Institute," in 1847; removed to Boston, and re-organized as the "Boston Theological Seminary," in 1867; since 1871 the theological department of Boston University. For its history, see "Annual Reports of Boston Theological Seminary," especially the "Quarter-Century Report of 1872," and the "Quadrennial Reports to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church." For further information respecting the university as a whole, see the "Annual Report of the President" and the current issues of the "Boston University Year Book."

The theological department, until permanent buildings shall be erected, occupies the rooms and halls of the Boston Wesleyan Association. The president, Rev. Dr. W. F. Warren, is well known as an instructor, and by his writings. He is assisted by an able faculty in all the departments.

Boswell, Wm. L., formerly professor in Dickinson College, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., June 22, 1828. He graduated in Dickinson College in June, 1848, and in the following spring joined the Philadelphia Conference of the M. E. Church. In 1853 he accepted the chair of Ancient Languages in Williamsport Seminary, and shortly afterwards the same position in Delaware College. In 1855 he was elected to the same chair in Genesee College. In 1857 he became Professor of Mathematics in Dickinson College, and three years after Professor of Languages. In 1865 he resigned his position, and engaged in insurance business in Philadelphia.

Bostwick, Shadrach, was born in Maryland in the year 1767 or 1768. He was educated as a physician, and entered upon its practice. He entered the itinerancy in 1791, and during fourteen years he had appointments in Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Ohio. He was five years presiding elder. In 1803 he was appointed missionary to Deerfield, Ohio. He had been preceded by a local preacher from Virginia. He formed the Deerfield circuit, then connected with the Pittsburgh district of the Baltimore Conference. He was the first regular preacher, indeed, sent to the Western Ro-serve. At the next Conference he returned from his vast circuit sixteen members. He continued his labors in that region until 1805, when he located. He formed the first Methodist societies in that part of Ohio, and gave an impulse to the cause of Methodism, which it has never lost. Bishop Hedding spoke of Bostwick as "a glorious man." He was famous for the intellectual and theological power of his sermons. "Hundreds will rise up in that day and call him blessed." His discourses were systematic, profound, and luminous, and often very melting; his piety deep and pure; his manners dignified and noble. Methodism in that region owes much to the labors of this eminent pioneer. After locating in 1805, he resumed the practice of medicine.

Bouden, Edward, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, became an itinerant in 1849; was president of the Annual Assembly in 1871. For many years Mr. Bouden has held the office of chapel secretary, and in 1874 was liberated from circuit work that he might attend to the duties of this office and others which were incorporated with it. He resides in Harrogate, Yorkshire.

Boundaries of Annual Conferences.—The Annual Conferences from 1773 to 1796 had no definite boundaries. The ministers attended such Conferences as were most convenient to them, or as they were respectively notified by the bishops. At one time a Conference was held in almost every presiding elder's district, the chief Conference being at Baltimore. They were known as District Conferences, rather than Annual. The General Conference of 1796 determined to give the Conferences definite boundaries, dividing the territory into six Conferences. In 1804 a separate section in the Discipline was devoted to the subject of boundaries. These have been changed from time to time, as the General Conference has judged best. As the churches have grown older, and as vested interests have arisen, there is more difficulty in changing the boundaries, and in some cases serious injury has occurred. The General Conference has usually constituted a committee on boundaries, consisting of one member from each Annual Conference. Formerly this committee reported for the consideration of the General Conference, but in 1872 it was determined that the decision of this committee should be final. In order to avoid difficulties, the General Conference of 1876 resolved that no change should hereafter be made until the plans should have been submitted to the Annual Conferences interested. It also provided that adjacent Conferences might settle and alter boundary lines between them, through a committee of five, appointed from each Conference, their action being approved by the bishops presiding at the next Conferences.

Bourne, Hugh, was born April 3, 1772, in Staffordshire, Eng., and died at Bennesley, Staffordshire, Oct. 11, 1852. He was the founder of the Primitive Methodist Church. He was trained up as a Wesleyan Methodist, and became an active preacher. When about thirty years of age, he, with a number of other preachers of the Wesleyan Church, engaged in holding camp-meetings and various out-door religious services. The Wesleyan Conference disapproved of these measures, and in 1807 passed a resolution condemning their course. This reproof caused Mr. Bourne to leave the Conference and to form a new Methodist organization. Its first class was formed at Standley, Staffordshire, in 1810. In 1844, Mr. Bourne visited the United States. While withdrawing from the Wesleyan body, the Primitive Methodists and their leaders have prosecuted revival work, and have indulged but little in controversy. [See PRIMITIVE METHODISTS.]

Bowdish, Charles G., was born at Potsdam, N. Y., May 12, 1834, and died at Astoria, July 5, 1873. He was one of five brothers connected with the Methodist Episcopal ministry. He was converted in 1853, and soon entered Cazenovia Seminary. Removing to Minnesota, he was received into that Conference in 1858. Having served a number of its appointments, he was elected chaplain of the 11th Minnesota regiment of volunteers, in 1864. In 1870 he was transferred to the New York East Conference, and filling a number of appointments, died in that Conference. He was a man of fine taste and culture. While in the army he rendered valuable service to Bishop Clarke in the organization of the Holston Conference. He was twice elected chaplain to the Minnesota House of Representatives. In 1867 he was appointed by President Johnson to superintend the annual payment of the Chippewa Indians. At the General Conference in Brooklyn, in 1872, he was placed on the staff of official reporters.

Bowen, Elias, D.D., an eminent minister in the old Oneida Conference, was born in Warwick, Mass., June 16, 1791, and died Oct. 25, 1871. He united with the M. E. Church in 1814, and shortly after entered the ministry. He occupied many of the best stations in the Conference, and was for twenty-four years, at different periods, presiding elder. He was a delegate in seven General Conferences. In 1857 he asked for a superannuated relation, believing that the churches generally desired younger ministers, but was always ready to fill the pulpit when his services were required. In 1870 he united with the Free Methodists. As a preacher he was clear, logical, and forcible, and was a warm friend of education and of educational institutions. His last moments were peaceful and triumphant.

Bowen, Wm. C., A.M., president of Bordentown Female Seminary, was born at Berkshire, Tioga Co., N. Y., Nov. 25, 1832. His father, Dr. Elias Bowen, was identified with the interests of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Central New York for fifty years. He graduated at the Wesleyan University in 1854, was admitted into the Oneida Conference in 1857, and he continued in the pastoral work until 1866. Much of his life has been spent in the profession of teaching, having been principal of Drewville Institute; Professor of Mathematics and Philosophy in Cooperstown Seminary; of Mathematics in Central New York Conference Seminary; and principal of Skaneateles Academy. In 1875 he became president of Bordentown Female College, which position he now occupies.

Bowers, John, under the constraining influence of the Holy Spirit, dedicated himself to the Christian ministry, in the British Wesleyan Church, when barely seventeen years of age. His heart was warm with a rich experience of gospel truth, and his zeal was the pure inspiration of duty to his Master and love to souls. For more than thirty years he exercised a powerful ministry in many important circuits. In 1843, Mr. Bowers was appointed house governor at Didsbury College; an office for which he was eminently qualified, and which he retained for twenty years. In 1858 he was elected president. During the last few months of his life he gave every assurance of a firm reliance on the everlasting covenants; disease sometimes obscured the brightness, but could never weaken the strength of his joy in Christ. He sank peacefully away, May, 1866.

Bowling Green, Ky. (pop. 4574), the capital of Warren County, is situated on the Big Warren River, at the crossing of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad. The M. E. Church South established a literary institution, but the buildings and grounds were greatly injured during the war, and the college was for a time suspended. It has since been re-organized. The following are the church statistics:

Bowman, Thomas, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the M. E. Church, was born July 15, 1817, near Berwick, Columbia Co., Pa. He prepared for college at the Wilbraham Academy, Mass., and at Cazenovia, N. Y. While a student at the latter place he was converted and joined the M. E. Church, Jan. 1, 1833. He graduated at Dickinson College, as valedictorian of his class, in 1837. After leaving college he spent one year in studying law, and was licensed to preach July, 1838; and traveled for one year as agent for the Pennsylvania Colonization Society. In 1839 he joined the Baltimore Conference, and was stationed in Beaver Meadow circuit. From 1840 to 1843 he was a teacher in the grammar school in Dickinson College; when his health becoming impaired, he was placed in a superannuated relation until 1848. He was then appointed professor of Dickinson Seminary, at Williamsport, Pa., which institution he organized, and over which he presided for ten years. In 1858 he was stationed at Lewisburg, Pa., and during the year was elected president of the Indiana Asbury University. He continued to act as president of the university from 1859 until 1872, when he was elected to the episcopacy. He received the title of Doctor of Divinity from the Ohio Wesleyan University in 1853, and that of Doctor of Laws from Dickinson College in 1872. He was elected chaplain to the United States Senate during the sessions of 1864 and 1865; and in 1864 was appointed by the General Conference as one of the delegates to attend the British Wesleyan Conference. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1868 and 1872. From 1839 to 1856 he was a member of the Baltimore Annual Conference; from 1856 to 1859, of the East Baltimore Conference; from 1859 to 1864, of the Southeast Indiana; from 1864 to 1872, of the North Indiana. Since his election to the office of bishop, in 1872, he has been actively engaged in episcopal duties, and has visited nearly all parts of the United States. His residence is in St. Louis, Missouri.

Boyce, W. B., an eminent British Wesleyan minister, was born in 1804. He went to Africa in 1829, where he made good proof of his ministry, and was very successful as the author of a Kafir grammar.

He made many valuable translations. He returned to England in 1843. Two years after he went to Sydney, N. S. Wales, where he labored for twelve years. In 1854 the Australian Conference was constituted, and its first session was held in Sydney, under the presidency of Mr. Boyce, who also held the office of general superintendent of missions in Polynesia. The following year he went to Engperary, Ireland, and lived in communion with that church until, when about sixteen years of age, he was converted to Protestantism. He became a local preacher in the Wesleyan Church in his native country. Removing to Canada at a time when Wesleyanism was unhappily divided, he was introduced into the itinerant ministry among the Primitive Methodists. He has filled the best stations in land, as representative of the Australian Conference; here he became missionary secretary in 1858. He went to Eastern British America and Canada in 1861. He returned to the Mission House, where he became senior secretary and deputy treasurer on the death of Dr. Hoole, and remained in labors more abundant till 1876, when he left England for New South Wales, to spend the evening of a long and useful life among his family and numerous friends.

Boyle, Robert, a Primitive Methodist minister in Canada, was born of Roman Catholic parents, in Tipperary, Ireland, and lived in communion with that church until, when about sixteen years of age, he was converted to Protestantism. He became a local preacher in the Wesleyan Church in his native country. Removing to Canada at a time when Wesleyanism was unhappily divided, he was introduced into the itinerant ministry among the Primitive Methodists. He has filled the best stations in the gift of the church. He has been its representative to the parent body in England, and to the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada in 1874. He has also been both president and secretary of his own Conference. He is now about fifty years of age.

Boyle, Thomas N., was born April 26, 1839, at Blairsville, Pa. While receiving an academical education at Bellefonte, Pa., he was converted, and became a member of the M. E. Church. He was licensed to preach in 1859, and was received into the Pittsburgh Conference one month afterwards. He has continued constantly in the work of the ministry, except several months' service as captain of a company of infantry during the late war. Eleven years of his itineracy have been spent in city appointments, one year presiding elder of South Pittsburgh district, and he is now on the Pittsburgh district, comprising all the charges of that large city.

Bradburn, Samuel, was converted when about eighteen years of age, and entered upon the work of the ministry in the British Wesleyan Church in 1774. He was endowed with extraordinary gifts, and his ministry was owned of God in the salvation of many souls. He traveled a great deal with John Wesley, and was with Charles Wesley when he died. He never fully recovered from the effects of a fever he had at Manchester, but he died as he had lived, "trusting wholly on the Lord Jesus, who was his all in all." Mr. Bradburn is buried in City Road chapel ground; only a brick wall separates his body from his warm and unchanging friend, the Rev. John Wesley.

Bradburn, Sophia, was a native of Gloucester, England. In the eighteenth year of her age she was converted, and immediately united with the Methodist society, of which she continued a true and faithful member to the end of her life. It is stated on good authority that she first suggested to Robert Raikes, with whom she was personally acquainted, the plan of Sunday-school instruction. As Mr. Raikes looked upon a large number of unfortunate children who roamed the streets of that city, he asked Miss Cook,—as that was her name before her marriage,—“What shall we do for these poor, neglected children?” She replied, “Let us teach them to read and take them to church.” The suggestion was adopted, and Mr. Raikes and Miss Cook conducted the first company of Sunday scholars to the church, exposed to the derision of the multitude as they passed along the street. She afterwards became the wife of Samuel Bradburn, one of the early Wesleyan preachers. Through the greater part of her life she was severely afflicted, yet in spite of her affliction she was accustomed to rise at four o'clock in the morning, and was a regular attendant upon the five o'clock preaching or prayer-meeting, which was customary in those early days. She was faithful in visiting the sick and efficient as a class-leader, and a devoted and faithful wife. It was her practice to read the entire morning service of the Church of England in her closet, and when she was so deeply afflicted that she could no longer do this, the service was held daily in her sick-room by her daughter. From her early life she enjoyed the fraternal friendship of John Wesley. She says that one of Wesley's many salutations which always filled her with the spirit of cheerfulness was, “Sophy! live to-day.” She died placidly and calmly, aged seventy-five years.

Braden, John, D.D., was born in the city of New York, Aug. 18, 1826. He was converted, and united with the M. E. Church at Monticello, Ill., in 1846; graduated at the Ohio Wesleyan University in 1853. He taught in the Female College at Xenia, Ohio, one year, and in 1854 was admitted into the Cincinnati Conference. He was successively appointed to New Carlisle, Jamestown, New Burlington, Rayssville, York Street, Cincinnati, and to the Ladies' Home Mission of that city. In 1860; and 1861 he was principal of the New Carlisle Academy. In 1867 he became president of the Central Tennessee College, was transferred to the Tennessee Conference, and placed in charge of Clark College, Nashville. In 1868 he was connected with the public schools in Nashville. In 1869 he was re-elected president of Central Tennessee College, which position he still holds. He was also presiding elder of Nashville district from 1872 to 1876, and was a delegate to the General Conference in 1876.

Bradford, Joseph, a British Wesleyan Methodist preacher, and traveling companion of John Wesley. For thirty-eight years he was an itinerant preacher, and in 1803 he was president of the British Conference. He was a pious and useful man. He died at Hull in 1808.

Bradley, Alexander.—Born in Baltimore, Md., in 1812, and possessed of a fair education, he early developed rare mechanical skill, and settled, in early manhood, in Pittsburgh, where he still resides, and has built up a colossal manufacturing establishment. He entered into manufacturing of iron-ware in 1836. In 1865 he founded the Tradesman National Bank, and became president, which office he has held ever since. Through his gift of $20,000 the "Bradley Professorship" was founded in Allegheny College. In 1874 he was elected president of the board of trustees of that institution. He is also a trustee of Beaver College and Musical Institute, and a director in the Pittsburgh Bank for Savings, and Pittsburgh Insurance Company. He was one of the originators of Christ church, in Pittsburgh, and has been for many years president of its board of trustees, and has held other official positions in the M. E. Church.

ALEXANDER BRADLEY, ESQ.

He has long managed the financial interests of the centenary fund for the endowment of Allegheny College, and other Conference funds. He has also contributed largely to the erection of a number of churches. He was an active and honored lay delegate to the General Conference of 1872.

Bragdon, Charles C., principal of Lasell Female Seminary, at Auburndale, is the son of Rev. C. P. Bragdon, deceased. He was educated in the Northwestern University, where he graduated, and was engaged as professor in Williamsport Seminary before accepting his present position. He added to his culture by traveling in Europe.

Bragdon, Edmund Erastus Eastman, D.D., a distinguished teacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Acton, Me., Dec. 8, 1812, and died at Lima, N. Y., March 20, 1862. He was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1841, and taught in the same year at the Mexicoville Academy, New York. In 1842 he was appointed principal of Fulton Academy; in 1846, principal of Mexicoville Academy; and in 1848, principal and financial agent of Falley Seminary. In 1853 he was elected Professor of Ancient Languages in the Ohio University; in 1854, Professor of the Latin Language in the Indiana Asbury University; and in 1858, Professor of Ancient Languages in Genesee College. Prof. Bragdon was engaged in pastoral work in the Black River and New York Conferences in 1844, 1845, 1847, and 1853.

Brakeley, John H., Ph.D., a native of Warren Co., N. J., born Nov. 14, 1816, was converted on his twenty-first birthday. While a student at Lafayette College, he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. He graduated in 1839, and received the degree of A.M. in course, and a few years after his Alma Mater conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. He became an educator, and taught a select school in Cecil Co., Md., then became principal of Port Deposit Academy, and afterwards spent five years as Professor of Languages and Natural Sciences in Wesleyan Female College, Wilmington, Del. He then took charge of Pennington Female Institute, and remained four years. In 1851 he founded Bordentown Female College, and was its president for twenty-three years. It greatly prospered under his presidency. He became a local preacher in 1842, and has long been an ordained elder. He was president of the National Local Preachers' Association in 1861-62, and held other official positions in the M. E. Church, and is now president of the board of trustees and steward of Trinity church, Bordentown, N. J.

Bramwell, William, was born at Elswick, Lancashire, in 1759, and died suddenly while attending the Methodist Conference at Leeds in 1818. His early educational advantages were limited, but his parents trained him to a religious and exemplary life. He united with the Methodists, much against the wish of his parents, and soon after, while listening to a sermon preached by Mr. Wesley, he received the evidence of his adoption. He at once became active in religious labors, conducting prayer-meetings early in the morning for the accommodation of working-people; and, having been appointed a class-leader, the Methodist society at Prewton, England, where he was an apprentice, was soon doubled. He entered the itinerant ministry in 1786, and for thirty years labored as a Methodist preacher, and was a great revivalist. Perhaps no man in his day gathered more into the Methodist communion than did he. In 1791, through his agency, a wide-spread revival in Dewsbury occurred; and in 1792, while on Bristol circuit, about five hundred were added to the societies. His success was similar on other circuits, reporting almost always at each Conference hundreds of additions to the church. "His energy was tireless, his understanding masculine, his decision of character unswerving, his voice singularly musical, his command over the passions of his hearers absolute. He was ascetic, an early riser for study and prayer; reading some, studying more, and praying most. He acquired a knowledge of the Greek and the French, and translated from the latter a very good work on preaching. He was scrupulous to a fault, and charitable to excess, giving even the clothes from his person to the poor. The quickness and clearness of his discriminations of character were marvelous, and led both himself and his friends to suppose that he possessed the power of discerning spirits." His memoir and life have been read by thousands to their comfort and edification.

Confederation. It is now about 1000 years old. Methodist services were introduced into the city by Dr. L. S. Jacoby, who had been appointed missionary to Germany, and who entered on his work in December, 1849. He fixed the headquarters of the mission in Bremen, and commenced publishing a newspaper and religious tracts, as well as holding religious services. He finally succeeded in erecting a large and commodious building, combining room for a chapel on the second floor with rooms for conducting the book business and for the residence of a missionary. It was dedicated on the 1st of April, 1855. It is sometimes known as the Tract House. At one time a theological institute for young men was conducted in Bremen, but it was subsequently removed to Frankfort. (See MARTIN INSTITUTE.) A large number of books have been Breedon, Henry, a supernumerary minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England. He commenced his ministry in 1831, in connection with the Arminian Methodists, a body of seceders in the midland counties, who united in 1837 with the Wesleyan Methodist Association. He was actively engaged in the work of the itinerancy until 1872, when increasing age and infirmities induced him to ask to be made a supernumerary. His request was complied with, and from that year he has resided in Leeds. Mr. Breedon when in the prime of life took a very active part in connexional affairs. For four years successively he was elected corresponding secretary; he was a member of the connexional committee for sixteen years, and in 1848 he filled the presidential chair.

Bremen (pop. 104,000) was formerly a free city in the north of Europe, embraced in the Germanic published in the German language, and a weekly paper, which circulates over 10,000 copies; also a Sunday-school paper having about the same circulation. There are now 243 members in Bremen and Bremerhafen, and the church property is valued at $31,000.

Brenton, Samuel, was born in 1810. He was converted in early life, and entered the Illinois Conference of the M. E. Church in 1830. In 1834 he located because of ill health, and studying law was admitted to the bar, and was regarded as a talented attorney and worthy counselor. In 1841, his health having been restored, he returned to the ministry, but in 1848 he became disabled by paralysis. He was highly regarded both by his brethren and the public. He was elected president of Fort Wayne College, where he labored one year with great acceptability. He was a member of the General Conference of 1848, and after his retirement from the ministry was appointed Register of the Land Office at Fort Wayne. He was also elected to Congress for three separate terms. He was taken sick in March, 1857, at Washington, and with difficulty was able to return to his home. His last hours were peaceful.

Bribery at Elections.—A bribe is something given or taken as a means to pervert justice, to secure office, or to violate duty. Anciently, it was practiced very extensively in the East, and in modern times it has sometimes assumed a magnitude and importance truly alarming. From Mr. Wesley it received frequent and unsparing denunciation; he regarding it as one of the fearful sins of the age. Endeavoring to correct the evil, he wrote in 1747, on the eve of an important Parliamentary election, a tract entitled "A Word to a Freeholder." He warned his own people that, though sorely tempted, they should not "even eat or drink at the expense of the candidate for whom they voted." In 1764 he wrote a pointed letter to the societies in Bristol, referring to a number of evils to which they were exposed. Among other things he says, "For God's sake; for the honor of the gospel; for your country's sake, and for the sake of your own souls, beware of bribery. Before you see me again the trial will come at the general election for members of Parliament. On no account take money or money's worth. Keep yourselves pure; give, not sell, your vote; touch not the accursed thing, lest it bring a blast upon you and your household."

This subject was considered of so much importance by Wesley that he placed it among the duties of his preachers to "extirpate bribery; that is, receiving anything directly or indirectly for voting in any election. Show no respect of persons herein, but expel all that touch the accursed thing." This rule was adopted by the American Methodists and in 1792, in view of the frequent corruption through strong drink, they added additional clauses to that strong statement. The section in the Discipline of the M. E. Church reads, "Extirpate bribery, receiving anything directly or indirectly for voting at any election. Show no respect of persons herein, but expel all that touch the accursed thing, and strongly advise our people to discountenance all treats given by candidates or at elections, and not to be partakers in any respect of such iniquitous practices." This warning is needed as much to-day as in Mr. Wesley's age, and unless the tendency is checked our free institutions will be exposed to great danger.

Bridge, Jonathan, a member of the New England Conference of the M. E. Church, was born in 1812, and was received on trial in that Conference in 1834. He filled the leading appointments of his Conference, was a close student, and developed intellectual powers far above mediocrity. "He was an ardent and devoted Christian, a sincere philanthropist, and a faithful minister of Christ." A few days before his death he wrote in pencil-marks a message to his brethren, in which he said, "The atonement is my great and glorious hiding-place." And a few moments before departing he whispered, "I never felt better in my life than now."

Bridgeport, Conn. (pop. 18,969), is situated on Long Island Sound, and is one of the oldest towns in the State. It was incorporated as a city in 1836. It is the seat of several large manufactories. In this vicinity Methodism was early introduced. Jesse Lee was appointed to Stamford circuit in 1789. He says, "It was my lot to go to that circuit alone, and to labor by myself. Another preacher was appointed to the circuit with me, but he failed." In 1790 he says, "On the 19th of May we organized the first class in Stratford (New Bridgeport), composed of a few loving persons, who were much despised in town on account of their religion and their attachment to the Methodists." A singular incident is related as having occurred at that time. "A Mrs. Wells was visiting a neighbor, Mrs. Weeler, and was relating to her a dream which she had the previous night, concerning a minister whom she saw arrive at the house, dismount, enter, and say, 'I am a minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and I have come to preach to the people of this place. If you will call your neighbors together I will preach to them to-night.' While describing him Jesse Lee rode up to the house, and, looking out of the window, she said, 'Why, there is the man now.'" In 1790, Stamford circuit was changed to Fairfield, and in 1795, to Redding. In 1813 Stratford circuit was organized. The growth of the church was for a number of years very slow, but more recently it has been quite prosperous. The present statistics are:

Bridgeton, N. J. (pop. 6830), a manufacturing town in Cumberland County. The first Methodist services were conducted by Rev. J. Walker, then in charge of the Salem circuit, which embraced the whole of Southern New Jersey. In 1808 Cumberland circuit was organized, and Bridgeton became one of its appointments. Previous to that time a small frame church had been built. In 1823 Bridgeton became a separate station, under the care of Rev. Dr. Pitman. In 1849 West Bridgeport, now Trinity church, was organized as a separate appointment, and in 1862 the Central church was established. Some twenty years since a secession occurred, which led to the formation of a Methodist Protestant Church. The present statistics are as follows:

Briggs, Martin C., D.D., is a native of the State of New York, but removed with his parents to Ohio early in life. He was educated at the W. R. T. Institute, under Dr. Asa Lord, and at Concord, N. H., under Dr. John Dempster. He united with the REV. MARTIN C. BRIGGS, D.D.

Erie Conference M. E. Church in 1845, and was transferred to California in 1850. He was the first editor of the California Christian Advocate, and was chosen the first president of the University of the Pacific. He was a member of the General Conference in 1860. He has filled stations and traveled districts as a presiding elder. Has served three pastoral terms in the First church of San Francisco, and is filling his third term in the church on Sixth Street, Sacramento. He has been a strong opponent of slavery, Romanism, and rum.

Bristol, Pa. (pop. 3269), on the west bank of the Delaware, nineteen miles above Philadelphia. Methodism was introduced into Bristol at an early period, but has not had a very rapid growth. It reports 462 members, 332 Sunday-school scholars, a church valued at $14,500 and a parsonage at $4000.

Bristow, James H., a minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Clark Co., Ky., July 26, 1813, and died in Paducah, March 1, 1870. He studied and commenced the profession of law; but, having been converted at a camp-meeting in 1832, he resolved to become a minister of the gospel. He was licensed as a preacher by the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and exercised his ministry for several years in Kentucky and Ohio. Becoming more thoroughly Arminian, he united with the M. E.

Church, under Rev. J. B. Finley. In 1844 he was admitted on trial in the Kentucky Conference, and at the separation of the church, being in Kentucky, he adhered to the Church South. Having filled prominent appointments, he was sent, in 1852, as a missionary to California, where he remained until the commencement of the war, in 1861. Though by birth and association Southern, he espoused the cause of the Union. Having returned to Kentucky, he found himself so surrounded with perils, that on a Sabbath morning he left a congregation that was assembling in Harden County and went to the camp of General Rousseau. He was immediately chosen as chaplain, and he retained the position till near the close of the war, sharing its dangers and hardships. Frequently he was trusted with important dispatches. After retirement from military life, he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and procuring an upper room on Market Street, Louisville, he preached and organized a class, which became the nucleus of the Methodist Episcopal Church in that city. Subsequently, he succeeded in organizing a society in Paducah, which, at his death, numbered 104 members. In the spring of 1870 he was struck with paralysis, and for five months was confined to his bed. Among his last expressions were, "I stand on the rock immortal and eternal, and have a bright assurance of eternal life."

British Methodist Episcopal Church.—This church embraces the members of the Methodist Church in Canada of the African race. It was originally part of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, but was constituted a separate Conference in 1856. Subsequently, it was separated into an independent church, of which Bishop Nazrey became the superintendent. From the time of its organization to 1864 Bishop Nazrey had claimed to be its bishop, and at the same time to be a bishop in the African M. E. Church. But this being disallowed by their General Conference, after that date he confined his supervision to Canada. Bishop Nazrey died in 1875, and Rev. R. R. Disney was elected in his place. His duties are multifarious, for in his address to the last Ontario Conference he said, "For the last half-year I have endeavored faithfully to discharge the various duties of bishop, editor, general book steward, and elder in charge of a large church, and treasurer of the whole connection, at one and the same time." There are two Conferences, the Ontario and the Nova Scotia, and there is also a mission in Bermuda, which reports a very prosperous work. They publish a paper called the Missionary Messenger, which circulated last year 22,000 copies; and they have commenced a small literary institution, called the Nazrey Institute. The Ontario Conference reports 25 preachers, with 1761 members, 839 Sunday-school scholars, 25 churches valued at $69,360, and 3 parsonages valued at $2050. We have not the statistics of the Nova Scotia Conference.

* Rebuilt 1833 and 1871.

Brook, S. G., was born in Cleveland, O., April 10, 1837, and was early a member of the Sunday-school and of the church. He entered Allegheny College in 1856, and graduated June, 1859, in the class with R. H. Mansell and J. S. Messimore, of India. He subsequently graduated at the Law School in Cleveland, in 1861. He spent five years in the army, holding the rank of major. He removed to Missouri in 1866, and for several years has been one of the editors and proprietors of the Macon Republican. He is an earnest church worker and superintendent of the Sunday-school. He was lay delegate from the Missouri Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Brockunier, Samuel, a pioneer minister of the M. E. Church, was born in German Valley, Huntington Co., Pa., June 12, 1795, and died in Bloomington, Ohio, July 22, 1867. He was converted Feb. 17, 1812. His license to preach was signed by Rev. J. B. Finley. In 1817 he was appointed by the presiding elder to Chautauqua circuit, the distance around which was between 300 and 400 miles, having thirty or forty times to preach each round. He organized upon that circuit many new societies and built the first church. He was received on trial in the Ohio Conference, at Steubenville, in 1818. Among his classmates was Dr. Charles Elliot. He filled a number of appointments in Ohio, Western Virginia, and Western Pennsylvania. He supplied a number of districts as presiding elder. His last appointment was that of agent for the Preachers' Aid Society, in 1854. In 1855 he was superannuated. He was faithful in all the work assigned to him as a minister. On one occasion he said, "My district, my circuit, my station, are all reduced to the narrow compass of an armed chair, but through all my afflictions my trust has been in the Rock of ages."

Brogden, Alexander, Esq., M.P., was born in 1825; educated at King's College, London. He is a justice of the peace for the county of Lancaster, and M.P. for Wednesbury. He is an influential Methodist, and a wealthy iron-master.

Brooklyn (pop. 396,099).—Captain Webb visited this city, then a small rural hamlet, about 1766, and preached, but formed no class. In 1768 he visited Newtown and Jamaica, on Long Island. Some years afterwards Woolman Hickson preached his first sermon in Brooklyn, standing upon a table in the open air in the street in front of where Sands Street church now stands. He offered, at the close of his sermon, to visit the village again if any one would open his house for worship. Mr. Peter Cannon, a cooper, accepted the proposal, and his shop near the ferry was for some time the regular place for holding the Methodist meetings. About 1785 or 1786, Mr. Hickson formed a class of several members, the leader of which was Nicholas Snethen, afterwards famous as a preacher. Long Island first appears in the list of appointments of the Conference of 1784, with 24 members. In 1786 the number of members had increased to 146 white and 8 colored. The church in Brooklyn was incorporated in 1794, and ground was purchased in the same year of J. and C. Sands, on New (now Sands) Street, for building a church. The corner-stone of the building was laid by William Phoebe, a sermon was preached on the foundation by Isaac Buck, and the church was dedicated June 1, 1794. Brooklyn was this year united with New York in appointment. It first appeared as a separate appointment in the next year (1795), with Joseph Totten as the preacher in charge, and 23 white and 12 colored members: Long Island had this year 226 white and 31 colored members. In 1800, Brooklyn reported 54 members (including white and colored), and Long Island 390 members. In 1804 the church on Sands Street had grown so much that the building had to be enlarged. In 1806 it returned 136 members, and the society promised to supply the preacher a house and an allowance of $160 a year. In 1808, Mr. Joshua Sands gave the church the amount of $100, that was still owing to him for the property, and in the next year presented it with land on High Street for a parsonage. A house of worship was built about 1810 to accommodate 1200 to 1500 persons. This church became popularly known as the "Old White Church," and was used till 1843, when the present Sands Street church was built. A separate building for Sunday-school rooms and class-rooms, and a parsonage, were added, making it one of the most completely furnished churches of its time. The body of John Summerfield reposes under the altar of this church. The Brooklyn society in 1810 reported 255 members, and Long Island 863 members. The name of the Long Island circuit disappears from the minutes this year, the appointments being made to Suffolk and Sag Harbor, and Jamaica. In 1817 the colored members of the society in Brooklyn built a separate house of worship, but were to continue under the care of the regular preachers. The majority of this society seceded some time after, and organized independently as the "African Wesleyan Methodist Episcopal Church." In 1820 there were in Brooklyn 277 members, and on the Long Island circuits 828 members. A second church, the York Street church, was organized in 1823, and its house of worship was dedicated June 6, 1824, Bishop George, John Summerfield, and the Rev. John Hannah, of England, officiating. In 1825 there were returned 417 members in Brooklyn, 135 in the mission for the west end of Long Island, and 885 for the other appointments on Long Island: in 1830, 566 members in Brooklyn, and 1249 in the circuits of Long Island.

Three new churches were added between 1830 and 1840: the Washington Street church, built in 1831, and set off as a separate station in 1835; the Ebenezer church, organized in 1837; and the Centenary church, formed in 1838. The church in Williamsburg, which has since become a part of Brooklyn, first appears on the list of appointments during this period. This society was formed about the beginning of the century, and built a church on North Second Street, in 1808. The foundation of a new church was laid on South Second Street, in 1837. The church was organized there in 1838, and its house of worship, the present South Second Street church, was dedicated in 1840. The churches in Brooklyn, Williamsburg, and Newtown this year reported 1665 members. Between 1840 and 1850 were organized the Eighteenth Street, Carlton Avenue (now Simpson), and Pacific Street churches, in Brooklyn, the Grand Street and South Fifth Street (now St. John's), in Williamsburg, and the First church, in Greenpoint. Between 1850 and 1860 the Dean Street (now Hanson Place), De Kalb Avenue, Nathan Bangs, Janes, Hedding Mission, Warren Street, First Place, William Street, Fleet Street, and Summerfield churches, in Brooklyn, and the South Third and Cook Street churches, in Williamsburg. In 1850 the churches in Brooklyn, Williamsburg, Greenpoint, and Bushwick returned 15 churches, 2527 members, and 405 probationers. In 1860 there were 24 churches, 4177 members, and 608 probationers. The Long Island district reported in this year 10,262 members and 1535 probationers. The Seventh Avenue, Nostrand Avenue, Wesley, Greene Avenue, Leonard Street, and Greenpoint Tabernacle churches were added between 1860 and 1870, and the minutes of that year showed 31 English-speaking churches, with 8618 members and 1209 probationers. A German mission had been organized as early as 1852, and was served in connection with the Williamsburg circuit. It grew into two churches, which were attached to the eastern German Conference, on the organization of that body. These two churches returned in 1870, 188 members and 37 probationers. A Swedish church was organized in 1869, which appears first on the minutes in 1873, with 260 members and 65 probationers.

The first African Methodist Episcopal Church was formed in 1818.

The first African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church was formed about the year 1840.

The first Methodist Protestant Church was formed in Williamsburg in 1832, by the withdrawal of a number of members from the existing Methodist Episcopal Church in that place. A second church was formed about 1859, and two others have been organized more recently. In 1873 the congregation of the Attorney Street Methodist church, New York, one of the oldest Methodist Protestant churches in the country, a large number of them having removed to Brooklyn, disposed of their church property in New York, bought the building of a Universalist society in the eastern district of Brooklyn, and removed their church organization to this city.

The Primitive Methodist Church of Brooklyn was organized in 1839.

A Wesleyan Church was organized in Williamsburg in 1843, but it was dissolved in the next year.

The following table exhibits the present condition of the Methodist churches in Brooklyn. The column of members includes probationers and local preachers, and that of the value of church property includes the parsonage, where there is one.

Brooks, Jabez, D.D., a professor in the State University of Minnesota, was born in Stockport, England, Sept. 18, 1823; was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1850, and in the same year became principal of the Watertown Seminary, Wisconsin. He was appointed Professor of Mathematics in Lawrence University in 1851, joined the Wisconsin Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1852, became principal of the preparatory department of Hamline University in 1854, and was chosen president of that institution in 1861. In 1869 he was appointed to his present position of Professor of the Greek Language and Literature in the State University of Minnesota. He has filled several pastoral charges in the Wisconsin and Minnesota Conferences, and was a member of the General Conference in 1864. He was in 1863 a member of the State Board of Normal Instruction of Minnesota, and a United States Commissioner on Indian payments, and in 1867 was president of the Minnesota State Teachers' Association, and again a member of the State Normal Board.

Brooks, Nathan Covington, LL.D., is president of the Baltimore Female College, and is also the author of a course of Greek and Latin classics, published by Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger, of Philadelphia. He was born in Cecil Co., Md., in 1809, and graduated at St. John's College. He has long been an active and exemplary member of the M. E. Church, and has long been engaged as an active and successful educator, having built the Baltimore Female College, and been its president from its foundation, in 1849, to the present time. He has also written a "History of the Mexican War," and a volume of Scripture poems, besides being a contributor to the monthlies and quarterlies.

Brown, E. S., was born in Brown Co., Ill., March 29, 1834. He was taught by pious parents to love the Saviour in his childhood. For fourteen years, during the early settlement of Illinois, his father's house was used as a preaching-place by the Methodist Episcopal branch, as well as a home for the traveling preacher. In his fifteenth year his parents moved to Iowa, and it was there he was converted four years later. When twenty years of age he received license to preach, from the Quarterly Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, of which he had become a member. For five years he served as local preacher. In his twenty-sixth year he joined the Iowa Conference, and has spent seventeen years in the active ministry. He has been president of the Iowa Conference three terms.

Brown, George, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Washington Co., Pa., Jan. 29, 1792. In early life his parents

removed to Jefferson Co., O. They had belonged to the first class of Methodists formed in Maryland and organized by Robert Strawbridge. His early education was limited. At a camp-meeting, near Baltimore, he was converted, August 21, 1813. He immediately commenced a course of religious reading, and in 1815 was appointed to Anne Arundel circuit, Maryland. For several years following, his circuits were in Maryland, Eastern Virginia, and Pennsylvania. In 1823 he was appointed presiding elder on Monongahela district. In 1826 he was appointed to Stenbenville. By this time the reform movement, embracing lay representation and opposition to the episcopacy, had become prominent, and he took an active part in writing and speaking in behalf of the reformers. He wrote a series of letters addressed to the junior bishop, and signed Junius. These letters were severe and uncompromising, and led to his final separation from the M. E. Church, his last appointment being by Bishop Roberts, to New Lisbon circuit. After full consideration, he decided to change his church relation and to join the associated churches, which formed the Methodist Protestant Church. From that time he became a leader, and was a member of every General Conference and Convention of the Methodist Protestant Church, until the separation occurred on account of slavery, in 1858. He was also a member of every similar council of the Methodist Church in the North and South. In 1853 he was elected president of the board of trustees of Madison College, Pennsylvania, and shortly afterwards to the presidency of the college. The same year he was appointed chairman of a committee to compile a new hymn-book. In 1860 he was elected editor of the Western Methodist Protestant, now Methodist Recorder, the official organ of the denomination, in which position he remained for two years. He was also president of the Pittsburgh Convention, in 1860. That year he removed from the vicinity of Pittsburgh to Springfield, O. He preached almost every Sabbath until the month of his death. His last days were sunny and calm. He died in great peace at his residence in Springfield, O., Oct. 25, 1871. He was the author of "Recollections of Itinerant Life" and of "The Lady Preacher."

This church was organized in connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church, but has become connected with the Primitive Methodist Church since the session of the New York East Conference in 1877. It appears on the minutes of the New York East Conference with 46 members, 12 probationers, 1 local preacher, and 72 scholars in the Sunday-school.

Brown, Hon. Charles R.—In early life he consecrated his talents to the service of God. Choosing the profession of law, he achieved fame by the publication of two volumes of "Circuit Court Reports." Subsequently, as judge of the Supreme Court of Michigan, presiding at important trials, the ermine was honored by his wise and judicious course. His devotion to Methodism was recognized by his election as a lay delegate to represent the Michigan Conference in the General Conference of 1872.

Brown, John N., a delegate from the Western New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Otsego Co., N. Y., in 1818, and joined the Genesee Conference in 1841. During the Civil War he served for three years as chaplain of the 11th Regiment of New York Volunteers, and participated in more than twenty engagements, among which was the battle of Gettysburg, Pa.

Brown, R., an active layman in the M. E. Church, was chosen to represent the Tennessee Conference as lay delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

Brown, Stephen D., an eminent minister of the M. E. Church, was born in Swanton, Vt., Sept. 13, 1815, and died in New York, Feb. 19, 1875, aged fifty-nine years. He was a son of Stephen S. Brown, an eminent jurist of that State, and a grandson of Rev. Amasa Brown, forty years pastor of the Baptist church in Hartford, N. Y. By diligent study he was admitted to the bar in September, 1835. His mind having changed as to the public duties of life, he commenced the study of theology, and was admitted into the Troy Conference in 1837; thus abandoning most brilliant prospects of the legal profession. In 1857 he was transferred to the

New York Conference, after having filled a number of important stations in Vermont and New York. He was especially successful in the city mission and church extension work. He was appointed on the Tract, Sunday-School, and Conference Education Boards, and was also one of the managers of the Missionary Society. His ministry altogether was one of marked ability and success, standing very high among the counselors in the Conference, and a faithful administrator of the Discipline. His influence in the establishment of Methodism in Vermont is reported to have been very great, because of his high social position, his ripe culture, his fine legal talents, his eloquence and fervent piety. He was a strong advocate of temperance, and was earnestly engaged in the anti-slavery cause. On special occasions as a public speaker and preacher he had great power. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1864 and 1872. When his last sickness came he seemed ambitious to live for yet greater usefulness, and when informed that his sickness was fatal, he said, "I had not thought that my life work was so nearly done; but if it is God's will, it is all right. I have been preparing for this hour for many years."

Brown, William Roberts, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerancy in 1835; was president of the Annual Assembly in 1865.

Brownfield, Hon. John, a native of Uniontown, Pa., born about 1811, and for nearly half a century an active, useful, and honored member of the M. E. Church, having been received into church fellowship by the late Rev. Dr. Charles Elliott, of precious memory. He has been a class-leader all his religious life, and a devoted worker in the Sunday-school. Long a resident of South Bend, Ind., he organized the first Sunday-school in that place, and has held the position of superintendent from that time until the present. He has held the position of trustee of Indiana Asbury University, and is a liberal supporter of it, and also of educational interests generally. He was lay delegate to the General Conference of 1872, representing the Northwest Indiana Conference.

Brownlow, William G., ex-governor of Tennessee and ex-United States Senator from that State, was born in Wythe Co., Va., in 1805, and died at Knoxville, Tenn., April 29, 1877. He learned the trade of a carpenter, but in 1826 joined the Holston Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and labored in the itinerant work for ten years. In 1832 he was a delegate to the General Conference. He became editor of the Knoxville Whig (Tennessee) in 1839, and acquired his greatest fame in connection with that journal. In 1856 he published a work entitled "The Iron Wheel Examined and its False Spokes Extracted," a reply to attacks made upon the M. E. Church. He supported the institution of slavery, and defended it in pamphlets which he published on the subject. In 1858 he held a public discussion in Philadelphia with the Rev. A. Pryne on the question, "Ought American Slavery to be perpetuated?" in which he advocated the perpetuation of slavery on both moral and economical grounds. When the Civil War broke out Mr. Brownlow took the side of the Union, advocated its cause with vigor, and exerted a strong influence in developing and strengthening the Union sentiment in East Tennessee. He was arrested for treason to the Confederate States in 1861, and imprisoned for several months, but was finally escorted outside of the Confederate lines and released. Upon the capture of Nashville by the forces of the United States, he returned to Tennessee. He was elected governor of the State in 1865, and at the close of his term was elected to the Senate of the United States. At the close of his term, in 1875, he became editor of the Knoxville Chronicle.

Bruce, Philip, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in North Carolina, a descendant of the Huguenots, and a soldier of the Revolution. He entered the itinerant missionary in 1781, and traveled extensively, filling the most important stations until 1817, when he became superannuated. He died in Giles Co., Tenn., May 10, 1826. He was very efficient as a preacher, presiding elder, and as a delegate to the General Conference. Near the close of his life he said, "Indeed, my work is well-nigh done, and I am waiting in glorious expectation for my change." At the time of his death, he was the oldest traveling preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church, except Freeborn Garrettson. The Virginia Conference directed that a suitable monument should be erected over his grave.

Bruehl, Rudolph A. W., born in Ratibor, Germany, Dec. 29, 1828, was educated by Roman Catholic parents in that faith. At fourteen he was placed under the charge of the priests, to be trained for the priesthood, but their fallacies and imperfections led him to enter commercial life and espouse infidelity. He came to the United States July 7, 1851, and was providentially thrown among the Methodists, and joined the German M. E. Church, in Philadelphia, that year. In 1853 he was sent to Baltimore as a teacher and colporteur of the M. E. Tract Society, and in 1854 he was called by Swormstedt and Poe, Cincinnati, to superintend the German department of the Western Book Concern. In 1856 he succeeded in having the first German Sunday-school paper established, by authority of the General Conference. In 1863 he became a local preacher, and subsequently was ordained. Through his efforts the Christian Apologist fund, for sending papers, tracts, etc., to the army during the Civil War, was established, and it accomplished good results. In 1863 he was identified with the founding of the German Wallace College and the first German Methodist orphan asylum, at Berea, Ohio. He was lay delegate from the Central German Conference to the General Conference of 1872, and devoted his labors to establish the German Sunday-school department. He was that year elected a member of the general book committee, and in 1876 re-elected, and occupied the position of secretary of the Western section and of the local committee. He is a trustee of the German Wallace College, trustee of the German Methodist Orphan Asylum, trustee of the church, class-leader, steward, Sunday-school superintendent, and an officer in several general church boards. He is the author of several publications, "Soldiers' Friend," "Divine Service of the Roman Catholic Church," etc. He has spent most of his religious life in church work, and is now in the insurance business.

Brunner, John H., a minister of the M. E. Church South, was admitted into the traveling connection in 1840. He has performed his ministerial work chiefly in the Holston Conference of the M. E. Church South. After filling various charges he became president of Hiwassee College, and has discharged the duties of that office with but slight intermission for more than sixteen years.

Brunow, J. J. F., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ellerbeld, Germany, March 13, 1833. He was thoroughly educated in his youth, and he retained through life studious habits. He emigrated to New York in 1852, when nineteen years of age. He removed to California, and was converted at a camp-meeting held by the M. E. Church South. In 1856 he was called by Bishop Pierce to Texas, and he engaged in ministerial work in the Church South. About two years after the outbreak of the Civil War he left Texas and went to New York. For a short time he labored on a German mission in the city of Newark, N. J., in connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1866 he took charge of the Second German Presbyterian church of that city, and served with great acceptability that congregation for three years. When the East German Conference of the M. E. Church was organized in Philadelphia in 1869, Mr. Brunow became a member of that Conference, and was appointed to the First M. E. church in that city. His earnest and faithful labors were crowned with success. About the close of his third year he was transferred to Texas, by Bishop Janes, in December, 1871, and was appointed to the German mission at Austin. Here, by excessive labors, Mr. Brunow overtaxed his strength, and died Aug. 1, 1872.

Brunson, Alfred, D.D., a delegate from the West Wisconsin Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Connecticut in 1793: was licensed to preach when twenty-two years of age, and joined the Ohio Conference in 1821. He was a warm defender of the doctrines and polity of the church, and wrote for the Itinerant during the radical controversy. He became engaged in mission work on the Upper Mississippi in 1835, and the active period of his life was mainly spent on the frontiers. Dr. Brunson was also a member of the General Conference in 1832, 1860, and 1868. As a presiding elder, he has had the charge of seven different districts. He has told the story of his life and ministerial work in a book entitled "The Western Pioneer: or, Incidents in the Life and Times of Alfred Brunson."

Bryan, J. M., was born in slavery in Newbern, N. C., June 1, 1817, and died at Donaldsonville, Miss., Jan. 2, 1876. When seventeen years of age his owners removed to Tennessee, taking him with them, with whom he remained until the twenty-second year of his age. He was then sold to a wealthy planter in Louisiana, in whose family he received religious and secular instruction far beyond many others of his day. He united with the M. E. Church, and remained with his owners until 1865, when he came to New Orleans at the re-organization of the Mississippi Conference by Bishop Thomson. At this session he was admitted on trial and appointed to Vicksburg, where he planted the church, and succeeded during the year in erecting the first M. E. Church building in that city. He was next appointed to Martinsville, where he remained three years, built one church, and organized three other congregations. He was successively appointed to Donaldsonville, to Sixth Street, New Orleans, and to St. James' chapel, Donaldsonville, where he died. Just before his departure he said, "My way is clear; there is no veil between me and my God: even sin. I am now passing over Jordan." He was a good man, a close student, a true Methodist preacher, and everywhere useful in planting the church.

Buckingham, N. S., a delegate from the Central Pennsylvania Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Montgomery Co., Va., and joined the Baltimore Conference in 1843. He has done pastoral work in the Baltimore, East Baltimore, and Central Pennsylvania Conferences.

Buckley, James M., D.D., a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872 and 1876, was born in Rahway, N. J., and was educated at Pennington Seminary, N. J., and Wesleyan University. He studied theology at Exeter, N. H., and joined the New Hampshire Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1858. His pastoral work has been performed in the New Hampshire, Detroit, and New York East Conferences. He has written considerably for the periodical press of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has published several small works, one entitled "An Appeal to Persons of Sense and Reflection to begin a Christian Life" (N. Tibbals & Sons, New York), also one on the "Theatre," another of an argumentative character, entitled "Modern Miracles" (Hurd & Houghton, New York). He is one of the managers of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is one of the committee appointed in accordance with the action of the General Conference of 1876 to revise the Hymn-Book.

Bucyrus, O. (pop. 3066), the capital of Crawford County, situated on the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad. It was for several years connected with various circuits. It is first mentioned by name in the records of the church for 1834, when Rev. J. Kinnear was appointed to that circuit. The circuit reported, in 1835, 315 members. The first church, a small frame structure, has been replaced by a substantial brick edifice.

L., William H., and Samuel Budgett are treading in their father's steps. Their prosperity has been cumulative, and their wealth has been consecrated to the service of God. The subject of this notice is a liberal contributor to all the funds, is one of the treasurers of the British Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society, and occupies a high position in the councils of the connection. He has visited our Continental missions in France, Germany, and Italy, and we trust he may long live to be a helper of the church.

Mr. Budgett is not a stranger to transatlantic Methodism, having visited the various churches in America.

Buenos Ayres, South America (pop. 177,800). —In 1835 the condition of South America attracted Christian attention. The Missionary Board of the M. E. Church sent Rev. S. C. Pitts to visit Buenos Ayres and other cities. Having reported favorably, Dr. John Dempster was, in 1836, appointed to that city. The first services established were in the English language, as a large number of English and American citizens resided in the city. By their liberal contributions, assisted by the Missionary Society, a neat church was erected, and a self-supporting congregation was established. From this centre a religious influence extended to other parts of the republic, and services in the Spanish language were subsequently commenced. Gaining strength, the congregation resolved to erect a new place of worship, as indicated in the accompanying wood engraving. "Its stained-glass windows and its seats were imported from the United States. There is an audience-room in front, with a Sunday-school room, an infant-class room in the rear of it, also the Young Men's Christian Association room, the pastor's study, the Sunday-school library-room, and class-rooms. Over these rear rooms is the parsonage, which has a parlor, dining-room, four bedrooms, kitchen, and bath-room, all comfortably furnished. The whole is a very beautiful and convenient mission property. The English-speaking Sunday-school connected with the mission has an average attendance of 150 scholars. The Spanish-speaking Sunday-school has an average attendance of about 50 scholars. In the social meetings both languages are commingled, and it is no uncommon thing to hear testimonies or prayers, at the same love-feast, in Spanish, German, French, and English. Rev. H. G. Jackson has been pastor of the English congregation, and Mr. Rial, a converted priest, is his assistant in the Spanish work. Mr. Jackson himself preaches well in Spanish. The congregation on nearly all occasions fills the lecture-room, and the haven of a free and full salvation is slowly but surely working. The new building is a great step toward a position of power and influence for Methodism in the country. The government, in view of the educational influence of the church, has given $1000 toward the erection of this building."

BUENOS AYRES METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Buffalo, N. Y. (pop. 117,714), a large and growing city on Lake Erie, which owes its prosperity both to manufactures and commerce. It first appears in the annals of Methodism, under the title of the Holland Purchase, and subsequently as New Amsterdam circuit. During the War of 1812 it was burned by the British and Indians. In 1813, Rev. James Gilmore visited the hospital and military post, and preached to the soldiers. In 1817 a class of eight or nine persons was formed at Buffalo, and Rev. Gleeson Filmore was appointed the following year to Buffalo circuit. He had just been received on trial, and on his arrival found the little class consulting what they should do to secure a preacher. At that period there was no church edifice in the place; the Presbyterians occupied the court-house and the Episcopalians the only school-house. Mr. Filmore obtained leave to occupy the school-house when not used by the Episcopalians. Prejudice, however, was soon aroused, and he was notified by some of the citizens that the town was sufficiently supplied with ministers, and that his services were not needed. He informed them he had been appointed, and should remain whether he was supported or not. He proceeded to lease a lot and to contract for the erection of a church. A plain building, 25 feet by 35, was dedicated in January, 1819, being the first church erected in the Holland Purchase. The people were so poor and business so prostrate that he solicited funds from abroad. The little church was soon filled with attentive hearers, and a number were awakened. He also preached at Black Rock, in a building fitted up for a school-room in the barracks. At the end of his second year he reported 82 members. He received for his services the first year $70, and for the second $150. Owing to various difficulties the church grew but slowly for many years. The building of Grace church, about twenty years since, gave a new impulse to the work, which was greatly increased by the building of Delaware Avenue church. Services were commenced in the German language in 1847, by Rev. J. N. Sauter, a converted Catholic, out of which have grown North Buffalo and Buffalo circuits, comprising six preaching-places, with a membership of 292. The present statistics are:

Bugbee, Lucius H., D.D., president of Allegheny College, was born in Gowanda, N. Y., Nov. 25, 1830. He was converted in 1845, and united with the church in 1850. Having pursued his studies in the public school, he entered the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary in 1850, and remained until 1853. During this time he was licensed to preach. He entered the Senior class of Amherst College, and graduated in 1854, and the same year became Professor of Logic and Rhetoric in Cooperstown Seminary. In 1855 he removed to Iowa, and, after spending two years in business, united with the Upper Iowa Conference in 1857. His first appointment was as principal of the Fayette Seminary. The following year the institution was organized as the Upper Iowa University, and he was elected its first president, where he remained until 1860. Having resigned on account of impaired health, he was transferred to the Rock River Conference, and occupied important charges until, in 1865, he was elected president of the Northwestern Female College, at Evanston. In 1868 he accepted the presidency of the Cincinnati Wesleyan College, where he re-organized that institution, which had been suspended for two years. In 1875 he was elected president of Allegheny College, which position he now fills. The degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by the Ohio Wesleyan University in 1869.

Building Churches.—The manner in which churches should be built, and the method of paying for them, very early engaged the attention of Mr. Wesley. In his larger minutes, he directs that all the preaching-houses, wherever the ground would permit, should be built in the octagon form. He supposed this shape was best for the voice, and furnished for a given expense a greater amount of room. The minutes further directed, "Let the roof rise only one-third of its breadth. Have doors and windows enough, and let all the windows be sashes opening downward; let there be no Chinese paling and no tub pulpit, but a square projection with a long seat behind. Let there be no pews and no backs to the seats. It should have aisles on the sides, and be parted in the middle by a rail running along, to divide the men from the women." These directions, peculiar as some of them are, arose partly out of the state of society, and partly from the liability to interruption by evil-disposed persons, to which the congregations were constantly subject. He also directed that the churches should be built "plain and decent, and not more expensive than was absolutely unavoidable." In 1774 the American Conference directed every preacher in charge to take a general collection at Easter, to be applied to the payment of church debts, and also to relieve necessitous preachers. Similar provisions were adopted in 1784. In 1789 a yearly subscription was required for building churches. In 1820 a rule was adopted which required the churches to be built with free seats. In 1852 this was limited to wherever it might be practicable. Prior to this time, it was contrary to the economy of the church to build houses with pews to sell or rent: and the Annual Conferences were enjoined to prevent as far as possible such arrangements. Since 1852 the provision of the Discipline is, "Let all our churches be built plain and decent, and with free seats wherever practicable, but not more expensive than is absolutely unavoidable." It is further required that the "Quarterly Conference shall appoint a judicious committee of at least three members of our church, who shall form an estimate of the amount necessary

Danube, is washed by the Black Sea on the east, touches Servia on the west, and is divided by the Balkan Mountains from the province of Roumelia on the south. It has an area of about 39,000 square miles, and a population of 2,500,000, of which 40 per cent. are Bulgarians, 20 per cent. Ottomans (Turks), and the rest are of various nationalities. The territory of Bulgaria formed a part of the ancient Mœsia, and was incorporated in the Roman empire. The original inhabitants were driven out by Slavic tribes, and these in turn were subdued by the Bulgarians, a Tartar or Finnic tribe, who occupied the country in the seventh to build; and three-fourths of the money, according to such estimate, shall be secured or subscribed before any such building shall be commenced." "In all cases where debts for building houses of worship have been, or may be, incurred contrary to or in disregard of the above recommendation, our members and friends are requested to discountenance such a course by declining to give pecuniary aid to all agents who shall travel abroad beyond their own circuits or districts for the collection of funds for the discharge of such debts: except in such peculiar cases as may be approved by an Annual Conference, or such agents as may be appointed by their authority."

Bulgaria, a province of European Turkey, formerly an independent kingdom, lies south of Roumania, from which it is separated by the century. In the end the Bulgarians became absorbed in the more numerous Slavic race. They figured in the later history of the Roman empire as one of the tribes which contributed to its disintegration. From the seventh century to 1018, and again from 1196 to the close of the fourteenth century, Bulgaria formed an independent kingdom. About the latter period it was subdued by the Hungarians, and afterward, in 1389, was conquered by the Turks, to whom it has been subject ever since. Of the population of Bulgaria, about 170,000 are Mohammedans, 6000 are Roman Catholics, and the rest are attached to the Greek Church, which has among them ten archbishoprics and three bishoprics. Missionary effort is directed to that part of the population which is attached to the Greek Church. The mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church was begun in 1857. The Bulgarian Christians were disturbed by controversies growing out of the assumptions of the Greek priesthood and bishops, and their attempts to employ the Greek language in the schools and services of the church to the exclusion of the Bulgarian. The American Board were invited to send missionaries into Bulgaria, but were not able at that time to undertake the work, and recommended the field to the society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The Rev. Wesley Prettyman and the Rev. Albert L. Long, and their wives, the first missionaries, reached the country in September, 1857, and established themselves at Tultcha. They were reinforced in 1859 by the Rev. F. W. Flocken and his wife. A school was opened at Tultcha, and continued in operation till 1868, when the headquarters of the mission were removed to Rustchuk. Mr. Long removed to Constantinople in 1863, became connected with Robert College, and engaged in the preparation of books in the Bulgarian language, but still continued to superintend the mission. In 1870 the mission employed five missionaries and three assistants, and returned 27 members of the church and 3 probationers. In the following year adverse circumstances befell it, and active work was temporarily suspended, although Dr. Long from Constantinople exercised a general superintendence over its interests, and preached regularly to the Bulgarians in that city. The work was resumed in 1873, when Dr. Long resigned the superintendency of the mission, and the Rev. F. W. Flocken was appointed in his place, and a new force of missionaries was sent out. In 1876 three American missionaries were employed, with eight native assistants, and a school for preparing additional laborers was in operation at Rustchuk, with six students. The following is a summary of the statistical report of the mission for 1876:

One female Bible-reader is employed at Tultcha, and one at Lom Palanka. Day schools are established at Rustchuk, Tultcha, and Loftcha, with 3 teachers and 46 scholars. The contributions of the mission for the year were $94.20. The mission possesses property at the various stations, the total value of which is given at $531.63.

The missions of the American Board in European Turkey operate largely among the Bulgarians of Roumelia and Constantinople, although they are not strictly within the limits of Bulgaria proper. This society has stations at Constantinople, Eski Zagra, Samokore, and Monastir, with 8 out-stations, 3 churches, and 14 preaching-places, 10 missionaries, 33 assistants of various kinds, 154 members, 14 Sunday-schools, with 367 scholars, and 4 common schools, with 83 scholars. A Bulgarian evangelical society has been organized at Samokore.

Bulgarian Language.—Bulgaria and the adjacent province of Moldavia are supposed to have been the cradle of the Slavic language. The ancient Bulgarian language was the richest of all the family, and was the scriptural language of the Greek-Slavic Church, and the great medium of ecclesiastical literature in the ancient Slavic lands. Among the works of ancient Bulgarian literature are the translation of the Bible by Cyril and Methodius, and the writings of John of Bulgaria, of the tenth century. Modern Bulgarian literature furnishes little that is worthy of note, and consists chiefly of a few elementary works and religious books, and the national songs. The number of works published in Bulgaria by the missionary societies is not yet very large. A version of the New Testament was printed at Smyrna for the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1840. The Rev. Dr. Riggs missionary of the American Board at Smyrna, published, in 1849, a Bulgarian grammar, and a translation of Gallaudet's "Child's Book of the Soul." A number of works are published and circulated by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, whose catalogue is added to from year to year. The Rev. Dr. Long, formerly superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal mission, has assisted in the preparation of many of these works, and is the editor of the Zornitza, a monthly paper for children, published by this society. A weekly paper was established in December, 1875, which in a short time attained a circulation of 1600 copies. In 1875 there were printed at the press of the American Board, in the Bulgarian language, 17,000 copies of periodicals and tracts, containing 306,000 pages.

The Methodist Episcopal Church is represented in Bulgarian literature principally by the work of Dr. Long, in a translation of the Bible, which he executed in connection with Dr. Riggs of the American Board and two Bulgarian literary gentlemen, and by his labors in connection with the publications of the American Board. While he was actually engaged in the regular mission work, Dr. Long made translations and wrote tracts, which were published and circulated through the American Board Press. He also projected and started the Zornitza. Since his transfer to Robert College, Constantinople, he has been engaged in work of this kind, so that a large proportion of the publications of this society are the fruits of his labors. The Rev. H. W. Flocken, the present superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal mission, has prepared a "Church History" in Bulgarian, and translations of Ralston's "Christian Institutes," Binney's "Theological Compend," and "Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church," which are circulated among the students, and used by them in manuscript, but have not been printed. A "Life of Huss," a pamphlet of forty-eight pages, was published from the Methodist Episcopal Press in 1876, and is its first issue.

Bundy, Hon. Hezekiah S., is a native of Marietta, O.; was born Aug. 15, 1817, and now resides at Wellston, Jackson County. He received a fair English education, and entered mercantile life for a brief time, but he left that vocation to promote large landed interests at his present residence. He became a member of the church in his early manhood. In 1848 he was elected a member of the Ohio Legislature, and served either in the House or Senate for several years. Upon entering public life he became a member of the bar, though still identified somewhat with large manufacturing interests, and was a Presidential elector in 1860. He was elected to the Thirty-Ninth Congress in 1864, but declined a re-election. He was again elected, to the Forty-Third Congress, in 1872. The same year he represented the Ohio Conference as lay delegate to the General Conference. Much of the time since his retiring from public life has been devoted to iron manufacturing interests, and to the development of his extensive mineral lands.

Bunting, Jabez, D.D., was born at Manchester, May 13, 1779, and died June 16, 1858. His parents very early resolved that he should have the best education they were able to procure. At the excellent school where he was placed he was for a time exposed to a great deal of annoyance because he was a Methodist, but his talents and manliness soon won him the respect of all. His parents made it an essential condition that his nights and Sabbaths should be spent at home. Dr. Percival, who was his instructor in medicine, was an anti-trinitarian, and his parents were anxious to save him from this erroneous teaching. He was converted when about sixteen years of age. At nineteen he was licensed to preach, and in 1799 received from the Conference his first appointment, which was Oldham. He soon gained superior influence over his brethren, by virtue of his superior talents. "He regarded Methodism as a great work of God formed to be of signal benefit to the world, and he gave himself with all his powers to promote its efficiency. He well understood its principles, and saw to what essential results those principles would lead, if vigorously carried out, and his practical mind very early engaged in clearing away obstacles, and in creating new facilities for its successful action." To Jabez Bunting is the Wesleyan Missionary Society indebted for its organization. For some eighteen years he was one of its secretaries. He was four times elected president of the Conference. He was president of the Wesleyan Theological Institution from its foundation in 1834 until his death. In organizing and administrative talents he was superior. Though a devoted Methodist, his Christian philanthropy led him to love all Christians.

Dr. Bunting heard Dr. Chalmers preach in 1847, and called to see him in the afternoon. Dr. Chalmers says of this visit, "Delighted with a call after dinner from Dr. Bunting, with whom I and Mr. Mackenzie were left alone for an hour at least; most exquisite intercourse with one of the best and wisest of men. Mr. M. and I both love him to the uttermost." His last years were spent in great suffering. His feelings were depressed, but his faith prevailed. He was heard to say, "Perfect peace," and his very last words were, "Victory, victory, through the blood of the Lamb!"

Bunting, Wm. M., was the eldest son of Dr. Bunting, and a British Wesleyan minister. He was a man of rare gifts, natural and acquired. The Christian ministry furnished him with full and delightful employment for all his varied powers. He had pre-eminently the gift of sacred song. Eight of his exquisitely beautiful hymns are in the New Wesleyan Hymn-Book just issued; while many of his fugitive pieces are to be found in the old magazines over the nom de plume of Alec.

He was a supernumerary seventeen years, and died November, 1866, in the sixty first year of his age.

Burch, Robert, was born in Tyrone Co., Ireland, about 1777, and died at Canandaigua, N. Y., July, 1855. He entered the itinerant ministry in the Baltimore Conference in 1804. From 1811 to 1815 he was presiding elder of Carlisle district, and in 1816 was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference, and stationed in Philadelphia. He was for some time the traveling companion of Bishop Asbury. He filled important appointments in Baltimore and Philadelphia; was a man of commanding powers and devoted piety; and was one of the most efficient pioneers in American Methodism.

Burch, Thomas, was born in Tyrone Co., Ireland, Aug. 30, 1778, and died suddenly, Aug. 22, 1849. In 1801 he was awakened and converted under the preaching of Gideon Ouseley. In 1805 he was admitted on trial in the Philadelphia Conference. He was elected to the first delegated General Conference of 1812. Having preached for some time in the Canada part of the New York Conference, after the close of the war with Great Britain, he returned to the United States, and continued in the itinerant ranks until stricken suddenly with heart disease. His last sermon was preached about ten days before his death.

Burial of the Dead.—The Methodist Church has always regarded sepulture as the only proper way of disposing of the dead. In the early history of the church, the Conference considered that it was scarcely lawful to preach funeral sermons upon all occasions, irrespective of the character of the person deceased. Hence, in 1777, this question was asked, "Has not the preaching of funeral sermons been carried so far as to prostitute that venerable custom, and in some sort to render it contemptible? Yes. Therefore let all the preachers inform their societies that we will not preach any but for those who, we have reason to think, have died in the fear and favor of God." These preachers were not only under the control of Mr. Wesley, but they still regarded themselves in the Church of England. Some of these preachers had been at least partially trained up in that church, and one part of the burial service forbids the office "to be used for any that die unbaptized or excommunicated, or have laid violent hands on themselves." But when Mr. Wesley sent to America the ritual for the government of all the services in the church, he omitted that part of the service. It was therefore left to the judgment and discretion of the preachers of the American Conference. In 1792 a note was prefixed to the burial service, which said, "The following or some other solemn service shall be used." The Discipline now, however, makes it the duty of the minister attending the funeral service to follow the form laid down in the Discipline, as it says, "In administering the sacraments and in the burial of the dead let our form of ritual invariably be used." The church also forbids making a charge for any services performed by the minister. The rule reads, "We will on no account whatever make a charge for administering baptism or for burying the dead." As to the use of the form of service, the custom is not uniform, however, and in many instances ministers do not consider it proper to use the burial service over the remains of one who has died unrepentant. The form of service has been but little changed, except in some of the Scripture selections, since it was first adopted by the church in 1792. At the house where the service is held, the minister is required by the Discipline to read as introductory Scripture John xi. 25, 26, Job xiv. 25, 27, I. Timothy vi. 7, Job i. 21. If the remains are conveyed to a church, then the minister preceding the corpse shall repeat those Scriptures to which we have referred. At the house, or in the church, he may read Psalm xxxix. or xc., I. Corinthians xv. 41, 58. At the grave, when the corpse has been laid in the grave, the minister shall read the ritual as contained in the Discipline.

Burke, William, a pioneer Methodist preacher, a native of Virginia, was converted in 1790, when twenty years of age. In 1791 he was sent to the Holston Mountains. Few men saw harder service than he, traveling by night in order to escape the dangers threatened by the Indians throughout that region. After laboring in Virginia and Tennessee, he was for a time an active presiding elder. His life was full of adventure and of great suffering, traveling frequently a hundred miles without the sight of a house or human being. He labored twenty-six years in Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio. In 1811 he organized and took charge of the first Methodist station in Cincinnati, and, it is believed, the first in Ohio. His health failing, he retired from the effective work. He was appointed judge of the county, and afterwards postmaster of the city, and held the latter office for twenty-eight years. Becoming involved in trouble, however, he was suspended by the Conference in 1818. He thereupon organized an independent church in Cincinnati, which flourished for a few years and then failed. After a long-continued investigation, the General Conference of 1836 restored his name to the minutes. He died in Cincinnati in 1855, aged eighty-five. He was a member of the committee of fourteen who, in 1808, drafted the Restrictive Rules of the church.

Burlington, Iowa (pop. 13,930), is the capital of Des Moines County, situated on the Mississippi River. It is one of the first places where Methodism was planted in the State, and is mentioned in the minutes of 1836. For a number of years it was connected with a circuit. The present statistics are as follows:

Burlington, N. J. (pop. 5817), was settled in 1677, five years before Philadelphia. As early as 1769, Captain Webb preached in this place. Among the first converts was Christian Joseph Toy, in 1770. A class was soon formed, and Mr. Toy was appointed leader. It is the first place in New Jersey where Mr. Asbury preached, in 1771. A revival occurred in 1772, and the next year Mr. Asbury writes, "The little society appears to be in a prosperous state." A small frame church was erected in 1790, and Mr. Asbury writes, "After there had been Methodist preaching in Burlington for twenty years, they have built a very beautiful meeting-house." The growth of the church has not been rapid for the last twenty years. The present statistics are:

Burlington, Vt. (pop. 14,387), situated beautifully on the eastern side of Lake Champlain, is the most important city in the State. It was early visited by Freeborn Garretson, who traversed this region in 1793. It is probable there were Methodist services as early as 1799 or 1800, but the name does not appear upon the minutes for several years afterwards. At one period there were two churches in the city, but these were united and a fine edifice was built. There are now 314 members, 275 Sunday-school scholars, a church valued at $62,000 and a parsonage at $4000.

Burns, Alexander, D.D., was born in Castlewellan, County Down, Ireland, in August, 1834, and removed to Canada when twelve years old. He was reared a Presbyterian, but was converted, and joined the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Toronto in 1851. He entered the Victoria University in 1855, and was mathematical tutor one year, and classical tutor two years, before graduation. He graduated in 1861, winning the Prince of Wales gold medal, as "Primus in Artibus." He remained one year as classical teacher in the university, and entered the ministry, and was ordained at Toronto in 1864. He removed to Iowa at the invitation of the venerable Dr. Charles Elliott, and remained with him in the Iowa Wesleyan University three years, as Professor of Mathematics and vice-president of the university. He accepted the presidency of Simpson Centenary College in 1868, and was elected president of the Iowa Wesleyan University in 1869, but declined the offer. The same year he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the Indiana State University. He was a delegate to the General Conference of 1876, and is still president of Simpson Centenary College.

Burns, Francis, missionary bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in the city of Albany, N. Y., and was thoroughly African in his complexion. His parents were poor, and at the age of four he was placed in service with a farmer in Greene County, and at the age of eight was indentured to learn the farming business. He was kindly permitted to attend school with the other children of the neighborhood during the winter season, and two years after, his health becoming poor, he was sent to the district school during the entire summer. The family in which he was placed were respectable and eminently pious. One who knew the lady says she was "a holy and zealous woman, and was a class-leader at the time of her death." At fifteen years of age he was converted, and at seventeen felt that God required him to preach, but he refrained because he was bound to his master until he was twenty-one. His education was insufficient, and there appeared to be no field in which he might labor. When the way opened, however, he felt unwilling to enter it; but, possessing an unquenchable thirst for knowledge, he employed all his efforts to obtain it. While attending a high school he began to hold meetings and to exhort, and he was licensed as a local preacher on the Windham circuit. "By his intelligence, his consistent piety, and by the force of his character, he rose above the disabilities of his color, and commanded the respect of all that knew him."

Probably Dr. Terry of the Mission Rooms was chiefly instrumental in leading him into the missionary work. Having noticed the young man in his congregation, and having listened to his fervent testimony, he advised him to enter upon a course of study that he might be in readiness to go to Liberia or elsewhere, should the door open. In 1833 he secured for him an interview with Bishop Hedding. In 1834, when the Rev. John Seys was about to sail for Liberia, it was arranged that Mr. Burns should accompany him as a missionary teacher, and he accordingly sailed in September of that year. For two years after his arrival in Africa he suffered from the dreaded fever, but in due course he was elected to orders, and in ten years, returning to New York, he was ordained deacon and elder by Bishop Janes. He performed hard and difficult work in the missionary field, and also occasionally occupied the post of teacher in the Monrovia Seminary, and edited with marked ability Africa's Luminary. When, in 1849, the work was divided into districts, he was appointed to the Cape Palmas district, and for six years out of the ten that he was presiding elder he served as president of the Conference, reporting clearly and comprehensively the business of the mission to the board in New York. The General Conference of 1856 made provision for the election and consecration of a missionary bishop for the African work.

kind, sweet, and good as ever beamed from human heart or disposition. He seems to be lacking in none of the qualifications of the gentleman and Christian minister. He possesses also an intelligent and cultivated mind, speaks readily and fluently, and even eloquently, and is in all respects a model African. Such is the man whom the Liberian Conference has selected for a bishop, and such the one the highest authorities of one Ameri-

REV. FRANCIS BURNS.

MISSIONARY BISHOP OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Accordingly, in January, 1858, the Liberia Annual Conference elected Mr. Burns as their first bishop, and he returned to the United States for ordination. This took place at the Genesee Conference, October 14, 1858, the services being conducted by Bishops Janes and Baker. Dr. Robie, who was present, says, "Though of ebony complexion, he had gained wonderfully on the affection and respect of all who had made his acquaintance, and especially of those privileged to an intimate association with him. His manner is exceedingly pleasant, and his spirit is as ean church have set apart for the sacred and responsible position." He immediately returned to Liberia, and for nearly five years devoted himself to the work which devolved upon him. His health becoming impaired, he was directed to take a sea-voyage. He died April 18, 1863, within three days after his arrival in Baltimore.

Burns, John, D.D., was born in Washington Co., Pa., April 10, 1808. When eighteen years of age he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church at Wheeling, West Va., and was licensed to exhort in June, 1832, by Z. H. Coston. In December of the same year he united with the Methodist Protestant Church, under the preaching of Z. Ragan. In less than six weeks he was licensed to preach by the M. P. Quarterly Conference of Wheeling station.

In 1833, as a probationary member of the Ohio Conference, he was assigned to a mission near Wheeling, and received fifty cents as salary that year. At this session of the body Pittsburgh Conference was set off, and by it he was appointed to Woodfield circuit, where he received seventy-two dollars, with house-rent and fuel for the year. He was ordained elder at Wheeling in 1837. Four times successively was he appointed a member of the General Conference,—in 1842, 1846, 1850, 1854; the last time being elected to the honorable position of president of the body. In 1866 he was a member of the Cincinnati Convention, and in 1877 of the Union Convention at Baltimore. Several other times has he been appointed delegate to the General Conferences, and is now a member of the Board of Publication, located at Pittsburgh. He received the honorary title of Doctor of Divinity from the Western Maryland College in 1875.

Burr, Jonathan Kelsey, D.D., a delegate from the Newark Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born at Middletown, Conn., Sept. 21, 1825. He was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1845, and taught in the same year in the Adelpian Academy, Mass. He entered the Union Theological Seminary, New York City, in 1846, and joined the New Jersey Conference in 1848. In 1867 he was elected Professor Extraordinary of Hebrew and Exegetical Theology in the Drew Theological Seminary, which position he held for about two years. He then returned to pastoral work.

Burr, W. A.—A prominent official of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and represented most worthily the Nebraska Conference as a lay delegate to the General Conference in 1872.

Burritt, Charles D., was born at Ithaca, N. Y., May, 1823. He was carefully trained by pious parents, and in 1841 he entered the Wesleyan University. In 1844 he was called to a tutorship in that institution. He was converted in 1841, and in 1844 was admitted into the Oneida Conference of the M. E. Church. After serving as tutor in the university, he filled prominent stations until his health became impaired. In 1855 he was elected to the presidency of the Wesleyan Female College, at Delaware, O., but was obliged to resign his position almost immediately on account of failing health. He returned only to die, May 7, 1855. He was an able and eloquent preacher, and was faithful and self-sacrificing in his labors.

Bushell, Robert, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerancy in 1851; succeeded Rev. S. S. Barton as general missionary secretary in 1871. He still holds the office. He resides at Sheffield.

Business Transactions.—The General Rules forbid "brother going to law with brother." The church has taught that a legal adjustment of difficulties between members of the church should only be sought after all reasonable efforts in the church have failed. In the American Conference, as early as 1781, the question was asked, "What proper method should be taken when differences arise in dealing between the brethren?" The Conference directed that the preacher in charge at the quarterly meeting should consult with the steward in appointing proper persons to examine into the circumstances; and if there should be found any suspicion of injustice or inability in the referees so appointed, it should be the duty of the minister to appoint men of more skill and probity, and the parties should abide by their decision or be excluded from the society. At the General Conference of 1784 the essential features of the provision of 1781 were continued; but only cases of importance or of great difficulty should require the interference of the preacher in charge. But when examined, the decision of the referees should be final. In 1787, any member of the church was prohibited from entering into a lawsuit with another member before these measures could have been complied with. In 1796, parties dissatisfied with the judgment of the referees were allowed the privilege of applying to the ensuing Quarterly Conference for a second arbitration; and if the Quarterly Conference should see sufficient reason, they should grant such second arbitration; in which case each party should choose two arbiters, and the four should choose a fifth; the judgment of the majority of whom should be final. Any person refusing to abide such judgment should be expelled. And all difficulties in business transactions of whatever kind are to be adjusted. The Discipline now directs that "where the matter cannot be settled by the parties themselves, the preacher in charge shall inquire into the circumstances of the case, and shall recommend to them a reference, consisting of two arbiters chosen by the plaintiff and two by the defendant, which four shall choose a fifth, the five arbiters being members of the church; and if either party refuse to abide their judgment, he shall be brought to trial, and if he fail to show sufficient cause for such refusal, he shall be expelled; and if any member of the church refuse in case of debt or other dispute to refer the matter to such arbitration when recommended by the preacher in charge, or shall enter into a lawsuit with another member before these measures are taken, he shall be brought to trial, according to the regular forms of trial in the church; and if he fail to show that the case is of such a nature as to require and justify a process at law, he shall be expelled."

Bussey, Gen. Cyrus, a reserve delegate from Louisiana to the General Conference of 1876. He was trained and educated by a pious father, a member of the Indiana Conference. He entered the army from Iowa, and after the close of the war removed South. He has been for several years a cotton factor, and has been president of the Cotton Exchange in New Orleans. He has taken a deep interest in the prosperity of the M. E. Church.

Butler, William, D.D., superintendent of the missions of the M. E. Church in Mexico, is a native of Ireland. He was awakened in Dublin under a sermon preached by Dr. Durbin when on a visit to that country. He united with the Wesleyans in Ireland, and on his removal to the United States he became a member of the New England Conference. He is a man of extensive reading and fine culture, and very early took a deep interest in the missionary movements of the church. His preaching and writing aided in kindling a greater missionary spirit wherever he labored. The Missionary Board having resolved to establish a mission in India, Dr. Butler was selected in 1856 as its superintendent, and sailed with a company of missionaries. On his arrival, he selected the northwest part of that populous country as his special field. Scarcely had he entered thoroughly upon the work, until the Sepoy Rebellion broke out. Surrounded with great perils, he and his family barely escaped to Nynee Thal, in the Himalaya Mountains. At the close of the rebellion, the mission was re-established, and was successfully prosecuted. In his intercourse with the officers of the government, he was received courteously, and from time to time the mission received encouragement and support. After the mission was organized into a Conference, and the office of superintendent was no longer needed, he returned to America, and resumed his place in the New England Conference. After he had continued in the pastoral work a few years, he was appointed secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union, in which position he remained until the close of 1873. The Missionary Board having established a mission in Mexico, he was selected as its superintendent, and sailed for that country early in 1874. Through his labors the mission has been successfully established in the city of Mexico, where a beautiful property has been fitted up for a church. Congregations have also been gathered in a number of other places, and orphanages both for boys and girls are sustained. In 1876 he visited the United States, and by private collections raised between ten and twelve thousand dollars, for the translation and publication of Methodist tracts, books, and papers. Since returning to Mexico, a beautiful paper has been issued, and the work of publishing books has commenced. Dr. Butler has contributed a number of papers to the periodicals of the church, and has published a volume on India, entitled "The Land of the Veda."

Butterworth, Edward, a youthful missionary of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, who died soon after his arrival in Eastern Africa. He was a young man of rare promise. He was born in Manchester, Jan. 17, 1841, and brought to God through the ministry of Rev. Jas. Caughey, when about nineteen years of age. He at once devoted himself to Christian work with entire consecration. The Sunday-school and the ragged-school were his chosen fields of labor, and in both he was remarkably successful. He had intelligence, tact, and especially love.

Being asked to go to Eastern Africa, he readily consented. A year was spent after his designation to foreign labors in needful preliminary studies, such as Arabic and medicine. He sailed from Southampton, November, 1863. After a prosperous voyage he reached Africa, arriving at Ribe Feb. 18, 1864. He received a joyous welcome, and gladly entered on his chosen work. In six weeks his distressed missionary comrades stood helpless, almost distracted, by his death-bed. He died of African fever, April 2, 1864. Mr. Butterworth was in all respects a noteworthy young man. He was deeply pious, and his mental powers were above the average. He had received a good education, and was very fond of scientific pursuits, geology being his favorite study. He was a man of great energy and determination, yet was universally beloved for his kind, generous, unselfish disposition. His early death was felt to be "a heavy blow and great discouragement" by those who had hoped for much from his labors.

Butterworth, Joseph, a prominent British layman in the Wesleyan Church, was born in Coventry in 1770. He married the sister of Dr. Adam Clarke's wife, and shortly after was led to Christ while hearing a sermon preached by his great relative. (On the same evening Mrs. Butterworth was convinced of sin and led to Christ by conversation and prayer with her sister at home.) Mr. Butterworth served God, and to the utmost of his power promoted that pure and undefiled religion of the Holy Scriptures which, while it ascribes glory to God in the highest, promotes peace and good will among men. His liberality was almost unbounded. He was emphatically the poor man's friend. He died, June, 1826, as he had lived, trusting in the Lord, and staying himself on the only Saviour of the human race.

He was one of the first members of the Wesleyan Methodist societies who was elected to the British Parliament, and was one of the few whose piety and consistency were not affected by his associations in political life or by the pressure of public duties.

Button, Charles W., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born at Harper's Ferry, Va.,

HON. C. W. BUTTON.

July 7, 1822; was converted and united with the Methodist Protestant Church, January, 1843. He was elected as a delegate to the Maryland Annual Conference, March, 1847, and frequently thereafter represented his local church in the Virginia and Maryland Conferences. He was for four years postmaster at Harper's Ferry, and was a delegate to the General Assembly of Virginia during the session of 1853-54. He was a member of the General Conferences of his church in 1854, 1858, and 1866; of the General Convention at Montgomery, Ala., in 1867; and of the General Conferences of 1870 and 1874. He removed to Lynchburg, Va., in 1857, and became editor and proprietor of The Lynchburg Daily Virginian, which position he still holds. In March, 1865, he was elected a member of the Confederate Congress, to succeed Hon. W. C. Rives, but the Congress and government soon after dissolved, and he never took his seat. In May, 1876, he was one of the fraternal messengers to the General Conference of the M. E. Church in Baltimore, Md., and addressed that assembly. He was also a representative to the General Convention at Baltimore which consummated the union of the Methodist and Methodist Protestant Churches.

Buttress is, in architecture, a projection which gives additional strength or support to a wall. It is chiefly employed in Gothic architecture to counteract the pressure of the arches which cover the naves and aisles of churches. In the ancient classical style buttresses were not used, but simple pilasters. The early Methodist churches being built plain, did not employ them, but as the Gothic style—more or less complete—is adopted, buttresses become requisite to secure proper strength in the building.

Butts, T., was one of Mr. Wesley's earliest and most devoted friends in assisting him in conducting his book business. At an early period he was his traveling companion, and in 1744 was employed by Charles Wesley to carry to Wednesbury the sum of £60, which had been collected for the relief of Methodists who were suffering from persecution. In 1753, Mr. Wesley appeared to be so pressed with the temporal business connected with publishing, that the stewards of the society of London, of whom Mr. Butts was one, offered to take upon themselves the whole care of the business. Mr. Wesley hesitated, but, as Mr. Butts was sincere and earnest in his proposal, he gave it into the hands of himself and Mr. Briggs, who was one of his preachers. They issued a circular, as stewards of the London society, addressed to the stewards of the several circuits, urging them to take care of, to sell, and to settle for, the books desired in the respective societies,—the work to be done without commission, as they added, "we ourselves have no profit from it but the profits that will meet us in eternity." Such was origin of the name Book Steward, still used in England; and a glimpse is given of the unselfish devotion of many early Methodists.

Buttz, Henry A., D.D., professor in Drew Theological Seminary, was admitted into the Newark Conference in 1858. After filling a number of appointments in several cities, he was appointed tutor in the Drew Seminary. He is now Professor of New Testament exegesis. He has recently published a valuable edition of the Greek Testament.

Byers, A. G., is a member of the Ohio Conference, and has filled a number of important appointments. He is now (1876) secretary of the Ohio State Board of Charities.

Byford, William Heath, M.D., was born at Eaton, Preble Co., O., March 20, 1817, and became an eminent medical practitioner in Chicago. He has been professor in one of the medical colleges of that city, and has twice been president of the American Medical Association. He is also the author of a number of valuable medical works. He has for many years been a member of the M. E. Church.

By-laws are regulations made by a corporation for its own government. The General Conferences have adopted a system of by-laws or rules for their own government corresponding, in the general arrangement, to the rules which govern parliamentary bodies. Many Annual Conferences have also adopted a similar system of rules or by-laws.

C.

Cabell, B. F., A.M., President of Warren College, Ky., was born in Campbellsville, Ky., June 6, 1850. He was converted in 1867 at Bedford, Ind.;

REV. B. F. CABELL, A.M.

was educated in the Ohio Wesleyan University, and became a local preacher in the M. E. Church South. In 1875 he was elected professor in Warren College, and is now (1877) filling the presidency.

Cabinet is a term sometimes employed to designate the bishop and presiding elders when, in session at an Annual Conference, they are engaged in arranging the appointments for the ensuing year. Sometimes it is applied to the presiding elders only, when reference is made to the bishop and his cabinet. It originated from the fact that the bishop calls together the presiding elders to advise and assist in the appointments, and they thus resemble cabinet officers. It, however, is not mentioned in the Discipline, and has no legal recognition by the church. (See COUNCIL.)

Cairo, Ill. (pop. 6267), the capital of Alexander County, situated on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and on the Illinois Central Railroad. It is one of the most important cities in Southern Illinois. In the minutes of the church it is first mentioned as a mission in 1851, when Henry C. Blackwell was appointed to it. He reported in 1852, 92 members and 4 local preachers. The M. E. Church (1876) has 136 members, 165 Sunday-school scholars, and $7000 church property. The M. E. Church South has a few members, and also the African M. E. Church.

Calais, Me. (pop. 5944), situated in Washington County, on the St. Croix River, and also on the St. Croix and Penobscot Railroad. This city is thirty miles from the sea, at the eastern extremity of the State, opposite the British town of St. Stephen, the river forming a part of the boundary between the United States and the British possessions. Calais was for a long time included in the St. Croix circuit. In 1827 the name of the circuit was changed to Calais, and the work was supplied by Josiah Eaton. In 1828 it reported 58 members, and had as pastor Nathaniel P. Devereux. In 1829 it reported 67 members, when Josiah Eaton was returned. The progress of Methodism was slow for a long time, the place sometimes declining to a mission, but the progress now is more marked. It is in East Maine Conference. The statistics are: members, 150; Sunday-school scholars, 290; church property, $6000.

Calcutta (pop. 450,000), a city of Hindostan, capital of the province of Bengal, and the metropolis of British India. It was founded by the East India Company in 1686. The great majority of the native inhabitants are pagans and Mohammedans. For the English residents there are 6 Roman Catholic churches, 12 Church of England, and 8 of other Protestant denominations. There are also a Greek and Armenian church, a synagogue, 74 mosques, 167 Hindoo temples, and 1 Chinese temple. Methodism was introduced into Calcutta by the Wesleyans of England, in 1830. They now report 2 ministers, with a membership of 219, and a native agent, who preaches in the Bengali language. Their services have been confined chiefly to the English people and to the native pagans. The services of the M. E. Church were introduced by William Taylor in 1872, who commenced preaching in the English language, and to the natives through interpreters, and organized societies among the Eurasian population, or native descendants of European or mixed parentage. These people, speaking the native dialects as well as the English, have become missionaries among the different races. Since that time the South India Conference has been formed, embracing Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras provinces. In Calcutta two churches have been erected, and religious service is also held in a number of halls. The reported statistics are: 187 members, 210 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $37,500. There are also special services held for seamen, which have proved very beneficial.

Caldwell, Merriitt, A.M., professor in Dickinson College, was born in Hebron, Me., Nov. 29, 1806, and died in Carlisle, Pa., June 6, 1848. He was early trained under religious influences, and graduated with honor at Bowdoin in 1828. He was immediately elected principal of the Maine Wesleyan Seminary, where he remained until, in 1834, he was elected Professor of Mathematics and vice-president of Dickinson College. While he was accurate and thorough as a mathematical teacher, his mind was particularly occupied with metaphysical and literary questions. In 1837 he was transferred to the chair of Metaphysics, in which he remained until his death. In addition to his college pursuits, he took a deep interest in the moral questions of the day, and was especially active in promoting temperance. In 1846 he visited England as a delegate to the world's convention, and took an active part in forming the Evangelical Alliance. After his return his health, which had been improved by his tour, became greatly enfeebled, and he gradually sank with consumption. He was a man of great mental strength, yet with unusual kindness and amiability. As a professor, he was a favorite of the students, because of his clear and happy manner of stating truth. As a writer, he was logical and forcible, and notwithstanding his imperfect health he found time to prepare several works. Among these were "A Manual of Elocution, including Voice and Gesture," one of the best books on that subject published, "Philosophy of Christian Perfection," "Christianity Tested by Eminent Men," and "The Doctrine of the English Verb."

Caldwell, Hon. T. H., a distinguished lawyer and judge, represented the Tennessee Conference at the General Conference of 1872. His commanding influence in the church led to his selection to this important position.

Calendar of Ministerial Duties in Circuits (English Wesleyan).—The following is an outline of the monthly routine devolving upon every superintendent in the discharge of his ordinary official duties in his circuit work.

January.—Annual subscriptions to the Theological Institution Fund, due on the 1st inst. These, with donations, are to be solicited in the first or second week, and transmitted to the treasurers without delay. The fast-day is on the first Friday after Christmas quarter-day.

February.—Chapel Fund collection to be made, and duly remitted. Payments from the Annuitant and Auxiliary Funds are due on the 1st.

March.—Visitation of the classes for renewing tickets of membership and making the yearly collection. The number of members returned this quarter is the official connectional return. In the quarterly meeting there will be required the report of Sunday and day schools. Thanks to circuit ministers, with invitation to remain a second, or third year, as the case may be, or no such invitation when a change is desired. It is the time also to invite successors. Nomination of candidates for the ministry. Examination of pupil teachers on the first Saturday. Fast-day first Friday after quarter-day. Returns to be entered in the circuit book, and payments made to the Book Room for sales made.

April.—Schedules of schools to be sent to district educational secretary, also chapel schedules to district chapel secretary. Subscriptions and collections for Educational Fund.

May.—Annual meeting of Wesleyan Missionary (Foreign) Society. Private subscriptions to Auxiliary Fund to be collected. Annual meeting of district committees. Education and Auxiliary Fund collections to be then paid in. All matters connected with Kingswood, etc., schools must be sent by the financial secretary to the treasurers by the 31st.

June.—Quarterly meeting proceedings. Returns to be entered in the circuit book. Memorials from circuits to the Conference to be presented. Home missionaries to send an annual report to the managing committee. Fast-day first Friday after quarter-day. Plan of preaching appointments at the Conference must be sent to those who have to preach there not later than the 15th.

July.—The circuit schedule for the June quarter must be sent to the chairman of the district by the second Monday. All collections must be paid by superintendents to financial secretary before the first day of Conference. Examinations of candidates for the ministry must take place. District treasurers of Children's Fund must send in their schedules to the secretary not later than the 10th, and all moneys to the treasurers one week before Conference, which meets on the last Wednesday. Collections for home missions not later than second Sabbath.

August.—Payments to claimants on the Annuitant and Auxiliary Funds are due on the 1st. All book accounts must be settled with the book steward.

September.—Quarterly visitation of the classes and collections solicited for the Auxiliary Fund. Financial district meeting. Proceedings of the quarterly meeting; new rules made by Conference to be read, discussed, and decided upon. Treasurer for the Auxiliary or Worn-Out Ministers' Fund to be appointed in each circuit. Returns to be entered in circuit book.

October.—The donations solicited last month in the classes for the Auxiliary Fund are to be collected and paid in to the circuit treasurer. Public collection, to be divided between Theological Institution and the Worn-Out Ministers' Fund.

November.—Private subscriptions and public collections for the Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove Schools are to be made early this month, and remitted to the secretary, with schedules of accounts and claims.

December.—Appointments in each circuit of poor stewards and society stewards. Chapel Trust accounts to be made up to 31st. Quarterly meeting business. Appointment of circuit stewards. New house schedule prepared for March by committee. Trustee meeting (general) for the circuit fixed. The treasurer of the Auxiliary Fund presents his accounts. Chapel secretary for the circuit appointed. Usual returns entered in circuit books. The examination of candidates for the training institutions takes place. The watchnight is held on the last night of this month.

California, State of (pop. 560,247).—In extent of territory this State exceeds every other in the Union except Texas. It contains 188,981 square miles, and it is supposed 90,000,000 of acres are capable of being made productive. Its population has grown very rapidly. By the census of 1850 the number returned was only 92,597. Its natural scenery, embracing the Sierra Nevada Mountains, the Yosemite Valley, and the Pacific coast, is exceedingly grand. In 1819 the boundary line between Mexico and the United States, from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific, was fixed at 42 degrees N. latitude, which is the northern boundary of California. Mexico, from the period of its conquest, belonged to Spain, until, in the Revolution of 1824, it became independent. At the close of the war between the United States and Mexico, Upper California was ceded to the United States, in 1848, and it was admitted into the Union as a State in 1850. The Spanish Romanists were the first colonists. Their missionaries settled in a number of places to teach and to civilize the native Indians, and numerous old buildings yet remaining are monuments of their benevolence. Their first mission at San Diego was founded in 1769. By the aid of money collected for what was termed the "California Pious Fund," they gained great influence in the territory, and the names of the towns and cities are suggestive of their presence and power. In 1831 they had thirty-one missions in Upper California. Protestantism commenced under great disadvantages. According to the United States census of 1850, there were church buildings, 28; accommodation, 10,200; value of property, $276,800: of which the Romanists had buildings, 18; accommodations, 7500; value of property, $233,500. The Baptists had 1 church, 400 sittings, value, $5000. The Presbyterians, 3 churches, 700 sittings, value, $11,000. The Methodists, 5 churches, 1600 sittings, value, $18,300. The whole Protestant churches having only about one-third as many edifices, and about one-sixth as much property, as the Romanists.

Methodism was introduced shortly before the discovery of gold. On the 24th of April, 1847, Rev. William Roberts, of New Jersey, and Rev. Jas. H. Wilbur, of Black River Conference, entered the Golden Gate on a sailing vessel, which cast anchor in the Bay of San Francisco. A small Mexican village called Yerba Buena, made of adobe bricks and covered with earthen tiles, had been built among the sand-hills. This was San Francisco in embryo. California at that period was a portion of Mexico.

Mr. Roberts had been appointed superintendent of the Oregon mission, which had been started by Jason Lee and his co-laborers. Messrs. Roberts and Wilbur were on the way to Oregon to engage in mission work. As the ship would not proceed on her voyage up the coast for some weeks, Mr. Roberts and his colleague deemed it proper to make journeys to the various villages in the valleys that could be visited by travelers on horseback. They went to Sonoma, Napa, Santa Clara, San José, Pajaro (now called Watsonville), and Monterey. They obtained all possible information, and sought opportunities for preaching the word. Two Sundays were spent in San Francisco, one of the missionaries preaching on board the ship and the other in a wareroom in the village. Six persons were found who had been Methodists in other lands, who were formed into a class, and Aquilla Glover was appointed leader. A Sunday-school was also organized. This was the first Methodist society in California, and the first Protestant organization on the Pacific coast, south of the Oregon mission. Having spent forty-five days in explorations around San Francisco, the missionaries proceeded northward to the field of labor assigned them. Before sailing from San Francisco Mr. Roberts prepared a report, and sent it by the hands of Colonel J. C. Fremont, to the missionary secretary at New York, urging the importance of sending missionaries at once to California.

During the summer and fall of 1847, John Trumbody and family arrived, and stopped in San Francisco; they were members of the M. E. Church, and at once united with the class. Quite a band of immigrants, having crossed the plains, located at San José. Of that number there was providentially a young man, with his family, who was a local preacher,—Mr. Elihu Anthony,—who had formerly resided near Fort Wayne, Indiana. Mr. Anthony at once formed a class of twelve members, which soon numbered about thirty. This was the second church organization in California. Some of the original twelve remain in the church to this day, while others are fallen asleep. Mr. Anthony soon crossed the mountains, and pitched his tent at Santa Cruz, where he still resides. There he formed a class, and appointed Silas Bennett leader. This was the third society. The fourth was soon formed at Pajaro, or Watsonville, and H. G. Blaisdell was appointed leader. Mr. Blaisdell now resides in Nevada, having served two terms as governor of that State. He was a member of the General Conference in Brooklyn in 1872. Mr. Anthony visited the several classes as often as practicable, and preached the word. Corresponding with Superintendent Roberts, his work was approved. The discovery of gold in the mountains sadly embarrassed all efforts which the few were putting forth to plant the church of Christ on the coast. The male members went in search of gold, and the regular services were measurably discontinued.

The General Conference held in Pittsburgh in 1848 formed the Oregon and California Mission Conference. In the fall of the same year, Rev. Isaac Owen, of Indiana Conference, was appointed a missionary to California, and, a few months later, Rev. William Taylor, of Baltimore Conference, was also appointed to the same field. The former was sent across the plains with farm-wagons, drawn by oxen, and the latter sailed from Baltimore by way of Cape Horn. They left for the Pacific early in the spring of 1849. Before leaving Baltimore, Mr. Taylor purchased a church, and had it shipped for San Francisco. Gold having been discovered, immigrants from all portions of the world were soon on the way to the new Eldorado. In the spring of 1849, Mr. Roberts had timbers hewed, split, rived, shaved, and prepared for the erection of a church, and shipped from Oregon to San Francisco. There was not a saw-mill on the coast between Alaska and the isthmus of Panama at that time. Mr. Roberts came down with his church material. Finding Rev. Asa White and family in a tent on the hill-side, and John Trubody and family in the same locality, a council was held, a church lot was purchased on Powell Street, where the First Methodist church now stands, and preparation was made for erecting the church. Mr. White, then past middle life, was an active, earnest, and eminently useful local preacher. He held regular services in his tent every Sabbath, and week-evening prayer-meetings, till the arrival of a regular pastor. Father White also collected funds to meet the expenses of building the church.

On the 21st day of September, 1849, the ship arrived, having on board the missionary and family for whose speedy and safe arrival earnest prayers had been daily offered for many months. Mr. Taylor received a most cordial and brotherly greeting.

The new house of worship was nearly inclosed. It was soon completed, and formally dedicated. Intelligence was soon received that Mr. Owen and family had crossed the mountains, and were traveling slowly toward Sacramento. On comparing notes, it was ascertained that on the same Sabbath Mr. Taylor commenced his ministry in San Francisco. Mr. Owen stood under the outstretched boughs of a forest-tree at Grass Valley and preached the gospel to his fellow-travelers. Pressing onward with his exhausted teams, Mr. Owen and family reached Sacramento about the middle of October. Dr. W. G. Deal, a local preacher, had been holding services, but no society had been formed. The church shipped from Baltimore had been sent to Sacramento, and lay in a heap on a church lot which had been secured. Sunday came, and the services were held in the shade of a tree on the church lot. Before pronouncing the benediction, Mr. Owen, pointing to the lumber, said, "We will occupy our new church next Sunday." They, of course, did so, as he always redeemed his pledges.

Mr. Taylor's work included San Francisco and all the villages that he might be able to reach. Mr. Owen's field included Sacramento and the regions round about.

Local preachers were secured and pressed into service whenever it was possible. Rev. James Corwin, who had come from Indiana, was sent to Stockton, where he formed a class, and engaged at once in building a house of worship. The societies at Santa Clara, San José, Santa Cruz, and Watsonville were re-organized, and regular services were established. Never were pastors more actively employed than were Isaac Owen and William Taylor during their first year in California. Calls and urgent appeals came from all sections of the country. In many mining camps the laymen organized societies and conducted religious services. Some men commenced to preach who had never before heeded the call to engage in that work.

In 1850, Revs. S. D. Simonds, of Michigan, E. Bannister, of Genesee, and M. C. Briggs, of Erie, were added to the corps of laborers. Mr. Simonds was appointed to Benicia and Sonoma, Mr. Bannister opened a select school in San José, and Mr. Briggs was appointed to Sacramento.

In 1851 a larger number of ministers arrived, and entered at once into the work. In August the first annual meeting, or District Conference, convened in San Francisco, William Roberts presiding. Nine preachers were present. Twelve churches and five parsonages were reported: there were 507 church members and 192 probationers. On the 10th day of October, 1851, the first number of the California Christian Advocate was issued. It was published by a committee, and edited by M. C. Briggs and S. D. Simonds. In the month of June of that year a charter for the University of the Pacific was obtained. It was located at Santa Clara, and E. Bannister, A.M., was placed in charge of it. The preparatory department was soon opened for the reception of pupils. Early in 1852 some ten or eleven additional ministers arrived, who found fields ready for cultivation.

In 1852 the General Conference separated California and Oregon, and formed each into an Annual Conference. California was divided into two districts, and Isaac Owen and J. D. Blain were appointed presiding elders.

On the 3d of February, 1853, the first session of the California Conference opened in the church on Powell Street, San Francisco, Bishop E. R. Ames presiding. Thirty-five preachers were present, including supplies and candidates for admission. Twenty-six churches and ten parsonages were reported; cash raised for improvements, $80,587. Members, 1334; probationers, 115. Fifty-one preachers were appointed to fields of labor. The work was divided into three districts, and Isaac Owen, J. D. Blain, and John Daniel were appointed presiding elders. The church on the coast in California was now fairly organized.

The General Conference, in 1860, made provision for establishing a book depository in San Francisco. A lot was secured on Mission Street, on which a store was erected, and the business opened in 1862, E. Thomas, then the editor of the Christian Advocate, being in charge.

In 1864 the General Conference divided the work, setting off that portion lying east of the western summit of the Sierra Nevada Mountains into a separate Conference, which took the name of Nevada. In 1875 the California Conference was again divided, by a line starting on the ocean beach at the northwest corner of San Luis, Obispo County, and running eastward along said county line and along the north line of Tulare County to the Nevada line. The portion of the State north of said division line, and the Sandwich Islands, constitute the California Conference. That portion of the State lying south of division line constitutes the Southern California Conference.

In 1876, in the California Conference there were 105 churches; probable value, $688,500; there were 71 parsonages; probable value, $83,105; the number of church members, 7640; probationers, 1675; total, 9315.

In Southern California Conference: church members, 1257; probationers, 200; total, 1457; churches, 13; probable value, $49,500.

In Nevada: church members, 585; probationers, 101; total, 686; churches, 12; probable value, $66,500; parsonages, 13; probable value, $17,600.

The Chinese mission located in San Francisco, under the superintendence of Rev. Otis Gibson,

A.M., was opened in 1868. The buildings are commodious, the schools are well attended, and a small but growing church of native converts are the fruits of this enterprise of the church.

The M. E. Church South also established services at an early period, as a number of miners and business men had emigrated from the Southern States. They now have two Conferences in the State,—the Pacific and the Los Angeles. The former reports (1875) 3842 members and 2574 Sunday-school scholars, and the latter 875 members and 521 Sunday-school scholars. The Church South has also established the Pacific Methodist College, and has published a paper. The African M. E. Church has a few members. The church statistics of the principal denominations, as given by the census of 1870, are as follows:

	Edifices.	Sittings.	Property.
Roman Catholic.....	144	66,640	$4,692,200
Methodist.....	155	41,035	677,625
Presbyterian.....	50	21,798	453,050
Protestant Episcopal.....	38	13,095	398,200
Congregational.....	36	11,915	282,400

California Chinese Mission.—From its commencement the providential aspect of the Chinese immigration to our shores attracted the attention of all the evangelical churches in the land. The Baptists and Presbyterians at once commenced Christian missions among these strangers. The California Annual Conference of the M. E. Church earnestly advocated the importance of occupying this providential field; and in 1868, Rev. Otis Gibson, who had spent ten years in the Foo-Chow China mission, was appointed by Bishop Thomson missionary to the Chinese on the Pacific coast. Mr. Gibson proceeded at once to his appointed field of labor, and spent the first two years in an examination of the field, in arousing the Christian element of the whole coast to a sense of the moral and religious obligations imposed upon it by the presence of these idolaters, and in inaugurating and organizing a general system of Chinese Sunday and evening schools for instruction in the English language by Christian men and women.

Special missionary collections were also gathered to the amount of $9000, gold coin, which, together with an appropriation from the Missionary Society, enabled the missionary to purchase a very eligible lot, and erect the commodious and well-furnished mission-house, 916 Washington Street, San Francisco.

The lot is 56 feet front on Washington Street, 137½ feet deep, with a narrow street on each side, giving three fronts, and admirable facilities for light and ventilation.

The mission-house is 56 by 70 feet, three stories above the basement. The basement is for rental purposes, and brings in a monthly revenue of about $60. On the main floor are three school-rooms 19 by 35 feet, with folding-doors between, so that all can be thrown together whenever desirable. On the second floor are two fine school-rooms, with folding-doors between, now used on Sundays as a chapel, also a tenement for the assistant missionary. The third floor of the building was designed and is used for a female department, called the Asylum, which is managed and its current expenses largely met by the Woman's Missionary Society of the M. E. Church on the Pacific coast.

bly adapted for the primary classes; while the more advanced classes use the same books and pursue, as far as they are able, the same studies as the scholars of our public schools generally.

Religious instruction is interspersed in all the lessons as far as practicable, and the school is always closed with Christian song and prayer. Superstition and idolatry are uprooted in the minds of the scholars by teaching the truth. As truth

On the other side of the building is a comfortable parsonage for the family of the superintendent, also a number of pleasant rooms for rent or for the accommodation of assistant teachers. The whole cost of this valuable property, including furnishing, has been about $32,000; and all bills have been promptly paid when due.

The evening schools were at once opened, and have been continued ever since, increasing slowly but constantly in numbers and influence. The schools for boys and men are opened only in the evening, because most of the Chinese are so employed that they cannot attend a day school. The scholars are of all ages from eight to thirty-five, and of all grades of intellect, from exceedingly stupid to exceedingly keen and intelligent. Four school-rooms are now used and five teachers employed in these evening schools at the Methodist mission-house.

Jacob's Reader, an illustrated lesson-book, prepared expressly for the deaf and dumb, is admirably gains a lodgment in the mind error goes out. Already a number of the more advanced scholars have become intelligent and consistent Christians, and nearly all of the regular scholars lose their faith in the idols. The mission maintains a school in San José, and another is conducted in the chapel of the mission on Jackson Street, supported and managed entirely by Mr. H. W. Stowe, a self-supporting missionary among the Chinese in San Francisco.

The regular Sunday services of the mission at the mission-house are a Bible and Catechism class in the English language at eleven o'clock A.M. Preaching services in the Chinese language at twelve M.; attendance from 45 to 70. Sunday-school for Chinese girls and women at two P.M. General Sunday-school at six P.M.; attendance 80. General class-meeting at eight P.M.; attendance 20 to 30.

Besides the Sunday services and the Wednesday evening prayer-meeting, Mrs. Jane Walker, the devoted and efficient missionary employed by the Woman's Missionary Society, conducts a Tuesday evening prayer-meeting with the girls of the asylum, and Mrs. Gibson conducts a Thursday class and prayer-meeting with Chinese women not connected with the asylum. In this mission 47 Chinese and 2 Japanese have professed faith in Christ, and have been baptized and received into the church.

The first regular Quarterly Conference of this mission was held December 25, 1875. Quarterly love-feasts had been held for more than a year previous. These love-feasts have been seasons of unusual interest. As many as 40 persons have testified in an intelligent and feeling manner of the grace of God in their salvation, and about the same number have joined in the communion. Between the testimonies given these Chinese Christians break out in appropriate songs and hymns, sometimes in the Chinese language and sometimes in the English language. Occasionally one is overcome with emotion, and breaks down with weeping and tears while trying to tell what the Saviour has done for his or her poor soul. Christian visitors not understanding a word of the testimonies given often enter into the spirit of the meeting, and express themselves as interested and profited by the services. There are at present (1877) 2 native licensed preachers, 2 exhorters, 49 members in full connection, and about 10 catechumens or probationers.

Besides these services at the mission-house, the mission daily, except Saturdays, opens a chapel, 620 Jackson Street, in the heart of Chinatown, for preaching the gospel in the Chinese language to such of the passing crowds as may be willing to enter. This chapel—"Foke Yam Fong," The Gospel Temple—is the only preaching-place in Chinatown proper, and is now well known to the Chinese population as the place where they can any day at two o'clock p.m. hear about the "Jesus" religion. Here annually for the last four years many thousands of Chinese have heard something about the gospel of Christ, and we can but hope and believe that some of this good seed will in God's own time bring forth fruit to his glory, some thirty-, some sixty-, and some a hundred-fold. The constant preaching of the gospel of Jesus in this chapel has had the effect at least to excite the Chinese to a little active effort to teach their own peculiar national doctrines. During the year 1876, the Chinese of San Francisco employed a teacher or preacher from China to read and expound the teachings of Confucius and the ceremonials of heathen worship. The theatre was used for this purpose, so that in the afternoon while Christian Chinamen have been preaching "Jesus and the resurrection" in this gospel temple, a heathen Chinaman has been expounding the philosophy of Confucius and the ceremonials of idolatry in a heathen theatre on the opposite side of the street. The heathen service was well attended at first, but gradually the novelty of the affair died out, the attendance dwindled to nothing, and the effort to run that kind of opposition was given up. The gospel temple preaching has been continued with increasing interest and larger attendance.

The asylum and girls' school department of the mission is under the supervision and patronage of the Woman's Missionary Society. This society employs a missionary, Mrs. Jane Walker, who devotes her whole time to the care and education of the poor Chinese women and girls who seek this refuge from a slavery worse than death. During the last three years seldom less than twenty, a part of the time as many as twenty-six, of such women and girls have been inmates of this institution, boarded, clothed, and schooled by this society. As many as seventy-five different women and girls have shared for a longer or shorter time the privileges of this asylum. Ten have been returned to China at their own request. Fifteen have professed faith in Christ and have been received into the church. Seventeen have been legally married, seven of which number are married to Christian men, thus forming, in a small way, a pattern and nucleus of the Christian home among the Chinese.

This mission, while it has not been at all behind other missions in direct evangelistic work and results, has gained a commanding influence in the community, both Chinese and American. It has stood in the front rank of the defenders of the treaty and constitutional rights of these persecuted and defenseless strangers, and has always been particularly obnoxious to the anti-Chinese politicians and to the Irish papists.

California Christian Advocate is a weekly periodical of the M. E. Church, published at San Francisco. It was started and conducted for some time as a private enterprise. The General Conference of 1852 directed that it should be published under the direction of the book agents at New York. But, owing to difficulties arising out of its indebtedness, the book committee advised the agents not to incur the expense. In 1854 it was suspended. But being revived, the General Conference made an appropriation to it, and elected Rev. Eleazer Thomas editor, who continued to fill the office, by re-election, until 1868, when H. C. Benson, D.D., its present editor, was chosen. It is under the control of a publishing committee of three ministers and two laymen, appointed by the General Conference, and whose duties are similar to those of the general book committee. The circulation (1876) is about 2600.

California Conference, M. E. Church.—The territory occupied by this body was originally included in the "Oregon and California Mission Conference," with William Roberts as superintendent.

It first convened at Salem, Oregon, Sept. 3, 1851. The California district, of which Rev. Isaac Owen was presiding elder, then embraced 759 members and about 12 preachers. The first session of the California Conference was held in San Francisco, Feb. 3, 1853. It reported 1388 members, 38 traveling preachers and 48 local.

In 1876 Southern California Conference was separated from it. It now embraces "that part of the State of California lying west of the summit of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, and north of a line commencing at the northwest corner of San Luis, Obispo County, and extending eastward with the northern line of San Luis, Obispo, and Tulare Counties, and also the Sandwich Islands."

The statistics of the Conference (1876) are as follows: preachers, 135; Sunday-school scholars, 11,802; members, 9330; churches, 105; value, $688,500; parsonages, 71; value, $83,105.

California Conference, African M. E. Church, was organized by Bishop Campbell, at San Francisco, in 1865. Its boundary includes "the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, with Washington Territory, Idaho, and Utah. Within these boundaries the colored population is not large, and is widely scattered; and consequently the growth of the church has not been rapid. In 1869 there were reported 10 churches, 2 parsonages, 303 members, and church property valued at $6246. In 1875 the reports show 11 churches, 213 members, and church property amounting to $43,600.

Call to the ministry.—See MINISTERIAL CALL.

Callahan, Ethelbert, a lawyer in fine standing in Illinois, devoted to the interests of the M. E. Church, of deep and unaffected piety, and of signal influence in the community where he resided. He was the first lay delegate from the Southern Illinois Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Callender, N., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Clinton Co., N. Y., Sept. 18, 1800, and died in Louisville, Ky., Feb. 6, 1876. He was converted in Leesburg, O., in 1819, licensed to preach in 1825, and received on trial in the Pittsburgh Conference the same year. Having acquired a knowledge of the German language, after spending several years in the English work, he assisted Dr. Nast in the German work, and was one of the pioneers of German Methodism in this country. In 1839-40 he was placed in charge of the Pittsburgh German mission district, the first of the kind organized in the church, and during that time he aided in building the first German Methodist church in the United States. In 1840 he was appointed to the New York German mission. In 1842 he was appointed chaplain to the Western Penitentiary, Pa. In 1845 he re-entered the English work, filling several charges until 1854. From that time to 1859 he presided over the Michigan and Cincinnati German districts. From 1860 to 1862 he was again in the English work, spending a part of his time as Bible agent in Southern Ohio. From 1863 to 1865 he acted as hospital chaplain at Camp Denison, Ohio. From 1866 to 1871 he filled several charges, until failing health compelled him to superannuate. The closing years of his life were spent in great suffering, yet he expressed strong confidence in God, and calmly passed away to his rest.

Calvinism is properly the system of theology taught by John Calvin. The word, however, is generally used in contrast with Arminianism, and it denotes a theory of grace and predestination stated by Calvin, and held by a number of the churches. It asserts: 1. "Predestination we call the eternal decree of God, by which he hath determined in himself what he would have to become of every individual of mankind, for they are not all created with a similar destiny; but eternal life is foreordained for some, and eternal damnation for others. Every man, therefore, being created for one or the other of these ends, we say he is predestinated either to life or death. We affirm that this counsel, as far as it concerns the elect, is founded on his gratuitous mercy, totally irrespective of human merit; but that of those whom he devotes to condemnation, the gate of life is closed by a just and irreprehensible, but incomprehensible judgment." To show that this decree of predestination does not depend upon the foreknowledge of character, it is added, "It is a notion commonly entertained that God, foreseeing what would be the respective merits of every individual, makes a correspondent distinction between different persons; that he adopts as his children such as he foreknows will be deserving of his grace, and devotes to the damnation of death others whose dispositions he sees will be inclined to wickedness and impiety. Thus they not only obscure election by covering it with the veil of foreknowledge, but pretend that it originates in another cause." Again: "Many, indeed, as if they wished to avert odium from God, admit election in such a way as to deny that any one is reprobated. But this is puerile and absurd, because election itself could not exist without being opposed to reprobation: whom God passes by he therefore reprobates, and from no other cause than his determination to exclude them from the inheritance which he predestines for his children."—Calvin, Institutes. At the same time Calvin denies that his doctrine makes God the author of sin, saying, "Their perdition depends on the divine predestination in such a manner that the cause and matter of it are found in themselves. For the first man fell because the Lord had determined it should so happen. The reason of this determination is unknown to us. Man, therefore, falls according to the appointment of Divine Providence, but he falls by his own fault."

2. Calvin taught that the death of Christ should efficaciously redeem all those, and those only, who were from eternity chosen to salvation and given to him by the Father.

3. That being born in sin, all men were subject to wrath, and without the regeneration of the Holy Spirit they were neither willing nor able to return to God, and that that regenerating grace was bestowed only upon the elect.

4. That while the human will is in some sense free, being able to exercise the power of choice on many subjects, yet it never will choose to commence a holy and divine life unless the heart is regenerated by the Holy Spirit, and that regenerating power is given only to the elect.

5. That those who have been truly called by the Holy Spirit, though they may fall into sin, are never deserted by that Spirit so that they pass into eternal destruction. "So that not by their own merits or strength, but by the gratuitous mercy of God, they obtain it, that they neither totally fall from faith and grace, nor finally continue in their falls and perish."

These views taught by Calvin, and in part by the Synod of Dort, have been to some extent modified by what are termed moderate Calvinists. Among the Methodists these doctrines are held only by a comparatively small branch, which are known as Calvinistic Methodists, or the followers of Whitefield in England, and of Howell Harris in Wales.

Calvinistic Controversy.—The most bitter and protracted controversy in which Methodism has taken part has been known as the Calvinistic Controversy. In 1740, Mr. Wesley, finding his societies troubled by Calvinistic teachers, published a sermon on Free Grace. It had a powerful influence on the public mind in England, strengthening the advocates of Arminianism, and greatly irritating Calvinistic ministers. It called forth a large number of replies, some of which were argumentative, but the great majority severely denunciatory. From that time forward, everywhere, the followers of Mr. Wesley were assailed because of their Arminian principles. After he had formed his Conference, so strong became the feeling of opposition toward him on the part of many of the Calvinistic ministers of the Church, that, in 1771, a circular was published inviting the ministers generally to assemble at the time of Mr. Wesley's Conference, and to go in a body and utter their protest against his sentiments. This circular, so unwise in its character, and designed by force of public opinion to prohibit the utterance of free thought, occasioned the publication of Mr. Fletcher's celebrated Checks to Antinomianism, a work which in its age proved a most powerful weapon against Calvinism. Other works followed in defense of universal redemption, and everywhere the Methodist ministers found themselves obliged to maintain and defend their views in the pulpit. The controversy was not confined to England. The early Methodist preachers in America were assailed and reproached for the same cause. Wherever they went they preached with earnestness an unlimited atonement, and the possibility of salvation for every human being. The result of this controversy was that Calvinistic preaching became greatly modified, and that Arminian sentiments have spread more and more widely. At the present time but little controversial preaching is heard upon these topics.

Calvinistic Methodists.—As stated in the article on Methodism (see METHODISM), the small company of earnest men who were distinguished as leaders in the revival in the middle of the eighteenth century did not perfectly agree in their theological views. John and Charles Wesley were earnest and decided Arminians; Whitefield, with others, were as decidedly Calvinistic. This difference of opinion, however, did not prevent their most earnest and hearty co-operation for a time; but when societies were formed, the spirit of controversy arose, and as the result, those adopting different opinions affiliated together. The followers of Whitefield, embracing the Rolands, Williams, Humphreys, and Cennick, espoused Calvinistic tenets, and went so far as to denounce as heretical a contrary faith. In Wales, Howell Harris had preached an earnest gospel before the conversion of Whitefield. When the controversy arose, he also adopted the Calvinistic view; and when his societies were organized in 1743, they became known as the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. After a short separation the hearts of Whitefield and Wesley were strongly joined together, and while they differed in judgment they loved as brothers. After the death of Mr. Whitefield, the Calvinistic societies were divided into three distinct sects. The first was known as Lady Huntington's Connection (see HUNTINGTON), which were societies established by ministers supported chiefly by her, and the work was greatly aided by a college founded by her at Trevecca. Secondly, the Tabernacle Connection, or Whitefield Societies. These during the life of their founder were united together through him, but after his death they separated into distinct churches, and have generally become Congregationalists. Thirdly, the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists (which see). These were the offspring of the labors of Howell Harris, to which we have already alluded, and in their general organization and arrangement in many points resemble the Wesleyan Methodists. They have Conferences, classes, and other Methodist usages. They are confined, however, almost entirely to Wales, and the Welsh population in the United States. While there remained but little direct results of the labors of Mr. Whitefield and his coadjutors, they were instrumental in arousing the public mind in many parts of England and of the United States, and through their efforts many of the Calvinistic churches were greatly revived. They now number probably about 80,000; 60,000 being in Wales, and about 4000 in the United States. On account of doctrinal views, they affiliate more with the Presbyterians than with other Methodist bodies.

Cambridge, Mass. (pop. 39,634), a suburban city of Boston, separated from it by the Charles River. It was settled in 1631, and was at first called New Town. In 1638 the name was changed to Cambridge. It is the site of Harvard University, and it is said the first printing-press in America was established here, in 1639. Though probably visited by Jesse Lee, Methodism was not established until a much later period. It contended with difficulties here as in many parts of New England. Recently the progress has been more satisfactory. The statistics as reported by the New England Conference are:

Camden, N. J. (pop. 20,045), the capital of Camden County, on the Delaware River, opposite Philadelphia, and connected with all important points in the State by railways. It was incorporated as a city in 1831, and has had a rapid growth, as may be seen in the fact that in 1850 its population numbered only 9475. Its rapid growth is largely due to the overflow of the population of Philadelphia. Camden is first mentioned in the minutes in 1811, when it had 190 members, and John Woolson was pastor. In 1812 it had 390 members, and with Burlington constituted one charge. In 1813 it reported 479 members. This year its name disappeared from the minutes, and did not reappear until 1825. During most of the interval Camden was included in Gloucester circuit. Its name again disappeared after 1825, and did not reappear until 1828, when Edwin Stout was pastor. In 1829 it was connected with Gloucester circuit, when Jacob Gruber and Richard M. Greenbank were in charge of the circuit. While on this circuit, Mr. Gruber was once taken to task by a steward of Camden for his general uncouthness. Mr. Gruber listened to the criticism with some uneasiness, and when it was ended, replied to the critic, "Oh, very well; you want me to preach very nice and fine when I come to Camden among the fashionable people,—I'll try." He did try, and in a measure succeeded, but in the course of his sermon managed to utter some of his most stinging sarcasms on formal and fashionable Methodists. After that he was allowed to preach in his natural style. The present statistics (1876) are:

Campbell, Jabez Pitt, one of the bishops of the African M. E. Church, was born in Slaughter-

REV. JABEZ PITT CAMPBELL.

ONE OF THE BISHOPS OF THE AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Neck, Sussex Co., Del., Feb. 6, 1815. Though born free, he was given as collateral security for debt, and in order to escape being sold into slavery fled to Philadelphia in 1828. At ten years of age he was converted and joined the church, and was licensed to preach in 1837. He entered the traveling connection in 1839, and was sent as a missionary to assist in the New England work. He filled various appointments until 1856, when he was elected book steward and editor of the Christian Recorder. He represented his church at the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1864, and was at the same session elected bishop. He entered at once on his duties, and, visiting California, organized that Conference in 1865. Returning East, he visited the Southwest, and organized the Louisiana Conference. In his different journeys it is estimated that he traveled during the quadrennium from 1864 to 1868, 40,000 miles. He has charge of the sixth episcopal district, embracing the States of Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and Mississippi.

Camp-Meetings.—This name has been given to a class of religious services held in the open air, and continued usually for from five to ten days. A grove is selected near some thoroughfare; within it, a stand or platform is built, and sittings arranged to accommodate several thousand people; around these, in the form of a square or circle, are pitched or erected tents to accommodate those who lodge upon the ground. Originally small cotton or cloth tents were used; subsequently small plank structures, and now, at some grounds, which are purchased and held by associations, neat and pleasant temporary buildings are erected. The public services are held at the stand, where sermons are delivered, and general prayer-meetings are conducted in the space immediately before it; but large tents are frequently provided, in which a number of prayer-meetings are simultaneously conducted. In the intervals between public services, those who tent upon the ground are expected to devote nearly all their time to religious services, either in the tents or within the inclosure. This class of meetings originated in 1799, on the banks of the Red River, in Kentucky. At a sacramental occasion held by the Presbyterian church, sermons were delivered by both Presbyterians and Methodists, and such remarkable effects followed, as produced extensive public excitement. The congregation was sometimes melted to tears of sorrow, and then gave utterance to shouts of joy; people came from surrounding sections of the country to witness and to attend the meeting. The house being too small to contain them, a stand was erected in the grove, and people came in wagons, bringing with them their provisions and clothing to remain a few days upon the ground. The success of this meeting led to others, in which Presbyterians, Baptists, and Methodists participated, and from this union of the denominations they were called general meetings. It is said that from ten to twenty thousand persons attended some of these earlier meetings. Opposition to them, however, sprung up, especially in the Presbyterian church, and they were gradually abandoned, while the Methodists favored them, and established them in different parts of the country. More recently they have been adopted to some extent by other denominations. Some of the encampments are distinguished for the beauty of their location and for the conveniences connected with them; such especially are Martha's Vineyard, Round Lake, near Saratoga, and Ocean Grove, at the seashore, near Long Branch. Others of similar character have been established in different sections of the country. These meetings were introduced into England by Rev. Lorenzo Dow, an eccentric Methodist preacher from America, who visited that country. The necessity for such meetings, however, was not deeply felt, and they gave rise to considerable discussion among the different denominations. The Wesleyan Conference in 1807 resolved: "It is our judgment that even supposing such meetings to be allowable in America, they are highly improper in England, and likely to be productive of considerable mischief, and we disclaim connection with them." It is proper to say that, not having access to forests or retired places, these meetings were held in tents in the immediate vicinity of large cities, and hence were subject to great interruption. Notwithstanding this utterance of the Wesleyan Conference such meetings were held in various localities, and those who actively encouraged them were finally made the subjects of church discipline. The leaders of the movement withdrew, and organized, in 1810, the Primitive Methodist Church, which fully sanctioned the practice of preaching at camp-meetings, as well as in market-places and in the highways. More recently the Wesleyan societies in Ireland have conducted a few of them. These meetings have been disapproved of by many because of the great excitement which sometimes attends them, and because of extravagances, in which a few persons have sometimes indulged; but they have been eminently successful in attracting the attention of numbers who would not have attended a regular church service, and who have been led to serious reflection by the earnestness and fervor of those who have engaged in them. Held, as they usually are, during the summer, and in a healthy location, they furnish a temporary retirement from the heat of large cities, and have thus been to some extent promotive of health. While there undoubtedly have been instances of persons attending these meetings for improper purposes, and there may have been scenes of disorder, especially in the outskirts, yet the history of these meetings shows that wonderful reformations have been accomplished by their agencies, and many intelligent and deeply devoted Christians have been spiritually edified.

Canada is the most important part of British America. The origin of the name is involved in great obscurity. The term was originally employed to designate the country on both sides of the St. Lawrence River, but for many years has been confined to the region north. In 1534 it was discovered by the French, who took possession of the country, and placed a large sign of the cross on an eminence to announce the religious character of the enterprise. Priests accompanied the various military expeditions, and forts were established at every prominent point from Quebec to the chief lakes. In 1629 Quebec fell into the hands of the English, but in 1632 the province was restored to France. By the treaty of Utrecht, Hudson Bay,

New Foundland, and Nova Scotia were ceded, in 1713, to England, France reserving the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi valley; but disputes afterwards occurring, after a struggle of seven years Canada was ceded to England, in 1763, and since that period it has remained under the British crown.

The early settlers of Canada were almost wholly Roman Catholics, and their descendants are still very numerous. Under the English government there was an immigration of Protestants, and provision was made for the support of Protestant clergymen, though no State church was established. Methodism was early introduced into Nova Scotia; and at the organization of the M. E. Church, in 1784, ministers were ordained for that province. The church spread into Canada from New York. Its territory was embraced first in the New York Conference, and then in the Genesee. In 1824 the work in Canada became an Annual Conference, and at their request, in 1828, it became an independent church. As missionaries had been sent from England into Lower Canada and Nova Scotia, who organized societies on the plan of the British societies, a discussion took place upon the subject of church government, and as Canada was a province of England, the majority thought it wiser to seek an affiliation with the Wesleyan Methodists of the parent country, and the name of the church was changed from the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canada to that of Wesleyan Methodist. A few, however, denying the right of the Conference to make this change, and preferring the American plan, re-organized as the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, although comparatively few in numbers, have continued their organization. (See M. E. CHURCH OF CANADA.) The Wesleyan Methodists remained in connection with the parent body, being organized into an affiliated Conference, and receiving a president from England, until 1874, when a union was effected between the Canadian Conference, the Conference of Eastern British America, and the New Connection Methodists, and an independent church was formed, called the Methodist Church of Canada. (See METHODIST CHURCH OF CANADA.) There are also a number of Primitive Methodists, who have a Conference in Canada, with a few appointments extending into the United States. The Bible Christians also have an organization. A number of colored people during the days of slavery fled from the United States and settled in Canada, and Methodist Episcopal churches were organized among them. In connection with the African M. E. Church a Conference was constituted, which in 1856 became independent, under the superintendence of Bishop Nazrey, and adopted for its name the "British M. E. Church" (which see).

The Methodists in Canada number as follows:

	Preachers.	Members.
Methodist Church.....	1093	107,575
M. E. Church.....	247	26,000
Primitive Methodists (about).....		8,000
Bible Christians (about).....		6,000

Canada Methodist Book Room.—A small depot of books was established coincidently with the first issue of the Conference organ, the Christian Guardian, in November, 1829. The editor acted as book agent, and was so called after the American custom. This was the second year after the Canada Methodists assumed the name of "M. E. Church in Canada." The agency continued to be associated with the editorship until the connection became united with the British Conference, under the name of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada, when, in 1835, the Rev. Matthew Lang, pastor of the Toronto city circuit, was appointed "book steward," after the old country usage. This office continued to stand associated with other duties until the Conference of 1843, when a minister was appointed to that work exclusively. The incumbents of that office, from the first until that time, were Egerton Ryerson, James Richardson, Matthew Lang, John Ryerson, and Alexander McNab. Since 1843 the incumbents of the office have had that work alone. Their names and order of succession are as follows: A. McNab, Anson Green, D.D., G. R. Sanderson, Anson Green, D.D., and Samuel Rose. (See ROSE, SAMUEL.)

According to an agreement made in 1836, books were furnished by the New York Book Concern at 40 per cent. discount. In 1848, by a new arrangement, they were purchased at 50 per cent., and matters so continued until during the Civil War the discount was restored to 40 per cent.

The Book Room continued, with various fortunes, until the year 1874, when three connections were united in one, and the state of its affairs was set forth in the report of a committee of the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada, which, in an abridged form, embraced the following statement:

1. Total assets of the Toronto Book Room, $97,054.19; total liabilities, $40,142.30; balance, $56,911.89. Other considerations, which cannot well come in here, leave the total value of its assets at about $60,000.

2. The Methodist Connection Book Room.—"There is no real estate connected with this publishing interest, and there will be a deficit in the Methodist Connection publishing accounts of $200, which the Conference of that church proposes to assume."

3. Wesleyan Book Room at Halifax.—The report for the year ending May 1, 1874, shows that "there are no available assets connected with the establishment, and no real estate. But owing to a debt due to the ministers of that church for advances, said debt is made a first charge on the profits of the Concern, which, though not a pressing claim, nevertheless leaves a deficiency of $1200.63."

The business of the Book Room is conducted by the book stewards, under the direction of a book committee of thirty-seven members chosen by the General Conference. It is divided into two sections. The western section has control of the publishing interests in Toronto, and the eastern of those in Halifax. They have power to fix the salaries of book stewards and editors, and, under certain restrictions, to suspend them for incompetency or culpable negligence. A full report is to be made to the Annual Conferences and to the General Conference.

A weekly paper—the Christian Guardian and Evangelical Witness—is published at Toronto, and another—the Provincial Wesleyan—at Halifax. The editors also have supervision of the Sunday-school papers,—the Banner and the Advocate. According to the recommendation of the General Conference, a monthly magazine has been issued, and a depository has been established in Montreal. Rev. Samuel Rose was elected by the General Conference book steward for the west, and Rev. A. W. Nicholson for the east. Rev. Edward Hartley Dewart was elected editor of the Guardian, and Rev. W. H. Withrow assistant editor. The latter devotes his time to the magazine and books.

Canandaigua, N. Y. (pop. 4862), the capital of Ontario County, situated on the Northern Central Railway. The first class was formed nearly five miles southwest of the village, in 1796, where in after-years Cokesbury chapel was built. Previous to the building of the church worship was held in a log school-house. The first minister of the new church was the Rev. James Gilmore; and under his ministry and that of his successors there were several revivals, the most important one occurring under the ministry of Zina J. Buck, in 1842, when 130 were converted, and the most of them added to the society. In 1811 a Methodist minister preached in the "old Star building," then the court-house of Canandaigua, and the first class in the town was organized in 1815. It consisted of about 20 members, and the Rev. Gideon Lanning appointed William Boughton, a local preacher, leader. For some time the class met in the upper story of a tin-shop on Buffalo Street, and when this became too small they met in a school-house on Chapel Street, and continued to do so until their church was built. This city first appears in the minutes for 1817, with Benjamin G. Paddock as preacher in charge.

The first church edifice was commenced in 1817, and was dedicated July 26, 1818. The estimated cost was $7000. The church was incorporated in 1823. As late as 1826 the book agents of New York held a mortgage against this church for $1000, and the Conference of that year appointed an agent to collect funds to relieve the church of its embarrassment. About 1835 a new lot was purchased on Main Street, and the old church moved on it. About 1858 the church was enlarged and repaired, costing nearly $8000. The Genesee Conference held a session in the old church in 1836, and in the new or enlarged one, the East Genesee held a session in 1855. After extensive repairs, the church was re-opened by Bishop Thomson, Aug. 25, 1868, the cost being about $7500. It became a station in 1828, when Richard Wright was appointed pastor. There are now (1876) 203 members, 180 Sunday-school scholars, and $26,000 church property.

Cannon, William, ex-governor of Delaware, was born March 15, 1809. His parents were deeply devout Christians, and members of the Methodist Church. He was converted in his seventeenth year in Sussex Co., Del. Before his twentieth year he was a class-leader and exhorter, and was for many years recording steward of his charge, and for several years was lay steward of the Philadelphia Conference. He was successful in the prosecution of business and acquired a handsome competence, which he dispensed widely and liberally. From time to time he received marks of the confidence of his fellow-citizens in being placed in official position, and was elected governor of the State, in which office he served a part of the time during the civil rebellion. He was a man of uniform and deep piety, and died in Bridgeville, Del., March 1, 1865, in the full enjoyment of the religion which he had prized. "I would rather have religion," said he, "than the wealth of Astor. I am established on the Rock of ages."

Canterbury (pop. 20,961), a city in the southeastern part of England, is the residence of the Archbishop of Canterbury. A small Methodist society was organized before 1750, and Mr. Wesley was in the habit of occasionally visiting the place. His confidential friend, Vincent Peronet, was the proprietor of a small farm in the vicinity. It was also a great military depot, and Mr. Wesley always felt and manifested a deep interest in the welfare of soldiers. A number of them became very deeply attached to the Methodists, and it is said that when certain regiments, on their way to Holland, passed through the city, remembering former days, they attended class-meeting in such numbers that the military class-meeting lasted for nine successive hours. In dining with one of the colonels, the officer remarked, "No men fight like those who fear God. I had rather command five hundred such than any regiment in his Majesty's army." While Mr. Wesley was thus preaching to the soldiers and to the poor in this venerable city, he was furiously opposed not only by mobs but by the clergymen. One of the rectors, Mr. Kirby, published a work entitled "The Impostor Detected, or the Counterfeit Saint Turned Inside Out. Containing a Full Discovery of the Horrid Blasphemies and Impudence Taught by those Diabolical Seducers called Methodists." In this production Mr. Wesley is accused of "matchless impudence and wickedness, and of impious cant. He is a chameleon, uses blasphemous jargon, basely belies Christianity, and nonsense is the smallest of his failings. In him the angel of darkness has made his incarnate appearance, and he and his brother are murderers of sense as well as souls, and just about as fitly cut out for poets as a lame horse would be for a rope dancer." As this was published under the eye of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who is, under the Queen, the head of the English Church, and as it was circulated without disapprobation, it shows the spirit of the clergy of that age. Notwithstanding this effusion, however, in 1764 a chapel was built, out of the materials of the St. Andrew's church, which had been pulled down because it interfered with the street. On the Canterbury charge two ministers are stationed, and 400 members are reported.

Canton, Ill. (pop. 3308), situated in Fulton County, has considerable elements of prosperity and natural advantages for future growth. It is first mentioned in the minutes in 1833, when Peter Boring was appointed pastor. The Church South, since the close of the war, has had a small charge. It is in the Central Illinois Conference, and reports as follows: Methodist Episcopal Church, 217 members, 150 Sunday-school scholars, $18,500 church property; M. E. Church South, 63 members.

Canton, Ohio (pop. 8660), capital of Stark County, situated on the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad, is pre-eminent in the United States for the manufacture of mowers and reapers. It is immediately surrounded by one of the best agricultural districts in the State. It was very early visited by the Methodist itinerants, and is first mentioned in the Conference minutes for 1823, when William Tipton was appointed to Canton circuit, it then being in the Portland district, with William Swayze as presiding elder. The pastor reported in 1824 321 members, and it was then placed in the Ohio district, with Charles Elliott as presiding elder and Dennis Goddard as pastor. At the organization of the Pittsburgh Conference, which held its first session September 15, 1825, Canton fell into that Conference, and Billings O. Plimpton was appointed pastor. In 1862 and 1863, under the pastoral labors of S. P. Woolf, a new church was completed, costing about $52,000. Two other churches have since been erected. The statistics are as follows:

First Church.....	351	300	$73,000
Second Church.....	232	200	24,000

Cape Colony embraces the southernmost portion of Africa, and is under the dominion of Great Britain. Its area is variously estimated at from 200,000 to 250,000 square miles. Its greatest length is over 600, and its greatest breadth over 400 miles. The Cape of Good Hope was probably known to the Phœnician navigators before the Christian era, but was discovered by the Portuguese in 1497. About the middle of the seventeenth century it was occupied by the Dutch East India Company, and became a permanent British possession early in the present century, having been ceded by Holland, to whom it belonged for a time. In 1814, Dr. Coke, when on his way to India, left a missionary at the Cape of Good Hope, but not finding his way open the field was abandoned, and he joined his brethren in Ceylon. The mission was re-established in 1816, and from that time has gradually spread through the entire British dominions of South Africa. The discovery of diamonds greatly increased the population. At present the Wesleyans have in Southern Africa 6 districts, 68 ministers, with native missionaries and evangelists, and 14,638 members.

Cape Girardeau, Mo. (pop. 3585), situated in a county by the same name, on the Mississippi River and the Cape Girardeau and State Line Railroad. The first settlements were made by French and German emigrants, in 1794. It is the seat of St. Vincent College. It was probably here that Methodism was introduced into the State. In 1806, John Travis was appointed missionary to Missouri, and Jesse Walker was appointed to Illinois. In 1807, Jesse Walker was appointed missionary to Missouri. In 1809 Cape Girardeau reported 54 members, and Jesse Walker was appointed to this circuit. In 1810 it reported 100 members. It is in the St. Louis Conference of the M. E. Church, and the statistics are reported (1876) as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	24	60	$2100
African M. E. Church.....	118	65	2500

Capers, William, D.D., one of the bishops of the M. E. Church, was born in South Carolina, Jan. 26, 1790. He was educated in the South Carolina College, but leaving before graduation, he commenced the study of law. He was admitted on trial in the South Carolina Conference in 1808; and after seven years spent in the ministry he located. He was re-admitted in 1818, and was a member of the General Conference of 1820. In 1828 he was sent as a delegate from the Methodist Church of the United States to the British Conference. In 1835 he accepted the chair of Professor of the Evidences of Christianity in Columbia College; and was by the General Conference of 1836 elected editor of the Southern Christian Advocate. In 1840 he was elected missionary secretary, with his duties principally in the South. He was a member of the General Conference of 1844, and took part in the debate which led to the separation of the Southern bishop he was careful, prudent, and dignified, and he faithfully discharged his duties both to the ministers and to the church. He died in Anderson, S. C., Jan. 29, 1855.

Church. Such was his intimacy with the leading men of the South that he was supposed more fully to reflect their views than perhaps any other minister. He attended and participated in the convention of 1845 at Louisville; and at the first General Conference he was elected bishop of the M. E. Church South. He was originally of a Huguenot family, and his father served in the Revolutionary War. Subsequently his house was the home of Bishop Asbury and the early preachers. Bishop Capers was gentle and amiable both in appearance and manner, and was a smooth and eloquent speaker. As a Carlisle, England (pop. 31,074), an ancient city, whose cathedral was founded in 1101. Mr. Wesley visited the city in 1770, when the society had but fifteen members. Its place of worship was a cart-shed, and stones and brickbats were often thrown at the worshipers. It has now 3 preachers, 543 members, and 845 Sunday-school scholars, with several chapels.

Carlisle, Pa. (pop. 6650), was founded in 1751, and in 1753 contained five log houses. The United States built here a fort in 1777, chiefly by the labor of the Hessians captured at Trenton, N. J. This town is the seat of Dickinson College. Asbury visited this place in July, 1789, and preached in the Episcopal church in the morning, and because he did not read prayers he was forbidden the church in the evening. His text was, "Blessed is he who shall not be offended in me." He preached in the evening in the court-house, from "Look unto me and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth." The opposition was great, and many declared that "it was no preaching." In his tours he returned again in August, 1803. Henry Boehm preached Friday night, the 29th; on Saturday, at 11 o'clock, Asbury preached, and Wilson Lee at night. On Sabbath they had a prayer-meeting at 5 A.M., preaching at 8 A.M. by James Smith, Asbury at 11 A.M., and Lee in the afternoon. He was there again in 1807, and preached twice on Sabbath, August 9. His next visit was on August 8, 1810, when he "drew a plan for a new chapel seventy by forty-five, of one story, the cost about two thousand dollars." July 9, 1815, he preached in the new chapel. Carlisle is first mentioned in the records of the church for 1794, when William McDowell and William Talbot were sent to that circuit. Previous to this it had been connected with Little York. In 1795 this circuit reported 295 members, and Joshua Jones and Resin Cash were sent as pastors. The M. E. Church has 287 members, 245 Sunday-school scholars, and $27,300 in church property.

Carlton, Thomas, D.D., late book agent of the Methodist Episcopal Church in New York, was born in Londonderry, N. H., July 20, 1808, and died in Elizabeth, N. J., April 17, 1874. While he was a lad, his parents removed to Niagara County, N. Y., where he spent his youth upon a farm. He became a member of the church in 1825, was appointed a class-leader in 1827, and an exhorter in 1828, and joined the General Conference in 1829. He served thirteen years in the regular pastoral work and seven years as a presiding elder, when, in 1852, he was elected by the General Conference senior agent of the Book Concern at New York. During the whole period of his service as book agent he performed also the duties of treasurer of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. During his term of office the credit of both enterprises was maintained at a high standard, and he displayed unusual talent as a financier. Dr. Carlton was a member of all the successive General Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church from 1848 to 1872. After his retirement from the Book Concern in 1872, he engaged partially in secular pursuits, though manifesting a deep interest in all the enterprises of the church.

growth through college and university stages, he remained president till 1874, when he was elected bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada by the General Conference of said body at Napanee. He was admitted into the Bay of Quinté Annual Conference on trial in 1856; into full connection, and ordained deacon by Bishop Richardson, in 1860, and elder by Bishop Smith in 1864. His years of active service, till the election to the episcopate, were given to the educational work of the church. Received the M.A. degree in 1860, and the D.D. in 1874.

Carpenter, Charles W., was born in New York, Dec. 16, 1792, and died at Plattekill, N. Y., May, 1853. His parents were members of the John Street church. He was converted in his eighteenth year, during a revival conducted by Ezekiel Cooper, in the city of New York. He entered Columbia College, but his health failing he was compelled to leave before graduation. He was licensed to preach by Freeborn Garrettson in 1812. He entered the New York Conference in 1814, but by reason of failing health was compelled to retire from the active ministry in 1816, and went to Savannah, where he engaged in business for ten years. During this time he labored as a local preacher. In 1828 he returned

North, and was re-admitted into the New York Conference, in which he filled many important appointments as pastor and presiding elder. He was secretary of the New York Conference for several years, and was several times elected a delegate to the General Conference. All of his official positions he filled with ability. Ill health compelled him to take a supernumerary relation in 1850, and from that time his health rapidly declined. He was a man of uniform character, good literary acquirements, and great loveliness of disposition.

Carpenter, Coles, was born in Westchester Co., N. Y., March 17, 1784, and died at Cambridge, N. Y., Feb. 17, 1834. His parents were Methodists, and he was carefully trained in religion. At seventeen he was converted, and in 1809 was admitted on trial in the New York Conference. He filled important appointments until the organization of the Troy Conference, in 1832, when he remained in the latter. In 1833 he was appointed presiding elder of Troy district, in which service he labored until his death. His preaching was an earnest and direct appeal to the conscience and heart. To him death had no terrors. So triumphantly did he meet his last enemy that his dying words were, "Glory! glory! glory!"

Carr, Joseph M., A.M., was born at Damascus, O., March 9, 1836, and was converted in his eighteenth year. He was educated at Mount Union College, and graduated creditably in the regular and classical course, June, 1859. The same year he was received on trial in the Pittsburgh Annual Conference, and has occupied prominent appointments, one year presiding elder, and at the formation of the East Ohio Conference, in 1876, was re-appointed to that office, which he now holds. He is a member of the board of control of Mount Union College, and received in cursu A.M. He was prominently engaged in organizing the Ministerial Relief Society, of Pittsburgh Conference, and is now active in the same organization, of the East Ohio Conference. He was appointed by the General Conference to represent the East Ohio Conference in the publishing committee of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, 1876-1880.

Carrier Seminary is located at Clarion, Pa. In 1859 preliminary steps were taken for the establishment of a seminary at this place, but the exciting events connected with the war, and its progress, prevented successful action. In 1866 the centenary committee of the Erie Conference approved the establishment of a seminary of a high grade within the Clarion district. This action was approved by the ministers of the district who met at Clarion, and resolved to attempt to raise $50,000 for a seminary building, and Rev. R. M. Bear was appointed financial agent. He was succeeded in the following year by Rev. E. R. Knapp, who continued in the work for several years. In 1867 the board of trustees was elected, a site secured, and the building was put under contract. The corner-stone was laid June 16, 1868, by Bishop Kingsley, who delivered an eloquent address on the occasion. The building was opened for students in 1871, and the name of Carrier Seminary was adopted, in honor of the Carrier family, who agreed to give the amount of $6000. The school had been previously organized in the old academy building. Its first term was opened Sept. 10, 1867, by Professor J. Townsend, who was succeeded the next year by Rev. S. S. Stuntz. In 1870, Miss A. G. Haldeman became principal. When the new building was opened the music department was supplied with pianos and organs, and a boarding department was commenced. The fall term began under Professor J. J. Stedman. He was succeeded by Professor J. S. Melican, and in the fall of 1874 Professor W. Todd was placed in charge, who remains (1877) still in charge of the institute. The location of the building is one of remarkable healthfulness, and the ample grounds are tastefully arranged, and planted with fruit and ornamental trees. The building is of brick, 100 by 75 feet, three stories high, with a boarding department maintained at the actual cost, which is apportioned among the various boarders. The present faculty is: Rev. William Todd, A.M., Principal; Miss E. J. Haldeman, Preeceptress; Miss Mary Rodgers, Instrumental and Vocal Music. The number of students is about fifty each term. Value of the property about $75,000.

Carroll, John, D.D., of the Methodist Church of Canada, was born on an island in the Bay of Fundy, within the Province of New Brunswick, Aug. 8, 1809. With his parents he came to Canada in infancy. His father was in the British army in the war of 1812-15. His boyhood was a hard one. The end of the war in 1815 found the family in York, now Toronto. He was awakened in the spring of 1824 by a religious tract, taken on trial by Rev. John Ryerson, found peace that summer, under the preaching of the devoted Rowley Heyland. At the age of eighteen he was appointed a class-leader, and at nineteen was called out on a circuit under the presiding elder. At the Canada Conference of 1829 he was received on trial, and in 1833 was ordained to the full work of the ministry. For thirteen years he filled several of the best circuits and stations; he was then appointed as a district chairman, which office he ably filled for twenty-five years. In 1863 he was elected co-delegate of the Conference. For one year he was Sunday-school agent and editor of Sunday-school periodicals. His literary labors have given to the church eleven volumes and tracts. Since he was nominally superannuated he has had charge of mission work for three years and a half. His D.D. was conferred unasked by the University of South Carolina, at Columbia. He has been in the ministry over forty-eight years.

Carrow, G. D.—Born in Kent Co., Md., Nov. 26, 1823; converted Aug. 7, 1840; admitted to the Philadelphia Annual Conference in 1843; self-educated; appointed superintendent of the South American mission 1854; introduced mission day-schools and Methodist preaching in the Spanish tongue; received the degree of D.D. from Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., 1866; member of the General Conference of 1868; fraternal delegate to the Wesleyan Conference of Eastern British America 1871.

Carskaden, T. R., lay delegate from the Baltimore Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Hampshire Co., Va., in 1837, and joined the church when he was sixteen years old. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of West Virginia in 1862, and the youngest member of that body, and has been a director of the West Virginia State Temperance Society.

Carson City, Nev. (pop. 3042), the capital of Ormsley County, and also the capital of the State, 27 miles south from Reno, and 23 miles southeast from Truckee, California. It is also situated on a river by the same name, on the Virginia and Truckee Railroad. It is the oldest town in the State, contains some fine buildings, and is being rapidly supplied with schools and churches.

This region was originally included in the California Conference. In 1861 a "Nevada Territory district" was organized, with N. R. Peck as presiding elder, and W. J. Blakely was appointed to Carson City. In 1862 he reported 4 members, and T. H. McGrath was appointed pastor. He reported, in 1863, 14 members, having purchased a church lot for $400, and organized a Sunday-school of 60 scholars. In 1864 the General Conference organized a Nevada Conference. It held its first session in Carson City, September, 1865. The statistics as reported in the minutes for 1876 are: members, 38; Sunday-school scholars, 65; church property, $13,000.

Carson, Joseph, a minister in the M. E. Church South, was born in Winchester, Va., Feb. 19, 1785, and died in Culpepper Co., Va., April 15, 1875, in the ninety-first year of his age. He united with the M. E. Church in April, 1801, and soon after was converted. He was admitted to trial at the Baltimore Conference, April, 1805, at the session which was held in Winchester, Va., in the house of Rev. George A. Reid, where Bishop Asbury and Whatcoat presided. He was appointed junior preacher on the Wyoming circuit, which embraced all that part of Pennsylvania from the western branch of the Susquehanna to the New York State line, being 400 miles in circuit, having 32 appointments. There was no church edifice on the circuit, he preaching in private houses and groves. About 600 were added to the church during that year. He traveled extensive circuits in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, and everywhere revivals attended his labors. In 1825 and 1826 he was stationed in Richmond, Va. During his pastorate the membership was doubled, and the revival extended to all the churches in the city. He gave to the church 74 years of his life, and to the ministry 73. "His mind was clear, logical, powerful; his character was strong, pure, self-sacrificing; his preaching was expository and evangelical; his administration was prompt, thorough, and decisive; his personal bearing dignified and genial; his voice was thrilling and impressive."

Carson, Robert J., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Franklin Co., N. C., in the year 1809, and died in the latter part of 1872, near Weldon, N. C. Embracing religion while young, at twenty years of age he was admitted on trial in the Virginia Conference. Traveling a number of circuits in that Conference and the North Carolina Conference, he served a number of terms as presiding elder. In 1828 he was placed on the supernumerary list. He was a member of the Louisville Convention of 1845, and of the General Conference of 1846. "In person he was a true specimen of nature's nobleman, tall and erect in form, and of a very commanding appearance. He was a fine preacher, often overwhelmingly powerful, and yet as simple as a child."

Carter, Erasmus, was lay delegate from the Texas Conference to the General Conference of 1872, and most worthily represented it.

Carter, J. L., represented the East Oregon and Washington Conferences at the General Conference of 1876 as lay delegate, to the satisfaction of the body and in a way to reflect the wishes of his constituency.

Carter, Oscar, was born in slavery, and remained in bondage until the proclamation of Abraham Lincoln. He entered the United States army, in which he served two years faithfully. Being honorably discharged, he took up his residence in Vicksburg, where he united with the M. E. Church. He was licensed first as an exhorter, soon after as a local preacher; he removed to Edwards' Depot in 1868, and was called to take charge of a congregation until the next session of Conference. In 1872 he was ordained deacon in the Mississippi Conference, and returned to the same congregation. The following year he was sent to Forest Station, where he remained till the time of his death. He was assassinated in Scott Co., Mississippi, in Nov., 1875.

Cartwright, Peter, a pioneer minister of the M. E. Church, was born Sept. 1, 1785, in Amherst Co., Va., and died at Pleasant Plains, Ill., Sept. 25, 1872, in the eighty-eighth year of his age. When eight years of age he removed with his parents to Logan Co., Ky. He was converted May 1, 1801, at a union protracted meeting held by the Presbyterians and Methodists near his home. He was licensed to exhort in May, 1802, and was employed by the presiding elder until his reception into the Annual Conference, October, 1804, at Mount Gerizim, Ky. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Asbury, and elder by Bishop McKendree. He was appointed presiding elder of Wabash district by Bishop Asbury in 1812. From 1813 to 1816 he was presiding elder of Green River district, Ky. In this latter year also he was elected delegate to the General Conference at Baltimore, and was a delegate to thirteen General Conferences in succession. Having traveled circuits in Kentucky from 1816 to 1820, he was appointed presiding elder of Cumberland district in 1821. He removed to Illinois in 1823. In 1825 he was presiding elder of Illinois district, which office he held in different districts until 1869, when he took a superannuated relation. In 1870 and 1872, however, he was Conference missionary. He attended forty-six sessions of the Illinois Conference, missing only one from 1824 to 1871. He is said to have been present at the first roll-call in his Conference forty-five times. He was appointed by his Conference six years a visitor to McKendree College, three years to Illinois Wesleyan University, and one year to Garrett Biblical Institute. He was eight years in the Western Conference, as many in the Tennessee, four years in the Kentucky, and forty-eight in the Illinois Conference. He was a man peculiar in his manners, and yet an acknowledged leader of the church in his day. As a pioneer in Kentucky, Ohio, and Illinois, his services in the planting of the churches can never be fully estimated. His remarkable perception of human nature and ready wit supplied his lack of literary culture; a man of remarkable physical constitution, he was well adapted to endure the severities of pioneer life. With all his rude exterior and peculiar manners, public men very generally regarded him with reverence. In all Conference action his debates were short, pithy, and frequently humorous. Truly devoted to the doctrines and government of the church, he was always considered a safe legislator, hence his frequent election as a delegate to the General Conference. In the management of public meetings, especially camp-meetings, he perhaps had no superior in his day; in the control of rough and wicked men he had superior power. Having been born six years before the death of Wesley, and living to such an advanced life, he passed through many remarkable changes in the history of the church, and yet at no time was he disloyal to its economy and doctrines. As a citizen also, having been born before the nation had a constitution, and passing through the changeful history of the nation, he was ever found as to his church so to his nation, loyal to its interests. He died in peace, honored and revered by the church and the community. He has left to the church two works, valuable for their historical reminiscences, one entitled "Fifty Years a Presiding Elder," the other his autobiography.

Case, Charles G., of Fulton, N. Y., a wealthy and unusually generous layman of the M. E. Church, who became a member of the "Wesleyan Church" in 1843, and expended thousands of dollars in support of its various interests and institutions. He was an extensive contractor for building city water-works and State canals in various parts of the country. His devotion to the anti-slavery cause was early and constant, and he lived to see the triumph of freedom and the establishment of the American Union. To both he gave many good words, good deeds, and good dollars. He died early in 1876.

Case, William, long known as "Elder Case," deserves a place among the foremost men in the ranks of Methodism, particularly so in what was long known as the "Two Canadas," Upper and Lower. He was a native of New England, of the town of Swansea, on the Massachusetts seaboard, where he was born Aug. 27, 1780. His boyhood and early manhood were spent in the town of Chatham, N. Y., where he was converted about his twenty-third year. Two years after, he was taken on trial in the New York Conference. Immediately upon his reception he was appointed to Upper Canada, as the colleague of the notable Henry Ryan, on the Bay Quinté circuit. After another year spent in Canada, he was removed to the Ulster circuit, in the State of New York. The following two years he was returned to Upper Canada, to its western section; the year 1808-9 on the Ancaster circuit; and the year 1809-10 he was sent to organize the Thames circuit, between the Thames and St. Clair Rivers, where a great revival took place. When he entered the Province at the beginning of this period there was an embargo on the conveyance of American property, and he was forced to make his horse swim after the ferry-boat across the Niagara River from Black Rock to Fort Erie. Upon his return to Conference in 1810 he was appointed presiding elder, in the State of New York, in which office he continued, on two several districts, until the close of the war in 1815. He was then appointed to Canada, but now as a presiding elder, first on one and then on the other of the two districts into which the work in Canada was divided. At the formation of the Canada Annual Conference he fell within its bounds, and continued one of its two presiding elders until 1828. About 1823, when on the Niagara district, he had the honor of originating the plan of Indian or aboriginal evangelization in Canada, which became his predominant passion until death. Upon the organization of an independent Methodist Episcopal Church for Canada in 1828, he was elected general superintendent pro tempore, in which office he continued during the whole five years prior to the change to Wesleyan Methodism. He also presided in each of the five Annual Conferences held during that period, and was special "superintendent of missions." From a tentative election, it was ascertained that had there been a Canadian elected to the office of bishop, Elder Case would unquestionably have been the person chosen. When the union with the British Conference took place in 1833, and the church took the name of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, his labors were entirely restricted to the Indian missionary work. Some general visitations, a supervisal of the translations, and a special oversight of the Indian Industrial School at Alderville, joined to the ordinary duties of a missionary, may be said to have been thenceforth his life-work. The Indians of Alderville and Rice Lake, through the influence of John Sunday, a notable Indian preacher, remaining under the British Conference, when that Conference withdrew from the union in 1840, Mr. Case remained in the same connection during the seven years of separate operations, and in 1844 was appointed as one of the representatives of the British Conference to the American General Conference in New York. He had been a delegate from the Canada Conference in 1836, to Cincinnati, while the first union was in existence. When the union was restored in 1847, he was one of those who hailed the event with much gladness. He continued in the same relation which he has held save that, three several years, he was chairman of the Cobourg district. He lived to see the whole of Wesleyan Methodism in the two Canadas and Hudson Bay territory consolidated into one work, under the jurisdiction of the Canada Conference, in 1854. At the following session he, at the request of the Conference, preached his famous jubilee sermon. On Oct. 19th, 1855, he was called to his final rest.

Mr. Case was a man of commanding personal appearance, dignified, intelligent in conversation, fair preaching ability, and good administrative talents. Calm, self-possessed, urbane, amiable, he was very generally respected and beloved, and well merited the designation, which he long bore, of FATHER OF CANADIAN MISSIONS.

Castle, Joseph, D.D., of the Philadelphia Conference of the M. E. Church, was born in Devonshire, Eng., Jan. 6, 1801. His parents having removed to Canada, in 1819 he joined the church, and the following year received license to exhort. In 1823 he was admitted on trial into the Genesee Conference. His subsequent appointments were Wilkesbarre, Pa.; Owego, Auburn, Ithaca, Utica, and Cazenovia, N. Y. In 1837 he received the degree of A.M. from Hamilton College. In 1838 he was appointed presiding elder of the Berkshire district, but at the end of one year was transferred to Albany. In 1841 he was transferred to Union church, Philadelphia. His subsequent appointments were Nazareth, Harrisburg; St. Paul's, Wilmington; St. George's, Eighth Street, now Green, North Philadelphia district, Union, Western, and Mount Zion, Manayunk. In 1848 he graduated in the Pennsylvania College of Medicine, having entered some four years before, and in 1848 received the degree of D.D. from Dickinson College. From 1863 to 1871 he was presiding elder on the South Philadelphia, Reading, and Central Philadelphia districts, after which he was stationed at the Western church and on the city mission. In 1875 he asked a superannuated relation. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1832, 1836, 1840, 1860, 1864, and 1868.

Castleman, David, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Adams Co., Pa., Nov. 4, 1825, and died at Moorsville, Pa., Nov. 10, 1875. In 1848 he was licensed as a local preacher, and in 1849 admitted on trial in the Baltimore Conference. He filled all of his appointments faithfully and efficiently. His death was sudden and surprising to all his friends. Having just concluded a funeral service in the Moorsville cemetery, near the Manor Hill camp-ground, and the last words scarcely having fallen from his lips, he suddenly fell to the earth and expired. He was an industrious, faithful, and efficient Methodist preacher, especially looking after the interests of the poor, the sick, and the dying.

Catechism of the Methodist Episcopal Church.—In 1748 Wesley published a 12mo pamphlet of 39 pages, entitled "Instructions for the Young." He enjoined it upon his preachers to use this among the children. In 1787 the American Conferences instructed the preachers to procure this pamphlet. In 1800 reference is made to a "Catechism," and in 1808 to "Catechisms," and it was requested that all who could should read and commit them to memory. It was made the duty of the preacher to impress them upon the minds and hearts of the young. The General Conference of 1824 made it the duty of the preachers in charge to introduce the Catechism into the Sunday-schools. The Wesleyans in England having prepared a series of Catechisms, they were circulated also among the American Methodists; but there was no Catechism directly prepared and authorized by the General Conference until 1848. Rev. Dr. Kidder, the Sunday-school editor, was then instructed to prepare a church Catechism, and with suitable assistance such a Catechism was arranged, and was adopted by the General Conference of 1852. The title is "Catechisms of the Methodist Episcopal Church." They consist of three numbers, number 2 being an advance on number 1, and number 3 being the fullest development and statement of the doctrines of the church. The Discipline directs that these Catechisms be used in all the Sunday-schools.

Catechumens were candidates for baptism in the ancient church who were placed under a system of instruction prior to their admission. In different ages there were different periods of preparation. In some churches the period of Lent was specially devoted to this work. The phrase catechumen is not found in the Discipline or rules of the Methodist Churches; but sometimes the term is employed to designate the children of the church, especially those who are studying the Catechism and elementary doctrines preparatory to being received into full membership. Sometimes the phrase has been applied to probationers, because they are supposed to be receiving instruction preparatory to full admission. Among the Wesleyan Methodists in England the term has been recently revived, especially through the labors of the recent Rev. Mr. Jackson, who prepared a course of instruction for young persons between childhood and puberty.

Catholic (Greek καθολικός, from κατά and ὅλος, general, universal) was a title given to the early Christian church on account of its claim to embrace all the world. In this respect Christianity was different from all other systems. They were for one nation, as the Jewish Church; or for one government or language, as the Phœnician, Egyptian, Greek, or Roman. Christianity was for the world, and hence was called Catholic. In this sense the Catholic Church is the body of true believers everywhere, and the term cannot be appropriated to any one branch or to any one denomination.

Its first use was to distinguish the Christian from the Jewish Church. Its second, to distinguish orthodox believers from those who adopted the various forms of heresy. Polycarp, who died in 166, used it in the former signification. So also it is used in the Apostles' Creed: "I believe in the holy Catholic Church." It is the assertion of a firm conviction that the church of Christ will prevail and triumph until it fills the whole earth,—that its message and its promises are to all men everywhere. In 372, Patricianus, when asked why Christians called themselves Catholics, replied, "Christian is my name, and Catholic my surname; the one is my title, the other my character or mark of distinction."

To claim the exclusive name of Catholic by any one denomination is simple arrogance. The Romanists did this, as they claimed universal dominion; and when, as before the Reformation, all the countries of Christendom, save what was then the comparatively small and almost unknown country of Russia,—only the nucleus of the present empire,—bowed before the supremacy of the Pope, there seemed to be a shadow of claim. But since the Reformation the national influence of Romanism has diminished, until at present the leading nations of the earth are decidedly anti-papal.

Strictly speaking, to say Roman Catholic, or Greek Catholic, is as absurd as to say a particular universal. But as long use has so employed the term, Protestants should always prefix Roman to Catholic if they so designate the papal church.

It would be better, however, to employ the terms Romanist, or papist, instead of Roman Catholic.

In the printed forms of the Apostles' Creed the Methodist Churches use a foot-note to explain "Catholic" by "universal." The churches and the public should be so instructed as not to require this.

Catskill, N. Y. (pop. 7391), the capital of Greene County, situated on the Hudson River. This vicinity abounds in attractive scenery, and is a very popular summer resort for artists.

Catskill is first mentioned in the minutes of 1831, in connection with Saugerties, John Tackaberry and D. Poor pastors. It is in the New York Conference, and has 1 church, with 310 members, 225 Sunday-school scholars, and a church property valued at $21,300. There is an African M. E. society here, but the date of its organization is not reported.

Cawnpore (pop. 108,796) is a large native city in the interior of India, which has a considerable population of whites and half-breeds. It was the scene of a dreadful massacre in 1857. In 1873 the India Conference, being deeply convinced that something should be done for the education and better training of the mixed population, at the earnest request of various persons, opened a school in Cawnpore. Private bungalows were rented, and teachers were paid from tuition fees, and from a monthly grant from the English government in aid of teachers; but as these buildings were not adapted to school purposes, and were held at a high rent, it was determined to build. The plan as adopted was to have three buildings, but only one has been as yet erected, and to accomplish that considerable debt was incurred. The school is under the supervision of the India Conference, which appointed a board of trustees and examiners. It is a work of vast moment, and may be the means of extending the knowledge of the truth very widely through that population. The India Conference of ceeded by Augustus W. Smith, subsequently president of the Wesleyan University. In 1833 steps were taken for the erection of two additional buildings, one of brick, 36 by 50 feet, three stories high; the other of wood, 100 by 22 feet, two stories high.

Cazenovia Seminary.—The Genesee Conference in 1819 "resolved to take measures to establish a seminary within the bounds of the Conference, and a committee was appointed to consider and report thereon." At a subsequent session a resolution was adopted to establish a seminary of learning in Ithaca. "This action," says Dr. Peck, "was induced by a strong petition, and large papers coming from certain friends at Ithaca." In 1823 the subject was again considered, and as the Ithaca scheme had failed, Cazenovia was selected, and the old court-house, now the venerable chapel, became the seminary building. The institution was named the "Seminary of the Genesee Conference," and it was opened in the latter part of 1824. It commenced with a class of eight, but in two years had increased to one hundred and forty-five. In 1827 the building next west of the chapel was erected and occupied as a boarding-hall. The Conference having been divided, the name of the seminary was changed to that of Oneida Conference Seminary. From its earliest history it was fortunate in having men of more than ordinary power at its head. Its first president was Nathaniel Porter, who was succeeded by Professor Larrabee, President W. H. Allen, Professor Johnson, of Middletown, Dr. Bannister, of Evanston, Dr. Whedon, now of the Quarterly, and Bishop Andrews have been connected with the institution. Rev. George Peck was principal from 1835 to 1838. He was succeeded by Rev. George G. Hapgood, and in 1843 by Rev. Dr. Bannister, who remained at the head of the institution until 1856, when he left for Garrett Biblical Institute. Under his administration an indebtedness of $5000 was canceled, William's Hall was built, and the old chapel was changed and repaired. Among the special contributors was General Ledyard, who also furnished the organ in the chapel at a cost of $500.

At its semi-centennial reunion in 1875, a subscription of over $40,000 was made to aid its funds. Being one of the oldest seminaries, it numbers among its students some of the most prominent men of the church. Some 16,000 day students have received instruction in its halls. Of these 140 are in the ranks of the ministry, with an equal number of young women, who have become the wives of ministers. Three of the bishops of the church are among its alumni. One hundred and forty of its students are engaged in the profession of the law, one hundred and twenty in the profession of medicine, of whom Davis, of Chicago, and Valentine, of St. Louis, are remarkably conspicuous. It has been represented in commerce, in banks, in Congress, and in gubernatorial chairs. Its President is W. S. Smyth, Ph. D., assisted by an able faculty.

Cedar Falls, Iowa (pop. 3070), situated in Blackhawk County, on the Iowa division of the Illinois Central Railroad, is a rapidly-growing town, surrounded with a fertile agricultural district. This place was first called in the records of the church Upper Cedar mission, and was supplied in 1853 by W. Gough. In 1855 it is first named Cedar Falls, when P. E. Brown was sent as pastor. In 1856 Jonesville and Cedar Falls were connected, and E. D. Lamb was appointed pastor. In 1857 it reported 40 members. It is in the Upper Iowa Conference, and reports (1876) 300 members, 220 Sunday-school scholars, a church edifice valued at $10,000, and a parsonage at $1600.

Cedar Rapids, Iowa (pop. 9940), situated in Lynn County, on the Iowa division of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. The first Methodist class was formed here in 1841, and the place appears in the minutes for 1842, but is called Cedar mission, when Uriah Ferree was appointed missionary. In 1848 Cedar Rapids mission is first mentioned, when Isaac Searles was appointed pastor. In 1844 he reported 64 members. In 1848 it disappears as a mission. In 1854 the first M. E. church was built, and the first Sunday-school organized under the ministry of the Rev. Elias Skinner. In 1870 a new church was built. An African M. E. society was organized in 1874, and has a house of worship valued at $3000. The class from which this society originated numbered 32. It is in the Upper Iowa Conference, and reports (1876): members, 230; Sunday-school scholars, 200; church property, $45,000.

Cennick, John, was the son of Quakers or Friends. He was awakened in 1735, and after severe self-mortification found peace Sept. 6, 1737. He at once commenced preaching and writing hymns, many of which Charles Wesley corrected and published in 1739. He is the author of the hymn beginning, "Jesus, my all, to heaven is gone." Mr. Truman says that "there can be no doubt that John Cennick was one of Wesley's lay preachers before Maxfield was," who has generally been considered his first. It was at Whitefield's suggestion that Cennick became the first master or chaplain of Kingswood School. In his preaching he became Calvinistic, and Wesley finally disowned him with a number of others, and they connected themselves with Whitefield. Mr. Wesley said emphatically that it was not on account of doctrine, but because of their personal abuse, that he disowned them. Mr. Cennick soon left the Calvinistic Methodists and united with the Moravians. After all this he wrote Mr. Wesley a kind letter, in which he says that he really loved "the servants and witnesses of Jesus in all the world, and wished all to prosper." Wesley answered in the same spirit. "Although his career was comparatively short, yet in zealous, successful labor it is difficult to equal it." "He had a lion's courage and martyr's piety, but his passions sometimes mastered his prudence." He died in 1755.

Centenary Biblical Institute, The, is located in the city of Baltimore, and was organized in December, 1866, and received its name from the fact of its organization in the centenary year of American Methodism. It was chartered by the Superior Court of Baltimore, Nov. 27, 1867, the charter having been prepared by Bishop Scott, who also suggested the name. It is under the control of an excellent board of trustees, and it is secured to the M. E. Church. The charter requires the approval of the bishops for the appointment of officers and for any change in its charter. The object, as set forth in the charter, is "the education of such pious young men, especially colored, for the ministry of the M. E. Church as shall be judged by a Quarterly Conference to be divinely called thereto." Four of its trustees and all of its students are of African descent. Its first professors were Rev. J. H. Brown, D.D., and Rev. William Harden, who lectured to classes, made up of pastors stationed in or near the city and of the resident local preachers, from October, 1868, to June, 1870. Each class met only twice a week. The regular work of the institute was commenced Oct. 2, 1872, under the presidency of Rev. J. Emory Round, with 9 students. The whole number for the first academic year was 32. In order to extend the usefulness of the institution, a limited number of young men were admitted to prepare themselves for the profession of teaching. This policy has contributed materially to the improving of common-school instruction in the territory which its students represent. According to the annual catalogue its students for 1875-77 number 121, 50 of whom are preparing for the ministry, and 71 are expecting to be teachers. Twenty-six of the former students have rendered good services in teaching school; 32 are members or probationers in Annual Conferences, 6 of whom have served as presiding elders; about 40 others are local preachers, several of whom are serving under presiding elders as supplies. Students have attended from Maryland, Virginia, Delaware, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, New Jersey, and Massachusetts, and the institute has been indorsed by the Baltimore, Washington, Delaware, Central Pennsylvania, and New-ark Conferences. At the organization of the institute, $5000 which had been set apart by the Missionary Society for the education of colored young men were donated to it. Seven thousand five hundred dollars were paid for its building, which was erected as a city dwelling-house, though above the average in size. The current expenses since 1872 have been paid by voluntary subscriptions and church collections, including appropriations from the Freedman's Aid Society of the M.

Watkins, D.D., and Rev. C. G. Andrews, D.D., who was an alumnus of the college, and is now the president. Under the patronage of the Methodist Church the growth of the college was rapid, and its usefulness was constantly increasing. Before the war it had entered on its rolls as high as 260 students. It shared, however, the fate common to Southern colleges during the war: sometimes it was used as a hospital for sick Confederate soldiers, and

E. Church. The institute has no property except its building, a small amount of school furniture, and a small library of text-books. Two hundred dollars have been contributed annually by the Board of Education of the M. E. Church for the assistance of needy students for the ministry. The present officers of the board of trustees are: Rev. L. F. Morgan, D.D., President; Rev. J. H. Brown, D.D., Vice-President; Francis A. Crook, Secretary; and W. J. Hooper, Treasurer. Rev. J. Emory Round, D.D., is president of the institution, and is assisted by other teachers. It has done and is doing an excellent work for the colored population.

Centenary College of Louisiana is located in Jackson, La. It was established by the State in 1825, under the title of the College of Louisiana. After having been in operation for twenty years it was taken under the patronage of the M. E. Church South in 1845, and its name was changed to Centenary College of Louisiana. Its first president under the new arrangement was Hon. D. O. Shattuck. His successors in office have been Hon. A. B. Longstreet, Rev. R. H. Rivers, D.D., Rev. B. F. Drake, D.D., Rev. J. C. Miller, A.M., Rev. W. H.

sometimes appropriated by Federal troops as temporary barracks; and hence sustained serious loss and damage. Since that time its history has been one of persistent effort to repair the injuries occasioned by that event, and of constant struggle in the midst of political disturbances and financial pressure to regain its former prosperity and usefulness. A new central building has been erected at a cost of $60,000, containing a magnificent audience-hall, society-halls, rooms for library, recitation, etc. This structure is perhaps unrivaled in elegance, spaciousness, and commodiousness by any Southern college building. Though the number of students has been greater than at present, the moral and intellectual tone was never higher. From the ranks of its alumni have come not only its own president but professors of colleges, men of eminence in the church and state, men of culture in the various professions, and men of usefulness in various stations in life. The board of trustees and its friends cherish sanguine expectations of its permanent prosperity. Rev. C. G. Andrews, D.D., is president, and G. H. Wiley, A.M., is Professor of Ancient Languages.

Centenary Collegiate Institute, The, is located at Hackettstown, N. J. It was projected by the Newark Conference at its session in 1866. A number of places competed for the honor of its location, but finally, in 1868, Hackettstown was selected; the citizens contributed $10,000 in cash, with ten acres of eligible land. The selection was made on account of the grandeur of the scenery, the purity of the water, and the healthfulness of was nearly $190,000. The building is of brick, five stories high, with three towers, and is constructed in the most substantial manner. It is heated throughout by steam, lighted by gas, and supplied with mountain spring-water on every floor. Provision is made against fire by the most modern improvements. The sleeping-rooms are furnished with black walnut bedsteads, bureaus, spring mattresses, carpets, and every requisite. Great atten-the climate. The corner-stone was laid Sept. 9, 1869, when addresses were delivered by Bishop Simpson, Chancellor Runyon, David Campbell, Esq., C. Walsh, Esq., and Rev. L. R. Dunn. During the centenary year contributions were made amounting to $12,000. This sum was increased by the gift of $10,000 from D. Campbell, Esq., and by subscriptions at the laying of the corner-stone of $6000, making $38,000 for the commencement of the enterprise. In 1869 the Rev. George H. Whitney, D.D., was elected president. The edifice was five years in process of erection, the trustees having wisely adopted the motto, "pay as you go." During these five years subscriptions were solicited through the bounds of the Conference. The ministers nobly subscribed from their own resources $30,000. The congregations generously pledged $120,000. Of this amount, more than $20,000 were given by David Campbell, Esq., of Newark, and over $40,000 by George J. Ferry, Esq., of Orange. The entire cost of the edifice, furniture, etc., exclusive of grounds, tion has been paid to ventilation. The dining-hall and chapel are spacious and well furnished. A powerful pipe organ adds to the attractiveness of the chapel, which will accommodate over six hundred persons. Three elegantly furnished parlors opening into each other form a suite of rooms 20 by 30 with ceiling of 14 feet. There is also a gymnasium in a separate building. The institute was dedicated Sept. 9, 1874; a large concourse was present, and addresses were delivered by Hon. George J. Ferry, Governor Joel Parker, David Campbell, Esq., and Rev. C. N. Simms, D.D. In the afternoon, in the chapel, Mr. Ferry, president of the trustees, delivered the keys to the president of the institution, Rev. Dr. Whitney, who then delivered his inaugural. It was followed by brief addresses. Much credit is due Cornelius Walsh, David Campbell, and George J. Ferry, the successive presidents of the board of trustees, for their noble efforts. The institute opened with 183 students, 130 of whom were boarders. The number in attendance the first year was 251; the second year, 266. The first graduating class numbered 25, of whom 11 were ladies. The ladies' department is a full chartered college. In the gentlemen's department special pains are taken in college preparatory work. During the past year the number in Latin and Greek was 191, in higher mathematics, 162. The present faculty are constituted as follows: Rev. G. H. Whitney, D.D., President, and Professor of Mental and Moral Science; Rev. G. H. Whiting, Ph.D., of Ancient Languages; L. H. Bachelder, A.M., General and Analytical Chemistry and Mathematics; C. L. Waldo, Natural Science and Latin; E. A. Whitney, Commercial Department; Charles Grobe, Musical Director; Miss M. A. Wragge, Preceptress, and Teacher of French; Miss Annie Nicholl, History, Painting, and Drawing; Miss Fanny Gulick, English Literature and German; Miss L. M. Waldo, Piano and Organ; Miss Alice Tuttle, Piano and Organ.

Centenary Fund.—It is impossible to omit this very important matter in any account of British Methodism, because it marks an era in its history and an item in its financial progress.

Mr. Wesley commenced his public ministry Sept. 19, 1739. One hundred years later this event was commemorated with a holy enthusiasm and a munificent liberality that, with the exception of the jubilee year of Wesleyan missions, has had no comparison in Methodism.

The total amount received was £216,184.9.8. This was disbursed as follows:

Theological Institutions.—The erection of premises at Richmond, £24,000; to the Didsbury Institution, £19,400; to the endowment fund, £26,000.

Wesleyan Missionary Society.—Centenary Hall and Mission House, £29,433.13.7.; towards the missionary ship Triton, £6000; to the fund for the support of worn-out missionaries and widows, £10,000; grant for mission chapels, £5000; mission-schools and school-houses in Ireland, £6000; general purposes of missionary committee, £2000; liquidation of mission debt, £11,000.

Centenary Chapel Relief Fund.—Grant for relief of distressed chapels, £38,000; worn-out ministers' and widows' relief fund, £16,200.

Chapels in Ireland.—Irish Chapel Fund, £2000; Dublin Centenary Chapel, £5000.

Education Fund.—British and Foreign Bible Society, £1000; various expenses, £3186.10.9.

The money thus laid out as the result of this great centenary movement, combined as it was with renewed spiritual power, gave a new life to the whole machinery of Methodism, that widened its area, and the influence of which will be felt through all time.

Centenary of Methodism.—The British Methodists fix Sept. 19, 1739, as the epochal period of Methodism, because John Wesley began his public ministry at this time. Hence they determined to celebrate the centenary of Methodism in 1839. This they did with great enthusiasm and munificence. Arrangements were made by the Conference to hold especial meetings throughout the connection. Everywhere the enthusiasm was intense. They first designed to raise for various church purposes about $400,000. But the estimate was far below the liberality of the people. The aggregate result was about $1,080,000. This was applied as above described. (See CENTENARY FUND.)

The Methodists in America also joined in the general celebration, although their centenary proper did not come until about twenty-seven years afterwards. They raised, however, about $600,000. The British Methodists in reviewing the spiritual results of the century, counting Canada, a large portion of which had but recently come under their supervision, found that the Wesleyan Conference embraced in its jurisdiction 1635 traveling preachers and 420,198 members, being an average annual increase during the previous fourteen years of nearly 10,000 members. The statistics of Methodism throughout the world were 5200 traveling preachers and 1,171,000 members.

Centennial of American Independence.—The General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1872 appointed a committee on the subject of the national centennial. In the report of that committee was presented the fact that the Methodist Church was the first religious body, "through a deputation of our chief ministers, to give a pledge of support to the government in the days of Washington, and has ever maintained unswerving loyalty, and was second to none in the struggle for the perpetuation of that government in the days of Lincoln." It was further stated that such an occasion would be "worthy especially of the observance of the church," by appropriate religious services, to declare their faith in and cognizance of the overruling providence of Almighty God, and especially that "under his guidance our fathers, by their heroism and sacrifices, maintained the Declaration of Independence, and by their wisdom and devotion established our republican institutions; that under his favor our country has enjoyed during the century long intervals of peace and an unprecedented prosperity; that under his blessings those arts and sciences and forms of industry which develop the resources of a land and elevate the character of a people have been fostered; that under his providence the means of intelligence have been multiplied, the cause of education promoted, and our free-school system, the fruit of American Protestantism, and the bulwark of American freedom, firmly established; that under his control the nation has been led to abolish slavery and re-invest the emancipated with every civil and political right; that under his restraints during the prosperous periods of peace and the terrible seasons of war our people, by respect to authority and obedience to law, have proven to the world that governments may be permanent where man is free; and that under his special care our church has been protected in her religious liberty, and our people have shared in the common happiness and prosperity."

The General Conference directed that these services should begin on the first Sabbath of June in 1876, and close on the 4th of July of the same year. It declared their primary object to be the "religious improvement of the church, especially by reviewing what God hath wrought for our nation." They declared further, that it was appropriate that contributions should be received from the people for either local or general purposes. The local objects should be the endowment of educational institutions under the patronage of the Annual Conferences and the increase of existing educational funds. The general object should be the aiding of needy young men called to the ministry, or needy young women called to the missionary work in the church; and that funds so collected for this general object should be held in trust by the Board of Education of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the principal to forever remain intact, the interest alone to be used for the above-named purpose. This fund should be named "National Centenary Fund." They ordered further, that each Annual Conference should provide for a memorial discourse to be delivered during its session first preceding the 4th of July, 1876, and that the Board of Bishops should devise a programme of religious services to be observed in all the churches, and that the bishops should prepare a memorial address and present it to the next General Conference. Such an address was prepared and presented to the General Conference of 1876. A few extracts from this excellent address is all that the allotted space will permit:

"In company with your fellow-citizens you will joyfully review the land which God has given us; the annals of our colonial settlement and training; the fit time, and men, and deeds of the Revolutionary struggle; the formation of a more perfect union under a constitution of consummate wisdom; the marvelous increase of our territory, our population, and our resources; our triumph in arts and in arms; our progress in sciences, literature, and education; our undecayed faith in the self-evident truths of the great Declaration, and their recent stupendous re-assertion in the emancipation and enfranchisement of the servile population more numerous than that of the Colonies at the Revolution; our contributions to the nations from which we sprang, and our predestined part in the great drama of human history; and, in fine, all the facts and all the forces which have made the century memorable, and which presage a more signal future. But the patriot, who is also an intelligent Christian, surveys a wider horizon than his fellow-citizen. He interprets and values all centuries and nations by their relations to the kingdom and glory of Christ. Here a nation growing within a century from three to forty millions, and overspreading vast regions recently occupied by the savage and the wild beast, has so maintained and diffused the faith that an increase of churches and communicants, of schools distinctly consecrated to Christ, and of organized Christian charities, has relatively outstripped the increase of population.

"We must not, brethren, be content to stand at this meeting-place of the centuries, at this hour of retrospect and anticipation, simply with secular and patriotic rejoicing, nor with formal and scanty recognition of the great purposes of God in our country's history. Particularly should American Methodists thus mark the close of the first century of our national history, for our church is almost coeval with the State. When the Declaration of Independence was made, twenty-five ministers and less than five thousand members enrolled in eleven circuits constituted the new religious organization. Few would have prophesied for it a career of distinguished usefulness, but it pleased Providence that the new experiment of popular government should not lack the quickening moral life on which its success depended. Gladly admitting the great usefulness of other churches, and attempting no exact estimate of the services of Methodism, we yet believe that God has given to it this honor: that by its direct and indirect influence upon the national sentiment and character it has been a powerful auxiliary of the Republic, and the indispensable condition of its success. We close the century in which the State and Church, though in law and in fact separate and distinct, have been mutually helpful and co-operative to the noblest results. Another century confronts us with greater possibilities, and, it may be, larger perils. Shall they not summon all who bear the name of Methodists both to earnest prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, and to deeds which, even beyond those of former days, shall testify loyalty to Christ and his kingdom, and intelligent self-sacrificing devotion to the Republic?"

This patriotic Christian document was soon published in all the leading literary and political as well as Christian periodicals of the land. It is yet too soon to give the results of the contributions to the various causes suggested by the provisions of the General Conference by which the centennial should be observed. Such a report can only properly be made to the ensuing General Conference of 1880. It is sufficient to say that the provisions of the Conference were generally observed and carried out. It is proper now to summarize the principal statistical facts of the church at this most important period in the history of the nation. The Methodist Church up to that time had existed in America one hundred and ten years, but the Methodist Episcopal Church only as an organized body ninety-two years. The statistics reported for the church at the close of 1875 are as follows: 12 bishops, 81 Annual Conferences, 10,923 traveling and 12,881 local preachers, 1,580,559 members; church edifices 15,633, valued at $71,353,234; 5017 parsonages, valued at $9,731,628; 19,287 Sunday-schools and 1,406,168 scholars; total benevolent collections, $1,052,710. In these collections are not included those for the bishops nor for any local missionary society, nor do they include the receipts for legacies, nor personal donations outside the church collections. Salaries of ministers, $9,890,200. Added to those for building new churches and making church improvement, for Sunday-schools, etc., it makes an aggregate of $15,896,799. Adding to these the benevolent collections proper, it makes a total of $16,949,509. There were appropriated for foreign missions for 1876, $297,749. Adding together all the Methodist bodies in the United States, the following aggregate is found: 20,453 traveling and 24,384 local preachers, and 3,173,229 members. At this time also, as a general summary of Methodists throughout the world, we may state as a grand total: 27,591 traveling and 61,474 local preachers, and 4,189,105 members. According to the census in 1870, there were in the United States, of Methodists, 25,278 organizations, 21,337 edifices, 6,528,209 sittings, $69,854,120 church property.

Centennial of American Methodism.—At the General Conference of 1860 a committee, consisting of N. J. B. Morgan, E. O. Haven, F. C. Holliday, J. F. Crane, and M. D'C. Crawford, was appointed on the centenary of American Methodism. In accordance with their report the Conference recommended the several Annual Conferences and the entire membership of the church to unite in properly celebrating the coming centenary. All other Methodist bodies were cordially invited to engage in this celebration in such a manner as would be most agreeable to themselves. The bishops were requested to appoint a committee of seven, called a committee of correspondence, whose duty it should be to correspond with individuals and ecclesiastical bodies upon the subject, and this committee, in connection with the Board of Bishops, should constitute an executive committee, with full powers to determine the time and the general outlines of said celebration. They also reported the primary object of the celebration should be the spiritual improvement of the church, and, in the second place, to secure public contributions from the church for the benefit of such objects of church enterprise as the committee might designate. The General Conference of 1864 appointed an additional committee on the centenary, viz.: David Patten, John P. Durbin, Thomas Carlton, Adam Poe, Joseph M. Trimble, Jesse T. Peck, and Joseph B. Wakely. This committee reported that the celebration should commence on the first Tuesday in October, 1866, and continue throughout the month, at such times and places as best suited the convenience of the churches. They also declared the primary object to be the spiritual improvement of the church by reviewing the great things God had done for the church during the past century. In the second place, to solicit the offerings of the church to be applied to those institutions and agencies to which the church has been most indebted for its efficiency. Two departments of Christian enterprise were to be placed before the people: the one connectional, central, and monumental, and the other local and distributive. The Board of Bishops was requested to appoint 12 traveling preachers and 12 laymen, who, in connection with the board, should constitute a committee to determine what objects and in what proportions the moneys raised as connectional funds should be appropriated, and they should have all power necessary to the proper distribution of these funds. The local funds should be appropriated to the cause of education and church extension, under the direction of a committee consisting of an equal number of ministers and laymen appointed by the several Annual Conferences. Each Annual Conference was to provide for the delivery of a memorial sermon before its own body at the session next preceding the Centennial Celebration, and also to appoint a committee of an equal number of ministers and laymen to give advice and direction for the appropriate celebration. The committee asked for a donation of not less than $2,000,000 as an expression of gratitude on the part of the church. The report having been adopted, the bishops appointed on the general committee, as ministers, George Peck, Charles Elliott, John McClintock, D. P. Kidder, D. Patten, E. Thomas, D. W. Bartine, F. C. Holliday, Thomas Sewall, James F. Chalfant, Moses Hill, and F. A. Blades. As laymen, T. T. Tasker, George C. Cook, James Bishop, John Owen, Isaac Rich, Clinton B. Fisk, I. P. Cook, Cary A. Trimble, Oliver Hoyt, Alexander Bradley, F. H. Root, and Edward Sargent.

This general committee held a session at Cleveland, O., Feb. 22, 1866. All of the committee were present except Bishop Thomson, then in India.

Abel Stevens was appointed to prepare a centenary volume setting forth such facts as would properly come within the scope of such a work, and Dr. McClintock was also requested to add a chapter embodying the action of the centenary committee. A central centenary committee of arrangements was appointed, consisting of J. McClintock, D. Curry, J. R. Crooks, Oliver Hoyt, James Bishop, and C. C. North. A second meeting of the committee was held Nov. 8, 1865, in the city of New York. Among other conclusions to which they arrived were the following: "That the Centenary Educational Fund should be placed before the people as the prominent object for connectional contributions, and that if any contributors desired to specify the objects of their subscriptions in whole or in part, they should have the liberty to select from any one of the following interests to be placed before the people: 1, the Centenary Educational Fund; 2, the Garrett Biblical School at Evanston; 3, the Methodist General Biblical Institute at Concord, to be removed to the vicinity of Boston; 4, Biblical Institute in the eastern Middle States; 5, a Biblical Institute in Cincinnati or vicinity; 6, a Biblical Institute on the Pacific coast,—contributions to the last three objects should be retained and managed by the Educational Board until they were sure that enough had been actually raised from other sources to make the aggregate amount, including the connectional contributions, to these respective objects not less than $150,000 in each case; 7, the erection of a centenary missionary building for the Mission House at New York; 8, the Irish Connectional Fund; 9, the Biblical School at Bremen, Germany; 10, the Chartered Fund; there was added to these objects the Sunday-School Children's Fund.

A very general observance of the centennial took place, especially by the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States. Memorial sermons were delivered in all the Annual Conferences. The centenary volume prepared by Abel Stevens was issued and extensively circulated. The editors of the church papers not only encouraged it by editorials, but gave large space to contributors upon the subject.

The first Sabbath of January, 1866, was observed as a day of religious service for invoking God's blessing upon the church in the centenary year. As a financial result the liberal thank-offerings of the people for the various objects named, as reported to the General Conference of 1868, amounted to $8,709,498.39. The magnificent gift of Daniel Drew, Esq., to establish a theological seminary at Madison, N. J., is specially worthy of mention. (See DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.) Also the establishment of Heck Hall by the trustees of Garrett Biblical Institute. (See GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE.) The General Education Fund received $15,727.78: the Children's Fund, $83,785.66. Besides the centenary contributions during this year, the church raised for benevolent objects $930,419. It was found in reviewing the history during that year that its statistics in one hundred years had so increased as to exceed the highest hopes of all its members. There were in 1866, as the product of a century's toil, 9 bishops, 64 Annual Conferences, 7576 itinerant and 8602 local preachers; total members, 1,032,184; church edifices, 10,462, valued at $29,594,004; parsonages, 3314, valued at $4,420,958; Sunday-schools, 14,045; scholars, 980,622; total foreign missionaries, 222; members in foreign lands, 7478; domestic missionaries, 303; having a membership of 26,075; 2 theological seminaries, 23 colleges, and 77 seminaries and female colleges; 77 instructors, 22,305 students; educational property valued at $7,898,239; 2 Book Concerns in New York and Cincinnati, with 7 depositories in as many different cities. The capital stock of the Book Concern, $1,213,327; official church papers, 16; unofficial, 6; bound volumes of books issued by the Book Concern, 2548; tracts of various sizes, 1037. In reviewing, it was found that there were 8 other Methodist bodies in the United States, and at the close of 1865 their statistics were as follows: Methodist Episcopal Church South, 2591 traveling and 4904 local preachers; 708,949 members. Methodist Protestant Church, 810 traveling and 750 local preachers. This includes both North and South. African Methodist Episcopal Church, 513 traveling and 2100 local preachers; 53,670 members. Evangelical Association, 405 traveling and 323 local preachers; 5185 members. Wesleyan Methodists, 236 traveling and 164 local preachers; 25,620 members. African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, 217 traveling and 444 local preachers; 5600 members. Free Methodist Church, 67 traveling and 69 local preachers; 3655 members. Primitive Methodist Church, 20 traveling and 34 local preachers; 1905 members. Making a total outside of the Methodist Episcopal Church of 4859 traveling and 8788 local preachers, and 980,604 members.

Central Alabama Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1876 so as to "include the Dadesville, Marion, and Huntsville districts," formerly belonging to the Alabama Conference. It held its first session in Huntsville, Ala., Oct. 18, 1876, Bishop Scott presiding. It formed a new district called Springfield, and reported the following statistics: preachers, 43; Sunday-schools, 60; scholars, 3037; members, 5932; churches, 41; value, $17,135.

Central Christian Advocate, located at St. Louis, Mo., is one of the periodicals established by the M. E. Church. It was taken under the control of the church by the General Conference of 1856, and Joseph Brooks was elected editor. It had, however, for some time previous been published as a private enterprise. Charles Elliott was elected editor in 1860, B. F. Crary in 1864, re-elected in 1868, Benjamin St. James Fry in 1872, re-elected in 1876. Present circulation, 7722.

Central German Conference, M. E. Church.

—Until 1864 the various German congregations and districts connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church were embraced in the several Annual Conferences. At that time the General Conference determined "that the Germans should be organized into three Annual Conferences, each containing about seventy-five members." Also, "That the German work at present connected with the Cincinnati, North Ohio, and Southeastern Indiana Conferences be organized into a Conference to be called the Central German Conference." In 1868 the General Conference fixed the boundaries of the Central German Conference so as to comprise the German work within the bounds of the Cincinnati, North Ohio, and Southeastern Indiana Conferences, and also to include Danville, Golconda, and Metropolis, in Illinois. In 1872 its boundaries were so changed as to embrace the German work within the States of Ohio, West Virginia, Michigan, and Indiana, except those appointments belonging to the Chicago German Conference. It also included the German work in the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Western Pennsylvania, and also Golconda and Metropolis, in Illinois. Its boundaries remained unchanged at the General Conference of 1876. This Conference held its first session in Cincinnati, August 24, 1864, Bishop Morris presiding, and William Nast, secretary. It reported 8860 members, 72 traveling and 92 local preachers, 132 churches, valued at $223,500, 48 parsonages, valued at $34,641, 150 Sunday-schools, and 7208 scholars. In 1876 it reported 119 traveling and 97 local preachers, 12,122 members, 175 Sunday-schools, and 10,710 scholars, 177 churches, valued at $627,600, and 71 parsonages, valued at $119,850.

Centralia, Ill. (pop. 3190), laid out in 1853, is situated in Marion County, and is a beautiful and prosperous place. Methodist services were held in this town for the first time in May, 1854, and shortly after the first M. E. church was erected, which stood until 1864, when in that and the next year a new and larger one was erected. It is in the Southern Illinois Conference, and reports: members, 203; Sunday-school scholars, 180; church property, $8000. The African Methodists have a small society here, but it has (1877) no house of worship.

Central Illinois Conference, M. E. Church, was organized in 1856 under the name of the Peoria Conference. It embraced "all that part of the State of Illinois north of the north line of the Illinois Conference, and south of the following line: beginning on the Mississippi River at Rock Island; thence with the Rock Island and Chicago Railroad to La Salle; then with the Illinois River to the mouth of Kankakee River; thence with the Kankakee River to the Indiana State line, so as to embrace Rock Island City, Moline, and Port Byron circuits, and La Salle station." In 1860 the name was changed to Central Illinois Conference. The boundary lines were changed so as to read: "Beginning on the Mississippi River at Meredosia; down said Meredosia to its mouth; thence easterly to Center School-house, so as to embrace Center society in this Conference; thence to the mouth of Mud Creek, on Green River; up said river to the mouth of Coal Creek; thence up said creek to the Rock Island and Chicago Railroad; thence with said railroad to La Salle; thence with Illinois River to the mouth of Kankakee River; thence with said river to the Indiana State line, so as to embrace La Salle station." In 1868 some changes were made in its boundaries, such as leaving Ottawa in the Rock River Conference, and including Aroma and Bureau Junction in the Central Illinois Conference. Its boundaries as defined by the General Conference of 1876 are as follows: "Embracing that part of the State of Illinois north of the Illinois Conference, and south of the following line, namely: beginning on the Mississippi River at the Meredosia; thence down the Meredosia to its mouth; thence easterly to Center School-house, so as to include Center society; thence to the mouth of Mud Creek; thence up Green River to Coal Creek; thence up said creek to the Chicago and Rock Island Railroad; thence along said railroad to Bureau Junction; thence to the Illinois River; thence up said river and the Kankakee to the Indiana State line, leaving the city of Ottawa in the Rock River Conference, and Aroma and Bureau Junction in the Central Illinois Conference." This Conference, under the name of Peoria, held its first session at Peoria, Sept. 10, 1856, Bishop Janes presiding, and reported 11,102 members, with 90 traveling preachers. After the change of its name in 1860, and some changes being made in its boundaries, a session was held at Macomb, Ill., Sept. 12, 1860, Bishop Baker presiding. There were reported in 1861: 19,208 members, 173 churches, valued at $263,530, 73 parsonages, valued at $39,775, 348 Sunday-schools, and 15,621 scholars. There were reported from this Conference in 1876: 228 traveling and 253 local preachers, 413 Sunday-schools, and 28,480 scholars, 25,973 members, 335 churches, valued at $1,027,940, and 137 parsonages, valued at $141,950.

Central New York Conference is "bounded on the west by the Genesee Conference, on the south by the New York State line and the Wyoming Conference, and on the east and north by Wyoming and the Northern New York Conferences." It was organized in its present form in 1872. The territory embraced within its limits is a part of the old Genesee Conference, and remained within its boundaries until 1832, when the Oneida Conference was organized, occupying the principal part of the present territory. In 1872 the Conferences in Central and Western New York were remodeled, and the Central New York was constituted, embracing also a part of what had been the East Genesee Conference in New York, and the Troy district in Pennsylvania. In 1876 the Pennsylvania part of the work, and a large part of what had pertained to the former East Genesee Conference, was separated from it, and its boundaries became as now constituted. It embraces 186 traveling preachers, 126 local preachers, 22,632 members, and 18,697 Sunday-school scholars. It has 214 churches, valued at $336,640, and 107 parsonages, valued at $198,700.

Central Ohio Conference, M. E. Church, was organized under the name of Delaware in 1856, and was bounded by a line "commencing at the northwestern corner of the State of Ohio; thence east by the north line of the State to a point north of the mouth of Sandusky River; thence south to the mouth of Sandusky River, excluding Port Clinton circuit; thence up said Sandusky River to Upper Sandusky, excluding Tiffin City, and including Fremont and Upper Sandusky; thence along the Ohio and Indiana (now the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad) to Crestline, including Bueyrus station and Crestline; thence along the Cleveland, Columbus and Cincinnati Railroad to the north line of the Ohio Conference, including Cardington, Weldo, Westfield, and Galena circuits; thence west along the north line of the Ohio and Cincinnati Conferences to the west line of the State; thence north along the west line of the State to the place of beginning." The name of this Conference was changed to Central Ohio in 1860. No material changes were made, however, in its boundaries. The boundaries as fixed by the General Conference of 1876 are as follows: "Bounded on the north by the north line of the State of Ohio; on the east by the north Ohio Conference; on the south by the Springfield branch of the Cleveland, Columbus and Cincinnati Railroad to the west line of the Ohio Conference, yet so as to exclude St. Paul's charge in Delaware and Milford, and to include Marysville; thence to the west line of the State of Ohio by the north line of the Cincinnati Conference; and on the west by the west line of the State of Ohio." This Conference held its first session under the name of Delaware at Lima, Ohio, Sept. 25, 1856, Bishop Waugh presiding. It then reported 14,632 members, 98 traveling and 136 local preachers. The statistics for 1876 are: 152 traveling and 168 local preachers, 342 Sunday-schools and 27,813 scholars, 24,361 members, 308 churches, valued at $837,156, and 78 parsonages, valued at $17,250.

Central Pennsylvania Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1868, and with the exception of exchanging a few small appointments in 1872, and having gained Harrisburg from the Philadelphia Conference, its boundaries remained the same in 1876, and are as follows: "On the south by the State line from the Susquehanna River to the west boundary of Bedford County, excepting so much of the State of Pennsylvania as is included in the Baltimore Conference; on the west by the west line of Bedford, Blair, and Clearfield Counties, except so much of Clearfield County as is embraced in the Erie Conference; thence to St. Mary's; on the north by a line extending from St. Mary's eastward to Emporium; thence by the southern boundary of Potter and Tioga Counties, including Wharton and Liberty Valley circuit; thence through Sullivan County north of Laporte to the west line of Wyoming County; on the east by Wyoming Conference; thence on the northern line of Carbon, Schuylkill, and Dauphin Counties to the Susquehanna River, including Hickory Run, Weatherby, Beaver Meadow, and Ashland; and thence by the Susquehanna River to the place of beginning, including Harrisburg." It held its first session at Danville, March 10, 1869, Bishop Scott presiding. It reported 183 traveling and 113 local preachers, 398 Sunday-schools and 32,472 scholars, 28,240 members, 324 churches, valued at $880,900, 65 parsonages, valued at $131,800. It reported in 1876, 224 traveling and 153 local preachers, 461 Sunday-schools and 41,058 scholars, 40,939 members, 406 churches, valued at $1,718,277, and 99 parsonages, valued at $234,550.

Central Tennessee College is located at Nashville, Tennessee. At the close of the late war the freedmen congregated, for various reasons, in the large cities of the South. Nashville having been the headquarters of a large Union army during most of the war, multitudes of the freedmen went to it seeking food, labor, homes, and safety. Their poverty and ignorance roused the sympathy of Christians and the fears of patriots. Efforts were made by various organizations to educate them as well as to afford temporal relief. Before the roar of the cannon or the clash of arms had ceased teachers were in the camps of the freedmen with the primer and spelling-book. The Methodist Episcopal Church was an early and liberal contributor to this work. In the fall of 1865, Bishop Clark indorsed the organization of a mission-school in the basement of Clark chapel. Rev. O. O. Knight was employed as teacher and as the pastor of the church. Rev. John Seys was associated with him in the work.

CENTRAL TENNESSEE COLLEGE.

As the school rapidly increased other teachers were employed. The next summer, the place being too small, a large brick building, known as "abandoned property," was fitted up, and permission to use it for school purposes was given by General C. B. Fisk, then in command at Nashville. In the fall of 1866, Rev. W. B. Crichtow was appointed principal, with a large corps of assistants. That year about 800 scholars were enrolled. The Missionary Society had hitherto aided in the support of the school, but it was now transferred to the Freedman's Aid Society. In July, 1866, the school was chartered by the Tennessee legislature. In September, 1867, the city of Nashville opened free public schools for colored children. This relieved the church, and the college became a school for training teachers and preachers for the freedmen. A tuition fee of $1 a month was charged, and has been continued. Rev. J. Braden, D.D., was elected president in 1867, and resigned at the end of the year; and Rev. G. H. Hartupce was placed in charge of the school. In 1868, Dr. Braden was re-elected, and entered at once upon his labors. The studies were at first entirely primary, the primer and spelling-book being the only text-books that were absolutely necessary. Other studies were soon demanded, and gradually the entire college course was introduced and regular classes were organized. The normal, academic, and theological courses of study were early introduced as the necessity for competent teachers and intelligent preachers demanded. In 1876, through the aid furnished by the brothers Samuel and Hugh Meharry, of Shawnee Mound, Ind., the Meharry Medical Department was opened, and in 1877 the first graduate received the degree of M.D. Over 3000 students have been enrolled since the school was organized. Hundreds of these have become teachers, and tens of thousands have been blessed by their labors. From the report of only 43 who have been teachers, we learn that they have taught in eight different States 129 school terms, making 654 months, and enrolling 6194 scholars, the wages ranging from $15 to $90 per month. But few have been able to pursue the college course. Nearly all the students as soon as qualified, only partially, find employment as teachers. These not only teach day-schools, but also organize and conduct Sunday-schools. The great need for teachers in the school-room and in the pulpit among the freedmen, and the work already accomplished, more than justify the wisdom of the founders of this and similar schools in the South and give promise of increasing usefulness in the future. The religious spirit that has pervaded the school has resulted, under the divine blessing, in the conversion of many souls. The faculty consists of Rev. J. Braden, President, and teacher of Biblical Literature; Rev. W. Patterson, teacher of Ancient Languages and Literature; Rev. John Deal, teacher of Mathematics; Miss Ella Plotner, teacher of Common English Branches; Mrs. Laura T. Ela, assistant in English Branches, and Preceptress; Mrs. L. C. Braden, teacher of Instrumental Music; Mrs. J. Deal, Matron; Rev. G. W. Hubbard, M.D., in charge of Medical Department.

Ceremonies or Ecclesiastical Rites are not to be considered as any part of divine worship, though they are connected with it. Their use is to perform "decently and in order" what God has commanded should be done, but the mode of which he has not divinely appointed. Thus, while baptism is a Christian duty, its mode of administration, the lessons, the cup and bowl, or the use of any signs, are simple ceremonies. The religious act is an essential duty; the manner in which the act is performed is non-essential, and is ceremony. For the sake of uniformity and to preserve proper order the church has ordained suitable ceremonies; without these there would be lack of proper solemnity, and there would be confusion; but if too much importance be attached to these the really essential part may be obscured by the attendant ceremonies. The spirit of Christianity is a spirit of simplicity, and ceremony should be practiced only so far as, with due reverence and solemnity, to perform the various acts of divine worship. These ceremonies not being essential, and not being prescribed in the word of God, may be varied by different churches, or by the same church in different countries, and in different ages. While enjoined by the church, the individual minister or member should conform to them as expressing the judgment of the church as to propriety of action, but the church itself may change and modify them as it deems wise and proper. The 22d article of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and which is embraced by all the Methodist churches of America, reads, "It is not necessary that rites and ceremonies should in all places be the same, or exactly alike, for they have been always different, and may be changed according to diversity of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's word. Whosoever through the private judgment willingly and purposely doth openly break the rites and ceremonies of the church to which he belongs, which are not repugnant to the word of God, and are ordained and approved by common authority, ought to be rebuked openly, that others may fear to do the like, as one that offendeth against the common order of the church, and woundeth the consciences of weak brethren. Every particular church may ordain, change, or abolish rites and ceremonies so that all things may be done to edification." In this latter clause the phrase "particular church" signifies a particular denomination.

Certificates of Removal.—The Discipline of the M. E. Church requires the preacher in charge to see that all persons removing from the bounds of his church shall take with them a certificate of removal. This certificate is a protection to the society or church wherever such an individual may go, and it is also a letter of introduction, showing his moral and religious character. In the early history of Methodism in the United States, societies in different places were imposed upon by persons claiming to be members of the church; hence a question was asked in the Annual Conference in 1782, "How shall we more effectually guard against impostors?" And the answer was, "Let no person remove from North to South without a certificate from the assistant preacher, and let no one be received into society without." Previous to this, however, in England, among the Wesleyans, it was the duty of the preacher "to warn all from time to time that none were to remove from one society to another without a certificate from the assistant in the words (else he will not be received into their society): A. B., the bearer, is a member of our society in C. I believe he has sufficient cause for removing." Wesley added to this his own personal statement, "I beg every assistant to remember this." This provision was adopted by the M. E. Church at the General Conference of 1784, the only change being made in the phraseology to make it suit the changed form of the church.

Some persons have improperly availed themselves of the provision by obtaining a certificate of removal without designing to change their residence, but simply to avoid church discipline. The pastor is not obliged to give such a certificate except in cases of actual removal, though it has become a custom in cities and large towns to extend that courtesy to those who desire to become members of some other Methodist church in the city. A difficulty also arose where parties, against whom there were unfavorable rumors, applied for certificates, and the pastor felt unwilling to certify to their good standing. To meet this case, the General Conference, in 1848, enacted "that when a member wishes to remove his residence out of any particular charge, and there are in the judgment of the preacher in charge sufficient reasons for withholding a certificate, and the member is willing to be tried, he shall be held guilty of maladministration unless he proceed in the trial of such persons."

The Discipline requires the preacher in charge "to warn all from time to time that none are to remove from one circuit to another without a regular certificate, and that if they do so, they will not be received into the church in other places." In 1864, the preacher was directed when he gave a certificate to notify the pastor of the church to which the member was about to remove, so that he might be prepared to exercise a pastoral care over him. For lack of proper care on the part of members who remove, and sometimes from the inattention of pastors, many are annually lost to the church. There is no definite time prescribed within which the certificate must be presented. Much is left to the discretion of the minister and church, but wherever presented, the member is responsible from the date of the certificate. The General Conference of 1848 decided that "when a member receives a certificate of membership from the preacher having charge of a circuit or station, he is responsible for his moral conduct (from the date of his certificate until he joins) to the society receiving him upon that certificate."

In addition to certificates of removal, the pastor "may give a note of recommendation to any member who wishes to unite with any other evangelical denomination." This is a matter of courtesy, and is left to the judgment of the administrator.

Ceylon: Languages and Missionary Literature.—The most important languages spoken in Ceylon are the Tamil and the Singhalese, both of which are related to the languages of India. The Tamil is one of the Dravidian languages of Southern India (see INDIA: LANGUAGES AND MISSIONARY LITERATURE), and is spoken in the northern part of Ceylon, as well as in the Carnatic of India. The Singhalese, the language of the southern part of the island, is partly aboriginal and partly derived from the Sanscrit, and has an admixture of Malay. The Portuguese has also considerable currency, and a number of works have been published in it from the mission presses. The missions of the American Board, and of the Church Missionary Society and the Wesleyan Missions, all have extensive publishing establishments, and have severally issued many thousand copies of books and tracts in these three languages as well as in English.

The most important literary labors of the Wesleyan missionaries in the languages of India have been performed in connection with the mission in Ceylon. The printing-press was set up at Colombo at an early period in the history of the mission, and was busily employed in the printing of spelling-books, hymn-books, religious books and tracts in the Tamil, Singhalese, and Portuguese languages. Two of the missionaries, the Rev. Daniel J. Gogerly and the Rev. Robert Spence Hardy, acquired a world-wide fame in the department of literature relating to Buddhism, in which they are acknowledged to stand at the head. Mr. Gogerly, born 1792, died 1863, went to Ceylon in 1818 to take charge of the press, and entered the regular service of the mission in 1822. He was one of the first of the missionaries who was able to preach extemporaneously in Singhalese, but devoted himself especially to the study of the Pali language, and is said to have been the first European who gave any critical or scientific study to this ancient tongue, in which is embodied the most important literature of the Buddhist religion. (See INDIA: LANGUAGES AND MISSIONARY LITERATURE.) He prepared a dictionary of that language, and had copies made of all the sacred books with their glosses. He was one of the translators of the Singhalese version of the Bible of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and edited and corrected all the editions of that version. One of his most important works was the "Christiani Pragnyapati: The Evidences and Doctrines of the Christian Religion," a polemic against Buddhism, published in Singhalese, at Colombo, in 1862, the effect of which upon the public mind was such that the Buddhists were constrained to form a society to oppose the progress of Christianity. Mr. Gogerly also made a number of valued contributions to the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society and other periodicals in illustration of Pali literature and Buddhism. He was for some time superintendent of the mission in Ceylon, and was appointed by the government one of the school commissioners for the central district of the island.

The Rev. Robert Spence Hardy, born 1803, died 1868, spent at intervals twenty-three years in Ceylon, viz., from 1825 to 1833, from 1835 to 1847, and from 1862 to 1865, and during the latter period was superintendent of the South Ceylon mission. His acquaintance with the Sanscrit and Pali languages was extensive and accurate, and he was also well versed in the Singhalese, Portuguese, and several other languages. He was a member of the Royal Asiatic Society, and published in three languages upwards of four thousand pages, principally on subjects relating to Buddhism. His principal works in English were: "Eastern Monachism: an Account of the Origin, Laws, Discipline, Sacred Writings, etc., of the Order of Mendicants founded by Gautama Buddha." London, 1850, 8vo; "A Manual of Buddhism in its Modern Development." Translated from a Singhalese manuscript. London, 1853, 8vo; "The Legends and Theories of the Buddhists compared with Christianity and Science" (a work upon which he was engaged when he was seized with mortal illness). London, 1867, crown 8vo. Other works composed by the Wesleyan missionaries in Ceylon are a Dictionary of Singhalese, and several sermons and tracts by the Rev. John Calloway; Singhalese and English and English and Singhalese Lexicons by the late Rev. Benjamin Clough; a Pali Grammar and Vocabulary by the late Rev. Benjamin Clough; a Singhalese and Portuguese Dictionary and Grammar by the Rev. W. B. Fox; translations of the New Testament and Hymn-Book into Portuguese by the Rev. Robert Newstead; and a translation of the "Pilgrim's Progress" into Sin-ghalese by the Rev. Alexander Humes. Among the works relating to Ceylon and the Wesleyan missions may be mentioned "A Voyage to Ceylon; with Notices of the Wesleyan Mission," by a Surgeon; "Mission to Ceylon and India," by the late Rev. W. M. Harvard, D.D.; "Jubilee Memorials of South Ceylon," by the late Rev. R. S. Hardy; all of which are published by the Wesleyan Missionary Society, London.

The Jaffna Religious Tract Society, organized in 1823, has published a large number of tracts and a number of religious books. Among its publications is a collection of Tamil Hymns, adapted for public, private, and social worship, the selection of which is made largely from the Wesleyan Hymn-Book.

Ceylon, Missions in.—Ceylon is closely connected with India, and is associated with it in Wesleyan missionary work. It is an island south of India, of an area of 25,704 square miles, and a population of 2,405,287. The Singhalese, who form the majority of the population, are allied to the races of Southern India. The population of the northern part of the island consists largely of Hindoos, who speak the Tamil language. The other inhabitants consist chiefly of the Veddals (a wild aboriginal tribe), Mohammedans, and English. Christianity was introduced into Ceylon in the sixth century, but soon died out. The Portuguese occupied a part of the island early in the sixteenth century, and re-introduced it under the form of Roman Catholicism. St. Francis Xavier began his missionary labors in 1544, and in a few years the Portuguese government induced the entire population of the districts under its sway to profess Christianity. The Dutch dispossessed the Portuguese in the seventeenth century, and received the conversion of the entire Roman Catholic population to the Reformed faith, so that at the close of their rule the number of nominal Christians was said to be 425,000. Yet nearly all traces of the Dutch church have died out. The island passed into the possession of the English about the close of the last century. Missions were established in Ceylon by the London Missionary Society in 1804, the English Baptist Society in 1812, and the American Board in 1812. The mission of the Wesleyan Missionary Society was undertaken in 1813, at the suggestion of Sir Alexander Johnson, chief justice of the island. On the 30th of December of that year, Dr. Thomas Coke sailed for Ceylon, with six missionaries, who took with them a printing-press. They arrived at Point de Galle in June, 1814, and received a warm welcome from the officers of the British government and the English clergy. Four stations were established at Jaffna and Batticaloa, in the Tamil district, and at Galle and Matura, in the Singhalese district. Circumstances favored the rapid growth of the mission. The English and the natives were well inclined towards it. An influential high-priest was converted at the close of 1814, and another priest of extensive patronage a few months afterwards. A church for the English service was built at Colombo, and opened for worship at the end of 1816. The custom of holding Annual Conferences of the missionaries was adopted about this time. Education in the vernacular was begun in 1817, in the hope of superseding the Buddhist priests in this department. The number of vernacular schools rose to 1000 in the first year, 4000 in the second year, and 21,000 in thirty years. In 1819 schools had been opened in the principal villages along the western coast, from Negombo to Galle, and the work of general education in the maritime provinces was carried on by the missionaries until it was taken up by the government in 1834. Kandy, the capital of the interior of the island, was occupied as a mission station in 1840, following which came an investigation of the subject of government support of idolatry, which led to the abolition of the system. In 1842 a mission was established among the Veddahs, a wild and savage tribe of devil-worshippers, living in the jungles. In 1854 the mission, divided according to the linguistic affinities of the population into the Tamil and Singhalese districts, reported a total of 27 chapels and other preaching-places, 26 missionaries, 1749 members, 449 on trial, 80 schools, and 3753 scholars. In 1872 thirty-eight missionaries were employed, of whom only eight were Europeans; the number of members had increased to 2187, and of scholars to 6100. Several of the churches had begun to be self-supporting, and educational institutions had been brought into successful operation in both districts. In 1876 the missions reported 35 stations in the Singhalese or South Ceylon district, and 27 stations in the Tamil or North Ceylon district, and in all 201 chapels and other preaching-places, 53 missionaries and assistant missionaries, 2492 members, 518 on trial, 39 catechists, 90 local preachers, 131 Sunday-schools, with 289 teachers and 5993 scholars in the same, 174 day-schools, with 246 teachers and 9356 scholars in the same, and a net total of 10,035 scholars in the day- and Sunday-schools. Wesley College, at Colombo, furnishes to its students a collegiate education sufficient to qualify them for admission to the Calcutta University. It was attended in 1876 by 198 students. The training institution at Colombo returned 12 students. Another college or high school is being established at Galle. Seven missionary and auxiliary missionary societies laboring in Ceylon and representing the Church of England, and the Baptist, Wesleyan, and Congregational Churches, reported in 1873, 89 principal and 163 subordinate stations, 38 English and American, and 80 native ministers, 591 lay agents, and 4807 members. At the Indian Missionary Conference held at Allahabad, India, in 1871, the total number of church members in Ceylon was given at 5164, and the number of professed Christians at 31,376.

Chadwick, Joseph H., was born in Boston, Mass., Feb. 27, 1827. He was educated in the common schools of the city. In 1845 he entered the counting-room of the Boston Lead Company as a clerk, and in 1852 became a member of the firm. In 1860 he became agent and treasurer of the company, which position he now holds. He early removed to Roxbury, now a part of Boston, and was repeatedly elected to positions in the city government. In 1865 he became a director in the Rockland Bank, Roxbury. In 1872 he was elected by the legislature of Massachusetts one of the State directors of the Boston and Albany Railroad.

Mr. Chadwick is a trustee or director in a dozen or more charitable or benevolent institutions. At seventeen years of age he was converted, and joined the church in Roxbury. When the Winthrop Street church was built, in 1868, he was the financial supervisor of the undertaking, and carried it successfully through. He has always been greatly interested in the educational institutions of the church. In 1872 he became a trustee of Boston University, and soon after, with a few others, purchased Lasell Seminary, at Auburndale, and established a school for young ladies under the patronage of the New England Conference. His residence is Boston Highlands, Mass.

Chadwick, J. S., D.D., was born in New York.

April 12, 1841; united with the church in 1853. After working for a time at the printing business, he commenced in 1858 studying for the ministry, and graduated in 1861 at the Garrett Biblical Institute. He has since preached in the Rock River, Newark, and Kentucky Conferences, and is (1877) stationed in Louisville. He was a delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

Chaffee, James F., was born in Middlebury, N. Y., Nov. 5, 1827; joined the Rock River Conference in 1848, and, after filling a number of important appointments, removed to Minnesota in 1857. He has assisted in building a number of churches, and has been presiding elder of the Minneapolis and St. Paul districts; and was a member of the General Conference of 1868. He has labored in behalf of Hamline University with both time and means.

Chairman of Districts (English Wesleyan) is similar in many respects to the "presiding elder of the Methodist Episcopal Church." Originally the chairman was simply a minister chosen at a special meeting of the district. That special meeting "being summoned by a superintendent in the district to consider some case of difficulty concerning himself"; but when these special meetings became annual district meetings, a chairman became a necessity. The Conference of 1792 seeing this, ordained that at the final settlement of the stations for the ensuing year the ministers of each district should choose their own chairman from among themselves. This is so far modified that now the chairman is chosen by ballot at the Conference, by all the ministers who are in Conference at the time.

Districts are composed of a number of circuits within easy access of some defined centre; they have been divided and subdivided or altered as may have been necessary or expedient. The present number of districts in Great Britain is 34, and of circuits 673.

The chairman must give proper notice of the district meetings to the ministers of the district, and also to the circuit stewards.

Should a minor district meeting be called for (which has special reference to discipline in cases of irregularity or immorality), he must convene the same. To every accused minister he must in due time give a written notice of the nature of the charges preferred against him, the names of his accusers, and the time of holding the trial. He does not, as in the case of the presiding elder in the United States, attend the Quarterly Conferences, or, as they are usually termed, quarterly meetings,—but he must preside in all the meetings of his district (except in the presence of the president of the Conference), and direct all their proceedings in accordance with rule and usage. With his brother ministers he is held responsible for the carrying out of all Methodistic rule in his district. To effect this he must, at every ordinary district meeting, make strict inquiry concerning the work of God in every circuit within its limits.

He must inquire every year into the moral character, doctrine, and general efficiency of every minister; the making of circuit plans by the superintendent or his colleagues; as to whether the chapels are connectionally settled; the stewards changed or re-elected as enjoined by rule; whether the Sacraments are duly administered, baptisms registered, the Scriptures read in public service, and the quarterly fasts observed.

He must carefully examine all candidates for the ministry; make inquiries as to the studies of probationers, and judge of the fitness of candidates for ordination.

By previous familiar acquaintance with the nature and management of connectional funds, he must be prepared to enforce rules as to grants ordinary and extraordinary, from the Contingent Fund, Chapel Fund, etc., and also to lay before their several committees the real state of every case proposed. He must also be (if sought for) the counselor of every minister in his district. He may attend, though only by invitation, the quarterly meeting of any circuit. At the same time solitary stations with only one minister are to be visited by him officially once or twice every year; and he may call to account any minister in his district.

He may be tried for personal or official delinquency, but the accuser must apprise the chairman of his intentions, and duly inform the president of the Conference, who, if he deems it needful, must summon a meeting of the ministers of the district, and put the accused on his trial before them. In the event of his guilt being proved, the meeting, in conjunction with the president, has power to suspend him till the ensuing Conference, or depose him from the chair and elect another in his place.

In case of death, the duties and responsibilities devolve on the president of the Conference, who may arrange, either by convening the ministers of the district or by correspondence with them, to obtain their votes for the election of the most fit minister among themselves to fill the vacancy until the next Conference; on this action the president declares and appoints such minister to be the chairman of the district.

One important duty of this office is, that the chairman is required to procure three complete copies of the minutes of all the meetings of the district committees, duly signed by the chairman and the secretary. One of these must be inserted in the district records, a second be reserved for the use of the chairman, and a third presented to the president and preserved as a document belonging to the connection.

Chamberlain, Benjamin, was born in Mount Vernon, Me., July 31, 1791, and died in Ellieottville, Feb. 10, 1868. He was endowed by nature with a vigorous understanding, but had obtained only a very limited education. He became a member of the M. E. Church, and was devoted to its interests. He was engaged for many years in the business of a lumberman and lumber merchant; and having accumulated a large fortune he resolved to devote it chiefly to education. He gave to the Randolph Academy, now the Chamberlain Institute, for buildings and expenses, and to Allegheny College, during his life nearly $100,000; in his will he bequeathed to them jointly $400,000 more. His wife was in full sympathy with his plans, and gladly surrendered her own claim that nothing might interfere with his noble designs. The law of New York, however, prohibits a man bequeathing more than one-half his property to any benevolent object, and also prohibits an academy from holding property the net annual income of which shall exceed $4000. Judge Chamberlain, for he had been elevated to office by his fellow-citizens, thought that as he had no children and his friends were well provided for, there would be no contest over his will. But after his death suit was brought by his brother, and a large proportion of the property was taken from these institutions. This fact, in connection with many others, should be an admonition to men who design to found literary institutions to so arrange their property prior to their death that no legal contests may arise. While, however, his grand designs were frustrated, both the institute and the college received a portion of his estate, and thus "being dead he yet speaketh."

Chamberlain Institute and Female College is located at Randolph, N. Y. In 1850 the Randolph Academy and Female Seminary was opened for students, though a charter was not obtained until the following January. The grounds embraced about seven acres, and with the buildings were owned by an association of stockholders. In 1851 it was selected by the regents of the university as one of the institutions where teachers' classes should be instructed. In 1863 an additional building was erected to accommodate the students who were receiving instruction. In 1868, Benjamin Chamberlain, a lumber merchant of large wealth, and who had been a friend of the academy, and a liberal donor, bequeathed to it in his will about $200,000. But under the laws of New York, a contest having been made by his brother, a large part of the property was lost. Thirty-eight acres of ground had been added by the citizens to the original plat, and a building had been erected by Judge Chamberlain at a cost of $50,000. The amount received by his will was $45,000 for endowment, and in recognition of his liberality the name was changed to Chamberlain Institute. The charter was also so changed that the trustees are elected by the Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, and the institution has remained under its control and patronage since that time. Five years afterwards the boarding hall was burned, with the institute library, cabinet, furniture, and a library belonging to the principal. The building was 40 by 100 feet, three and four stories high. In less than a year, however, by the great liberality of the people, a new building was erected, which in comfort and arrangements surpassed the former, at a cost of $40,000, which was paid for without using any of the funds of the institution. The trustees in their last exhibit report the amount of property exclusive of debts $103,154. During the last six years 300 students have been annually in attendance; and among the 250 academies in the State of New York it ranks the thirty-sixth in the number of pupils, and the eighth in the value of school property. The institution since 1870 has been under the presidency of J. T. Edwards, D.D.; and there are associated with him a corps of nine able teachers. The institution is well supplied with apparatus, library, cabinet, musical instruments, and all the equipments of a first-class and vigorous seminary. (See cut on the following page.)

Chamberlain, Schuyler, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Woodstock, Conn., Sept. 4, 1800; and died at his residence in Craftsbury, Vt., May 5, 1862. He was converted under the labors of Wilbur Fisk, in 1818, and joined the first class formed in Craftsbury. He was received into the New England Conference in 1828, and during his itinerant life filled a number of important appointments. He was three times elected a delegate to the General Conference. He also represented the town of Craftsbury in the legislature three times. He possessed superior abilities as a preacher, and held with great tenacity to the doctrines and usages of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Chamberlayne, Israel, D.D., an eminent minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Otsego Co., N. Y., Sept. 6, 1795; and died in Lyndonville, Orleans Co., N. Y., March 20, 1875. He was converted when fifteen years of age, and in 1813, when only eighteen years of age, was received on trial in the Genesee Conference. He filled a number of prominent appointments and was eight years presiding elder. He was five times elected a delegate to the General Conference, viz., 1824, 1828, 1832, 1852, and 1856. Because of extreme nervousness, he was compelled to retire from the itinerancy, yet not from effective duties. His sermons, essays, reviews, and public volumes were numerous. His last published work was entitled "Saving Faith." "He was distinguished for intellectual strength, for a dignified and courteous bearing in his intercourse with his brethren, by the strictest observance of the rules of propriety and order in church law and Conference duties. He was a master in logic, an original expounder in metaphysics and theology, exact as a linguist, sharp as a controversialist, and a good rhetorician; as a preacher he was instructive and original, and often his utterances were attended with power and unction overwhelming."

Chambers, E. Everet, D.D., was born in Ogden, N. Y., Jan. 27, 1820; was educated in Lima, and joined the Genesee Conference in 1843. He has been presiding elder for thirteen years; was delegate to the General Conference in 1872; has been a trustee of Genesee Seminary for more than twenty years, and was school commissioner of the city of Buffalo for one year.

Chambersburg, Pa. (pop. 6308), the capital of Franklin County, was laid out in 1764, but did not increase much until the peace of 1783. It suffered considerably during the late Civil War. Methodism was introduced into this place in 1793, by Daniel Madeira and his wife Ellen. The first church was erected in 1799, and situated on East Queen Street. In 1794 and 1795, Charles Burgoon, stationed on Frederick circuit, visited Chambersburg, and is supposed to have been the first M. E. minister to do so. In June, 1802, a class of seven persons was formed. In 1811 a brick church, situated on the corner of Second and Queen Streets, took the place of the first one, which was of logs. In 1847 this church was replaced by the present one. In 1869 about thirty persons went out of this society and formed the King Street society, building a church on South Second Street. In 1875 the society erected their present church, on the corner of Second and King Streets. An African M. E. church was erected here near the year 1812, was deeded to the society in 1840, and rebuilt in 1872. The society was organized prior to 1831. The services of the African M. E. Zion Church were introduced in 1831; the first church was built in 1838, and rebuilt in 1872. The United Brethren in Christ have a society of 340 members. It is in the Central Pennsylvania Conference. The statistics are as follows:

Chandler, John, was born in Enfield, Conn., Oct. 16, 1797, and died at his home in Peoria, Ill., Aug. 14, 1873. He was converted when twenty-four years of age, and although trained under Calvinistic influences, yet, by reading Fletcher's "Checks," he was led to adopt Arminian doctrines, and united with the M. E. Church April 26, 1821, in Rochester, N. Y. He was received on trial in the Pittsburgh Conference in 1824. For twelve years he worked efficiently in that Conference. Among those converted through his ministry was Calvin Kingsley, afterwards bishop. He was subsequently employed on Ravenna and Erie districts. In 1844 he was transferred to the Rock River Conference, and stationed at Peoria; after which he served a number of districts in the Conference. In 1864 he was appointed centenary agent. Mr. Chandler "was deeply pious, a man of power in prayer and preaching, a prudent officer in the church, and a princely leader in Israel."

Chapel or Church.—In the days of Wesley the Church of England erected in certain localities plain church edifices for the accommodation of those parishioners who might reside a great distance from the parish church. These were denominated chapels. They also erected what were termed parochial chapels, which were considered more or less dependent upon the mother church. In harmony with Wesley's views of his relation to the Church of England, when he found it necessary to erect a house of worship for his societies he called it a chapel. This, with other words of like import, such as "preaching-house" and "meeting-house," were terms which he preferred to the more stately name of church. The Methodists and Dissenters in England still speak of their houses of worship chiefly as chapels. At the introduction of Methodism in the United States the houses of worship were also named in the same modest way as chapels, meeting-houses, etc. But when the church was organized into an independent body, free alike from the church and authority of England, it began to introduce the use of the word church in the place of the former terms, and it has so far supplanted the word chapel that in the Discipline and history of the church the word chapel is seldom used. In some localities, however, especially where there are persons who were trained in the Wesleyan Methodist Church, they prefer yet to call their churches chapels. In the phraseology of the Board of Church Extension, and in the general church proceedings, the word chapel is nearly obsolete.

Chapel Affairs.—During the lifetime of Mr. Wesley, the larger number of the chapels built for the Methodists were erected with his sanction, and the debts left upon them were, comparatively, and with few exceptions, not very formidable.

Some of the early minutes of Conference on chapel affairs are curious and instructive, and contain the germs of several leading principles on which such affairs are yet conducted. Thus, in 1749 the question proposed was, "What do we advise with regard to public buildings?" Ans. "Let none be undertaken without the consent of the assistant" (i.e., the superintendent). Then follows a draft of a trust deed, with directions for its use, and for filling up vacancies everywhere with new trustees. "We know not what danger may ensue from delay."

In 1770, Q. "What is the whole debt remaining?" Ans. "The old debt £5671, and the new debt £1287. We gain no ground; the debt is larger now than it was last year. How can we prevent its further increase? By putting an absolute stop to all building for the ensuing year."

In 1775, Q. "Do we permit any to build new preaching-houses?" Ans. "Yes, if it be proposed first at the Conference."

In 1790, "No collections shall be made in future for the building or repairing of preaching-houses except in the circuits where they are respectively built or repaired." At this Conference a small building committee was for the first time appointed: but this appointment was only temporary.

After the death of Mr. Wesley, and the creation of district meetings, the Conference in 1793 resolved as follows: (1) "All matters relating to the building of preaching-houses and dwelling-houses shall be determined in future in the district meetings."

From this time until 1818 many chapels were built at a cost far beyond the means of the Methodists of that day. During a great part of that period war prices both diminished the resources of the people and increased the cost of erecting chapels, but the necessity was urgent, and the confidence of the people in the elasticity and extension of the Methodist system was strong. Yet often the results did not justify the expectations which had been cherished. Debts too heavy to begin with were increased by many unfavorable circumstances, until, in scores of cases, they became burdensome almost beyond endurance. Many expedients were resorted to for relief; among others, the Conference, year after year, gave permission to certain ministers and trustees to beg for particular chapels, either generally or through such districts and circuits as were selected for the purpose, and named in the yearly minutes. This plan, though perhaps the only one then practicable, was open to many objections. It detached a considerable number of ministers from their regular circuit duties; it hindered to that extent the spirituality and progress of the circuits; it occasioned considerable traveling expenses; and it became a just cause of complaint among the most liberal of the people, on whom calls for assistance were frequently made; and it was but partially successful.

At length, in 1818, with a view to diminish the evils of the previous plan, to prevent future unauthorized applications, and to distribute relief to distressed cases more equally, the Conference consented to establish a General Chapel Fund, which should be replenished annually by private subscriptions, public collections, and contributions from chapel trusts. The money thus raised was distributed by a committee which met before each Conference, considered applications presented through the May district meetings, and made grants towards meeting such annual deficiencies as it was believed could not otherwise be provided for. From the first it was proposed to make grants also towards reducing the debts, but this was not found practicable until after the lapse of several years.

Eventually it became apparent that the practice of making grants towards annual deficiencies, though it gave temporary relief, had a tendency to pauperize the feelings of trustees and to encourage applications for this kind of connectional help. For those grants were made without requiring the trustees to raise any proportionate sum to meet them,—though no doubt some did so,—and being made year after year, many trustees began to depend upon them, and others, influenced by the example thus set, became applicants.

Thus matters went on until not less than from £3000 to £4000 per annum were distributed in annual grants, while the debts which rendered such aid necessary were not diminished, but by various untoward circumstances were often increased. Thus it became clear that unless some vigorous effort could be made to reduce the principal of the debts the connection was all but spending its strength in vain.

In the mean time, feeling that this state of things would not only continue but increase as the connection increased unless some plan could be devised to prevent injudicious and unwarrantable expenditure on future erections, the Conference resolved in 1817 that a chapel building committee should be appointed.

This, in effect, grew out of the experience of the chapel relief committee: the hope being that, if the future could be regulated, the past might, little by little, be remedied.

It would be tedious and not very profitable to describe the working of these two committees. Their separate organizations and action were continued until 1854; and it cannot be doubted that they conferred great benefits on the connection, and that the generous and self-denying men who conducted their operations (some being ministers and some laymen) deserve to be held in most grateful remembrance. The names of Marsden, Wood, Marriott, West, Burton, Jobson, and others, are here worthy of honorable record. Yet there were defects in the constitution and operations of those committees, and there was a standing hindrance in the prevalent opinions of the connection respecting trust debts, which, though much evil had been occasioned by them, were not regarded with so much dislike as they ought to have been. Indeed, some strangely thought them a blessing!

Constituted separately and meeting separately, these committees had no regular official means of becoming acquainted with each other's proceedings except as the presence of a few men on both committees gave them information. Hence it frequently happened that the amount of debt, to relieve which help was sought from one committee, was far greater than the other committee had ever sanctioned. Thus, though great efforts were made by the connection, and some trusts were effectually relieved, the aggregate of connectional chapel debts continued to increase as additional chapels were erected, and more than the proper proportion of outlay was left as debt upon them. Even after the special and most valuable aid given first by well-considered movements in 1827, 1829, and 1832, by which large sums, amounting in the aggregate to about £50,000, were borrowed, to be distributed in grants, and their repayment made a charge on the income of the General Chapel Fund within a term of years; and next by the Centenary Relief Fund, of which not less than £39,080 was appropriated for the reduction of trustees' liabilities; and after all the efforts made by the excellent men above named, with Messrs. Heald, Fernley, and others, who labored with steady zeal for many years in the service, it seemed as though the period of connectional security in reference to chapel debts was indefinitely postponed. At last it became evident that an amalgamation of the two committees in one body, to whom should be referred all building and relief cases, with all other matters relating to chapel and other trust affairs, and the setting apart of a competent minister as secretary, had become indispensable. An additional reason was, that by a great connectional effort a large sum had been raised in 1853, partly for the discharge of heavy deficiencies, which had accumulated in several departments of Methodism during a season of connectional strife and loss, and partly to be employed as a permanent loan fund, to aid trustees in their efforts to relieve debts on their respective trusts, and reduce the amount of annual deficiencies, by lending them money, to be repaid in installments without interest, and to be met by not less than an equal amount actually given by themselves and their friends, so that, in effect, at least double the sum thus actually given should be paid off. The practicability of this admirable plan had been fully proved by the Rev. W. Kelk, then the secretary of the chapel building committee; and this, with other known qualifications, marked him out as a fit man to be appointed to the new office of general chapel secretary.

Accordingly, in 1854, the Conference sanctioned a new system of regulations, which had been carefully prepared for the future administration of chapel affairs; consolidated the functions of the two previous committees into one large body, of 30 ministers and 30 laymen, to be called "The Wesleyan Chapel Committee," and set apart Mr. Kelk as its first secretary, by whom the details of the new system were carefully worked out. To him succeeded, in 1860, the Rev. John Bedford, who, during the preceding year, had officiated as interim secretary, in consequence of Mr. Kelk's illness, and who continued to act as the head of the department until 1872, when failing health obliged him to retire. In the mean time, the work had so grown as to render necessary the appointment of a second secretary, and the Rev. Wm. Edwards was so appointed in 1865. On Mr. Bedford's retirement the Rev. E. H. Tindall became the colleague of Mr. Edwards, who, in May, 1876, sunk under the pressure of the work, and entered into rest.

At the Conference of that year the Rev. Henry J. Pope was appointed to act with Mr. Tindall, and the work of the department has expanded to such dimensions that, besides the two secretaries, three clerks are now constantly employed, and the offices at Oldham Street, Manchester, have become inadequate for the convenient dispatch of the work to be done.

The secretaries have acted under the direction of an influential general committee, to whose devotion to the affairs of the department the connection is deeply indebted.

In 1860 an attempt was made to extend the usefulness of the department by the creation of a branch of the fund for the purpose of affording help, by grant and loan, towards the erection of chapels. This attempt was for a time but partially successful, no such general response being made to the appeal of the committee as would warrant the hope of any considerable benefit resulting from the plan. Nevertheless, amidst great discouragements, the attempt was continued, until its value began to be apparent to all observers. It was really the germ of the great efforts which have since been made, and of the more remarkable proposals recently sanctioned, for the enlargement of Methodist agencies by the erection of suitable chapels. The resources of this branch of the committee's operations have been replenished for loan purposes by the noble bequest of £20,000, duty free, by the late John Fernley, Esq., who for many years rendered eminent service as the senior treasurer of the Chapel Fund; but they are yet far below what the necessities of the connection call for, and it may be hoped that a movement begun by the munificence of Sir Francis Lycett and Mr. Newburn will expand them, so as to enable the connection to render more efficient help to many urgent cases.

In 1866 the Conference sanctioned, and inserted in its printed minutes, a compendium of regulations, according to which chapel and other trust affairs have since been administered.

The free grants from the General Chapel Fund, from 1818 to the Conference of 1876 (including those from the Centenary Relief Fund), and a considerable sum specially raised for chapels in Scotland many years ago, for relief of debts alone, have amounted to £299,886. This does not include the help afforded by means of loans to trustees, repayable without interest, nor the aid given of late years towards the cost of new buildings.

Twenty-two years having now elapsed since the reconstituted system was commenced, the following summaries will give some idea of the work done in that period and of the progress made:

In the building department, including new chapels, chapel enlargements, school premises, ministers' houses, sites, and organs, the details of the cases completed show a total expenditure of £3,850,985. Of this sum there has been actually raised £3,101,182, leaving as temporary debt £749,503, of which a considerable portion has been paid off.

In the relief department, the debts provided for during the twenty-two years have been the following: with the aid of grants, £299,886; with the aid of loans, £456,268; exclusively by local efforts and surplus trust income, £359,033; total, £1,115,187.

It would scarcely be possible to make out exactly what has been realized from sales of old premises, after discharging the debts upon them, and from other sources, not being gifts; but, taking the building and relief departments together, it will be safe to say that upwards of £3,300,000 have been realized in gifts alone during the twenty-two years.

Unto Him be the praise, whose are "the silver and the gold, and the cattle upon a thousand hills!"

It is gratifying to state that very few circuits exist which have not derived benefit from the vigorous administration of chapel affairs. The surplus income of a large number of trusts is now applicable towards the support of circuits, and of a larger number of ministers than could otherwise be employed. Of that surplus, there was applied to those purposes, during last year alone, £35,446. And thus, as well as in other ways, the work of God will be yet further promoted as this department continues to prosper.

Among other valuable work done by the secretaries of the committee, returns have been obtained and tabulated of the provision for public worship made by the Wesleyan Methodists in Great Britain. It appears that, as nearly as can be ascertained, there were, in January, 1875, 7486 Wesleyan chapels, providing accommodations for 1,723,980 persons.

An important and very useful branch of the committee's duties is to facilitate the proper settlement of trust property, and the due renewal of trust deeds; to superintend applications to the charity commissioners, and generally, to give advice in delicate and difficult cases affecting trust premises and management.

For various purposes connected with the erection and maintenance of chapels, the service of local chapel interests, and the benefit of the General Chapel Fund or its auxiliaries, the committee, some years ago, with the advice of eminent lawyers, framed a deed, which the Conference of 1866 duly sanctioned, appointing a board of trustees to hold investments (of money), and apply either the principal or the dividends, from time to time, to such objects as donors or testators might direct.

This board consists of three ministers and three laymen, first chosen by the Conference, by whom also vacancies are to be filled up when they occur, and it has rendered valuable service to the connection. The expense of separate local appointments of trusts for each investment from time to time is thus avoided; and the succession of the board being provided for, both trustees and other persons have in effect the best guarantee which they can desire for the safe and permanent carrying into effect of their respective intentions. The secretary of this board is the Rev. John Bedford, who in this and other connectional work yet renders such services as his strength permits.

Chapel Fund for Watering-Places.—In 1862, in response to the report of a committee presented to the Conference respecting the need of better accommodation in watering-places, the Rev. W. M.

Punshon offered to raise by his personal efforts the sum of £10,000 for the above purpose. The offer was accepted,—the committee of advice and distribution appointed. The funds raised exceeded the original offer, and cases were met the outlay on which was at least £60,000, and the number of sittings thus provided about 15,000. (For other chapel information, see METROPOLITAN CHAPEL BUILDING FUND.)

Chaplain, a person originally so termed because he performed divine service in a chapel, or in places smaller than or apart from the regular churches. At an early period chaplains were appointed to conduct religious services in the castles of noblemen and in hospitals and monasteries. The term is now chiefly applied to those who officiate in the army, navy, or charitable institutions. In the Methodist Episcopal Church, bishops are authorized to appoint chaplains "to reformatory, sanitary, and charitable institutions, and for prisons, and in the army and navy, and they may remain for a longer period than three years." A chaplain also may be, if elected by an Annual Conference, with the approbation of a bishop, ordained by him before his probation ends. In the United States army and navy, until very recently, the chief chaplaincies were filled by ministers of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and though at present they have more than their numerical proportion, yet chaplains from other denominations are now frequently appointed, and this religious partiality on the part of the government has greatly diminished.

Chaplain, John Francis, D.D., born in Trappe, Talbot Co., Md., Oct. 16, 1824; converted in the same place, Aug. 5, 1845; graduated at Dickinson College 1843; admitted into Philadelphia Conference 1852; member of General Conference parts of sessions in 1860 and 1868, as reserve delegate; delegate in 1876; presiding elder of Lehigh district 1877.

Chappell, George R., Esq., of Manchester, Eng., died in 1860, in the eighty-third year of his age. He was a useful man in Methodism, and has left behind him a name still lovingly remembered. He was a pious man; no claims of business kept him from the worship of God; he gave large sums to the cause while living, and at his death left £500 to the Auxiliary Fund and £1000 to the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

Chappell Hill Female College is located at Chappell Hill, Texas, a village founded about 1849. It is the site of Soule University also, and both institutions were prosperous before the Civil War. During that period but little attention could be given to literary institutions, and the college was greatly depressed. About five years since the building was destroyed by fire. It has, however, been rebuilt, and the edifice is beautiful though plain. It is neatly finished and comfortably furnished. The school is in an excellent condition, and is doing a fine work. It is under the presidency of Rev. E. D. Pitts, D.D., who is assisted by able teachers. (See cut on the following page.)

Charitable Trusts (Wesleyan).—Before 1861 there was no legal provision for remedying defects in deeds, by which property is held in trust for charitable and religious uses. In that year an act of Parliament passed the legislature; and from the report of the committee of review (fully indorsed by the Conference) we are enabled to understand some of the necessities of the case, with some idea of relief afforded.

A report of the same committee states that the deeds of 1334 trust estates, which were void on various grounds, were made good by the immediate operation of these acts. Including all classes of cases, 1777 trust deeds have been made good.

Charleston, S. C. (pop. 48,956), the capital of Charleston County, and the metropolis of the State. This city was settled by an English colony under William Sayle, who became the first governor. In 1679 he located his colony on the west side of Ashley River, but after his death the colonists passed over and planted themselves on the west bank of the Cooper River, and Oyster Point became Charleston. This city is one of the most important places in the Southern States. It was the chief point of attack during the Revolutionary War. Here also Castle Pinckney, Fort Ripley, Fort Moultrie, and Fort Sumter were built for the protection of the vast harbor. During the late Civil War it was one of the chief centres of interest, being the place where the war commenced by the firing upon Fort Sumter.

The religious history of Charleston has not been less interesting. Aside from the preaching of the Wesleys in 1736, Pilmoor, one of the first American missionaries, visited the city in 1773, and encountered the violence of persecutors. He could obtain no place for preaching but the theatre, where, while fervently delivering a sermon, suddenly the table used by him for a pulpit, with the chair he occupied, disappeared, descending through a trap-door into the cellar, some persons having contrived the trick as a practical joke. Nothing discouraged, however, the preacher sprang upon the stage, with the table in his hands, invited the audience to the adjoining yard, adding, "Come on, my friends; we will, by the grace of God, defy the devil this time, and not be driven by him from our work." There he quietly finished his discourse.

In 1785, Ashbury, Jesse Lee, and Henry Willis visited Charleston. They were hospitably entertained about two weeks, and they preached every day. Before they departed their host was converted, and Willis was left to maintain the Methodist standard. Jesse Lee delivered the first sermon in an unoccupied Baptist church. He had about twenty hearers. Willis occupied the pulpit in the afternoon. At night Lee preached again. On the next Wednesday, Asbury took the pulpit, and occupied it daily for a week. Willis, being left in charge, entered upon his duties under many discouragements, but he succeeded in forming a small society, and in two years a commodious house of worship was built. This was erected on Cumberland Street.

In 1787 the first Annual Conference in this State was held in this city, presided over by Coke and Asbury. Dr. Coke dedicated the new church, which would accommodate 1500 hearers, and which cost £1000. He says, "This was a surprise to the people, as there were not more than forty white members in the society."

In 1791, William Hammett, one of Coke's missionaries to the West Indies, came to the United States, and took charge of the Methodist society in Charleston, but, becoming dissatisfied with the discipline and government of the church, formed an independent church in 1791. His commanding influence enabled him to lead away many members and erect a new church, which he called Trinity. His people adopted the name of "Primitive Methodists." After the death of Mr. Hammett the congregation was supplied by Mr. Brazier. After serving it for a time, he sold the building to the Episcopalians. It was, however, claimed by the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, after an appeal to the courts, a decision was rendered in their favor, and the organization abandoning its former principles, it became the second Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mr. Hammett had built a second church in the suburbs of the city, several local preachers had joined him, and he at one time contemplated a general organization. His party also erected churches in Georgetown, Savannah, and Wilmington, but in about eleven years the organization became extinct. The slavery agitation also affected the church and prevented its rapid progress; but in 1811, when Rev. Mr. Capers was sent to Charleston, there were 145 white members. It was chiefly through his energy that Methodism took a strong hold of the colored population in South Carolina. He made a profound impression in Charleston, and because of his superior culture and talents commanded almost universal respect.

In 1845, Charleston was embraced in the M. E. Church South, and so continued until after the Civil War. At its close a part of the colored population united with the M. E. Church, and a large church was bought from another denomination. The African M. E. Church also organized, and has a numerous membership. The statistics are as follows:

Charleston, W. Va. (pop. 3162), the capital of Kanawha County, is situated on the Kanawha River, some sixty miles from its mouth. The town is pleasantly located, and commands a fair amount of trade. Methodist worship was established here in the first quarter of the present century, the minutes for 1824 reporting John F. Power as its pastor. It was then in the Ohio Conference. In 1826, when Henry S. Fernandes was appointed to it, the charge reported 202 members, and in 1827, when John F. Power was returned, it reported 229 members. When the West Virginia Conference was organized it fell within the bounds of that Conference. The statistics are: M. E. Church members, 242; Sunday-school scholars, 240; church property, $18,000. M. E. Church South: members, 130. Colored M. E. Church: members, 211; Sunday-school scholars, 217; church property, $7000.

Charlotte, N. C. (pop. 4473), the capital of Mecklenburg County, and is famous for "the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence" in 1775. A United States mint has been established for a number of years. Methodism was early introduced, and has a fair proportion of the population. North Carolina Conference having adhered to the M. E. Church South, the M. E. Church had no membership until after the war. The following are the statistics:

Chartered Fund, The.—At the organization of the M. E. Church in 1784 "The Preachers' Fund" was originated. The design of this fund was to "provide for superannuated preachers, and the widows and orphans of preachers." To secure this object they directed, 1. that "every traveling preacher should contribute $2 yearly at the Conference. 2. Let every one when first admitted as a traveling preacher pay $2.67." This money was to be placed in the hands of three treasurers, three clerks, and three inspectors. These nine were to form a committee for the management of the fund. By this plan every worn-out preacher was to receive $64 a year, every widow $53.33, and every child of a preacher $53.33, and none should be entitled to anything from this fund unless the preacher had paid $6.67. Any person neglecting to pay his subscription for three years, unless he was absent from the United States by the direction of the church, should not be entitled to any of this fund. This brought comfort and relief to a great number of the preachers and their families, and most of the preachers were subscribers to it. Several changes were made in these regulations, until, in 1796, the "Chartered Fund" was established. It will be seen by the provisions of this plan, no assistance was given to an effective traveling preacher. It was soon discovered that some help must be rendered to the itinerants, as many of them were locating because of the inadequate support the church was able to give them. In the General Conference of 1792 some conversation was held re-dren, widows, and orphans." All the stock of the Preachers' Fund was thrown into the Charter Fund, which was incorporated in Philadelphia in 1797. After that time there were some alterations made in the application of the money annually given. The annual subscriptions of the traveling preachers to the Preachers' Fund were to be reserved for extraordinary cases which the Chartered Fund might not reach. Some time afterwards these subscriptions ceased. Annual collections have been taken up in the churches for necessitous cases. The Chartered Fund has remained a permanent fund until the present day. Dr. Bangs says, "It may be questioned whether by inducing a false dependence in the public mind this fund has not defeated the objects of its institution, and disappointed the specting the establishment of a plan for the relief of such preachers. Thomas Ware says, "As to the Conference, I was pleased with the spirit in which the business was transacted, but not with all that was done; or, in other words, that something was not done which I had hoped would be done. I had hoped that some measures would be entered into by that body to retain the preachers in the itinerant ranks. During the four years between the two General Conferences we had lost by location 106 preachers. This appeared to me a great fault, and one that ought to be remedied." At the organization of the Chartered Fund in 1796, it will be seen that its plans were much more comprehensive than those of the Preachers' Fund. Its design was "for the relief and support of the itinerant, superannuated, and worn-out ministers and preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America, their wives and chilexpectations of its benevolent founders and patrons."

The fund is carefully invested by a board of trustees, and the accruing interest is distributed to the Annual Conferences. It has not been very highly estimated by the church, and is comparatively small.

According to the report to the General Conference of 1876 the amount of invested funds Jan. 1, 1876, was $42,935.07, being an increase in four years of $2748.41. The highest dividend paid during each of the four years was in 1873, which was $40. In 1875 the dividend to each Conference was $30. C. Heiskell is president, J. Whiteman treasurer, and A. M. Burton secretary of the trustees.

Charter-House, The, is an institution in London at which Mr. Wesley when a boy was educated. It lies in the very heart of the city, but by its iron gates is shut in from the busy world. It was anciently a burial-place, purchased in 1349, when the great plague raged in London, and it is said that more than 50,000 victims of it were interred in this place. About twenty years afterwards, Sir Walter De Manny founded on it a convent of Carthusian monks. That order originated at Chartreuse, from which the term Charter-House is derived. It was suppressed as a monastery by Henry VIII. After passing through various hands, it was bought in 1611 by Thomas Sutton, Esq., a rich merchant, who founded the present institution, which was chartered by James I. In this school Addison, Steele, Blackstone, Isaac Barrow, and other eminent men were educated. Mr. Wesley's father had strictly enjoined him to run around the Charter-House garden three times every morning, a command which he faithfully obeyed. By this means it is supposed his health was improved and his constitution established. In the school 44 boys between the ages of ten and fifteen are gratuitously clothed, fed, and instructed. It has connected with it many historical reminiscences.

Charters are acts of incorporation by which various bodies are constituted capable of holding property, and performing other specified acts. Church charters are secured to constitute the various congregations, bodies corporate. Whether obtained specifically from the legislature or under a general act of incorporation, the Discipline of the Methodist Church requires that in all cases it should be distinctly specified that the property is to be held and used in trust according to the Discipline and usages of the M. E. Church. A neglect to attend carefully to this direction has sometimes endangered the title to church property, and has formed the occasion for expensive and painful litigation. In all cases those interested in the purchase and improvements of church property should be careful to secure both deeds and charters containing the specifications required by the Discipline.

Chase, Alden Fitzroy, a professor in the Maine Wesleyan Seminary, was born in Woodstock, Me., Oct. 26, 1842, was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1869, and in the same year became teacher of mathematics in the Wesleyan Academy, Wilbraham, Mass. He was appointed teacher of Mathematics and English Literature in the Maine Wesleyan Seminary and Female College, Kent's Hill, Me., in 1872, and joined the Maine Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the same year.

Chattanooga, Tenn. (pop. 6093), on the Tennessee River, in Hamilton County, an important shipping-point for Eastern and a part of Middle Tennessee. In the vicinity of the town is Look-out Mountain, famous as the scene of the battle fought above the clouds, Nov. 23, 1863. Chattanooga was first mentioned in the minutes of the church under the year 1843, when T. K. Munsey was appointed to it. He was succeeded in 1844 by G. N. E. Cunningham. It is in the Holston Conference. The statistics are:

Chautauqua Assembly is a Sunday-school association held at Fairpoint, on Lake Chautauqua. The ground was originally selected for camp-meeting purposes, and meetings of various kinds have been held upon it. It consists of a beautiful grove on a projecting point, easy of access from both Jamestown and Mayville. In 1874 it was selected for the meeting of a Sunday-school assembly, and has been so occupied each succeeding year. Distinguished ministers and lecturers give addresses on appropriate subjects, and teachers are stimulated to the closer study of the Holy Scriptures, and are inspired with fresh zeal in their work. The grounds embrace about fifty acres. A large number of comfortable cottages have been erected, and during the assemblies a number of tents are also pitched upon the ground. A miniature view of Palestine was constructed on the lake-shore, and was a novel feature of the assembly. The Sunday-school arrangements have been chiefly planned by Dr. J. H. Vincent.

Cheetham, Charles, an influential layman of the United Methodist Free Churches, England. He resides at Heywood, Lancashire. He has been a member of the Foreign Missionary Committee for sixteen years, and from 1861 to 1870 he held the important office of missionary treasurer. It was through his suggestion that the mission to Eastern Africa was founded.

Cherokees, The, belong to the Appalachian group of American Indians, who for centuries inhabited Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama. Their original territory comprised over thirty-five millions of acres, and they formed a nation by themselves, having about fifty villages in the valley of the Tennessee River. In 1826 a syllabic alphabet was invented by one of their number, by which the Cherokee language is written and read with facility. They were engaged for a number of years in war with the United States, which ultimately resulted in the cession of a large part of their territory. Finally, in 1835, the government succeeded in inducing them to give up the whole of their original territory in exchange for a plat west of the State of Arkansas. In 1838, contrary to the protest of their chiefs and of the majority of their nation, they were removed by General Scott under a military force into the north and eastern part of the Indian Territory. There they have organized a government, have a legislature or general council, a system of courts, and live mostly in villages, have comfortable houses, and are somewhat skilled in agriculture and the mechanical arts. They annually raise a large amount of stock. They have a printing-press, issue a paper, and publish pamphlets and books. Prior to their removal West, Methodist ministers had visited them and established societies among them, and after their removal societies and churches were organized, and schools were established, which have had much influence in their civilization and education. They have a permanent investment in State stocks, guaranteed by the United States, of $759,899, on which they receive an annual interest of five per cent. from the United States treasury. From 1841 to 1844, Bishop Ames, then missionary secretary, took a deep interest in their nation and in the establishment of schools among them. In the division of the church they fell into the Southern department, and their territory is now within the bounds of the Indian Mission Conference of the M. E. Church South. They constitute a district which reports 75 white, 1296 Indian, and 8 colored members, and an orphan asylum.

Chester, Pa. (pop. 9485), is on the west side of the Delaware River. It is the oldest town in the State, having been settled by the Swedes in 1643, before the grant to William Penn, and for a time was called Upland. In 1682, William Penn held a provisional assembly here. It was chartered in 1701, and was the capital of Chester County until 1789, when Delaware County was organized. Methodist services were held as early as 1772, Bishop Asbury recording in his journal that the people were pleased with its services. He was at the place several times during the year, and again in July, 1773. In 1774, Chester, embracing several appointments, reported 36 members, and Daniel Ruff and Joseph Yearbury were appointed to the charge, who at the end of six months exchanged with William Watters and Philip Ebert. In 1775 the charge reported 74 members, and had Richard Webster as pastor. The year following it reported 104 members, and in 1780, 100 members. In late years the church has grown rapidly with the place. It is in the Philadelphia Conference, and reports as follows:

Chester Heights Camp-Ground is situated on the Baltimore Central Railroad, 21 miles from Philadelphia. A farm of 148 acres was purchased by an association in 1872, and 60 acres were set apart especially for camp-meeting and excursion purposes. This ground was inclosed with a board-and picket-fence 7 feet high; a large pavilion was erected 60 by 101 feet in size, and from 16 to 24 feet in height, with a basement for storage purposes. The front of the building, designed for offices, preaching-stand, and ministers' lodging, etc., being 70 feet long, 20 feet deep, and 32 feet high. Several wells have been dug on the ground, and a steam-engine and pump furnish an ample supply of water. Seats to accommodate some 3000 people have been prepared, and an additional plot of ground of 31 acres has been purchased for tenting purposes, and for the accommodation of horses, etc. A camp-meeting has been held each year since the opening of the ground. Many excursions of Sunday-schools, students, and others have assembled on the grounds. It is in a very healthy section of country, and, from its elevated location and pleasant slope, can easily be kept dry. The association expect to recompense themselves by the sale of a sufficient number of lots.

Chestnut, John A., a native of Kentucky, born in 1816, and converted in his thirtieth year, has been for years a resident of Illinois, and has large banking interests in Carlinville and Springfield. Though possessed of large means, he is devoted to the interests of the church, and its ministers have no truer friend than he. His financial ability is sought and used in the interests of Conference societies. These eminent services, with high character and superior ability, led to his choice as lay delegate by the Illinois Electoral Conference, to represent that body in the General Conference of 1876. He is a great Sunday-school worker.

Chew, Richard, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerancy in 1847; was president in 1867. Mr. Chew is the author of "Life of Rev. James Everett," an octavo volume of 540 pages.

Chicago, Ill. (pop. 298,977), is the largest city in the State, and the capital of Cook County. The name is of Indian origin, and is mentioned by the French Jesuit Marquette, who first visited it in 1671. It was also visited by Perrot in 1770. In the winter of 1774 and 1775 Marquette camped near the present site of the city. The first fort, Dearborn, was built by the United States government on a point of the river near its mouth, in 1804. In the war with Great Britain, in 1812, it was abandoned. The town was laid out in 1830, and was organized in 1833. It was chartered in 1837. Chicago is the largest grain and lumber market in the United States, and is the metropolis of the Northwest. In 1871 it was visited by the most disastrous conflagration known in the history of the country. Twenty-five thousand buildings were destroyed, including nearly the whole business portion of the city, and covering an area of three thousand acres. But it rapidly arose from its ashes, and is almost completely rebuilt. The Methodists were the pioneers among the religious bodies in Chicago. Jesse Walker was appointed at the Illinois Conference in 1830 to the Chicago mission, where he succeeded in planting Methodism in that then infant town. In 1831 he was sent to the Desplaines mission, and organized many small societies. In 1832 a Chicago district was formed, mostly of missionary ground, and Jesse Walker was superintendent or presiding elder, and also missionary to Chicago Town, as it was then called. That year Chicago reported 10 members. In 1834 it reported 25 members, and John T. Mitchell was appointed to "Chicago missionary station." The first quarterly meeting in the city was held in the fall of 1833, and in the spring of 1834 the first regular class was formed.

The church has shared in the rapid growth of the city, though a large part being foreigners, it has not as great a percentage of membership as in cities more strictly American. On the site of the old Clark Street church, in the centre of the city, a large business block has been built, with an audience-room in the third story. The income, after debt and expenses are paid, is to be devoted to church extension in the city. Methodist services were established among the Germans in 1846. In a population of 100,000, they have now 7 churches and 5 parsonages, valued at $141,000, with 767 members. The Swedes and Norwegians have also churches, and a weekly paper, called the Sandebudet, is issued at the Book Room. To facilitate the spread of religious literature, a branch of the Western Book Concern was established in Chicago, and in 1852 the Northwestern Christian Advocate was commenced. The Northwestern University and the Garrett Biblical Institute are in its immediate vicinity. The statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Chicago German Conference was separated from the Northwest German Conference in 1872, and includes "all the State of Wisconsin except those appointments along the Mississippi River, and that part of the State of Illinois north of the east and west line, passing along the north line of the city of Bloomington (also excepting the territory now in the Southwest German Conference), and east of a north and south line passing through the city of Freeport, and that part of the State of Indiana west of the line between the counties of St. Joseph and Elkhart, and north of the line between Stark and Pulaski Counties." It also includes Danville, Ill. It embraces 59 traveling preachers, 5683 members, 5304 scholars, 98 churches, valued at $284,792, and 48 parsonages, valued at $32,690.

Children's Day is designated in the Discipline of the M. E. Church as the second Sabbath in June. During the Methodist centennial year of 1866 a considerable amount of money was contributed by the Sunday-schools of the church, and called the "Children's Fund." The General Conference of 1868 appointed a "Board of Education of the Methodist Episcopal Church." It was made a part of the duty of this board "to receive, separately invest, and to augment the Sunday-School Children's Fund, appropriating the interest only to assist meritorious Sunday-school scholars in obtaining a more advanced education." Each Annual Conference is to share in the annual proceeds of this fund proportionately to the number of Sunday-school children under its care, providing that annual collections in behalf of this fund are taken within its bounds. The beneficiaries of this fund shall be selected as the annual Conference directs.

The General Conference of 1868 recommended that the above-named time be so called, and that wherever practicable a collection be taken in the Sunday-school in aid of that fund. The contributions to this fund during the centennial year of 1866 amounted to $59,523.49. It has been considerably increased since. The Board of Education reported to the General Conference of 1876 "an increasing observance of the Children's Day, and if it could become universal would insure most desirable results."

Children's Fund (English Wesleyan).—By the minutes of 1770 all circuits were bound to support the children of their respective ministers, hence ministers were very frequently objected to on account of their large families. This state of things greatly needed change, and ministers and friends sought the most efficient means to effect it. In 1818 it was decided that the subject should be discussed in the May district meeting, when the circuit stewards were present.

At the Conference, 1819, resolutions were adopted rearranging and adjusting the whole affair. Every district must be responsible for providing from its own resources the usual quarterly allowance for such a number of children as shall be found, on annual examination and calculation, to be fairly chargeable on circuits in that district according to the number of members in society.

When ascertained, a yearly division of allowances among the several circuits must take place. For this apportioned sum each circuit is held responsible, and it is expected to furnish the sum in quarterly installments, either from regular income or extra local effort.

Though the number of members in each district be the sole guide to the apportionment of allowances, and the number of members in each circuit be the leading rule on which to base the division, yet, in particular cases, the district meeting is permitted to modify the general principle of numbers, so that the more burdened circuits may, as much as possible, be relieved by others in the same district, and the whole quota for each be raised within itself.

This arrangement constitutes "The Children's Fund," and does away with all allowances for children from the "Contingent Fund."

When the apportionment to each district is made, it rests with the financial district meeting to make definite allowances to each circuit, and, if needful, to legislate as to the best means for raising the quota, so that all being remitted to the district treasurer, he, after paying all district claims, may remit any surplus to the general treasurer prior to the ensuing Conference.

The number of members responsible for one child's allowance has varied in different years, but an arrangement was made in 1868, which has not since been disturbed, that 100 members should provide £6.10 for one child.

The circuit stewards are required to pay the regular allowances to such ministers as are entitled to receive the same. If the apportionment be less than the needed sum, the district treasurer makes up the deficiency; if more, the balance is remitted to the treasurer.

When preachers' sons are sent to Kingswood or Woodhouse Grove Schools, the parents forego their claim on this fund. There are sundry minor details unnecessary to notice. The connectional yearly grant is £6.6, and continues till the age of twenty years.

Children's Home, The (English Wesleyan).—

This establishment—its headquarters located in Bonner Road, Victoria Park, E., and now happily a permanent institution of Methodism—originated in a very humble but divinely-inspired desire to provide for the orphans and destitute children which it might be able to shelter and provide for in the city of London, especially in its eastern portion. The idea and the fruition of it owes its present position to the piety and zeal of the Rev. T. B. Stephenson, B.A. For some years the whole system, like Methodism itself, was the outcome and development of providential guidance. The prominent feature from the first was not to herd these outcasts together in masses, but to carry out the "home" idea, and in detached buildings to place a small number together, under the fostering care of a matron, termed a mother.

Workshops provide for industrial training, under proper supervision; and a printing-office has been established, at which most satisfactory work has been done for the connection, by hands formerly prone to other and evil deeds.

It has spread into different branches at home and in the colonies, and, after pursuing a steady, unassuming, and officially unrecognized course for several years, was formally noticed by the Conference in 1872, when a report was presented and received, acknowledging the generous gift by Mr. Barlow, of Bolton, of a farm of about one hundred acres, for the purpose of forming a branch in Lancashire, with great facilities for instruction in farming, and a commodious residence, all under proper supervision and instruction.

In 1873 the Rev. T. B. Stephenson was appointed principal, and in 1874 its position is found under the stations of Conference. In 1875 it was reported that there were 300 children in residence in four branches of the parent institution, termed respectively the London branch (headquarters), the Lancashire branch, the home at Hamilton, in Canada, and a new establishment at Gravesend called the Milton branch. The latter is certified by the home secretary for the reception of boys. Excellent premises, with twenty acres of ground adjacent, will provide accommodation for upwards of 100 boys.

The project of a training-ship in the Thames has been started, but not yet perfected.

The report at the last Conference (1876), referring to the successful working of the several branches of "the Home," states that the total income from donations (chiefly small ones) amounted to the sum of £10,158.19.7, towards which the Sunday-schools contributed £2229.4.7.

Heavy liabilities still surround the plan for the full establishment of the home, but large sums have been promised, and the friends of this enterprise are prayerfully and hopefully sanguine as to its ultimate success.

An influential committee of ministers and laymen are annually appointed, and in its organization the Conference recognizes a proportion of gentlemen belonging to other evangelical bodies of Christian workers.

Altogether, to this date, 850 children have been received into the "Home," of whom 400 have been placed in situations; and of these, numbers have become members of the church of Christ.

One interesting feature of its development is that it affords proper training to young men to prepare them to enter other spheres of Christian usefulness. In connection with this part of its operations, several young men have entered the ranks of the Christian ministry; and a number of excellent women, some of them of superior social position, have devoted themselves to the Christian care of orphan and outcast children. Upwards of £50,000 have been contributed towards the establishment and working of "The Children's Home" during the last eight years.

Childs, Niels T., a lay delegate from the Wyoming Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Orange Co., N. Y., in 1830; was for several years engaged in the business of tanning at Ellenville, N. Y., at which place he became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and afterwards removed to Binghamton, N. Y.

Chili Seminary is an institution of learning under the control of the Free Methodist Church. It is located at North Chili, Monroe Co., N. Y., ten miles west of Rochester, on the Buffalo division of the New York Central Railroad. It is in the midst of a beautiful and healthy country. The buildings have recently been enlarged and improved. Rev. B. T. Roberts, A.M., is President; and B. H. Roberts, A.B., Principal; Luey M. Sellew, Preceptress; Della Carpenter, Teacher of English Branches; and J. R. Chesbrough, Teacher of Penmanship.

Chillicothe, Mo. (pop. 3978), the capital of Livingston County, on the Hannibal and St. Joseph and the St. Louis and Kansas City Railways. It is mentioned first in the records of the church in the year 1839, when Reuben Aldridge was appointed pastor. At the Conference of 1840 he reported 253 members, and was succeeded by Henry Blaisdell. The next year the charge contained 318 members, and received as pastor Constantine F. Dryden. It is in the Missouri Conference. The statistics are: M. E. Church: members, 136; Sunday-school scholars, 200; church property, $8000. M. E. Church South: members, 225. African M. E. Church: members, 126; Sunday-school scholars, 72; church property, $3100.

Chillicothe, O. (pop. 8920), the capital of Ross County, on the Scioto River, about midway between Columbus and Portsmouth. It was founded in 1796 by pioneers from Manchester, O., who settled on Station Prairie, a little below the present town. The first legislature of Ohio met here under a sycamore-tree, on the bank of the Scioto, and its first business was the passage of a law against drunkenness. Chillicothe was for a number of years connected with Scioto circuit. In 1806, James Quinn called together the board of trustees of the Chillicothe society, of which Governor Tiffin and Judge Scott were members, and they proceeded to take measures for the erection of a church,—the first in all that valley. In September, 1807, Asbury preached in that new church to about five hundred persons. It was frequently visited by Asbury, and a number of Conferences were held here. This church was burned about the year 1820, but soon replaced by another and better one. It was first named in the minutes in 1820, when Abdel Coleman was appointed to the charge. In 1821 he reported 348 members on the circuit, and was succeeded by James Quinn, who was returned in 1822, and who, in 1823, reported 233 members. In 1840 the society was divided and a second church built. In 1855 there were five Methodist churches in the place, which then had a population of 7200. It is in the Ohio Conference, and its statistics are:

China, Missions in.—China proper occupies a region seven times the size of France, or nearly half as large as all Europe. Its present population is estimated at about 400,000,000 souls, who all use one written language, but have many spoken dialects. The Chinese nation is the oldest now existing. Its traditions date back nearly five thousand years, and its history is claimed to have begun about 2200 B.C. Twenty-three dynasties of kings reigned till A.D. 1279, when the country was conquered by the Mongol Tartars. The Mongols were expelled in 1368. The Mantchoo Tartars invaded China in 1522, and finally established themselves in power, which they hold to the present day. From 1644 the intercourse of Europeans with China was very restricted and attended with difficulties until about the middle of the present century. The Portuguese were the first to visit the country, and to establish factories at points along the coast in the sixteenth century. The Dutch followed about a hundred years afterwards, and the English towards the close of the sixteenth century. The Russians had an overland trade with China as early as the sixteenth century. In 1841 occurred the so-called first opium war with England, which resulted in the opening of five great ports to English trade, and subsequently (in 1844) to the conclusion of treaties with France and the United States. Another war broke out in 1857, with Great Britain and France, at the end of which more liberal treaties were concluded. Since that time the policy of the Chinese government has grown more friendly towards foreigners, more ports have been opened, and greater freedom of access to the country has been afforded. The disposition of the people continues jealous and intolerant, so as to neutralize largely the privileges accorded by the government.

The Chinese manifest indifference in religious matters. Three systems of religion are taught and professed in the empire, Tauism, Confucianism, and Buddhism. Confucianism was founded by Confucius in the sixth century B.C. It is an elaborate system of moral precepts, of merit as a system of morals and for the guidance of practical life, but has hardly any features which would entitle it to be called a religion. Tauism, or the system of the supreme reason, was founded by Lao Tse, who lived about half a century before Confucius. It teaches that the Tau or reason is the source of all things, of all divinities, beings, and material forms; that all good beings emanate from reason and return into its bosom, to exist eternally therein; but that the miseries of successive births, and their accompanying sorrows, await them if they are not good. It recommends contemplation as the most effectual means of purifying the spiritual nature. The higher classes of the Chinese are for the most part Confucianists or Tauists; Buddhism is the religion of the classes who form the mass of the population, but are ignorant and low in social position and civilization. The worship of ancestors prevails generally among the adherents of all these religions. The Mohammedans number several millions in China.

Christianity was introduced into China by the Nestorians as early as the seventh century. This church had a rapid growth, so that by 1330 it counted 30,000 adherents. It disappeared after the expulsion of the Mongols. Roman Catholic missions were begun by the Franciscans about the commencement of the thirteenth century, were suspended when the Mongols were driven out, and were renewed by the Portuguese Jesuits in the middle of the sixteenth century. The missionaries secured favors from the government, and prospered till 1722, when a repressive policy was adopted towards them. Under the operation of the recent treaties they have pursued their efforts with more freedom, and now claim 158 European and 169 Chinese priests, 325,000 members, and 5 seminaries. A mission of the Greek Church was established by Peter the Great of Russia, but it has only a few hundred converts.

Protestant missionary effort was begun in 1807, when the Rev. Dr. Robert Morrison, of the London Missionary Society, went to Canton, and, living there in seclusion, engaged in the translation of the Bible into Chinese and the preparation of a dictionary. He was joined by the Rev. W. Milne in 1813. The Acts of the Apostles were printed in 1810, the dictionary in 1814, and the entire Bible in 1818. Several other books were published by Mr. Morrison, which were of great value to the missionaries who followed him. A number of Protestant missions and schools were started early in this century among the Chinese of the Malay Peninsula and the East Indian Archipelago. Among them were the Anglo-Chinese College, established by Dr. Morrison and Mr. Milne at Malacca in 1812, and the missions of the American Board, which were removed to China in 1844. Previous to 1840 more than fifty missionaries had been employed in these stations, while only five had succeeded in gaining a residence at Canton, and about the same number had remained temporarily at Hong-Kong. After the conclusion of the second series of treaties, missions were established in the country by numerous European and American societies. They have been conducted since with steady growth.

The mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church in China was begun in 1847, Rev. Messrs. Moses C. White and J. D. Collins and their wives arriving at Foochow on the 1st of September of that year. They were reinforced the next year by the Rev. Messrs. Henry Hiecock and R. S. Maclay and their wives. Three day-schools for boys were started in 1850, and a girls' school in 1851. Blocks were prepared for printing works in Chinese, and several editions of books of Scripture were printed during the earlier years of the mission. The first convert was not baptized till 1857. A female foundling asylum was established in 1860, which received 18 inmates in the first year. In 1863 a printing-office, furnished with fonts of English and Chinese type, went into successful operation, and the mission reported 4 city and 4 country stations, 14 American and 11 Chinese agents, 87 members of the church, a boys' school with 14 scholars, a girls' school with 15 scholars, 3 Sunday-schools with 60 scholars, and mission property, real and personal, valued at $30,000. A new station, Kiukiang, was occupied in December, 1867, by the Rev. Messrs. Virgil C. Hart and E. S. Todd, and was organized as a mission in 1868. The mission at Peking was established in 1869, under the supervision of the Rev. L. N. Wheeler. Arrangements were made in 1872 to open a mission at Canton. In that year the designations of the mission-fields were changed, and they were known thereafter as the East China mission, headquarters at Foochow; Central China mission, headquarters at Kiukiang; North China mission, headquarters at Peking; and South China mission, headquarters at Canton. The missionary force had increased to 7 missionaries and assistants and 63 native preachers in East China; 10 missionaries, assistants, and woman missionaries, and 9 native helpers in Central China; and 15 missionaries and woman assistants in North China. The churches reported 1921 members, probationers, and baptized children, 615 Sunday-school scholars, and 12 theological students in East China, and 39 members, probationers, and baptized children in Central China. The General Conference of 1876 ordered the Fokien province, or East China mission, to be organized into an Annual Conference.

The statistical reports for 1876 showed that there were connected with the East China mission, or Foochow Conference, 4 presiding elders' districts, with 32 stations and circuits, 88 classes, 5 missionaries, 5 assistant missionaries, 3 missionaries of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, 78 native preachers, 1255 members, 537 probationers, 491 baptized children, 11 students in the Biblical school, a boys' high school, a girls' boarding-school, and 18 girls' day-schools, with in all 335 pupils, and 744 Sunday-school scholars. The number of baptisms during the year was 192 adults, 98 children. Amount contributed for the support of preachers and presiding elders, $596; amount of benevolent contributions, about $23; value of mission property, $56,000.

The statistics of the Central China mission for 1876 were: number of stations and circuits, 6; missionaries, 4; assistant missionary, 1; missionaries of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, 2; native helpers, 3; other assistants, 8; members, 23; probationers, 37; baptized children, 4; pupils in three day-schools and the girls' boarding-school, 63; pupils in Sunday-schools, 76; total value of mission property, $18,500.

The statistics of the North China mission for 1876 were: number of stations and circuits, 9; missionaries, 5; assistant missionaries, 5; missionaries of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, 3; preachers on trial and exhorters, 9; members, 39; probationers, 41; children baptized, 5; adults baptized, 25; pupils in two day-schools and the girls' boarding-school, 43; Sunday-school scholars, 100; value of mission property, $25,900; value of the property of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, $9500.

These statistics show a total for the three missions of 128 foreign and native agents, 2432 members, probationers, and baptized children, 920 scholars in Sunday-schools and 761 in other schools, and $109,900 as the value of the mission property.

The China mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church South was begun in 1848, when Charles Taylor, M.D., and the Rev. Benjamin Jenkins, D.D., established themselves at Shanghai. They were reinforced in 1852 by the Rev. G. W. E. Cunningham. A congregation was gathered at Shanghai, and a school was opened, which soon had 34 members on the roll. A church was built, and a printing-press was set up. Another reinforcement of missionaries was sent out in 1854. Since that time the work has prospered and grown. In 1872 the mission reported stations at Shanghai and Soochow, 68 members, 15 probationers, and four schools with 49 scholars. In 1876 the mission was supported at an expense of $7500, employed 3 missionaries and 10 native helpers, and returned a total of 101 members and 67 Sunday-school scholars. In December of this year, Bishop Marvin visited the mission officially for the purpose of ordaining six native preachers. The report of the Rev. Mr. Lambeth, superintendent, made at this time, showed that the mission had 11 churches and preaching-places, and 7 schools, and that it owned property valued at $12,835.

The China mission of the Wesleyan Missionary Society was begun in 1852. The Rev. George Piercy, a Wesleyan, had gone to China, in 1850, on his own account to engage in missionary work, and had stationed himself at Canton. The society adopted him as its missionary, and sent out two men to help him in 1852. The force was doubled in 1855, and in 1858 as many converts had been gained as there were missionaries. In 1862, 21 members were recorded, and 155 pupils had been gathered into the schools. In 1867 a book-room was opened at Canton, and in 1868 a hospital was established at Hankow, under the care of a medical missionary. In 1869 the mission had—at Canton in the south and Wuchang in the centre—12 missionaries, with 85 members and 312 scholars. In 1876 its work embraced two districts,—the Canton district, with the stations Canton East, Canton West, and Fatshaw; and the Wuchang district, with the stations Wuchang, Hangchow, Kwangchi, and Wusueh,—with 12 missionaries and assistants, 18 subordinate paid agents, 5 local preachers in the Wuchang district, 260 members, 49 on trial, 16 day-schools with 460 pupils, 1 Sunday-school in the Wuchang district, with 3 teachers and 50 scholars in the same, and 440 attendants on public worship.

The society of the United Methodist Free Churches has at Ningpo 1 principal station, 4 out-stations, 2 organized churches, 2 chapels, 2 missionaries, 7 native preachers, and 112 members.

The society of the Methodist New Connection had, in 1872, at Tientsin and Laoling, in Northern China, 2 principal and 6 subordinate stations, 2 missionaries, 11 lay agents, and 242 members.

In 1874 there were laboring in China, including the Methodist missions and 4 independent missionaries, 265 missionaries, under the direction of 13 American, 1 Canadian, 11 English, and 2 European Continental societies. The total number of converts under the care of the societies is estimated at about 10,000.

Chinese Language and Literature.—The Chinese language presents great difficulties to the missionary and the scholar. It is totally unlike any other language in its roots and structure. It is the oldest language now spoken, and, except the Hebrew, is the oldest language used in its written form. The written language is ideographic, and bears no relation to the spoken tongue or to any of the dialects. The labor of acquiring it is one of the great bars to the progress of the empire, for it is a task requiring more time than is given in the countries of the West to the acquisition of a liberal education. A separate character is used for every word and idea, so that some authors speak of as many as 50,000 characters. About 33,000 characters may be in actual use, of which an accomplished graduate is expected to know some 10,000 or 12,000, while one may attain a respectable standing in literary circles if he is familiar with 2000 or 3000.

The colloquial dialects are numerous. The most important and most widely extended of them is the Mandarin, which is the general and polite language of the country, the language of official circles, and is commonly used in several of the northern and western provinces. Nearly every province has also its own colloquial dialect, so that, with a few exceptions, the inhabitants of one part of the country cannot understand those of another, better than if they were people of widely-separated nations. In the colloquial dialects, the intonation is quite as important as the word or the connection, and the same word has several distinct meanings, according to the tone in which it is pronounced. The task of learning the use and meaning of these modulations is a delicate and difficult one; ignorance, or disregard of them, exposes the stranger to ridicule, as well as to perversion of his meaning. The missionary in China expects to spend fully three years in learning the language before he can be qualified to begin his regular work.

The Chinese literature is said to be one of the most extensive in the world. Several departments of knowledge are embraced in the books of the country, with considerable fullness, but unequal degrees of merit. The works in highest esteem are the nine classics, which include the writings of the four sages,—Confucius, Tseng Sin, Kung Kieh, and Mencius. They consist of works of history, morals, philosophy, and books of rites and odes, the oldest of which was rewritten by Confucius about 500 B.C., from a work which was written about 1150 B.C. The others were written between about 500 B.C. and 300 B.C. These works have moulded the thought of the Chinese for more than two thousand years, and form to the present time the foundation, and nearly all that is essential in their literary culture.

The mission press has been an important and effective agent in furthering the objects of missionary work in China. Mr. Morrison, the founder of the Protestant missions, begun his translation of the Bible with the beginning of his work. Now the Bible is published in several versions, and is accessible, either entire or in parts, in large editions and various dialects, to the people in different parts of the empire. The British and Foreign Bible Society has published three versions of the entire Scriptures, the New Testament in the Pekin Mandarin colloquial, and in the Nankin and Ningpo colloquials. It also published parts of the New Testament in the Canton colloquial, in the Hakko colloquial (in Roman characters); for Tartary it publishes the New Testament in Mantchoo, and the entire Bible in Buriat, or Eastern Mongolian, and the Gospel of Matthew in the Southern Mongolian colloquial. The American Bible Society has published the New Testament in the Foochow colloquial.

The establishment of the Methodist Episcopal mission press at Foochow was suggested almost at the beginning of the mission at that point. In 1848 the Rev. Mr. Hickock concluded that much could be done with the colloquial dialect. Since that time an extensive Methodist literature has been published in this dialect (the Foochow), and many works have been printed in the classical language. In 1855 several parts of the New Testament were prepared for publication, and editions of the Gospel of Matthew in the colloquial and classical, and of the Sermon on the Mount, and the hymns of the church in the colloquial dialect, were printed and distributed. In 1857 two tracts were added, and in 1858, selections from the Catechism, with proof texts, an Illustrated Geography, by the Rev. Dr. Wentworth, a translation of the "Pilgrim's Progress," "Jesus, the only Saviour," by the Rev. Dr. Boardman, "Essays, Prose and Poetical, on Christianity," by Mr. Ling, a literary graduate of the first degree, St. Mark's Gospel, with colloquial renderings in parallel columns, the Ten Commandments, with proof texts, and an edition of the "Three-Character Classic." The amount of the publications in this year was 20,840 copies, or 1,038,640 pages octavo. The annual quantity of publications has since rarely fallen below those figures, has more often been twice as great, and has risen to as many as 179,024 copies in 1867, and 9,937,000 pages in 1866. The present list of publications includes, besides the works already mentioned, editions of other parts of the Bible adapted to a variety of wants, works of ritual, many special works, as calendars and reports, tracts on "Buddhism," "The Nature and Worship of God," "Doctrine and Miracles," "Forever with God," "Trust in Faith," "Ten Essential Doctrines," "God the Universal Lord," "Daily Food," "Anecestral Worship," "Christian Customs," "The Soul," "Christianity and Confucianism Compared," "Justification," a Centenary Tract by the Rev. N. Sites, "Rejecting the False," "Bible Evidence," "Bible Summary," "Natural Depravity," "Against Idolatry," "Church Creed and Church Covenant," "Filial Piety," "Peep of Day," "Prayer for the Emperor," and other subjects; maps of the world and of the Holy Land; works on Astronomy, the Sun's Eclipses, Arithmetic; a large Geography by Mrs. Baldwin; a "Life of Jesus," by the Rev. S. F. Woodin, of the mission of the American Board; and a "Life of Bishop Kingsley," by Mrs. Sites, with other works.

The Missionary Recorder, a valuable periodical, was issued from this office for several years, and the Fokien Church Gazette, the Good News, and the Berean Lessons, are now published here. Printing is also done for the American Board and English missions at Foochow, and for missions at Amoy, Swatow, Formosa, and Bangkok, Siam. Probably the most important work yet undertaken in Chinese literature by foreigners is the "Anglo-Chinese Dictionary, or Manual of the Foochow Dialect," which was begun by the Methodist Episcopal missionaries in 1867.

Other important works in which the Methodist Episcopal missionaries have taken part are the New Testament in the Foochow colloquial dialect, prepared by a joint committee of the American Board and the Methodist Episcopal mission, the Rev. Messrs. O. Gibson, R. S. Maclay, and S. L. Baldwin representing the latter, and a Hymn-Book in the same dialect, prepared by a committee of several missions, in which Dr. Wentworth, the Rev. S. L. Baldwin, and the Rev. R. S. Maclay represented that of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Other hymn-books have been published in the local dialects for the Methodist Episcopal missions at Kiukiang (prepared by the Rev. V. C. Hart) and at Peking (prepared by the Rev. L. N. Wheeler and Rev. H. H. Lowry).

The Rev. Young J. Allen, of the mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church South at Shanghai, who is employed by the Chinese government as a teacher of history and a translator, had prepared for the government press in 1872 a large work on Chronology, 700 pages octavo, double columns, a "History of India from its First Discovery down to the Conquest by England," in two volumes, and a "History of France," from the "Encyclopedia Britannica." At the close of 1876 the mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church South had published a Hymn- and Tune-Book, editions of the Discipline, and Catechisms 1, 2, 3, and a "Catechism with Scripture References," had a "Child's Pictorial Bible History" in press, and had ready, or nearly ready, the "Books of Daniel and Esther in the Shanghai Colloquial," tracts called "The Blind Woman," "The Prodigal Son," and "Words of Comfort," a book of Scripture Emblems, a work called "Streaks of Light," a Geography and a Mental Arithmetic, and had in course of preparation an edition of Dr. Ralston's "Elements of Divinity." These works were to be issued from the Presbyterian press.

The American Presbyterian mission press was established in 1836 at Macao, and was removed in 1845 to Ningpo, and in 1860 to Shanghai, where it is still in successful operation. It has sent forth a large supply of publications, including Bibles, Christian tracts, and other works adapted to the wants of Chinese objects of missionary labor, of which the issues in 1872 amounted to 18,119,312 pages. The Presbyterian missionaries have participated with delegations from other missions in the preparation of translations of the Bible, and parts of the Bible, particularly into the Shanghai, Wen Li, Canton, Ningpo colloquial, and Mandarin dialects. The American Board has a press in the north of China, from which 1,019,190 pages were printed in 1875. The missionaries of several other societies have made important contributions to the Christian literature of the country.

Choctaws, The, are part of the Appalachian group of Indians who dwelt between the Mississippi and Tombigbee Rivers in parts of Mississippi and Alabama. By the English and French traders they were early called Flatheads, because of a compression exercised upon the infants soon after birth. The government desiring to obtain possession of their lands in 1837, they yielded the whole of their territory in exchange for lands west of Arkansas, and removed in 1838 to the West. Like the Cherokees, they have a national council, an organized judiciary, trial by jury, and a Supreme Court; and have made considerable progress in the common arts of civilization. They have good schools and academies. In their vested funds held by the United States they have means sufficient for the education of all their children. The English language is taught in their schools, and is spoken by many of their families. Various religious denominations have labored among them, and the M. E. Church South has 9 ministers and 743 members. The Chickasaw Indians, originally a different tribe, have become in a great measure incorporated with the Choctaws, comprising now but one people.

Choirs.—In early Methodism there were no choirs in their churches. Mr. Wesley was exceedingly partial to congregational singing, and directed the ministers to select suitable persons to start the tunes, and to exhort the whole congregation to unite in singing. Gradually, however, those who understood and cultivated the science of music preferred sitting together, and thus in many churches choirs were established. There is no uniform practice in Methodist churches, —in some there is congregational singing, in others general choirs, and in a few quartette choirs.

Christian Advocate, The, was the first paper published weekly under the authority of the General Conference. It was commenced in New York, Sept. 9, 1826, and has been issued regularly since that date. It had been preceded by Zion's Herald, published in Boston, and by The Missionary Journal, published in Charleston; these were merged in The Advocate, which took the name of The Christian Advocate and Journal and Zion's Herald. The people of New England feeling that they needed a separate paper to meet their necessities, Zion's Herald was re-established, and that part of the title of The Christian Advocate was dropped. For many years it was called The Christian Advocate and Journal, but for the sake of convenience the latter part of the title was subsequently omitted. From 1828 to 1832, Dr. Bangs was the editor. In 1832, Dr. J. P. Durbin, who had been Professor of Languages in Augusta College, was elected to the editorial chair, with Timothy Merritt, of New England, as his assistant. In 1836, Dr. Durbin having in the interim of General Conference accepted the presidency in Dickinson College, and having left New York, Samuel Luckey and John A. Collins were elected editors. In 1840, Dr. Thomas E. Bond, a local preacher and a practicing physician, and George Coles were elected editors. Dr. Bond was re-elected in 1844. At the General Conference of 1848, Abel Stevens, who was editor of Zion's Herald, was elected but declined the office, and George Peck was elected in his place. In 1852, Dr. Bond was re-elected, and was succeeded in 1856 by Abel Stevens. In 1860, Edward Thomson, then president of the Ohio Wesleyan University, was chosen for that responsible place, and in 1864, Dr. Thomson, having been elected bishop, was succeeded by Daniel Curry. He was re-elected in 1868, and in 1872. In 1876, Charles H. Fowler was placed in the editorial chair. As it was the first official paper of the church, and as it is published at the great commercial centre of the Union, it has ever been regarded as the leading official organ, and it has rendered immense service to the church in its varied interests. From 1828 to 1836, the period of the reform agitation and secession, and also the period of severe and combined attacks from the Calvinistic churches, it was of great value in defending both the doctrines and economy of the church, and its circulation increased so rapidly that at that early time it circulated about 30,000 copies. The great wants, especially of the West, demanded the establishment of other papers, and its circulation for a time was diminished; but for a number of years past it has been increasing, and at present issues 62,000 copies weekly.

Christiania (pop. 64,935) is the capital and the largest city in Norway, and is a place of considerable commercial importance. It is finely located at the head of a beautiful bay or fiord. Methodist services were introduced into Christiania some years after they had been established in Frederikstad, and other parts of Norway. Notwithstanding the Lutheran Church is established as the state religion, and for a time great difficulties were thrown in the way of missionaries, yet the growth of the church within the last few years has been quite satisfactory. It has received a number of episcopal visitations, and under the authority of the last General Conference an Annual Conference was organized, and held its first session in Christiania, Aug. 17, 1876. A neat and commodious church edifice has been erected by the contributions of the people. Ground has been secured and a new chapel is in process of erection. Two ministers are now stationed in the city, who report 508 members, 425 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $18,500. Attached to the church a room has been built, which is occupied as a book depository, and for the publication of a church and Sunday-school paper. (See cut on the following page.)

Christian Index, The, is the title of a church paper issued monthly by the Colored M. E. Church of America. It is published in Louisville, Ky., and has a fair circulation.

Christian Library.—In 1749, Mr. Wesley, though constantly pressed with other duties, commenced the compilation and publication of the "Christian Library." This was ultimately completed in fifty volumes duodecimo. He published it under the following title: "A Christian Library, consisting of Extracts from, and Abridgments of, the Choice Pieces of Practical Divinity which have been published in the English Tongue." This work was of great service to the Wesleyan preachers, and to such of the people as were enabled to procure it, but its expense was too great for the masses, and hence it was not generally known. In 1752, Mr. Wesley remarks concerning it, "It cost me £200; perhaps the next generation may know its worth." It has since been printed in an octavo edition of thirty volumes.

Christian Recorder is the title of a periodical published in Philadelphia as the organ of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. It is now in its fifteenth volume, having been established in 1863. It is issued from their Book Room, and is edited with ability.

Christmas is so called because of special "mass" or religious services referring to the birth of Christ, which are held on that day. The observance of Christmas is not of divine appointment, nor is it alluded to in the New Testament. The day of Christ's birth cannot be fixed from any historical data, but for a number of centuries the churches have adopted this day in commemoration of that glorious event. It was carefully observed by the ancient churches since the fourth century, in obscurity. Some of the best critics suppose it is derived from the Greek κυριακόν, the Lord's house; others suppose it is of the same form as the Latin circus, signifying the assemblage of a large number of people, which usually partakes of a circular form. Ecclesiastically the phrase is used to signify, 1. The membership composing any particular congregation. 2. The edifice in which that congregation worships. 3. A particular denomination, as the Baptist Church or the Methodist Church. 4. The aggregate of Christians in any particular locality, as the church in Rome, the church in Jeru-and the Church of England had religious services suited to the occasion. Mr. Wesley strictly observed these, and directed his ministers to preach on all the great festivals of the church. He prepared a number of hymns suitable to the occasion, and published them for the use of his societies. For many years a Christmas morning prayer-meeting was extensively held, in which Christmas hymns were sung, suitable addresses delivered, and prayers offered. In Puritan communities but little attention is paid to the day, and the Methodist congregations share in the general feeling, but usually there is some religious service held during the day.

Church.—The derivation of this word is involved in obscurity. Some of the best critics suppose it is derived from the Greek κυριακόν, the Lord's house; others suppose it is of the same form as the Latin circus, signifying the assemblage of a large number of people, which usually partakes of a circular form. Ecclesiastically the phrase is used to signify, 1. The membership composing any particular congregation. 2. The edifice in which that congregation worships. 3. A particular denomination, as the Baptist Church or the Methodist Church. 4. The aggregate of Christians in any particular locality, as the church in Rome, the church in Jeru-gregate is composed of all true believers now existent on earth, but as those neither have, nor can have, any organized form, the phrase is usually applied to bodies of Christians united by similar formularies of faith, and by similar usages in worship, and who are jointly interested in rules and regulations made for the general good. The Methodist Churches have adopted the definition made by the Church of England, to wit: "The visible church is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that are of necessity requisite to the same." The Romanists require as the test of a true church that it should be under "the government of lawful pastors, and especially of the one vicar of Christ upon earth, the Roman Pontiff." Among them the government of the church belongs to the priesthood, who receive it from the Pope, who is the visible head of the church. Among Protestants, the theory is that the government of the church pertains to the whole body of the church, as all Christians compose a spiritual priesthood. This is the Methodist theory, and hence laymen are admitted to participation in the church government. Though the relative powers of the ministry and laity, in their relative participation, vary among the different branches of Protestants, and also among different branches of the Methodist family, yet in all of them, at present, the right of the laity to a voice in church government is freely admitted.

Church Conference is an ecclesiastical association in the M. E. Church South, and consists of all the members of the church and resident members of the Annual Conference belonging to any station or circuit. It convenes once a month in stations and once in three months on circuits, and the preacher in charge presides. The secretary is expected to report to the Quarterly Conference all the statistics to be reported to the Annual Conference. Its order of business is to hear reports from the preacher, the class-leaders, from the Sunday-schools, and the stewards of the church. It also looks after the poor, the collections ordered by the Annual Conference, and other matters of church enterprise; the literature of the church, prayer-meetings, and all matters of a local church interest.

Churches and Church Property.—Down to 1856 the M. E. Church had given no direction about reporting the number of churches and parsonages. The General Conference of that year ordered a report to be made by the preachers annually. In 1857 they reported 8335 churches, valued at $15,781,310; 2174 parsonages, valued at $2,126,874; total church property, $17,908,184. The last report (1876) gives 15,474 churches, valued at $70,886,671, and 5180 parsonages, valued at $9,119,510, making a total of church property, $80,006,181. Neither the British Methodists nor the M. E. Church South report any church property in their general minutes. The Methodist Church property of all denominations in the United States according to the census of 1870 was $69,854,121. The latest statistics show the following table of Methodist Church property, in part, in the United States, including parsonages:

M. E. Church.....	$80,006,181
African M. E. Church.....	3,000,000
The Methodist Church.....	2,662,736
Methodist Protestant Church.....	3,000,000
African M. E. Zion Church.....	421,000
American Wesleyan Church.....	335,075
Free Methodist Church.....

It is probable that the property of the M. E. Church South amounts to from $25,000,000 to $35,000,000.

Church Extension, Board of.—For many years the M. E. Church had felt the need of some systematic method by which feeble congregations could be assisted in the erection of churches. The English Wesleyans had established a chapel building fund which was of great service to them, and similar associations were organized in other churches. This want in the church led the General Conference, in 1864, to authorize the establishment of the Church Extension Society. It was incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania, March 13, 1865, with its central office in Philadelphia. Dr. Samuel Y. Monroe was its first secretary. He commenced his work with zeal and activity, but had scarcely organized the society when his labors were terminated by sudden death. Dr. A. J. Kynett, who had been a member of the General Conference, and had been active in securing the authorization of the society in the General Conference, was appointed to fill the vacancy, and has been elected and re-elected at each General Conference until the present time. In 1872 the organization of the Church Extension Society was changed to that of the Board of Church Extension, the members of which are appointed quadrennially by the General Conference. This action was followed by all the benevolent organizations of the church, which have now taken the form of church boards under the control of the General Conference. The annual church collections in behalf of the board have varied from $30,000 to $80,000. Special donations and bequests have added somewhat to this sum. These funds are apportioned by the general committee, appointed by the General Conference, to the several Annual Conferences, and under the action of the Conference committees are distributed to the most needy churches. The appropriations must, however, in all cases be approved by the general board before payment is made. Small as this sum is, when spread over the vast extent of territory aided by the society, great good has resulted from the donations. Churches have been stimulated to build which otherwise would have been discouraged, and efforts to liquidate church debts have been successful by the stimulus given even by small donations.

In addition to the fund arising from annual collections, a loan fund has been established, to which large contributions have been made, amounting in cash and property to $144,610.13, and in annuity funds to $120,600, making a total of the capital of the Loan Fund of $265,210.13. (See LOAN FUND.) The capital of this fund is to be preserved intact. It is loaned by the board on approved security, at such rates of interest as are agreed upon, to embarrassed churches, which agree to repay at such times and in such installments as are specified. By this Loan Fund a large number of churches severely pressed have been saved to the church and ultimately extricated from embarrassment. During the eleven years the board has been in operation it has received by collections $787,786.51, and it has loaned funds amounting to $265,210.13. It has "assisted 1897 churches in various parts of the United States and Territories. Most of these were built by the aid thus afforded, and many others, previously built but hopelessly involved, were rescued by this timely aid. During the last year 290 churches in 38 different States and Territories received assistance. Two hundred and nineteen of these received donations alone, 34 loans, 37 both donations and loans. The average amount of donations per church during the year was $213.75, of loans $381.13." A large portion of the help thus granted was to feeble societies in the West, and to small churches among the colored people in the South. Several benevolent individuals have contributed from $1000 to $10,000 each to the Loan Fund, desiring to leave a portion of their property which shall annually forever contribute to the erection of churches. Some gentlemen advanced in years have made donations of similar sums, or even larger, on the condition that during their life a specified interest should be paid to them annually, the capital to be the property of the board. A considerable proportion of the Loan Fund has been secured through the labors of Dr. C. C. McCabe, who has been assistant secretary, and who travels throughout the bounds of the church. The accompanying map shows the location of the churches aided during 1876.

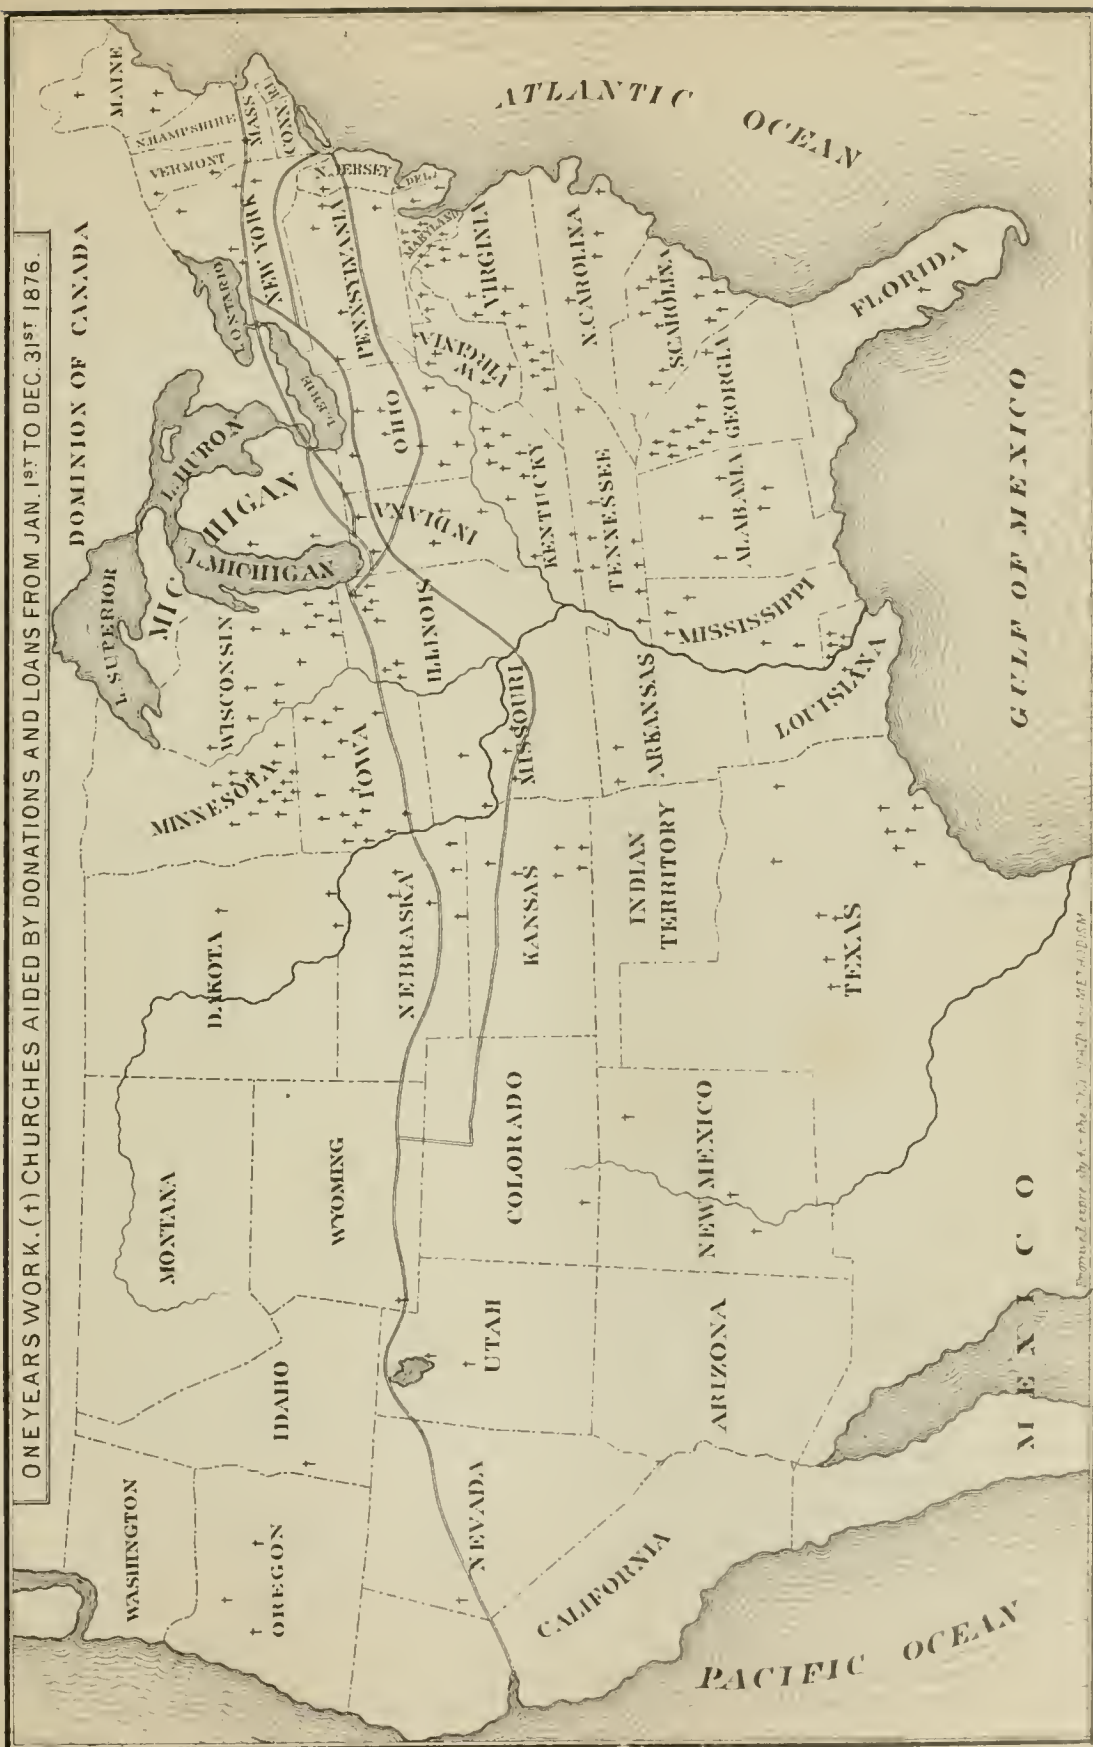

The board consists of thirty-two ministers and thirty-two laymen, chosen by the General Conference, the bishops being ex-officio members. The general committee consists of twelve persons selected by the General Conference, one representing each episcopal district. These confer with a committee of the board, and make the annual appointments.

Church Government.—The Methodist Episcopal Church holds, as do most other Methodist bodies, that there is no prescribed form of church government given in the word of God. General principles and facts are therein given for the guidance of the church in all ages. John Wesley, who once entertained the doctrine that jure divino episcopacy was the only authorized form of government given by inspiration, very early in his public life abandoned that theory. After having read Stillingfleet, he believed the author had unanswerably proved that neither Christ nor his apostles prescribed any particular form of church government. As to the reason for this he answered, "Without doubt, because the wisdom of God had regard to this necessary variety. Was there any thought of uniformity in the government of the churches until the time of Constantine? It is certain there was not, and would not have been then had men consulted the word of God only." He did, however, believe that the episcopal form of government is most in harmony with the teaching of the New Testament and the practice of the early Christian church. In accordance with this view he recommended to the Methodists in America to adopt the episcopal form of government. In this respect he acted in perfect harmony with the general views entertained by the Reformers. Watson, in referring to this subject, says that all "agree in admitting there was no model prescribed in the New Testament for a Christian church as there had been in the Mosaic economy for the Jewish Church, and that it was a branch of the liberty of the disciples of Christ or one of their privileges to choose the polity which seemed to them best adapted for extending the power and influence of religion." In perfect harmony with this view, also, is the twenty-second article of religion in the Methodist Episcopal Church. (See ARTICLES OF RELIGION.) While these views are liberal, they are at the same time evangelical. It must not be inferred that the M. E. Church looks upon church government as being of little importance. It regards it as of great value, as being necessary to the harmony and unity of the church. It is true, however, that it has always regarded deep spirituality as of more value, and has insisted from the beginning with more earnestness for true piety than for special ceremonies or forms of church government. While holding firmly to its own church order, it is ready to fellowship and unite in holy enterprises with evangelical Christians of every name and of every form of church government.

Church Manual.—The General Conference of the M. E. Church of 1876 directed that the Boards of Management of the Educational, Missionary, Church Extension, Freedman's Aid, and Book Concern, together with the Sunday-School and Tract Societies, should unite in publishing a church manual to be sent free to all the ministers of the church. It was to be a monthly publication, and was designed to give in a condensed form the latest facts and news relating to all the above interests. Each one of the above societies or boards was to bear a proper proportion of the actual cost of the publication.

Church Records.—It is made the duty of the preacher in charge in the M. E. Churches to keep correct records of all persons received on probation, or who may remove, by letter, or have withdrawn from the church, or who have died. He must also record marriages and baptisms, and keep a record of all matters relating to the membership of his charge. Hence one of the questions asked in the Quarterly Conference is, "Are the church records properly kept?" It is made the duty of the pastor to examine the records of the classes, and the steward's accounts, and to see that these are kept according to the usages and directions of the church. There are other records, besides those kept by the minister, which are considered of great importance by the church, such as the deeds, mortgages, insurance papers, and other legal documents. In order to see that all of these are properly kept, it is made the duty of the last Quarterly Conference of each year to appoint a committee on church records.

Church Trials.—It is a part of the fundamental law of the M. E. Church that the General Conference shall not take away the privilege of the ministers or members of a trial by a committee and an appeal. In the interim of the General Conference, if any bishop is accused of immorality he may be brought before a committee of elders, which committee, if in this preliminary examination they find him guilty, may suspend him, subject to a trial before the Judicial Conference. The bishop, however, has the right of appeal to the ensuing General Conference.

The trial of a minister is very similar. When complaint of immorality is made against him a preliminary examination is held, and if he is believed to be guilty he may be suspended from his official functions, and cited to trial before the Annual Conference. He has the right of appeal to a Judicial Conference. In the trial of a local preacher, he is brought before a committee of his peers, and if found guilty he is to be expelled, retaining, however, the right of appeal to the ensuing Quarterly or District Conference, which court is final in his case.

Respecting the trial of church members, the first form of action is that of complaint, which must be made to the preacher in charge or pastor having supervision. If the complaint appears to be well founded the pastor must summon a committee, which may be selected from any church within the district, or the defendant may be brought before the society to which he belongs. The early Methodists gave to the preachers the right to receive and to exclude members until the year 1789. From that day to 1800 the pastor and the society before whom the accused was to be brought were considered co-ordinate in the responsibility of the verdict. After 1800, however, this plan was changed, and the sole responsibility of the verdict was left with the committee or with the society. The Discipline of the church now directs that an accused member shall be brought to trial before a committee of not less than five, who shall not be members of the Quarterly Conference, and if the preacher shall judge it necessary, in order to obtain an unprejudiced verdict, he may select the committee from any part of the district. The preacher in charge is to cause an exact record to be made of all the proceedings in the case. The parties concerned have the right of challenge for cause, and if the accused is found guilty, by the decision of a majority of the committee, and the crime be such as is expressly forbidden in the word of God, the preacher in charge is to expel him. And if the accused person evades a trial by absenting himself, after sufficient notice has been given, he may be tried in his absence, and, if found guilty, expelled. In all cases of the trial of members or ministers, witnesses who are not members of the church may be called, and the testimony of an absent witness may be taken before the preacher in charge or the preacher appointed by the presiding elder of the district within which such witness resides, provided sufficient notice has been given to the opposite party of the time and place of taking such testimony. Any accused person has the right to call to his assistance, as counsel, any member in good and regular standing in the M. E. Church. In any of the above-mentioned cases of the trial of members, if the preacher in charge shall differ in judgment from the majority of the committee concerning the guilt or innocence of the accused, he may refer the trial to the ensuing Quarterly Conference, which may order a new trial. The preacher in charge shall proceed to try the case, unless the charges are withdrawn. After such forms of trial and expulsion, such persons have no privileges of the society or of the sacraments in the church, unless they have given evidence of contrition, confession, and satisfactory reformation.

Cincinnati, O. (pop. 216,239), was settled in 1788, and in 1800 had a population of 400. This city now ranks first in population in Ohio, and eighth in the United States. It is called the Queen City. It was laid out after the model of Philadelphia. The Presbyterians were among the first settlers of this city, and in laying out the town one-half of one of the most valuable squares was appropriated to their denominational use.

The Baptists were perhaps next in order of time.

In 1798, Rev. John Kobler was sent by Bishop Asbury to form a circuit if possible in the Northwest Territory. He visited Cincinnati, and said that the site on which the city now stands was nearly a dense and uncultivated forest. No improvement was to be seen but Fort Washington, around which were built a few cabins of the first settlers. Kobler found but little opportunity for preaching, as the troops cared little about the gospel, and the inhabitants who were religious were unfriendly to Methodism. Probably Rev. Henry Smith and others, the successors of Kobler, visited the place. In 1804, John Collins, a farmer and local preacher, delivered the first Methodist sermon in Cincinnati of which record is made. He preached in an upper room in the house of a Methodist merchant, Carter by name, and his congregation numbered twelve. The next sermon was by Rev. John Sale, the regular preacher on the Miami circuit, in a friend's house, on Main Street, between First and Second. His audience numbered between thirty and forty, and after sermon a society of eight persons was organized. This became the nucleus of Methodism in Cincinnati. Religious services were subsequently held in an old log school-house, below the hill, not far from the fort. The first love-feast was held in the court-house, in 1805, during a quarterly meeting, when Rev. William Burke was presiding elder of the Ohio district. It was then included in the Miami circuit. The first report of the Miami circuit was made to the Conference of 1799, of 99 members.

In 1805 the first church lot was purchased, situated on Fifth Street, between Sycamore and Broadway. The "Old Stone Church," as it was subsequently called, 20 by 40 feet, was built on this lot, and dedicated in 1806. In September, 1808, Bishop Asbury, accompanied by Rev. Henry Boehm, paid his first visit to this town, and it then contained less than 2000 inhabitants. The stone chapel was crowded to overflowing to hear him. On Sabbath morning he preached a sermon of great power from these words, "The love of Christ constraineth us." Immediately afterwards, as was their custom where there was a German population, Boehm preached in the German language from this text, "He came to his own and his own received him not," and this is believed to have been the first German discourse delivered in Cincinnati.

The stone church was twice enlarged, and at last rebuilt, and, under the name of Wesley chapel, occupies the same site. The General Conference of 1820 authorized the establishment of the "Western Book Concern" in this city, and Rev. Martin Ruter was appointed book agent. In 1834 the Western Christian Advocate was authorized by the General Conference, and Rev. T. A. Morris was appointed or elected editor. The Ladies' Repository and Gatherings of the West was instituted in 1840, with Rev. L. L. Hamline as editor. By the wise suggestions of Rev. Charles Elliott, the Wesleyan Female College was established in 1842. To facilitate the mission, to which he felt himself specially called, Rev. William Nast began in 1837 to publish a German paper entitled the Christian Apologist, which was the forerunner of the numerous German publications issued from the Book Concern.

Cincinnati Methodism suffered considerably from what was known as the "Radical Controversy." In 1828 a number of active members united in forming Union societies, and their course being considered injurious to the church, some of them were summoned to trial and were expelled. This led to a large secession and to the building of an edifice on Sixth Street by the Methodist Protestants, and subsequently to another on George Street. Rev. William Burke, becoming dissatisfied, established an independent congregation on Vine Street, to which he preached for a number of years, but which subsequently failed. The African Methodist Episcopal Church early established a congregation in this city, but the colored people were divided, one colored congregation adhering to the parent church, and which now has a beautiful place of worship. The German work, commenced by Dr. Nast in 1836, was for a few years quite successful, and several large German congregations were formed. The removal of members, the influx of a strong Romanistic element, and the greater activity of the Lutheran churches left little room for a corresponding increase in later years; but these churches are doing an excellent work. The German population is about 115,000, or 34 per cent. The following table presents a view of the statistics as reported in 1876:

Cincinnati Conference, M. E. Church, was set off from the Ohio Conference in 1852. The Kentucky territory, having been previously included in the Ohio Conference, was set off at the same time, and the preachers in the Cincinnati and Kentucky Conference, for the convenience of the work, met together in 1852. The Cincinnati Conference is thus bounded: "Commencing at the southwest corner of Darke County, in the State of Ohio; thence easterly to the northwest corner of the Ohio Conference, so as to leave Burlington and Delaware districts in the Central Ohio Conference; on the east by the Ohio Conference; on the south by the Ohio River; and on the west by the State of Indiana, except so much in the variation of that line as to attach Elizabeth, Hamilton Co., O., to the Southeastern Indiana Conference." moting female education. A board of trustees was organized, and arrangements made by them for procuring a teacher. Under Mr. Wilber the attendance so rapidly increased that enlarged accommodations were found desirable, and a property was purchased on Vine Street, and a seminary building erected. The institution continuing to flourish, and property in the centre of the city becoming greatly enhanced in value, the original site was disposed of, and the present college edifice was erected on ground fronting on Wesley Avenue, 287 feet, with a depth of 115 feet. was included in the Cincinnati Conference until 1872.

The first session of the Cincinnati Conference, as held separately from Kentucky, was in 1853, when it reported 32,325 members, 190 traveling and 238 local preachers. In 1876 the minutes show 190 traveling and 200 local preachers, 362 Sunday-schools, and 37,719 scholars, 36,056 members, 363 churches, valued at $1,693,720, and 81 parsonages, valued at $192,000.

Cincinnati Wesleyan College dates its origin from September, 1842, when nineteen students were enrolled in a granite building on the north side of Ninth Street, between Main and Walnut, under the presidency of Rev. Perlee B. Wilber. The incipience of the enterprise was in a large degree owing to the zeal and energy of Dr. Elliott, who was at that time editor of the Western Christian Advocate, and was exceedingly earnest in pro-ing was completed in September, 1868, and is 172 feet long by 60 feet wide. In the rear of the centre is a wing 40 by 30 feet, making the entire depth 90 feet. Exclusive of the basement there are four stories and a Mansard-roof. The tower extends 50 feet above the main roof, being 114 feet above the foundation, or 135 feet above the street. The structure is of brick, with heavy stone finish, in a combination of the Gothic and Corinthian styles, and presents an imposing appearance. It ranks among the finest edifices of Cincinnati, and has few, if any, superiors for the purposes to which it is consecrated. The halls are spacious, the stories high, and the facilities for lighting, heating, and ventilating almost perfect. Each floor has a bathroom, with hot and cold water. The dormitories are finished and furnished with especial reference to the health and comfort of boarders. The dining-hall is large and attractive. The reading-room, 16

by 25 feet, is furnished with standard American and European periodicals, and a growing library of over 1000 volumes. The recitation-rooms are provided with all necessary appliances, and a thoroughly equipped laboratory has been furnished during the past year for the department of natural science. The music-rooms are in the Mansard, and a large number of pianos, organs, etc., are accessible to the pupils. The value of the college property is estimated at $225,000. The college is conducted, as its name indicates, upon the basis of entire loyalty to Christ. The discipline is parental and mild but firm, and it is the constant endeavor to establish and maintain between pupils and teachers the most pleasant relations. The enrollment of students for the past year was 216, every section of the Union being represented. After the death of Dr. Wilber, who fell a martyr to anxiety and overwork, the institution has been under the presidency of Dr. Robert Allyn and other able instructors. In 1875, Rev. Dr. H. D. Moore succeeded to the presidency, and has the general oversight of all the departments. He is assisted in the literary department by Catharine J. Chamberlayne, A.M., Lady Principal, and Professor of Belles-Lettres; Charles W. Super, A.M., Ph.D., Ancient Languages; Francis A. Fish, A.M., Mathematics and Astronomy; Martha Borkee Flint, A.M., Natural Science; assisted by teachers in French and German, and lecturers on various branches of natural science and history. The College of Music is under Karl Barnes as dean, assisted by a number of skillful musicians. The College of Design is under Mary W. Richardson, with assistants; and the preparatory school is under Miss Clara A. Burr, principal, with skillful and careful assistants. Circleville, O. (pop. 5407), the capital of Pickaway County, on the Scioto River, and the Cincinnati and Muskingum Valley Railway. The village was founded in 1810, on the site of two forts, of unknown age, of nearly equal size, and near each other; the one an exact circle, and the other a square; the sides of the latter 55 rods in length. The circular fort was surrounded by two earthen walls, 20 feet high, inclosing a ditch, and the square one by a single wall, 10 feet high. The village covers the whole of the site of the circular fort, from which it gets its name, and the western half of the square. In 1846 these curious forts had been nearly obliterated by the improvements of the village. Methodist services were held in Circleville occasionally during the years from 1812 to 1816, in which latter year a society was organized. The first M. E. church of the place was built in 1830, burned in 1851, and rebuilt in 1852. Previously to 1834 the circuit was called Pickaway, but in that year it took the name of Circleville. An African M. E. society was established here in 1832, but was without a house of worship until 1851. A Methodist Protestant church was built in Circleville at a recent date, and was occupied for a time by a small society, but the church is now in other hands, and the society disbanded. It is in the Ohio Conference, and reports: M. E. Church: members, 345; Sunday-school scholars, 445; church property, $21,500. African M. E. Church: members, 145; Sunday-school scholars, 81; church property, $1000.

Circuits (American) are so named in Methodism because the preacher visits in regular succession a number of appointments in different localities. The term is used in distinction from stations, which have a single appointment and support their own pastor. In old times these circuits were very large, frequently embracing from ten to forty appointments. The official members of these appointments met together once in three months at quarterly meetings, where a Conference was held to care for and supervise the general interests of the work within their bounds. In the United States at one time, as in England, the circuit system was almost universal, and even the largest cities had country territory annexed to them, and as the charges in the cities multiplied they were united together in the same manner as country appointments. As population, however, increased, and the single congregations were strengthened, circuits were divided and subdivided, until the number of appointments now seldom exceeds more than from two to ten, though in a few of the Western States larger circuits still remain. Sometimes these circuits were under the care of but one minister; generally, however, two ministers, and sometimes three, were appointed to each circuit, one being a man of age and experience, the other young and inexperienced. In this way the feebleness of the aged, as well as by the activity, zeal, and energy of youth. This circuit system also served as a means of theological training, for the young ministers were under the watchful eye and counsel of the older, and were directed in their studies and in all their plans. For years past the tendency has been to form separate stations as soon as single congregations gain sufficient strength.

Circuits (English Wesleyan).—The first appearance in the minutes of Conference of circuits, as such, was in 1746, when they were seven in number. In these circuits, No. 5 was Yorkshire, which included the counties of Lancashire, Cheshire, Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, Rutlandshire, and Lincolnshire. These were composed of a number of towns, villages, and hamlets, wherein were societies. In 1770 the circuits had increased to 50, one of which was America!

A great change has taken place since then. Now, generally speaking, each comprises a limit of from eight to ten miles distance from the circuit town. The number of circuits is now 673.

The office of superintendent, and the appointment of ministers, will be found on a subsequent page.

The circuit plan, containing a list of the appointments of the traveling and local preachers, must be made by the superintendent or one of his colleagues.

Tabernacle." Prior to this date the Methodists in London had worshiped in the building called the Old Foundry (see FOUNDRY CHAPEL), which, as the ground was held only on lease, they were in danger of losing. Mr. Wesley collected subscriptions in various parts of England for this building, which, though plain, is large and commodious, and is "the most sacred and attractive edifice in the Methodist world." In the rear of this church Mr. Wesley was buried, and several of the leading ministers lie in close proximity. The president of the British Conference is usually in charge of City Road chapel,

CITY ROAD CHAPEL.

The election of stewards takes place at the Christmas quarterly meeting. They are appointed for two years, but are sometimes re-elected for two or even more years in succession after the termination of the period of office, and during the transaction of the financial business they are members of both the May and September district meetings.

(For the business of the circuit quarterly meetings, see QUARTERLY MEETINGS. For the office and work of circuit stewards, see STEWARDS.)

Cissell, George.—Prominent among the lay delegates of the Southern work, he represented the Lexington Conference faithfully at the General Conference of 1876.

City Road Chapel, an engraving of which is here given, was commenced by Mr. Wesley, in April, 1777, and was opened Nov. 1, 1778. He writes, "It is perfectly neat but not fine, and contains far more people than the Foundry; I believe, together with the morning chapel, as many as the Claffin, William, LL.D., a large manufacturer and merchant of Boston, Mass., was born at Milford, Mass., March 6, 1818. He has been actively engaged in the city, and identified with all its public interests. He has been a member of the State legislature and Representative in Congress, and was governor of the State from 1869 to 1871. He has been an active and prominent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has presided in many of its public assemblies, was a member of the General Conference in 1872, and is one of the principal founders of the Boston University.

Claffin, Lee, was a distinguished philanthropist of Boston, Mass., and was born in 1791. By industry and frugality, as well as by unusual business tact, he acquired wealth in the manufacture of shoes. He was a member of the M. E. Church, and ardently devoted to all its interests. He was one of the most liberal patrons of the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham, Mass., the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn., and of what is now the Boston Theological Seminary. He also contributed largely for purchasing a seminary at Orangeville, S. C., which is now the Claflin University. He died February 23, 1871, leaving behind him a monument in literary institutions more durable than any which could have been erected over his grave.

Claflin University, South Carolina.—The

Charleston for the education of candidates for the ministry, was removed to Orangeburg, and became a part of Claflin University.

With such an origin it began to make its own history. Its work has been a noble one for the hitherto neglected youth of color in South Carolina, giving to the M. E. Church some of her best preachers in that Conference, a large number of teachers annually to the public schools, and multitudes of youth more or less educated, who have gone out to impart their inspiration to others.

CLAFLIN UNIVERSITY.

Orangeburg Female College existed for many years prior to the late Civil War under the direction of a clergyman of the Presbyterian Church. At the close of the war the property was purchased, through the energetic efforts of Revs. T. W. Lewis and A. Webster.

A charter was obtained from the legislature conferring full university powers, taking its name from a distinguished citizen of Massachusetts, Hon. Lee Claflin, who was the chief contributor in its purchase. Rev. A. Webster, D.D., was elected president, and the school was opened for youth of both sexes during the fall of 1869.

Baker Theological Institute, first established at Its support has come principally from the Freedman's Aid Society of the M. E. Church, and from the fostering hand of ex-Governor Claflin, of Massachusetts, and other members of that benevolent family whose name it bears.

By act of General Assembly, in 1872, the Congressional grant of land for establishing an agricultural college was accepted by the State, the institution was created and made a co-ordinate branch of Claflin University. In 1874, Dr. Webster resigned the presidency, and Rev. E. Cooke, D.D., was elected as his successor; and subsequently was placed in charge of the agricultural department also by the trustees having charge of that interest. In January, 1876, the main buildings, making a frontage in all of 260 feet, were destroyed by fire; but temporary arrangements were soon made for continuing the work of instruction with but a slight interruption.

During the past year a convenient brick edifice of imposing appearance has been erected, which, with other school buildings and cottages of various sizes, will afford ample accommodations for a large number of students.

The experimental farm of the Agricultural College contains 116 acres of land largely under cultivation; this, with others belonging to the University, aggregates about 150 acres conveniently located adjoining the college buildings.

It is intended to connect agricultural labor and mechanical industry with the college, as a means by which students can help to defray their expenses.

The income of the agricultural fund, amounting annually to $11,508, has hitherto been paid only in part, leaving, after meeting the payments on the purchase of the experimental farm, very little to be applied to purposes of instruction. The interest manifested by the present State government gives promise of the payment of this annual interest for the cause to which it has been assigned, and also such other appropriations as may be necessary to give the institution the highest degree of efficiency.

Under these encouraging aspects Claflin University proposes to meet the increased demands upon it, arising from the suspension of the State University, at Columbia, in which were many colored students, by enlarging its board of instruction and organizing at once a full curriculum of college studies.

Clark, Alexander, D.D., was born in Jefferson Co., O., March 10, 1834. His father is of Scotch-Irish extraction. His mother was born in the Highlands of Scotland. He received an ordinary English education in the common schools of his native State, engaging much of the time in manual labor. His father, a classical scholar, was his best teacher, and home his highest school. At seventeen years of age he became a teacher, and continued in the service for about six years. During this time he conceived the idea of a schoolday paper, and started the School Visitor, afterwards the Schoolday Magazine, for a time setting his own type and working the editions upon a hand-press. This periodical continued for nearly twenty years, and was finally merged in the St. Nicholas, of New York.

In 1861, Mr. Clark was ordained in the Methodist Protestant Church, and took pastoral charge at New Brighton, Pa. In 1863 he became associate pastor with the Rev. Thomas H. Stockton, D.D., of the church of the New Testament, Philadelphia. In 1864 he was called to the pastorate of Union chapel, Independent Methodist Church, Cincinnati, and in 1866 was appointed pastor of the First Methodist Protestant Church, Pittsburgh, which position he held for four years. In 1870 he was elected editor of the official periodicals of the Methodist Church, The Methodist Recorder and Our

REV. ALEXANDER CLARK, D.D.

Morning Guide, which position he still holds (1877). Mr. Clark received the honorary degree of A.M. from Mount Union College, Ohio, in 1864, and the same degree the following year from Otterbein University, Ohio. In 1875 he received the degree of D.D. from the Ohio Wesleyan University.

During Mr. Clark's editorship he made two visits to California, remaining the second time three months, by invitation, supplying the pulpit of the First Presbyterian church, San Francisco. In 1874 he attended the General Conference of the M. E. Church at Louisville, Ky., and was received as fraternal messenger. In 1876 he attended the General Conference of the M. E. Church at Baltimore. In the same capacity and same year he visited, also, in the relation of official deputation, the various British Conferences in England, being cordially received by all. He extended his foreign trip to Holland, Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, France, and has in press (1877) an account of his journey, entitled "Summer Rambles in Europe." He is the author of various works, the best known of which are "The Old Log School-House," "Schoolday Dialogues," "Workday Christianity," "The Gospel in the Trees," and "Starting Out." The Hymn-Book of the denomination, "Voice of Praise," was principally compiled by Mr. Clark, who is author, also, of a small volume of poems called "Ripples on the River."

Mr. Clark has been a member of four General Conferences and several Conventions of the church, including the Union Convention in Baltimore, May, 1877.

ONE OF THE BISHOPS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

born in Uniontown, Ala., 1847, and died in Lauderdale, Miss., May 17, 1875. He united with the church in 1870, became a local preacher, and entered the Mississippi Conference in 1873, and was appointed to Meridian and Lauderdale circuits. He was very successful as a minister, adding large numbers to the churches wherever he was appointed. On Lauderdale circuit 150 united with the church. He was instrumental in erecting two churches.

At the age of nineteen he left home to struggle for this purpose. Having secured by his own exertions sufficient means, he attended the Wesleyan University, and graduated in 1843. He was admitted into the New York Conference, and after filling five charges was appointed as editor of The Ladies' Repository. He was elected to the same position by the General Conference of 1856, and re-elected in 1860. His editorial work having given great satisfaction to the church, in 1864 he was elected to the office of bishop. He entered upon this work with great zeal, and traveled extensively, especially through the South, organizing a number of Southern Conferences. His health remained firm until near the close of his Conferences in 1870. The duties of the office and the death of Bishops Thomson and Kingsley had a depressing influence upon him, and his friends advised rest. He continued to suffer during the ensuing winter, but anxious to perform his work he began his visitation to the Conferences in the spring of 1871, and attended Lexington, Ky., and West Virginia Conferences, performing his duties with his usual accuracy. As his strength failed he was assisted by one of his colleagues in the Pittsburgh and New England Conferences. He was advised to return home, but had an earnest wish to meet his brethren of the New York Conference once more, and he opened its session in Peekskill, April 6, 1871, with the Lord's Supper. Having presided a few minutes, he invited Bishop Simpson to the chair and retired to his room, where he was confined with intense suffering during the entire session. It seemed doubtful for a while whether he would survive, but his strength rallied, and he was removed to his home in Cincinnati, where he lingered until the 23d of May. His religious experience was clear and triumphant. His expressions to his family were both consoling and encouraging. He rejoiced in Christian song. When Dr. Muhlenberg's beautiful hymn, "I would not live away," was sung to him, he exclaimed, "Yea, Lord Jesus, come! come quickly!" And as these words were sung, "Since Jesus hath lain there I dread not its gloom," he repeated them with strong emphasis.

As a minister, Bishop Clark was able and successful. His sermons were carefully prepared and were full of instruction, and he has left both to his family and the church a valuable legacy in the volumes which he published. As a writer, he was clear, exact, and forcible. His skill and strength were shown not only in his sermons and in his editorials, but in his published works, such as his "Mental Discipline," "Elements of Algebra," "Life and Times of Bishop Hedding," and "Man all Immortal." He was a man of decided convictions, was earnest in opposition to slavery when it required great nerve to meet the tide of public opinion. He took a deep interest in education generally. At the time of his death he was president of the board of trustees of the Wesleyan Female College, in Cincinnati. He was also president of the board of trustees of the Ohio Wesleyan University. He was also president of the Freedman's Aid Society, and labored to promote the interests of education, especially in the South.

Clark, George L., a lay delegate from the Troy Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Chazy, N. Y., about 1826, studied law at the State and National school, at Ballston Spa, N. Y., was admitted to the bar in 1852, and settled in Plattsburg, N. Y. He was appointed by President Grant United States Assessor of Internal Revenue for the 16th district of New York, and held that position until it was abolished.

Clark, Homer J., D.D., was born at Mount Holly, Vt., December 23, 1803, and died at Homersville, Medina Co., O., Sept. 24, 1875. His conversion took place in early life. He was received on trial in the Ohio Conference in 1824. He entered the State University at Athens, O., where he spent five years, and graduated with honor. In 1829 he was sent as pastor to Pittsburgh. The Methodist Protestants, or Reformers as they were called, having taken possession of the Smithfield Street church, permission was granted to use the court-house as a place of worship. Dr. Clark was talented and very popular, and he drew large crowds. In 1830 he was appointed to Uniontown, and the succeeding year he was elected professor of Madison College, Uniontown, Pa., then under the patronage of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1832 he was stationed in Steubenville, O., and in 1833 in Meadville, Pa. From that period until 1844 he sustained the position first of vice-president and then of president, and Professor of Moral Science in Alleghany College, Pa. He inaugurated the plan of perpetual scholarships, and spent two years as the principal agent. He then returned to the college as president, and after two years resigned his position. In 1850 he was stationed in South Common, Alleghany City, and in 1851 in Smithfield Street, Pittsburgh. At the General Conference of 1852 he was elected editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, which position he filled with ability. After this he served as presiding elder of the Pittsburgh and Steubenville districts. He then took a superannuated relation and located in Ohio. One of his sons, Rev. Stephen R. Clark, is now a member of the North Ohio Conference. Mr. Clark's disposition was amiable and gentle. He was loved and esteemed by all who knew him. A few months before his death, having a desire to work for the Master, he engaged to supply a pulpit near his home. His last work was an unfinished sermon.

Clark, Laban, an eminent minister in the M. E. Church, was born July 19, 1778, at Haverhill, N. H., and died at Middletown, Conn., Nov. 28, 1868, in the ninety-first year of his age. His parents were Congregationalists, and his doctrinal instructions were Calvinistic. In 1799 he was converted, and united with the church. In 1800 he was licensed as an exhorter, and immediately employed by the presiding elder. In 1801 he was received on trial in the New York Conference at John Street church, to which he traveled 340 miles on horseback. In 1803 he was sent as a missionary to Lower Canada. After this he filled important appointments in New York, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. He also served a number of terms as presiding elder. In 1832 he was appointed agent for the Wesleyan University. In 1851, having completed a half-century in the ministry, he accepted a superannuated relation. He was one of the principal founders of the Wesleyan University, and also took an active part in the formation of Conference academies. He was one of the founders of the Missionary Society while he was pastor in New York, in 1819. For years he was recognized as a leader in his Conference, and in the General Conference he always took a prominent part. In discourse he was argumentative, but always practical. He was devotedly attached to the doctrines and government of the church of his choice.

Clark, Lewis, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in East Hampton, Hampshire Co., Mass., July 26, 1813, and died in Glenville, O., March 4, 1876, in the sixty-third year of his age. He was converted in 1830, and having spent several years at the Wilbraham Seminary, he was employed by the presiding elder. In 1838 he moved to Ohio, where, in 1840, he was received on trial in the Erie Conference, and labored faithfully in all his appointments. At different times he was superannuated because of imperfect health. He was well read in Christian theology and Biblical literature, and could ably expound and define the doctrines of the Bible.

Clark, Samuel, was born in Virginia about the year 1800, and died in Van Buren Co., Iowa, Sept. 9, 1857. He entered the Baltimore Conference in 1821, and his first appointment was to East Wheeling, Va. Subsequently he removed to Ohio, and, after having traveled several years, removed to Iowa. When having been located for several years, he was in 1844 re-admitted. He possessed powers of mind which gave him high rank as a gospel minister. He was jealous for the purity of the church, and an able defender of her doctrines.

Clark University, Atlanta, Ga., was projected in 1869, and a grammar-school was then opened which has been in successful operation ever since, and is now embraced in the public school system of the city. Rev. L. D. Barrows, D.D., spent the winter of 1871-72 in Atlanta, and was instrumental in purchasing property for school purposes and opening the nascent university. For the two years following the institution was under the care of Rev. James W. Lee, A.M., and the succeeding two years of Rev. Isaac J. Lansing, A.M. For the past year Prof. J. Martin, A.M., has been in charge, with Miss Mary Owen, matron, and teacher of the girls' department, and Prof. W. H. Crogman, A.B., and Miss Upshaw, teachers in the preparatory department. During the past year there have been enrolled for the first term 117, second term 143, students. In addition to preparatory studies and the regular college curriculum, a special course has been provided for teachers, and also for candidates for the ministry, who are not able to take a full course. A liberal charter has been obtained. The institution owns four hundred and fifty acres of valuable land adjoining the city limits, which, with its property in the city, is worth $40,000. The institution is named in honor of Bishop Davis W. Clark, D.D.

Clark, William Warner, late of the faculty of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary and Genesee College, was born at Bristol, Vt., Aug. 19, 1826, and died in Rochester, N. Y., Sept. 19, 1869. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1848, and in the same year became teacher of Mathematics in the Gouverneur Wesleyan Seminary, New York, and in 1850 principal of that institution. In 1853 he was elected teacher of Mathematics in the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, Lima, N. Y. In 1860 he accepted an appointment as teacher of Ancient Languages in Baton Rouge Collegiate Institute, Louisiana, but resigned the position in a few months on account of ill health, and returned, in 1861, to his former position in the Genesee Seminary. In 1864 he served as acting Professor of Mathematics in Genesee College, but in a short time removed, in feeble health, to Rochester, N. Y.

Clarke, Adam, LL.D., was born at Moybeg, Londonderry Co., Ireland, in 1760 or 1762. His father, a classical teacher, was a member of the Church of England, but his mother, of Scotch origin, was a Presbyterian. Adam Clarke, when a boy, was remarkable for his physical strength, but appeared dull and stupid until about his eighth year, when the severe criticism of a school-fellow seemed to arouse him from lethargy, and from that time he made rapid progress in learning, especially in the Latin language. In his seventeenth year he was brought under religious impressions through the instructions of two Methodist preachers, and he united with a Methodist society, and soon became a class-leader and home missionary. In 1782 he was sent by Wesley to Kingswood. While digging one day in the garden at Kingswood he found a half-guinea, with which he bought a Hebrew Bible, and this laid the foundation of his great knowledge of the sacred writings. The same year he was employed by Wesley as an itinerant preacher, and with little interruption he remained in this work until 1815. He was an earnest, faithful, and diligent preacher, and to the last the chapels where he preached were filled to overflowing. He was thrice elected president of the British Conference. While an itinerant preacher he found sufficient time for a thorough study of Oriental literature. In the preparation of his great commentary, the greatest work of his life, he says, "I have had no assistance, not even a single week's help, from an amanuensis: no person to look for commonplaces or refer to an ancient author, and find out the place and transcribe a passage of Latin, Greek, or any other language which my memory had generally recalled, or to verify a quotation; the help excepted which I received in the chronological department from my own nephew, Mr. John Edward Clarke. I have labored alone for twenty-five years previously to the work being sent to the press, and fifteen years have been employed in bringing it from the press, so that nearly forty years of life have been so consumed." As a divine and antiquarian, and an Oriental scholar, he perhaps had no superior in his days. He was employed by the British government to edit the old state papers, as a continuation of "Rymer's Fœdera." As a theologian Dr. Clarke was an Arminian, and held the Wesleyan theology entire, with the exception of the doctrines of the eternal Sonship of Christ. His error on this point drew out admirable articles from Watson and Treffry. A monument to the memory of Dr. Clarke was erected at Port Rush, Ireland, in 1859, by contributions from both the old and the new world, and also a building at Port Stewart, to be used as a school-house and church.

Clarke, Cyrus, a native of Beaver Co., Pa., born April 30, 1818. His entire life has been spent in Beaver and Lawrence Counties. He received a fair education, such as sons of farmers obtain. His parents were Presbyterians, but in his thirtieth year he was converted, and joined the M. E. Church, and soon after was appointed a class-leader, and still holds that position. Most of his religious career he has held the office of trustee and steward, and for twenty-seven years has been connected with the Sabbath-school at New Castle, Pa. Ira D. Sankey, the associate of the evangelist Dwight L. Moody, was one of his Sunday-school pupils, and first began to sing at his school. He is a trustee of Alleghany College, and member of the board of control of that institution, and life trustee of Beaver College. He donated $5000 to the Kingsley professorship in Alleghany College. He spent from 1840 to 1850 in mercantile business in Beaver County, and then removed to New Castle, and pursued the same occupation, after which he was three years in the office of prothonotary, seven years cashier of the Bank of Lawrence County, then changed to a national bank, which position he still holds. He assisted in founding the First National Bank of New Castle, and is a controlling director. He is also president of the New Castle and Franklin Railroad Company, and largely engaged in coal interests. He is very active and liberal in church and educational projects, and a staunch friend of the church. Was reserve lay delegate from Erie Conference in 1872, and lay delegate from the same Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Clarke, George W., D.D., born in Ohio in 1810. United with the M. E. Church in his fifteenth year. Graduated at Alleghany College in his early manhood, and in 1834 was received into the Pittsburgh Conference. When the Erie Conference was organized, in 1836, he became a member of that body. Subsequently he was elected to the chair of Greek Language, and became vice-president of his Alma Mater, a position he honored for seventeen years. For over a quarter of a century he has occupied commanding positions in pastoral and district work, and has been honored with an election to the General Conference seven times. He is the author of a work on the Atonement. He was appointed by the General Conference of 1876 a member of the publishing committee of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, to represent the East Ohio Conference. He is now agent of the Endowment Fund of Alleghany College.

Clarke, H. R., D.D., of Wyoming Conference, was born in Camden, N. Y., Aug. 23, 1813. He was converted when thirteen years of age, and united with the M. E. Church in 1827. He taught in Cazenovia Seminary for eight years, and joined the Oneida Conference in 1844. He has filled a number of leading appointments, and has been presiding elder of Wyoming, Owego, Binghamton, and Otsego districts. He was a member of the General Conference in 1856, 1864, and 1868. He has also been a trustee of Genesee College and of Syracuse University, and has been identified with general educational interests.

South, and no congregation of the M. E. Church has been organized. The African M. E. Church and the Colored Church of America have erected churches. The statistics for 1876 report:

DR. A. CLARKE'S SCHOOL-HOUSE AND CHURCH.

Clarke, John Creemer, Esq., M.P., born in Abingdon, England, in 1821. A liberal contributor to all the local funds of Methodism. Mayor of his native place in 1870, now a magistrate, and member for the same.

Clarksville, Tenn. (pop. 3200), the capital of Montgomery County, on the Cumberland and Clarksville division of the Louisville and Nashville Railway, and on the right bank of the Cumberland River, about fifty miles northwest of Nashville. Methodism was introduced into Clarksville in 1828, and the name appears on the records of the church in 1829, when it was connected with Montgomery, and E. P. Seraggs was pastor.

The first church was built in 1832, and was rebuilt in 1843. In 1845 it adhered to the Church

Classes.—Very early in the great revival movement Mr. Wesley divided the members of his societies into classes of about twelve, one of whom was styled the leader. These classes were generally arranged according to residence, that they might meet in private houses in their own localities. Sometimes they were arranged for meeting at different hours, according to the employment and opportunities of the various members. They were usually composed both of men and women, but early in the history of Methodism some classes were formed of women only, and others of men only. In some instances women were made the leaders of women's classes, and sometimes of mixed classes, especially for the young. The original number of twelve was, however, soon enlarged, and sometimes from twenty to fifty or even a larger number meet in a single class. Efficiency and activity, however, are promoted by smaller classes, as it is impossible for a leader to keep a careful supervision over a very large number.

Class-Leaders are virtually sub-pastors in the M. E. Church, and as such they are appointed by the preacher in charge, and act chiefly under his counsel and advice. It is their duty, according to the Discipline of the church, to see every member of their classes once a week, either in the class-meeting or to visit the absentees or the sick at their own residences. The object of this visit is to give such religious counsel, advice, or encouragement as circumstances may require. He is further to meet the preacher and the stewards, to pay over any money which is collected, and to report the case of any member requiring aid or attention from the pastor. Qualifications for a class-leader should be deep personal piety, mature experience, and ability to give religious counsel and advice wisely and affectionately, and to influence the younger members to systematic attention to all their Christian duties. He should be well versed in the Discipline of the church, and should read the lives of persons eminent for piety, and such books as clearly set forth the different shades of experience and the Christian duties devolving upon members of the church.

Class-Meetings (English). — Notwithstanding some discussion and difference of opinion, class-meeting still stands prominently and solely the test of membership in Great Britain. While a very few persons through constitutional timidity may be unable to give expression to their experience in a class-meeting, in too many instances the dislike to these services arises from a want of love to God rather than from any mental infirmity.

The character of the class-meeting cannot be lowered, or the glorious, soul-refreshing and powerful vitality of the church will cease to exist.

The weekly class-meeting was originated at a time when Mr. Wesley was devising some mode of paying the existing debts. In 1742, the societies having greatly increased, they were divided into classes, each class containing twelve or more persons, who were committed to the charge of one entitled the leader.

The rules of the society bear date May 1, 1743. Mr. Wesley says, "In the latter end of the year 1739 eight or ten persons came to me in London and desired that I would spend some time with them in prayer, and advise them how to flee from the wrath to come. This was the rise of the United Society." It was at Bristol, Feb. 15, 1742, whilst discussing the subject of debt, that one arose and proposed that every member of the society should pay one penny a week; another said that some were so poor that they could not afford it, when the first replied, "Put eleven of the poorest with me, and, if they can give nothing, I will give for them as well as for myself, and each of you call upon eleven weekly, receive what they can afford, and make up the deficiency." From this sprang forth this mighty organization. At first a person was appointed to collect the weekly subscription, and to pay the same to the stewards. The financial and the spiritual were then conjoined. Mr. Wesley met all the leaders, requested them to make inquiries into the spiritual state of the members; disorderly ones were rejected, some reclaimed, and the whole spiritually edified. Mr. Wesley says respecting the class-meeting, "It can hardly be conceived what advantages have been gained from this little prudential regulation. Many now happily experienced that Christian fellowship of which they had not so much as an idea before. They began to bear one another's burdens, and naturally to care for each other." And, "Speaking the truth in love, they grew up into Him in all things, who is the Head, even Christ, from whom the whole body, fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, increaseth unto the edifying of itself in love."

A more correct and beautiful illustration of the working of this system, even unto the present day, could not be found.

The nomination of each leader is with the superintendent, who must make personal examination as to the qualifications and character and general fitness of each. The approval or rejection of such nominee is with the leaders'-meeting. They must believe in the general doctrines of Christianity, and be apt to teach. (See LEADERS'-MEETING.)

The value of this integral and essential part of the Methodist economy was never more appreciated and valued than it is now, with the experience of nearly a century and a half.

Each member pays one penny or more per week as class-money, and sums according to ability or inclination, varying from one shilling to five pounds, are paid as ticket-money at the quarterly visitation of the classes by the minister. There are two other collections made in the classes: in March, in aid of the Home Mission and Contingent Fund; in September, for the Worn-out Ministers' and Ministers' Widows' Fund.

In America these meetings have not been so strictly a test of membership as in England. They are placed among the means of grace, and are highly esteemed, and attendance upon them is specified as a Christian duty. They have been a peculiar feature of Methodism, and have accomplished a vast amount of good; both inciting to a higher personal experience and in accustoming the members to religious conversation and labor. They are agencies to develop earnest and active Christian workers. Whenever regularly attended, the entire membership of the church is brought into fellowship with each other, and the experience and counsel of mature Christians become of great service to the younger and less experienced members. As a bond of union their influence can scarcely be overestimated. In many churches, however, the attendance is less regular or general than the Discipline of the church requires. The usual order of service in these meetings is, opening with singing and prayer, sometimes with reading of the Holy Scriptures. The leader then gives such general counsel and exhortation as he deems suitable, and speaks to each member of the class touching his or her experience. Each member is expected to take part in the exercise, either in the relation of experience or making such inquiries or giving such counsel as may suit the occasion. Sometimes a special topic is selected, on which the members converse; or some duty is discussed in an informal way. By this Christian conversation, and by the variety and experience, many a sorrowful heart is comforted, many a doubt is removed, and a stronger and more vigorous type of Christian piety is cultivated.

Class-Stewards are persons appointed in each class to receive the collections and attend to all financial matters connected with the class. Generally the class-leader attends to these several duties, but in some of the larger classes it has been found convenient to have a person appointed to attend specifically to the financial matters.

Claverack and Hudson River Institute, is one of the largest boarding institutes for both sexes in this country, and is located in the village of Claverack, N. Y., three miles from the city of Hudson. It commands a fine view of the Catskill Mountains and of the Berkshire Hills. The building, erected in 1854, contains 242 rooms, furnishing ample accommodations for pupils, teachers, recitation-rooms, parlors, etc. The institution is furnished with a fine set of chemical and philosophical apparatus, and has a large and increasing library. There are eleven departments of instruction, under the care of suitable teachers. In addition to the general academic course there is a college course for women, prescribed by the board of regents of the University of the State of New York. Young men are prepared for the Junior class in college. For twenty-three years it has been under the management of Dr. Alonzo Flack, its present president; has averaged a registration of 388 pupils, and has employed 18 officers and instructors. The permanency of its president, its able teachers and its uniform and regular system of physical exercises, and the co-education of the sexes have been among the agencies which have promoted the growth of the institution. The school is divided into six forms, which are met separately by the president as often as once a week, and the time is partly devoted to lectures on business, formation of habits, morals, etiquette, etc. To these form-meetings, with their questions and discussions, the president attributes much of the good order and prosperity of the institution.

The germ of this institution was the Washington Seminary, opened in 1779, which was under the care of A. M. Carshore for twenty-five years. During that period such men as General Van Ness, General Van Rensselaer, Martin Van Buren, Robert Morris, and others received an elementary education. The Claverack Academy was chartered in 1831, under the principalship of Rev. W. Mahon. The institution was chartered under its present title June 14, 1854. It has been patronized by the leading men of the place and of its vicinity, and in 1869 the regents granted the institution power to confer degrees upon women.

Cleveland, Ohio (pop. 92,829), is one of the most beautiful cities in the United States, and is the second in size in Ohio. It is delightfully situated on a plain ranging in elevation from 60 to 100 feet above Lake Erie. Cleveland circuit is first mentioned in the minutes of the church as connected with the Pittsburgh Conference, and in the Ohio district with Rev. D. Linerick as presiding elder, and Revs. John Crawford and C. Jones as pastors in 1827. A class was then organized consisting of nine members, with Elijah Peate as leader. In 1834, Cleveland was made a station, and in 1835-36 enjoyed the services of the talented F. A. Dighton, who so early passed away. A schism occurred in 1839, when about half the members seceded and organized a Wesleyan society. The Methodists worshiped in halls, school-buildings, and the old log court-house until 1841, when the church on the corner of St. Clair and Wood Streets was built, and which was remodeled and improved in 1857.

Cleveland First M. E. church, an engraving of which is given, is located at the corner of Euclid Avenue and Erie Street. It succeeds the old St. Clair Street organization. The chapel on Erie Street was built in 1869. The main church was dedicated in December, 1874. It is built of Sandusky limestone, and is 76 feet front by 117 feet deep, to which is added the chapel, 47 by 75 feet, making a front on Erie Street of 164 feet. The tower is 20 feet square and 96 feet high. The base of the spire and pinnacle is 195 feet. The audience-room is 97 feet in length by 64 in width. The house is neatly and beautifully furnished throughout. The stained-glass windows are of excellent workmanship. The seats are of black walnut, elliptically arranged, and galleries extend around three sides of the building. The large organ and choir are placed behind the pulpit. The seating capacity is about 1500.

The Newburg church, which was then in a village, but is now part of the city called South Park, was organized in 1832. The first church was built in 1841, and rebuilt in 1874. The East Cleveland church, then in the country, was organized as a class in 1828. The first church was built in 1841, and rebuilt in 1868. Christ church, formerly called Erie Street, was organized in 1850. The first church was built in 1853, and in 1876 the present church was purchased and beautifully refitted. The Scoville Avenue church was organized in 1853, and worshiped in a small chapel until 1869. They then removed to Scoville Avenue, and in 1873 built their present fine brick church. One liberal gentleman, Mr. Horace Wilkins, it is said contributed towards it more than $10,000. Broadway church was purchased in 1873 by Horace Wilkins and H. A. Massey, and was completed and dedicated in that year. Woodland Avenue originated in a colony from Scoville Avenue in 1871, and was known as Kingsley chapel. In 1874 they removed to their present site. The Cottage mission was organized by Rev. D. Prosser in 1875. The society worships in a small building on the corner of Wilson Avenue and Prospect Street. On the west side of the river, which is included in the North Ohio Conference, Franklin Avenue church was built on Hanover Street in 1835, and rebuilt on Franklin in 1870. Taylor Street church was built on Bridge Street in 1855, and was rebuilt on Taylor Street in 1869. The first German church was built on Prospect Street in 1847, and rebuilt on Erie in 1860. A second German church was built on the west side, on Lorain Street, in 1851. After the secession, which occurred in 1839, the first Wesleyan church was built on Prospect Street in 1840. It was rebuilt on Ohio Street in 1862. The African M. E. Church was organized in 1849. Their first house was built on Bolivar Street in 1850, and rebuilt on Ohio Street, 1865. Clinton, Iowa (pop. 6123), the capital of Clinton County, situated on the Mississippi River, is a very important railroad centre and rapidly-growing town. The first class was formed in 1856. The first M. E. church was erected in 1857, under the supervision of the Rev. J. B. Taylor. Following the dedication was a revival, which resulted in a class of forty, of which the Rev. G. W. Brindell took charge in September, 1858, under appointment from the Upper Iowa Conference. In 1865 the first church, of wood, gave way to one of brick, and in 1869 this latter was enlarged. An African M. E. society was organized in 1865, and in 1870 a society of Albright Methodists was organized. The statistics report (1876): M. E. Church: members, 310; Sunday-school scholars, 320; church property, $18,000. African M. E. Church: members, 54; Sunday-school scholars, 55.

REV. JOSEPH J. CLINTON.

BISHOP OF THE AFRICAN ZION METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Clinton, Joseph J., bishop of the African M. E. Zion Church, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 3, 1823. He acquired a good common school education, and studied at the Alleghany Institute, but did not graduate. At fifteen he experienced religion, and began as a lay preacher at the age of seventeen. In 1843 he was ordained an elder, and in 1856 was elected bishop. During the Civil War he spent nearly all his time at the South. He was chaplain of the 1st United States colored regiment, and in addition performed a large missionary work wherever he visited. Finding a wide door of usefulness, he left his position in the regiment and gave himself up entirely to missionary work. He organized 10 Conferences, licensed and ordained 700 ministers, brought 100,000 children into the Sunday-schools, and admitted a larger number of members into his denomination. In 1869 he visited California and organized a Conference in San Francisco. He resides in the city of Philadelphia.

Clinton, Thomas, a pioneer preacher of the M. E. Church South, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., January, 1793, and died in St. Helena Parish, La., Oct. 28, 1875. In a few months after his birth his parents died from yellow fever, and, two years after, his only sister. He was taken by a kind friend to the South, and while living in Augusta, Ga., he united with the M. E. Church. He was received on trial in the South Carolina Conference in 1820, and was appointed a missionary for the Mississippi Conference, which then included Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. He spent five years in Alabama, one in Louisiana, and the rest in Mississippi. Of the fifty-six years of his ministry, eighteen were spent on circuits, five on Wilkinson colored mission, and four on districts. "He was a close and successful student, confining himself mainly to what pertained to his calling as a traveling Methodist preacher, and became one of the best theologians in the Conference."

Cobb, Hon. George T., was born in Morristown, N. J., Oct. 13, 1812. During his early life

he exhibited a rare judgment and skill in business, and as, in later life, his means increased, he bestowed them freely upon the church of his choice. He was baptized by the late Dr. Dempster, and joined the Vestry Street church, New York. He was several times a member of Congress, and likewise a member of the State Senate. He was devoted to the interests of his church. The wealth which he possessed was lavished freely upon public buildings. The beautiful and costly M. E. church of Morristown, N. J., was erected largely under his personal supervision and through his abounding liberality. Integrity of the purest type, keen insight into public measures, knowledge of human nature, and philanthropy of princely kind, were among his leading characteristics. At the time of his death he was unquestionably the chief statesman of the State of New Jersey. He was killed suddenly by a terrible railroad accident near White Sulphur Springs, Va., Aug. 6, 1870.

In April, 1876, his widow, his daughter (Mrs. Wm. B. Skidmore), and his niece (Miss Ella Wandell) continued his noble generosity by endowing the chair of New Testament Exegesis, in the Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, N. J., in the gift of property estimated to be worth $40,000.

Cobleigh, Nelson Ebenezer, D.D., LL.D., teacher and editor in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Littleton, N. H., Nov. 24, 1814, and died at Atlanta, Ga., Feb. 1, 1874. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1843, and in the same year taught in the high school at Middletown, Conn. He joined the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1844, and continued in the pastoral work of the same till 1853, when he was elected professor of Ancient Languages in McKendree College, Illinois. In 1854 he was elected to the professorship of the same branches in Lawrence University, Wisconsin. In 1858 he was elected president, and Professor of Moral and Intellectual Science in McKendree College, Illinois. He retired from this position in 1863 to become editor of Zion's Herald, Boston, Mass., from which position he was called in 1867 to assume the presidency of the East Tennessee Wesleyan University, at Athens, Tenn. In 1872 he was elected editor of the Methodist Advocate, a journal of the M. E. Church, at Atlanta, Ga.

Dr. Cobleigh achieved an honorable success in every station to which he was called. His early life was spent in poverty, and he gained his education by hard exertion. He was an acceptable pastor, earnest and logical as a preacher, with much magnetic power, a teacher of great and varied abilities, an editor of tact, discrimination, and force. As editor of the Methodist Advocate at Atlanta, Ga., his position was a delicate one. It was his duty to advocate the cause of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the South at a time when political excitement was intense and the estrangement between the Northern and Southern branches of the church was at its highest. He did his work with boldness and vigor, yet with such tact and so evident a spirit of fairness as to win the esteem and favor as well as the respect of those who were opposed to him and to the cause he represented, so that after his death those who had been his most pronounced antagonists, as well as his friends, paid willing honors to his memory.

Cobourg Collegiate Institute, Canada, is named from the place of its location, and has been adopted as a preparatory department of the Victoria College or University. It gives a complete and thorough course in classics, mathematics, English and modern languages, and also prepares special classes for departments in the arts and sciences. D. C. Mellenry, B.A., is the principal, assisted by four competent teachers.

Cocagne, John Baptist, was born in 1821 in France, and was brought up in the Roman Catholic faith. Shortly after immigrating to America he was converted, and united with the M. E. Church, and was licensed to exhort. He spent four years in the Gouverneur and Fairfield Seminaries, supporting himself by his work. He joined the Conference in 1846, and in 1851 took charge of the French mission in New York. Subsequently he was sent to the Detroit French mission. Partly to benefit his health he sailed for his native land in the steamer Lyonnaise, but the vessel was wrecked, and he perished in the deep.

Cochrane, James W., was the first lay delegate from the Washington Conference (colored) to the General Conference of 1876. He is engaged in teaching.

Codington, Wesley Perry, a professor in Syracuse University, was born at Sing Sing, N. Y., Oct. 23, 1840, was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1860, and was appointed in the same year teacher of Mathematics in the Troy Conference Seminary, West Poughkeepsie, N. Y. He was afterwards appointed, in 1862, teacher of Ancient Languages in America Seminary, New York; in 1863, acting principal of that institution; in 1864, teacher of Greek in the Oneida Conference Seminary, New York; in 1866, Professor of Latin and Greek in Genesee College; and in 1871, Professor of the Greek Language and Literature in Syracuse University. Prof. Codington joined the New York Conference of the M. E. Church in 1863.

Cohoës, N. Y. (pop. 15,357), on the Hudson River, and on the New York and Hudson River Railway. It has grown rapidly, and is chiefly engaged in manufacturing. A society was formed here in 1820, and fully organized in 1839 by the Rev. E. Crawford, with a membership of 20. The first church was built in 1841, and replaced by a new one in 1848. A second society was formed in 1876. It is in the Troy Conference, and reports: First church: members, 450; Sunday-school scholars, 300; church property, $29,000. Second church: members, 60; Sunday-school scholars, 125; church property, $4000.

Coke, Thomas, LL.D., first bishop of the M. E. Church, was born at Brecon, Wales, Sept. 9, 1747, and died at sea, near India, May 3, 1814. He was educated in Oxford University, and after his graduation had charge of South Petherton parish, Somersetshire. While in the exercise of his ministry he formed the acquaintance of the Methodists, and became so faithful and earnest as to excite much opposition. He sought an interview with Mr. Wesley, an allusion to which, dated Aug. 18, 1776, is found in Mr. Wesley's journal: "I preached at Taunton, and afterward went with Mr. Brown to Kingston; here I found a clergyman, Dr. Coke, late a gentleman commoner of Jesus College, Oxford, who came twenty miles on purpose to meet me. I had much conversation with him, and a union then began which I trust shall never end." Having been dismissed from his curacy for his earnest ministry, he united with Mr. Wesley, and preached to immense congregations on the commons and fields in London. In 1780 he was appointed superintendent of the London circuit, and from that time forward was associated with Mr. Wesley in visiting the churches both in England and Ireland. He assisted Mr. Wesley in securing a proper deed in chancery that the churches might be legally held and the societies might be perpetuated. In 1782, under Mr. Wesley's direction, he held the first Irish Conference in the same manner that the Conference in England had been held. In 1784, Mr. Wesley having been strongly urged by the Methodists of America to provide for them a church organization, selected Dr. Coke as the first superintendent, and suggested to him that receiving ordination from himself he should proceed to America, organize the church, and ordain Mr. Asbury. Dr. Coke requested some time for consideration, and at the end of two months accepted Mr. Wesley's proposition, received ordination, and arrived in America in November, 1784.

Having conferred with Mr. Asbury and a number of the preachers, a Conference or general convention of ministers was called at Christmas for the organization of the church. The preachers assembled at Baltimore, and by a unanimous vote resolved to constitute an independent church, to be called the Methodist Episcopal Church, and elected Dr. Coke and Francis Asbury as bishops: whereupon Dr. Coke ordained Mr. Asbury, and also ordained a number of deacons and elders. He was the first Protestant bishop in America, with the exception of some visitors who had been sent by the Moravians. His labors, however, were not confined to the United States. After organizing the church he returned to England, and assisted Mr. Wesley: and though some years afterwards he designed to make America his home, such were the necessities of the English churches after the death of Mr. Wesley, that at the earnest invitation of his brethren the General Conference in America permitted him to reside in England, he not performing any episcopal duties while absent from the country. For many years he presided annually in the Irish Conference, frequently over the English Conference, have missions established among the Indians, and also among the Germans of America, and was continually planning for the extension of the gospel. In all his labor he bore his own expenses; having inherited some wealth, and having that wealth increased by marriage, he not only supported himself but spent nearly his whole fortune in laboring in behalf of missions.

REV. THOMAS COKE, LL.D.

and traveled extensively through England, Scotland, and Wales, besides his visits to the United States. He was deeply imbued with the missionary spirit, and was successful in planting the church in many places. Perceiving the need of missionaries in Nova Scotia, he set sail from England, designing to leave some missionaries in British America, but was driven by stress of weather to the West Indies, and there laid the foundation of those missions which in their future operations largely prepared for the emancipation of the slaves. He was anxious to

He was himself a missionary society, conducting the entire work, collecting, sending out missionaries, keeping the accounts, and making the reports until his death. He was successful in starting missions among the French, and his heart yearned for the vast population of India. For years he corresponded and prayed upon the subject, and, when nearly seventy years of age, he proposed to the Wesleyan Conference that he would go personally as a missionary to the East Indies. The Conference objected on account of the expense, but he offered to bear the entire expenses himself, to the amount of $30,000; and selecting some six missionaries he embarked with them. On his voyage he rose early, employed his time in reading and writing, in religious conversation and preaching; and a few days before the company expected to land, having retired to rest feeling a little unwell, he was found in the morning dead in his room. No man in Methodism except Mr. Wesley did more for the extension of the work through the world than did Dr. Coke. Mr. Asbury, in his minute on the death of Dr. Coke, says, "He was a minister of Christ in zeal and labors, and in services, the greatest man of the last century." Besides his extensive travels he took a deep interest in education, and shortly after his arrival in the United States we find him planning with Mr. Asbury the erection of a college, which was named by the Conference after both the bishops "Cokesbury." In his various visits he solicited for it money, addressed the students, and in every way endeavored to promote its interests. He was also a voluminous writer, publishing a number of sermons and addresses on various theological and ecclesiastical topics. He assisted Henry Moore in preparing his life of Mr. Wesley, published a history of the West Indies in three octavo volumes, a commentary on the Holy Scriptures in six volumes quarto, and also a work on the occurrences of Europe as related to prophecy, and the cottager's Bible, with reflections at the end of each chapter, for family reading. While in America he exercised the functions of a bishop in ordaining ministers: in Europe he exercised none of the prerogatives of that office, as the close connection of the Methodist societies with the English Church rendered it improper so to do.

Cokesbury College was the first literary institution under the patronage of the M. E. Church. It was located at Abingdon, eighteen miles north of Baltimore, on the road leading to Philadelphia. It occupied a site commanding a beautiful and extensive view of the bay. Dr. Coke, on one of his visits, writes, "The situation delights me more than ever. There is not, I believe, a point of it from whence the eye has not a view of at least twenty miles, and in some parts the prospect extends even to fifty miles in extent. The water of the port forms one of the most beautiful views in the United States; the Chesapeake Bay in all its grandeur, with a fine navigable river (the Susquehanna), which empties into it, lying exposed to view through a great extent of country."

The first idea of the institution appears to have been conceived by John Dickins and Mr. Asbury, and in 1780, in the midst of the Revolutionary War, a plan was prepared by them for a seminary, and some small subscriptions were secured. In 1784, at Dr. Coke's first visit, Mr. Asbury laid his plans before him, and he advised that the institution should be a college. They commenced soliciting subscriptions, and by the time the Conference at which the church was organized assembled they reported £1000. The Conference approved the plan and named the institution Cokesbury College. The corner-stone of the building was laid by Bishop Asbury, June 5, 1785. The edifice was of brick, 108 feet long by 40 feet wide, and three stories high. Before the building was fully finished a few students were admitted and a teacher was provided. The institution was formally opened Sept. 17, 1787. Bishops Coke and Asbury, in an appeal which they issued, stated, "They had three objects in its erection,—first, to provide for the education of the sons of ministers; secondly, for the education and support of poor orphans; and lastly, but not least, the establishment of a seminary for the children of our friends, where learning and religion may go hand in hand."

Bishop Asbury personally solicited subscriptions both for its erection and support, and for the time being was nominally its president. The Discipline of 1789 says, "The college will be under the presidency of our church for the time being, and is to be supported by yearly collections throughout our circuits, and in endowments which our friends think proper to give and bequeath." The Rev. Mr. Heath was its first principal, having been sent from England by Mr. Wesley. The discipline of the institution was unusually strict. The students were required to rise at five in the morning, and to be in bed at nine in the evening, without fail. They were directed to study seven hours a day, three hours being given for meals and recreation. The recreations were walking, reading, gardening, and bathing without-doors, and carpenter's, joiner's, cabinet-maker's, or turner's business within-doors. Three acres of ground were arranged for a garden, and a gardener was employed to overlook the students when employed in that recreation. All play amusements were prohibited. At different times both Dr. Coke and Bishop Asbury conducted an examination of the students, and expressed their approval of the qualification of the faculty and of the general management of the institution.

In September, 1789, John Dickins writes, "The college is 108 feet in length from east to west, and 40 feet in breadth from north to south, and stands on the summit and centre of six acres of land, with an equal descent and proportion of ground on each side. The whole building is well painted on the outside, and the windows completely glazed. The house is divided into rooms, as follows: at the west end are two rooms on the lower floor, each 25 feet by 20. The second and third stories the same. At the east end are two rooms, each 25 feet by 20. The second and third stories are the same. In the middle of the lower floor is the college-hall, 40 feet square, and over that, on the second floor, two school-rooms, and on the third floor two bed-chambers. At the end of the hall are square spaces for four sets of staircases, two at the north and two at the south end, with proper doors opening on the staircases. The carpenters' work on the first and second floor, with one staircase, is almost completed. The plastering and painting of four rooms at the west are nearly finished. The school-rooms are also chiefly done, and one room at the west end partly plastered." It then had 30 students, 10 of them partly supported on charity, several of whom were maintained, clothed, and educated gratis. As soon as the building was under roof a preparatory school was opened with 15 scholars in charge of Mr. Truman Marsh (a Quaker), who had the reputation of being a good Latin scholar and an excellent disciplinarian. Mr. Heath was, on Mr. Wesley's recommendation, elected the first president, and was inaugurated in December, 1787, when Mr. McClaskey and Mr. Marsh were appointed professors, the number of students being 25. In August of the next year, Bishop Asbury writes, "Two of our teachers have left, one from incompetency and the other to pursue riches and honors; had they cost us nothing the mistake we made in employing them might be the less regretted." It appears that Mr. Heath, who was an excellent clergyman, had been found by the older students during a temporary absence of Professor Marsh to be unable to instruct the higher classes in Latin, and the affair being made public, the president sent in his resignation. He became the rector of a parish church, and was much esteemed. Mr. Wesley left him in his last will as a token of friendship £60. Mr. McClaskey had purchased a farm on Gunpowder River, near Abingdon, where he settled and soon after died. The next faculty consisted of Dr. Jacob Hall as president, and Rev. John Hargrove, Rev. Joseph Toy, and a Mr. Tait, from Georgia; a teacher of French was subsequently added. Dr. Hall had a fine reputation as a general scholar. Mr. Hargrove embraced the doctrines of Swedenborg, and, resigning his situation, built the first New Jerusalem church in Baltimore. Mr. Toy was a first cousin to the late Bishop White, of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Mr. Tait resided in the college, continuing until its close, when he returned to Georgia, and was elected to the Senate of the United States. For a time Joseph Everett was chaplain. In the first year of Dr. Hall's administration an attempt was made to burn the college by putting fire into one of the closets, but it was discovered by the students and extinguished without doing any harm. In May, 1789, there was a gracious revival among the students. In 1792 there were 70 students in the halls, and several young gentlemen from the Southern States repaired thither to finish their education. The college was incorporated Jan. 26, 1794, and was authorized to confer degrees and to enjoy other privileges given to colleges. In 1793 Bishop Asbury says, "I found matters in a poor state at the college. Five hundred pounds in debt and our employees nearly seven hundred pounds in arrears." At the following New York Conference, owing to these embarrassments, it was resolved that nothing but an English free day-school should be kept at Cokesbury College. The number of professors was reduced, but Dr. Hall and Mr. Toy remained. On the night of Dec. 7, 1795, about 12 o'clock, the citizens were aroused with the cry of the college being on fire. The flames could not be arrested, and in a few hours the building, with its library, philosophical apparatus, and important private papers, was in ruins. To discover if possible the perpetrators of the deed, the governor offered a reward of $1000, but no sufficient information was obtained, although there were persons to whom suspicion attached as guilty of the act. Two years after, the trustees made application to sell the property for debts for which they were bound. Notwithstanding it was in operation but a few years, a number of prominent men were among its students. Among these were Samuel White, of Delaware, who was elected to the United States Senate, Asbury Dickens, Esq., for a long time Secretary of the Senate, Colonel William Doughty, of Philadelphia, a naval officer, Dr. William Dillum, and Rev. Valentine Cook.

No attempt was made to rebuild the institution on the same site, but some friends in Baltimore purchased a building in that city, and the institution was recommenced. In precisely a year from the previous disaster it caught fire from an adjacent building and was consumed. No further effort was made to resuscitate it.

Cokesbury Conference School was organized by the South Carolina Conference in 1836, and named in honor of Bishops Coke and Asbury. Since that time it has educated the sons of ministers of the Conference free of tuition. It had an endowment fund of $18,000.11, which contributed largely to paying their board, but it was almost entirely swept away by the disasters of the late Civil War.

This institution before it was adopted by the South Carolina Conference was called "Tabernacle Academy," and was taught by the distinguished Dr. Stephen Olin. Here he began his career as a teacher, was converted during a revival among the students, and soon after entered the itinerant ministry.

Bishop Wightman was president of its board of trustees for a number of years. It has done a good work for the church and for the country. Five of the present presiding elders of the South Carolina Conference, M. E. Church South, received in it their education in part, as did also Bishop McTyeire. The present officers are: F. A. Connor, rector; George C. Hodges, classical teacher.

Cokesbury is a beautiful village of about 600 inhabitants. The locality is proverbially healthy. The fine mineral spring near by, and the intelligence and refinement of the inhabitants of the vicinity, make the place a favorite summer resort.

this circuit in 1809 showed 75 members. It is in the Michigan Conference, and reports: M. E. Church: members, 476; Sunday-school scholars, 365; church property, $35,000. Free Methodist Church: members, 40; Sunday-school scholars, 50; church property, $1500.

Coles, George, was born in England in 1792, and died in New York, May 1, 1858. At the age of twelve he was converted, and in his leisure moments devoted himself to reading and study. At COKEBURY CONFERENCE SCHOOL.

Colburn, Samuel S., a minister in the M. E. Church South, was born in Green Co., Tenn., May 1, 1807, and died in Missouri, Aug. 26, 1875. He was converted in 1832. In 1835 he served as junior preacher on a large circuit, and in the fall of the same year was admitted on trial in the Missouri Conference. He spent twenty-five years in active service. His health failing in 1868, he was superannuated for six years.

Cold Spring, N. Y. (pop. 3086), in Putnam County, on the Hudson River, and on the New York Central and Hudson River Railway. This place is first mentioned in the minutes under date of 1843, when Samuel King was sent to it. In 1844 it is reported as a circuit, with 314 members. It is in the New York Conference, and reports: members, 365; Sunday-school scholars, 200; church property, $57,000.

Cold Water, Mich. (pop. 4381), is the capital of Branch County, and is watered by a stream of the same name. It is first mentioned as early as 1808, in connection with the Western Conference and in the Indiana district. The first report from the age of twenty-two he was licensed as a local preacher, and in 1818 immigrated to America. The following year he was received on trial by the New York Conference, and labored effectively for thirty-three years. Twelve years he was assistant editor of The Christian Advocate, and three years he was editor of The Sunday-School Advocate and of Sunday-school books. Among his publications were "The Antidote," "Lectures to Children," "Scripture Concordance," "My Youthful Days," "My First Seven Years in America," and "Heroines of Methodism." Though not profound or powerful, he was a clear, practical, persuasive preacher. He had felt for years a great dread of dying, but as the hour of his departure drew near he obtained a complete triumph and release from every fear. About an hour before his death he requested prayer, and at its close he responded with deep feeling: raising his hand, he exclaimed, "Awake!" as if some heavenly voice saluted his ear. He then leaned back and slept in Christ.

Colhouer, Thomas Henry, A.M., was born in Baltimore Co., Md., June 9, 1829. He received an English education at the Clover Hill Academy, in Maryland. In 1845 he removed to New Jersey and prosecuted the study of the higher English branches, under the Rev. John W. Mears, D.D., afterwards a professor in Lafayette College. He subsequently pursued a regular classical course at the Classical Institute, in Camden, N. J.

His earliest religious impressions were formed in a Methodist Protestant Sunday-school, in Maryland, in the tenth year of his age. When sixteen he made a public profession of faith in Christ, at first in the Methodist Episcopal Church, as no organization of the other branch then existed in Camden. He was appointed class-leader and licensed to exhort while a member of the M. E. Church; but was among the first to enter the Methodist Protestant Church when an opportunity offered in Camden. He was received into the New Jersey Conference of the M. E. Church in 1855, and filled the office of secretary for eight years. In 1865 he united with the Pittsburgh Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, and acted as secretary for nine years. In 1875 he was elected president of the Pittsburgh Conference, and re-elected in 1876. In 1868, Mr. Colhouer published his "Republican Methodism." In 1872 the book was enlarged and revised, with a change of title to "Non-Episcopal Methodism" (owing to the political association of the word Republican), and is now a standard authority, and adopted by the denomination and used in the college at Adrian as a text-book. Mr. Colhouer is now (1877) preparing "Sketches of the Founders of the Methodist Protestant Church." In 1872 he received pro merito, from Adrian College, the title of Master of Arts. He has been a member of several Conventions and General Conferences, filled almost every post of honor in the denomination, and has been successful as a builder, pastor, and counselor.

Collect is a short form of prayer found in the liturgies of several churches. Its original meaning is very doubtful. Perhaps the most accurate opinion is that it was designed as a comprehensive prayer, in which, as near as might be, the earnest devotions of all the people should be concentrated and expressed in as brief a style as possible. These forms of prayer are certainly of very ancient origin, some of them dating as early as the fourth century. They became very greatly multiplied during the later years of the Roman Catholic Church. One feature of the Reformation was to correct the liturgy in this respect, and retain but comparatively few of these collects. The Church of England in forming its liturgy retained a still less number, and these were devoted to the services for Sabbath and holidays and general occasions of consecration or dedication, or the administration of the ordinances and ceremonies of the church. The Methodist Episcopal Church has collects only for the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, burial of the dead, consecration of bishops, and ordination of deacons and elders.

Collections (English Wesleyan).—The following are the regular collections made in all the circuits during the year, at the direction of the Conference:

1st. Private donations in the classes at the renewal of tickets in September, on behalf of the Worn-out Ministers' and Ministers' Widows' Fund.

2d. Private subscriptions and public collections for the Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove Schools are to be made in the early part of November.

3d. The annual subscriptions and donations for the Wesleyan Theological Institution, Jan. 1.

4th. Collections on behalf of the Auxiliary Fund.

5th. Annual public collections for the General Chapel Fund to be made, and subscriptions solicited, in the month of February.

6th. Public collections are to be made in all the chapels in each circuit within the metropolitan postal area on behalf of the Metropolitan Chapel Building Fund, with donations and subscriptions, to be forwarded before the end of March.

7th. The yearly collection (for Home Missionary and Contingent Fund) to be made in all the classes at the renewal of tickets in March.

8th. The private subscriptions and public collections for the Educational Fund are to be made in April.

9th. The private subscriptions for the foreign missions are to be received in all the circuits, either weekly, monthly, quarterly, or annually, as is most convenient to the subscribers. The annual public collections for that fund are to be made in all our chapels and other preaching-places at the time of the anniversaries of the several auxiliary or branch societies; or, where no public meeting is held, in the month of May.

10th. The private subscriptions for the fund auxiliary to the Worn-out Ministers' and Ministers' Widows' Fund are to be solicited in May.

11th. The collections in aid of the Home Mission and Contingent Fund, for the support and spread of the gospel in Great Britain, are made in all our chapels and preaching-places; not later than the second Sunday in July, but wherever practicable before the May district meeting, and in connection with it a public meeting. In addition to the above, one collection must be made for the Theological Institution and one for the Auxiliary Fund.

Colleges.—In the early history of a religious denomination there is seldom sufficient numbers and wealth to found and endow colleges of a respectable character. We have no record of the early Christians attempting to found such institutions. The insecurity of property and even of life did not permit them to engage in this work, but as soon as freedom from persecution was secured, we find literary institutions established in Alexandria and in other principal cities. In all ages Christianity has been the patron of education, and all Christian nations have established colleges and universities, and in nearly all cases these are directly or indirectly under the influence of religious denominations. When Methodism arose in England, Mr. Wesley had no design to establish a separate church: and, hence, looked to Oxford and Cambridge for the education of all young men who might belong to his societies, as well as to other Christian churches. Finding himself surrounded, however, by the poor, he early established Kingswood School for the benefit, first, of the poor in the vicinity, and, secondly, for the benefit of the sons of Methodist preachers. Not until after his death was an effort made in England to establish a Methodist college. As the Methodists in England, however, grew in strength and numbers, they found it necessary to establish institutions for the education of their youth; for until a very recent period no one could enter the English universities, or could graduate in them, without a subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles: and it was found that such an influence was exercised that Methodist young men who attended the university were in very many cases estranged from the faith of their fathers. There is at present more liberality and catholicity of feeling, and a young man is not now compelled to be a member of the Church of England before he can obtain the honors of the university. The Wesleyans have established colleges at Taunton and Sheffield (which see), besides a school at Cambridge, and theological institutions for the training of young ministers. In the United States, at the organization of the church, measures were taken for establishing a college, and in a few months thereafter the corner-stone of Cokesbury College was laid. It has a sad history, having in about ten years perished by the hand of an incendiary; and the second effort in Baltimore having also been destroyed in the flames, the early ministers felt that it was not wise to spend their time and means in that work. Little was done for collegiate education from that time until, in 1823, Augusta College, Kentucky, was opened. This was followed by Madison College, in Pennsylvania; and though both of these have passed away, they gave birth to a host of institutions which have followed from 1830 to the present time. The attention of the church has been called to this subject, and a large number of collegiate institutions have been founded. Some of these possess very considerable property, and are sufficiently endowed to make them permanent, while others are but in their infancy, and are struggling with financial embarrassment. In the M. E. Church South a number of institutions were in a very flourishing condition prior to the Civil War; but in some cases the buildings were destroyed, and in many others the funds which they possessed were invested in Confederate bonds, and proved a total loss. The institutions, however, are now recovering from their depression, and many of them are regaining their former position. The Methodist Protestant Churches have also two very respectable colleges, with some smaller institutions. The African M. E. Church has a respectable institution—the Wilberforce University—near Xenia, O. In Canada, the Wesleyans have a noble institution in Victoria College, with smaller institutions; and the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canada has also a college at Belleville. (See EDUCATION.)

Collier, William, D.D., was born in Hagerstown, Md., May 11, 1803. At that time his parents were members of the Lutheran Church, in which he was baptized; they, however, soon became Methodists. From the age of six till twelve he attended school, when he was put to a trade. He was converted at fourteen, and soon after became deeply impressed that he ought to fit himself for preaching. To this end he began a course of reading, privately prosecuting it as well as his advantages would allow. His first license to preach was received from the M. E. Church.

In 1824 his mind was first called to the subject of lay-delegation, by a circular written by Ezekiel Cooper, of the M. E. Church, approving of its adoption. Upon consideration of the subject he became a strong advocate of the principle. In 1829 he began his labors with the new organization, having withdrawn from the M. E. Church after the expulsion of the "Reformers." He filled some of the most important charges in Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and the District of Columbia during his active pastorate. In 1874 he was granted a superannuated relation in the fiftieth year of his ministry. Six times he has been president of his Conference, three times representative to the General Conference, and three times member of other conventions of the church.

Collins, Charles, D.D., of the M. E. Church South, was born in Maine, April 17, 1813, and died in Memphis, Tenn., July 10, 1875. He graduated from Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn., taking the first honor in a class of such men as D. Curry, E. E. Wiley, and others, and was elected to the presidency of Emory and Henry College, near Abingdon, Va., before he was twenty-five years of age. In 1844 he evinced great talent and ability in his controversial papers against Romanism. In 1848 he published also some doctrinal tracts, entitled "Methodism and Calvinism Compared." About this time he was editor of the Southern Repository and College Review. He was also a frequent contributor to the Ladies' Repository. He received, in 1851, his degree of Doctor of Divinity from three different colleges. In 1852 he was elected president of Dickinson College, Pennsylvania, which position he held for eight years. In August, 1860, he took charge of the State Female College, Memphis, Tenn. In connection with this institution he closed the labors of his life. "His thoughts were weighed in the balances of Christian philosophy and then uttered with transparency and precision. In style he was clear, concise, pointed; in language, pure and elegant; in spirit, calm but earnest and impressive."

Collins, John, was born in New Jersey, 1769, and died in Maysville, Ky., 1845. His parents were Friends, but he was converted in 1794 and united with the M. E. Church. After laboring some years in New Jersey as a local preacher, he removed, in 1803, to Claremont Co., O. In 1804 he preached the first Methodist sermon in Cincinnati. In 1807 he was admitted into the Western Conference. Among other eminent citizens whom he led into the church and to the Saviour was John McLean, afterwards judge of the Supreme Court of the United States. His appointments, with two intervals of location, were for thirty years in Ohio. He took a superannuated relation in 1837, and died a blessed death, his last words being, "Happy! happy! happy!"

Collins, John A., was born in Delaware in 1801, and died in Baltimore, May 7, 1857. He commenced the study of law in the office of the distinguished William Wirt, but was converted at a camp-meeting in Loudon County, and his thoughts were directed to the Christian ministry. In 1830 he was received into the Baltimore Conference. "From that time to the day of his death, a period of twenty-seven years, he devoted himself with untiring zeal on circuits, in stations, as agent of Dickinson College, and, as a presiding elder, to the work of a Methodist preacher." In 1836 he was elected assistant editor of The Christian Advocate, at New York; but he soon resigned the office: partly on account of climate, but chiefly because he thought he could serve the church more fully in the regular ministry. Few men have equalled him in successfully preaching the doctrines, or in more faithfully defending the Discipline of the church. He was elected to every General Conference from the time he became eligible until the time of his death. As a debater, either in Annual or General Conference, he had few equals; and was especially conspicuous in defending the position of the Baltimore Conference. He was suddenly smitten down while on his way to a quarterly meeting, was taken to the house of a friend, and survived but a few days. His last moments were not only peaceful but triumphant.

Collins, Rev. Joseph S., the "old man eloquent," was born in Sussex Co., Del., March 17, 1779, and died at Winchester, Va., Aug. 1, 1874, being in his ninety-sixth year. He was the father of the gifted Rev. John A. Collins of the old Baltimore Conference. He was early converted, and was licensed as a local preacher. Naturally gifted, and by careful training and study, he became like a walking "Cyclopedia" in theology and literature. In 1805 he removed to Ohio, and remained there until 1812, and for six years was the senior editor of the Scioto Gazette. In 1812 he was appointed a clerk in the United States Land Office, at Washington City, where he remained for twenty-seven years. For many years he was a member of the "Local Preachers' Association" of Baltimore, and was on their plan of appointments until his ninety-fourth year. He was a member of the Preachers' Meeting of that city, and took an active part in the discussions of that body. His wonderful memory enabled him to retain what he had read, and his mind was a magazine of power in debate, conversation, and in preaching. He was remarkably amiable, polite, and refined, and as gentle as a child.

Collins, Judson Dwight, was born in Wayne Co., N. Y., Feb. 12, 1822, and died in Washtenaw, Mich., May 13, 1852. At the age of fourteen he made a profession of religion and united with the M. E. Church. On the opening of an academy at Ann Arbor he became a student, and was a member of the first class in the Michigan University, graduating in 1845. He was immediately employed as a teacher of Natural and Moral Science in the Wesleyan Seminary, at Albion. In 1846 he was admitted on trial in the Michigan Annual Conference, and, after laboring zealously a few months, was appointed a missionary to China, and departed for that field of labor on the 3d of March, 1847, being appointed to Foo-Chow. On the 28th of Feb., 1848, he had the pleasure of seeing a school organized consisting of eight boys, and, on the 14th of March, he opened a Sunday-school with very promising prospects. He also united with other missionaries in an effort to secure a correct and uniform version of the Holy Scriptures. In May, 1850, he was appointed superintendent of the China mission, but from failing health he was compelled to return to his native country, where he died in the following year.

Collins, Rev. Thomas, an eminently holy man, of extensive usefulness; converted at eight years of age, under the ministry of Gideon Ouseley. He entered the ministry in 1832, and died Dec. 27, 1864. A valuable memoir of him was written by Rev. S. Coley.

Collins, Wellington H., was born in 1816, in Waleott, Wayne Co., N. Y., and died at Detroit, Mich., 1858. He was converted in 1835, began preaching in 1837, and entered the Michigan Conference in 1838. After twenty years as a pastor and seven years as presiding elder, and having been elected as a delegate to the General Conferences of 1852 and of 1856, he died from paralysis. He was a safe counselor, a masterly preacher, a strong debater, and a true Christian.

Collord, Isaac, a minister in the M. E. Church South, was born in the city of New York, June 25, 1794, and died in Cincinnati, O., March 8, 1875. He united with the old John Street church in 1810. Having removed to Cincinnati in 1811, he united with the "Old Stone church," afterwards called Wesley chapel. He was a captain in the army during the War of 1812. He was licensed to preach in 1818. In 1819 he united with the Ohio Conference, and was appointed to the Limestone circuit, in Kentucky. He continued to serve the church faithfully as a pastor, whether on circuits or in stations or as presiding elder. Having served the church twenty-nine years, he was superannuated in 1848. "He was endowed with a vigorous intellect, which he cultivated by extensive and judicious reading."

Colman, Henry, A.M., was born in Bridport, Vt., May 14, 1834. His father, Rev. Henry R. Colman, was missionary to the Oneida Indians, and he lived among them from 1840 to 1845. He was converted at his father's family altar in 1851, while attending Lawrence University, where he graduated in 1857. After serving as tutor in the university for one year, he was received on trial by the West Wisconsin Conference, and in 1859 was transferred to Wisconsin. From 1863 to 1867 he was principal of Evansville Seminary. Since that time he has been engaged in the pastorate, and has been stationed at Waukesha, Fort Atkinson, and two pastoral terms in Milwaukee. He has been since 1873 secretary of his Conference, and was a member of the General Conference of 1876, where he served on important committees. He has written much for the church papers, besides a series of comments on the Sunday-school lessons.

Colman, Joseph, an itinerant minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England. In connection with the Wesleyan Reform movement Mr. Colman labored for nine years preaching and attending public meetings. In 1858 he entered on circuit work, and was elected president of the Annual Assembly in 1864. He became supernumerary in 1876. He resides at Holt, Norfolk.

Colorado (pop. 39,864) was organized as a Territory in 1861, and embraced an area of 104,500 square miles. It was admitted as a State in the Union in 1876. It is traversed from north to south by the elevated chain of the Rocky Mountains, whose highest peaks attain an altitude of from 11,000 to 14,000 feet, while the mountain valleys are from 5000 to 6000 feet above the level of the sea. It is remarkably rich in gold and silver mines, and its dry atmosphere is said to be beneficial to those having weak but not diseased lungs. In 1859 the discovery of gold led to a great increase of population, and Rev. W. H. Goode was sent to organize the M. E. Church in the Territory. In the minutes of Kansas and Nebraska Conference of 1860 it was recognized as the Rocky Mountain district, and the following year there were reported in the Territory 391 members, 7 Sunday-schools with 212 scholars, and 3 churches valued at $1800. The distance being very great from any other Conference, it was organized, in 1864, as an independent Conference, which embraced the entire Territory, and its first session was held in July, 1864. The reports for 1876 show 37 traveling preachers, 32 local preachers, 2065 members, 47 Sunday-schools with 3018 scholars, 32 churches valued at $118,850, and 10 parsonages at $9675. Probably about 150 of the membership and 3 of the churches are in the Wyoming Territory, a part of which now belongs to the Colorado Conference. The Southwest German Conference have a church organized in Denver with 47 members, and church property valued at $15,000. The M. E. Church South also sent missionaries into this Territory, and have organized the Denver Conference, which embraces also Montana Territory. They reported (1875) 523 members with 432 Sunday-school scholars. The African M. E. Church has also organized a few congregations. The southern portion of Colorado, formerly included in New Mexico, has a Spanish population, nearly all of whom are identified with the Roman Catholic Church, which gives them a preponderance in the State. The census tables of 1870 give the following statistics of the leading denominations:

	Edifices.	Sittings.	Property.

Colorado Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1864, and included "the Territory or State of Colorado." By the action of the General Conference of 1868 it embraced "Colorado Territory, and that part of Dakota Territory lying west of Nebraska, and the Territory of New Mexico, excepting that portion lying west of the Rocky Mountains." In 1872 it was bounded so as "include Colorado Territory and that part of Wyoming Territory lying north of Colorado." The boundaries were not changed by the General Conference of 1876. The latest reports are as follows: preachers, 37; Sunday-schools, 47; scholars, 3018; members, 2065; 98 churches, value, $284,702; 48 parsonages, value, $32,690.

Colored Churches.—The Discipline of the Metholist Episcopal Church recognizes no difference whatever in the rights and privileges of its members on account of distinction of color. At one time the colored and the white membership were reported separately, but that distinction ceased more than twenty years since; yet not only in the M. E. Church, but in nearly all the Methodist Churches, and in those of other denominations, the colored people prefer to meet in distinct congregations. This has arisen partly from the fact that many of the colored population felt that they were not treated as perfect equals, and, secondly, from a desire for more intimate association with each other in all church arrangements. The first separation of church worship in Methodism on account of color took place in Philadelphia, in 1794, when the colored membership of the St. George's church, under the leadership of Richard Allen, erected for themselves, aided by public contributions, a house of worship. This was followed a few years after by the colored membership in the city of New York; and wherever in the free States the colored membership was sufficiently numerous separate congregations were organized. This was done by their own act and choice, and these congregations remained a part of the M. E. Church as perfectly as the white congregations, and were entitled to many of the rights and privileges of the same. In Baltimore and in the northern slave States separate congregations were also established, but farther South the slave-holding population were unwilling that the colored people should meet alone, and hence seats in the gallery, or in some portion of the church, were assigned to them, and they were permitted only to hold services in the presence of some white persons. In 1816 several of these congregations united, especially in Philadelphia and Baltimore, and formed the African M. E. Church (see AFRICAN M. E. CHURCH), and in 1820 the African M. E. Zion Church was organized in New York (which see). Many of the colored local preachers in Delaware and Maryland who remained in the M. E. Church from time to time desired a Conference to be held, and authority was given to organize such a Conference in Delaware. In 1864 two Conferences to be composed of colored ministers were organized under the authority of the General Conference, called the Delaware and Washington. In 1872 the word "colored" was stricken from the Discipline, and colored and white ministers are equally eligible to admission to any Conference; yet in practice the Delaware, Wilmington, Lexington, and a few other Conferences are composed chiefly, if not altogether, of colored ministers. They feel that in this association, all the responsibilities of a Conference devolving on them, they improve more rapidly, and feel more easy in the association than with those whom they know have enjoyed superior advantages in culture. In addition to the African M. E. Church and the African Zion M. E. Church, which are composed almost exclusively of colored members, the colored M. E. Church of America was organized in 1874 under the special patronage of the M. E. Church South, and at present very few colored members remain in the Southern church. In Canada, where slavery never existed and where the prejudice on account of color has never prevailed as in the United States, still the colored people have preferred to have separate congregations and a separate Conference, and are organized into the British Methodist Episcopal Church. This has been objected to by some as constituting a color line, and they have desired that all such distinctions should be obliterated. While this is done theoretically, yet practically it is found that congregations and Conferences constituted as they now are in the Methodist Episcopal Church, will exist by the choice of all parties concerned.

Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America is the title of an organization formed in 1874. Prior to the Civil War a large number of the colored people were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Their statistics for 1860 report over 200,000. Nearly all of these were in slavery, and in many of the Southern States they were forbidden by law to hold meetings among themselves. At the close of the war, having been emancipated and having acquired rights as citizens, they preferred to organize in separate societies and conduct their own services. Some of them united with the African M. E. Church and others with the Zion Church, while some preferred a union with the M. E. Church, which established schools and services among them. The leading ministers of the Church South thought it was wiser for the colored people who remained with them to constitute separate churches. The General Conference of 1870 authorized the bishops to organize Annual Conferences among the colored ministers, and in 1874 they authorized the bishops, should a General Conference be constituted, to ordain bishops elected by them. Accordingly, in December, 1874, a General Conference of colored ministers, representing the five Annual Conferences, organized under the patronage of the Church South, assembled at Nashville and organized an independent church, assuming the name of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, and they elected two bishops, Revs. W. H. Miles and R. H. Vanderhorst. Since that time three additional bishops have been elected, viz., L. L. Halsey, J. B. Beebe, and Isaac Lane. This church harmonizes perfectly with the M. E. Church South, in doctrines and discipline. They have purchased ground for institutions of learning in Louisville and in Mississippi.

They publish a paper in Louisville, called the Christian Index. Their annual minutes have not been published, so that their statistics in detail are not before the public. They report the aggregate of 17 Annual Conferences, 673 traveling preachers, 1123 local preachers, 92,558 members, 30,769 Sunday-school scholars, with 827 churches, valued at $952,027. In constituting them a separate church, the M. E. Church South gave to them their interest in all the churches occupied by the colored people. As some of these churches had attached themselves to other branches, litigation has occurred in several places.

Colson, Jesse C., a member of the Board of Church Extension, was born in Gwynedd Township, Montgomery Co., Pa., Aug. 14, 1822. He united with the church at Old Bethel in 1847. After some years, he removed to Philadelphia, and was class-leader, steward, and trustee in Sanctuary church. He united with others in the formation of Grace church, where he is now class-leader and trustee. He is a builder by profession.

Columbia Female College is under the patronage and control of the M. E. Church South, and located at Columbia, S. C. It was founded about 1856. Its buildings have lately been greatly improved, and the institution is taking vigorous measures to liquidate a debt which has rested upon it. The South Carolina Conference at its recent session directed that one-half the amount collected on the educational assessment upon the several charges the ensuing year should be appropriated for this purpose. The faculty consist of Hon. J. L. Jones, A.M., President, and Professor of Mathematics and Metaphysics; Rev. E. J. Meynardie, A.M., D.D., Lecturer, Emeritus, on Æsthetics and Biblical Literature; Rev. J. Walter Dickson, A.M., Natural Science and Latin; W. H. Orchard, Music; Miss C. E. Putnam, Instructress in Kindergarten, Calisthenics, and Rhetoric; Miss Annie Smith, French and English; with teachers in the ornamental and preparatory branches.

Columbia, Pa. (pop. 6461), in Lancaster County, at the head of lumber navigation on the Susquehanna River. At the Philadelphia Conference of 1807 the appointment given to William Hunter and Henry Boehm was "Pennsylvania." Mr. Boehm, speaking of this work in his "Reminiscences," says, "We had not, however, the whole Keystone State as our field of labor, but only that part which lies between the Delaware and Susquehanna Rivers." Bishop Asbury records under date of July 25, 1807: "We came through Lancaster to Columbia. On the Sabbath-day I preached in a lot near the river; we may have had seven hundred people; my subject was II. Cor. v. 14. The missionaries Boehm and Hunter were present." As Mr. Boehm says that the object of their appointment was to break up new ground, it is to be presumed that the services conducted by Bishop Asbury, attended by Boehm and Hunter, were among the first Methodist services held in Columbia. The place is not mentioned in the minutes until 1829, when John Goforth and J. Lednum were appointed to it. In 1830, it being a large circuit, it reported 282 members. Afterwards it was called Strasburg and Columbia, until 1835, when the two places were separated, and F. Hodgson was sent to Columbia. In 1836 it reported 129 members. It is in the Philadelphia Conference, and reports in 1876: M. E. Church: members, 505; Sunday-school scholars, 400; church property, $19,000. African M. E. Church: members, 126; Sunday-school scholars, 99; church property, $8000.

Columbia River Conference, The, was separated from the Oregon Conference at the session of the latter held in Olympia, Washington Territory, in August, 1873, under the name of East Oregon and Washington. Its boundaries then included all of the State of Oregon and Washington Territory east of the Cascade Range of mountains. Two presiding elders' districts were constituted, besides an Indian mission district, and about twenty men assigned to labor in the Conference. It then covered an area of over 100,000 square miles. Its first annual session was held in Walla Walla, Washington Territory, July 31, 1874. Bishop S. M. Merrill presiding, Rev. H. K. Hines, secretary. Its second at Dalles City, Oregon, August, 1875, Bishop Peck, president. At the General Conference of 1876 all of Idaho lying directly north of Nevada was added to the Conference, and its name changed to Columbia River. This increased its area to near 150,000 square miles, and added several important charges. Its first session under the new name was held at La Grande, Oregon, commencing Aug. 9, 1876, presided over by Bishop W. L. Harris, with H. K. Hines still as secretary. At this, the third session, the Conference numbered twenty-nine charges, and reported a membership of 1584. The country included in the Conference boundaries had been settled only from five to fifteen years, and its work was entirely pioneer, rivaling in romance and incident the history of any of the frontiers of Methodism. The territory is beautifully variegated, valley and mountain, hill and vale, woodland and prairie, presenting an ever-changing variety. It is among the most fertile and healthy regions in the United States. Lying along and on both sides of the great Columbia River, and its greatest tributary, Snake River, it appropriately takes its name from that majestic stream. It reported (1876) 24 traveling and 23 local preachers, 22 Sunday-schools and 905 scholars, 1451 members, 13 churches, valued at $31,435, and 10 parsonages, valued at $6525.

Columbia, S. C. (pop. 9298), the capital of the State, seated on the Congaree River. The South Carolina College, founded by the State in 1804, is located here, as are also a Presbyterian theological seminary and a Roman Catholic college. Methodism found its way into Columbia early in the present century, Asbury having preached there in 1803. Under date of November 11, 1803, he writes: "We crossed Contee's ferry on Tuesday, and I entered Columbia like an Indian chief; it rained, and I had cast a blanket round me. John Harper came to meet us and welcome us to his house, when, although the weather was stormy, we held a family meeting, and the rooms were filled with respectable hearers." Asbury was back in Columbia again at the Conference of 1810, which was held in the house of Senator Taylor, beginning Thursday, Dec. 13. Under date of Saturday, Dec. 2, 1815, Asbury notes in his journal that he preached in Columbia on the Sunday previous. The place is mentioned in the minutes in 1804, when Bennet Kendrick was appointed to it. In 1805 it reported 89 white and 20 colored members. The Southern church was the only form of Methodism from 1845 to the close of the Civil War. There are now several organizations. The statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
Washington Street, South...	210	167	$78,000
Marion Street, South.....	235	106	5,000
M. E. Church.....	235	75	2,000
African M. E. Church.....	1191	307	7,000

Columbus, Ga. (pop. 7401), is situated at the head of navigation on the Chattahoochee River, and has many natural advantages. At the separation of the church it became a part of the M. E. Church South, which has had a constant and satisfactory growth. The African M. E. Church has also an organization. The statistics for 1876 are:

Churches	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
St. Luke's.....	509	267	$20,000
St. Paul's.....	207	157	10,000
Broad Street and Mission...	189	81
African M. E. Ch., St. James...	125	450	25,000
African M. E. Ch., St. John...	150	150	5,000

Columbus, Ind. (pop. 3359), the capital of Bartholomew County, on the Jeffersonville, Madison and Indianapolis Railway. This place is mentioned in the minutes first under date of 1827, when it belonged to the Illinois Conference, and Constant B. Jones was its pastor. In 1828 it reported 560 members, and Asa Beck was appointed to it. It was then a circuit, but subsequently became a station. It is in the Southeast Indiana Conference, and reports: members, 291; Sunday-school scholars, 212; church property, $6000.

Columbus, Miss. (pop. 4812), the capital of Lowndes County, is on a branch of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, and also on the Tombigbee River. A circuit by this name was connected with the South Carolina Conference as early as 1807. In 1809 it reported 71 white and 15 colored members. In 1814 it appears on the Mississippi district of the Western Conference, and then reported 126 white and 14 colored members. In the division of the church, in 1845, its membership was identified with the Southern church, which occupied the ground exclusively until the close of the Civil War. After that time a large portion of the colored membership became connected with the M. E. Church. The statistics of 1877 are: M. E. Church: 910 members, 100 Sunday-school scholars, $3700 value of church property. Methodist Church South: 253 members.

Columbus, O. (pop. 31,274), the capital of the State, was selected as the seat of government in 1812. In 1816 it was incorporated as a borough, and in 1834 as a city. In 1820 its population was 1400. Its public buildings are superior, especially the State capitol and penitentiary, and the asylums for the deaf and dumb. A large proportion of the population is of foreign descent. The place now occupied by this city was originally included in the Scioto circuit, to which Rev. Henry Smith was sent in 1800. The first Methodist class of four members was formed in 1814, by the Rev. Samuel West. The first church was built in 1815, enlarged in 1818, and replaced by a new one in 1825. The church now in use was begun in 1853. In 1830 this (Town Street charge) was made a station. Wesley chapel society was formed in 1846 by 190 members of the Town Street charge, who, in 1848, built a church, which Bishop James dedicated. The Third Street society was founded in 1853: in 1854, Bishop Morris dedicated its first church, on Friend Street; in 1859 it bought the Second Presbyterian church, on Third Street, which was burned in 1869 and rebuilt in 1870. Heath chapel, on Broad Street, was built in 1855. The society was for many years connected with Harrisburg circuit, and in 1866 was made a mission. Christie chapel was organized in 1860, and its church built on Cleveland Avenue, in 1861. The Third Avenue society originated in 1867, and in the same year built its church, on the corner of Third Avenue and High Street. The Neil society was organized in 1871, and in 1872 its church was built on one of two lots donated for the purpose by Mr. Robert Neil. The Broad Street society, composed mostly of members from Wesley chapel, organized in 1875, and in the same year built a church. A German M. E. society was organized in 1843; its first church was erected in 1844, on Third Street, and its second in 1871, on the corner of Third and Livingston Streets. The German population is about 8000. St. Paul's African M. E. society was founded in 1823; built its first church on Long Street, in 1824; rebuilt in 1844, and again in 1872. A Welsh Calvinist M. E. society was organized here in 1849, and built its church on the corner of Long and Fifth Streets, in 1850. It is in the Ohio Conference. The table following shows the date at which each church was erected, the number of its members and Sunday-school scholars, and church value, including parsonages:

Comegys, Cornelius Parsons, formerly Governor of Delaware, was born in 1781, and was in his youth brought up on a farm. He was a man of great force of character and strong intellect, and was early called to serve his country in various trusts. He was several times a member of the State legislature, and was Speaker of the House when the war with Great Britain broke out, in 1812. He resigned his place and volunteered in the army, and was made a lieutenant-colonel and also adjutant-general of the State. In subsequent life he was cashier of the Farmers' Bank, held the office of State treasurer, and was governor of the State from 1838 to 1842. He was an earnest and devoted member of the M. E. Church. He died in 1851.

Comfort, George Fisk, a professor in Syracuse University and author, was born in Berkshire, N. Y., Sept. 20, 1833, and was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1857. He was afterwards engaged, in 1857, as teacher of Natural Science and German in Amenia Seminary, New York; in 1858, as teacher of Natural Science, Drawing, and Painting in Fort Plain Seminary and Collegiate Institute, New York; and in 1860, as teacher of Natural Science and Latin in the Van Norman Institute, New York City. From 1860 to 1865 he traveled in Europe and the East, and studied general history, the history of the fine arts, and philosophy, after which he was elected, in 1865, Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Alleghany College. He retired from this position in 1868, and spent three years in the preparation of text-books in the modern languages. In 1872 he was elected Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in the Syracuse University. Professor Comfort was, in 1866, elected a member of the Institute Archeologico at Rome, Paris, and Berlin, and has served for several years as secretary of the American Philological Association. He is the author of a course of instruction in the German language, consisting of the following works: "German Primer," "First Book in German," "First German Reader," "A German Course for Schools," "Teacher's Companion for the German Course," "A German Reader," "German Conversations." All of which are published by Harper & Brothers, New York.

Comfort, Silas, D.D., was born in Deer Park, Dutchess Co., N. Y., May 18, 1808, and died at his residence in Union, Broome Co., N. Y., Jan. 10, 1868. He was converted when nine years of age, and was received into the Genesee Conference when twenty-seven. By earnest application he became a profound scholar. The dead languages, science, general literature, biblical criticism, and systematic divinity were studied and made tributary to the high purposes of his profession. He wrote several valuable volumes, and had another in finished manuscript at his decease. He contributed many choice articles to the periodicals of the church, some of which were republished in Europe. He spent forty-five years in the ministry, serving sixteen years as presiding elder. In 1835 he was transferred to the Missouri Conference, and there served as presiding elder and pastor. After seven years he returned to the Oneida Conference. He was a strong friend of the rights of the colored members of the church.

Commentaries.—In 1755, Mr. Wesley prepared for the benefit of his societies his "Explanatory Notes on the New Testament," a quarto volume of 762 pages. This was accompanied with his portrait, which was the first instance in which his likeness accompanied any of his works. In the preface of this book he informs the reader that for many years he had contemplated such a work, and that the notes were written chiefly for plain and unlettered men who only understood their mother tongue, and yet revered and loved the word of God. In reference to the translation of the text, he remarks that he did not alter the authorized version, except in a very few instances. He relied chiefly on Bengelius's "Gnomon." A second edition of this work was published in 1757. In 1759 he and his brother carefully compared the translation with the original, and corrected and enlarged the notes for a new edition, which was published in 1760. Adam Clarke said of these notes, "Though short, they are always judicious, accurate, spiritual, terse, and impressive, and possess the happy and rare property of leading the reader immediately to God and his own heart." This volume is still in print, and is recommended to the candidates for the ministry in the course of study in the M. E. Church. In 1765, Wesley published his "Explanatory Notes upon the Old Testament," which consisted of three quarto volumes, making 2622 pages. The preface bears the date of April 25, 1765. On the last page of the work is added December 24, 1766. Of it Wesley remarks, "About ten years ago I was prevailed upon to publish explanatory notes upon the New Testament. When that work was begun, and indeed when it was finished, I had no design to attempt anything further of the kind; nay, I had fully determined not to do it, being thoroughly fatigued with the immense labor of writing twice over a quarto book containing seven or eight hundred pages. But this was scarcely published before I was importuned to write explanatory notes upon the Old Testament. This importunity I have withstood for many years."

In the preparation he relied mainly upon Matthew Henry's and Mr. Pool's commentaries, but he added much of his own and of other authors to both of these. Concluding his preface, he says, "My design is not to write sermons, nor to draw inferences from the text, or to show what doctrines may be proved thereby, but to give the direct, literal meaning of every verse, of every sentence, and, as far as I am able, of every word in the oracles of God."

Dr. Coke also published a commentary, in the preparation of which he was assisted by Mr. Drew.

From 1810 to 1826, Adam Clarke published his Commentary, consisting of eight volumes. This was the grandest achievement of his life. As early as 1798 he began to collect materials for this work, the first number of which was published in 1810.

During the preparation of this work he was constantly employed as a minister. For many years this commentary was an acknowledged standard both in Europe and America, and in some respects it is doubted by many whether it has been surpassed even in this day.

From 1811 to 1818, Joseph Benson published his Commentary, embracing five volumes. It was less scholarly than Dr. Clarke's, but was more popular, and was regarded by the Wesleyans as being superior in its theological teaching.

Both of these commentaries have been extensively published and widely circulated. Besides other commentaries published in England upon portions of the Scripture, of late years in America there have been a number of able expositions of different books and portions of both the Old and New Testament. Down to the present time no American commentary embracing the entire Scriptures, published by the Methodist Episcopal Church, has yet appeared. A commentary, however, intended to include both the Old and New Testaments, is very far forward in its compilation. This work is under the general editorial charge of Dr. Whedon. The entire New Testament is completed, with the exception of the book of Revelation. A number of volumes have already appeared upon the Old Testament Scriptures, and others are being rapidly prepared. This commentary is designed to be both scholarly and popular,—adapted both to the critical student and the Sunday-school teacher. There are also expositions of various books both of the Old and New Testaments, among which may be mentioned Nast's "Commentary on Matthew and Mark," Strong's "Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels," Watson's "Exposition of Matthew and Mark," Hilbard on the Psalms, Louking's "Notes on the New Testament," etc. Popular commentaries upon parts of the Scriptures are being published by the Sunday-school department of the church in the form of tracts or leaves or compendiums, and these are distributed among the Sunday-school scholars, teachers, and normal classes of the church.

Committee of Exigency (English Wesleyan).

—This is a necessary provision for cases demanding immediate attention, and for correspondence with the government or Parliament on subjects affecting the general interests of the connection.

The committee is annually appointed, and consists of the president and secretary, the ex-president, missionary secretaries, principal of the Westminster Training Institution, secretary of the education committee, senior secretary of the chapel committee, the ministerial treasurer and financial secretary of the Home Mission and Contingent Fund, with eight additional ministers and nine laymen.

Committee of Privileges (English Wesleyan).

—This committee, since its commencement in 1803, has been actively engaged in guarding the privileges of the connection. It must always be consulted before any lawsuit can be entered upon affecting the whole or even a part of the body. Its office is to keep a watchful eye upon all legislative enactments or proceedings, and to take action respecting the same when necessary. It is appointed annually by the Conference, and consists of the president, secretary, and all ex-presidents, the book steward and editor, missionary secretaries, the governor and tutors of the Richmond branch of the Theological Institution, the principals of the two branches of the Normal Training Institution, the secretary of the education committee, the treasurer and secretary of the Home Mission and Contingent Fund, the secretary of the Fund for the Extension of Methodism in Great Britain, the principal of the Children's Home, six other ministers, with three from the Irish Conference, and twenty-four lay gentlemen.

Common Schools.—Methodism has always manifested a deep interest in the education of the masses, and has recognized the intimate connection which exists between intelligence and virtue. While seeking to establish colleges and seminaries under its own special patronage, it has ever felt a deep interest in the success of the common school system of education. Only the common schools can reach the children of the entire community. With Protestant citizens of all denominations the various branches of Methodism have rejoiced in the fact that by the munificence of the state a good primary education is placed in the reach of the poorest children. From time to time the Annual Conferences have spoken decidedly in reference to their devotion to this cause, and to their anxiety to have the Bible connected with common school instruction.

In 1872 the bishops, in their address to the General Conference, said, "The combined and persistent efforts made by the bishops and priests of the Romish church to destroy our system of common schools attract much public attention. The general diffusion of virtue and intelligence among the people furnish the only sure basis on which civil and religious liberty can rest. It becomes us, therefore, duly to unite with all intelligent Christians and all true patriots to cherish the free institutions bequeathed to us by our Protestant forefathers, in giving an intelligent, firm, and earnest support to the civil authorities in maintaining, extending, and rendering more perfect and efficient our system of primary education, until all the people throughout the land shall share in its benefits and participate in its blessings." The report on education, as adopted by the General Conference, says, "Having carefully considered that portion of the bishops' address that relates to the common schools, we report as follows, viz.: Whereas, we have always, as a church, accepted the work of education as a duty enjoined by our commission to 'teach all nations'; and whereas, the system of common schools is an indispensable safeguard to republican institutions; and whereas, the combined and persistent assaults of the Romanists and others endanger the very existence of our common schools; therefore, Resolved, 1. That we will co-operate in every effort which is fitted to make our common schools more efficient and permanent. Resolved, 2. That it is our firm conviction that to divide the common school funds among religious denominations for educational purposes is wrong in principle, and hostile to our free institutions and the cause of education. Resolved, 3. That we will resist all means which may be employed to exclude from the common schools the Bible, which is the charter of our liberty and the inspiration of our civilization." In the pastoral address of the General Conference of 1876 it is said, "We stand around the public schools in holy and heroic lines for their defense against Romanism and skepticism."

Communion (κοινωνία, a sharing) ordinarily signifies some joint association or agreement. Ecclesiastically it has various significations: 1. Communion is sometimes employed to signify a specific denomination, because its members are supposed to have intimate church fellowship each with the other, and the phrase "excommunication" simply signifies to be deprived of that fellowship, or to be no longer recognized as a member of that body. 2. It is sometimes used, as in the Apostles' Creed,— "the communion of saints,"—to signify that spiritual fellowship and that participation both in spirit and in religious activity which is the joint privilege of all believers. 3. It is more generally applied to the celebration of the Lord's Supper, as an act of fellowship among professing Christians. The phrase, "the holy communion," is one which the Church of England has adopted, and which is also extensively used among other churches. A question has arisen among some denominations whether this communion of the Lord's Supper should be confined to members of their particular denomination, or to such Christians as agree with them on some ceremonial points, or whether all who are recognized as true Christians should be admitted to participate in these holy services. Those who take the restricted view are said to favor close communion. The larger part of the Baptists in the United States and some in England admit to their communion only such as have received immersion. These are called among themselves "strict communionists;" while others, among whom were Robert Hall, and at present Mr. Spurgeon, in England, and a number of eminent divines in America, believe that the communion should not be so restricted, and are called "free communionists." In all branches of the Methodist family an invitation is given to all evangelical Christians of whatever name to unite with them in those holy services, believing that it is one of the most suitable expressions of oneness in Christian life and purpose, and of the visible communion of saints. Among Protestants the communion is invariably received in both kinds,—that is, the bread and wine are administered to each communicant; but in the Roman Church, as the doctrine is taught that the elements are transmuted into the body and blood of Christ, the use of either is a full administration of the Lord's Supper, and hence the wafer alone is usually given to the communicants. Methodists, in common with all Protestants, reject this view. The communion-table is the term employed to designate the table on which the elements are placed in the administration of the Lord's Supper. The communion-service is the ritual or liturgy which is used by the administrator, though the phrase "communion-service" also designates the set of vessels or dishes employed in the service. The "communion-rail" is the term sometimes applied to the place at which the communicants kneel, and which is frequently in Methodist churches termed the altar.

Concord, N. H. (pop. 12,241), the capital of the State, situated on the Merrimack River. It was first settled in 1725, and incorporated by the name of Rumford in 1733, and as Concord in 1765, and as a city in 1853. A biblical institute, under the control of the M. E. Church, for the training of young men for the ministry, was incorporated in 1847. The building was formerly a Congregational church, but being repaired it was presented to the M. E. Church. The institute has since been removed to Boston. This town was originally included in the Pembroke circuit, which was organized in 1807. Concord circuit is first mentioned in the minutes for 1823. The society was regularly organized in 1825, and in 1830 Concord became a separate station, with the Rev. Samuel Kelley as pastor. In 1831 the first church was erected, which was enlarged in 1858, and improved in 1874. In 1874 the society was divided, the divisions being known now as the First M. E. church and the Baker Memorial church. It is in the New Hampshire Conference, and reports in 1876:

Date.	Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
1831	First Church*	220	295	$12,000
1874	Baker Memorial.....	157	181

Concordances are lists of the principal words in any work arranged alphabetically, so that reference may more easily be made. They are especially prepared for finding any passage in the Holy Scriptures. Those most generally used are Brown's and Cruden's.

A small Scripture concordance was prepared by Rev. George Coles, a member of the New York Conference, and was published at the Methodist Book Concern.

Conference Claimants in the M. E. Churches are such persons as have claims, according to the Discipline, upon the Conference funds. They are superannuated preachers, widows, orphans, and extremely necessitous cases. Their relative claims are decided by the Annual Conferences according to their supposed necessities, and the amounts appropriated depend on the funds collected. In 1876 the sum disbursed by the M. E. Church was $134,059.

Conference Collections in the M. E. Church are such collections as the Discipline requires the various preachers in charge to collect from their congregations and report through the Annual Conference. These collections are for the superannuated preachers' mission, church extension, Sunday-schools, tracts, Freedman's Aid, and education. The term is sometimes applied specifically to the collection for the superannuated preachers, which was once called the fifth collection.

Conferences.—The term Conference is appropriately applied to the bringing together of persons for the expression of opinion upon any subject. It is, however, generally employed to denote the assembling of religious bodies. There are notices in the middle ages of meetings termed conferences, in the Roman Catholic Church, which embraced portions of large dioceses. The term was also applied to the meeting of ministers both in Roman Catholic and Protestant countries for the discussion of questions relating to pastoral duties. We have the record of several Conferences held in England to settle religious questions, such as the "Savoy," and the "Hampton Court." This term was given by Mr. Wesley to the first assembly of his preachers, when he met with them to confer on various points of doctrine and discipline; and it has since embraced the various bodies composing the Methodist judicatories, such as the "General Conference," the "Annual Conference," and the "District" and "Quarterly Conferences" (which see). This name has been retained by the different bodies of Methodism however organized, and is also the designation of the highest ecclesiastical body in the Free-will Baptist Church.

Confession of Faith is a term employed in various religious denominations to designate articles of belief systematically arranged. In the Methodist Discipline their equivalent is found in the Articles of Religion and in the General Rules.

Congregational Methodists.—At different periods in the history of Methodism a few congregations have from time to time become independent, and have assumed the Congregational form; though usually in a few years they either return to the parent church, abandon their organization, or become merged in the regular Congregationalists. There is now a small organization in the South which has assumed the title of the Congregational Methodist Church. Its first organization took place in Monroe Co., Ga., in 1852, by members who seceded from the M. E. Church South. Prior to the commencement of the war they had organized a few congregations in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. The chief point at which they aimed in their secession was to secure a permanent instead of an itinerant ministry. In 1872 a paper was established called The Congregational Methodist, which is published at Opelika, Ala., and a vigorous effort was made to extend its influence through a number of the Southern States. In 1874 it claimed a membership of from ten to twelve thousand.

Congregational Singing.—As was remarked in the article on choirs, Mr. Wesley was very partial to congregational singing, and took great pains in instructing his congregations. It is said by some that in his morning service he would sometimes teach his congregation a new piece of music by singing it first himself, and then by asking them to join with him. If they erred in time or tune, he would point out the error and make them sing the verse again. He had fine musical taste, and published a number of tune- as well as hymn-books. The early Methodists were distinguished for their earnest singing, and many were attracted to their services simply by their music. As the church enlarged less attention was paid to this branch of worship, and in many places choirs being employed and new books of music introduced, the congregations failed to unite with them. Since music has been cultivated more generally in the Sunday-schools a new impulse has been given to congregational singing, and the best teachers of music in the church, as Prof. Tourjee, Philip Phillips, and W. G. Fischer, are very earnest in encouraging congregational singing. A few of the churches having fine organs dispense with choirs and employ simply precentors, who lead the devotions of the congregation. Not only in Methodism, but throughout all denominations, the last ten years have witnessed a great improvement in congregational singing.

Conklin, John L., was a prominent member of the Missouri Conference M. E. Church, and was for some time editor of The Central Christian Advocate. He was a clear, logical thinker and a fine writer, of much more than ordinary mind, but of feeble physical powers. While conducting a protracted meeting he sank down in the altar, was conveyed home, and in a few days departed.

Connecticut (pop. 537,454).—The territory embraced in this State was granted by James I., in 1620, in the patent for New England, and was conveyed as a separate territory by the Plymouth Council in March, 1631. The first permanent settlement was made in 1635, the colonists being from Massachusetts. For some time they acknowledged the authority of that colony, but in 1639 they established a separate government. The early settlers were known as Puritans or Independents, and they sought to identify their religious organization with the civil institutions of the country. No person was allowed to hold office or to vote unless he was a member of that church. The severity of the Blue Laws of Connecticut is well known in history. Much that is fabulous has been added. The association of the civil and religious systems produced a declension in piety in the churches, and when Whitefield and others contended for a converted ministry and a converted membership they were strongly opposed by a number of clergymen. Methodism was introduced in 1789, and met with much opposition. This was partly owing to the strong Calvinistic tenets then held by the controlling churches, and also because the itinerant ministers were regarded as intruders. Jesse Lee was the first Methodist minister who commenced establishing regular congregations in the southern and eastern part of the State, though ministers from the State of New York had occasionally held services across the boundary lines. Lee preached his first sermon in New England at Norwalk, Conn., and in his journal is found this entry, "I am the first that has been appointed to this State by the Conference. I set out with prayer to God for a blessing on my endeavors, and with an expectation of many oppositions." Thence he passed to Fairfield, to preach to thirty or forty in the court-house; subsequently visiting New Haven, Reading, Danbury, Redfield, Rockwell, etc. He organized the first society in Stratfield, July 3. The second was formed at Reading. The first Methodist circuit in New England included New-ark, Fairfield, Stratfield, Milford, Reading, Danbury, and Canaan. So little was his success, however, that after seven months' incessant work he had formed but two classes, both embracing only five members. In January, 1790, he formed the third class at Mr. Wheeler's, in Limestone, consisting of two men and two women. In 1790 New England was constituted a district, with Jesse Lee as presiding elder, and he associated with him four other ministers. At the end of this year about two hundred members were reported to Conference, and two churches had been erected: one at Stratfield, called Lee's church, supposed to be the first Methodist church built in New England, the second in Dantown. As has already been remarked, a few of the preachers from Freeborn Garrettson's district, on the Hudson, had crossed over into Connecticut, and a few societies had been organized in that way. The Congregational ministers were supported by law until after the commencement of the present century, and Methodists and even Methodist ministers were compelled to pay tax for their support. In a few cases their property was sold to collect these ministerial taxes. The western part of the State of Connecticut was for many years embraced in the New York Conference, and since its division has been occupied by the New York East Conference, while the eastern part of the State is connected with the Providence Conference. This division and union with other States makes it more difficult to give the exact Methodistic population, but in 1876 the approximate report is 24,681 members, 20,651 Sunday-school scholars, $2,071,000 value of church property. The Congregationalists being the earliest churches established, still retain a large superiority, having more than one-third of the church edifices, sittings, and value of church property in the State. In numbers the Methodists are second, but in the value of church property the Protestant Episcopal Church is in advance of them. The following table, compiled from the United States census of 1870, shows the strength of the leading religious bodies in the State as at that time reported:

	Edifices.	Sittings.	Property.
Congregational.....	360	133,175	$4,728,700

Connectional Fire Insurance (English Wesleyan).—This company was formed in 1872, with the sanction of the Conference, for the purpose of insuring Wesleyan Methodist trust property only. It is placed on a proprietary basis, and possesses a subscribed capital of £25,000. The shareholders are simply guarantors; their interest in the undertaking being a nominal one. The company seeks to obtain the insurance of all the Wesleyan trust property in the United Kingdom. After payment of losses and working expenses and the formation of an adequate reserve fund, the entire profits are to be applied, first to the assistance of the Worn-out Ministers' and Ministers' Widows' Auxiliary Fund, and then for the relief of distressed Chapel Trusts, insuring with the company.

It is estimated that the whole of the Wesleyan trust insurances would yield an income of about £4000 per annum, and that the average annual surplus would be nearly £3000. Losses to the extent of £2233.6.8 have been paid, and two grants have been made to the Auxiliary Fund, while the appropriations to the Reserve Fund have amounted to £2600, a sum equal to 34 per cent. of the entire premiums received since the commencement of the business.

The company has entered upon its fifth year. The current year's income will exceed £3000, while the average annual loss has hitherto fallen short of £600. About two-thirds of the entire Wesleyan insurances are at present effected with the company, and every effort is being made to insure the remainder.

Consecration in the Christian church is the ceremony of dedicating persons or things to the service of God. It is especially applied in the Discipline of the Methodist Churches to the setting apart of bishops for their office, and of dedicating church edifices to the worship of God. The form of the consecration of bishops is to be found in the Discipline or ritual of the church. The phrase "consecration" is used in common with churches of other denominations, and is also preferred in the Methodist Episcopal churches to that of ordination, as the church does not recognize, in the High Church signification of the word, any third order, but simply an official position established by the church and invested with important prerogatives. The custom of consecrating churches has come down to us from a very early period. Though we have no special accounts earlier than the fourth century, yet it must be remembered that for the first two centuries church edifices were not erected, as Christians were not permitted in many places to hold property, nor were they protected in personal rights. Eusebius gives an account of the consecration of a church at Jerusalem, builded by Constantine, A.D. 335. The solemnity began with an oration or sermon, followed by prayers, in which was one specially for the dedication. The day of consecration was usually observed by the church among its annual festivals. In the Church of Rome the services are performed by a bishop in his pontifical vestments, and is accompanied by various processions and ceremonies. In the M. E. churches a form of dedication or consecration is prepared to be used by any minister who may officiate.

Conshohocken, Pa. (pop. 3071), in Montgomery County, on the Philadelphia, Germantown and Norristown Railway. The first Methodist sermon here was preached by the Rev. T. C. Murphy, in the summer of 1848. Occasional open-air services were held until 1854, when Union Square and Conshohocken were detached from Radnor, and the Rev. L. C. Pettit appointed to them. In 1857 Conshohocken was made a separate charge, and the Rev. R. Owen its pastor. In August of this year the corner-stone of a church was laid, and Jan. 10, 1858, worship was held in the church, which was still unfinished. In 1867 the church was finished and dedicated. The parsonage was built in 1867. It is in the Philadelphia Conference. The statistics are: members, 251; Sunday-school scholars, 255; church property, $20,000.

Constantinople (pop. 1,075,000) is the capital of the Turkish Empire, and is situated upon the Bosphorus, having one of the most beautiful sites in the world. It has an old history full of interest. About one-half of its population is Mohammedan. Methodist services have been introduced only incidentally. The Bulgarian mission having been established in 1857, it was found that its interests could be best advanced by the residence of its superintendent for a time in or near Constantinople. A large Bulgarian population is gathered in that city, and whatever there is of literature in that language has been issued under the superintendency of American missionaries from that place. Rev. Dr. Long, for a number of years the superintendent of the Bulgarian mission, became professor in Robert College, which is located in the vicinity, and has given much of his time to the translation and publication of the Bible and of religious literature. In this way, while no church has been formed in Constantinople yet, Methodist services have been held, and it has been a centre of influence for the Bulgarian work.

Constitution is a term frequently employed to designate those principles or enactments which in any form of government are not subject to legislative change, and which can only be altered by a convention or general expression of the popular will. The phrase is applied in Methodist literature to that part of the discipline of the church which, when a delegated General Conference was formed, was placed beyond its direct control by the adoption of what is known as the Restrictive Rules. These prohibit the General Conference from making certain alterations in the doctrines and fundamental polity of the church without the concurrence of three-fourths of the Annual Conferences. The object of all such provisions, whether in state or in church, is to prevent hasty legislation or the adoption of such sudden changes as might interfere with the harmonious and permanent working of government. Usually the constitution in a State government is a definite and precise document, to which reference can always be made. In the Church Discipline the phrase constitution is not employed, and some differences of opinion have existed as to the extent to which the General Conference, without consulting either the preachers or the people, has authority to make changes.

Contingent Fund (American).—The Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church in making its annual appropriations for the various missionary fields sets aside the sum of $25,000 as a contingent fund. Its design is to meet unforeseen emergencies and exigencies which may arise either in the Annual Conferences or in the foreign fields, and for which no provision was made. By the constitution of the Missionary Society it is applicable only to such fields as were established as missions by the previous Annual Conferences, and in them only for peculiar cases unknown at the time when the Conference provisions were made. Such cases arise in the destruction of crops by locusts or grasshoppers, the almost entire failure of crops, or the destruction of church property, or sometimes, as in mining districts, by a sudden change of population, or by the occurrence of any circumstances which unexpectedly interfere with the progress of the mission.

Contingent Fund (Wesleyan).—See HOME MISSION AND CONTINGENT FUND.

Conversion.—The literal meaning of the word is the act of turning, from the Latin word conversio. In a spiritual sense it expresses the turning of a sinner from his sins unto God. In a limited sense it expresses the human part of that change called regeneration by which the sinner is brought into the kingdom of heaven. Matt. xviii. 3: "And said, Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." In a wider sense it denotes the total change wrought by the Holy Ghost upon the human heart through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. The work of conversion cannot be performed, as the Pelagians teach, in the strength of our own nature, and without any inward grace; nor, as the semi-Pelagians teach, is the conversion of the soul to God the effect of its free choice, without any predisposing grace bestowed. Our nature left to itself cannot realize the ideal of which it is a wreck, nor create by its own act the image it has lost. "No man can come unto me except the Father draw him."—John vi. 44.

The work of conversion, on the other hand, is not as the Calvinists teach, the act of God's sovereignty. Sovereignty is a matter of power over forces and events which do not come within the sphere of responsibility. No man can be converted apart from the exercise of his own will; the moment that force enters would be the moment of his degradation as a man. If a man could be saved by a volition of the sovereign, then the humiliation and agony of Christ constituted an unnecessary and inexplicable scene in the divine government. "Therefore I will judge you, O house of Israel, every one according to his ways, saith the Lord God. Repent, and turn yourselves from all your transgressions; so iniquity shall not be your ruin."—Ezekiel xviii. 30. "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord."—Acts iii. 19. Conversion is that act of the sinner whereby, under the continued activity of the Holy Spirit, he, with an earnest will effort, and with his whole heart, turns away from sin and cleaves unto God. The work is the act of the human will as acted upon by the Holy Spirit. It is the effect of human and divine endeavor. Man cannot convert himself, nor can God alone do it. God convicts man. The Holy Spirit works through the faculties of the soul, the mind, the will, the affections, but puts no force upon them. The will compelled is destroyed; it is influenced but not superseded by the divine will. Conversion dependent upon human volition is also dependent upon man's personal co-operation with God. It is conditional upon man's repentance and faith in God through Christ. In Paul's conversion, the Holy Spirit convicted him and illuminated his understanding. His conversion was actualized only when, submitting to God's command, he made a profession of his faith in Christ. "And the hand of the Lord was with them: and a great number believed, and turned unto the Lord."—Acts xi. 21. "And now why tarriest thou? arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord."—Acts xxii. 16.

Means of conversion are (1): the word of God. "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul." (2) The preaching of the word. "And many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God."—Luke i. 16. Conversion is not a question of time but of faith. Men are led into God's kingdom when they accede to his conditions.

In some cases men are led suddenly out of the darkness into light; in other cases the flowing in of the light and life of God is gradual; but in both cases the same consciousness will be found. Primarily conversion is instantaneous, the work of Christ being finished by which conversion is made possible. The moment the soul appreciates the virtue of that work it is changed. "Then they that gladly received his word were baptized: and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls."—Acts ii. 41.

Conviction, a term used ecclesiastically to denote the state of being awakened to a consciousness of sin, whereby the soul of man has a clear sight of its sinful condition, of its guilt before God, and of the punishment due it. It is antecedent to repentance and conversion, and is the first condition that leads to the recovery of the soul from its apostasy; but preceding conversion it does not produce it, nor does it follow that a sinner convinced of sin is or must be necessarily converted. God arrests men in their evil ways, and illuminates their understanding,—some following the light are led into the truth; others with the light bestowed continue in evil. Acts ii. 37: "Now when they heard this, they were pricked in their heart, and said unto Peter and to the rest of the apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Acts vii. 54: "When they heard these things, they were cut to the heart, and they gnashed on him with their teeth." Conviction is wrought in the conscience of the sinner, which, although supreme in the tribunal of the soul, is neither independent nor infallible, but, like other faculties of our common nature, reveals the weakness of a dependent and corrupted creature. All men have a sense and knowledge of sin even as all have a sense and knowledge of God; but the revelation is inefficient for the highest purpose,—the glass is clear, but the eyes are dim; the law is correct, but man cannot apply it. John i. 9: "That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Romans ii. 14, 15: "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: which show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another." I. Cor. xii. 7: "But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal."

The efficient agent in the work of conviction is the Holy Spirit, which not only reveals unto the soul its true condition before God, but also condemns it by his authority and arouses it to a sense of its danger. The primary office of the Holy Spirit is to convince the world of sin, working in the heart of man a secret conviction of its evil and danger. This office belongs alone unto God. The Holy Spirit strives with men and enlightens and reproves them. His work is universal, not confined to any race nor limited to any age. He is present, going through all minds everywhere, moving them inwardly and drawing them unto him. Before Christ the manifestation of his office was not clear, but since the ascension of Christ the race has been living under the dispensation or law of the Holy Spirit. His work, fragmentary in former ages, is now organized, and is the controlling agency in the regeneration of humanity. John xvi. 8, 9, 10, 11: "And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment: of sin, because they believe not on me; of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more; of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged."

The principal means by which the work of conviction is carried on through the Holy Spirit is the preaching of the word of God, and especially of the law. The word enters the intellect of the sinner, while the Spirit interprets it and urges upon the soul its acceptance. The Scriptures give many instances of its arresting men in moments of evil-doing, or when they were satisfied with their own condition. Not only does the Spirit work conviction through the word preached and read, but also through afflictions, dangers, sickness, and disappointments. God makes these instrumental in arousing the sinner to a consciousness of his condition. Acts viii. 29, 35: "Then the Spirit said unto Philip, Go near, and join thyself to this chariot. Then Philip opened his mouth, and began at the same scripture, and preached unto him Jesus." I. Cor. xiv. 24: "But if all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all."

The work of the Spirit in conviction is to lead men unto God, but the effect rests with man. Conviction of sin may or may not lead to conversion. The conscience may be awakened and the judgment convinced, and yet the will and affections remain unchanged, as in the case of Agrippa, who was almost persuaded to become a Christian. A man may be convinced that there is no other way of recovery but by the love of God, manifested in the gift of Christ his Son, through his sufferings and death; may be fully persuaded of the riches of God's grace and the desirableness of happiness, of the comforts of religion here, and of the joys immortal hereafter, and yet with these remain an unconverted man.

Cook, Charles, D.D., a distinguished French Methodist, was born in London, May 31, 1787, and died Feb. 21, 1858. He was converted at the age of twenty-one, and after having served as tutor in a seminary, he entered, in 1817, the Wesleyan Methodist ministry. The following year he was sent to France, and exercised his ministry in Normandy. Acquiring a good French style, he became very popular and useful as a preacher. He traveled extensively throughout France and Switzerland, and in many instances revivals followed his labors. He had more than ordinary administrative talent, and in addition to organizing Methodism he also assisted in originating the Sunday-School and Bible Society. He worked in harmony with the Reformed churches in France, and though oftentimes persecuted, and being compelled to hide himself for some time in Switzerland; he lived to see Methodism firmly planted in that country. Merle d'Aubigné says that Cook "was to France, Switzerland, and Sardinia what Wesley was in his day to England." His life has been published by his son, J. P. Cook.

Cook, Emile, was a distinguished Methodist minister in France. His father had long been the superintendent of the Wesleyan Methodist mission in France and Switzerland, and he was trained in all the details of missionary work. He became distinguished not only for his devotion but for his literary and executive ability. He visited the Evangelical Alliance in New York, and on his return was one of the unfortunate number who were nearly lost at sea. The exposure which he suffered, and the consequent shock upon his nervous system, led to his speedy decline on his reaching home. Few men have manifested more entire devotion to the cause of Christ. He was universally beloved and respected wherever he was known.

Cook, Rev. Isaac Parker, was born in Baltimore, Md., December, 1808, and early received a good English education. He became a member of the first Sunday-school said to have been organized in that city, in 1816. He was a member of the "Asbury Sunday-School Society" fifty years, nearly one-half that time being president of the society. He was president of the Sunday-School Convention of the M. E. Church at the session of the General Conference of 1852, in Boston. He was one of the editors of The Sunday-School Friend, published in Baltimore in 1835; said to be the first Sunday-school paper published in the M. E. Church. He was converted in his fifteenth year, and joined Baltimore city station, now First church; in 1828 was authorized to exhort; in 1830 licensed to preach, and ordained deacon and elder. In 1831 he assisted to organize the "Local Preachers' Association" of that city, and was nearly thirty years its president, very useful and active. For thirty-five years his sermons, and missionary and Sunday-school addresses, averaged one hundred per annum. Several times, by request of Bishop Waugh, he assisted in the ordination of ministers. In 1858 he was one of the founders of the National Local Preachers' Association, and in 1865 he was the president of that body. He formed the "Young Men's Preachers' Aid Society," and subsequently became manager and president of the "Methodist Preachers' Aid Society" of Baltimore. He was identified with the first "Juvenile Missionary Society," and was the originator of the "City Mission," which still exists. He held multitudinous offices of president and treasurer of local and general societies in the M. E. Church. He was treasurer of the Educational Fund, and trustee of Dickinson College. He was Commissioner of Public Schools, and president of Maryland Bible Society ten years. In 1857 he was elected Register of Wills for Baltimore City, and was re-elected without opposition in 1863 for a second term.

Cook, Valentine, an eminent pioneer minister in the M. E. Church, was born in the year 1765 in Greenboro' County, now Monroe Co., Va., and died in 1820 in Kentucky. Very early he succeeded in acquiring a common English education, and also became so familiar with the German as to be able to read, write, and speak the language with ease. He was admitted to Cokesbury College in 1786, and remained there one or two years. In 1788 he was received into the itinerancy, and traveled the Calvert circuit in Maryland. During the year 1792 he was engaged in a newspaper controversy touching the leading principles of Methodism with the Rev. Samuel Porter, a Presbyterian of considerable note in Pennsylvania. When Cook was on the Pittsburgh circuit he was also engaged in a discussion with Rev. Mr. Jamieson, a Scotchman, and a minister of the Seeder Church in the same vicinity. He afterwards became presiding elder, and traveled several districts. In 1797 he was engaged in a public discussion on the subjects and mode of baptism. It is said by his biographer that about this time also "the custom of calling anxious ones to the altar to be instructed and prayed for was introduced into the church by Mr. Cook." His biographer further says, "Prior to the introduction of that practice it was customary for mourners to kneel down in whatever part of the congregation they might happen to be at the time they were seized with conviction, and certain persons were detailed to instruct and pray with them, to remain seated or kneel down likewise." In 1798, Mr. Cook was transferred to Kentucky. In 1799 he was appointed principal of the Bethel Academy, in Jessamine Co., Ky. He remained in the institution, however, a brief period of time, and located in 1800. He spent the remainder of his life in either teaching in academies or in visiting portions of the country, giving whatever services he could to the cause of Methodism. He visited Lexington, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, remaining some time in these cities and preaching with great power to large crowds.

After preaching at a camp-meeting he was stricken down with disease. Of his religious state he said, "When I think of Jesus and of living with him forever, I am so filled with the love of God that I scarcely know whether I am in the body or out of the body," and having said these words he fell asleep.

Cooke, Charles, D.D., was born in St. Mary's Co., Md., Sept. 3, 1799, and died in Philadelphia, Aug. 24, 1875. His parents were members of the Episcopal Church. In 1815 he entered the academy at Georgetown, D. C., and during the vacation of that year was converted at a camp-meeting, and united with the Foundry M. E. church, Washington, D. C. He was licensed to preach in 1819, and employed under the elder on Lancaster circuit, Virginia. In 1820 he was received into the Baltimore Conference, and appointed to Westmoreland. At the organization of the Pittsburgh Conference he fell into that Conference. He was elected as a delegate to the General Conference of 1836, and in 1840 was elected editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate. After this he was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference, and served some of its most important appointments. At the session of 1870 he preached his semi-centennial sermon. His last appointment was St. George's, Philadelphia. He was gentle and amiable, and yet firm, an able preacher, and greatly beloved by his friends.

Cooke, Edward, D.D., president of Claflin University, Orangeburg, S. C., was born at Bethlehem, appointed teacher of Natural Science in Amenia Seminary, New York. In 1840 he was chosen principal of Pennington Seminary, New Jersey, where he continued till 1847, when he entered the pastoral work in the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1853 he was appointed president of Lawrence University, Appleton, Wis. From 1857 to 1860 he was a member of the Board of Regents of Normal Schools in Wisconsin. He returned to pastoral work in 1859, and continued in it in Wisconsin and in the New England Conference till 1864, when he was appointed principal of the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham, Mass. In 1875 he was called to the presidency of Claflin University. He was a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1856 and 1860.

Cooke, William, D.D., of the Methodist New Connection, England, was born July 2, 1806, at Burslem, Staffordshire. He was brought to the knowledge of God in his fifteenth year. Soon after his conversion he became a teacher, prayer-leader, and exhorter. When about seventeen he formed a night-school for the gratuitous instruction of adults. At the age of eighteen he became a local preacher, and when twenty was called to the regular ministry. In 1836 he was appointed general superintendent of the Irish mission, which office he held for five years. When recalled to England in 1841, he became the general secretary of the connectional missions, and held the office for eight years, taking at the same time (one year excepted) the full duties of a circuit as superintendent preacher. In the year 1845 he had a public discussion with Mr. Joseph Barker, a minister who had been expelled the denomination in 1841 for heterodoxy. The discussion, which was held in the large lecture-hall, Newcastle-on-Tyne, lasted for ten nights. Some of Mr. Barker's partisans went from the discussion and burned his writings. In 1848 he was appointed editor of the connectional magazines, and manager of the Book Room, and sustained that office for more than twenty years, with such satisfaction that on his retirement a handsome money testimonial was presented to him. He has been three times president of Conference, namely, in 1843, 1859, and 1869. In 1870 he was made supernumerary, but in 1875 he resumed the duties of the ministry in charge of Forest Hill, near London, where he is still (1877) laboring, though in his seventy-first year. He has written about forty works, theological, polemical, and biographical. Some of these have passed through many editions. His principal productions are, "Christian Theology," "The Deity," "The Unity, Harmony, and Growing Evidence of Sacred Truth," "The Shekinah, or the Manifestation of God," "Discourses Illustrative of Sacred Truths," "Five Hundred attracted much attention, and he was earnestly sought for by the different churches. He filled prominent appointments in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Wilmington, New York, and Newark, and everywhere was instrumental in winning many to the knowledge of the truth. He was a man of unusual pulpit power, and he manifested deep piety, professing the experience of perfect love, and laboring earnestly to expound it. He not only taught it in his public ministrations, but he lived

REV. GEORGE G. COOKMAN.

Newark, N. J., Nov. 13, 1871. He had been early consecrated by his mother to the ministry, and when about ten years of age, while attending the grammar-school of Dickinson College, at Carlisle, he professed conversion, and shortly after united with the church. He was a diligent and earnest student, and after the death of his father he applied himself still more diligently to his studies, becoming quite proficient in Latin, Greek, German, French, and to some extent in the sciences. He was licensed to preach in 1846, when only eighteen years of age, and after serving under the presiding elder, was admitted into the Philadelphia Conference in the spring of 1848. His pulpit efforts to adorn it by his own practice. His last sermon was preached from the text, "We all do fade as a leaf." Confined to bed with severe illness, feeling himself declining, he said, "I am sweeping close by the gates of death;" and on other occasions he spoke of being "washed in the blood of the Lamb." He died universally beloved, and is held in affectionate remembrance wherever he labored.

Cookman, George G., was one of the most popular pulpit orators in America. He was born in 1800, at Hull, England. His father being a man of wealth and position, he enjoyed the advantages of a careful academical education, while he also received a thorough religious training. In his youth he was remarkable for his early efforts in Sunday-school anniversaries and other services. At the age of twenty-one he visited America on business, and commenced his labors as a local preacher. He returned to England, and remained assisting his father for some four years, and in 1825 he removed to Philadelphia. After preaching for a short time as a local preacher, he joined the Philadelphia Conference in 1826, and spent the remainder of his life with ceaseless energy and great success in preaching in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, and the District of Columbia. In 1839 he was elected chaplain to the American Congress, and his sermons were remarkable for both beauty and power. His church was crowded, and a number of the members of Congress and persons in high position were led to Christ through his efforts. His imagination was remarkably brilliant. On the 11th of March, 1841, he embarked on the ill-fated steamer President for a visit to England, and the vessel was never heard of again. As a speaker he became deeply interested in his subject, and every nerve and muscle of his frame seemed to be full of excitement. A small volume of his speeches was published in 1841, but very few of his sermons have been preserved. His widow is extensively known in the church for her personal religious efforts, and for the careful training of her sons, two of whom have been engaged in the ministry.

Cookman Institute is located at Jacksonville, Fla., and is an institution for the education of colored ministers and teachers, with a day-school attached. About thirty boarders have been received in the building, some of whom have been supported by generous patrons. Many of the students are in a primary course of instruction, but a few have pursued the higher English studies and the elements of mathematics and Latin. Biblical lectures were delivered last year to a class of ten young men studying for the ministry. Its property is worth about $4000, and it has a good three-story brick building, which can accommodate 50 boarders, and 150 pupils in recitation. It is named after the lamented Alfred Cookman.

Cool, Peter Y., was born in New York. When a youth he went to California, was licensed to preach, and united with the California Conference, M. E. Church, in 1855, and rendered faithful service. When the Conference was divided he became a member of the southern division, and was appointed presiding elder of the Santa Barbara district. He was re-appointed to the district in 1876.

Cooley, Hon. Dennis N., was born in New Hampshire about 1820. Removed to Dubuque, Iowa, in 1854. He was born of Methodist ancestry, and is a Methodist by preference and by marriage. He early entered the practice of law, and enjoys a fine legal practice in Dubuque and Washington City. He served as commissioner in South Carolina, under President Lincoln, for the sale of islands and lands to the freedmen. Was two years U. S. Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and is president of the First National Bank in Dubuque. He was a lay delegate from the Upper Iowa Conference to the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876, and was the first lay secretary of the former. At the last-named session he was chairman of the book committee. He has long been active as Sunday-school superintendent and in other official positions, and is a liberal supporter of the church and education.

Coombe, Rev. Pennell, was born in Smyrna, Del., Aug. 5, 1811; converted the 24th of June, 1829; received a good English education; filled a vacancy at Elkton, Md., in 1834, and was admitted into the Philadelphia Annual Conference in 1835. He was twenty-eight years a pastor, nine years Conference secretary, four years a presiding elder, one year agent of Dickinson College, and ten years general temperance agent. He was a member of the General Conference in 1856, and also in 1860.

Cooper, Ezekiel, was born in Caroline Co., Md., Feb. 22, 1763, and died in Philadelphia, Sunday, Feb. 21, 1847. His father was an officer of the Revolutionary army. Freeborn Garrettsen came into the neighborhood and proposed to preach. The Revolutionary soldiers were at that time upon duty, and were drawn up in front of the house and formed into a hollow square while Garrettsen stood in the centre and addressed them. During his sermon his attention was attracted by the thoughtful aspect of a boy leaning upon the gate, and apparently absorbed in the discourse. That boy became the distinguished minister, Ezekiel Cooper. He entered the ministry in 1785, and was sent to Long Island in 1786. He traveled on the Jersey circuit. There were then but ten Methodist preachers in the entire State of New Jersey, and only about 1200 members. When he died, New Jersey had become an Annual Conference, with 140 preachers and more than 30,000 members. In 1793 he was presiding elder of Boston district, which then embraced a large part of New England, including what was then the Province of Maine. He was a companion and a fellow-laborer with Jesse Lee in New England, and together they contended against the peculiar difficulties of the times. His field of labor subsequently lay in Brooklyn, New York, Philadelphia, and Wilmington. At the death of John Dickins, in 1798, he was appointed as book agent, and was in 1800 elected by the General Conference as agent and editor of Methodist books. At that time the Book Concern was exceedingly limited in its means, but by his wise and prudent management its interests were greatly enlarged. He continued to act as book agent until 1808, when he resumed his itinerant labors for eight years and then located: he remained in this relation for eight years, and then re-entered the effective work, but was soon afterwards placed in the supernumerary list in the Philadelphia Conference. His personal appearance embodied a fine illustration of age, intelligence, and piety. His frame was tall, but slight; his locks white with years, and his features expressive of reflection and serenity. He was considered by his ministerial associates a "living encyclopædia." He was a diligent student and a close observer. He was never married, was frugal, even to a fault; and, what was quite unusual in that day, left behind him an estate of about $5000. At the time of his death he was supposed to be the oldest Methodist preacher in the world. To him Mr. Wesley addressed the last letter which he wrote to America, in which he uses the strong language, "Lose no opportunity of declaring to all men that the Methodists are one people in all the world, that it is their full determination so to continue." After a brief sickness he died "calmly and peacefully." He was buried in St. George's church, where a marble slab is his memorial. A part of his property he bequeathed to that church for the support of the poor.

Cooper, Samuel C., was born in 1799, and died in Greencastle, Ind., July 19, 1856. In 1818 he was converted, and in 1827 he was received on trial in the Illinois Conference. At its division he became a member of the Indiana Conference. He was an active and efficient laborer, and was presiding elder on several districts. His most useful work was as agent for Indiana Asbury University, in the erection and endowment of which he took great interest.

Cooper, Thomas, Esq.—This "prince and great man" in early Pittsburgh Methodism was the first class-leader and first steward, and also a member of the first board of trustees that was ever appointed in that city: each of which offices he filled acceptably to the day of his death, except one year when he was out of the city. Father Cooper was born in Birmingham, England, July 5, 1777. His parents and grandparents were members of the Wesleyan society. His grandfather was among the first fruits of John Wesley's labors in Birmingham. Convicted in his twentieth year under the preaching of the Rev. Joseph Benson, author of the Commentary, he was soon after converted. In the year 1800 he accompanied his father to this country, and settled in New York, and two or three years afterwards removed to Pittsburgh. He formed a class of thirteen persons, who constituted the whole of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Pittsburgh: among the number was Rev. John Wrenshall, a local preacher, the grandfather of Mrs. President Grant. Revs. Wm. Page and Lewis Sutton were in charge of Pittsburgh circuit in 1803. He was appointed to the office of class-leader by Rev. Mr. Page, and was thus officially the first leader and steward. In 1806 he rented a house for a dwelling and a chapel in which the whole church might worship, which continued to be the sanctuary until 1810, when a lot was purchased on Front Street, while Rev. Wm. Knox, uncle of Bishop Simpson, was in charge of the circuit. His popularity was not confined to the church of his choice, but his fellow-citizens recommended him to be an alderman, which office he held until 1834, when he removed without the city limits. He was also engaged in mercantile life. After 1834 he remained in quiet retirement on a farm until his death, holding official connection with Liberty Street M. E. church, and always true to the "old side" during the struggle with the Reformers. He rarely ever was absent from the Sunday morning service and the meeting of his class. He often had charge of two or three classes. Being a superior singer, for a generation he led the singing in the altar alone. He was a man of wonderful power in prayer and of remarkable faith. He died in great peace, with a halo of glory on his countenance, September 14, 1850, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. He was a man of unflinching integrity, a philanthropist, devotedly pious, well-read, and intelligent. When he came to Pittsburgh in 1803, the shade of a tree was the preaching-place, then his house became the sanctuary in 1806, and the first church in 1810.

Cooper, William, D.D., was born May 31, 1804, in Caroline Co., Md.; converted Feb. 20, 1824, in Smyrna, Del.; and in 1827 was appointed to Chester circuit, under the presiding elder. In 1828 he was received into Philadelphia Conference on trial. After traveling until 1833, on account of severe illness he took no regular appointment until 1836, though he organized St. Paul's church and Mariner's Bethel, Philadelphia. He filled a number of the most important appointments in the Conference during a long series of years, among which were the South Philadelphia and the North Philadelphia districts. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1844, 1856, 1860, and 1872. He became supernumerary in 1873, and resides in Philadelphia.

21, 1832, and was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1855. In the same year he was engaged as principal of the Monroe Academy, Henrietta, N. Y., and in 1856 as teacher of Natural Science and Mathematics in Falley Seminary, Fulton, N. Y. He joined the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1858, and was in the same year appointed principal of the Springfield Academy, now the Griffith Institute, N. Y. In 1865 he was transferred to the Cincinnati Conference, and was appointed president of the Hillsborough Female College, Ohio. He was called from this institution in 1872 to his present position of principal of the Wyoming Seminary, Kingston, Pa.

Copenhagen (pop. 181,291) is the capital of Denmark, and is a beautiful and growing city. Its population belongs almost exclusively to the Lutheran Church, which is the established church of Denmark. Methodist services were introduced by Rev. Mr. Willerup in 1858, and under his superintendence a large church edifice was erected. Deceived in the estimates which were furnished him, the building cost much more than had been anticipated, and proved for a number of years an embarrassment to the Missionary Society. It has been the centre, however, from which services have been extended into several places in Denmark, and by its position has also aided in strengthening and extending missionary work in Norway and Sweden. Services have also been held occasionally in halls in other parts of the city, and regular services have been recently established in that part known as Christianshavn. The statistics report 3 preaching-places, 279 members, 300 Sunday-school scholars, and a church valued at $64,960.

Corbit, Israel S., was born in Philadelphia, of Methodist parents, and was converted in St. George's church. He was admitted into the New Jersey Conference in 1844, in which he remained actively until his last sickness and death, in 1855. He was remarkably successful in the erection and improvement of churches, and in the promotion of revivals. He aided in beautifying the church in Summerfield, in building the church edifice in Princeton, and in erecting the second church in Camden. At Bordentown, which was his last charge, he established preaching in the open air on Sabbath afternoons for boatmen, and in one of his services became so chilled that his lungs became seriously and fatally affected. As he drew near his end clear light shone on his pathway, and triumphant exclamations burst from his lips. Among other exclamations, he said, "When! O when on spirit wing shall I rise above this clay and look down upon the stars as burning dust beneath my feet! I am very, very, very unworthy, but I lean upon the atonement." In his memoir it is said "that as an eloquent preacher he had scarcely a superior in the Conference. His mind had reveled among the Greek poets till he had caught the brightness of their theme, and, like the face of Moses when he came down from the mount, it shone with their splendor."

Corbit, William P., was born in Philadelphia, Oct. 12, 1818; was converted in 1839, and was admitted on trial in the New Jersey Conference in 1841. He has filled a number of prominent appointments in the New Jersey, New York, New York East, Baltimore, and Newark Conferences; has been connected with many revivals, and has received large numbers into the church; he has also aided in erecting several beautiful church edifices. He is at present (1877) stationed in Jersey City.

Cordozo, H. L., a native of Ohio, from whence he removed to South Carolina, and occupied important trusts under the State government, his brother being Secretary of State in South Carolina. He is very active in the M. E. Church, and was lay delegate from the South Carolina Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Cork (pop. 78,382), a large city in the south of Ireland, having for its seaport Queenstown. It is the third city of Ireland in importance as well as in population. The inhabitants of the south of Ireland are nearly all Romanists, though a few Protestants are found in nearly every parish. Methodism was early introduced into Cork, and the young societies enjoyed the personal labors of both John and Charles Wesley. The latter was the subject of much persecution, and not unfrequently mobs were excited. The Methodist societies, however, do not increase to any great extent, as, owing to the opposition experienced and the character of the population, many of them emigrate from year to year. It was in this city that Richard Boardman, the first missionary to America, died. There are now stationed in Cork two Wesleyan Methodist ministers, who report (1876) 404 members and 371 Sunday-school scholars. The value of church property is not reported in the Irish minutes.

Cornell College, Iowa, is located in Mount Vernon, sixteen miles east of Cedar Rapids, on the Chicago and Northwestern Railway. The campus embraces about thirty acres, and commands one of the finest prospects in the country. It was projected by Rev. G. B. Bowman, in 1851, as the Iowa Conference Seminary. The school was not formally opened until Nov. 14, 1853. It continued as a successful seminary until 1857, when it was organized as a college, and received the name of "Cornell," from its generous benefactor, the late W. W. Cornell, Esq., of New York City. The first building erected, the ladies' hall, was commenced in 1852, and was used for general school purposes until 1857. The main college edifice was dedicated in 1857. The gentlemen's hall was erected in 1872. A fine stone building for chapel, library, and museum is in process of erection, and will soon be completed. For style of architecture and convenience of arrangements this will be one of the finest buildings in the State. The institution devotes special attention to practical chemistry, and is furnished with a valuable apparatus, and also with a set of engineering instruments. The museum contains a large and valuable collection to illustrate the various departments of natural history, and the library is composed of over four thousand volumes. From the beginning the institution has been equally open to both sexes. The ladies' hall has recently been refitted and enlarged, so as to give superior advantages to young ladies. It can, however, accommodate only about fifty. Nine scholarships have been added with $500 each, for the purpose of educating, without charge for tuition or incidental fees, young men preparing for the ministry. There is also an endowment of about $80,000. An army officer under the authority of the government has been detailed by the Secretary of War to act as professor of military science and tactics. The faculty consists of Rev. W. F. King, D.D., President, and Hamline Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy; Alonzo Collins, M.A., Natural Sciences; Henrietta J. Cook, M.A., Preceptress, and Professor of History and German; Rev. Hugh Boyd, M.A., Greek and Latin; James E. Harlin, M.A., Mathematics; Sylvester N. Williams, C.E., Civil Engineering, assisted by a number of tutors in the ornamental and preparatory branches. (See cut on the following page.)

Cornell, J. B., Esq., was born at Rockaway, Long Island, Feb. 7, 1821. His ancestors were English, and among the earliest settlers in the country. He was brought up on a farm until fifteen years of age, when he learned the iron business. In 1847, with his brother, W. W. Cornell, he commenced a manufactory in New York with a very limited capital, and employed only four or five men. At present the firm employs from five to nine hundred men. When seventeen years of age he joined the old Green Street church, in New York, and has ever since been a devoted and active member, having been both class-leader and trustee. He has also taken a deep interest in Sunday-schools, and in the cause of church extension. For several years he has been president of the City Mission and Sunday-School Society, and has given not only large contributions, but also much of his time, to promote its interests. He was a lay delegate to the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876.

Cornell, William W., late of New York, was born on Long Island, Jan. 1, 1823, and died March 17, 1870. At sixteen years of age he began to learn the iron business with an elder brother, and was converted in his eighteenth year, when he united with the church, and continued an active and earnest member until his death. The first hundred dollars which he earned after commencing business for himself he gave to the Missionary Society, then making a special call for funds. He peculiarly loved the Sabbath-school, and was long a superintendent and liberal supporter. He was the first president of the Sunday-School and Missionary Society of New York City, and gave his time and his means with almost unbounded liberality. During his four years' administration eight churches were built, his own contribution being in each case one-half of the cost. The edifice on Thirty-fifth Street he gave to the society. He was one of the noblest men that ever graced and honored New York Methodism. As might have been expected, his faith was triumphant in the sick and dying hour.

Corner-Stone Laying.—Previous to the year 1864 the form of service at the laying of a corner-stone was left in the M. E. Church to the judgment of the officiating preacher. At the General Conference of 1864 a form was provided and published in the Discipline. This consists of a brief address, prayer, hymns, Scripture lessons, and, if desired, a sermon. After which the contributions of the people shall be received. And then the minister, standing by the stone, shall exhibit to the congregation a box to be placed in an excavation of the stone. It may contain a copy of the Bible, the Hymn-Book, the Discipline, the church almanac for the year, church periodicals of recent date, the names of the pastor, trustees, and building committee of the church, with such other documents as may be desired. A list of these may be read; after which the minister may deposit the box in the stone and cover it, and the stone shall be laid and adjusted by the minister, assisted by the builder. Then shall the minister say, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, we lay this corner-stone for the foundation of a house to be built and consecrated to the service of Almighty God, according to the order and usages of the Methodist Episcopal Church." The service may conclude with extemporary prayer, the Lord's Prayer, and the benediction.

Corning, N. Y. (pop. 4018), in Steuben County, on the Erie Railway and important branches. The commerce of the town is chiefly in lumber and coal. In 1839, when Corning appears first in the minutes, it was connected with Addison, and in charge of A. Abbott and Philo Tower. In 1840 the pastors were Philo Tower and Charles S. Davis, and in 1841 they reported in the circuit 445 members. It is in the Genesee Conference, and its statistics are: members, 270; Sunday-school scholars, 220; church property, $25,000.

Cornish, Geo. Henry, of the Methodist Church of Canada, was born in Exeter, Eng., June 26, 1834, and was converted in Toronto in 1852. He received an elementary education in a commercial school, and subsequently pursued a more liberal course in Victoria College. In 1858 he was received into the Conference. His skill in penmanship, and his readiness in statistics, caused him to be selected as one of the statisticians of the old Canada Conference, and afterwards its journal secretary from 1872 to 1874. He has since filled the same place in the London Annual Conference. He has published a hand-book of Canadian Methodism, which contains valuable statistics as to the ministers and circuits, and the various officers of the several Conferences, together with a tabulated view of the Connectional Funds, and the various operations of the church. He reports that in the last nineteen years he has "traveled 66,285 miles, preached 3258 sermons, held 1531 prayer-meetings, led 680 classes, made 6845 pastoral visits, and received into church fellowship 1233 persons."

Corporation is an association for any special purpose, which is sanctioned by the state and recognized as a "civil party." The rights usually bestowed on corporations are to hold and acquire property, to contract obligations, and to sue and be sued. Ecclesiastically, it is the recognition by the state of the membership of any one congregation, or of certain persons selected from among them, as a body to hold the property for the use of the congregation. The early Methodist societies in England were not incorporated, and the property is held under a general deed of trust, which secures the preservation of denominational order. In the United States different forms prevail in different States: in some, church officers are recognized simply in view of their election, as shown by the records kept by the church; in others, they are recognized when the elected officers are recorded according to law; in others, a specific charter or act of incorporation is obtained, either directly from the legislature or, more usually, under a general act of incorporation from the local courts. Wherever incorporated, the property is held for the use of the congregation according to the general Discipline of the church.

Corresponding Secretaries are officers of the various church boards or societies, elected by the General Conference to manage the various interests intrusted to them. The first corresponding secretary elected was for the Missionary Society, in 1836. Since that period a secretary has been elected for the Sunday-School and Tract Society, for the Board of Church Extension, for the Freedman's Aid Society, and for the Board of Education. At one period there were three missionary secretaries,—at present (1877) there are two. They perform the various duties enjoined by the General Conference, but are under the direction of their respective boards of managers for the details of their work. The Discipline permits them to hold their membership in whatever Conference they may choose, subject to the approbation of the bishop. They are elected for four years, without limit as to re-election. Their salaries are determined by the respective boards.

Corry, Pa. (pop. 6809), in Erie County, on the Atlantic and Great Western Railway. It is one of the principal railway centres in the northwestern part of the State, and to its railway connections and the oil-fields in its vicinity is due its rapid growth. It is in the Erie Conference, and its statistics for 1876 are: members, 340; Sunday-school scholars, 240; church property, $15,000.

Cortland, N. Y. (pop. 3066), the capital of Cortland County, was named after Van Cortland, a family who were among the first and most distinguished Dutch settlers of the State. This town was formerly connected with Cayuga circuit. In 1804, Rev. W. Hill visited Cortland, and called on Jonathan Hubbard, a prominent resident of this place, to whom he made known his mission. Notice was given to the different families, and a congregation of twenty assembled at Mr. Hubbard's house, and listened to the first Methodist sermon delivered in that place. There were then only three houses within the limits of the town. Mr. Hubbard was a member of the Presbyterian Church, but had listened to Jesse Lee, and others of like fame, while living in Massachusetts, and through their instrumentality Mrs. Hubbard and some of the children had become members of the Methodist Church. A class of ten persons was soon formed, of whom Elijah Batchelor, who had formerly been a member of the New York Conference, but was then located, was appointed leader. It was through his influence that the circuit preachers were induced to labor here, and in their absence he often preached, and was greatly instrumental in building up and strengthening the church. He soon after entered the regular ministry. He was at different times appointed on the circuit embracing Cortland. This society became a part of Cayuga circuit, which extended from Lake Ontario nearly to Ithaca, and from Cayuga Lake to the Cincinnatus valley.

The corner-stone of the first Methodist church was laid July 4, 1831. The church was rebuilt in 1866. The charge was made a station in 1822. It was supplied by Elias Bowen, Loring Grant, John Dempster, Wm. N. Pearne, and John Alabaster. It is now in the Central New York Conference, and has 475 members, 500 Sunday-school scholars, and $40,000 church property.

Corwin, Hon. Isabod, was born in Urbana, O., April 3, 1823, and died November 28, 1872. He was a brother to Hon. John A. Corwin, of the Supreme Court of Ohio, and son of the late Hon. Moses B. Corwin, M.C. from Ohio. Converted at the age of fifteen, he occupied the office of trustee and steward, and was very active in the Sunday-school. His death, owing to his active, useful, and devoted services, was regarded as an irreparable loss. He acquired a good English education, and by teaching fitted himself for the bar, and he early became prominent. He filled two terms as prosecuting attorney, and, in 1866, was elected to the office of judge of the Court of Common Pleas, for the district composed of Champaign, Miami, and Darke Counties, and at the close of the term, 1871, he was unanimously re-elected. He was an able, conscientious, and upright jurist. His religious experience was of the highest and most active type.

Such was his hold on the community, and the love for him by all denominations, that the pastor of the Roman Catholic church called to see him the day before he died, and prayed for him and asked God's blessing upon him. He died in signal triumph. He was elected as a lay delegate for the Cincinnati Conference to the General Conference of 1872, as a tribute to his Christian excellence and his mental greatness.

Cosby, Lewis F., D.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born at Staunton, Va., Jan. 15, 1807. He received a liberal education, was converted, and united with the M. E. Church. He was licensed to preach Aug. 27, 1828. He embraced the principles of reform, withdrew from the M. E. Church, and united with the Associate Methodist Protestant Church of Lynchburg, Va., and was re-licensed to preach, and became associate preacher with Rev. Dr. Holcombe. He was stationed in Abingdon, Va., in 1831 and 1832; was ordained deacon and elder in 1832; organized a church in Portsmouth, Va., and was pastor in Norfolk, Va., until his health failed. In 1834 he was appointed pastor of Lynchburg and Bedford circuit, comprising churches in six counties. He retired on account of broken health for a series of years. In 1855 he was again stationed in Abingdon, Va. He was twice elected president of the Virginia Conference, and he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Western Maryland College, June, 1872.

Coston, Zara H., was born in Litchfield, Herkimer Co., N. Y., Aug. 6, 1793, and died in Lawrence, Kan., June 3, 1874. He was converted when seventeen years of age, and united with the church in the Genesee Conference. Emigrating to the West, he was licensed to preach at Cincinnati in 1820 when about twenty-seven years of age, and received on trial in the Ohio Conference of the M. E. Church in 1820. Having filled a number of appointments both as pastor and presiding elder, he was transferred to the Pittsburgh Conference in 1829, and stationed at different times in Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Meadville district, Alleghany district, Beaver, Monongahela City, and was three years in charge of the Book Depository at Pittsburgh. He was also agent for Alleghany College. In 1858 he took a superannuated relation. He subsequently removed to the West, and resided in Iowa, Missouri, and Kansas. During his pastorate in Pittsburgh he was in the midst of what was then called "The Radical Controversy." He stood faithfully and loyally to the church of his choice. He was an active and liberal friend of Alleghany College, a man of average ability as a preacher, but superior in the kindness of his nature. On special occasions he preached with great power.

Cottier, Rev. John, is a native of Peel, Isle of Man, born Nov. 6, 1809. His parents were Methodists, and he was converted and joined the English Wesleyan Church in 1832; was appointed class-leader two years afterwards, and was licensed as a local preacher in 1835. In the year 1842 he emigrated to New York, and five years afterwards removed his private residence to Brooklyn, where he now resides, but has for many years been in mercantile business in New York. For twenty out of thirty years he has been a trustee of Sands Street church, and also superintendent of the Sunday-school, and has held various official positions in the church and in general benevolent societies. He was one of the founders of the National Local Preachers' Association, and was president for the year 1866-67.

Council is a term employed in the Methodist Episcopal Church to designate the meeting of the bishop and presiding elders for the purpose of arranging the ministerial appointments. The Annual Conferences hold their business sessions in the forenoon of each day. In the afternoon, and frequently in the evenings, and sometimes until a late hour at night, the bishop and presiding elders are engaged in carefully considering the circumstances of each charge, and of each minister, that a proper arrangement may be made for the ensuing year. The term "council" was first applied, in 1789, to an assembly instituted for the general union and supervision of the church. At the General Conference of 1784 no provision was made for other General Conference sessions. Legislation was accomplished by submitting matters to each Annual Conference separately. This was found to be exceedingly inconvenient, and a Council was instituted consisting of the bishops and presiding elders, who should meet, consult, and prepare matters to be laid before the Annual Conferences, but no act was to be binding on the church unless unanimously approved by the Council first, and subsequently adopted by the Annual Conferences. The first session was held in 1789, and adopted various measures in behalf of the educational and publishing interests. The plan of the Council was at that time changed so as to substitute for the presiding elder, an elder elected by each district. The second session was held in 1790, but was unsatisfactory because its acts were without any binding force. In its stead the Annual Conferences voted to call a General Conference in 1792. Since that period the phrase is applied only to the meetings first mentioned.

Council Bluffs, Iowa (pop. 10,020), the capital of Pottawattomie County, on the Mississippi River, opposite Omaha. In 1851, Council Bluffs appears in the minutes of the Iowa Conference. In 1852 the Council Bluffs mission district was organized, and in 1854 the mission reported 25 members.

The Union Pacific Railroad, which passes through it, caused a large increase of population, and the church shared in the growth of the place. It reports in 1876: 216 members, 105 Sunday-school scholars, $26,700 value of church property.

Course of Study.—As a number of the early Methodist ministers had not enjoyed opportunities for thorough literary culture, Mr. Wesley was exceedingly careful in reference to their habits of study. To assist them he collected such books as he thought would prepare them for greater usefulness, and in his minutes he enjoined them "to read the most useful books, and that regularly and constantly." They were also required "to spend the morning in this employment, or at least five hours in the four-and-twenty." The M. E. Church early insisted on its ministers giving attention to reading, but no specific course of study was enjoined prior to 1816. Before this time the bishop sometimes examined the preachers in the presence of the Conference touching their qualifications. To avoid this inconvenience the General Conference of 1816 directed the bishops, or a committee which they should appoint at each Annual Conference, to point out a course of reading and study proper to be pursued by candidates for the ministry. The presiding elders were directed to refer candidates to this course, and before such candidate could be received into full connection he must give satisfactory evidence of his knowledge of the various subjects. In 1844 the duty was devolved more fully upon the bishops, and it was determined that the course of study should extend through four years. The Discipline now makes it the duty of the bishops "to prescribe a course of study in English literature and in science, upon which those applying for admission upon trial in the Annual Conferences shall be examined and approved before such admission; and also, to prescribe a course of reading and study proper to be pursued by the candidates for the ministry for a term of four years." The General Conference of 1876 also directed that a course of study should be prepared for local preachers. The candidate for admission into the traveling connection is now examined in the ordinary branches of an English education; and also, as to his knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and of the doctrines and economy of Methodism, and his attention is directed to a course of reading. If received into Conference, he is examined at the end of each year upon the studies assigned to that year. In two years, if his examination be satisfactory and his ministerial life and qualifications be approved, he is elected deacon, and at the end of four years, if he has completed the studies and is approved in them, he is elected elder. The examination is conducted by committees appointed by the Annual Conference; the answers in the last year's examination are directed to be given in writing. The course of study prescribed for the several years, as well as for candidates for admission and for local preachers, is contained in the Appendix to the Discipline.

Covenant Service (English Wesleyan).—This solemn institution is brought before us for the first time in Mr. Wesley's journal, Aug. 6, 1755: "On the Monday following, he explained and enforced the service in the French church at Spitalfields, and, after an invitation to enter into this service, eight hundred persons stood on their feet. Such a sight," he says, "I never saw before. Surely the fruit of it shall remain forever."

The form of covenant used then and now was written by the eminent Joseph Alleine, the author of the "Alarm to Unconverted Sinners." At first it was held at frequent times through the year. It is now generally held on the afternoon of the first Sabbath in the new year, and with it is associated the administration of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Covington, Ky. (pop. 24,505), is the capital of Kenton County, on the Ohio River, opposite Cincinnati. It has grown rapidly by the transfer of the population from Cincinnati. The region of country in which the city stands was originally included in the old Licking circuit, and afterwards in the Newport circuit. The name of Covington does not appear in the minutes until 1832, when it was associated with Newport. In 1838 it became a station, and in 1839 reported 156 members. At the division of the church, in 1845, Methodism in Covington suffered severely from the warmth of controversy; a large proportion of the members adhered to the South with the Kentucky Conference, but a number declined to be separated from the M. E. Church. These erected a new edifice, and commenced separate worship for themselves. Since that period both the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church South have occupied the city. The statistics as reported in 1856 are as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
Union Church.....	460	550	$100,000
Shinkle Chapel.....	110	180	6,000
Main Street.....	144	164	10,000
German M. E. Church.....	344	240	26,000
M. E. Church South, First.....	348

Cowles, Henry B., a minister in the M. E. Church South, was born in Virginia, Nov. 2, 1813, and died Nov. 28, 1874, in Petersburg, Va. In February, 1831, he was received on trial in the Virginia Conference, and occupied for more than twenty years the position of presiding elder. He was appointed agent for Randolph Macon College in 1854, and succeeded in raising an endowment of $100,000. "His talents for business were uncommonly good; a man of keen judgment of character, a skillful manager of men, he was punctual, industrious, and faithful in the discharge of every duty. His preaching was simple, direct, earnest, and full of spiritual power."

Cox, Melville B., the first missionary of the M. E. Church to Africa, was born in Halle, Me., Nov. 9, 1799. He says, "In 1818 I found peace in believing, and joy in the Holy Ghost, while alone in the woods pleading for mercy in the lowest language of hope if not in despair. In a few weeks after I joined a small class of Methodists." In 1820 he took charge of a class, and at the close of a year preached his first sermon. In the following spring he commenced traveling under the presiding elder. In 1822 he was received on trial, but, in 1825, owing to failing health, he took a supernumerary relation, and removed to Virginia. In 1828 he located, and became editor of the Itinerant, a paper published in Baltimore to defend the polity of the church against the attacks of the Mutual Rights.

In this place he remained two years; then he returned to Virginia, and entered the Conference, and was stationed in the city of Raleigh. In 1831 he volunteered to go as missionary to Liberia, and attended the General Conference of 1832 in Philadelphia. He was detained during the summer and fall in making arrangements for his journey to Africa, and did not arrive in Liberia until March 9, 1833. At once he commenced his labors, and finding a number of members and local preachers who had emigrated with the colonists from America, he organized them as members of the M. E. Church. He arranged the special interests of the mission, and took incipient measures to establish an academy at Monrovia. So zealous was he that in a few weeks after his landing he arranged for and held the first camp-meeting ever conducted in Africa. His ministry opened with great prospects of success, but in less than five months from his arrival he fell a victim to the fever of that climate, and died July 21, 1833. He desired for his epitaph, "Let a thousand fall before Africa be given up." He was a man of a remarkably sweet spirit, of deep devotion, of considerable culture, and of great though quiet energy.

Cox, William, D.D., was born in New Lisbon, O., Aug. 19, 1817. At the age of eighteen he was converted, and united with the M. E. Church. He pursued his studies in Alleghany College, and in 1839 was received on trial in the Pittsburgh Conference. He has filled a number of important appointments as pastor or presiding elder, and for several years was secretary of the Conference. He was a member of the General Conference of 1856, and was among the few who then voted for lay delegation. He was again a member in 1860, and acted as one of the secretaries, and originated the improvement which makes the minutes published under the direction of the secretary the official minutes of the Conference. The degree of D.D. was conferred on him, in 1859, by Dickinson College.

Coxe, James Clarke Watson, principal of the Vermont Methodist Seminary and Female College, was born at Fort Ann, N. Y., July 9, 1837, was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1863, and in the same year, having already served as principal of the high school at East Bridgewater, Mass., was appointed teacher of Greek and Mathematics in Newbury Seminary, Vermont. He joined the Vermont Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1864, and did pastoral work in that Conference till 1872, when he was elected principal of the Vermont Methodist Seminary and Female College, at Montpelier. He was chairman of the Sunday-school workers of Vermont in 1871, and was a member of the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1872.

Cozens-Hardy, William Hardy, an influential layman of the United Methodist Free Churches, England. He resides at Letheringsett, Norfolk, and is in the commission as a county magistrate. He was one of the parties in a far-famed chancery suit, in which judgment was given in his favor. The point established by it was that where a mortgagee of chapel property is also a trustee his interests as mortgagee are paramount.

Crafts, Wilbur Fisk, author of books for Sunday-schools and Sunday-school teachers, was born at Fryeburg, Me., Jan. 12, 1850, was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1869, and afterwards studied in the school of theology of the Boston University. He joined the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1870, and has since preached in that and the New Hampshire Conference. He has published several volumes relating to Sunday-schools, and designed to serve as helps and illustrations in Sunday-school work, the most important of which are, "Through the Eye to the Heart," Nelson & Phillips, New York; "Childhood, a Book for Parents, Teachers, Pastors, and all Lovers of Childhood," Lee & Shepard, Boston, Mass.; "Trophies of Song, or Articles and Incidents in regard to Sacred Music," D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, Mass.; "The Ideal Sunday-School," Henry Hoyt, Boston, Mass.; "The Bible and the Sunday-School" (outlines of addresses and conversations given at the Sunday-school Parliament in Wellesley Island, St. Lawrence River, in 1876, edited by him), Adam Miller & Co., Toronto, Ont.; "Historic Hymns."

Mrs. Crafts (Sarah J. Timanus) has also contributed many works and articles to Sunday-school literature.

Cramer, M. J., a member of the Cincinnati

Conference, of German parentage, was converted in his youth, pursued his studies, and graduated at the Ohio Wesleyan University. He joined the Cincinnati Conference, and filled a number of important charges. He was appointed consul to Leipzig, in Germany, and has since been minister at Copenhagen, Denmark. He has contributed a number of important articles to the church periodicals, and has, in many incidental ways, served the cause of missions.

Crane, Rev. Jonathan T., D.D., was born near Elizabeth, N. J., June 18, 1819. An ancestor on his father's side, Stephen Crane, was one of the company who settled at Elizabeth in 1665, thus planting the first English colony in the Province. Dr. Crane's parents were members of the First Presbyterian church of Elizabeth. At the early age of thirteen years he was left an orphan. In the eighteenth year of his age he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in 1843 was graduated at the College of New Jersey, Princeton. The next spring he was licensed as a local preacher, and appointed by the presiding elder to the Parsippany circuit. Received on trial in the New Jersey Conference in 1845, he labored the next three years in Warren County. In the summer of 1849 he was elected principal of the New Jersey Conference Seminary at Pennington, where he remained nine years.

Resigning this position in 1858, he became pastor of Trinity church, Jersey City. His subsequent appointments have been as follows: Haverstraw, Central church, Newark, Morristown, Hackettstown, Newark district, Elizabeth district, and Cross Street church, Paterson.

He received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity, from Dickinson College, in 1856, and was a member of the General Conferences of 1860, 1864, 1868, and 1872.

Besides a large number of articles in the Methodist Quarterly Review and other periodicals, he has published the following books: 1. "An Essay on Dancing," 1848. 2. "The Right Way; or Practical Lectures on the Decalogue," 1853. 3. "Popular Amusements," 1869. 4. "The Arts of Intoxication," 1870. 5. "Holiness the Birthright of all God's Children," 1874 (enlarged edition, 1875). 6. "Methodism and its Methods," 1875.

Craven, Braxton, D.D., LL.D., president of Trinity College, N. C., was born in 1823. He entered the ministry when very young, and when nineteen years old was elected as principal of the Union Institute, located in Randolph County. At that time the institution was but in its infancy, but under his constant and energetic supervision it gradually enlarged and extended its sphere of influence. In 1851 it was taken under the patronage of the North Carolina Conference, and in 1853 a loan having been made from the Literary Board of the State, security could only be given by Mr. Craven, with others associated with him, becoming personally responsible. In 1859 he succeeded in having the institution placed wholly under the control of the Conference, and its name was changed to Trinity College. In 1863 he resigned the presidency, and was stationed for two years at Edenton church, in the city of Raleigh, but in 1865 he was re-elected as president, and retains (1877) that position. Under his care 198 students have graduated, who are occupying respectable and some of them very influential positions in society. More than one-fifth of the members of the North Carolina Conference have been educated in whole or in part under his supervision. He is a member of the North Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church South, having united with it in 1857.

Crawford, George W., A.M., was born in Orange Co., Ind., and shortly after his conversion felt it his duty to preach. In 1848 he entered the Indiana Asbury University, where he spent three years. In 1854 he joined the Northwestern Indiana Conference, and after filling for nearly five years important charges he died in Minnesota, August 9, 1859. His dying words were, "Glory! glory to God!"

Crawford, Morris M. D'C., D.D., is an active member of the New York Conference, and has filled a number of its most important stations. He is now (1877) presiding elder of the New York district. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1856, 1860, 1864, 1872, and 1876, and served on some of the leading committees. He has taken a deep interest in the missionary cause, and has for many years been a member of the Missionary Board. He is also a trustee of the Drew Theological Seminary.

Crawfordsville, Ind. (pop. 3359), the capital of Montgomery County, on the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railway. Crawfordsville appears in the minutes first under the year 1825, when Hakaliah Vredenburg was its pastor. It then belonged to the Illinois Conference. In 1826 the circuit reported 160 members, and received as pastor Henry Buell. It is in the Northwest Indiana Conference. The statistics for 1876 are: members, 437; Sunday-school scholars, 250; church property, $20,000.

Credentials in the ministry are the evidences of authority, having been given by some church for the exercise of ministerial functions. The M. E. Church is careful to duly authorize all persons who exercise their gifts publicly. It is the custom in the British Wesleyan Conference when a minister is received on trial to give him a copy of the minutes of the Conference in which is inscribed, "To A. B. You think it your duty to call sinners to repentance; make full proof hereof, and we shall rejoice to receive you as a fellow-laborer." Having spent four years on trial, and having been recommended by the assistant, he is received into full connection, and a copy of the Bible and minutes is given him, inscribed, "As long as you freely consent to and earnestly endeavor to walk by these rules we shall rejoice to acknowledge you as a fellow-laborer." And that Conference also requires that none in any of the societies should exhort without a note of permission from the assistant, which should be renewed yearly. In the American Conference, in 1780, it was enjoined that all the traveling preachers should take a license from every Conference. This license was to be signed by Bishop Asbury. At the same Conference it was also directed that the local preachers and exhorters should not presume to speak in public without taking a note every quarter (if required), and should be examined by the assistant with respect to their life, qualifications, and reception. At the General Conference of 1784 it was required that a local preacher must have a note of permission from the assistant before he should exercise his gifts in public. At the General Conference of 1782, in order to guard against irregularity, it was enacted that there should be written at the bottom of every certificate this statement, "The authority this conveys is limited to next Conference." In 1787 it was determined that when a minister is on trial in the Annual Conference his authority to preach is indicated by his continuance on trial, and is equivalent to the renewal of his license to preach. This has remained the custom of the church. At the ordination of a preacher as deacon or elder a parchment is given him, signed by the bishop, ordaining him, which is considered in the strict sense his credentials as a minister of the gospel. The annual passage of his character at Conference is considered an annual authorization to preach. When any such preacher is expelled from the church, or is otherwise deprived of ministerial authority, he is required to return his parchments or credentials to the Annual Conference of which he was a member, and such papers are to be filed with the papers of the Conference. If at any future time, however, he "should give satisfactory evidence to the said Conference of his amendment, and shall procure a certificate of the Quarterly Conference, circuit, or station where he resides, or of an Annual Conference, who may have admitted him on trial, recommending him to that Annual Conference, of which he was a member formerly, for the restoration of his credentials, the said Conference may restore them." And when a local elder or deacon is expelled, or otherwise deprived of ministerial authority, he is required to surrender his parchments, "to be filed with the papers of the Annual Conference within the limits of which the expulsion took place; and should he at any future time produce to the Annual Conference a certificate of his restoration signed by the president and countersigned by the secretary of the Quarterly or District Conference, his credentials may be restored to him."

Creek Indians, formerly called Muskogees, inhabited the State of Georgia and part of Alabama.

They were a brave and warlike tribe, and in the War of the Revolution adhered to the British. There were frequent contests between them and the white population until they were terribly punished by General Jackson, when they surrendered a large part of their territory. After having ceded portions of their lands in various territories, they ultimately, in 1832, yielded all their lands east of Mississippi and received in exchange lands west of Arkansas, occupying the country north of the Choctaws and Chickasaws. They have advanced in civilization, but have decreased in population. They have about $200,000 held in trust for them by the United States. Various denominations have established missions; among these the Baptists have been very successful. The Methodists have, also, a number of charges, and their membership of about 1000 is embraced within the bounds of the Indian Mission Conference of the M. E. Church South.

Creighton, James, was a presbyter in the Church of England, who assisted John Wesley in the ordination of Dr. Coke. He began to preach in the Church of England in 1776, and entered the Methodist itinerancy in 1783, the year before the ordination of Coke. He died in 1819. He was a thorough scholar and a prolific writer. The most important of his works were "A Dictionary of Scripture Proper Names," and an edition in four volumes of Shuckford's "History of the World Sacred and Profane."

Crever, Benjamin Heck, D.D., of Central Pennsylvania Conference, was born in Carlisle, Pa., March 16, 1817. He was early the subject of religious impressions, and in 1835, during his course of study in Dickinson College, he was converted, and the following spring united with the church. He entered the Baltimore Conference on trial in 1840, and in 1842 was appointed as one of the preachers to the city station. After having spent a year or two in Virginia, and having preached at Lewisburg, his health declining, he engaged, in 1846, as a teacher in Milton. His attention was turned to educational interests, and finding a valuable property in Williamsport, he took an active part in securing its transfer to the Baltimore Conference, and the appointment of Rev. Thomas, now Bishop, Bowman to its presidency. In 1850, thinking his health sufficiently restored, he returned to the regular pastorate, and was stationed at Warrior Mark, Jersey Shore, and Lewiston. He was removed to Baltimore, where he spent four years, and at the division of the Baltimore Conference in 1856, he became a member of the East Baltimore Conference. Having filled an appointment in Cumberland, he was, in 1861, stationed in Frederick City. On the occurrence of the war an intense excitement occurred in that place, and he exerted himself in favor of the Union, and was appointed a chaplain in the hospital department, in which he remained until the close of the war. Returning to the pastorate he was sent to Winchester, Va. There on his first Sabbath his right to the pulpit was contested by a minister from the Church South. This gave rise to difficulties, and litigation followed, resulting in confirming the title to the M. E. Church. The following spring he requested to be removed to other work, and was appointed to the charge of the Carlisle district, and was also elected delegate to the General Conference. He was a member of the committee on boundaries when the Central Pennsylvania Conference was formed, of which he became a member. In 1871, at the close of his labors on the district, he was appointed to Bloomsburg, and feeling that his strength was scarcely equal to the work of the pastorate, he removed, in 1872, to Minnesota, and aided in planting a colony in that locality, where he was enabled to secure the erection of a good church, besides assisting various church enterprises. After spending three years in the West, and realizing a great improvement in his health, he returned to his former Conference, where he is now (1877) engaged in the pastorate. He was from an early period an earnest advocate in the cause of temperance.

Critchfield, Hon. Leander J., a native of Knox County, O., born in Danville, Jan. 3, 1827, was converted and entered the M. E. Church in his seventeenth year. He graduated at the Ohio Wesleyan University in 1849, and subsequently received the degree of A.M. He commenced to practice law at Delaware, and removed to Columbus, the State capital, where he still resides. In 1856 he was appointed by the Supreme Court of Ohio reporter of its decisions, and held the position over fifteen years, continuously reporting during that time sixteen volumes of the Ohio State Reports, and at the same time keeping up his professional practice; declining a further term tendered him to devote his entire time to his law business. In 1860, conjointly with Hon. Joseph R. Swan, he prepared "Swan & Critchfield's Revised Statutes of Ohio," with notes of decisions of the Supreme Court, contained in twenty-eight volumes of the Ohio Reports, which is a standard authority. Governor, now President, Hayes tendered him a place on the commission to codify the statutes of the State, but he declined. Active and devoted in church matters, his usefulness was recognized by the Ohio Lay Electoral Conference choosing him to represent them at the General Conference in 1872, where he performed valuable service on the book committee. He was elected alternate delegate in 1876. Long a trustee of Ohio Wesleyan University, and taking a deep interest in its welfare, he has been honored with proffers of civil positions, but preferred to continue in his professional career.

Croggon, Rev. W. D., was appointed to a circuit in England in 1817, but subsequently labored successfully in France and Greece: was Superintendent of Schools in Ireland fourteen years: died in 1854, aged sixty-three.

Crooks, Adam, was born May 3, 1824, at Leesville, O. His conversion occurred in his fourteenth year. When sixteen years old he sought the blessing of entire sanctification, and realized the joy of complete salvation. He was then a member of the Methodist Protestant Church. The association of that church with slavery led him to unite with the Wesleyan Church, which was organized at Leesville, O., July 25, 1843, of which he was made a class-leader. Exhorter's license was given him in 1844, and in 1845 he joined the Alleghany Wesleyan Annual Conference, and became pastor of a feeble colored church in Erie, Pa. In 1847 forty anti-slavery Methodist citizens of North Carolina, who would not recognize the "Church South," met in convention in Guilford County, adopted the Wesleyan Discipline, and asked to be supplied from his Conference. It was then a peril of life to any "abolition preacher" to labor in North Carolina. He preached there, however, four years, giving faithful yet kind testimony against slavery, as well as all other sins.

The public prejudice against "abolitionists and Free-Soilers" developed a storm of opposition. Warnings, threats, public denunciation, and formal indictment before the Superior Court of Forsyth County followed. The "misdemeanor" charged was, "Circulating the 'Ten Commandments' with intention to excite insurrection," etc. This was a tract showing that slavery violated all the commandments. He was not convicted.

A formal demand by citizens of Montgomery and adjoining counties was made in writing that he should leave the State by Feb. 1, 1850. This he refused to do. Subsequently, with fearful oaths and imprecations, five men conspired to kill him on the road, but allowed him to pass unmolested. A few months later nearly two hundred men, ten of whom were magistrates, entered the Lovejoy chapel during public worship, headed by a "justice of the peace." Four men dragged him from the pulpit, conveyed him to Troy, and imprisoned him by order of the sheriff, who released him after enforcing an agreement to leave Montgomery County. Adjacent counties were equally indignant, and organized armed bands to seize, lynch, and kill Mr. Crooks. This provoked an opposite feeling, and hundreds armed to defend him. A quarterly meeting at Union, Guilford Co., was to be the occasion of a collision. Thousands were purposing to be on hand. Blood was sure to flow on both sides. So judged eminent men who were Mr. Crooks's friends. He therefore declined to attend the meeting, and left for the seat of the Alleghany Conference. His Southern work was ended.

From 1851, for thirteen years, Mr. Crooks was occupied with the pastoral work in Ohio. He was elected to the honorary degree of A.M., in 1863, by Adrian College. In 1864 he was chosen editor of the American Wesleyan, the organ of the Wesleyan Connection. This position, associating therewith the office of book agent, he occupied to the close of his life, at Syracuse, N. Y., Dec. 15, 1874. He was faithful to his convictions of duty, successful in the ministry of the word, a champion of the true Wesleyan principles of a hundred years ago. Devout ministers of various denominations followed him to the grave, whose public testimony was that he was possessed of such "eminent Christian zeal, courage, untiring energy, and quick fraternal sympathy as endeared him to them, and gave him a high place in their respect."

The opinion of the entire Wesleyan body was well expressed by Dr. Lore in The Northern Christian Advocate, who said, "When Dr. Prindle and many other leading men judged it better to abandon their organization and return to the M. E. Church, Brother Crooks threw himself into the breach. If there had been no Adam Crooks at that crisis there would have been no American Wesleyan Church now."

Crooks, George R., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1822, entered Dickinson College in 1835, and graduated in 1840, spending one of the intermediate years in Illinois. In 1841 he began the itinerant life in that State, traveling the Canton circuit, which then comprised parts of Fulton, Knox, and Peoria Counties, with Rev. Richard Haney. In the fall of that year he was recalled to Dickinson College, where seven years were spent as tutor, principal of the grammar-school, and adjunct professor of Latin and Greek. In 1843 he was admitted to the Philadelphia Conference, and in 1848-49 traveled Dauphin circuit; in 1850 was appointed to Pottstown circuit; 1851-52 to Trinity church, Philadelphia; in 1853-54 to St. John's, Philadelphia; in 1855-56 to St. Paul's, Wilmington, Del.; and in 1857 was transferred to the New York East Conference. In this Conference he has served as pastor of the Seventeenth Street church, New York, two terms, Summerfield, Brooklyn, and the M. E. church of Flushing, L. I. In 1876 he was transferred to the New York Conference, and appointed to St. Paul's, Tarrytown.

In 1846, Dr. Crooks was associated with the late Dr. McClintock in the preparation and publication of a series of Greek and Latin elementary books for schools, which have been widely circulated. In 1852 he published an edition of Bishop Butler's Analogy, completing an unfinished analysis of that work left by the late Dr. Emory.

In 1857, in connection with Professor A. J. Schem, he prepared and published a Latin-English School Lexicon. In 1860 he became editor of The Methodist, a position which he held for fifteen years. This paper under his direction was largely instrumental in carrying lay delegation, after a persistent advocacy of eleven years. In 1856 he published the "Life and Letters of the Rev. John McClintock, D.D." He is now engaged in association with the Rev. Dr. J. F. Hurst in editing and preparing a series of theological works.

Crowell, Loranus, a member of the New England Conference, was born in Ware, Mass., Oct. 28, 1815, and was the son of Rev. Joshua Crowell. While pursuing his studies at the Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham, he was converted at the age of fourteen years. He graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1840. For four years he was principal of the Springhill Boarding-School, at Sandwich, Mass., and in 1844 he was received into the New England Conference. He has occupied a number of important stations in Lynn, Worcester, and Boston. He has also been presiding elder on the Lynn, Boston, and Worcester districts. He was a delegate to the General Conference of 1856; and from 1856 to 1860 was a member of the general missionary committee. For some twelve years he has been trustee of the Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham.

Crowther, Jonathan, an English Methodist minister, was born in Cornwall, England, July 31, 1794. He was educated at the Kingswood School, and became an itinerant preacher in 1814, and headmaster of Kingswood School in 1823, and afterwards of Woodhouse Grove. After serving several churches he was, in 1837, appointed to superintend the Wesleyan missions in India, where he was eminently successful in establishing the missions, especially in Madras. In 1843 he returned to England, and in 1849 was appointed classical instructor at the Theological School at Didsbury, where he remained until his death, Jan. 11, 1856. He was a most prolific writer, and published not less than twenty-one separate sermons and volumes, the most important being "A Portraiture of Wesleyan Methodism," "The Scripture Gazetteer, or the Geography of the Bible," and "The Life of Dr. Coke."

Crystal Springs Camping-Ground is located on the Dowagiac Creek, about eight miles from the city of Niles, Mich. It contains thirty-five acres of ground, and is held in fee simple by the trustees of the Niles district of the M. E. Church. The soil is a sandy gravel, beautifully undulating, shaded with oak-, hickory-, and maple-trees. The springs are of great volume, and the water is remarkably pure. The State fish-hatchery is located on these grounds, and uses a part of the water of the springs, which adds to the general interest. Camp-meetings have occupied it for several years, and have been largely patronized by the citizens generally.

Cubitt, Rev. George, was five years a missionary in Newfoundland. In 1836 he was appointed connectional editor, which office he continued to hold till the close of his life, in 1850.

Cumback, Hon. Will, was born at Oxford, O., in 1828, and removed to Indiana while but a youth. He was early converted, and was active in church interests. He was elected to Congress in 1854, to represent the Greensburg district, though only twenty-six years of age, being one of the youngest men ever elected to that body. In 1868 he was elected lieutenant-governor of Indiana. During the war he was a paymaster in the army, and handled sixty-two millions of dollars. For years he was revenue collector of the fourth district of Indiana. He was educated at Oxford College, became a lawyer, and rose to distinction. He has been active in all departments of church service, and has held many official positions. He has also devoted much time in promoting the educational interests of Methodism in Indiana, and is a popular lecturer. He filled the position of lay delegate for the Southeastern Indiana Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Cumberland, Md. (pop. 8056), the capital of Alleghany County, on the Potomac River, and on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. This city is located near the commencement of the Cumberland coal regions, which extend west to the Ohio River. It was very early visited by Methodist itinerants. It is first mentioned by name as a circuit in 1783, when John Cooper was appointed as preacher. It was then occasionally called Old Town, and at that Conference reported 50 members. The circuit being in Alleghany County, its name was changed from Cumberland to Alleghany at the Conference of 1783. The deed of the lot on which the first church was built bears the date of 1799; the church is supposed to have been built in 1800. In 1816 this church, which stood on Smallwood Street, was abandoned, and a new one built on Centre Street. In 1829 Cumberland was made a station, and in 1837 the church was enlarged by the addition of fifteen feet to the rear, and raised to a full two-story building. This house was used until 1848, when it was replaced by a new one, the corner-stone of which was laid by Bishop Hamline. In 1871 the old church was torn down and the present fine one begun; in 1872 the lecture-room was dedicated and occupied; in 1875 the house was finished. Previous to 1849 the colored members worshiped with the white, but in that year they organized a separate society, and in 1851 or 1852 built a church of their own, which they enlarged and remodeled in 1870. For a number of years after the organization of this society two preachers were sent to Cumberland, who alternated in the services of the white and colored members. In 1870, Kingsley chapel, in South Cumberland, was built. It has done and is doing excellent service to the railway and canal-boat men, who live in large numbers in that neighborhood. In 1876 a neat brick parsonage was built by the society. Trinity M. E. Church South was organized in 1868, and in 1869 built a house of worship on South Centre Street, but in 1876 its society becoming embarrassed and discouraged, disbanded. A Methodist Protestant society was formed in 1836, and built its first church on Bedford Street. In 1849 this church was replaced by a new one. An African M. E. society was also organized, and has a church on Frederick Street. It is in the Baltimore Conference. Statistics: Centre Street: members, 485; Sunday-school scholars, 400; church property, $42,000. Kingsley chapel: members, 156; Sunday-school scholars, 265; church property, $1200. Colored M. E. Church: members, 104; Sunday-school scholars, 125; church property, $6000.

Cummings, Joseph, D.D., LL.D., ex-president of the Wesleyan University, was born in Falmouth, Me., March 3, 1817, was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1840, and in the same year was appointed teacher of Natural Science and Mathematics in Amenia Seminary. In 1843 he was elected principal of that institution. He joined the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1846, and was employed in pastoral duties till 1853, when he was appointed Professor of Theology in the Methodist General Biblical Institute, Concord, N. H. In 1854 he was elected president of Genesee College, and in 1857 president of the Wesleyan University. He resigned the presidency in 1874, but remains (1877) Professor of Moral Philosophy. He has edited an edition of Butler's Analogy, and has published several sermons and tracts. He was a member of the General Conference of 1876.

Cunningham, Edwin W., a resident of Emporia, Kan., and lawyer by profession. He represented in the General Conference of 1876, as lay delegate, the South Kansas Conference.

Cunningham, James, D.D., was born in Philadelphia, Nov. 30, 1811; was converted, and united with the church in 1829. He was licensed to preach in 1833, and admitted on trial in the Philadelphia Conference of the M. E. Church in 1834. Since that time he has been continuously actively engaged in the ministry, filling important appointments in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware. In 1854 he was corresponding secretary of the Philadelphia Conference Tract Society. The four following years he was presiding elder on Reading district, and from 1865 was four years on Wilmington district. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1852, 1856, 1864, and 1868. He is at present (1877) stationed at St. George's, Philadelphia, and is a member of the Board of Church Extension.

Currie, Duncan Dunbar, of the Canadian Methodist Church, was born in Fredericton, New Brunswick; was converted in 1847, and entered the ministry in Eastern British America in 1853. He has occupied some of the most important charges in his Conference, and has been engaged in extensive revivals. He was four years secretary of the Conference of Eastern British America, and is (1876) secretary of the Conference of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. He has published a catechism on baptism, which has passed through several editions.

Curry, Daniel, D.D., editor of the National Repository, was born near Peekskill, N. Y., Nov.

REV. DANIEL CURRY, D.D.

26, 1809. He was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1837, and became principal of the Troy Conference Academy, West Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in the same year. In 1839 he became a professor in the Georgia Female College, at Macon, Ga. He entered the Georgia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1841, and filled pastoral charges at Athens, Savannah, and Columbus. In 1844 he was transferred to the New York Conference. He continued engaged in pastoral work till 1854, when he was chosen president of the Indiana Asbury University, at Greencastle, Ind. After three years he returned to New York, and entered the New York East Conference. In 1864 he was elected by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church editor of The Christian Advocate, at New York. He was re-elected to that position in 1868 and 1872. In 1876, the General Conference having ordered a committee to consider the propriety of making some change in the Ladies' Repository, to make it a magazine of wider interest and more extended usefulness, he was elected as editor. Dr. Curry has written much for the periodicals of the church, in addition to the articles which he has given in the course of his regular editorial work. He has published a "Life of Wyckliff," "The Metropolitan City of America," and a "Life of Bishop Davis W. Clark," and has edited the writings of the late Rev. Dr. James Floy, and an edition of Southey's "Life of Wesley."

Curry, Hiram M., a minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Adams Co., Ohio, April 7, 1818, and died in Fletcher, Miami Co., March 3, 1874. Converted in his youth, he was admitted on trial in the Ohio Conference in 1848. Besides other appointments, he served as presiding elder of Green River, Covington, and Mobile districts. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1860. In 1863 he was transferred from the Kentucky to the Cincinnati Conference. While in Kentucky he suffered great persecution, because of his anti-slavery and Union sentiments. "Few men of his time did more hard work."

Curtis, Edward C., a delegate from the Central New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born about 1831, was converted at Charleston, S. C., in 1848, and joined the Oneida Conference in 1854. In 1870 he was appointed agent of the Syracuse University to obtain funds for its endowment.

Cusworth, Rev. Joseph.—For twenty-seven years he was one of the treasurers of the Home Mission and Contingent Fund. During his governorship of old Kingswood School he succeeded in having the noble building at Lansdowne (New Kingswood) erected, and the school for ministers' sons removed to that place. He died March, 1857, in the seventy-first year of his age.

Cuthbertson, John, an eminent member of the United Methodist Free Churches, England. He is a class-leader in the London seventh circuit, and resides in Chelsea. He is known, however, throughout the connection, having been for many years one of its most influential laymen. He was elected a member of the connectional committee in 1858, and at every successive assembly the same honor has been conferred on him. He has been a member of the Book Room committee since its formation, and treasurer of the Book Room Fund for fifteen years. Mr. Cuthbertson was brought up a Wesleyan, and continued in fellowship until the memorable disruption. He was an elder brother of Mr. Thomas Cuthbertson.

Cuthbertson, Thomas, a leading layman of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, was born in London in 1814. In early life he became identified with the Wesleyan body, and was soon engaged in the zealous proclamation of the gospel. As a local preacher he labored with great acceptance. When Revs. Jas. Everett, Samuel Dunn, and William Griffith were expelled the Conference in 1849, Mr. Cuthbertson entered into the Wesleyan Reform movement. In the union of the Wesleyan Reformers and Wesleyan Methodist Association, resulting in the formation of the United Methodist Free Churches, he fervently rejoiced, and his time, talents, and prayers were all bestowed freely on the new denomination. His business engagements made him be "in journeyings oft," and more than one feeble station had cause to hail his periodical appearances. He enjoyed in a large measure the esteem and confidence of his brethren, and he was often placed in positions of honor. He was a member of the Book Room committee from its establishment, and with almost as great regularity was he elected from year to year on the foreign missionary committee. He was an active member of the Wesleyan Local Preachers' Mutual Aid Association, and was elected president in 1869. His end was sudden. When journeying from Newcastle-on-Tyne to Alnwick, on Tuesday, Oct. 26, 1875, he arrived at Bilston Junction between 6 and 7 o'clock in the evening. When the train stopped, Mr. Cuthbertson rose from his seat, but fell back and expired. "He was not, for God took him." The respect in which he was held led to a movement for the perpetuation of his memory. A sum of money was contributed by which an elegant mural tablet has been erected in Pimlico chapel, where he was wont to worship, and an amount invested by which a £10 prize, to be called the Cuthbertson Prize, will be given annually to the most proficient student in the Theological Institute, and another prize to the probationer on a foreign station who is most successful in written examinations. Mr. Cuthbertson was a man of rare moral excellence, and striking testimonies were publicly borne to his remarkable worth. He was the friend of the young and a supporter of Sunday-schools, and manifested a deep interest in foreign as well as home missions. The inscription on the tablet erected to his memory is, "He was a good man and just; strong in the love of truth, full of winning kindness and charity. With singular wisdom and untiring zeal he labored in God's cause. He was a local preacher forty-two years, and in manifold ways rendered eminent service to the United Methodist Free Churches."

Cuykendall, E. N., was born in 1826, and died Sept. 4, 1857. In 1848 he entered the Oneida Conference, and shortly after professed to receive the blessing of perfect love. On every charge that he served he was permitted to witness a number of conversions. During his sickness he was joyful and triumphant, and his last faint whisper was, "Bless the Lord!"

Dahomey (pop. 180,000) is a kingdom of Africa, on the Slave Coast, between Ashantee on the west and Yarriba Benin on the east. The coast is known by the name of Guinea. It is about 180 miles long by 200 in width. It formerly carried on a large traffic in slaves, and the people are remarkable for their ferocious habits. They have a standing army of about 6000 female warriors. Wesleyan missionaries have visited them, and have organized a number of societies, and have thus aided in partially suppressing if not entirely destroying the slave-trade. They are under the protection of the British government.

Dailey, David, was born in Gloucester, N. J., March 1, 1792; was converted in 1805, and was received into the Philadelphia Conference in 1812. He filled appointments of great prominence both as a preacher and a presiding elder, and was a member of the General Conference of 1836. His last effective appointment was in Snow Hill district. In 1855 he requested a superannuated relation. As a theologian he had few superiors, "while his meek and quiet spirit, his clear perception of right, and the holiness of his life invested him with acknowledged power." He exercised a laborious and useful ministry for a period of more than forty years, and among his last words were, "I am inexpressibly happy." He died May 4, 1856.

Dakota Territory (pop., whites, 14,181; Indians, about 26,000) is part of the Louisiana Territory acquired in 1803. It was organized as a distinct Territory in 1861. Since that period the Territories of Idaho, Montana, and Wyoming have been set off from it. It now embraces about 150,932 square miles, and extends from the northern boundary of Nebraska to the British possessions, lying west of Iowa and Minnesota. The white population is chiefly confined to the small portion of territory lying between the State of Iowa and the Missouri River, and to a few settlements along the North Pacific Railroad. It contains large Indian reservations, and its settlement has been much retarded by the hostility of savage tribes. The discovery of gold in the Black Hills has increased the tide of immigration, and has also led to disastrous conflicts.

Methodism was introduced into Dakota from the northwestern part of Iowa, and its earliest settlements were in connection with the Sioux City district. It is first named in 1860, George Clifford being presiding elder, and S. W. Ingham being appointed to Dakota mission. In 1861 it reported 20 members and 35 Sunday-school scholars. The entire Territory is embraced in the Northwest Iowa Conference, and all its appointments are included in the Sioux City district. At one time when it was supposed a heavy population would settle along the North Pacific Road a North Dakota district was constituted, but when that work was suspended and financial depression occurred a separate district was deemed unnecessary. There are now (1876) reported in the entire Territory 15 preachers, 625 members, 660 Sunday-school scholars, 9 churches valued at $17,750, and 4 parsonages, valued at $1550. At Yankton, the capital of the State, there are 65 members, 138 Sunday-school scholars, and a church valued at $6000.

The following table is prepared from the United States census of 1870:

Dale, Marcus, a minister of the Louisiana Conference, M. E. Church; born at Gallipolis, O., 1834; converted in 1851; educated at Oberlin, O.; ordained 1861. He served in the Union army two and a half years. At present (1877) pastor of Union chapel, M. E. Church, New Orleans.

Dalles, a name which was given by Canadian French voyageurs to deep chasms in rocks which form a narrow passage for rivers. It is especially applied to the long narrows of the Columbia River, which lie 43 miles above the Cascades, where the river is compressed between walls of basaltic rocks. At this place a mission was established by the Methodist missionaries who visited Oregon in 1835. When the Indian war broke out the missionaries were warned away by the government, and their land selected for the site of the mission, and which they had partially improved, was taken partly for a fort and partly occupied by other settlers. This gave rise to a tedious litigation, which was finally decided in favor of the Missionary Society.

Dallinger, W. H., F.R.M.S., was trained in Calvinistic doctrines of a high type; at the age of sixteen he studied the Scriptures alone, to see whether the views of God presented by them were coincident with what he had been taught. The result was an entirely opposite conclusion. He became a Methodist, and entered the ministry in 1861. From an early age he was an ardent lover of nature and of scientific research, his leaning being towards biology. He also worked assiduously at experimental chemistry, organic and inorganic, electricity, light, heat, physiology, and the phenomena of life generally. All this has enabled him calmly, without impulse or haste, to consider the nature, foundations, and issues of the newer lines of philosophical thought. By a series of patient investigations, extending over years, he has proved most conclusively that "putrescent organisms," or "monads," multiply by exquisitely minute spores or eggs, and that there is no spontaneous generation. The value of Mr. Dallinger's researches has been recognized by leading men of science in England, Germany, and America. In 1871 he was made a "Fellow of the Royal Microscopical Society," of which learned body he is this year (1877) elected vice-president. His ministerial work is thoroughly done, and is crowned with the divine blessing. Full acquaintance with the subject enables him to grapple with the difficulties of thought and belief as they present themselves to cultivated hearers and readers. He has in this way been made very useful. He has traveled three years in three of the Liverpool circuits, and is under engagement to the fourth. He furnishes the articles on science in the Wesleyan periodicals, and is a most liberal contributor to the monthly Microscopical Journal. The Royal Society have awarded Mr. Dallinger £100 out of money recently placed at their disposal by the government, to assist those who are engaged in original research; and he has recently popularized the results of his work in a lecture at the Royal Institution of Great Britain.

Dalton Female College is located in Dalton, Ga., in a beautiful valley, 100 miles above Atlanta, and is surrounded with grand natural scenery. The town is noted for the remarkable healthfulness of its climate, purity of water, and the intelligence and morality of its citizens. It was built and donated by the city of Dalton to the M. E. Church South in 1873. Rev. W. A. Rogers, A.M., is president of the institution, and is assisted by two male and two female teachers. The number of pupils annually in attendance is about 100. It is furnished with maps, charts, diagrams, etc., for the purposes of instruction. The college building is of brick, and is well ventilated and completely furnished.

Danbury, Conn. (pop. 6543), the capital of Fairfield County, on the Danbury and Norwalk, and New York, Housatonic and Northern Railways, was settled in 1665, and incorporated in 1696. In 1777 it was attacked and burned by the British. Methodism was introduced here in 1789, by Jesse Lee, it being within the bounds of the Stamford circuit, the first organized by him in the State. The first M. E. church was erected in 1809, the second in 1835, and the third and present one in 1854. There is also a small Methodist Protestant society. They have a church, but no pastor. It is situated in the New York East Conference, and the statistics are as follows: M. E. Church: members, 737; Sunday-school scholars, 374; church property, $20,000; German M. E. Church: members, 20; Sunday-school scholars, 40.

Danforth, Calvin, a member of the Oneida Conference of the M. E. Church, was born at Fort Covington, N. Y., in 1809, and was received on trial in 1830. His health becoming impaired, he visited the South, and accepted a position as teacher in an academy at Warrenton, Ga., and subsequently became Professor of Mathematics in Covington Manual Labor School. He died in May, 1839, in St. Augustine, Fla., where he had gone by medical advice to seek for health. He was a deeply-devoted and earnest minister, and in full sympathy with the educational movements of the church.

Dannelly, James, a member of the North Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church South, was born in Columbia, Ga., Feb. 4, 1786. At the age of thirty he experienced religion, and two years afterwards was licensed to preach. He traveled extensively throughout South Carolina, and was instrumental in the conversion of vast numbers. He was especially noted for his keen reproof of vice of every form.

Dansville, N. Y. (pop. 3387), situated in Livingston County, on the Erie and Genesee Valley Railroad. It is one of the oldest towns in Western New York. The town has not of late years increased much in population. Methodism was introduced in 1819 by Rev. Micah Seager, and the services were held in a school-house. It was then included in the Genesee circuit. The first church was built in 1828, when Robert Parker was sent to that charge. In 1829 he reported for the circuit 391 members. It subsequently became a station. A new church was built in 1876-77. It is in the Genesee Conference, and reported (1877) 150 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $18,000 church property.

Danville, Pa. (pop. 8436), the capital of Montour County, on the north branch of the Susquehanna River. It contains one of the largest establishments for making railroad iron in the United States. Methodist services were introduced in 1814, and the first church was built in 1839, and rebuilt in 1849. This church was originally called Mahoning Street, but now St. Paul's. Trinity church was built in 1868, as was also the African M. E. church. There is also a society of the Evangelical Association, having a church edifice built in 1870. It is situated in the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and the statistics are as follows: St. Paul's: members, 380; Sunday-school scholars, 198; church property, $25,000. Trinity:

members, 266; Sunday-school scholars, 225; church property, $30,500.

Danville, Ill. (pop. 4751), the capital of Vermillion County, situated at the intersection of the Toledo, Wabash and Western, and the Indianapolis, Bloomington and Western Railroads. It has natural and improved facilities for extensive growth. It is first noticed in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1835, when W. Crissy and D. Colson were appointed to that circuit. They reported the next year 730 members. Methodism has continued to prosper, and now has three flourishing churches, two English and one German. It is situated in the Illinois Conference, and its statistics are as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
North Street.....	300	300	$23,500
Kimber.....	291	350	10,775
German Church.....	87	90	8,000

Danville, Va. (pop. 3463), situated in Pittsylvania County, on the Richmond and Danville Railroad. It was embraced in one of the oldest circuits in the M. E. Church, called Pittsylvania, and which is first mentioned in the records of the Conference for 1776, when Isaac Rollins was appointed in charge, and it reported 100 members. In 1777 it reported 150 members. It retained its name for many successive years upon the records of the Conference. Danville as an appointment does not appear in the annals of the church until 1835. At the division of the church, in 1845, it adhered with the Virginia Conference to the Church South. The M. E. Church has no organization. Its statistics for the M. E. Church South are: May Street, 227 members; Lynn Street, 205 members.

Darke, Enoch, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, who was born in Worcester near the close of the last century, and died July 8, 1860. He was thrice elevated to the presidential chair of the late Wesleyan Methodist Association, viz., in 1844 and 1853. His itinerancy dates back from 1836. Mr. Darke retired from the ministry for a time and engaged in business pursuits, still serving the churches by preaching; but seeking to re-enter the itinerancy, he was after full consideration received again in 1857. He did not labor long after his re-admission. He died in the triumph of faith, his last words being, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."

Dashiell, R. L., D.D., senior secretary of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Salisbury, Md., in June, 1826. He was graduated from Dickinson College in 1846, and joined the Baltimore Conference in 1848. In 1860 he was transferred to the Newark Conference, New Jersey. In 1868 he was elected president of Dickinson College, where, besides carefully performing the other duties of his office, he gave much attention to the improvement of the financial condition of the institution. In 1872 he returned to itinerant work in the Newark Conference. He was the same year chosen a delegate to the General Conference, and was elected by that body one of the secretaries of the Missionary Society. He was again a delegate to the General Conference in 1876, and was re-elected missionary secretary.

Daugherty, Myron A., was born in Macedon, N. Y., Sept. 29, 1824. His parents removing to Michigan, he was educated at Macedon Seminary and Albion College. For a time he studied law, but preferred business pursuits. He was converted at Albion College, and served as steward, Sunday-school superintendent, and local preacher for ten years. In 1855 he joined the Michigan Conference, and filled various important appointments. In 1868 he became agent of Albion College and devoted eight years to its service, succeeding by his labors and plans in rescuing it from debt and securing its endowment. His health suffering, he was transferred to West Texas in 1875, where he is laboring for the extension of the church.

Davenport, Colonel William, was by birth a Virginian, but in early life settled in Lenoir, North Carolina. In his youth on several occasions he piloted Bishop Asbury across the mountains to Tennessee and Kentucky. Converted in early life, he was devoted to all the interests of his church, and was especially jealous for its doctrines and polity. He was modest and unostentatious, but generous. He served his country repeatedly as a member of the legislature, and enjoyed the unbounded confidence and esteem of his fellow-citizens. He gave some $3000 for the erection of the Davenport Female College, which was named, notwithstanding his remonstrance, after him. A life-size portrait adorns the college chapel.

Davenport Female College is located at Lenoir, Caldwell Co., N. C. The college building is of brick, 120 feet long, in the form of a transept. Its wings are 30 feet wide, 50 feet long in the centre, and a large portico in the front resting on four massive fluted columns; two and one-half stories high, and surmounted by a lofty observatory. Connected with this by long corridors is the boarding department, a large three-story building. The cost of the two edifices was about $16,000. The college campus embraces sixteen acres of land, the building standing on a beautiful eminence, and the view from its observatory over the surrounding landscapes and distant mountains is very fine. The building was commenced in 1853, and in 1857 it was tendered to the South Carolina Conference. Being accepted by them, Rev. H. M. Mood, A.M., was appointed president. After serving four years he was succeeded by Rev. R. N. Price, and he by J. G. Stacey. The building was occupied a short time during the war by the Federal army, and the libraries, furniture, apparatus, and buildings were greatly injured. From these effects the institution has never recovered, but it has been plainly refitted. In 1870, by a change of boundaries, it was placed under the patronage of the North Carolina Conference. Since that period it has been under the care of Rev. W. M. Robey, A.M., under whose administration its condition has improved. The location is very healthy, and a deep religious influence has pervaded its halls.

Davenport, Iowa (pop. 20,038), the capital of Scott County, is situated on the Mississippi River, and on the Iowa division of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway. A fine railway bridge spans the Mississippi, connecting this city with Rock Island. It was settled in 1836, organized as a town in 1839, and as a city in 1851. In 1839 Methodist services were introduced. The first church edifice was erected in 1842, and was rebuilt in 1853, and again in 1872. Davenport is first mentioned in the annals of the church for 1848, when Joel B. Taylor was sent as a missionary to that locality, and in the following year it reported 100 members. In 1855 it reported 242 members. The Fourteenth Street church was built in 1867, as was also Cook chapel. There being a large German population in the city a German church was organized, which has built a comfortable edifice. An African M. E. church was erected in 1862. It is situated in the Upper Iowa Conference, and reports in 1876 the following statistics:

Davidson, William A., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Jefferson Co., O., Sept. 3, 1823. He was converted when twenty years of age; was graduated from Alleghany College in 1847, and was received on trial in the same year in the Pittsburgh Conference. He has filled such stations as Smithfield Street, Liberty Street, Trinity, and Emory churches in Pittsburgh, and other charges of like position in the Conference, besides serving a number of years as presiding elder. The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred on him by Alleghany College, and he has been for many years a member of its board of control. He was a member of the General Conference of 1864, and is (1877) stationed at Salem, in the East Ohio Conference. He has been a frequent contributor to the religious and secular press.

Davies, R. N., M.D., was born in Philadelphia, Oct. 28, 1829. He was converted in his sixteenth year and joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, of which he remained a member until after removing to Illinois. In 1850 he united with the M. E. Church. He was admitted on trial in 1851 in the Illinois Conference; but his health failing he was discontinued in 1853, and the next nine years were spent in the study and practice of medicine. When the Civil War broke out he entered the army and became second lieutenant, and was disabled at Perrysville, Ky., Oct. 8, 1862, by the bursting of a shell over his head. In the fall of 1863 he was again admitted on trial in the Illinois Conference, and, after filling a number of important stations, was, in 1875, appointed presiding elder. He was a member of the General Conference of 1876, and was appointed as fraternal delegate to the Reformed Episcopal Church. He has been engaged in several public discussions with Protestant Methodists, Universalists, Baptists, etc., but in all cases only accepted challenges given.

Davis, Charles A., was born Oct. 7, 1802, and died at Norfolk, Va., Feb. 20, 1867. He was admitted into the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church in 1824. He was a popular and useful preacher, and was stationed in Baltimore, New York, and Philadelphia. He was one of the secretaries of the General Conference in 1832. For a number of years he was employed in one of the departments of the government in Washington, and was received into the Virginia Conference of the M. E. Church South, filling appointments in Richmond and Portsmouth, and was appointed chaplain to the navy. At the commencement of the Civil War he espoused the cause of the Union, and subsequently united with the Virginia and North Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church.

Davis, Henry T., was born in Springfield, O., July 29, 1832; was licensed to preach in 1855, and admitted in the Northwest Indiana Conference in 1857. He was subsequently transferred to Nebraska Conference, where his appointments were Bellevue, Omaha, and Lincoln stations, and presiding elder of Nebraska City, Lincoln, and Omaha districts. He was a delegate to the General Conference from Nebraska in 1864 and 1876.

Davis, John, a member of the Baltimore Conference, was born in Northumberland Co., Va., Oct. 30, 1787, and died in Hillsborough, Va., Aug. 13, 1853. He was converted at the age of nineteen, and joined the Baltimore Conference in 1810. Immediately after he was converted he began to exhort and preach with unusual effect, and in his early ministry he was very successful. It is said that on a single circuit, in 1818, about 1000 were converted under his ministry. He was a man of clear intellect, sound judgment, great industry, and rare prudence. For a number of years he filled the office of presiding elder, and was regarded by the ministers as a safe and able counselor. He was a member of every General Conference but two from 1816 to the time of his death. He manifested a deep interest in the cause of education, was active in sustaining Dickinson College, and served both as agent and trustee. Few men in the Baltimore Conference have exercised a more commanding influence.

Davis, Nathan Smith, M.D., was born at Green, N. Y., Jan. 9, 1817, and studied medicine at Geneva, N. Y. He removed to Chicago in 1849, and has since that time been engaged in the practice of medicine. For ten years he was editor of the Chicago Medical Journal, and subsequently of the Chicago Medical Examiner. He is Professor of the Principles and Practice of Medicine in Chicago Medical College, and has published several volumes on "Clinical Lectures," "History of Medical Education," "Agriculture," etc. He has for many years been a member of the M. E. Church.

Davis, Werter Renick, D.D., was born in Circleville, O., April 1, 1815; was converted and joined the church in 1829; and, after preparing for college at the Hillsborough Academy, was educated at Kenyon College, Ohio. He received the degree of M.D. from the College of Surgery and Medicine in Cincinnati, and of D.D. from Indiana University. He was received into the Ohio Conference in 1835, and, after filling a number of appointments, was transferred to the Missouri Conference in 1853. In 1854 he was elected Professor of Natural Science in McKendree College, in which he served four years, the latter year acting as president. In 1858 he was elected first president of Baker University, and was transferred to the Kansas and Nebraska Conference in 1859. He was presiding elder of Baldwin City district in 1862; was chaplain of the convention that formed the State constitution of Kansas; and was superintendent of public instruction in Douglas County. He became chaplain in the army in September, 1862, and the following year was commissioned as colonel of the Sixteenth Regiment of Kansas Volunteers. In 1865 returning to the pastorate, he has served as presiding elder on several districts. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1868 and 1872.

Davisson, Robert G., a resident of San Francisco, Cal., and largely identified with the commercial interests of that city. He is devoted to the Sunday-school interests of the M. E. Church, and his prominence and activity were recognized by his choice as lay delegate from the California Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Dawson, William, a supernumerary minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England. He became an itinerant in 1836. He was elected president of the late Wesleyan Methodist Association in 1855. Through failing health he applied to be made a permanent supernumerary in 1869, and since that year he has resided at Burslem, in Staffordshire.

Dayton, Ohio (pop. 30,473), the capital of Montgomery County, and situated at the confluence of Mad and Great Miami Rivers. It has superior water-power and railroad facilities. It was laid out in 1799, and incorporated as a town in 1805. It was chartered as a city in 1841. Methodism was very early introduced into this region by the pioneers on the Miami and Mad River circuits, as these were among the first circuits formed in Ohio. For several years Dayton was embraced in what was called "Union circuit." In 1831 "Dayton station" is recorded, and David D. Dyche was appointed pastor, who reported, in 1832, 246 members. From that time the M. E. Church has prospered in this city. Both the German and African M. E. Churches have since organized societies. It is in the Cincinnati Conference, and reports the following statistics:

Deacon (Greek, διάκονος), signifying a runner, messenger, or servant, is an officer in the Christian church vested with different functions and prerogatives in the various Christian bodies. In the early Christian church the office of deacon was specially to care for the poor, and to attend to the temporal interests of the church; but in piety and Christian deportment, the qualifications as enumerated by the apostles compare with those for the ministry. In Presbyterian and Congregational churches deacons are officers of the church, who assist the minister in various duties. In the Church of England, in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and in the Methodist Episcopal churches, a deacon is a minister in regular standing, who is authorized to administer baptism, to perform matrimony, and to assist the elder in the administration of the Lord's Supper, but who is not authorized to consecrate the elements. In the Methodist Episcopal churches, those persons who are believed to have been called of God to the work of the ministry receive license by the vote of the Quarterly Conference or District Conference as local preachers. If they purpose devoting their whole time to the ministry they are recommended to the Annual Conferences. After having been received on trial by the Conference, at the end of two years, having passed satisfactory examinations, and being approved as ministers, they are eligible to the office of deacon, and after two additional years of ministerial work they are eligible to the office of elder. The duties of the deacon are thus specified in the ordination service: "It appertaineth to the office of a deacon to assist the elder in divine service. And especially when he administers the Holy Communion to help him in the distribution thereof, and to read and expound the Holy Scriptures; to instruct the youth and to baptize. And, furthermore, it is his office to search for the sick, poor, and impotent, that they may be visited and relieved." Local ministers who have been licensed to preach for four years, and who pass satisfactory examinations and are approved by the church, are also eligible to be ordained deacons. The ordination is performed by the laying on of the hands of the bishop, in connection with appropriate scriptural lessons and prayers. The form is precisely the same in all the M. E. churches of whatever branch, and is that which was prepared by Mr. Wesley, slightly modified from the ritual of the Church of England. Among the English Wesleyan Methodists, and all of its affiliated branches in Ireland, Canada, and Australia, and in the organizations which have seceded from the Wesleyan body, there is but one form of ordination, which is that for elders, and which is given after four years of examination and probation. The order of deacons is not recognized at present in any of the non-Episcopal Methodist churches. The Methodist Protestants retained the order of deacons from the organization of their church until within the last few years.

Dean, James Alexander, D.D., was born at Hubbardton, Vt., April 3, 1823. He was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1847, and entered upon the study of theology in the same year at the Andover Seminary. He removed to the South in 1848, joined the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1849, and took the charge of the South Lowell Academy, Orange Co., N. C. In 1855 he was appointed president of the Ohio Wesleyan Female College, Delaware, O.; in 1856, president of Mansfield Female College, Ohio; and in 1857, principal of the Asbury Female Institute, Greencastle, Ind. He joined the Providence Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1860, and performed pastoral work in that and in the New York East Conference till 1872, when he was elected president of the East Tennessee University. In 1876, having resigned the presidency, he was transferred to the New York East Conference, and received a supernumerary relation.

Dean, Sidney, was born in Glastonbury, Conn., Nov. 16, 1818, and received an academic education in Glastonbury and Wilbraham. He commenced life as a manufacturer. He was converted in Glastonbury in a revival in the Congregational church, at which his parents were attendants, in 1841, but subsequently removed his relation, to the M. E. Church. In 1843 he was licensed as a local preacher, and in the same year joined the Providence Conference. In 1851 he was forced by a strong determination of blood to the brain to suspend preaching, and, taking a supernumerary relation, he entered into business. He served in the legislature of his State as Representative, and was elected to Congress in 1855, and re-elected in 1857, where he served as chairman of the committee on public expenditures, and also on the committee on the District of Columbia. In 1860, his health having improved, he entered the active work, and was stationed at Pawtucket, Providence, and Warren. He located in 1865, and became editor of the Providence Evening Press, which position (1877) he still retains. In addition to his editorial work he was, while in Congress, the Washington correspondent of the New York Independent. He has also published a number of sermons and addresses.

Decatur, Ill. (pop. 7161), the capital of Macon County, is one of the most important railroad centres in the State. It is also situated on the Sangamon River, which gave name to one of the oldest Methodist circuits. Decatur was for many years included in its bounds. It was in this region where Peter Cartwright had many of his bold adventures in frontier life. This city is first noticed in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1838, when David Corellson was appointed to that charge. He reported, in 1839, 200 members. The German population is nearly as large as that of the American, and a church was organized, and an edifice erected for worship in the German language. The church has continued to prosper until it now (1877) has three flourishing congregations. The African M. E. Church has also an organization. It is in the Illinois Conference, and reports the following statistics:

Decker, G. G., a lay delegate from the New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born at Roxbury, Delaware Co., N. Y., about 1826. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in early manhood, and has been active in church matters. He is engaged in mercantile pursuits.

Decrees of God, The.—The decrees of God may be defined to be "his purposes or determinations respecting his creatures. For this reason they are sometimes called the counsel, and sometimes the will of God; terms which are never applied to necessary things, but only to the determinations of free agents." When the Scriptures represent the decrees of God as his counsel, the word is not to be taken in its common acceptation, as implying consultation with others; nor is it to be understood as denoting reflection, comparison, and the establishment of a conclusion by logical deduction. The decisions of an infinite mind are instantaneous, and they are called counsel, to signify that they are consummately wise. Nor are we to conclude, because the decrees of God are called his will, that they are arbitrary decisions; but that in making them he was under no control, but acted according to his own sovereignty. When man's own will is the rule of his conduct, it is in many instances capricious and unreasonable; but wisdom is always associated with will in the divine proceedings. Accordingly, the decrees of God are said to be "the counsel of his will."

The Scriptures reveal the intentions and acts of God, affirming that "all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are called according to his purpose." Romans viii. 28. Having made known unto us "the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself." Eph. i. 9.

The decrees of God are eternal. That the decrees of God are eternal necessarily follows from the perfection of the Divine Being. He sees the end from the beginning; the distinctions of time have no reference to him who inhabiteth eternity. To suppose any of the divine decrees to be made in time is to suppose that the knowledge of God is limited; that he receives accessions to it in the progress of time, and that he forms new resolutions as new occasions require. No one who believes that the divine understanding is infinite, comprehending the past, the present, and the future, will assent to the doctrine of temporal decrees. If God has any plan at all it must be eternal, hence the Scriptures declare, "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world." Acts xv. 18. The salvation of men, for example, is said to be according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ. Eph. iii. 2.

The decrees of God are immutable. This characteristic of the divine decrees results from the infinite perfection and immutability of God. Change of purpose arises either from the want of knowledge or want of power. The change of human purpose is the effect of deficient wisdom, but God knows with absolute certainty all things that ever were, now are, or ever shall be, and his purposes must therefore continue the same amid all the changes of created things. The whole government of God rests upon the immutability of his counsel. "With him there is no variableness or shadow of turning." James i. 17. "He is of one mind, and who can turn him?" Job xxiii. 13. "The counsel of the Lord standeth forever, the thoughts of his heart unto all generations." Psalm xxxiii. 11.

To the immutability of the divine decrees it has been objected that the Scriptures represent God, in some cases at least, as changing his purpose. For instance, he said to King Hezekiah, "Set thy house in order, for thou shalt die and not live." But afterwards he said to him, "I will add unto thy days fifteen years." II. Kings xx. 1, 6. To meet the objection, and reconcile this and other cases with the immutability of God's purpose, it needs only be declared that immutability of counsel is not immutability of administration. The purpose of God is the plan according to which he operates as the Creator and Governor of the world, while the administration of God consists in his actual operations in accordance with this plan.

Again, man is a free moral agent, and is therefore governed by laws and motives adapted to his moral constitution, and the purpose of God extends to the whole duration of his existence, and not merely to some particular period of it. Hence it is easy to conceive, in view of the conditionality of God's moral government and of the mutability of man, that the divine administration respecting him at one time may be different from what it is at another, while in both cases it accords with the immutability of the divine decrees.

When, therefore, we meet with passages of Scripture in which a change of the divine purpose seems to be indicated, as in the case of Hezekiah, we must understand them to imply a change of the divine administration, but not of the divine purpose.

The decrees of God are free. "They are rational determinations founded upon sufficient reasons. They are not necessitated by any external cause." God is free to act or not act, and when he purposes it is not from any blind necessity, but according to the beneficence of his will. "Who hath directed the Spirit of the Lord, or being his counselor, hath taught him?" Isaiah xl. 14.

To deny the freedom of the divine decrees is the same as to assert that they could not have been different from what they are. But are we prepared to adopt this sentiment? As well might we affirm that God could not have performed the work of creation sooner or later than he did. Such a view of necessity in regard either to the operation or the purposes of God is contrary to Scripture, and injurious to the feelings of piety, and must be rejected. God acts not by a mere necessity of nature but as a rational and personal being, and in this sense his purposes are free.

The decrees of God are either absolute or conditional. Absolute decrees are such as relate to those events in the divine administration which have no dependence upon the free actions of moral creatures. They are not called absolute because made in the exercise of arbitrary power, but through rational determinations. The execution of them is not suspended upon any condition that may or may not be performed by moral creatures, but is ascribed to divine agency. Thus the purpose of God to create the world, and to send his Son to redeem it, are called absolute decrees.

Conditional decrees are those in which God has respect to the free actions of his moral creatures. Of this class are the purposes of God respecting the eternal welfare of man. In the formula of Arminius we have the following words, which express the doctrine held by Methodism: "God, by an eternal and immutable decree, ordained in Jesus Christ his Son, before the foundation of the world, to save in Christ, because of Christ, and through Christ, from out of the human race which is fallen and subject to sin, those who, by the grace of the Holy Ghost, believe in the same, his Son, and who by the same grace persevere unto the end in that faith and the evidence of faith; but, on the contrary, to leave in sin and subject to wrath those who are not converted, and are unbelieving, and to condemn them as aliens from Christ."

It is the opposite of the doctrine originated by Augustine and developed by Calvin, that God's decrees are absolute. "That the decrees of God are his eternal purpose, according to the counsel of his own will, whereby for his own glory he hath fore-ordained whatsoever comes to pass."

That the divine decrees relating to the eternal destiny of men are conditional is only consistent with all the perfections of his nature, and in harmony with the nature of a holy and just God. If the decree of human salvation is unconditional and absolute, it contradicts God's nature. God, we are told in Scripture, is love; and such a doctrine makes the cross, the fruit of divine love, a testimony of God's wrath unto the world. God's decree is free in the sense that no ground for predestination is to be found in the predestinated, hence nothing indicates a limit of it. It extends as wide as sin reaches, and as far as the forgiveness of sins is necessary; it includes the whole race, for "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

The end of God's decree is one with his nature. The ultimate aim is his own glory and the blessedness of his creatures. The expression of his will, it is also of his beneficence. He will have all men to be saved. "Who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." 1. Timothy xi. 4. "The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness; but is long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance." 11. Peter iii. 9.

As Mr. Wesley says, "It is free for all, as well as in all, and so it was before the foundation of the world. But what decree? Even this: I will set before the sons of men 'life and death, blessing and cursing, and the soul that chooseth life shall live, as the soul that chooseth death shall die.' This decree, whereby 'whom God did foreknow he did predestinate,' was indeed from everlasting; this, whereby all who suffer Christ to make them alive are 'elect, according to the fore-knowledge of God,' now standeth fast, even as the moon, and as the faithful witnesses in heaven; and when heaven and earth shall pass away, yet this shall not pass away, for it is as unchangeable and eternal as the being of God that gave it.

"This decree yields the strongest encouragement to abound in all good works, and in all holiness; and it is a well-spring of joy and of happiness also, to our great and endless comfort. This is worthy of God; it is every way consistent with all the perfections of his nature. It gives us the noblest view of his justice, mercy, and truth. To this agrees the whole scope of the Christian revelation, as well as all the parts thereof."—Sermons, vol. i. pp. 482, 490. (SEE PREDESTINATION AND ELECTION.)

Dedication.—Prior to the General Conference of 1864 the form of service used in the dedication of Methodist Episcopal churches was left to the judgment of the officiating minister. To secure more uniformity the General Conference at that time introduced into the Discipline an order of dedication, which is now generally used, and which may be seen in full by a reference to the Discipline or ritual of the church. It consists of a preparatory address to the congregation; the use of appropriate hymns, and of an extemporary prayer suited to the occasion: the first scriptural lesson is read from the dedication of the temple by Solomon, and the second from the tenth chapter of Hebrews; a sermon, or address, is then delivered by the pastor, and the contributions of the people are received; the 122d Psalm is then read by the pastor and the congregation alternately; the trustees present the church to the officiating minister for the service of dedication, which is contained in a form of declaration, and which is followed with a form of dedicatory prayer.

Deed of Declaration (English Wesleyan).—A declaration of ministers in connection with Mr. Wesley, to show the importance of uniformity of teaching and to cement the bond of union between them, was first signed at the Conference of 1754, and renewed in subsequent years. But the "Deed,"—the Magna Charta of Methodism,—sometimes called the "Poll Deed," but generally known as "The Deed of Declaration," bears date February 28, 1784. On this deed the property belonging to the entire connection morally and legally rests. Its validity has been tested severely, but its force and power have been placed beyond all question. It was signed and sealed by Mr. Wesley and two witnesses, and is enrolled in the Court of Chancery.

Deeds are instruments of writing by which the title of property is conveyed. As church property is held by trustees, and as these are sometimes appointed according to the forms of ecclesiastical law, and sometimes under forms prescribed by the state, great care should be exercised in having the deeds carefully prepared. For lack of proper attention tedious litigation sometimes occurs, and the title to church property is endangered if not lost. The Discipline of the M. E. Church requires that in all the deeds shall be inserted the provision that the property is conveyed in trust to be held according to the Discipline and usages of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Attorneys, conveyancers, and others frequently not understanding the peculiarities of church polity, execute deeds without any allusion to a trust, and sometimes are careless in reference to the corporate name or title of the church. The General Conference has taken measures for the preparation of appropriate forms of deeds for every State and Territory.

Deems, Charles F., D.D., was born in Baltimore, Dec. 4, 1820, and after graduating at Dickinson College, entered the ministry of the M. E. Church South, in the North Carolina Conference. Subsequently he was Professor in the University of North Carolina and Randolph Macon College. He has been an able contributor to various periodicals and reviews, and is now editor of the Sunday Magazine. He is also author of a "Life of Dr. Clark," "Life of Christ," "Annals of the M. E. Church South," and other volumes. He has resided in New York for a number of years, and is pastor of the "Church of the Strangers."

Deering, Hon. William, a lay delegate from the Maine Conference to the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1872, was born in South Paris, Me., about 1827. He was educated at the Maine Wesleyan Seminary, and was engaged for a number of years in mercantile business at Portland. He served for several years as a member of the governor's executive council of the State of Maine. More recently he has removed to Chicago.

Defense of the Fathers is the title of a work published by Dr. Emory—subsequently bishop—during the radical controversy. It gives a clear and full statement of the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the character of its episcopacy, the reasons for its adoption, and defends Bishop Asbury and Dr. Coke against the attacks which had been made upon them.

De Frees, Hon. Joseph H., a native of Tennessee; converted June, 1840; has held the position of steward and trustee in the M. E. Church for thirty years. He resides in Goshen, Ind., and has been sheriff of the county for several terms, and a member of the Indiana legislature, in both branches, and was a member of the Thirty-ninth Congress one term. He was twice a lay delegate to the North Indiana Conference, and represented the electoral lay body of that Conference at the General Conference of 1876.

De la Matyr, Gilbert, D.D., was born in Pharsalia, N. Y., July 8, 1825; was educated at Rushford, N. Y., and admitted on trial into the Genesee Conference in 1850. In that Conference he remained in various charges until 1862, when he entered the army as chaplain, and remained for three years. On his return he became presiding elder of Wyoming district. In 1867 he was stationed in Brooklyn; in 1869 in Omaha; and in 1871 in Kansas City. In 1874 he was transferred to Southeast Indiana Conference, and stationed in Indianapolis, his present (1877) appointment. He received the degree of D.D. from Willamette University. He published a sermon on the relations of church and state, opposing the taxing of church property in Nebraska.

Delaware (pop. 125,015).—This State received its name from Lord De la Ware, the second governor of Virginia, who entered the Delaware Bay in 1610. For nearly half a century the Dutch and Swedes contended for its possession, but subsequently it was conquered by the English, and in 1682 the Duke of York transferred it to William Penn, who held it as tributary to Pennsylvania. In 1703 it was allowed its own assembly, but remained under the governor of Pennsylvania. In 1776 its first constitution was formed, and at the close of the Revolutionary War it was the first State to ratify the Constitution of the United States. It was a slave State, and retained its slaves, though few in number, until the late Civil War.

Methodism was introduced into Delaware by Captain Webb. Bishop Asbury dedicated the first church in Wilmington, in 1789, and makes this entry in his journal, "Thus far have we come after more than twenty years' labor in this place." The first preaching-place in New Castle was the house of Mr. Robert Furnace, the court-house being closed against the Methodists. The first Methodist society in the State was formed in New Castle, in 1770. In 1771, Mr. Hersey, who lived west of Christiania, opened his house for Methodist preaching, and a church called "Salem" was built there. This State was the scene of many of the trials and triumphs of the first Methodist preachers. In it Asbury, in 1778, when persecuted and forbidden to preach, found shelter at Judge White's until the storm of war had passed. It was at Barrett's chapel that Dr. Coke and Bishop Asbury first met, and at that time the incipient measures were taken for the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church. A large part of the population had been trained in the English Church, and their clergymen having fled during the Revolutionary War, many of the leading inhabitants early united with the Methodist societies.

In no State in the Union has Methodism a larger membership in proportion to the population. The first reports of numbers made by States in the published minutes were in 1796, when 2228 members were reported. After the formation of the Methodist Protestant Church a few societies of that denomination were organized, which are included in its Maryland Conference. After the organization of the M. E. Church South, a few societies were organized by that church in the southern portion of the State. These are embraced in the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church South. The colored Methodists are divided between the M. E. Church, the members of which belong to the Delaware Conference, and the African M. E. Church, the members of which are embraced by the Philadelphia Conference. It is somewhat difficult to estimate the exact Methodist membership, as neither the Conference lines nor the district lines coincide with the boundaries of the State. The Wilmington Conference of the M. E. Church includes the entire peninsula as well as the State of Delaware. The Delaware Colored Conference embraces the entire peninsula and a part of New Jersey. An approximate estimate is: members of the Wilmington Conference, 14,773; Delaware Conference, 2637; African M. E. Church, 1468; showing a total membership of 18,878. There is an excellent seminary for young ladies in Wilmington, under the supervision of Rev. — Wilson, D.D., and also a Conference seminary at Dover. A fine building for the latter institution was consumed by fire, but another edifice is in process of erection.

The following table, prepared from the United States census of 1870, gives the relative statistics of the various denominations:

	Edifices.	Sittings.	Property.

Delaware Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1864, on the petition of a number of colored ministers and members included within its bounds. It includes the territory "east and north of the Washington Conference;" the principal part being the State of Delaware and Eastern Maryland, with a few churches in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. It was constituted so as to permit such colored churches as preferred to do so, and which were embraced in several of the adjacent Conferences, to be associated together in Conference relation. It held its first session in Philadelphia, July 28, 1864, Bishop James presiding. It then reported 21 traveling and 39 local preachers, 4964 members, 21 Sunday-schools with 841 scholars, 34 churches, valued at $34,000. The latest report (1876) shows a very large increase, by the following statistics: 58 traveling and 192 local preachers, 14,191 members, 174 Sunday-schools, 7255 scholars, 187 churches, valued at $215,600, and 18 parsonages, valued at $8750.

Delaware, O. (pop. 5641), the capital of Delaware County, on the right bank of the Olentangy River, twenty-four miles northwest of Columbus, contains the Ohio Wesleyan University and the Ohio Wesleyan Female College, under the control of the M. E. Church. The boundary lines of the Ohio and Central Ohio Conferences meet at this place, and in the latter Conference is William Street society, organized in 1818, whose church was built in 1822, and rebuilt in 1846. St. Paul's society, in the Ohio Conference, was organized in 1852; its church was built in 1856, and rebuilt in 1874. A German church, in the Central German Conference, was organized in 1840; its church edifice was built in 1844, and rebuilt in 1857. An African M. E. society of the Ohio Conference was organized in 1844, and its church was erected in 1847. The statistics are as follows:

representative to the General Conference. Each Annual Conference is entitled to a delegate for every 45 members in full connection, and for every fraction of two-thirds. Each electoral Conference is entitled to send two delegates where the Annual Conference elects two ministers. From one to three reserve delegates are usually elected to supply any possible vacancy which might arise from death, sickness, or otherwise.

Delegates, Fraternal.—In the early years of the Methodist Episcopal Church a fraternal correspondence between the Wesleys of England and the Methodists of America was kept up through Dr. Coke, who passed to and fro; his last visit being in 1804. Not unfrequently letters of fraternal greeting were borne by him from the British body, and returned through him from the Methodists of America. With the cessation of his visits the regular correspondence ceased, but after the War of 1812, difficulties having arisen between the missionaries in several churches in Canada, the bishops of the church and the General Conference addressed the British Conference on the subject, and a special correspondence on these subjects was conducted. As these difficulties continued, in 1820 Rev. John Emory was sent by the M. E. Church to England to arrange for some definite plan of the work in Canada; he was also requested to arrange for the mutual exchange of publications. He was cordially received by the British Methodists, and an arrangement was formed in reference to the difficulties in Canada. To reciprocate his visit, Rev. Richard Reese visited the General Conference in 1824, with Rev. Dr. Hanna as his traveling companion. Thus was commenced an interchange of personal visits and fraternal salutations which has been continued at various intervals from that time until the present, and has served to maintain a close fraternity of feeling between the oldest representative bodies of Methodism. These fraternal visits are not now confined to the Wesleys of England, but are reciprocated between the various branches of the Methodist family, and of other evangelical churches, and tend to increase the spirit of brotherly affection, and to manifest to the world the true unity of the various Christian bodies. The following table presents a list of the delegates that have been received by, and sent from, the various General Conferences of the church:

De Motte, Harvey C., Ph.D., born in Greene Co., Ill., July 17, 1838; entered Illinois Wesleyan University 1859, and graduated and was elected Professor of Mathematics in same institution in 1861. Served as first lieutenant in the Union army for several months in 1862, and returned to his duties as professor in the same year, which position he still holds. He received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy, upon a written examination, from the Syracuse University in 1877.

Dempster, John, a distinguished educator in the M. E. Church, was born in Florida, N. Y., Jan. 2, 1794. His father, James Dempster, a Scotchman, educated at the University of Edinburgh, was sent by Mr. Wesley as a missionary to America. At the age of eighteen young Dempster was converted at a camp-meeting, and at once devoted himself to a life of diligent study and labor. For more than fifty years it was his habit to retire at nine at night and to rise at four in the morning. He also became intensely devoted, and manifested unusual zeal. His first public efforts indicated unusual power as a speaker and great acuteness as a thinker. He especially excelled as a logician. In 1815 he was admitted into the Genesee Conference, but, owing to very doubtful health, he was continued a probationer four years. His first circuit was in Lower Canada, and Dr. Peck says, "It was a vast field, most of it a wilderness. During the cold season his horse broke down, and he went to his appointments on foot. His boots gave out, but he went on still, his feet constantly wet with snow-water; nothing daunted, he must meet his appointments. His soul blazed while his poor body shivered and withered under hardships too terrible for humanity to endure." From 1818 to 1835 he filled some of the most important appointments, and was for several years presiding elder. Everywhere he left decided impressions of his pulpit power. He was especially anxious to enter into new fields, and to enlarge the borders of the church. In 1836 he accepted the invitation of a missionary brother to go as missionary to Buenos Ayres, South America, where he labored successfully for six years. Returning in 1842, he was appointed to the leading charges in New York City. Deeply impressed with the conviction that there should be a seminary for young ministers, he devoted himself to this work, and in 1847 opened the Biblical Institute at Concord, N. H. For seven years he traveled extensively, collected funds to sustain it, and filled the chair of the instructor. After having seen it securely fixed in the affections of the preachers, he resigned his place to be a pioneer in the West. Provisionally, a lady of wealth was arranging to devote her property for a theological school when Dr. Dempster visited the West. He opened a preliminary school at Evanston, which afterwards became the Garrett Biblical Institute. He was cordially received by many of the ministers, and the General Conference shortly after recognized the Biblical Institutes as a regular part of church work. His yearning spirit turned farther west, and it was his purpose to establish an institution in California. He resolved to visit the Pacific coast, intending to devote his money to a theological school. His health had suffered for several years from a tumor, and he believed the removal of it was necessary to enable him to bear the fatigues of a journey. His physician encouraged him, but the operation proved fatal. He died Nov. 28, 1863, and his end was peace. He was a man of some peculiarities of habit and of immense power of will. His intellect was sharp and clear. He delighted in metaphysical investigations, and loved to grapple with the most difficult problems connected with the divine government and the destiny of man. Without the facilities of college life, he had studied the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages. He was a man of extensive reading, and as a speaker he held his hearers in rapt attention by his compact and unflinching argumentation.

Denison, J., D.D., president of Baker University, was born in Bernardston, Mass. He professed conversion, and united with the M. E. Church in 1832. From 1834 to 1837 he pursued his studies in the Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham. He entered the Wesleyan University in 1837, and graduated in 1840. Subsequently, for three years, he taught the ancient languages in Amenia Seminary, and in 1843 joined the New England Conference of the M. E. Church, where he continued to fill a number of prominent appointments, until, in March, 1855, he removed to Kansas. After filling several appointments, he was presiding elder of Manhattan district from 1859 to 1863, and was a member of the General Conference of 1864. From 1863 to 1873 he was president of the Kansas State Agricultural College, and in 1874 was elected president of Baker University, in which position (1877) he still remains.

Denmark, Missions in.—Denmark is the southernmost and smallest of the three Scandinavian states of Europe. The kingdom includes the peninsula of Jutland and the surrounding islands, and holds as dependencies Iceland, Greenland, the Faroe Islands, and the islands of St. Croix, St. Thomas, and St. John, in the West Indies. The population of Denmark is 1,874,000, and that of Copenhagen, the capital, is 181,291. The Lutheran is the established religion of the kingdom, but complete religious toleration is guaranteed by the constitution. The work of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Denmark grew directly out of the labors of the Rev. O. G. Hedstrom among the Scandinavian sailors in the city of New York. (See SCANDINAVIAN DOMESTIC MISSIONS.) Missions were opened in Norway and Sweden in 1854 by natives of those countries who had been converted at Pastor Hedstrom's Bethel ship, and arrangements were made two years later for starting a mission in Denmark. No progress was made till 1858, when the Rev. C. Willerup, laboring at Fredericksbald, in Norway, was appointed to the new field. In the next year Mr. Willerup reported that a goodly number of persons in Copenhagen were applying to the government, according to the formalities of the law, to secure their release from the State church. They had to declare that they were or intended to be members of some independent orthodox church, after which their course and that of the new church would be unobstructed. Two years later, in 1861, the church at Copenhagen returned 68 members. In 1862 the Missionary Society, deeming Copenhagen an important centre of operations, made an appropriation of $5000 for the erection of a suitable church building in that city. Mr. Harold Dollner, a Danish merchant, doing business in the city of New York, added $1000. The new church, which was called St. Paul's church, was dedicated on Sunday, the 6th of June, 1866. The occasion was honored by the attendance of many dignitaries and persons of high social position in the Danish capital. Besides the dedication sermon of the Rev. Mr. Willerup, an address was delivered by the Hon. Joseph A. Wright, United States minister to Prussia. The second station in Denmark, Veile, was formed in 1862; the third, Svendborg, in 1863. Until 1869 the work in Scandinavia was conducted as a whole. In that year it was divided, and the work in Denmark was placed in the charge of the Rev. C. Willerup as superintendent. The reports show that there had then been received at Copenhagen since the beginning of the mission 247 members, of whom 73 had removed to America, 133 had withdrawn or been expelled, and 88 remained as members in full connection with the church. The work in Denmark has at times suffered by opposition arising from the jealousy of persons connected with the State church, but has enjoyed a steady prosperity, to which the tables in the reports fail to do justice, for the mission churches have been depleted every year by emigrations to America, and the fruits of their growth are largely represented in the Scandinavian churches of the United States. The following is a summary of the condition of the mission, as shown in the report for 1876:

Stations.	Missionaries.	Members and Probationers.	Churches and Preaching-Places.	Scholars in Sunday-Schools.
Copenhagen.....	2	279	4	300
Veile, Homslyd, etc..	3	275	21	358
Svendborg, Trolleb., and Odense...	2	57	8	56
Langeland.....	1	77	9	60
Total.....	8	688	42	774

Total number of full members, 561; of probationers, 127; of local preachers, 4; of exhorters, 5; of baptisms during the year, 24; of Sunday-schools, 13; of officers and teachers in the same, 55; total value of church property, $92,455, less $23,239 debt; total contributions for the societies and causes of the church, $1602.52.

Dennis, H. W., delegate to the General Conference of 1876, died at Monrovia, Liberia, on June 11, 1876. He was one of the colonists who early sailed for Liberia, and began his public life as a clerk, and was so quick and reliable he took rank among the first business men of the Republic in both native and foreign trade. He was for many years the agent in Liberia of the Colonization Society, receiving the immigrants on their arrival, providing for their immediate wants, looking after their interests, keeping all the accounts, making such strict returns as to give entire satisfaction to all the parties. On the death of Mr. McGill, who had been agent for the Methodist mission in Liberia, Mr. Dennis succeeded to that position in 1863, and the Missionary Board at New York was always satisfied with his clear business-like accounts, and with the manner in which he discharged the duties of the agency to the Methodist church; and the Sunday-schools in Monrovia owe much of their prosperity to the interest which he took in them, and especially in providing music for the regular services. He also held the post of Secretary of the Treasury under the Liberian government, but was compelled to retire on account of the failure of his health. He had designed to retire from business and public life, and spend the remainder of his days in trying to open up the interior of Africa to missionary work, but he was unexpectedly cut down.

Dennis, John, D.D., was born in Ovid, N. Y., Aug. 29, 1810. He was educated at the Ovid Academy, and was converted while a student in the institution; was licensed to preach in 1832, and, after having filled a charge under the presiding elder, was admitted on trial in the Genesee Conference in 1835. He has received forty-four consecutive appointments, many of them being of the most important character, in Buffalo, Rochester, Geneva, and Lima, and was also presiding elder of the Rochester district for eight years. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1848, 1852, and 1856. For a number of years he was treasurer of Genesee College. In 1871 he received the degree of D.D. His present residence (1877) is Brockport.

Denver, Colorado (pop. 4759), the capital of the State, is situated on the Denver and Pacific Railroad, 106 miles south of Cheyenne, and five railroads centre in it. It is growing rapidly and substantially, and has more than doubled its population since the census of 1870. Denver is first mentioned in the records of the M. E. Church in 1860. It was then connected with the Kansas and Nebraska Conference. In 1861 it reported 82 members and 70 Sunday-school scholars. The Lawrence Street church, an engraving of which is given on the following page, was built in 1864, largely through the efforts of Hon. John Evans, then governor of the Territory. It is built of brick, and is 44 by 85 feet, with a gallery on three sides of the building. It will seat ordinarily about 650 persons, and it cost about $30,000. Three other churches have since that time been erected. Of these, the German church was built to accommodate a large German population which was attracted to that central point. Among the earliest inhabitants of the city were also a number of citizens from the Southern States, and some from Kansas, who had been identified with the M. E. Church South. For their use a lot was secured and a building was erected at an early period. In it the Denver Conference held its first session. There is also a small African society organized. In 1876 the statistics were as follows:

Denver Conference, M. E. Church South, was organized by the General Conference of 1874, and held its first session at Denver, Col., Aug. 27, 1874, Bishop Pierce presiding. It reported 21 traveling and 9 local preachers, 636 white members, 11 Sunday-schools, and 402 Sunday-school scholars. Its boundaries "include the Territories of Colorado, Montana, and New Mexico."

The minutes of 1875 report 20 traveling preachers and 1 local preacher, 502 white members, 9 Sunday-schools, and 432 Sunday-school scholars.

De Pauw, Washington C., Esq., was born at Salem, Ind., in 1822, and now resides at New Albany, in the same State. He had all the educational advantages which were furnished at that early period, but which were small compared with the present facilities. At the age of sixteen his father died, and he was dependent upon his own resources. Unwilling to lean on any relations, he worked for two dollars a week, where he could get it, and when he could not get pay he worked for nothing rather than be idle. So fully did his course gain public confidence that at the age of twenty-one he was without opposition elected clerk and auditor of his native county, and was re-elected until he refused to serve longer. For more than a quarter of a century he has declined all public position, and refused to be a candidate for any office, though repeatedly urged to do so. In 1872 he was solicited from many parts of the State to be a candidate for governor, and was assured that he would not be expected to make the usual canvass. In his absence from the State, and with his known opposition, he was placed on the ticket for lieutenant-governor, but respectfully declined the nomination. He has been extensively engaged in various departments of business as a manufacturer, grain-dealer, and banker, and in all these departments he has been successful, and has realized a handsome fortune. This has been employed in building churches and educational institutions, and in helping the poor and educating the deserving. He is an active member of the M. E. Church, and was elected as a and a leader of a special meeting for holiness in his own church. He is also a member of the National Camp-Meeting and Publishing Association, and is a trustee and director in twenty-two colleges, universities, banks, and corporations. To himself the most satisfactory work is that which is performed for Christ in the church and Sunday-school. He has largely assisted the female college in New Albany, which is called after his name. has aided the Church Extension Fund, and assisted churches in distress, and has taken special interest in preparing young men for preaching the gospel of Christ.

De Pauw College for Young Ladies is located in New Albany, Ind., and was organized in 1852, under the name of Indiana Asbury Female College. From that period to 1866 it was under the direction of five different presidents. A large debt was accumulated, which embarrassed its progress, and ultimately required its sale. In 1866, the centennial year of American Methodism, arrangements were made for its repurchase, and through the liberality of citizens of New Albany, and especially by the munificence of Hon. W. C. De Pauw, this object was realized, and the property was secured to the Indiana Conference. Rev. Erastus Rowley, D.D., a graduate of Union College, N. Y., and who had been in charge of similar institutions, was elected president, and the college was re-opened in September, 1866. As the number of students increased an additional building was needed, and Mr. De Pauw, at an expense of $10,000, erected a handsome and commodious wing, and the name of the institution was changed to De Pauw College for Young Ladies. Mr. De Pauw has since that time, by the donation of a valuable and well-selected library, and by other gifts, added to its usefulness. During the administration of Dr. Rowley being refitted, it is more commodious and attractive than at any previous time. It is under the care of Rev. Erastus Rowley, D.D., assisted by an able corps of teachers.

Depositories.—For the purpose of furnishing more convenient centres at which books might be obtained, and thus increasing the business of the Book Concern, depositories were established in a number of the principal cities. In these the book agents either purchased or, more usually, rented stores, and employed agents to conduct the business under their direction. Depositories have been established in Atlanta, Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, Pittsburgh, San Francisco, and St. Louis, though that in Chicago has more of the character of a branch of the Western Book Concern. The depository in Boston has the oldest history.

The early New England preachers engaged very heartily in the personal circulation of Methodist books, the presiding elders usually keeping large supplies on hand, and distributing them among the preachers upon their districts. After the Zion's Herald had become well established (its first number having been issued in January, 1823), a small depository was opened in its office. The first Methodist book-store, however, of any importance was opened by Rev. D. S. King, then a superannuated minister of the M. E. Conference, about forty years ago. His quite commodious rooms on Washington Street became the headquarters of Methodism in Boston, the editorial-room of Zion's Herald being in the rear of the sales department. The establishment, which was the private property of the proprietor, was in no other sense a depository than that it kept on hand the books of the catalogue of the Concern, and offered the same terms to the preachers. It changed its proprietors a number of times, the firm becoming, successively, D. S. King & Co., Waite, Peirce & Co., Strong & Brodhead, Binney & Otheman, and Charles H. Peirce. At length, in 1851, the agents at New York assumed the business, appointing Mr. James P. Magee, who still retains his position, as their agent.

Almost immediately upon his taking charge the depository assumed much wider proportions, and became a central denominational point for all New England Methodism. The business was conducted in the same vicinity for a number of years, until the erection of the large and beautiful building of the Boston Wesleyan Association, since which time it occupies one of its large stores.

This building, represented in the engraving, and which is located on Bromfield Street, adjoining the old church, is the property of the association which publishes Zion's Herald. The dimensions are 72 feet front and 112 feet deep; three large stores are on the street, and large and handsome rooms are on the front and rear of each story. An open space breaks the building from the first story, except in the section nearest the church. There is a hall in the rear wing which will seat between three and four hundred persons. The upper part of the building is occupied by the Theological Seminary.

The sales amount to about $82,000 per annum, and the stock on hand is estimated at about $20,000, with notes and amounts due for about $25,000 more.

The Buffalo Depository was established in that city after Dr. Carlton was elected principal agent of New York. He was fortunate in procuring the services of H. H. Otis, who has had charge of it since that period. The depository occupies only rented property. The stock kept on hand varies from $20,000 to $30,000. The sales amount to about $50,000 annually, and less than $8000 was due on notes and accounts in 1876.

The depository in Atlanta was established by the Western Book Concern Jan. 1, 1869, in connection with the Methodist Advocate, published at that place. The amount of sales is comparatively small, not having in any year amounted to more than $5000; but the prospect is favorable with the increase of trade for larger sales being realized. The business is managed in connection with the publishing of the Methodist Advocate and the distribution of other periodicals from that point. No real estate has been purchased.

(For the Chicago Depository, see WESTERN BOOK CONCERN; for depositories in Pittsburgh, St. Louis, and San Francisco, see the cities named; for the Philadelphia Depository, see PHILADELPHIA TRACT SOCIETY.)

Besides the regular depositories, Methodist books and publications are also kept on sale in several of the cities, either by private individuals or by associations under the patronage of the church. In Baltimore, the friends of the church had long felt the need of some central locality where the publications of the church could be obtained. A movement was made in 1870 towards securing such a result, but little was accomplished, however, until 1872, when Rev. D. H. Carroll succeeded in securing a sufficient capital on subscription, and a building was purchased on Fayette Street at a cost of $15,000, and Mr. Carroll was appointed as the agent. Under his successful agency the business opened so encouragingly that its friends resolved to secure a more commodious edifice, and ultimately succeeded in purchasing an imposing building on Baltimore Street, five stories high, with an imposing iron front structure,—the building being 40 feet in front and 100 feet deep, and is in the very centre of the retail stores of the city. Its cost was $76,000, and it was regarded as being purchased on very advantageous terms. The property is held by a stock company for the church, and the indebtedness is annually reduced by the profits from the sales. The sales-room is spacious, well ventilated, and finely lighted, and elegant rooms have been set apart and furnished for pastors' and other church meetings, and for the Methodist Historical Society. A monthly local paper is issued from the depository, entitled the Methodist Record, and is under the editorship of the agent. The annual sales amount from $30,000 to $35,000.

Depravity, a word denoting a vitiated moral character, is, in a theological sense, expressive of man's condition after the sin of our first parents: in an evangelical sense, expressive of the truth "that man has no ability in himself, and by merely acting in himself, to become right and perfect, and that, hence, without some extension to him from without and above, some approach that is supernatural, he can never become what his own ideal requires." It differs from the interpretation held by the Pelagians and by the modern Socinians. "That though Adam by his transgression exposed himself to the displeasure of his Maker, yet neither he nor his posterity sustained any moral injury by his disobedience; that the only evil he suffered was expulsion from Paradise and subjection to severe labor; that he was created mortal, and would have died had he not sinned; and that his posterity enter life with their moral powers in perfect integrity."

It differs also from the opinion held by the semi-Pelagians, "That Adam created mortal, would yet have been kept alive by the bounty of God had he been obedient; that he was the natural representative of his posterity, so that all the effects of his fall to some extent are visited upon them: not, however, as penal, but as natural consequences, and as children are often compelled to suffer by the negligence or fault of their parents."

Wakefield gives the following definition, as generally accepted by the followers of Arminius and of Calvin: "That Adam, by his transgression, incurred the divine displeasure, lost the moral image of God, in which he was created, and became subject to temporal death, and exposed to death eternal; that as he was the federal head and legal representative of his posterity, they fell in him as really as he fell in himself, and thus become liable to all the penal consequences of his transgression; that man in his fallen condition is very far gone from original righteousness, and is, of his own nature, inclined to evil, and that continually: and that he has no power, without divine grace, to do anything that is really good or acceptable to God." "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin: and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Romans v. 12. "That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." Romans v. 21.

Depravity is total, in the sense that it includes all the race, that all men are born in sin, and that it affects all the human faculties, but not total in the sense that all the powers with which man was originally created have been taken away. He is very far gone from original righteousness; his nature, corrupted and become mortal by the fall, has not been destroyed; the image of God, in which he was created, has been defaced, but not obliterated; the understanding with which he was endowed has been darkened, but not destroyed; the will weakened, but not taken away. Scriptures nowhere teach that the fundamental laws of the mind, the first principles of reason, are utterly traversed and obliterated so that man is not able to recognize the existence of God, or feel his obligation to him. The manifestation of the Spirit is given unto all, but the revelation is modified by the means through which it passes. The will of God revealed unto all men, and power given to obey that will, make all responsible. Accountability rests upon this knowledge and power. If depravity is total in the sense that all human power to know God is lost, then incapacity leaves the race without responsibility. Scripture teaches that all men are created responsible beings: "Because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened." Romans i. 21. "Who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them." Romans i. 32.

If depravity is total in the sense that all the powers of the soul are lost, then man is reduced to a mere machine; his recovery is by no effort of his own, his conversion and restoration the entire work of another, leave him no volition. The saved are of God's work, and the lost are of God's work. This assumption may explain the sovereignty of God in man's salvation, and confirm a theory that man has no volition or power in the matter of his restoration and destiny, but it is contrary to God's word, which recognizes human volition as instrumental in salvation; that in the call to repentance recognizes an alternative power in man enabling him to accept or reject God. "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." Acts iii. 19. "And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent." Acts. xvii. 30.

Inherited depravity is not personal guilt. No one is or can be justly punished for his ancestor's guilt, and guilt, as Dr. Wilbur Fisk well says, "is not imputed until by a voluntary rejection of the gospel man makes the depravity of his nature the object of his choice. Then he is by his very nature a child of wrath, so that, though our infant nature may be a child of grace, our adult nature may be a child of wrath." (See ORIGINAL SIN.)

De Puy, W. H., D.D., assistant editor of The Christian Advocate, New York, was born at Penn Yan, N. Y., Oct. 31, 1821; at the age of twenty became principal of the academy at Coudersport, Pa., and two years later principal of the Genesee Classical Seminary. He joined the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1845, and was engaged in pastoral work till 1849, when he became agent for Genesee College, Lima, N. Y. In 1850 he was appointed principal of the Teachers' Department of Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, was elected Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the same institution in 1851, and filled that chair for four years. In 1855 he was appointed pastor of Grace church, Buffalo, and successively and consecutively served for the full pastoral term in each of the four M. E. churches then in that city, and during about four years of those pastorates was editor of the Buffalo Christian Advocate. He was also for two years the American Bible Society's district secretary for Western New York. In 1865 he was appointed assistant editor of The Christian Advocate, at New York, a position which he still occupies. He was secretary or assistant secretary of the Genesee Conference for fifteen years, and a delegate from the Western New York Conference to the General Conference of 1876. He served as pastor of John Street church, New York, in 1866, 1867, and 1868. He was also editor-in-chief of the Daily Christian Advocate during the quadrennial General Conference seasons of 1860, 1872, and 1876, and has been the editor of The Methodist Almanac for the last twelve years, and for the same period secretary of the Methodist Episcopal Sunday-School Union. He received the degree of M.A. from Genesee College (now Syracuse University), and that of D.D. from Union College. Dr. De Puy is the author of a large octavo work, entitled "Three-Score Years and Beyond, or Experiences of the Aged," published at the Methodist Book Concern, New York.

Des Moines Conference, M. E. Church, was so named by the General Conference of 1864, and included "all that part of the State of Iowa not included in the Iowa and the Upper Iowa Conferences." The General Conference of 1860 had organized a Western Iowa Conference occupying chiefly the same ground, and in 1868 it included that part of the State "west of a line beginning at the southeast corner of Wayne County; thence due north to the south line of Marshall County; thence west to the southeast corner of Story County; thence due north to the State line; leaving Knoxville in the Iowa Conference, Monroe in the Des Moines Conference, and Iowa Falls in Upper Iowa Conference, and also including that portion of Dakota Territory east of the Missouri River and south of Fort Randall." In 1872, Northwest Iowa Conference being organized, it changed especially the northern and western boundaries of this Conference. It is now bounded as follows: "Beginning at the southeast corner of Wayne County; thence north to the south line of Marshall County, leaving Knoxville to the Iowa Conference and Monroe to the Des Moines Conference; thence west to the southeast corner of Story County; thence north to the northeast corner of Story County; thence west to the northeast corner of Crawford County; thence south to the north line of township eighty-three; thence west to the east line of Monona County; thence south and west on the line of Monona County and the Missouri River." It held its first session at Clarendon, Iowa, Aug. 31, 1864, Bishop Janes presiding, and reported 8304 members, 67 traveling and 126 local preachers, 45 churches, valued at $54,250, 24 parsonages, valued at $16,900, 189 Sunday-schools, and 8646 Sunday-school scholars. The report in 1876 was: 162 traveling and 244 local preachers, 21,835 members, 355 Sunday-schools, 19,702 Sunday-school scholars, 160 churches, valued at $407,305, and 95 parsonages, valued at $70,275.

Des Moines, Iowa (pop. 12,035), the capital of the State, is situated on the Des Moines River and the Iowa division of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad. It was originally called Fort Des Moines, because at this place was early built a fort or military station to protect settlers. This was abandoned in 1846, and the town was changed to

Des Moines. The earliest reference to this appointment in the records of the church is in 1847, when Raccoon Fork mission was established, and J. Q. Hammond was appointed missionary. In 1848 Des Moines mission was established. In 1850 the mission reported 129 members. The M. E. Church has had a very rapid growth in this city. To accommodate a large foreign population a German church was organized. The African M. E. Church has a few members, but no church property. The city is included in the Des Moines Conference, and the statistics are as follows:

Detroit, Mich. (pop. 79,577), is the largest city in the State, and the chief port of entry. It is one of the oldest cities in the Union, the first settlement having been made by a French colony from Montreal, Canada, as early as 1701. In 1760 it came under the control of the English, and in 1805 it was almost entirely destroyed by fire. Because of its early unsettled condition, and also from the character of its population, Methodism did not make much progress for several years after its introduction. The city has always contained a very large percentage of foreign population. In 1838 there were 15,000 Irish and an equal number of Germans, and 4000 French.

The first Methodist sermon was delivered by Mr. Freeman, a local preacher, in 1803. In 1804, Nathan Bangs, then a missionary in Upper Canada, came over to Detroit and preached, but organized no society. Soon after this, however, William Mitchell organized the first class. Detroit is first noticed in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1809, and was then connected with the New York Conference, and was in the Upper Canada district, with Joseph Sawyer as presiding elder, and William Case was sent to Detroit as "missionary." In 1810 the Genesee Conference being organized, it fell within its bounds, and reported 78 members. During the War of 1812 the city fell into the hands of the English, and there was no report from it to the M. E. Church from 1812 to 1815. In that year Joseph Hickcox was sent to re-organize the work, and reported 140 members. In 1825 it reported 70 members. After passing the severe trials of the earlier years, Methodism began to flourish, and is now well represented in that city. The engraving on the following page represents the Central church, which occupies a commanding location, and is a large and commodious edifice of handsome architecture, being an ornament to the place. The city is in the Detroit Conference, and reports (1876) the following statistics:

Detroit Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1856, and includes "all that part of the State of Michigan east of the principal meridian, and also the upper peninsula." The first session was held at Adrian, Mich., Sept. 17, 1856, Bishop Morris presiding. It reported 11,185 members, 115 traveling and 120 local preachers. The report in 1876 shows 235 traveling and 176 local preachers, 24,449 members, 383 Sunday-schools, and 30,775 Sunday-school scholars, 280 churches, valued at $1,432,350, and 127 parsonages, valued at $170,630.

Dewart, Edward Hartley, editor of the Christian Guardian, was born in the north of Ireland, and came to Canada with his parents in boyhood. While yet a lad he was converted near Norwood. His opportunities for education were very limited, but he was an insatiable reader, and perused all the books he could procure in the settlement. On one occasion he walked sixteen miles barefooted to secure the loan of a book. One of his greatest helpers was the Rev. Wm. Young, the minister on the circuit from 1843 to 1845, who gave him the free use of his library. When the normal school was opened in Toronto, in the winter of 1846-47, he walked the intervening 160 miles between his home and Toronto in the snow, and entered his name among the first students; and before he had completed his course he was often selected to lecture before his fellow-students in the absence of one of the professors. After graduating, he taught school, until called out on the St. Thomas circuit, in 1851. His first city charge was Montreal West, after which he served successively St. John's, Collingwood, Toronto North, and Ingersoll, from which place he was called to the editorial chair in 1869. Mr. Dewart has published several works, one a compilation, as a school reader; another, "Selections from Canadian Poets." He has also published a large volume of original poems, called "Songs of Life."

Dibrell, Anthony, a descendant of a Huguenot family, was born in Buckingham Co., Va., Aug. 19, 1805, and was educated in the University of North Carolina. Subsequently he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Lynchburg. He was converted in 1828, and was received on trial in the Virginia Conference in 1830. He filled a large number of prominent stations, and was for several years presiding elder. Sept. 1, 1855, he fell a victim to yellow fever in the city of Norfolk. He was a member of the Louisville Convention, which organized the Southern Methodist Church, and was also a member of each successive General Conference until his death.

Dickenson, Rev. Peard, was for two years curate to Rev. Vincent Perronet, when he united with Mr. Wesley and exercised his ministry with zeal and devotion. Died triumphantly, 1802.

Dickhaut, Henry C., was born in Hesse-Cassel, Germany, June, 1838; emigrated to the United States in 1853, and settled in Chicago. Shortly after he reached this country he became identified with the German department of the Methodist Book Depository in that city, and after the great fire was transferred to the Western Book Concern in Cincinnati as chief German clerk. He was converted after he came to this country, and has been useful in church interests in various ways connected with the German work of the M. E. Church. He represented the Northwestern German Conference as lay delegate in the General Conference of 1872, and the Central German Conference at the General Conference of 1876.

Dickins, John, was born in London in 1747, and died in Philadelphia, September 27, 1798. He was educated partly in London and partly at Eton. He united with the Methodists in America in the year 1774, and was received as a traveling preacher in 1777. During the Revolutionary War he traveled extensively in Virginia and North Carolina. He was a man of more than ordinary education, being well acquainted with Latin and Greek, and well skilled in mathematical science. In 1780 he planned with Bishop Ashbury the establishment of a seminary, which subsequently was changed into "Cokesbury College." At the close of the Revolutionary War he was stationed for some years in the city of New York, where he superintended the publication of Methodist literature. In 1789 he was stationed in Philadelphia, and the publishing department being established there, he remained at its head until his death by yellow fever in 1798. "His skill and fidelity as editor, inspector, and corrector of the press were exceedingly great, conducting the whole of his business with punctuality and integrity." He passed through the terrible epidemics of 1793 and 1797 uninjured. In the awful visitation of 1798 he declined to leave the city, though friends earnestly urged him to do so, and continued so long as he had strength to visit those who were suffering. After he was taken severely ill he called his wife to his bedside and said, "My dear, I am very ill; but I entreat you in the most earnest manner not to be the least discomposed or uneasy. Tell the children I beg of them not to be uneasy. for divine wisdom cannot err. Glory be to God. I can rejoice in his will whether for life or death! I know all is well, glory be to Jesus!" With similar utterances he passed away.

Dickinson College, at Carlisle, Pa., in the beautiful and fertile Cumberland Valley, was founded in 1783, and is therefore the oldest college under the control of the Methodist Church. It was named after John Dickinson, the eminent Revolutionary patriot, and governor of Pennsylvania, on account of his "great and important services to his coun-ally, under the direction of that denomination, and received from time to time substantial aid from the State. The first president, Dr. Nesbit, was called from Scotland, and was universally regarded as a man of most marked ability, and the college started with the highest promise of success. Its history, however, was one of continued struggles and varying success, although among its administrators were men of foremost character and reputation, and its faculty frequently embraced some of the ablest try," and his "liberal donation to the college." Equal with him in interest and activity in establishing the college was the celebrated Dr. Benjamin Rush, of Philadelphia, who for more than a quarter of a century was foremost in every measure looking towards its advancement. The original intention was evidently that the college should be undenominational, but one-third of the first board of trustees, as constituted by the charter, consisted of clergymen, and it was prescribed in that instrument that "the number of clergymen should never be lessened." In its early struggles the membership of the Presbyterian Church seemed most willing and able to support it, and the college passed tacitly and by common consent, though altogether inform-men in its different departments. Among its earliest graduates were found men of the highest distinction, including Chief-Justice Taney, President Buchanan, Judges Gibson and Grier. Its history as a Methodist institution dates from 1833. Owing to internal difficulties, and also largely to the growing dissensions in the Presbyterian Church, which preceded the division of that body, the trustees became so discouraged in the management of the college that they cheerfully considered overtures made to them from the Baltimore Conference, through a duly authorized committee, to assume the responsibility for and control of the college. The whole subject was carefully and deliberately considered, and, after the Philadelphia Conference had been admitted into the arrangement on the same terms with the Baltimore Conference, the college was placed under the control of these Conferences by the formation of a new board of trustees, according to the prescribed legal method, consisting of individuals selected by the Conferences. The sole conditions of the transfer of all the rights and privileges—then vested by law in the trustees—was that the college should be established and supported, that its literary character should be of high grade, and that it should be endowed so as to insure the preservation of its character and give extent to its usefulness. Thus the college—with its past honorable record, its buildings and grounds, its library, one of the most valuable in the country, its philosophical apparatus, embracing some pieces of rare historic interest—passed under the control of the Methodist Church, with the full consent of all parties. The new board contained some of the ablest and most representative men of the church, and they accepted the responsibility with earnestness of purpose. Dr. Durbin was called to the presidency. Efforts were made towards securing an endowment, which were partially successful, and the Conferences assumed to make good the deficiencies by annual collections. The grounds were improved,—a new building was erected. All departments were thoroughly organized. Young men in the church had their attention turned to a collegiate education. Nowhere did greater success attend this eminent man, when all the circumstances are considered, than in his connection with Dickinson College, and perhaps, in the great day of accounts, in no position will his influence upon the church be found to have been more far-reaching. His administration of twelve years was followed by those of Dr. Emory, Bishop Peck, Dr. Collins, Dr. Johnson, Dr. Dashiell, and the present incumbent, Dr. J. A. McCauley. The established character of the college was fully maintained. The numbers in attendance, affected at times by temporary causes, were what might reasonably have been expected, and the position attained by many of its graduates indicates a training fully equal to that of its earlier days. Among those in the church may be named Bishops Bowman and Cummins, Drs. Crooks, Hurst, Deems, and many others, as well as men prominent in all professions and fields of usefulness.

In 1851 a plan of endowment by the sale of cheap scholarships, giving four years' tuition for $25, was inaugurated, which proved in so far successful as to add largely to the funds of the college and the number of its students, which, under the administration of Dr. Collins, in 1855, reached a maximum of 245.

The outbreak of the war caused a loss of one-third of its patronage, which was largely from Maryland and Virginia; but during the war the full course of study was kept up, the class of 1863 having been graduated hastily in the college chapel before the capture of the town. The perfect immunity of its grounds and property from harm at the time was due largely to the presence of so many of the alumni of the college in the invading army. In the centenary year of Methodism, 1866, more than $100,000 were added to its endowment. Its course of study was enlarged by the addition of elective scientific and biblical studies in the Junior and Senior years. Since then the administration of its finances has been eminently conservative. All debt has been carefully avoided, and, by careful and judicious expenditure of the available income, a thorough collegiate course of instruction has been afforded, and its present condition is such that all receipts by donation may add directly to its effectiveness. Its present productive endowment is above $170,000, with valuable property, unproductive at present, which will in the near future add to its income. Its facilities for education accumulated during nearly a century are unusually large. Its grounds are beautiful, and its buildings ample, comprising three colleges. Its libraries, including those of the societies, contain 28,000 volumes, and the college library especially is full of rare and valuable works that could not be duplicated. The philosophical and chemical apparatus and collections for illustration are large, and annually increasing. Several courses of study are open for graduation; the usual classical course of American colleges of four years for the degree of A.B., including elective scientific and biblical studies in the last two years, in place of ancient languages and mathematics, and a Latin scientific course of three years, in which Greek is not required, and the completion of which entitles to a degree under the seal of the college.

The town is ready of access from all points. Its markets are well supplied from the surrounding country, and the necessary annual expenses of a student are such that, with tuition payable by means of scholarships, parents of even moderate means may afford their sons the advantages of thorough collegiate training. Its faculty consists of Dr. J. A. McCauley, president, and Professors Himes, Harman, Little, and Lippincott.

Diefendorf, Benjamin J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Montgomery Co., N. Y., in 1809, and died Oct. 9, 1875, aged sixty-six years. He was converted when six years of age, prepared for college at Cazenovia, and graduated from Middletown in 1833. He spent seventeen years as a teacher in the Wesleyan University, Dudley Academy, Mexico Academy, and Fort Plain Seminary, and about eighteen years in the active ministry within the bounds of the Black River Conference, to which he was admitted in 1837.

Dillingham, Hon. Paul, a lay delegate from the Vermont Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Shutesbury, Mass., in August, 1800, and removed to Vermont while a child. He became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church in his early youth; was admitted to the practice of the law in 1824, and in later years filled the offices of justice of the peace and State's attorney. He served as a member of the constitutional convention of the State in 1836-37; was for six years a member of the House of Representatives and for two years a member of the State Senate; was a member of the National House of Representatives from 1843 to 1847, and was governor of the State of Vermont from 1865 to 1867.

Dillon, Isaac, D.D., a member of the Oregon Conference, was born in Zanesville, O., Oct. 28, 1823. He became a member of the M. E. Church in 1839. Graduated from Dickinson College in 1843, and entered the Ohio Conference in 1844. In 1852 he was transferred to the Oregon Conference. He served various important charges until 1866, when he was appointed presiding elder of Walla Walla district. After serving the district two years he was, by the General Conference of 1868, elected editor of the Pacific Christian Advocate, to which position he was re-elected in 1872, serving the church in that capacity eight years, when he resumed his place in the regular work, receiving his appointment to the East Portland station.

Dimmitt, J. P., was born at Batavia, O., Dec. 24, 1827, and was converted Sept. 21, 1842, in Pike Co., Ill. He was licensed to preach by Peter Akers, D.D., in 1848, and was received into the Illinois Annual Conference the same year. He traveled circuits nine years, stations ten, and districts, as presiding elder, eight years, and was a delegate to the General Conference in 1864.

Dinger, F. W., was born at Aarau, in Switzerland. Having emigrated to America, he was converted at Brooklyn, N. Y., and became a member of the East German Conference. He has filled a number of important appointments, and has been presiding elder of New York district. He is now (1877) stationed in Scranton.

Dinsmore, C. M., A.M., was born in Windham, N. H., Aug. 20, 1826. His ancestors were from the north of Ireland, and of Scotch descent. Converted at the age of fourteen he joined the M. E. Church, fitting himself for college at the New Hampshire Conference Seminary, and entering the Wesleyan University, graduated in 1851. Subsequently he pursued the study of theology at the Concord Biblical Institute, but left before graduation to accept the principalship of East Andover Academy. He was received on trial in the New Hampshire Conference in 1853, and has been constantly engaged in the pastorate since that time. He served one term in the legislature of his State, and in 1864 was school commissioner of Sullivan County, and member of the Board of Education for the State. During the war he served in the Christian Commission at Hampton hospital, and in 1872 was a member of the General Conference at Brooklyn, N. Y.

Diocesan, Episcopacy, is that system in which the bishop has jurisdiction over a certain district of country which is called a diocese. It is the form adopted by the Roman Catholics, the Church of England, the Scandinavian Lutheran Churches, and the Protestant Episcopal Church. The Moravians and the Methodist Episcopal Churches have no dioceses, their superintendents being itinerant and general. The particular work of each bishop is arranged at joint meetings for the purpose.

Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, The, is the title of a book containing the doctrines, usages, government, and ritual of the church. It corresponds to the Confession of Faith of Presbyterian Churches, and to a part of the Book of Common Prayer of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The early Methodists, being members of the Church of England, adopted no rules pertaining to church government. Mr. Wesley and his associates at Oxford adopted a few rules for the regulation of their time, studies, work, and deportment. After the organization of the Methodist societies Mr. Wesley drew up the General Rules (see GENERAL RULES) as a guide to his societies for their moral and social deportment. These have been retained as a part of the Discipline of all the Methodist churches. As the number increased he called together his preachers in conference, and regulations were adopted specifically with reference to their ministerial work. These minutes were, from time to time, revised and enlarged, but finally were called the "Large Minutes." These constituted the only Discipline known to the Wesleyan Methodists prior to the death of Mr. Wesley. Since that time they have been enlarged to meet the various necessities, and their rules now define the duties not only of ministers but of all the official bodies of the church. In America, from the arrival of Mr. Wesley's missionaries until the organization of the church in 1784, the English minutes were accepted as their rules of order, the Conference adding from time to time such provisions as were deemed necessary for the American work. When the Conference or Convention met in 1784 to form the church Mr. Wesley had added to the larger minutes a ritual, the Articles of Religion, and matters pertaining to church organization. These were adopted or modified according to the judgment of the Conference, and thus formed the Discipline of the church, which, at that time, was like the Large Minutes, in the form of question and answer. In the following year Mr. Asbury, in connection with John Dickins, carefully revised the Discipline, separating it into sections and giving it a new arrangement. He waited, however, until the arrival of Dr. Coke, in the spring of 1787, and for the Conference which had been called by Dr. Coke at Mr. Wesley's suggestion as a General Conference, that he might lay it before them. Although the Conference did not perform the work which Mr. Wesley had desired, yet it did revise the Discipline and make a number of important changes. The early General Conferences, embracing at first all the preachers in full connection and subsequently all the elders of the church, having supreme power, revised the Discipline at each session, it being read over carefully paragraph by paragraph. To prevent incautious or hasty action the Conference bound itself not to abolish any of the old rules except by a two-thirds vote, though a new rule might be adopted by a simple majority.

In 1808 a plan having been adopted for a delegated General Conference, restrictions were placed upon it in reference to fundamental parts of the Discipline and economy of the church, which could only be altered by a two-thirds vote of the General Conference, and by a concurrent three-fourths vote of the members of the Annual Conferences. In all other matters the delegated General Conference possessed the same power as the original body. At every session of the General Conference some changes have been made in some part of the Discipline. In its publication it has at different times been changed as to its order. In 1804 it was divided into two parts: the first part embracing the spiritual economy, and the second the temporal economy of the church. In 1848 it was arranged in three parts: the first including the origin, doctrines, and government; the second, the ritual; and the third, the temporal economy. In 1860 its arrangement was altered into six parts: the first embracing the doctrines, administration, rules, and means of grace; the second, the government of the church; the third, the ritual; the fourth, the religious and benevolent institutions; the fifth, the temporal economy; and the sixth, slavery. In 1864 this arrangement was somewhat modified, so that the first part embraced the origin, doctrines, and rules; the second, the government of the church; the third, the administration of the Discipline; the fourth, the ritual; the fifth, the educational and benevolent institutions; and the sixth, the temporal economy. This order has been observed to the present time, excepting that the ritual of the church has been transferred from the fourth to the sixth part. The aim of the church has been to keep its Discipline in as small a compass as possible, so that it may be placed in the hands of all the members of the church to be carefully read and studied. The episcopal address which is published as the introduction to the Discipline contains these words:

"We esteem it our duty and privilege most earnestly to recommend to you, as members of our church, our Form of Discipline, which has been founded on the experience of a long series of years, as also on the observations and remarks we have made on ancient and modern churches. We wish this little publication may be found in the house of every Methodist, and the more so as it contains the Articles of Religion maintained, more or less, in part or in whole by every reformed church in the world.

"Far from wishing you to be ignorant of any of our doctrines, or any part of our Discipline, we desire you to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest the whole. You ought, next to the Holy Scriptures, to understand the Articles of Religion and the Rules of the Church to which you belong."

The Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church South is the same in substance, though differing in some particulars. Its general order is also very similar, though it is divided simply into chapters without the division of parts. It has in an appendix a pastoral address, and the boundaries of the Annual Conferences.

The Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canada and of the African Methodist Episcopal Church and of the African Zion Church are also very similar.

Dissenters is a term used in countries where state churches are established to signify those who refuse to unite with the state church in its services. In Great Britain the words Dissenter and Nonconformist are nearly synonymous. The early Methodist societies of Great Britain rejected the name of Dissenters because they considered themselves as a part of the Church of England. They were organized into separate societies, but they received both baptism and the Lord's Supper from the priests of the various parishes, as Mr. Wesley's lay ministers were not permitted to administer these ordinances. Thus the various societies remained until the time of Mr. Wesley's death, though since that period they have become entirely separate from the Church of England, and have all the elements of an independent church; still, they do not call themselves Dissenters, because they are in agreement with the evangelical portion of the Church of England in doctrines, and they use the Prayer-Book in the larger churches in their morning services. The rapid movement of many of the English clergy through high-churchism towards Rome, and the haughty and oppressive bearing of others, is, however, placing the Wesleyan Methodists of England more firmly on independent ground, and they no longer consider themselves so strictly identified with the national church. In all other countries where state churches are established, as in France and Germany, the Wesleyans occupy the position of Dissenters.

District of Columbia (pop. 131,700) was a territory ceded to the United States by Virginia and Maryland in 1790, and originally contained 100 square miles. In 1846 the Virginia portion, on account of matters involved in slavery, was receded to Virginia, and the territory, as now constituted, contains about 60 square miles. It is under the exclusive control of Congress, but its citizens have no voice in the election of President or Vice-President, and have no representation in Congress. Its chief population is in the cities of Washington and Georgetown. This territory was embraced in the old Frederick circuit, which, in 1784, covered all of Maryland lying west of the Baltimore circuit, embracing also Fairfax County, in Virginia. In 1784, Mr. Gateh tells us that Georgetown was embraced in the Frederick circuit, and that there were only a few members in it. This was the only point then occupied in what is now the District of Columbia. For nearly twenty years we find no mention of Georgetown or the District of Columbia, but in 1801 Georgetown is reported with 58 white members and 37 colored. This probably embraced the entire membership in the district. In 1802, Georgetown and the city of Washington are reported as containing 72 white members and 39 colored. These appointments remained together until 1805, when they reported 173 white members and 137 colored, and they are separated into two distinct appointments, the report of 1806 being, for Georgetown, 110 white, 92 colored; and for Washington, 61 white and 25 colored. The growth appears, however, to have been quite slow, for ten years afterwards the report in 1816 is: Georgetown, 254 white and 163 colored members; Washington, 140 white and 92 colored; and up to that time only one minister had been sent to each place. At that session, however, two ministers were appointed to Georgetown. The growth of Georgetown has since that period been exceedingly slow. While the growth of Methodism in Washington was not rapid, yet having been introduced shortly after the national capital was laid out, it started under more favorable circumstances. The site for the Foundry church was donated by Mr. Foxall, who had been associated with Methodism in England, and who named the church in Washington after Mr. Wesley's old church in London. He also contributed largely to the building of the edifice. It is now one of the best sites in the city for a church. With the growth of population the number of churches in Washington increased, and Methodism enjoys a fair position in the capital of the nation.

The District of Columbia is included in the Washington district of the Baltimore Conference, and has, in its work among the whites, 16 stations, with 4262 members and probationers, and 4482 Sunday-school scholars, 18 churches, valued at $649,500, with 6 parsonages, valued at $39,500. It has also in the Washington Conference, among its colored members, 3 stationed ministers, with 2372 members, 843 Sunday-school scholars, with 4 churches, valued at $60,000. The Methodist Episcopal Church South has in the city of Washington 1 church, with 446 members, 480 Sunday-school scholars, and an edifice valued at $50,000. The Methodist Protestant Church, which was organized shortly after the secession in 1828, has 3 churches, with 377 members, 372 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $96,000. The African M. E. Church has 5 churches, valued at $73,500, with 1617 members and 1027 Sunday-school scholars. The African Zion Church and the Colored Church of America have each an organization, but no report has been found of statistics. Making a total of Methodist members of 8296, 6079 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $972,500. The following table, prepared from the United States census of 1870, shows the relative position of the various leading denominations at that date:

	Edifices.	Sittings.	Property.

District Conferences in the M. E. Church are composed of traveling and local preachers, exhorters, district stewards, and one Sunday-school superintendent and one class-leader from each pastoral charge within a presiding elder's district. The Conference assembles once or twice in each year, as each district may determine for itself, the presiding elder designating the time and the Conference the place. The District Conference, however, is only held in such districts as shall by a vote of the majority of the Quarterly Conferences desire such meeting. If a bishop is present he is the presiding officer, otherwise the presiding elder. Should both be absent, the president is chosen by ballot, and a record of the proceedings, carefully kept by a secretary, is to be sent to the ensuing Annual Conference. The duties of the District Conferences are: to take the general oversight of all the temporal and spiritual affairs of the district; to take cognizance of all the local preachers and exhorters within its bounds, inquiring as to their gifts, labors, and usefulness, and to arrange for them a plan of appointments. The Conference has authority to try and expel or acquit any local preacher against whom charges are preferred. It has power to license local preachers, or renew their licenses; to recommend such local preachers, as are proper candidates, for deacons' or elders' orders, or for admission on trial in the traveling connection. Such recommendation, however, can only be given after the person has been properly recommended by the Quarterly Conference or the leaders' meeting of the church in which he is a member, and after he has passed a satisfactory examination on the course of studies prescribed. It is made the further duty of the District Conference to inquire in reference to the benevolent collections, and to take such measures as may be necessary for their success; to superintend the Sunday-schools, and to take necessary measures for missions or church extension within their bounds; and also to provide for appropriate literary exercises during their sessions. At these meetings reports are made by the presiding elder, and by each pastor, local preacher, and exhorter, as to the work which he has performed, and by each district steward, superintendent, and class-leader, as to the condition of the departments of church work represented by each one.

After a District Conference has been constituted, it may be discontinued by the vote of two-thirds of the members present, after notice has been given at a previous session, and with the concurrence of three-fourths of the Quarterly Conferences in a district. The provision for establishing District Conferences was enacted by the General Conference of 1872, but was somewhat modified by the Conference of 1876. They have not been used in probably more than one-half of the districts within the boundaries of the church. Where they have been used and properly conducted, they have been found valuable in developing a deeper interest in the affairs of the church, and in strengthening the connectional bonds of the district.

District Meetings (English Wesleyan).—The annual district meeting is the second ecclesiastical court of Methodism. It was instituted at the first Conference after Mr. Wesley's death, "for the preservation of our whole economy." This annual meeting as a committee of the Conference is one at which most important ministerial and financial duties are discharged; it meets in May, and consists of "all the preachers appointed by the Conference to the different circuits within its bounds; all of whom, not excepting supernumeraries or preachers on trial, are required, unless unavoidably prevented, to attend its sittings." The meeting is opened by singing, reading the Scriptures, and prayer (this is done at each sitting of the committee); the secretary is then chosen by ballot,—usually the financial secretary appointed at the preceding Conference. The names of the ministers and preachers on trial are called over, and recorded in the district minutes.

To this list are appended the names of any who may have been appointed to any circuit during the year by the president. Minutes are made of every absent minister, and a dispensation is granted by the meeting. The questions come in a regular form of business, published by the authority of Conference. "Are there any objections to any ministers or preachers on trial?" is the first. This comprises four divisional inquiries: "Are there any objections to his moral and religious character?" "Does he believe and preach our doctrines?" "Has he duly observed and enforced our Discipline?" and, "Has he competent abilities for the itinerant work?" Some of the answers are given by a colleague, or the nearest superintendent minister; others are answered by himself. Each question must be put by the chairman, and a separate answer to each must appear in the district minutes.

The following questions are asked and answered: "Have the directions of Conference as to residences and interchanges been duly observed?" "Has any minister married since the last meeting; and if so, have the rules on this subject been observed?" "Has any minister died since Conference?" (If one has, a character must be inserted.) "Does any minister resign?" "Does any one offer himself for foreign missions?" "Do any return to the work?" "Do any become supernumeraries?" "Are any such to be re-appointed to a circuit?" The number of members at the March quarterly visitation are to be recorded. Other questions as to the employment of home missionary ministers, pastoral visitation, and the state of the work of God are asked, and the answers duly registered. The representative to the stationing committee is chosen. Those who at the ensuing Conference are to be admitted into full connection are examined for recommendation,—and also those remaining on trial. The result of a careful examination "by papers" being duly recorded.

The constitution of the district committee is two-fold, clerical and lay,—the former attend to those ministerial matters indicated. The latter meet on the second day of the session, and comprise the district treasurer of the Children's Fund, also of the Worn-out Ministers' Auxiliary Fund,—the general treasurers of connectional funds residing in the district; with the circuit stewards. The financial business includes the appointment by the lay members of their own representative to Conference, with a careful review of the Home Mission and Contingent Fund; the amount of the yearly collection, grants for removal, expenses, afflictions, furniture, etc., with claims for extraordinary deficiencies and contingent expenses. Circuit arrangements, Auxiliary Fund, chapel affairs, education matters, Children's Fund, schools and Schools' Fund, and collections, all come under strict investigation. It is probable that the proposed introduction of lay representation (to be decided next Conference) may make some alterations in the above arrangement, and a new edition of the "Order of Business" be published.

The Financial District Meeting is held in September, and is restricted to the administration of temporal affairs only; it is always held previous to the September quarterly meeting. It was first instituted in the year 1821; the previous year having shown that, owing to the extended and improved finance, the May meeting was unable to accomplish the duties involved, and a special meeting was held. The place of meeting is chosen by the chairman. All superintendents of circuits must attend, and as many other ministers as can conveniently do so; these, with the circuit stewards in the district, the district treasurers of the Children's Fund, the Auxiliary Fund (and during the missionary business), the district missionary treasurer and secretary, compose the members of this meeting. The Contingent Fund grant, for ordinary circuit deficiencies, is divided among the several claimant circuits. The allowances for ministers' children are duly apportioned. The district treasurers for the Children's and Auxiliary Fund, and for the district Sustentation Fund, are appointed; as also the district chapel sub-committee, consisting of four ministers and four laymen (the chairman and financial secretary being members ex officio). Also the district Sunday-school sub-committee, of which the chairman and education secretary, and one minister and three laymen chosen by the meeting, are members. An education secretary, and also a district probationer's examination secretary, are appointed. Chapel affairs are brought under consideration, and arrangements made for holding missionary anniversaries in the several circuits. Other meetings may be held as occasions arise in the several districts, with the following designations and purposes:

The Minor District Meeting is so termed because designed to avoid the inconvenience and expense of assembling the regular district committee in cases which might be determined by a smaller jurisdiction; and also to engage as few persons as possible in the investigation of affairs, in themselves important, but often painful and unprofitable. This was instituted in the year 1793, and was first for the trial of ministers only; but in 1835 the rule was altered so as to allow an excluded member to appeal from the decision of a superintendent to a minor district meeting. The chairman and four ministers (two being chosen by each of the parties concerned) constitute the court. The object contemplated is twofold: First. "The settlement of any differences or disputes which may possibly arise between two preachers in the same district; or, if any preacher be accused of immorality." Secondly. "To take into consideration appeals from accused members of society against sentences of expulsion; and from superintendents of circuits against apparently factious verdicts of leaders' meetings, or when these meetings refuse to give any verdict at all." If either party should decline to choose two ministers to act as members of the same, the chairman is directed and empowered to nominate them. In all cases the minutes of such court must be presented at the annual meeting, and entered on its minutes; the parties concerned having the right of appeal to the district meeting, and to the Conference.

The Mixed District Meeting, so called, had in its origin special reference to disputes which had arisen as to the administration of the Sacraments in our societies, as well as to furnish a remedy when accusations of immorality, or of teaching false doctrine on the part of any preacher, were preferred. This court consists of the preachers of the district (the chairman presiding), and also of the preachers, trustees, stewards, and leaders of the circuit concerned. It cannot in any case do more than declare the guilt of the accused party, if proved; in this position he is considered "as removed from the circuit." The matter is then transferred to the annual meeting.

The Special District Meeting is a tribunal only convened under circumstances of grave necessity; and consists of all the ministers of the district, together (if deemed desirable) with four superintendents, or other preachers selected without reference to contiguity,—of whom two shall be chosen by each of the parties specially concerned. The president of the Conference, when invited, may attend and preside, having the secretary of the Conference as his "official adviser."

The right of appeal to the Conference is reserved to all parties.

District Meetings of the United Methodist Free Churches, England.—The circuits of this connection are, in harmony with Methodistic usage, grouped in districts. There are fourteen districts in Great Britain, viz.: Birmingham, Bristol, Cornwall, Leeds and Bradford, Lincoln, Liverpool, London, Manchester, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Norwich, Nottingham, Rochdale, Sheffield, and Wales. There are six districts in other parts of the world where the denomination has its mission. The districts are Jamaica, Australia, New Zealand, West Africa, East Africa, and China.

The home districts meet annually in the month of May. In some districts an autumnal session is also held. The Annual Assembly appoints the district conveners, but each district meeting elects its own chairman and secretary. The meeting is constituted mainly of representatives freely chosen by the circuit quarterly meetings. Circuits under 200 members can send one representative, under 500 members two representatives, under 1000 members three, and over 1000 members four, representatives. In addition to these representatives the district meeting consists of the convener, the district chapel secretary (who is also appointed by the Annual Assembly), with all the supernumerary ministers and members of the connecional and missionary committees resident within its bounds. The functions of Free Methodist district meetings are not very important. The late Wesleyan Methodist Association had no district meetings, and as the United Methodist Free Churches largely followed the usages which had been current in that body ere the amalgamation in 1857, there was no large function which could be intrusted to them on their introduction in that year. They have been found so useful, however, that gradually more and more importance is assigned to them in the economy of Free Methodism. The statistics of membership are presented to the district meeting, which makes inquiry as to causes of decrease when diminution of numbers is reported; statistics of chapels and school-rooms built or enlarged during the year, with what has been done in reducing debts on chapels; these and similar facts are reported to the district meeting. Circuits which require grants in aid of ministers' salaries make their application to the district meeting first. The district meeting recommends such sum as it thinks proper. Candidates for the ministry are heard preach, and are examined by the district meeting, and, if judged suitable, are recommended to the Annual Assembly. In the matter of grants and candidates for the ministry the district meeting has not a veto or final authority. The Annual Assembly can employ candidates with or without the indorsement of district meetings, and its authority in the matter of grants is also absolute. The district meetings may and often do memorialize the Assembly in reference to modifications of existing rules. Many important questions are thus ventilated. It is customary also for district meetings to consider questions of public interest on which it is important that the mind of the body should be known. District meetings have no judicial powers, and no authority whatever over the itinerant ministers.

The foreign district meetings differ somewhat in their powers and functions from those held in England. Their distance from the central authority, and the exigencies of their work, make it imperative that they should have a larger sphere of authority. The districts in heathen lands are only nominal. As yet they are not organized. The colonial districts, Jamaica, Australia, and New Zealand, exercise powers resembling those of a Conference or Annual Assembly. They examine into the character of preachers, and they have authority to call men out to the work of the ministry in their own district. Thus they are preparing for independent action, should they by God's blessing become able to dispense altogether with English help, and to form Free Methodist churches not subject to the authority of the home connection, but bound to it by ties of gratitude, kindred, sentiment, and brotherly love.

Divinity of Christ, The.—The supreme fact on which all other things in the redemption of mankind depend is that of "God manifest in the flesh." The incarnation is the corner-stone of redemption. That God was in Christ Jesus "reconciling the world unto himself" is a fundamental principle of the Christian religion. The fact of redemption is the distinguishing doctrine of the Bible, and the nature and ministry of Christ the especial theme of the sacred writers. "From the nature of the work he was to perform it was necessary that he should be at once God and man. He must participate in the nature of those he came to redeem, and have power to subdue all evil, and dignity to give value to his obedience and suffering."

From the beginning to the end, therefore, of the sacred volume, from Genesis to Revelation, a God-man Redeemer is held up as the object of supreme reverence, love, and confidence to the perishing children of men.

The doctrine is indicated in the pre-existence of our Lord. "By establishing on scriptural authority the pre-existence of Christ, we take the first step in the demonstration of his absolute divinity. His pre-existence, indeed, simply considered, does not evince his God-head, and is not, therefore, a proof against the Arian hypothesis, but it destroys the Socinian notion that he was a mere man." That he existed prior to his incarnation is evident from the following passages of Scripture: "He that cometh after me is preferred before me: for he was before me." John i. 15. "Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am." John viii. 58. When Christ uttered these last words the Jews took up stones to stone him, revealing their wrath at so manifest a claim to divinity. Again: "And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." John xvii. 5. Whatever, therefore, the true nature of our Lord Jesus Christ may be, it is at least evident that he had an existence previous to his incarnation and previous to the very foundation of the world.

His pre-existence is not only indicated in Scripture, but also his grade of being. In the Old Testament we find a distinction between Jehovah as messenger, a mediator, and Jehovah as he who sends, between the Father and the Son. We find in the Old Testament a constant mention made of a person distinct from Jehovah, who, nevertheless, bears the titles and attributes and accomplishes the end of Jehovah. This person claims divine authority, exercises divine prerogatives, and receives divine homage. He is designated also as the Son of God, the Mighty God. The work attributed to him is elsewhere attributed to God himself. Thus, in Genesis, xvi. 10, the angel of Jehovah appears to Hagar, and says, "I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude." And Hagar, it is said, "called the name of Jehovah that spake unto her, Thou God seest me." This angel therefore is declared to be Jehovah, and he promises what God only could perform. Again, in Genesis, "And Jehovah said, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" This Jehovah is also called by Abraham "the Judge of all the earth," and the account of the solemn interview is thus given by the sacred writer: "The Lord (Jehovah) went his way as soon as he had left communing with Abraham." This person called in the Old Testament Jehovah, is in the New Testament designated as Christ. No name is given to the angel Jehovah which is not given to the angel Christ. No attribute is ascribed to the one which is not ascribed to the other. The worship which was paid to the one by patriarchs and prophets was paid to the other by evangelists and apostles; and the Scriptures declare them to be the same august person, the Redeeming Angel, the Redeeming Kinsman, and the Redeeming God.

The first argument from the New Testament in proof of the divinity of Christ is derived from the fact that he is everywhere called Lord: the Lord; our Lord. He is called Lord in the New Testament with the same constancy and with the same pre-eminence that Jehovah is called Lord in the Old Testament. In the Old Testament the word is used to express man's relation unto God as sovereign and protector. In the New Testament the same relation of sovereign and protector is applied to Christ. He is addressed as Lord, and receives the homage of men as being supreme in authority. "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honor." "But Christ is not only called Lord by the way of eminence, but he is declared to be the Lord of lords; to be the Lord of glory: the Lord of all; the Lord of the living and the dead; the Lord of all who are in heaven and in earth and under the earth. All creatures, from the highest to the lowest, must bow the knee to him, and acknowledge his absolute dominion. He is in such a sense Lord as that no man can truly call him Lord but by the Holy Ghost. If his lordship were merely the supremacy which one creature can exercise over other creatures, there would be no necessity for a divine illumination to enable us to recognize his authority. But if he is Lord in the absolute sense in which God alone is Lord; if he has a right in us, and an authority over us which belong only to our Maker and Redeemer, then it is necessary that the Holy Spirit should so reveal to us the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ as to lead us to prostrate ourselves before him as our Lord and our God."

That Christ is divine is evident from the titles ascribed to him in the Scriptures. If they are such as can designate a Divine Being and a Divine Being only, then is Christ truly divine. He is called the Alpha and Omega, Rev. i. 8; Emmanuel, Matt. i. 23; First and Last, Rev. i. 17; Everlasting Father, Isaiah ix. 6; Mighty God, King Everlasting, Luke i. 33; King of kings and Lord of lords, I. Tim. vi. 15; Lord of glory, I. Cor. ii. 8. He is spoken of as Eternal, Heb. vii. 3; as Omnipresent, Matt. xviii. 20; as Omniscient, Matt. ix. 4; as Omnipotent, Matt. xxviii. 18.

"All things which the Father hath are mine," John xvi. 15. If the Son possesses all things that belong unto the Father, then he possesses all the attributes and perfections of the Father, and must necessarily be of the same nature, substance, and Godhead.

That Christ is divine is proven by the fact that divine works are ascribed unto him. If the works accomplished by Christ in the nature of things cannot be performed by any creature, however exalted, then must he be truly God. Creation is attributed to him in Scripture. "The world was made by him," the whole system of physical nature is described as the work of him. John i. 3, 10. Inspiration is given unto men through him. "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things unto your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." John xiv. 26. Salvation is bestowed upon man by him. He assumes power to forgive sins, to be the conservator of all things, to raise the dead, and declares himself as the supreme judge of all men at the end of the world. Acts iv. 12; John v. 21; Matt. xxiv. 30.

The nature of his promises attests his divinity. Christ promises to his people blessings which none but God has either the right or the power to bestow. He promises to forgive sin. It is intuitively certain that God only can forgive sin. He is our moral governor; it is against him that all sin is committed, and he only has the right to remit its penalty. When, therefore, Christ says to the soul, "Thy sins are forgiven," he exercises a divine prerogative; he promises the Holy Spirit to hear and answer prayer; he promises peace in this life, an eternal joy to his obedient followers in the life to come. The infinite God cannot promise or give anything more than Christ promises to give those who follow his teachings and accept his principles.

Christ's power over nature is a testimony to his divinity. He claims absolute power over nature; he assumes power to reveal hidden laws in nature, and to modify and suspend those revealed. The laws of nature are the expression of God's will: they are ordained of God; they can be changed and suspended only by him. Christ wrought miracles. He wrought immediately upon nature. He spake and the water was changed into wine; he spake and the dead were restored unto life. He claimed power in his own name over the laws of nature, suspending them at his own pleasure. He not only claimed power over the lives of men, but claimed power over his own life. He appealed to men to accept him because of the work that he manifested before them. "Though ye believe not me, believe the works: that ye may know, and believe, that the Father is in me, and I in him." John x. 37, 38.

His sinless nature is a witness to his divine nature. He assumed to be without sin. He is the only being that has ever made such a claim before men. He challenged men to find an error in his judgment or a stain upon his soul. "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" He not only assumed it, the claim is corroborated by the testimony of those associated with him, both friends and foes. Men sent to arrest him returned, saying of him "that never man spake like this man;" said Pilate's wife, "Have nothing to do with this just man;" said the Roman centurion, "Truly this was the Son of God." Evil spirits arrested by him cried out, "Let us alone; what have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? Art thou come to destroy us? I know thee whom thou art, the Holy One of God."

The divine authority of Christ is manifested in the control which he claimed over all his people and over all creatures. All power was and is in his hands. He assumes to be a teacher with the authority of one equal with God. He commands men and angels; he controls men everywhere; he demands worship of all intelligences as God. All the relations that God assumes towards man he also assumes. He is clothed with the same attributes, endowed with the same qualities, crowned with the same titles, reveals in his deeds the same nature that God proclaims of himself in the sacred volume.

The Scriptures not only affirm Christ to be the "very unoriginated God," but we find they also declare that in Jesus Christ substantial divinity and real humanity are combined. The very name Jesus Christ is a sufficient proof: Jesus, Saviour, being the human appellation, and Christ the anointed being, the official, titled Emmanuel. Matt. i. 23. As God he is the root, source, or origin of David's family and kingdom: as man he has descended from David's loins. Rev. xxii. 16. As man he weeps over the grave of Lazarus; as God he raises him from the dead. John xi. 35, 43, 44. As a man he himself suffers and dies; but as God he is able to raise his own body from the grave. John x. 18.

Christ claimed supreme divinity when he said to Philip, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." He was the human personation of the invisible God. In him was manifest the fullness of the Godhead. He was perfect humanity, and he was divinity. He could not have been, as the Unitarians teach, "a good pure man, and not be more than man." He assumed to be one with God, an assumption on the part of any creature that is blasphemous. He claimed to be without sin, that is not possible to unregenerate nature. He claimed to be the Messiah sent of God to redeem humanity; himself deluded, or deceiving others, he could not be a good man. A perfect man with such claims as he put forth, sustained by such mighty works, can only prove that being perfectly good, he was divine: being perfect humanity, he is very God, equal with the Father.

Dix, D. H. K., of Western Virginia Conference, was born in Lewis, now Upshur county, W. Va., Jan. 24, 1828. Besides a common school education he had the advantage of one or two years in the West Virginia Academy. He was of Methodist parentage, and was converted at the age of sixteen, and united with the church. He was admitted into the West Virginia Conference in 1850, and has filled a number of the most important appointments, having also been presiding elder for five years. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1876, and was appointed on the general missionary and church extension committee. While filling a supernumerary relation he was a member of the State Senate from 1865 to 1868.

Dixon, Rev. James, D.D., was a minister of unusual power: his devotion to the Saviour was unswerving; he declared "the whole counsel of God." His ministry was practical, tender, and searching; his eloquence sententious, racy, and epigrammatic, full of originality, and never failed to enchain his hearers. In 1841 he was elected president. In 1848 he was representative to the M. E. Church of America, visiting Canada at the same time. Towards the end of his life he became blind, yet for nine years after this he continued to preach and edify the people. His ministry commenced in 1812, and ended in 1871.

Dixon, Ill. (pop. 4055), the capital of Ogle County, situated on the east side of Rock River, is an important railroad centre and a rapidly-growing town. It is first noticed in the annals of Methodism for 1839. In 1841 it is reported as a circuit, with 231 members, and Philo Judson was appointed to the charge. In 1842 he reported 174 members. It is in the Rock River Conference, and reports (1876) 207 members, 207 Sunday-school scholars, and $13,500 church property.

Doane, Nehemiah, a member of the Oregon Conference of the M. E. Church, was born at Eastham, Mass., Jan. 22, 1820. He was converted in 1836, licensed to preach in 1845, and entered Boston Theological Seminary,—then at Concord, N. H.,—at its organization in 1847. He was sent out from the seminary to Oregon, classed as a foreign mission, in 1849, being the first ever sent to a foreign mission from any of our theological schools, and was put in charge of the Oregon Institute, now the Willamette University, and afterwards of Portland Academy. Twenty-six years he has served on the most important charges in his Conference, including several terms as presiding elder. He was delegate to the General Conference in Baltimore in 1876. He has published a work on infant baptism.

Dobbins, J. B., A.M., of the Philadelphia Conference, was born in 1819. He was converted in 1836, and soon became class-leader and superintendent of the Sabbath-school. He was received into the New Jersey Conference, and occupied a number of the most prominent stations. In his ministry he was favored with a number of remarkable revivals, as in Newark, Haverstraw, Trenton, and Bridgeton. He also filled the office of presiding elder, and was a member of the General Conferences of 1868 and 1872. He has written considerably for the press, and assisted in preparing the New Jersey Conference memorial volume.

Doctrines.—The doctrinal standards of the Wesleyan Methodists of England and of such churches as affiliate closely with them are contained in Mr. Wesley's "Notes on the New Testament" and in his sermons. In the Methodist Episcopal Church they are contained chiefly in the Articles of Religion. (See ARTICLES OF RELIGION.) As, however, the Methodists in America had accepted precisely the same doctrinal views as the Wesleyans of England, there was an implied understanding that the doctrines as taught by Mr. Wesley in his writings were received as standard doctrines in the church. An allusion to this appears to have been made in the first restrictive rule, which says, "The General Conference shall not revoke, alter, or change our Articles of Religion, nor establish any new standards or rules of doctrine contrary to our present existing and established standards of doctrine."

The allusion here, though somewhat indefinite, appears to be to those standards which were recognized in 1808, over and above the Articles of Religion. Those who drafted these rules very probably referred to the same standards which the Wesleyans recognized, and which had been recognized in America before the Articles were framed. This is the more probable, as the Articles do not set forth distinctly and specifically those doctrines which Mr. Wesley made especially prominent in his preaching, and which marked the character of the early Methodist services, such as the Witness of the Spirit and Christian Perfection. The General Conference has also indirectly enlarged the sphere of doctrinal standards in authorizing the publication of the catechisms, and in the specification of Watson's Institutes as a text-book of examination for young ministers.

Doering, C. H., D.D., was born Aug. 27, 1811, in Hanover, Germany. He emigrated to Wheeling in 1836, where he was converted. In 1837 he entered Alleghany College, where he taught German while pursuing his college course. He organized a German mission in New York City in 1841, and was afterwards presiding elder of Pittsburgh mission district. In 1850 he was sent as a missionary to Germany, where he has labored on various stations and districts. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1876, and is now book agent and editor of the German periodicals and books in Bremen.

Doggett, David Seth, D.D., one of the bishops of the M. E. Church South, was born in Virginia in 1810. He pursued his studies in the University of Virginia, and was admitted on trial in the Virginia Conference in 1829. Subsequently he accepted a professor's chair in Randolph Macon College. In 1866 he was elected to the office of bishop, and has since that period resided in Richmond, Va. He has traveled extensively over the Southern States in the discharge of the duties of his episcopal office. He has also published several sermons, and an address on the rise and progress of Methodism in North Carolina.

Donelson, P. S., D.D., was born in Franklin Co., Mass., in 1825, of Scotch descent; was converted and joined the M. E. Church at twelve years of age; graduated at the University of Michigan in 1849, and pursued his theological studies at the Presbyterian Seminary in Auburn, N. Y. He joined the Michigan Conference in 1851, and was three years Professor of Languages in Albion College. After serving two years as pastor at Lansing, the capital of the State, he was, in 1856, elected as president of the Ohio Wesleyan Female College, in Delaware, at which he continued until 1873. During this time he graduated eighteen classes, numbering in all over 300 students. He received the degree of D.D. from Indiana Asbury University; was a member of the General Conference of 1868, and is now (1877) presiding elder of Toledo district, Central Ohio Conference.

Dorsey, Dennis B., M.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Baltimore Co., Md.,

December 28, 1799. He received but little early education, there being no schools in Western Virginia, whither his parents had removed. He was converted at a camp-meeting in 1817, and in April, 1820, was received into the Baltimore Conference, M. E. Church, and remained an itinerant in it until his "suspension," in 1826, for matters connected with advocating the reform in her government. He was very active in the lay represen-itinerant, though he was president of the Pittsburgh Conference in 1835, and had charge of Sixth Street station, Cincinnati, in 1854. In 1857 he started at Martinsville, Ohio, The Independent Press. His health declining, in 1859 he resided with one of his sons at Fairmont, Va., where he died March 18, 1860. His mental characteristics were, composure under elaborate thought, clearness of intellectual vision, activity, justness of judgment, and metaphys-tation movement. In 1827 and '28 he studied medicine under Rev. Dr. Jennings, and was graduated March 21, 1831. In September, 1828, he began to edit The Mutual Rights and Christian Intelligencer, and continued in this relation until November, 1830. In 1831 he was stationed in Georgetown as a member of the Maryland Annual Conference.

In 1832 he removed to Wheeling, Va., his health being feeble, and commenced the practice of medicine. From this period he ceased to be a regular ical acumen, associated with great simplicity of mind. His learning was considerable as a self-made man; particularly in theology had he fullness of knowledge. His writing was voluminous, and he left a great mass of manuscripts on a large range of subjects. His preaching was expository and practical. His piety was intelligent, constant, and usually serene. Several times during his last illness he said to his children, "Remember, I forgive everybody who ever offended me, and I desire all to forgive me." His death was peaceful, and his dying words, "I put my trust in the Lord, and believe I shall never be confounded."

Doub, Peter, D.D., a minister of the M. E. Church South, was born in North Carolina, March 12, 1796, and died in Greensborough, N. C., Aug. 24, 1869. He was admitted into the Virginia Conference in 1818, and traveled extensively through Virginia and North Carolina. Few men were more successful in swaying the minds of the community and in leading converts into the church. In 1866 he accepted the chair of Biblical Literature in Trinity College, N. C., in which he remained until his death.

Dougharty, George, was one of the pioneer ministers in the M. E. Church. He entered the itinerancy in 1798, and died March 3, 1807, at Wilmington, N. C. He was a man of broad and liberal views, and bold and fearless in his address. He was a hard student, and spent his entire energies in the great work of preaching the gospel and advancing the interests of humanity. For his fearless utterances on slavery he was attacked by a mob in Charleston, and was dragged to a pump, where water was pumped upon him, until he probably would have died had not a heroic woman interfered and kept the mob at bay until he was rescued. In 1803 he endeavored to establish a Methodist academy in South Carolina, showing that he took a deep interest in every department of labor which could advance the Redeemer's kingdom.

Doughty, Samuel, a member of the Philadelphia Conference of the M. E. Church, was born in Philadelphia in January, 1794, and died at Wilmington, Del., Sept. 17, 1828. He was converted in 1816, and was received into the Philadelphia Conference in 1823. Though his ministerial career was short he was one of the most popular and eloquent, as well as successful, preachers of his age. He was an earnest advocate for Sunday-schools, and for all the benevolent institutions of the church. His literary attainments and talents were of a high order, and some of his sermons were published in the Methodist Magazine.

Douglass, George, LL.D., principal of the Wesleyan Theological College, Montreal, Ontario, was born in Scotland in 1826, and was converted in Montreal in early youth. He was admitted at the age of twenty-two into the Wesleyan ministry. He spent a short time at one of the branches of the theological institution in England, but was soon sent out a missionary to the Bermudas. From Bermuda he returned to the province whence he was sent out, and labored in the city of Montreal until the Canada East district was merged in the Canada Conference, in 1854, when he was stationed successively at Kingston, Toronto, and Hamilton City. Returning to Canada East in 1863, he was in the pastorate in Montreal until the opening of the Montreal Theological College, about 1872, when he was placed in charge of that institution, in which responsible position he still (1877) remains. The senate of McGill College, Montreal, conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Laws. He is, since 1874, the vice-president of the General Conference of the body to which he belongs. Once was he the president's co-delegate in the original Canada Conference.

Douglass, Thomas Logan, a minister of the M. E. Church South, was born in Person Co., N. C., July 8, 1781, and died near Franklin, Tenn., April 9, 1843. At the age of twenty he was received into the Virginia Conference, and for twelve years traveled on important circuits and districts, when he was transferred to the Tennessee Conference, in which he remained until the close of his life. He was remarkably useful both as a preacher and presiding elder. He had more than ordinary intellectual power, and excelled in the pulpit. He was thoroughly devoted both to the doctrines and economy of Methodism, and was several times elected a delegate to the General Conference. The minutes say his piety was uniform and deep, and his temper sweet. Few men in the Southwest had so much influence as Mr. Douglass.

Dover, N. H. (pop. 9294), the capital of Stratford County, is situated on the Boston and Maine Railroad. It was settled in 1623 by a company of fishmongers from London, and is the oldest town in the State. Methodist services were probably introduced into this place by the preachers who were in Portsmouth. It was afterwards connected with the Stratford circuit, but is not mentioned in the minutes until 1823. In that year the society was organized by the Rev. Jotham Horton, and the first church was erected in 1825, which stood until the summer of 1875, when it was replaced by the present handsome edifice. In 1847 there was a secession from the society, a church was built, and for a time regular services were maintained, but the society was dissolved, and the church passed into other hands. It is in the New Hampshire Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are: members, 398; Sunday-school scholars, 498; church property, $47,000.

Dow, John G., was born in New Hampshire, 1785. He entered the New England Conference in 1822, and after filling a number of prominent appointments, was for several terms presiding elder, and also financial agent of Newbury Seminary. He fell by a stroke of paralysis, May 18, 1858, at the house of his son-in-law, Rev. J. H. Twombly. "He was sound in doctrine, deep in experience, uniform in piety, godly in conversation, and exemplary in walk. His preaching was of a high order, characterized by deep, close, concentrated, consecutive thought, and his messages were delivered with demonstration of the Spirit and with power. He was emphatically a man of one work."

Dow, Lorenzo, was born in Coventry, Conn., Oct. 18, 1777, and died at Washington, D. C., Feb. 2, 1834. He commenced preaching in the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1798, when but eighteen years of age. In 1799 he left his work under an impression that he had a special mission to Ireland. He attracted great attention both in Ireland and England. Because of his irregular conduct he was dropped from the roll of the Conference, and was never again regularly connected with the itinerancy, but he traveled extensively and preached frequently, and adhered strictly to Methodist doctrines. He made frequent applications for admission into the Conference, but because of his eccentricities he was refused. He often preached with great power, and many were awakened and converted under his ministry. He was especially skilled in controversy in refuting atheism, deism, universalism, and Calvinism. He spent many years in the South among the planters and slaves, preaching to vast multitudes as they gathered in the forest or elsewhere. He often rode forty or fifty miles a day, and preached four or five times. His manner and appearance excited great curiosity, and his startling and eccentric statements were widely circulated. He was a pronounced opponent of the Jesuits, and of every form of Romanism. He went to Washington to arouse the government against what he believed to be the plans of the Church of Rome, but died suddenly. His writings were numerous and peculiar.

Downey, Charles Gibbs, professor in the Indiana Asbury and Iowa Wesleyan Universities, was born in October, 1819, and died in 1857. He was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1840, and in the following year was appointed a tutor in the Indiana Asbury University. He continued in this institution, being appointed in succession Professor of Natural Sciences, of Mathematics, and of Belles-Lettres, till 1857, when he was elected Professor of Mathematics in the Iowa Wesleyan University, and shortly afterwards died.

Downey, Robert J., was born in New Albany, Ind., 1836. At the age of ten he was converted, and shortly after united with the M. E. Church. He was thoughtful and studious; graduated in a commercial college, and was licensed to preach in 1857. He spent two years in the theological school at Evanston preparing for missionary work, and in 1859 sailed for India. Arriving at Lucknow, he attended the Conference then in session, but was taken ill that day, and expired Sept. 1, 1859. He preached but one sermon in India. His end was triumphant.

Downs, John, one of Mr. Wesley's early ministers, entered the itinerancy in 1743, having previously been a reader of sermons at the Orphan House when no preacher was present. He was a man of sincere and unaffected piety, of great application, and possessing an uncommon genius. Mr. Wesley says of him, that "he was little inferior either in inventive genius or strength of mind to Sir Isaac Newton. When he was at school learning algebra, Downs came one day to his master and said, 'Sir, I can prove this proposition a better way than it is proved in this book.' His master thought it could not be, but upon trial acknowledged it to be so. Some time after his father sent him to New Castle with a clock which was to be mended. He observed the clock-maker's tools and the manner in which he took it to pieces and put it together again; and when he came home he first made himself tools, and then made a clock which went as true as any in the town. I suppose such strength of genius as this has scarcely been known in Europe before. Another proof of it is this: thirty years ago, while I was shaving he was whittling the top of a stick. I asked, 'What are you doing?' He answered, 'I am taking your face, which I intend to engrave on a copper plate.' Accordingly, without any instruction, he first made tools, and then engraved the plate. The second picture which he engraved was that which was prefixed to the 'Notes upon the New Testament.' (This was the first of Mr. Wesley's portraits published in any of his works.)

"Yet this man for the simple crime of preaching the gospel of salvation was brought before the bench of magistrates, who signed his impressment into the army, and sent him as a prisoner to Lincoln jail. After his release he continued to labor as a preacher until 1774, when he was seized with mortal illness in the pulpit, and in a few hours died."

Doxology, a sentence, or collection of sentences, uttered with especial reference to giving praise and glory to God. These are found first in the New Testament, next in the liturgies of the various churches, and third as connected with the hymns and psalms used in divine service. Frequent expressions are found in the Scriptures, such as, "Blessing and honor and glory and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb for ever and ever." The Lord's Prayer also closes with a doxology, saying, "For thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen." In the ancient church the doxologies as used in the liturgies were usually of three kinds: Gloria Patri, or the lesser doxology, is supposed to have been formed during the Arian controversy, and for the purpose of checking that heresy. Its form was, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost." The Western church added, "as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end." This doxology is considered a noble testimony to the church's faith in the Holy Trinity. It is of frequent use in the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church. Gloria in excelsis, or the major doxology, is supposed to be founded upon the words of the angels, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." It was of very early origin, supposed by some to have been in existence A.D. 139. It is found without doubt in nearly its verbal integrity in the Apostolic Constitutions, and is used by both the Greek and Latin Churches. It has been used in the Church of England for above twelve hundred years. It is found in its full integrity in the Methodist Episcopal Discipline, and is to be repeated at the conclusion of the Lord's Supper. The third form, liturgical doxology, was used as early as the second century. It commences with the words, "Therefore with angels and archangels, and with all the company of heaven, we laud and magnify thy glorious name," etc. It is used in the Church of England, in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and some other Protestant churches, and in the Methodist Episcopal Churches, by the minister immediately after he has received the elements of the Lord's Supper, previous to his administering the same to the people. The doxologies which are used in connection with the hymns and psalms of the church are such as are usually found at the close of the various hymn-books, being a verse or two to be sung as expressive of praise and glory to God. The Discipline of the M. E. Church says, "Let a doxology be sung at the conclusion of each service, and the apostolic benediction be invariably used in dismissing the congregation."

Drake, Benjamin M., D.D., an eminent minister of the M. E. Church South, was born in North Carolina, Sept. 11, 1800. He was received in 1820 into the Tennessee Conference, but was transferred during the next year to Mississippi. He traveled extensively through that Territory, and was instrumental in building the first Methodist church edifice in the city of New Orleans. He was an ardent friend of education, and was president of the first Methodist school established in Mississippi, which was called the Elizabeth Female Academy. Subsequently he was elected president of Centenary College. He died in 1860. He exercised a very wide-spread influence, and was greatly respected and beloved.

Draper, Rev. D. J., was born in 1810: received into the ministry in 1834. The following year he was sent to Australia, where he made full proof of his calling, and filled the highest offices in the church. He was president in 1859. In 1864 he was representative to the British Conference, and it was on his return voyage that he and his excellent wife were lost in the wreck of the steamship London.

He sunk into a watery grave, preaching to the last the Saviour whom he loved and served.

Dravo, Rev. John F., born in West Newton, Pa., Oct. 29, 1819, was converted at Liberty Street M. E. church, Pittsburgh, in 1838. He resided in McKeesport and neighborhood from 1840 to 1868, and held important official positions over twenty years. Educated at Alleghany College, he was licensed to preach as a local preacher in 1854. He removed to Beaver, Pa., in 1868, and is a steward, class-leader, teacher of Bible-class, and president of board of trustees of one of the largest and best charges in the Conference. This church was built through his energy, and the generous gifts of thousands of dollars. He is the vice-president of the board of trustees and life patron of Beaver College, to which his gifts aggregate $15,000, and through his timely aid and personal exertions the life of this institution has been saved and its future success assured. He has been for many years identified with the benevolent work accomplished in State public institutions, the advocate of temperance, prominent in political reform, and refusing civil offices of a high class. He has been a director of the "Alleghany County Home for the Poor" eight years, a director and vice-president of the Morgantza Reform School of Western Pennsylvania, delegate to National Convention in 1860, and frequently delegate to State Conventions, director of the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad, Tradesmen's National Bank, People's Insurance Company, Pittsburgh Coal Exchange, Pittsburgh and Connells-ville Coke Exchange, president of Pittsburgh and McKeesport Locomotive-Works, vice-president of Chamber of Commerce in Pittsburgh. He was president of the National Local Preachers' Association, 1872-73.

Dress.—The early Methodists were remarkable for their plainness and simplicity of dress. This arose not from any desire to be singular, nor from any conviction that any one form or mode of dress was a Christian duty, but from their belief that it was their duty to consecrate all their means to the service of God. So many were perishing around them, so urgent were the demands of humanity, and so limited were their means, that they felt it to be wrong for them to expend upon their own persons the treasures which God had intrusted to their care for the conversion and salvation of the world. Under the influence of such a motive Mr. Wesley, when a student in Oxford, sold the pictures which he had in his study that he might give their value to the poor. In 1737, before he had gone as a missionary to Georgia, while he advocated great plainness of dress, yet he expressed himself opposed to any singularity of manner. He says, "I entirely agree with you that religion is love and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost; that as it is the happiest, so it is the cheerfulest thing in the world; that it is utterly inconsistent with moroseness, sourness, severity, and indeed with whatever is not according to the softness, sweetness, and gentleness of Christ Jesus. I believe it is equally contrary to all preciseness, stiffness, affectation, and unnecessary singularity." When he was in Savannah, Ga., he says, "I took occasion to expound those Scriptures which relate to dress, and all the time that I afterwards ministered at Savannah I saw neither gold in the church, nor costly apparel, but the congregation in general were almost constantly clothed in plain clean linen or woolen." In 1760, twenty years after his societies had been formed, he published a tract entitled "Advice to the Methodists with Regard to Dress," in which he says, "I would not advise you to imitate the Quakers in those little particularities of dress which can answer no possible end but to distinguish them from all other people. To be singular merely for singularity's sake is not the part of a Christian; but I advise you to imitate them, first, in the neatness, and, secondly, in the plainness of their apparel." The same sentiments he reiterated on many occasions, praising those societies which laid aside all ornaments and devoted their time and means to Christian labor. In 1785 he published a sermon, in which he expostulates with his members as follows: "Do you take my advice with regard to dress? I published that advice above thirty years ago. I have repeated it a thousand times since. I have advised you to lay aside all needless ornaments, to avoid all needless expense, to be patterns of plainness to all that are around about you. Do you take this advice? Are you all exemplary, thoroughly plain in your apparel, as plain as Quakers or Moravians? If not, you declare especially to all the world that you will not obey them that are over you in the Lord." Two years afterwards, in another sermon, he adds, "I conjure you, all who have any regard for me, show me, before I go hence, that I have not labored, even in this respect, in vain for one-half a century. Let me see before I die a Methodist congregation full as plainly dressed as a Quaker congregation, only be more consistent with yourselves."

While he was thus earnest in guarding his societies against extravagance in dress and in all their expenses, he strongly advocated neatness, propriety, and gentility. In his own dress he was a pattern to others, being remarkably neat and plain. He also recommended those who were occupying official stations, and were necessarily brought into contact with the court, to conform to the rules and etiquette of society, so far as was necessary for their stations and position in life. At the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1784, the article in the larger minutes was adopted by the American Conference, to wit: "How shall we prevent superfluity in dress among our people? Ans. Let the preachers carefully avoid everything of this kind in themselves, and speak frequently and faithfully against it in all our societies." From that time to the present the testimony of the church has been clear and explicit against all superfluity of apparel, and it has strongly advised its members to be patterns of neatness and simplicity. The present provision of the Discipline of the M. E. Church is, "We should by all means insist on the rules concerning dress. This is no time to encourage superfluity in dress. Let all our people be exhorted to conform to the spirit of the apostolic precept, 'not to adorn themselves with gold, or pearls, or costly array.' 1. Tim. ii. 9."

The church thus lays down what it conceives to be the scriptural standard, and leaves the application chiefly to the judgment and conscience of the individual Christian, not attempting to prescribe specifically any mode of dress or any rules other than the precepts of the Holy Scriptures. The same general principles are held by nearly all the various branches of Methodism.

Drew, Daniel, for many years a noted capitalist and railroad director in New York, was born in Carmel, Putnam County, in 1797. Early thrown upon his own resources, he was industrious and frugal. He began business as a cattle-drover, and subsequently became interested in steamboats and railroads, and was also interested in heavy stock operations in the New York market. In middle life he united with the M. E. Church, of which he still remains a member. He founded the Drew Theological Seminary, at Madison, N. J., the Drew Ladies' Seminary, at Carmel, N. Y., and also built in great part a Methodist church at Carmel, besides aiding in a number of church enterprises.

DANIEL DREW, ESQ.

Drew, Samuel, A.M., was an eminent metaphysical writer, and also a Methodist local preacher, in England. He was born March 3, 1765, at St. Austell, and died at Helston, March 29, 1833. He was of a poor family, and learned the shoemaker's trade. When about twenty years of age he was converted under the preaching of Adam Clark, and at once commenced a more extensive course of reading, having a book before him and pursuing his studies while busily engaged in his shop at work. He contributed to various journals, and was recognized as an able writer, but did not leave his mechanical occupation until 1809. In 1788 he was licensed as a local preacher, and continued during his busy life to fill the pulpit very frequently. He became managing editor of The Imperial Magazine in 1819, and under his supervision the enterprise was very successful. In 1824 he received the degree of A.M. from Aberdeen. In addition to his editorial labors on the magazine he wrote and published a number of works, among which the chief were on the "Existence and Attributes of God," "Essay on the Immateriality and Immortality of the Soul," "Life at Carmel, N. Y., was chartered by the legislature of New York, April 23, 1866, "to promote the education of both sexes in literature, science, and the arts, and to furnish to young women the advantages of a collegiate course of study." By the charter the trustees are to be appointed by the Annual Conference, within whose jurisdiction the seminary is located. The property consists of a beautiful site of ten acres of land on an eminence overlooking the town of Carmel, and has a lawn tastefully laid out, and bountifully shaded with a luxuriant growth of trees. The seminary building is represented in the accompanying engraving. It has been for ten years under the management of George C. Smith, who has been assisted by a corps of able teachers.

Drew Theological Seminary, The, situated at Madison, N. J., is the chief educational result of the great centenary movement in the Methodist Episcopal Church in the year 1866. Daniel Drew, Esq., of New York, proposed to found a theological school in or near the metropolis by the gift of $500,000. Not only the denomination in which he was a communicant, but the whole country, was taken by surprise. The benefaction was the first of such magnitude in the country, but since then others of similar character have followed. The generous overture was gladly accepted, and Mr. Drew, after personally inspecting other theological institutions throughout the country, consented to the location of the new seminary in Madison, New Jersey.

The valuable property known as "The Forest," belonging to the Gibbons estate, was purchased. The stately Gibbons mansion was found to be as well suited for the purposes of the seminary as if expressly built for it. The necessary additional buildings were arranged for, and the architect, Mr. S. D. Hatch, of New York, engaged at once in their erection. The school was formally opened on the 6th of November, 1867, with the Rev. J. McClintock, LL.D., as President, and Professor of Practical Theology, and the Rev. B. H. Nadal, D.D., as Professor of Historical Theology. Several of the bishops and a large number of distinguished clergymen and laymen from all parts of the country participated in the exercises. From the first the number of the students has been annually increasing, and at present the rooms are hardly sufficient for their accommodation.

The main building, known as Mead Hall, is a large and imposing brick edifice, about 150 feet long and 100 feet wide, of the Ionic style of architecture. It contains the library, chapel, reading-room, and the offices and lecture-rooms of the professors. Its original cost was very great, and in consequence of the superior quality of its materials and the workmanship, it seems as complete and substantial as at the beginning. It is heated with steam throughout, and is in every respect adapted to its various uses. Asbury Hall, in the Elizabethan style, was prepared solely for the use of students. Each room is tastefully supplied with carpet, full set of oak furniture, and every appliance needful for the comfort of the occupants. Embury Hall contains the boarding-house of the students, who, by their committees, direct their boarding matters, subject only to the supervision of the faculty. This building contains also the Society Hall and the residence of the janitor and matron, and a number of additional rooms for students. The houses of the professors were erected at the cost of about $20,000 each. It was Mr. Drew's purpose to make these houses thoroughly convenient and comfortable, and it was fully accomplished. Each house has connected with it about three acres of land, with requisite out-buildings. The grounds of the seminary are ample, amounting to about one hundred acres. They are laid out with great taste and attractiveness, the original model being one of the finest of the English baronial estates.

The first president of the institution, Rev. Dr.

McClintock, was removed by death; the second, Rev. Dr. Foster, resigned after his election to the episcopacy. He was succeeded by the present incumbent, Rev. Dr. John F. Hurst, who was elected in May, 1873. The faculty consists, at present, of the president, who retains his chair as Professor of Historical Theology; James Strong, S.T.D., Professor of Exegetical Theology; Rev. Daniel P. Kidder, D.D., Professor of Practical Theology; Rev. Henry A. Buttz, D.D., George T. Cobb Professor of New Testament Exegesis; Rev. John Miley, D.D., Professor of Systematic Theology; James Oliver Wilson, A.B., Special Instructor in Elocution.

Bishop Simpson, of Philadelphia, is president of the board of trustees, and John B. Cornell, Esq., of New York, is vice-president.

The library consists of about 15,000 volumes, and was selected with great care by its first president. It contains important literary treasures, which were industriously gleaned in various parts of Europe. In hymnology, lexicography, history, serials, and several other departments it is very rich. Dr. McClintock's personal library has been purchased very recently by a few ladies in New York, and incorporated with the seminary. Besides this valuable addition, other important accessions to the library have been made by legacy.

In March, 1876, the trustees were informed by the founder that he would not be able to continue the payment of the interest on the note which constituted the endowment of the seminary. This was a great blow to the institution, and it came in the very midst of the year's work. The real estate had already been deeded to the trustees, and on this there was no incumbrance. The question now was to provide measures for the continued effectiveness of the seminary and for its ultimate re-endowment. A. V. Stout, Esq., of New York, gave $40,000 for the endowment of the president's chair, and the heirs of the late Hon. George T. Cobb, of New Jersey, gave property in New York City estimated to be worth about $40,000 for the endowment of the chair of New Testament Exegesis. Other important gifts have been made, amounting in all to about $130,000. Other leading benefactors are the following: John B. Cornell, George J. Ferry, E. L. Faneher, John T. Martin, William White, James H. Taft, Mark Hoyt, Mrs. Ziba Bennett, and William Hoyt. The seminary employs no financial agent, and refuses to borrow money from any quarter. There are plans on foot for the endowment of a Janes memorial professorship, an alumni professorship, a professorship to be established by the ladies of the Methodist Episcopal Church throughout the country, and a professorship to be established by the Methodist Episcopal churches of the city of Philadelphia. There are good beginnings in each of these, and when they are once completed the seminary will be fully restored to its original unembarrassed condition. However, no branch of the instruction has been cut off, and, notwithstanding the financial embarrassment, the facilities of the seminary have been improved from year to year.

In addition to the corps of regular instructors it has been announced that arrangements have been made for teaching in future the Arabic and Syriac languages, besides German, Spanish, and Italian,— sity, it attends, for the present, to its original work of theological instruction. Its officers are determined to develop it in this respect to the highest possible status. One of its chief advantages is its location in one of the most healthful regions along our sea-board, in the midst of beautiful scenery, and surrounded by a community of high Christian culture. It is easy of access from New York, and the students have therefore all the positive advantages, without the disadvantages, of life in the city.

the latter group as an adaptation to the new requirements of the missionary field of the Methodist Episcopal Church. A series of lectures will be delivered in future, every term, by representative men, not only of the Methodist, but of other denominations. The students are exempt from all expenses except the items of board and fuel. The cost of instruction, rooms, and other necessities is met by the endowment provided at the outset, and placed at the disposition of the trustees by the founder. While the institution has the charter of a univer-

Drinkhouse, Edward J., M.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, born in Philadelphia, Pa., March 26, 1830, was converted in 1848, and was educated in the public schools of his native city. A few months after being received into full membership in the M. E. Church he withdrew on account of dissatisfaction with the church polity, and united with the Methodist Protestant Church. He was licensed to exhort and to preach in 1849, and was received on probation in the Maryland Annual Conference in March, 1850. He filled various appointments up to the spring of 1863, when ill health led to a residence in San Francisco, Cal., and a demission of the active ministry up to May, 1866. He received the degree of Doctor of Medicine from Toland Medical College, San Francisco, in 1865. Returning to Maryland under an appointment to the West Baltimore station, he served two years, and was appointed to Ninth Street, Washington City, mission, and remained in charge until October 1, 1874, being exempted from the operation of the "Restrictive Rule" by a special provision covering missions. This continuous pastorate of six years and a half is perhaps the longest ever served in the Methodist Protestant Church by successive annual appointments and in accordance with law. He was one of the editors of the Methodist Protestant for the year 1867: a member of the General Conference of 1870, and also of the General Conference of 1874, by which he was elected editor and publisher of the Methodist Protestant for the ensuing four years. He was also a representative to the General Convention which united the two branches of the Methodist Protestant Church.

Drinkle, H. C., a native of Lancaster, O., born in the year 1845, and still a resident of that place, was converted at the early age of thirteen; he has since devoted himself to the interests of the M. E. Church. He occupies a prominent position in the legal profession at the bar of that city, and his election to prominent positions of trust at home and in the State gives him wide influence in that section of country. He is active in the church and Sunday-school interests.

Drummond, James, M.D., was born May 19, 1804, and was engaged in the practice of medicine from 1827 to 1836. He joined the M. E. Church in 1832, and was licensed to preach in 1833. The death of his brother, Rev. Thomas Drummond, in 1835, led him to abandon his profession as a physician and to enter the Pittsburgh Conference in 1836. In 1852, by a change of Conference boundaries, he became a member of the West Virginia Conference, where he remained until, in 1865, he was transferred to the Pittsburgh Conference, and in 1876, by another change of boundaries, he became a member of the East Ohio Conference. After laboring forty-one years in the itinerant field, and during thirty-seven of which he was on the effective list, he requested to be changed to the supernumerary relation. He was one year agent for Alleghany College, six years a presiding elder, for eighteen months chaplain to the United States hospital in Wheeling, W. Va., having been appointed by President Lincoln, and also by Bishop Janes. He has been a member of five General Conferences, to wit: 1844 and 1848, from the Pittsburgh Conference; and 1856, 1860, and 1864, from the West Virginia Conference. His present residence is Cadiz, O.

Dublin (pop. 246,326) is the capital and the largest city of Ireland. It is beautifully laid out, and is the seat of many flourishing institutions. Mr. Wesley very early crossed over to Ireland, and societies were organized in Dublin. The first Irish Conference was held in this city. There is in Dublin a connectional school, established under the patronage of the Conference, and twelve ministers are stationed, including Kingstown. Services are also held in the garrison for the benefit of the soldiers who are members of the Methodist societies. The membership is reported at about 1300, with 2000 Sunday-school scholars. The principal churches are Stephen's Green, Abbey Street, Rathmines, Centenary chapel, Cork Street, and Blackhall Place.

Dubuque, Iowa (pop. 18,434), the capital of Dubuque County, is situated on the west bank of the Mississippi River. It is the oldest town in the State, having been settled in 1788 by Julien Dubuque, a French Canadian Catholic, who obtained a grant from the Spanish government to operate the lead mines in the vicinity. Its modern settlement took place in 1833, when the United States government took possession of the land that had been vacated by the Indians the year previous. Before the end of the first year its population had increased to about 500. It was organized as a town in 1837, and a city charter was granted in 1841. It was the first, or one of the first, points at which Methodism entered the State. In 1834, Galena and Dubuque mission was organized, and Barton Randall and J. T. Mitchell were appointed to the mission. In 1835, H. W. Reed was appointed to Dubuque, and the mission reported 48 members.

The German Methodists have here a small organization. This station is now in the Upper Iowa Conference, and reports 287 members, 300 Sunday-school scholars, and $30,000 church property. The German M. E. Church reports 38 members, 42 Sunday-school scholars, and $2400 church property.

Duluth, Minn. (pop. 3131), the capital of Duluth County, is situated near the western extremity of Lake Superior. As late as 1869 the present site of this town was almost a dense forest. It has direct connection with the Northern Pacific, and Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroads. It grew rapidly for a time, but has declined since the failure of the North Pacific Railroad.

From the Minnesota Conference, held at St. Anthony, September, 1868, Rev. U. Haw was appointed to Lake Superior, and his charge embraced this settlement. In 1869 he reported 43 members, when Duluth appears on the records of the church. In 1870 Duluth reported 43 members, 60 Sunday-school scholars, and $500 church property. It is in the Minnesota Conference, and reports (1876) 60 members, 76 Sunday-school scholars, and $1200 church property.

Duncan, James A., D.D., president of Randolph Macon College, was born in Norfolk, Va., April 14, 1830. His father having accepted the professorship of Ancient Languages in Randolph Macon College, then located in Mecklenburg County, Va., he removed to that place, and, becoming a student, graduated in June, 1849. The same year he entered the Virginia Conference, and served in circuit and station work, filling a number of prominent appointments, and being for six years editor of the Richmond Christian Advocate. In 1868 he became the president of Randolph Macon College, in which position he still (1877) continues. His father still lives, and is Professor of Greek in Wofford, S. C., though over eighty years of age.

Dunkirk, N. Y. (pop. 5231), is situated in Chautauqua County, on Lake Erie, and is an important railroad centre. It was incorporated in 1837. It is first mentioned in the annals of the church as connected with Fredonia, in 1851, and both places were served by J. W. Lowe and G. W. Chesbro. In 1852 they reported from the charge 105 members. In 1853 it was made a separate charge. A German M. E. Church has been organized and is prospering. This city is in the Erie Conference, and reported in 1876, 129 members, 115 Sunday-school scholars, and $5000 church property. The German M. E. Church reported 42 members, 60 Sunday-school scholars, and $4200 church property.

Dunmore, Pa. (pop. 4311), situated in Luzerne County, two miles from Scranton, has grown up comparatively recently. It was early in 1861 reported as a charge in the records of the M. E. Church. It had, however, been connected with Scranton for some time before. In 1862 it reported 55 members, 70 Sunday-school scholars, and $3000 church property. It is connected with the Wyoming Conference, and reports 136 members, 163 Sunday-school scholars, and $9500 church property.

Dunn, Charles B., was born in Eastern Maine, Dec. 10, 1815. He experienced religion when about fourteen years of age; attended the Washington Academy, pursuing the higher branches of an English education, as also the Latin and Greek languages. His father's house being the home of the Methodist preachers, he had free access to their books, and at an early age became well acquainted with Methodist literature. He joined the Maine Conference in 1842, and at its division became a member of the East Maine portion. In addition to other appointments he has served seven years as a presiding elder, and has been twice elected to the General Conference.

wick, N. J., in 1822, and was converted in Newark in 1836. In 1838, at the age of sixteen, he commenced his ministry, and after having served as a supply on several circuits, he was received into the New Jersey Conference in 1841. He has filled a number of the most important appointments in the State of New Jersey, especially in the city of Newark and its vicinity. He has been engaged in building churches in Keyport, Madison, Springville, Elizabethport, and Orange. He has officiated at the dedication and laying the corner-stone of some seventy churches and chapels. He prepared for the press with Dr. George "The Garden of Spices," and is the author of "The Mission of the Spirit" and of "Holiness to the Lord," both of which have been republished in England. He was a member of the General Conference of 1876, and the same year received the degree of D.D. from the Wesleyan University. During the last year he was appointed by the Missionary Society one of the executive committee to aid the missionary secretaries in their plans for the relief of the treasury. He has been a frequent contributor to the church periodicals.

Dunn, Thomas, M.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in York Co., Pa., in 1782. He was educated for the profession of medicine, but devoting himself to the ministry, was received into the Philadelphia Conference in 1803. He continued to preach until 1813, when he located and practiced medicine in Philadelphia for twenty years. When the organization which became the Methodist Protestant Church was formed, the Union Society, of Philadelphia, which consisted of some eighty members, was dissolved, but some of them formed themselves into a church, and chose Dr. Dunn for their pastor. In 1837 he became a member of the Maryland Annual Conference, and was stationed in Baltimore and Alexandria. Subsequently he removed to Louisiana, where he died in 1852.

Dunwody, Samuel, a minister of the M. E. Church South, was born in Chester Co., Pa., Aug. 3, 1780. Having removed to the South, he was received on trial by the South Carolina Conference in 1806, and succeeded in organizing the first Methodist church in Savannah, Ga. He was a very successful preacher, and one of the most influential in founding Methodism in various parts of the Southern States. For a number of years he was presiding elder, and was at several sessions a member of the General Conference. He took an active part with the South at the General Conference of 1844 upon the slavery question, and continued zealously in the ministry until 1846, when he became superannuated. He died July 8, 1854.

Durbin, John Price, D.D., an eminent minister of the M. E. Church, was born in Bourbon Co., Ky., in 1800. He was of an old Methodist family, and was carefully trained by pious parents. In his eighteenth year he was converted, and shortly afterwards he joined the church. He was licensed to preach in about a week, and was soon sent out as a supply upon a circuit. In his earliest ministry he held his audience as if by some strange spell, and frequently thrilled them with electric sparks of surprising eloquence. Being very vehement, his health failed, and his voice seemed broken. He was advised to go into the negro cabins and sit down and talk to the inmates in a conversational tone. Other occupants came in, and with care his voice in six months became powerful enough to be heard by large congregations; and this experience probably produced his peculiar conversational style. In 1820 he joined the Ohio Conference, and while he traveled a circuit some two hundred miles in extent, he read on horseback during the day, and in the evening by the light of pine-knots thrown upon the fire. He soon commenced the study of the ancient languages, and attended during the week the Miami University, and subsequently Cincinnati College, where he was admitted to the degree of Master of Arts. In 1826 he was elected Professor of Languages in Augusta College. In 1831 he was elected chaplain to the United States Senate. In 1832 he was elected to the editorship of The Christian Advocate, in New York, but, in 1834, Dickinson College having been accepted by the Baltimore and Philadelphia Conferences, and his election having been unanimous and enthusiastic, he accepted the presidency, in which he remained until 1845. In 1836 he became a member of the Philadelphia Conference, in which he remained during life. In Dickinson College he manifested unusual administrative and executive ability. In 1842 and 1843 he traveled in Europe and the East, and published as the result four volumes of observations. He was a member of the General Conference of 1844, and took part in the debates which occurred in reference to slavery. He was a member of seven successive General Conferences, and was always a wise and prudent counselor. He was an early advocate of lay representation in the councils of the church. After having been eleven years president of Dickinson College he returned to the pastorate, filling the pulpits in Union and Trinity churches, Philadelphia, and was appointed as presiding elder on the North Philadelphia district. In 1850 the health of Dr. Pitman, who was missionary secretary, having failed, the Board of Bishops appointed Dr. Durbin to fill the vacancy. The General Conference of 1852 elected him to that position, in which he remained during all his active life. By his administrative power, his rare tact, his great prominence and popularity, and his stirring eloquence, he aroused the church, and was eminently successful in the management of the affairs of the society. With the exception of the mission in Liberia, and one which had just been commenced in China, all the foreign missions grew up under his personal supervision. The receipts increased from $100,000 to nearly $700,000 a year. In 1872 he declined a reelection as missionary secretary. Seldom afterwards did he appear in public, and on the 18th of October, 1876, he was stricken with paralysis, and calmly departed this life. Few men ever equaled him in solid and widespread popularity; few have been his equals in ability, fidelity, tact, and industry. He ranked among the first in the church as a pulpit orator, a Christian pastor, an educator, a writer, and an administrator.

Dustin, Mighil, D.D., of the Cincinnati Conference, was born in Boonville, N. Y., Aug. 18, 1810. In 1831 he entered as a student in a collegiate institute, which became Marietta College, where he continued his studies. He united with the M. E. Church in 1833; was licensed to preach, and was admitted into the Ohio Conference in 1836; and on its division became a member of the Cincinnati portion. He has been an effective minister for forty-one years, six on circuits, twenty-six in stations, eight years as presiding elder, and one as agent for the Ohio Wesleyan University. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1856 and of 1864, and was appointed by the latter body as fraternal delegate to the M. E. Church of Canada. When stationed at Oxford he pursued the study of Hebrew in the Miami University, and received the degree of D.D. from Moore's Hill College.

Early, John, D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Bedford Co., Va., Jan. 1, 1786, and died in the city of Lynchburg, Va., Nov. 5, 1873. He was converted April 22, 1804. His parents were Baptists, but he located. In 1821 he was admitted and appointed presiding elder. He was eminently successful in leading sinners to the Saviour; on one circuit receiving into the church five hundred members, and it is said that at one camp-meeting conducted by united with the Methodist Church, and early gave promise of usefulness. In 1806 he was licensed to preach, and among those who received the benefit of his first labors were the slaves of President Jefferson. He was admitted on trial in the Virginia Conference in 1807. Having good administrative ability, he was soon appointed a presiding elder. In 1815, the care of a family having come upon him, he felt it his duty in order to support them to him one thousand persons were converted. He was deeply interested in the missionary cause, and everywhere awakened missionary zeal. He was one of the most zealous and active workers in the establishment of Randolph Macon College, and was for many years president of its board of trustees. In 1812 he was elected a delegate to the first delegated General Conference, and was elected a delegate to every successive General Conference from 1828 to 1844. The first General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in 1846, elected him as book agent. At the General Conference in 1854 he was elected bishop, and in 1866, at the General Conference held in New Orleans, he was, with Bishops Soule and Andrew, voted a superannuated relation. He was active in his various official duties until his eightieth year. On the morning of November 5, 1873, he died in great peace.

Early, William, a pioneer minister in the M. E. Church, was born in New Jersey, Oct. 17, 1770, and died in June, 1821. He was converted at the age of nineteen, and united with the Conference in 1791. He spent two years of his early ministry as a missionary in New Brunswick, where he endured much suffering, laboring for his Master's cause. His subsequent ministry was spent in Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland.

East Africa: Languages and Missionary Literature.—The missionary literature of the languages of Eastern Africa consists chiefly of grammars and vocabularies in several languages, as the Amharic, Galla, Nakafui, Waniki, Suacheli, and Dankali, composed by the agents of the Church Missionary Society, and University missions, and Drs. Krapf and Hopkins, and translations of parts of the Scriptures into the same languages. To these should be added the translation of the Bible into Waniki, which Mr. Wakefield, of the United Methodist mission, is preparing.

East Africa, Missions in.—The countries near the eastern coast of Africa have been only recently explored, and comparatively little attention has been given to them by missionaries. The researches of Livingstone and others have shown that the region between the Zambezi River and the Upper Nile is elevated, well watered, fertile, and capable of a high degree of development, and have awakened a great interest in them. The principal missionary operations in East Africa have been along the Zanzibar coast and in Abyssinia. Abyssinia is nominally a Christian country, attached to the Abyssinian Church, but its Christianity is of a corrupted form, and a large part of its population are in heathenism. It has received missionaries from several English, German, and Swedish societies. The Zanzibar coast is under the rule of the sultan of Zanzibar, an Arabian chief. The interior districts have been devastated by the slave-trade, which he is trying to suppress, and a few settlements of emancipated slaves have been formed on the coast. The earliest Protestant mission on this coast was that of the Church Missionary Society, which was established near Mombas, about 200 miles north of Zanzibar, by Dr. Krapf, in 1843.

Methodism is represented in this region by the mission of the United Methodist Free Churches, which was established in 1863. Dr. Krapf had been in Europe on a visit, and was accompanied on his return to the field of his labors by Messrs. Woolman and Wakefield, of that body, who established a missionary station at Ribe, near Mombas. The design was, at first, to labor among the southern Gallas, but this was eventually given up, and the operations of the mission were directed to the Waniki people. Its work has been very useful, though not as yet fruitful in converts. The labors of the late Rev. Charles New, one of the Free Church missionaries, were of importance in other aspects than that of the missionary. The value of the services rendered by him in the search for Dr. Livingstone was publicly and gratefully acknowledged by Sir Bartle Frere and the Royal Geographical Society of England, and his death, in 1875, was generally regretted as a loss to civilization and science. In 1872 this mission reported 3 principal and subordinate stations, 17 hearers, and 12 scholars. In 1876 the mission was reinforced by the dispatch of an agriculturist with a plow, and a mechanic, who were to teach the natives agriculture and other useful arts. Mr. Wakefield was engaged in translating the Scriptures into the Waniki language.

Other missions in this region are that of the Church Missionary Society, which reported, in 1876, 40 native communicants, and that of the Society of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Durham, and Dublin. A bishop of the Church of England is stationed at Zanzibar.

Three movements have been made since 1875 to establish missions in the lake regions of Central Africa. The Free Church of Scotland dispatched a party in 1875, who reached Lake Nyanza in the latter part of 1876, and have there founded the Livingstonia mission. They were followed by a company representing the Established Church of Scotland, and were to be followed by a company of United Presbyterians, both of whom would occupy the same region, and co-operate with them. The London Missionary Society has sent a party to establish a mission at Lake Tanganyika, and the Church Missionary Society is establishing a station on the Nyanza lakes.

Eastern Africa Mission, The, of the United Methodist Free Church of England, was originated through the influence of the writings of Dr. Krapf, and by his subsequent visit to England. In his interview with the Missionary Board he agreed to accompany the missionaries and to aid them in selecting a location. Two young ministers, Thomas Wakefield and James Woolman, were selected, and on the recommendation of Dr. Krapf two students were taken from the Missionary Institute in Switzerland. The missionary party of five met at Kornthal, in Germany, and on Aug. 12, 1861, left Europe, and sailed from Trieste to Alexandria, making some stop at Cairo, where Dr. Krapf continued his instructions in Arabic and the native languages. From Cairo they proceeded to Aden, and thence by a native vessel to Mombas, an island on the east coast of Africa. They reached Zanzibar Jan. 5, 1862, and were kindly received by the sultan, who gave them passports to any parts of his dominions. Jan. 20 they reached Mombas, but before a missionary station was selected the two Swiss missionaries abandoned the work. The two young Englishmen, though shattered and seriously ill, remained. In a short time, however, Mr. Woolman was obliged to return to England. The place selected for the missionary station was Ribe, a few miles from Mombas, where a tent was pitched, and the parts of an iron house, which they had brought with them, were put together. On this being accomplished, Dr. Krapf returned to Europe, Mr. Wakefield being left alone. On Dec. 12, 1862, Rev. Charles New sailed from England to strengthen the mission, and arrived April 7, 1863, and found Mr. Wakefield in great straits. A few months later they were joined by Rev. Edward Butterworth, who died within a few weeks. For several years the two missionaries prosecuted the work amidst great difficulty and discouragement. In 1868, Mr. Wakefield visited England at the request of the foreign missionary committee, and on his return to Africa in 1870, was accompanied by his wife and Rev. William Yates. They found the mission in a flourishing condition. About twenty converts were shortly after baptized, and a number more received on trial. In 1872, Mr. New visited England, speaking in behalf of the cause of missions, and prepared for the press a book entitled "Life, Wanderings, and Labors in Eastern Africa." Intelligence was received of the death of Mrs. Wakefield, and Mr. Yates having returned to England, Mr. Wakefield was left alone. Mr. New sailed from London, May 7, 1874, designing to establish a mission at Chaga, but was instructed to attempt first to open a station at Uscambara. Failing in this he proceeded to Chaga, but was treated with great injustice and cruelty, and died before his missionary brother could reach him. Another missionary sent out was seized soon after his arrival with sun fever, and was obliged to return. Since that time Mr. James S. Seden has gone out as a missionary and Mr. W. H. Randall as a Christian mechanic. The mission now gives promise of success; several preaching-places have been opened, and three native evangelists have been set apart for the work. These native teachers are the fruit of the mission. There were reported to the assembly of 1876, 35 members and 10 on trial. Much attention is now being paid to civilizing processes, gardening, planting, and building are in active progress, but Mr. Wakefield is anxious to devote his whole efforts to native evangelization. He is also engaged in the work of translation, having a printing-press that the work may be executed on the spot. The expenditure on behalf of the mission last year (1876) amounted to £1391.12.11.

East Maine Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1848, and embraced "all that part of the State of Maine not included in the Maine Conference," being all that part of the State lying east of the Kennebec River, and of a line due north from the great bend near Skowhegan. It held its first session Aug. 2, 1848, and reported 8865 members, 85 traveling and 70 local preachers.

The latest report (1876) is 93 traveling and 83 local preachers, 10,823 members, 163 Sunday-schools and 10,959 Sunday-school scholars; 105 churches, value, $361,150; 61 parsonages, value, $54,050.

East Maine Conference Seminary.—At the first session of the East Maine Conference of the M. E. Church, in August, 1848, it was resolved to establish a Conference seminary. A board of trustees was elected, and proposals were received from various places. In 1849 the location of the seminary was fixed at Bucksport. The charter bears the date of 1850, and the seminary building was completed in 1851. It was opened in June, 1851, under the principalship of Rev. L. L. Knox, with some 25 students in attendance. In 1854 the boarding-house was erected, and was opened during the following year. In 1856, owing to financial embarrassment the school was suspended until relief could be furnished. In 1859, R. B. Bucknam was elected principal of the seminary, and the school was re-opened with improved financial prospects. He was succeeded, in 1862, by James B. Crawford. He served until 1869, when M. F. Arey was principal; in 1872 he was succeeded by Rev. George Forsyth, who fills the position at present. The faculty consists of Rev. George Forsyth, principal, F. H. Haley, Miss M. Trecarten, Mr. J. F. Knowlton, and Mr. W. C. Kimball.

The academical course of study is regarded as equal to that of any similar school, and the classical course offers a thorough preparation for any college in the country. The location is a beautiful one, on an eminence commanding a magnificent view of the Penobscot River and surrounding country. The school is well equipped with apparatus for the successful teaching of natural science. It has an honorable record, having during the period of national peril furnished from among its alumni and students a large number who entered the service of their country. Many of the students have risen to positions of influence and honor.

Eastman, Benjamin C., was born in New Hampshire, 1788; entered the New England Conference, M. E. Church, in 1825. He was of delicate health, and was superannuated for a number of years. He manifested deep devotion, and was more than ordinarily useful. He died at Concord, July 12, 1858. When asked near the close of life as to his spiritual condition, he replied, "Clinging to the Rock."

East Ohio Conference was organized by the General Conference of 1876. The Pittsburgh Conference, at its session in March, 1876, requested a division of its territory, making the State line between Ohio and Pennsylvania the Conference line. The General Conference detached not only the Ohio part of the Pittsburgh Conference, but also the Ohio part of the Erie Conference, and united these segments to constitute the East Ohio Conference. The boundaries are as follows: "Beginning at the Cuyahoga River, and running easterly along the lake-shore to the Pennsylvania State line; thence along said line, leaving the Petersburg society in the Erie Conference, to the Ohio River; thence down said river to the Muskingum River; thence up said river to the Ohio Canal, near Dresden, excluding Marietta and Zanesville; and thence along said canal to Lake Erie, including Akron and all of the city of Cleveland lying east of the Cuyahoga River." The first session of the East Ohio Conference thus constituted was held at Steubenville, O., Sept. 20, 1876, and was presided over by Bishop Ames, the Rev. James R. Mills, D.D., being secretary. The statistics reported are as follows: number of preachers in full connection, 242; on trial, 6; supernumerary, 12; superannuated, 47; full members, 40,048; probationers, 2115; 497 Sunday-schools and 42,269 Sunday-school scholars; church edifices, 490; value, $1,821,660; 106 parsonages, valued at $183,200.

Easton, Pa. (pop. 10,989), the capital of Northampton County, situated on the Lehigh Valley Railroad and on the Delaware River. It was laid out in 1738 and incorporated in 1789. The Six Nations and seven other tribes of Indians met here in council in 1758 with the governors of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and also Sir William Johnson. It was frequently made military headquarters. This region was early included in the Bristol circuit, first mentioned in the annals of the M. E. Church in 1801, when Anning Owen and Joseph Osburn were appointed to that charge. Northampton circuit was organized in 1802, and Johnson Dunham was the only pastor. Easton, however, is not mentioned by name until 1831, when Thomas Millard was pastor. The first church was erected in 1835. It is now in the Philadelphia Conference, and reports 294 members, 411 Sunday-school scholars, and $27,000 church property.

East Saginaw, Mich. (pop. 11,350), in Saginaw County, is one of the most important railroad centres in the State, and is a rapidly-growing city.

Methodism was introduced into this region in 1831 by B. Frazee, who was appointed to "Saginaw mission" from the Ohio Conference. (See SAGINAW CITY.) This city, however, does not appear by name in the annals of the M. E. Church until 1853, when Addison C. Shaw was appointed to East Saginaw. He reported, in 1854, 35 members. Methodism has continued to prosper in this city, and now has two well-established M. E. churches. The German Methodists have here an enterprising congregation. This city is in the Detroit Conference, and the following are the latest statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
Jefferson Street.....	245	365	$7000
Hess Street.....	172	100	4500
German M. E. Church.....	80	110	7900

East St. Louis, Ill. (pop. 5644), is one of the most important railroad centres in Southwestern Illinois. Its recent and rapid growth is chiefly owing to this fact, and also to its proximity to St. Louis. This city is first mentioned in the annals of the M. E. Church as an appointment in 1865, when J. T. Hough was appointed pastor. There had been Methodist services held here, however, for some time previous. Mr. Hough reported, in 1866, 47 members, 158 Sunday-school scholars, and $1000 church property. It is in the Southern Illinois Conference, and reports 91 members, 175 Sunday-school scholars, and $17,500 church property.

East Tennessee Wesleyan University is located at Athens, Tenn. In 1865 the Holston Conference of the M. E. Church recommended the "establishment of an institution of high grade to meet the wants of the whites of the M. E. Church in the South." A committee was appointed to survey the field, and Athens was selected as being in location the most central, easy of access, and healthy, and as having a commodious structure ready for occupancy. The report was adopted, and in 1865, Rev. J. F. Spence succeeded in raising in the North a sufficient sum of money to purchase the ground and building. The site of the university is pleasant; the campus embraces about fourteen acres of land, handsomely elevated, and gently sloping in several directions. A beautiful mountain stream sweeps along to the south, which in various ways adds to the comfort of students. The main college building, University Hall, is a large three-story brick edifice, erected before the war by the Odd-Fellows for educational purposes. It occupies a central position in the campus, and has a fine view of mountain scenery. The institution was incorporated by the legislature of Tennessee in the winter of 1865-66 as the East Tennessee Wesleyan College, and was opened on the 30th of October following, under the direction of Prof. P. C. Wilson. During the first year 86 students were enrolled. The following year its title was changed to the East Tennessee Wesleyan University, and it commenced its operations in September, 1867, under Rev. N. E. Cobleigh, D.D., as president. During its second year 141 students were enrolled; 6 of the first class graduated in 1870. Dr. Cobleigh having been elected editor of The Methodist Advocate in 1872, James A. Dean, D.D., was chosen president, which chair he occupied for three years, and during this time a heavy debt accumulated on the property, and great financial embarrassment ensued. In June, 1875, Rev. J. J. Manker was braced in the Red River district of Arkansas Conference." It held its first session Dec. 25, 1840, and reported 18 ministers, 1623 white and 230 colored members, and 25 local preachers. This was the result of the toils of such faithful pioneers as Ruter, Fowler, Alexander, Summers, Manly, Williams, Stevens, and a few others. The General Conference of 1844 organized an "Eastern Texas Conference," and at the division of the church, in 1845, both of these Conferences adhered to the chosen president, but his private business led to his resignation in three months afterwards. Rev. J. F. Spence, A.M., was then elected president, and through his efforts the indebtedness was liquidated and the building and grounds were improved, and the prosperity of the school is now greater than at any previous time. Several Southern States are represented in its halls, and the names of over 190 students are enrolled. Young ladies are admitted to all the classes, and may compete for the honors and prizes of the university. The present faculty are: J. F. Spence, President, and Professor of Moral Science; J. C. Beaman, Ancient Languages; J. F. Palmer, Natural Science; D. A. Bolton, Mathematics; with several assistants and tutors. The value of the buildings and property is estimated at $40,000.

East Texas Conference, M. E. Church South.

—The old Texas Conference was organized by the General Conference of 1840, and was made to "include the republic of Texas, except what was embraced in the Red River district of Arkansas Conference." In 1847 the "Eastern Texas Conference" reported to the Church South as follows: preachers, 29; local preachers, 33; members, white, 3622; colored, 764. Its latest (1875) report is as follows: preachers, 52; local preachers, 116; members, 11,223; Sunday-schools, 97; Sunday-school scholars, 3745. The boundaries of this Conference, as fixed by the General Conference of 1874, are as follows: "On the north by the southern boundary of North Texas Conference; on the east by the Louisiana State line from its junction with the North Texas Conference southern boundary, in Caddo Lake, to the Gulf of Mexico; on the south and west by the Gulf of Mexico to the East Pass of Galveston Bay; and thence by said bay and the Trinity River to the southwest corner of Kaufman County."

The Church South has also in the State the North Texas, Texas, Northwest Texas, and West Texas Conferences, and also a part of a German Conference.

Eaton, Homer, of the Troy Annual Conference, son of the late Rev. Bennett Eaton, of the same Conference, was born in Enosburg, Franklin Co., Vt., Nov. 16, 1834. He was converted at the age of sixteen years, and immediately thereafter commenced his preparatory studies at the academy in Bakersfield, Vt., and finished them at the Methodist General Biblical Institute, in Concord, N. H., in 1857. He was admitted on trial in the Troy Annual Conference in May, 1857. In 1861 he was chosen first assistant secretary of his Conference, which position he continued to hold until 1870, when he was elected secretary, to which office he was re-elected for seven consecutive years. He was a member of the General Conference held in Brooklyn, May, 1872, and by that body was appointed one of the fraternal delegates to the General Conference of the M. E. Church in Canada. He was elected a reserve delegate to the General Conference of 1876, and in the same year was appointed presiding elder of the Albany district, which position he now (1877) holds.

Eaton, Joel W., a delegate from the Troy Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born about 1836, and was graduated from the General Biblical Institute at Concord, N. H. He joined the Troy Conference in 1857. He served as a chaplain in the Union army in 1862 and 1863. Mr. Eaton was one of the short-hand reporters in the four General Conferences preceding the one to which he was elected a delegate.

Ebbert, Hon. Henry, was born in Uniontown, Pa., Nov. 29, 1801, and received a fair education. Converted in his early manhood, he has held the office of leader, steward, and trustee. He now resides in Tiffin, Ohio, and has occupied high civil positions as mayor of the city and associate judge of Seneca County, Ohio, collector of the United States revenue, etc. He was a trustee of Ohio Wesleyan University for some time, and represented the North Ohio Electoral Lay Conference at the General Conference of 1872.

Eckett, Robert, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, was born at Scarborough on Nov. 26, 1797, and died at Clevedon, near Bristol, on July 26, 1862. In early life he removed to London, where by skill and diligence in business he gained fortune and position. His parents were pious, and when sixteen years of age he gave his heart to God, and joined the Wesleyan society. He became a local preacher and class-leader. Mr. Eckett adhered to the dissidents, and in the late Wesleyan Methodist Association gradually rose to the foremost place. In 1838 he retired from business and entered the itinerant ministry. He never left London, but was appointed to the same circuit for twenty-four years in succession. During that period he wielded great influence in the councils of the body. For many years he shaped the policy of the late Wesleyan Methodist Association. He was very active in promoting the union which resulted in the founding of the United Methodist Free Churches, of which body he was the second president. He was elected on the connectional committee every year from its formation, in 1836, to his death. He was elected thirteen times connectional secretary, and four times he filled the presidential chair. For fourteen years he was editor of the magazines, and at the period of his death he held the office of foreign missionary secretary.

Mr. Eckett was a man of peculiar mental powers, an able preacher, a ripe theologian, a competent reviewer; his special domain was church politics and legislation. He was a debater of consummate skill. Hence he became literally a master of assemblies. For years he had no compeers and no rivals, although he had antagonists. His controversial powers were displayed not merely viru voce. He was a pamphleteer. Though zealously attached to his own body, Mr. Eckett was a lover of all good men, and a member of the Evangelical Alliance from its formation. In private he was genial and sympathetic. His memory has been enshrined in a work from the pen of Rev. M. Baxter, entitled "Memorials of Free Methodism."

Ecumenical Conference.—For a number of years a desire had frequently been expressed in periodicals that delegates from the different branches of Methodism throughout the world might meet for fraternal intercourse and consultation. At the General Conference of 1876 resolutions on this subject were presented by Rev. A. C. George, D.D., and others, and referred to a committee on the state of the church. After full consideration, the paper referred being amended as to its title and phraseology, was returned to the General Conference with a recommendation that it be adopted, and it received the sanction of the General Conference by a vote of 127 to 74, as follows:

"Whereas, There are a number of distinct bodies of Methodists in the United States, in the Dominion of Canada, in Great Britain, and in other countries; and

"Whereas, These different Methodist organizations accept the Arminian theology, and maintain usages which distinguish them to some extent from every other denomination of Christians; and

"Whereas, There are in these Methodist churches nearly thirty thousand itinerant ministers, twice that number of local preachers, and more than four millions of lay members; and

"Whereas, These several Methodist bodies have many interests in common, and are engaged in a common work, and are seeking a common object; and

"Whereas, An Ecumenical Conference of Methodism would tend in many ways to a closer alliance, a warmer fraternity, and a fuller co-operation among these various Methodist organizations for the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom in all parts of the earth; and

"Whereas, It is eminently proper that this General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church—a Conference and a church representing and including eleven thousand itinerant ministers and sixteen hundred thousand members—should initiate and propose such a measure: therefore,

"Resolved, 1. That the bishops be requested to appoint a committee of correspondence, consisting of nine persons,—two of their own number, four other ministers, and three laymen,—who shall take this whole subject into consideration, correspond with different Methodist bodies in the country, and in every other country, and endeavor to arrange for the said Ecumenical Conference of Methodism, at such time and place as may be judged most advisable, to consider topics relating to the position, work, and responsibility of Methodism for the world's evangelization.

"Resolved, 2. That such committee is hereby empowered to represent, and speak for and in the name of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States in respect to said Ecumenical Conference, and is directed to make a full report of its proceedings to the General Conference of 1880.

"Resolved, 3. That the necessary expenses of such committee of correspondence be met in the same manner as expenses of fraternal delegates to other religious bodies are met."—Journal, p. 367.

In pursuance of this action the bishops, at a meeting held in New York City, November, 1876, appointed said committee of correspondence, as follows:

Bishops.—The Rev. Matthew Simpson, D.D., LL.D., of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and the Rev. Edward R. Ames, D.D., LL.D., of Baltimore, Maryland.

Other Ministers.—The Rev. Augustus C. George, D.D., of Central New York Conference; the Rev. Lorenzo D. Barrows, D.D., of New Hampshire Conference; the Rev. Park S. Donelson, D.D., of Central Ohio Conference; and the Rev. Isaac N. Baird, D.D., of Pittsburgh Conference.

Laymen.—The Hon. J. W. Marshall, of Washington, District of Columbia; the Hon. James Harlan, of Mount Pleasant, Iowa; and Francis H. Root, Esq., of Buffalo, New York.

This committee has issued a circular letter, and addressed it to the various bodies of Methodists throughout the world.

The only responses thus far received (September, 1877) are from the Methodist Protestant Church, and from the Evangelical Association. The former by its convention of May, 1877, forming a union of the Methodist Protestant and Methodist Churches, cordially indorses the plan; the latter declines, on the ground of not being a part of the Methodist family.

Eddy, John Reynolds, son of Rev. Augustus Eddy, and brother of Dr. Thomas Eddy, was born in Xenia, O., Oct. 10, 1829. He commenced the study of law, but determining to devote himself to the ministry, was admitted into the Northwest Indiana Conference in 1856. After filling several appointments, he became chaplain of the 22d Indiana Regiment, but on June 24, 1862, in the midst of battle, he was instantly killed by a shell.

Eddy, Lyman A., member of the Oneida Conference, was born in Milford, N. Y., April 3, 1811; converted while a clerk in Geneva, N. Y.; he entered Cazenovia Seminary in 1835, and subsequently was received on trial in the Oneida Conference. He has filled many important appointments, and has especially taken a deep interest in the cause of education. He has been president of the trustees of Cazenovia Seminary for many years, and has been a patron and friend of the school.

Eddy, Thomas M., D.D., late one of the corresponding secretaries of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born near Cincinnati, O., in September, 1823, and died in the city of New York, Oct. 7, 1874. He joined the Indiana Conference in 1842, and filled its most important appointments; was elected editor of The Northwestern Christian Advocate in 1856, and was re-elected to the same position in 1860 and 1864. While serving in this office he was frequently called upon to participate in the dedication of churches in the towns and villages of the Northwest, so that he soon became widely known as a preacher as well as an editor. After the close of his office as editor of The Northwestern Christian Advocate, in which the weekly issues had swelled from 14,000 to about 30,000, he returned to pastoral work, and was appointed to the Charles Street church, Baltimore. Here he was associated with the building of the Mount Vernon Place church. He was next appointed to the Metropolitan church, Washington, in 1872, but was chosen a delegate to the General Conference in the same year, and was by that body elected a missionary secretary. In this capacity he labored assiduously and with his whole strength for the promotion of missionary interests, traveling throughout the bounds of the church, and delivering addresses, until he was seized by the illness which ended in his death.

Dr. Eddy was a preacher of unusual power, a sprightly and forcible writer, a wise and safe counselor, and of indomitable energy. He was by deep conviction a believer in the doctrines of the church, and a firm adherent to its polity. As a friend, he was genial and social, of unquestioned piety, without a tinge of narrowness, and was universally respected and beloved.

In his last illness his mind was absorbed in the

to their departments. They are elected by the General Conference for four years without limit as to re-election. During Mr. Wesley's life-time he selected various persons to assist him in managing the general book interest and in printing his magazine; but he himself was editor of the magazine, and all the books were published under his immediate inspection. After his death the publishing interests devolved upon the Conference, which was properly his successor. This Conference elected from time to time a book steward, who was also for a time editor of the publications. But at present two editors, Benjamin Frankland and Benjamin Gregory, are appointed. The Methodist Magazine was for many years the only official periodical publication. The weekly papers, such as The Watchman and The Recorder, are under the patronage of the Conference, but are the property of private individuals. The Missionary Society, in its development, required missionary notices, which were issued at first quarterly and then monthly. In America, no editor separate from the book agent was elected until 1828, when Dr. Nathan Bangs was elected as editor of The Advocate. The magazine, or Quarterly Review, was edited for a time under the supervision of the agents. As the various periodicals arose additional elections were made, until at present there are some twenty editors elected by the General Conference. The names and period of service of the different editors are interests of the missionary cause. He said, "Forward is the word; no falling back. We must take the world for Christ, say so to our people. God calls us louder than thunder in the dome of the sky. The Lord strikes the hour. We must throw down our gold in the presence of God."

Editors, The, of the various periodicals and publications of the Methodist Churches are elected either by the General Conferences or, as among the British Wesleyans, by the Annual Conference. They may be either ministers or laymen, but must be approved by the church. Thus far they have always been ministers, though not always members of Annual Conferences. In the Methodist Episcopal Churches they may be members of such Annual Conferences as they, with the approbation of the bishops, select. The salary is determined by the book committee, or by a committee of publication, where the circulation is chiefly local. The corresponding secretaries of the Missionary Society, and of the Tract and Sunday-School Union, are also editors of the various publications belonging as follows:

M. E. Church.—Methodist Quarterly Review, prior to 1832, was edited by the book agents; from 1832 to 1840 it was controlled by the editor of The Christian Advocate. At that time it was enlarged, and the subsequent editors are as follows: 1840–48, George Peck; 1848–56, John McClintock; 1856 until this time, Daniel D. Whedon.

Christian Advocate: 1828–32, Nathan Bangs; 1832–36, J. P. Durbin, Timothy Merritt; 1836–40, S. Lucky, John A. Collins; 1840–48, Thomas E. Bond, with George Coles as assistant until 1844; 1848–52, George Peck; 1852–56, Thomas E. Bond; 1856–60, Abel Stevens; 1860–64, Edward Thomson; 1864–76, Daniel Curry; 1876, Charles H. Fowler.

Sunday-School Advocate: 1844–56, Daniel P. Kidder; 1856–72, Daniel Wise; 1868, John H. Vincent.

Ladies' Repository: 1840–44, L. L. Hamline; 1844–48, Edward Thomson; 1848–52, Benjamin Teft; 1852–54, W. C. Larrabee; 1854–64, Davis W. Clark; 1864–72, Isaac W. Wiley; 1872–76, Erastus Wentworth; 1876, Daniel Curry, the name being changed to National Repository.

Western Christian Advocate: 1832-36, T. A. Morris; 1836-48, Charles Elliott, W. R. Phillips being assistant, 1836-40, and L. L. Hamline, 1840-44; 1848-52, Matthew Simpson; 1852-56, C. Elliott; 1856-64, Calvin Kingsley; 1864-68, John M. Reid; 1868-72, S. M. Merrill; 1872, Francis S. Hoyt.

Northwestern Christian Advocate: 1852-60, J. V. Watson; 1860-68, Thomas M. Eddy; 1868-72, John M. Reid; 1872, Arthur Edwards.

Northern Christian Advocate: 1844-48, Nelson Rounds; 1848-56, William Homer; 1856-60, F. G. Hibbard; 1860-64, Isaac S. Bingham; 1864-76, Dallas D. Lore; 1876, O. H. Warren.

California Christian Advocate: 1852-56, S. D. Simonds; 1856-68, Eleazer D. Thomas; 1868, Henry C. Benson.

Pittsburgh Christian Advocate was under the control of the Pittsburgh Conference until 1844. Its editor from 1833-36 was C. Elliott; from 1836-40, William Hunter; from 1840-44, Charles Cook. It was then taken under the care of the General Conference. 1844-52, W. Hunter; 1852-56, Homer J. Clark; 1856-60, Isaac N. Baird; 1860-72, S. H. Nesbit; 1872-76, William Hunter; 1876, Alfred Wheeler.

Pacific Christian Advocate: 1856-64, Thomas H. Pearne; 1864-76, Isaac S. Dillon; 1876, John H. Acton.

Central Christian Advocate: 1856-60, Joseph Brooks; 1860-64, Charles Elliott; 1864-72, Benjamin F. Cray; 1872, B. St. James Fry.

Methodist Advocate: 1868-72, E. Q. Fuller; 1872-75, N. E. Cobleigh; 1875, E. Q. Fuller.

The Christian Apologist (German): 1840, William Nast.

German Family Magazine and Sunday-School Publications: 1872, Henry Liebhart.

Southwestern Advocate: 1876, J. H. Hartzell.

Besides the official publications, a number of unofficial papers, either as individual property or as owned by Annual Conferences, have been published.

The Zion's Herald, in Boston, was established in 1823, and, with a short intermission, has been published ever since. It is owned by the Boston Wesleyan Association, who have always elected its editor. Among these have been Abel Stevens, N. E. Cobleigh, Gilbert Haven, and W. R. Pierce.

The Methodist was published in New York City, chiefly in the interest of lay delegation, and was edited from 1860 to 1875 by George R. Crooks, assisted by contributing editors. Since that time D. H. Wheeler was elected editor.

The Philadelphia Christian Standard, or Home Journal, was published for several years by Adam Wallace, and was then sold to the Association for the Promotion of Holiness, and has been edited by A. Lowry and J. S. Inskip.

The Buffalo Christian Advocate was established in Buffalo by W. E. Robie, and has been continued with varying fortune since his death.

The Vermont Christian Messenger has also been published for a number of years.

M. E. CHURCH SOUTH.—Prior to the separate organization of the M. E. Church South, weekly periodicals were published at Nashville, Richmond, Charleston, and subsequently at Memphis, New Orleans, Galveston, and one or two other points. During the Civil War some of these were suspended, and the Book Room being considerably crippled, they thought it not expedient to publish officially by the General Conference more than one paper, which is at Nashville, and edited by Thomas O. Summers, D.D. Papers, however, under Conference patronage are still published at the principal points where they had been previously.

The Methodist Protestants in the United States publish The Methodist Protestant, of which E. J. Drinkhouse is editor; and The Methodist Recorder, at Pittsburgh, of which Alexander Clark is editor, as also of The Morning Guide.

The True Wesleyan has been published by the Wesleyan Methodist Church, at Syracuse. In Canada, The Christian Guardian has been the organ of the Wesleyan, now the Methodist Church of Canada, and is edited by E. D. Hartly. The Canada Christian Advocate is published by the Canada M. E. Church, and is edited by S. G. Stone.

Church papers are also published in Germany, edited by C. H. Doering, and also small sheets in Sweden and Norway, designed for the church and the Sunday-school. A paper is also published in India, and in China, and very recently, under Dr. Butler's supervision, a paper is published in Spanish in the city of Mexico, called El Abogado, or The Advocate.

Edmondson, Rev. Jonathan, M.A., was appointed by Mr. Wesley to the Epworth circuit, and continued in the work fifty years. He was at one time missionary secretary, at another the president of the Conference. His last words were, "Jesus is my salvation." Died in 1842.

Education.—In its early work Methodism devoted its energies so actively to evangelical efforts that among many the opinion prevailed that it was indifferent, if not hostile, to education. This impression may have arisen partly from the fact that in its rapid spread it was obliged to employ earnest, devoted men who had not enjoyed opportunities for refined culture. The thought, however, that Methodism was unfavorable to education was wholly erroneous. The young men in Oxford University, that time-honored seat of learning, who first received the epithet of Methodists, were scholars of a high rank, and of unusual mental power. Mr. Wesley and his coadjutors, though they preached the gospel to the poor and the outcast, as soon as these were united into societies sought their elevation and the education of their children. Among his earliest works was the teaching of poor children in Oxford, and scarcely had he formed a society when he opened a school at Kingswood for the education of the children of the poor colliers. At his first Conference, in 1744, when persecution in its severest form was raging around him, he proposed a school for the education of those who might assist him in the sacred work, but he was obliged to defer the project for want of means. The Kingswood School was, however, enlarged to receive the sons of his preachers, and others who gave promise of intellectual vigor. The Wesleyans of England embodying his spirit and imitating his example, have established a number of seminaries, colleges, and theological schools. In the United States, scarcely were small societies organized before Mr. Asbury turned his thoughts to the subject of education. We find him in 1780 engaged with John Dickins in preparing a plan for a seminary, and in securing some subscriptions. The times were so unfavorable, however, that but little was accomplished. As soon as the church was organized he joined with Dr. Coke in plans for a college; they solicited subscriptions, and an institution was built at Abington, called Cokesbury College (which see), which was burned. It was immediately reopened in Baltimore, but in another year that perished also in the flames. In the mean time Bishop Asbury had been active in encouraging the formation of seminaries, and had made partial arrangements both in the South and West, but after the disasters which befell Cokesbury and Baltimore, he believed it to be his duty to devote himself fully to evangelical labor. For twenty years the church did little in its organized capacity in the cause of education; but about 1817 academies were started in Baltimore, New Hampshire, and New York. In 1823 Augusta College, in Kentucky, was organized, and in 1825 Madison College, in Pennsylvania. These were followed by the Wesleyan University of Middletown, Dickinson College, at Carlisle, and Alleghany College, at Meadville. From this time the spirit of education became aroused, and academies, seminaries, and colleges were founded by the churches in various parts of the land. (See SEMINARIES, COLLEGES, UNIVERSITIES.) These have increased until there are now under the direct or indirect control of the M. E. Church, the property being held by trustees the majority of whom are members of the church, seventy-six seminaries, twenty colleges, and fifteen universities,—though it should be stated that the name university suggests in many instances little more than that of college. Three biblical schools have also been established, to wit: the theological department of the Boston University, once known as the Concord Biblical Institute, Garrett Biblical Institute, now the theological department of the Northwestern University, and Drew Theological Seminary, at Madison, New Jersey (which see). There are also biblical departments, or chairs, in several of the colleges, in which a partial theological course is given. In a few of the institutions schools of medicine and of law have been opened, and very recently schools of oratory, music, etc. The M. E. Church South had in full operation at its separation a number of flourishing colleges, and these have been added to as it has grown in numbers and strength. It is a matter of regret that the funds of several of these colleges were seriously diminished, and in some cases wholly lost, as their trustees invested them in Confederate bonds, or in forms of property which were destroyed during the war. They are recovering, however, from their depression, and the munificent gift of Mr. Vanderbilt has established a university of high grade at Nashville, Tennessee. For more particular information, refer to the list of seminaries, colleges, and universities, and the specific articles devoted to each. The Methodist Protestant Church has established two colleges, one in Adrian, Michigan, the other in Westminster, Maryland, with several smaller institutions in different localities. The African M. E. Church has a respectable institution, Wilberforce Institution, near Xenia, Ohio, with a few incipient seminaries. The Methodist Churches, however, are not yet, proportionally to their numbers, abreast with the other and older denominations. These had literary institutions in operation long before the first Methodist society was formed. Their graduates have filled places of public trust: they have accumulated wealth; their alumni are employed as teachers and as professors in public institutions, and the natural influence of the great majority of the educated men of our country has been unfavorable to Methodism. The teachers in the public schools, and especially in the seminaries and academies, turn the attention of the students very naturally to the institutions from which they graduated: and hence, in very many instances, the educated youth of the Methodist Church is turned away from our own institutions and wholly lost to our communion. Careful attention will be required to correct this tendency. The education of the young women of the church was a prominent thought with the founders of the first seminaries which were established: and in this direction a very great work was accomplished. The Methodist colleges were among the first that threw open their doors to receive young women as well as young men. In addition to this a large number of seminaries were founded exclusively for young women, such as the Wesleyan Female College at Macon, Ga., the Cincinnati Wesleyan Female College, and many others, which were designed to give the highest possible culture to the young women of the church, and such others as chose to enter the halls. From these have been furnished a large number of young women, who are now engaged in teaching or in leading in various benevolent reforms.

The following list of colleges and universities is taken from the publications of the various churches :

Education, Board of.—The General Conference of the M. E. Church of 1860 appointed a special committee to report and determine a plan for an Educational Board. No action was taken until 1868, when the committee on education reported a plan for the organization of a board, to consist of twelve trustees, six of whom should be ministers, two of them bishops, and six laymen, of which number five should be a quorum. They authorized the board to secure a suitable charter, and trustees were elected, four for four years, four for eight years, and four for twelve years, and every four years thereafter four for twelve years. The board has received and securely invested the Educational Fund, which was contributed during the Centennial year, and also the Children's Fund, contributed during the same year. The interest only of these funds can be appropriated. The interest on the Children's Fund is to be applied in assisting in the higher education of Sunday-school scholars. The interest of the Educational Fund proper is to be appropriated, first, to aid young men preparing for the foreign missionary work; second, to aid young men preparing for the ministry at home; third, to aid the biblical and theological schools; fourth, to aid any societies and colleges or academies under the patronage of the church. This board has its headquarters in the city of New York. At the General Conference of 1876 the corresponding secretary reported the invested funds to amount to $102,000; that during the last two years and a half there had been expended on students, members of the church, seeking to prepare themselves for the ministry at home or abroad, the sum of $22,500. This amount had been distributed among 400 students in different parts of the country. This help is considered in the light of a loan, and it is expected that, should circumstances permit, it will be returned to the board at some future time. The amount of money contributed by the church for education, and which was received by the board in 1876, was $25,909. Through the agency of the corresponding secretary many Conference and educational societies auxiliary to the general board have been organized, and the interest in education has been greatly increased throughout the church. The present board is as follows: Bishops, Thomas Bowman, M. Simpson; Ministers, J. W. Lindsay, C. A. Holmes, E. O. Haven, and D. P. Kidder; Laymen, John Elliott, Oliver Hoyt, William Clafin, F. H. Root, C. C. North, and J. Long.

Education, General Committee of, and its Funds (English Wesleyan).—The general committee of education, to whom the Conference had intrusted the supervision of day and infant schools, and of educational interests generally, in the Wesleyan body, after having considered with care and deliberation the various subjects committed to them, judged it right to present to the Conferences of 1840 and 1841 a draft of their matured plan, to direct and assist the friends of Wesleyan education, that the desired ends might be effectually secured. Their plan included the principles of the schools in every branch of education, with their government, support, teachers, school-houses, and statistical information. The committee is one of the largest and most influential in the connection; it includes now the president and secretary of the Conference, the ex-president, the treasurers and secretary of the committee, the principals of the two branches of the Normal Institution, the secretary of the Connectional Sunday-School Union, the principal of the Children's Home, the book steward, the editor, with thirty ministers in London, and thirty laymen.

The duties of the committee are: (1) To exercise a general supervision over the affairs of education; to connect and combine the whole of our school operations in their aggregate character for the purposes of public utility; to be a medium of communication for the connection on educational subjects, whether with the government or other public bodies; and to promote and facilitate the adoption in Wesleyan schools of such rules as tend to secure the greatest practical efficiency and to preserve connectional harmony. (2) To direct the application of all funds intrusted to their care. (3) To superintend and direct the training of teachers, and to recommend such teachers to schools on application of the local committee. (4) To collect information on matters relating to the general interests of education; to correspond with local committees and friends of education on various subjects connected with teachers, inspectors, etc., to promote the formation of new schools, and by advice and co-operation to encourage those already formed. (5) To prepare from their official documents, and to present to Conference, an annual report of their proceedings, and of the general progress of Wesleyan education. The committee is elected annually. The Conference directs that all who contemplate the erection or alteration of premises for the establishment of new schools should communicate with the committee. The general secretary is a minister annually appointed by the Conference, and may remain in office for any length of time that may be deemed fit; he is also the resident secretary of the Wesleyan Normal Institution. District secretaries were first appointed in 1859. They must be selected one for each district at the September district meeting. They must receive and classify day- and Sunday-school schedules; present to the May district meeting a general statement and view of the whole, and forward to the general committee the circuit and district schedules, and any resolutions passed by the meeting on the subject of education. Two treasurers—one a minister and one lay gentleman—are annually appointed by Conference.

In 1839 a grant from the Centenary Fund of £5000 was made. In 1844 it was resolved by the Conference that a general education fund should be commenced with a basis of £20,000. For this object a public collection was appointed to be made twice in every place of public worship on the last Sunday in November, 1845. It was also resolved that for seven years the Chapel Fund should be designated "The General Chapel and Wesleyan Education Fund;" one moiety being for the former, the other for the latter object. In 1846 the sum above named was realized. This fund is now supported by a specific annual collection throughout the connection, and by private subscriptions. These must be made in the month of April, and the moneys paid at or before the annual meeting in May to the financial secretaries; the accounts to be duly audited and presented to the Conference. By the minutes of 1861 it is enjoined that the state of the day-schools as well as the Sabbath-schools should be brought before the March quarterly meeting.

Education Society (Methodist Church of Canada).—This association was formed at their first General Conference in 1874. Its object is "to assist in maintaining our universities, theological, day-schools, and higher mission-schools; to defray the expenses of examination of candidates for the ministry in our church, and to aid such in obtaining an education." The subscribers of five dollars per annum shall be members of the association. Its general management is vested in a central board, composed of the president of the General Conference; one layman from each Annual Conference, to be appointed from its Conference, to hold office four years; one minister from each Annual Conference, to be elected annually by its Conference; and also the head of each university and of each theological school. Collections are to be taken up in its behalf in all the churches and preaching-places some time in February or April of each year. Committees are to exist at each Conference to consider the cases of candidates, and to make such arrangements as may be necessary.

Edwards, Arthur, D.D., editor of The Northwestern Christian Advocate, was born in Ohio in November, 1834. He graduated from the Ohio Wesleyan University in his twenty-third year, while Dr. Thomson, afterwards bishop, was president. He immediately entered the Detroit Conference, and has been for many years its efficient secretary. During the war he spent nearly three years as chaplain in the army. For several years he was assistant editor of The Northwestern Christian Advocate, and was elected as editor in 1872, and re-elected by acclamation in 1876. He was a member of the General Conference, of 1872 and of 1876, serving as secretary of the committee on the Book Concern in the first session, and as secretary of the committee on episcopacy in the latter.

Edwards, James T., D.D., principal of Chamberlain Institute, was born Jan. 6, 1838, in Barnegat, N. J. He was converted at twelve years of age, pursued his academic studies at Pennington Seminary, and graduated at the Wesleyan University in 1860. He filled for one year the chair of Natural Science in Amenia Seminary, and then accepted the same department at East Greenwich. In 1862 he enlisted as a private in a Rhode Island regiment, but shortly after was made lieutenant, and then adjutant of the parole camp, near Alexandria. Leaving the army, he was elected principal of the East Greenwich Seminary, and also served as State Senator and as Presidential elector. He was elected for the third time to the Senate, and was chairman of the committee on education. In 1870 he became principal of Chamberlain Institute and Female College, where he now continues. In 1876 he received the degree of D.D. from Allegheny College.

REV. JAMES T. EDWARDS, D.D.

Edwards, William, born 1820: entered the institution in 1841: labored with great acceptance in several circuits: was appointed in 1865 one of the general secretaries of chapel building committee. He labored long and well in this important department; was seized with apoplexy while conducting divine worship in London: lingered ten days, then fell asleep in Jesus, May, 1876, in the fifty-seventh year of his age, and the thirty-third of his ministry.

Ela, David Hough, late principal of the Providence Conference Seminary, was born in Canaan, Me., Jan. 19, 1831, and was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1857. He joined the Providence Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1858, having already served one year in the pastorate. He was elected principal of the Providence Conference Seminary in 1871. In 1873 he returned to pastoral work in the New England Conference. Mr. Ela was a member of the General Conference of 1872.

Elder is a word used synonymously with presbyter, and usually signifies, ecclesiastically, one who exercises the full office of the ministry, because generally in ancient times only persons of somewhat advanced years were selected to hold public office and to fill commanding positions. In some churches the word elders is used to signify officers of the local church who assist the minister in its administration, but who do not take upon themselves the office of the ministry. The elders of the New Testament Church were plainly the pastors or overseers, to whom pertained the functions of expounding and administering the sacraments. In the Roman Catholic Church, the Church of England, and the Protestant Episcopal Church, the word priest is generally used instead of presbyter or elder; but in the Methodist Episcopal Churches it signifies those who fill the full office of the ministry, and is used in contrast with the term deacon. In the Methodist Episcopal Churches, after a preacher has been elected to the office of a deacon and serves two years acceptably in the ministry, he is eligible to the order of elder, and being elected by an Annual Conference, he is ordained by the laying on of the hands of the bishop and of the elders who assist him. There is no higher order than elder recognized in the Methodist Episcopal Church. A presiding elder is appointed simply to superintend a given district. (See PRESIDING ELDER.) Local preachers who have filled the ministry as deacons acceptably for four years are eligible, after proper examination, to the office of elder. Among the Wesleyan Methodists, however, there is no ordination of local preachers, and the only ordination recognized among them is that of elder. The same is true of nearly all the non-episcopal Methodist Churches. What are termed "ruling elders" in the Presbyterian Churches correspond more nearly with the offices of steward and class-leader in the Methodist Episcopal Church, though they differ in their mode of election, the duration of the office, and some of the functions performed.

Election.—There are three kinds of election spoken of in the Scriptures, which may be clearly distinguished from one another:

First. The election of individuals to perform some special service. Thus, Cyrus was "elected" to rebuild the temple; the twelve disciples were "chosen" to their office by Christ; St. Paul was a "chosen" vessel to preach the gospel to the Gentiles. This election has, however, manifestly no relation to the limitation of eternal salvation. It does not confer upon the persons so chosen an absolute security. One of the elected apostles was Judas, who fell and was lost; and St. Paul confesses his own personal liability to become a "cast-away." It does not exclude others from the saving-grace of God, for the apostles were "elected" to preach the gospel in order to their salvation.

Second. That of nations or bodies of men to eminent "religious privileges." Thus, the Hebrews were chosen to receive special revelations of truth, to be the "people of God," to be his visible church, and publicly to "observe and uphold his worship." They were privileged because unto them were committed the oracles of God. By covenant with Abraham, their founder, all the nations of the earth were to be blessed in his seed. The promised Messiah was to be born of his seed.

In the Christian dispensation believers are elected to the privileges of the visible church. Faith in Christ as the promised Messiah was substituted for birthright in Abraham, as the condition of membership in the visible church. The subjects of these elections are called in Scripture "the elect," "the chosen," "ordained," or "called." The election of the Gentiles to equal privileges with the Hebrews on condition of faith in Christ, is the election chiefly spoken of in the Epistle to the Romans.

Christ removed all distinctions between Hebrews and Gentiles by his atonement. He added new conditions to the blessings of church and of grace. The entrance into the new church founded by Christ was not by natural birth, but conditioned on spiritual birth. The conditions were offered first unto the Hebrews, which accepted, constituted them the elect of God. They were also offered unto the Gentiles, which they accepting, became the elect of God and the "called according to his purpose." The calling and the election were not limited to one people, but to all believers of all nations. The gospel was preached to both Hebrew and Gentile, and men of all nations received it.

But this election into the visible church does not infallibly secure the salvation of every elected person. The Hebrews were elected to be a peculiar people, but that did not secure the salvation of every Hebrew individually. This will be admitted by all: for as the foundation of their church state was their natural relation to Abraham, and as "that which is born of the flesh is flesh, none of them could be saved merely by 'virtue of their being' Hebrews outwardly. 'But with many of them God was not well pleased: for they were overthrown in the wilderness.'" I. Cor. x. 5. Nor does the election of the Christian church infallibly secure the eternal salvation of every one of its members,—that is, of every elected person. True believers are warned of danger, and exhorted to care and diligence, that they may inherit eternal life. The fact of their outward calling does not procure salvation. As men in the Hebrew Church, elected to all its privileges, fell into sin and were lost, so some in the Christian church, having the same privileges, have sinned and been cut off. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." I. Cor. x. 12. "Give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall." II. Peter i. 10. Neither does this election preclude the salvability of those not elected, as the Calvinists teach. The election of the Hebrews to be a peculiar people did not exclude other peoples from the possibility of salvation. In the Old Testament we have men of piety of many nations regarded by God. Thus, Job and Jethro were rewarded by him. The Scriptures testify that all men are under the favor of God because of the atonement, that by virtue of Christ's sacrifice salvation is made possible unto the race. "God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him." Acts x. 34, 35. This ecclesiastical election, neither in the old nor in the new church, excludes others from the favor and mercy of God. The election of Abraham and his posterity was designed not only to preserve the truth, but to diffuse it, and to counteract the spread of superstition and idolatry. God made them the conservator of his revelation, that through their election all might be called. He educated them, that through their culture the world might be brought to Christ. Their election did not mean the reprobation of other nations, but just the opposite; in Abraham, one family, all the families of the earth were to be blessed. Jerusalem, hid in the solitude of the mountains for ages, was in the fullness of time to be revealed in her principles and laws, in her holiness and beauty, "the joy of the whole earth."

And so of membership in the church of the New Testament, the election is not designed to exclude those outside from the grace of God, not to be a testimony of God's wrath, but a witness of God's love unto the world. The church is to illuminate, and is called "the light of the world;" it is to conserve human interests, and is called "the salt of the earth." Men are called into its fellowship that through its blessed agency others may be "made partakers of eternal life."

Third. That of individuals to be the children of God and heirs of eternal life. That a personal election is designated in the Scriptures is evident from the following passages: "I have chosen you out of the world." John xv. 19. "God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth." II. Thess. ii. 13. "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through the sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ." I. Peter i. 2. "Many are called, but few are chosen."

Not only is the election designated, but the grounds of the election are made known. Men "are elect according to the foreknowledge of God." The choosing is after the calling; it is an "act done in time." The election is by and through the sanctification of the Spirit,—that is, it is a selection, a choosing out of the world, a separation from the world, by regeneration, conversion, the new birth; in a word, when God justifies a sinner, regenerates his nature, accepts him as a child of God, makes him an heir of eternal life, he thereby, then and there, separates him from sinners of the world, elects him to be his child and an heir of eternal life. "The sinner, by this selection, becomes a saint, an elect person, and is frequently so called in the Scriptures." "This election is almost universally spoken of as conditioned upon repentance towards God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; and if in any passages the condition is not specifically mentioned, it is plainly implied. If in any sense this election is eternal, it is so only in the purpose of the Divine Being to elect: and as the election itself is conditioned upon faith, it follows that the eternal purpose to elect was based upon that foreseen faith."

This doctrine of election is distinguished from the Augustinian and Calvinian doctrine, that "election is the unchangeable decree of God, by which, before the foundation of the world, he hath chosen in Christ unto salvation a set number of men. This election is one and the same of all which are saved. Not all men are elected, but some not elected; whom God in his unchangeable good pleasure hath decreed to leave in the common misery, and not to bestow saving faith upon them; but leaving them in their own ways at last to condemn and punish them everlastingly for their unbelief, and also for their sins." The error of this doctrine consists, first, in the statement that "personal election is eternal." Eternity in the proper sense of the word can alone be predicated of God, not of his volitions or doings. His purpose in the salvation of men is eternal, it is unchangeable. "He that believeth shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned."

But this purpose, according to Scripture, is carried out in time, and follows the administration of certain appointed means of salvation. The "calling" antecedes election, and the election is conditioned upon "belief in the truth," by "the sanctification of the Spirit" and "the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ." Men are not elected to everlasting life from all eternity, but only upon fulfilling the conditions of God's purpose. I. Peter I, 2. The Augustinian election is unscriptural in the fact that it limits the number of those for whom Christ died.

Scripture nowhere alludes to a salvation ordained for a set number of men. If there is a secret purpose, Scripture makes no allusion to it. Scripture is an ultimate authority, what it reveals we must accept; its testimony is explicit. God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. "Jesus Christ by the grace of God tasted death for every man." "He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world." The interpretation of the terms "the world," "whosoever," "all men," and "every man," as referring to the elect, is not in consonance with the meaning of the Scripture. In all reason the words express universality; they are terms that are used without limitation; they affirm as clearly as words can express that the death of Christ has made the salvation of all men possible.

Further, it is declared that "God is not willing that any should perish:" but, "will have all men to be saved." There is no conflict between his will and purpose. They are one, hence his purpose cannot be to save only a determinate number of men.

Christ died for all men. "For if through the offense of one many be dead, much more the grace of God and the gift by grace which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many: therefore as by the offense of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came unto all men unto justification." Christ died that all men through him might be saved; he died in order that they might be elected through faith to eternal life. He reveals in his death the extent of the atonement: it is co-extensive with the sin of the race. As many as have suffered death in Adam, so many have the possibility of eternal life in Christ.

The election cannot be limited, for the command to preach the glad tidings is universal. Proclaim it to every creature. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." This command cannot be reconciled with the doctrine of an eternal purpose to elect only a determinate number of men.

If those who believe not "shall not see life," it must have been possible for them to have believed and have received life; the alternative declares that salvation is unlimited.

Again, the Augustinians "affirm that as Christ's death does save the elect, and does not save others, therefore, in the eternal purpose and intent of the divine mind, there was a distinction." Christ was given of the Father, and he gave himself and suffered and died for the elect in a sense in which he was not given, did not give himself, and did not die for others. Some are saved, and some are not; therefore saving agencies have different relations to their subjects. It assumes that God purposed that what is should be, and that the opposite could not be; that the lost were purposed to be lost from eternity, and the saved to be saved from the same period. It assumes that the death of Christ per se saves men, so that those saved only had the salvation offered them. Scriptures teach that those for whom Christ died may perish, that true believers may refuse the grace of God, and "draw near unto perdition," that men may "depart from the fellowship of Christ and become partakers of evil and be lost."

Another error in the doctrine of election as held by Augustine and Calvin is, that "election to eternal life is unconditional." "It is the gracious act of God in choosing a definite number of men," without any foresight of faith or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving him thereunto.

To affirm that in purpose men were elected from eternity "without foresight of faith or good works," is to say that from eternity God purposed to constitute his church of persons to whose faith and obedience he had no respect. He eternally purposed to make Peter, James, and John members of his church without respect to their faith or obedience or anything else in them. That his church is constituted on the sole principle of this purpose and not on the basis of faith and obedience, is entirely opposed to the word of God. The essential elements of a church are believing and obedient men. Discipleship in Christ is based upon faith and obedience. Men are made part of the church by faith. The initiatory rite by which they are led into the church implies a previous faith.

Men are not elected or predestinated unto faith and obedience, but are elected through faith and obedience. "God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth." II. Thess. ii. 13.

Sanctification and faith are here means of election, and if they are means there cannot be an election unto faith and obedience.

But it is affirmed that Paul teaches unconditional election in Romans viii. 29, 30: "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren.

"Moreover whom he did predestinate, them he also called: and whom he called, them he also justified: and whom he justified, them he also glorified."

The doctrine can be determined by finding out to whom the clause "whom he did foreknow" refers.

If reference is had to men considered as actually existing beings, then knowing all men, all men are elected and universalism is affirmed; if particular persons are designated, then Calvinism is affirmed; if a class of persons distinguished by some special relation or qualities is affirmed, that relation or quality will interpret the true meaning of the sentence. None will affirm that the text applies to any particular persons. There is no ground for that exegesis.

The reference is evidently to the class "named in verse twenty-eight," they that love God who are the called according to his purpose.

The election is conditioned upon the ground of love. The successive steps from the hour of the call until the hour of glorification are conditioned upon the faith and obedience of the human soul. "God is no respecter of persons," having given his Son to redeem all men; as our Father he loves all mankind. He has given Christ our all-sufficient Saviour to die for all mankind. He has given the Holy Spirit to strive with all mankind. He has ordained that the glad tidings be preached unto all mankind, giving unto every human soul the offered salvation through Christ, and providing that all who receive it shall live, and that those who voluntarily reject it shall die. God is no respecter of persons, but he is a respecter of character. He does not elect unconditionally, but in every nation he that worketh righteousness shall be saved. Holiness is the end of redemption. The formation of a godlike human character is the essential to please God and be accepted of him. For this end of humanity he has made special sacrifice. He has given Christ our Redeemer that we might make our "calling and election sure."

Electoral Conference is a body of laymen in the M. E. Church which assembles on the third day of the session of the Annual Conference, immediately preceding the General Conference, and at the same place. It is composed of one layman from each circuit or station within the bounds of the Annual Conference. Each layman is chosen by the last Quarterly Conference preceding the time of the assembling of the Electoral Conference. No layman is eligible as a delegate to the Electoral Conference or to the General Conference unless he shall be at least twenty-five years of age, and shall have been a member of the church in good standing for five consecutive years preceding the election. The Electoral Conference convenes for the purpose of electing lay delegates to the ensuing General Conference. Each Electoral Conference is entitled to two delegates to the General Conference, except where such Annual Conferences have but one ministerial delegate, and then it is entitled to one lay delegate.

Electricity.—Mr. Wesley showed his keen sagacity and foresight in early employing electricity as a remedial agent. In 1753, when he read Franklin's letters, he wrote, "What an amazing scene is here opened for after-ages to improve upon!" In 1756 he opened rooms for the sick to try "the virtue of this surprising medicine." After many experiments, he writes, "Hundreds, perhaps thousands, have received unspeakable good; and I have not known one man, woman, or child who has received any hurt thereby. . . . It is the most efficacious medicine in nervous disorders of every kind which has ever yet been discovered." These services and experiments were in behalf of the poor, and were wholly gratuitous.

Elgin, Ill. (pop. 5441), in Kane County, Fox River, 42 miles northwest of Chicago, was settled 1835, and is the site of the American Elgin Watch Factory. The first Methodist sermon of which we have record was in 1835. In 1836 a few persons favorable to Methodism settled at Hoosier Grove, four miles east of Elgin, and during the year a class was organized. George Hammers was appointed the first leader, and was succeeded by Benjamin Burritt. It was then a part of Fox River circuit, which reported, in 1837, 280 members. In 1838 the Elgin circuit was organized, covering a territory of about forty miles square, and containing thirty-two preaching places. In 1839 services were held on the east side of the river, and for a time at the corner of Du Page and Geneva Streets. The first church building was not finished until 1840, when Elgin became a station, with one or two contiguous appointments, and S. Bolles was placed in charge. The church edifice was enlarged in 1851 to accommodate the growing congregation. In May, 1866, a new church was commenced, which was finished in September, 1867. It is in the Rock River Conference, and reports 470 members, 250 Sunday-school scholars, and $30,000 church property. The Free Methodists have a small society.

Elijay Seminary is located in a town of that name, on the Elijay River, in North Georgia. It is the Conference seminary of the Georgia Conference of the M. E. Church, and is in successful operation. W. R. Turner, A.M., was principal in 1876-77, and 75 students were enrolled. The value of the property is $8000.

Elizabeth, N. J. (pop. 20,832), the capital of Union County, and five miles southwest from Newark. It was settled in 1665, and was for some time the capital of the State. It was formerly called Elizabethtown. According to the records of the M. E. Church the State was in 1781 divided into East Jersey and West Jersey, and in that year

James O. Cromwell and Henry Metcalf were appointed the only preachers for all of that former territory. In 1785, Bishop Asbury in one of his tours having missed the stage was obliged to walk six miles to Elizabethtown, and there preached in an unfinished church belonging to the Presbyterians. In 1787 this city is first mentioned in the annual minutes, and it was visited by Asbury and Coke, the latter preaching in an Episcopal church. After this Asbury often visited the city. In 1795, July 28, he preached here to about eighty people, and after the sermon "led the class." In the afternoon he attended the Bowery church. He was here again in 1802, and makes this amusing record: "Wonders will never cease! Nothing would serve but I must marry Thomas Morrell to a young woman. Such a solitary wedding I suppose has been but seldom seen. Behold father Morrell 75, father Whatecoat 66, Francis Asbury 57, and the ceremony performed solemnly at the solemn hour of ten at night!" In 1809 he and Boehm, his traveling companion, were here, and Asbury calls it "a new town, and we have a large house built here; the Baptists are building a grand house." From that time Methodism has gradually increased in this city. During the last year two of the churches united and purchased a new church edifice. The Free Methodists have a small society, and the German M. E. Church is prospering. It is in the Newark Conference, and reports the following statistics:

Elkhart, Ind. (pop. 3265), situated in Elkhart County, and on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad, is surrounded with a fine agricultural district. It is first mentioned in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1852, as connected with Bristol, with Enoch Hildstock as pastor, and he reported, in 1852, 117 members. They were continued together until 1858, when J. H. Hutchinson was appointed to Elkhart. He reported, in 1859, 164 members, 270 Sunday-school scholars, and 1 church, valued at $3500. It is in the North Indiana Conference, and reports (1876) 150 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,000 church property.

Elliot, Arthur W., was born in Maryland in 1784; removed to the West, and was an efficient local preacher in the M. E. Church for several years. In 1818 he entered the Ohio Conference, where he traveled circuits from two to three hundred miles in circumference, oftentimes encountering great difficulty from almost impassable roads and streams, as well as from the storms of winter. His originality, eloquence, and energy gave him great influence. He had wonderful power over the multitude in protracted and camp-meetings, where the thunder of his voice, his daring style, and bold delivery had full scope; and thousands were converted under his ministry. His health, however, became impaired, and he was supernumerary eight years, and superannuated seventeen. He died in Paris, Ill., Jan. 18, 1858.

Elliot, Charles, D.D., was born May 16, 1792, at Glencoway, Ireland. He was converted in 1811, and soon turned his attention to theological studies. He was licensed to preach in 1813, and in 1814, with his widowed mother and her family, sailed for America. Locating in Western Pennsylvania, he was received on trial in the Ohio Conference in 1818 and appointed to Zanesville circuit. In 1822 he was appointed a missionary to the Wyandotte Indians. From 1827 to 1831 he was Professor of Languages in Madison College, Pennsylvania. From 1833 to 1836 he was editor of the Pittsburgh Conference Journal. From 1836 to 1848 he was editor of The Western Christian Advocate. The next four years were spent in the regular work of the ministry, and from 1852 to 1856 he was again editor of The Western Christian Advocate. In 1857 he was elected a professor, and in 1858 as president, of the Iowa Wesleyan University. From 1860 to 1864 he edited The Central Christian Advocate. He was nine times a delegate to the General Conference, and after a long career of arduous and successful labor he died at Mount Pleasant, Iowa, Jan. 6, 1869. The chief literary work of his life was his "Delineation of Roman Catholicism," and his arguments drawn from original sources are probably unrivaled in English literature. His scholarship was not only varied but accurate, and especially his knowledge of the history and theology of the Roman Catholic Church was not surpassed by any theologian of his time. In every department of labor Dr. Elliot was an untiring worker. Naturally possessed of a vigorous constitution and cheerful spirits, he never felt labor a burden. Mere elegance was never his aim either in mind or manners; but while the learned found in him a master the child also found in him a companion. The great burden of his heart was a reformation of Romanism. He had even offered himself as a missionary to Rome. During the last days of his life this was the burden of his mind. He was permitted to see the veil lifted and light dawning on that land, and rejoiced greatly. His closing hours were, as might be expected, full of calm, peace, and joy.

Elliot, Simon, was born in Ireland, Oct. 25, 1809. He was converted and joined the M. E. Church about the age of eighteen, was educated at Madison College under the care of his brother, Dr. Charles Elliot, and joined the Pittsburgh Conference in 1833. He filled a number of the leading stations, and was presiding elder of Beaver, Clarksburg, Morgantown, and Steubenville districts, on the latter of which he died on Sept. 26, 1849. He possessed a sound, discriminating judgment, with deep and earnest piety. In ministerial faithfulness he had few equals. He was a man of talent, culture, and unflinching Christian integrity.

Elliott, James, D.D., lately president of the Montreal Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada, was born in Drogheda, Ireland, in 1818, and emigrated to Canada in 1832. He was converted and united with the church at the early age of twelve, and was received into the Conference in 1841. After having spent several years on circuits, he was stationed in Prescott, Brockville, and Hamilton. At the close of his term in the latter city he was elected secretary of the Wesleyan Conference, and was removed to Quebec, and made chaplain of the district, which office he has continued to fill in various districts. In 1866 he was nominated as president of the Canada Conference, and confirmed by the British Conference, and performed its duties in the years 1867-68. Since 1854 he has been stationed in Quebec, Toronto, London, and Kingston.

Elliott, John, a banker of New York, and a member of St. Paul's M. E. church. He was born in Ireland, emigrated when a young man to America, resided several years in Philadelphia, and is a partner in the firm of Riggs & Co. He is a member of the Missionary Board, and is also a member of the Board of Education.

Elmira, N. Y. (pop. 15,862), the capital of Chemung County, situated on the Northern Central and Erie Railroad. It was organized as a town in 1792, and was at first called Newtown, but in 1828 its name was changed to Elmira. It was known by the former name in the earlier records of the M. E. Church, and appears in 1826 with Edmund O'Fling as pastor. It had formerly been connected with Bath circuit. Mr. O'Fling reported, in 1827, 60 members. In 1829, Robert Burch was appointed to "Elmira," and he reported, in 1830, 141 members. Since this time Methodism has prospered, and now reports, as connected with the New York Central Conference, the following statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

Elyria, Ohio (pop. 3038), the capital of Lorain County, and situated on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad. It is pleasantly located, and has some natural advantages for prosperity. It is first mentioned in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1840, when Joseph Jones and John Brokefield were appointed to that charge, and they reported from that circuit, in 1849, 570 members. It is situated in the North Ohio Conference, and reports (1876) 227 members, 220 Sunday-school scholars, and $11,000 church property.

Embury, Philip, a local preacher from Ireland, probably conducted the first Methodist service on the continent of America. He was a descendant of the Palatines, who had been exiled from their own country on account of their religion, and who had settled in Ireland, in Ballingarane, west of Limerick. He was born about the year 1730, his parents being members of the German Lutheran Church. He was converted on Christmas, 1752, through the instrumentality of Mr. Wesley. His qualifications were soon recognized, and he was appointed class-leader, and subsequently local preacher. About 1760 he emigrated in company with a few families and settled in New York; but we have no information of his holding any religious service until 1766. Late in the year 1765 a number of emigrants from the same neighborhood arrived in New York. Mrs. Barbara Heck, moved by the religious destitution among the circle of friends, urged Mr. Embury—who was her cousin—to commence preaching. After some hesitation he consented: and she collected four persons, who, with herself, constituted his audience. These he enrolled in a class, and from that time conducted services regularly in his own house. About three months afterwards, Captain Webb, of the British army, visited the society and preached for them. The private room being too small to hold the congregation, a larger room was hired, and subsequently a rigging-loft. The congregation increasing in two years, the old John Street church was built. Mr. Embury, who was a carpenter, worked upon the building, making the pulpit with his own hands; and on the 30th of October, 1768, he preached the dedicatory sermon. At that time he was one of the trustees, and was the treasurer of the church. In 1770 he left New York and settled in Camden, Washington county. When leaving the city the society made him a present of a copy of Cruden's tion, to perpetuate the memory of the first local preacher of America.

As a preacher, though possessing no superior talent, and without much literary culture, he was of a respectable character. He evinced deep feeling, was earnest in his appeals, and he manifested the beauty of deep Christian piety. The Methodists of America everywhere honor his memory. Concordance, which he carried with him and carefully preserved as a memento of their affection. In his new residence he continued to preach. He organized a small society, and was also appointed justice of the peace. In 1775 he received a severe injury while mowing in his meadow, and shortly after died. His remains were interred on the plantation of a friend, about seven miles from Ash Grove; and in 1832 they were removed to the Methodist burying-ground at Ash Grove, where a marble tablet was erected, an address being delivered on the occasion by Rev. John N. Maffit. In 1873 the National Local Preachers' Association erected a marble monument with a suitable inscription, at Newton Co., Ga., 40 miles east of Atlanta. By special act of the legislature, drinking- and gambling-saloons are excluded from the town and from within one mile of the place. It was chartered Feb. 6, 1837. Lovick Pierce, Ignatius A. Few, William J. Parks, and George F. Pierce were among the original charter members of the board of trust. The college is held in joint ownership by the North Georgia, the South Georgia, and the Florida Conferences of the M. E. Church South, but numbers among its patrons members of all Protestant denominations. From the beginning it has given free tuition to the sons of itinerant preachers. Its sessions have been regularly held, except for a short period during the war. Its alumni number 605. The college is well furnished with ample and commodious buildings for thorough educational work, having, besides the society halls and the academy, four new large and well-appointed buildings. It has a partial endowment. Emory

College for a generation has been recognized as one of the foremost institutions of Christian learning in Southern Methodism. Its curriculum is broad and thorough. Its faculty consists of eight actively-engaged members, to wit: Rev. A. G. Haygood, D.D., President, and Professor of Mental and Moral Science; Rev. G. W. W. Stone, A.M., Vice-President, and Professor of Mathematics; Rev. Alex. Means, M.D., D.D., LL.D., Professor Emeritus of Natural Science; Rev. Osborn L. Smith, D.D., Professor of Latin Language and Literature; Rev. Morgan Callaway, D.D., Professor of English Language and Literature; H. A. Secomp, A.M., Professor of Greek Language and Literature, and Hebrew; John F. Bonell, A.M., Professor of Natural Science; Rufus W. Smith, A.M., Principal of Academic Department; R. M. McIntosh, Professor of Vocal Music. Its students for 1876 in all the departments numbered 167.

Emory, John, D.D., one of the bishops of the M. E. Church, was born in Queen Anne Co., Md., April 11, 1789. Before he was ten years of age, his father, having designed him for the profession of the law, placed him under a popular classical teacher in Easton; thence he was sent to Lancaster, Pa., where he remained at school one year. He completed his academical course in the year 1804, in Washington College, Md., and in 1805 commenced the study of law. In 1806 he experienced justification and united with the M. E. Church. In 1808 he was admitted to the bar and commenced his profession, but in the following year, notwithstanding the strong opposition of his father, he resolved to enter the ministry, and in 1810 joined the Philadelphia Conference. He successively filled appointments in Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore, Washington, and Annapolis. When just eligible he was chosen delegate to the General Conference of 1816, and he was a member of every subsequent General Conference, except that of 1824, until his election as bishop. In 1817 he engaged in controversy, writing in defense of the witness of the Holy Spirit, answering Bishop White, of Philadelphia, who had written against that doctrine. In 1820 he distinguished himself in the General Conference in the discussions on various important questions, and was appointed a delegate to the British Wesleyan Conference to settle some difficulties that had arisen in reference to Canada. In the controversy with the Reformers from 1820 to 1828, he wrote a defense of the fathers, which was regarded as exceedingly able and useful. In 1824 he was elected assistant book agent, and in 1828 he was elected book agent. With him originated the Publishing Fund and the change of the magazine into the Quarterly Review. For its first two years most of its original articles were from his pen. In 1832 he was elected bishop, and the appointment gave great satisfaction throughout the church. He was an able presiding officer, and was always on the alert to advance the interests of the church. He took an active part in the organization of the Wesleyan University and Dickinson College, and prepared a course of study for candidates for deacons' and elders' orders. After he was elected bishop he removed his family to Baltimore, and in the spring of 1834 placed them temporarily on a farm. On Wednesday, the 16th of December, 1835, he left home in a light carriage early in the morning. About two miles from his house he was found by a wagoner lying insensible and bleeding by the side of the road. He had either jumped or been thrown from the carriage while it was in rapid motion, and his skull was fractured by the fall. He was unconscious until about seven in the evening, when he expired. His remains were deposited beside those of the venerable Asbury in the vault under the pulpit. The degree of D.D. had been conferred upon him several years before his death. Bishop Emory was a man of unflinching integrity, of great strength of will, and of more than ordinary discretion. As a writer he was clear, forcible, and accurate, and as a presiding officer self-possessed and was elected Professor of Ancient Languages in Dickinson College. In 1839 he was admitted on trial in the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church. In 1842 he was appointed, in the absence of Dr. Durbin, acting president of Dickinson College, and in 1845, on the resignation of Dr. Durbin, he was elected president. In 1847 he was selected to attend the Evangelical Alliance at London. By systematic. His early death was a great loss to the church. Few ministers have equaled him in accuracy of scholarship, broad and comprehensive views, fertility of genius, and in administrative ability.

Emory, Robert, D.D., son of Bishop Emory, was born in Philadelphia, July 29, 1814. In 1827 he entered Columbia College, New York, and graduated in 1831 with the highest honors of his class. Like his father, he entered upon the study of law, first in Yale, and afterwards in the office of the Hon. Reverdy Johnson, of Baltimore. In 1834 he reason of failing health he spent the following winter in the West Indies, but his health continuing to decline, he returned, and died in Baltimore, May 18, 1848. Dr. Emory's classical scholarship was thorough and accurate, and his general culture wide and generous. As a preacher he was earnest and successful, and as a college president seldom surpassed. He was a clear and accurate writer, and his "History of the Discipline" was of great value to the church. He had projected several works, which he did not live to complete. His death, as might have been expected, was marked by composure and serenity. Having arranged his temporal concerns, he said, "And now something is due to God. My mind in all my deep affliction has been kept in peace; indeed, its complete serenity has been a matter of astonishment to myself." To his brethren of the Conference he frequently said, "Tell me not how a man dies, but how he lives."

Endsley, Andrew J., D.D., born in Alleghany Co., Md., Jan. 16, 1824, but brought up in Somerset Co., Pa., was converted in his eighteenth year, and was a leader, steward, trustee, exhorter, and local preacher for nine years. He was received into the Pittsburgh Conference in 1851, and spent his first two years on a circuit, and the remainder of his ministerial career—fifteen years in prominent stations, and nine years in the office of presiding elder. During this period he was ten years a member of the publishing committee of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate,—part of the time its chairman. He was two years member of the committee of control of Alleghany College, and was honored in 1871 by Mount Union College with the degree of Doctor of Divinity. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1868 and 1872.

England (pop. 21,487,688) is the most important division of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and contains an area of 50,922 square miles, or including Wales 58,320 square miles. Christianity was introduced into England as early as the second century, but during the Saxon invasion, A.D. 449, the chief part of Great Britain, except Wales, was thrown back into barbarism. In 596 it was visited by Augustine as a Christian missionary, and it is related that during his first year he baptized ten thousand converts. He was sent by the Roman pontiff, Gregory the Great, and under his influence, and that of his successors, the churches in England became subject to the authority of Rome. Although it had been independent prior to the sixth century, from this period there were occasional struggles between papal supremacy and ecclesiastical freedom until the sixteenth century. After the Norman conquest, William the Conqueror openly refused submission to the court of Rome, but at the accession of Henry VIII., in 1509, the supremacy of Rome was acknowledged by the English churches. During his reign the Reformation commenced in Europe, and was favored by him so far as it opposed the papal supremacy, and during this period several editions of the Bible were printed and circulated. The struggles which followed the reign of Henry VIII. until the establishment of Elizabeth on the throne are well known to the readers of history. Subsequently the churches sunk into apathy and spiritual inactivity, from which they were not aroused until nearly the middle of the eighteenth century, when the Methodist or Wesleyan movement commenced under the leadership of John and Charles Wesley, George Whitefield, and others. It was chiefly confined to the students of Oxford and a few localities, until about the year 1739, when the public mind became stirred by the powerful preaching of the early Methodists, in the open air, in chapels which they erected, and by the means of lay ministers who were raised up in various localities. (See METHODISM, WESLEYAN METHODISTS, and JOHN WESLEY.) From the time of Henry VIII. the king or queen of England was recognized as the head of the church, and notwithstanding the Reformation the Church of England has been a state church, its property having been furnished at public expense, and its ministers and public institutions supported chiefly by national funds, or by specific endowments given, from time to time, by pious individuals. The Church of England still embraces the largest part of the population, though other churches have rapidly increased. The Presbyterian Churches, though not strong in numbers, have considerable influence from the fact that the Church of Scotland is recognized as the state church in that part of the kingdom, and the Queen, when visiting in Scotland, frequently attends its services. The Congregationalists and Baptists are also quite numerous. The Methodists of England are divided into various bodies, of which the original or Wesleyan Methodists are much the strongest in numbers, institutions, and social position. The Primitive Methodists rank next in numbers and in ratio of increase, and are an earnest and devoted people, whose ministrations reach a large part of the masses. The other Methodist bodies—such as the New Connection, which was first separated from the Wesleyan Methodists on the point of church government, the United Methodist Free Churches, and the Wesleyan Reformed Union—have considerable numbers, but have not increased so rapidly as the Primitives. The census of 1861 and of 1871 give no information concerning the membership of the Church of England or other religious denominations, and hence only estimates can be made. The national church claims from twelve to seventeen millions, while the various non-conforming bodies claim a larger percentage of people than these statistics would give them. The number of Roman Catholics is variously estimated at from one to two millions. From England, as its centre, the Methodist movement has spread through all parts of the British empire, and has its chief strength among the English-speaking nationalities, its greatest number being in England and the United States, though by missionary effort it has spread into nearly all parts of the globe. The relative strength of the various Methodist bodies in England is given in the following table, although the numbers may not be entirely accurate, as it is difficult in some of the reports to distinguish the numbers in England alone from those in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales:

Enthusiasm (εὐθουσιασμός) is a term applied to mental excitement, manifesting itself in various ways. The priestesses of Apollo delivered their oracles in a state of great excitement, and their hearers believed it was caused by a divine influence. It is sometimes considered to be a divine impulse or impression, which for a time overpowers the reason and the outward senses; in this sense, prophets who spoke by the will of God were enthusiasts. Sometimes the term is applied to intense mental feeling, as when one speaks of the enthusiasm of poets, or of the enthusiasm of men of genius. It is more usually applied to mental excitement which exceeds the rules of propriety. Men are said to be enthusiasts who manifest feeling out of due proportion with the ordinary relations of life; who are ready to engage in enterprises without proper calculation or proper foresight; who expect results without the proper agencies; in this sense it is a species of insanity or of folly, applied generally to religious people and religious exercises. It signifies an imagination unduly excited, and which leads the mind astray in its conclusions. Instances of it are found in persons who fancy they have some special grace, some superior manifestations of the divine nature, and yet manifest improper tempers and perform unchristian actions. Others fancy that they are endowed with special gifts, as a power of working miracles, of healing the sick, and some have supposed they had the power of prophesying. Of the same class are those who fancy they receive particular communication or direction from God in the ordinary circumstances of life; who rely on visions, or dreams, or strong impressions, or sudden impulses; such persons injure the cause of evangelical religion very greatly without designing so to do. They have in their own fancy created a wrong standard, and many persons, discovering their error, attribute to religion their defects; unfortunately, such persons are found connected with almost every period of religious revival, and either by extravagancies in manner or in language, tend to weaken the confidence of the public mind, making profession with which their deportment does not harmonize, and claiming gifts or manifestations unwarranted by the word of God; they have wrong conceptions of what God has promised. As in the natural world, he is the author of temporal blessings and yet will not raise the harvest for us if we do not plant or sow and cultivate; so in the spiritual, while he is ready to answer prayer and while he is the author of every spiritual mercy, yet he will enlighten the judgment or communicate spiritual strength but by the use of our understanding, and the improvement of every opportunity for gaining knowledge and understanding the circumstances in which we are placed. He has given his word as the great directory of human conduct: he refers us to that word as our guide, and we are not at liberty to turn from that word and expect divine light without its careful study. Nor does God reveal his will directly since the volume of revelation has been closed. It is true the Spirit enlightens the human heart, it leads to a knowledge of the truth, but it is by bringing "all things to our remembrance whatsoever he hath spoken unto us." The word of God is the sword of the Spirit, "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life." They are enthusiasts who expect to understand truly the word of God without careful and diligent study, or who expect to be guided in the ordinary affairs of life by the Divine Spirit when they do not try to use their own understanding and all appropriate helps. The Anabaptists in Germany greatly troubled the work of the Reformation by claiming for themselves divine guidance and superior divine illumination. They wrought not only their own ruin, but vastly injured the progress of God's work. In Mr. Wesley's day, he was exceedingly annoyed by persons professing piety and yet running into wild extravagance, claiming that they were better than others, had power to discern spirits, received direct answers of prayer to guide them in the ordinary duties of life, were guided by impulses and impressions. He was obliged to disown George Bell and others (see GEORGE BELL), and at one time his societies in London were in very great peril. The same influences operated in each period of the church's history. When evangelical piety is active, as in this age, in labors for the benefit of man, it will almost inevitably be attended by enthusiastic manifestations. There will be some claiming for themselves what God has not promised to give. Methodism has thus not unfrequently been injured. In Western New York, where this spirit of enthusiasm prevailed some twenty years ago, the churches were divided, and they have scarcely yet recovered from the injuries inflicted by some who were really earnest and zealous Christians, but who were led astray; and by others who fancied they were designated of God as leaders of the people. Not unfrequently, at camp-meetings and in protracted meetings and in revival services, indications of the same character are manifested. There are some very good people who claim to be guided by impressions, and who profess to receive direct answers to prayer with regard to the practical duties of life. Such persons need to be admonished that while God has promised to hear and answer prayer, and while he does enlighten our judgment, and does guide the hearts of those who put their trust in him, he has not promised to give direct answers in the ordinary duties of life. He has given us reason to guide us, sources of information to enlighten us, and his Holy Spirit to, imperceptibly and unconsciously to us, incline our judgment. He has promised to answer our petitions and requests in all spiritual matters, and he has promised that his Spirit shall bear witness with ours that we are the children of God; but he has not promised any such spiritual communication or influence to answer our temporal requests. It is doubtless difficult to draw the line clearly and distinctly between true spiritual perception and enjoyment and that which is enthusiastic and fanatical. Many good people fearing lest they may discourage the ardent and the zealous, rather favor what may be tinged with enthusiasm; but it should be remembered that no error can help the cause of truth: that the cause of God needs no addition of human influence or power, but is always weakened and impaired by every mixture of defect or error. It is important on the one hand to cultivate true, earnest, zealous, scriptural piety, and on the other hand to repress everything which is contrary to the word of God, and is simply the result of excited and erring imaginations.

Entwisle, Joseph, Sr., under the constraining love of Christ, began to call sinners to repentance ere he was sixteen. He maintained an unblemished reputation, prosecuted his labors with exemplary diligence, and won the esteem and confidence of all who knew him. He was twice placed in the chair of the Conference by his brethren. In all the relations of life he adorned his Christian profession. His departure was sudden, in 1841.

Episcopacy, Methodist.—Episcopacy (ἐπίσκοπος, ἐπισκοπῆσις) is a form of church government in which officers are appointed to superintend a number of churches and ministers. Where this superintendency is confined to a specific district or territory, as in the Roman Catholic, the Church of England, and the Protestant Episcopal Church, it is called diocesan episcopacy. Where there is no limitation of districts, but the supervision is connected with the entire church, as in the Moravian, Methodist Episcopal, and Reformed Episcopal Churches, it is called a general episcopacy or superintendency.

Methodist episcopacy differs from the episcopacy in the Church of Rome, and in what is termed the High Church party of the Church of England and of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in that it does not claim that the order of bishops is instituted by direct divine appointment. The Church of Rome and the High Church party teach that the bishops are the successors of the apostles in the Christian church, and that the ordination has descended in an unbroken line from the apostles down to the present time, and an ordination can only properly be performed by bishops. What is termed the Low Church party in the Church of England and in the Protestant Episcopal Church does not maintain the theory of an unbroken apostolic succession, nor of the exclusive validity of episcopal orders. The Methodist Episcopal Churches believe that the episcopal form is a very ancient one,—that it grew up early in the Christian church as the best means of exercising a proper supervision over all parts of the church, and of uniting the church in all of its great movements and enterprises,—but that the form of church government is not contained in the New Testament, and is left to the judgment of the church in the different ages, and according to different circumstances. They believe that this form of episcopacy is nearer the apostolic model than that of the churches which claim apostolic succession. Their belief is that certain elders were chosen from the body of the presbyters to superintend the church, and for the sake of order to exercise certain functions, such as presiding in assemblies, ordaining, and performing such other duties as by the authority of the presbyters are devolved upon them. The bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church are elected by the General Conference, and are consecrated according to a special form, which was modified by Mr. Wesley from the ritual of the Church of England. Their functions and the limit of their authority are clearly set forth in the Book of Discipline, and they are amenable to the General Conference both for their official and moral conduct, and may be suspended or expelled, if it be deemed necessary. This form of episcopacy was recommended by Mr. Wesley at the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America. It is well known that in consequence of the Revolutionary War the ministers of the Church of England had generally left the country, and the Methodist societies, being unable to obtain the sacraments, were anxious to be supplied with ordained ministers. At the first Mr. Wesley urged the bishop of London to ordain preachers for America, but, failing in this, he advised an independent organization, and for this purpose ordained, assisted by other presbyters, Richard Whatcoat and Thomas Vasey as elders, and Thomas Coke, LL.D., a presbyter in the Church of England, as superintendent. This ordination was performed because, according to his view of the primitive episcopacy, bishops and presbyters were of the same order. This view was entertained by the ministers who met in conference or convention in 1784, and organized the Methodist Episcopal Church. And they provided, as is still the order of the church, that in case there should remain no bishop, either by death or otherwise, then the Conference should elect elders who should ordain a bishop elect. Mr. Wesley, in the earlier part of his ministry, had adopted the views of the High Church party in reference to episcopal succession, but by his subsequent reading and reflection he entirely changed his opinion. He says, "I still believe the episcopal form of church government to be scriptural and apostolical,—I mean well agreeing with the practice and writings of the apostles. But that it is prescribed in Scripture I do not believe. This opinion, which I once zealously espoused, I have been heartily ashamed of ever since I read Bishop Stillington's 'Irenicon.' I think he has unanswerably proved that neither Christ nor his apostles prescribed any particular form of church government, and that the plea of divine right for diocesan episcopacy was never heard of in the primitive church."

Mr. Wesley made several efforts to secure a personal successor to act as the general superintendent over his societies in England. Eighteen years before his death he began to feel deep concern for his societies in case of his death. He wrote to Mr. Fletcher, saying, "The wise men of the world say, 'When Mr. Wesley drops then all this is at an end,' and so surely it will be, unless before God calls him hence one is found to stand in his place. It is not good that supreme power should be lodged in many hands. Let there be one chief governor. I see more and more, unless there be one to preside over the rest, the work can never be carried on. The body of the preachers are not united, nor will any part of them submit to the rest, so that there must be one to preside over all, or the work will no doubt come to an end." He added, "Thou art the man. Come out in the name of God! Come to the help of the Lord against the mighty! Come while I am alive and capable of labor! Come while I am able, God assisting, to build you up in faith, to ripen your gifts, and to introduce you to the people! Nothing is of equal moment." But Fletcher, fearing the opposition that might come from Charles Wesley, and perhaps shrinking from the great responsibility, refused to become his personal successor.

During his life-time, Wesley had but one embarrassed opportunity of organizing a church according to his own idea, and in the language of Dr. Dixon it may be said, "If we mistake not, it is to the American Methodist Episcopal Church that we are to look for the real mind and sentiments of this great man." His sentiments are expressed in the diploma given to Dr. Coke, where he indicates his providential call to organize a Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, and still further, in the ritual which he sent by Dr. Coke for the services of the Methodists in the United States, which prescribes a form for ordaining superintendents, elders, and deacons. The terms superintendent and bishop have both been used in the church from the beginning, being regarded as synonymous.

The early minutes say, "Following the counsel of Mr. John Wesley, who recommended the episcopal mode of church government, we thought it best to become an episcopal church, making the episcopal office elective, and the elected superintendent or bishop amenable to the body of ministers and preachers."

In 1789 is the fuller statement: "In the year 1784 the Rev. John Wesley, who under God has been the father of the great revival in religion now extending over the earth by the means of the Methodists, determined at the intercession of multitudes of his spiritual children on this continent to ordain ministers for America, and for this purpose sent over three regularly-ordained clergy; but, preferring the episcopal mode of church government to any other, he solemnly set apart, by the imposition of his hands and prayer, one of them, namely, Thomas Coke, Doctor of Civil Law, late of Jesus College, in the University of Oxford, for the episcopal office; and having delivered to him letters of episcopal orders, commissioned and directed him to set apart Francis Asbury, then general assistant of the Methodist society in America, for the same episcopal office. He, the said Francis Asbury, being first ordained deacon and elder. In consequence of which the said Francis Asbury was solemnly set apart for the said episcopal office by prayer and the imposition of the hands of the said Thomas Coke, other regularly-ordained ministers assisting in the sacred ceremony. At which time the General Conference held at Baltimore did unanimously receive the said Thomas Coke and Francis Asbury as their bishops, being fully satisfied of the validity of their episcopal ordination."

Episcopal Address is a quadrennial statement made by the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Churches to the members of the General Conference, presenting a review of the condition of the church, and of what appears to the bishops as necessary for its advancement. The first episcopal address was made by Bishop McKendree to the first delegated General Conference in 1812. Prior to that time the bishops were members of the General Conference, and had equal rights with other members to make motions or take part in the debates; but in the delegated General Conference being restricted to the office of presiding, Bishop McKendree deemed it to be his duty to present to the Conference such matters as he thought necessary. Bishop Asbury appeared to be a little surprised, and intimated to Bishop McKendree in the presence of the Conference that it was a departure from his custom; but the latter pleasantly replied in substance that he could not expect his sons to be able fully to follow in his footsteps. The value of the suggestions made by Bishop McKendree was recognized, and ever since that period his precedent has been followed. The address presents a brief summary of the progress of the church during the preceding four years, the condition of the various departments of publication, missionary effort, Sunday-schools and education, and makes such suggestions to the General Conference, as to disciplinary changes, as to the bishops appear necessary from the condition of the administration or the growth of the church. In this respect it somewhat resembles the message expected from the President, or from the governors of the various States, addressed to the congressional or legislative bodies. The various topics contained in these addresses are usually referred to appropriate committees for proper consideration.

Episcopal Fund is the term given to the amount collected in the Methodist Episcopal Church for the support of the bishops, their widows and orphans. In the early history of the church no definite plan was assigned for the support of the bishops. Bishop Asbury being a single man and spending nearly all his time in traveling, had no expense for a residence, and out of his early salary of only $80 he supported himself, and for several years aided in the support of his aged mother. Dr. Coke, who visited the United States only occasionally, enjoyed a handsome income, and bore his own expenses, and contributed largely to aid all church enterprises. The amount which Bishop Asbury needed was furnished by friends from time to time. He kept a strict account of what he received, and devoted all the surplus means to aid the preachers on the frontier.

When Bishop Whatcoat was elected in 1800, the support of the bishops was directed to be divided among the Annual Conferences. After some years the bishops were directed to draw their traveling expenses from the Book Concern. In 1852 the support of the bishops was devolved upon the Book Concern, from which they drew their allowances quarterly. This remained the law of the church for twenty years. In 1872 the General Conference directed that a collection should be taken up for the support of the bishops, and paid to the agents of the Book Concern, on whom the bishops drew for their allowances, the book concern paying whatever was deficient in the collection. In 1876 it was ordered that the book committee should estimate the amount necessary for the support of the bishops, their widows and orphans, that the same should be apportioned to the several Conferences and churches; and the book agents at New York and Cincinnati were directed to loan to the Episcopal Fund such sums over and above those collections as would meet the drafts of the bishops for salary and traveling expenses, and for widows and orphans of deceased bishops, from the 1st of January, 1876, to the 1st of January, 1877, after which time no money should be loaned except for house-rent and traveling expenses, and which sums should be returned to the Book Concern as soon as collected for the Episcopal Fund, so that no provision is made for the allowances made to the bishops except by the collections made from the different churches.

Epworth Church.—The engraving on the opposite page represents the church at Epworth, county of Lincoln, England, of which Samuel Wesley, the father of John Wesley, was the rector from about 1696 to his death, in 1735. In this church John Wesley assisted his father, serving as his curate. One of his first sermons in the church was preached Jan. 11, 1726, at a funeral service for one of the parishioners. After his father died the living passed into other hands, and, after Mr. Wesley had returned from Georgia and had commenced his earnest ministrations, he visited Epworth, and, being refused the use of the church by the rector, he stood upon his father's tombstone, which was at the side of the church, and preached in the open air to an immense audience.

Epworth Seminary is situated at Epworth, Iowa, 19 miles west from Dubuque, on the Illinois Central Railroad. It was founded in 1856, and the school opened in the fall of 1857. The first principal was Rev. J. Pollock, who conducted the institution for two years, when Rev. R. W. Keeler assumed control, and retained it till 1864, when it was sold under a mortgage, passing into the hands of the Presbyterians. It was conducted by Mr. Jewett till 1870, when it again, after passing through one or two hands, became the property of the M. E. Church, who placed Rev. J. W. Rigby in charge as principal. Mr. Rigby laid the foundations of a good school, when ill health compelled him to resign. His successor was Rev. Adam Holm, the present incumbent, who is now entering on his fifth year as principal of the school. The property is worth $4000 to $5000. No endowment. Average number of students, 60.

Erie, Pa. (pop. 19,646), the capital of Erie County, situated on Lake Erie, about midway between Cleveland, O., and Buffalo, N. Y. It is an important railroad centre. Its military history is full of interest, the most important event of which was the building and equipping at this place of Commodore Perry's fleet during the war of 1812-15. The Erie circuit was one of the first organized in this part of the State. The first Methodist church erected within the bounds of the Erie Conference was built at West Springfield, Erie Co., Pa., some time before 1810. The Erie circuit then was two hundred miles in extent and had twenty-three appointments, and only one church edifice, the one above referred to, and it was "built with round logs covered with clapboards." On the 10th of June, 1817, J. B. Finley began a camp-meeting fourteen miles below Erie, which did much for the establishment of Methodism in all that region. The

In 1844 Akron was included within its bounds. But little other changes were made until 1876, when all that part of the State of Ohio included within its limits was separated and placed in the East Ohio Conference. The boundaries are at present as follows: "On the

In 1835 it reported 68 members. In 1838 a frame church was erected on the lot secured in 1826. It was 32 by 45 feet, costing $300, and was dedicated by Homer J. Clark, Jan. 1, 1839. From that time Methodism has continued to advance gradually in this city. It is in the Erie Conference, and reports as follows:

Erie Conference M. E. Church.—The territory contained in this Conference was originally a part of the Baltimore Conference, and when the Pittsburgh Conference was organized, in 1824, was contained within its territory. It was organized as a separate Conference in 1836, with the following boundaries: "On the north by Lake Erie, on the east by a line commencing at the mouth of Cattaraugus Creek; thence to the Alleghany River at the mouth of Tunungwant Creek; thence up said creek eastward to the ridge dividing between the waters of Clarion and Sinnemahoning Creeks; thence east to the head of Mahoning Creek; thence down said creek to the Alleghany River; thence across the said north by Lake Erie, on the east by a line commencing at the mouth of the Cattaraugus; thence up said creek to the village of Gowanda, leaving said village in the Western New York Conference; thence to the Alleghany River at the mouth of the Tunungwant Creek; thence up said creek southward to the ridge dividing between the waters of Clarion and Sinnemahoning Creeks; thence southward to the head of the Mahoning Creek; thence down the said creek exclusive of the Milton society, but including the Finley society in the Punxutawney circuit, and Putneyville in the Bethlehem circuit, to the Alleghany River; thence across said river in a northwesterly direction to the Western Reserve line, including Wampum and Petersburg; thence along the said line to the place of beginning, including Orangeville and the State line appointments on the Jamestown circuit." The first session of the Erie Conference was held in 1836, and reported 16,248 members, with 111 traveling preachers. Before the separation of the Ohio portion it reported 309 traveling and 279 local preachers, 40,343 members and 41,464 Sunday-school scholars, 478 churches, valued at $2,248,050, and 181 parsonages, valued at $305,156. In its new and contracted boundaries it reported, in 1876, 205 traveling and 181 local preachers, 29,637 members and 29,297 Sunday-school scholars, 325 churches, valued at $1,222,200, and 121 parsonages, valued at $198,375.

Eskridge, Vernon, of the Virginia Conference, was born Oct. 26, 1803, in Westmoreland Co., Va. In 1820 he united with the M. E. Church, and was shortly after appointed the leader of a class. In 1823 he established prayer-meetings, and received license to exhort. In 1827 he obtained license to preach, and labored in various appointments with considerable success until his failing health rendered him unable to fulfill the regular work of the ministry. Desiring to be active, however, he obtained, in 1851, an appointment as chaplain in the navy, and in a short time some fifteen or twenty of the men professed faith in Christ and established a religious society on board his ship, the frigate Cumberland, which was then cruising in the Mediterranean. After an absence of three years he returned, and died in Portsmouth, of yellow fever, Sept. 11, 1855. He took a deep interest in the cause of education, and through his influence in a great measure the Virginia Collegiate Institute was established in 1851.

Etheridge, John Wesley, A.M., Ph.D., was born in the Isle of Wight, Feb. 24, 1804, and died at Camborne, May 24, 1866. He professed conversion and united with the church at the age of sixteen. In 1824 his name appeared on the preachers' plan for the Isle of Wight, and in 1827 he was appointed to Hull circuit. His ministry was full of promise, but after eleven years of labor he was compelled by affliction to become a supernumerary. In 1846, his health recovering, for twenty years he discharged with conscientious fidelity his official duties. Early in life he evinced a strong love for the study of languages, and amid all his ministerial work he was a close student. He read both Hebrew and Syriac with remarkable facility. His mind was well stored with knowledge, and he was endowed with correct and elegant taste. He was an eminently holy man. His only regret, uttered with meek humility just before leaving the world, was that his "Life of Fletcher," which he had written amidst much weakness and suffering, was not more worthy of the subject and better calculated to be useful. He published a "Life of Dr. Adam Clarke," a "Life of Dr. Coke," and a "Life of Rev. John Fletcher;" also, "The Syrian Churches: their Early History, Liturgies, and Literature;" "The Apostolical Epistles from the Peshito," with the remaining epistles and the revelation after a later Syrian text; "Hore Aramaicæ," being essays on the Shemitic, Aramaic, and Syrian languages; "Jerusalem and Tiberias;" "The Targums of Onkelos;" and "Jonathan ben-Uzziel."

Eufaula, Ala. (pop. 3185), is a beautiful town situated on the Chattahoochee River, at the headwaters of navigation, and is the principal shipping-point for an extensive region of country. It was very early visited by the pioneer Methodist preacher. As early as 1823, John I. Triggs and John Slade were appointed missionaries from the South Carolina Conference to the Chattahoochee region. This town, however, is not mentioned in the annals of the M. E. Church until 1843, and then as connected with Glenville, with Thomas H. P. Scales as pastor. He reported, in 1844, 502 members. The M. E. Church has a small society of about 130 members, but no church. The Church South has 275 members. The African M. E. Church has 335 members, 150 Sunday-school scholars, and $4000 church property.

Europe (pop. 301,605,227) is the smallest, but also the most enlightened and enterprising quarter of the globe. Its superficial area is estimated at about 3,814,600 square miles. In proportion to its area it is more populous than any other quarter of the globe. It is eminently a Christian country, as it is estimated that nearly three-fourths of the entire Christian population of the globe live within its boundaries. It is divided into three empires, Germany, Austria, and Prussia; and one sultanate, Turkey; ten kingdoms, two principalities, and five republics; though two of these republics and the two principalities are so small they are seldom counted among the sovereign states. In language, it is divided into three principal groups, the Germanic embracing about 31.2 per cent.; the Greco-Romanic, about 32.3 per cent.; and the Slavonic, about 27.3 per cent. of the population, with a number of smaller divisions, such as the Celts, Basques, Turks, Finns, etc. In religion, the entire population is nominally Christian, with the exception of about 5,000,000 Jews, 6,800,000 Mohammedans, and 500,000 pagans. The Christian population is separated into three main divisions, the Roman, the Greek, and the Protestant Churches. Among these the Roman Church is estimated at 147,000,000, or nearly one-half, the Greek Church at about 69,000,000, and the Protestant from 70,000,000 to 75,000,000.

Methodism commenced in England in 1739, and in point of numbers, position, and influence, is second only to the national church. It has spread into Scotland, Ireland, and the adjacent isles, but its numbers in these countries is comparatively small. About the beginning of the century it was introduced into France, where its progress has been very slow. Within the last forty years it has spread into Germany and Switzerland, where a Conference has been established; into Norway and Sweden, in each of which is a Conference; and into Denmark and Italy. A mission was established in 1857 in Bulgaria, but comparatively little has been accomplished, and the war between Russia and Turkey has completely interrupted all missionary effort. In Russia, Austria, Turkey proper, Greece, Spain, Portugal, and Belgium, no progress, except the organization of a few societies, has been made. The Roman Catholic countries have been so intolerant it has been almost impossible to procure admittance. Only within the last few years has the way been opened in Italy. Religious publications are now issued from the Methodist press not only in the English language, but in German, Danish, Swedish, French, Spanish, Italian, and Bulgarian. Its future must depend largely on the prevalence of liberal ideas and religious toleration.

Evangelical Association is a religious denomination confined chiefly to the United States. It is generally classed under Methodist bodies, for the reason, perhaps, that Rev. Jacob Albright, its founder, was a Methodist, and that its doctrines, usages, and government are similar to those of the Methodists. It originated in Eastern Pennsylvania, when, about 1790, Mr. Albright felt himself called to endeavor to work a religious reform among the German population of that region. He had no thought at first of organizing a denomination, but he was so successful, and his little societies were so multiplied, that at a general meeting called to consider what should be done, Mr. Albright was unanimously elected and ordained by the preachers as their general superintendent or bishop. The epochal year of this church is 1800. They have the same Conferences or Conventions as the M. E. Church, with similar powers. Their bishops are elected every four years by the General Conference, and their presiding elders are elected every four years by the Annual Conference. They have a flourishing college at Plainfield, Ill., and several seminaries. The publishing house is located at Cleveland, O., from which issue four respectable periodicals, two in German and two in English. It has 4 bishops, 15 Annual Conferences, 835 itinerant and 503 local preachers, 95,258 members, 1233 churches, valued at $2,935,000, 322 parsonages, valued at $384,049, 1502 Sunday-schools, and 80,000 Sunday-school scholars.

Evangelists were a class of religious teachers spoken of in the New Testament. The term as applied therein seems to indicate that these teachers were not fixed to any particular charge. Their more modern designation, considering the true nature of their office, would be missionaries, and they might operate in the home or foreign field at pleasure. They do not seem to have been intended to be a permanent class of religious teachers. Methodism has never employed such a title to any considerable extent to distinguish any class of its religious teachers; an exception, perhaps, may be made in reference to the American Wesleyans. They were disposed to speak of their ministers as evangelists. The term, however, was never generally applied even in that denomination. As now used, it indicates a class of religious teachers who visit from place to place to conduct revival meetings, without being specially responsible for their work to any ecclesiastical body.

Evans, J. G., A.M., president of Hedding College, was born in Marshall Co., Ill., Dec. 19, 1833, and was converted and joined the church in December, 1849. He attended the Peoria Wesleyan Seminary, Judson College, and the Ohio Wesleyan University, but before graduation, by the advice of friends, entered the Rock River Conference, in 1854. In the division of the Conference he fell into that part which is now Central Illinois, and of which he has remained a member. He received in 1870 the degree of A.M. from Quincy, now Chaddock College. In 1872 he was elected to the presidency of Hedding College, in which position he remains. He has been for several years the secretary of his Conference, and was a member of the General Conference in 1876. He has published a number of sermons preached on special occasions.

REV. J. G. EVANS, A.M.

Evans, Hon. John, ex-governor of Colorado, is a native of Ohio. He pursued the study of medicine, and graduated in Philadelphia; settled in Indiana, and after practicing a few years became director of the Insane Asylum in Indianapolis. Subsequently he accepted the chair of professor in a medical college in Indiana, and shortly afterwards in Chicago, where he became joint editor of the leading medical journal. He was active in founding the Northwestern University, which was located north of Chicago, and from him the village was called Evanston. He was appointed by President Lincoln governor of Colorado, and has since that time been actively engaged in railroad interests, having been president of the Denver and Pacific Road, and is now engaged in constructing a road from Denver to the mountains. He united with the M. E. Church in 1843, has filled various official positions, and was elected lay delegate to the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876.

Evans, William B., was born in Lancaster Co., Pa., March 18, 1794, and died near Ridgeville, O., March 10, 1873. His father had served in the Revolutionary War, and he served a term of six months in the war of 1812. Shortly afterwards he was converted, and soon felt it his duty to preach, and, though oppressed for a time with doubts as to his qualifications, he became a zealous and successful preacher, spending more than half a century in the ministry. At a very early period in the reform movement he identified himself with it, and attended, in 1828, the Convention in Baltimore which organized the associated Methodist Churches. Upon his return he entered the regular ministry, and was active in organizing churches and circuits under the conventional articles. He was also present and took part in organizing the first Annual Conference of the new denomination for the West, at Cincinnati, Oct. 15, 1829. In his preaching he was earnest, and was identified with many revivals. During one year he took four hundred members into the church. Everywhere he won the affections of the people, and commanded the respect of those without. He was a man of earnest faith and power in prayer, and many were brought into the church through his instrumentality. In his declining years he was uniformly patient, contented, and happy, and joyfully looked forward to his release. During the reform controversy he wrote a pamphlet entitled "A Brief View of the Government of the Methodist Episcopal Church, set forth in Questions and Answers," of which a large number of copies were printed and circulated.

Evansville, Ind. (pop. 21,830), the capital of Vanderburg County, on the Ohio River, and also on the Evansville and Crawfordsville Railroad. It was laid out in 1817 by Mr. Robert M. Evans. Many relics have been discovered indicating that here was an early French settlement. The city is beautifully located. This place was very early visited by the pioneers of Methodism, who crossed the river from Kentucky. It is first mentioned by name in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1838, when John S. Bayless was appointed to Evansville. He reported for "Evansville station" 160 members. From that time the church has greatly prospered. The German Methodists and the African M. E. Church are both well represented here. It is in the Indiana Conference, and reports as follows:

Everett, James, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, and the first president of the body, was born at Alnwick, on May 16, 1784. On Mr. Wesley's last visit to Alnwick, James Everett, then a scholar in the Wesleyan Sunday-school, heard him, and in later years he often adverted with pleasure to the fact that the founder of Methodism had laid his hands upon his head. When nineteen years of age he found the Saviour, and joined the Wesleyan society. He entered the itinerancy in 1807, and for many years he labored, with occasional interruptions through a tendency to bronchitis, as a circuit minister, enjoying a large measure of popularity.

In 1849 he was severed from the Wesleyan ministry for refusing to answer a question propounded by the Conference as to the authorship of the famous "Fly Sheets." In the agitation which followed he co-operated zealously with the Wesleyan Reformers. When the amalgamation took place, in 1857, with the Wesleyan Methodist Association, Mr. Everett was elected president by a large majority. While strength permitted he continued to preach, but the last few years of his life were spent "in age and feebleness extreme." He died on May 10, 1872.

As a preacher he was able and eloquent, sound in doctrine and evangelical in tone. In his discourses he often relieved his graver manner by touches of quaintness or humor, for which his love of the Puritan writers would account. On the platform Mr. Everett was persuasive and stimulating in his palmy days. Especially on the mission question was he "a host in himself."

The forte of James Everett was literature. His literary taste was exquisite, and his literary productions voluminous. He was greatest in biography. His "Lives of Adam Clarke and Daniel Isaac" show something of Boswell's habits as well as Boswell's skill. Besides these biographies he published many others, the most popular of which is the "Life of Samuel Hick" (the Village Blacksmith), now in its twenty-sixth edition.

The copyright of the greater number of Mr. Everett's biographical works was presented by him to the Free Methodist Book Room, which has brought out new editions of them. A memoir has been published by Rev. R. Chase.

Everett, Joseph, of the Philadelphia Conference, was born in Queen Anne Co., Md., June 17, 1732. He was awakened at the time of one of Mr. Whitefield's tours through the country, and united in 1763 with the Presbyterian Church; but under the excitement of the times he declined in his religious experience. In 1778, after having been in the Revolutionary army, he heard Francis Asbury at Dr. White's, in Maryland, and becoming deeply stirred, he subsequently united with the Methodist society. In 1780 he commenced traveling on the Dorchester circuit, and the following year was admitted on trial in the Conference, from which time he continued to fill important appointments, being among the number of the most active presiding elders, until, in 1805, his name appears among the superannuated preachers. He was a remarkably useful minister, and was distinguished for "the boldness, the pointedness, plainness, and energy with which he rebuked sin and warned the sinner of his danger. Great was the success which attended his faithful admonition, for wherever he went he was like a flame of fire burning conviction into the understanding and heart of the ungodly, and at the same time pointing the penitent to the blood of the Lamb for pardon and salvation." His last illness was protracted, but his dying scene was remarkable. "On the night of his death, about twelve o'clock, he awoke from a gentle slumber, and immediately his devout spirit seemed overwhelmed with ecstasy, and with exclamations of praise and adoration, he shouted, 'Glory! glory! glory!' for about twenty-five minutes, and then ceased to shout, and ceased to breathe the same moment." He died at Cambridge, Md., on the 16th of October, 1809.

Examining Committees are committees chosen by the Annual Conferences, or appointed by the bishops, at the request of the Conferences, to examine candidates for admission on trial, as well as on the four years' course of study, and also to examine candidates for deacons' or elders' orders. The course of study is prescribed by the bishops (see COURSE OF STUDY), under the direction of the General Conference, and the candidates are required to give satisfactory evidence of their knowledge of the various subjects. These committees are appointed the previous year, at the close of Conference, and usually they assemble the day before the regular meeting of the Conference, and after examining the classes, make report to the Conference when the names of the candidates are called. In the M. E. Church South the examining committee, with which the class begins, continues to conduct the examination through the four years' course of study. This is practiced by some of the Annual Conferences in the M. E. Church, but there is no uniform rule, and in the majority of cases new committees are appointed for each year.

Excommunication is the judicial exclusion of offenders from the religious privileges of a particular denomination to which they had belonged. It is a power necessary for the protection of religious societies, and being confined to separation from its membership and privileges, has in it no element of punishment. Anciently among the Jews excommunication deprived the person of many social enjoyments, and sometimes brought with it severe penalties. It is authorized by our Saviour when he says, "If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church: but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican. Verily, I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." In harmony with this direction of the Saviour the apostles exercised their authority in the churches, and St. Paul directs, "If any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed. Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother." And to Titus he says, "A man that is an heretic after the first and second admonition reject." The church simply withdraws its association from persons who either teach contrary to its doctrines, or who violate the moral code or its order of government. As the church became connected with the state, excommunication involved also civil penalties, and the church delivered those whom they deemed incorrigible to the civil power, who put many of them to death. In the Methodist Episcopal Church no one can be excommunicated until after trial before a jury of his peers, and after having had the privilege of an appeal to a higher court. After due penitence and reformation the excommunicated person may be restored.

Exhortation is a form of direct address urging an individual to the performance of some duty, or deterring him from pursuing a course of wrong. It differs from persuasion, in that it is addressed more to the affections than to the intellect. It is a branch of preaching: for men need not only instruction but to be aroused to a sense of duty. Among the early Methodist preachers exhortation was an important branch of their work, and very generally when two ministers were present, at the close of the sermon by one, an exhortation was made by the other. A class of persons are specified as exhorters, but exhortation in the Methodist Churches is by no means confined to them.

Exhorter is a term applied to a lay officer in the Methodist Churches, who is constituted by the recommendation of the class of which he is a member, or of the leaders' and stewards' meeting of the circuit or station. He must have a license signed by the preacher in charge. The duties and privileges of an exhorter are to hold meetings for prayer and exhortation whenever an opportunity is afforded, subject to the direction of the preacher in charge: to attend all the sessions of the Quarterly Conference and the District Conference, and to be subject to an annual examination of character in the Quarterly or District Conference, and the renewal of license annually by the presiding elder or preacher having charge, if approved by the Quarterly Conference. This office has existed in the church almost from the beginning of Methodism. In the British Conference of 1746 the following direction was given: "Let none exhort in any of our societies without a note of recommendation from the assistant. Let every exhorter see that this be renewed yearly. Let every assistant rigorously insist upon this." And in 1770 we find this record: "That each assistant may know the exhorters in his circuit let each give his successor a list of them."

At the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1784, this office was recognized, and the same regulations continued. In the earlier history of the church this office was found to be very useful, both in the edification of the church and in developing the talents of persons likely to be called to the ministry. Where there was a scarcity of ministers the exhorter often did important service, and even now, in cities as well as in the more rural parts of the church, he is still useful. Many who are not qualified to preach may do important service in the way of exhortation. It also furnishes a sort of probation to the ministry, by preparing the way for the more efficient discharge of its functions. The gift of exhortation should be encouraged in the church as well as the gift of prayer.

Experience is a word oftentimes applied to denote the religious condition through which a Christian passes, and men are said to tell their experience when they relate the events connected with their awakening, conversion, and increase of religious faith.

Experience Meetings are meetings expressly appointed for the relation of Christian experience, wherein, after opening with singing and prayer, all Christians, male or female, old or young, have liberty to speak of the religious experiences through which they have passed or may be passing. One form of these experience meetings is the love-feast, another is the class-meeting, but the term is more generally applied to the more public meetings which occur without regular order. Sometimes they are called covenant or conference meetings. They appear to have been held in times of old, for it is said, "Then they that feared the Lord spake often to each other."

F.

Faber, Henry A., was born in Hasted, Bremen, Germany, 1842; emigrated to this country in 1856, and has resided in Cincinnati, O., since. He was admitted to the bar in 1869, and practiced law for several years, and was connected for three years with the Western Methodist Book Concern. He was early converted, his parents being among the first Methodist converts in Bremen. He has held various church positions, and was president of the Aurora Fire Insurance Company of Cincinnati for several years, largely managed by the German Methodists, and is now president of the Queen City Commercial College. He represented the Central German Conference at the General Conference of 1872.

Fagg, Hon. T. J. C., was born in Albemarle Co., Va., June 15, 1822, and removed to Pike Co., Mo., in 1856. He became a member of the M. E. Church South in 1856, and in 1862 he and other members united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. He studied law, and commenced to practice in 1845. Twice he was a member of the legislature. He was judge of the third judicial district of Missouri for seven years, and for three years associate justice of the Supreme Court of the State. During the Civil War he was colonel of the 5th Regiment of the Federal State troops. He was delegate to the General Conference of 1876 for the Missouri Conference.

Fairbank, Ira, was born in 1786, and died in Yates Co., N. Y., May 31, 1857. His parents were members of the church, and he professed conversion before he had reached his tenth year. He was received on trial by the Genesee Conference in 1811, and was ordained by Bishop Asbury. For the thirty years of his ministerial life he desisted from the regular work only six months. "He was prompt, diligent, systematic, laborious, and successful." He was a man of deep piety, loved the church, and was true to all her interests.

Fairchild, Wm., was born in Greene Co., N. Y., in 1811, and has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church nearly half a century. He has been largely engaged in mercantile life, first at Cincinnati, and now at Leavenworth City, Kan., where he resides. He was a lay delegate from the Kansas Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Faith, in its simplest form, is an assent to the truth of what we learn upon the testimony of others, and is specially applied to that realm which lies beyond our own intuitions and reason and the objects of our senses. Christian faith not only embraces this general idea, but it adds a personal trust in Christ's promises, presence, and power, which gives implicit confidence in him as a personal Saviour, and thus realizes the benefits of his redemption. Christian faith, in its character of simple assent, may be exercised by the intellect without any special work of grace upon the heart: for a man may believe the facts in the life of Christ, and the declarations which he made, in the same way in which he may believe the facts in the life of Socrates and the truth of many of his utterances; but no man, without the assistance of the Divine Spirit, is able to trust in Christ as his personal Saviour, so as to realize the fulfillment of his promises in the work of salvation on the human soul. The Methodist Church teaches that the grace of God touches every human heart, leading it to serious thought,—that under the influence of this grace man discerns his relations and responsibility to God, feels to some extent the force of his obligations, discerns the purity and holiness of the divine law, and finds himself exposed to its threatenings and penalties. If he yields to the influence of this grace he will have true sorrow for sin, will behold its enormity and exceeding sinfulness, and will repent sincerely and heartily. Under this state of penitence he turns to the exhibition of love in the incarnation, sufferings, and death of the Lord Jesus Christ, yields to the invitation to look unto him; feeling his own helplessness, and his utter inability to save himself, he trusts in Christ as his Saviour. This is the exercise of true faith. It follows repentance,—it precedes justification. This is especially so in the order of thought, for, while repentance and faith are conditions of salvation, the moment a man believes with all his heart he is justified by faith,—he is regenerated by the Divine Spirit. Methodism rejects the Calvinistic view that, in the order of salvation, regeneration is the first divine act, and that from that regeneration follows, first, faith, and then repentance. This theory is based upon the assumption that God gives his Holy Spirit only to the elect whom he chooses to save, and whom he creates anew by his own divine power, without any consent or co-operation upon their part; that this regeneration having taken place, man then exercises faith in Christ, and, in the exercise of that faith, repents of his sins and turns to a life of holiness. This view logically follows from a belief in the doctrine of predestination,—for to the non-elect no efficacious grace is given, and without this grace it is impossible for man to turn to God. But Methodism, rejecting the doctrine of election and reprobation, and believing that Christ died for every man, and that the grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men, every individual is placed by th's divine influence in a state of possible salvation. This power having been imparted, and the human will being free, man may yield to the invitation and to the work of the Holy Spirit, and become a child of God by repentance towards God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ: or he may refuse to yield, and he may grieve the Holy Spirit, whereby he would have been sealed until the day of redemption. While faith thus follows repentance, and precedes regeneration, yet the exercise of that faith continues to be the condition on which the gospel promises are realized, and the Christian is emphatically termed a believer, in that the mind remains in a condition of believing all the great truths of the gospel, and in personally trusting in Christ for light, comfort, consolation, and guidance all along the journey of life. Thus the realization of all the divine promises rests on faith, and to the believer Christ is made wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. Faith is the instrumentality by which victory over sin is obtained, power to resist the tempter, and a full trust in the atoning merits of Christ in all its cleansing efficacy. The true Christian lives by faith from day to day, and it is by faith he will triumph in the dying hour.

Fall of Man, The, is a phrase used by theologians to denote the act of disobedience towards God of our first parents, and the consequences of sin and misery which have been entailed upon their posterity. The scriptural account of the events in the garden of Eden is well known, involving the command, the temptation, the disobedience, and the ejection from Paradise. The effects of that fall are everywhere seen in a depraved human nature, which manifests itself in early childhood, and affects men in all lands and under all circumstances. In consequence of it men are born in sin and exposed to wrath; not that they are guilty of Adam's sin, nor that they are to be punished for his transgression. As their depraved nature comes not of their choice, so a Saviour is freely given, who proffers to save them from that corruption, and to take away every stain. If we are condemned, it will be, not for having inherited a corrupt nature, but for having refused the offers of salvation through Jesus Christ. (See DEPRAVITY and ORIGINAL SIN.)

Fall River, Mass. (pop. 26,766), on Narragansett Bay, derives its name from the river at the mouth of which it is situated. Its excellent facilities for water-power have caused the erection of large manufacturing. It was formerly known as Troy, but in 1834 the name was changed to Fall River. This region was included in the original Warren circuit of Rhode Island, organized in 1793, but the earliest record of Methodist services was in 1824, when Rev. E. Blake, pastor of Somerset, preached once in two weeks. In 1825 a class of twelve members was formed, and in 1827 the place was favored with a revival, which increased the society. The meetings were held in a school-house at the corner of Ananwan and South Main Streets. In 1827 it became a station, with Rev. E. T. Taylor (Father Taylor) as pastor, and the first church edifice was built and dedicated Dec. 25, 1827. The church grew with the rapid growth of the place until 1845, when, in the great fire, the church edifice was burned, many of the members lost their property, and worship was conducted in a hall near the present site of the church. Under the pastorate of Thomas Ely a larger house was commenced, and dedicated April 3, 1844, the membership at that time being over three hundred. In 1849 the second church was organized; land was purchased on Bank Street, and a new house of worship commenced, which was dedicated Nov. 10, 1852, by Dr. Wise. The North church was built in 1857 or 1858, and the Brayton church followed. The Quarry church was dedicated Sept. 28, 1870, and the Terry Street church, June 24, 1875. A Primitive Methodist church has also been erected, and is in a flourishing condition. In the mean time the First church, which is the mother of the six churches besides the Primitive, still exists, vigorous and full of energy. The statistics of 1876 are as follows:

Date.	Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
1827	First Church.....	294	301	$59,500
1852	St. Paul's.....	374	500	32,000
1857	North Church.....	64	81	3,500
	Brayton.....	84	225	7,000

Family Prayer was regarded by Mr. Wesley as of very great importance, hence he made it the duty of all those who would continue in fellowship with him to observe this practice, and thus show their desire for salvation. He made it the duty of his preachers in their pastoral visitation not only to inquire if the family observed this duty, but never to leave a family without praying with them whenever at all practicable. Wesley often deplored the absence of family religion, and believed this to be one of the causes why the church did not progress more rapidly. It was almost the invariable custom of the early pioneer Methodist preachers to pray with the family with whom they lodged, whether in a private or public house, and very often these services were the beginnings of a church organization in those communities. A judicious observance of this duty, as well as other parts of family religion, will be of moral and religious benefit to the family, to the church, and to the state.

Fancher, Hon. Enoch L., LL.D., is a distinguished attorney and jurist of New York City, and a member of St. Paul's M. E. church. For many years he has been an active member of the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society, and has served as counsel for both the Missionary Society and for the Methodist Book Room. He was elected as a reserve delegate to the General Conference of 1876, and was appointed as one of the Fraternal Commissioners who subsequently met at Cape May. He has contributed a number of articles to the church periodicals.

Faribault, Minn. (pop. 3045), the capital of Rice County, situated on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, has had a very rapid growth. Here are located the State Deaf and Dumb Asylum and Protestant Episcopal College. Methodism was introduced here in 1855 by Rev. T. M. Kirkpatrick. In 1856 the city for the first time appears in the minutes, with G. H. Jennison as pastor, who, in 1857, reported 26 members, but no Sunday-school scholars or church property. The first church was erected in 1859, and was rebuilt in 1876. There are also a few Free Methodists, and the Germans have a small society. It is in the Minnesota Conference, and reports 147 members, 125 Sunday-school scholars, and $9000 church property. The German M. E. Church reports 30 members, 80 Sunday-school scholars, and $8000 church property.

Farmer, Thomas, Esq., was for many years one of the treasurers of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in England; he possessed many excellences which rendered his co-operation of the highest value. Firm in his attachments, diligent in business, gentle in manners, and munificent in his contributions, his death was felt to be a public loss; but his work was done, and the Master said, "Well done; come up hither." He died in 1861.

Farrar, John.—Entered the work in 1822; was four years a master at Woodhouse Grove School, England; then in the active ministry in some of the best circuits until 1839, when he became governor of Abney House Institution for four years; then classical tutor at Richmond for fourteen years, after which he was governor at Woodhouse Grove ten years; in 1868 he became governor of Headingly College. To the sorrow of all he this year (1877) retires from active duty. He was president of the Conference in 1854 and 1870. Mr. Farrar still retains that wisdom in council, urbanity of manner, and devotion of a pure life to the cause of Christ which are the chief ornaments of a long and useful career.

Fasting or Abstinence was practiced in the early Christian church as a means of self-denial. In the Roman Catholic and Greek Churches fasts are kept with great severity. In Protestant churches fasting is not made a term of membership, but is generally recommended as a Christian duty. Mr. Wesley observed the weekly fasts prescribed by the Church of England, and recommended them to all the preachers and members of his societies. In the General Rules, fasting or abstinence is placed among the ordinances of God which are to be observed by all as an evidence of their desire of salvation. Among the duties of a preacher in charge, as prescribed in the Discipline, p. 176, s. 10, is, "He shall take care that a fast be held in every society in his circuit on the Friday preceding every quarterly meeting, and that a memorandum of it be entered on all the class papers." Among the instituted means of grace to which the attention of preachers is particularly directed, we find, p. 119, s. 4, "Fasting: Do you use as much abstinence and fasting every week as your health, strength, and labor will permit?" And among the questions propounded to every minister, prior to his being received into full connection, is: "Will you recommend fasting or abstinence both by precept and example?" No specific rules are given in regard to the time or extent of fasting or abstinence, but the whole matter is left to the judgment and conscience of each individual member or minister.

Faville, Oran, late State Superintendent of Public Instruction of Iowa, was born in Mannheim, Herkimer Co., N. Y., Oct. 13, 1817, and died at Waverly, Iowa, Oct. 3, 1872. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1844, and was in the same year appointed teacher of Ancient Languages in the Oneida Conference Seminary. In 1846 he was appointed to a similar position in the Troy Conference Academy, West Poughkeepsie, Vt., and was subsequently chosen principal of that institution. He was elected, in 1852, Professor of Ancient Languages in McKendree College, and in 1853, president of the Wesleyan Female College at Delaware, O. He removed, in 1855, to Iowa, where he filled at different times the offices of county judge, lieutenant-governor of the State, and president of the State Board of Education. In 1863 he served as acting secretary of the State Board of Education, and was appointed a Visitor to the United States Military Academy at West Point. In 1864 he was appointed State Superintendent of Public Instruction for Iowa, and president of the State Teachers' Association of that State. He resigned these positions in 1867, on account of ill health. In addition to his regular official duties, Mr. Faville was editor of the Iowa School Journal from 1863 to 1867.

Fayetteville, N. C. (pop. 4660), the capital of Cumberland County, is situated on the Cape Fear River and Western Railroad. It has several times suffered severely by fire. It appears that Methodism was introduced into this place about the year 1800, by Henry Evans, an educated colored local preacher from Virginia. Assisted by white people he succeeded in erecting a small wooden church, which was dedicated as Evans' chapel in 1802. A number of white people connected themselves with this church, contributing largely to build it; and they occupied the first floor while the colored people used the gallery. This property was deeded to the church about 1804, and a white preacher was regularly appointed in charge. It was visited in 1803 by Bishop Asbury and Rev. N. Snethen, who preached in the Presbyterian church. In 1805, Bishop Asbury, on visiting the place, declined an invitation to preach in the State-house, and also in the Presbyterian church, preferring to preach in the small Methodist church, partly occupied by the colored people. He makes the record: "Oh what sweetness I feel as I stroll along through the solitary woods! I am sometimes ready to shout aloud and make all vocal with the praises of his Grace who died, and lives, and intercedes for me." Bishop Whatcoat also preached in the same church. The chapel seems to have been repaired, for Asbury, on his visit in 1812, says, "There is a neat little Methodist chapel costing but $1200, ten hundred and fifty of which are paid; what will not perseverance and management do!" In 1813, on his visit, he was so lame that he was carried into the church, where he ordained two deacons and one elder. The city first appears on the minutes of 1808, Samuel Dunwoody being pastor. It was connected with other appointments, and he reported from the circuit in 1809, 197 members. In 1832 an eligible lot was purchased on Hay Street, and a large frame church was erected and dedicated in 1835. For a time it was occupied by both the white and colored membership, the small chapel having been sold, but subsequently it was repurchased and occupied by the colored people. In 1852 or 1853 Evans' chapel was burned, but was rebuilt of brick in 1855. It contains 600 sittings, and is valued at $2000. At present it is occupied by the A. M. E. Zion Church, but the title is held by the Church South. At the separation of the church, in 1845, in common with the North Carolina Conference it adhered to the Church South, and since the close of the war no branch of the church except the Zion has effected any organization. The church on Hay Street is said to be the largest and most influential in the city, having a membership of 350, with 200 pupils in Sunday-schools, and with church property valued at $13,000. The Zion membership is 500, with a Sunday-school of 200, and property estimated at $2000.

Fellows, Nathaniel, A.M., principal of Wilbraham Academy, was born at Stonington, Conn., Nov. 19, 1828. He prepared for college at the Wesleyan Academy, and graduated at the Wesleyan University in 1858. The year after his graduation he served as Professor of Mathematics in the Wesleyan Academy; and was then admitted into the New England Conference, where he served the churches at Holyoke, Wilbraham, Southampton, Springfield, Palmer, and Watertown. In 1873 he was appointed presiding elder on the Worcester district, and after remaining in that position for a year and a half he was elected to the position which he now holds at the head of one of the most flourishing institutions of the church.

Felton, Cyrus E., D.D., a native of Cleveland, O., was born in 1830, and converted in his twentieth year. He entered the Ohio Conference in 1851, and in addition to a fair education pursued his studies in the Ohio University, at Athens, Ohio. He has filled appointments in Columbus, Cleveland, St. Louis, Chicago, and is now (1877) pastor of Christ church, Pittsburgh. In 1875 and 1876, embracing thirteen months, he traveled in Europe, Egypt, Greece, and Palestine. Among the fruitful results of this trip, besides his pulpit ministrations, have been lectures giving his observations of travel, and he is now preparing a book on the Holy Land. McKendree College, Illinois, in 1873, honored him with the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

Ferguson, Samuel D., born in New York in 1798, was converted at fourteen, and joined the New York Conference in 1819. He occupied prominent positions in the Conference, and was at different times presiding elder on the Plattsburg, Hartford, and Delaware districts. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1832 and 1836, and in 1836 was agent for the Troy Conference Academy. For four years he was superintendent of an orphan house, and erected a boarding-school in the valley of the Charlotte River, which was opened in 1848. He was a man of great enterprise and benevolence, and the religious enterprises of the church were remembered in his last will. He died in New York, Dec. 30, 1855.

Fernley, John, Esq., of Southport, England, resided many years in Manchester, where he was engaged in profitable commercial pursuits. He mingled with the most prominent men in Methodism. He was a man of deep, unobtrusive piety, and yet was foremost in every religious enterprise. Mr. Fernley held the office of treasurer of the Chapel Fund; was connected with the establishment of the Theological Institution at Didsbury; founded the Fernley lectures; provided free from debt "Trinity Hall," at Southport, for the education of ministers' daughters; erected two large and commodious chapels, which he presented to the Conference; and, finally, made princely bequests to the funds of Methodism. He died in 1874, satisfied with divine favor, confidently relying on the atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ, aged seventy-six.

Fernley Lecture, The (established 1869), (English Wesleyan).—This owes its existence to the liberality of one of the most generous donors to various institutions, the late John Fernley, Esq., of Southport. A sum of money was invested by him to secure a premium to the lecturers year by year. The object of the lecture is defined in the minutes of Conference as designed "to explain and defend the theological doctrines, or the ecclesiastical polity, of Wesleyan Methodism in a manner adapted to the necessities of the times, and for the benefit of the candidates for ordination and the laymen who attend the Conference on committee or otherwise." It is generally delivered on the evening preceding the opening of Conference.

The first lecture was delivered on July 25, 1870, at Hanley, by the Rev. G. Osborn, D.D., on "The Holy Spirit, His Work and Mission." The second in Manchester, on July 25, 1871, by the Rev. W. B. Pope, D.D., on "The Person of Christ." The third in London, on July 30, 1872, by the Rev. John Lomas, on "Jesus Christ, the propitiation for our sins." The fourth in Newcastle-on-Tyne, July 29, 1873, by the Rev. B. Gregory, on "The Holy Catholic Church, the Communion of Saints." The fifth in Camborne, on July 28, 1874, by the Rev. J. Dury Geden, on "The Doctrine of a Future Life as contained in Old Testament Scriptures." The following year no lecture was delivered, owing to the sudden death of the minister appointed. The sixth in Nottingham, on July 25, 1876, by the Rev. H. W. Williams, D.D., on "The Priesthood of Christ."

Ferris, William Henry, D.D., was born in Northeastle, N. Y., Feb. 15, 1815, and was converted and joined the M. E. Church at the age of thirteen. He was admitted into the New York Conference in 1843, and has filled a number of the most prominent charges in the city and on the Hudson River. He served for two terms in the office of presiding elder, and has represented his Conference three times in the General Conference. He has been instrumental in the erection of several prominent churches.

Ferry, George Jackson, Esq., of Orange, N. J., was born at Newburg, N. Y., Nov. 28, 1830. He was converted March 7, 1848, and immediately united with the M. E. Church. He removed to Newark, N. J., in November, 1855, and engaged in the mercantile business. From the beginning of his commercial career he has been successful and prosperous amid the many fluctuations which have occurred during the last twenty years. He has manifested an intense interest in the educational and general benevolent agencies of the church, and has been active in promoting the spiritual culture of young people. He was the chief donor in behalf of the Centenary Collegiate Institute (Hackettstown, N. J.), having given some $40,000 during its building and organization alone. He is at present the president of its board of trustees. He is also a trustee in the Wesleyan University (Middletown, Conn.), and of the Drew Theological Seminary (Madison, N. J.). In the recent great reverses of these institutions Mr. Ferry has been a steadfast friend and wise counselor. His gifts to the two have been about $25,000. He was a member of the General Conference of 1876, and took an active part in its deliberations. During the last few years he has resided at Orange, N. J. Though pressed with many other engagements he still consents to be superintendent of the Sunday-school. He has been twice elected mayor of the city of Orange, but has little inclination for the excitements of political life, and, though young, has withdrawn entirely from it. Mr. Ferry is an ardent advocate of the temperance reform and other philanthropic movements.

Few, Ignatius, LL.D., of the Georgia Conference, was born in Columbia Co., Ga., in April, 1791. His father, Capt. Few, participated actively in the Revolutionary War, and at its close became a judge and senator in Congress, and was a delegate to the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States. Dr. Few was prepared for college at Bergen, N. J., and was sent to Princeton to complete his studies, but, after remaining some time, went to New York, where he prosecuted his studies further, and then returned to Georgia and engaged in the study of law. During the war with Great Britain in 1812, he was appointed colonel of a regiment; subsequently he engaged in the practice of law, but was attacked with severe hemorrhage of the lungs. He was converted in 1827, and connected himself with the M. E. Church. In 1828 he entered the South Carolina Conference and filled appointments for a few years, when he became superannuated. He was the projector of Emory College, which has rendered important service to the cause of education and to the church. The degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred upon him by the Wesleyan University. His last public act was drawing up a report on the division of the church, which was adopted by the Georgia Conference in 1845. The excitement connected with this work brought on a severe hemorrhage, from which he never fully recovered. He died at Athens, Ga., in perfect tranquillity, Nov. 21, 1845. He was a man of brilliant intellect, extensive culture, and deep piety. He was for some time president of Emory College, at Oxford, Ga., but his impaired health compelled him to withdraw from so responsible a place.

Field-Preaching, or the proclamation of the gospel in the open air, has been the practice of the great reformers in almost every age of the church. The precedent for it was set by the Saviour himself and by his apostles, and by the early Christians who had no edifices regularly built for Christian worship for nearly two centuries. At the period of the Reformation, in the sixteenth century, religious services were frequently held, especially in the suburbs of cities, in the open air, as the Protestants had no buildings in which they were permitted to assemble. At Oxford University there is a niche or kind of pulpit on one of the buildings in which, according to the condition of the founder, a specified number of sermons must be preached during the year. This form of preaching was specially revived in England under Messrs. Wesley and Whitefield at the beginning of the year 1739. They were generally excluded from the Established churches, not by any ecclesiastical order, but by the general understanding of the clergy. Mr. Wesley spent the first two months of 1739 in London, and was not permitted to preach more than five or six sermons, except in private houses. Mr. Whitefield visited Bath and Bristol, and was threatened with suspension and expulsion if he should continue to preach without a license. As the doors of the church were closed against him he went out into the open air at Kingswood, Feb. 17, 1729, and preached his first out-door sermon to about 200 colliers. At his second sermon about 2000 people were present, and the congregations increased so that at his fifth sermon 10,000 were estimated to be in attendance. Returning to London and finding the churches closed, he resorted to Moorfields and Kensington Common to preach the gospel to the multitudes. Vast assemblies met him at every appointment, and his congregations were estimated as high as from 50,000 to 60,000. Before leaving Bristol he wrote to Mr. Wesley an earnest letter requesting him to come and take part in the work; and summing up the result of six weeks' labor in the open air, he says, "Many sinners have been effectively converted, and the children of God have been exceedingly comforted, several thousands of little books have been dispersed among the people, about £200 collected for the orphan house, and many poor families relieved by the bounty of my friend, Mr. Seward; and what gives me greater comfort is that my dear and honored friend, Mr. Wesley, is to be left behind to confirm those that are awakened, so that I hope when I return from Georgia to see many believing followers of Jesus Christ." Mr. Wesley arrived in Bristol and preached his first sermon in the open air, April 2, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Out-door preaching, however, was not entirely new to Mr. Wesley, for while in Georgia he had frequently thus proclaimed the gospel. Speaking of his feelings when he was about entering on this method of preaching in England, he says, "I could scarcely reconcile myself at first to this strange way of preaching in the fields, having been all my life, till very lately, so tenacious of every part relating to decency and order, that I should have thought the saving of souls almost a sin if it had not been done in a church." But from that time forward, both in the cities and in the country, he addressed vast audiences in the open air. He gives the reasons which induced him to adopt this method: "(1) That he was forbid by a general consent, though not by any judicial sentence, to preach in any church. (2) That the rooms in which he preached could not contain a tenth part of the people that were earnest to hear. He determined to do in England what he had often done in a warmer climate (Georgia), to wit, when the house would not contain the congregation, to preach in the open air; and never has been seen a more beautiful sight than when on Rose Green, on the top of Hanam Mount, thousands of people were calmly joined together in solemn waiting upon God." After twenty years of experience in out-door preaching, he remarks, "One hour in Moorfields will convince any impartial man of the expediency of field-preaching. What building, except St. Paul's church, could contain such a congregation; and if it could, what human voice could have reached them there? By repeated observation I find I can command thrice the number in the open air that I can under a roof, and who can say the time for field-preaching is over while greater numbers than ever attend, while the comforting and convincing power of God is so manifestly present?" It was in these services Mr. Whitefield saw such evidences of divine power, which he thus records: "The first discovery of their (the miners) being affected was in seeing the wet gutters made by their tears, which plentifully drowed down their black cheeks as they came out of the coal-pits. The open firmament above me, the prospect of adjacent fields, with the sight of thousands and thousands, some in coaches, some on horseback, and some in the trees, and at times all affected and drenched in tears together, to which was added the solemnity of the preaching, everything was almost too much for, and nigh overcame, me." A remarkable amphitheatre at Gwenap, in Cornwall, was the scene of many of these services. Mr. Wesley preached there in 1762 to the largest congregation of his life. Mr. Tyerman says, "Here are held annual commemoration services, ever since the date of Mr. Wesley's death on Whitmonday, when thousands wend their way in all manner of conveyances to this consecrated spot, not only to honor the man whose memory they revere, but to commemorate the mercies of God, whose servants they are!" The last occasion of out-door preaching by Mr. Wesley was in the eighty-seventh year of his age, at Winchelsea, beneath a shade-tree in the church-yard. This tree was long protected by the vicar of the parish, and was known as "Wesley's tree." One who was present says, "The word was attended with mighty power, and the tears of the people flowed in torrents." Field-preaching, or tent-preaching, was practiced among the Covenanters in Scotland, who in days of persecution were obliged to hide themselves in caves and commons, and the practice has been kept up in some parts of the Highlands until a recent period. In America, in the absence of churches, or on occasions of general interest, when the people cannot obtain admission, out-door preaching has been practiced by various denominations, and the practice has been kept up at camp-meetings and similar assemblies. (See CAMP-MEETINGS.)

Fiji Islands, Wesleyan Missions in the.—Fiji, or Feejee Islands, are a group of about one hundred and fifty islands, nearly one hundred of which are inhabited, lying in the Southern Ocean, between 15° 30' and 19° 30' south latitude, and longitude 177° east and 178° west. They are the largest and most populous group of Polynesia. They were formerly divided into several districts, each governed by its chief, who exercised a severe tyranny over his subjects. The people were fierce savages and cannibals, in the practice of killing their parents and old people when they could no longer be useful, and sacrificing widows at the funerals of their husbands. This group is the field of one of the most successful of the Wesleyan missions. The mission was begun in 1835, when William Cross and D. Cargile went from Vavau, one of the Friendly Isles, where the Wesleyans had a missionary station, to Lakemba, of the Fiji group. They were received with hostile demonstrations by the populace, but sought an interview with the chief and gained permission to stay. They began to preach, and having among their hearers several persons who had witnessed the missionary services at the Friendly Islands and acquired some knowledge of the gospel there, soon gained a few converts, whom they baptized. The mission made steady progress, and was gradually introduced into the other islands of the group. In 1845 and 1846 one of the islands was visited by a great revival, which gave the work a powerful impulse. Thakombau, a former cannibal chief, who had conquered a of attendants upon worship as made the total loss to the Christian population about 35,000. In 1876 the missions were refreshed by an extensive revival. The training-schools, conducted in connection with a number of the circuits, have done a useful work in furnishing ministers and teachers. The new mission started by the Wesleyan Missionary Society in New Ireland and New Britain has been manned by students from these schools. The following statistics of the Fiji district were reported at the district meeting held in the latter part of 1876: number of chapels and other preaching-places, 933; of missionaries, 10, and an English schoolmaster; of native ministers, 54; of catechists, 764; of day-school teachers, 2941; of Sunday-school teachers, 3107; of local preachers, 810; of class-leaders, sovereignty over the other chiefs and had become recognized as king, embraced Christianity in 1854. In the same year the Missionary Society had in the group 89 chapels and other preaching-places, 2536 members, 574 persons on trial, and 4068 scholars in the 120 day-schools. The conversion of King Thakombau was followed by a rapid increase in the number of converts, so that, in 1858, the missionaries were able to report that about one-fourth of the entire population had abandoned heathenism and wished to be instructed in Christianity, and in 1860 the number of professed Christians had reached 60,000. In 1877 the group was annexed, with the consent of the king, and at his solicitation, as it is represented, to the British colonies. In 1875 the islands were visited by an epidemic of measles, which was very severe upon the Christian population, and carried off 9 native ministers, upwards of 150 catechists, 200 local preachers, 700 class-leaders, and 8000 church members, together with such a number 2406; of members, 17,302, with 39 English church members; of persons on trial, 5436; of Sunday-schools, 1178, with 39,873 scholars; of day-schools, 1462, with 37,992 scholars; of hearers, 89,532. The island of Rotuma, lying northwest of the Fiji group, is connected with the Fiji mission. Its inhabitants (about 3000 in number) speak a different language from the Fijian, and are all Christians. The Fiji churches form a district in connection with New South Wales and Queensland Conference of the Australian Wesleyan Methodist Church.

Fijian Missionary Literature.—One of the most important labors of the missionaries in the South Sea Islands was to reduce their languages to writing. This having been done, the mission press was established in connection with the missions shortly after the beginning of their operations, and through its means the people have been furnished with a Christian literature adapted to their capacity and wants. Besides numerous tracts and schoolbooks which have been circulated among the native converts from the Fiji press, the most important works in Fijian are the translation of the Scriptures into that language, made by the Rev. J. Calvert, the Fijian Dictionary of Mr. Calvert, and the Grammar and the Dictionary of the Rev. D. Hazlewood. Mrs. Calvert has prepared a narrative of the mission. In general literature, the Rev. J. Waterhouse has published an account of "The King and People of Fiji," and the Rev. Messrs. T. Williams and J. Calvert have prepared a work on "Fiji and the Fijians." The late Rev. Walter Lawry has left accounts of his two missionary visits to the Friendly and Fiji Islands in 1847 and 1850, and Dr. Seeman is the author of "Viti: a Mission to the Fiji Islands." These works are published by the Wesleyan Missionary Society, London.

A translation of the Bible into the Rotumah language has been made by the Rev. Mr. Fletcher, and was printed in 1870, at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

Fike, Henry C., A.M., a native of St. Clair Co., Ill., born in 1832, was converted at the age of fifteen, and in his twentieth year graduated at McKendree College, and subsequently received the degree of A.M. He spent seven years in teaching, and during the war he was three years quartermaster of the 117th Regiment Illinois Volunteers. Since then he has been occupied in milling at Warrensburg, Mo. He has been for years curator of the State Normal School. For many years he has devoted his attention to Sabbath-school work. He represented the St. Louis Conference at the General Conference of 1876.

Fillmore, Glezen, D.D., was born in Bennington, Vt., Dec. 22, 1789, and died in Clarence, N. Y., Jan. 26, 1875. He was licensed to preach in 1809, and after having served nine years as a local preacher he was admitted, in 1818, into the Genesee Conference, and was sent to Buffalo. He found the city without any church building, but succeeded in erecting a small edifice 25 by 35 feet, and at the end of two years reported 82 members. He was then appointed to the Erie district, which embraced all the territory from Lake Ontario to Meadville. Under his supervision Rochester was favored with a remarkable revival, and thus was laid the foundation of the church in that city. He was appointed four times as pastor in the city of Buffalo, and twenty-seven years he served as presiding elder. For fifty-six years he was a member of Conference and never missed a session. When he asked for a superannuated relation he said, "This is the hardest appointment I ever received." He took an active part in establishing the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary at Lima, N. Y., and was four times chosen as a delegate to the General Conference. He was an earnest, devoted, successful minister, and was instrumental in the conversion of thousands.

REV. GLEZEN FILLMORE, D.D.

Finch, Thomas John, was born in Lenham, England, April 22, 1816. He came to America in 1832, and, after remaining in New York one year, went to Cincinnati, O., where a large part of his life has been spent. He united with the Methodist Protestant Church, and was converted two days after while walking on the street. He became pre-eminent in the Sunday-school work as teacher, superintendent, and organizer, and was active in this work for over thirty years. He afterwards removed to Springfield, O., where he has been Sunday-school superintendent for ten years. He is one of the trustees of his church, its secretary and treasurer, member of the district committee and Board of Church Extension, and treasurer of the Board of Missions. He has been a director of Adrian College from the beginning, two years member of the Board of Publication, nine times in thirteen years representative to the Annual Conference. He was one of the Commissioners on the Basis of Union who met in Pittsburgh in 1875, and a member of the Union Convention at Baltimore in 1877. He has been elected to every General Conference of his church for the past twelve years.

Findlay, O. (pop. 3315), the capital of Hancock County, was originally called Fort Findlay, and the town was laid out in 1823. In 1832, E. Day and B. Allen were appointed from the Ohio Conference, M. E. Church, to "Fort Findlay mission," and they reported, in 1833, 308 members. From that time the church has made fair progress. It is in the Central Ohio Conference, and reports 307 members, 220 Sunday-school scholars, and $23,000 church property.

Finley, James B., born in North Carolina, July 1, 1781, was one of the most distinguished ministers of the M. E. Church in the West. He was converted in 1801, and in 1809 he was received on trial by the Western Conference, and traveled extensive fields of labor for six years. From 1816 to 1821 he was presiding elder of districts which embraced as much territory as an Annual Conference now contains. Through the instrumentality of a colored preacher (John Stewart) a revival had commenced among the Wyandot Indians at Upper Sandusky, O., and Finley was selected as a missionary to these "sons of the forest." This work he successfully prosecuted for six years, and from that time until 1845 he was preacher in the leading charges or was presiding elder of districts. At the solicitation of the directors of the Ohio penitentiary he was appointed chaplain, where he served three years and a half, until his health became impaired. He was elected eight times as delegate to the General Conference. He died Sept. 6, 1856. He was a man of great energy of character, of burning zeal, and of deep devotion to all the interests of the church. In quarterly meetings and at camp-meetings he had great power over the masses, who were oftentimes wonderfully moved by his eloquence. He published several volumes, among which were an "Autobiography," "Wyandot Mission," "Sketches of Western Methodism," "Life among the Indians," and "Memorials of Prison Life."

Finley, John P., son of Robert W., was born in North Carolina, June 13, 1783. Under the instruction of his father he acquired a knowledge of the sciences as well as the Latin and Greek languages. In 1810 he was licensed to preach in the M. E. Church, at the time having charge of an academy in Union, Greene County. In 1816 he removed to Dayton, to take charge of an academy in that place. Subsequently he taught in Steubenville and in Piqua. In 1823 he was appointed Professor of Languages in Augusta College, Ky., where he spent the remainder of his life. He died May 8, 1825.

Finley, Robert W., a minister of the Ohio Conference, was born in Bucks Co., Pa., June 9, 1750. He was converted at the age of seventeen in the College of New Jersey, and, after passing through the regular course, remained two or three years as a student of theology, though occasionally engaged as a teacher of languages, and during this time was licensed to preach in the Presbyterian Church. Pressing calls being made for ministerial labor in the South, he volunteered, in 1777, to preach in the new settlements of the Carolinas and Georgia. In 1780 he returned to North Carolina, and such was the distraction resulting from the war, he removed first to Virginia and then to Ohio. In 1790 he removed to Kentucky, and settled at Cane Ridge. He opened a classical school, said to have been the first opened in the State, and ten or twelve young men were educated, who became Presbyterian ministers. In 1796 he removed to Ohio, and settled near Chillicothe. In 1808 he transferred his relation to the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in 1812 was admitted into the Western Conference as an itinerant preacher. The same year his son, James B. Finley, was admitted into full connection. He continued to preach until 1824, when he took a superannuated relation. He died Dec. 8, 1840, leaving three sons in the ministry.

Finney, Thomas M., D.D., an eminent minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was admitted into the St. Louis Conference at its session in 1850. He has filled a number of the most important appointments in the Conference, having been stationed at different churches in St. Louis, and having been agent of the Depository and presiding elder of St. Louis district. He has also represented his Conference in the General Conference. According to the action taken by the General Conference of the M. E. Church South in 1874, he was appointed one of the commissioners to meet similar commissioners on the part of the M. E. Church for the purpose of adjusting difficulties between the two churches. The action of the commission has been favorably received.

Fischer, Wm. G., professor of music, was born at Baltimore, Md., Oct. 14, 1835. In early life he showed unusual fondness for music, and in 1858 was elected as teacher of music in Girard College. He was converted, and joined the M. E. Church Jan. 19, 1851, and has from his youth led in congregational singing. He resides in Philadelphia, and is engaged in a large piano trade. He is a musical composer, and has furnished a number of popular pieces for the Advocate of Holiness.

Fish, Hon. George W., M.D.—Born in Delaware Co., N. Y., in 1816; has resided at Flint, Mich., since 1838, having graduated in medicine the year previous. During the Civil War he was surgeon of the 4th Michigan Cavalry, and at the close he was appointed collector of internal revenue for his district. Dr. Fish was United States consul at Ningpo, China. He was also, at the time of his election to represent the Detroit Conference in the General Conference of 1876, State senator from the nineteenth district.

Fish, Henry, is a successful and influential business man, and is very devoted to the Sunday-school work and other departments of the M. E. Church. He represented the Detroit Lay Electoral Conference at the General Conference of 1872.

Fisher, Albert N., D.D., was converted in his youth; studied theology in Garret Biblical Institute; entered the East Genesee Conference in 1862; and was transferred to Nevada in 1864. He served several charges, was presiding elder, and, being elected superintendent of public instruction, filled that office for five years. In 1874-75 he visited Europe and the East, and on his return was transferred to Genesee.

Fisher, Charles Oliver, a delegate from the Georgia Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Baltimore, Md., July 4, 1830, and joined the Washington Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1865. He had for a time within this Conference the charge of the West Virginia missions, and organized societies and built churches at Wheeling, Moundsville, Fairmont, Clarksburg, Parkersburg, and Kanawha. In 1869 he was made presiding elder, and in 1870 was transferred to the Georgia Conference. He is now presiding elder of the Macon district.

Fisher, H. D., D.D., was born March 14, 1824; was converted at the age of fourteen, and commenced preparation for the ministry. In 1848 he joined the Pittsburgh Conference, and after filling various appointments was transferred, in 1858, to the Kansas Conference, and endured many of the trials of the early settlers. During those days of excitement his life was frequently in jeopardy. After the sacking at Lawrence and the fearful massacre, he was only saved, under the blessing of Providence, by the remarkable heroism and thoughtfulness of his wife. He was shot at from ambush, and in the pulpit when preaching. He was once on a steamer on the Missouri river, when persons were shot by enemies who were seeking to kill Chaplain Fisher. For fifteen years he was a member of the board of trustees of Baker University, and when in great peril he became its agent. In 1872 he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity. In 1875 he was financial secretary for Mount Union College, and was one year superintendent of the work under the Ladies' Home Mission of Cincinnati. He was a delegate to the General Conference from Kansas in 1864, and reserve delegate in 1868. He was for two years one of the regents of the State University, Kansas. He is stationed at present (1877) in Omaha, Neb.

Fisk, General Clinton B.—General Fisk was born in Livingston Co., N. Y., in 1828, and while but an infant his parents removed to Clinton, Mich. He was left fatherless at four years, and by dint of personal labor he became a student of Albion Seminary, and subsequently entered upon a commercial life. In 1858 he became a resident of St. Louis, and was connected with a life insurance agency. In 1861 he was elected colonel of the 33d Regiment of Missouri volunteers, and rapidly rose to brevet major-general. At the close of the war he represented the United States Freedmen's Bureau, at Nashville, Tenn., and founded Fisk University, and is still president of the trustees. For many years he has been a high officer of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, spending part of his time in New York City. He occupied the position of president of the Indian commissioners for some time under President Grant. He has long been active in church interests and was prominent in the organization of Union church, in 1862, at St. Louis. He was one of the fraternal messengers appointed by the bishops to the General Conference of the M. E. Church South, in 1874, and was also one of the commissioners to meet the commissioners of the M. E. Church South, at Cape May, in August, 1876, for the adjudication of difficulties between the churches. General Fisk was lay delegate from the St. Louis Conference to the General Conference of 1876, and was chairman of the committee on the state of the church.

Fisk, Herbert Franklin, principal of the preparatory department of the Northwestern University, was born in Stoughton, Mass., Sept. 25, 1840; was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1860; became teacher of Latin in the Delaware Literary Institute, Franklin, N. Y., in the same year, and principal of Shelburn Academy, Vt., in 1861. In 1863 he was appointed teacher of Ancient Languages in the Oneida Conference Seminary; in 1867, teacher of Ancient Languages in the Wesleyan Academy, Wilbraham, Mass.; and in 1868 principal of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary. After filling this position a number of years, he accepted his present position. He is a member of the Central New York Conference.

Fisk, Wilbur, D.D., first president of the Wesleyan University, was born in Brattleboro', Vt., Aug. 31, 1792. At the age of twelve he embraced religion, but its enjoyment he subsequently lost for a time. At the age of twenty he entered the University of Vermont, graduating with honor in 1815. He immediately commenced the study of law, engaging at the same time as private tutor. A severe illness, which endangered his life, revived his religious impressions, and, on his recovery, he felt called to enter the ministry, and was received into the New England Conference in 1818. In 1823 he was appointed as presiding elder of the Vermont district, and in 1826 was elected as principal of the Wilbraham Academy. He was elected delegate to the General Conferences of 1824, 1828, and 1832, and took an active part in their deliberations. In 1830 he was elected as the first president of the Wesleyan University, and through his untiring efforts the institution was firmly founded, and began to exercise a widely-extended influence. In 1828, at the organization of the Canada Methodist Episcopal Church, he was elected bishop, but felt compelled to decline the office. In 1835-36 he visited Europe for his health, and while there was appointed a delegate to the Wesleyan Conference in England. He was at the same time elected to the episcopacy of the church, but on his return to America he declined the office, believing that his health was insufficient for that work, and that, were it otherwise, his duty to the university compelled him to remain in it, saying, "If my health would allow me to perform the work of the episcopacy, I dare not accept it, for I believe I can do more for the cause of Christ where I am than I could do as a bishop." For many years he struggled against a fatal pulmonary disease. He died at Middletown, Feb. 22, 1838.

REV. WILBUR FISK, D.D.

Dr. Fisk was one of the purest men and one of the most intellectual and eloquent preachers the church has ever possessed. His distinguishing traits were deep personal piety, intellectual clearness and logical power, great tact in controversy, and earnest devotion to the truth. As a preacher he was everywhere admired, and as a teacher he was beloved and revered by his pupils. He lived for many years in the enjoyment of the Christian doctrine of perfect love, showing its impress on his daily life, and he considered it the most potent element in experimental divinity. He published a number of works, among which are "The Calvinistic Controversy," "Travels in Europe," "Sermons and Lectures on Universalism," "Reply to Pierpont on the Atonement," and other tracts and sermons.

Fiske, Lewis R., D.D., president of Albion College, was born in Pennfield, N. Y., Dec. 24, 1825. Removing to Michigan, he was converted at the age of sixteen, and prepared for college at Albion Seminary. He entered the University of Michigan in 1846, and graduated in 1850. He immediately commenced the study of law, but in a few months accepted the professorship of Natural Sciences in Albion College, and after three years accepted the same chair in the Michigan State Normal School.

In 1856 he became Professor of Chemistry in the Michigan State Agricultural College. In 1855, while Professor at the Normal School, he united with the Michigan Conference, and, after having served seven years as Professor of Chemistry in the Agricultural College, he entered on his pastoral work in 1863, and was stationed at Jackson. In 1866, being transferred, he was stationed in Central church, Detroit, and subsequently in Ann Arbor. In 1872 he became presiding elder of Ann Arbor district, but the following year was re-appointed to the Central church, Detroit, and in 1876 was placed in charge of the Tabernacle church of the same city. The Michigan Christian Advocate having been started in Detroit, in January, 1875, he was appointed one of its editors, and in September of that year became editor-in-chief, which position he still holds. He received the degree of D.D. in 1873, and was elected president of Albion College in 1877.

Five Points Mission—Site of Old Brewery—was established under the auspices of the Ladies' Home Missionary Society of the M. E. Church,—a society organized by the ladies of the church in New York in 1844. We find in the annual report of this society for 1848 the determination expressed "to make a new point in Centre or Elm Streets, in the vicinity of the Tombs; several ladies have pledged their labors to the Sunday-school." In 1850 this purpose on the part of the society was carried into execution, and a room 20 by 40 feet in size, on the corner of Cross and Little Water Streets, was secured for Sunday-school purposes. On the first Sabbath of its use the room was filled with attendants from the alleys, garrets, and cellars of the neighborhood. A person present described the assembly as "a more vivid representation of hell than she had ever imagined." A Sunday-school of 70 children having been organized, the necessity of a day-school was most apparent. During the second year of this mission effort under the care of Rev. J. Luckey and his untiring wife, the attendance upon the mission service so increased that the little room used would no longer meet the demands of the work undertaken. It was suggested by the ladies interested in the mission to buy the "old brewery which stood opposite Paradise Square, upon the corner of Park and Cross Streets. This was a dilapidated building which had for forty years served for a brewery, but which during the last twenty years had been the haunt of murderers and robbers, who within the shades of its dark and winding passages concealed their stolen goods and forever hid from sight their victims." The society appealed to the public to aid them in ridding the city of this "pest-house of sin, and to transform it into a school of virtue." Through the kindly interest of Mr. Harding, two public meetings were held in Metropolitan Hall (then the most desirable public hall in the city), the one addressed by Rev. Henry Ward Beecher and Rev. J. B. Wakely, and the other by Mr. Gough, the well-known lecturer upon temperance. As the result of these public appeals for help the Ladies' Society realized $8000 towards purchasing ground upon which to erect a mission building in the Five Points. The society selected an advisory board of gentlemen to negotiate for them a purchase of lots suitable for their purpose. The following-named gentlemen, W. B. Skidmore, L. Kirby, D. Drew, J. B. Cornell, A. Worrall, O. D. McLean, in company with Rev. J. Luckey, missionary, waited upon Mr. Lynch, the owner of the old brewery property, "to obtain the refusal of it for a short time." Before one year had passed sufficient money had been pledged to justify further steps towards the completion of the purchase. In December, 1852, the old brewery was demolished. In January, 1853, the corner-stone of the Five Points mission building was laid; and on June 18 of the same year it was dedicated to its sacred uses. This building was a substantial brick edifice, five stories in height, and contained a chapel that would accommodate 500 persons. The upper rooms were occupied by poor families, whilst the school-rooms and office were upon the ground-floor. The building cost $36,000. Within the last few years extensive additions have been made to the mission-house. "Large school-rooms have been built in the rear costing $7000, and a bequest from Mr. J. B. Scoles enabled the society to erect a four-story building adjoining the mission-house on the street, containing the present office, the manager's room, and rooms for the making, storing, and distributing of clothing to the 600 children who attend the schools. In the office may be seen every day barrels of bread which supply a daily luncheon to the children. The former school-room has been fitted up for a reading-room, well supplied with papers and periodicals, with a library of 1200 volumes,—from 80 to 100 young men may be seen here reading of an evening." The day-school is chiefly supported by the Public School Fund, and requires the services of eight lady teachers; it is conducted strictly as a public school, although under the supervision of the board of managers of the Ladies' Home Missionary Society. The school has numbered during the past year 1035 scholars upon its roll. The Sunday-school numbers 600 scholars, and is conducted by volunteer teachers from various religious denominations. The children are visited by a lady visitor employed by the society, and the condition and home influences of each child are reported to the lady managers. Each child of regular attendance and in need is clothed by the society. The policy of the Five Points mission is to help the children in their own homes. The tenement-rooms in the mission-house are occupied by widows and their children free of rent,—the cleaning of the building being attended to by these women. The sewing-school under the care of the mission has trained many little ones to help themselves by the use of the needle, and has during the past year had an average attendance of 150 children and 30 volunteer teachers.

Flack, Alonzo, Ph.D., principal of Claverack College, was born in Argyle, N. Y., Sept. 9, 1823. Brought up by Presbyterian parents, he early became a professor of religion. He graduated at Union College in 1849, and, having been licensed as a preacher by the M. E. Church prior to that time, he pursued his theological studies at Concord, N. H. In 1850 he commenced teaching at Charlottesville, which, in the fourth year of its history, registered 1253 pupils, but, unfortunately, the buildings were suddenly destroyed by fire. He then took charge of the Hudson River Institute, at Claverack, and since that time has devoted himself to its interests. Under his care in twenty-three years about 6250 young people have attended as students.

Fleming, Eli M. H., of the Des Moines Conference, was born in Chester Co., Pa., March 1, 1822, and united with the M. E. Church in 1836. He joined the Indiana Conference in 1850, and was transferred to Iowa in 1854. He has filled a number of important stations, was several years secretary of the Western Iowa Conference, and was presiding elder of Council Bluffs district. One year he was transferred to California. He was delegate to the General Conference in 1876. He is the author of publications on "The Christian Sabbath," "The Separate and Continued Existence of the Soul after Death," "The Second Advent," "Total Depravity," etc.

Fletcher, John, was born Sept. 12, 1729, in Nyon, Switzerland, and died Aug. 14, 1785. He was educated at Geneva, where he studied both philology and philosophy. Early in life he was to a good degree master of the French, German, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages. His parents intended him for the ministry, but he preferred the army, and at twenty years of age he entered the service of Portugal as captain. On the return of peace he went to England, and became an instructor in the family of T. Hill, Esq. About 1755 he united with the Methodist society, and in 1757 was ordained in the Church of England. Through the influence of Rowland Hill he received three years afterwards the charge of Dunham; but his zeal and energy finding here too little for their exercise, he preferred Madeley, even at a lower salary, because it offered him a larger sphere of usefulness. Here was afforded an ample opportunity for the exercise of his varied accomplishments. Being very jealous for the Master's cause, he frequently reproved the country gentlemen for their various sports and pastimes. Opposition arose, and he was refused admission into many of their houses and homes. This refusal was indicated by placards posted on the doors of his chapel. But not intimidated, he pursued his work. His liberality to the poor is said to have been scarcely credible. "He led a life of severe abstinence that he might feed the hungry; he clothed himself in cheap attire that he might clothe the naked. He sometimes unfurnished his house that he might supply suffering families with necessary articles." In the summer of 1769 he visited France, Italy, and Switzerland. On his return to England, at the request of Lady Huntingdon he became president of her seminary, established for the ministerial training of young men, at Trevecca, in Wales. He went there to reside in 1770, but soon afterwards resigned on account of doctrinal differences with its patron. His life in this institution is thus described: "Languages, arts, sciences, grammar, rhetoric, logic, even divinity itself, as it is called, were all laid aside when he appeared in the school-room among the students, and they seldom hearkened long before they were in tears, and every heart caught fire from the flame that burned in his soul." On leaving Trevecca he resumed his pastoral labors, making Madeley his centre. By reason of failing health he was obliged again to visit Switzerland. Being partially restored, he returned to England in 1781. The last public work of his life was the opening of a school-room for poor children in Madeley wood. "For a time he fell into asceticism, living on vegetables and bread, and devoting two whole nights each week to meditation and prayer; errors which he afterwards acknowledged. He accepted and defended Wesley's doctrine of perfection, and exemplified it in a life of purity and charity." Southey says, "No age or country has ever produced a man of more enlivened piety or more perfect charity. No age has ever possessed a more apostolic minister." His preaching was instructive, eloquent, and effective. The energy of his discourse was irresistible. He was Wesley's first choice as a personal successor, but this responsibility he declined. Fletcher was especially eminent as a controversial writer. He wrote largely upon the Calvinistic controversy against Toplady, Hill, and others, and his "Checks to Antinomianism" have never been successfully answered. Their style is clear, forcible, and sometimes ornate. He discusses the highest problems, as theories of the freedom of the will, prescience, and fatalism, in a manner which interests the ordinary reader, and the scriptural argument is cogent and thorough. No writer has so fairly balanced and reconciled the apparently opposite passages of Scripture. These writings are to be found in all the Methodist publishing houses; they should be in the study of every minister, and are read to-day more than any of the controversial works of the last century. Nor did he confine his writings to the Calvinistic controversy. His "Appeal to Matter of Fact and Common Sense" is an able treatise on human depravity, and he eloquently defended the doctrine of the "Witness of the Spirit." He was one of the few controversialists who wrote without bitterness, through whose pages a spirit of love and deep devotion everywhere glows.

Fletcher, Mrs. Mary.—Her maiden name was Bosanquet. She was born in Laytonstone, county of Essex, England, September, 1739. At five years of age she was much concerned to find out the way to heaven, and a servant-maid who came to live with them from among the Methodist talked with her about her soul. She says of herself at this time, "I thought that if I ever became a Methodist I was sure of salvation, and determined, if ever I could get to that people, whatever it would cost me, I would be one of them." She experienced God's pardoning love when between seven and eight years old, and when about twelve used to rise in the morning before her parents were up, and go out to read and pray with poor neighbors in one of the little cottages near the garden. When nearly sixteen she resolved to resign the gayeties and amusements of fashionable life, in which she had been brought up, and, on occasion of declining to attend the theatre with her father, explained to him her feelings and purposes on this subject. The result, according to her memoirs, of her persistence in a course commended by her conscience was the leaving of her father's house and taking lodging in an obscure part of London. During the great revival in London in 1761 and 1762, in the little church of which she was a member, the people of Laytonstone weighed heavily upon her mind, with a sense of responsibility she could not shake off. She finally decided to remove there; which she did, opening in her own house an asylum for the poor and the orphan. To these she devoted her heart, time, and fortune. Here Mr. Wesley visited her establishment, which he said "appeared to him the only perfect specimen of a Christian family he ever saw." In 1768 she removed to Yorkshire, where, Nov. 12, 1781, she was married to Mr. Fletcher, one of the holiest of Mr. Wesley's sons in the gospel. Mr. Fletcher lived only four years, and his widow, for more than thirty years after his death, lived to supply his lack in the parish of Madeley. She was the chief instrument in building chapels in Madeley, and in each she had a seat beside the pulpit, elevated a step or two above the floor. From these seats she exercised her talents in publishing salvation in the name of Christ. In person she was small and short, but her appearance was noble, and commanded respect. Her forehead was large, her eyes prominent and penetrating. Her manner was marked by cheerfulness, humility, and unfeigned sincerity. She had rare faculty of adaptation, and won many souls by her efforts. As a public speaker her discourses were marked with great good sense, and some of them with great originality and ingenuity. Her style is described as vehement, her voice and manner masculine. She expounded the Scriptures with great wisdom and faithfulness. She retained her influence in the same places for thirty years, her congregations being as large at the end as at the beginning.

Rev. Henry Moore, editor of her memoirs, says her preaching was only an enlargement of her conversation with her family and guests before her congregation. She never meddled with church government, nor usurped authority over man, but strove to win souls by pureness, by knowledge, by long suffering, and kindness.

Burder, in his "Pious Women," says, "Had she lived in the apostolic age she would have taken rank among the presbyteresses or female confessors of the primitive church. Had she been born in a Roman Catholic country she would doubtless have been enrolled among the saints of the calendar."

She died in 1805, and was buried in the church at Madeley, where a plain tomb was erected to her memory and that of her husband.

Flint, Mich. (pop. 5386), the capital of Genesee County, is surrounded by a fertile country, and possesses abundant water-power. It is the seat of the Michigan Asylum for the Deaf, Dumb, and Blind. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1840, when Ebenezer Steele and Jonathan Blanchard were appointed to "Flint mission" from the first session of the Michigan Conference. In 1841 they reported 250 members, and Francis B. Bangs was appointed to Flint. He reported, in 1842, 273 members. The church has prospered since that period. It is in the Detroit Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
Court Street.....	363	260	$28,000
Garland Street.....	320	160	14,000
Free Methodist.....	40	1,000

Florida (pop. 187,748) was discovered by Sebastian Cabot in 1497. It was visited by Ponce de Leon, the Spanish navigator, in 1512, during a voyage which he had undertaken to discover the fountain whose waters were supposed to have the property of bestowing perpetual youth. He arrived from Hispaniola, at Cape Sable, on Easter-day, and gave the country the name of Florida, from the vast multitude of flowers, or perhaps orange-blossoms. The first permanent settlement was made by the Spanish, under Melendez, in 1565, at St. Augustine, which is the oldest town in the United States. Florida remained a Spanish colony until 1763, when it was ceded to Great Britain, but was retroceded in 1784. In 1810 the inhabitants met in convention at Baton Rouge and declared the independence of West Florida, and sought the protection of the United States. President Monroe issued a proclamation asserting the right of the United States, under the Louisiana purchase, to take possession of the Territory, and directed the governor of New Orleans accordingly. By a treaty with Spain in 1821, the whole of Florida was ceded to the United States, and a Territorial government was established the same year. In 1839 a constitution was framed, and being approved by Congress, Florida was admitted into the Union in 1845. Since its acquisition by the United States it has been the theatre of many bloody Indian wars, principally with the Seminoles. The larger part of them were removed in 1846 beyond the Mississippi, although a remnant for several years baffled the efforts of the government to remove them. The unsettled condition of the Territory prevented its rapid settlement, or the establishment of religious organizations. In 1807, Jesse Lee in his southern tour crossed the St. Mary's River into Florida in a small boat, knelt down in the woods, and earnestly implored God to claim this land for his own, to send ministers of the gospel, and to bless the people with the riches of his grace and salvation. St. Augustine first appears in the minutes for 1823, with Rev. J. N. Gallen as preacher, who reported, the following year, 52 members. In 1830 there were in the Territory 9 circuits and 14 traveling preachers, and 2358 members. A Conference was organized in 1841, having 32 traveling and 58 local preachers, and 6186 members. At the separation in 1845, Florida adhered to the M. E. Church South, and so remained until the close of the Civil War. Since that time a number of societies have been organized, and churches have been built by the M. E. Church, the African M. E. Church, and African Zion Church. The M. E. Church has in the State of Florida 2564 members. The M. E. Church South reports 8705, and part of the State is included in the Alabama Conference. The African M. E. Church reports 10,237 members; and the following table, compiled from the census of 1870, shows the relative strength of the different denominations:

	Edifices.	Sittings.	Property.
All denominations.....	390	78,920	$426,520
Baptist.....	123	21,100	73,460
Episcopal.....	13	4,600	71,100
Presbyterian.....	29	6,620	70,310
Roman Catholic.....	9	3,950	90,800
Methodist.....	215	42,600	140,700

Florida Annual Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1872, and "shall include the State of Florida." Its first session was held Jan. 19, 1873, at Jacksonville, Bishop Ames presiding. It reported 26 traveling preachers, 59 local preachers, 2207 church members, 27 Sunday-schools and 1033 scholars, 33 churches, valued at $16,060, 5 parsonages, valued at $1025. The principal part of the appointments are in the northern and eastern part of the State and along the St. John's River. In 1876 the reports are as follows: 2564 members, 47 Sunday-schools and 1426 scholars, 44 churches, valued at $22,415, 9 parsonages, valued at $3210.

Florida Conference, African M. E. Church, was organized June 8, 1867. Its boundaries now include the State of Florida. At its session in 1876 it stationed 81 preachers, including 8 presiding elders. It reported 10,237 members, 223 local preachers, 131 churches, valued at $86,115, 148 Sunday-schools, and 7624 Sunday-school scholars.

Florida Conference, M. E. Church South.—This Conference was organized by the General Conference of 1844. Adhering to the Church South after the division of 1845, it reported, in 1847, 37 preachers, 70 local preachers, 3988 white members, and 2570 colored. The General Conference of 1874 fixed the boundaries of this Conference so as to "include all that part of the State of Florida not included in the Alabama Conference." The latest report (1875) is as follows: 59 traveling preachers, 97 local preachers, 8705 white members, 20 colored, 117 Sunday-schools, and 3593 Sunday-school scholars.

Flushing, N. Y. (pop. 6223), situated in Queen's Co., Long Island, on the Flushing and Northside Railroad, is about eight miles distant from New York. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1823, when Luman Andrus was appointed to that charge. In 1824 it reported 54 members, and John Luckey was appointed "missionary to the west end of Long Island," which included Flushing. In 1825, Robert Seney was appointed to Flushing, which then had 90 members. From that time the church has made fair progress. The African M. E. Church has a prosperous organization. They report about 100 members, 125 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,000 church property. Flushing is in the New York East Conference, and the M. E. Church reports 174 members, 168 Sunday-school scholars, and $18,000 church property.

Fond Du Lac, Wis. (pop. 12,764), the capital of Fond Du Lac County, on Lake Winnebago, and on the Chicago and Northwestern and other railways. Previous to 1845 it was an important trading-post, and has since grown rapidly. The first sermon in this city was delivered by Jesse Halsted, a Methodist itinerant. Occasional services were held from that time to 1843, when Alfred Brunson was appointed to Fond Du Lac circuit, in which year he organized a class. The Methodists worshiped in a school-house and halls until 1852, when the two churches on Marr and Arndt Streets were dedicated. In 1860 Arndt Street church was closed, the members joining the Marr Street, but in 1866 the society was organized, and the church opened. In 1865 Marr Street church was sold, and Spencer Hall was purchased. In 1866-67 the hall was enlarged and improved, and the charge was called Division Street. In 1866 the Arndt Street church was sold, and the Cotton Street church was dedicated in 1868. A German M. E. church was built in 1862, and rebuilt in 1873, and an African M. E. church was built in 1867-68, but no statistics are reported. There is also a Norwegian M. E. church connected with Green Bay, but the date of its organization is not reported. This city is in the Wisconsin Conference, and reports the following statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
Division Street.....	268	307	$21,000
Cotton Street.....	141	161	8,000

Foote, John B., born at Martinsburg, N. Y., in 1826, was converted in his thirteenth year. He fitted for college at Lowville Academy, but entered the Concord Biblical Institute, from which he graduated in 1850, being the first graduate of the first theological school of American Methodism. The Wesleyan University and the Genesee College both gave him the honorary degree of A. M. in 1869. After supplying a pastorate at Ballard Vale, Mass., he entered the Black River Conference in 1851, serving its principal charges, and two terms as presiding elder. He was Conference secretary eight years, and a delegate in General Conference in 1864, in which he presented a resolution discountenancing tobacco, which was the first introduction of the subject in any General Conference. His published writings have been a few sermons, a "Cemetery Dedication Address," a small "Foote Genealogy," and some fugitive newspaper articles.

Forbus, John F., born in Baltimore, Md., about 1800, was converted in his boyhood, and started for the West soon after, settling in Cincinnati, where he lived and where he died, in 1876. He was an extensive merchant, and at one time very wealthy. For half a century he was a local preacher, and was president of the National Local Preachers' Association in 1874-75. He was a popular speaker, especially on the platform.

Foreknowledge of God, The, is a property of the divine nature that is included in his omniscience. The Scriptures affirm everywhere the divine prescience. The whole body of prophecy is founded upon it; the rise and fall of kingdoms predicted in the Old Testament, and the prophecies concerning Jerusalem and the Jews in the New Testament, uttered by Christ, are evidences of this property in the divine mind.

This foreknowledge Methodism teaches is not founded on predestination or decrees, as sometimes taught by the Calvinists. It has no influence upon either the freedom or the certainty of human actions, because it is knowledge and not influence. "Simple knowledge is no cause of action, nor can it be conceived to be causal unconnected with exerted power or mere knowledge; therefore, an action remains free or necessitated, as the case may be. A necessitated action is not made a voluntary one by its being foreknown, nor is a free action made a necessary one." Mr. Wesley observes, "With God nothing is past or future, but all things equally present. He has, therefore, if we speak according to the truth of things, no foreknowledge, no afterknowledge. Yet when he speaks to us, knowing whereof we are made, knowing the scantiness of our understanding, he lets himself down to our capacity, and speaks of himself after the manner of men. Thus, in condescension to our weakness, he speaks of his own purpose, counsel, plan, foreknowledge."

Foreknowledge is also affirmed in the Scriptures of God in the sense of fore-approved. Thus, of believers it is written, that they were foreknown. "God hath not east away his people which he foreknew." Romans xi. 2. "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son" (Romans viii. 29), that is, those that love God. This foreknowledge of faith and obedience among men is made the ground of their predestination unto eternal life. It embraces all who believe in God, and, as believers, "who love God, who, having actually embraced the gospel, are said to be the called according to his purpose." (See ELECTION and PREDESTINATION.)

Forrester, Hiram M., president of Broadway Insurance Company, New York, was born near Danbury, Conn., Nov. 21, 1813. At the age of seventeen he removed to New York and engaged in a dry-goods store. He was converted in the great revival in Allen Street church in 1830, and united with the M. E. Church, since which time he has been actively engaged in church work, and has occupied the principal official positions in his church. He was an early advocate of lay delegation, and presided over the first public meeting held in its interests, in the John Street church, in the city of New York, in 1866; and he was also president of the first New York Lay Conference, in 1872. He has been for twenty-three years a member of the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society, to the interest of which he has given diligent attention, and has also been for thirteen years one of the managers of the American Bible Society.

Forsyth, Geo., principal of East Maine Conference Seminary, was born in England in 1835.

Coming to the United States at an early age, he prepared for college at Amenia Seminary, where he was brought to seek "peace with God." Graduating at Wesleyan University in 1864, he engaged as teacher in Wyoming Seminary. In 1870 he was appointed to the Gibson charge in Wyoming Conference, of which body he became a member in 1867. In 1872 he was elected principal of East Maine Conference Seminary, which position he yet occupies.

a distinct station in 1854. It is in the Troy Conference, and reports (1876) 261 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $19,000 church property.

Fort Edward Collegiate Institute was organized as a stock corporation and erected in the year 1854. It cost, for building, fixtures, furniture, apparatus, and improvements, over $80,000. The object of its founders was to establish a seminary of learning of high grade under Christian auspices at a moderate price for board and tuition, so that Fort Dodge, Iowa (pop. 3095), the capital of Webster County, situated on the Des Moines River, and on the Illinois Central Railroad. This town was known in the records of the M. E. Church for 1855 as Dodgeville, when J. B. Hiles was appointed to the circuit. In 1857 it appears as Fort Dodge, and was then connected with Webster City. In 1858, S. B. Guiberson was appointed to "Fort Dodge mission." A German Methodist society has been organized, and reports 72 members and 50 Sunday-school scholars. The M. E. Church is in the Northwest Iowa Conference, and reports 151 members, 166 Sunday-school scholars, and $19,300 church property.

Fort Edward, N. Y. (pop. 3492), is situated on the Hudson River, and is especially noted in history as the place where Miss Jane McCrea was barbarously murdered by the Indians during the Revolutionary War. It is the site of Fort Edward Collegiate Institute. The Methodist Church was organized in 1828, and a brick church was built in 1829, Julius Field being preacher in charge. It was connected in earlier years with Sandy Hill and Glens Falls, and was long merged in the Fort Ann circuit. A new brick edifice was built in 1853. It became the institute might be a people's college. The buildings are now furnished for 250 boarding-students, and for a faculty of 15 residing in the institute. It has been favored with great prosperity during the twenty-three years of its existence, having enrolled upwards of 9000 students from 33 different States. Its graduates are now scattered in more than half of the States of the Union, some of them occupying proud positions. Among them there are about 150 clergymen, 100 lawyers, 100 doctors, and 500 professors and teachers, besides a host of merchants and men of business. The institution educates young ladies as well as young gentlemen. An average of 10 or 12 graduate yearly from the collegiate preparatory course and about 25 from the commercial college course. The size of the institute and its number of students enable it to make a division of labor, which reduces the board to a lower figure than is likely to be found in smaller establishments. From its beginning the institution has been under the presidency of Joseph E. King, D.D., who has had control of its management, and who is assisted from time to time by a large and able corps of teachers.

Fort Madison, Iowa (pop. 4011), the capital of Lee County, situated on the Mississippi River, and the Burlington and Quincy Railroad. A fort, called Fort Edwards, was built in 1808 as a protection against Indian depredations. It was one of the first points in the State at which Methodist services were held, though its priority is disputed by Dubuque. In 1832 it appears on the minutes as Fort Edwards, with David B. Cartwright as missionary. Fort Madison was laid out as a city in 1835, and appears subsequently by that name on the minutes. It is in the Iowa Conference, and reports 137 members, 130 Sunday-school scholars, and $21,500 church property.

of Allen County, situated on the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad. It received its name from a fort which was erected by the order of General Wayne in 1794.

Methodism was introduced about 1827 by Rev. John Strange, who was presiding elder of the Madison district of the Illinois Conference, which at that time embraced a large portion of the State. In 1829, Rev. N. B. Griffith was appointed to Fort Wayne mission, and in 1830 the first class was organized consisting of but five members, to whom, the following year, four were added. The services were held in private houses and in halls until 1840, when a neat frame church was erected, 36 by 50

Fort Scott, Kan. (pop. 4174), the capital of Bourbon County, was established as a military post in 1842. It is surrounded by a fertile country, and has many facilities for improvement. The name first appears in the minutes of the Missouri Conference as a mission. In 1855 it reported 9 members. In 1856 the membership had increased to 90. It was then a circuit, embracing a large district of country. In 1865 it became a separate station. Under the labors of Rev. John Paulson, the present M. E. church was built and dedicated in 1869, and under Rev. Allan Buckner a parsonage was built in 1871. The African M. E. Church was organized in 1866, and a small edifice was erected. It was rebuilt and dedicated in 1875. Fort Scott is in the South Kansas Conference, and reports, in 1876, 188 members, 260 Sunday-school scholars, and $5500 value of property. The African M. E. Church reports 114 members, 70 Sunday-school scholars, and $2700 church property.

feet, on the site where Berry Street church now stands. At the same period the first Methodist Sunday-school was organized, the members having previously taken part in union schools. That frame church has since given place to a substantial brick edifice, two stories high, and which has connected with it a commodious parsonage. A second congregation was organized in 1849, and held its early services in the college hall until a frame church was erected, in 1850, on the site where the present Wayne Street church now stands. It has given place to a brick building, with a commodious audience-room and gallery. It has also a parsonage connected with it. The Centenary church, a frame building, was erected in 1866, in the southern part of the city, and the Third Street church was built in 1876, in the northern part of the city, and has a small parsonage connected with it. A large part of the population of Fort Wayne consists of emigrants from foreign countries, among whom Methodism has as yet exerted comparatively little influence, but among the native population it keeps a fair position and has promise of much usefulness. The statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Date.	Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
1840	Berry Street.....	128	108	$30,000
1850	Wayne Street.....	200	150	32,000
1866	Centenary.....	95	200	4,000
1876	Third Street.....	45	200	3,000

Fort Wayne College is located in Fort Wayne, Ind., and was organized in 1846. It has a beautiful campus of about 3 acres, situated at the west end of the city. The building is 175 feet in front and four stories high, the foundation being of stone and the walls of brick. Though it is plain in its style of architecture, it is solid, substantial, and well arranged. The lecture-halls and recitation-rooms are sufficient to accommodate 500 students, and 100 boarders can be comfortably provided for in the building. The chapel is spacious, and will seat about 1000 persons. The value of the property is estimated at $75,000. It is under the patronage of the North Indiana Conference. The average attendance is about 100 students, both young men and young women, and there is no debt against the institution except a very small amount, which is provided for by reliable subscriptions. Its friends propose to secure for it an endowment. It has had a number of presidents in succession, among whom Rev. R. D. Robinson, D.D., served about fifteen years, but has recently resigned, as he did once before, to engage in regular pastoral work. Its present president is W. F. Yocum, A.M., who is assisted by an able corps of teachers.

Forty Fort Church, the interior of which is shown in the accompanying engraving, is situated in the Wyoming valley, near Kingston, Pa., and was erected in 1807, the first in the valley. It is a small edifice having high square galleries on three sides, and a pulpit so elevated as to make it painful to look up to the preacher. The box-shaped pews with perpendicular backs are made of unpainted pine boards, and the whole interior of the church well represents the stern simplicity of the early days of Methodism. It stands in one of the most beautiful rural cemeteries in the whole country, in which rest the remains of many of the early members of the church. The battle-ground of the Wyoming massacre lying near by gives additional interest to the old church. The name originated from its proximity to an old fort, in which forty families took refuge from the hostile Tories and Indians. Bishop Asbury, Lorenzo Dow, and many of the early Methodist ministers preached from its pulpit, and there are many interesting historical reminiscences connected with it. Foss, Cyrus David, D.D., president of Wesleyan University, was born at Kingston, N. Y., January 17, 1834; was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1854, and was afterwards appointed teacher of mathematics in Amenia Seminary, N. Y., and in 1856, principal of the same institution. He joined the New York Conference of the Meth-

Foster, Henry, M.D., the founder of Clifton Springs Medical Institute, is a native of Ohio. Having studied medicine, and being deeply pious, he resolved to build an institute which should be conducted on strictly Christian principles, and where patients might enjoy religious teaching and fellowship. He also designed to assist, as far as he was able, ministers who were suffering from impaired health. The building is large and commodious, and is furnished with every appliance of bath, electricity, and medicine. He built a chapel, where services are held every Sabbath morning and evening, with Bible class in the afternoon. Meetings for prayer and religious conference are also held twice in the week. He is a member of the M. E. Church, but all evangelical pastors and Christians who are in the institute or vicinity share in the services. Many have been converted, and many led to a higher experience while patients under his care.

Foster, Randolph S., D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Williamsburg, O., Feb. 22, 1820. He pursued his studies in Augusta College, Ky., and shortly after he was seventeen entered the ministry. He was soon placed in important stations in the Ohio Conference. When in charge of Wesley chapel, Cincinnati, he replied, through The Western Christian Advocate, to attacks made by Rev. Dr. Rice, of the Presbyterian Church, on the doctrines of Methodism, and his letters were published in book form in 1849, with the title of "Objections to Calvinism." In 1850 he was transferred to New York, and stationed in Mulberry Street church, and while there he published a volume on "Christian Purity." In 1856 he was elected president of the Northwestern University, and, after occupying that position for several years, returned to the pastorate, filling appointments in New York City and vicinity. In 1858 he was chosen as professor in Drew Theological Seminary, and on the death of Dr. McClintock he succeeded to the presidency. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1864, 1868, and 1872. In 1868 he was selected to visit with Bishop Ames the Conferences of Ireland and England, and in 1872 he was elected one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Since his election, in addition to other work, he has visited the Conferences and missions in Europe, and also the missions in South America. His present residence is Boston.

The object of the deed was to render valid and effectual trust deeds which had been or might be executed with the view of permanently settling property for the use of the body, to remove doubts and prevent litigation in the interpretation of such trusts, to declare who were the members of the Assembly when the Foundation Deed was executed, to provide for the identity and successive identity of the Annual Assembly, and to fix its powers, and also to preserve the system of itinerant preaching and a permanent connectional existence among and between the circuits and churches of the body by means of the Annual Assembly.

This deed specifies how the Annual Assembly shall be elected, and what connectional officers shall be admitted. It determines its order of business, and the duties it shall perform; authorizes the admission of ministers, specifying the doctrines which they must believe and preach, and authorizes tained a dwelling-house, book-room, and school. There was also a dispensary, from which medicines were furnished to many of the poor, and an electricity-room, where electricity was administered, without compensation, to the poor, and which became subsequently the origin of the London Electrical Dispensary. There was a band-room or chapel, in which a day-school was kept for poor children, and the central part was fitted with seats for morning worship, where Mr. Wesley frequently preached at five in the morning. In this building, also, Mr. Wesley formed a loan fund to assist the poor, and to prevent them from pawning their goods and paying exorbitant interest.

the exercise of discipline against unsound members. It thus fixes the standard of the doctrines and discipline of the church. It may be revised every ten years, but the doctrines, and certain features of discipline, can never be changed.

Foundry Chapel, the first building opened for Methodist preaching, was situated in Moorfields, London. It had been occupied for the purpose of casting cannon for the government, but owing to an accident had long been in a dilapidated state. Mr. Wesley leased it from the government, and preached his first sermon in it November 11, 1739. Necessary repairs and alterations to fit it for this purpose were not made until the following year, when it was formally opened, July 23, 1740. The first Methodist society was organized in this building, and at its opening there were only 70 members in the society. The building when arranged con-

Lackington, the celebrated bookseller, with others who rose to great eminence, began their career by loans from this fund. The main chapel was on the ground-floor, as shown in the accompanying engraving, and was not furnished with pews, except a few plain seats with backs, but had movable benches for seats, and it was furnished also with galleries. In this building the first Methodist Conference was also held. It was Mr. Wesley's chief place of preaching in London, until August, 1779, when, after forty years' occupancy, it was left for the new and commodious City Road chapel. Mr. Wesley entered in his journal, August 8, 1779, "This was the last night which I spent at the Foundry. What hath God wrought there in forty years!"

Fowler, Charles Henry, D.D., LL.D., editor of The Christian Advocate, was born in Burford,

Canada, Aug. 11, 1837. In 1841 his friends removed to Illinois, where he spent his early years on a farm. In 1851 he became a student at Rock River Seminary, and in the spring of 1855 entered Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, at Lima, N. Y., and in the fall of the same year entered Genesee College, graduating in 1859 with the highest honors of his class. He immediately returned to Chicago and commenced the study of law; but on Christmas evening of that year he was converted; and, determining to enter the ministry, in March, 1860, entered the Garrett Biblical Institute, graduating in 1861. He was subsequently honored with the first degree of D.D. conferred by that institution. He was received into the Rock River Conference in the fall of 1861, and occupied successively full ministerial terms at Jefferson Street and at Clark Street. In 1866 he was returned to Jefferson Street, and succeeded in building the large Centenary M. E. church. After being stationed at Wabash Avenue he was returned to the Centenary in 1870, and after the great fire of 1871 he took an active part in raising funds for the restoration of the Chicago churches and the Garrett Biblical Institute. He visited Philadelphia and other Eastern cities, raising the sum of $40,000 for this purpose. In 1866 he was elected as president of the Northwestern University, but at that time declined; being again elected in 1872, he accepted, and remained in that position until he was elected by the General Conference to the editorship of The Christian Advocate, the position which he now occupies. He received the degree of LL.D. in 1875 from the Wesleyan University. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876.

Fowler, Henry H., Esq., of Wolverhampton, England, is the son of a Wesleyan minister, and a lawyer by profession. He is a Liberal in politics, and a member of the Reform Club. He has for several years been the chairman of the Wolverhampton Liberal Association, and has announced his intention of contesting the borough in the Liberal interest at the next election. He was chosen mayor of the town at the early age of thirty. Mr. Fowler is well known in Methodist Connectional committees and Conference, and has taken a very active part in promoting the introduction of the laity into Conference. In conjunction with his partner, Mr. Robert Perks, he framed and carried through the British Parliament of 1876 "The Methodist Conference Act," which gives ecclesiastical freedom to the Methodist Churches of the Australasian and other colonies.

Fowler, Littleton, of the East Texas Conference of the M. E. Church South, was born in Smith's City, Tenn., Sept. 12, 1802. He embraced religion at a camp-meeting in Caldwell Co., Ky., in 1819, and shortly after united with the M. E. Church. He was licensed to preach in 1826, and was admitted on probation into the ensuing Kentucky Conference. In 1829 he was appointed to Louisville, where he received 250 persons into the church. In 1832 he was transferred to the Tennessee Conference, and in 1833 became agent of La Grange College, in which work he spent four years. In 1837 he was appointed as missionary to Texas, and in the following year was appointed superintendent of that mission, embracing in his charge the entire territory, or what was then the Republic. In 1842 he was agent for Rutgersville College, and was one of the delegates to the memorable General Conference of 1844, and was also a member of the convention at Louisville for the organization of a separate church. He died of bilious fever Jan. 19, 1846. He was a man of strong intellect, fair education, and of great power in the pulpit.

Fox, Prof. Henry J., was born in Hull, England, in 1821; emigrated to the United States in 1844; joined the New York Conference, and has served as pastor the churches in Hartford, Conn., Sand Street and South Fifth Street, Brooklyn. Forty-third Street and Seventh Avenue, New York, and Charleston, S. C. He was principal of the Ashland Seminary four years. In 1866 he received the degree of D.D. from Union College, and for the last four years has been professor in the State University, South Carolina. He has published several works, the last being "The Student's commonplace Book."

Foxall, Henry, a local minister, was born in Monmouth, England, in 1760. At the age of twenty-five he went to Ireland to superintend extensive iron-works, and in the city of Dublin he became connected with the Methodists and experienced a change of heart. He emigrated to America in 1794. In 1801 he settled in Georgetown, D. C., where he remained until 1823, when, returning to England, he died, in December of that year, in calm and peaceful triumph. As a Christian his piety was deep and fervent, and as a local preacher he was humble, reverent, pathetic, and useful. He was a man of great benevolence of character, and was devoted to the philanthropic movements of the church. In England he contributed annually £50 sterling to the Missionary Society. He built the Foundry church in the city of Washington, and presented it to the society. To the Charter Fund he left $5000, and also $5000 to the Missionary Society in England. He gave also a parsonage to the church in Georgetown.

France (pop. 36,100,000) has an area of 203,900 square miles. It was anciently called Gaul, and was among the first countries in Europe in which Christian churches were founded. Some writers have claimed that the Apostle Peter ordained bishops for various cities. For this statement there is no historical authority, but it is certain that as early as the second century Christian churches were founded. Irenæus, in A.D. 198, presided at three provincial Synods, and is said to have established a school of catechists at Lyons. Among the Franks, King Clovis, persuaded by his wife, Matilda, embraced Christianity at the close of the fifth century, and it was soon regarded as the chief Catholic nation of Europe. The Reformation of the sixteenth century found many friends in France, and as early as 1521 a Protestant congregation was formed at Meaux. Their growth was so rapid for a time that they sought to establish themselves as the state church. Subsequently trouble and persecution arose, and from 20,000 to 100,000 Protestants were supposed to have perished in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Until nearly the close of the eighteenth century laws of great severity against them were from time to time enacted. The National Assembly of 1789 gave all denominations equal rights, and since that period, while religious toleration has been recognized in theory, practically there are great impediments. The Reformed and the Lutheran Churches are recognized by the state, and money is appropriated for the support of the pastors, and two Protestant theological seminaries were long maintained at Strasburg and Montauban. The interference of the state, however, has been as disastrous in its results upon Protestantism as the persecution which formerly existed. There are now a number of independent churches organized which are more purely evangelical, and which, it is hoped, will gradually diffuse a revival influence.

Methodism was introduced into France as early as 1790, and a number of societies were formed, which were broken up and scattered during the Revolution. The Wesleyans of England sent missionaries in 1817, and under the labors of Charles Cook and others a French Conference has been formed, which is recognized as an affiliated body by the Wesleyans in England. Services in the English language were also established in Paris for the English residents of that city, and for many years regular services have been maintained. The growth of Methodism, however, in France has been very slow. It was probably impeded by the national hostility so extensively felt towards the English nation, but for many years that cause has passed away. Through the shrewdness and intrigues of the Roman Catholic priesthood, though the laws appear to be tolerant, every possible barrier is placed in the way of the extension of evangelical labor. The whole Methodist membership in France is scarcely 2000. At one time a mission was established for the Germans in Paris, under the care of Rev. William Swartz, by the Conference of Germany and Switzerland of the M. E. Church. It gave great promise of success, but on the occurrence of the Franco-German war the German population was scattered and the mission was abandoned.

France, Methodist Missions in.—Methodist missionary work among the French is carried on among the people of that nationality settled in English-speaking countries where Methodist churches are established, in France itself, and in places near the borders of France, as in some parts of Switzerland and Italy, and at Brussels, in Belgium, where French is the prevailing language. The laws in France secure freedom and protection to every kind of worship, and the government even gives support to Protestant and Jewish as well as to Roman Catholic pastors. A previous license has, however, to be obtained for holding all meetings in which more than twenty persons are engaged, and churches which have not been expressly recognized by the government are expected to comply with this general regulation, in order to avoid the liability to interruption. This license can only be obtained on the petition of a certain number of householders: and, where the prefects are hostile, the people are fearful to petition, and hence with the appearance of freedom there is practically almost absolute prohibition against evangelical work in new places.

Methodism was introduced into France through the Norman islands of the British Channel. These islands—Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, and a few smaller ones—lie close to the shores of France, are, in fact, almost included in one of its great bays, and are inhabited by a people of nearly pure Norman descent and speaking the French language, but belong to Great Britain. During Mr. Wesley's life-time, Pierre Le Sueur, a native of the island of Jersey, went to Newfoundland, and there had his attention called to Methodism. On his return to Jersey, in 1775, he became acquainted with another person, John Fentin, who had been converted in Newfoundland. In the following year a pious sea-captain came to the island and began preaching in English. Le Sueur also began to preach in French. In 1785 some Methodist soldiers, in a regiment which had recently been stationed on the island, applied to Mr. Wesley to send them a preacher. Adam Clarke was sent the next year. In the mean time Pierre Arrivé, of Guernsey, having, through the influence of Le Sueur, become favorable to the Methodists, opened the way for them to enter that island. R. C. Brackenbury began the work there. He was followed by Dr. Coke and Jean de Quetteville from Jersey, and a society was organized in a short time. De Quetteville was a writer of hymns (in French), and many of his compositions are still in use in the French congregations of these islands. Dr. Adam Clarke visited the island of Alderney in 1787, and was followed by native preachers from Jersey and Guernsey, who organized churches.

In 1790, De Quetteville and John Angel went over to Normandy. They were followed by William Mahy, a local preacher of Guernsey, who was shortly afterwards ordained by Coke at Coureelle, and was the first Methodist preacher ordained on the Continent of Europe. A chapel was hired in Paris, in which De Quetteville preached the first Methodist sermon that was preached in that city, but it was soon given up. Meetings were held at Coureelle, Cresson, Beauville, Perrières, and many other places, with favorable prospects at first, but an opposition gradually arose against the evangelists which made their labors more difficult. Pierre de Pontavice, a refugee from Brittany residing in Jersey, returned to France, and began, in 1802, a work which he continued till his death, eight years afterwards. Mahy had formed a number of societies, when his health and intellect failed and he was obliged to cease working. The Revolution soon afterwards put a stop for a time to all progress.

During the French Revolution, French prisoners of war were kept in ships at the English naval stations of Chatham, Plymouth, and Stapleton. William Toase labored with these men as a Methodist missionary, and was assisted by local preachers from the Channel Islands. When the prisoners were discharged and returned to their homes, they carried with them their Bibles and many of the teachings of the missionaries, and helped to revive the work which had been begun in France before the Revolution. De Quetteville, Le Sueur, and another minister, Olivier, returned to the society which had been founded in Normandy, and Charles Cook, in 1817, was added to the band. He proved an energetic and most useful laborer, and contributed greatly to the success which Methodism has gained in France. He was followed by Henry de Jersey in 1819. Societies were organized in the north of France, in Paris, and in the southern part of the country. Circuits were formed and supplied with preaching, partly by ministers from the Channel Islands, partly by preachers who grew up out of the churches of the country. The first French district meeting was held at Perrières, April 20, 1820, during which the first Methodist love-feast was held in France. An English Wesleyan mission was begun at Paris in 1833 by the Rev. Robert Newton. The French Conference was organized in 1852, as a body affiliated with the English Wesleyan Conference, and subordinate to it in legislative functions. The stations in the French cantons of Switzerland, in Corsica, and at Nice and Turin, have been organized in connection with the French work and are a part of it. The Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church formerly assisted in the support of the French churches, particularly with reference to the extension of their work into the valleys of Italy and Corsica. In 1852 the society, in response to an application from the Rev. Charles Cook for help in supporting the labors of Mr. Rostan in Italy, made an appropriation of $2500 for this work. In 1854 the appropriation was doubled, with especial reference to the extension of the work in the Waldensian valleys, Piedmont, Nice, and Corsica. Five thousand dollars were again appropriated in 1855. In later years the appropriations were discontinued.

The Methodist churches and missions in France, Switzerland, and Corsica under the care of the French Conference returned, in 1876, 17 central or principal stations, 184 chapels and other preaching-places, 34 ministers, 99 local preachers, 1908 members, 131 on trial, 58 Sunday-schools and 12 day-schools, with a total of 2560 scholars, and 9889 attendants at public worship.

Missions to English-speaking people were conducted at Paris, Rheims, and Boulogne, with, in all, 3 ministers, 4 local preachers, 8 chapels and other preaching-places, 81 members, 99 Sunday-school scholars, and 639 attendants upon worship.

A French chapel at Brussels, in Belgium, was occupied in 1875 by the Rev. J. Hoeart, Jr., which returned 1 Sunday-school, with 5 teachers and 40 scholars, and 300 attendants on the services.

Frankford, Ky. (pop. 5396), the capital of the State, is situated on the Kentucky River and on the Cincinnati, Lexington and Louisville Railroad. It is in the midst of a beautiful country. This region was early visited by the pioneer Methodist preachers who traveled the Franklin circuit. Its name appears in the minutes for 1821, and Nathaniel Harris was in charge of Frankford and Danville. In 1822 it reported 36 members. It adhered to the Church South in 1845, and reports 230 members. The African M. E. Church reports 235 members, 150 Sunday-school scholars, and $2000 church property.

Frankland, B. B. A., son of Rev. B. Frankland, was a tutor at Woodhouse Grove, England, ten years, entered the ministry in 1845, and for thirty years, with diligence, humility, prudence, and propriety, he served the church, nineteen years in circuit work and twelve as editor. His sermons and writings were marked by simplicity, exactness, and strength. He was a sensitive and vigilant guardian of evangelical truth. Suddenly summoned away in the midst of his days, he was found ready.

Franklin, Pa. (pop. 3908), capital of Venango County, is situated on the Alleghany River, and was laid out in 1795. It is in the celebrated oil regions, and has had a rapid and solid growth. The Methodist preachers visited that part of the State about the year 1800 or 1801, but no organization was effected until about 1810, when a class was organized by Joshua Monroe. When Andrew Hemphill traveled the Carlisle district of the Baltimore Conference, he visited Franklin, having made an appointment to preach. Being refused the school-house, he stood under a tree on the common and delivered the first Methodist sermon heard in the place. Regular preaching was established in 1826. The first church was built in 1834, which gave place to a beautiful edifice in 1863. A very great revival has recently (1877) occurred. In 1860 an African M. E. society was organized, and a small house of worship built. Franklin is in the Erie Conference, and reports: members, 380; Sunday-school scholars, 240; church property, $44,000.

Fraternal Relations.—It was Mr. Wesley's great desire that the Methodists all over the world should be known as one body. Prior to the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in 1784, the members of these societies everywhere were under the same general rules, and while ministered to by preachers of their own, received the sacraments at the hands of the ministers of the Church of England. When the M. E. Church was organized, the fact that Dr. Coke was recognized as a member of the Wesleyan Conference in England, and was also bishop of the church in the United States, and that he passed to and fro performing duties in both bodies, bound the English and American branches most closely together. Subsequently the interchange of visits between the Wesleyans of England and the M. E. Church in the United States still preserved this fraternity of feeling. Various secessions occurred, however, both in England and America, and, as usual in such cases, there was considerable controversy, and sometimes the manifestation of a bitter feeling. As time progressed, and as the various bodies addressed themselves to their proper work of saving souls, and as the controversy upon minor points diminished, fraternal feelings were gradually re-established. In England the controversy between some of the seceding bodies and the Wesleyans was for a number of years very sharp, and up to this time there has not been established between the parent body and some of the seceding bodies any official fraternal relations; but a kindlier feeling has been developed, and to some extent such relations are beginning to be recognized. In Ireland, in 1876, propositions were entertained both by the Wesleyans and the Primitives looking to a reunion, the general terms of which were agreed upon in the recent Conference in 1877. In Canada, the East British American Conference, the Wesleyan Conference of Canada, and the New Connection Methodists formed a union in 1874, and constituted the Methodist Church of Canada. There still remain, however, in that province the Primitive Methodists and the Methodist Episcopal Church as distinct from this organization. In the United States, the Protestants, which separated in 1828; the African Methodists, which separated in 1816 and 1820; and the Wesleyan Methodists, which separated in 1842, long remained without any fraternal relations being established. All these bodies were recognized as having withdrawn from the Methodist Episcopal Church, and as having created separate and distinct bodies, no provision having been made in any way looking towards such separation by the General Conference of the church. At the General Conference in 1844 the discussions and decisions in the cases of Mr. Harding and of Bishop Andrew led to such a state of feeling that a separation appeared inevitable, and action was taken by the General Conference looking to that possible contingency. Unfortunately, the language used was somewhat indefinite, and the churches in the various sections of the Union took different views of what was designed and what was granted by the General Conference: the South claiming that full permission was given for the Southern Conferences to erect themselves into a distinct organization, while the Conferences in the North claimed that such permission was suspended on certain conditions. The separation occurred in 1845, and a General Conference of the Southern organization, which met in 1846, appointed Dr. Lovick Pierce as a delegate to visit the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1848, for the purpose of establishing fraternal relations between the two divisions of the church. In the mean time controversies sprung up upon the border, and a lawsuit in reference to a division of the Book Concern was apprehended. When the General Conference of the M. E. Church assembled in Pittsburgh, in 1848, Dr. Pierce presented his credentials, and was kindly received personally, but the General Conference declined the proposition to establish fraternal relations before the difficulties were settled. The two churches remained without any fraternal intercourse until after the close of the Civil War. It was then supposed that the questions connected with the Book Concern having been settled by the decision of the Supreme Court, and the questions directly or indirectly springing out of slavery having been removed, the barriers to fraternal relations no longer existed. Accordingly, the General Conference of 1868 appointed a commission "to confer with a like commission from the African M. E. Zion Church," who were also "empowered to treat with a similar commission from any other Methodist Church that may desire like union." In April, 1869, the bishops of the M. E. Church appointed Bishops Janes and Simpson to visit and confer with the bishops of the M. E. Church South, who met in St. Louis the next month. The visit was made and a friendly correspondence ensued, but without any definite action. The commission appointed by the General Conference requested Bishop Janes and Dr. W. L. Harris to attend the General Conference of the Methodist Church South at Memphis in 1870. They were received kindly and treated with great respect, but as that body regarded the committee as appointed to treat on the subject of union only no specific advance was made, though a kindlier feeling was awakened between the two branches of the church. At the General Conference of 1872 authority was given to appoint a committee of two ministers and one layman to convey fraternal greetings to the General Conference of the M. E. Church South. This commission consisted of Albert S. Hunt, D.D., Charles H. Fowler, D.D., and General Clinton B. Fisk. They visited the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South at Louisville, in May, 1874, were received with great cordiality, and in turn that General Conference authorized a delegation consisting of two ministers and one layman to bear their Christian salutations to the ensuing General Conference of the M. E. Church; and, in order to remove all obstacles to formal fraternity, the bishops were authorized to appoint a commission of three ministers and two laymen to meet a similar commission appointed by the General Conference of the M. E. Church to adjust all existing difficulties. Accordingly, Lovick Pierce, D.D., James A. Duncan, D.D., Landon C. Garland, LL.D., were appointed delegates to visit the General Conference, and E. H. Myers, D.D., R. K. Hargrove, D.D., Thomas M. Finney, D.D., Hon. Truett Polk, and Hon. David Colockton were appointed commissioners. Mr. Polk having died before the meeting, the bishops appointed Hon. E. B. Vance in his stead. The delegates met the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Baltimore, in May, 1876, except Dr. Pierce, who was unable on account of his feebleness to be present, but who sent a long and fraternal letter of greeting. They were received with great cordiality, and the General Conference appointed as commissioners to confer with theirs M. D'C. Crawford, D.D., Hon. Enoch L. Fancher, LL.D., Erasmus Q. Fuller, D.D., John P. Newman, D.D., and General Clinton B. Fisk. The commissioners of both bodies met at Cape May, N. J., Aug. 17, 1876, and after a very pleasant session of six days the commissioners, by a unanimous vote, approved of an address (which was published) to the bishops, the ministers, and the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church South, accompanied by a basis upon which they advised that all the disputes between the churches concerning church property should be settled. This agreement has been very generally approved by the ministers and members of both bodies, and on the proposed basis the disputes concerning church property have been generally settled. Though the commission on union appointed by the General Conference of 1868 produced no direct results, yet under its influence fraternal feelings largely increased, and at the General Conferences of 1872 and of 1876 delegations were received from nearly all the Methodist bodies in the United States and Canada, as well as from Great Britain and Ireland, who brought their greetings, which were kindly returned by letter and by the appointment of delegates to visit these bodies. (See DELEGATES, FRATERNAL.)

Frederick, Md. (pop. 8525), the capital of Frederick County, is on a branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, 60 miles west of Baltimore. Methodism was planted in Maryland within the bounds of what was at that time Frederick County, but in the division of the territory became Carroll County. The first circuit formed, embracing the whole country west of Baltimore, was called Frederick. There is no evidence, however, of Methodist services having been held in the town of Frederick before 1770, when it was visited by John King, who was one of the first preachers in America, and was exceedingly zealous and laborious. After that time it was regularly visited by the circuit preachers. A society was organized, among whom John Haggarty was the most active, who subsequently became an able and distinguished preacher. While Methodism grew with the population in various parts of the circuit, the progress in the town of Frederick was comparatively slow. For more than thirty years after its introduction there were only about 30 members. In 1792 the first Methodist church was built, which gave place to a new edifice in 1841, and this has been succeeded by a larger and more commodious church now standing. The Asbury M. E. church (colored), was built in 1818, was enlarged in 1850, and was rebuilt in 1870. The Methodist Protestants purchased and occupy the former M. E. church edifice. During the Civil War, the M. E. Church South, commenced an organization, and their church was built in 1868. The African Bethel church was rebuilt in the year 1870. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Date.	Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
1792	M. E. Church.....	366	260	$26,000
1818	Colored M. E. Church...	329	142	9,000
	M. Protestant Church...	50	52	5,000
1868	M. E. Church South.....	102	100	14,000

Fredericksburg, Va. (pop. 4064), situated on the Rappahannock River and on the Richmond and Fredericksburg Railroad, is an old city, which was named in honor of Prince Frederick, father of George III. Just beyond its limits is an unfinished monument, begun in 1833, which marks the resting-place of the mother of Washington, who died in 1789.

Methodism was introduced into this place about 1796, and in a few years after a small church was built, which was improved in 1825, and was destroyed by fire in 1841. Prior to its destruction a brick church had been built on Hanover Street. Fredericksburg belonged to the Stafford circuit for a number of years. In 1809 it was established as a station under the charge of Beverly Waugh, subsequently bishop. John Kobler, a pioneer of Methodism in the West, settled in Fredericksburg in his old age, and took special interest in the erection of the Hanover Street church: and when he died left the society a house for a parsonage. At the division of the church a part of the society adhered to the Church South, and for a number of years there were two churches maintained. During the Civil War, Fredericksburg was seriously injured, and though the M. E. Church made a number of efforts to re-organize, little was accomplished after that period. The reports made to the Baltimore Conference of the Church South show 189 members, 156 Sunday-school scholars, and $6500 church property.

Free Methodists.—The organization of the Free Methodist Church dates from Aug. 23, 1860, at a convention composed of ministers and laymen who had been members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, but became dissatisfied with the workings of its government. Though organized at that date, the movement commenced several years earlier within the bounds of the Genesee Conference, and originated in an association of ministers who thought they had not been properly treated by the leading men of the Conference. They privately adopted a platform, and, in this organization, were known as "Nazarites." In their writings and speeches they complained of the decline of spirituality in the church, charging the church with tolerating for the sake of gain the worldly practices of its members, and its departure both in doctrine and discipline from the teachings of the fathers. They professed themselves to be moved by the Holy Spirit, and believed it was their duty to bear open testimony against what they alleged to be the sins of the church. This organization and its publications containing such charges against the leading members of the Conference led, in 1855, to a very unpleasant state of feeling, and resulted in various church trials. In 1858 two of the leaders were expelled from the Conference; they appealed to the ensuing General Conference held at Buffalo, in 1860, but as they had declined to recognize the authority of the church, and had continued to exercise their ministry, and to organize societies, the General Conference declined to entertain the appeal. Even prior to the trial, some of the ministers had established appointments, and organized societies in opposition to the regular church services. At the organization of this church in 1860, they accepted the doctrines of Methodism as contained in the Articles of Religion, and placed a special stress on Christian perfection or sanctification. They added an additional article, which says: "Those that are sanctified wholly are saved from all inward sin; from evil thoughts and evil tempers. No evil temper, none contrary to love remains in the soul. Their thoughts, words, and actions are occasioned by pure love. Entire sanctification takes place subsequently to justification, and is the work of God wrought instantaneously upon the consecrated believing soul. If the soul is cleansed from all sin it is then fully prepared to grow in grace." They also added a second article, on future rewards and punishments. In church polity the name of bishop was abandoned, and a general superintendency substituted. The Conference organizations were retained as in the M. E. Church, and laymen in number equal to the ministers were admitted into each of these bodies. The name of presiding elder was changed to that of district chairman. No one is admitted as a member, even after probation, without a confession of saving faith in Christ. The reason alleged by them is, that much of the defection in other Methodist Churches is due to the fact that multitudes who have joined the church as inquirers have failed to pursue a strictly spiritual life. They also require their members to be exceedingly plain in their dress, and they prohibit any one connected with the church from being a member of any secret society. They require not only abstinence from intoxicating liquors, but also from the use of tobacco except as medicine. In its early history some of its leaders encouraged a spirit of wild fanaticism, claiming the power of healing by the laying on of hands. In many cases the excitement connected with these meetings passed into extravagance, which was sanctioned by their leading men as being evidences of the influence of the Holy Spirit. As the denomination has progressed, and has extended its boundaries, though their services are still characterized by much fervor, there is less of these manifestations. The Free Methodist Church is confined almost exclusively to the Northern States. There are at present ten Annual Conferences, which report for 1876 the following statistics:

Conferences.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

A monthly magazine was commenced in 1860 by Rev. B. T. Roberts, who was elected the first superintendent, which is called The Earnest Christian. It is conducted as an independent enterprise, but has the patronage of the church. There is also a weekly paper called The Free Methodist, which, though published by an individual, is in the interest of the denomination. Two institutions of learning are under the auspices of the church, one at North Chili, Monroe Co., N. Y., where Mr. Roberts resides, the other at Spring Arbor, Mich.

Freedman's Aid Society.—Prior to 1866 the Methodist Episcopal Church had co-operated with the different freedman's aid commissions in the common work of elevating the freedmen. About that time a strong tendency towards denominational movements was manifested among the different churches, as it was supposed more could be accomplished by separate church action. Accordingly, a convention was called in Cincinnati, and the Freedman's Aid Society of the M. E. Church was duly organized, and subsequently it obtained a charter under the laws of Ohio. The subject was brought before the attention of the Annual Conferences in the fall of 1866 and in 1867, and received their cordial approval. The first appointment of teachers, 75 in number, was made Oct. 6, 1866, though but little money had then been provided. The receipts of the first year amounted to $37,139.89, and the funds were applied wholly to the educational work, except the amount necessarily required by the office. In 1868 the board reported to the General Conference, which passed resolutions sanctioning its organization, approving its objects, and commending it to the liberal support and co-operation of the ministers and members of the church. The Annual Conferences were requested to take collections in its behalf, and the bishops were authorized to appoint a traveling preacher as corresponding secretary. In harmony with this action, Dr. R. S. Rust was chosen corresponding secretary, and having been re-elected by the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876, he continues in that position. A few eligible points were selected for the establishment of training-schools, and some real estate was purchased. From 1867 to 1872 the receipts amounted to $277,968, and the number of teachers employed averaged 90, having an average of 8000 pupils under their instruction. The General Conference of 1872 fully adopted the society, and a board of managers was appointed for it as for the other benevolent associations. At the commencement of the society teachers were selected, and schools were established for primary scholars wherever a felt want was manifested. As common schools were established in some of the Southern States, and as the funds of the society were limited, it has since that period restricted its work chiefly to founding and organizing institutions for training ministers and teachers for the South. Its teachers generally are Christian men and women, who devote themselves with great zeal to the work, and serve the society at a very moderate compensation. As soon as funds can be acquired it is the design of the society to establish a seminary of a high grade within the bounds of each Conference in the South. This can only be done gradually. Lands must be purchased and improved, school buildings and dormitories repaired and erected, and proper apparatus and furniture purchased. Already property in ground, buildings, and furniture has been procured amounting to some $200,000. For the present, also, the society must support at least the principal teachers in these various institutions, and must give aid to some of the young men who are preparing for the ministry in this country, and for missionaries to Africa.

The necessity for such a society must be evident to every reflecting mind. In several of the Southern States there is no good system of common school education, and very few teachers have been prepared for instructing the colored youth; yet the progress made by the colored children has established the fact of their capacity to learn, and has in a great measure removed the prejudice that had existed against their education. Long years of ignorance and degradation have placed the race under unfavorable circumstances, and it has been regarded as vastly inferior to the whites in all respects. It is, however, surprising to witness with what readiness the children learn, and with what success they master the studies in the ordinary course. The great need, however, is for educated teachers, who shall instruct and elevate the colored youth; and more especially for educated ministers, who shall on the one hand perfectly sympathize with their people in all their habits and circumstances, and on the other will raise them to a higher plane of thought and culture. This work is now in progress, but as yet comparatively little has been accomplished. The following table presents a concise view of the work of the society for nine years:

Year.	Teachers employed.	Amount expended.
1868.....	52	$37,139.89
1869.....	70	50,167.24
1870.....	105	93,513.50*
1871.....	110	82,719.49*
1872.....	75	51,568.43
1873.....	70	55,144.98
1874.....	60	66,995.74
1875.....	50	86,562.88
1876.....	60	58,204.75

With the exception of the amount furnished for two years from the Freedman's Bureau, the funds of the society have been received wholly by contributions from the benevolent. Since its organization the society has aided in the establishment of the following institutions:

Bennett Seminary, Greensborough, N. C.; Centenary Biblical Institute, Baltimore, Md.; Central Tennessee College, Nashville, Tenn.; Claflin University and Baker Institute, Orangeburg, S. C.; Clarke University and Theological Seminary, Atlanta, Ga.; Cookman Institute, Jacksonville, Fla.; Haven Normal School, Waynesborough, Ga.; La Teche Seminary, Baldwin, La.; New Orleans University and Thompson Biblical Institute, New Orleans, La.; Orphans' Home, Baldwin, La.; Rusk Biblical and Normal Institute, Huntsville, Ala.; Wiley University, Marshall, Texas.

Several of these institutions are yet in an incipient condition, and have accomplished but little, while others have erected permanent buildings and their halls are crowded with students. It is not expected that this association will be a permanent one. In process of time these several schools will be transferred to the Conferences within whose limits they are located, and for whose interests they will be permanently required. The field they embrace, and the work required to be done, are immense. A population of nearly 5,000,000 is to be directly or indirectly benefited. Bishop Thompson forcibly said of their numbers, "More than in any State in the Union; than in all New England; than in Algiers, or Egypt, or Nubia, or Abyssinia; more than in Eastern Africa from Cape Guardafui to Cape Corientes; more than in Ethiopia; ten times as many as are in Natal and Cape Colony together; and forty times as many as are in the country of the Hottentots. One-fortieth of the sons of Africa at our doors! Ethiopia's hand stretched forth to us. Providence has two modes of evangelizing: sending Christians into pagandom, and sending pagans into Christendom. Behold our providential domestic African mission."

Freeport, Ill. (pop. 7889), the capital of Stephenson County, situated on the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. Methodism was introduced into this region about 1830-31, and in 1838 James McKean and John Gilham were sent to Freeport circuit. In 1840 services were commenced regularly in the town. The station was organized in 1850, and the first church was built in 1851. The second church was erected in 1866. German services were commenced in 1857, and in 1858 an edifice was built. There are a few Free Methodists, but they have no church. It is in the Rock River Conference, and reports as follows:

Date.	Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
1851	First Church.....	210	380	$21,500
1866	Embury.....	192	280	24,000
1858	German M. E. Church	130	116	4,500

Fremont, O. (pop. 5455), the capital of Sandusky County, is situated on the Lake Erie and Louisville, and Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroads. It has had a rapid growth in recent years, and has a beautiful location. Methodism was introduced into this city soon after its organization, and first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1850, with S. M. Beatty as pastor. The circuit, in 1851, reported 381 members. From that time the church has had a fair growth. It is now a station in the Central Ohio Conference, and reports 181 members, 188 Sunday-school scholars, and $9500 church property.

French, Jno., M.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in the county of Goochland, Va., and removed to Lynchburg, Va., where he studied medicine. Some years after he removed to Norfolk. He was a local preacher of the M. E. Church, and about 1828 he retired from the general practice of his profession, and entered more heartily into the work of the gospel ministry. He joined the Reformers, and was an active coadjutor with Shinn, McCaine, Jennings, and others in inaugurating the measures which led to the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church. About 1830 he was called to organize a church in Boston, Mass., and, using a school-room for a preaching-place, he soon commanded large and intelligent audiences. Six months after he returned to Norfolk, and with others established the Virginia Conference of the M. P. Church and became its first president. He served the constitutional period, and then turned his attention specially to the organization of a church in Norfolk. To this end he purchased the old theatre, and fitted it up for a church, an enterprise which resulted in his financial ruin. Afterwards he was re-elected to the presidency of the Conference. In 1836 he removed to Nansemond County, and died in the fall of 1838.

French Domestic Missions in North America.—Missions among the French settlers in the United States were begun by the Methodist Episcopal Church as early as 1820. They have never been an important feature of the work of the church for two reasons, viz., the French immigration has always been small, and it has been the settled policy of the church to Americanize the congregations and organize them into English-speaking churches as fast as possible.

The Rev. Daniel De Vinne joined the Mississippi Conference in 1820, desiring to labor among the French in Louisiana. He was appointed to a circuit which embraced a region extending 564 miles from Alexandria, on Red River, to the Gulf of Mexico. Near the end of his two years of labor on this circuit a church was built and dedicated in Plaquemine Brulee, on the western side of the Opelousas Prairie, which was the first Protestant church in Southwestern Louisiana.

Missions were established in 1850 on the St. Lawrence River, within the bounds of the Black River Conference, and at Croghan, in the same region, which reported, in 1859, 59 members and 74 probationers. In 1864 many of their members had been received into American societies, and in 1866 they were discontinued. A small mission existed in the Troy Conference, near Lake Champlain, in 1859, but this also can no longer be recognized. A mission was organized at Detroit in 1851, which, in 1852, returned 24 additions to the membership and 35 to 40 children in the Sunday-school. This mission, in 1858, ceased to be French, and an English service was established in its place. A mission was begun in New York City in 1851 by the Rev. J. B. Cocagne, which had only a brief existence.

The Methodist Church of Canada sustains missions to the French of the Province of Quebec at eight stations and circuits, as follows: Montreal, Quebec, Compton and Sherbrooke, Roxton Pond, Stafford and Ely, Lacolle, Bolton, Stukely, etc., Canaan and Farnham, which reported, in 1876, 7 missionaries and 140 members.

French Methodist Literature.—French literature is rich in works of a spiritual and devotional character, many of which have been extensively circulated in other countries, and are read with edification by Christians of all communions. The Methodist Church, besides possessing translations or adaptations of the more important English and American Methodist works, has produced several writers of ability and piety, combined with the national fervor of expression, whose works are published at the Conference agency, the Librairie Évangélique, No. 4 Rue Roquépine, under the management of the Rev. Matthew Lelièvre. According to the report made to the Conference of 1877, five works had been published at this agency during the year, and the sales of books had amounted to 28,000 francs. A weekly journal, L'Évangéliste, Rev. Matthew Lelièvre, editor, is published under the direction of the Conference, which is in its twenty-fifth year, and is self-sustaining.

Freund, John W., a member of the East German Conference, was born at Darmstadt, Germany, in 1832. Arriving in the United States in 1848, he was converted and united with the M. E. Church in 1849. He joined the New York Conference in 1853, and, after filling a number of important appointments in several cities, was appointed presiding elder of the Philadelphia German district, the position which he now holds. He was a member of the General Conference of 1876.

Friendly Islands: Language and Missionary Literature.—The language of the Friendly Islands is one of the Polynesian dialects, which form a class of themselves. It has been reduced to writing by the missionaries, who have given it all the literature it has. The mission press was established in the islands in 1831, and from it have been published large editions of school-books of various kinds adapted to the wants of the people, selections from the Scriptures, hymn-books, catechisms, and other useful works. Among the more important works which have been issued are a selection of twenty of Mr. Wesley's sermons, a translation of Barth's "Church History," and the Bible. The people have exhibited a high appreciation of their books, and they have gained a large circulation. A visitor to the islands about the year 1853 reported that 8000 of the natives could read the Scriptures, and 5000 could read in their own language. The policy of the missionaries to sell the books rather than give them away has been attended by good results, not only in a pecuniary respect, but in respect to its ultimate object of cultivating the habit of self-dependence among the converts. Among books relating to this mission are "Tonga and the Friendly Islands," by the late Miss Farmer, and the late Rev. Walter Lawry's accounts of his two missionary visits to the Friendly and Fiji Islands, already mentioned in the account of the missionary literature of the Fiji Islands.

Friendly Islands, Wesleyan Missions in the.—Friendly, or Tonga Islands, a group consisting of three clusters of islands in the Southern Ocean, lying between latitude 18° and 25° S., and longitude 173° and 176° W. The whole number of islands is about 150. Before Christianity was introduced among them the inhabitants were savages like the other Polynesians, but showed less signs of hostility than their neighbors to the whites, whence the islands were called Friendly. The first attempt to introduce Christianity into the group was made in 1797, when Captain Wilson, of the ship Duff, left ten mechanics on the island of Tongataboo as missionaries. Three members of this band were murdered, and the others were compelled to go away. The Rev. Walter Lawry, of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, visited the islands in 1822, but did not remain upon them. Some native converts from Tahiti next appeared on the field. In 1825 the Rev. Messrs. John Thomas and John Hutchinson were appointed missionaries to these islands by the Wesleyan Missionary Society. They reached Ilihifo in 1826,

Iiabai, and the Tonga group. King George, who was converted in 1834, succeeded to the sovereignty of all the islands in 1845, and threw the whole weight of his influence in favor of Christianity. He has proved to be the most remarkable man whom Polynesia has produced. Through the whole of his long reign he maintained a steady Christian demeanor, and gained the respect and even admiration of the strangers of various nations who came in contact with him. In 1832 a mission was established at Keppel's Island. In 1836 auxiliary missionary societies were formed in the islands of Iiabai and Vavau, in aid of which the people gave liberal subscriptions of the multifarious articles which serve them in the place of currency. The progress of the mission suffered interruptions in 1840 and were received unfavorably, but remained, and were reinforced in 1827 by three others. In 1830, Mr. Thomas went to the Iiabai Islands, one of the subordinate groups, and after a few months of labor gained a few converts, who were baptized, among them their king, Taufaaahau, whose name was changed to King George. Through the influence of this potentate idolatry was abolished on the island of Vavau. More missionaries were sent out in 1831, among whom was a printer, and a mission press was established, which has proved an effective help to the dissemination of gospel truth. The progress of the mission since this period has been very rapid. Hosts of native laborers have been raised up, who have spread the gospel through the group and have done the major part of the work, which has resulted in the overthrow of idolatry and the general reception of Christianity by the islanders. In 1839 a revival prevailed in Vavau, and 1852 from rebellions of the heathen part of the population. On the latter occasion the insurgents were abetted by the Roman Catholic missionaries. The rebellions were suppressed, and uninterrupted progress has since been enjoyed. In 1854 the mission reported 9 missionaries, 487 local preachers, 7161 members, 174 schools, 7928 scholars, and 9100 attendants upon worship. For several years the islands have been regarded as wholly Christian, and the churches have been self-supporting, constituting a district under the care of the New South Wales and Queensland Conference of the Australasian Methodist Church.

The report of the Wesleyan Missionary Society for 1876 gives the following statistics for the Tonga or Friendly Islands district: chapels and other preaching-places, 127; missionaries, 17; catechists, 21; local preachers, 943; members, 7845; on trial, 441; Sunday-schools, 124, with 716 teachers and 5503 scholars; day schools, 117, with 198 teachers and 5503 scholars; attendants on public worship, 19,320.

Fry, Benj. St. James, D.D., was born in Rutledge, East Tenn., in 1824, but spent his childhood and early manhood in Cincinnati, receiving his education at the Woodward College. He was received into the Ohio Conference in 1847. Among his appointments in that Conference were Portsmouth, Newark, Chillicothe, and Zanesville. He was four years president of the Worthington Female

REV. BENJ. ST. JAMES FRY, D.D.

College, and served three years as chaplain in the Union army. In 1865 he was put in charge of the depository of the Methodist Book Concern at St. Louis, and conducted its business till he was elected editor of the Central Christian Advocate by the General Conference of 1872, and, having been re-elected, now occupies that post. He was a reserve delegate of the General Conference of 1868, and served a part of the session, and was secretary of the committee on Sunday-schools. At the General Conference of 1876 he was secretary of the committee on education.

He has been a frequent contributor to the periodical literature; is the author of several volumes of Sunday-school books, including lives of Bishops Whatecoat, McKendree, and Roberts. He is also the author of "Property Consecrated," one of the prize volumes issued by the church on systematic beneficence.

Fry, James D., A.M., professor in the Illinois Wesleyan University, was born May 16, 1834, in Chester County, Pa. He was educated partly at Oberlin, O., but finished his collegiate course at the Ohio Wesleyan University. He joined the Ohio Conference, and after having spent several years in the pastoral relation and as financial agent of the Wesleyan University, he spent a year traveling in Europe. On his return he was elected to the professorship which he now holds.

Fry, Mrs. Susan M. (maiden name Davidson, wife of the preceding), was born in Burlington, O., Feb. 4, 1841, and was educated in the Female Seminary at Oxford, O., where she graduated at the age of eighteen, and engaged in teaching drawing, painting, and music. In 1867 she was converted and joined the M. E. Church, and the following year was married. In 1871 she began to work in the interests of the Ladies' and Pastors' Christian Union, and for the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and is at present secretary of its Illinois branch. She has visited many of the Conferences and addressed them in behalf of these societies. After having traveled with her husband in Europe, she was elected to the chair of Belles-Lettres in the Illinois Wesleyan University in 1875, a position which she still holds. She has also been an occasional contributor to the church and other periodicals.

Frye, Christopher, a member of the Baltimore Conference, was born in Winchester, Va., Feb. 13, 1778: was converted in 1796, and joined the Baltimore Conference in 1802. For thirty years he regularly filled important appointments in the Conference, and was presiding elder of the Greenbrier, Monongahela, Potomac, and Baltimore districts. After he had taken a superannuated relation he was settled on a farm near Leesburg, and while attending to a thrashing-machine he was caught by the machinery and one of his limbs was severely crushed. He was perfectly self-possessed, conversed with the utmost calmness in reference to his approaching end, and died Sept. 18, 1835.

Frye, Joseph, a member of the Baltimore Conference, was born in Winchester, Va., in 1786. In 1809 he entered the Baltimore Conference, and filled various appointments until 1822, when, in consequence of a violent disease, he was placed in a superannuated relation. Re-entering the itinerancy in 1824, he was stationed in Baltimore and vicinity, and was presiding elder of the Baltimore district. In 1836 he was superannuated. His life was an active and useful one, and he died in Baltimore in May, 1845. As a preacher he sometimes had remarkable power. The following incident is related by Rev. Alfred Griffith:

"I cannot forbear here to relate an incident illustrative of his remarkable power in this regard, of which I was myself a witness,—it occurred in the Foundry church, in Washington, while the Baltimore Conference was in session, and during the administration of General Jackson. Joseph Frye was the preacher, and the general was one of his audience. The discourse was founded on the incident in the evangelical history touching the Syrophenician woman. He threw himself into his subject—itsself one of great beauty and tenderness—with such deep feeling and mighty power, that the effect was quite irresistible. The President sat so near me that I was able to watch the movements of his great and susceptible heart as the preacher advanced; and it really seemed as if the old man's spirit was stirred to its lowest depths. The tears ran down his face like a river, and indeed, in this respect, he only showed himself like almost everybody around him. When the service was closed, he moved up towards the altar with his usual air of dignity and earnestness, and requested an introduction to the preacher. Mr. Frye stepped down to receive the hand of the illustrious chief magistrate, but the general, instead of merely giving him his hand, threw his arms around his neck, and, in no measured terms of gratitude and admiration, thanked him for his excellent discourse. The next day an invitation came to the whole Conference to pay a visit to the White House, and it was gratefully accepted; and the general received the members in the most respectful and cordial manner. After passing a very pleasant hour with him they were about to retire, when he proposed that they should not separate without devotional exercises. They first sang, and then one of the Conference led in prayer. The general fell upon his knees with the rest, and the prayer being a somewhat lively one, he shouted out his loud and hearty Amen at the close of almost every sentence. It was a scene which none who witnessed it would be likely ever to forget."

Fuller, Erasmus, D.D., was born in Carlton, N. Y., April 15, 1828. At seven years of age he was greatly impressed by the Divine Spirit, and joined the church at fourteen. While in school at Adrian, Mich., he came under the notice of the late James V. Watson, D.D., of the Michigan Christian Advocate, and subsequently became his partner. He was assistant editor of the Northwestern Advocate four years; entered the pastorate in Rock River Conference December, 1856, serving at Peru two years, Lee Centre two, Elgin two, Aurora one, Mendota district four, Dixon district one. In September, 1868, he transferred to Georgia; was elected editor of The Methodist Advocate, first issued January, 1869, and has filled this position till the present, except for a year and a half. He was a member of the General Conference in Chicago, 1868, and took an active part in the controversy on districting the bishops, writing the minority report, embracing the principles which prevailed.

In 1872 he represented the Georgia Conference in Brooklyn. By a Conference of 84 members he was unanimously elected to the General Conference in Baltimore, 1876, and has served on the general mission committee, the general committee on church extension, and was one of the commissioners who formed the Cape May compact. He has published two small volumes, one on the Sabbath, and one in defense of the M. E. Church in the South. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the Ohio Wesleyan University.

Fuller, J. M., D.D., was born in Caledonia Co., Vt.; united with the M. E. Church in 1824, and was licensed to preach in 1827. He was admitted on trial in the New England Conference in 1828; was in the New Hampshire and Vermont Conference in 1830; was transferred to Genesee in 1843, and, after spending twenty-five years in the ministry in Eastern New York and filling important positions, was transferred to Michigan in 1868, and to Detroit Conference in 1871. He served two years as tract agent for Genesee and East Genesee Conferences, and three years as agent of the American Bible Society, and nearly one in the army as colonel during the Civil War. He has been nearly fifty years in the ministry, and is now presiding elder of Detroit district.

Fulton, N. Y. (pop. 3507), is in Oswego County, on the New York and Oswego Midland Railroad. It was originally included in Cayuga circuit, and afterwards in the Oswego circuit. It does not appear as a separate appointment until a comparatively recent date. The first Methodist services were held in 1809, by the Rev. Mr. Fuller. The first class was formed in 1813, by the Rev. Mr. Bishop. In 1820 the Oswego circuit was formed, and Fulton was attached to it. The society was not regularly organized until 1826. In 1828 the brick church now existing was erected. It has been twice enlarged. In 1843 a large secession took place, which built a Wesleyan church, but the organization has ceased to exist. In 1853 the first church was divided and a second society formed, but in 1857 they were consolidated. There is a Free Methodist society here, which reports 82 members, 35 Sunday-school scholars, and $1800 church property. Fulton is in the Northern New York Conference, and reports 380 members, 350 Sunday-school scholars, and $14,000 church property.

Fund for the Extension of Wesleyan Methodism in Great Britain.—This fund was established in 1874 by the Wesleyan Conference, which directed that "a speedy and general effort should be made" to raise a fund which shall supplement the ordinary funds of the connection, and the local resources of the people: in part to sustain an additional number of home missionary ministers, whose duty it shall be to preach the gospel in districts where Methodism does not now exist ; and to facilitate the erection of chapels where needed, and the enlargement of others which are at present insufficient. At the same time, with a view to carry into practical effect the proposed movement, the Conference further directed that "information should be circulated, and a general canvass instituted throughout the connection." These and similar resolutions of the Conference originated in the munificence of Sir Francis Lyeett and William Newburn, Esqs., who each offered a sum of £10,000 provided that an equal amount of £20,000 could be raised for the objects which the fund was intended to accomplish. Their generous offers have since been supplemented by a considerable number of promises, varying in amount from £1000 downwards.

In carrying out the design of the Extension Fund, it is proposed that a thousand chapels, to be aided from its resources, should be built in the country villages and market towns in the course of the next ten years, at an average of one hundred a year; and that the subscriptions of the friends throughout the connection should be invited towards the entire project. Such subscriptions might either be at the rate of so much per chapel, varying in sums from one shilling per chapel to ten pounds and upwards, or a stated sum per annum, or for a term of years, in aid of the general purposes of the fund. Some friends might desire to limit their gifts to donations once for all ; or in aid of some particular class of chapels, and in all such cases these wishes will be strictly observed.

The total amount promised to the fund since 1874 is upwards of £38,000. The treasurers have generously invested £12,000 of their promised contributions ; the interest upon this has amounted to £545, and has been more than sufficient to meet the necessary working expenses.

The committee has received up to last Conference (1876) about two hundred applications for aid, most of them from places so poor that unless some means reach them, such as this fund is intended to supply, the probability is that the people will continue for years without any Wesleyan place of worship, and with less chance of religious instruction than thousands of people possess who live in absolutely heathen countries.

Funds of the United Methodist Free Churches, England.—There are various funds established by the connection which are managed by committees appointed by the Annual Assembly.

Ashville College Fund.—This is simply a building fund. It is not intended to make annual appeals for the support of the college, which it is hoped will be self-supporting. For the purchase of grounds and the erection of school buildings a fund was formed, for which subscriptions were solicited, payable at once or by five annual installments. The fund has been munificently supported. The five years are 1876-81. (See ASHVILLE COLLEGE.)

Book Room Fund is under the management of a treasurer, book steward, and committee. (See Book Room.) The available profits are annually apportioned by vote of the Annual Assembly to connectional objects. The capital of the Book Room amounted in 1876 to £6037.5.4. Its profits for the year, August, 1875, to August, 1876, were £1354.9.6.

Chapel Relief Fund is to aid in the erection or purchase of chapels in places where help is specially needed, and to relieve chapels which are heavily burdened with debt. To entitle a chapel to relief it must, if built or bought since 1866, be settled according to the provisions of the Model Deed or Reference Chapel Deed. If settled on trust before that date, it must in some other way have been secured to the connection. The greater portion of the chapels in the connection are settled on deeds, which make them non-eligible as applicants. In 1866 its income by contributions was £246.13.3½. In 1876 its income from the same source was £725.7.5, and from all sources £878.2.10.

Chapel Loan Fund has been in existence for about ten years. It has the same general objects as the Chapel Relief Fund, and to entitle trustees to loans, chapels for which they make application must be settled as prescribed in the preceding paragraph. Loans are granted on condition that they be repaid by installments within a period agreed upon, not, however, exceeding ten years ; the trustees giving legal security for re-payment. No interest is charged, but a very small proportional payment is exacted annually ever after a loan has been granted, to defray working expenses and prevent the diminution of the capital. Loans never exceed the amount that trustees themselves may raise, and are not paid till such amount is either actually paid for the reduction of the chapel debt or rendered available for the purpose. Annual subscriptions are not solicited for this fund. On its establishment the project was to raise £10,000 as a capital fund by subscriptions spread over five years, and a grant of £2500 from the Book Room. The capital at present amounts to about £9500, and as the Book Room grant is not yet all paid, there is reason to believe that the capital will shortly exceed the £10,000 proposed.

Home and Foreign Mission Fund.—This is the most important of all the connectional funds. It is imperative on all the societies to make annual collections on its behalf, and the fund is further supported by subscriptions and donations. Much is done by Sunday-schools in the way of raising contributions. Its income from all sources for 1876 was £17,072.3.7, and after defraying an expenditure of £17,065.10.8, there was a balance of £5618.11.1. As by far the greater portion of the income comes to hand late in the year, it is felt desirable to have a considerable balance to meet current expenditure, and thus prevent payment of interest on advances made by bankers. As the title of the fund indicates, home and foreign missions are supported from one fund. The operations at home and abroad are directed by two distinct committees. Home missions are under the guidance of the connectional committee, and foreign missions of the foreign missionary committee. (See MISSIONS.)

Home Mission Chapel Extension Fund was established in 1875. It was found that a special fund was needful to aid in the erection of chapels in localities where Free Methodism had not a footing, and where effort would probably yield good results. It was therefore determined to raise, if possible, £10,000 in five years,—one-half of the amount to be raised by annual grants of £1000 from the Mission Fund, and the other half by special subscriptions spread over five years. In less than a year the entire amount required was promised and the fund in operation. The fund is under the management of the connectional committee. Grants are made only on condition that, when practicable, the debt remaining on the building does not exceed one-third of the entire cost of the land and chapel premises. In no case must it exceed one-half.

Local Preachers' Fund.—A thank-offering fund was raised in the centenary year of British Methodism, 1839, by the late Wesleyan Methodist Association. A portion of the amount thus raised was devoted to the establishment of a fund for the relief of aged and necessitous local preachers. The present capital of the fund is £1475.13.1. A treasurer is annually appointed by the Assembly, and grants are made on application by the connectional committee. The interest accruing on the investment of the capital is the annual income, which the expenditure must never exceed. Thomas Booth, Esq., of Rochdale, has been treasurer of the fund since its formation, in 1845.

Sunday-School Fund.—This fund was formed by a vote of the Annual Assembly of the late Wesleyan Methodist Association, in 1845, out of the amount raised as a thank-offering in 1839. The capital of the fund at present is £1345.16.6, which is invested by order of the Annual Assembly. The interest is available for the purpose of rendering assistance in providing school-books, libraries, and other fittings for schools in connection with the body. The fund is under the management of the chapel committee, and its treasurer is, ex officio, a member of the committee. Thomas Booth, Esq., of Rochdale, has

Superannuation and Beneficent Fund is established for the benefit of itinerant ministers and their widows. As its name indicates, it has two objects. As a beneficent fund, it relieves ministers who may be temporarily incapacitated, or who may have had increased expenditure through domestic affliction. As a superannuation fund, it provides annual allowances for ministers who are permanently superannuated, or, in case of the death of ministers, for their widows. The fund was established in 1862. Something had been done before that year for both the objects mentioned, but in that year the existing fund was established, and other funds were broken up. A large sum was raised by voluntary subscriptions and grants from Book Room profits as a capital, and the fund is annually supported by a payment of £2.5 from each member of the fund, and by contributions from the churches. A few ministers have not become members of the fund, but the great majority have done so; and joining the fund is now made imperative on all ministers received into the body. A certain amount is voted each year by the Annual Assembly for beneficent purposes, and this amount forms the beneficent fund for the year. The larger portion of the expenditure consists of payments made on account of supernumeraries and ministers' widows. The scale of annuities in the case of supernumeraries is at the rate of 30 per cent. for every year of service. Thus, if a minister is superannuated when he has traveled twenty years, he is entitled to an annuity of £30 per year. If he has traveled thirty years, his annuity amounts to £45. A widow's allowance is two-thirds of this, or simply one pound for every year her husband may have traveled. Ministers are entitled to annuities only after they have traveled ten years. There is an exception made to this in the case of brethren who have died while serving in a tropical climate. Furniture grants are paid to brethren retiring from active work, and to the widows of ministers. Regulations grounded on equity and right declare what must be done in case of voluntary retirement or expulsion from the ministerial body. The capital of the fund in 1876 amounted to £22,467.0.2.

Theological Institute Fund.—The institution for ministerial training is supported by collections and subscriptions from the churches: fees received from the students; payments made by churches which have enjoyed the Sunday services of the tutor; and grants from the Book Room. A special appeal is now being made, on account of new premises which have been sought for the use of the Institute. The expenditure in 1876 was £781.9.6, leaving a balance on hand of £169.3.10. (See THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.)

born in Baltimore, Md., March 21, 1797, and died in the same city Aug. 29, 1874. He was converted about the fifteenth year of his age, and united with the M. E. Church in 1814. He was admitted on trial in the Baltimore Conference in 1817, and appointed to Berkley circuit. He filled a number of appointments in Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, and was several times presiding elder. He was in the effective work forty-five years; was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1828 and 1832, and was fifty-seven years a member of the Baltimore Conference. His sermons were models of gospel preaching; they were adapted to the case, and well delivered. He was a man of sound judgment in the interpretation of the canons of the church, and judicious in the administration of the Discipline. Among his last utterances were, "I am constantly enjoying solid peace. I am on the rock. Living or dying, I go trusting wholly in the merits of the atonement."

G.

Galena, Ill. (pop. 7019), the capital of Jo Daviess County, and situated on the Illinois Central Railroad. It was laid out in 1826. It has been specially noted in the past for its production of lead and copper. Methodist services were introduced into this region about 1827, when Galena mission was formed. It does not appear by name, however, in the minutes until 1828, when John Drew was appointed to Galena. In 1829 he reported only 6 members. It was continued as a mission for some time, as the population and membership were very fluctuating. The church is now well established, and Methodism is favorably represented. The German and African Methodists have each a congregation. It is in the Rock River Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church	269	320	$17,200
German M. E. Church.....	174	165	5,000
African M. E. Church.....	16	14	400

Galesburg, Ill. (pop. 10,158), the capital of Knox County, on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1855 as a mission, to which M. L. Haney was appointed. He reported, in 1856, 120 members. A chapel edifice was erected prior to 1857. It is in the Central Illinois Conference, and reports 280 members, 129 Sunday-school scholars, and $17,000 church property. The African M. E. Church has a flourishing congregation, and reports 337 members, 131 Sunday-school scholars, and $4500 church property.

Galion, O. (pop. 3523), is situated in Crawford County, on the Cleveland, Columbus and Cincinnati Railroad. The first Methodist class was organized in 1818, and the first church was built in 1834, and subsequently rebuilt in 1859. Galion does not appear in the minutes of the church until 1850, when William Thatcher was appointed to that circuit, and reported the following year 224 members. Bishop Harris was converted at a campmeeting, about six miles from Galion, in 1834. It is in the North Ohio Conference, and reports (1876) 307 members, 215 Sunday-school scholars, and $14,500 church property. The German Methodists also erected a church in 1873, and they reported about 100 members, 100 Sunday-school scholars, and $5000 church property.

Gallipolis, O. (pop. 3711), the capital of Gallia County, situated on the Ohio River, and noted for the ancient remains near the village. In 1828 it first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church as a circuit, and with Jacob Delay and E. T. Webster as pastors. They reported, in 1829, 419 members. In 1837 it reported, as a station, 90 members. From that time the church has prospered. It is in the Ohio Conference, and reports 390 members, 384 Sunday-school scholars, and $23,500 church property. The African M. E. Church reports 91 members, 54 Sunday-school scholars, and $2000 church property.

Galpin, Frederick W., a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England; entered the itinerancy in 1867. The entire period of his ministry has been spent as a missionary in Ning-po, China.

Galveston, Texas (pop. 13,818), situated on Galveston Island, at the mouth of the bay of the same name. While embraced in Mexican territory this island was the abode of the notorious pirate Lafitte, whose settlement was destroyed by the United States in 1821. The growth of the city proper commenced in 1837. As early as 1838, Rev. Abel Stevens was appointed to Houston and Galveston, and he was succeeded, in 1839, by Rev. Thomas O. Summers, when both cities reported only 68 members. The first Methodist class in Galveston was organized, it is said, by Mr. Fountaine. The Galveston City Company donated lots for a church on Twenty-second Street, and in 1842 Mr. Summers succeeded in erecting a church, which received its name from Mr. Ryland, of Washington City, who gave a handsome donation towards its erection. In 1850 it was greatly enlarged and improved, and was occupied as a house of worship until 1871. In 1851 a house of worship was erected on Broadway for the use of the colored people. The African M. E. Church is well represented. In 1845, at the separation of the church, it became a part of the M. E. Church South. After the close of the Civil War services were established by the M. E. Church, which have been confined chiefly to the German and colored population. There are German organizations both of the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church South. The following are the statistics reported for 1876:

Garland, Landon Cabell, A.M., LL.D., an educator in the M. E. Church South, was born at Lovington, Va., March 21, 1810, and educated at Hampden Sidney College. From 1830 to 1833 he was Professor of Chemistry in Washington College, Va.; held the same chair for two years in Randolph Macon College, and became its president in 1835. He continued at the head of this college until 1846. The following year he accepted a professorship in the University of Alabama, and in 1855 became its president. After 1866 he was Professor of Physics and Astronomy in the University of Mississippi, and is now Professor of Physics in the Vanderbilt University, in Nashville. He has been for many years a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and was selected by the General Conference of 1874 as fraternal delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church in Baltimore. He has written for various periodicals, and also a work on "Plane and Spherical Trigonometry."

Garrett Biblical Institute.—This institution was incorporated, in 1855, by the legislature of Illinois as a theological seminary for the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was located in Evanston, near Chicago, where the Northwestern University had just recently been established. It was founded on real properties, improved and unimproved, situated in the city of Chicago, which were devised by will for this end by Mrs. Eliza

Garrett, relict of the late Augustus Garrett, at one time mayor of Chicago. Just prior to her death, Mrs. Garrett gave approval to the aforementioned charter, the obtaining of which she had encouraged; and on her estate going to probate the portion bequeathed as endowment for the said theological school was set apart to the control and care of five trustees, named in the charter (afterwards increased to six trustees, three laymen and three clergymen), and their successors forever. Theological departments were created and professors elected in the summer of 1856, and the school was opened as a corporate organization in full working force in the following September.

That schools of this class began their career amid prejudices against them in the church is well known. The name given to them—Biblical institutes—was a concession, perhaps also a protest. But the name has grown respectable by honorable wear and use, and this institution may not soon change in this regard. The Rev. John Dempster, D.D., was the indomitable pioneer through that era of prejudice. He established the first school at Concord,—the Methodist General Biblical Institute,—then proceeded West, and was a very considerable agent in shaping and completing arrangements for

GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE.

Garrett Biblical Institute, and was checked only by death in planting a like institution on the Pacific coast. The name of such a man is blessed.

Dr. Dempster was till his death, in December, 1863, the honored senior professor in this excellent school which he so helped to build up. Associated with him as professors at its organization were the Rev. Daniel P. Kidder, D.D., and the Rev. Henry Bannister, D.D. The Rev. F. Johnstone and, after him,—for a period,—the Rev. F. D. Heminway, were instructors in the temporary preparatory department. After Dr. Dempster's death the Rev. Miner Raymond, D.D., was elected professor, and subsequently Rev. F. D. Heminway, D.D., and

Rev. William X. Nide, D.D. No changes, up to this time, have occurred in the faculty, except that Dr. Kidder repaired, in 1871, to a similar professorship in Drew Theological Seminary.

In accord with usage in most theological schools in this country, the professor oldest in office, and in virtue of his seniority, acts as president of the faculty. The professors are peers, and miscellaneous responsibilities are, as far as possible, equally distributed.

The course of study is strictly biblical and theological, and continues three years. Instruction is largely by lectures, written and oral, but text-books as syllabus-work are in use. From this course over 200 have graduated, and over 1000 have received more or less instruction. The institution has been blessed, for the most part, in the men it has trained. Many are self-denying workers in the hardest fields. Many occupy distinguished positions as pastors and other honored callings kindred to the pastorate. A good number are abroad publishing salvation through Christ to the heathen. The school has always continued to foster the spirit of missions and a high religious consecration.

Hon. G. Goodrich has been president, and Orrington Lunt, Esq., secretary of the board of trustees and general financial manager. Both have labored diligently from the commencement of the institution, giving their time and other services gratuitously.

Garrett, Mrs. Eliza, founder of the Garrett Biblical Institute, was born near Newburg, N. Y., March 5, 1805. Her maiden name was Clark. In 1825 she was married to Mr. Augustus Garrett, and, after residing in the east several years, they removed to the Mississippi valley, where they buried a son and daughter, their only children. In 1834 they removed to Chicago, and in 1839 both of them joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. Subsequently Mr. Garrett became mayor of the city. After his death, in 1848, Mrs. Garrett resolved to devote a large portion of her property to ministerial education, and after leaving legacies to friends, gave the residue of her estate to found the Garrett Biblical Institute. She lived to see its site selected and the seminary commenced under Dr. Dempster. She died Nov. 23, 1855. She had been a consistent and devoted Christian for seventeen years, and she died in Christian triumph, exclaiming, with her latest breath, "Bless the Lord, O my soul!"

Garrettson, Freeborn, a pioneer minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born Aug. 15, 1752, in Maryland. He was converted in 1775, in the twenty-third year of his age, and in the same year united with the Conference. In 1784, at the Christmas Conference, he was ordained elder by Dr. Coke, and in the same year volunteered as a missionary to Nova Scotia, where he remained about three years laboring with great success, leaving about 600 members in connection with the Methodist societies. In 1788 he was appointed a presiding elder to extend the borders of the church up the Hudson. He was assisted in this work by twelve young preachers. His labors extended as far as Lake Champlain, and into Eastern New York, Western Connecticut, and Vermont. Besides these places, he traveled extensively throughout the States of Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey. He was severely persecuted during the Revolutionary War and his life frequently threatened. He was superannuated in 1818. He died in New York City, Sept. 26, 1827, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, and in the fifty-second year of his itinerant ministry. In his will he made provision for the annual support of a single preacher as a missionary, to be appointed by the New York Conference. He was one of the most efficient and laborious evangelists of his age, and died lamented and honored by all the people.

Garrettson, Mrs. Catharine, was born Oct. 14, 1752. She was the daughter of Judge Robert R. Livingston, who had inherited a large estate in the Livingston Manor, on the Hudson River. Her mother was the daughter of Colonel Beekman, a descendant of William Beekman, who was governor of what is now the State of Delaware under a commission from Sweden. Her brother, Robert Livingston, was one of the committee who framed the Declaration of Independence, and was first chancellor of the State of New York, and administered the oath to Washington when first inaugurated as President. He was also Secretary of Foreign Affairs and Minister to France. Another brother, Edward Livingston, was senator from Louisiana, Secretary of State, and Minister to France. She had six sisters, women of more than ordinary talent, three of whom married generals famous in the history of their country. Their house was a centre of deep patriotic interest, where public movements were noted and discussed, and no small sacrifices were made. Catharine Livingston became deeply serious, and on one Sabbath at the communion experienced a sense of acceptance with God. In his journeys through New York, Rev. Freeborn Garrettson came to Poughkeepsie, and was invited to preach at Rhinebeek. He was invited to make his home at Mr. Tillotson's, whose wife was a sister of Miss Livingston. Shortly afterwards a class was formed which she joined, and in 1793 she was married to Mr. Garrettson. Six years after her marriage a place was purchased on the Hudson and a house built, in which she resided until her death, and which is now the residence of her daughter. She writes in October, 1799, of the new house, "We moved into it, and the first night in family prayer, while my blessed husband was dedicating it to the Lord, the place was filled with his presence, who in the days of old filled the temple with his glory."

Mrs. Garrettson was remarkable for her good judgment and for her sense of propriety. She was deeply pious and spent much time in prayer. She was universally respected, and her counsels and admonitions were listened to and valued even by the gay and thoughtless. In 1827 her husband died of sudden illness in New York, but in glorious triumph. She remained twenty-two years longer, and at ninety-seven, when visited by her only surviving brother, was seized with sudden illness. Before she became unconscious she cried out, with uplifted eyes and hands, "Come, Lord Jesus, come; Lord Jesus, come quickly!" and then in holy triumph, clapping her hands, she exclaimed, "He comes! He comes! He comes!" and passed away.

Garrott, Samuel F., a native of Pennsylvania, born in 1831, removing to Missouri, became largely engaged in mercantile pursuits, using his wealth and social position to promote the cause of Christ and Methodism. He was elected by Lay Electoral Missouri Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Garside, Joseph, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerancy in 1844, and was president in 1874. Mr. Garside has labored hard for the establishment of Ashville College, a connectional school at Harrogate, Yorkshire, for the education of ministers' and laymen's sons. He is secretary to the governing body.

Gatch, Hon. Conduce H., born in Clermont Co., O., July 25, 1825, is the grandson of Rev. Philip Gatch, one of the pioneers of American Methodism. He was converted while quite young, and has been active as a Sunday-school superintendent and trustee of the M. E. Church. Educated at Augusta College, Ky., he studied law, and commenced to practice in 1849, and occupied a high position at the bar, both in Ohio and at his present residence at Des Moines, Iowa, the past ten years. While a resident of his native State he was a member of the Ohio senate, prosecuting attorney, and subsequently was district attorney in Iowa, delegate to the first National Republican Convention in Philadelphia, in 1856, and was also captain and lieutenant-colonel in Ohio regiments during the Civil War. He represented the Des Moines Conference as a lay delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

Gatch, Philip, one of the early Methodist pioneers, was born near Baltimore, March 2, 1751. He was awakened and converted in January, 1772. He had a fair education for that day, and notwithstanding his great reluctance he yielded to his conviction and entered the ministry. He attended the first Conference held in Philadelphia, in 1773, and receiving his appointment, subsequently traveled in New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, and preached with extraordinary success. He was the means, in the hand of Providence, in adding hundreds, probably thousands, to the church. In his early ministry he suffered great opposition and was the subject of severe persecution. Traveling between Bladensburg and Baltimore, he was arrested by a mob, who severely abused him, covered him with tar, and applying it to one of his naked eyeballs, produced severe pain, from which he never entirely recovered. After describing the scene, he says, "If I ever felt for the souls of men I did for theirs; when I got to my appointment the Spirit of the Lord so overpowered me that I fell prostrate in prayer before him for my enemies. The Lord no doubt granted my request, for the man who put on the tar and several others of the party were afterwards converted." The next morning a mob waylaid him on his way to another appointment, but by turning out of the road he avoided them. On another occasion he was seized by two stout men, and he says, "They caught hold of my arms and turned them in opposite directions with such violence that I thought my shoulders were dislocated, and it caused me the severest pain I ever felt. The torture, I concluded, must resemble that of the rack. My shoulders were so bruised that they turned black, and it was a considerable time before I recovered the use of them." Notwithstanding this opposition he continued in his ministry for a number of years. Subsequently he removed to Ohio, some twenty miles east of Cincinnati, and was instrumental in laying the foundations of Methodism in the West, but he never re-entered the itinerancy. He died Dec. 28, 1835. His life has been written by Judge McLean.

Gatch, Thomas M., Ph.D., president of the Willamette University, Salem, Oregon, was born near Milford, Clermont Co., O., Jan. 29, 1833. He graduated at the Ohio Wesleyan University in 1855, and was Professor of Mathematics and Natural Sciences in the University of the Pacific, California, in the years 1856, 1857, and 1858. The Indiana Asbury University conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in 1874. He has been president of the Willamette University for over twelve years, and is (1877) mayor of the city of Salem and a member of the State Board of Examination.

Gaulter, John, was called into the ministry by Mr. Wesley in 1785. He was quaint in his manner, vigorous in his style, full of racy thought, exemplary in the discharge of every duty. He died in 1839, aged seventy-four.

Gause, J. Taylor, Esq., a large manufacturer in Wilmington, Del., was born Sept. 30, 1823, in Kennet Square, Chester Co., Pa. He lived on a farm until he was nineteen years of age, and received the elements of a good English education. In his twentieth year he entered the office of Betts, Harlan & Hollingsworth as a clerk, and in 1858 was admitted as an equal partner in the firm, which was changed to Harlan, Hollingsworth & Co. After Mr. Hollingsworth's death the firm was dissolved and the company was incorporated, Mr. Gause becoming vice-president and general manager. He united with the M. E. Church, and was for a number of years a member of St. Paul's, but united with several others in forming Grace church, in the planning and erection of which he took a deep interest, and to whose funds he has been a liberal contributor.

Geddes, Hon. George W., born in Mount Vernon, O., July 26, 1824. He received a fair English education, and studied law under Hon. C. Delano, and commenced to practice in 1845, at Mansfield, O., where he now resides. Two of his law partners were elected to the bench, and in 1856 he was elected judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and twice re-elected to the same position, serving fifteen years. He was also nominated for the Supreme Court. He was converted March, 1858, and has filled the office of class-leader, steward, trustee, and other church positions. He was lay delegate to North Ohio Conference in 1875, and lay delegate from that body to the General Conference in 1876. Judge Geddes is a trustee of the Ohio Wesleyan University, and also of Mount Union College. Having acquired wealth and honor in his profession, he is now acting as a steward for Christ and the church.

Geddes, N. Y. (pop. 3629), is in Onondaga County, and about two miles distant from Syracuse. Methodist services were introduced by Nathaniel Salsbury and Manly Tooker in 1823. The first church edifice was erected in 1855, and rebuilt in 1872. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1844, with Robert N. Barber as pastor, who, in 1845, reported 38 members, and was connected with Salina. In 1846 Geddes was reported separately as having 69 members. During the first few years the church did not make very rapid progress, but of late it has grown steadily. It is in the Central New York Conference, and reports 180 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $30,000 church property.

General Conference, The, of the M. E. Church is its supreme governing body. It meets quadrennially on the 1st day of May; its last session having been held in 1876.

(1) Composition.—It is composed of both ministers and laymen; the ministers are selected by the respective Annual Conferences, and consist of one for every forty-five members, with an additional representative for every fraction of two-thirds. Each Conference, however, whatever be its numbers, is entitled to at least one delegate. The lay members in the bounds of each Conference are also represented by one delegate where there is but one ministerial representative, and by two delegates in all the other Conferences. During the sessions the bishops act as presiding officers. Whenever desired by one-third of either ministers or laymen a separate vote may be called for, and before any measure can then be adopted a concurrent majority of both the lay and ministerial members is requisite. The ministerial representatives are chosen by the Annual Conferences at their sessions next preceding the time of the General Conference, and usually two alternate delegates are chosen to provide against any vacancy that may occur. The laymen are elected by an Electoral Conference, which meets at the time and place of the Annual Conference, where delegates are chosen. (See ELECTORAL CONFERENCE.) Two-thirds of the delegates elected constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. The sessions usually occupy about a month.

(2) Duties and Powers.—The General Conference being the supreme body of the church, has full power over every part of the organization and Discipline of the church, except as prohibited by certain restrictions adopted prior to the organization of the delegated General Conference. These restrictions are six in number, and are usually known as the Restrictive Rules. (See RESTRICTIVE RULES.)

By these restrictions the General Conference is prohibited from ever changing the doctrinal standards of the church. They are also prohibited from changing the General Rules, and the general polity of the church, so as to do away with episcopacy, or to destroy the general itinerant superintendency, or to prohibit the right of appeal, or to divert the proceeds of the Book Concern from the purposes to which they had been assigned. But all these, except the doctrines, may be changed by two-thirds of the General Conference acting in concurrence with three-fourths of the members of the Annual Conferences.

This body elects the bishops, who are responsible to it both for their moral and official conduct; they also elect the book agents, the editors of church periodicals, the corresponding secretaries of the Missionary, Church Extension, Sunday-School, and Freedman's Aid Society; and it has full power to constitute such associations or organizations for conducting the various interests of the church as it may deem prudent. It has no direct control over the private members of the church, or over the moral or ministerial conduct of the ministers. It indirectly, however, and efficiently controls the administration, and secures unity and efficacy through the bishops who preside in the several Annual Conferences, and through the presiding elders who preside in the Quarterly Conferences. All questions of law are decided primarily by these administrative officers: an appeal from the decision of the presiding elder in the Quarterly Conference being taken to the bishops, and an appeal from the decision of the bishops being taken to the General Conference. The final decision of all questions of law and of administration are placed in the General Conference.

(3) History.—Prior to the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in 1784, a number of Annual Conferences had been held, the first of which met in Philadelphia in 1773. The Conference of 1784 assembled at an unusual time, having been called together by Dr. Coke and Mr. Asbury, at the request of Mr. Wesley, and for the express purpose of organization. That organization having been completed, it adjourned without making any provision for future General Conferences. It was understood that any legislative action must be laid before and receive the concurrence of the different Annual Conferences. In September, 1786, Mr. Wesley requested Dr. Coke, then in England, to call a General Conference, to meet in Baltimore in May, 1787, and desired that at that Conference Mr. Whatcoat might be elected as superintendent, in connection with Dr. Coke and Mr. Asbury. Dr. Coke accordingly issued his call, and came to the United States in time to attend the previous sessions of the Annual Conferences; but as the Conferences themselves had not been consulted, and as no authority had been given by them for the assembling of a General Conference, the measure met with much opposition. The Conference met in Baltimore at the time named, but was attended by but few of the Southern ministers. Unfortunately, no record of its proceedings has been preserved; several incidents, however, have passed into history. First. The Conference of 1784, in their ardent attachment to Mr. Wesley, had resolved that "during the life of the Rev. Mr. Wesley we acknowledge ourselves his sons in the gospel, ready in matters belonging to church government to obey his commands." As Mr. Wesley had authorized the calling of a General Conference, and had desired the appointment of Mr. Whatcoat as superintendent, without, as they believed, having fully understood the condition of the work in America, they felt themselves trammelled by their resolution. Dr. Coke and some others claimed they were bound to submit to Mr. Wesley's decision according to the terms of their agreement. The result was, that without any desire to offend Mr. Wesley, or undervalue his suggestions or opinions, they deemed it necessary to rescind that resolution, and accordingly did so. Secondly. They declined to elect Mr. Whatcoat as superintendent. Thirdly. They adopted a remodeled form of the Discipline, dividing it into sections, arranging the various topics under specific heads. In their additions to the Discipline the word "superintendent" was changed to that of "bishop," and it is supposed by some that the term "presiding elder" was introduced.

To prevent Bishop Coke from attempting to call a General Conference, or to exercise any acts of official authority while absent in England, the Conference appointed a committee to confer with him, and an agreement was drawn up and signed, that "when absent from the country he would not exercise any episcopal authority, nor when present would he exercise any functions, except presiding, ordaining, and traveling at large." This session having been irregularly called, and not generally attended, is not recognized as a General Conference.

The necessity for some general meeting being universally admitted, and the preachers being so widely scattered as to render the meeting difficult and expensive, a plan for a council was adopted. (See COUNCIL.) But this proving unsatisfactory, the Conferences united in a call for a General Conference, to be composed of all the preachers in full connection.

First Conference, 1792.—This body assembled in Baltimore in November, 1792, and is usually spoken of as the first General Conference, and it is properly considered as such, as being the first session called by the regular vote of the church. Its general functions had been exercised by the Conference or Convention of 1784, and, in part, by that of 1787. While having unlimited power over the Discipline of the church, an agreement was made that no alteration should take place in the Discipline except by a vote of two-thirds. We learn that the Discipline was read over section by section, modifications were suggested, and when properly agreed upon they were adopted. At this session the first definite arrangement was made for the publication and circulation of books, though incipient measures had been taken by the council, and under their authority a Book Concern had been established in Philadelphia. The session was memorable for some measures introduced by Mr. O'Kelly. He had been presiding elder over one of the largest districts, chiefly in Virginia, and being a man of more than ordinary mind, and of great energy of character, he had obtained a strong influence over the younger preachers; by some means he had become dissatisfied with the administration of Mr. Asbury, and was jealous of his authority. He desired a general modification of the Discipline of the church, but introduced as the first step a resolution that before the appointments should be finally announced they should be read before the Conference, and should be subject to alteration, or to ratification, by their votes. As the British Conference had adopted this plan after the death of Mr. Wesley, it was known to have the sympathy and approbation of Dr. Coke, who was present, and who desired to see the British plan carried out in America. It was also supposed by Mr. O'Kelly and his friends that they had secured the approval of a majority of the delegates. The matter was debated freely for several days. Bishop Asbury, desiring to leave the Conference entirely uninfluenced by his presence, retired from the room, leaving the presidency to Dr. Coke; when it came to a vote, however, the measure was rejected by a decided majority; thereupon Mr. O'Kelly and some of his associates withdrew, and subsequently organized what they termed the "Republican Methodist Church." Provision was made by this Conference for the regular sessions of a General Conference to meet every four years, and to be composed of all the preachers in full connection, and in their hands was placed the whole legislative power of the church. A chapter was added to the Discipline defining the office and duties of presiding elders, and limiting their time on any district to four consecutive years. It is said that this measure was adopted chiefly from the injury which had followed from Mr. O'Kelly's having continued so long in charge of the district in Virginia. The interests of the Cokesbury College were also properly examined and cared for.

Second Conference, 1796.—This session met on the 20th of October, in Baltimore, Bishops Asbury and Coke presiding, the latter having returned to America after an absence of nearly four years in England. He brought with him a letter of greeting from the British Conference. Prior to this session the number of the Annual Conferences had been left to the judgment of the bishops to avoid unnecessary traveling by the preachers. As the church was rapidly spreading over distant and sparse districts, Conferences had been called in many localities, but as difficulties had arisen as to interchanges and administration, the boundaries of the Annual Conferences were for the first time determined by this General Conference. They were limited to six in number, though the bishops were authorized contingently to add a seventh. As in the secession led by Mr. O'Kelly, churches proved to be insecure, and some of them had been lost, a form of deed was prepared and published for the better security of church property. A plan for a preachers' fund, called the "Charter Fund," was adopted, and trustees were elected. At this Conference it was also agreed that local preachers might be ordained as deacons after four years' ministerial service. The health of Bishop Asbury having been somewhat impaired, a proposition was introduced for the election of an additional bishop; but Dr. Coke proposed that if it was the wish of the brethren he would devote himself wholly to the work in America, and thereupon the Conference declined to make any election. Scarcely, however, had the Conference closed its sessions until Dr. Coke received an earnest request from the British Conference to return to England to assist them in settling difficulties which had arisen among their ministers and members. He consulted with Bishop Asbury and a number of the leading ministers and members, and, after considering the peculiar difficulties of the Methodists in England, they gave their consent that Bishop Coke might return to them.

Third Conference, 1800.—Prior to this session the General Conference had set in the fall, and it was appointed to meet the first day of November; but, owing to the prevalence of the yellow fever during the preceding year, the Annual Conferences by vote requested Bishop Asbury to change the time to the month of May. The change was made, and it has uniformly met since that time in the same month. Bishop Asbury's health continuing feeble, the Conference resolved to elect an additional bishop. The Conference was nearly evenly divided between Richard Whatcoat and Jesse Lee, and the second ballot was a tie; on the third ballot, however, Richard Whatcoat was elected, and was ordained May 18, 1800. The first distinction as to the rights of colored preachers appears to have been made at this General Conference. The Philadelphia and Baltimore Conferences had, under certain conditions, permitted the election of colored preachers to deacons' orders; but as this was objected to in the South, the matter was brought before the General Conference, and a rule was adopted authorizing such election, but it appears never to have been inserted in the Discipline, owing to the opposition of the South. At this session membership in the General Conference was restricted to elders who had traveled four years, and the Annual Conferences were directed to send their journals to the General Conference for revision. A resolution was also adopted directing each Annual Conference to pay its proportional allowance for the support of the bishops. As the number of married ministers was increasing, the Conference urgently recommended to the churches the erection of suitable parsonages. An additional Annual Conference was created, increasing the number to seven. The most important action was the removal of the Book Concern from Philadelphia to New York. We have no information why this was done, but as Mr. Dickins, the agent, had died from yellow fever during the interval preceding the Conference, and as the yellow fever had so severely scourged Philadelphia for several years, the removal may have been suggested by this cause.

Fourth Conference, 1804.—This session assembled in Baltimore on the 6th of May. The journals inform us that "according to the custom which prevailed, the Discipline was read over paragraph by paragraph, and a vote was taken on each section." The bishops were directed to allow the Annual Conferences to sit at least a week, and they were prohibited from permitting any preacher to remain more than two years successively in the same section or circuit. Prior to this time, that is, for twenty years after the organization of the Church, there was no limit set to the number of years a preacher might remain in the same appointment. Though the general practice had been to change very frequently, sometimes as often as every six months, and in some instances every three months, yet there were ministers who had remained for three or four years, and it is said the limitation arose from the fact that a few ministers desired to continue more permanently in the larger stations. A proposition to change the form of the General Conferences into a delegated body was voted down, but it was understood that the matter should be laid before the Annual Conferences that they might more fully express their wishes.

Fifth Conference, 1808.—Historically, this session was one of the most important ever held. The plan of a delegated General Conference had been discussed by the various Annual Conferences, and five out of the seven had given it their approval. At the assembling of the body, a committee of fourteen, or of two from each Annual Conference, were appointed, who, after consideration, reported in favor of the measure. The preachers of the Baltimore and Philadelphia Conferences, however, constituted a majority of the ministers in attendance at the General Conference, and they were unfavorable to the measure, as it would take out of their hands the power of control which they had held owing to their proximity to the place of meeting. The plan proposed also limited the power of the General Conference, as the ministers were unwilling that a small delegated body should have the power of changing the essential characteristics of the church. The committee reported against allowing the General Conference to change the doctrines, the General Rules, the episcopal character of the church, or the plan of its itinerant general superintendency, without these changes being first referred to the great body of the ministers in the Annual Conferences and receiving their sanction. At that time it was understood that this restriction would prevent any alteration in the appointment of presiding elders; and as the leading members of the Philadelphia Conference and some of the Baltimore preachers desired such a change, the proposed plan with its restrictions was laid upon the table to be considered more fully; and as a preparatory question, a proposition was made authorizing each Annual Conference to elect without debate, and by ballot, its own presiding elders. After an able and exhaustive debate of three days, the proposition was lost by a vote of 52 for and 73 against. This question having been settled by the Conference, the consideration of the plan was resumed and was at first defeated; subsequently, it was re-introduced and adopted, with the restrictions now existing, except that it then required, not a majority of three-fourths as now, but a majority of all the Annual Conferences to change any of these restrictions, and such remained the law of the church until 1832. The General Conference was by this plan to consist of not more than one delegate for every five members of the Annual Conference, nor of a less number than one for every seven, and it was to possess, except as limited by the restrictions, full power to legislate for the church. Bishop Whatcoat having died since the last General Conference, his place was filled by the election of Bishop McKendree, who had been an exceedingly active and popular minister, and who had filled the office of presiding elder for a number of years in the Western Conference.

Sixth General Conference, First Delegated, 1812.

—This body met in the city of New York on the 1st day of May, 1812, being composed of one representative for every five members of the various Annual Conferences. It consisted of ninety members. The bishops who had previously been members of General Conferences, and as such had taken part in the debates, were now limited to the simple office of presiding. Owing to this change Bishop McKendree made to the General Conference a communication in writing, giving a sketch of the condition of the church and making such suggestions as he deemed appropriate. The precedent thus set has since that time been followed by the bishops. Bishop Asbury, instead of a written communication, made an able address, directed chiefly to Bishop McKendree. No changes of much moment were adopted at this session.

Seventh Conference, 1816.—The Conference met in the city of Baltimore. In March preceeding the session Bishop Asbury, who had long been in feeble health, died in Virginia, and as but one bishop remained and the church had largely extended its borders, the Conference elected Enoch George, of the Baltimore Conference, and Robert R. Roberts, of the Philadelphia Conference, as additional bishops. The number of Annual Conferences was increased to eleven, and the bishops were authorized to add a twelfth if in their judgment certain conditions of the church required it. The necessity of a church periodical was becoming deeply felt, and the Conference authorized the publication of a monthly Methodist magazine, which being commenced in the ensuing year, was the precursor of the vast number of periodicals which have issued from the church press. As the number of ministers had largely increased, the ratio of delegation was changed from five to seven.

Eighth Conference, 1820.—The ratio of delegation having been changed, this Conference was composed of eighty-nine delegates, who met in the city of Baltimore; the formation of the Missionary Society and of the Tract Society, which had taken place in New York in the interim, was approved, and they were recommended to the patronage of the church. A great interest having been felt in the cause of education, the Annual Conferences were recommended to found academies and institutions of learning. Difficulties having arisen in reference to the work in Canada, between the Wesleyans in England and the Methodist Episcopal Church, an address was sent to the British Conference, and the bishops were also authorized, if they judged best, to send a delegate; accordingly, John Emory, afterwards bishop, was appointed. Conference resolved to elect an additional bishop, and Joshua Soule, who had been serving as book agent at New York, received a majority of the votes. The question of electing presiding elders was brought up at this Conference, and a long debate ensued. Bishop McKendree, who was in feeble health, was not present during this part of the session. Bishop George was actively in favor of the proposed measure and exerted his influence in that direction. Bishop Roberts was unwilling to exercise any influence whatever. As the debate progressed, and it became evident the measure would not carry, a compromise was proposed, and a committee was appointed to confer with the bishops. Bishop George invited this committee to meet him. After consultation they agreed that whenever a vacancy occurred the bishop should nominate three persons, of whom the Conference should choose one by ballot without debate. As this was reported to the Conference by a committee who had been appointed to meet the bishops, it was adopted without debate as a compromise measure by a considerable majority. Bishop McKendree, who had been absent from the city, returning to the Conference, expressed his decided conviction that the action was a violation of the third restrictive rule, and in this view Bishop Roberts concurred with him. Bishop Soule, who had been elected by the vote of the Conference but not yet ordained, believing the plan to be unconstitutional, informed the bishops he was unwilling to administer under it. Some discussion followed in the General Conference when the bishops communicated to them this fact, and Bishop Soule declined to be ordained, and resigned his office. The majority of the Conference voted to suspend the resolution for four years, and directed the bishops to administer under the Discipline as formerly constituted. They also added a resolution recommending the Annual Conferences to so alter the Discipline that if a majority of the bishops judged any measure unconstitutional, they should return it to the Conference with their objections, and a majority of two-thirds should be required for its final passage. This measure failed, as it did not receive a majority of all the Annual Conferences.

Ninth Conference, 1824.—The majority of the Annual Conferences having expressed their opinion that the changes proposed in the presiding eldership were unconstitutional, they were by one resolution declared null and void; by a second, they were continued as suspended until 1828. These resolutions do not seem to be in harmony. An old member of the General Conference explains them by saying that Conference had adopted a rule requiring a second vote on a different day for the passage of an important measure, but there is no trace of such a rule on the journal of the Conference. At this session Bishop Soule, who had resigned the office at the previous session, was re-elected bishop on the second ballot, and on the third Elijah Hedding was also elected bishop. As the representation was becoming inconveniently large, the Annual Conferences were requested to change one of the Restrictive Rules, so as to allow of a representation of not less than one for every twenty-one. This proposition, however, failed to receive a majority of each Annual Conference, and was therefore lost. The British Conference, in return for the visit of John Emory, sent Rev. Richard Reese and Rev. John Hannah as delegates from their body.

Tenth Conference, 1828.—The General Conference assembled for the first time west of the Alleghany Mountains, in the city of Pittsburgh. For nearly eight years the church had suffered from much excitement on questions of church polity. After the Conference of 1820 a reform party was organized, exciting articles were published in a paper founded for the purpose, and the action of the General Conference was assailed, and especially the office and administration of bishops and presiding elders. After the decision of the General Conference in 1824, the Baltimore Conference exercised discipline on some of its ministers for statements made in these publications, and discipline was also exercised upon some members for participating in the organization of Union societies, which were understood to be forms of opposition against the Discipline of the church. An appeal was taken to the General Conference, and at this session the judgment and action of the Baltimore Conference were sustained. The question of lay delegation, which was also warmly supported by the persons and periodicals alluded to, was also brought before the attention of the General Conference, and a report was adopted that it was inexpedient. The Annual Conferences were again requested to concur in changing the Restrictive Rules, so that any one might be altered on the recommendation of three-fourths of the members of the Annual Conferences by two-thirds of the ensuing General Conference. In this request the Annual Conferences subsequently concurred, and since that date it has continued to be the law of the church. The work in Canada having been constituted in 1824 a separate Conference, it addressed a memorial to the General Conference requesting to receive an organization into a distinct church, owing to embarrassments arising out of the different government under which they lived. The Conference assumed they had no right to divide the church, but, considering the work in Canada as having been missionary in its character, a resolution was adopted that if the Canadian Conference should elect a superintendent the bishops were authorized to ordain him. Under this action, at its following session the Canadian Conference declared itself an independent church, and elected a bishop; but, as the person elected declined the office, there was no ordination; subsequently the large part of the church in Canada united with the Wesleyans in England.

Eleventh Conference, 1832.—The Conference met in the city of Philadelphia. During the preceding quadrennium the reform element, which had desired an alteration in the episcopacy and presiding eldership, seceded from the church and established a separate organization, and there was but little division of opinion on matters of church government among the members of the body. James O. Andrew, of Georgia, and John Emory, of Baltimore, were elected bishops. A number of petitions were presented to the Conference asking for a more stringent rule on the subject of temperance, but no decided action was taken. The establishment of The Western Christian Advocate, to be published at Cincinnati, was authorized.

Twelfth Conference, 1836.—Conference met in the city of Cincinnati, and was chiefly distinguished for an excitement which arose on the subject of slavery. An agitation had commenced in a number of the Northern States on this question, and several Northern Conferences had forwarded petitions asking for a change in the General Rules, so as to exclude all slaveholders from the communion of the church. The Methodists, at a very early period before the organization of the church, had adopted the most stringent regulations, but by the increased influence of members in the South these had been relaxed, and slaveholding was tolerated in certain sections of the country. Where the law allowed the minister to free his slaves he was required to do so; but where the law forbade it this action was not required. During the session of the Conference a general anti-slavery meeting was called in the city of Cincinnati. Two members of the Conference attended and took part in the public discussions. During the meeting the church was severely denounced, and opprobrious epithets were employed against its ministers. This produced no little feeling in the Conference, and a resolution was introduced disapproving of the conduct of the two members in attending such a meeting, and a vote of censure was passed by 120 to 14. Any right to interfere with the civil or political relations between master and slave was in another resolution disclaimed. This action of the General Conference produced great excitement, especially in the northern part of the church, and greatly increased the agitation which had commenced.

The Book Concern at New York having been burned shortly before the session of the General Conference, some friends in Baltimore, and also a gentleman in Philadelphia, tendered the General Conference ground for the erection of a suitable building in their respective cities, but after a full consideration the location was continued in New York. At this session, Beverly Waugh, of Baltimore, Wilbur Fisk, president of the Wesleyan University, and Thomas A. Morris, editor of The Advocate at Cincinnati, were elected bishops. Dr. Fisk was at that time absent in Europe, and on his return declined to accept the office, believing it to be his duty to remain in the University.

Thirteenth Conference, 1840.—Twenty-eight Annual Conferences were represented in this session, held at Baltimore. Five new Annual Conferences were formed. A number of petitions were presented asking for the extension of the ministerial term to three years, but no change was made. During the preceding quadrennium various matters had been presented to the Annual Conferences which some of the bishops had ruled out as not being within the scope of their regular work. This action was objected to by some of the Annual Conferences, and criticised severely by a number of writers. The bishops laid the matter before the General Conference, and, after full consideration, it was decided that "it was their right, as administrators, not to entertain business which did not refer to the duties of the Conference as prescribed in the Discipline, or which did not arise in connection with the interests of the charges in their bounds." The same principle was extended to Quarterly Conferences. The subject of slavery was exciting increased attention in the country, and memorials were presented asking an alteration of the Discipline, but no action was taken. Memorials were also presented on the subject of lay representation, the presiding eldership, and episcopacy, and a report adverse to any change was adopted. At the request of the Ohio Conference, book agents were authorized to establish a periodical for women as soon as sufficient patronage could be obtained. The result was the establishment of The Ladies' Repository, with L. L. Hamline as its first editor. The New England Conference asked for an alteration of the Discipline which should prohibit bishops from transferring members from one Conference to another, in opposition either to the person's wishes or the wishes of a majority of the Conference. The General Conference decided adversely, considering the transfer of ministers essential for the strengthening of weak points and for the preservation of union. A remarkable work having commenced during the quadrennium among the German population under Dr. Nast, and the Book Concern at Cincinnati having established a German periodical, the Conference approved the action, and Dr. Nast was elected editor of the German paper.

Fourteenth Conference, 1844.—This memorable Conference met in New York. The subject of slavery created an unprecedented excitement. A few weeks before its session the Baltimore Conference had suspended one of its members from the ministry for refusing to manumit certain slaves received through marriage. He appealed to the General Conference, and the action of the Baltimore Conference was sustained by the decisive vote of 117 to 56. Bishop J. O. Andrew, who resided in Georgia, had a short time previously married a lady who was an owner of slaves; the case was brought before the Conference, and, though the laws of Georgia did not admit of their emancipation, yet as the bishop was free to select his own place of residence the Conference believed that in his case emancipation was practicable. A long and warm discussion arose, and finally, on a vote of 110 to 68, the Conference declared its judgment that Bishop Andrew should "desist from the exercise of his office so long as this impediment remained." The members from the Southern States were deeply excited by this action, and they presented to the Conference a paper stating that, "in their judgment, it was impossible for their ministry to be successful in the South under its jurisdiction." Some preparatory measures were adopted by the Conference looking to the contingency of a separation, and the following year a large part of the Southern territory was organized into the Methodist Episcopal Church South. The death of Bishop Roberts and the extension of the work led to the election of two bishops, to wit, L. L. Hamline, of Cincinnati, and Edmund S. Janes, of New York. The Annual Conferences were requested to concur in the suspension of the Restrictive Rule, so as to restore Mr. Wesley's original rule on the subject of temperance. The session continued until the 11th of June, being the longest as well as the most exciting session on record.

Fifteenth Conference, 1848.—The Conference met for the second time in Pittsburgh. Much of its time was spent in considering questions growing out of the separation of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. A resolution was passed declaring that the General Conference had no power, either directly or indirectly, to effectuate or sanction a division of the church. Dr. Lovick Pierce had been sent by the Southern church to propose fraternal relations. The Conference received him, personally, cordially, and were ready to grant him any personal courtesy, but declined to adopt fraternal relations, as a suit was then threatened in the United States Court, and they considered that the provisions of the plan of the General Conference had not been carefully regarded. The Annual Conferences having refused to give consent to an alteration of the Restrictive Rule, so as to divide the property of the Book Concern, resolutions were adopted authorizing the book agents, if they could legally do so, to submit the matters in dispute to arbitration. This, however, was not effected, and a suit was commenced by the South, which was finally decided in their favor. California having been incorporated into the Union, as a result of the Mexican War, a Conference was established on the Pacific coast.

Sixteenth Conference, 1852.—This Conference met for the first time in the city of Boston, and was most pleasantly entertained. An excursion down the bay was tendered by the city authorities, and divers other courtesies were extended. Bishop Hamline, on account of impaired health, resigned his episcopal office. This resignation and the death of Bishop Hedding made it necessary to increase the number of bishops. On the first ballot Levi Scott, Matthew Simpson, Edward R. Ames, and Osmon C. Baker were elected. An appeal from the Ohio Conference brought the question of pew churches in review. After considerable discussion the rule forbidding their erection was rescinded, but another was adopted expressing a decided judgment in favor of free churches. A Convention which had been held in Philadelphia presented through a committee a memorial on the subject of lay delegation. A large committee was appointed to consider the memorials and to hear the various representations, but it was decided that the introduction of lay delegation at that time was not expedient.

Seventeenth Conference, 1856.—This session was held in Indianapolis, being a farther point West than any previous session had been held. The subject of slavery was brought before the Conference in various requests to change the General Rule. While the change was not made, the Conference felt it to be its duty to make a strong and decided utterance. A theological school having been established some years previously in Concord, N. H., and a large property having been proffered by Mrs. Garrett for the establishment of a biblical school near Chicago, the measure received the approval of the General Conference, and was the first indorsement of strictly theological schools. The Conference also authorized the election of missionary bishops under certain circumstances, provided the Annual Conferences would concur in the alteration of the Restrictive Rule. The measure received, subsequently, the requisite majority, and Francis Burns, of the Liberia Conference, was ordained to that office, being the first colored minister placed by the church in that post.

Eighteenth Conference, 1860.—Conference met in Buffalo. Many of the Annual Conferences had earnestly desired a change in the General Rule on slavery, but a constitutional majority had not concurred. The chapter on slavery was altered so as to give a more distinct and strong expression against the evils of slavery. The question of lay delegation was fully considered, and the General Conference adopted a report favoring lay delegation whenever a majority of the members and ministers desired it. The vote of the membership and of the Conferences was subsequently taken, and the matter was decided in the negative.

Nineteenth Conference, 1864.—This session was held in the city of Philadelphia during a period of great civil excitement. The Southern States had attempted, in 1861, to secede, and their course had led to a terrible civil war. The sympathy and support of the membership of the church was earnestly given to the government, and the records of the nation show that a large proportion of the soldiers were furnished from their congregations. A committee was appointed to express to President Lincoln their sympathy, and to assure him of the determination of both ministers and members to sustain the government, both by their prayers and efforts. Mr. Lincoln in his response said, "Nobly sustained as the government has been by all the churches, I would utter nothing which might in the least appear invidious against any; yet without this it may fairly be said that the Methodist Episcopal Church, not less devoted than the best, is by its great numbers the most important of all. It is no fault in others that the Methodist Episcopal Church sends more soldiers to the field, more nurses to the hospitals, and more prayers to Heaven than any. God bless the Methodist Church! God bless all the churches! Blessed be God, who in this our great trial gave us the churches!"

To meet the general wants of the church three additional bishops were elected, to wit, Davis W. Clark, Edward Thomson, and Calvin Kingsley. As the Union army had occupied a portion of the Southern States, the Union men in those sections urgently desired that ministers should be sent to them. In answer to their request the borders of the church were extended, new Annual Conferences were formed, and authority was given to the bishops to form such other Conferences as might be necessary for the interests of the work. The Annual Conferences having recommended the alteration of the Restrictive Rule so as to absolutely forbid slaveholding in the church, the requisite change was made in the Discipline. The term of ministerial appointments was also extended from two to three years, and a board of trustees was appointed—subsequently chartered by the legislature of Ohio—for the purpose of holding donations and bequests made to the church, and Conference adopted a plan for the establishment of the Church Extension Society, with its central office in Philadelphia, and also arranged preparatory measures for holding centennial services in 1866.

Twentieth Conference, 1868.—This session was held in the city of Chicago, the farthest point West at which any session has been held. The Conferences which had been newly formed in the South and the Mission Conferences elected delegates, who applied for admission, and, after an earnest debate, the question was decided in the affirmative. The Conference also reaffirmed its willingness to admit lay delegation when the church desired it. A contingent plan for its introduction was adopted, and the matter was referred to a vote of the people and preachers, to be taken in 1869. The subject was discussed in the periodicals of the church, and out of more than 200,000 votes cast by the laity more than two to one desired a change. The Annual Conferences agreed to the alteration of the Restrictive Rule, so that the measure might be adopted.

Twenty-first Conference, 1872.—The church had been painfully bereaved of four of its bishops since the last session, Bishops Thomson, Kingsley, Clark, and Baker. Bishop Kingsley fell, when at Beyrout, Syria, after having visited China and India to superintend the missions, and having almost completed the circuit of the globe. As there had been so many deaths, and the borders of the church were largely extended, eight additional bishops were elected, to wit, Thomas Bowman, William L. Harris, Randolph S. Foster, Isaac W. Wiley, Stephen M. Merrill, Edward G. Andrew, Gilbert Haven, and Jesse T. Peek. They were consecrated on the 24th of May. The occasion was one of great solemnity and interest, as never before had so large a number been consecrated at one time. This Conference selected places of residence for the bishops, that they might the better supervise the entire work, allowing the bishops to select according to seniority of office. The lay delegates which had been appointed under the contingent plan were present, and, after the full sanction of the plan by the General Conference, they were admitted to their seats. The session of the Conference was somewhat protracted on account of some difficulties which had arisen in the management of the Book Concern, but, after full examination, a report was adopted which proved satisfactory both to the Conference and to the church. An important change was made in the constitution of the various benevolent societies, so that they should no longer be simply voluntary associations, but should be under the management of boards elected by the General Conference.

Twenty-second Conference, 1876.—The last session of the General Conference was held in the city of Baltimore, and the various interests of the church were carefully examined but no important changes were made. The subject of the presiding eldership was discussed but no change was adopted. Propositions to change the ratio of delegation to the General Conference, and also to suspend the third Restrictive Rule so as to allow the number of districts to be determined by the Annual Conferences, were sent down to the Conferences. Measures were also adopted to change The Ladies' Repository to a periodical of higher literary merit. The next session is to be held at Cincinnati, O., May 1, 1880.

General Conference Districts.—For the convenience of managing the general interests of the M. E. Church the General Conference divides the entire territory occupied by the church at home and in foreign lands into twelve districts, including a certain number of Conferences in each district. From each of these districts one member is selected by the General Conference to serve on the general book committee; a second to represent the interests of missions and church extension; and one minister and one layman to represent the interests of the Freedman's Aid Society. These persons hold their office until the session of the ensuing General Conference. Their expenses in attending to the interests of the church are provided for by the societies or interests which they represent.

General Rules.—In 1743, Messrs. John and Charles Wesley drew up for their societies a small tract pointing out the true characteristics of a Christian life and deportment. As it contained a number of directions for Christian conduct, it received the name of "General Rules." Conforming to these was made the condition of continuance in the Methodist societies. These rules continue to be respected and observed by the Wesleyan Methodists in England, and by all the branches of the Methodist family which have sprung from them. Mr. Wesley's original rule on temperance was for some time modified in the M. E. Church, but in 1848 was restored by the General Conference to its integrity. The rule now existing on slavery in the Discipline of the M. E. Church was not among Mr. Wesley's original rules. It was added in America in 1789. The Discipline requires that these rules should be read in the churches on certain occasions, and that a copy should be given to persons desiring admission on their first meeting in class. They are as follows:

"(1) In the latter end of the year 1739, eight or ten persons came to Mr. Wesley in London, who appeared to be deeply convinced of sin, and earnestly groaning for redemption. They desired (as did two or three more the next day) that he would spend some time with them in prayer, and advise them how to flee from the wrath to come, which they saw continually hanging over their heads.

That he might have more time for this great work, he appointed a day when they might all come together; which from thenceforward they did every week, namely, on Thursday, in the evening. To these, and as many more as desired to join with them (for their number increased daily), he gave those advices from time to time which he judged most needful for them; and they always concluded their meeting with prayer suited to their several necessities.

"(2) This was the rise of the UNITED SOCIETY, first in Europe and then in America. Such a society is no other than 'a company of men having the form and seeking the power of godliness, united in order to pray together, to receive the word of exhortation, and to watch over one another in love, that they may help each other to work out their salvation.'

"(3) That it may the more easily be discerned whether they are indeed working out their own salvation, each society is divided into smaller companies, called classes, according to their respective places of abode. There are about twelve persons in a class, one of whom is styled the leader. It is his duty,

"1. To see each person in his class once a week at least; in order,

"1. To inquire how their souls prosper.

"2. To advise, reprove, comfort, or exhort, as occasion may require.

"3. To receive what they are willing to give toward the relief of the preachers, Church, and poor.*

"II. To meet the ministers and the stewards of the Society once a week: in order,

"1. To inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any that walk disorderly, and will not be reprov'd.

"2. To pay the stewards what they have received of their several classes in the week preceding.

"(4) There is only one condition previously required of those who desire admission into these societies, 'a desire to flee from the wrath to come, and to be saved from their sins.' But wherever this is really fixed in the soul, it will be shown by its fruits. It is therefore expected of all who continue therein, that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation,

"First, By doing no harm, by avoiding evil of every kind, especially that which is most generally practiced, such as,

"The taking of the name of God in vain.

"The profaning the day of the Lord, either by doing ordinary work therein, or by buying or selling.

"Drunkenness, buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity.

"Slaveholding; buying or selling slaves.

"Fighting, quarreling, brawling, brother going to law with brother; returning evil for evil, or railing for railing: the using many words in buying or selling.

"The buying or selling goods that have not paid the duty.

"The giving or taking things on usury, that is, unlawful interest.

"Uncharitable or unprofitable conversation; particularly speaking evil of magistrates or of ministers.

"Doing to others as we would not they should do unto us,

"Doing what we know is not for the glory of God: as

"The putting on of gold and costly apparel.

"The taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus.

"The singing those songs or reading those books which do not tend to the knowledge or love of God.

"Softness and needless self-indulgence.

"Laying up treasure upon earth.

"Borrowing without a probability of paying: or taking up goods without a probability of paying for them.

"(5) It is expected of all who continue in these societies that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation.

"Secondly, By doing good: by being in every kind merciful after their power: as they have opportunity, doing good of every possible sort, and, as far as possible, to all men.

"To their bodies, of the ability which God giveth by giving food to the hungry, by clothing the naked, by visiting or helping them that are sick or in prison.

"To their souls, by instructing, reprov'ing, or exhorting all we have any intercourse with: trampling under foot that enthusiastic doctrine, that 'we are not to do good unless our hearts be free to it.'

"By doing good, especially to them that are of the household of faith, or groaning so to be: employing them preferably to others; buying one of another; helping each other in business: and so much the more because the world will love its own and them only.

"By all possible diligence and frugality, that the Gospel be not blamed.

"By running with patience the race which is set before them, denying themselves, and taking up their cross daily: submitting to bear the reproach of Christ, to be as the filth and offscouring of the world: and looking that men should say all manner of evil of them falsely for the Lord's sake.

* This part refers to towns and cities; where the poor are generally numerous, and Church expenses considerable.

"(6) It is expected of all who desire to continue in these societies that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation,

"Thirdly, By attending upon all the ordinances of God; such are,

"The public worship of God:

"The ministry of the word, either read or expounded:

"The Supper of the Lord:

"Family and private prayer:

"Searching the Scriptures: and

"Fasting or abstinence.

"(7) These are the General Rules of our societies; all which we are taught of God to observe, even in his written word, which is the only rule, and the sufficient rule, both of our faith and practice. And all these we know his Spirit writes on truly awakened hearts. If there be any among us who observe them not, who habitually break any of them, let it be known unto them who watch over that soul as they who must give an account. We will admonish him of the error of his ways. We will bear with him for a season. But if then he repent not, he hath no more place among us. We have delivered our own souls."

Genesee Conference, as now constituted, embraces the territory which, at the last General Conference, was included in the Western New York and East Genesee, and includes all that part of the State of New York (except what is included in the Erie Conference) lying west of "a line beginning at Sodus Bay, and running south on the east line of the towns of Sodus and Lyons, in Wayne County, and the east line of Ontario County to Seneca Lake; thence south of the said lake to Watkins; thence south to the New York State line, leaving the charge of Watkins, Havana, Millport, and Horseheads in Central New York Conference." It also includes what is known as the Troy district, in the State of Pennsylvania.

The old Genesee Conference was organized in 1810, under a provisional authority, which was given to the bishops, and it included that part of Pennsylvania which is embraced in the Wyoming and Genesee Conferences, and all the State of New York lying west of the Troy Conference, and also extended into Upper and Lower Canada, and into what was then the Territory of Maine. In 1824, when the Pittsburgh Conference was organized, that part of the State of New York which now belongs to Erie Conference was detached from Genesee, and the same year the Provinces of Canada were constituted into an Annual Conference. In 1832 the Oneida Conference was organized, which separated from the Genesee Conference that part of the State lying east of Cayuga Lake. In 1848 it was divided into two parts: the western part retained the name of the Genesee Conference, and the eastern that of East Genesee, the dividing line being the Genesee River, the city of Rochester being on the East Genesee side. The boundaries being thus restricted, several ineffectual efforts were made by their delegates in General Conference to add the portion of Western New York which is included in the Erie Conference. An unfortunate agitation occurred a few years after the separation from the East Genesee Conference, known as Naziritism, and which involved at one time a considerable portion of the Conference. An association was formed by a number of ministers who professed to aim at greater purity of life and greater simplicity in church service, and who claimed to restore the church to its original condition. They also endeavored to obtain the control of the Conference, and to secure its principal offices. The existence of the association being known, the matter was brought before the Conference, which passed an act of disapprobation upon the proceedings, and urgently recommended a discontinuance of the association. The leaders, however, persevered, and were expelled or suspended for contumacy and opposition to church order, and in some cases for alleged breaches of veracity. They immediately organized into a distinct body, and divided many of the churches, everywhere denouncing the old church and its ministers as fallen and hypocritical. The litigations for property, the contentions and controversies which followed, greatly retarded the progress of the church. Feeling that its boundaries were too small, an effort was made in the General Conference of 1872 for the enlargement of its area, and, after much discussion, a plan was adopted by which the five Conferences were divided into four; the East Genesee Conference was abolished, the western part of the territory being attached to the Genesee Conference, the name of which was changed to the Western New York, and the eastern portion attached to the Central New York Conference, which took chiefly the place of Oneida. Many of the ministers and members in the bounds of what had been the East Genesee Conference were deeply afflicted at the division. As the change had been but little discussed or expected, a Convention was held asking for the restoration of the Conference line; and in 1876 the East Genesee Conference was restored, except a small portion near the southern line of New York, which remained attached to the Central New York Conference. This change of line, and the conviction that these Conferences were too small, operated upon the minds of many, and at the ensuing Annual Conferences the Western New York Conference and the East Genesee Conference appointed commissioners under the provision of the General Conference on the subject of the change of boundaries. These commissioners met, and recommended the obliteration of the division line, and the formal reunion of the Western New York and East Genesee Conferences, to constitute the Genesee, having nearly the boundaries which it had prior to the division in 1848. This recommendation was submitted, first, to the Western New York Conference, and was by them unanimously adopted, and afterwards was submitted to the East Genesee Conference, and adopted without a dissenting vote, both Conferences requesting the presiding bishops to agree to their reunion at that session. Accordingly, Bishop Ames, who presided at the Western New York Conference in 1876, and Bishop Simpson, who presided at the East Genesee Conference, having signified their concurrence, the Western New York Conference adjourned, and re-assembled with the East Genesee Conference; and the two bodies united formally in one, without a dissenting vote ratified the union, and the subsequent proceedings were conducted in the name of the Genesee Conference.

Genesee Wesleyan Seminary is located at Lima, in Western New York. It is in the centre of a rich agricultural district, and Lima was once termed the "Flower-Bed" of the "Garden" of Western New York. The Genesee Conference in 1829 appointed a committee of five to report at the next session preparatory measures for the erection of a seminary. At the session of 1831 the trustees reported to the Conference, and a committee of three was appointed, who memorialized the legislature for the incorporation of the seminary. During that year Rev. Dr. Samuel Luckey was elected principal, and was transferred from the New York to the Genesee Conference. He remained at its head until elected by the General Conference of 1836 editor of The Christian Advocate and Journal. The institution opened most favorably, the report to the Conference of 1832 showing that the whole number of students during the year was 341, and the number attending at one time about 170 or 180. A revival occurring in the institution was the means of the conversion of about 40 students. Means were arranged by the agents for the erection of handsome buildings. The history of the institution under the administration of Schuyler Seager, and others, was one of great prosperity; no other institution in the church accomplishing apparently more in the education of active and useful young men and young women. In 1850 it was resolved to enlarge the institution from a seminary into a college, or to connect a college with the seminary; and Rev. Dr. Tefft, editor of The Ladies' Repository, was elected president. The location of the college, however, was thought by many not to be sufficiently central, and some embarrassments having arisen, it was resolved to establish a college in a more central location. Syracuse was selected, and the college department at Lima was abandoned. The seminary, however, has been continued. The establishment of high schools in all the large towns, and especially of normal schools in different parts of the State, diminished the number of students attending the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary. The seminary is now under the presidency of Rev. G. H. Bridgeman, who is assisted by a board of able teachers. It has large and commodious buildings, and has all the facilities of a first-class seminary.

Geneseo, Ill. (pop. 3042), in Henry County, is on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad. It first appears in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1855, when H. J. Humphrey was sent as pastor, who reported, in 1856, 70 members. It is in the Central Illinois Conference, and reports 155 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $21,500 church property. The German Methodists report 43 members, 32 Sunday-school scholars, and $4500 church property.

Geneva, capital of the Swiss canton of the same town, is famous not only for its beautiful site on the borders of the lake, in the neighborhood of majestic mountains, but for its historic and religious associations. It was for many years the home of Calvin, who was not only the spiritual leader of the people, but who gained and exercised great temporal influence. It was long the metropolis of Calvinism, and it exercised great influence in France. By the influx of Roman Catholic population from adjacent territories, and by the influence of Rationalism on the Protestant churches, its high theological tone has not been preserved. The evangelical party some years since organized a theological school, which has become famous through Professors Merle d'Aubigné and Gausson. The French Methodists have occasionally held services in Geneva, but no permanent congregation has been organized.

Geneva, N. Y. (pop. 5521), is situated at the head of Seneca Lake, on the New York Central Railroad. Methodist services were introduced about 1812 by William Snow, then on the Lyon circuit. In 1818 a class of 13 was organized, and the early meetings were held in shops or school-houses. Its first appearance on the minutes of the M. E. Church is in 1821. Loring Grant was then appointed pastor, and under his labors a church edifice was erected. In 1828 it became a station, and reported 75 members. It is in the Genesee Conference, and reports (1876) 306 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $29,000 church property.

Genuflection, the act of kneeling in prayer, or of bending the knee. The early Christians, as Baronius asserts, knelt so frequently and so long that cavities were worn in the floor where they prayed. Jerome says that the knees of St. James had become through this practice as hard as those of camels. While the term genuflection is properly applied to all acts of kneeling in worship, it more generally signifies the simple bending of the knee for a moment, as performed by the Romanists and the High Church party in the English and Protestant Episcopal Churches at the name of Jesus, or in short prayers interspersed in other exercises,

Conference, and was stationed in the city of St. Louis. In 1872 he was transferred to the Central New York Conference, and was chosen as regent of the University of the State of New York. In 1877 he was transferred to Western Virginia Conference, and is stationed in Wheeling. He was a member of the General Conference in 1872 from the St. Louis Conference, and of the General

so that the posture is but momentary. The Methodist Churches practice and recommend kneeling in prayer, but do not practice what is generally termed genuflection.

George, Augustus C., D.D., was born at Vaughn, N. Y., April 22, 1824. He was educated at the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, Lima, N. Y., and joined the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1847. At the division of that Conference he fell into the East Genesee portion, and filled many important appointments, and was for several years presiding elder. In 1865 he was transferred to the Missouri

Conference of 1876 from the Central New York Conference. He has written much for the secular and religious press, and is the author of "Counsel to Converts," "Satisfying Portion," and "Short Sermons on Consecration." He also contributed a biographical sketch of Rutherford to the "Garden of Spices." He presented at the General Conference of 1876 resolutions in favor of an Ecumenical Conference, and is now one of the committee of correspondence on that subject.

George, Enoch, one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Lancaster Co., Va., in the year 1767 or 1768. He was brought up chiefly among Episcopalians, and attended the ministry of Rev. Devereux Jarratt, who was one of the most earnest and effective preachers of his time. Under this ministry he received his first religious impressions; but his father having changed his residence, where there were no evangelical clergymen, he neglected the Christian ordinances altogether. Subsequently he attended Methodist services held by John Easter, and shortly after experienced the comforts of religion. He was soon called to the exercise of public prayer and exhortation, and with great diffidence entered the field of labor as a preacher, and was sent by Bishop Asbury to assist in forming a circuit on the head-waters of the Catawba and Broad Rivers, in North Carolina. The difficulties were so great that he wrote to Bishop Asbury asking him to transfer him to some other field. But the good bishop replied, that "it was better for him to become inured to hardships while he was young, than when he was old and gray-headed his task would be easy." He was received on trial in 1790, and, after having filled several appointments, was made presiding elder in 1796. In 1798, on account of ill health, he traveled to the North, but in 1800 resumed his labors, and was appointed presiding elder of Potomac district, in the Baltimore Conference. His health failed a second time, and he located, but, in 1803, again resumed the work, and was stationed in Baltimore, Alexandria, Georgetown, and on Baltimore and Georgetown districts. In 1816, after the death of Bishop Asbury, he was elected and ordained bishop, and continued in the active discharge of his duties until his death, which took place at Staunton, Va., Aug. 23, 1828. He was a man of deep piety, of great simplicity of manners, a pathetic, powerful, and successful preacher, greatly beloved in life, and very extensively lamented in death.

Georgetown, D. C. (pop. 11 384), is situated on the left bank of the Potomac River, immediately west of Washington City, from which it is separated by Rock Creek. It was very early embraced within the bounds of the old Frederick circuit, and was occasionally visited by the pioneers of Methodism. Subsequently, in the division of the work, it was included in Fairfax circuit, and again in Alexandria. In 1801, Thomas Lyle was appointed to Georgetown, which appears for the first time on the minutes, and which included also the city of Washington. At the end of the year it reported for both Georgetown and Washington 111 members. The two places remained connected until 1805, when Seely Bunn was appointed to Georgetown, and reported the following year 202 members. It was visited frequently by Bishop Asbury. His first visit appears to have been in 1772, when he preached to a large number of slaves who were collected to hear him. He always spoke gratefully of his treatment by the citizens. Georgetown has grown but slowly compared with Washington, and the growth of the church has not been rapid. There is, however, a second church now associated with the charge. The African M. E. Church and the African Zion Church have congregations, but a large portion of the colored population adhere to the M. E. Church. It is in the Baltimore Conference, and reported in 1876 as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	310	352	$41,000
Colored M. E. Church.....	777	225	6,000
African M. E. Church.....	114	60	3,000

Georgia (pop. 1,184,109) was the last settled of the original thirteen States, and has an area of about 58,000 square miles. In 1732 the country between Savannah and Altamaha Rivers was granted by George II. to General James Oglethorpe and others. They founded Savannah, Feb. 1, 1733. In 1736 they imported Scotch Highlanders and Germans, who built several fortifications. In 1752 the Province was surrendered to King George, by whom governors were afterwards appointed. In 1775 Georgia united with the other Colonies, and sent deputies to Congress. Its first State constitution was adopted in 1777. From 1778 to 1782 it was occupied and controlled by the British army. It adopted the United States Constitution, in 1782, by a unanimous vote. For years it was engaged in bloody wars with the Indians, until they were compelled to sue for peace.

General Oglethorpe, having founded the Colony, returned to England and tried to influence the British Parliament to send out missionaries to the Indians, believing a door was open for their conversion. John Wesley accepted his invitation to go as a missionary, and left England for this purpose in 1735. He returned, however, in 1737, regarding his mission—at least in part—as a failure. The day before Wesley arrived in England Whitefield had sailed for Georgia, but remained only sixteen weeks. In 1740, Whitefield founded a mission orphan house in Savannah, but there was no permanent establishment of Methodism in Georgia until about 1784. In 1785 the minutes show that Beverly Allen was sent as missionary to Georgia, and the following year he reported 78 members. The first Annual Conference in this State was held April 9, 1788, and six members and four probationers attended. "Our little Conference," says one, "was about £61 deficient in their quarterage, nearly one-third of which was made up to them." In 1796 there were in the State 1174 members, which were included in six circuits. In 1806, Bishop Asbury says, "There were in the State 130 Methodist societies and about 5000 members, and Methodist ministers were preaching to about 130,000 of the population." In 1844, prior to the separation of the church, the Georgia Conference reported 37,049 white and 13,994 colored members. At the separation it adhered to the Church South, and, with the exception of some Methodist Protestants, continued to be the only Methodist organization in the State until near the close of the Civil War. The M. E. Church South has two Conferences, which are North Georgia and South Georgia, and which (1875) together reported 279 traveling and 646 local preachers, 82,824 members, and 39,503 Sunday-school scholars. After the close of the war the Methodist Episcopal Church organized a number of societies, and has now two Conferences, the Georgia and the Savannah,—the membership of the former being chiefly white, and of the latter colored. They reported together 15,692 members, 8023 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $130,960.

The African Methodist Episcopal Church has two Conferences, the Georgia and the North Georgia, which reported 31,138 members, 16,122 Sunday-school scholars, and $342,749 church property. The Methodist Protestant Church has a Conference, whose statistics are 30 preachers, 2462 members, 1152 Sunday-school scholars, and $15,899 church property. In addition to these, the African M. E. Zion Church and the Colored M. E. Church of America have a number of churches. The following table, compiled from the United States census of 1870, shows the relative strength of the leading denominations:

Denominations.	Organizations.	Edifices.	Sittings.	Property.
All denominations...	2837	2698	801,148	$3,261,955

Georgia Conference, African M. E. Church, was organized May 30, 1867. Its boundaries now include the southern part of the State of Georgia. At its session in December, 1876, it stationed 94 preachers, including 5 presiding elders. There were reported 12,814 members, 173 local preachers, 123 churches and 30 parsonages, valued at $124,414. 155 Sunday-schools, and 6824 Sunday-school scholars.

Georgia Conference, M. E. Church, was organized, under authority given to the bishops, as a Mission Conference by Bishop Clark. Its first session was held at Atlanta, Oct. 10, 1867, J. H. Caldwell acting as secretary. It reported at that time 40 traveling preachers, 66 local preachers, 10,613 members, 63 Sunday-schools, 4778 scholars, and 28 churches, valued at $25,250. The General Conference of 1868 determined that it should include the State of Georgia, and it so continued until, at the General Conference of 1876, the Savannah Conference, embracing the southern part of Georgia, and the principal part of the colored population, was separated from it. A book depository has been established within its bounds, at Atlanta, and The Methodist Advocate is issued under the editorship of Dr. E. Q. Fuller. Property has been purchased for the establishment of Clark University, in Atlanta, and a literary institution has also been commenced at Ellijay. Its statistics, reported in 1876, are as follows: 38 traveling and 45 local preachers, 2811 members, 31 Sunday-schools and 955 scholars, 65 churches, valued at $29,275, and 2 parsonages, valued at $1550.

Gere, John A., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Chester, Mass., April 8, 1799, and died in Shickshinny, Pa., June 3, 1874. Having left his native home, he was received into the M. E. Church, at Harper's Ferry, June 12, 1820. He was received into the Baltimore Conference in 1823. During an active ministry of more than half a century he filled many responsible positions, both in stations and upon districts, in the Baltimore, East Baltimore, and Central Pennsylvania Conferences. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1840, 1844, 1852, and 1872. "He was a man of great courage, and yet of equal meekness. These were controlling elements of his character. As a preacher he was sound in doctrine, clear in his statements of truth, earnest in his manner, and fearless in the presentation of practical duty."

German Book Concern, Bremen, Germany.—Rev. L. S. Jacoby preached his first sermon as pioneer missionary to Germany at Bremen, Dec. 23, 1849, and on the 21st day of May, 1850, appeared the first number of Der Evangelist as an organ of the M. E. Church, the brothers Charles and Henry Baker, of Baltimore, donating enough to cover all expenses for one year. In Bremen the list opened with 200 subscribers, and many German members in the United States subscribed for their friends in the fatherland. In 1854 Der Kinderfreund, a Sunday-school paper, was started, and in 1860 both papers were self-sustaining. The Hymn-Book, 22 tracts, General Rules, Articles of Faith, "Fletcher on the New Birth," "Wesley's Sermons," and "Fletcher's Appeal" were among the first publications of the mission, and 880,000 pages of tracts were distributed the first year. In 1859 the mission sold and distributed 400,000 tracts, 5000 Bibles, 11,000 Testaments, and Sept. 22, 1860, the printing-office and bindery was dedicated at Hastedt, a suburb of Bremen. When the Preachers' Seminary was moved to Frankfort, in 1868, the printing-office and bindery were removed to the former building. Since its commencement about 500,000 bound books and at least 500,000 children's books have been sold. In the eighteen years from 1850 to 1869 the Tract Society at Bremen distributed 9,500,000 tracts, leaflets, pamphlets, and children's tracts. Two steam presses and twelve binders can hardly do the work in the bindery.

The Evangelist has now 10,722, the Kinderfreund 7765, and the Quarterly Review 380 subscribers.

Dr. Doering is book agent and editor, and under his careful management the Book Concern has become more remunerative from year to year. Last year's net profits were 19,831 marks, or about $5000. The property is valued at 72,000 marks, on which there is a debt of 29,700 marks. Dr. Jacoby was forever planning, collecting material, translating, and printing. His large powers as superintendent gave him full scope to act on his judgment. He not only enlisted the Missionary, Tract, and Sunday-School Board in his work, but found in the American Bible Society, New York, and the Religious Tract Society of London, liberal aid to prosecute the work of spreading wholesome literature throughout Germany. Among the original publications of the Concern may be noticed Dr. Warren's "Einleitung zur Systematischen Theologie" and a little book on "Logik" by the same author; A. Rodemeyer, "Über Biblische Heiligung;" and Dr. A. Sulzberger has written two volumes of "Christian Dogmatics," which have been placed by the bishops in the course of study for the German ministers.

German Mission Conference, M. E. Church South.—A number of German societies had been organized in New Orleans and Texas in connection with the M. E. Church South, and were included within the bounds of their respective Conferences. In 1874 the General Conference organized these into a separate Conference, and its boundaries were so arranged as "to include so much of the State of Texas and Louisiana as is under the supervision of the German ministers of the Church South." It held its first session at Houston, Texas, Dec. 16, 1874, Bishop Keener presiding. There were then reported 19 traveling and 11 local preachers, 910 members, 22 Sunday-schools, and 837 Sunday-school scholars. The latest report (1875) is 22 traveling and 13 local preachers, 981 members, 24 Sunday-schools, and 985 scholars.

German Missions.—The large German population in the United States called the attention of the best minds in the church to the necessity of evangelizing the incoming masses. Bishop Asbury felt a great anxiety for German services, and when accompanied by Henry Boehm, invited him to preach in German whenever hearers could be obtained. Bishop Emory had been solicitous on this subject for several years, and in 1833 the subject of a German mission for Cincinnati was advocated by the book agents, Messrs. Holliday and Wright. March 9, 1835, a letter appeared in The Western Christian Advocate on the subject, and Thos. A. Morris, the late Bishop Morris, who was then editor, indorsed it in an editorial. While the church was asking what could be done, God had been preparing a number of men for missionaries as soon as the mission was begun. Wm. Nast was awakened on the banks of the Hudson by the preaching of Brother Romer, of the New York Conference, and after three years of doubts and fears was converted at Danville, O., January, 1835. Adam Miller, of German ancestry, born in Maryland, was converted in 1827, and felt constrained to prepare himself for the German work. John C. Lyon, who came to the United States in 1817, was converted at Baltimore, 1826, entered the Methodist itinerancy in 1828, and became the most able pulpit orator in the infancy of the German work. C. H. Doering came to the United States in 1836, and was converted at Wheeling, W. Va. John Swahlen was awakened in Switzerland, and came to Cincinnati, 1833, where he soon became the first fruit of the mission.

Wm. Nast was brought forward by Dr. Poe, and was sent as the first German missionary to the city of Cincinnati, in the fall of 1835. His labors met with little success that year, and in 1836 he was sent to the Columbus district. The result was that the church was discouraged and was ready to give up the work. Wm. Nast made an appeal to the Conference to continue its efforts, and to provide a German paper. The Conference was very conservative, and was afraid to venture more than the publication of the General Rules, Articles of Faith, and the Wesleyan Catechisms. 1837-38, Nast was returned to Cincinnati, and was more successful, so that German Methodism may be said to take its start in the fall of 1838, when the first society was formed, and 30 members reported. Dr. Nast soon found a helper in John Swahlen, and as Nast cannot sing, Swahlen claims to have been the best singer in the German work of that time. Nast preached in the church on Fourth Street, which is now St. Paul's church, Cincinnati, and afterwards had the use of Burke's church, on Vine Street.

This second mission was commenced in Pittsburgh, Pa., by Martin Hartman, who had been of the Evangelical Association. He had a helper by the name of Dr. Kiel. They were quite powerful revivalists, but both soon ran into such fanaticism that they almost ruined the work, and did great harm to many souls. The third mission was commenced Christmas, 1838, in Wheeling, W. Va., by John Swahlen, with a class of twelve, and here the first German Methodist Episcopal church edifice in the world was built by John Swahlen, and dedicated in 1840. Bishop Soule, who took a great interest in this work, appointed Adam Miller with a roving commission in the bounds of the Cincinnati and Lebanon districts. The Pittsburgh Conference began the Monroe mission with J. Swahlen and a local preacher, E. Riemenschneider, late missionary to Germany, and had a very successful year, as 165 members were reported by C. C. Best at its close. In 1839, Nast and Hofer reconnoitred in Lawrenceburg, Ind. Rev. J. Kisling was appointed missionary, and formed a number of societies into a circuit.

GERMAN CHURCH, BALTIMORE.

In 1840 missions were established in Alleghany City, and in Marietta, O. The mission in Louisville, Ky., commenced this year by Peter Schmucker, a former Lutheran pastor, by preaching in the streets, afterwards in a little Presbyterian chapel, and this charge has the honor of being first on the list of self-sustaining churches in the German work, not three years after its organization.

In 1841, Lyon built the first German M. E. Church east of the Alleghany Mountains, in Second Street, New York, which was dedicated by Bishops Morris and Hedding, May 4, 1843. This mother church of the East had then a membership of 130, and since then thousands of its converts have been scattered all over the States. Bishop Roberts sent P. Schmucker to New Orleans in 1842, who organized a society, and put Brother Bremer, a local preacher, in charge. In five years there were 19 missions, 20 missionaries, and 1500 members, which were scattered from New York City and Lake Erie to New Orleans.

In 1844 a new epoch in the work began. The scattered missions in the bounds of the different Conferences were formed into presiding elder districts, to facilitate the proper appointments, to examine candidates for the ministry, and to secure a better supervision. This made the work more compact, and the societies developed more healthfully. Two districts in the Ohio Conference, with C. H. Doering and Peter Schmucker as presiding elders, were formed.

The missions of Missouri and Illinois were thrown into the Missouri Conference, but on account of the separation of the Church South they were changed, in 1845, into the Illinois Conference, and formed into two districts, with L. S. Jacoby and William Nast as presiding elders.

In 1846 Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Newark, N. J., were the more prominent points where missions had been commenced, and a volume of Wesley's Sermons was published, translated by Dr. Nast. The Discipline had already done good service for several years.

In 1848 the church showed its confidence in this work by electing William Nast and L. S. Jacoby as delegates to the General Conference. In 1849 the Eastern work was formed into a district of the New York Conference, with John C. Lyon as presiding elder. In 1852, Nast, Lyon, and Kuhl were the delegates to the General Conference at Boston. The petition of the German preachers of the Ohio Conference to form German Conferences was not granted by the General Conference, but they divided the German work into five Conferences, viz., Ohio, Southeast Indiana, Illinois, Rock River, and New York. The preaching of the German delegates at Boston resulted in the formation of a German church. In 1856, G. L. Mulfinger, W. Nast, John Kisling, and Ph. Kuhl were the delegates from the West.

At the General Conference of 1860 there were five German delegates, and the members of the Cincinnati Conference again asked for the formation of German Conferences, but the demand being only a local one, the General Conference laid the matter over until the demand should become more general. The publication of a new hymn-book was authorized. During the next quadrennium the Civil War broke out, and the membership was reduced nearly 3000, owing to the large number who fell in the Union cause. In 1864 the Western Germans petitioned the General Conference so unanimously for German Conferences, that without debate three German Conferences were formed, viz., the Central, Northwest, and Southwest German, and the bishops were authorized to form the Eastern work into the East German Conference, which was done by Bishop Janes, April 11, 1866, leaving only the missions on the Pacific coast in the California Conference.

The Conferences very largely use the English language in their sessions out of respect for the bishops; they bring in their reports in both languages, the secretaries keep the minutes in English, and the work is so well done that no adverse criticism has been brought in by the general Conference committee on journals.

Below we give the statistics of the work to date:

German Orphan Asylums.—The war for the Union threw a great many orphans upon the attention of the German churches, and hence, in 1864, the Southwest German churches opened an orphan asylum at Warrenton, Mo., which very soon was crowded with about 100 children whose fathers had lost their lives in defense of the Union cause. Rev. Philip Kuhl with his wife have been for many years the "house parents" of the institution, and have managed the farm of 500 acres for the benefit of the orphanage. The orphans receive instruction in the elementary branches in both English and German, and such of them as show the necessary talent for a higher education are graduated into the German College, which is situated on the same grounds. The building is worth $5000. At present the number of orphans is not large.

The German Orphan Asylum at Berea, O., is situated very near the German Wallace College. It has very spacious grounds, and an excellent building of Ohio sandstone. Rev. William Ahrens, of the Central German Conference, has been the moving spirit in this enterprise, and on an average 50 children are sheltered, clothed, and educated here. The churches in the Central Chicago and East German Conferences have by annual collections paid for the property and run the institution by their "thanksgiving-day" collections. Brother Gottfried Lieberherr, who received his education at a Swiss orphanage, has been the "Hausvater" since 1865, and is a most excellent teacher and disciplinarian. It is a treat to hear these German orphans sing. Some of them have graduated to the German Wallace College. The Germans have thus been first in the field to start orphan asylums in the M. E. Church. Value of property, $40,000; debt, $4200; annual running expenses, $4500.

German Publications.—The first attempt to reach the Germans by means of the press was made in 1838, by translating the Wesleyan Catechisms I., II., III., the Articles of Faith, and the General Rules. Feb. 15, 1838, the Rev. Thos. Dunn, of the North Ohio Conference, wrote an article in The Western Christian Advocate, by which he aroused the church to the necessity of publishing a German paper, and about $3000 were raised by individuals to commence the enterprise. The bishops at their meeting in New York indorsed it, and, with Wm.

Nast as editor, the first number of the Christliche Apologete appeared January, 1839, and soon became a power in the land. It is still edited by Dr. Wm. Nast, and has about 14,825 subscribers. During the war many thousand copies followed the soldiers on their march.

In 1856 the General Conference ordered the publication of a Sunday-school paper called the Sunday-School Glocke, a semi-monthly, which has a circulation of 25,000. The Berean lessons, Bibel-forscher, has 21,500, and Haus und Hurd, a monthly magazine, 7000 subscribers: all of which are edited by Dr. H. Liebhart.

With the rise and growth of the German mission work the German publications have been increased, until the Western book agents have a larger list of German publications than any other house in the United States, and their sale of books of other houses, especially by import, is also very large. To R. A. W. Brühl, and later to H. Dickhaut, much of the success of that branch of the business is owing. The agents, Hitecock and Walden, publish now a catalogue of 128 pages of German publications. Nearly all the books are translations from the English or republications of German authors. The early preachers were too busy with missionary work to encourage authorship. Dr. Nast's "Commentary on the First Three Gospels" has been well received in the literary world, his Introduction has been placed by the bishops in the course of study, and his Catechism has been authorized by the General Conference. Dr. Liebhart has written "Das Buch der Gleichnisse," a compendium of illustrations: F. Kopp, a book on Holiness; Wm. Ahrens, a religious novel; J. C. Ryan, a commentary on "Revelation of John," and published some hymns which will never perish; Dr. Lobenstein, a volume of sermons; P. A. Mölling, "Golfblumen," etc. Dr. Liebhart has been untiring in editing German books both for the family and Sunday-school. No book-house produces more beautiful mechanical work than the Western Book Concern. During the last quadrennium the sales of German books were $133,900.70; periodicals, $173,681.01; total, $307,581.71.

German Wallace College, Berea, O., twelve miles west of Cleveland. The Eastern section of the M. E. German Churches accepted from Mr. Baldwin the so-called Baldwin Hall, and from Mr. Wallace considerable land and a brick building, to start a German school for higher education. Baldwin University, founded 1856, an English Methodist institution, is situated in the same town. June 3, 1863, Rev. Jacob Rothweiler, of the Central German Conference, was appointed to inaugurate the movement, and by his energy the success of the institution became assured. June 7, 1864, the college was organized, and has now a real property worth $47,000, an endowment of $40,000, a cabinet worth $1500, and a library of 600 volumes. The debt is $7612.42. The largest number of German students at any time was 125. The two colleges—Baldwin (English) and Wallace (German)—work very harmoniously together, and the students of either college are entitled to all the privileges of the other. Rev. Wm. Nast, D D., has been for a number of years honorary president of the school, but Revs. J. Rothweiler, Fr. Schuler, and P. F. Schneider have succeeded each other in filling the position of de facto presidents.

Germany.—The German Empire contained in 1871 a population of 41,060,695, with an area of 210,396 square miles. Prussia, the largest kingdom in this empire, is thoroughly Protestant, while Bavaria and Baden contain a majority of Catholics. Throughout the greater part of the empire there is religious toleration, though in some of the Catholic districts the limitations are very stringent. The Lutheran and German Reformed Churches are recognized as State churches in Prussia and several smaller provinces. Methodism was introduced into Southern Germany by the Wesleyans of England. C. G. Muller, of Winnenden, Württemberg, a young man of twenty years, went, in 1805, to London. He was successful in business, and was converted soon after his removal to that country; became a local preacher among the Wesleyans, and, in 1830, revisiting his birthplace, preached to the people and related his personal experience. A revival was the result, and he laid out a circuit of appointments. When he returned to England the converts petitioned the Wesleyan Missionary Society to return him to them as a missionary, and in the following year he consented to return to Germany and preach in his former home. A very remarkable revival followed, in which, as he walked home from late meetings, people would meet him at ten and eleven o'clock at night and urge him to preach for them also. He died in 1853, leaving 67 preaching-places, 20 local preachers, and 1100 members, principally in Württemberg. After the establishment of German churches in the United States the converts wrote letters to their friends in Germany informing them what Methodism had done for them in America. The Revolution of 1848 advanced religious liberty, and many persons in Germany wrote requesting the M. E. Church to send to them preachers. In May, 1849, a mission was established, and Dr. L. S. Jacoby, then presiding elder of the Quincy district, Illinois Conference, was appointed a missionary to Germany. When he arrived in Bremen, in November of that year, he was discouraged in observing the desecration of the Sabbath, and feared that little good could be done. He succeeded, however, in procuring a hall in the Kramerant-haus, or public building, where he preached his first sermon on Sunday evening, Dec. 23, 1849, to about 400 persons. In April, 1850, he reported 21 converts who had joined the M. E. Church, and the conversion of others who retained their membership in the State church. As soon as the church was regularly organized a German periodical was started, the funds to support which were furnished by Charles and Henry Baker, of Baltimore. Shortly afterwards the hymn-book, Wesley's sermons, and many tracts were printed and scattered among the people. In June, 1850, Rev. H. Doering and Lewis Nippert sailed as missionaries to join Dr. Jacoby. The first Sunday-school on the American plan was organized in Bremen in 1850, and a circuit of nine appointments was formed for the three missionaries. Letters from America oftentimes prepared the way for establishing services. Such letters were often read from the pulpits of various churches, and there were indications of a general awakening. The criticisms of the press, emanating sometimes from the State clergy, and persecutions by the mob, and in a few instances the seizure and imprisonment of the missionaries by the police, and the prosecution by the police of members in the police courts, increased the excitement of the people and their anxiety to understand more about the Methodist Church, so that the wrath of man was made to praise God. In 1851 eight missionaries were employed, who itinerated from Bremen to Hamburg, Hanover, Frankfort, and as far as Saxony and Württemberg. In 1856 the Conference was organized under the authority of the General Conference, and was visited by one of the bishops in 1857. The Book Concern continued to issue its papers and tracts and exercise an influence upon the public mind. The Martin Mission Institute, which had been established previously at Bremen, was transferred to Frankfort, funds having been furnished by John T. Martin, Esq., of Brooklyn, to purchase a building. The Conference received full powers as an Annual Conference in 1868, and Dr. Jacoby retired from the superintendency, having in less than twenty years penetrated the greater part of Germany, German Switzerland, and reached some of the German settlements in France with the gospel. Sunday-schools, the printing-press, a theological seminary, and a Conference were all organized and had become powers to continue the work among the Germans of Europe. Methodism, under the influence of Dr. Jacoby, not only effected its organization, but it became an element of power in vitalizing the older churches and stimulating them to greater zeal and energy. The statistics of 1876 show that the Wesleyans have 8 chapels, 133 preaching-places, 11 missionaries, 34 local preachers, 2200 members, and 400 scholars in the Sunday-schools. The M. E. Church has 10,224 members, 87 preachers, value of property $411,123, with 13,355 children in the Sunday-schools. The value of the Book Concern building is estimated at $18,000, and the building of the theological school at $60,000. In addition to this work of Methodism proper, the Albright Methodists, or the Evangelical Church, has sent a number of missionaries to Germany, and has performed a work of great value in the awakening and conversion of many souls. They have a large number of organized churches, and are annually extending their borders.

Germany and Switzerland Conference.—The M. E. Church commenced a mission in Germany in December, 1849, and in 1856 the prospects of the work were such that the General Conference constituted the German Mission Conference, embracing also the missions in France and Switzerland wherever the German language was spoken. This Mission Conference had all the rights and privileges of other Annual Conferences, except that of sending delegates to the General Conference, and of receiving dividends from the Book Concern and Charter Fund. It was organized in September, 1856, by Dr. Jacoby, the superintendent of the mission, and embraced at that time 9 traveling and 7 local preachers, 428 members, and 99 probationers. The following year it received its first episcopal visitation from Bishop Simpson, and since that time it has been visited by Bishops Janes, Harris, Foster, and Andrews. In 1868 it was constituted a Conference, with full rights and privileges, under its present title. In 1876 it reported 87 traveling and 37 local preachers, 7960 members, and 2264 probationers, and 13,355 Sunday-school scholars, with 61 churches, valued at $1,644,491. It has also a Book Concern at Bremen and a theological school at Frankfort-on-the-Main.

Gerry, Robert, was born in Maryland in 1799. His father, Colonel Gerry, was a man of influential standing. He joined the Methodist Church in 1817, and entered the Philadelphia Conference in April, 1826. For "thirty years he filled some of the most prominent appointments of the Conference with great acceptance and usefulness, with a heart fired with the love of God and souls, with a voice almost incomparable, and with an eloquence and earnestness seldom equaled. He preached the unsearchable riches of Christ and his atonement. God honored his ministry in giving him to see wherever he labored deep evangelical and extensive revivals of religion." He died in great peace May 9, 1856.

Gettysburg, Pa. (pop. 3074), is the capital of Adams County, and is the site of Pennsylvania College. It was the scene of one of the most severe battles during the late Civil War. Methodist services were held near this place as early as 1783 by Bishop Asbury and Freeborn Garrettson. In 1803 regular preaching was established by Joseph Stone and Daniel Fidler. The first class was organized in 1815, and the first church edifice was built of brick, in 1822, costing about $1500. The Gettysburg circuit, which embraced a large scope of the surrounding country, was formed in 1827, and the town did not become a station until 1876. The present church edifice was built in 1871, at a cost of about $1500. The African M. E. Zion Church was introduced about 1831, and erected a small church in 1841, at a cost of about $500. The African M. E. Church resulted from a division, about 1874, in the Zion Church, and an edifice was erected in 1876, costing about $800. It was in this city, while Dr. Nast was professor in the Lutheran seminary, that having been awakened, he attended the M. E. Church, though his conversion did not take place until subsequently in Ohio, where he became so useful and distinguished in the German work. Gettysburg is in the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and reports about 200 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $1200 church property.

Gibson, Otis, D.D., missionary to the Chinese in San Francisco, was born in Moira, N. Y., in 1826; graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., in 1854; and sailed from New York for China in April, 1855. In 1865, after ten years of efficient service in the Foo-Chow mission, he returned to the United States on account of the health of his family, and was two years in charge of Moira station, Black River Conference, his native place. In 1868 he was transferred by Bishop Thomson to the California Conference, and appointed missionary to the Chinese on the Pacific coast. In 1872 he was a delegate from California Conference to the General Conference, and was elected to serve on the general missionary committee from 1872 to 1876. He was also a regular delegate to the Evangelical Alliance held in New York in 1873. He is the author of "The Chinese in America," a valuable book of some 400 pages on the Chinese question.

REV. OTIS GIBSON, D.D.

In the whole course of his missionary life, both in China and among the Chinese in America, Mrs. Gibson has nobly filled her place as an efficient "helpmeet" of her husband, contributing her full share of toil and counsel in all the labors and responsibilities which he has borne.

Gibson, Tobias, a pioneer Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Liberty Co., Ga., Nov. 10, 1771, and died in Natchez, Miss., April 5, 1804. He was a man of great wealth, but forsook it all to proclaim the gospel. He was admitted on trial in 1792, in the twenty-second year of his age. He traveled for eight years large circuits, mostly in the far south, or in the Holston Mountains. In 1799 he volunteered for the Mississippi Valley, though already broken in health by excessive labors. With the approval of Asbury he started alone on horseback to the Cumberland River, in Kentucky, traveling hundreds of miles through the vast wilderness. Having reached the river, he sold his horse, bought a canoe, and started down the river, thence six or eight hundred miles down the Mississippi to his destination. He reached Natchez eighteen years before the Mississippi Territory was admitted into the Union. Four times he went from this vast wilderness six hundred miles for the purpose of obtaining additional laborers from the Western Conference. A few additional laborers were given him from time to time, and thus was Methodism planted in that portion of the great valley. He preached his last sermon on New Year's day, 1804. A lingering consumption at last terminated his useful life.

Gilbert, Anthony, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerancy in 1836, and was elected president in 1854. For twenty-three years he was a member of the connectional committee. He was made a supernumerary in 1872. He resides in Sunderland.

Gilbert, Nathaniel, a prominent citizen of Antigua, West Indies, and descended from Sir William Gilbert, half-brother of Sir Walter Raleigh. He was "a man of sound understanding, sharpened by a collegiate education and an admirable training in a court of law." For some years he was speaker of the House of Assembly in Antigua. His gay and thoughtless brother Francis having failed in business in Antigua, had returned to England. There he was brought to repentance, and became a member of Mr. Wesley's society. He sent to his brother Nathaniel a number of Mr.

Wesley's publications; but, believing him to be an enthusiast, for some time he refused to read. At length, his sister reading to him the "Appeal," it so changed his mind that he visited England to make Mr. Wesley's personal acquaintance. He took with him several of his negro servants, two of whom were converted under Mr. Wesley's ministrations, and were baptized by him. Mr. Gilbert felt that he had a mission to accomplish, and, returning to Antigua, fitted up a room for preaching, and "was soon branded as a madman for preaching to his slaves." A society at St. John's was formed, and through his efforts and those of his brother Francis, who labored with him, Methodism was planted in the West India Islands. He died in 1774, eleven years before the appointment of the first Methodist missionary to Antigua, leaving a society of sixty members. As he was near death, a friend said, "On what do you trust?" The answer was, "On Christ crucified." "Have you peace with God?" He answered, "Unspeakable." "Have you no fear, no doubt?" "None," replied the dying saint. "Can you part with your wife and children?" "Yes. God will be their strength and portion." His brother Francis, returning to England, became a member of the class led by Mr. Fletcher. As late as 1864, in the Madeley vicarage, was the great-grandson of Nathaniel Gilbert, who testified "that he had reason to believe that no child or grandchild of the first West Indian Methodist had passed away without being prepared for the better world." The organization which Mr. Gilbert formed was kept up for four years by the labors of two colored women, who held services almost every evening until the arrival of Mr. Baxter.

Giles, Charles, was a distinguished minister in Western New York. He was born in Connecticut in 1783, and died in Syracuse, Aug. 30, 1867. He was successively connected with the Philadelphia, New York, Genesee, Oneida, and Black River Conferences, and filled the most responsible positions, including those of presiding elder and of delegate to the General Conference. "He was a thorough scholar,—rich in facts, brilliant in thought, and intense in love for dying men,—a man of power, intellectually and emotionally. At the name of Jesus, even in extreme superannuation, his eye kindled with life and his face flushed with intelligence, when in other respects he was oblivious to earthly things."

Gillespie, John Jones, was born in Milton, Northumberland Co., Pa., Nov. 13, 1813. At the age of fourteen he was the subject of deep religious impressions. In 1832 he went to Pittsburgh, Pa., and, having been robbed on the way, began with less than a dollar in the world. The lonely boy at first strayed into a Presbyterian church, and, being pleased with the preaching, would probably have become a member if a kind word had been spoken to him. After a time he began to attend the Methodist Protestant church with the friends with whom he boarded, and has ever since been identified with it. Feeling the need of a better education he spent his evenings at a night-school, after serving his employers through the day.

JOHN JONES GILLESPIE.

As a business man he became successful, and has established a substantial trade in Pittsburgh, besides holding honorary connection with a number of banks and public institutions. He has been prominently connected with the church interests, in the capacity of trustee of church and college, representative to the Annual and General Conferences, and president of the Board of Publication of the Methodist denomination, which latter position he still continues to hold. He has helped the Book Concern through many a dark hour by his generosity and business foresight, and has ever been a true friend to the church.

Gillett, Philip Goode, LL.D., was born in Madison, Ind., March 24, 1833, his father being Rev. S. T. Gillett, D.D., for forty years a member of the Indiana Conference. He graduated from the Indiana Asbury University in 1852, and became a member of the faculty of the Indiana Institution for the Deaf and Dumb. In 1856 he was elected principal of the Illinois Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, and which he has superintended for twenty-two years with great success. In this institution are taught not only departments of literature, but articulation and lip reading. It is one of the leading institutions of its kind in the world.

Dr. Gillett has also taken a deep interest in the education of the idiotic, and secured the passage of the bill through the legislature for an institution for feeble-minded children, which he organized and superintended for a time gratuitously. Dr. Gillett has been from his youth an earnest member of the M. E. Church, and was one of the early and active advocates of lay representation in the General Conference. He also co-operates with Christians of every name; has been twice honored with the presidency of the Illinois State Sabbath-School Association, and once with that of the United States Sabbath-School Convention, and is now one of the vice-presidents of the American Sunday-School Union.

Glen's Falls, N. Y. (pop. 4500), situated in Warren County, on the Hudson River, and on the Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad, especially noted for numerous saw-mills and fine marble quarries. Methodism was introduced into Warren County at a place called Thurman's Patent, in 1796, by the lay preachers Richard Jacobs and Henry Ryan. In 1798 a society was organized by Lorenzo Dow on the "Ridge," about six miles from the Glen. The first class was organized by John Lovejoy, and John Clark was the first minister appointed. The first church edifice, a stone structure, was erected in 1829. With the organization of the Troy Conference in 1832, Glen's Falls was united in a circuit with Fort Ann and Sandy Hill, and for several years the work was called Fort Ann circuit. In 1847 a new brick church was erected at a cost of $5000. It was, unfortunately, burned in 1864, but has been replaced by a more beautiful and commodious edifice. In 1849 Glen's Falls became a station and was strengthened by a remarkable revival. A brick chapel was also erected in South Glen's Falls in 1869-71. It was enlarged in 1872; and 90 members of the parent church, in 1876, organized a new society in South Glen's Falls. A union mission was also built on West Street, which is largely supported by the Methodists. Glen's Falls is in the Troy Conference, and reports (1876):

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
Glen's Falls	800	375	$48,000
South Glen's Falls.....	90	1,500

Gloucester City, N. J. (pop. 3628), is on the Delaware River, a few miles below Philadelphia. It was visited by Captain Webb as early as 1768; and a family by the name of Chew became seriously impressed. Tradition says that the elder Mr. Chew, with eight sons, came from England to America as early as 1740. David Chew became one of the earliest and most useful of the lay preachers in West Jersey. It was at this point that Mr. Asbury landed when he arrived in America, in 1771, and in this neighborhood the third Methodist church, in New Jersey, called Bethel, was erected, perhaps in 1780, through the energy of Jesse Chew. In 1790, in this region occurred one of the most powerful revivals in modern times. Gloucester City was embraced in the adjacent circuits until 1839, in which year services were regularly established, and the first M. E. church in the place was built. Unfortunately, it was burned, but was rebuilt next year. In 1850 the old church was sold and a new one erected, which is still in use. It is in the New Jersey Conference, and reports 422 members, 300 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,590 church property.

Gloversville, N. Y. (pop. 4518), in Fulton County, and on the Fonda and Gloversville Railroad. It has grown rapidly in recent years. The first Methodist society in this vicinity was formed about a mile from the town, in 1790. The first M. E. church was built at that place in 1796. The first class in Gloversville was formed in 1820. The first church was erected in 1839, when it was connected with Johnstown. In 1842 the appointment appears as Gloversville. In 1855 the church was enlarged. The present edifice was not erected until 1870. It is in the Troy Conference, and reports: First church, 794 members, 700 Sunday-school scholars, $70,000 church property. Second church, 186 members, 250 Sunday-school scholars, and $8000 church property.

Goff, Milton B., A.M., was born in Pittsburgh, Pa., Dec. 17, 1831, and was converted and joined the M. E. Church in 1841, at Sewickly. He has held the position of president of the board of trustees, and is a steward, a class-leader, a teacher in the Sunday-school, and treasurer of the stewards. He was educated and graduated at Alleghany College in 1855, and received the degree of A.M., in cursu, in 1858. Prof. Goff has spent twenty-two years teaching, during which time he was connected with Madison College, North Illinois University, and for the past twelve years he has been Professor of Mathematics in the Western University of Pennsylvania. He is a member of the board of control of Alleghany College; the author of a series of books on arithmetic, and a book of arithmetical problems, and is now at work on a series of mathematical text-books. For a number of years he has made the mathematical calculations of the noted "Sanford Hill Almanac."

Gold Hill, Nev. (pop. 4311), is situated in Storey County, four miles southwest from Virginia City, and is in the immediate vicinity of a number of rich mines. Methodism was introduced from Virginia City about 1865. Gold Hill and Silver City appear as a separate charge in 1868, and from that time the statistics have fluctuated. It is in the Nevada Conference, and reports 38 members, 154 Sunday-school scholars, and $2200 church property.

Golden Hours is a monthly magazine published by the M. E. Church for boys and girls. The General Conference of 1868 authorized the book agents at Cincinnati, O., to publish "a first-class illustrated monthly magazine for children and youth." Accordingly, the first number appeared January 1, 1869. The present circulation is 6600.

Good, John B., an attorney in Lancaster, Pa., was born June 18, 1823, in Lancaster Co., Pa. He served as justice of the peace from 1847 to 1858, and was admitted to the bar as an attorney in Lancaster, May 25, 1864. He united with the M. E. Church of Lancaster in February, 1865; has held the office of class-leader since 1866, and of exhorter since 1867. He was president of the first Lay Conference held in Philadelphia, in March, 1872.

Goodrich, Hon. Grant.—This distinguished layman of nearly half a century's membership in the Methodist Episcopal Church was born about 1810, and was lay delegate for the Rock River Conference to the General Conference of 1876. He has long been a devoted worker, as a class-leader and Sunday-school teacher, in Chicago, at old Clark Street church. From its beginning he has been president of the board of trustees of the Garrett Biblical Institute, and has attended gratuitously to its legal business. He has also been from its commencement a trustee of the Northwestern University. For many years he was a practicing attorney, and was for some time judge in one of the higher courts.

Goodwin, William H., D.D., LL.D., was born in Tompkins Co., N. Y., June 12, 1812, and died at Dryden, Feb. 17, 1876. At nineteen he was converted, and when twenty-two years of age was admitted on trial in the Genesee Conference. He filled a number of the most important appointments in the Genesee and East Genesee Conferences; and was also a number of years presiding elder on different districts. By reason of failing health, in 1875, he was granted a supernumerary relation, and in a few months afterwards was called to his reward. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1860 and 1864. In 1865 he was appointed regent of the University of New York, and the same year Hobart College conferred upon him the honorary title of LL.D. In 1854 he was chosen as State senator from Ontario and Livingston Counties. His commanding personal appearance, connected with his acquired ability and genial manner, gave him great influence among his brethren. In the most heated debates in Conference, he was never betrayed into the least discourtesy of word or act. His death was sudden and unexpected. He said to his companion, "Commit it all to God, be happy and cheerful," and in an instant he was gone.

Goshen, Ind. (pop. 3133), is the capital of Elkhart County, on the Lake Shore and Michigan Railroad. It is in the midst of a highly productive agricultural district. It first appears in the minutes of the church as the name of a circuit in 1839, with George M. Boyd as pastor. It has since become a station, and has had a steady growth. It is in the North Indiana Conference, and reports 224 members, 235 Sunday-school scholars, and $16,500 church property.

Gough, Benjamin, Esq., was born at Southborough, in Kent, England, in 1805; has been an extensive contributor to the literature of the age; chiefly in verse for the last forty years. He is a frequent writer in Good Words, The Sunday Magazine, The British Workman, Band of Hope, etc., as well as in the Wesleyan magazines and papers. He has published a number of poetical works, most of which have been honored by the patronage of her most gracious majesty the Queen. Among other poetical works may be mentioned, "Lyra Sabbatica," "Kentish Lyrics," "Songs from the Woodlands," etc. Mr. Gough is an active local preacher, and although beyond the allotted three-score years and ten does good service for the Master at Woburn Sands, in Bedfordshire.

Gough, Henry Dorsey, was one of the early Methodists in Maryland. He was a gentleman of a large estate, and was married to a sister of General, afterwards Governor, Ridgely. He had an elegant mansion, called "Perry Hall," twelve miles from Baltimore; one of the most elegant, at that time, in America. In April, 1775, with a number of wild companions, he went to hear Mr. Asbury preach, expecting some amusement; but under the sermon was brought to serious reflection, and after some time experienced the joys of conscious pardon and peace. For a number of years he was an earnest and active Christian. He built a chapel near his house, in which all his family, both white and colored, assembled morning and evening for prayer. It was also occupied as a preaching-place, both on Sabbaths and week-days. For some cause he was separated from the church for several years; but in 1801 he was reclaimed, and reunited with the Light Street church, in Baltimore. He died in May, 1808, during the session of the General Conference.

He was a man of great liberality and benevolence. His wife, Mrs. Prudence Gough, was a devoted and earnest Christian. Though their house was the resort of much company of the highest circles in Maryland, yet, when the bell rung for family devotion, all were called together; and if no gentleman was present to lead, she read a chapter in the Bible, gave out a hymn, and engaged in prayer. Mr. Asbury says, "She has been a true daughter; she has never offended me at any time." She was awakened under the first sermon she heard from Mr. Asbury. A writer says, "She came into the congregation as gay as a butterfly, and left with the great deep of her heart broken up." Their only child, a daughter, was married to James Carroll, a gentleman of wealth, and of one of the leading families in Maryland.

REV. GEORGE THOMAS GOULD, D.D.

Gould, George Thomas, an educator in the Kentucky Conference, was born in Beaufort, N. C., Dec. 17, 1842. He was converted in 1860, and licensed to preach the following year. He was recalled from college on account of his father's illness, and he joined the Kentucky Conference in 1862, when, after having filled important appointments for ten years, he became associate principal and proprietor of the Millersburg Female College. He received the degree of D.D. from the Kentucky Military Institute. In 1874 he was on the editorial staff of the Central Methodist.

Grace primarily signifies favor. In the Scriptures it is used to denote the favor of God towards man: his mercy as distinguished from justice; and blessings freely and unmeritedly bestowed. It is also sometimes used to designate the privileges of the Christian dispensation as compared with those of the Mosaic economy: the law being positive, limited, and condemning; while grace is free, boundless, and justifying. It is the source of redemption with all its glorious benefits, and is free in all and for all. It depends on no human merit, good works, or righteousness; but is an expression of God's boundless love to man. This grace is not irresistible, as was taught by Augustine and Calvin. While free for all, it may be accepted or rejected; and the Scriptures teach that men do resist and grieve the Holy Spirit. The conversion of Paul is sometimes referred to as an instance of irresistible grace; but his expression, that he had not been "disobedient to the heavenly vision," clearly indicates the freedom of his will and the independent character of that obedience which he manifested. He was suddenly and irresistibly arrested and impressed; but he obeyed the voice and thus became a son of God. Without grace freely bestowed man would neither repent nor believe; but grace sufficient to enable him to forsake sin and return to God is freely imparted by the Holy Spirit. If he yields to divine teachings and holy impulses he is saved; if he disobeys he works out his own destruction. Men, if lost, will be condemned not for having inherited a depraved nature, but for having rejected grace freely offered, and for having refused to obey the divine command when power was freely offered through the operations of the Holy Spirit. As the apostle speaks of the possibility of himself becoming "a castaway," so there is no state of grace attainable on earth where man does not need to watch and pray and to resist temptations, lest he may ultimately perish. (See PERSEVERANCE.)

Gracey, John Talbot, A.M., was born in Delaware Co., Pa., Sept. 16, 1831; educated in Philadelphia; prosecuted the study of medicine for two and one-half years, and entered the ministry in the Virginia Conference of the M. E. Church South in 1850. In March, 1852, he joined the Philadelphia Conference of the M. E. Church, and served as pastor in various churches until March, 1861, when he was appointed as missionary to India. He commenced the mission at Sectapoor; was subsequently appointed to Bareilly and Nynce Tal; was secretary for two years of the "annual meeting," and first secretary of the India Conference, and also acted as president of that Conference in 1867. In January, 1868, he returned from India on account of his wife's health, and was admitted to the General Conference of 1868 as the first delegate from territory outside of the United States. Since that period he has filled several pastoral terms; has taken a deep interest in the missionary cause, contributing to various papers, and acting as editor of the missionary department of the Northern Christian Advocate. He also visited Western Africa in company with Bishop Haven. He is a member of the American Oriental Society, and is (1877) acting as assistant recording secretary of the Missionary Society.

Graham, Hon. James L., born in Pittsburgh, Pa., Nov. 17, 1817, has resided nearly all his life in Alleghany City. He received a good common school education, and was converted and joined Beaver Street church in 1835; two years afterwards he was licensed to preach. In 1839 he was received on trial in the Pittsburgh Annual Conference, but owing to ill health he retired from the itinerancy at the close of the first year and became a local preacher, which relation he has since retained. He has filled the official relations of class-leader, steward, trustee, and Sunday-school superintendent. Among the civil positions filled, he was three years high sheriff of Alleghany County, twelve consecutive years in the Senate of Pennsylvania, during which he was Speaker of the Senate in 1867 and 1868, and was chairman of the finance committee, the highest position in the Senate. He represented Alleghany County in eight State and two National Conventions, but has retired from political life. He has occupied the position of school director twenty years, director of the poor nine years; is now a member of the board of controllers in Alleghany City, trustee of Mount Union College, and Director of the Western Reform School.

Graham, Thomas Butterworth, was born in Coshocton Co., O., Aug. 11, 1826. His father and mother united with the Methodist Protestant Church in 1833, and their house was a preaching-place for several years. He learned early to love the principles of the Methodist Protestant Church, and has lost none of that ardor with his years. He was converted when fourteen, and licensed to preach at nineteen. When twenty years of age he joined the Ohio Conference. Nineteen years of his ministry have been spent in three fields of labor. He is now, for the sixth year, pastor of the church with which he first united. He has once been elected president of the General Conference, and three times president of the Ohio Annual Conference. During the days of the anti-slavery movement he was fearless in his advocacy of the oppressed, and took an active interest in the measures which led to the abolition of slavery in the United States.

Grand Haven, Mich. (pop. 3147), is situated on Lake Michigan, near the mouth of Green River, and is the western terminus of the Detroit and Milwaukee Railroad. It is first mentioned in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1859 as connected with Muskegon. The following year L. W. Early was pastor, and the circuit was called Muskegon. This remained the name of the charge until 1875, when it was connected with Spring Lake. It is in the Michigan Conference, and reports about 120 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $5000 church property.

Grand Prairie Seminary and Onarga Commercial College is located at Onarga, Iroquois Co., Ill. The town is not cursed with any drinking- or billiard-saloons, and is a very pleasant and healthful resort for those seeking an education. The school was organized in August, 1863, in the old M. E. church edifice, and was chartered under its present name in February, 1865. The building—centrally located in a fine campus—was erected in 1864, and dedicated in 1865, at the session of the Central Illinois Conference. The institution is under the watch-care and patronage of said Conference.

It is a wooden structure, three stories in height, and contains a commodious chapel, society hall, cabinet, reading-room, a large and well-furnished committee-room, and also suitable rooms for recitations. Value of building, grounds, and apparatus, $17,000. Endowment Fund, regarded good, some $16,000. In addition to the preparatory, there are three courses of study,—commercial, scientific, and classical.

The number of scholars enrolled in 1876 was, not including specials in vocal and instrumental music,—females, 67; males, 128; total, 195. The seminary is in a flourishing condition, and the friends of the institution have never manifested greater interest nor more complete satisfaction than at present. John T. Dickinson, A.M., is president, and is assisted by able teachers.

Grand Rapids, Mich. (pop. 16,507), the capital of Kent County, on the rapids of Grand River, 33 miles from Lake Michigan. Methodist services were introduced in 1836, and the city appears on the minutes in 1838. James H. Freese, having been appointed as missionary, the following year reported 55 members. It was regarded as a mission, and embraced the surrounding country until 1843, when the first church edifice was erected. It became a station in 1844. The pastor, Andrew M. Fitch, reported, in 1845, 120 members. The first church was rebuilt in 1869, and the second church was erected in 1872. A large number of Germans having settled in the vicinity, a German church was erected in 1862, and in 1874 a Wesleyan Methodist congregation was organized. A city mission has been established, which has performed a good work. It is in the Michigan Conference, and reported in 1876:

Date.	Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

Grant, Jeffrey, a native of Charleston, S. C., born in 1838. Removed from Charleston to Jacksonville, Fla., in 1869. He acquired a fair education, and spent some time in teaching, and for several years has been a local preacher, and acting pastor of the M. E. Church at St. Augustine. He was a lay delegate from the Florida Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Graves, Albert Schuyler, D.D., was born in Salisbury, Vt., Jan. 17, 1824, and graduated at Wesleyan University in 1846. In 1847 he was admitted into Oneida Conference, and in 1860 became presiding elder of the Cortland district. In 1865 he was elected principal of Cazenovia Seminary, and in 1870 was transferred to the New York East Conference, where, after filling several appointments, he was, in 1876, appointed presiding elder of South Long Island district. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1864 and 1868.

Graves, W. C., a delegate from the Holston Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in East Tennessee in August, 1815, and joined the Holston Conference in 1834. He was connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church South from 1845 to 1865, when he again joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was at one time editor of a monthly publication, was afterwards editor of The Religious Intelligencer, and is a corresponding editor of The Methodist Advocate.

Graw, Jacob B., D.D., was born in Rahway, N. J., Oct. 24, 1832, and was educated at Rahway and Bloomfield Seminars, and in New York High School. He was admitted into the New Jersey Annual Conference in 1855. He entered the United States service as chaplain in September, 1861, having taken a prominent part in organizing a company of volunteers. For a few months, while in the service, he had command of a regiment. He has taken a deep interest in the temperance cause, assisting in the State organization in 1867, and occupying one of the highest positions for five years. He represented the State organization in various places in the United States, and was sent to London as a delegate in 1873. He also edited The New Jersey

Gazette for several years. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876, and has been a member of the book committee since 1875.

REV. JACOB B. GRAW, D.D.

He has served as trustee of Pennington Seminary, and as a trustee of Dickinson College. He has also been presiding elder on the Burlington and New Brunswick districts.

Gray, Edward J., A.M., president of Williamsport Dickinson Seminary, is a native of Pennsylvania. His father was for more than forty years a local preacher. He graduated in Dickinson Seminary, under the presidency of Bishop Bowman, June 18, 1858. A year prior to his graduation he united with the church and was licensed to preach. Shortly after his graduation, after filling several appointments, his health failing, he took a supernumerary relation. But his health recovering he resumed the pastorate, and, after filling various appointments, was, in February, 1874, elected to his present position at the head of a prosperous seminary.

Green, A. L. P., D.D., an eminent minister in the M. E. Church South, was born in Sevier Co., Tenn., June 24, 1807, and died at Nashville, Tenn., July 15, 1874, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. He removed in childhood with his parents to Jackson Co., Ala. Here he was converted, and united with the M. E. Church when nine years of age. He was admitted on trial in the Tennessee Conference in 1824. At the age of twenty-five he was elected a delegate to the General Conference, and was re-elected at every session except one until his death. In 1845 he was the chief one of the commission raised by the Church South to secure the interests supposed to be accruing to that church by the division. He was chiefly instrumental in conducting the suit against the M. E. Church to secure a division of the funds of the Book Concern. He was engaged in the ministry about fifty years, and at the session of his Conference before his death was appointed to deliver a semi-centennial sermon at the next session, but he died before the time arrived. The last two years of his life were devoted to the educational interests of his church, and especially was he engaged in contributing to and establishing Vanderbilt University. "In the polity of the church—in its literary, missionary, and educational interests—he was an acknowledged leader of great force. Limited in his early educational advantages, he was nevertheless a thoughtful and diligent student, acquiring by observation, learning from nature, and studying men and books, until he fairly won the honors conferred on him by colleges, and came to the front in all the leading measures of the church and epochs in her history by the force of his own merit." He died in great tranquillity.

Green, Anson, D.D., was born in the United States, but, removing to Canada, united with the Canada Conference at its organization, in 1824. He has remained firm in his attachments to his Conference and church during all the changes and divisions through which it has passed, and has filled all the principal offices of that Conference, from the highest to the lowest. Twice he occupied the chair of the Conference as chief minister, three times he was elected to represent Canadian interests in the British Conference, and three times in the American General Conference. He was appointed a member of the first General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, held in London in 1846, and of the last, held in New York in 1873. For sixty years he has devoted his entire energies to the interests of the church. He has lately written an autobiography, styled the "Life and Times of the Rev. A. Green, D.D.," which is just issued from the connectional press of the Methodist Church of Canada.

Green Bay, Wis. (pop. 4666), is the capital of Brown County, and is situated on Fox River. It is one of the oldest towns in the Northwest, having been settled by the French in 1745. For many years in its early history it made but little progress, but it has become a commercial centre. On the opposite side of the river is Fort Howard. In this place Methodism was first planted in Wisconsin. The Rev. John Clark having come from England in 1832, was sent to Fox River mission, which embraced Green Bay. The mission is first mentioned in the minutes of the church in 1835, and M. Royal was appointed in charge. In 1836 the first church was erected. In 1856-58 the second church was built. In 1867 Fort Howard, which had been included in the Green Bay charge, became a separate work, leaving in Green Bay only 27 members. Since that period the society has been comparatively small. There is also a Norwegian Methodist Episcopal society organized in the place, and a German Methodist Episcopal Church. It is in the Wisconsin Conference, and reports in 1876 the following statistics: First church, 25 members, 50 Sunday-school scholars, $7500 church property. German Church, 58 members, 40 Sunday-school scholars, $4500 church property. Norwegian Church, 25 members, 25 Sunday-school scholars, $1000 church property.

Greencastle, Ind. (pop. 3227), the capital of Putnam County, on the Terre Haute and Indianapolis Railroad. It is the seat of Indiana Asbury University. Methodism was introduced into Greencastle in 1822 by Rev. W. Cravens, the pastor of the Eel River circuit. The first M. E. church was built in 1825, and the second in 1832-34. In 1844 a new church called Roberts chapel was erected, and the former building was changed into a parsonage. A second church was erected shortly afterwards, which was subsequently consolidated with Roberts chapel, the location being too close to the former church. Subsequently a new organization was made, and the Locust Street church was erected in 1875. The African M. E. Church has also a small society. It is in the Northwest Conference, and reports as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
Roberts Chapel.....	325	250	$10,000
Locust Street.....	365	250	10,000
African M. E. Church.....	75	70	600

Green Island, N. Y. (pop. 3135), is situated on the east bank of the Hudson River, in Albany County, and on the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad. It was formerly included in the Albany circuit, afterwards in the Troy circuit, and being a small village was not until recently entered on the church records by name. Methodist services were introduced in 1838; in 1853 a church was completed, and in 1875 it was enlarged and improved. It is in the Troy Conference, and reports 268 members, 248 Sunday-school scholars, and $11,000 church property.

Greenwich Seminary and Musical Institute is located at East Greenwich, R. I. It was opened as an academy in 1804, in a building which has since been removed. In 1841 it was conveyed to a board of trustees under the patronage of the Providence Conference, and the institution was opened as such Aug. 18, 1841, under the superintendency of Rev. B. F. Teft, since so well known in the church. Resigning at the end of the year to take pastoral work, he was succeeded by Rev. G. F. Poole, in 1842; by D. G. Allen, in 1843; by G. B. Cone, in 1844. Under his administration, by the advice of the Conference, the boarding-house was erected. In 1847, W. R. Bagnell became principal, and in 1848, Rev. Robert Allyn, now president of South Illinois Normal School. He remained six years, and was succeeded by Rev. W. G. Quereau. In 1858 the old academy building was succeeded by the new and much more convenient edifice. In 1858, Rev. M. J. Talbot became principal, and in 1859, Eben Tourjee, since so distinguished in his profession, became professor of music. In 1862, the legal name of the institution was changed to the "Providence Conference Seminary and Musical Institute." In 1858 the boarding-hall was also enlarged and improved. The institution has been under the charge of Rev. B. D. Ames, Rev. J. T. Edwards, and David H. Ela. In 1873 it was placed for a time under the care of the trustees of the Boston University, and was designed as one of the preparatory schools, and Rev. Francis D. Blakeslee, A.M., was appointed principal. At the end of two years the connection with the University was dissolved by mutual agreement, and Mr. Blakeslee has been retained by the trustees in his position. The institution has on its roll the names of a number of men distinguished in the various departments of professional life, such as Governors Harris and Sprague, Doctors W. F. Warren and C. H. Payne, with many others who are very prominent. For several years the institution has been embarrassed with a debt incurred in the erection of buildings. An effort is now being made, with fair prospects of success, to greatly reduce this burden. Rev. F. D. Blakeslee, A.M., is principal, and is assisted by a corps of able teachers. (See cut on next page.)

Gregg, Albert B., a delegate from the Central

GREENWICH ACADEMY, MUSICAL INSTITUTE, AND COMMERCIAL COLLEGE.

New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Oneida Co., N. Y. After reaching manhood he was engaged for eight years in teaching, and afterwards for five years in commercial pursuits, and joined the Oneida Conference in 1855. In 1868 he acted as agent for the removal of Genesee College.

Gregory, Benjamin, commenced his ministry in 1840. In 1868 he became one of the connectional editors in conjunction with the late Rev. B. Frankland, on whose death, in 1876, he was appointed to the sole charge of the English Wesleyan connectional literature, and is winning a wide-spread reputation for culture and taste. Mr. Gregory is a ripe scholar and a good divine.

Gregory, John, was born in Bath, England, in 1831. He removed with his parents to New York in 1850, and joined the Wesleyan Methodist Church in that city. In 1858-59 he was a student at Illinois Institute (now Wheaton College). In 1859 he acted as pastor of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, Wylie Street, Pittsburgh. In 1860 he was ordained elder by the Alleghany Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection. For eight years he served in this branch; then, in 1868, joined the Pittsburgh Conference of the Methodist Church, in which he has since been actively engaged. He has served some important circuits and stations, and is now located at Connellsville, Pa.

Grier, James, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Stark Co., O., Dec. 16, 1823, and died in Akron, O., June 18, 1874. He united with the church as a seeker of religion in his fourteenth year, and was soon after converted. He was graduated from Alleghany College, Pa., in 1849, and was received the same year on trial in the Erie Conference. Having served different charges, in 1852 he was appointed principal of the Western Reserve Seminary, at West Farmington, O., which position he filled for eight successive years. He returned to the pastoral work in 1861, and spent seven of his remaining years as presiding elder on different districts. He was a man of even temper, as a preacher of more than average ability, and a successful administrator of the Discipline.

Griffin, Thomas A., a delegate from the Troy Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Hastings, England, in 1823; began preaching when eighteen years old; came to the United States in 1853, and joined the Troy Conference in the next year.

Griffith, William, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1828, and was identified with it for twenty-one years. In 1849 he was severed from the Wesleyan body in conjunction with Revs. James Everett and Samuel Dunn. Mr. Griffith then fixed his residence at Derby, where he has since remained. He labored for some years in what was known as the Wesleyan Reform movement. In 1855 he became minister of the Derby Circuit, and has continued in that relation. He is a member of the executive board of the Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control, and holds very advanced liberal opinions in politics.

Griffiths, William, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerant ministry in 1850, and, after laboring one year in Huddersfield, Yorkshire, was appointed to Kingston, in Jamaica. He is (1876) engaged in circuit work, but exercises a general oversight over the missions in Jamaica.

Grindrod, Edmund, was received into the ministry in 1806. His piety was calm, deep, active, and habitual. His judgment was remarkably sound. His "Compendium of the Laws and Regulations of Wesleyan Methodism" remains a monument of his intimate knowledge of its ecclesiastical order and institutions. He was elected president of the English Wesleyan Conference in 1837.

Griswold, E. C., born in Hartford, Conn., May 18, 1827, was converted in Middletown, Conn., in 1842, and subsequently held the position of class-leader, steward, and superintendent of the Sunday-school. He graduated at Wesleyan University in 1847, from which he received, in cursu, the degree of A.M. He now resides in Elyria, O., and has been honored by election to local offices, and to the board of education of that city. He is a trustee of Baldwin University. At the General Conference of 1876 he represented the North Ohio Conference.

Gruber, Jacob, a member of the Philadelphia Conference, was born in Lancaster Co., Pa., Feb. 30, 1778, and died in Lewistown, Pa., May 25, 1850. At the age of fifteen he was converted, and united with the Methodist Church. For this act he was driven from home by his parents, who were German Lutherans, but subsequently becoming reconciled, he was permitted to return home. Yet he was so zealous for the spiritual welfare of his neighbors that he was compelled, when about twenty-one years of age, to leave home a second time. He started on foot towards Lancaster, not knowing what to do, and on his way met a Methodist preacher, who informed him of a vacancy on a circuit, and who urged him to commence preaching at once. He immediately spent all his means in purchasing a horse and started for the circuit. The next year he was received by the Philadelphia Conference, and his appointments subsequently extended from New Jersey through Pennsylvania to Western Virginia, and from the lakes to the shores of the Chesapeake Bay. He was circuit preacher thirty-two years, presiding elder eleven years, and though opposed to station work, yet he filled acceptably for seven years stations in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington. He was eccentric both in manner and style, but was an earnest, devoted, and useful minister. He was strongly anti-slavery, and was once arrested in Maryland and tried for exciting insurrection, because he preached against slavery as a national sin, but he was honorably acquitted. Henry Boehm, who was once his colleague, says of him, "A more honest man never lived: a bolder soldier of the cross never wielded the sword of the Spirit. As a preacher he was original and eccentric; his powers of irony, sarcasm, and ridicule were tremendous." By rigid economy and careful investment he acquired some means, which at his death, having no children, he bequeathed to the church, leaving to the Chartered Fund $1400; to Dickinson College, scholarships amounting to $500; to the church in Lewistown $500; and to the Missionary Society, at the death of his wife, $3120.

Guest, Job, was born in 1785, and died Dec. 15, 1857. He was admitted into the Baltimore Conference in 1806, and traveled extensively from the shores of Lake Erie, on the north, to the waters of the Chesapeake Bay, and throughout Western Maryland, Western Pennsylvania, and Northern and Southwestern Virginia. "He was a man of more than ordinary talents, and was instrumental in adding many hundreds, not to say thousands, to the fold of the Redeemer during a ministry of nearly fifty years of effective service."

Gunn, John H., a prominent and influential merchant in Olney, Ill., and a resident of that place since 1841, was born in Portsmouth, O., June 3, 1826, of parents trained in the Protestant Episcopal Church. His grandfather was a lay-reader in that body, and organized the first Episcopal Church in Portsmouth. His father subsequently became a Methodist, and removed to Illinois. He was converted and became a member of the M. E. Church when he was nineteen. He received a fair education, and since he joined the church he has occupied the offices of class-leader, steward, trustee, and Sunday-school superintendent, the latter for a score of years. Occupying prominence in mercantile life, he has been enabled to exert a strong influence in behalf of Christ and Methodism. At the General Conference of 1876, he was a lay delegate from the Southern Illinois Conference.

Gunn, William, was born in Caswell Co., N. C., March 13, 1797. He embraced religion, and became a member of the church while he was a mere youth. He joined the itinerancy in 1819, filled a number of the most prominent appointments in Kentucky, and was presiding elder upon the Kentucky and Lexington districts. He was the subject of a most remarkable occurrence: "About 1830, while on a visit to his father-in-law, and sitting in his house, he was struck with lightning. The electric fluid having first made rather fearful havoc of the stone chimney, passed in a divided current from his head to his feet, and from his shoulder to the ends of the fingers of his left hand; one part of it penetrated through the floor, the other finding its way out at a broken glass in the window. His clothes were burnt to shreds, his boots rent, his penknife rendered strongly magnetic, and his flesh fearfully lacerated. In his recovery from the effects of this terrible shock, he always recognized most gratefully the hand of Providence, not doubting that he had been spared to labor for the benefit of the church, and with the exception of about two months, in which he was then taken off from his labors, the whole thirty-five years of his ministry was a period of unbroken active service." He died of typhoid fever, in Lexington, Ky., Sept. 3, 1853. He was remarkably studious, was a sweet singer and an able preacher.

Guttridge, John, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerancy in 1838, and was president of the Annual Assembly in 1863. A physical infirmity which made circuit work difficult to him induced Mr. Guttridge to become supernumerary in 1868, but his services are in great demand for anniversaries and chapel openings. He is popular also as a public lecturer. He is the author of a large volume entitled "Earnest Words," and of some smaller works.

H.

Hackedorn, H. F., M.D., was born in Huntingdon Co., Pa., Sept. 19, 1828, and died at Lima, O., Sept. 1, 1874, where he had resided for many years. He was converted in early manhood, and was active in all the official positions of the church. He was educated at Juniata, Pa., and graduated in medicine at Sterling Medical College in 1850, and practiced medicine for eight years. He was cashier of the Allen County Bank, and subsequently founded the Lima Paper Mills. He was a trustee of the Ohio Wesleyan Female College at the time of his death: and had been lay delegate from the Central Ohio Conference to the General Conference in 1872.

Hagerstown, Md. (pop. 5779), is situated on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, near the west bank of Antietam Creek. During the Civil War an important battle was fought near this place, and it was also the scene of several minor engagements. This section of country was early visited by Strawberry, Owen, King, Asbury, and other pioneer preachers. In 1776, Asbury says, "It seemed as if Satan was the chief ruler there. The people were very busy in drinking, swearing," etc. In 1812 he revisited the place, and says that he "preached in the neat new Methodist chapel to about one thousand hearers." It was for a number of years included in the Chambersburg circuit, and appears as a separate circuit in 1822, with John Emory, subsequently bishop, as pastor. Being on the border between the North and South, it has been subject to the retarding influences connected with questions of slavery. The church, however, has prospered to a good degree. The statistics in 1876 are as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	243	217	$11,000
Colored M. E. Church.....	72	60	2,000
African M. E. Church.....	140	70	10,000

Hagerty, John, of the Baltimore Conference, was born in Prince George's Co., Md., Feb. 18, 1747. In 1771 he was awakened under a sermon preached by Rev. John King, who formed a society of which Mr. Hagerty became the leader. Under an intense desire to benefit others he commenced exhorting, and after a time reluctantly consented to preach. In 1779 he entered the traveling connection, and in 1784, at the organization of the church, he was among the number who were ordained deacons and elders. In 1785 he was stationed in the city of New York, and after occupying prominent positions he located, in 1793, on account of the serious illness of his wife, but continued to preach in and around Baltimore when his health and opportunity permitted. He died in great confidence and triumph, Sept. 24, 1823.

1866. He was transferred to the Kentucky Conference in 1867, and took charge of the Greenville Collegiate Institute. In 1870 he was elected principal of the institution at Macon, Mo., and was transferred to the Missouri Conference, and admitted into full connection. He remained in charge of the Johnson College, at Macon, Mo., until elected to the charge of Quincy College, now called Chaddock College, in which position he still remains.

Hall, Samuel Romilly, an English Wesleyan minister, was a man of rare intellect, of cultured piety, of large administrative ability, who took from his first entrance into the ministry a lively interest in all its affairs. As a preacher he lost himself in his message and trusted to the Holy Spirit to imprint the truth on the heart and conscience of his hearers. He "turned many to righteousness." He was at an early period a resolute abstainer from alcoholic drinks. He was elected Conference president in 1868, and aimed in every act to be without rebuke, and carried into it the savor of that holiness which becometh the house of God forever. He fell asleep June 6, 1876.

Halloway, Cornelius James, a lay delegate from the Georgia Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Charleston, S. C., in 1846, removed to Augusta, Ga., in 1868, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1869. He has held the positions in his local church of class-leader, Sunday-school superintendent, and recording steward.

Hallowell, Me. (pop. 3007), is situated on the Kennebec River, and also on the Kennebec and Portland Railroad. It was permanently settled soon after the erection of Fort Western, in 1754, but a few traders resided in it perhaps a hundred years earlier. The town was included in the Readfield circuit, the first formed in the State of Maine, in 1793. This circuit extended from Hallowell to Sandy River. The first Methodist sermon preached in this place was delivered by Jesse Lee, Oct. 13, 1793. Philip Wager was appointed to the circuit in 1794, and was followed, in 1795, by Enoch Mudge and Elias Hull. The name first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1802, when the Readfield circuit was divided, and Comfort C. Smith and Aaron Homer were appointed to Hallowell circuit. It is in the Maine Conference, and reports 178 members, 212 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,000 church property.

Hamilton Female College.—The Wesleyan Female College at Hamilton owes its origin to an attempt made in the town of Dundas by the Rev. Samuel Rose and others, in 1859, to establish a school of high character. An opportunity having occurred to purchase a large building at a greatly reduced price led to its transfer to the city of Hamilton, and to the procuring of a charter from the provincial legislature. The institution is proprietary in its character, the proprietors assuming the financial responsibility: but it is under the patronage of the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada. The agreement between the proprietors and the Conference is that the governor of the institution is to be appointed by the Conference; that seven of the twenty-one directors shall be ministers appointed by the Conference, and that twelve of the fourteen lay directors must be members of the Methodist Church. The course of study is extensive, and the degrees of Mistress of English Literature and Mistress of Liberal Arts are conferred. Its graduates number 122. The governor of the institution is Rev. Samuel Dwight Rice, D.D., who is assisted by an able corps of teachers. The value of the buildings is estimated at $75,000, and the library and cabinets are estimated at $5000 more.

Hamilton, O. (pop. 11,081), the capital of Butler County, is situated on both sides of the Miami River, twenty-five miles north of Cincinnati. Methodist services were introduced in 1814. In 1820 a house of worship was built; rebuilt in 1833; burned in 1839, and again rebuilt in 1840. In 1866 the church was enlarged and re-furnished at almost the original cost of the edifice. It first appears as a circuit on the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1828, with John A. Banghman as pastor, who reported, in 1829, 407 members. It subsequently became a station.

An African M. E. church was begun in 1873, and finished in July, 1877. The German Methodists have also a fair congregation. It is in the Cincinnati Conference, and has the following statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	533	600	$30,000
German M. E. Church.....	80	80	3,000
African M. E. Church.....	82	93	10,000

Hamilton, Ontario, Canada (pop. 26,716), is a flourishing city, and is a place of great enterprise. It contains six churches belonging to the Canada Methodist Church. The largest is the Centenary, which is built of red brick in modified Italian style, is 150 feet long, with a width of 75 feet. It has neither spire nor tower, but is adorned with small pinnacles with stone finials, and is neatly and beautifully finished. The audience-room will seat comfortably 1600 people. In the aisles are 90 folding-chairs attached to the ends of the pews, and other arrangements are made to seat 2000 people on special occasions. The pulpit is a small desk on a large platform, and the orchestra is in the rear of the pulpit. The Sabbath-school room will accommodate, with its class-rooms, 700. The cost of the building was $65,000. Wesley church, in John Street, was built about 1840, but has since that period been remodeled. Its size is 63 by 101 feet. The architecture is in the Gothic style, and when the improvements are finished will have towers surmounted with steeples. It is intended to seat 1200 people, at a cost of about $14,000. The Zion Tabernacle and King Street churches are also large and beautiful edifices. The Simcoe Street church is not so large, being 54 by 74, and will seat 550 persons; its style is plain Gothic, and cost about $9000. There is also the Hannah Street Mission church, a small edifice, built by the New Connection prior to the union. It is in a fine location, with a probability of growth, though the present edifice is plain and unpretending.

Hamlin, B. B., D.D., was born in Warren Co., Pa., Aug. 28, 1823; was converted Aug. 28, 1842; and was licensed to preach Feb. 10, 1844. He was admitted on trial into the Baltimore Conference in 1848, and remained in connection with it until the formation of the Central Pennsylvania Conference. He has since been a member of the latter, filling its principal appointments, serving three terms in the office of presiding elder, and having been a member of the General Conferences of 1864, 1872, and 1876.

Hamline, Leonidas Lent, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Burlington, Conn., May 10, 1797, and died in Mount Pleasant, Iowa, Feb. 22, 1865. His early studies were pursued with some thought of the Christian ministry, but arriving at manhood he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Lancaster, O. The death of a little daughter, in 1828, led him to serious reflection, and he united with the M. E. Church in the autumn of that year. Shortly afterwards he was licensed, first to exhort and then to preach, and prevented his active work. In 1852 he resigned the episcopal office, and by his request his name was placed among the superannuated preachers of the Ohio Conference. Desiring perfect quiet, he moved to Mount Pleasant, Iowa, where he closed his life. In an account which he wrote for his family, speaking of the years from 1852 to 1860, he says, "For eight years I have been afflicted, and God has 'tried me as silver is tried,' but he has often sweetened those trials by his presence in a marvelous in 1832 was received on trial in the Ohio Conference. In 1834 he was stationed at Wesley chapel, Cincinnati, and on the decease of Rev. W. Phillips, in 1836, he was appointed assistant editor of The Western Christian Advocate, and was elected to the same position in 1840. When The Ladies' Repository was established, in January, 1841, to him was assigned the work of editing that journal, in which office he remained until 1844, when he was elected to the office of bishop. He filled that position with great usefulness until declining health, in 1850, manner. And now, day by day, my fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ. Though almost helpless, and dependent upon my devoted and affectionate wife for personal attentions, who never wearies in bestowing on me her exemplary patience (thanks be to thy holy name, O God, for such a gift), yet I am far more contented and cheerful than in the best days of my youth." In his last illness he prayed for his family, the church, his own Conference, the missions, the country, the world. He then had occasion to drink, and his painful thirst reminded him of the exclamation on the cross when the Saviour said, "I thirst!" He burst into tears and broke out again in praise. He spoke of his present state, and of fresh baptism into Christ; into his glorious name, and exclaimed, "Oh, wondrous, wondrous, wondrous love!" Dr. Elliott says of him, "As a preacher, he was in the first rank in all respects that regard the finished pulpit orator. His style as a writer would compare favorably with the best writers in the English language. He had no superior for logic, argument, or oratory. He was the subject of much bodily affliction, and when amidst excruciating pains, he retained the full exercise of his intellectual powers to the very last hour of his life." His principal writings, chiefly sermons, are given in the works of L. L. Hamline, D.D., edited by Rev. Dr. Hibbard.

Hamline, Mrs. Melinda, wife of Bishop L. L. Hamline, was born at Hillsdale, Columbia Co., N. Y., Sept. 29, 1801. She was carefully trained by a pious mother, and at a very early age was the subject of deep and abiding religious impressions. When about nine years of age, with a classmate of remarkable piety, she was in the daily habit of retiring for prayer, in one of which seasons she became inexpressibly happy and all fear of death was removed. In 1820 she was married to Mr. Truesdell, a man of brilliant intellect, and who from conscientious scruples chose teaching in preference to law, for which he had been prepared. Unitedly they taught a young ladies' seminary, with an interval of one year, in which Mr. Truesdell was a professor in Augusta College. In 1835 Mr. Truesdell died, and she continued the school for another year. She was subsequently married to Rev. L. L. Hamline, D.D., and while he was editor of The Ladies' Repository, she contributed occasionally to the periodical press, and prepared a small volume, a memoir of Mrs. Sears, which was published in 1850. In 1843 she realized the fact of her entire consecration to God, a point which she had been seeking in some measure for a number of years, but which she had not successfully reached until that period. In 1844, when Mr. Hamline was elected to the office of bishop, it became necessary he should have a traveling companion, and Mrs. Hamline cheerfully resigned the comforts of home-life and accompanied him in his journeyings as long as he was able to travel. When he retired from the active ministry they remained East among her relatives until 1857, when, at the advice of physicians and at the request of Dr. Charles Elliott and other friends, they settled at Mount Pleasant, Iowa, where they remained until the death of Bishop Hamline, in 1865. A few months after this event Mrs. Hamline went to Evanston, Ill., having arranged for the removal of her husband's remains to the beautiful cemetery of Rose Hill. Her residence has since been on the shore of Lake Michigan, where her friends meet regularly in her parlors for religious services. Both by her personal entreaty and by her pen she urges those whom she can influence to a perfect consecration to the divine will.

Hamline University was incorporated in 1854, and located at Red Wing, Minn. It owes its foundation to Bishop L. L. Hamline, who gave to it a donation of $25,000, and in honor of whom it was named. A part of this donation was used in the erection of buildings. A part of it was given in real estate, in Chicago, the present value of which is said to be equal to the full amount of the original gift. A preparatory school was organized, of which Jabez Brooks, A.M., was principal. In 1857 college classes were commenced, and B. F. Crary, of Indiana, was elected president. The financial crash of 1857 severely affected the young institution. It had incurred a debt, and its assets were either depreciated or destroyed, and its income diminished. The faculty struggled for a few years amidst difficulties, and in 1861 Dr. Crary resigned. He was succeeded in the presidency by Jabez Brooks, D.D., who resigned in 1869, and soon thereafter the school was suspended and has not been reopened. Notwithstanding its temporary failure its students and graduates are to be found in almost every walk of life, and it has paid the church all it cost. It was the first in the field in Minnesota, and its friends expect to see it resuscitated. In 1871, Rev. J. F. Chaffee was appointed agent, and the location of the institution was changed from Red Wing to about midway between St. Paul and Minneapolis, and near the line of the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad. Seventy-seven acres of land were secured, sixty of which are set aside for the purposes of endowment, the remaining seventeen acres being the campus. A building 122 by 50 feet, five stories high, of stone and brick, was put under contract and the walls partially erected. Under the labors of Rev. J. R. Creighton, Mr. Chaffee's successor, the building has been put under roof and in a safe condition. It is an imposing edifice, and will be visible from distant parts of the surrounding country. From its roof can be seen the homes of nearly 80,000 people. A second time it suffered from financial depression, which has been long continued and disastrous, and which was aggravated in Minnesota by the locust plague. There is some debt remaining on the building and on the adjoining land, but the property is not in peril, and it is hoped that with the return of prosperity the building will be finished, and the university will be in successful operation.

Hammer, Isaac A., M.D., is a native of Tennessee, born in 1827. While an infant his parents removed to Indiana, and in 1850 he became a resident of Iowa, and shortly afterwards became a member of the M. E. Church. He has occupied official positions for a quarter of a century, and since 1863 has held license as a local preacher. He is a member of the medical profession, and resides at Newton. He was first lay delegate from the Iowa Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Hamnett, Jonathan, D.D., a native of Pittsburgh, born January 10, 1816, was converted, and joined the M. E. Church in 1834. He was licensed to preach in 1837, and was admitted into the Pittsburgh Conference the same year. He was educated at Alleghany College, and graduated with honor, and in 1869 he received the degree of D.D. from Missouri University. He has been a member of the faculty of Alleghany College for thirty-one years, and for many years has been vice-president, and at one time acting president of that institution.

Hanlon, Thomas, D.D., was born of Irish Roman Catholic parents, in the city of New York.

REV. THOMAS HANLON, D.D.

March 23, 1832. Removing to New Jersey, he was brought up on a farm until he was sixteen, when he learned the carpenter's trade. He was converted on Freehold circuit at the age of fifteen, and entered the New Jersey Conference in 1852. He pursued his studies carefully in connection with the active ministry, and graduated at Princeton, N. J., in 1863. In 1867 he was appointed president of Pennington Seminary, and after having served six years he re-entered the pastoral work, and was appointed to Green Street, Trenton, and subsequently presiding elder of the Trenton district; but the necessities of Pennington Seminary seemed to the Conference to require his re-appointment, and in 1876 he again became president. The number of students has largely increased during the year, and vigorous efforts have secured its financial relief.

Hannah, John, D.D., an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Lincoln in 1792, and entered the ministry in 1814. He was distinguished by fervent piety, theological knowledge, ripe judgment, and pulpit eloquence. In 1834 he was appointed divinity tutor of the then newly-established Theological Institution. In 1842 and 1851 he was elected president of the Conference. The last twenty-five years of his life were devoted to his educational work at Didsbury, and during this period he likewise sustained the office of chairman of the Manchester and Bolton district, and held not a few of those great trusts which Methodism confides to its leading ministers. He discharged every duty with purity, dignity, and courtesy. It was as a preacher and teacher of divinity that Dr. Hannah was most useful. He was mighty in the Scriptures and in the power of God; his whole being was ruled by a living and practical Christianity, and his theological lectures were not only models of careful thought, of perspicuous arrangement, and of chaste and forcible diction, but they were means of grace as well as of mental improvement to the hearers. At the Conference of 1867 Dr. Hannah became a supernumerary, and a few months afterwards a sudden collapse of his physical powers brought his earthly life to a close.

Hannibal, Mo. (pop. 10,125), is situated on the Mississippi River, and the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad. Occasional Methodist services were introduced in 1820, but the first regular services were not held until 1832. The name first appears in the minutes of the church for 1837, with Nelson Henry as preacher in charge. It was then an extensive circuit, and reported 377 members. The first church edifice was erected in 1842, and was enlarged in 1850. At the separation of the church, in 1845, a part of the membership remained with the M. E. Church. These erected a new church in 1850, which was replaced by a very creditable structure in 1870. The M. E. Church South soon added another church. The African M. E. Church was organized in 1865, and a church was built in 1869. Hannibal is in the Missouri Conference, and reports as follows:

Harbin, Nathaniel Parks, was born in South Carolina in 1816, but removed to Georgia in childhood, and was converted in his fifteenth year. When the M. E. Church was re-established in Georgia he gave it his hearty support, and, being a representative man among the whites, he exerted much influence. He represented the Georgia Conference at the General Conference of 1876.

Harden, William, a minister of the M. E. Church, was born in Baltimore, Md., Aug. 27, 1828, and died in the same city Nov. 9, 1873. Converted in his childhood, he united with the church in 1845. In 1856 he was admitted on trial in the East Baltimore Conference. He filled various prominent appointments, and was presiding elder of Frederick district. He was a member of the General Conference in 1864, and for several years was secretary of the East Baltimore Conference. He was a man of intense working power, especially in revivals and camp-meetings. "As a preacher he was clear, forcible, instructive, and often his public efforts were attended with marked power. He was well read in general literature, and in Wesleyan theology a thoughtful student, endowed with more than ordinary strength of mind, careful in preparation, fluent and precise in expression, and of commanding presence."

Hardy, Robert S., an English Wesleyan minister, was born in 1803, and died in Leeds in 1868. He had a godly training; in 1825 was ordained, and sailed for Ceylon. At intervals he spent twenty-three years in that mission. In his labors to turn men from sin to God he was earnest and faithful, often undertaking long journeys on foot in order to reach portions of the population not otherwise accessible, and his work was greatly owned of God. He was learned in all the wisdom of the East. His publications on "Buddhism" and "Eastern Monachism" gained him great celebrity among the learned. He was elected a member of the Royal Asiatic Society. He read Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, Portuguese, Singhalese, Pali, and Sanskrit. His last illness was short, and his death sudden, but he was ready, full of thankful joy.

Harlan, Hon. James, was born in Clarke Co., Ill., Aug. 25, 1820, and in his youth removed to Indiana. He graduated with distinction at Indiana Asbury University in 1845, and then studied law. Having removed to Iowa in 1847, he was elected Superintendent of Public Instruction in that State. He was received on trial at the Iowa Conference, held October, 1854, and was appointed president of the Iowa Wesleyan University. In 1855 he was elected United States Senator from Iowa, and remained in that body until 1865, when he was appointed by President Lincoln, Secretary of the Interior. He was again elected to the Senate in 1866 for a full term of six years, retiring in March, 1873. He was lay delegate from the Iowa Conference to the General Conference of 1872. His residence is in Mount Pleasant, Iowa.

Harlow, William Thompson, a minister and teacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Duxbury, Mass., April 18, 1815. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1837, and in the same year became principal of the seminary at South New Market, N. H. In 1839 he was elected Professor of Philosophy and Mathematics in Emory and Henry College, Virginia. He joined the Providence Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1842, and continued to labor in the traveling connection till 1856, when he was appointed principal of the Rock River Conference Seminary, Mount Morris, Ill. In 1869 he returned to pastoral work in the Providence Conference.

Harman, Henry M., D.D., professor in Dickinson College, was born in Anne Arundel Co., Md., March 22, 1822; was converted when about seventeen years of age, and united with the M. E. Church. In his twenty-second year he was licensed to preach, but after teaching for a short time entered Dickinson College, in 1845, and graduated in 1848. He was for two years professor in the Baltimore Female College, and for about ten years was associated with Dr. Morgan in conducting a mathematical and classical school in Baltimore. One year he was professor in West Virginia University. Resigning his chair, he visited Europe, Egypt, and Palestine in 1869-70, on his return publishing "A Journey to Egypt and the Holy Land." Shortly afterwards he was elected Professor of Ancient Languages and Literature in Dickinson College, which chair he now holds. He united with the Central Pennsylvania Conference in 1872. He received the degree of D.D. in 1866. He has contributed various articles to the Methodist Quarterly Review, and is now publishing an "Introduction to the Study of the Holy Scriptures."

Harper & Brothers is the title of one of the largest publishing houses in New York, or in the world. For nearly sixty years their publications have been extensively read, and are now found wherever the English language is spoken; their magazines and weeklies being unrivaled in circulation. The house was founded in 1817 by the two elder brothers, James and John Harper, and was known as J. & J. Harper. In 1823 and in 1825 the two younger brothers, Joseph Wesley and Fletcher, were admitted as partners, and the name of the firm was, in 1833, changed to Harper & Brothers. Their grandfather, an Englishman, was one of the earliest Methodists, and his son Joseph was a farmer upon Long Island, where, in the midst of diligent labor and strict integrity and frugality, his sons, the members of the firm, were educated.

JAMES HARPER, the eldest, was born in Newtown, April 3, 1795. At the age of sixteen he was apprenticed to the printing business in New York.

On arriving in the city, he adhered to strictly temperate habits, resisting all the temptations which the city offered. He united with the John Street Methodist church, and opened a prayer-meeting in the house of an old colored woman near Ann Street.

JAMES HARPER.

In 1817, associated with a junior brother, he commenced printing for publishers, and in the following year the imprint of J. & J. Harper appeared on an edition of Locke's "Essay upon the Human Understanding." While attentive to business and blessed with prosperity, he remained a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church; was long a class-leader and a trustee in John Street church, and when he removed to the upper part of the city he joined St. Paul's church, on Fourth Avenue. He was attentive to his religious duties and regular in his family devotions. In 1844 he was elected mayor of New York, but declined all invitations to enter further into political life. On Thursday, the 25th of March, 1869, he was in his office in usual health. In the afternoon, riding with his daughter in the Central Park, the pole of the carriage broke, the horses were frightened, he was thrown from the carriage, taken up insensible, and carried to St. Luke's Hospital, where he died on the next Saturday evening, March 27.

FLETCHER HARPER.

JOHN HARPER was born at Newtown, Jan. 22, 1797; was educated under religious influences; apprenticed to the printing business, and united with his older brother in opening a printing establishment. He was the general financial manager of the house that has become so universally known.

In the midst of all his business he was a devoted and consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church; quiet, careful, devoted to his denomination, but liberal towards all. He was deeply affected by the sudden death of his elder brother, James, and from that period ceased to take much interest in the business. He suffered from a severe paralytic stroke about three years before his death, and, gradually declining, he died April 22, 1875.

JOSEPH WESLEY HARPER was born at Newtown, Dec. 25, 1801: was delicate in his youth, and was apprenticed to his older brothers. He became a member of the firm in 1823, and directed and superintended the correspondence with authors and writers and those connected with the business of the house. His letters were marked with urbanity of manner and intelligent clearness of statement. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, deeply devoted to all its interests; was a class-leader and a trustee. His residence was in Brooklyn, and he was connected with the Sands Street church. For some time before his death he was confined to the house and to his room, but he was cheerful and confident, exhibiting a filial trust in God. He calmly passed away on Monday morning, Feb. 14, 1870.

FLETCHER HARPER, the youngest of the four brothers, was born in Newtown, Jan. 31, 1806, and learned the printing and publishing business in the office of his brothers, and was admitted into the firm in 1825. He superintended chiefly the literary department of their work. He was kind and gentle in his association with men, and diligent and remarkably sagacious in the management of business. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church from his youth up, and was to the close of his life a member of the Methodist Episcopal church at Fourth Avenue and Twenty-second Street. Until within a year of his death his step was elastic and firm, and his eye bright and sparkling. A long illness which he suffered prevented him from taking any active part in business for the last few months of his life. He died May 29, 1877.

The four brothers were remarkable for their harmony in all their relations. "So close was the intimacy and so unbounded the common confidence, that for many years no accounts were kept between the brothers. Each one took what he needed for himself, and the others neither knew, nor cared to know, how much each one drew out for his own use. This state of affairs continued until within ten years of the death of James Harper." The success in business attained in such a manner by men of religious principle and of avowed religious profession, is a lesson worthy of study by the young men of the land.

Harrington, Calvin Sears, professor in Wesleyan University, was born at St. Johnsbury, Vt.,

May 17, 1826. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1852, and was in the same year engaged as teacher of Latin in the New Hampshire Conference Seminary and Female College, at Sanbornton Bridge. He was appointed principal of that seminary in 1855; was elected Professor of the Greek Language and Literature in Wesleyan University in 1861, and Professor of the Latin Language and Literature in the same institution in 1869. He joined the New Hampshire Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1854. He was a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872. He has edited an edition of the "Captivi," "Trinummus," and "Rudens" of Plautus, which was published in 1869.

Harris, Howell, the real founder of the Welsh Calvinistic Church, was born at Trevecca, Wales, in 1714, and died at the same place July 21, 1773. He was converted in 1735. He went to Oxford University the same year, but because of the immoralities of the institution remained only one term, and returned to Wales, and immediately began his evangelistic labors by establishing schools and organizing societies, although only twenty-two years of age. At that time there were only six dissenting chapels in all the north of Wales. Whitefield first met him in 1739. At that time he had visited seven of the twelve counties of Wales, and established about thirty societies. In 1743, Whitefield, Harris, Jones, and others organized these societies into the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Church. Wesley first met him in 1739, and their friendship continued through life. He was rudely persecuted, but continued to travel and preach, sometimes as often as six times a day. Under a threatened invasion of England he took a commission in the army, which he held for three years, preaching wherever his regiment went. He never was ordained. Wales is much indebted to him for his evangelistic labors.

Harris, William L., D.D., LL.D., one of the bishops of the M. E. Church, was born near Mansfield, O., Nov. 14, 1817. He was converted, and joined the church at a camp-meeting in Ohio, June 10, 1834. After having received an elementary education, he entered Norwalk Seminary, where, under the instruction of Dr. Chaplain, he remained for two years, studying the ancient languages and mathematics. He was licensed to preach in 1836, and was employed by the presiding elder on Wellington's circuit. In 1837 he was admitted into the Michigan Conference, which at that time embraced the northern part of Ohio, and was successively appointed to Dover and Worcester circuits, and to Mansfield. In 1840, the Northern Ohio Conference having been formed, he became a member of it, and was appointed to Belleville, Amity, Chesterville, and in 1844 to Delaware. Having served in that station one year, he accepted a tutorship in the Ohio Wesleyan University, but returned in 1846 to the pastoral work. But being stationed in Toledo he suffered from malarial fever, and was removed the following year to Norwalk. In 1848, at the unanimous request of his Conference, he very reluctantly accepted the principalship of Baldwin Institute, now Baldwin University, where he remained for three years, witnessing the growth of that insti-circumnavigated the globe, visiting the missions in Japan, China, India, Turkey, Italy, Switzerland, Germany, and Scandinavia. This journey occupied about eighteen months. He was a member of every General Conference from 1856 to 1872, and served as secretary of every session, having been re-elected without opposition. In 1874 he was sent as a delegate to the British Wesleyan Conference, and was at the same time accredited by the Ameri-
